I remember reading somewhere that Sumeru can be identified as the Himalayas, and the spatial cosmology is mostly India, the southern continent of Jambudvipa.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 14th, 2012 at 5:54 PM

Title: Re: How to get rid of clinging to self

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Buddha's basic remedy is the contemplation on the five aggregates and the 6-12-18 sensory fields. To see that whatever you call the I must be an aggregate, and all aggregates bear the three characteristics (impermanent, suffering, selfless) results in comprehending and even realising that there is no such thing as an I.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 19th, 2012 at 12:00 AM

Title: Re: Mondo Zen, Integral Zen (tm)

Content:

Jinzang said:

If the goal of Zen is to see through delusion, how is a modernized Zen going to see through the delusions of modernism? The truth is neither tradition or modernism is going to save us, but it easier for a modern person to see the faults of tradition and resist them than to see the faults of modernism.

Astus wrote:

The delusion to be seen through is the attachment to identity. Modernism, traditionalism, and any other form of presentation are only meant to make the realisation accessible. As long as a teaching leads to correct view it is an authentic method. The important question is the efficiency of the way, not the embellishment used to attract people.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 19th, 2012 at 7:47 PM

Title: Holmes Welch the Chan Transmitter

Content:

Astus wrote:

The <http://www.pragmaticbuddhism.org/node/12> and the <http://www.cloudwater.org/index.php/ch-an-zen/our-lineage>, practically the same lineage, claims that http://buddhistinformatics.ddbc.edu.tw/dmcb/Holmes_Welch_%E5%A8%81%E7%88%BE%E5%A5%87 transmitted the Linji Chan lineage of the http://buddhistinformatics.ddbc.edu.tw/dmcb/Jiangtian_chan_si_%E6%B1%9F%E5%A4%A9%E7%A6%AA%E5%AF%BA. Holmes Welch had Ven. T'ai-ts'ang in his book "The Practice of Chinese Buddhism, 1900-1950" as an important source of information on Chan history. In the same book Welch describes how Dharma transmission was a common practice of ensuring the succession of abbots in a monastery. He quotes from an account of the practice in the Kiangsu area: "In actuality this kind of "dharma transmission" has become a formality in the Ch'an sect. It is a million miles away from the dharma transmission by the direct imprint of mind on mind. This kind of dharma transmission is simply a traditional formality of genealogical succession." (p. 165) Stuart Lachs (<http://www.hsuyun.org/docs/english/pdf/DressingTheDonkey.pdf>) quotes from another work of Welch: "Dharma transmission is only an institutional sanctioning of a teacher bestowing membership in a teaching lineage and may be no more than, as Buddhist scholar Holmes Welch said "like [getting] a Flash Gordon pin.""

While Welch was interested in both Chinese Buddhism and Taoism, I can see no sign that he was also a Dharma teacher. And compared to his scholarly reports it appears to me strange to give him the position of a Chan master. Any other information on the subject is welcome.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 19th, 2012 at 11:42 PM

Title: Re: Online Philosophy & Buddhology Resources

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thesaurus Literaturae Buddhicae

(multilingual presentation of Buddhist literature sentence by sentence in Sanskrit, Chinese, Tibetan, English, etc.)

<http://www2.hf.uio.no/polyglotta/index.php?page=library&bid=2> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

Database of Modern Chinese Buddhism

http://buddhistinformatics.ddbc.edu.tw/dmcb/Main_Page "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 19th, 2012 at 11:42 PM

Title: Re: Online Philosophy & Buddhology Resources

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thesaurus Literaturae Buddhicae

(multilingual presentation of Buddhist literature sentence by sentence in Sanskrit, Chinese, Tibetan, English, etc.)

<http://www2.hf.uio.no/polyglotta/index.php?page=library&bid=2> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

Database of Modern Chinese Buddhism

http://buddhistinformatics.ddbc.edu.tw/dmcb/Main_Page "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 20th, 2012 at 7:47 AM

Title: Asian Classics Institute

Content:

Astus wrote:

It has an organised set of study materials online:

<http://www.acidharma.org/aci/index.html> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 20th, 2012 at 8:51 PM

Title: Re: Cultivating both Body and Mind in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think what should be differentiated is that outside of Anuttarayogatantra the bodily practices, if used in any community or tradition, are not part of the path to enlightenment but are simply exercises for health. But even in AYT I'm not sure what could be considered actual body trainings.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 20th, 2012 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: Cultivating both Body and Mind in Buddhism

Content:

Jikan said:

Would you say that prostrations are primarily a meditative practice, or a practice for health? How about circumambulation or pilgrimage?

Astus wrote:

They are not meant to train your body but to train your mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 20th, 2012 at 11:41 PM

Title: Re: Cultivating both Body and Mind in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

I understand "cultivating body" as a practice used to attain liberation by training the body. Prostrations, etc. are bodily activities - just as reading, listening, reciting, etc. - meant to assist the mind, and by training the mind one reaches enlightenment. Therefore, there is no cultivation of body in Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 21st, 2012 at 7:39 AM

Title: Re: Cultivating both Body and Mind in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

The "Mushindokai" page refers to a Tantric form of practice. Others also refer to Tantric body practices. And the question in the OP was if there is any kind of body training in non-Tantric Buddhism. That's how my answer is no. Even the concept of the system of channels, winds and drops is unknown outside of Tantra, if they can be viewed as body related practices or explanations for such yogas.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 21st, 2012 at 5:48 PM

Title: Re: Cultivating both Body and Mind in Buddhism

Content:

Meido said:

As mentioned, in Zen there are body and breath practices predicated on an understanding of subtle energetics, energy centers, and their utility for the integration or embodiment of realization. These are of course not practiced with reference to tantric texts.

Even basic meditation in Rinzai practice is concerned primarily with unifying a specific breathing method (involving a sealing of the pelvic floor and gathering of energy into the navel center) with one's bodily posture. In other words, the mental "method" of practice is understood, established and deepened through a specific use of the body, not separately from it or even alongside it.

Astus wrote:

Let's add that that kind of Rinzai Zen technique started with Hakuin and used to strengthen the body to avoid illness generated by extensive asceticism. It does not lead to realising the nature of mind, nor is it used in any other Zen school outside of Hakuin's followers. There are of course others who do different forms of yoga, qigong, etc., but again, not for liberation itself but as supportive methods to maintain health. As such, they are not much different from a healthy diet and proper clothing.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 21st, 2012 at 7:12 PM

Title: Re: Cultivating both Body and Mind in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Raksha,

The Shaolin monastery was first associated with Bodhidharma around the beginning of the 8th century by the Northern School's lineage story. But connecting Bodhidharma with martial arts happened almost a thousand years later in 1642 (see Faure: Chan Buddhism in Ritual Context, p. 91 and McRae: Seeing Through Zen, p. 26).

For me to see connection with body cultivation and the path of liberation would require instructions given in the sutras and the writings of the masters. So far I have not encountered any sutra or manual in Mahayana Buddhism that teaches such techniques, unlike in Vajrayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 21st, 2012 at 10:52 PM

Title: Re: Cultivating both Body and Mind in Buddhism

Content:

lobster said:

The Buddha himself said, "There is one thing that when cultivated and regularly practiced, leads to deep spiritual intention, to peace, to mindfulness and clear comprehension, to vision and knowledge, to a happy life here and now and to the culmination of wisdom and awakening. And what is that one thing? It is mindfulness centered on the body."

Elsewhere, Buddha said, "If the body is not cultivated, the mind cannot be cultivated. If the body is cultivated then the mind can be cultivated."

<http://mettarefuge.wordpress.com/2011/04/11/why-buddhist-practice-is-deeply-rooted-in-mindfulness-of-the-body/>

Astus wrote:

That is the first section of the fourfold basis of mindfulness (satipatthana), called mindfulness of body (kayanupassana). It is not by training the body but by training the mind that one uses that technique, otherwise we could say that Buddhism also has such methods as cultivating water, earth, space, etc. that can all be objects of meditation.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 22nd, 2012 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Cultivating both Body and Mind in Buddhism

Content:

Raksha said:

nothing truly secret or precious has EVER been written down in texts.

Astus wrote:

I guess you have not read this in the Buddhist canon.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 22nd, 2012 at 5:59 AM

Title: Re: Five Mountain Zen Order & Paul Lynch

Content:

Astus wrote:

Yudron,

In Buddhism, generally speaking, there are no special rules for establishing yourself as a teacher. Technically, a small group of monks can establish a separate community without problem. In fact, even a single influential monk or nun with substantial followers can start a new monastery or even a new tradition. Lay people are free to do as they want. Nobody owns the Dharma and nobody rules the Sangha. What really matters in the end is whether one can get the necessary support, either from the general laity or from political power, that will provide the material basis of Dharma centres, monasteries, publishing, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 22nd, 2012 at 6:14 AM

Title: Re: Cultivating both Body and Mind in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Meido,

What reason does Hakuin give that those practices result in realisation?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 22nd, 2012 at 6:29 PM

Title: Re: Cultivating both Body and Mind in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Meido,

So, according to your quotes, focus on the belly and the feet helps calm the mind at the initial stages of meditation. Did I miss anything?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 22nd, 2012 at 6:41 PM

Title: Re: Cultivating both Body and Mind in Buddhism

Content:

Raksha said:

I meant 'truly secret and precious' since obviously all the Buddhist canon is precious. Equally obviously none of it is secret. What is not written down are the instructions from a teacher to his student. The things of the greatest value cannot be obtained for money, nor are they displayed openly. If I remember correctly Tibetans believe that Buddhist texts have little value unless they are accompanied by a textual transmission given by a qualified teacher. What do you suppose this transmission actually involves, why can't it be written down or bought at the local bookstore?

Astus wrote:

There are many texts considered that kind of oral instructions, upadesha, written down by students. And in these days you have not only books but video records too. What would be the purpose of such special secret teachings anyway? Throughout the history of Buddhism there were groups that claimed to possess such secret instructions. What "secret instruction" actually meant is that they could not prove that it's from a traditional source so they called it hidden. This has happened with the Mahayana sutras, the Tantras, the Zen transmission, and all the rest. What is also common about them is that today you have it all written down. And even if there were some special secret instructions, nobody could use it as a reason in a discussion like this, because of its secret nature.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 22nd, 2012 at 8:23 PM

Title: Re: Hidden Truths and Secrets in Buddhism

Content:

Raksha said:

Likewise in Buddhism, what you can read in books is only the tip of the iceberg.

Astus wrote:

What do you base this view on?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 22nd, 2012 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: Cultivating both Body and Mind in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Split topic: <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=39&t=10896>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 22nd, 2012 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: Hidden Truths and Secrets in Buddhism

Content:

Raksha said:

Buddhism was not to be found in books, and that what was truly precious was never even spoken, never mind sold in bookstores.

Astus wrote:

This idea is found already in the earliest Prajnaparamita sutras, expressing that emptiness is the absence of conceptual proliferation. And then on the same is stated in later traditions like Zen with the same intention.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 23rd, 2012 at 1:40 AM

Title: Re: Hidden Truths and Secrets in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

In the Anguttara Nikaya (3.131 / PTS: 1.282 / 3.129) the Paṭicchanna sutta says,

"Monks, there are these three things which are practiced in secret, not openly. What are they? The ways of womenfolk are secret, not open. Brahmins practice their chants in secret, not openly. Those of perverse views hold their views secretly, not openly. These are the three things. Monks, there are these three things which shine forth for all to see, which are not hidden. Which three? The disc of the moon shines for all to see; it is not hidden. The disc of the sun does likewise. The Dhamma-Discipline of a Tathagata shines for all to see; it is not hidden. These are the three things."

(<http://www.fakebuddhaquotes.com/three-things-cannot-be-long-hidden-the-sun-the-moon-and-the-truth-buddha/>)

"Bhikkhus, these three are carried away covered, not openly. What three? Women are carried away covered not openly. Brahmanical mutterings are done under cover and Wrong view is covered not made manifest. Bhikkhus, these three when made manifest shine. What three? Bhikkhus, the moon shines when manifest, the sun shines when manifest and the Teaching and Discipline declared by the Thus Gone One shines when manifest and not when covered. These three shine when manifest and not when covered."

(<http://metta.lk/tipitaka/2Sutta-Pitaka/4Anguttara-Nikaya/Anguttara1/3-tikanipata/013-bharanduvaggo-e.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 24th, 2012 at 2:15 AM

Title: Re: Are Tibetan Buddhism and Tantric Buddhism the same thing?

Content:

pueraeternus said:

I get the impression that in Nalandabodhi (Dzogchen Ponlop Rinpoche's organization), they do cater for those who only practice in the sutra tradition. Which is interesting, since I also had the impression that all the Tibetan schools lead their students to tantra, with sutra only as preliminary training.

Astus wrote:

The <http://www.bodhipath.org/> of the Shamarpa is also mostly sutra teachings, i.e. Lojong.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 24th, 2012 at 8:43 PM

Title: Re: Is modernity bad for practice?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think that the current era is more conducive to practice than it was in the past. In pre-modern Europe (approx. before 16th century, although we can say that since the middle of the 20th century it is post-modern) people took the Christian world view as evident and everything else was simply wrong. Buddhism could spread in the West exactly because of the loss of faith after World War 2 in both religion and science. Explicit atheism in Europe is below 20% and even in the most atheist countries it doesn't go above 35%, while there are countries where organised religion is accepted by more than 90% (based on https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Religion_in_Europe). It is misleading to say that people are generally materialist just because state education consists mostly of non-religious subjects. But if you mean by materialist that people are greedy, there is nothing new about it. At the same time, with modernity came education and the accessibility of information. Again something that Buddhism greatly benefits of. In the pre-modern era the general population not just couldn't read but books were also a rarity.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 25th, 2012 at 12:17 AM

Title: Re: Sex, Death And The Meaning Of Life

Content:

Astus wrote:

Interesting show. It makes me ask how it could have happened that while Buddhism have had these ideas about exchanging oneself with another, empathy, removing the concept of identity, that Dawkins gives as sources of making life better, never really became the norm in any Buddhist country or region.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 25th, 2012 at 1:06 AM

Title: Re: Is modernity bad for practice?

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is misleading to say that people are generally materialist just because state education consists mostly of non-religious subjects.

Huseng said:

No, I'm saying state education teaches materialism (without calling it materialism) as the default worldview. If you got educated in pre-modern Tibet your worldview would be thoroughly Buddhist with the whole cosmology, karma and rebirth taught as explicitly real and realistic, whereas now there is an alternative worldview.

This is why so many people (not just in the west, but in Asia too) have problems with the idea of rebirth and karma.

Astus wrote:

Should rebirth be part of education? One could as well make it a theistic view. It is the very idea of removing all religious ideas from public education that helped pushing back religions from the front. Teaching or studying science is not the same as materialism. I'm not a science fan and I've never really been interested in it. But bringing religion back into education sounds like a very bad move to me. Buddhism should be ready for the challenge and prove its teachings instead of expecting people to just follow because the Buddha said so. The Dalai Lama is very clever in emphasising that kind of attitude, returning to the Indian teachers where they had to argue and defend their views in face of others who followed many different kinds of world views. Buddhism started its career in the West first by donning the robe of a rational philosophy. Today it is studied and spread by its meditation methods of helping people. Buddhism must stay humanistic in the sense of something tangible and close to everyday life. That way it might have a chance of staying alive. I trust and believe in Buddhism because I know it works and I find it logical. If I had just followed my culturally ingrained instincts about spirituality I would have left Buddhism long ago for a nice Christian church or some other Western philosophy, because that's where my inclinations were.

As for practice, I don't see any special hindrances created by technology. Is it really more difficult today to become a renunciate than before? What is it that stops anyone from ordaining? The government is not a problem, nor is travel, unlike before. There are monasteries now even in Europe, America and Australia where one can go. Food is not a problem in any developed country. In fact, if one really wanted to imitate the early Buddhist community, being a homeless beggar is less risky today than in ancient India, and one can still access public libraries and internet, not to mention healthcare, soup kitchens and shelters.

Are people in general more exposed to sensual pleasures today? Sure, because the society can afford it. And that is what the majority is interested in. Not surprising at all in the realm of desire, is it? But nobody forces anyone to watch TV, play games and go to parties. People have enough wealth and free time to support the industries based on entertainment, beauty products, travelling, etc. At the same time, one can put that time and money into spiritual endeavours as well. And many do. In developed countries more people live in better conditions today than the lesser nobility and burghers/bourgeoisie did a few hundred years ago.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 26th, 2012 at 5:17 PM

Title: Re: The Mahaparinirvana Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Gregory,

How is the concept of One Vehicle an important one here? I mean, even the Prajnaparamita Sutra in 8000 Verses says right in the first chapter that prajnaparamita is required by both sravakas and bodhisattvas. So, we can say that there is actually only one path and one goal taught in different ways for different audiences.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 26th, 2012 at 5:53 PM

Title: Re: Is modernity bad for practice?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Putting aside whether this is true or not, what if modernity is bad for practice? The idea of a Dharma ending age is not a new one, and it's not stopped any school to continue with whatever they had been doing. There are some emphasising the difficulty of the times for hundreds of years now, mainly the Pure Land schools. In Zen they emphasise that regardless of the circumstances every being has buddha-nature and the possibility to attain enlightenment right now. Vajrayana has both concepts and claims that it is the most appropriate method especially for this dark age. All three schools embrace householders and say that being busy in everyday life is not a problem. And there is Vimalakirti and the idea of the householder bodhisattva.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 26th, 2012 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: The Mahaparinirvana Sutra

Content:

Huifeng said:

But the Prajnaparamita does not say that there is one path and one goal...

Astus wrote:

True.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 28th, 2012 at 5:22 PM

Title: Re: The Mahaparinirvana Sutra

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

No its not,tathagatagarbha is not eternalism,when Buddha spoke of eternalists in was never in relation to enlightenemnt/Tathagatgarbha but was in relation to the false self not being eternal.

nilhism and eternalism in Buddhist sutras are in realation to the tainted self(5 aggregates/Skandalas)

Buddhism teaches that nhilism is wrong view so Enlightenment doesnt cease(if it did cease then it would annihilate=nhilism eternalism in Buddhism was in realation to the 5 Skandalas tainted self(as the Brahmas beleived the 5 Skandala self was eternal)the Buddha taught this eternalism was wrong view.

Astus wrote:

This idea that there is a true eternal self beyond the five aggregates is exactly the atman of outsiders and the teaching refuted by the doctrine of the five aggregates itself. If the buddha-nature were like that it would be indeed nothing but false teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 30th, 2012 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: The Mahaparinirvana Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

If there were a self beyond the aggregates, one could not touch it, feel it, think of it, or experience it in any way, because those are all within the aggregates. Something beyond the aggregates is beyond perception, beyond reality, therefore unreal and only a mental fabrication, an idea only. Realisation of such a self would also be impossible, as such a permanent self would either be already realised or never realised, since realisation is change and experience. A self beyond the aggregates has no function, therefore no existence.

"If the aggregates were self, it would be possessed of arising and decaying. If it were other than the aggregates, it would not have the characteristics of the aggregates."

(<http://www.fodian.net/world/1564.htm#Investigation%20of%20Self%20and%20Things>)

Commentary from the Zhonglun:

"If the soul existed apart from the five skandhas, the soul would not have the characteristics of the five skandhas. As it says in the verse: 'if the soul is different from the five skandhas, then it will not have the characteristics of the five skandhas'. Yet no other dharma exists apart from the five skandhas. If there were any such dharma apart from the five skandhas, by virtue of what characteristics, or what dharmas, would it exist?"

Commentary from the Prasannapada:

"And so, in the first place, the Self is not the aggregates; but it is also not reasonable for the Self to be different from the aggregates. For if the Self were something other than the aggregates, then the aggregates would not be its defining characteristics. For example, a horse, which is different from a cow, does not have a cow as its defining characteristic. In the same manner, the Self, when it is conceived as different from the aggregates, would not have the aggregates as its defining characteristics. Here, because they are conditioned (saṃskṛta), the aggregates arise from causes and conditions and their defining characteristics are occurrence, perdurance and decay. Therefore, if the Self does not have the aggregates as its defining characteristics, as you maintain, then the Self would not have occurrence, perdurance and decay as its defining characteristics. And in that case, the Self would either be like a sky flower, because it does not exist, or it would be like nirvāṇa, because it is unconditioned. As such, it would not be called the "Self," nor would it be reasonable for it to be the object of the habitual sense of 'I.' Therefore, it is also not reasonable for the Self to be different from the aggregates. Alternatively, here is another meaning of the statement, "If the Self were different from the aggregates, the aggregates would not be its defining characteristics." These are the defining characteristics of the five aggregates: (1) malleability, (2) experience, (3) the apprehension of an object's sign, (4) conditioning, and (5) representation of an object. If, just as consciousness is asserted to be different from material form, the Self were asserted to be different from the aggregates, then the Self would be established with a distinct defining characteristic. As such, it would be apprehended as being established with a distinct defining characteristic, just as consciousness is apprehended as established with a defining characteristic distinct from material form. The Self is not, however, apprehended in that fashion; hence, there is no Self distinct from the aggregates.

Someone objects, «The Tīrthikas know of a Self separate from the aggregates, and they thus speak of its defining characteristics. Hence, this way of refuting the Self does not refute them. And the way that the Tīrthikas speak of a separate defining characteristic for the Self is stated in the following verse from Encountering Madhyamaka:

The Tīrthikas conceive of a Self that is by nature eternal; it is an experiencer without being an agent; it is devoid of qualities and inactive. The Tīrthikas' system has come to be further divided in terms of this or that distinction in the qualities predicated of the Self.» (MAV 6.142)

We respond as follows. It is true that the Tīrthikas state a defining characteristic of the Self separate from the aggregates, but they do not state its defining characteristic after having perceived the Self in its actuality. Rather, through not properly understanding dependent designation, they do not realize, due to their fear, that the Self is merely nominal. Not realizing this, they depart even from conventional reality, and due to their false concepts, they become confused by what is merely spurious inference. Thus confused, they conceptually construct a Self due to their confusion, and they then state its defining characteristic. In the "Analysis of Factors in Action and their Object" (MMK 8), Nāgārjuna says that the Self and its substratum are established in mutual dependence on each other; and by saying this, he refutes the above notion of Self in even conventional terms."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 30th, 2012 at 5:01 PM

Title: Re: a true flame? a true jewel?

Content:

Astus wrote:

In the article Batchelor discusses how the organisational structure - basically, the idea of a superior teacher - can be a major factor in the abuses in Zen and Tibetan Buddhism:

<http://sweepingzen.com/buddhism-and-sex-the-bigger-picture/>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 1st, 2012 at 6:55 PM

Title: Re: a true flame? a true jewel?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think it goes like this. From the lowest level of a noble disciple (<http://www.accesstinsight.org/tipitaka/an/an05/an05.179.than.html>) enlightened beings follow a clear ethical conduct. A bodhisattva may go out of the boundaries of ethics driven by compassion, however, neither compassion nor the idea of skilful means are an excuse for misbehaviour in any situation (in the story of the ship captain bodhisattva he willingly took upon himself birth in hell as a consequence of murder). Therefore, either the teacher is truly realised and needs no special rules from the community, or the teacher is not enlightened and needs regulations and overview. There is no such thing as a naughty bodhisattva. Enlightened madness is what it is called, madness, therefore it should be treated as such.

The problem with the above traditionalist presentation is its extremity of pure-impure. Keeping up this division in general is useful to some extent, and that's how Buddhism operates in its established form, similarly to any organised religion. There is also the option to leave the whole enlightened-unenlightened question out of the business and see humans as humans. Spiritual attainments should not be organisational factors. In fact, they never are in the monastic structure. It is a Western mistake, a confusion, to think that teachers are necessarily enlightened. There is also a general misunderstanding about what enlightenment is. Abuses will continue as long as good willing teachers and writers fail to reform their presentation of Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 4th, 2012 at 6:38 AM

Title: Re: Karmic Debt and Pure land?

Content:

Astus wrote:

If I understand your question right, you are asking whether it is possible or advisable not to do something bad. Karma is action, volitional action. You have to want to do it. There is also habit - the effect of past karma, i.e. previous acts - that makes doing certain things feel more natural than others. Having the habitual impulse to do something is not what is called "karmic debt" usually. Karmic debt is an informal expression for the results of our past deeds, like our birth. And to answer the question, we always have a choice about what we do, even if that is reduced to doing or not doing. It is always recommended to avoid doing harm to others. There are situations when we feel virtually incapable to resist a negative emotion burning in our heart and it seems easier to act on it than not to. However, if we can recognise the presence of such an impulse before doing anything, that is already half way to evade reaction to the feeling. When we have become aware of an emotion and we want to become free from it, what needs to be done is to use the recitation of the name and that way offer the whole problem to Amita Buddha. This way we avoid both acting on the impulse and suppressing the emotion.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 6th, 2012 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: Mindful of what in Buddhanusmriti?

Content:

Astus wrote:

With the recitation one is aware of the name in sound and thought. Reciting with a distracted mind is still recitation, but this time one only recites with the mouth but not the mind, i.e. one is not really conscious of the name in thought and the sound moves to the background of one's awareness. There are several techniques of buddha-remembrance that one can use, but the commonest form of recitation is just about intentionally and consciously reciting the name.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 6th, 2012 at 4:39 PM

Title: Re: If lust is desire...

Content:

Astus wrote:

Let's first remove all the stories and ideas connected to sex and relationships. Then we're left with a fairly simple act that in and of itself is not more pleasurable than a dinner in the evening. Going directly to the opposite and of how sex is filthy and relationships are suffering, it goes nowhere but to frustration and anger. Also, creating a Buddhist myth of sex and relationships is as a romantic idea as the rest.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 6th, 2012 at 6:26 PM

Title: Re: Women can tell when you cheat

Content:

Astus wrote:

Based on the article there are a few problems with the research.

“More masculine-looking men (were) rated as more probable to be unfaithful and having a sexual history of being more unfaithful.”

"Men, on the other hand, seemed to have no clue. They tended to perceive attractive, feminine women to be unfaithful, when there was no evidence that they were, the scientists noted."

So, if someone matches the stereotypical idea of man/woman it's more likely to be also unfaithful according to both sexes. And while men confessed their unfaithfulness to a greater extent, women did not, the reason being the social view of adultery that this article strengthens and follows.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 6th, 2012 at 9:45 PM

Title: Re: If lust is desire...

Content:

Astus wrote:

One more thing about celibacy is how it is present in the Western world. The Catholic Church clergy is (supposed to be) celibate. And I suppose I don't need to repeat all those incidents that made it to the news about the different forms of abuse, and there are many less known too. Not a positive image of celibate people at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 7th, 2012 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: Women can tell when you cheat

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't believe that one's mental abilities depend on one's physical sex, and have not yet found any opposing reason or evidence to it. Otherwise we are stating that one sex is better in certain things than the other simply by birth.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 7th, 2012 at 6:49 AM

Title: Re: If lust is desire...

Content:

Yudron said:

Exactly. In my experience in a woman's body, it's not sex that is any kind of problem for my practice, it would be dwelling on thoughts about sex, and then getting in to relationships with non-practitioners which ends up with a lot of wasted time doing things to please someone whose priorities are different than a practitioners time are. Sex itself is no big deal, it's what we make of it.

I don't know if loosing semen creates all the problems some texts say they do, but in my body sex for me does not leave me depleted at all... I just feel a little healthier and happier afterwards... as I recall.

Astus wrote:

Loss of semen as loss of "vital energy", I leave this to those who follow such esoteric paths. If you look at it on the biological level there is no basis for such a belief (i.e. semen is continually reproduced anyway, with or without having sex).

In the Bloodstream Sermon of Bodhidharma it is written,

"But since married laymen don't give up sex, how can they become Buddhas? I only talk about seeing your nature. I don't talk about sex simply because you don't see your nature. Once you see your nature, sex is basically immaterial. It ends along with your delight in it. Even if some habits remain, they can't harm you, because your nature is essentially pure. Despite dwelling in a material body of four elements, your nature is basically pure. It can't be corrupted."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 7th, 2012 at 5:25 PM

Title: Re: Is modernity bad for practice?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here are some nice word from Keizan Jokin,
Monks these days are not stable in their conduct and do not thoroughly learn the major and minor forms of deportment and the internal and external mental arts, so it looks as if there is no monastic deportment. Even if mental states and physical deportment are like those of antiquity, if you have not clarified the realm of Mind, these are no more than the defiled state of humans and celestials. How much more do people who do not clarify the realm of Mind or control physical deportment receive the offerings of the faithful in vain and fall into the hells!

Thus, a former worthy said, "The world has deteriorated and people are lax. Even if one's mental states and physical deportment are not like those of the ancient holy ones, if one is able to clarify the one great matter thoroughly and intimately, perhaps one will not differ from all the Buddhas of the three times. He will become a brother of all the patriarchs and ancient worthies in history. From the beginning, there has been no triple world to escape, much less six paths to be traveled." Therefore, investigate thoroughly and study meticulously. Clarify the business beneath the patch robe. This one great matter has nothing to do with the three periods of the Dharma or differences between India, China, and Japan. Do not be sad about living in the evil time of the last days of the Dharma or hate being a resident of a peripheral land far away [from India and China].

Of course, even if any number of Buddhas came and tried to offer this one great matter, even their power would not suffice in the end. Therefore, this is not a path you can pass on to your children or a path you can receive from your father. You have to do it yourself, awaken to it yourself and acquire it yourself. Even though you practice for infinite eons, self-authentication and self-awakening happen in an instant. Once you rouse yourself, not so much as a hair in all of heaven and earth will get in the way. Once you reach this realm, nothing is hidden in the whole of eternity. How can there be anything to receive from Buddhas?

If you want to reach this realm completely, you must first abandon everything. You must not even seek the realm of Buddhas and patriarchs. Much less can there be any love or loathing of self or others. Just look directly within, without a hair of intellectualizing. There is without doubt something that has no skin or flesh. Its body is like space, without any specific form. It is like pure water, which is clear to the bottom. Completely clear and bright, you just have to know it thoroughly.

Now, how can I reveal this principle?

The water is clear to the very bottom;
The pearly gleams naturally, without need of cutting and polishing.

(Keizan Jokin: The Record of Transmitting the Light, on "Liangshan Yanguan", p. 215-216, tr. Francis Cook)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 8th, 2012 at 6:59 AM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism just as irrational as other beliefs?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Besides the encyclopaedic abhidharma, the psychological yogacara and the epistemological pramana teachings, there is a writing of the madhyamaka founder Nagarjuna (c. 2nd century CE), the Vigrahavyavartani ("The Dispeller of Disputes"), where you can see how the bases of rationality - logic and epistemology - is questioned and shown to be without any substantial foundation to rely on. So the question really is: what are rationality and irrationality if not simply conceptual constructs? The Buddha taught that grasping at such fixed views, believing them to be the exclusive truths, is the very source of all pain and dissatisfaction in life. Realising them to be what they really are, i.e. mental products, leads to freedom, compassion and wisdom.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 9th, 2012 at 6:09 PM

Title: Re: the Four Mountains (Big Monasteries) of Taiwan

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'd say Chung Tai for its Chan approach and DDM for its scholarly approach.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 9th, 2012 at 6:44 PM

Title: Re: What is "meditation"?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The two categories used are calming (samatha) and insight (vipasyana) to define meditation (bhavana). It is like this in Theravada and both Eastern and Northern Mahayana. The so called special forms like shikantaza and mahamudra are presented either as vipasyana or as the union of samatha and vipasyana.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 10th, 2012 at 6:16 AM

Title: Re: What is "meditation"?

Content:

Rakshasa said:

Is mindfulness a form of calming (shamatha) or insight (vipassana)? Interesting that you say Shamatha is a form of calming the mind, I like allowing all the thoughts and mental activity to calm down just by sitting in lotus posture with erect spine and trying to relax every muscle of my body so I must be practicing Shamatha.

Where would you categorize "focusing" in the Buddhist scheme of meditation?

Someone once told me that if you practice to stare at a candle light with complete focus for long time, you may develop psychic abilities. Since there is effort and mental focus required I don't think this could be classified as "Shamatha" (calming), right?

Astus wrote:

Mindfulness is the guardian of meditation, it keeps us on the object, and when the object is lost, we recognise that it is lost because of mindfulness. Mindfulness is a quality necessary for meditation, but it is not meditation in and of itself, since one has to be mindful when doing all sorts of things.

Focusing, being concentrated on a single object, can be used for calming the mind. However, focus alone is not meditation, because it can also result in a very agitated and narrow mind.

To be clear about the different qualities required for progressing on the path to liberation, I recommend you study the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bodhipakkhiy%C4%81dhamm%C4%81>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 11th, 2012 at 8:56 PM

Title: Re: East Asian Buddhist Schools?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Right now it shows that the service is temporarily unavailable, but this is a very good summary of Chinese Buddhist schools:

<http://www.buddhistdoor.com/OldWeb/bdoor/archive/nutshell/index.htm>

This is a summary of the ten Chinese schools: <http://www.buddhanet.net/e-learning/history/b3schchn.htm>

Traditional view of karma and rebirth is practically identical in all schools.

One more important thing to know about Chinese Buddhism is that "schools" exist only in theory, they are simply philosophical and practical categories of different types of teachings, but monasteries and communities seldom if ever specialise in only one or two of the schools.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 11th, 2012 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: the Four Mountains (Big Monasteries) of Taiwan

Content:

Huseng said:

Orthodoxy in this sense reflects a kind of Buddhism with many subtle Christian influences. I've often sensed in Taiwanese Buddhism a strong sense of appreciation for Catholicism. A lot of major Chinese Buddhist authors of the 20th century studied Christianity and even had a degree of contact with institutions like the Catholic Church. These exchanges still occur and are widely advertised as quite positive.

Astus wrote:

I didn't hear about that but it certainly explains a few things.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 11th, 2012 at 11:06 PM

Title: Re: East Asian Buddhist Schools?

Content:

icylake said:

in fact after 8-9th centuries, in Chinese buddhism, the "school" lost it's importance. only chan and pure land remained as distictive schools. and even those two schools were assimilated each other.

Astus wrote:

Chan as a school with its own organisation did not exist before the Song dynasty, but even then it just meant that a "Chan monastery" is a public monastery led by an abbot who is affiliated to the Chan lineage, but beyond that the monks' lives were as in any other monastery in the kingdom. Pure Land never had its own organisation, except for certain lay devotional communities. Tiantai was the major rival lineage, but again, it is an administrative issue rather than actual difference in daily monastic life. Strong distinct schools as in Japan never existed in China, because of the difference in regional and imperial government.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 12th, 2012 at 9:02 PM

Title: Re: How smart do you have to be to get it?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Being clever or not so clever is not an issue. The question is whether one has the dedication to the path or not. With the correct guidance - of course, what constitutes "correct" for someone depends on affinity - eventually anyone can attain liberation. With bodhicitta there is buddhahood, without bodhicitta there is no escape.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 12th, 2012 at 9:49 PM

Title: Re: Do Zen Buddhists fully accept rebirth as a truth?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are people who disregard the teachings on rebirth and anything else they deem supernatural. Anyone can freely study and practice Buddhism without fully agreeing to every words of the Buddha before checking everything personally. It is actually a level of attainment within Buddhism when one has gained assurance via study and practice that the teachings of the Buddha are true. So you should not worry about your scepticism regarding rebirth. However, it should also be clear to you that rebirth is a fundamental teaching within Buddhism on which the entire path of liberation is based (i.e. without something to be free from there is no point in working for enlightenment).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 13th, 2012 at 6:51 AM

Title: Re: Formal English Training

Content:

Astus wrote:

The <http://onedropzen.org/> is an international Rinzai organisation with a training monastery in Japan where they speak English. The <http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/> has several temples in Europe and America, plus all the Soto communities that are not members of the Japanese church. As for those who want to train in Japan, it seems only natural that one should first learn the language.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 13th, 2012 at 6:56 AM

Title: Re: Zen, doctrines and sutras

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is said that Zen is not based on written or oral teachings. On one hand, that means that the nature of mind is beyond concepts. On the other, Zen accepts the entire Buddhist Canon as authentic and does not make a single sutra or a set of sutras as their primary source. Nevertheless, there are certain sutras favoured by the tradition, mostly the popular scriptures in East Asia.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 13th, 2012 at 9:41 AM

Title: Re: Formal English Training

Content:

Astus wrote:

By training centres do you mean monasteries specifically designated as shugyou dera/doujou (修行寺/道場) by one of the official Zen churches? Because of those, all Rinzai sects combined have only 33 in Japan, of which 20 belong to the Myoushinji tradition.

Here is a training temple of the Sanbo Kyodan group:

<http://www.tetsugyuji.com/index.html>

However, if you extend this definition to all Zen centres (not necessarily Japanese) where one can regularly practice meditation and participate in retreat, there are quite a few in the West of those. Or if you mean monasteries where monks live, there are some of them too.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 13th, 2012 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: How smart do you have to be to get it?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"What I get all comes from my own mind - how could I be using some other power? It depends on whether or not the person in question is willing. If they themselves actually agree to develop the mind of enlightenment, even very ignorant people, who just know to drink when thirsty, eat when hungry, and feel attracted to the opposite sex - once they achieve the willing mind, then they can use this to discover that body does not exist and mind is only a name. When we are liberated in respect to body and mind, adverse and favorable situations and all the myriad differences all emit the light of our own mind. At this point, there is no place to put 'wisdom' much less 'ignorance'!"

(Zibo Zhenke: Discipline That Liberates, in "Zibo: The Last Great Zen Master of China" by J. C. Cleary, p. 112)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 14th, 2012 at 1:07 AM

Title: Re: Harrowing of Hell & Karandavyuha Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

When you have a compassionate supernatural being and a place where others suffer, it follows that such a being could as well travel to the underworld and help those poor sinners down there. Kshitigarbha is specifically the bodhisattva liberating hell beings.

Also see the mytheme https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Descent_to_the_underworld.

There is the Chinese https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ghost_Festival based on the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ullambana_Sutra where it is Mulian (Maudgalyayana, the arhat with magic powers) who saves his mother from hell.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 14th, 2012 at 8:07 AM

Title: Re: How smart do you have to be to get it?

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is the will to attain enlightenment, the decision to walk the path of liberation, giving birth to bodhicitta, the determination to become a buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 14th, 2012 at 5:54 PM

Title: Re: Thich Nhat Hahn

Content:

Astus wrote:

When you ask "Is it Zen?", what you may have in mind is a story of Linji shouting or Dogen sitting all day. In fact, Zen is just a short word for Buddhism. Does TNH teach Buddhism?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 14th, 2012 at 10:04 PM

Title: Re: How smart do you have to be to get it?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Reciting the nembutsu does not come from studying and understanding its meaning. There is no other reason or cause by which we can utterly believe in attaining birth in the Pure Land than the nembutsu itself. ... Even if those who believe in the nembutsu study the teaching which Shakyamuni taught his whole life, they should not put on any airs and should sincerely practice the nembutsu, just as an illiterate fool, a nun or one who is ignorant of Buddhism."

(<http://www.jodo.org/teachings/teachings02.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 15th, 2012 at 12:13 AM

Title: Re: Falling asleep

Content:

Astus wrote:

You should check your surroundings if they are optimal. You should also consider what kind of meditation you are actually doing. There are traditional methods used against drowsiness in meditation.

From the <http://antaiji.dogen-zen.de/eng/zzyk.shtml>:

If dullness or sleepiness overcome your sitting, move to the body and open the eyes wider, or place attention above the hairline or between your eyebrows. If you are still not fresh, rub the eyes or the body. If that still doesn't wake you, stand up and walk, always clockwise. Once you've gone about a hundred steps you probably won't be sleepy any longer. The way to walk is to take a half step with each breath. Walk without walking, silent and unmoving.

If you still don't feel fresh after doing kinhin, wash your eyes and forehead with cold water. Or chant the "Three Pure Precepts of the Bodhisattvas". Do something; don't just fall asleep. You should be aware of the great matter of birth and death and the swiftness of impermanence. What are you doing sleeping when your eye of the way is still clouded? If dullness and sinking arise repeatedly you should chant, "Habituality is deeply rooted and so I am wrapped in dullness. When will dullness disperse? May the compassion of the buddhas and patriarchs lift this darkness and misery."

From the <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn46/sn46.053.than.html>:

"Now, monks, on any occasion when the mind is sluggish, that is the wrong time to develop calm as a factor for awakening, concentration as a factor for awakening, equanimity as a factor for awakening. Why is that? The sluggish mind is hard to raise up by those mental qualities. Just as if a man, wanting to make a small fire blaze up, were to place wet grass in it, wet cow dung, & wet sticks; were to give it a spray of water and smother it with dust. Is it possible that he would make the small fire blaze up?"

"No, lord."

"In the same way, monks, on any occasion the mind is sluggish, that is the wrong time to develop calm as a factor for awakening, concentration as a factor for awakening, equanimity as a factor for awakening. Why is that? The sluggish mind is hard to raise up by those mental qualities.

From the <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an07/an07.058.than.html>:

"Well then, Moggallana, whatever perception you have in mind when drowsiness descends on you, don't attend to that perception, don't pursue it. It's possible that by doing this you will shake off your drowsiness.

"But if by doing this you don't shake off your drowsiness, then recall to your awareness the Dhamma as you have heard & memorized it, re-examine it & ponder it over in your mind. It's possible that by doing this you will shake off your drowsiness.

"But if by doing this you don't shake off your drowsiness, then repeat aloud in detail the Dhamma as you have heard & memorized it. It's possible that by doing this you will shake off your drowsiness.

"But if by doing this you don't shake off your drowsiness, then pull both your earlobes and rub your limbs with your hands. It's possible that by doing this you will shake off your drowsiness.

"But if by doing this you don't shake off your drowsiness, then get up from your seat and, after washing your eyes out with water, look around in all directions and upward to the major stars & constellations. It's possible that by doing this you will shake off your drowsiness.

"But if by doing this you don't shake off your drowsiness, then attend to the perception of light, resolve on the perception of daytime, [dwelling] by night as by day, and by day as by night. By means of an awareness thus open & unhampered, develop a brightened mind. It's possible that by doing this you will shake off your drowsiness.

"But if by doing this you don't shake off your drowsiness, then — percipient of what lies in front & behind — set a distance to meditate walking back & forth, your senses inwardly immersed, your mind not straying outwards. It's possible that by doing this you will shake off your drowsiness.

"But if by doing this you don't shake off your drowsiness, then — reclining on your right side — take up the lion's posture, one foot placed on top of the other, mindful, alert, with your mind set on getting up. As soon as you wake up, get up quickly, with the thought, 'I won't stay indulging in the pleasure of lying down, the pleasure of reclining, the pleasure of drowsiness.' That is how you should train yourself.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 15th, 2012 at 6:05 PM

Title: Re: How smart do you have to be to get it?

Content:

undefineable said:

On a level deeper than 'Buddhist' concepts, how do you see this? Could it begin from a desire to be free of self and no-self?

Astus wrote:

I don't know what depths you refer to. The will for enlightenment usually comes from understanding suffering and its causes.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 16th, 2012 at 7:09 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism in the Twenty First Century - Dr Alex Berzin

Content:

Astus wrote:

If "abandoning their heritage" is wrong for Asians, what about Westerners?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 18th, 2012 at 4:01 PM

Title: Re: Moral discipline is the central practical teaching..?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Before getting to Mahayana teachings, I recommend you go through these summaries of the Buddha's teachings based on the suttas, then you will see how detailed they actually are.

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/lib/authors/thanissaro/wings/index.html>

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/ptf/index.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 20th, 2012 at 8:03 PM

Title: Re: Zen - Principles and Practices

Content:

Astus wrote:

Interesting introductory film of the myth of Zen. The first half shows the rohatsu sesshin, a single event in an entire year of a monastery, as if Christianity were all about Lent. The second half shows different traditional Japanese arts associated to some extent with Zen, although that is debatable, since they are generally Chinese arts exported to Japan. Comparisons made between medieval Japanese and European culture sounded to me far fetched, especially when it connects a tea house (chashitsu) with a Gothic cathedral.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 20th, 2012 at 8:49 PM

Title: Re: Why was E-Sangha controversial?

Content:

Astus wrote:

If anyone is interested, the major trouble in the Zen section of eSangha was about rebirth, a subject that was put into the TOS in order to avoid further debates. Both Jundo and Nonin got banned in the course of that issue, and of course personal heated debates with mods. The interpretation of buddhahood was never a subject of regulation as far as I remember.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 20th, 2012 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: Zen - Principles and Practices

Content:

Astus wrote:

True, as it was produced by the <http://firstzen.org/>.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 22nd, 2012 at 2:56 AM

Title: Re: When was the first exclusively Mahayana ordination?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Exclusively Mahayana ordination, that was invented by Saicho of the Tendai school, who used only the Brahmajala Sutra and not the usual pratimoksha. In China the ordination has always been based on one or another set of Vinaya, eventually developing into using only the Dharmagupta Vinaya and the threefold ordination (novice + monk + bodhisattva).

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 22nd, 2012 at 7:06 PM

Title: Re: When was the first exclusively Mahayana ordination?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Bhikkhu Sujato has a study: <https://sites.google.com/site/sectsandsectarianism/home>, that shows how different sects developed, not because of some doctrinal schism but natural evolution, as a result of historical circumstances. As he writes in the conclusion, "We cannot find any evidence anywhere for the formation of schools due to schisms in the narrow Vinaya sense."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 25th, 2012 at 6:48 AM

Title: Re: "No Seeking" teaching of Linchi (Rinzai)

Content:

Astus wrote:

To answer the original question, the Extensive Record of Baizhang starts with these words,

"In language you must distinguish the esoteric and the exoteric; you must distinguish generalizing and particularizing language, and you must distinguish the language of the complete teaching and the incomplete teaching.

The complete teaching discusses purity; the incomplete teaching discusses impurity. Explaining the defilement in impure things is to weed out the profane; explaining the defilement in pure things is to weed out the holy.

Before the nine-part teaching had been expounded, living beings had no eyes; it was necessary to depend on someone to refine them. If you are speaking to a deaf worldling, you should just teach him to leave home, maintain discipline, practice meditation and develop wisdom. You should not speak this way to a worldling beyond measure, someone like Vimalakirti or the great hero Fu."

(Sayings and Doings of Pai-Chang, p. 29, tr. T. Cleary)

From the Record of Guishan,

"There was a monk who asked the Master, "Does a person who has had sudden awakening still need to continue with cultivation?" The Master said, "If one has true awakening and attains to the fundamental, then at that time that person knows for himself that cultivation and noncultivation are just dualistic opposites. Like now, though the initial inspiration is dependent on conditions, if within a single thought one awakens to one's own reality, there are still certain habitual tendencies that have accumulated over numberless kalpas which cannot be purified in a single instant. That person should certainly be taught how to gradually remove the karmic tendencies and mental habits: this is cultivation. There is no other method of cultivation that needs to be taught to that person."

(Sun-Face Buddha, p. 24-25, tr. M. Poceski)

Hanshan Deqing <http://chancenter.org/cmc/2011/10/13/essentials-of-practice-and-enlightenment-for-beginners/>,

"This state of actualized-enlightenment can be further divided into shallow and profound realizations. If you exert your efforts at the root [of your existence], smashing away the cave of the eighth consciousness, and instantaneously overturn the den of fundamental ignorance, with one leap directly enter [the realm of enlightenment], then there is nothing further for you to learn. This is having supreme karmic roots. Your actualization will be profound indeed. The depth of actualization for those who practice gradually, [on the other hand,] will be shallow.

...

So called sudden enlightenment and gradual practice refers to one who has experienced a thorough enlightenment but, still has remnant habit tendencies that are not instantaneously purified. For these people, they must, implement the principles from their enlightenment that they have realized to face all circumstances of life and, bring forth the strength from their contemplation and illumination to experience their minds in difficult situations."

I think that saying "no seeking" requires loads of practices is contrary to Linji's approach to the matter.

"Bring to rest the thoughts of the ceaselessly seeking mind, and you will not differ from the patriarch-buddha. Do you want to know the patriarch-buddha? He is none other than you who stand before me listening to my discourse. But because you students lack faith in yourselves, you run around seeking something outside. Even if, through your seeking, you did find something, that something would be nothing more than fancy descriptions in written words; never would you gain the mind of the living patriarch. Make no mistake, worthy Chan men! If you don't find it here and now, you'll go on transmigrating through the three realms for myriads of kalpas and thousands of lives, and, held in the clutch of captivating circumstances, be born in the wombs of asses or cows."

(Record of Linji, p. 8, tr. Sasaki)

"This threefold body is you, listening to my discourse right now before my very eyes. It is precisely because you don't run around seeking outside that you have such meritorious activities."

(p. 9)

"What is my purpose in speaking this way? I do so only because you followers of the Way cannot stop your mind from running around everywhere seeking, because you go clambering after the worthless contrivances of the men of old."

...

"Virtuous monks, time is precious. And yet, hurrying hither and thither, you try to learn meditation, to study the Way, to accept names, to accept phrases, to seek buddha, to seek a patriarch, to seek a good teacher, to think and speculate.

Make no mistake, followers of the Way! After all, you have a father and a mother—what more do you seek? Turn your own light inward upon yourselves! A man of old said:

Yajñadatta [thought he had] lost his head,

But when his seeking mind came to rest, he was at ease."

(p. 10)

"Outside mind there's no dharma, nor is there anything to be gained within it. What are you seeking? Everywhere you say, 'There's something to practice, something to obtain.' Make no mistake! Even if there were something to be gained by practice, it would be nothing but birth-and-death karma. You say, 'The six pāramitās and the ten thousand [virtuous] actions are all to be practiced.' As I see it, all this is just making karma."

...

"There are a bunch of blind shavepates who, having stuffed themselves with food, sit down to meditate and practice contemplation. Arresting the flow of thought they don't let it rise; they hate noise and seek stillness. This is the method of the heretics. A patriarch said, 'If you stop the mind to look at stillness, arouse the mind to illumine outside, control the mind to clarify inside, concentrate the mind to enter samādhi—all such [practices] as these are artificial striving.'"

(p. 17)

"Followers of the Way, true buddha has no figure, true dharma has no form. All you're doing is devising models and patterns out of phantoms. Anything you may find through seeking will be nothing more than a wild fox-spirit; it certainly won't be the true buddha. It will be the understanding of a heretic."

(p. 20)

"I say to you there is no buddha, no dharma, nothing to practice, nothing to enlighten to. Just what are you seeking in the highways and byways? Blind men! You're putting a head on top of the one you already have. What do you yourselves lack? Followers of the Way, your own present activities do not differ from those of the patriarch-buddhas. You just don't believe this and keep on seeking outside. Make no mistake! Outside there is no dharma; inside, there is nothing to be obtained. Better than grasp at the words from my mouth, take it easy and do nothing. Don't continue [thoughts] that have already arisen and don't let those that haven't yet arisen be aroused. Just this will be worth far more to you than a ten years' pilgrimage."

(p. 22)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 25th, 2012 at 5:50 PM

Title: Re: "No Seeking" teaching of Linchi (Rinzai)

Content:

Astus wrote:

When the Buddha talked about those with little dust in their eyes, it was about people who are capable of understanding the Dharma. That is, any Buddhist.

Enlightenment is not about gaining or getting rid of something. It is realising for oneself that there is nothing to gain or lose, which is the same as saying that there is nothing to seek, that the mind is originally perfect. The one reading this is without form or substance and there is no hindrance to its all encompassing activities. Isn't this true?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 25th, 2012 at 10:03 PM

Title: Re: "No Seeking" teaching of Linchi (Rinzai)

Content:

greentara said:

Astus, It maybe premature to say that I am without form or substanceeven though the scriptures may say it's true.

Astus wrote:

Is there a thought, a feeling or any experience that you constantly perceive? If not, it can't be said there is a substantial thing anywhere. Nevertheless, you can still perform your daily tasks, interact with people and decide what you want to do next. Isn't that how it appears to you? That's why there is no need to seek anything beyond this mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 26th, 2012 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: "No Seeking" teaching of Linchi (Rinzai)

Content:

Astus wrote:

Although this is from Menzan Zuiho's Jijuyu Zanmai, the sentiment is the same:

"If Zen indicated nothing but doing dhyana, it would be the dhyana of the six paramita, or the samadhi of the three studies. All bodhisattvas practice these, and since they all practice zazen, they would not select just one of those practices and give it the special name of marvelous mind of nirvana a, the eye of the storehouse of true dharma, and pass it down.

Even though there are many people who are said to be doing zazen, all of them are apparently doing the practice of the ordinary deluded followers of the two vehicles or following the provisional bodhisattva [way]. Those who know the Buddha Samadhi, the realm of the original awakening of the Buddhas, are rare. Because of this [misunderstanding] people concentrate on a koan to hasten awakening. They labor the mind to find the subject who sees and hears [kenmon no shujinko]. They sweep clear the distracted mind [monen] and think that no-mind [munen] is good."

(Zen Classics, p. 257-258)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 26th, 2012 at 5:53 PM

Title: Re: "No Seeking" teaching of Linchi (Rinzai)

Content:

greentara said:

Astus, I think it's best to stay with what I know. I know I exist..... more than that I can't be sure of!

Astus wrote:

That knowledge is already enough. There is nothing else to be discussed in Buddhism.

"I know I exist" - this is the starting point. Then one has to look at what is it that exists. That's the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Skandha#The_five_skandhas and the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Skandha#Eighteen_Dh.C4.81tus. They are two ways of categorising our everyday experience.

There is nothing else that we can consider existing beyond those. Forms, sounds, feelings and ideas are all covered. And this is where one has to investigate, look at how they exist. This is called insight meditation, vipasyana. This is level one. Zen comes a couple of steps later.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 26th, 2012 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Template of the Mahayana sutras?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Mahayana Sutras were written texts from the beginning, unlike the agamas as we can see in the Pali Canon. The statement about the importance of a given sutra is like a self-advertisement in order to have the sutra be spread and preserved.

There are sutras describing meditation techniques and wisdom teachings besides moral subjects. Here are some popular ones: Vimalakirti Sutra, Diamond Sutra, Surangamasamadhi Sutra, Amitabha Sutra, Prajnaparamita in 8000 Verses Sutra, Lankavatara Sutra, Samdhinirmocana Sutra.

See some collections of Mahayana scriptures here:

<http://fodian.net/world/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;
<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra0.html> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;
<http://www4.bayarea.net/~mtlee/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;
<http://lirs.ru/lib/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;
<http://www2.hf.uio.no/polyglotta/index.php?page=library&bid=2> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;
<http://www.bdkamerica.org/default.aspx?MPID=81> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 27th, 2012 at 9:49 PM

Title: Re: The Commodification of Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

It is an interesting mixture of socialist and romantic ideas. Because there is exploitation of the working class and the natural resources, Buddhists should return to a pre-modern state. Should Buddhists live like the Amish? That is quitting society and not liberating beings. Isn't there a bodhisattva in the marketplace as the perfect embodiment of Mahayana? The "dirt of the world" is not something outside to avoid. Commodification can be another term for skilful means. Buddhism must be meaningful in order to reach the people.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 28th, 2012 at 5:32 PM

Title: Re: What else to do. Waiting for Rainbow Body.

Content:

Inge said:

I find it strange that on a buddhist board, one of the worst things you can do, is to claim that buddhist methods actually works.

Astus wrote:

Strange indeed.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 28th, 2012 at 7:07 PM

Title: Re: The Commodification of Buddhism

Content:

Huseng said:

Why is it always one perceived extreme to another?

I'm saying recognize the dirty money for what it is and be open about it.

Recognizing one's own necessary evils does not necessitate taking extreme measures.

Astus wrote:

I see. Well, it'd be nice to see every person and organisation within capitalist economic systems saying that money comes from the exploitation of the working class and financial tricks. That would practically mean becoming Socialists. However, there is more than one point of view, thus money is not necessarily dirty, exploitation can be renamed opportunity and natural evolution, etc. As long as people can live in peace and security there is little need for political and economical questions. Alas, we don't live in Paradise. And if we think about it, there is nothing accomplished without work. Although if people were not so greedy we could manage providing the basics of food and clothing without much problem to everyone.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 29th, 2012 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: Remaining confirmed Enlightened Masters.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Within Buddhism the English word "enlightenment" can mean several things, depending on context and tradition. Outside of Buddhism it is even more complicated, and just because there is one word used it does not mean that it has the same meaning.

Since it seems to me that you are new to Buddhism, I recommend you start here: <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/ptf/index.html>. This covers the basics. Once finished you can go to other topics, like the different Indian schools and how Buddhism developed in other cultures throughout Asia.

There are many teachers within Buddhism who can teach people the path to enlightenment. If there were none or just a few, Buddhism would be already dead or dying. Fortunately the Buddha's teaching and the Buddhist community is well and alive. And you are free to choose from the many available resources it has.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 1st, 2013 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: Hua tou, mind on breath, reciting etc, which one and why?

Content:

Astus wrote:

If you are interested in Chan, you can start with these:

<http://hsuyun.budismo.net/en/dharma/index.html>

<http://www.westernchanfellowship.org/reading/articles-for-newcomers-to-chan-and-zen-meditation/>

<http://chancenter.org/cmc/publications/free-literature/>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 3rd, 2013 at 6:05 PM

Title: Re: Online Philosophy & Buddhology Resources

Content:

Huseng said:

The THESAURUS LITERATURAE BUDDHICAE (TLB) is a multilingual presentation of Buddhist literature sentence by sentence in Sanskrit, Chinese, Tibetan, English, etc.

<http://www2.hf.uio.no/polyglotta/index.php?page=library&bid=2> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Astus wrote:

You should read the topic more often:

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=138169#p138169> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 3rd, 2013 at 6:05 PM

Title: Re: Online Philosophy & Buddhology Resources

Content:

Huseng said:

The THESAURUS LITERATURAE BUDDHICAE (TLB) is a multilingual presentation of Buddhist literature sentence by sentence in Sanskrit, Chinese, Tibetan, English, etc.

<http://www2.hf.uio.no/polyglotta/index.php?page=library&bid=2> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Astus wrote:

You should read the topic more often:

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=138169#p138169> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 4th, 2013 at 4:03 AM

Title: Re: Eckhart Tolle on christmas

Content:

lowlydog said:

What is the truth about Christmas?

In the history of Christianity, if you believe you are the sole possessor of the truth then that belief has the power to corrupt your actions, even to the point of insanity – whether it's the Catholic Inquisition or a big shopping spree. The Truth is inseparable from who you are. If you look for it in ideas, beliefs, or even gifts from the store, you will be deceived every time.

The true meaning of Christmas is that the very Being that you are is Truth. This is what Jesus meant when he said, "I am the way and the truth and the life."

Jesus speaks of the inner essence identity of every human being. Some Christian writers call this the "Christ within". The real meaning of Christmas is to find that essential self that is universally experienced as the Christ within no matter what your cultural or religious upbringing is. As we approach the ceremonial date of the birth of Christ and as many of you gather with friends and family, perhaps standing in the silence of the Christ within can keep bringing you back to Being - the eternal life that Christ promised human kind.

Astus wrote:

How does this match with the Buddha's teachings?

"if you believe you are the sole possessor of the truth then that belief has the power to corrupt your actions, even to the point of insanity"

"Those who dispute, taking hold of a view, saying, "This, and this only, is true," those you can talk to. Here there is nothing — no confrontation at the birth of disputes." (Snp 4.8)

"The Truth is inseparable from who you are."

What "Truth"?

"the very Being that you are is Truth"

"If a bodhisattva abides in the signs of self, person, sentient being, or life-span, she or he is not a bodhisattva." (Diamond Sutra, ch. 3)

"the inner essence identity of every human being. Some Christian writers call this the "Christ within"."

"the assertion of philosophical views which are non-existent [i. e., not true], is meant that in the Skandhas, Dhatus, and Ayatanas, [some philosophers] assume the existence of an ego, a being, a soul, a living being, a nourisher, or a spirit. This is said, Mahamati, to be the assertion of some philosophical views which are nonexistent [i. e., not true]." (Lankavatara Sutra 2.XXV)

"the eternal life that Christ promised human kind"

"Regard heaven and earth and consider their impermanence. Regard the world and consider its impermanence." (The Sutra of Forty-Two Sections Spoken by the Buddha, section 19)

What Tolle does in this short quote is first denying that there is a person or organisation in sole possession of the Truth, claims that there are many religions and spiritual traditions in possession of the Truth, to eventually say that what he calls the Truth is the Truth of everyone else, practically making himself the representative of everyone else and denying their own definition of their own truth. But as we can see, his teachings don't agree with the Buddha's, and it's also unlikely that mainstream Christians would accept his interpretation.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 4th, 2013 at 5:49 PM

Title: Re: "Zen is Going to Hell and It's the Boomers' Fault!"

Content:

Astus wrote:

It's natural selection. Species that are incapable of reproduction die out. In Buddhism the minimal requirement is transmitting the form. In Zen it should be the substance that is passed on, but when the teachers don't have it how could the students?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 4th, 2013 at 5:59 PM

Title: Re: Every-minute Meditation.

Content:

Astus wrote:

A story about "doing one thing at a time".

Unknown said:

Seung Sahn would say, "When you eat, just eat. When you read the newspaper, just read the newspaper. Don't do anything other than what you are doing."

One day a student saw him reading the newspaper while he was eating. The student asked if this did not contradict his teaching. Seung Sahn said, "When you eat and read the newspaper, just eat and read the newspaper."
(Essential Zen, p. 15)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 4th, 2013 at 6:41 PM

Title: Re: Eckhart Tolle on christmas

Content:

lowlydog said:

Hi Astus, I'm hoping that this clip from his book will answer your questions.

Astus wrote:

Says the same thing as the short quote.

1. Those who believe that their truth is the real truth are wrong.
2. The truth is universal.

3. The universal truth is what Tolle thinks is the truth.
4. Tolle's truth is some sort of essentialism that has not been specified in the quotes.

What is obvious, however, is that Tolle believes that the Hindu's atman is the same as buddha-nature, something that is not accepted in Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 4th, 2013 at 10:02 PM

Title: Re: Eckhart Tolle on christmas

Content:

Astus wrote:

greentara,

Buddha-nature as a self is a skilful means. How can we tell? The five aggregates are not the self and there is no self possessing them outside of the skandhas either. Besides that there is no possibility for any self. This is the teaching of no-self in Buddhism since the beginning. Misinterpreting the buddha-nature as an ultimate self is as wrong as taking emptiness to be nothingness, the extremes that are the clear marks of wrong views. The correct view, dependent origination, refutes both eternalism and annihilationism.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 5th, 2013 at 12:19 AM

Title: Essential Zen Practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

"If a thought arises, be aware of it; once you are aware of it, it will disappear. The excellent gate of practice lies here alone."

(Zongmi on Chan, p. 123)

"Do not think of any good or evil whatsoever. Whenever a thought occurs, be aware of it; as soon as you are aware of it, it will vanish. If you remain for a long period forgetful of objects, you will naturally become unified. This is the essential art of tso-ch'an.

Honestly speaking, tso'ch'an is the dharma gate of ease and joy."

(Dogen's Manuals of Zen Meditation, p. 181)

"One must not delve into thoughts that arise, whether good or bad. As soon as a thought arises, he must become aware of it. He must always be aware of what arises in the sphere of consciousness without losing clear discrimination, and without becoming dull or scattered. A myriad of years is nothing but one moment of thought, which is neither discontinuous nor continuous. This is the essential Way (or method) of Zen practice. Zazen is in itself the doctrinal gateway of "comfort and ease."

(The Baizhang Zen Monastic Regulations, p. 256)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 5th, 2013 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: Eckhart Tolle on christmas

Content:

songhill said:

Where does it say in the Mahayana Mahaparinirvana Sutra that Buddha-nature is upaya or skillful means? MPN says, in fact:

"Again good sons! Just as all rivers flow to the sea, all Sutras and all forms of meditation lead ultimately to the Mahaparinirvana Sutra. Why? Because it expounds in the most excellent manner [the doctrine that all sentient beings] possess the Buddha-nature."

For the person who has realized and experienced this nature it is certainly not upaya. It's what makes a Buddha a Buddha.

Astus wrote:

I didn't say it is stated in the MPNS.

Can you define what the buddha-nature is and what is its relation to the five skandhas and eighteen dhatus?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 5th, 2013 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: Eckhart Tolle on christmas

Content:

songhill said:

Strictly speaking, BN is not, satisfactorily, definable because it is inconceivable. But this may help.

O good man! Buddha-Nature is birthlessness and deathlessness; it is not going, not coming. It is not past, not future, and not present. It is not something that arises out of a cause; it is not the making of any cause. It is not something made; it is not a maker. It is not any outer form, nor is it not any form; it is not something with a name, nor is it something with no name; it is no name and no matter. It is not long, not short. It is not something that has come out [arisen] in the five skandhas, the 18 realms, and the 12 spheres. Hence, we say eternal.

Astus wrote:

There's another word for that definition in Buddhism: emptiness. The very lack of any substance, self, essence, being.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 5th, 2013 at 4:45 AM

Title: Re: Eckhart Tolle on christmas

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Empty of other not empty of itself.

Astus wrote:
What is itself?

Author: Astus
Date: Saturday, January 5th, 2013 at 4:59 AM
Title: Re: Eckhart Tolle on christmas
Content:
Son of Buddha said:
Empty of other not empty of itself.

Astus wrote:
What is itself?

PadmaVonSamba said:
itself means, if you reduce something down to its core, there is some single element of which something ultimately is.

Astus wrote:
Then what is the single element called buddha-nature?

Author: Astus
Date: Saturday, January 5th, 2013 at 5:16 AM
Title: Re: Mind versus Self?
Content:
Astus wrote:

If buddha-nature is simply the lack of defilements then it is no different from how nirvana is defined in the four noble truths and other basic teachings. However, it is meaningless to say that "nirvana is hidden in every being", unless we are using a metaphoric or poetic language, or all we mean is the ability of beings to attain nirvana, which has not been denied in the first place, therefore the statement's sole function is to give some motivation to those lacking confidence.

Author: Astus
Date: Saturday, January 5th, 2013 at 5:26 AM
Title: Re: Eckhart Tolle on christmas
Content:
songhill said:

This nature, as in Buddha-nature, is not a sheer vacuum:
The atman is the Tathagatagarbha. All beings possess a Buddha Nature: this is what the atman is. This atman, from the start, is always covered by innumerable passions (klesha): this is why beings are unable to see it. — Mahaparinirvana-sutra

Astus wrote:

Then give the definition of what buddha-nature is and not what it is not.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 5th, 2013 at 5:27 AM

Title: Re: Mind versus Self?

Content:

Astus wrote:

However, it is meaningless to say that "nirvana is hidden in every being", unless we are using a metaphoric or poetic language

PadmaVonSamba said:

Yeah, that's pretty much what it is.

Astus wrote:

And that's why I said buddha-nature is a skilful means.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 5th, 2013 at 7:04 AM

Title: Re: Mind versus Self?

Content:

greentara said:

Astus, I know you are very sincere.... but can you please put in in your own words without overly using 'buddhist talk' I would feel you're speaking from some sort of direct experience no matter if it were just the merest hint or inkling.

Astus wrote:

Direct experience is what is right in front of us. What is that? The physical and mental impressions experienced by us, There are sights, sounds, odours, tastes, tactile sensations and thoughts. Is there anything permanent of them? No. Some believe that awareness/consciousness is permanent, based on the idea that behind all experiences there is a single thing experiencing them all. But is there an awareness independent of something to be aware of? Not possible. If there is not something to be aware of we can't say that there is an awareness of it, just like if we don't see blue we don't say that nevertheless there is the seer of the blue. And in general, without seeing anything, when there is no visual perception at all, the act of seeing is not present either. That's why an independent awareness is not possible. Could there be anything else beyond our present experiences? Even if there were it would be nothing else but our imagination of such a thing as we have no other experience of it.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 5th, 2013 at 7:09 AM

Title: Re: Eckhart Tolle on christmas

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Luckily in the Mahamudra tradition we have direct introduction (I do believe something of the sort exists in some Zen schools too?), if the student has the karma vipakka to successfully receive the introduction, this whole discussion disappears up its own...

Astus wrote:

I don't think there is any need for special tricks. The dialectical teachings of abhidharma, madhyamaka and yogacara should suffice perfectly.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 5th, 2013 at 6:44 PM

Title: Re: Essential Zen Practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

And what is that right practice in your opinion?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 5th, 2013 at 6:53 PM

Title: Re: Eckhart Tolle on christmas

Content:

songhill said:

What it is is through realization; not through verbal expressions or concepts.

Astus wrote:

That means you are arguing for something that you cannot explain or describe. You could as well argue for the Flying Spaghetti Monster and the Invisible Pink Unicorn.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 5th, 2013 at 7:12 PM

Title: Re: Mind versus Self?

Content:

greentara said:

Astus, Does that mean I think the sky is blue. I go up in a plane and don't see blueness anywhere. I return to earth and look up and again the sky is blue. Is this all illusion or can this 'small' insight wake us up?

Astus wrote:

Even physically the blue sky is an illusion, a result of the coming together of light, aerial conditions, the human eye and language. Not too long ago, before aeroplanes and such, in certain cultures people believed there is an ocean above our heads or a heavenly structure. From the personal perspective, even when you are looking at the sky you don't see it uninterruptedly in a continuity but there are moments of perception following each other, both physically and mentally. You don't keep the thought "blue sky" constantly in mind and you can't really keep your eyes open for long. There are further topics one can go through, like whether the sky is inside or outside, whether it is one or many, etc., as you can find in traditional Buddhist works. The result is that the "blue sky" is simply a dependently originated conceptual phenomenon.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 5th, 2013 at 7:19 PM

Title: Re: Eckhart Tolle on christmas

Content:

lowlydog said:

1. At the ultimate level Truth cannot be believed only experienced.
2. Truth is God, the law of nature is truth.
3. Tolle experiences truth, one cannot think truth.
4. Read his books.

Depends on how you interpret words, words have different meanings to different people.

Astus wrote:

2. Buddhism has no God nor does it consider any natural law ultimate.

Based on point 1 it follows that:

3. Since you cannot believe in truth you cannot tell what truth is, neither can one know what some other people experience, making truth completely incommunicable and subjective.
4. Since truth cannot be told it can't be written either.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 5th, 2013 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: Eckhart Tolle on christmas

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

So this was a lie then? If Dharma is dharma and we need to look past words to see the truth, then even false words, if we look past them, contain the truth.

Astus wrote:

So the New Age sentiment of anything goes as long as you agree that anything goes.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 5th, 2013 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: Eckhart Tolle on christmas

Content:

lowlydog said:

That depends on your definition of the word God. <https://youtu.be/2MSaVFuc3EI> "onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

3. You cannot believe the truth at the ultimate level, nor can you satisfy your hunger by watching others eat, making truth at the ultimate level indescribable.

4. Exactly, words cannot describe the ultimate level of truth.

Astus wrote:

Do you know of a sutra where the Buddha talks about God?

As I said, if that ultimate level cannot be told or described there is nothing to talk about.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 5th, 2013 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: Eckhart Tolle on christmas

Content:

songhill said:

I am arguing for something that is ineffable and non-conceptual which transcends the mundane whirl, and is realizable—but is not like the hairs of a tortoise. Our Buddha-nature is truly real, the secular world that runs away from the teaching of Buddha-nature is not.

Astus wrote:

If it is beyond the six senses it is irrelevant to our life, it does not solve the problem of suffering, and no being can experience it. If it is within the six senses it is necessarily impermanent and empty. There is no third option.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 6th, 2013 at 12:00 AM

Title: Re: Eckhart Tolle on christmas

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

If you want to know what direct, non-conceptual experience is, just wait until the next time you accidentally hit your thumb with a hammer. You will immediately know without knowing.

Astus wrote:

All the five physical senses are non-conceptual, states like coma, swoon and deep sleep are without concepts, and meditative absorptions beyond the first level are without concepts too. A non-conceptual experience is not an "eternal self" or anything full of miraculous abilities. Not grasping on concepts, realising emptiness, prajnaparamita, that is also not a "pure being".

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 6th, 2013 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: Eckhart Tolle on christmas

Content:

songhill said:

The five aggregates are the noble or ariyan truth of suffering (S.v.425) subject to clinging consisting of material shape, feeling, perception, habitual tendencies and consciousness. As long as we cling to them (the aggregates) we doom ourselves to endless suffering. We have to transcend them. In addition, besides being suffering the origin of suffering concerns the five aggregates.

"The desire, indulgence, inclination, and holding based on these five aggregates affected by clinging is the origination of suffering " (M.i.191). (Emphasis added.)

Astus wrote:

Clinging is the cause of suffering, not the aggregates. Removing clinging doesn't mean the elimination of the aggregates. It is understanding that there is no permanent thing, there is no self but only dependent aggregates that is the knowledge removing clinging. Imagining there is a real self inside or outside the aggregates is the ignorance causing clinging.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 6th, 2013 at 3:58 AM

Title: Re: Essential Zen Practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

Zazen is not a matter of body posture, nor is it a method to achieve something. This is what the Platform Sutra (ch. 5) and later generations say.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 6th, 2013 at 6:47 PM

Title: Re: Mind versus Self?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Exactly.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 6th, 2013 at 6:55 PM

Title: Re: Essential Zen Practice

Content:

songhill said:

In Caodong (Soto) posture is very important. For Dogen Zenji, zazen appears to be enlightenment. For example, "Sitting is itself the treasury of the eye of true Dharma and the mystic mind of nirvana" (Carl Bielefeldt, Dogen's Manuals of Zen Meditation, p. 169). Dogen Zenji seemed to believe that one is already a Buddha so that zazen is not practiced to become a Buddha. When the adept can sit in zazen with no desire his Buddha-ness will begin to reveal itself.

"For Dogen, zazen is not waiting for enlightenment, but simply the practice of buddhas. This practice is not to acquire something in some other times or in another state of consciousness or being. It is actually the practice of enlightenment or realization right now. And this enlightenment or realization for Dogen is naturally expressed in practice" (Steven Heine, Dale Stuart Wright, Zen Ritual, p. 177).

Astus wrote:

Sitting meditation is just a small part of a Zen monastery's programme, initially assuming a sitting posture is helpful for beginners. But not even Dogen or Keizan regarded sitting itself as the only form of Zen.

"Give up the operations of mind, intellect, and consciousness; stop measuring with thoughts, ideas, and views. Have no designs on becoming a Buddha. How could that be limited to sitting or lying down?"
(http://www.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/gongyo_seiten/translations/part_3/fukan_zazengi.html)

"Zazen means to clarify the mind-ground and dwell comfortably in your actual nature. This is called revealing yourself and manifesting the original-ground. In zazen both body and mind drop off. Zazen is far beyond the form of sitting or lying down."
(<http://antaiji.dogen-zen.de/eng/zzyk.shtml>)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 6th, 2013 at 9:36 PM

Title: Re: Mind versus Self?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Not self is a skillfull means to get too True self not self tells us what is not enlightenment and leads us to what is.

Astus wrote:

If the teaching of no-self tells us what is not enlightenment, then the true self should tell what enlightenment is. However, I am still looking for a clear description of what that actually is. Yes, it is said that it is "permanent, joy, self and purity", but those are just qualities without telling the thing that has those qualities.

Just to give an example of what I'm looking for from those emphasising "true self", here is an explanation from Sallie B. King's book "Buddha Nature" that is a study of the Buddha Nature Treatise (Foxinglun):

"The essential point here is that the new teaching of atmaparamita is not in conflict with the old anatman teaching, but on the contrary is the fulfillment of it. The very anatman itself, when taken to its extreme (i.e., when perfected) is the atmaparamita. This teaching is logically parallel to the sunyavada teaching that emptiness or sunya is the characteristic or the own-being (svabhava) of all things. ... Though the language is new, the content of this message is not. What we have here is a variation on the theme enunciated previously, "Buddha nature is the Thusness revealed by the dual emptiness of person and things ... If one does not speak of Buddha nature, then one does not understand emptiness" (787b). Non-Buddhists are as wrong as ever in seeing a self in the changing phenomena of worldly flux." (p. 89)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 7th, 2013 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: Mind versus Self?

Content:

songhill said:

Looking for the self using the nets of the five aggregates is an impossible task. It isn't a particular shape or a pleasant feeling. It isn't a percept. It isn't a formation or consciousness. In addition, the five aggregates are produced by worldlings (S. iii. 152). The aggregates also belong to Mara the Buddhist devil (S.iii.189). From passage after passage, for example in the Khandhavagga of the Samyutta-Nikaya we learn that aggregates are not the self or not my self (na meso attâ). From this we can surmise that the self is most intrinsic. It doesn't have to be made or produced. In a manner of speaking it finds itself by putting away desire for what is not itself (S.iii.78). But as we know, worldlings produce and crave the five aggregates which are suffering; which are not the self.

Astus wrote:

You think that because it is taught that the five aggregates are not self that there must be a self somewhere else. However, if there were a self outside of the five aggregates that self would be without any sensory ability or even consciousness. Who believes in an unconscious, inactive self, and what would be the point of such a self anyway? On the other hand, the Buddha teaches that people think something to be a self or a possession of the self among the five aggregates, and that's why he teaches again and again that the five aggregates are not the self. But imagining a self beyond the five aggregates makes no sense even in everyday terms, not to mention Buddhism. Nevertheless, if you find a self appealing that is without thoughts, feelings and sense faculties, go on. It's just I don't see what Buddhism has to do with that idea of a non-functional self.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 7th, 2013 at 2:39 AM

Title: Re: Mind versus Self?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is an important difference between the five aggregates and the five clinging aggregates (<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.048.than.html>), namely clinging itself. This clinging is not from outside the aggregates, it is not the same as the aggregates, but the attachment, desire toward them (<http://www.metta.lk/tipitaka/2Sutta-Pitaka/3Samyutta-Nikaya/Samyutta3/21-Khandha-Samyutta/02-03-Khajjanivaggo-e.html>). There are ways people assume a self related to the aggregates, but even when it is believe to be beyond them is refuted (<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.15.0.than.html#feelings3>). As it is clear from the definition of the four noble truths, the five clinging aggregates is considered the fundamental source of suffering, while the abandonment of clinging - not the aggregates - is the liberation from suffering.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 7th, 2013 at 5:19 AM

Title: Re: Essential Zen Practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is interesting that you bring up Dogen again while none of the three original quotes are from Dogen or even a Caodong teacher.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 7th, 2013 at 7:48 PM

Title: Re: Two opposing states cannot coexist without... (Dharmakirti)

Content:

Astus wrote:

I haven't really studied Dharmakirti, but I think if you look into abhidharma materials they discuss mental states, for instance that in a single moment there can be only one mental factor present.

Here is one good source on the classical Abhidharma Kosa:

<http://abhidharmakosa.wordpress.com/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 7th, 2013 at 9:17 PM

Title: Re: Mind versus Self?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

The True Self is the Dharmakaya,Buddha,Enlightenment,Pristine wisdom,clear light.
The Buddha is the "thing" that has these qualities(treasure storehouse)

If you had a cup of water,you would say the cup has water in it.

If you had a cup that had nothing in it you would say the cup is Empty,so what is the cup empty of?

It is empty of everything but itself.this is known as Other-Emptiness.

Would you say the cup is empty of Cup also?no you can say it is empty of water or anything you put into the cup,but the cup will still be the cup.

Like wise so is Enlightenment it is empty of everything but itself.

If you say all of Samsara,defilements,suffering are all impermanent and empty,then turn around and say the Buddha is empty also,you are putting the Buddha in the category of the created,conditioned and impermanent along with all of Samsara.doing this is known as Empty-Empty.

Astus wrote:

"The Buddha is the "thing" that has these qualities"

A buddha means a person without defilements.

What is a person?

The five aggregates.

What are the defilements?

Desire, anger, ignorance.

Do we reach a "true self" by removing clinging?

No.

Do we annihilate everything?

No.

Could this person without defilements be called free from all suffering and full of wisdom and compassion?

Yes.

Are the defilements permanently eliminated?

Yes.

Could this be called a permanent state of liberation?

Yes.

Is there really an actual thing or entity that is permanently free from defilements?

No.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 7th, 2013 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: Mind versus Self?

Content:

greentara said:

The great Master Dogen said, "To study the Buddha Way is to study the self, to study the self is to forget the self, and to forget the self is to be enlightened by the ten thousand things." To be enlightened by the ten thousand things is to recognize the unity of the self and the ten thousand things.

Astus wrote:

Dogen says "forget the self" from which you make "unity of the self and the ten thousand things". How so? Without self what do you unify? But if you have self to unify it is not forgotten.

On the other hand, Dogen continues with these words:

"To be confirmed by all dharmas is to cast off one's body and mind and the bodies and minds of others as well. All trace of enlightenment disappears, and this traceless enlightenment continues on without end."

(http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Dogen_Teachings/GenjoKoan8.htm#wab4)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 7th, 2013 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: Mind versus Self?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Satta Sutta (<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn23/sn23.002.than.html>) says that one should "Practice for the ending of craving for form. ... feeling. etc.", and while it says that "smash, scatter, & demolish form ... feeling. etc.", the point is to remove craving toward form, etc., and not to remove form itself. Removing form would mean that immediately one would become incorporeal, something that did not happen to the Buddha and his disciples.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 8th, 2013 at 12:52 AM

Title: Re: Mind versus Self?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Songhill,

What do you say for this? "Removing form would mean that immediately one would become incorporeal, something that did not happen to the Buddha and his disciples."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 8th, 2013 at 2:56 AM

Title: Re: Mind versus Self?

Content:

songhill said:

This is not something the Buddha said. The Buddha might say that form is not my self (ditto with the rest of the aggregates). We are already incorporeal but clinging to the aggregates and believing that we consist of aggregates (sakkaya) has made it seem otherwise for us. In a way, we have to give up the illusion of being particulate (khandha).

Astus wrote:

You interpret the Buddha's teaching on the aggregates in a way that it becomes eliminating the aggregates themselves, it is not something the Buddha himself said. And he could have never said it anyway. Why? Because speaking requires functioning aggregates.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 8th, 2013 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: Mind versus Self?

Content:

catmoon said:

Its an odd thing - suddenly threads all over the board are converging on a single topic - the nature of the self.

What does everyone think of the idea of locking them all and starting a new thread that would get everyone under one roof?

Astus wrote:

If you are happy to bring all raised issues under one thread without making the OP a huge one it sounds fine.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 8th, 2013 at 5:02 PM

Title: Re: Mind versus Self?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

A person is an individual personality "i" ego that which clings to the 5 aggregates
Donna sutta the Buddha is not a person.

You stated earlier the Buddha was a "person" so you have already labeled the Buddha an actual thing(person) and entity.you say the Buddha the person is free from defilement then you turn around and say No actual thing is permanently free from defilement.

Astus wrote:

If you look at what I said, "person" is a superficial designation of the five aggregates and not some ego/I. That is "person = five aggregates", nothing more, nothing less. The five aggregates are not permanent. Defilement is believing that there is something permanent in the five aggregates, that is, imputing a self based on momentary experiences. For instance, believing that there is an ultimate essence is such a mistaken imputation, it is ignorance, the very cause of samsara. Such a belief includes thinking that buddha-nature means an ultimate essence/self. And that is, in other words, the "five clinging aggregates". So, the difference between ignorance and knowledge, suffering and liberation, is whether there is or there is not any clinging.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 8th, 2013 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: Mind versus Self?

Content:

oushi said:

I wouldn't oppose ignorance to knowledge, this is a misunderstanding. They often go hand in hand. Maybe you meant wisdom?

To see that there is no clinging is to see objects that can cling to each other, but are separate. Without objectifying, this problem does not arise, as objects and relations dissolve. This way, even knowledge(wisdom?), or liberation won't follow. You don't have to cut the world into two, and take the better half into nirvana.

Astus wrote:

Call it objectification or clinging, in terms of the path one has to make a difference between the starting point and the goal. The point is, however, that the problem is not with the object but the approach/attitude toward it (i.e. aggregates and clinging), and there is no hidden substratum of some eternal self/soul/nature/etc. behind it all.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 8th, 2013 at 10:46 PM

Title: Re: Mind versus Self?

Content:

oushi said:

Must he?

There is a profound problem with such a statements. You cannot know, that there isn't. You can only "not know" if there is. Opposite of "knowing" is "not knowing", not a different type of knowing. Hidden substratum is there, as soon as you name it (make it "Bliss"). If you won't name it, there certainly won't be any "eternal self/soul/nature/etc". This way, nirvana is not a nihilistic black nothingness even if there is no such thing as "eternal self/soul/nature/etc". The problem lies in conceptualization, not in the nature of reality. There is no world to escape and no need to escape it.

Astus wrote:

What other description can you give for a path then a way between two points?

I don't see what problem you mean. You first say that one cannot know about an ultimate self, then you make its existent dependent on naming. Naturally, if something exists only nominally it is not something ultimate. How that helps with mistaking nirvana for annihilation is not clear to me. Reality is conceptual (nominal), and mistaking concepts for substances is indeed the problem.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 9th, 2013 at 5:56 PM

Title: Re: Mind versus Self?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

No the person is an identity or personality.

it is that identity/personality which is clung to the 5 aggregates that makes a worldly person

Astus wrote:

That is your interpretation, not mine. If there were a self beyond the aggregates it had nothing to do with the aggregates themselves, could not even cling to them. That is because such a self would exist separately from the aggregates and wouldn't need them for its existence at all, nor have the attributes of the aggregates. That includes attachment itself, which is a function of the fourth aggregate (samskara).

Son of Buddha said:

really so believing that there is an ultimate essence is ignorance and the very cause of Samsara. I could of swore anything that was dependently arisen/dependent origination was ignorance and the very cause of Samsara.the 12 links of dependent origination has as its root and source ignorance,everything that is dependently arisen is rooted and produced in ignorance so in your view if the Buddha/Emptiness is dependently arisen then he is produced from ignorance.

Astus wrote:

There are the twelve links of dependent origination but it is only a specific instance of dependent origination/interdependency. The Buddhist path itself is based on causes and effects, however, it leads to liberation and not suffering. The cause of enlightenment is the path of morality, meditation and wisdom, the direct cause is the very realisation of dependent origination.

Son of Buddha said:

also the "self" you speak of that clings to the 5 aggregates is the worldly "i" personality/identity that thinks Astus will always be permanent,everlasting and unchanging this is called the super ego where one views his SELF as "I" have attained the highest.

this is the false self it is not the True Self I speak of which is the Dharmakaya the body of attributes that which is NOT dependently arisen from Ignorance.

Astus wrote:

Again, I don't speak of any self that clings to the aggregates, it is something you do. Perhaps it is not clear for you what the aggregates actually are. They cover all the physical and mental functions that exist. That is, the five sensory faculties of the body, and every mental phenomenon from basic feelings and thoughts through complex ideas up to consciousness. There is in fact nothing else in this whole world. But if you think there is, well, let me know. Personally I have no knowledge of anything that is either not a physical object, a mental object or consciousness. Of course, if it is something else, nobody can see it, hear it, feel it or know about it.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 9th, 2013 at 6:05 PM

Title: Re: Mind versus Self?

Content:

undefineable said:

If you're saying that reality is made up of concepts, then how is there any reality for a being who has moved beyond concepts, i.e. an enlightened being, given that he or she cannot logically exist in any way whatsoever without one?

Astus wrote:

The problem is not in having or not having concepts. Suffering comes from believing that concepts are not just concepts but real things, because we are always happy to relate to things in a positive, negative or neutral ways, to identify with them, to attach to them.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 9th, 2013 at 6:50 PM

Title: Re: Two opposing states cannot coexist without... (Dharmakirti)

Content:

Astus wrote:

Excluding impossible realities with reasoning uses the laws of logic, that is, that something is either true or false, no third option possible (excluded middle).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 10th, 2013 at 4:53 PM

Title: Re: Canon and doctrines, precepts.

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are two things one should pay attention for: harmlessness and compassion. These two are what essentially the bodhisattva's actions are guided by. Fused with wisdom it becomes the sila-paramita.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 10th, 2013 at 6:40 PM

Title: Re: Impoverished Western Practitioners

Content:

Astus wrote:

As long as Buddhism is about having a teacher it remains a clerical system, like Brahmanism. When emphasis is put on study, practice and community, then it is possible to rely on each other instead of some figurehead. A bhikshu/ni is supposed to be sustained by begging and charity. Homeless people can manage that. How come that life as a renunciate today would be too expensive?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 10th, 2013 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Italy and Teachers?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are some Soto Zen temples in Northern Italy: http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/temples/outside_jp/index.html#page "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Further information on Italian Buddhist centres:

http://www.buddhanet.info/wbd/country.php?country_id=66 "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 11th, 2013 at 5:15 PM

Title: Re: Mind versus Self?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Yes a True Self that exists beyond the aggregates.

clinging to aggregates is listed as apart of dependent origination which is rooted in ignorance.

the aggregates themselves are apart of dependent origination the 5 aggregates have as their source ignorance, ignorance as their origin, they are born and produced from ignorance.

so if the 5 aggregates are actually sourced, originate, and are born and produced from ignorance how does that fit into your views?

Astus wrote:

You believe in a true self beyond the aggregates, that is fine for a Hindu or some other religion, but in Buddhism there is no such thing. See the explanation in Nagarjuna's main work:

<http://www.fodian.net/world/1564.htm#Investigation%20of%20Self%20and%20Things>.

Also, from Mipham:

"If there were an independent self distinct from the five aggregates, it should be observable, but since no such self can be observed, we must deny its existence. Were there a self transcending the conditioned aggregates, it would not have the characteristics required to perform actions or to experience happiness and suffering, and so on; rather, it would be unconditioned, like space, beyond either benefit or harm." (<http://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/mipham/individual-selflessness>)

Son of Buddha said:

So WHO is the one that is realising dependent origination?

YOU STATED:(down below) "Again, I don't speak of any self that clings to the aggregates, it is something you do" you rely more on this tainted self than I do my friend, "I" cannot realise Dependent origination, "I" cannot realise enlightenment for the "I" itself IS the property of Samsara. your view is of a self that is realising something as if the "I" truly is real.

Astus wrote:

Speaking in English without using personal pronouns is possible, although weird. The difference is whether one takes "I" as something eternal, substantial, independent and real or just as a conventional word.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 12th, 2013 at 12:21 AM

Title: Re: Mind versus Self?

Content:

songhill said:

This comes across to me as somewhat of put down. For those of us who have read reputable Buddhist scholars such as Pande and Hajime Nakamura, to name just a few, the doctrine of no-self was not in the original canon. It is part of postmortem Buddhism. Of the discourses I have read in the Samyutta-Nikaya, for example, the Buddha makes a clearcut distinction between the aggregates and his self. Self has nothing to do with the aggregates. In this sense the Buddha's self is beyond the reach and range of the aggregates. This also comports with the general English definition of "transcendent" of going beyond or exceeding usual limits. In this case, the limit would be the five aggregates which the Buddha says are "not my self."

Astus wrote:

I don't know what original canon you mean. Mahayana has a few large collections of canonical works and a number of generally accepted masters like Nagarjuna, Aryadeva, Asanga and Vasubandhu. A self beyond the aggregates is accepted by none of them, nor even by Theravada.

There are the four seals of Dharma that define the minimum requirements of a doctrine to be considered in harmony with the Buddha's teachings. Here's a little explanation of it by Dzongsar Khyentse Rinpoche:

<http://www.shambhalasun.com/index.php?option=content&task=view&id=1814>. And here's a short sutra summing it up: <http://www.fodian.net/world/0599.html>.

You may insist on an ultimate self, but it contradicts the very basics of Buddhism. And to quote <http://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/mipham/individual-selflessness>:

"If the self existed, the path to liberation would be impossible, because any system that professes belief in a self can not include a path for eliminating attachment to the self. If our attachment to self is not eliminated, our attachment to 'mine' will ensure that we never part from our clinging to the three realms, and it will therefore be impossible for us to find a means to gain freedom from samsara."

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 12th, 2013 at 7:25 AM

Title: Re: Mind versus Self?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Another attempt to deflect the question, another round of dancing around the subject, another four pages without receiving a straight answer.

Astus wrote:

So it is. Since I have presented both logical and canonical sources that literally state that there is no "true self" in Buddhism I see no need to keep repeating it. Let me know once someone has come up with a clear answer to what that self is they claim to exist.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 16th, 2013 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: Advaitin vs. Buddhist takes on awareness/reality

Content:

rachmiel said:

Are Advaita and Buddhism talking about the same thing here -- i.e. does pure awareness = vijñāna -- but interpreting this thing radically differently?

Is there a Buddhist equivalent to Advaita's pure awareness / brahman?

Is there any ultimate substrate/reality in Buddhism? Or does Buddhism see "what is" as just a buncha ever-changing impermanent stuff in a grand web of inter-dependence?

Astus wrote:

1, Advaita thinks consciousness (vijñāna) is/has an eternal part. Buddhism refutes it.

2. No, otherwise they'd be the same doctrine using different words.

3. Buddhism teaches interdependence.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 17th, 2013 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: Advaitin vs. Buddhist takes on awareness/reality

Content:

rachmiel said:

I'm not sure what you mean. Advaita does not think anything ultimately is/has parts.

There is only brahman ... which, depending on frame of reference, is called Self (atman), God (Ishvara), pure awareness, etc. So what exactly does Buddhism refute?

So there is no ultimate substrate/reality in Buddhism? Awareness -- pure (object-less) or impure (subject/object) -- is just a skandha, hence empty (no independent existence)?

Astus wrote:

What I mean is that Advaita believes that there is an ultimate consciousness, but it is actually mistaking consciousness, certain forms of consciousness, to be something ultimate. For instance, in the Brahmajala Sutta (<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.01.0.bodh.html>) the Buddha explains several forms of mistaking different meditative experiences as the ultimate reality.

An objectless consciousness is not possible (what is it conscious of without an object?).

And yes, consciousness is an aggregate. Aggregate simply means a category of phenomena, not a unitary thing. Consciousness is always momentary (see:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.061.than.html>).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 17th, 2013 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: Advaitin vs. Buddhist takes on awareness/reality

Content:

Jeff said:

Advaita teaches "oneness" which can be described as interdependence.

Astus wrote:

Oneness means that everything has the same substance. Buddhism teaches that everything is without substance (nihsvabhava = empty) and dependently originated.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 17th, 2013 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: Advaitin vs. Buddhist takes on awareness/reality

Content:

lowlydog said:

Consciousness is permanent/eternal and Buddhism does not refute this. Advaita and Buddhism are the same teachings when understood(practically experienced) correctly.

Astus wrote:

Something eternal cannot change. A consciousness that cannot be conscious of anything new means a frozen consciousness. What is the use of such a thing?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 17th, 2013 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: Advaitin vs. Buddhist takes on awareness/reality

Content:

lowlydog said:

You are not taking into consideration the ultimate reality and how this statement rings true in the unmanifested(formless).

Astus wrote:

The ultimate truth in Buddhism is emptiness. The formless realms are just samsara.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 17th, 2013 at 2:13 AM

Title: Re: Advaitin vs. Buddhist takes on awareness/reality

Content:

lowlydog said:

something cannot be eternal. no-thing is eternal.

Astus wrote:

"No-thing"? Not a thing, nothing. If it is not something what does it matter if we call it eternal, impermanent, big, small, red or yellow? Talk about non-existent things is pointless.

lowlydog said:

I didn't just say the formless, did I. I said the unmanifested. Let try not to twist words shall we.

Astus wrote:

Unmanifested means what? Is it something that nobody sees, hears or perceives in any way? There is a word for it: speculation.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 17th, 2013 at 2:29 AM

Title: Re: Advaitin vs. Buddhist takes on awareness/reality

Content:

rachmiel said:

Perhaps the simplest and most direct way to get at what I'm trying to get at is to ask which of these is true.

1. Buddhism says there definitely is not brahman (ultimate real oneness/ground).
2. Buddhism says that there definitely is brahman.
3. Buddhism says sorry, dude, I'm not tawkin' about no brahman, because it is of no use to try to conceive the inconceivable.

If 3 is true, is there a hint of subtext of: I'm only saying this because to reveal the ultimate truth would confuse you (but in fact brahman is real).

Astus wrote:

The idea of an ultimate ground is refuted by various Buddhist teachers. From Kamalasila's Madhyamakaloka (Ryusei Keira: Madhyamika and Epistemology, p. 181-182; 184-185), the refutation of concepts like God, soul and others that are held by different Hindu sects to be the ultimate:

"first of all, those who imagine Isvara (i.e., "God") and so forth as having permanence and oneness acknowledge that [Isvara and so forth] have the property of influencing results produced successively, and therefore they also in fact acknowledge the absence of oneness by implication. This is because given that something which is one in nature is no different [later] from what it was [earlier] when it did not produce [results], then it could not produce [results] later, just as [it did not produce results] earlier. If, on the other hand, it did in fact produce [results], then because of the difference of character from its former state, its oneness would be undermined.

It is not correct either that this [Isvara] really has manyness. This is because it has been already proved earlier that simultaneously or otherwise [i.e., serially], there could not really be any connection between his continuum and that of the other things [that he creates].

...

Time (kala), Spirit (purusa), primordial matter (pradhana), Brahman and so forth, which are imagined by some people to be the causes establishing the various worlds, all the while being permanent and one in nature, are also acknowledged by those [same people] to possess, successively or simultaneously, the [manifold] natures of the various real or deceptive collections of entities [that constitute the different worlds]. Hence, the absence of oneness is in fact acknowledged by implication. Indeed, it is not correct that things which are one in nature could possess in this way the [manifold] natures of the various worlds.

If they [i.e., time etc.] are not established as being ones, they cannot logically be many either, for the latter [i.e., manyness] consists in being a collection of the former [i.e., ones]."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 17th, 2013 at 2:48 AM

Title: Re: Advaitin vs. Buddhist takes on awareness/reality

Content:

lowlydog said:

Wisdom is not a thing.

Astus wrote:

There are a few pages on prajnaparamita, as the primary form of wisdom in Mahayana. Short definitions are also available.

lowlydog said:

Quite frankly, that question cannot be answered. Even in asking the question, there is an implication that the unmanifested is a "thing" – and hence can be explained with words and understood by thinking. Understanding the unmanifested happens at a deeper level than thought.

Astus wrote:

That is, you don't mean anything by "unmanifested", since nobody can conceive such a thing, in which case it cannot be used in an argument.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 17th, 2013 at 2:54 AM

Title: Re: chan/seon/rinzai/soto differences

Content:

Astus wrote:

Is your question about their differences in doctrines, practices, ceremonies, scriptures, language, history, arts, organisation or something else?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 17th, 2013 at 3:55 AM

Title: Re: chan/seon/rinzai/soto differences

Content:

Astus wrote:

What makes them different first of all is that Chan is Chinese, Seon is Korean, while Rinzai and Soto are Japanese. This affects their history, their style, their language. In terms of doctrines all of them are East Asian Mahayana.

Chan is not very organised, therefore the specifics in terms of favoured sutras depend mostly on the teacher, and since Chan is almost synonymous with Chinese Buddhism, its uniqueness lies mainly in those that represent Chinese Buddhism in general. If there is anything Chan specific in practices, it is the use of huatou. Because Chan is a loose term in China there is no conflict with using teachings and methods from any school.

Seon re-emerged in Korea in the 19th century and today its major organisation is the Jogye Order, the largest Buddhist church in the Republic. They have a basic curriculum for novice monastics that emphasises the combined study of Hwaeom and Seon, according to the tradition of Weonhyo, Jinul and Hyujeong. The primary Seon method is the hwadu, similarly to Chan.

Rinzai today follows the teachings of Hakuin who created a special koan curriculum for practitioners. Soto today follows the teachings of Dogen, as a result of 18th century changes (similarly to Rinzai), and in practice they focus on shikantaza. Like other Japanese schools, they lack full monastic ordination, and were influenced by Tendai doctrines.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 17th, 2013 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: Advaitin vs. Buddhist takes on awareness/reality

Content:

Astus wrote:

lowlydog,

Consciousness is momentary. "But what's called 'mind,' 'intellect,' or 'consciousness' by day and by night arises as one thing and ceases as another." (SN 12.61). Also, there are six consciousnesses and not just one, and those six are not single units either, as there are innumerable moments of consciousness going on a day, plus the sixth consciousness is the four aggregates.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 17th, 2013 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: Akanistha

Content:

Astus wrote:

In the Avatamsaka Sutra the Buddha's enlightenment happens in different places simultaneously. This is not the answer to the question, but maybe some useful information.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 18th, 2013 at 6:56 AM

Title: Re: Akanistha

Content:

Astus wrote:

I have looked a bit around, but besides that the Akanistha is the place for non-returns, some general books on Buddhism indicate that regarding Maitreya there were different views about his place of eventual enlightenment, however, they don't give the sources. Also, the Avatamsaka Sutra follows the general pattern of descending from Tusita and does not involve the Akanistha as a place of enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 18th, 2013 at 6:58 AM

Title: Re: Advaitin vs. Buddhist takes on awareness/reality

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

So everything is without substance it is empty and dependently originated.

Is Enlightenment empty without substance and dependently originated?

(that is your definition of empty everything that is dependently originated correct?)

Astus wrote:

Indeed, as Greg said. Just look at the four noble truths. The first two tells about samsara and its cause, the second two about nirvana and its cause. Very simple.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 18th, 2013 at 4:07 PM

Title: Re: Advaitin vs. Buddhist takes on awareness/reality

Content:

songhill said:

Putting nirvana under the category of dependently originated thingees [sic] is not something the Buddha taught.

Astus wrote:

True, because nirvana is not a permanent or impermanent thingee but the end of suffering, just as when a fire is extinguished we can't say that non-fire is some new thing, it's just the end of burning. If there were a new thing coming out of the end of suffering or appearing because of the elimination of ignorance it would be a dependently originated phenomenon.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 18th, 2013 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: Advaitin vs. Buddhist takes on awareness/reality

Content:

Jainarayan said:

At a very basic and simplistic level, Advaita says nothing exists of itself. Everything depends on Brahman, created by Brahman. What we see is the effect and result of māyā. Under the veil of māyā everything is interdependent and keeps us from seeing that Brahman is hidden. If Brahman does not create, nothing exists. We are Brahman: aham brahmasmi: "I am Brahman". To realize that is to attain enlightenment and moksha (not an easy thing). A tree does not exist, it is ultimately dependent on Brahman (via the earth, the soil, the water, the sun), so the tree is empty. Thich Nhat Hahn says that without a cloud paper does not exist; without the cloud the paper is empty. Why does Brahman create? It's fun, it's the recreation of Brahman. Shankara says it is Brahman's nature to create, just as it is man's nature to breathe.

Astus wrote:

The idea of a creator god is refuted in Buddhism under the reasoning used in Madhyamaka against "production from other". There are problems with a creator god like "Who created the creator?", and "If the creator is eternal the creation must go on eternally", and "If creator and created are different how could one come from the other?", etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 19th, 2013 at 12:11 AM

Title: Re: Advaitin vs. Buddhist takes on awareness/reality

Content:

songhill said:

I would recommend that you take a look at the Sautrantikas. They generally believed in the negative character of nirvana (it is the one Sankara criticizes according to Pande). In other words, nothing essentially survives — it is abhāva all the way down. As you probably know Buddhaghosa was no fan-boy of the Sautrantikas. He attacked them without mercy. For Buddhaghosa nirvana was positive, it brought peace of mind (santi), it was imperishable (accuti), and brought solace (assāswkarana). The list goes on of positives. One argument Buddhaghosa posed to the Sautrantikas that if the existence of nirvana is denied, the various Buddhist practices become fruitless. My own opinion of the Sautrantikas is they are nihilists.

Astus wrote:

Nagarjuna explains clearly that such interpretations of Nirvana are mistaken, illogical, unreasonable and doesn't agree with the Buddha's teachings:

<http://www.fodian.net/world/1564.htm#Investigation%20of%20Nirvana>. See also:

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.085.than.html>,

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.072.than.html>,

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.044.than.html#beyond> and <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/an/an04/an04.174.than.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 19th, 2013 at 12:23 AM

Title: Re: Advaitin vs. Buddhist takes on awareness/reality

Content:

Jainarayan said:

Yes, I know that's the prevailing belief. If I'm not mistaken however, and I could be, there are schools of Buddhism that are either silent on it or do not reject the idea of a "ground of all existence" as Brahman is called

Astus wrote:

There is no such ultimate root of existence in the Buddha's teachings. See this sutta: <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/an/an10/an10.058.than.html>. Do you know of any Buddhist tradition that teaches an ultimate "ground of existence"?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 19th, 2013 at 8:06 AM

Title: Re: Advaitin vs. Buddhist takes on awareness/reality

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Yes ultimate/true/real/ existence is taught in the third turning Buddha Nature sutras, so this view is upheld by the Sutras. This view is upheld by Zhentong practitioners And Buddhists all across Taiwan and China. Look on the Yogacara vs Dzogchen thread on this forum, you will see a Yogacara practitioner from Taiwan upholding this view.

Any tradition that upholds the Third Turning as definite upholds this teaching in their traditions.

Astus wrote:

Can you show me a living Buddhist tradition where the view of an ultimate ground, a creator source is taught? It is neither Yogacara nor Zhentong.

Here it is from the Cheng weishi lun by Xuanzang, the primary work of East Asian Yogacara, refuting such erroneous views:

According to one doctrine, there is a great, self-existent deity whose substance is real and who is all-pervading, eternal, and the producer of all dharmas. This doctrine is unreasonable. If something produces something, it is not eternal, the noneternal is not all-pervading, and what is not all-pervading is not real. If the deity's substance is all-pervading and eternal, it must contain all powers and be able to produce all dharmas everywhere, at all times, and simultaneously. If he produces dharmas when a desire arises, or according to conditions, this contradicts the doctrine of a single cause. Or else, desires and conditions would arise spontaneously, since the cause [i.e., the deity] is eternal.

Other doctrines claim that there is a great Brahma, a Time, a Space, a Starting Point, a Nature, an Ether, a Self, etc., that is eternal and really exists, is endowed with all powers, and is able to produce all dharmas. We refute all these in the same way we did the concept of a Great Lord.

(Three Texts on Consciousness Only, p. 20-21)

And from the Mahayanasutralamkara (ch. 6, v. 2, 4) by Maitreya, a cardinal work in Yogacara and Zhentong:

The self-notion itself does not have the identity of a self, nor does the (selfish being's) deforming habit; their natures are different. Apart from these two there is no other (self), so it arises only as an error; liberation is therefore the termination of a mere error.

How is it that beings, directly aware of the relativistic origin of things, still resort to some other creator? What kind of darkness is this through which the existent goes unseen and the nonexistent is observed?

(The Universal Vehicle Discourse Literature, p. 50)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 20th, 2013 at 7:42 AM

Title: Re: Advaitin vs. Buddhist takes on awareness/reality

Content:

songhill said:

It is much easier for us if you would provide the Sanskrit for your term "ultimate ground" and also the Sanskrit for "creator source." In addition, I don't think you should link ultimate ground & creator source. There can be absolute monism sans a supreme creator god. I refer you to the excellent work The Kunjed Gyalpo otherwise available on Amazon as The Supreme Source: The Fundamental Tantra of Dzogchen Semde which has been translated into English by Andrew Lukianowicz.

Astus wrote:

Brahman is taught to be a creator, the source of all, in Advaita. Such an idea is rejected in Buddhism. I'm not the one claiming that Buddhism agrees with Advaita. Any kind of monism is also rejected, whether it is a material or spiritual substance.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 20th, 2013 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: Advaitin vs. Buddhist takes on awareness/reality

Content:

Matt J said:

This is a lower, provisional teaching for beginners. And Brahman is not the creator--- Brahman is one without a second--- what is there to create? Advaita also teaches Ajati Vada, depending on the context.

Astus wrote:

Where is the Illusion from then, if not from Brahman?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 21st, 2013 at 5:56 PM

Title: Re: So many schools

Content:

Astus wrote:

If you have trouble with faith in buddhas and bodhisattvas then Theravada is an easier choice here. You don't have to aim for becoming a monastic in the next life, rather you should work for attaining stream-entry, the first level of a noble disciple who is stable on the path to nirvana. As a stream-entrant one will never again be born in the lower realms and reaches liberation within 7 lives either as a human or as a god.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 21st, 2013 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: Mind versus Self?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

So are you saying the Buddha was clinging to the skandhas when he told us to "give them up"?

Astus wrote:

The Buddha taught to give up attachment, give up desire, anger and ignorance. Those are the causes of suffering. The skandhas are not, that's why there is nothing to give up about them. What sane person would want to give up their hearing, rationality, etc.? This misunderstanding that the skandhas must be eliminated makes people think there must be a superego, a higher self and a heavenly nirvana. This mistake has nothing to do with shentong, yogacara or buddha-nature, but simply not comprehending the basics, the very essentials of Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 21st, 2013 at 8:57 PM

Title: Re: Mind versus Self?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Apparently you didnt read the top of the page(32) before you commented.

The very quote I posted states to give up the 5 skandhas

Even gives an analogy of burning then and not caring cause they are not our self.

You do know the 5 skandhas themselves are produced from ignorance dont you?(do you need the sutra?)

Do you even know what Zhentong teaches? I think the true mistake is trying change The Buddha Nature sutras and Zhentong into something they are not.

Astus wrote:

It says that skandhas are neither I nor mine, that's what is to be given up, namely identification. Eliminating, destroying the skandhas would mean destroying your body and your mind, complete annihilation of all living functions. Apparently both the Buddha and his disciples were alive and well after their enlightenment, and they didn't lack their body or their mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 22nd, 2013 at 6:18 AM

Title: Re: We can, we cannot, we may, we may not.... arghhh!

Content:

Astus wrote:

I find that the worst type of discussions are about posturing. Either in the form of promoting yourself or promoting your teacher/tradition. They generate either pointless debates or ridicule. Asking for advice on your practice is risky but still OK, just be prepared for a wide range of opinions. Discussing Buddhist teachings for the sake of clarification or debate is fine as long as it doesn't degrade into personal attacks. And the important things to always keep in mind here are to remain calm, be kind, be clear and never make it or view it as personal.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 22nd, 2013 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: Question about Khenpo Gangshar's vivid awareness

Content:

Astus wrote:

Look at what Gangshar says,

"At that time, there is no thought of, "Sights and sounds are out there!" Everything appears without obstruction. There is also no thought of, "The perceiver, the six types of consciousness, is within!" Clear and nonconceptual naked awareness is unceasing. ... When you rest your mind in unfabricated naturalness, no matter what thought may arise, good or evil, happy or sad, the mind-essence which is free from concerns about joy or sorrow is clear and empty, naked and awake."

It's not about focusing on something, it is relaxing, i.e. not grasping at whatever appears. It is called being in the present because you are naturally with whatever occurs without obstructing or upholding, taking or rejecting anything.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 23rd, 2013 at 12:24 AM

Title: Re: Question about Khenpo Gangshar's vivid awareness

Content:

rachmiel said:

I'm not so much focusing on these "snapshots," more just taking note of them as they flash by, then dropping each when the next appears. At least that's what it feels like ...

So is Gangshar instructing us not to even take note of the impressions that arise, as one does in Vipassana?

Astus wrote:

Correct. Noting things that appear is not relaxing, it's not natural. If you want to follow that style of Vipassana, it's fine, but that's a different path. Here what matters is that you don't fabricate anything. A thought, an emotion or a sense-impression appears, but you leave it alone. Don't hang on to it by generating further thoughts, etc., and don't repress it by trying to stop its presence. The vividness of awareness comes from not creating any reference point, you just take in the vista of appearances just as they are.

You might want to make use of a more detailed instruction, like this one:

<http://www.chagchen.com/>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 23rd, 2013 at 5:52 PM

Title: Re: Question about Khenpo Gangshar's vivid awareness

Content:

Astus wrote:

As Jinzang advised, it's all about being aware instead of getting lost in thoughts and emotions. Vivid awareness is nothing more than that, so don't try to find any state or feeling that you consider "vivid awareness". Anchoring your attention to a simple object like breath or mantra makes easier to see when you are aware of what is going on and when you are lost in daydreaming. That's why generally the sequence of training is first samatha, then vipasyana, and finally resting (sometimes called the union of samatha and vipasyana).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 24th, 2013 at 8:08 AM

Title: Re: Question about Khenpo Gangshar's vivid awareness

Content:

deepbluehum said:

No one taught shamatha in Kagyu. The entrance into the mahamudra is aspiration and action bodhichitta. Pure Mahayana dharma. Leave Hinayana aside.

Astus wrote:

Check Jewel Ornament of Liberation, chapter 16: The Perfection of Meditative Concentration. Gampopa gives you ample reasons to practise shamatha. It is "Pure Kagyü Dharma".

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 24th, 2013 at 8:09 PM

Title: Re: Causal closure & naturalism

Content:

Huseng said:

There indeed is with Dharmakīrti, though in the general Buddhist context when not dealing with materialists, it seems such a dichotomy is less of an issue. The idea of wheat seeds producing wheat and not oats as an analogy for mental causes causing mind rather than physical causes isn't so much about a mind-body dichotomy, but just identifying homogenous causes and effects.

Astus wrote:

A common reasoning in Buddhism is that thoughts don't come from matter because the cause of a thought must be a previous thought. The difference between Buddhism and dualist views is that Buddhism considers all things phenomenological and not separate substances.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 25th, 2013 at 8:46 PM

Title: Re: Linji's teachings overlooked

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm a great fan of the Linjilu, however, it is not a stand-alone teaching and can't be actually used for a complete path. I also don't see any contradiction between the Linjilu and Mahayana.

This is a recommended work: <https://books.google.com/books?id=sNhj17-DNNgC>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 25th, 2013 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Linji's teachings overlooked

Content:

Astus wrote:

Training to realise emptiness, then training to integrate that realisation is the path of the bodhisattva. Linji says nothing else but urges people not to get lost in wrong ideas. However, telling people that there is no self and so there is nothing to attach to in itself doesn't help. That's why there are methods and teachings, to explain and to show to all sorts of people what the Dharma is about. Of course, when one talks to advanced students it's a different speech than when talking to beginners. Linji gives advanced teachings, not for beginners.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 26th, 2013 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: Linji's teachings overlooked

Content:

oushi said:

Not only does Linji stay away from "no self", but most of his message affirms "True man of no status".

Astus wrote:

Well, the expression "true man without rank" (無位真人) occurs in the Linjilu only in one story and used three times there. And that's it. Hardly a central teaching, although it is true that commentators and exegetes made the expression famous. Statements about how the things are empty appearances and names, however, comes up several times.

"All the dharmas of this world and of the worlds beyond are without self-nature. Also, they are without produced nature. They are just empty names, and these names are also empty." (Record of Linji, p. 19, tr. Sasaki)

And that's why, because appearances are indeed empty, dependently originated and mind made, there's nothing to hold on to, but rather to learn to let go of attachments.

"As for myself, I haven't a single dharma to give to people. All I can do is to cure illnesses and untie bonds." (p. 22)

oushi said:

Certainly he does not talk to a farmer walking by, nor is his teaching directed only to advanced students.

Astus wrote:

The entire text makes several references to common Buddhist teachings and scriptures, something that a person new to East Asian Mahayana can make little sense of. There is no explanation of ethics, nor meditation methods, nor clarification of how to become free from delusions, or why. Linji himself admits,

"It is not that I understood from the moment I was born of my mother, but that, after exhaustive investigation and grinding practice, in one instant I knew for myself." (p. 22)

Although he talks about direct and sudden enlightenment, just like many other Zen teachers before and after him, he was not without extensive knowledge of Mahayana. Teaching the essential meaning of Buddhism is not difficult for one who realised it personally, but it doesn't mean that the audience can make an immediate step into profound emptiness. Even those who exclusively focus on the Zen teachings under the guidance of a teacher spend years or even decades fully comprehending it. That is clear proof how even the most direct and sudden teaching fails to deliver immediate awakening. Just consider a very basic Buddhist teaching, impermanence. It is seemingly very easy to understand, everybody knows that nothing lasts forever. But a true insight into impermanence is liberation, something that just doesn't happen to everyone hearing about the fact that all things die. And that's why I say that the Linjilu presents an advanced view of Mahayana. I don't mean that it is or should be restricted, no way. But it takes a certain level of familiarity with the Buddhist path to have an actual impact on a practitioner.

The Linjilu, which is not an actual record of verbal teachings but a literary work of the highly developed Chinese Buddhist community from the Song era, was meant for educated Chinese monks and literati. This distance a modern reader has to overcome first. A living teacher can express the Dharma in a way that is fitting for the cultural and linguistic environment of the students. And I'm not saying that Zen requires a teacher to be practised. Zen is, however, only found in the living realisation of the Buddhadharma. That is the difference between dead words and live words. The Linjilu must come alive first to the reader in order to be understood. And this is not a simple obstacle. Nevertheless, as long as one feels the affinity, it is the right path.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 26th, 2013 at 6:12 AM

Title: Re: Linji's teachings overlooked

Content:

Astus wrote:

Let me ask then, taking a simple approach to Linji, what is his teaching in today's practical terms?

"Man of the Way" is simply an expression for "practitioner".

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 26th, 2013 at 6:20 PM

Title: Re: Linji's teachings overlooked

Content:

oushi said:

Then draw further conclusions, as "independent Man of the Way lacks nothing at all", practitioner lacks nothing at all. That is a starting point, and you can easily start from here. Just apply it.

Astus wrote:

And that is where I ask you, how to apply? Linji says "kill", but how do you "kill"? If practitioners don't lack anything what is there to do? If there is nothing to do then nothing changes and it all remains just as before: samsara.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 27th, 2013 at 8:48 AM

Title: Re: Linji's teachings overlooked

Content:

oushi said:

Relax, and drop the desire to perceive meaning.

Astus wrote:

I look at the monitor, drop all desire to perceive any meaning, and it is just colours. How does reducing one's mind to that of a butterfly attracted by light help? Sure, it doesn't ask questions. But on the other hand, a butterfly is not very wise either. I doubt Linji had this in mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 27th, 2013 at 9:07 AM

Title: Re: Linji's teachings overlooked

Content:

pueraeternus said:

I wonder if we can pinpoint more or less when in Buddhism does the primacy of the guru comes into play? Would that be the early stages of esoteric or vajrayana Buddhism?

Astus wrote:

Chan was never bound to having a teacher overlooking one's progress, although naturally most monks had elders to guide them. The abbot/master is an authority figure but not a guru, since he was the head of the entire monastery. The idea of a lineage - that gives the authority to the master - started in the 8th century when first (at least according to the earliest historical sources) a disciple of Shenxiu claimed primacy among fellow Chan teachers, and then Shenhui's claim to being the true heir and Huineng the real heir of Hongren (instead of Shenxiu).

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 27th, 2013 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Linji's teachings overlooked

Content:

oushi said:

If it is just colours, it's still meaning. But above all, desire to gain something through this act, which is also meaningless. It's not about being dumb, not at all. It's about dropping all, which requires great bravery, because it is not desired at all, to see oneself as meaningless. One's acts and ideas, as meaningless... Ego will rebel. Still, it is meaningless struggle. "Buddha is an idle person".

Linji said:

But if you can stop your heart(mind) from its ceaseless running after wisps of the will, you will not be different from the Buddha and patriarchs.

Astus wrote:

Are you saying that one should turn into a piece of stone by dropping all? No perception, no acts. Or is it still perceiving and acting but like a lunatic who can't understand anything that happens?

In my opinion Linji simply talks about not making a fuss, not attaching unnecessary sentiments to ordinary events. Life goes on just as before but we have to take it easy, to see clearly because one is without attachment, identification to emotions and ideas. There are thoughts, there are feelings, one can understand perfectly what goes on, but they are all illusory, all momentary appearances in the infinite sequence of causality.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 27th, 2013 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: What text(s) do you feel make a convincing case for Maha

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think the Vimalakirti Sutra is the best to make a point about what Mahayana is about. It is funny, easygoing, imaginative, philosophically deep and flexible, open to all sorts of inclinations.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 27th, 2013 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: Linji's teachings overlooked

Content:

oushi said:

Looks quite contrary to what you said.

Astus wrote:

I said ordinary events, nothing about being ordinary or not ordinary. What does "being ordinary" mean? As you quoted "Just be your ordinary selves with nothing further to seek, relieving nature, wearing robes and eating." Now, where is the difference here between common people and enlightened people doing the same thing? Attachment.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 28th, 2013 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: Linji's teachings overlooked

Content:

oushi said:

Are you attached to relieving nature? Hmmm...

People are attached to things they perceive as extraordinary. Meaning give rise to importance, which is proportional to desire, which results in attachment. People are not attached to things they see as meaningless, unimportant and ordinary.

Astus wrote:

I don't know what you mean by "relieving nature".

Primary attachment lies in the five desires: food, sex, sleep, wealth, fame. Everyday things. Only religious Buddhists are infatuated by nirvana, buddhas, etc. (which is of course appropriate for Linji to talk about to monks). So, when Linji says, one should just go on eating and sleeping however one pleases, it is not the same as in the five desires. Although we can say that those are very ordinary things. But, as you said, they are very important to people and they give meaning to their lives. Still, who can live without food and sleep?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 28th, 2013 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: Linji's teachings overlooked

Content:

oushi said:

Take away meaning and everything is "wonderfully the same", because differentiation must be based on meaning. Without it, there is no way to differentiate.

Astus wrote:

What do you mean by differentiation? A monk, like Linji, has to be able to uphold 250 precepts. That involves a lot of discerning about what to do and what not to do. He also criticises monks who don't have wisdom,

"And then there're a bunch of shavepates who, not knowing good from bad, point to the east and point to the west, delight in fair weather, delight in rain, and delight in lanterns and pillars." (p. 21, Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 28th, 2013 at 2:50 AM

Title: Re: basic Zen questions

Content:

Astus wrote:

Many Zen groups provide instructions for newcomers. If they didn't you should just ask, or maybe it's on their website. Otherwise you can read online and in books.

Here is a good one from the Soto teacher Shohaku Okumura: <http://antaiji.dogen-zen.de/eng/okumura-zazen.shtml>

This is a classic teaching by the great Hanshan Deqing:

<http://chancenter.org/cmc/2011/10/13/essentials-of-practice-and-enlightenment-for-beginners/>

You should also familiarise yourself with Zhiyi's shorter meditation instruction for a more in depth knowledge: http://kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/ebm_book_page.htm

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 28th, 2013 at 3:30 AM

Title: Re: basic Zen questions

Content:

Astus wrote:

Zen can utilise any meditation technique. Shikantaza is just one of them, while at the same time there are others too. So, if your question is about Shikantaza, then look at the first link by Okamura roshi.

The "mental technique" of Shikantaza is what is called no-thought (wunian/munen) in other Chan texts, the central method of sudden enlightenment since Heze Shenhui (or Huineng in traditional Zen history, see the Platform Sutra), otherwise called prajnaparamita in the sutras. It simply means not attaching to anything but being aware of everything at the same time. Just as Okamura writes, "In zazen we simply allow any thought, feeling or emotion to come up and then we simply let them go away; we actually do nothing." This is not shamatha nor is it vipashyana, if anything it is both at the same time. You don't block anything (shamatha - imperturbable), and you don't drop anything (vipashyana - aware).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 28th, 2013 at 4:37 AM

Title: Re: Linjis teachings overlooked

Content:

oushi said:

"Good" is "no differentiation" and it's not about wisdom in the sense of knowing.

Teaching are always provisional, that is why they can be used freely. Zen teachings are full of paradoxes because language itself is limited, that is why masters often regret they said anything, as they had to use false tool. It is greatly used in Diamond sutra for example. It is because you cannot say anything about non-differentiation, as each and every words comes from differentiation.

Astus wrote:

Paradoxes in a teaching means contradiction, that means illogical, and that is nonsense. I see no use of nonsense teachings. Some teachings may seem contradictory in Buddhism, but only as long as one makes a mistake about their meaning. I find both Zen and the Diamond Sutra perfectly sensible.

Teachings are meant to guide people to liberation, to the ultimate. The way to guide should be understandable and reasonable so that people can comprehend and follow it. Using gibberish or confusing sentences have the contrary effect.

As Nagarjuna (MMK 24:8-10, tr. Samten & Garfield) writes,

"The Buddha's teaching of the Dharma

Is based on two truths:

A truth of worldly convention,

And an ultimate truth.

Those who do not understand

The distinction between these two truths

Do not understand

The Buddha's profound teaching.
Without depending on the conventional truth,
The meaning of the ultimate cannot be taught.
Without understanding the meaning of the ultimate,
Nirvana is not achieved."

The Samdhinirmocana Sutra (ch. 2, tr. Keenan) says,

"ultimate meaning is realized internally by each saint, while reasoning is attained in the give and take [of joint discussion] among common worldlings."

and

"the saints, being freed from language through their holy wisdom and insight in this regard, realize the perfect awakening that reality is truly apart from language. It is because they desire to lead others to realize perfect awakening that they provisionally establish names and concepts and call things conditioned or unconditioned."

In the commentary to the chapter by Asanga (Powers, p. 36):

"Moreover, [Buddha] clarifies and opens up [the meaning of the ultimate]. With respect to that, [Buddha] "clarifies"s by way of clarifying well [the meaning of the ultimate] due to presenting designations of doctrines. He "opens up" [the meaning of the ultimate] by way of teaching the meaning."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 28th, 2013 at 5:19 AM

Title: Re: Linji's teachings overlooked

Content:

oushi said:

That is where his explanations ended, in not clinging to any thesis, any meaning.

Astus wrote:

That's where it's ended, not where it started. To reduce Linji's teachings to "do nothing" or "cling to nothing" is missing the most important message: the way to do it. Madhyamaka presents its own methods. And Chan does too. Although TNH's commentary to the Linjilu is titled "Nothing to Do, Nowhere to Go", it doesn't end with those six words on the cover.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 28th, 2013 at 6:36 AM

Title: Re: Linji's teachings overlooked

Content:

oushi said:

"Do nothing" sounds totally missed, as it is just opposite of doing something. "Nothing to do" is correct, as it is open for doing and non-doing.

Astus wrote:

There is "nothing to do" when one has finished with something. When there is nothing to do from the beginning, it means that everything is already fine. Unfortunately, most of us sentient beings are in samsara and it is not fine. So, there is something to do. How does it help in your view if we just tell ourselves that it is OK as it is? What changes? And if nothing changes, well, it is useless, it is not liberating, it is not the Buddha's teaching. Although Nagarjuna says that there is no difference between samsara and nirvana, but he also explains how and why that realisation is actually liberating. Linji too talks about realising that all phenomena are nothing but conceptual creations, illusions, and when one can actually see it that way, then there is nothing left to do. As you have quoted before, Linji sees the differences between practitioners and unties their mental knots accordingly. It's not that he just sits there telling everyone that everything is already perfect and they just shouldn't do anything. You say that "nothing to do" is where doing and not doing something are both possible, where one has the freedom. That is good. Still, how do you achieve that? That's what I'm asking.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 28th, 2013 at 6:47 AM

Title: Re: What if transmission of Buddhism was egalitarian....

Content:

Astus wrote:

Transmission of Buddhism happened through people and texts. Today you might include audio and video recordings. What is being transmitted are the teachings, in one way or another. It is only natural for Buddhism to be egalitarian in receiving people to accept the teaching since it is the very goal of the teachers and texts to be spread far and wide. What might not be (and often isn't) egalitarian is the way religious power are given to certain people, how things are organised in different communities. On the other hand, people are free to create new communities.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 28th, 2013 at 4:18 PM

Title: Re: Linji's teachings overlooked

Content:

Astus wrote:

Greentara,

I was talking generally about someone "who can't understand anything that happens", and not about any specific mental illness or such, as it was used only as an example.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 28th, 2013 at 4:26 PM

Title: Re: Mandarin and English speaking Buddhists?

Content:
Astus wrote:
Earth Dragon,

I can only congratulate you for the website. Great stuff! I hope you find Mandarin speaking members here who are willing to assist in this great project. You should know, however, that there are already lot of freely available info in Chinese on the web.

JKhedrup,

<http://www.unfetteredmind.org/> is surely an interesting teacher.

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, January 28th, 2013 at 5:06 PM
Title: Re: Linjis teachings overlooked
Content:
Astus wrote:
Thanks for your recommendation.

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, January 28th, 2013 at 7:45 PM
Title: Re: Linjis teachings overlooked
Content:
greentara said:
Astus, 'Who can't understand anything that happens', I don't wish to labour the point but what I'm trying to say is 'who can't understand anything?' There is no such person. A 'lunatic' may only understand part of what you say or only have an inkling but to say a person can't understand anything....is very harsh and shuts the door to all communication.

Astus wrote:
As you say, there is no such person because I used it as an example, not as describing or addressing anyone particularly.

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, January 28th, 2013 at 9:43 PM
Title: Thich Thanh Tu
Content:
Astus wrote:
Ven. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Thich_Thanh_Tu (1924-) is a modern Vietnamese Zen teacher of the Truc Lam tradition with monasteries in Vietnam, Australia, USA and Canada.

Sources for his teachings and more:

<http://www.truclamvietzen.net/Intro.htm>

http://dieunhan.net/DN_English.html

An introductory work by him:

<http://dieunhan.net/EnglishBook%5CKeysToBuddhism.pdf>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 29th, 2013 at 4:15 AM

Title: Re: Nuns in Thailand ... cause a stir!

Content:

Astus wrote:

Let there be nuns!

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 30th, 2013 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: chan/seon/rinzai/soto differences

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sara,

I said that Japanese schools don't have full monastic ordination (i.e. according to the Vinaya) and not that there are no monasteries. Does the OBC observe the Dharmagupta Vinaya or another one?

No Caodong school exists in China as an individual organisation, although there is the Caodong lineage, however, that is only nominal and has no influence on daily monastic life.

The Meiji government only removed the punishment for breaking monastic regulations. They didn't force anyone to have families and live like a layman. It was a decision the Buddhist churches made themselves to allow people give up the previous rules. But this is a different subject and off topic.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 31st, 2013 at 8:53 PM

Title: Re: Question about Khenpo Gangshar's vivid awareness

Content:

rachmiel said:

Apologies for getting a bit analytical. I'm trying to avoid doing something that feels like vivid awareness, but is not. To do this, I need to know if I'm on the right track.

Let's say there are two main types of awareness: awareness of objects (physical and mental) and pure awareness (no objects).

Awareness of objects can be very obvious: I see a tree, name it (tree/maple), and think about that time as a kid when I climbed a maple tree and found a bird nest in it. Or it can be subtler: I see a tree, name it (tree), but I don't go beyond that in interpretation/storytelling. Or it can be even subtler: I see colors and shapes, but don't name them.

Pure awareness is awareness with no objects, no subject/object division. One simply IS awareness.

My question: Which of these types of awareness is vivid awareness? Specifically, is it the subtlest form of awareness of objects, in which one perceives sensations without naming them? Or is it pure awareness, in which there are no objects, just awareness itself?

Thanks!

Astus wrote:

First of all, an awareness without object is a fiction, it is only a theory, a false concept of self. When there is no duality of subject and object it means that one does not reify a self and a thing, and by grasping on one there is always the other, that's why Buddhism is not a monism nor a dualism. The emptiness of self and appearances means that there is no clinging to an inherently existing essence. But, it doesn't negate any ordinary phenomenon, the six faculties work perfectly well, but one knows and sees that all are dependently arisen and without substance. That's why in Dzogchen you don't create any special state, don't make any effort in achieving something, but simply let things come and go without attaching to them any importance. You are aware of everything but don't get stuck by anything. So, if you are wondering about what pure awareness, vivid awareness or anything like that is, just see how the thought appears, stays and goes, but don't try to hold on to it, solve it, respond to it or remove it. Also, look at the preliminaries given by Gangshar on how to analyse appearances, since that can help you clarify some difficult points.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 31st, 2013 at 11:21 PM

Title: Re: Question about Khenpo Gangshar's vivid awareness

Content:

rachmiel said:

Thanks, very clear.

How does awareness of awareness fit into the above? The friend of mine who suggested I try Gangshar's vivid awareness said that this is what Gangshar is talking about: to be aware of awareness itself. Which doesn't negate objects, but doesn't attend to them either. One attends to the awareness that enables these phenomena to arise in the first place.

Astus wrote:

Awareness of awareness is simply being aware of whatever appears without attaching to them. There are numerous similar terms depending on the tradition and the scripture. There is a possible misunderstanding of taking it literally as if there was a singular awareness that can be aware of itself, which is not possible.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 1st, 2013 at 2:00 AM

Title: Re: Question about Khenpo Gangshar's vivid awareness

Content:

deepbluehum said:

This might be your personal position or that of Mahayana scholars. But it's not the position of the Drikung Kagyu lineage. Or any Kagyu or Dzogchen lineage for that matter. Awareness of awareness is beyond the mind.

Astus wrote:

Here are a few quotes from you from Dzogchen instructions.

"For a person of best capability, mind is mind when it is still, and it is mind when it moves. Once you are convinced that mind is empty, there is no difference at all between stillness and movement. Whatever thoughts arise, whatever appears, is all the play of pristine wisdom. It is the profound perspective of all victorious ones: emptiness. Without adulterating it in any way, rest within that itself. Although occasionally there are regular thoughts, since they are liberated automatically within that state, it is only meditative absorption (samadhi). It is dharmakaya. It is innately occurring pristine wisdom. It is the Great Seal (mahamudra). It is the perfection of transcendent intelligence (prajnaparamita). It is like a burned rope: it cannot tie you up because it is empty of essence. The thought-like occurrence is actually the shining radiance of emptiness. There is no difference between thought and emptiness. So the Great Orgyen said: Since the essence of thought is empty, know it as dharmakaya." (Za Patrul Rinpoche: The Clear Elucidation of the True Nature - An Esoteric Instruction on the Sublime Approach of Ati)

"When it happens that you do get involved in thoughts that recollect the past or entertain the future, then let be directly in awareness. If a thought pattern continues, there is no need for a separate antidote since whatever takes place is liberated by itself. What occurs spontaneously is the radiance of your own mind. To see it with vivid clarity is the essential instruction!

It is your mind's natural disposition to spontaneously reflect. Consequently, spend your life within this state of carefree and pervasive openness, of undistracted nonmeditation, of knowing one thing that liberates all - in which all that appears and exists is dharmakaya, samsara and nirvana are indivisible, and arising and liberation are simultaneous. If you spend your entire life in spiritual activities within this kind of state, in which the thinker and the object of thought are an undivided unity, there is not a single doubt that you will capture the 'stronghold of nonregression' in this very life." (The Final Words of Tsele Natsok Rangdrö)

"All we have to do now is maintain our awareness. As a thought arises from the state of stillness, if we simply recognize it with that awareness, it will dissolve back into the nature of mind. Thoughts and emotions become like the waves on the ocean, rising and sinking back into its expanse, and we become like the ocean itself, vast, spacious and placid. Nothing remains for us to do apart from maintaining that awareness." (Sogyal Rinpoche: Natural Great Peace)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 2nd, 2013 at 3:57 AM

Title: Re: Have you read portions of the Pali canon?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Digha, Majjhima and Samyutta Nikaya were among my first Buddhist books in English, and I'm working on obtaining the Anguttara. I haven't read them from beginning to end as I usually read suttas by topic. The Satipatthana Sutta (in "Heart of Buddhist Meditation" by Nyanaponika) was a teaching that helped me in the beginning decide on to further investigate Buddhism. ATI and metta.lk are sites I regularly use for references. Like Greg, I've also made some translations, only in my case to Hungarian.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 2nd, 2013 at 7:09 PM

Title: Re: List your favourite top 3 Mahayana Sutras

Content:

Astus wrote:

Complete Enlightenment Sutra

Vimalakirti Sutra

Diamond Sutra

(are you making statistics?)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 2nd, 2013 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: Definitive versus Interpretable Sutras across Mahayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

In Chan there is no categorisation of definitive and interpretable sutras, however, there are a couple of scriptures that are used to represent the common view of Mahayana according to their position. Although Tiantai claims the Lotus and the Nirvana Sutras as the final teachings of the Buddha, I've seen no problem using other texts in explaining their doctrines. Huayan focuses on the Avatamsaka Sutra naturally as the primary source of their teachings, while Pure Land has the three main sutras and portions of other scriptures.

So, if we use the definitive-interpretable categories, it is simply a question whether a scripture expresses explicitly what a given tradition holds as its doctrine or not. And if not then the exegete has to work until it does. As an example, in Chan it was first https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Yuquan_Shenxiu who explained every sutra in a way to teach Chan, i.e. seeing the nature of mind. It is a feature of Chan that has been followed ever since.

On the other hand, in Japanese Pure Land Honen simply put aside all other sutras not directly relevant to birth in Amita Buddha's world without rejecting their content, but rendering them useless for anyone following the Pure Land path.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 2nd, 2013 at 7:35 PM

Title: Re: List your favourite top 3 Mahayana Sutras

Content:

JKhedrup said:

LOL If we're ever going to propose a Mahayana Sutra translation project to sponsors we need to figure out people's favourites, right?

Astus wrote:

Since people here can read English but only very few knows canonical languages there is a big chance that all the favourite sutras are already translated, perhaps even more than once. So, instead of favourites, those that are not yet translated but are still considered important by the majority of the traditions should be published in English. Of course there are some sutras that could use a new translation (e.g. Lankavatara and the bigger Prajnaparamita Sutras).

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 2nd, 2013 at 7:45 PM

Title: Re: Lack of good translations of many Mahayana Sutras in Eng

Content:

Astus wrote:

It seems to be that while Tibetan Buddhism followers tend to focus on shastras in translation, from Chinese most of the important Mahayana sutras have been translated already. For instance, all the sutras used in Korean novice training are available in English, although not the commentaries. There are individual translators who make most of the work, like Thomas Cleary, and there are a few groups like the Bukkyo Dendo Kyokai and the Buddhist Text Translation Society publishing different scriptures.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 2nd, 2013 at 8:02 PM

Title: Re: Definitive versus Interpretable Sutras across Mahayana

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Who was the main formulator of the Tian Tai system, and where can I read about him in English?

Astus wrote:

He was <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Zhiyi>. There isn't much you can read in English unfortunately, and the "Buddhism in a Nutshell" series on BuddhistDoor.com has been removed and I can't find any copy of it (it had a nice intro to all Chinese schools).

Wikipedia has a few words on the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tiantai#Classification_of_teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 2nd, 2013 at 8:08 PM

Title: Re: Lack of good translations of many Mahayana Sutras in Eng

Content:

JKhedrup said:

While the most favoured Sutras have been translated already, as you mentioned, I can't help but thinking it would be a tremendous resource to have the complete Mahayana Canon available in English.

Perhaps once translated Sutras seen as obscure long ago will have a new relevance in the modern period.

Astus wrote:

I think it's simply a matter of people who know the canonical language taking the initiative and publishing translations online. <http://www.sutrasmantras.info/intro.html> is a good example. I like what D. T. Suzuki wrote in his preface to the Lankavatara Sutra:

"As regards the English translation of the Sutra, I have decided after much hesitation to send it out to the public with all its many imperfections. It is a bold attempt on the part of the translator to try to render some of the deepest thoughts that have been nourished in the East into a language to which he was not born. But his idea is that if somebody did not make a first attempt, however poor and defective, the precious stones may remain buried unknown except to a few scholars, and this perhaps longer than necessary. And then things develop. As it is illustrated in the long history of the Chinese translations of the Buddhist texts, there must be several attempts before the work assumes something of finality."

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 2nd, 2013 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: Lack of good translations of many Mahayana Sutras in Eng

Content:

Astus wrote:

What you mean is how to produce high quality translations that contain the necessary references and such to make understanding easier. I assume that those who can read any canonical language also have at least a basic knowledge of their contents, so the translations made are acceptable. As an example, Blofeld studied Buddhist Chinese for decades before he published The Zen Teaching of Huang Po, and still Wright could write a book about how much it shows the influence of non-Buddhist ideas, i.e. Blofeld's own cultural background. So, is it a good or a bad translation? If all translators had to do as much study as Blofeld we could be quite short on Buddhist books in English. And just as Blofeld's work, there must be first something to make people interested. Like the Bible, classical works have to be re-translated regularly anyway to make them up to date with the current language, lest they sink into obscurity. I'm not against quality in translation, what I'm saying is that quantity has its benefits too. Also, while scholars can make a wonderful job, it relies mostly on Buddhists to spread their religion.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 2nd, 2013 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: Definitive versus Interpretable Sutras across Mahayana

Content:

zangskar said:

Buddhistdoor's Buddhism in a nutshell is here:

<http://wfcs.buddhistdoor.com/OldWeb/bdoor/archive/nutshell/index.htm>

Best wishes, Lars

Astus wrote:

Big thanks to you!

Here's the link to the Tiantai panjiao system:

<http://wfcs.buddhistdoor.com/OldWeb/bdoor/archive/nutshell/teach70.htm>.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 3rd, 2013 at 4:21 AM

Title: Re: Can you Renew Precepts on your own in Zen / Chan Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

What precepts do you mean? Lay precepts are for life, bodhisattva precepts are until buddhahood, monastic precepts are for life. What you can give back are the monastic (Vinaya) precepts, but to be re-ordained it takes the community to approve it. Otherwise you don't lose the other vows. You can do repentance on your own of course, and remind yourself of the vows you took.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 3rd, 2013 at 7:15 PM

Title: Precepts in China and Japan

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sara,

What I meant is that in Japan the full Vinaya ordination does not exist among indigenous Buddhist schools. It is another thing that married clergy is a common practice, but Zen traditions also have training monasteries where celibacy is upheld. However, celibacy (brahmacharya) in itself doesn't make one a monk in Buddhism, ordination (upasampada) does. And that's what I meant.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 3rd, 2013 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: Advice

Content:

Astus wrote:

If you consider Tantra your primary interest you can find Tibetan Vajrayana sources plenty in English. Shingon is a different matter and to pursue it you would soon find the need to learn Japanese because of the lack of English resources, not to mention ordination in Japan. Learning to read the canonical works is the next level. But it's not impossible, there is at least one Westerner who went through with it and he is a Shingon master living in Japan. Tibetan Buddhism is a lot easier path. In terms of ordination, however, if you were serious about becoming a monk, the easiest way is going for Theravada, second best is Taiwan and Korea.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 3rd, 2013 at 11:31 PM

Title: Re: chan/seon/rinzai/soto differences

Content:

Astus wrote:

Discussion regarding the differences in ordination and precepts:

<http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=69&t=11532>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 4th, 2013 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: Precepts in China and Japan

Content:

Astus wrote:

In Jiang Wu's "Enlightenment in Dispute" there is a brief discussion of the situation of ordination in Ming times. Since the 14th century it's been under control by the central government, restricting full ordination to 40 by county and 20 by town. In the early 16th century the ordination platforms in Beijing and Nanjing were closed by imperial decree, then at the beginning of the 17th century the triple ordination was started and spread by the new Chan movement, and only in the mid-18th century was the government control over ordination removed. It gives the example of the famous Chan master Hanyue Fazang who had been a member of the monastic community since he was a child, but because of the ban on ordination he got the complete precepts only at the age of 37.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 4th, 2013 at 3:31 AM

Title: Re: Advice

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is only one type of inferior tradition in Buddhism and that is what another tradition imagines to be so. Buddhism per definition is the path to liberation, no matter what tradition. Shingon (and Tendai, another Japanese school that maintains an esoteric tradition) are different from Tibetan Vajrayana in several ways, especially because it is East Asian Mahayana and therefore contains teachings unique to that cultural-religious sphere.

It is an important doctrine of Shingon that one can attain buddhahood in this body (<http://www.shingon.org/teachings/ShingonMikkyo/sokushin.html>), and you can also read Kukai's short work on it, the <http://www12.canvas.ne.jp/horai/sokushingi.htm>. (As a cultural footnote (not to be confused with Kukai's teaching) look at what <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sokushinbutsu> means.) So, as I said, it is only from the biased interpretation of another tradition that a school is inferior.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 4th, 2013 at 7:11 PM

Title: Re: Rhetoric of a Marginalized Yāna

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think there are different stages. In "Nagarjuna in Context" (p.23) it says that the earliest known sutras (translated by Lokaksema) rarely refer to mahayana, hinayana and bodhisattvayana, it is more about doctrinal-practical differences rather than sectarian.

I can't remember where I read this, but the MMK seems to try to be an argument for general acceptance by all Buddhists and does not quote Mahayana sources or the bodhisattva idea. In terms of karma it strangely accepts certain abhidharmic ideas (MMK 17.14).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 4th, 2013 at 11:21 PM

Title: Re: Rhetoric of a Marginalized Yāna

Content:

Jnana said:

What I'm interested in exploring is how and why these strident criticisms developed. And also, if this kind of rhetoric is sustainable or even acceptable in the modern, pluralistic Buddhist world.

Astus wrote:

I can't say much about the origins, but regarding the second part we just have to look at what Mahayana have become. They maintain (most of them) the monastic rules, they promise liberation in this life (Zen, Tantra, etc.) or the next (Pure Land), and the laity is busy with devotional and merit making activities. Sectarian arguments against ancient Indian schools are rarely used, and only to point to some errors on the path. However, arguments come back are among Western Buddhists (like on this forum) where people get busy denigrating everything else but their own tradition.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 5th, 2013 at 1:09 AM

Title: Re: Rhetoric of a Marginalized Yāna

Content:

pueraeternus said:

I always wondered if the sudden enlightenment and full enlightenment in one life paradigm is just a mirror of Sravakayana soteriology. From an exceedingly difficult path that only mahasattvas can brave through for eons upon eons, we now have fast-track programs that promise liberation in 1 to a dozen or so lifetimes. Reminds me so much of good old boring stream-entry.

Astus wrote:

Another interesting thing about the sudden enlightenment in this life idea is how it dismisses and belittles the gradualist bodhisattva path. I'd say that the long-term bodhisattva teaching was not a very successful one in the end.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 5th, 2013 at 6:18 PM

Title: Re: The significance of empowerments

Content:

Astus wrote:

To me it seems that the empowerments are teachings compressed into visual and verbal symbols in order to give an impression on the level of imagination, something that one can use for the practice once the meaning is known. It is somewhat like the short verses attached to longer teachings as memory aids, however, empowerment also has the elements of ritual giving emotional assurance that the practitioner can achieve high realisations and sets up a bond between teacher and disciple.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 6th, 2013 at 3:57 AM

Title: Re: Shopping for a tradition

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't see anything new about this "shopping for a tradition" except that it is compared to consumerism. True, poor farmers had little chance to spend time off the field pursuing spiritual goals, and those who did had to become monks. On the other hand, the nobility and the literati had enough freedom to pick and choose as they liked. In the imperial courts all sorts of religions were present and all of them were vying for support from the ruling class and especially the emperor. The development of the Zen school is closely connected to political powers from the very beginning, from the initial strengthening of Shenxiu's so called "Northern School", through Shenhui gaining support for his "Southern School", the rising of Mazu's "Hongzhou School" because of the newly gained freedom of local lords, and so on. Monasteries require the support of the wealthy and powerful. The more support you get the bigger the monastery becomes, plus all the benefits that comes with it. Lose that support and you can lose everything in no time. It was always in the interest of Buddhism, just as any organised religion, to gain legitimacy and financial aid from the lords of the land. To give a European example, the survival of Christianity and its becoming the dominant religion depended first on the Roman emperors and then the kings, and when later Luther got the support of Frederick III of Saxony he managed for the first time to secure the survival of a heretic sect (although others have tried before). So, it is not just that people are shopping for a tradition, but every religion must sell themselves.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 6th, 2013 at 5:48 PM

Title: Re: Precepts in China and Japan

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sara,

I don't see the connection between the legal equality of sexes and the practice of a monastic order. Yesterday the House of Commons approved same-sex marriage in England and Wales, but it does not force any religious organisation to perform such a ceremony. Why? Because there is freedom of religion. Also, legal equality of the sexes does not force religious organisations to accept women into their clergy. So in actual practice I don't see why you connect secular legal concepts to religious institutions. Bringing up contraceptive methods as relevant to a celibate order is another strange thing. And if by birth control you also mean abortion, that is clearly against the precept of not taking life.

The Vinaya has proven its validity in several different cultures over a long time. What makes it dysfunctional today? It is still practised by humans just like before. How does the material wealth of a country change the daily life of a mendicant group that upholds poverty as a defining practice? Just as before, people still have sexual desires, and many rules in the Vinaya are meant to help avoid improper actions or being accused of such. How is that a bad thing?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 7th, 2013 at 6:32 PM

Title: Re: Precepts in China and Japan

Content:

Astus wrote:

How does this discussion of gender roles have a relevance to following the Vinaya or other sets of precepts? The OBC follows the Japanese version of bodhisattva precepts, or a combination of different regulations. This is one thing. In Buddhism being a bhikshu/ni is defined by the Vinaya, that is another thing. Since the OBC does not follow the Vinaya calling their clergy bhikshu/nis is incorrect from the Vinaya perspective. From a different perspective than the Vinaya it is a different matter. But since the Vinaya is one of the three baskets it is regarded as the definitive source of monastic regulations by the majority of Buddhists. As we all know, Japan is the one main exception where the Vinaya ordination has long disappeared. OBC, following the Japanese practice, don't have Vinaya ordination either. Arguing that a non-Vinaya system is better than the Vinaya system is again a different subject. However, expecting those who regard the Vinaya as the definitive source of monastic regulations to agree calling non-Vinaya ordained people bhikshu/nis is unrealistic.

Anyway, why the need to be called a bhikshu/ni when it is acceptable to abandon the Vinaya system?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 7th, 2013 at 6:51 PM

Title: Re: Lack of good translations of many Mahayana Sutras in Eng

Content:

Astus wrote:

I doubt that it's possible to give a clear definition of what makes a translation good. I've heard that there are better works than Kumarajiva's, however, since his have the prestige and sounds good in Chinese other translations are not used that often. It is the natural selection of translations. Which means that it's better to have more than less, and what is good for one can be bad for another. For a translation to become the definitive version requires either central force (like in Tibet and Theravada countries), or just trends that can change in different eras (like in East Asia).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 8th, 2013 at 1:05 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist themed products

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think I'd change my mug to another that has Guan Yin on it.

And T-shirts with bodhisattvas and such are also cool.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 9th, 2013 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: Thich Thanh Tu

Content:

Astus wrote:

I can't really tell, but it seems there are Western disciples if you look at their websites, the different community locations and the photos where you can see white lay people.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 9th, 2013 at 1:22 AM

Title: Re: Process Philosophy and Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

At college I studied some Process Philosophy and Process Theology. But it couldn't come alive for me, unlike Buddhism, so it just remained philosophy (i.e. "words talking about words"). But it doesn't mean that it can't work for others, since I know the teacher really loved it. Stoic and Cynic philosophy are different for me.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 10th, 2013 at 6:59 AM

Title: Re: How is Mahayana Buddhism faring in Viet Nam nowadays?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Just because a country's government is dictatorial it doesn't mean that people can't practise their religion at all, it's just that it is under a certain amount of control. Even in North Korea there is a sort of Buddhist union organising things, South Asian Buddhist countries are also mostly dictatorships, etc. Buddhism lived fine under all sorts of kings and emperors. Democracy is a very new thing even in Western countries while religions can be thousands of years old.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 11th, 2013 at 8:40 PM

Title: Re: Ratnasambhava Buddha and pureland

Content:

Astus wrote:

The general method for meditation on any buddha is practically identical. You can do visualisation, you can recite his name, you may also find some mantras, you can contemplate his and his lands virtues, and of course have the wish to be born in his presence and his land.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 12th, 2013 at 7:09 PM

Title: Re: Does astrology matter to you?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Since astrology has its own tradition in the Western culture it'd be difficult to show how a Buddhist version is in any way more sensible.

"Career interests are advanced through clear, logical thinking and the sound application of good business sense. Financial interests look especially promising now, Virgo, so seize any opportunities for advancement that come your way. Working with others is likely to prove profitable, and could bring you closer to them, too. Roll up your sleeves and go to it. The results could surprise you." (<http://my.horoscope.com/astrology/free-daily-horoscope-virgo.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 12th, 2013 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: Does astrology matter to you?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Karma Dorje,

It's not just that. Astrology is considered pseudo-science, because it wants to look like a rational system but it is not. There are many other areas of Buddhism that are clearly at odds with the modern world view, especially in areas that natural science covers (cosmology, elements, laws of physics, etc.) Since the greatest appeal of Buddhism in the West is its use of reasoning instead of relying on pure faith propagating astrology is against that. On the other hand, for those who are fine with supernatural things might be attracted to use Buddhist astrology, like other fortune telling systems.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 13th, 2013 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: Does astrology matter to you?

Content:

Huseng said:

Nobody ever actually proved that. A bunch of scientists signed some paper which said they denounced it as unscientific without any experimentation or evidence to prove it as irrational pseudoscience. It just doesn't jive with their theoretical framework, so they chucked it.

Astus wrote:

You can see for yourself some resources refuting astrology in the footnotes:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Astrology#Scientific_appraisal

By the way, when was there any proof of the relationship between planets and personality traits and everyday events? What kind of energy influences humans? How is it measured or perceived? etc.

Huseng said:

I don't think you can really escape the fact that Buddhism has a lot of magical thinking (in the sense of affecting reality by way of one's thoughts primarily), but at the same time there is what we would call a rational approach to certain things (like logic). Even the basic practices like merit dedication are essentially magic.

Astus wrote:

Sure, there are some magical aspects. The meaning of merit dedication, however, is not necessarily anything magical, as it's simply about relinquishing one's attachment to positive results and also sharing the joy of one's achievements. No magic in that.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 13th, 2013 at 1:33 AM

Title: Re: Does astrology matter to you?

Content:

Huseng said:

Like I said, I met one PhD who studied the effect of celestial phenomena on organisms to demonstrate that what goes on in the skies has an effect on beings down below, and demonstratively so. He didn't get so far in academia with such ideas by the sounds of it.

Really? When you dedicate merit you're hoping your karma ripens in a way that directly benefits other beings. That's magical thinking (I'm not saying that as pejoratively because magic is essentially creating a willed change in consciousness which sets patterns in motion to some desired end).

Astus wrote:

One PhD student, that's not exactly the same as actual research, is it?

Have you checked in the scriptures how dedication of merit works? The one explanation I remember from Theravada sources (e.g.

<http://www.budsas.org/ebud/whatbudbelieve/307.htm>) is that the person one dedicates the merit to must know about it in order for it to be transferred. And the reason for wishing all beings good is simply a personal practice and has no actual effect on others. If one could simply wish the merit to be transferred without the other's knowledge it'd result in the problem that buddhas could make all beings enlightened or at least free from ordinary suffering in no time.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 13th, 2013 at 5:19 AM

Title: Re: Does astrology matter to you?

Content:

Astus wrote:

How the "transference of merit" happens? To quote from <http://www.budsas.org/ebud/whatbudbelieve/307.htm> I have already referred to:

"When the beneficiary is aware of the act or wish, then a mutual 'rejoicing in' merit takes place. Here the beneficiary becomes a participant of the original deed by associating himself with the deed done. If the beneficiary identifies himself with both the deed and the doer, he can sometimes acquire even greater merit than the original doer, either because his elation is greater or because his appreciation of the value of the deed is based on his understanding of Dhamma and, hence, more meritorious, Buddhist texts contain several stories of such instances.

The 'joy of transference of merits' can also take place with or without the knowledge of the doer of the meritorious act. All that is necessary is for the beneficiary to feel gladness in his heart when he becomes aware of the good deed. If he wishes, he can express his joy by saying 'sadhu' which means 'well done'. What he is doing is creating a kind of mental or verbal applause. In order to share the good deed done by another, what is important is that there must be actual approval of the deed and joy arising in the beneficiary's heart.

Even if he so desires, the doer of a good deed cannot prevent another's 'rejoicing in the merit' because he has no power over another's thoughts. According to the Buddha, in all actions, thought is what really matters. Transference is primarily an act of the mind."

For more discussion of this see this thread on DWT:

<http://www.dhammadownload.com/viewtopic.php?f=24&t=1068>

To use a Mahayana explanation, it is practically the same. In Nagarjuna's MMK (17.4-5) there are seven types of action (karma) defined:

Speech and physical action:

Unobservable unrejected actions, and Unobservable rejected actions;

As well as . . .

Virtuous and nonvirtuous actions

Derived from enjoyment;

As well as intention: All are maintained to be similar.

These seven phenomena are the kinds of action.

The transference of merit, just as explained above in the Theravada teachings, here is called "virtuous and nonvirtuous actions derived from enjoyment" (paribhogānvayaṃ puṇyaṃ apuṇyaṃ ca tathāvidham / 從用生福德 罪生亦如是). Candrakīrti explains this type of action (paribhogānvaya):

"So too, there is [karma that has] continuity with use; this means the merit—the virtue—that is continuous with use. 'Use' (paribhoga) is the employment (upabhoga) on the part of the Saṅgha and such of an item that has been given away (pariyakṭa). [With that employment this karma has] continuity (anvaya)—in other words, there is a continuation (anugama) arisen in the continuum (santāna) of the giver, [and that continuation] is an accumulating of virtue. And [there is] the non-merit of that type—i.e., that has continuity with use. An example is the construction of a temple where beings are killed. From the use of that temple in such ways that beings are killed there, there arises in the continuum of those who built it the non-merit continuous with use. In this way, there is also nonmerit of that kind."

Why is it that it is impossible to transfer merit (or demerit) to another being without the other's knowing? Because that would mean that karma arises without intention, that one person's karma bears fruit for another individual, and that is contrary to the law of cause and effect in Buddhism. The continuum or series (samтана, defined in the Abhidharmasamuccaya (p. 69, and the Kosa on p. 1353) as "the momentary continuation of the aggregates, elements and spheres at each moment") of each person could take over another being, making the entire system of karma and the path to liberation chaotic and meaningless.

And it is because of the system of action and results that if constellations could define the events of one's life then good and bad things would not be the fruits of previous deeds, unless we can somehow establish that the stars and planets reflect one's karmic seeds.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 13th, 2013 at 6:04 AM

Title: Re: Does astrology matter to you?

Content:

Astus wrote:

PorkChop,

First the text clearly defines that transference happens when the receiver knows about it. Then it advises people to do good things that actually make merit. It actually follows what the Milindapanha says (http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/milinda.pdf, p. 149), the section explained a bit by Dhammanando Bhikkhu <http://www.abhidhamma.org/forums/lofiversion/index.php?t118.html>. This also explains the Tirokudda Kanda Sutta, that offerings can be made to certain hungry spirits, but not just generally to anyone.

"According to the Theravada understanding of the Law of Kamma, we are the makers and heirs of our own kamma. Therefore, there is no question of "sharing/transferring" meritorious kamma to another. The concept of transference of merits contradicts this understanding." (<http://sasanarakkha.org/dhamma/2007/03/merits-can-they-be-transferred.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 13th, 2013 at 6:52 AM

Title: Re: Does astrology matter to you?

Content:

PorkChop said:

The link does qualify that saying that transfer of merit is only possible in certain situations; where the deceased is in an unhappy destination and waiting for offerings.

Astus wrote:

And that is because only certain pretas can hang around to know about the offering.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 13th, 2013 at 7:54 AM

Title: Re: Does astrology matter to you?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

So is there a "self" or isn't there? What exactly constitutes the boundary between persons?

Astus wrote:

The whole merit transference topic came in to show that it is not magical thinking.

Getting into another subject on the nature of continuum could be dealt with in another topic if you want to pursue it. I promise I answer there.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 13th, 2013 at 8:03 AM

Title: Re: American "Zen"

Content:

Astus wrote:

First of all, in the West Zen has its strongest basis in America. There are so many good translations, studies and teachings already and more coming. To give my personal favourites: <http://beingwithoutself.org/jeff/>, <http://www.wwzc.org/book/ven-anzan-hoshin-roshi> and <http://sanshinji.org/teachers/> (who is Japanese but has a community in Indiana and speaks English).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 13th, 2013 at 5:32 PM

Title: Re: Does astrology matter to you?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

No, I just find it ironic that astrology gets questioned as fictitious in the same thread where the wholly fictitious entity called "an individual person" is used as some sort of substantial basis.

Astus wrote:

Dependent origination is how the world works. To say that emptiness equals nothingness, that is, the disappearance of everything, is an annihilationist approach. Interdependence is emptiness and there is no emptiness outside of phenomena. A person is a mistaken idea as long as one doesn't understand that it is actually the functioning of the five aggregates, and the aggregates are mistaken as long as they are viewed as independent entities. The law of causality is dependent origination and it is the clear proof that all appearances are without an inherent nature. To say that there is no causality either as the function of things is to say that by eliminating all appearances one gains liberation, and not by realisation of emptiness.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 13th, 2013 at 10:25 PM

Title: Re: Does astrology matter to you?

Content:

Astus wrote:

My response is based on another of your replies here where you explain your original point regarding the illusoriness of a person.

Karma Dorje said:

Neither is a person. Neither is a cause nor a condition. In fact, no tangible "thing" can be found at all. Treating persons as if they are anything more than a designation and that there is some sort of fixed line between them is incoherent. I agree with your points that a being will experience the results of the causes they have accumulated. However, those causes require particular secondary conditions to manifest, and it is to these conditions that dedication of merit and the four magical activities are directed.

Astus wrote:

Saying that there are no actual persons and then equating it with magical influence to me does not add up, unless you deny causality and say that anything works.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 13th, 2013 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: Does astrology matter to you?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

Are you saying that there are actual persons? You do not agree that imagining that there are persons (viz. discrete entities) in the first place is simply delusion?

I haven't said a thing about magical influence. I have only discussed astrology.

Astus wrote:

There is a distinct stream of causal factors, the series of the aggregates, that can be simply called a person. One continuum cannot be confused by another.

Astrology is the magical influence of constellations on people.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 14th, 2013 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: Does astrology matter to you?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

Please tell me how you distinguish one stream of causal factors from another. Where is the boundary that makes each distinct?

Astrology is most certainly not the magical influence of constellations on people. No jyotish has ever said it is. Rather one can take the seemingly external mandala of the time of birth as an indication of the karmic continuum of the seeming individual. Constellations are a signpost, not a causal factor.

Astus wrote:

From one apple seed one apple tree grows, and not another one nor a pear tree or a dolphin. That is, it is a distinct causal continuum. What I do, say and think comes from my mind and leaves impression on my mind. Mixing the continuum would mean that what I think is what you remember, etc.

What causes the stars to reflect a person's karmic seeds? What makes one set of stars more important than others?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 14th, 2013 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: Does astrology matter to you?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

We see time and again throughout the Buddhist teachings where Buddha and his followers like Maudgalyayana are able to read the minds of others. How do you propose this is possible if everything is distinct?

The stars don't reflect anything. The constellations merely indicate the gestalt at the time of birth, and no star is any more important than any other (aside from the Sun, for obvious reasons).

Astus wrote:

Mind reading is only one of the many magical elements of stories, an embellishment for entertainment. If the Buddha could have read others' minds then for instance the monks who got themselves killed would not have received instruction on corpse meditation. Also, one mind connecting directly to another mind would allow the possibility of telepathy and thus transferring enlightenment without saying a word, or the whole system would have to collapse into a single consciousness.

What is indicating the gestalt?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 14th, 2013 at 7:33 AM

Title: Re: Does astrology matter to you?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

So all of the common siddhis are all just more made up stuff? Well, if you are just going to dismiss anything in the teachings that doesn't accord with your current worldview and you think that conventional reality is actual, there's not much chance of common ground for us in this discussion.

Astus wrote:

Here is my view about it: <http://eubuddhist.blogspot.hu/2012/09/buddhist-magic.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 14th, 2013 at 5:35 PM

Title: Re: Does astrology matter to you?

Content:

Huseng said:

That's a pretty bold statement.

You're basically saying that plenty of adepts, many living today, who have spent their life practising and who some believe actually do read minds to some extent, are just superstitious believing in such embellished entertainment.

Astus wrote:

Basically, yes, although I wouldn't say it's purely superstition. You might be interested in this one, from Ven. Analayo: <http://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/fileadmin/pdf/analayo/BuddhaOmniscience.pdf>.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 14th, 2013 at 5:55 PM

Title: Re: American "Zen"

Content:

jeeprs said:

The <http://www.tricycle.com/editors-view/buddha-stain> discusses the Joshu Sasaki matter (may require subscription).

Astus wrote:

Just as in everyday life, the solution for ignorance is education. If those students knew even the basics of Buddhism they would have been aware that sex is not part of Zen training. So, while the teacher is guilty of sexual misconduct and power abuse, the disciples are guilty of being ignorants.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 14th, 2013 at 9:08 PM

Title: Re: Does astrology matter to you?

Content:

Huseng said:

So, quite early on astrology was a component of Mahāyāna, long before esoteric practices.

Astus wrote:

While many esoteric practices promise only worldly benefits it's developed into a path to liberation. Has astrology ever had anything more to offer then good days for insuring a male heir and such?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 15th, 2013 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: American "Zen"

Content:

Astus wrote:

... the disciples are guilty of being ignorants.

dzogchungpa said:

<http://education.yahoo.com/reference/dictionary/entry/guilty>

Astus wrote:

"deserving of blame"

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 15th, 2013 at 5:26 AM

Title: Re: American "Zen"

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

@Astus Your post seemed to imply that there is a kind of symmetry as far as guilt or blame is concerned between the teacher and his disciples in this case.

Is that what you meant?

Astus wrote:

That was my intention, yes. Although we can say that the teacher is the one who misbehaved and took advantage of his students, the students were also at fault in neglecting the study of the Dharma.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 15th, 2013 at 7:20 AM

Title: Re: American "Zen"

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

I can certainly agree with that. I guess 'guilty' just sounded somewhat harsh to my ear.

However, I do feel that Sasaki's fault is really of a different order of magnitude than that of the women he abused.

Astus wrote:

Agreed. However, to avoid future incidents, studying the actual teachings of the Buddha and the masters should be emphasised. It is really saddening that only a handful of Zen teachers tell people more than how to put their buttocks on the cushion.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 15th, 2013 at 6:09 PM

Title: Re: Sex Taboo's & applying Christianized thinking in Western

Content:

Astus wrote:

As you said, the scandal is not about sex itself, it is about abuse where a teacher lie about the nature of the relationship and with that causes harm to the person and to the sangha. A teacher marrying a student is fine, that is not about using one's higher status to cheat people into fake relationships. And it's never been about sex itself. So I find connecting the problem to some Christian puritanism is exaggerated.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 15th, 2013 at 6:24 PM

Title: Re: Does astrology matter to you?

Content:

PorkChop said:

The first point is that Quantum Physics has shown that electrons with related orbits will continue to have related orbits even after being spread across vast differences.

The second point is that Astrophysics & Chemistry show us that all elements on the periodic table heavier than helium likely came from an exploding star some where, also when stars explode they scatter debris all across the cosmos.

Who's to say that the heavier elements that make up our bodies are not in some way linked to planets & stars in far off cosmoses, and that those elements don't somehow influence our behavior here on a periodic basis? mind bottling

Astus wrote:

Can someone identify the quantum connections in people's body? Can someone show how molecular things in one's blood influence traffic? No. But it always sounds good to say something about quantum physics.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 15th, 2013 at 7:20 PM

Title: Re: American "Zen"

Content:

tigerdown said:

Do these largely rare cases among a handful of Buddhist monks mean that there is some systemic problem with ethics in Theradan, Tibetan, Taiwanese and other Buddhism? Of course not, and at least, no more than it would mean so in the American Zen world or Japanese Buddhism in general.

Astus wrote:

School shootings are also rare things, and it's not every day you find a dictator as the head of the state. Since we live outside of a war zone rape and murder are uncommon things too. Does low frequency mean there's nothing to worry about, nothing to watch out for? Also, the number of reported cases don't tell us the number of unknown issues, but it shows that people can get away with these things for decades, and it takes lot of effort for students to uncover the abuses to the public.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 16th, 2013 at 5:20 AM

Title: Re: Sex Taboo's & applying Christianized thinking in Western

Content:

Sara H said:

Since when is somebody abused by an orgasm?

Astus wrote:

If all was innocent and friendly sex why are people hurt? Who would complain about pleasure?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 16th, 2013 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: Does astrology matter to you?

Content:

PorkChop said:

Second question: Yes, what are feelings of anger but a molecular compound in the blood stream?

Astus wrote:

In Buddhism samskara are not rupa, i.e. anger, etc. are not molecular compounds.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 16th, 2013 at 7:01 AM

Title: Re: Hyon Gak Sunim interviews Robert Thurman

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thank you, it was a great interview and Thurman has some very good ideas.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 16th, 2013 at 7:12 AM

Title: Re: Sex Taboo's & applying Christianized thinking in Western

Content:

Sara H said:

That's what's interesting about this. "Sex Scandals"
Not "Lying Scandal".

It's the sex aspect that people are being sensationalist about.

Astus wrote:

As I said before, "the scandal is not about sex itself, it is about abuse where a teacher lie about the nature of the relationship and with that causes harm to the person and to the sangha." And this is what matches the idea of "sexual misconduct", so calling it a "sex scandal" is quite appropriate. You say that the big issue for many is the sex, however, I don't see people surprised that lay Zen teachers have sex or even talk about it. Also, it wasn't simply about lying either, although in Baker's case for instance there was also money involved. So, considering the basic five precepts, the one unbroken precept not yet on the list is actual murder. And this is not about secular law but Buddhist ethics that teachers are supposed to be examples of. Since you say that sex naturally creates drama then why is it only normal in a Buddhist context that supposedly enlightened teachers fall into such a base error? The answer is that it is not normal for a Buddhist teacher, it is not acceptable but harmful for the people involved and the community in general.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 16th, 2013 at 7:51 AM

Title: Re: Sex Taboo's & applying Christianized thinking in Western

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sara,

do you find that those of us discussing these matters here are falling for a common tabloid-style trick? Are there people here that say the problem is with the sex in these cases and not the power abuse? Neither Buddhism in general nor Zen in particular is popular enough to make it to the headlines of newspapers read by millions. All in all, Buddhism in the West is still a minor community made of educated middle class people mostly who don't really follow any Christian or conservative ideas but rather they tend to be quite liberal. So, let me ask you, where do you see the sort of puritan attitude towards Buddhist teachers?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 16th, 2013 at 8:37 AM

Title: Re: Does astrology matter to you?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Let's follow then the idea of chemically influenced/generated emotions that can be then be controlled to some extent by constellations. The body of an arhat should change its chemical elements or even the body since a liberated person has neither anger nor desire. And that means a medically definable nirvana. One might even find a pill to gain enlightenment. Of course, you said that not all anger is a corporeal product. Do you mean there are bodily and mental anger at the same time or they are different kinds of anger? I'm no doctor but I think higher blood pressure and heavier breathing can show anything between overwhelming desire and burning hate, or even just good acting.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 16th, 2013 at 7:23 PM

Title: Re: Sex Taboo's & applying Christianized thinking in Western

Content:

Astus wrote:

Matylda,

Are you saying that expecting a Zen teacher to follow common moral standards of a culture is beyond human abilities? An interesting idea.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 16th, 2013 at 7:50 PM

Title: Re: Does astrology matter to you?

Content:

Astus wrote:

PorkChop,

The mutual influence between mind and matter is quite obvious even on the everyday level, since people are mostly attached to and moved by stimuli in the five physical senses. At the same time one can also learn to be free from them. Related to this is that different people cling to different things, and even medication has to be adjusted to the individual. Considering that level of complexity in body chemistry and the large variety of responses to pills and such, astrology appears overly simplistic. And as already mentioned, the astrological systems are based on pre-modern cosmologies that don't exactly match the current state of astronomical knowledge.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 16th, 2013 at 7:55 PM

Title: Re: Does astrology matter to you?

Content:

Huseng said:

The Abhidharma-kośa-bhāṣya states, "The collective force of the actions of beings produces the winds which create (nirmā) the moon, the sun and the stars in heaven."

The cosmos are a reflection of beings' actions in this sense rather than a causative force.

Astus wrote:

I'm OK with the principle that realms appear because of karma. On the other hand, the Kosha's cosmological view of the world is very much outdated, and I think even the Chinese knew that early on.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 17th, 2013 at 10:46 PM

Title: Re: Sex Taboo's & applying Christianized thinking in Western

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Christianized thinking strikes again: <http://sweepingzen.com/sex-in-a-sacred-space/>!

Astus wrote:

The Kosha (p. 652) says that one of the four forms of illicit sex is: "in an unsuitable place: an uncovered spot, a caitya, an aranya". Same definition is repeated in other works. So, "sex in a sacred place" as misconduct is not a Christian idea.

Here's another thing from the Kosha (p. 604) that says some very relevant point (highlights from me).

"Sexual misconduct is much censured in the world because it is the corruption of another's wife, and because it leads to retribution in a painful realm of rebirth. It is easy for householders to abstain from it, but it is difficult for them to abstain from all sexual activity: householders do not leave the world because they are not capable of difficult things.

The Aryans possess akaranasāhvara with regard to sexual misconduct, that is, they have obtained definite abstention from it; in fact, in their future existence, they will be incapable of violating this precept. Such is not the case concerning all sexual activity. As a consequence, the rules of discipline of the Upasaka contain only the renunciation of sexual misconduct: it is inadmissible in fact that the Aryans, in a subsequent existence, would be capable of violating the discipline of an Upasaka which could happen if this contained the renunciation of all sexual activity. Akaranasāhvara means akriyāniyama, (that is akriyāyam ekantata, the certain abstention from one action)."

In brief: it is easy not to commit sexual misconduct for anyone, but aryanas are definitely free from it. And just to clarify, a noble being (aryana) is someone who has attained at least the first level of enlightenment, in case of bodhisattvas the path of seeing. Therefore, if someone commits a sexual misconduct that is a clear and obvious sign that the person has no insight into emptiness, has no enlightenment whatsoever, and should be viewed as an ignorant human being (prthagjana).

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 17th, 2013 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: Does astrology matter to you?

Content:

Huseng said:

Even so, the idea is that you can look into the cosmos to see a reflection of present events and things to come. It isn't so much that the night sky acts as a causal mechanism.

I'm neither for nor against astrology for the record. I'm exploring how it worked in various Buddhist traditions. I can't deny, however, that many masters used and still use it.

Astus wrote:

And there are other popular methods too, like

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=3igRAAAAYAAJ> and

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=c6Z8KqdF6LoC>. I think that they are all very interesting as long as one doesn't try to explain how they can actually work because then it just falls apart.

Another way to rationalise divination techniques is to see them as tools to bring out one's intuition, something that they all heavily rely on. And if we can allow the mind to have a mystical insight into the fabric of the causal relations then on some level fortune telling might actually work, or perhaps they can be used to better understand ourselves similarly to dream interpretation.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 18th, 2013 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: Does astrology matter to you?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Something I recommend for all: <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=idVxRE8uM-A>.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 18th, 2013 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: Sex Taboo's & applying Christianized thinking in Western

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Lotus Sutra in chapter 14 says,

"Bodhisattvas Mahasattvas must not regard women's bodies as objects of desire and speak Dharma for them. They do not take delight in looking at women. If they enter the homes of others, they do not speak with young girls, maidens, widows, and so forth. ... If they speak the Dharma for women, they do not smile or laugh and let their teeth show, nor do they expose their chests. Even for the sake of the Dharma, they do not become familiar with them, much less for the sake of other matters!"

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 19th, 2013 at 1:40 AM

Title: Re: Sex Taboo's & applying Christianized thinking in Western

Content:

Matylda said:

Well so now we have to remove all women from buddhist centers... there are plenty of teachers on YT speaking to the mixed audience very often mostly women who smile, and make jokes and so on, both Western and Asian teachers... what to do with that???

Astus wrote:

My point is that it's not a Christian, not a Hinayana, nor a modern idea to warn teachers about the dangers of having any kind of affair with women. It is also not acceptable to call such affairs a Dharma teaching, according to the Lotus Sutra.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 19th, 2013 at 4:40 AM

Title: Re: Sex Taboo's & applying Christianized thinking in Western

Content:

Matylda said:

yes according to Lotus sutra yes... but it is not final exposition in zen... moreover I hope you know how the bodhisattva is viewed in zen. I cannot quote but one can find in Sogenji writings as far as I know...

Astus wrote:

"Monetary and sexual matters are a far more serious cause of misfortunes than poisonous snakes. One should most carefully stay away from them."

(Baizhang Zen Monastic Regulations, fol. 5, ch. 7, §6; p. 219. tr. Ichimura)

"Thus, [pure] conduct and observance [of precepts] is Dharma that is not to be neglected even for an instant."

(Dogen: SBGZ: Gyoji; vol. 2, ch. 30; p. 165. tr. Nishijima & Cross)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 19th, 2013 at 5:18 AM

Title: Re: Sex Taboo's & applying Christianized thinking in Western

Content:

Matylda said:

of course, and now, does it apply to buddha as well???

Astus wrote:

Shakyamuni Buddha lived as an example to all a renunciate life, perfectly celibate. Do you know of any Mahayana sutra where a buddha engages in sexual activity (outside of anuttarayogatantra texts)?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 20th, 2013 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: American "Zen"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Zen's antinomian/iconoclast nature is no truer than its egalitarian attitude. Both are literary topics but without relevance to actual life where monastic life was highly ritualised and regulated, and Zen was the rhetoric only of the elite monks and lay aristocrats. That actually makes American Zen quite special as it is connected to the Beat culture and a serious re-interpretation of Zen texts.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 21st, 2013 at 11:44 PM

Title: Test Your Enlightenment

Content:

Astus wrote:

I now present ten questions in order to form a framework [to test your understanding].

[1] Do you thoroughly understand seeing [one's] nature, as if delineating and contemplating phenomenal forms similar to someone like Mañjuśrī?

[2] In everything you do—whether encountering situations or dealing with externals, seeing phenomenal forms or listening to sounds, raising a foot or lowering a foot, opening the eyes or closing the eyes—do you illuminate the implicit truth [zong] and comply with Buddhism?

[3] Do you read the teachings of each age and the statements of former patriarchs and masters, listening deeply and unafraid, completely understanding the truth in all of their teachings and not doubting it?

[4] In response to different [types of] difficult questions and all manner of trivial queries, are you able to provide [answers] according to the four kinds of eloquent responses and completely resolve the doubts that others have?

[5] At all times and in all situations, does wisdom shine forth unhindered and does thought after thought pass perfectly, without encountering a single dharma that is able to cause obstruction, or being interrupted for even a single instant?

[6] In all the occasions that present themselves to you in the external realm, whether contrary or agreeable, good or bad, do you resist [the desire to] elude them [on the one hand] and are you always conscious of destroying [any attachment to] them [on the other]?

[7] Within the realm of the mind and its objects comprised of a series of one hundred dharmas, do you get to see the extremely subtle essence-nature and the original point of rising of each and every [dharma], without confusing them with the circumstances of birth and death and the organs of sense and their objects?

[8] Regarding the four types of behavior—walking, standing, sitting, and lying—do you address others respectfully and exercise restraint when replying? And when wearing clothes and eating food, performing and carrying out [tasks], do you understand the true reality of each and every grade [in rank]?

[9] When listening to claims that there are Buddhas or there are no Buddhas, there are sentient beings or there are no sentient beings, do you sometimes applaud them and sometimes refute them, sometimes agree and sometime disagree, with a firm unwavering mind?

[10] When you hear about how all the different kinds of wisdom are able to clearly fathom how nature and form complement each other, how li and shi are unhindered, how nonexistence and existence are one and the same phenomena and do not reflect the origin [of phenomena] itself, and how the thousand sages appear in the world, can you avoid doubting it?

(Yongming Yanshou's Conception of Chan in the Zongjing Lu, p. 273-274, tr. A. Welter)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 22nd, 2013 at 8:07 AM

Title: Re: Test Your Enlightenment

Content:

kirtu said:

I see your wordy Yanshou and raise you just sitting.

Astus wrote:

They say that just sitting is practice-enlightenment and there's nothing beyond that, nothing to achieve at all. On the other hand, you sit silently till the end of your life. And if we scratch the rhetoric of just sitting a little bit we find that there's a lot more going on. So it can be that it is not Yanshou who talks too much but certain teachers say too little about what Buddhism is about. Mystifying enlightenment is of no use.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 23rd, 2013 at 7:46 AM

Title: Re: Test Your Enlightenment

Content:

seeker242 said:

Touche! Even funnier though would be if someone were to post on here and answer yes to every question, they would probably still be accused of being egocentric! "I got enlightenment" posts on Buddhist forums never seem to go over well.

Astus wrote:

Then Subhuti asked these monks, "Elders, have you ever achieved or realized anything?" The monks replied, "Only presumptuous persons will claim they have achieved and realized something. To a humble religious devotee, nothing is achieved or realized. How, then, would such a person think of saying to himself, 'This I have achieved; this I have realized'? If such an idea occurs to him, then it is a demon's deed."

(The Demonstration of the Inconceivable State of Buddhahood in "A Treasury of Mahayana Sutras", p. 33)

Resolute Mind asked, "Have you, sir, attained the Surangama Samadhi?"

The Indra king replied, "Could the characteristics of 'attain' and 'not attain' exist within this samadhi?"

Resolute Mind said, "No."

The Indra king said, "Good youth, you should understand that when a Bodhisattva practices this samadhi, there is nothing that is attained in any of the dharmas."

Resolute Mind said, "Since your understanding is like this, you must have already attained the Surangama Samadhi."

The king said, "Good youth, I do not perceive that the dharmas have any place of residence. He who has no residence in all the dharmas has attained the Surangama Samadhi. Good youth, to reside in this samadhi is to be completely without residence in all the dharmas. If one is without residence, then one is without grasping. If one is without grasping, one is also without preaching."

(Surangama Samadhi Sutra, p. 32. tr. McRae)

The Buddha asked Mañjuśrī, "When a Bodhisattva sits in a bodhimaṇḍa, does he attain anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi?"

Mañjuśrī replied, "When a Bodhisattva sits in a bodhimaṇḍa, he does not attain anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi. Why not? Because the appearance of bodhi is true suchness. Not finding a speck of dharma to capture is called anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi.

...

If there are those who say that they see bodhi and have attained it, we should know that they are the ones with exceeding arrogance."

<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra13.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 23rd, 2013 at 7:51 PM

Title: Re: Is the idea of "needing" a teacher just a control system

Content:

Astus wrote:

Rob,

There are a lot of things involved in the idea of a teacher. In general a teacher is just a person who teaches something. In Buddhism there are all sorts of teachers, that is, people who you can learn from different things. There are also specialists, people who know certain areas of Buddhism in depth. Let's say you want to study Yogacara. There are only a handful of English speakers who have thorough knowledge of Vijnaptimatra but a lot more who have some level of familiarity with it. If all you want is a basic understanding of Yogacara you can learn it in English and ask questions about points you find difficult from many teachers. However, if you aspire to become a specialist, you have to learn Chinese or Tibetan and because the problems you encounter become very technical you might have trouble finding the right person to consult with. So, do you need a personal teacher to know Yogacara? You don't. But because of your interest you might contact those who share your fascination with it and that way they become your spiritual friends (kalyanamitra).

A teacher can be an expert as I said above, but can also be a guide. People have different capacities - what usually means different levels of interest - and since the majority who study Buddhism don't have the inclination to go through the sutras and treatises, especially at the beginning, they rather rely on a single person they trust to present the Dharma in a simple and straightforward manner. But that's the case with almost everything and people usually prefer live talks and discussions rather than reading a book.

For those who only want to learn only on their own without any involvement in an actual community, well, I think it is very rare. Almost everybody wants to be with like minded people. And when it is not possible to meet in the physical space there are virtual groups like this forum.

Finally, there is the special case of the personal teacher where one follows a person to receive intensive education. It's like hiring a language teacher or a fitness trainer who you meet regularly and you get personalised instructions. Because true specialists are on high demand in a community only in specific situations is it possible to have such a tutor. Ideally a teacher knows the disciple very well, they have a close relationship, and that makes it possible to provide individual guidance. This is possible mostly in monastic and eremitic environments, or if you have a teacher living nearby whom you can visit any time you want. That's why only a few Buddhists have such a teacher. Even in a bigger monastery you see the abbot only once in a while, and becoming a personal disciple is a privilege.

In the Platform Sutra (ch. 2, tr. McRae) Huineng says,

"Because some people are stupid and some are wise, the stupid being the small and the wise being the great, the stupid ask questions of the wise and the wise preach the Dharma for the stupid. When a stupid person suddenly becomes enlightened, his mind opening forth, he is no different from a wise person.

...

If you can become enlightened yourself, don't rely on external seeking— don't think I'm saying you can only attain emancipation through [the help of] a spiritual compatriot other than yourself. This is not the case! Why? Within your own minds there is a spiritual compatriot [who will help you] become enlightened by yourself! If you activate the false and deluded, you will become all mixed up with false thoughts. Although some external spiritual compatriots may be teachers, they cannot save you."

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 24th, 2013 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: Test Your Enlightenment

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kirt,

It is actually quite easy to connect Yongming's Buddhism with Dogen's, although their general appearance is quite different, partly because Yongming lived just before the Song dynasty changes in Chan. Chinul for instance combines the teachings of Yongming and Dahui quite well.

Just sitting (只管打坐) is a combination of no-thought (無念, i.e. 非思量) with sitting meditation (坐禪). No-thought for Yanshou is the zong (宗), just as it is awareness/knowing (知) for Zongmi and ordinary mind (平常心) for Mazu. Yongming compares the two approaches and says (Integrating Chinese Buddhism, p. 191; end of the second question in the Guanxin Xuanshu) that the Hongzhou (Mazu) method works for those of the highest faculties while the Heze (Zongmi) path fits different capacities.

If it is true that just sitting equals seeing the nature (見性) then giving positive answers to all ten questions should be fairly simple. Let's see how it goes.

- [1] Seeing nature is knowing that thoughts come and go.
- [2] When there is no proliferation of ideas there is no attachment.
- [3] There is no other meaning of the Buddhadharma but seeing nature.
- [4] Not relying on preconceptions one sees and acts according to circumstances.
- [5] Thoughts cannot stay even for a moment.
- [6] Hope and fear, love and hate are only thoughts.
- [7] Confusion and clarity are both without substance, one moment of consciousness is followed by another.
- [8] Compassion comes with seeing nature, they are not two.
- [9] Seeing how one's mind works shows how all minds work.
- [10] Having or not having a thought is still clinging to a thought.

This kind of reductionist approach that is undoubtedly the Zen style can easily appear as a negation of the complexities of the path. In fact, it was one of Yanshou's primary goal to show that the teachings (教) harmonise with Zen (宗). That's why Albert Welter gave the title to his book "A Special Transmission within the Scriptures".

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 24th, 2013 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: Is the idea of "needing" a teacher just a control system

Content:

Astus wrote:

One interesting idea I see coming up again and again that is supposed to prove that people need a teacher is that we ordinary humans are incapable of seeing what is actually going on in our mind, therefore we need another person to tell us and correct it. I think this is a popular belief influenced by the scientific idea of objective observation and psychological views originating from that. But as Chekawa's mind training (<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Lojong>) text says: "Of the two witnesses uphold the principle one", i.e. you know best what goes on in your mind. It doesn't mean we can't cheat ourselves, but part of the practice is learning to see clearly.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 24th, 2013 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: Is the idea of "needing" a teacher just a control system

Content:

Jikan said:

That's an important point. One of the characteristics of beginners especially is that they don't see clearly. Can someone who does not see clearly learn how to do so without an external agent arranging the situation?

Astus wrote:

Unless you are living together 24/7 no person can give a better assessment of your behaviour than yourself, not to mention all the emotions and thoughts that don't show on one's face. It is usually when we are with others that strong and weak feelings surface, that's why Dharma friendship is very useful. On the other hand, people can be perfect critics of themselves up to the level of self-loathing and narcissism, and the problem comes from using the wrong list of critical psychological attributes. So Buddhism gives many descriptions of the good (kusala) and bad (akusala) qualities (dharma). The Shakyamuni himself, before his awakening, practised with dividing thoughts to these two kinds (<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.019.than.html>).

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 24th, 2013 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: Test Your Enlightenment

Content:

kirtu said:

Why did Yanshou feel a need to show that the teaching harmonize with Zen exactly?

Astus wrote:

There was a trend at the time of calling Zen a "special transmission outside the teaching" to separate it from other schools and to make it look superior. This naturally resulted in people rejecting studying the canon. As we know, eventually the idea of special transmission won and the mature Zen of the Song dynasty followed, and that was brought to Japan and eventually to the West.

kirtu said:

Seeing nature is beyond thoughts coming and going but that is a start.

Astus wrote:

Zongmi writes (Zongmi on Chan, p. 88; same quoted by Chinul in Collected Works, p. 290):

"If you find a good friend to show you [the path], you will all-at-once awaken to the Knowing of voidness and calm. Knowing is no mindfulness and no form. Who is characterized as self, and who is characterized as other? When you are aware that all characteristics are void, it is true mind, no mindfulness. If a thought arises, be aware of it; once you are aware of it, it will disappear. The excellent gate of practice lies here alone. Therefore, even though you fully cultivate all the practices, just take no mindfulness as the axiom. If you just get the mind of no mindfulness, then love and hatred will spontaneously become pale and faint, compassion and wisdom [prajna] will spontaneously increase in brightness, sinful karma will spontaneously be eliminated, and you will spontaneously be zealous in meritorious practices. With respect to understanding, it is to see that all characteristics are non-characteristics. With respect to practice, it is called the practice of nonpractice. When the depravities are exhausted, the rebirth process will cease; once arising and disappearing has extinguished, calmness and illumination will become manifest, and responsive functions will be without limit. It is called becoming a buddha."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 25th, 2013 at 6:04 AM

Title: Re: Test Your Enlightenment

Content:

kirtu said:

Right, this is the classic reversing the 12 links. But jumping (seeing) the Tathagata nature directly is faster and better (IMHO). Combining the two is Zen's own above and below practice/realization.

Did Zongmi or Yanshou teach about this? Chinul of course did.

Kirt

Astus wrote:

Zongmi writes in the Chan Prolegomenon (Zongmi on Chan, p. 123):

"All dharmas are like a dream. All the noble ones have said the same thing. Thus, thought of the unreal from the outset is calm. Sense objects are from the outset void. The mind of voidness and calm is a spiritual Knowing that never darkens. It is precisely this Knowing of Voidness and calm that is your true nature. No matter whether you are deluded or awakened, mind from the outset is spontaneously Knowing. [Knowing] is not produced by conditions, nor does it arise in dependence on any sense object. The one word "Knowing" is the gate of all excellence. Because of beginningless delusion about it, you have falsely grasped body and mind as a self and produced such thoughts as passion and anger."

And then continues with the same as quoted already, identifying the essential practice of no mindfulness, i.e. no thought. Zongmi claims that only this teaching of the Knowing (or awareness) is the explicit method that covers both the essence and the function, while other schools (Hongzhou, Niutou, etc.) fail to achieve this completely. Yanshou directly quotes Guifeng to show the different interpretations of the nature of mind found in the Chan lineages at the beginning of the Guanxin Xuanshu, therefore both Zongmi and Yongming hold the Heze Chan as the most authentic. Yanshou writes (Integrating Chinese Buddhism, p. 175):

"This awareness is the essence of mind for all the sentient beings. "Mind" is its name and awareness is its essence. It is comparable to "water" being the name and wetness being its essence. This awareness is neither the awareness that distinguishes subject and object nor the awareness of illuminating wisdom that realizes enlightenment. Rather, it is natural and spontaneous awareness. It acts freely without intention. It follows conditions but does not change; and though it does not change, it follows conditions. That is why it is called empty tranquil awareness. "Empty and tranquil" means to be without characteristics. Because it has a powerful ability to understand, yet is without form, it is called numinous awareness without confusion. Thus it is also called tranquil awareness, tranquil illumination, formless awareness, or non-knowing awareness."

Then he quotes from the Zhaolun, thus showing how the teaching of emptiness is in agreement with this, what is followed by another explanation (p. 177):

"This awareness is true awareness, the same as empty tranquil awareness. It is also called "awareness of no-thought." If one has no thought and awareness, one is in the state of common people; if one has no-thought and non-knowing, one is in the state of the two vehicles; if one has no-thought, but with awareness, one is in the state of the Buddhas. No-thought is empty and tranquil [awareness], and is also called "non-abiding awareness." Because if one abides in something, it is comparable to a person entering into a dark room and not being to see anything. But, if one does not abide in anything, it is like sunlight and moonlight illuminating and making visible all varieties of things."

Why did I say that seeing nature is knowing that thoughts come and go?

"But the essence of Suchness itself cannot be put an end to, for all things [in their Absolute aspect] are real; nor is there anything which needs to be pointed out as real, for all things are equally in the state of Suchness. It should be understood that all things are incapable of being verbally explained or thought of; hence, the name Suchness. Question: If such is the meaning [of the principle of Mahayana], how is it possible for men to conform themselves to and enter into it?

Answer: If they understand that, concerning all things, though they are spoken of, there is neither that which speaks nor that which can be spoken of, and though they are thought of, there is neither that which thinks nor that which can be thought of, then they are said to have conformed to it. And when they are freed from their thoughts, they are said to have entered into it."

(The Awakening of Faith - Attributed to Ashvaghosha, p. 40)

"The Way needs no cultivation, just not defiling it. What is defilement? When you have a mind of birth and death and an intention of creation and action, all these are defilement. If you want to know the Way directly, then ordinary mind is the Way. What is an ordinary mind? It means no intentional creation or action, no right or wrong, no grasping or rejecting, no terminable or permanent, no profane or holy."

...

"Grasping good and rejecting evil, contemplating emptiness and entering concentration—all these belong to intentional creation and action. If one seeks further outside, he strays farther away. Just put an end to all mental calculations of the triple world. If one originates a single deluded thought, this is the root of birth and death in the triple world. If one simply lacks a single thought, then he excises the root of birth and death and obtains the supreme treasure of the dharma-king. Since countless kalpas, the deluded thoughts of ordinary man—flattery, deception, self-intoxication, and arrogance—have formed the one body. Therefore, the su-ṭra says, 'It is only by many dharmas that this body is aggregated. When arising, it is only dharmas arising; when extinguishing, it is only dharmas extinguishing.' When the dharma arises, it does not say 'I arise'; when the dharma extinguishes, it does not say 'I extinguish.' The former thought, the later thought, and the present thought—all successive moments of thought do not wait for one another, and all successive moments of thought are quiescent and extinct. This is called the ocean-seal sama-dhi, which contains all dharmas."

(Mazu Daoyi in "The Hongzhou School", p. 123, 126)

"If someone can suddenly awaken to the correct cause, then he is at the stage of leaving defilement behind. He then shatters the three worlds and twentyfive forms of existence. Such a person knows that all phenomena, internal and external, are not real—arising from mind's transformations, they are all provisional designations. There is no need to anchor the mind anywhere. When feelings merely do not attach to things, then how can things hinder anyone? Let the nature of other things flow freely, without [interfering by] trying to break apart or extend anything. The sounds that one hears and the forms that one sees are all ordinary; whether being here or there, one freely responds to circumstances without any fault."

(Guishan's Admonitions in "Zen Classics", p. 30)

"The One Mind alone is the Buddha, and there is no distinction between the Buddha and sentient beings, but that sentient beings are attached to forms and so seek externally for Buddhahood. By their very seeking they lose it, for that is using the Buddha to seek for the Buddha and using mind to grasp Mind. Even though they do their utmost for a full aeon, they will not be able to attain to it- They do not know that, if they put a stop to conceptual thought and forget their anxiety, the Buddha will appear before them, for this Mind is the Buddha and the Buddha is all living beings."

(Zen Teaching of Huang Po, p. 29-30)

"If within a single moment deluded thinking suddenly ceases, [you will] thoroughly perceive your own mind and realize that it is vast and open, bright and luminous - intrinsically perfect and complete. This state, being originally pure, devoid of a single thing, is called enlightenment. Apart from this mind, there is no such thing as cultivation or enlightenment.

...

the illusory mind of delusion is originally rootless. You should never take a deluded thought as real and try to hold on to it in your heart. As soon as it arises notice it right away. Once you notice it, it will vanish. Never try to suppress thoughts but allow thoughts to be as you watch a gourd floating on water."

(<http://chancenter.org/cmc/2011/10/13/essentials-of-practice-and-enlightenment-for-beginners/>)

These are just a few works to show that enlightenment simply depends on grasping or not grasping a thought, just as the Platform Sutra says about moments of buddhahood. The idea of "jumping directly" to see that the nature of mind is empty and aware is in fact not that immediate, it rather serves as a background for letting go of thoughts. That's why it is the first step in Baizhang's three steps system. Not clinging to phenomena is also in perfect agreement with the teachings on selflessness, emptiness, mind only and the rest. Talking about an inherent buddha-nature can sound like a special teaching, but when it comes down to practice it is no different from the rest.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 25th, 2013 at 5:37 PM

Title: Re: Test Your Enlightenment

Content:

oushi said:

Is there one person that thinks that thoughts come and stay? This very nature of thoughts is the cause of the problem. Because thoughts come and go, people do all they can to initiate them and sustain them. The main influence society does on a person is "you have to know!" and "you have to remember!". "We all know that thoughts come and go, that is why we have to deal with it".

Astus wrote:

Impermanence and causality are easily understood and accepted by everyone, and at the same time they are the fundamental teachings that lead to enlightenment. The error we can make with thoughts is to regard them as real, as meaningful, as true and thus identify with them and create attachments. Another way to say this is the false belief in a thinker, a being that thinks and creates the thoughts, or an entity that is behind/beyond/above thoughts, i.e. the belief in a self.

"Even when all sorts of thoughts do crop up, it's only for the time being while they arise. So, just like little children of three or four who are busy at play, when you don't continue holding onto those thoughts and don't cling to any [particular] thoughts, whether they're happy or sad, not thinking about whether to stop or not to stop them — why, that's nothing else but abiding in the Unborn Buddha Mind. So keep the one mind as one mind. If you always have your mind like this, then, whether it's good things or bad, even though you're neither trying not to think them nor to stop them, they can't help but just stop of themselves."

(Bankei Zen, p. 50. tr. Haskel)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 25th, 2013 at 5:39 PM

Title: Re: Test Your Enlightenment

Content:

catmoon said:

It's a trap.

Astus wrote:

The appropriate word is: upaya.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 25th, 2013 at 7:09 PM

Title: Re: Test Your Enlightenment

Content:

Astus wrote:

From the

http://koreanbuddhism.net/master/dharma_talk_view.asp?cat_seq=32&content_seq=127&priest_seq=0&page=1:

"Empty your mind and reflect with clarity. You must have faith in the fact that the causal arising of each thought is actually non-arising." (32)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 25th, 2013 at 7:55 PM

Title: Re: African Americans & people of Color, & Buddhism in the W

Content:

Huseng said:

Is this a western problem, or really just America?

kirtu said:

It's a western problem. How many Gypsies are in the practice centers in German, Polish, Czech, Slovak place? How many North Africans are welcome in French centers, etc? I don't know the answers because I no longer live in Europe and haven't for a while but on trips to Austria and Germany for Kalachakra in 2006 and 2007 there were no minorities per se aside from Asian's. Are there any First Nation people's in practice center's in Canada? I've heard of some but is there a story there? How about Black Canadians (I forgot to ask my African-American-Canadian relatives in Toronto what they call themselves but I only met them once)?

Kirt

Astus wrote:

Gypsies are often considered people who cannot integrate into the larger society. It's not simply a matter of skin colour but they are often considered a separate nation/ethnicity. Nevertheless, in Hungary there is a Buddhist community specialising in gypsies: <http://www.jaibhim.hu/> Note that this group works among very poor people. So I'd say that it's not really a matter of colour but social status that decides how much one can relate to Buddhism at its current status. It is not the religion for working class. SGI provides a simple teaching with simple goals and active evangelising, so it works (at least in America).

Another unfortunate factor, at least in Hungary, is that the form of Buddhism that is popular among lower class people is often mixed with nationalistic ideals, something that gypsies can hardly relate to.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 26th, 2013 at 6:52 PM

Title: Re: Is the idea of "needing" a teacher just a control system

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thanks for sharing that Anders.

The vows of Samantabhadra (http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/samantabhadra.pdf) represent the attitude one should have in order to obtain the mind set of a disciple and be able to learn the Dharma. And that is crucial to find the teacher in every situation.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 26th, 2013 at 8:29 PM

Title: Re: Is the idea of "needing" a teacher just a control system

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Sorry if I was not clear, I was not rofl about having Amitabha as a teacher, in Vajrayana we also have primordial teachers (like Vajradhara for example) but with the way it was presented: you don't need a teacher, have Amitabha as a teacher. It struck me as oxymoronic.

Astus wrote:

"If one wishes to see the Buddha then one sees him. If one sees him then one asks questions. If one asks then one is answered, one hears the sutras and rejoices greatly." (Pratyutpanna Samadhi Sutra, ch. 2. tr. Harrison)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 27th, 2013 at 12:19 AM

Title: Re: African Americans & people of Color, & Buddhism in the W

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is elite Buddhism and there is popular Buddhism, just as in other religions. You don't expect a Sunday churchgoer to be able to understand a theological work, and you don't expect a priest to do regular retreats like a monk. Buddhism could spread among the people by simple rituals, recitations and basic moral rules. But currently in the West even the Buddhists themselves have doubts about rebirth and karma, so how could merit making and ethical discipline establish a larger community? Zazen and deity visualisation, aren't those monastic practices? Recitation of Amita Buddha's name, prayer wheels, lighting incense, and most importantly community activities. As I see it, those who want some usual religious environment go to Christian groups. Buddhism could be popular among liberal minded and spiritual (New Age) people if its image were transformed into something colourful, lively and more open than conservative religions where contraception is a sin.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 27th, 2013 at 5:51 PM

Title: Re: Sex Taboo's & applying Christianized thinking in Western

Content:

shel said:

A poem by Chizuko Karen Joy Tasaka, published today on SweepingZen.com

(<http://sweepingzen.com/to-joshu-sasaki-roshi-roshi-you-are-a-sexual-abuser/>) ...

Roshi, you are a sexual abuser

“Come” you say as you pull me from a handshake onto your lap

“Open” you say as you push your hands between my knees, up my thighs fondle my breasts

rub my genitals

french kiss me

you put my hand on your genitals stroke your penis

jack you off?

this is sanzen?

my friend—she was inji

sex with roshi

she tried to say no

you demanded, demanded, demanded demon demand the force of a tornado

sex with roshi

for whose best interest?

I told you I don't like it.

I asked you why you do this?

You said, “nonattachment, nonattachment, you nonattachment”

I told you as shoji, "women very angry, very upset"
I asked you why you do this.
You said: "Be good daughter to roshi, and good wife to G. [her husband].
Roshi, that is incest So many women trying to shake the shame from their voices of Sex with roshi

We came to you with the trust of a student
You were our teacher
You betrayed us
You violated our bodies
You rape our souls

You betrayed our previous student-teacher relationship
You abuse us as women
You emasculate our husbands and boyfriends

Roshi, you are a sexual abuser
Your nuns you make your sexual servants
Your monks and oshos are crippled with denial Roshi, Sexual Abuser.

–By Chizuko Karen Joy Tasaka (1951-2010)

(My bold above)

Astus wrote:
Thanks for bringing it here.

Author: Astus
Date: Wednesday, February 27th, 2013 at 7:15 PM
Title: Re: Buddhism and the Warrior
Content:

Astus wrote:
I think what feels difficult to accept for many is that not every human is fit to be a Buddhist. Those who defend, support or commit violence are such, just like many others who believe that happiness comes from samsaric gains. That is taking refuge not in the Three Jewels but in other philosophies and faiths. Violence comes from anger, anger comes from fear, fear is based on ignorance. How could such a thing mean liberation, or even something wholesome?

Author: Astus
Date: Wednesday, February 27th, 2013 at 8:32 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism and the Warrior

Content:

Nighthawk said:

So then what is the solution to invasion, tyranny, islamic terrorism, crime etc?

Astus wrote:

Don't do it.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 28th, 2013 at 9:01 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism and the Warrior

Content:

Nighthawk said:

How is a society to be run without the use of violence? I'm not talking about myself.

Astus wrote:

Buddhism is not a political philosophy and it was not meant to be such. Look at the <http://www.ymba.org/bns/bnsframe.htm> 11 (on politics), 21 (on violence and vengeance), 30 (handling worldly affairs) and 32 (harming beings in any way). In the <http://www.accesstoinight.org/lib/authors/thanissaro/bmc1/bmc1.ch05.html> rule includes prohibition against "running messages and errands for kings, ministers of state, householders, etc. A modern example would be participating in political campaigns."

Same thing mentioned in the <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.01.0.bodh.html> in the Intermediate Section on Virtue: "'Or he might say: 'Whereas some recluses and brahmins, while living on the food offered by the faithful, engage in running messages and errands for kings, ministers of state, khattiyas, brahmins, householders, or youths, (who command them): "Go here, go there, take this, bring that from there" — the recluse Gotama abstains from running such messages and errands.'"

So when the question is about the relationship of Buddhism with being a warrior, it makes sense only on the personal level, because Buddhism is the path of liberation for the individual, just as karma is always personal. That's why my answer is: don't do it.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 1st, 2013 at 4:21 AM

Title: Cleary on Cultish Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Foyan's teachings on meditation, much like those of the ancient masters, are quite different from the obsessive compulsive attitudes inherited by Western Zen cultists from Japanese sectarians automatically following late feudal and neo-imperial models of Zen organization and discipline. Foyan's teachings were evidently different from those of obsessive cultists of his own time too. Xutang (pronounced Syw-tahng), whose student Jomyo imported Zen to Japan in the thirteenth century, is on record as teaching,

"It is essential not to become attached to the form of sitting; when you sit, you should do so in a suitably convenient manner. If you lack inner direction, you will uselessly weary your spirit." Under the military authoritarian regimes that actually controlled most of the Zen establishments in feudal Japan, this original flexibility tended to give way to extreme disciplinarian rigidity."

(Instant Zen, p. 130)

"The irony in the obscurity of koans is that it derives mainly from linguistic and contextual gaps between sectarian Zen in Korea and Japan on the one hand and comprehensive classical Chinese Zen on the other. Offshoots of Korean and Japanese sects, not understanding the structure of the koans, have tended to make this aspect of Zen into a cult of secrecy, mystery, and/or simple mystification.

Imported to the West, this type of cult has given rise to the new coinage koanophobia, "fear of koans," evidently on account of their exploitation for bafflement value. Added to the premise of koanic secrets of overwhelming importance held authoritatively by an autocratic potentate and an elite circle, in a cultural environment where self-esteem is considered a central value, the mystery-cult approach to koans has had the effect of intimidating and yet alluring those who are naive or inwardly uncommitted but nevertheless wish to think well of themselves."

(Kensho, p. xi)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 1st, 2013 at 7:39 AM

Title: Re: Cleary on Cultish Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

The sources were given, they are both Thomas Cleary's books (as the title of the thread suggests) and their titles are also given with the page number. But if anyone wants more, like ISBN or date of publication I can also give that. Or, yes, you can search for it online.

How is it important?

The first quote is about zazen, in the book itself a note to Foyan's poem on sitting meditation. It is relevant to the idea that Zen is to be realised/accomplished/performed in proper sitting posture.

Three examples (not meant to be a critique of the individuals being quoted):

"You should be sitting straight up as if you were supporting the sky with your head. This is not just form or breathing. It expresses the key point of Buddhism. It is a perfect expression of your Buddha nature. If you want true understanding of Buddhism, you should practice this way. These forms are not a means of obtaining the right state of mind. To take this posture itself is the purpose of our practice." (S. Suzuki: Zen Mind, Beginners Mind; p. 26)

"Zazen is a physical practice. To sit in a chair and call it zazen is incorrect."

(<http://hardcorezen.blogspot.hu/2011/11/sitting-in-chairs-is-not-zazen-part-one.html>)

"During zazen, we have satori, we are Buddha, God. Without zazen, we have no such thing. So zazen is the holy posture, the highest. During zazen, the noblest holy mind manifests itself. What is holy in the world? Only the posture of zazen."

(http://www.abuddhistlibrary.com/Buddhism/C%20-%20Zen/Modern%20Teachers/Deshimaru%20Roshi/The%20Teachings%20of%20Master%20Deshimaru/teachings_of_master_deshimaru.htm)

The second quote is about how koans are viewed incorrectly as irrational and something that only an enlightened being can comprehend.

Quotes about koans:

"a paradox to be meditated upon that is used to train Zen Buddhist monks to abandon ultimate dependence on reason and to force them into gaining sudden intuitive enlightenment" (<http://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/koan>)

"An important part of kong-an practice is the private exchange between teacher and student wherein the teacher checks the student's grasp of the point of the kong-an. Kong-ans are probably best known for the unusual, seemingly non-rational quality of their language and dialogues, and are not meant to be studied, analyzed or approached conceptually. The kong-an is an experiential tool that helps us cut through our thinking so that we can just perceive and function clearly." (<http://www.kwanumzen.org/about-zen/zen-practice/kong-an-practice/>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 1st, 2013 at 6:17 PM

Title: Re: Cleary on Cultish Zen

Content:

kirtu said:

Zazen shows you your own Buddhanature directly.

With zazen you can see your Buddhanature.

Astus wrote:

Although the proper posture is heavily emphasised, even to the level where for instance Nishijima explains the effects of zazen with the nervous system, but it is also acknowledged that "zazen" is not bound to any posture. Obviously, assuming a meditative posture is not restricted to Zen or even to Buddhism, so it could hardly be the direct realisation of anything. Focusing on the body is a simple way to give a focus of the meditation and allow the mind to settle. But that's nothing more than shamatha, a good way to begin practising meditation. On the other hand, the mental attitude is what matters, like what they call mushotoku (無所特), hishiryō (非思量) and shinjin datsuraku (身心脱落), all equal to shikantaza. Of course, those who maintain that Zen is about the correct posture will say these are wrong interpretations.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 1st, 2013 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: Cleary on Cultish Zen

Content:

kirtu said:

Taisen Deshimaru (and presumably others) talk about correct posture as a start, not an end.

Astus wrote:

Wouldn't saying such a thing compromise the idea of zazen equals enlightenment?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 1st, 2013 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: Cleary on Cultish Zen

Content:

kirtu said:

Not at all. Actual zazen (seated meditation) is the essential element for kensho and satori. But we take our zazen with us off the cushion - we don't leave it there. Zazen is the start of enlightenment and is practice/enlightenment. But until we see that, it's just practice. But we take that with us no matter what we do.

Astus wrote:

If you can take zazen off the cushion then why is sitting, and in a specific posture, important at all? For instance, one can recite the nenbutsu or work on a koan anywhere in any posture.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 2nd, 2013 at 5:21 PM

Title: Re: American "Zen"

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

These American "Zen masters" are just too subtle for me:

<http://sweepingzen.com/unethical-practices/>

Astus wrote:

What Nonin says in that article basically denies liberation and fails to use the teaching to the two truths.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 2nd, 2013 at 6:19 PM

Title: Re: Cleary on Cultish Zen

Content:

kirtu said:

Sitting is important because it reveals your own Buddhanature to you. Zazen is a more intensive and direct practice than nembutsu for example although one can awaken to their Buddhanature through nembutsu as well.

Astus wrote:

I'm talking about sitting as a physical posture. People sit a lot every day in the office, at home, in a restaurant, in the car, etc. They sit because it is convenient. As Zhiyi writes (The Essentials of Buddhist Meditation, ch. 6, tr. Ven. Dharmamitra): "although it is true that this can be accomplished in any of the four deportments, still, for the study of the path, sitting is the superior posture." However, Huineng says (Platform Sutra, ch. 9, tr. McRae): "One is enlightened to the Way through the mind. How could it depend on sitting?" Even Dogen asks in the http://www.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/gongyo_seiten/translations/part_3/fukan_zazengi.html: "How could that be limited to sitting or lying down?" And in the Bendowa (<http://www.wwzc.org/sites/default/files/Bendowa-book.pdf>): "This is not only practised while sitting, it is like a hammer striking emptiness; before and after, its ringing pervades everywhere. How can it be limited to a place?"

What makes sitting more intensive and direct? How does intensity and directness depend on sitting? This is asked not because sitting is wrong but because this single posture is emphasised as if it had some special meaning or quality. Thich Nhat Hanh likes to teach walking meditation, and once a Chan monk told me that doing prostrations is the best. Many simply say that posture is not that important. Dogen likes to refer to Shakyamuni's sitting for six years (which is not true) and Bodhidharma's nine years of wall gazing (rarely interpreted as seated meditation, as discussed in Broughton: Bodhidharma Anthology, p. 66-68) as proof of elevating the sitting posture to the level of ultimate accomplishment. If that is just a poetic way of talking about meditation there is no need to think too much about it, however, just as you said, when it is equated with enlightenment itself, some explanations for that would be good.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 2nd, 2013 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: Cleary on Cultish Zen

Content:

kirtu said:

It is important, it's just not absolutely critical as meditation is done with the mind. But there is no other posture that facilitates long term deep concentration.

Astus wrote:

But concentration, attaining various levels of absorption, is neither the method nor the goal of Zen. I'm not questioning the yogic qualities of the posture, but they're not discussed in Zen works (except for Hakuin's tradition where it comes from outside of Buddhism), and they don't equal realising buddha-nature.

kirtu said:
For purification/Buddha repentance practice.

Astus wrote:
Not necessarily. It's Chan in motion.

Author: Astus
Date: Saturday, March 2nd, 2013 at 11:07 PM
Title: Re: Cleary on Cultish Zen
Content:
Matt J said:

This is like saying, if you can swim in the ocean, why swim in a pool at all?

Sitting is important because it allows us to leave off everything else and collect ourselves. Sitting in a proper posture is important because a proper posture facilitates relaxation and concentration.

Every teacher I've had, Zen, Theravada, and other, have started with sitting and then at some point say "now take your practice with you." In my experience, zazen is the hardest to get but the easiest to take into daily life.

Astus wrote:
Then we are talking about a gradual development, just as in any other school, except that in Zen they forgot to provide the description of the stages.

Author: Astus
Date: Saturday, March 2nd, 2013 at 11:57 PM
Title: Re: American "Zen"
Content:
Matt J said:

I don't see that at all. Nonin writes (in my opinion) controversial things at times but this article is not one of them.

Are you a part of a formal Zen tradition? There may be a disconnect between different teachings.

Astus wrote:
"We need to remember, however, that awakening is not a permanent event, that all of us, even those who have deeply awakened to our true nature and the nature of our relationship to the rest of the universe can fall into delusion in an instant and act badly, causing harm to ourselves and others."

"The law of cause and effect governs all our actions. No one can escape it, even the Zen Buddhist master who foolishly thinks that he or she is beyond it."

The impossibility of becoming free from karma, from samsara, sounds to me like denying nirvana. Saying that one is never permanently liberated means that the chain of dependent origination cannot be broken.

Would you say that Nonin's Zen is a teaching that promises no freedom, unlike other forms of Buddhism?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 3rd, 2013 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: Cleary on Cultish Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kirt,

Yes, they teach counting the breath, focusing on the lower belly and sometimes even other things. How does that make the sitting posture identical to buddhahood?

"Only the posture of zazen is the true living Buddha. It is the only posture which inspires true respect in everyone. Through it, I will be able to face anything."

(http://www.abuddhistlibrary.com/Buddhism/C%20- %20Zen/Modern%20Teachers/Deshimaru%20Roshi/The%20Teachings%20of%20Master%20Deshimaru/teachings_of_master_deshimaru.htm)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 3rd, 2013 at 8:36 AM

Title: Re: Cleary on Cultish Zen

Content:

kirtu said:

The sitting posture itself is not identical to Buddhahood. Deshimaru didn't mean that literally. However sitting is needed to accomplish zazen (unless one has a handicap , in which case it would be difficult but not impossible). But zazen is practice/enlightenment. From the beginning. In Zen, zazen is the gateway to directly discovering one's Buddhahood for oneself.

Astus wrote:

As I read it, you say that (1) sitting is required (unless not) for zazen, (2) zazen is practice-enlightenment, (3) zazen leads to the discovery of buddhahood. So, sitting is an ideal preparation for practice-enlightenment but it's not the same. And although it is called practice-enlightenment, there is a further step to find buddhahood - or you meant probably that practice-enlightenment is buddhahood, or rather the realisation of buddha-nature, but not the same as ultimate enlightenment. That way we have 3 or 4 stages of Zen practice, although if I remember correctly Dogen didn't agree with Dongshan's five ranks. Nevertheless, it is now clarified that sitting itself is not actually liberation but only the first step on the path. Or am I distorting your point?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 3rd, 2013 at 8:48 AM

Title: Re: American "Zen"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Nonin may not have meant it the way it appears to me, that's possible. Maybe "deeply awakened to our true nature" is just a superficial understanding of causality, or anything before the arya levels (i.e. actual insight into emptiness). And "No one can escape it" is not a doctrinal statement but rather a warning to the common people who may delude themselves with thoughts of transcendent enlightenment. I'm not excluding anything, it was simply strange at first.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 3rd, 2013 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: American "Zen"

Content:

Huseng said:

Not everyone agrees with this. In some strains of Mahāyāna thought, particularly the ekayāna, arhats are reborn outside the three realms and eventually must attain buddhahood.

Astus wrote:

But those who talk about the inconceivable rebirth of an arhat (and bodhisattvas) add that there is still conceptual obscuration.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 3rd, 2013 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: Cleary on Cultish Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dogen in both the Zazengi and Fukanzazengi uses Yueshan's story, saying (<http://www.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/shobogenzo/translations/zazengi/zazengi.translation.html>): "Sitting fixedly, think of not thinking. How do you think of not thinking? Nonthinking. This is the art of zazen." (普勸坐禪儀 (T2580_.82.0001 a27-b01): 兀兀坐定。思量箇不思量底。不思量底如何思量。非思量此乃坐禪之要術也。 / 正法眼藏坐禪儀 (T2582_.82.0217c08-11): 兀兀ト坐定シテ。思量箇不思量底ナリ。不思量底。如何思量。コレ非思量ナリ。コレスナハチ坐禪ノ法術ナリ。)

So zazen is hishiryō (非 - non, 思量 - thinking), sometimes translated as "

<http://antaiji.dogen-zen.de/eng/zgi.shtml> " or "

<http://www.wwzc.org/translations/zazengi.htm> ". As Bielefeldt

<http://www.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/shobogenzo/translations/zazengi/zazengi.suppl.notes.html#anchor4>, in the older version of Dogen's manual he simply quotes Zhanglu Zongze's Zuochanyi as the explanation of the actual mental practice: "Whenever a thought occurs, be aware of it; as soon as you are aware of it, it will vanish. If you remain for a long period forgetful of objects, you will naturally become unified. The is the essential of art of zazen.", and it is an instruction that has a longer history in Zen (see Bielefeldt's book on this: Dogen's Manuals of Zen Meditation). Practically it is the same as the <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=153955#p153955> and <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=154743#p154743>.

Dogen's zazen is actually not as harsh as other Zen teachers like Shishuang Qingzhu where people never laid down (a practice criticised in the Platform Sutra). A difficulty is that in Soto Zen the word zazen is often used as a synonym of hishiryō, the enlightened view that should be practised regardless of one's activities. The problem is only when a practitioner believes that Zen is only for the time on the cushion, while in fact sitting comfortably is only training, preparation, an artificial environment to become strong. But since the only thing to be mastered is hishiryō by hishiryō, essentially there is nothing new developed or attained.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 4th, 2013 at 3:10 AM

Title: Re: American "Zen"

Content:

Matt J said:

Baizhang's Wild Fox koan suggests that it is not so simple as yes or no.

Astus wrote:

I wouldn't rely on a single story to understand the relationship between karma and enlightenment. There are, after all, quite a few extensive treatises on the matter, and the sutras of course.

The bodhisattva career doesn't start at the 7th and 8th bhūmis but way before that. A 1st bhūmi bodhisattva is already on the 41st level in the usual 52 stages model and has very strong compassion, not to mention the wisdom with what the illusoriness of samsara is seen through. Such an enlightened noble being is capable of becoming an arhat, but doesn't do so in order to attain buddhahood.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 4th, 2013 at 7:06 AM

Title: Re: Cleary on Cultish Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is actually something to do, which is not generating samsara. In other words, although the nature of mind is already perfect, it is covered up by defilements. Cleaning the mind means not grasping at phenomena, not creating further trouble. The practice of letting go of appearances is itself stopping samsara and abiding in the buddha-mind by not abiding anywhere. This is what is done in zazen and this is the non-thought. Linji explains it very well:

The problem:

"If you engage in any seeking, it will all be pain. Much better to do nothing." (Record of Linji, tr. Sasaki, p. 19)

"Seeking buddha and seeking dharma are only making hell-karma. Seeking bodhisattvahood is also making karma; reading the sutras and studying the teachings are also making karma. Buddhas and patriarchs are people with nothing to do." (p. 17)

The solution:

"Bring to rest the thoughts of the ceaselessly seeking mind, and you will not differ from the patriarch-buddha." (p. 8)

"Followers of the Way, your own present activities do not differ from those of the patriarch-buddhas. You just don't believe this and keep on seeking outside. Make no mistake! Outside there is no dharma; inside, there is nothing to be obtained. Better than grasp at the words from my mouth, take it easy and do nothing. Don't continue [thoughts] that have already arisen and don't let those that haven't yet arisen be aroused." (p. 22)

In summary:

"It is because you cannot stop your mind which runs on seeking everywhere that a patriarch said, 'Bah, superior men! Searching for your heads with your heads!' When at these words you turn your own light in upon yourselves and never seek elsewhere, then you'll know that your body and mind are not different from those of the patriarch-buddhas and on the instant have nothing to do—this is called 'obtaining the dharma.'" (p. 28)

Dogen says in the

http://www.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/gongyo_seiten/translations/part_3/fukan_zazengi.html:

"Therefore, put aside the intellectual practice of investigating words and chasing phrases, and learn to take the backward step that turns the light and shines it inward. Body and mind of themselves will drop away, and your original face will manifest. If you want to realize such, get to work on such right now."

To emphasise the central point of the last two quotes above:

"An often-used Chinese expression, consisting of only four characters, describes the essence of Zen practice very accurately and very simply: "Turn the light and illuminate back." This expression is found in the records of Rinzai as well as Dogen, and many other Zen masters from early Zen to the present. It was an important term for Chinul, the father of Korean Son or Zen, and it is a kind of motto today for the university where I teach, a Zen-affiliated institution in Kyoto." (Jeff Shore:

<http://beingwithoutself.files.wordpress.com/2011/07/principles.pdf>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 4th, 2013 at 6:59 PM

Title: Re: Cleary on Cultish Zen

Content:

oushi said:

All true, but the question is, how to stop the "ceaselessly seeking mind"?

Astus wrote:

That's fairly simple. You don't stop it, you just don't continue/create it. It's stated in the quotes from Linji, but the same is found in other instructions.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 4th, 2013 at 9:14 PM

Title: Re: Cleary on Cultish Zen

Content:

oushi said:

The problem is that you are not the one who creates it (karma does).

Astus wrote:

That is denying personal responsibility for one's thoughts. Karma is one's own action, not some external force.

oushi said:

Koans are supposed to develop a break in reasoning chain through bombarding it with unsolvable problem. In this break, one is introduced to the Buddha Nature.

Astus wrote:

That's one way to use koans, and it's criticised by Cleary right in the OP.

oushi said:

I don't know how just sitting can be used to develop such an insight. It is rather contemplating the mind until one sees his nature, then it is just sitting.

Astus wrote:

Zazen is done with the understanding that one doesn't do anything with coming and going appearances. That's as simple as possible. Of course, it is possible to add various teachings, like momentariness of dharmas, the three characteristics of phenomena, emptiness, mind only, buddha-nature, etc., just to show that there is no point grasping at things, and that attachment is the very source of all problems.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 6th, 2013 at 7:34 AM

Title: Re: American "Zen"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Consider this a little (Record of Linji, p. 17-18, tr. Sasaki):

Trembling with fright, like donkeys on an icy path, [you say to yourselves,] 'I don't dare disparage these good teachers for fear of making karma with my mouth!'

Followers of the Way, it is only a great teacher who dares to disparage the buddhas, dares to disparage the patriarchs, to determine the right and the wrong of the world, to reject the teachings of the Tripiṭaka, to revile all infantile fellows, and to look for a Person amidst fortunate and unfortunate circumstances.

Therefore, when I look back over the past twelve years for a single thing having the nature of karma, I can't find anything even the size of a mustard seed. The Chan master who is like a new bride will fear lest he be thrown out of his temple, be given no food to eat, and have no contentment and ease. From olden days our predecessors never had people anywhere who believed in them. Only after they had been driven out was their worth recognized. If they had been fully accepted by people everywhere, what would they have been good for? Therefore it is said, 'The lion's single roar splits the jackals' skulls.'

Of course, the 7th major <http://www.ymba.org/bns/bnsframe.htm> says: "A disciple of the Buddha shall not praise himself and speak ill of others, or encourage others to do so. He must not create the causes, conditions, methods, or karma of praising himself and disparaging others." But if it's not about praising yourself at the expense of others, that's a different matter.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 6th, 2013 at 7:02 PM

Title: Re: What's all this nonsense about sitting still?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sitting still is only a small part of the Buddhist path. It is like a test environment where you have the opportunity to investigate how things are, where you have a short break from the everyday events to spend time with your study.

As for gaining insight from learning, it can work fine, if you have the right teachings and the correct motivation. Based on the words found in the books and heard from the teachers one can confirm it in personal experience. That's why the process is described as: listening, contemplating and realising. You hear/read about it, you understand it, and then check it in real life. This third part is what meditation is mostly used for at the beginning, to develop mental calmness and precision.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 6th, 2013 at 7:21 PM

Title: Re: What's all this nonsense about sitting still?

Content:

oushi said:

Outline of Practice Many roads lead to the Path, but basically there are only two: reason and practice.

Astus wrote:

Note that "reason" is not rational mind but what is nowadays translated as principle (理).

See the

http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enUS/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=146&Itemid=57.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 6th, 2013 at 8:39 PM

Title: Re: What's all this nonsense about sitting still?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think the measure of success on the path is the decrease of suffering, desire, anger, jealousy, and the rest of the unwholesome qualities in one's life. Sitting through days without moving, that's a different programme and usually a test of willpower ("I can do it!").

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 6th, 2013 at 10:34 PM

Title: Re: What's all this nonsense about sitting still?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Awakening removed from everyday activity is of no value. The first paramita is giving, the second is ethical conduct. Lacking those two means that wisdom is still far away. In other words, harming others is not the functioning of the buddha-nature, nor is showing the wrong example for beings.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 7th, 2013 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: What's all this nonsense about sitting still?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jikan, you are not alone. The celestial buddhas are also scratching their bald heads.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 8th, 2013 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: On the difficulty of recognizing the natural state

Content:

Astus wrote:

Mahamudra manuals are usually easy to read and understand in my experience (like those from the 9th Karmapa and Dakpo Tashi). Thrangu Rinpoche is also a very plain speaking teacher. Look at this short instruction from <http://www.rinpoche.com/teachings/4dharmas.pdf>:

"Now we experience mind, yet if we try to find it, we can't. It cannot be found. The reason it can not be found is that it has no inherent existence. It is empty. Does this mean the mind is nothing whatsoever? No, it is not mere nothingness, for the continuity of mind is unsevered; it goes on. It is mind that knows various phenomena. It is mind that illuminates various phenomena. Thus, we talk about the mind as being empty and luminous, or empty and clear. What one needs to do is to identify this union of emptiness and clarity and to practice meditation in terms of this union."

This is practically the same as it's taught in Madhyamaka meditation when one investigates mind. The point of it is to drop all sorts of reference points, all clinging to any identity, and open one's perception to all appearances without attachment.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 8th, 2013 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: American "Zen"

Content:

Astus wrote:

The deviations you see in Zen today happened before in China and other countries too. You just have to read the laments of the masters of the era.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 8th, 2013 at 5:00 AM

Title: Re: What's all this nonsense about sitting still?

Content:

Matylda said:

Here teaching is wrongly pointed to be sutras and shastras.. however in the end of the clause text says 更不隨文教 which means it is not about written teaching and in the first part it starts from 謂藉教悟宗 which points to oral teaching, i.e. oral instruction as a means, so note 6 is wrong since 更不隨文教 undermines it...

Astus wrote:

Regarding that note 15 says: " Scriptures are important as they provide guidance to enlightenment, but they can be misinterpreted or taken too literally. Also to study them as philosophy without practice will not lead to true understanding."

On the other hand, there is no mention of any oral teaching at all. Written texts are nothing but words on paper, and oral teachings are words by voice. Why would voice be a superior conveyor of words than paper?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 8th, 2013 at 7:32 AM

Title: Re: What's all this nonsense about sitting still?

Content:

Matylda said:

Well voice is superior to the written text in this sense that it comes from an enlightened master who can use words according to conditions and capacities, which text by its nature cannot... as for spoken word by living buddha what plays a role is 時所位, which is also crucial for skillful usage of the words of teachings... and 謂藉教悟宗 clearly suggests it.

Astus wrote:

How does 謂藉教悟宗 clearly suggest it for you? Just because it starts with 謂? It's simply explanatory (i.e. the meaning of it is "meaning" and not "saying") exactly as in the next section: 行入謂四行, that's why it was translated as that to English.

The sutras come from the Buddha himself, the treatises are written by enlightened masters, therefore in terms of source the written teachings are at least equal, if not superior, to oral instructions. The sutras and treatises address the different conditions and capacities, they can even have lists of them, unless you are proposing that the human mind today is somehow different in its workings from those of the past, in which case we need a whole new Buddhism. Is there anything a teacher can say that has not been already said before and written down several times? For someone transmitting the Buddhadharma, there can't be any difference between the spoken words and the canonical scriptures. It is true, however, that a teacher can give answers and instructions immediately while studying the Tripitaka takes time.

The Platform Sutra (http://www.fodian.net/world/2008_10.html) says: "Those who grasp at emptiness slander the Sutras by maintaining that written words have no use. Since they maintain they have no need of written words, they should not speak either, because written words are merely the marks of spoken language. They also maintain that the direct way cannot be established by written words, and yet these two words, 'not established' are themselves written."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 8th, 2013 at 5:54 PM

Title: Re: On the difficulty of recognizing the natural state

Content:

Astus wrote:

Although these are from https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dahui_Zonggao, they sound appropriate here:

"But people set up views of delusion and enlightenment and hold to interpretations of turning towards and turning away, wanting to understand this mind and see this inherent nature; thus this mind and this nature immediately flow into wrong paths, following the person's inversions, errors, and confusion. Hence enlightenment is not distinguished from delusion, nor the wrong separated from the correct. Because they do not fully understand the dreamlike illusion of "this mind" and "this nature," they falsely establish pairs of terms: they consider turning towards and turning away, delusion and enlightenment, as real, and accept this mind and this nature as true. They are far from realizing that whether true or not true, false or not false, worldly or world-transcending, these are merely provisional statements."

(Swampland Flowers, p. 83)

"You say that you have dull faculties. Try to reflect back like this: see if the one who can recognise the dullness is dull too or not. If you don't turn the light around and reflect back, you're just keeping to your dull faculties and adding more affliction. That would be adding illusory falsehood to illusory falsehood, laying on optical illusion on top of optical illusion. Just listen: the one who can know that sense faculties are inherently dull is definitely not dull. Though you shouldn't hold to this dull one, you shouldn't abandon it to study, either; grasping and rejecting, sharp and dull---these have to do with people, not with Mind. This Mind is one substance with all the buddhas of the three worlds: there is no duality.

If there were duality, the Dharma would not be of even sameness. "Receiving the teaching" and "transmitting Mind" are both empty falsehoods. Looking for truth and seeking reality seem even further off."

(p. 69)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 11th, 2013 at 1:12 AM

Title: Re: On the difficulty of recognizing the natural state

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Those who do not meditate with wisdom by analyzing the entity of things specifically, but merely meditate on the elimination of mental activity, cannot avert conceptual thoughts and also cannot realize identitylessness, because they lack the light of wisdom. If the fire of consciousness knowing phenomena as they are is produced from individual analysis of suchness, then like the fire produced by rubbing wood it will burn the wood of conceptual thought. The Buddha has spoken in this way."

(<http://www.dalailamainaustralia.org/pages/?ParentPageID=176&PageID=211>)

Since vipashyana is the key method to attain certainty in the true nature of mind and phenomena, if you have trouble applying instructions found in Mahamudra, you can also try Madhyamaka.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 11th, 2013 at 5:39 PM

Title: Re: On the difficulty of recognizing the natural state

Content:

monktastic said:

- When you are in the natural state, your experience will be like [...timeless, duality-free, ...]

Astus wrote:

That is to refute wrong ideas about the nature of mind, but the same terms are used for emptiness. In fact, there is nothing more than the unity of emptiness and appearances (non-abiding awareness). So the problem seems to be your looking for something special.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 11th, 2013 at 6:54 PM

Title: Re: On the difficulty of recognizing the natural state

Content:

Anders said:

Not entirely. Without being certain, what I understand from the claims is that the view of Madhyamika and the prajnaparamita sutras is equivalent to Mahamudra - however, the methods for entering such realisation are not.

Astus wrote:

I think that where vipashyana is used in Mahamudra, in the tradition of Gampopa, the methods used are not different from what they teach in Madhyamaka. It's put together as analytical and resting meditation, the same way it was written in Kamalashila's and Atisha's meditation works. A difference here is that while in Madhyamaka first the appearances are analysed and then the mind, in Mahamudra the mind comes first and appearances later. This has some consequences of course and that's why Mahamudra is not exactly Madhyamaka.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 13th, 2013 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: On the difficulty of recognizing the natural state

Content:

monktastic said:

What are some specific signs that one is in "the natural state"? What does it mean, experientially? Other than being free of acceptance and rejection, hope and fear -- which we've covered thoroughly, and which I deeply appreciate.

Astus wrote:

There are no signs. From early on signlessness (animitta) has been one of the characteristics of ultimate reality.

"What is the samadhi of signlessness apart from the samadhi of emptiness? If there is a remaining samadhi taking part in nirvana as its objective representation, this is called animitta samadhi. Again, animitta samadhi: The conditioned world has signs. Nirvana is signless. The conditioned world has three signs: arising, staying and passing away. Nirvana has three signs. Not arising, not staying, and not passing away. Thus the conditioned world has signs and nirvana is signless."

(Sariputrabbhidharmasastra in "Nagarjuna in Context", p. 162)

From a practical advice:

"If you identify by thinking "It's emptiness," or thinking "It is signless and aspirationless:· thinking "It is unidentifiable," thinking "It is completely pure," thinking "It is birthless," thinking "It is unperceivable," thinking "It has no nature:' thinking "It is without elaboration," thinking "It is not an object for analysis by speech or mind;"
thinking "It is uncreated and naturally present;' and so on, however profound these thoughts, our recognition of emptiness will not transcend the conceptualization of an arrogant mind.
Attachment to concepts leads to a fall into inferior states and a continuous ripening of karma from inferior actions."
(Lama Shang: The Ultimate Supreme Path of Mahamudra in "Mahamudra and Related Instructions", p. 86)

And just to show again what the essential nature of mind is:

"To realize that mind is empty of all empirical characteristics and devoid of any enduring essence is to realize the nature of mind. This insight will help you to understand the nature of the self as well. If you can realize this, you will also realize the nature of physical things to be empty of enduring essence. The result of understanding that emptiness is the nature of both the mental and physical realms is that you will no longer generate conflicting emotions in response to situations."
(Traleg Kyabgon: Ocean of Certainty, p. 110)

Just that short quote tells that emptiness has to be realised, which is the simple fact of the lack of anything graspable (i.e. any sign), from what comes freedom from (but not elimination of) emotions and ideas. Whatever concept you want to hold on to, that is mistaking illusion for reality, that is the root cause of ignorance. The nature of mind is that it is incomprehensible, that there is nothing at all to hold on to, to identify with, to discover, to realise; because suffering comes from attachment to something, and attachment is also the view that there is something to attach to. Thus the essential instruction is: relax. Relaxing means letting go of attachment. And that's it. Nothing more, nothing less. You can find proof of this any time. Just see what happens when you follow a thought and when you don't.

"Basic wakefulness is the very essence of the mind that fixates or thinks of something. Yet our dualistic fixation and thinking is like a veil that covers and obscures this luminosity.

In short, what is recognized is not a thing. What, then, do we recognize? We must experience naked wakefulness directly, and this occurs the instant that our mind is stripped bare of conceptual thinking. That experience, therefore, is not a product of our fabrication. It simply is. The problem is that it is too near to us, just like something held so close to your eyes that it is difficult to see. Moreover, it is too easy. We would prefer something more difficult. Simply remaining free from concepts is extremely easy. The only difficulty is that it goes against our tendencies—we enjoy conceptual activity, we like to have something to take hold of. So, although it is easy to remain freely, our habitual tendencies pull us away from that state."

(Chökyi Nyima Rinpoche: Three Words in "Quintessential Dzogchen", p. 185-186)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 13th, 2013 at 4:58 AM

Title: Re: On the difficulty of recognizing the natural state

Content:

monktastic said:

But if this is so, why all the brouhaha about the difficulty of recognizing it? This is what I cannot reconcile.

Astus wrote:

It's difficult because we always want something to be something, something to exist or not exist. But the main part is not about getting it right, this is the first step. You must not forget it either. As Wuxiang (aka Kim Heshang, 684–762) once taught in his three phrases: no recollection (of past/externals), no thought (of future/internals), do not forget (to maintain that) (無憶無念莫忘). Similarly to Garab Dorje's three statements.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 13th, 2013 at 5:26 PM

Title: Re: On the difficulty of recognizing the natural state

Content:

monktastic said:

I still don't see why these books are phrased so confusingly, but who am I to question TUR?

Astus wrote:

Confusion comes from fixating on specific words. That's why abhidharma, madhyamaka and yogacara have their own terminology. Sutras and individual teachers don't necessarily follow a strict philosophically clarified tradition and so they use words more loosely. Another reason why one of the four reliances emphasises meaning over words. If you understand the meaning the words are not confusing any more.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 15th, 2013 at 4:28 AM

Title: Re: Pureland study group anyone?

Content:

Astus wrote:

BDK translation (Inagaki & Stewart) in one book:

http://www.bdkamerica.org/digital/dBET_ThreePureLandSutras_2003.pdf "target="_blank

Inagaki's Dharma Treasury that has the sutras (translation from both Kumarajiva and Xuanzang of the shorter sutra): <http://www12.canvas.ne.jp/horai/dharma-treasury-index.htm> " target="_blank

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 18th, 2013 at 7:24 PM

Title: Re: Soul split into multiple mosquitoes?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Consciousness is momentary. Karma and dependent origination works on the basis of causal relationship between moments of consciousness. Splitting the stream of consciousness into multiple causal chains would mean that at the beginning there would be three identical beings, however, three of the same thing is just one thing, as at the time of one stream splitting into three new streams all three would have the same causal past making them identical. That's why I don't think one being becoming a multiple being is logical. This does not apply to emanations and magical multiplication since in those cases there are no multiple beings.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 18th, 2013 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: Soul split into multiple mosquitoes?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Aemilius,

Selflessness doesn't mean "anything goes". There is also dependent origination, strict causality, the actual explanation of the lack of any permanent self. Saying that from a single karmic stream multiple streams can emerge is illogical because there would have to be a moment where three consciousness are exactly the same because they have the same causes. The same cause creating three different results at the same time is a violation of causality. Again, I'm not talking about any one of the three being the real self or all three being the real self, but simple causal relations.

The example of monozygotic twins don't fully match for it takes time for the cell to split and then develop different bodies, therefore there is not a single moment when from one thing two different things occur, unlike in moments of consciousness.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 18th, 2013 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: Modern Education

Content:

Astus wrote:

The idea that feminism is the source of undisciplined youth in Canada sounds very strange. I haven't been to many places but in the EU, where the equality of sexes is a core value, I haven't heard of any country where public transport is unsafe or that travellers are harassed by unruly people. There are incidents, sure, but it's not normal.

Blaming women for not staying home for a larger social problem sounds to me very prejudiced and misogynistic.

The society in general should accept responsibility for children who are all taught at schools. Schools could teach correct behaviour. Films and other media could teach it too. In fact, we could say that since mostly men are the writers of TV programmes and computers games they cause the trouble.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 18th, 2013 at 11:42 PM

Title: Re: Modern Education

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

We may have different understanding of what feminism is about. I see it as the equality of sexes and not the superiority of women. Parenting is a job for fathers and mothers alike. It is in fact the disregard of the idea of equality that you can say mothers should stay at home. Why not the fathers? Why not try to find a system that is actually beneficial for the children and parents as well? Women are not better parents than men. Taking care of children is not a matter of which reproductive organ one has.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 19th, 2013 at 12:57 AM

Title: Re: Modern Education

Content:

Astus wrote:

I understand that there are people who are against men. I believe that is a minority since every major nation in the world is still patriarchal, including North America.

While men can't breastfeed, it is only important in the first year of a baby's life, and there are many other things with a baby parents have to do. There are women soldiers and police officers, so I don't think they are necessarily excluded from those professions.

Unknown said:

feminism as it is understood and promoted in North America sees men as disposable and quite often undesirable

Astus wrote:

That's a very radical form of feminism, hardly the mainstream.

Unknown said:

It gives free license to women to behave in any way they wish

Astus wrote:

What special rules should apply to women that are not equally required of men? And why?

Unknown said:

In reality, it is an ideology catering to passions and ill-will, rather than concern for the collective well-being of society. The needs of the few are placed in the forefront ahead of the long-term well-being of the greater whole. One might cry on about inequalities, but if you want to talk about inequalities how about all the men who die in wars, or work dangerous construction jobs? How many men were drafted in WWII in comparison to women?

Astus wrote:

As I said, feminism generally is the idea of the equality of sexes. How is that an elitist view? And yes, men are also victims of gender bias.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 19th, 2013 at 1:44 AM

Title: Re: Modern Education

Content:

Unknown said:

Men can waste money on stuff as well, but putting women to work in an industrial economy instead of letting them raise their children and maintain a household in order to pay for senseless industries and inflated housing prices was a bad trade.

Astus wrote:

That has a lot more to tell about the whole social economics and expectations than individual women. Did you know that men had make up and fancy dress before the Enlightenment?

Unknown said:

There is no equality in that sense. Men and women are not equal in various ways.

Astus wrote:

There is no complete equality now, that is true, never said there is. The point of feminist movements was and still is to work on achieving equality. Plus, in a developed country very few men ever go to wars or work in hazardous environments.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 19th, 2013 at 6:06 PM

Title: Re: Modern Education

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think this comparison of different feminisms are somewhat like different socialist ideas. There was the Soviet Socialist system, never really worked and eventually the whole ideology has disappeared. On the other hand, Western European social democracies are alive and they benefit many people. A radical https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Separatist_feminism philosophy is only one smaller group, like the anarchists in left-wing politics or dhutanga practitioners among all the monks.

From a feminist point of view we could highlight how people are happy to blame here women for social problems without considering the fact that the majority of politicians and influential people are men, that the nations are led and controlled mostly by men, and even here the members are also mainly men. How come that it's still the woman's fault? Of course, the true sinner is Eve and the Almighty Lord has nothing to do with creating evil...

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 19th, 2013 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: Modern Education

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here is an article on Swedish preschool childcare system:

<http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/magazine-21784716>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 19th, 2013 at 10:45 PM

Title: Re: Soul split into multiple mosquitoes?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Aemilius,

Schizophrenia is not about more than one being existing in the same body, and multiple beings don't exist within the same mind. Even the name of the illness that you meant is Dissociative Identity Disorder, defined as "a disorder characterized by identity fragmentation rather than a proliferation of separate personalities" (<http://www.psychologytoday.com/conditions/dissociative-identity-disorder-multiple-personality-disorder>).

Analysis to the level of emptiness does not refute dependent origination on the phenomenal level. If you say that causality is not a fundamental law then anything can come from anything and reason(ing) has no meaning at all. Causation means there must always be a cause for an effect. If there is no cause there is no causality and we are back at the previous point about anything coming from anything/nothing. Will, intention, is at the heart of dependent origination as the defining factor of karma, very much within the law of cause and effect. An intention that is free from all causes would mean something coming out of nothing, plus it'd have the problem of becoming permanent and ineffective. Thus "free will" cannot be the cause for a split in the karmic stream.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 19th, 2013 at 10:54 PM

Title: Re: Soul split into multiple mosquitoes?

Content:

Aemilius said:

There logically has to be a moment when one zygote actually splits in two!

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Twin>

Astus wrote:

A cell is not a constant thing but a living organism that has its own metabolism. For a cell to split into two it needs to gain mass, etc. See <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Mitosis>.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 20th, 2013 at 5:57 AM

Title: Re: Modern Education

Content:

Astus wrote:

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=9pAHEcYnaAE>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 21st, 2013 at 7:23 PM

Title: Re: Not arising, not ceasing

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra14.html>

<http://www.fodian.net/world/1564.htm#Investigation%20of%20Birth,%20Abiding%20and%20Perishing>

"all Dharmas are empty of characteristics. They are not produced, not destroyed, not defiled, not pure; and they neither increase nor diminish."

<http://www.fodian.net/world/0251.html>

"Though the person exists in the dream, when [the dreamer] awakens, there is nothing that can be grasped. Like an [illusory] flower in the sky that vanishes into empty space, one cannot say that there is a fixed place from which it vanishes. Why? Because there is no place from which it arises! Amidst the unarisen, all sentient beings deludedly perceive birth and extinction. Hence this is called the turning wheel of birth and death."
http://www.fodian.net/world/0842/01_manju.htm

"Good son, the nature of the Tathaagata is really without any birth or death. It is for the sake of transforming sentient beings that he makes a show of being born or dying."

http://www.fodian.net/world/0375_15.html

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 22nd, 2013 at 12:23 AM

Title: Re: Soul split into multiple mosquitoes?

Content:

Aemilius said:

If for example in one life you practice and study music, and you also work as an engineer, and you then you develop both careers to a high degree. Or you develop any number of different careers in a single life, or you develop them in two or more consecutive lives. Is it not now possible or even likely that this will act as a cause for the splitting of a single stream of existence into two or more parallel streams of existence?

gregkavarnos said:

No more than it is a cause for the splitting of a single stream of existence in this lifetime (ie not at all).

Astus wrote:

As Greg says.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 23rd, 2013 at 12:57 AM

Title: Re: Logic vs Common sense.. .

Content:

Astus wrote:

Logic is about correct reasoning and not about deciding what is true or false, good or bad.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 24th, 2013 at 10:00 PM

Title: Mahayana and Traditions

Content:

Astus wrote:

I see people struggling with what lineage or tradition to choose from in Buddhism. There are debates about the superiority and appropriateness of different methods and teachings. I believe that the Mahayana is truly the Great Vehicle, the path of the bodhisattva, not limited by geographical, cultural or historic factors.

One of the Four Great Vows is: Dharma-gates are measureless, I vow to learn them. Or: I vow to learn all the teachings. A bodhisattva masters any and all methods. The specific teachings are always skilful means, that is, they are valid only within a specific context and appropriate for a limited number of people. The wisdom of the bodhisattvas, however, is universal.

So, if you want to liberate all beings and attain the supreme enlightenment there can be no teaching that is unworthy of your attention. There is no fixed method you should attach to besides bodhicitta itself.

"The Lord speaks of the 'great vehicle'. Surpassing the world with its Gods, beings and Asuras, such a vehicle goes forth. It is the same as space, and exceedingly great. As in space, so in this vehicle is room for immeasurable and incalculable beings. Such is this great vehicle of the Bodhisattvas, these great beings. One neither sees its coming, nor going, and its abiding as such, does not exist. Thus one cannot get at any beginning of this great vehicle, nor at any end, nor at any middle. Yet, such is self-identical everywhere. Thus, hereof one speaks of a 'great vehicle'."

(http://fodian.net/world/0228_01.html)

"A man or woman setting out on the Great Vehicle imbued with ten indefatigable determinations will enter the stage of realization of Thusness, to say nothing of the stage of enlightening beings. What are the ten? The indefatigable resolution to see, attend, and serve all buddhas; to build up all roots of goodness without retreating; to seek all truths; to practice all the transcendent ways of enlightening beings; to fully accomplish all concentrations of enlightening beings; to enter successively into all ages; to thoroughly purify all oceans of buddha-lands in the ten directions; to lead all realms of sentient beings to perfect development; to carry out the practices of enlightening beings in all lands and ages; to fully attain each power of buddhas by maturing all beings through the process of practicing as many transcendent ways as atoms in all buddha-lands to mature each being. Men or women with faith who are imbued with these ten indefatigable determinations grow in all roots of goodness, leave all compulsive, routine mundane tendencies, drop out of all social castes, go beyond all stages of individual emancipation, are born in the family of all buddhas, fulfill the vows of enlightening beings, become pure with the attainment of all qualities of the enlightened, become clarified in all the practices of enlightening beings, develop all the powers of buddhas, overcome all demons and challengers, progress through all the stages of enlightening beings, and reach buddhahood." (Avatamsaka Sutra, ch. 39, p. 1171)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 25th, 2013 at 4:49 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana and Traditions

Content:

seeker242 said:

This is "Ekayana"?

Astus wrote:

It depends on how you interpret Ekayana. It is generally understood to mean that sravakas eventually enter the bodhisattva path, thus negating the validity of sravaka realisation (arhat) as ultimate on its own right. Outside of the Faxiang/Hosso school this is usually accepted as the orthodox view. My point here, however, is that while there are many Mahayana schools, the bodhisattva path is not restricted to any of them.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 25th, 2013 at 5:05 PM

Title: Re: Sutras by Length

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Great Prajnaparamita Sutra (大般若波羅蜜多經) is the longest in the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Taish%C5%8D_Tripitaka, 600 fascicles (卷), although it is a collection of many sutras just like the Ratnakuta. The Avatamsaka Sutra (大方廣佛華嚴經) translated by T. Cleary is 80 fascicles.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 25th, 2013 at 6:43 PM

Title: New Moderator: Kirtu

Content:

Astus wrote:

Please welcome him among our Global Moderators.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 25th, 2013 at 7:38 PM

Title: Re: On the difficulty of recognizing the natural state

Content:

Astus wrote:

Andrew108

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 27th, 2013 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: On the difficulty of recognizing the natural state

Content:

Astus wrote:

"What is it like to do nothing? I mean, really do nothing, nothing at all — no recalling what has happened, no imagining what might happen, no reflecting on what is happening, no analyzing or explaining or controlling what you experience. Nothing!" (<http://www.unfetteredmind.org/a-way-of-freedom>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 27th, 2013 at 7:18 AM

Title: Re: Nonregression of Bodhisattvas

Content:

Astus wrote:

The question is regression to what. When it is taught that bodhisattvas on the 8th bhumi don't fall back, it means leaving behind the possibility of becoming an arhat. Non-regression on the 1st bhumi means guaranteed liberation, either as a sravaka or as a buddha. Not falling back from the initial awakening of bodhicitta means maintaining the determination to enlightenment and not leaving behind the path of liberation completely by rejecting the Three Jewels. This is probably different from how Kongtrul understood the issue.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 30th, 2013 at 7:46 AM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Astus wrote:

It seems to me you are describing a specific training a Zen teacher would require. However, that is characteristic of a highly organised church, like Soto Zen, but not of traditions in other countries, where being a teacher is more about general recognition of fellow monastics and the laity rather than going through certain trainings and obtaining papers.

A big problem I see with the idea of measuring another's enlightenment is that there is no clear and transparent way to measure it. Then, calling it an esoteric and mystical thing that only a "fellow enlightened being" can validate leaves the disciples and the community blind and alienated from a central aspect of Zen. And this can be and is easily abused. Although there is the story of the unbroken transmission to back up this, clearly we see the lineage is only a myth.

Mahayanasutralamkara (17.10) writes:

One should serve a (spiritual) friend who is disciplined, tranquil, serene, outstanding in good qualities, energetic, rich in (knowledge of) scripture, awakened to reality, skilled in speech, compassionate, and indefatigable.

A friend with these qualities is the ground of service. "Disciplined" means that the senses are restrained due to moral discipline. "Tranquil" means that the mind is internally quieted by discipline in meditative concentration. "Serene" means the instinctual addictions are eradicated by the discipline of wisdom. "Outstanding in good qualities" means that he is unequalled and non-deficient. "Energetic" means that he is not indifferent to the welfare of others. "Rich in scripture" means that his learning is not inferior. "Awakened to reality" means that he understands reality. "Skilled in speech" means that he is skilled in the techniques of speaking. "Compassionate" means that his mind is free from the desire for material possessions. "Indefatigable" means that he teaches the Dharma continuously and reverently.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 2nd, 2013 at 4:40 AM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here are some clarifications from the Soto Zen side:

Authorization as Zen master?

Dharma transmission does not make you a zen master (what is that anyway? We will see soon...). It does not make you an osho (Japanese for "teacher") either. It is the first of three steps (shiho, ten-e and zuise), at the end of which you will officially be promoted to the rank of osho. In Japanese Soto-Zen, there more than 15.000 people with this rank. It is not as special as you might believe. If you have only shiho but not performed zuise yet, you are not regarded as a teacher of Zen. That, of course, does not mean that you can not share your practice with others. Even if you are not a teacher, you can and should share your practice with others.

And what is a Zen master in the first place?

A Zen master, in Japanese, is a zenji. This title is reserved for the founder Dogen Zenji and all the abbots of the two main temples, Eiheiji and Sojiji. So at each time, there is usually only two zenjis alive, unless there is a zenji living somewhere in retirement (like Itabashi Zenji, who is the third zenji alive right now). So, to become a zenji is not impossible, but it is a long way and shiho alone is certainly not enough. Calling yourself a Zen master just because you have shiho is a joke.

Here is a detailed description of <http://antaiji.dogen-zen.de/eng/adult45.shtml> in 10 chapters.

A picture that sums up the path:

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 2nd, 2013 at 4:43 AM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here is a list of https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Zen_ranks_and_hierarchy in both Soto and Rinzai for Japanese Zen. In other countries, since there are no actual Zen schools (i.e. restricted to Zen), there is no specific system like those either. Generally the abbot of a monastery is considered the main teacher, otherwise the teacher of the meditation hall is the meditation master (chan teacher). None of them implies any connection with specific Zen methods or teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 2nd, 2013 at 4:17 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Staying with Soto Zen, I don't see how "kensho" is a relevant concept. There is no enlightenment to be found outside of shikantaza. From the beginning it is enlightenment-practice inseparably. It is enlightenment because no-thought is buddha-mind, and it is practice because one has to familiarise oneself with no-thought. A teacher then is anyone who is more familiar with shikantaza than you, otherwise there is a complex hierarchical structure within the Soto church based mainly on study and practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 2nd, 2013 at 9:05 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Jikan said:

Is it conventional to discuss kensho in public?

Astus wrote:

Depends on who you ask and what kensho you mean.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 3rd, 2013 at 5:36 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Huseng said:

I follow the line of thought of early Mahāyāna where you need to cultivate mental stamina through long-term meditative practices coupled with wisdom gained through scripture. If you combine the study of philosophy and scripture with long-term cultivation of samadhi and a moral lifestyle, then your three trainings are covered and you'll see progress.

Astus wrote:

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Jinul> and https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Hanshan_Deqing did the same and both are regarded as major Zen teachers. It is not an unknown path even today.

Huseng said:

At that point what's the point of receiving transmission, or thinking someone is wiser than the flock just by virtue of having "received transmission"? It is all performance and largely a reflection of institutional, not spiritual, concerns.

Astus wrote:

I think most of us could give a list of a number of teachers we have received help from on our path. Among those teachers, good friends, there are some who were more influential in our progress than others. Depending on our inclinations we could say that we stand closest to this or that style of teaching, or perhaps a mixture of a handful of methods learnt here and there. This is how it worked before and how it works today for the majority. The idea of a Zen lineage is partially based on that natural phenomenon in the Buddhist community, it also contains a strong influence from ancestor worship and the aristocratic system, eventually transformed into a politically motivated structure (first the fight between Shenxiu's heirs, then between the "Northern" and "Southern" school, and so on, culminating in the superiority of the Linji lineage promoted in the Tiansheng Guandeng Lu (published in 1039) that was also the first to explicitly put down the so called five houses system). Debates surrounding the transmissions were never doctrinal but rather political, establishing claims to authority. Eventually it served as a unifying scheme within Chinese Buddhism and practically any aspiring monk or nun could present a transmission document as Holmes Welch reported. That is no different from how it happens in the Soto Zen church today where temple priests all possess a lineage chart as part of their position, thus its spiritual value is only nominal.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 3rd, 2013 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Huseng said:

Best to get back to the basics: sūtra, śāstra, abhidharma and dhyāna.

Astus wrote:

Actually Zen itself has a huge literature that can be used just like other sutras and treatises. So we could say that instead of transmission a Zen teacher is someone who follows in the footsteps of previous teachers in terms of doctrine and praxis. For instance Thich Nhat Hanh, Xuanhua and Xingyun are all considered Zen teachers, but in fact it is not a central part of their teachings. Another example is Ting Chen's "The Fundamentals of Meditation Practice"

(http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/chanmed1.pdf) that is described on BuddhaNet as Chan while in fact it is mostly Tiantai. Then defining who is a Zen teacher becomes more of a matter of identifying what constitutes Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 4th, 2013 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Huseng said:

The Indic literature, however, is far more consistent and coherent.

Astus wrote:

Zen literature is not just short stories and poems full of metaphors. There are many completely understandable teachings too from the Tang, Song and later eras. Zen has its own scriptures like the Shurangama and the Vajrasamadhi that form the basis of many other teachings, and generally most of the Zen teachers (and the audience) were familiar with the Mahayana corpus, thus many Zen works presuppose that knowledge.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 4th, 2013 at 7:02 AM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

randomseb said:

the texts left by the patriarchs are not that confusing, once you understand that they are making references to the "thisness" of situations.

Astus wrote:

The teaching of "thisness" (tathatā) is quite an old one and it is explained extensively by various sutras and treatises. For instance, Vasubandhu's short definition is "the [true] nature of entities and the insubstantiality of entities" (Inner Science of Buddhist Practice, p. 241). Asanga discusses three types of tathatā in the Abhidharmasamuccaya (favourable, unfavourable, neutral), and matches it with other terms like selfless, emptiness and signless. So, when you say that Zen texts are only referring to a well established Buddhist teaching - instead of saying it directly - it just proves how much they lack clarity.

randomseb said:

Chan/Zen is not something that can be understood by intellectualism, unfortunately, but such can point out the way, right. This is not some westernism, this comes straight from the likes of Bodhidharma and the various early Masters. If you think you've understood via intellectual analysis, you are mistaken. This is clearly stated by those people.

Astus wrote:

Understanding is intellectual. Comprehending words is intellectual. Understanding a teaching without intellect is not understanding it at all. A thoughtless state is also quite useless and it is not wisdom. Mystifying it that it's impossible to understand only makes it ambiguous and something that is left to everyone's imagination. How could any of that be called "directly pointing to mind"?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 4th, 2013 at 5:41 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

muni said:

"Even existing dharmas must be discarded,
So how can we cling to Dharmas which don't exist!
Ah ha! Futilely the Ancients busily pursued enlightenment, then departed.
The countenance, existing of its own accord
I wonder who named it buddha or sentient being?
Even one true Dharma cannot survive.

Outside the window, the cherry tree is singing this news".

<http://naturalmind.wordpress.com/2008/12/08/the-miraculous-awakening-of-zen/>

Astus wrote:

Diamond sutra, chapter 6

(http://www.fodian.net/world/Vajra_Prajna_Paramita_Sutra.html): "You must let go of dharmas. Even more so let go of non-dharmas." (法尚應捨、何況非法)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 4th, 2013 at 6:03 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Sara H said:

It's not meant to be understood by the head.

There is more than one way to understand something actually.

Most of what is written in Zen texts is meant to be understood from what has been referred to as "the mind of meditation"

In other words, if you've had a kensho, you get it, because you've experienced directly what they are talking about.

It then makes perfect sense. If you try to understand it from a logical or rational point of view, it doesn't work.

Astus wrote:

As I see it, either one understands something, comprehends how something works in a rational way, or not. Direct experience is where one does not use concepts. Thus, directly experiencing the nature of mind is what is called kensho. It's not a negation of understanding, nor something beyond understanding, it's simply not an explanation but an experience. However, once there is talk about something, it is intellectual. A teaching is necessarily bound to concepts. Following a teaching requires understanding of those concepts. Then the result can be the direct experience of emptiness.

Zen is a method where one doesn't go through a series of teachings and techniques but directly goes to insight into the nature of mind. How is that? By resting one's attention instead of pursuing phenomena. That's why neither explanations nor methods are needed. But usually without proper knowledge of Buddhism this direct style is insufficient to help people, so even in Zen they talk about watching the breath and pondering sayings.

As for the irrationality of Zen stories, please look at the second quote here:

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=154654#p154654>.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 5th, 2013 at 5:32 AM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Sara H said:

Yes, Huseng, I do think there should be some institutional authority or credentialing in Buddhism.

I don't think that anybody should just be able to pick up a Buddhist book and call themselves a holy man.

I don't agree with that.

Astus wrote:

However, the title of Zen teacher in the West is given based on a single person's decision. If you have seen how it works in the Soto Zen school in Japan, there it's a bit more complicated. But even that is not exactly like a peer reviewed qualification that they do in academia and in many Buddhist schools (e.g. Jogye, Gelug). So, if you want institutional control then Western Zen is a poor choice in my opinion.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 5th, 2013 at 5:26 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sara,

You call for control of who claims what title but then you reject the idea of transparency and rigorous examination. It is true that regarding Dharma-transmission it was always a single person deciding on who to give it to. On the other hand, accepting such a transmission had bonding effects and the receiver then on was recruited into and joined to the giver's family line. And since it was more about collecting the best men under your banner the question was not whether you find someone to give it to you but whose offer you accept. This is quite different in the West where, as you say, receivers of transmission are free to do as they like and have no obligations toward the giver. Teachers here are not held responsible for the actions of their disciples, and the actions of the teacher are not reflected on their disciples, making transmission lack social value and responsibility.

On the other hand, because a teacher is believed to possess some special mystical knowledge and only a teacher can confirm a disciples knowledge he possesses immense and absolute religious authority. This spiritual power attracts people who lack understanding of the Dharma and desire someone else to tell them what to do (which is not bad in itself but is a fertile soil to empower charlatans and misguided gurus). When instead of rational enquiry and analysis only transcendental and otherworldly realisation is emphasised, there is no tool left in the hands of the disciples to measure the worth of a teacher. Again, this generates the opportunity for abuse.

If I understand correctly, your intention with this thread was to point out that a Zen teacher is not superhuman and therefore subject to common passions and errors, and you want to point this out to confront the ideas that generate guru-worship. I think this is not the best approach to solve the problem. The problem lies in how people think about Zen itself and the relevance of Dharma-transmission. This difference in opinion is what created the ongoing debate here.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 5th, 2013 at 6:35 PM

Title: Re: Sepparate category for Zen rather than under E Asia Budd

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Zen forum is the general section for the topic. It is in the East Asian category because it is a form of Mahayana developed in East Asia. If there were a form of Buddhism that has not appeared in the Tibetan or East Asian cultural area it could have its own section.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 5th, 2013 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sara,

In both China and Japan the Zen school first struggled to take over the Buddhist monasteries and establish itself as the mainstream tradition. They used Dharma-transmission as a way to connect communities via the abbot and lay claim to higher authority. Then, once it was established, different groups within Zen worked for supremacy, again using Dharma-transmission.

You can look all this up in the various stages of the history of Zen in China (or just read the last one as it's short and online):

<https://books.google.com/books?id=7A1NF9yR-U4C>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=5M4KAAAYAAJ>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=WQXs14Qc8p4C>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=Y7sueo8jsYwC>

<http://www.scribd.com/doc/101923012/H-Welch-Dharma-Scrolls-and-the-Succession-of-Abbots-in-Chinese-Monasteries>

I wrote "You call for control of who claims what title"

because you wrote

"We have credentials in Zen for a reason, for safety and to ensure people are actually being taught Buddhism, and not just somebody's impressions that they read from a book."

and I wrote

"you reject the idea of transparency and rigorous examination"

because you wrote

"Zen is a decentralized system. Once a person becomes transmitted, they are not necessarily required to be dependent upon an institutional authority any more. They have become a new institutional authority in and of themselves. That's the way Zen works. That's the way our system is. The reasons it's done that way is to foster diversity, like spreading different seeds to the wind, so that the teaching has the most likely chance of catching hold somewhere and taking root and being passed on. Each teacher has their own personality, opinions, experience, and way of looking at things and doing things."

You said:

"They are not above criticism. This is not a "guru" thing here, you are supposed to trust your own gut and intuition. That, is what they are teaching you to do."

but before that you compared the Zen teacher's authority to gurus:

"It's more like each Transmitted Master becomes a Dalai Lama in and of themselves, with the authority to have their own disciples."

Making each Zen teacher the local Pope instead of a parish priest. Naturally, attitudes toward a local vicar and the direct representative of the Eternal is quite different. On the other hand, Buddhism in general presents a logical teaching that can be comprehended freely by any intelligent person, it is open to scrutiny and rational debate. In fact, it is a point the Dalai Lama regularly emphasises. And this system that is supported by the idea of transmission from teacher to disciple is problematic.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 6th, 2013 at 9:06 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sara,

The common idea of Dharma-transmission is that an enlightened teacher confirms the enlightenment of a student. This has been passed down from Shakyamuni himself, making all person in the lineage equal to the Buddha. That is, a Zen teacher is a living buddha (活佛 - the Chinese term used for tulkus, whereas tulku means nirmanakaya, i.e. an emanation of a buddha; just to show how the Zen idea of transmission gives a similar (actually higher) level of importance as being a tulku in Vajrayana). What is being transmitted is the buddha-mind, in other words the level of enlightenment confirmed is the realisation of the dharmakaya, something that only perfectly enlightened buddhas know.

This concept of the Zen teacher comes down to actual practice in the form of absolute authority of the master in all religious issues where students are completely dependent on a teacher to achieve liberation. It is a control system where no one can claim enlightenment unless verified by the master, and receiving such verification is in itself a declaration of buddhahood. There are of course attempts to degrade the meaning of a Zen teacher, saying that he is only an ordinary fallible person, it's just that it doesn't agree with the otherwise upheld idea of the transmission of the enlightened mind. Every Zen student aspires to buddhahood and relies on the teacher to tell them when they are there or not, therefore the master is the sole judge about a student's progress, and since all disciples want to receive that confirmation they will constantly try to please the teacher. Because a student is stripped of all independent understanding, whatever the master says is correct or incorrect must be so.

If you say that transmission is not about enlightenment, the patriarchs are not at all equal to buddhas, it is not the realisation of buddha-mind that is confirmed, then what is the point of Zen?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 7th, 2013 at 8:59 PM

Title: Karma Purification

Content:

Astus wrote:

Karma is intentional act and it is repeated by habit. Habit is a conviction that doing something is correct. Getting rid of a habit starts with reviewing that conviction, proving it false to oneself, and then mindfully re-educating the mind according to the new understanding. This is taught in the Noble Eightfold Path as <http://www.vipassana.com/resources/8fp5.php> where one learns to avoid evil (akusala) and cultivate good (kusala). Other two important factors are http://www.accesstoinight.org/lib/authors/bodhi/bps-essay_23.html of doing evil that strengthens the will not to repeat former errors nor create new ones.

In terms of practice, the above two (right effort, shame and fear) are encompassed in what is called <http://kongmu.wordpress.com/2011/10/09/88-buddhas/> (懺悔) that is part of the daily liturgical practice in Chinese Buddhism and it is also prominent in the <http://www.lamayeshe.com/?sect=article&id=394> of Vajrayana. There are also sutras about repentance, like the <http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra29.html>.

While formal practice helps reminding and indoctrinating ourselves the correct view, it is at the actual arising of an unwholesome intention when we can actually learn to let go of bad habits and stop repeating past mistakes. That is, purification doesn't mean that attachments are magically removed but through maintaining the right attitude one becomes mindful of good and bad thoughts. Seeing how wrong ideas lead to pain and suffering one can put an end to following and acting on them. This is purification on the relative level that brings about merit. The absolute purification is the complete practice of the Dharma whereby one attains liberation from samsara, and neither bad nor good thoughts are attached to.

"Ordinary people are stupid and only know they should repent for their past licentiousness—they do not know they should feel remorse for future errors. Because they do not have such remorse, their previous licentiousness is not extinguished and future errors continue to be generated. With previous licentiousness not extinguished and future errors continuing to be generated, how can this be called repentance?" (Platform Sutra, ch. 6, tr. McRae)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 7th, 2013 at 9:36 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Has this been your own experience?

Astus wrote:

My experience is very limited as I have only participated in the life of a couple of Zen communities and visited some others. That's why I also rely on other people's reports and even more on how the different groups and teachers describe their Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 8th, 2013 at 4:18 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sara,

It is about enlightenment. There is more than one stage of enlightenment before becoming Buddha's. A Zen Master is only guaranteed to be of the first step. Not complete Buddhahood.

Which stage of enlightenment is kensho, the first step? Is it the first of the Ten Faiths (十信), faith (信心)? Is it the first bhumi, i.e. the path of seeing? Or something else?

By the way, once there are stages, it is not the path of sudden but of gradual enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 9th, 2013 at 5:38 AM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sara,

There are various ways in Buddhism to categorise the different stages on the path. Various Zen teachers say different things about what level of enlightenment is attained at seeing the nature of mind. So, what interpretation is yours, or your teacher's, in this case? On what stage of the bodhisattva path a Zen master needs to be on?

The Ten Oxherding Picture doesn't really answer the above question as it is used only within the Zen tradition and doesn't specify its relationship to the bodhisattva path.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 9th, 2013 at 3:51 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sara,

As far as I know, all Buddhist schools (including Theravada) consider a bodhisattva to be a person aspiring for buddhahood. Mahayana is also called the bodhisattvayana because it considers the path of the bodhisattva as the definitive and superior way. This is reflected in the four major bodhisattva vows that in most Zen communities people recite regularly. Also, someone who has already reached the level of a buddha is a buddha and not a bodhisattva.

As shel said, the first bhumi is considered the first actual insight into emptiness by most schools. However, for instance Jinul says that the initial insight is the first stage of Faith (i.e. the 1st of the 52 stages, where the 1st bhumi is equivalent to stage 41), while others say that initial enlightenment (seeing nature) is equal to the 1st, or the 7th bhumi, or buddhahood. There was a discussion about it in this thread:
<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=69&t=5102>.

Since you say that kensho is not buddhahood it must be something below that level. Because you also say that Zen teachers are ordinary beings (pudgala), it can't be the 1st bhumi either (as that's where the path of the arya/noble bodhisattvas start). That leaves us the question what you actually mean by kensho. What is realised there? Is it the emptiness of self, the emptiness of the dharmas, the emptiness of the mind, or something else?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 9th, 2013 at 5:33 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Astus wrote:

The first bhumi includes a number of qualities, the definition is usually derived from the Avatamsaka Sutra's chapter on the Ten Stages. Among other things, an arya bodhisattva has great compassion and doesn't fail in upholding the precepts bodily and verbally (mental perfection comes on the 2nd bhumi). He is also free from the suffering of mundane troubles.

"The bodhisattva naturally helps sentient beings without distinction or discrimination, but there is still a subject and object involved. This applies to a bodhisattva on the first through seventh bhumi."

(Sheng-yen: Complete Enlightenment, p. 202)

"At the first bhumi, a bodhisattva has transformed the sixth consciousness into the 'wisdom of non-arising'—where afflictions no longer manifest outwardly, or arise."
(Sheng-yen: There is No Suffering, p. 30)

Other qualities described:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bh%C5%ABmi_%28Buddhism%29#The_first_bh.C5.ABmi.2C_the_Very_Joyous; <http://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/patrul-rinpoche/stages-and-path>; http://www.berzinarchives.com/web/en/archives/sutra/level2_lamrim/initial_scope/safe_direction/qualities_arya_sangha.html

Considering the above, it would be impossible for an enlightened teacher to steal others' money or harass female disciples.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 9th, 2013 at 7:04 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

seeker242 said:

I would not go so far as to say that. Unless you consider killing him, and the Buddha and the patriarchs, to be an achievement. The zen teachers that I have met say things like "nothing I can say can help you", "I can't save you", etc, etc. That does not sound like dependence to me. It sounds like the opposite.

Astus wrote:

What need is there for a Zen teacher then? And what is authorisation about?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 9th, 2013 at 7:24 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

seeker242 said:

I think it depends on which scripture you read. Chapter 25 of the Lotus Sutra describes Avalokitesvara as a bodhisattva who can manifest in a Buddha body, pratyekabuddha's body, or any kind of body, if needed to help the world, etc.

Astus wrote:

That's just one of the many inconceivable qualities of a bodhisattva, as the Vimalakirti and other sutras explain. It doesn't make them buddhas. Even Mara can appear as a buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 9th, 2013 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

seeker242 said:

Avalokiteśvara is not a Buddha, even though he is already "saved from all suffering and distress"? How can one who is already saved from all suffering and distress, not be a Buddha?

Astus wrote:

Arhats are free from suffering and they are not buddhas either. Even a stream-enterer is free from the suffering of the three lower births. I recommend you look into this short summary: <http://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/patrul-rinpoche/stages-and-path>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 9th, 2013 at 11:44 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Jikan said:

Is a Zen Master a bodhisattva? someone on the first bhumi?

Is a Zen Master an arhat?

A Buddha?

???

Astus wrote:

From my perspective, a Zen teacher is anyone who teaches Zen. Since there are many forms and styles of Zen there are also many kinds of teachers. The fact of teaching Zen is no indication of one's attainment, neither is any sort of authorisation from any teacher. This is a minimalist approach based on the term itself "Zen teacher", similarly to "English teacher" or "Maths teacher". The idea of a "Zen Master" who knows things beyond comprehension and sees through the student, while there might be individuals like that, it is mostly a myth and pious imagination.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 10th, 2013 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

seeker242 said:

Thanks! So what do you call someone who has completed all of the above?

Astus wrote:

One who has gone through the bodhisattva path is called a buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 10th, 2013 at 4:00 AM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Astus wrote:

If we want to look for an ancient source that still has a clear explanation on the subject, it is Fayan Wenyi's "Ten Guidelines for Zen Schools"

(http://www.cbeta.org/result/normal/X63/1226_001.htm) that was translated by Thomas Cleary in "The Five Houses of Zen" book. It describes the requirements of a teacher and how in his time most of the Zen communities and teachers fail to uphold the correct way.

His ten points (from Cleary's translation):

1. On false assumption of teacherhood without having cleared one's own mind ground
2. On factional sectarianism and failure to penetrate controversies
3. On teaching and preaching without knowing the bloodline
4. On giving answers without observing time and situation and not having the eye of the source
5. On discrepancy between principle and fact, and failure to distinguish defilement and purity
6. On subjective judgement of ancient and contemporary sayings without going through clarification
7. On memorizing slogans without being capable of subtle function meeting the needs of the time
8. On failure to master the scriptures and adducing proofs wrongly
9. On indulging in making up songs and verses without regard for meter and without having arrived at reality
10. On defending one's own shortcomings and indulging in contention

Thus, Fayan's criteria of a Zen teacher is that he should (1) be enlightened to the nature of mind, (2) don't attach to specific methods, (3) teach direct insight, (4) teach according to the situation, (5) clarify the two truths in teaching, (6) have appropriate training in the Dharma, (7) teach with insight and not just words, (8) know the scriptures, (9) don't write non-sense but clear and pleasant words, (10) don't disparage the Triple Jewels, the scriptures and the vehicles, and don't fail in upholding morality.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 10th, 2013 at 3:47 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sara,

What you describe as kensho, that is the initial certainty arising about the Dharma, and that is the level of Faith. It is important, very much. But the first bhumi, as you could see, is a lot more than that, where such external issues that you describe are not problems and internally it is a lot more peaceful and free.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 10th, 2013 at 3:57 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

seeker242 said:

Nice list. Do you think that if a person meets all of the above criteria, they can then rightly be given dharma transmission and called a official "zen master"?

Astus wrote:

There is no mention of any transmission. It is a guideline for those who are or plan to be teachers. There is no such thing as "official Zen master" in Buddhism, only in specific organisations. That is, if you set up a Buddhist community, you can create such a title, and that will be official there, but not necessarily for others.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 10th, 2013 at 4:58 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kensho can mean so many things that, as I see it, it requires a definition if we are to understand each other. Now that we have it, it is quite easy to see what you mean when you say that Zen teachers are ordinary people.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 10th, 2013 at 5:14 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Astus wrote:

To avoid such confusion there are quite elaborate descriptions and terms in Buddhism. The problem can be is that Zen is generally viewed as the path of sudden enlightenment. Now that is resolved by teachers like Zongmi and Jinul who established the system of sudden enlightenment and gradual practice, but that is not used in Japanese Zen and so Western heirs of that tradition have this trouble of not being clear about the nature of enlightenment and the actual stages. Since apparently very few Zen master teach actual sudden liberation there is a great need for a proper description of the gradual process, something that is readily found in Mahayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 10th, 2013 at 8:39 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sara,

What kind of Soto Zen do you mean to be gradual? Shikantaza is enlightenment from the very beginning and there is nothing to improve about it. On the other hand, in Hakuin's system people go through several stages in practice and they recognise various levels of attainment. Of the two it is in fact Rinzai that is gradual.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 10th, 2013 at 9:33 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Astus wrote:

MalaBeads,

You define Zen as "outside words and letters" and "an experiential school" and then say how erroneous it is to define Zen. What do you mean?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 12th, 2013 at 4:39 PM

Title: Re: Zen and daimoku

Content:

Astus wrote:

Might be interesting: <http://nichirenscoffehouse.net/library/Hakuin.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 12th, 2013 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Zen and daimoku

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://www.sgilibrary.org/view.php?page=3&m=0&q=>:

"unless one perceives the nature of one's life, one's practice will become an endless, painful austerity. Therefore, such students of Buddhism are condemned as non-Buddhist."

and

"Whether you chant the Buddha's name, recite the sutra, or merely offer flowers and incense, all your virtuous acts will implant benefits and roots of goodness in your life. With this conviction you should strive in faith. The Vimalakirti Sutra states that, when one seeks the Buddhas' emancipation in the minds of ordinary beings, one finds that ordinary beings are the entities of enlightenment, and that the sufferings of birth and death are nirvana. It also states that, if the minds of living beings are impure, their land is also impure, but if their minds are pure, so is their land. There are not two lands, pure or impure in themselves. The difference lies solely in the good or evil of our minds. What then does myo signify? It is simply the mysterious nature of our life from moment to moment, which the mind cannot comprehend or words express. When we look into our own mind at any moment, we perceive neither color nor form to verify that it exists. Yet we still cannot say it does not exist, for many differing thoughts continually occur. The mind cannot be considered either to exist or not to exist. Life is indeed an elusive reality that transcends both the words and concepts of existence and nonexistence. It is neither existence nor nonexistence, yet exhibits the qualities of both. It is the mystic entity of the Middle Way that is the ultimate reality. Myo is the name given to the mystic nature of life, and ho, to its manifestations. Renge, which means lotus flower, is used to symbolize the wonder of this Law. If we understand that our life at this moment is myo, then we will also understand that our life at other moments is the Mystic Law.⁴ This realization is the mystic kyo, or sutra. The Lotus Sutra is the king of sutras, the direct path to enlightenment, for it explains that the entity of our life, which manifests either good or evil at each moment, is in fact the entity of the Mystic Law. If you chant myohorenge-kyo with deep faith in this principle, you are certain to attain Buddhahood in this lifetime."

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 13th, 2013 at 4:38 AM

Title: Re: 52 Stages of the Boddhisattva

Content:

Astus wrote:

Saddharma Pundarika Sutra, that is the Lotus Sutra. Quite a few translations are available online. http://www.cttbusa.org/lotus/lotus_contents.asp.

The 52 stages system is based on the Gandavyuha Sutra, which is also the last chapter of the Avatamsaka Sutra.

Here are the stages in brief: <http://sgforums.com/forums/1728/topics/158325>

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 14th, 2013 at 1:39 AM

Title: Re: 52 Stages of the Boddhisattva

Content:

greentara said:

Astus, It's a very exacting list. If you look at the life of the doctor Jack Preger, you see a Boddhisattva in action. Working for decades on the streets of Calcutta (Kolkata) with the poorest of the poor. Tending people, not asking for money and no strings attached. A really good man and a great healer, reaching out a helping hand to all.

Astus wrote:

Being a good and caring person is not exclusive to Buddhism or bodhisattvas. Also, the bodhisattva path is not simply about being good and caring but bringing ultimate liberation to others and oneself.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 14th, 2013 at 1:57 AM

Title: Re: 52 Stages of the Bodhisattva

Content:

Astus wrote:

The reason I said it is the Gandavyuha Sutra is because in T. Cleary's translation of the Avatamsaka Sutra, in Appendix 3 he introduces and translates Li Tongxuan's commentary to it which in fact outlines the 52 stages, and also the same commentary is referred to in Buswell's "Collected Works of Chinul" summing up the bodhisattva path. I did not hear of Zhiyi's work before.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 14th, 2013 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: Mantras in Zen Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is common to recite the names of buddhas (e.g. Amitabha) and bodhisattvas (e.g. Avalokitesvara), and there are dharanis (e.g. Great Compassion Dharani) that are usually part of the liturgy. The "Ten Shorter Dharanis" (十小咒) are part of the daily ceremony in Chinese Buddhism and you may consider them mantras because of their brevity. Mantras from specific sutras may be used by some practitioners. Here is an introduction: <http://www.sutrasmantras.info/mantra0.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 15th, 2013 at 7:35 PM

Title: Re: Emotion and Reason

Content:

Astus wrote:

Both emotion and reason are thoughts, mental phenomena. Relying on either an emotion or a reason are attachment. In fact, emotions go away in a short time but people can hang on their reasoning for a lifetime. An emotion gets its meaning from reasoning, and one considers a reason true because of an emotion. There is no ultimate logical truth, there is no obstructive emotion. Reasoning is believing in a series of concepts. Emotion is believing in a feeling. The problem is not with the concept or the feeling, but with believing them to be true and real.

Some thoughts to consider:

"That, Manjusri, is the way a sick bodhisattva should concentrate his mind; he should live neither in control of his mind, nor in indulgence of his mind. Why? To live by indulging the mind is proper for fools and to live in control of the mind is proper for the disciples. Therefore, the bodhisattva should live neither in control nor in indulgence of his mind. Not living in either of the two extremes is the domain of the bodhisattva." (Vimalakirti Sutra, ch. 5, tr. Thurman)

"Noble sir, one who stays in the fixed determination of the vision of the uncreated is not capable of conceiving the spirit of unexcelled perfect enlightenment. However, one who lives among created things, in the mines of passions, without seeing any truth, is indeed capable of conceiving the spirit of unexcelled perfect enlightenment."
(ch. 8)

"Noble sons, there is a liberation of bodhisattvas called 'destructible and indestructible.' You must train yourselves in this liberation. What is it? 'Destructible' refers to compounded things. 'Indestructible' refers to the uncompounded. But the bodhisattva should neither destroy the compounded nor rest in the uncompounded."
(ch. 11)

There are of course other sutras that talk about how "passions are enlightenment" (煩惱即菩提).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 16th, 2013 at 4:27 PM

Title: Re: Mantras in Zen Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

In Hanshan's (1546–1623) time (https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ming_Dynasty, mostly the reign of the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Wanli_Emperor) there were strong financial, political, cultural and especially religious connection with Tibet (see: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tibet_during_the_Ming_Dynasty). When Hanshan refers to mantras (in his <http://chancenter.org/cmc/2011/10/13/essentials-of-practice-and-enlightenment-for-beginners/>) it reflects the presence of Vajrayana, but not because it is something inherent to Chan. Note that Hanshan mentions the mantras as one of the last techniques (i.e. for more troubled people) to use and something that is especially good for removing obstacles.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 16th, 2013 at 6:16 PM

Title: Re: Emotion and Reason

Content:

Astus wrote:

In the Sabbasava Sutta

(<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.002.than.html>) the relevant passages for emotions are §2 (restraining the 6 senses) and §6 (destroying sensuality, ill will, cruelty, unskilful mental qualities). Still, that's not the same as eliminating all emotions. In fact, there are the seven factors of enlightenment (§7) one has to develop what includes persistence (viriya), rapture (piti) and serenity (passaddhi).

And then there is a teaching like

<http://www2.hf.uio.no/polyglotta/index.php?page=fulltext&vid=30&view=fulltext> where you are taught not to abandon anything but simply realise the non-arising of phenomena.

Unknown said:

One should speak like this – do not give up your passion (rāga), do not fight your aversion (dveṣa), do not clear away your bewilderment (moha), do not liberate (uccal-) yourself from your body (kāya), practise (car-) the bad things (akuśala), do not hold back (nigrah-) your views (drṣṭi), do not be conscious of the bonds [to the worldly things] (sāyojana), grasp for (parigrah-) the parts of the personality (skandha), amass (piṇḍikr-) the spheres of sense-perception (dhātu), move about (car-) among the fields of sense-perception (āyatana), do not leave (atī-) the stage of fools (bālabhūmi), frequent (āgam-) the bad (akuśala), give up the good (kuśala), do not think of (manaskr-) the Buddha, do not reflect (cint-) on religious teachings (dharma), do not give offerings to (pūj-) the congregation of monks (sāgha), do not take the training (śikṣā) upon yourself (samādā-), do not seek (prārthaya-) the peacefulness of existence (bhavaśamana), do not cross over (uttr-) the river [of existence] (ogha). This kind of instructions one should teach and give to the bodhisattva in the beginning of his development (ādikarmika).

Why? Because this state of the moments of existence and nothing else is their [true] state (iyaṃ dharmāṇāṃ dharmasthitir shitir eva).

Foolish people (bāla) explain things (vyākṛ-) in accordance with moments of existence of arising (utpādadharma) and moments of existence of disappearance (nirodhadharma). But this sphere of all moments of existence distinguishes itself by being beyond thought-constructions (sa tu dharmadhātur nirvikalpaprabhāvitah), and understanding the essential character of all these moments of existence in this way is awakening (ya eṣāṃ dharmāṇāṃ svabhāvasyaivamanubodhaḥ sā bodhir iti).

If he is taught in this way and does not become afraid, scared or terrified, then he is a bodhisattva not turning back in his development, one who has a part in the stage of never turning back (yady evam upadiṣṭo nottrasen na sātrasyen na sātrāsam āpadyeta sa vatāvaivartiko bodhisattvo 'vaivairtikabhūmibhāgiya iti jñātavyah).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 18th, 2013 at 4:29 AM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

I have skipped most of the discussion, so I don't know if this has been mentioned before.

In today's Chinese Buddhism the Ven. Xuyun is the most outstanding teacher of Zen from whom many living teachers derive their lineage. It is said that Xuyun transmitted all five schools of Zen, and there are indeed monks who claim affiliation with one or more of those. What should be noted, however, is that the five school system is only a fabrication from the Song era that they came up with to categorise different groups of Zen teachers. On one hand, there were more than just five, on the other, the Fayan school (one of the five) never even existed. There are two descendants of Xuyun famous in the West: Ven. Xuanhua and Ven. Shengyan. Xuanhua belongs to the Weiyang lineage, a school that vanished long ago, and one can actually see a large gap in the transmission chart. This is a case of "remote succession" (yaosi 遙嗣), that is, one can claim transmission based on personal sympathy toward a dead teacher. Shengyan belongs to the Linji lineage coming from Xuyun, however, there are two problems with that and both because of having Zibo Zhenke in his chart. First, Zibo himself never claimed any succession and criticised those of his time who wanted to revive Zen based on the stories. Second, the dates of birth and death show that Zibo died years before his predecessor three generations back could even get a full ordination. So, the lineages of both Xuanhua and Shengyan show that it is not an unbroken transmission from generation to generation.

The reformer of modern Korean Zen was Gyeongheo from whom practically every living Zen teacher derives his lineage. However, Gyeongheo himself never received a Dharma transmission from anyone and even said that such a transmission has been long dead by his time. Another example from Korea is the Ven. Daehaeng Sunim, who was a well known teacher and who established a major organisation within the Jogye order, however, she has no lineage affiliation, no teacher, still she is regarded as an outstanding Zen master.

In Vietnam one of the most successful Buddhist organisations is the Truc Lam Zen that has the biggest training monastery in the country. It is a revival of the only Vietnamese founded Zen lineage that existed in the 13th and 14th century. The current reformer Thich Thanh Tu is of course not the direct descendent of any of the former patriarchs and has no Dharma transmission from anyone. Still, he is a major Zen teacher.

These are all modern examples of how lineage is not that definitive in Zen and people are perfectly capable of becoming outstanding teachers without an unbroken lineage.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 18th, 2013 at 4:48 AM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

As mentioned briefly earlier, some writings even present themselves as a kind of transmission in places with things like "may this writing confer the blessings of such and such...".

Astus wrote:

"Good friends, you should all recite this. If you practice according to it, you will see the nature through hearing these words. Although you may be a thousand li away from me, it will be as if you are constantly by my side. If you do not become enlightened through these words, then why have you gone to the trouble of coming a thousand li to see me?" (Platform Sutra, ch. 6, tr. McRae)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 18th, 2013 at 4:43 PM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think the question is whether it is acceptable to be a Zen teacher without being a member of a lineage. If yes, the argument over having or not having transmission is irrelevant. If no, then history shows that there were and are respected teachers without lineage, plus historical data proves the idea of unbroken lineage as fictional. Then we should ask why Western Zen followers are obsessed with lineage. And I think the reason is that many fail to see the actual teaching of Zen, so instead go for the superficial story of transmission. They look at a record of Zen stories and understand only as far as the presence of a teacher and a student but fail to comprehend the actual interaction that happens. It is similar to those who believe that the most important thing about zazen is the posture and fail to see the mind as the true place of meditation.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 18th, 2013 at 5:26 PM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

mirage said:

I am not very familiar with situation in Zen, but maybe because it one of the precious few ways to deal with numerous charlatans and crazies who appear out of nowhere proclaiming themselves to be enlightened teachers? Who can judge if a particular person is qualified to teach? His own teacher. How do we know this teacher is qualified himself? Supposedly because it was confirmed by his own teacher, and so on back to Buddha. I find this idea very attractive, even though it might not always work exactly that way in practice. But it is at least some insurance.

Astus wrote:

Since the lineage of confirming and authorising a teacher is broken, the transmission is given based on several reasons and not always connected to the receiver's inner realisation, and there are several examples of correctly transmitted teachers abusing the naive belief in transmission itself, it does not work as an guarantee for quality. Yes, people want to feel safe, but it's a false belief based on an illusion. On the other hand, if instead of blindly accepting the myth of transmission, they would take the time to actually study and contemplate the teachings and assess a teacher by his knowledge and behaviour, that could be a lot safer. In fact, both knowledge and behaviour are relatively easy to measure. As for those who believe that "enlightenment" is the single qualifying factor, that's a very narrow and simple view, especially when they have no idea what enlightenment is.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 18th, 2013 at 5:53 PM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

mirage said:

There are negative examples for everything, since it is samsara we are dealing with, and there are no perfect sure-fire solutions for anything. I, for one, would never follow a guru whose qualification was not confirmed by his teacher, who in turn belongs to a recognised lineage.

Astus wrote:

How do you confirm a lineage? I show you three lineage tables, full of Chinese names. Can you tell which one is genuine and which one is fake? By the way, are you saying that you'd never study under any of <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=161830#p161830>, or the Deshimaru followers?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 18th, 2013 at 6:31 PM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

mirage said:

Let us say that If I can trace the lineage reliably to one of the "big name" masters that are universally respected within the tradition as highly realized beings, then I will be content enough not to dig further.

Astus wrote:

That is, you would never study under for example Tsongkhapa, who had several teachers, but eventually established his own version of Buddhism for what he couldn't provide any predecessors? And any teacher who have received only visionary-mental transmissions or claimed reincarnation of a once famous person are all out of question (e.g. Asanga, Tilopa, Jigme Lingpa)? Not that there were no other orthodox teachers of the time within established communities, still, many outstanding masters were special because they came up with a new way of teaching and did not follow the existing methods.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 18th, 2013 at 7:30 PM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

there are several examples of correctly transmitted teachers abusing the naive belief in transmission itself

PadmaVonSamba said:

Please identify five.

- .
- .
- .

Astus wrote:

Known major cases (note that these are all outstanding teachers with large number of followers):

Taizan Maezumi, founder of Zen Center of Los Angeles and others

Seung Sahn, founder of Kwan Um Zen School

Joshu Sasaki, founder of Mount Baldy Zen Center

Daining Katagiri, founder of Minnesota Zen Meditation Center

Eido Shimano, founder of Dai Bosatsu Zendo Kongo-ji and New York Zendo Shobo-Ji

Richard Baker, heir of Shunryu Suzuki

Dennis Merzel, heir of Bernard Glassman

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 18th, 2013 at 7:32 PM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

From the topic: <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=69&t=10684>

Unknown said:

"Without fully and finally letting go one's self-with-form, there can be no transmission — even if one has received innumerable transmission certificates from various lineages. The basis and source of transmission in Zen is the awakening to one's selfless self. And this emerges precisely from the dropping away of self, once and for all. Remember the character I wrote on the board? That's it. No one transmits anything to anyone; in other words, shin or kokoro transmits kokoro to kokoro by way of kokoro. That's all."

<http://beingwithoutself.files.wordpress.com/2011/07/sourceofzenwhotransmitswhat.pdf> by Jeff Shore is a wonderful summary of the issue that combines both the Zen and the scholarly view.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 18th, 2013 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: Zen and different Pure Land views

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here is one for you: <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=53&t=5650>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 18th, 2013 at 11:25 PM

Title: Re: Should secular Buddhism be tolerated?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I assume by secular Buddhist what is meant is a person who is materialist and/or agnostic toward non-materialist assertions. It is a position where one doesn't have faith in teachings that are apparently without proof and contradict one's original view of the world. There are generally two types of secular Buddhists. Those who only focus on meditation and those who study Buddhist teachings. Both group expects results within this life and find Buddhism beneficial. The support scientific research and that way help spreading the teachings among those who are doubtful about the usefulness of the Dharma. Secular Buddhism should not only be tolerated but embraced, because that is a natural first step on the path for an educated modern person. In places where Buddhism is a traditional religion the majority of Buddhists look for material gain and a better next life, while secular Buddhists find the teachings about meditation and reality intriguing and good. The former is the simple believer with little knowledge, while the latter is someone with personal interest and enthusiasm. Since the lowest aspiration within Buddhism is the path of men and gods, both the simple believer and the secular Buddhist can be accepted as Buddhists.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 19th, 2013 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: Zen and different Pure Land views

Content:

Astus wrote:

In order to be able to accept buddha-lands, buddhas, deities and rebirth, one has to switch from objectivist-materialist to a subjectivist-phenomenologist view where appearances are experiential data. Then see how mental phenomena are definitive regarding all experience. Then it makes perfect sense that one can be born in the Pure Land just as one is born here because of karma.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 19th, 2013 at 12:47 AM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

mirage said:

It's a person's qualification/degree of realization that need verifying, not the exact content of their teaching.

Astus wrote:

And this is where I disagree. As one of the http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Four_reliances states: "Rely on the message of the teacher, not on his personality"

And Ven. Shengyan says (Zen Wisdom, p. 27-28),

QUESTION:

How does an ordinary practitioner recognize a false master?

SHIH-FU:

The most important thing in recognizing masters is to be able to judge whether they have a correct view of Buddhadharma. If their views of the Dharma are correct, then even if their behavior reveals some weaknesses, they should not be considered false masters. On the other hand, if teachers do not have a correct view of the Dharma, they cannot be considered authentic or virtuous masters.

Of course, this presupposes that the person making the judgment has some understanding of correct Dharma. Without an understanding of the Dharma, there is no way a practitioner can tell if a teacher is genuine or false.

Beyond this, there are some basic criteria that can be used in assessing masters. First, consider their causes and conditions. In other words, their actions should be based on a foundation of emptiness; there should be no attachment in what they do. Second, consider their causes and consequences, or karma. The sense of emptiness that guides the actions of virtuous masters (causes and conditions) should accord with their karma (causes and consequences). That is to say, their actions need to be guided by a sense of responsibility. They should, at all times, be clearly aware of the consequences of their actions. Thus, there is an intimate relationship between responsibility and non-attachment.

These, then, are the marks of virtuous masters: they have a correct view of the Dharma, their actions reveal no attachment and they have a clear sense of responsibility.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 19th, 2013 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: Zen and different Pure Land views

Content:

zamotcr said:

Then, would it be correct to say that maybe science will never find a Pure Land, because the observer perception, senses or mind is not pure, or something like this? So if someone is on a spaceship would not see the Pure Land because of his perception?

Astus wrote:

Correct. Not to mention that it's said Sukhavati is 10,000 buddha-lands away, i.e. farther than Captain Picard ever managed to go.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 19th, 2013 at 2:32 AM

Title: Re: Should secular Buddhism be tolerated?

Content:

Samanthabhadra said:

First of all its not a fundamentalist approach, someone who goes with evidence is not a fundamentalist, stating that the earth is not flat is not a fundamentalist position. That's how silly your question is.

Astus wrote:

In Buddhist cosmology https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Jambudvīpa#In_Buddhism is flat, surrounded by ocean, has Sumeru at its northern end and a huge tree in its centre. How does that match our modern understanding of a round Earth? It doesn't.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 19th, 2013 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: Zen and different Pure Land views

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here is a Zen way of showing the Pure Land (teaching of Huineng from the Platform Sutra):

“I will move the Western [Paradise] for you in an instant, so you will be able to see it right in front of you. Do you all want to see it or not?”

Those in the assembly all bowed their heads to the ground and said, “If we could see it here, how could we then want to be reborn there? We ask that in Your Reverence’s compassion you manifest the Western [Paradise] for us all to see!”

The master said, “[All of you in this] great assembly, [understand that] the very form-bodies of people in this world are the city walls [of the Pure Land]. Your eyes, ears, nose, and tongue are the gates [of the Pure Land]. Externally, you have five gates, and within is the gate of the sensory mind. The mind is the ground, and the nature is the king. The king resides on the mind-ground, and the nature exists just as a king exists. When the nature goes, the king is absent. When the nature is present, the body and mind continue. When the nature departs, the body disintegrates. ‘Buddha’ acts within the nature—don’t look for it outside your bodies! When one is deluded as to the self-nature, one is a sentient being, but when one realizes the self-nature, one is a buddha.

“Compassion is Avalokiteśvara, joy and equanimity are Mahāsthāmaprāpta, the ability to purify is Śākyamuni, and universal directness is Amitābha. The self is Sumeru, desire is the ocean’s water, and the afflictions are the waves. The poisons are the evil dragons, the falsenesses are the ghosts and spirits, the enervating defilements are the fishes, lust and anger are the hells, and stupidity is the animals.

In the Pure Land school, however, the method is visualisation (teaching from the Visualisation Sutra):

I, the Tathāgata, shall now teach you, Vaidehī, and all sentient beings of the future how to visualize the Western Land of Utmost Bliss. By the power of the Buddha all will be able to see the Pure Land as clearly as if one were looking at one’s own reflection in a bright mirror. Seeing the utmost beauty and bliss of that land, they will rejoice and immediately attain insight into the non-arising of all dharmas.

Also, by using only the recitation of the name of Amitabha one may have visions of the Pure Land as did Honen, founder of the Japanese Pure Land school.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 19th, 2013 at 3:01 AM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

Konchog1 said:

Hmm, I'm not quite sure I agree with you here. There is a lineage in the Gelug. It's just very complex. In Liberation in the Palm of Your Hand it says that the lineage starts with Shakyamuni and splits into lineages headed by Maitreya and Manjushri. These lineages are combined by Atisha and after Dromtonpa, splits into three headed by Gampopa, Potowa and Chaen Ngawa. These lineages are combined by Lord Tsongkhapa and continue in a straight line from there.

Astus wrote:

Practically any Buddhist who studied from different teachers can come up with a lineage, and all monks have an ordination lineage plus the Dharma lineage of their upadhyaya. In this sense there is nothing special about a lineage except for one difference. The nobility keeps record of their ancestors while ordinary people don't, however, everyone equally have ancestors going back to the unknown past. Similarly, in Buddhism there are those who claim to belong the a lineage - something that actually copies royal bloodlines, at least in Zen - and there are those who don't have such a record of their teachers' teachers. And what is the reason for showing a special ancestry? Not to insure the validity of their teachings but simply to raise themselves above the rest.

Can we say that only those with a lineage are enlightened? If so, Buddhism works only for a very few people, it is not an efficient teaching. However, if we say that there are many people who truly benefit from the teachings, distinguishing a few by a lineage is not about realisation or greatness but a claim for superiority (at least in the case of Zen).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 19th, 2013 at 3:06 AM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

mirage said:

It is relatively easy to give correct-sounding teachings, especially if people assume you know what you are talking about (which is generally the case). Of course if what a teacher is saying clearly contradicts Dharma, then it is reasonable to be suspicious. But this alone is not enough to distinguish a real teacher from a fraud. I certainly don't mean that lineage is the only criterion for me. It is one of several necessary criteria.

Astus wrote:

Correct sounding and correct are not exactly the same. A teacher who teaches correct Dharma is a proper teacher. And besides giving correct teachings what else can a teacher do? They obviously don't make people magically enlightened because they have received magic powers from their own teachers. The only thing anyone can get from a teacher is a teaching. So, what difference does a lineage make?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 19th, 2013 at 3:17 AM

Title: Re: Should secular Buddhism be tolerated?

Content:

Samanthabhadra said:

This empirical reality, the earth, the sun, the solar system, the trees, the buildings do not exist out there in the physical world. It is all inside your mind and it is only a state of mind. Vajrayana is not concerned with this world at all.

Astus wrote:

In that case what does it matter what kind of imaginary world one lives in? A round planet, a flat peninsula, or a disc resting on the backs of four huge elephants which are in turn standing on the back of an enormous turtle as it slowly swims through space.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 19th, 2013 at 4:57 AM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

mirage said:

Simple: I do not consider my ability to distinguish a correct teaching from a correct sounding teaching to be infallible. If it was infallible, I probably wouldn't need any teachings at all.

Furthermore, the very act of receiving a teaching personally is important. There is a common saying that repeating a mantra without having received it personally from a teacher is like trying to squeeze some oil out of a handful of sand.

Astus wrote:

The correct teachings are defined in the Buddhist canon, the Buddha himself taught them.

Zongmi wrote (Zongmi on Chan, p. 112):

"The sutras are like an inked marking string, serving as a model by which to establish the false and the correct. The inked marking string is not the skill itself; a skillful craftsman must use the string as a standard. The sutras and treatises are not Chan; one who transmits Chan must use the sutras and treatises as a norm."

And Yongming wrote (Conception of Chan in the Zongjing Lu, p. 248, 258):

"People develop understanding through texts. When people forget about the Buddha's message, one safeguards the minds of beginners on the basis of [texts]. Whoever understands the teaching through the corpus of Buddhist writings will not create a mind and realm of objects in opposition to each other, but will realize the mind of the Buddha directly. What error is there in this?"

"Moreover, if one wants to investigate the Buddha-vehicle, one will read extensively from the treasure storehouse [i.e., Buddhist scriptures]. Each and every [scripture] forces one to understand the truth about one's own self; utterance after utterance causes one to mysteriously unite with true mind. One simply should not grasp onto written texts as the highest meaning, forming [artificial] views according to the words. One should directly seek out the message written down in the corpus of Buddhist scriptures, tacitly uniting with the truth that is inherently implicit. At that point, the wisdom that does not depend on any teacher reveals itself, and the way of heavenly truth is no longer obscure."

Now, I'm not saying that teachers are unnecessary. There is a great value of someone who has studied, contemplated and practised the teachings, who has experience in the Dharma and compassion to teach it. However, there is nothing new a Buddhist teacher can say that are not already in the sutras. He can rephrase it for the student, give examples, etc., but the content is the same, just as the intention and the effect. A maths or a language teacher can't come up with new rules, he can only explain again and again until the student understands. A Dharma teacher has to do the same. In fact, even the sutras repeat the same things over and over.

So, what difference does it make if I hear a mantra from a teacher, from a friend, from a stranger or from the radio? The words are the same. What else is a mantra other than words? And I can ask the same about all the teachings there are in Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 19th, 2013 at 5:00 AM

Title: Re: Zen and different Pure Land views

Content:

zamotcr said:

So, according to the point of view, Pure Land can be seen as own Buddha's Nature, and also as a place, visible to "pure sentient beings", right?

Astus wrote:

It depends on what one wants to teach. Both are true, as it is explained by Seosan (see my first post here).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 19th, 2013 at 4:26 PM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

According to the understanding of Vajrayana, mantra is an intention and a energetic pattern that is transmitted from the guru to the student. it has nothing to do with ordinary language and can't be "learned" from books.

Astus wrote:

Can you explain what intention and energetic patter is in this case and how it is transmitted? And can you raise the same problem with non-Tantric teachings giving a reason for the requirement of a lineage?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 19th, 2013 at 5:27 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Astus wrote:

In Japanese:

<http://jisho.org/words?jap=%E5%B8%AB&eng=&dict=edict>

1: teacher; master; one's mentor;

2: () religious leader;

3: (Suffix) specialist;

4: (Noun) (Archaism) five-battalion brigade comprising 2500 men (Zhou-dynasty Chinese army) examples:

医師 【いし】 (n,adj-no) doctor; physician

印刻師 【いんこくし】 (n) seal engraver

画師; 絵師 【えし; がし (画師)】 (n) painter; artist; painter supported by patron

思惑師 【おもわくし】 (n) speculator

楽師 【がくし】 (n) master musician

教師 【きょうし】 (n,adj-no) teacher (classroom)

技師 【ぎし】 (n) engineer; technician;

写真師 【しやしんし】 (n) photographer

花火師 【はなびし】 (n) pyrotechnist; pyrotechnician

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 19th, 2013 at 6:40 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jeeprs,

I think it's the opposite, people want a superior being to guide them and show the way, someone they can completely trust. And for that trust one has to believe in the purity and goodness of the other person, to appear someone like Jesus. And if you believe that the other person is a living saint and an omniscient buddha it is quite easy to surrender yourself to him in every aspect. This is the easy way. The more difficult path is when you have your own confidence and the teacher is there to help, to assist you, but not to overtake the control of your (spiritual) life. However, such confidence comes from one's own study and experience, from the personal faith in the Triple Jewel. Therefore it is up to the system to show the correct way to beginners that will teach them how to gain that confidence and not to give up yourself to a seemingly superior being.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 19th, 2013 at 10:32 PM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

The transmission occurs through sympathetic influence-- the samadhi of the master creates an opportunity for the student to participate.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean telepathy? Or in what way is another person's state of mind a factor for another's state of mind? Wouldn't that be a violation of karma (if one can influence another's mind directly)?

Although the topic deals mainly with the Zen lineage, since it's generally about myths in Buddhism, a little trip into Vajrayana is permissible.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 19th, 2013 at 11:39 PM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

I have no clue what telepathy is. One's state of mind is easily and commonly affected by the state of mind of others-- spend an hour in a room with a manic person or an extremely angry person and observe your own mental state. I am not particularly concerned with some materialist explanation; it's empirically observable. I don't believe that mind is an epiphenomena of matter. There aren't any walls between one sentient being and another, only labels on percepts.

I don't know what you mean by violating karma... do you mean one person experiencing the karmic results of another? This is clearly not what I have described.

Astus wrote:

What I mean is that if it is possible to directly influence another's mind - one can transfer thoughts, feelings, ideas, concepts, anything - then one can make another do or feel whatever one wants, basically violating the law of karma, because karma depends on what one chooses and defines how one experiences. Being in the same room with others, seeing and hearing how they behave, is not a direct mental influence. So, if there is anything communicated by a teacher to a student beyond what the five sensory faculties record, then there is a direct mental influence. If there isn't, the mentioned intention and energy pattern is either in a physically perceivable act or it doesn't exist.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 20th, 2013 at 12:13 AM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

mirage said:

But how is it a problem? Even if it is possible to directly influence another mind, it can only result in providing supporting conditions for that mind. A teacher won't be able to create a new substantial cause in the student's mind, but he'll be able to support some existing causes, allowing them to actualize. This is no different from a physical interaction.

Astus wrote:

What would such a supporting condition be? Is it a thought, is it a feeling, is it a mental representation of a physical input?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 20th, 2013 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

I don't share your epistemological premises. One person in samadhi can certainly impact others. Much of the action to help others in Vajrayana is through this.

Can you please give me some sources for your ideas about karma that explain how samadhi has no impact on the environment and the surroundings of the meditator?

Astus wrote:

This <http://www.buddhanet.net/e-learning/karma.htm> should suffice. I can also cite further explanations from the Kosha or Yogacara sources if required. That is, karma is intentional action, nothing more, nothing less. Every individual experiences the effects of their own actions and not the actions of others. If one could experience the result of another's karma, that would mean that I suffer or enjoy the fruits of someone else's actions. One kills a man and another goes to hell for it. One practices the path and another attains enlightenment. Etc. So, what you are saying is that when one meditates another experiences the benefits of that meditation. Or, if in meditation someone can generate an intention in another's mind, that is taking control over another person's karma, which is again the case that one man's karma bears fruit for another (since the one influenced had no intention to do something but was made to do it by someone else's will). Not to mention the case that although the Buddha himself had superb samadhis, he couldn't make anyone neither liberated nor even a little better (and then consider infinite number of buddhas bringing everyone enlightenment just by meditation). And that's why I say direct mental influence is a violation of karma.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 20th, 2013 at 4:15 AM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

mirage said:

This is a strange point of view that seems to imply that people are unable to interact with each other at all. You cannot hit me in the face because that would mean that I suffer the result of your own action.

As I understand it, I can be hit by you because I have some karma to be hit (cause) and you have karma to hit me (supporting condition). Without any of these, the result would not happen. The seed cannot grow without water, and it is pointless to pour water if there is no seed.

Astus wrote:

I didn't say people are unable to interact, I specified direct mental influence. We can communicate and experience others via the five bodily sensory faculties, but we can't do it directly from mind to mind.

Good and bad experiences are the result of karma. Meeting the Dharma is a result of karma. Being able to practice is a result of karma. This subject is covered in Vajrayana preliminary practices, isn't it?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 20th, 2013 at 5:11 PM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

mirage said:

Maybe I am missing something? Naturally these things are the result of karma. However, doesn't the karmic seed require supporting conditions to bring the appropriate result? I distinctly remember that it does.

Regarding direct mental influence - how, then, can we account for things like mind terma? While transmitting esoteric teachings to his realized disciples in Tibet, Guru Padmasambhava concealed many teachings with the blessings of his enlightened mind stream in the nature of the intrinsic awareness of the minds of his disciples through the power of "mind-mandated transmission" (gtad rgya); thereby the master and disciple became united as one in the teachings and realization. Here, the master has concealed the teachings and blessings, the esoteric attainments, as ter in the pure nature of the minds of his disciples through his enlightened power, and he has made aspirations that the ter may be discovered for the sake of beings when the appropriate time comes

Astus wrote:

We may separate karma (the person's mental habits) and non-karmic conditions (external phenomena, i.e. things perceived by the five senses). This still maintains the impossibility of direct mental influence.

As for explaining mind terma, I can ask the same question. Or, to turn it around, I may say that such thing is not possible. And to give it another turn, such teachings are based on insight into the nature of mind, so it is true that they are from Padmasambhava (or any chosen enlightened being), since, as we can see in guruyoga, the mind of the teacher and the student are ultimately the same.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 20th, 2013 at 5:16 PM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

If we take as a starting premise that ultimately there is no me and you, then the problem of how can I influence/share/transmit to you really becomes redundant.

We all agree that conventional reality, as we perceive it, is not the way things actually are. If somebody is acting intentionally within the sphere of the ultimate...

Some go as far as to say that there is no ultimate and relative reality/truth anyway, or that the perception of the duality of the two truths is an illusion.

Astus wrote:

In ultimate reality there is no coming or going, no birth or death. Transmission is meaningless where there is no you and me. Receiving the four empowerments requires that the disciple follows the steps, does the visualisations, etc., without what he doesn't experience anything (I'm talking practically here). Intentional action in ultimate reality does not exist. As for the unity of the two truths, it is seeing that conventional phenomena are indeed conventional, and there is no separate ultimate beyond the conventional.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 20th, 2013 at 10:17 PM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Mirage,

I do not see why you insist so much on the impossibility of direct mental influence. I see this as dualistic thinking. In my opinion, direct mental contact no more contradicts karma than a physical contact does. Both are made possible and effectual by the presence of appropriate karma on both sides.

I insist on it because as I said I see it as contradicting karma. How is that an objection that it's dualistic thinking? You don't confuse your right hand with your left, and you don't quench your thirst by someone else drinking. Physical contact is not the same as intention, while thinking is intention. If one person can put thoughts into another's mind then the buddhas can make everyone enlightened.

As it says in your quote, Padmasambhava communicated teachings to disciples by words and deeds, and then those disciples remembered the teachings in a future life. It's not the same as Padmasambhava putting memories into another's consciousness.

The ability (abhijña) to read another's mind, i.e. telepathy, is not unique to a buddha. In the Visuddhimagga there is also a method given how to attain it (XII.3), and the Kosha (VII.56) mentions - but doesn't explain - three ways of doing it: by reading signs, by mantra, by meditation. In the usual enumeration (DN 2) of the mental states one can know by telepathy there are only general qualities and not specific thoughts.

Consciousness is apparently momentary, so the question is if a single moment of consciousness can be the same for two beings, practically a "mind meld", where two streams of consciousness become one. It is like two objects occupying exactly the same space, which means that it's just one object. Since they have different causal background meaning that the effects should be different - we arrive at the problem of different causes creating the same result and then we also have to explain how a single mind can continue on two separate streams. Another option is what Dharmakīrti mentions in his Samtanantara-siddhi (Wood: Mind Only, p. 217-218) that there is only a similar form appearing in one's mind that somewhat reflects another's consciousness. However, this is not a direct mental contact.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 21st, 2013 at 2:16 AM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Mirage,

The problem with the idea that buddhas can put thoughts into people's mind based on the person's receptiveness is that all buddhas continually work on liberating all beings. Therefore what happens is that only the individual's openness determines everything making the influence of buddhas meaningless. That is, buddhas have nothing to do and can't actually do anything, they are a meaningless extra with no actual relevance to anyone's life. Also, here we just simply skip the problem of a single moment of consciousness for multiple beings.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 21st, 2013 at 6:26 AM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Karma Dorje,

The problem is about direct mental influence as was raised regarding the transmission of mantras. The same problem stands with any other sort of idea that involves such consciousness to consciousness contact. Only if this can be clarified it is possible to move on to the specifics like the termas, empowerments and the rest.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 21st, 2013 at 7:59 PM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

I am still waiting for specific sources that preclude direct mental influence. It is a given that direct mental influence is possible in just about every form of Buddhism I know about so I was hoping for you to spell out your argument against it in specific quotes rather than just a link to a general article on karma.

Astus wrote:

In Xuanzang's Demonstration of Consciousness Only (ch. 7, in Three Texts on Consciousness Only, p. 239; tr. Francis H. Cook) it is explained that immediate perception of another's mind is impossible:

[Objection:] External form is really nonexistent and presumably not the object of internal consciousness. The minds of others really exist, so why are they not also one's own objects [of consciousness]?

[We reply,] who says that the minds of others are not the objects of one's own consciousness? We just do not say that they are its immediate objects. That is, when a consciousness is born, it is devoid of real function, unlike hands, etc., that immediately grasp external things, or the sun, etc., that spreads its light and immediately illuminates external objects. [Consciousness] is only said to perceive the minds of others because it is like a mirror in which appear seemingly external objects. It cannot immediately perceive [others' minds]. What it immediately perceives are its own transformations. Therefore, a scripture says, "There is not the slightest dharma that is capable of seizing other dharmas. It is just that when consciousness is born, it appears resembling images and is said to seize things." As with having the minds of others as objects, so with form, etc.

Further explanation is found from Dan Lusthaus in Buddhist Phenomenology, p. 490-491.

It should be understood simply by considering that consciousness is a subjective experience. Making consciousness objective is not consciousness any more. Experiencing the same therefore requires an identical consciousness, and so on as I have already said.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 21st, 2013 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

mirage said:

So, what matters for us is that blessings and teachings can be conferred in this manner - by causing through the power of yogic concentration the forms in one mind to be represented in another by their close copies. Doesn't it suffice for the purpose discussed in this thread?

Astus wrote:

Non-direct contact between minds, that includes all sorts of communication (like this forum). The point of bringing up the distinction is to find what else could there be transmitted between teacher and student other than words. If we exclude direct interference we need a representation, something that conveys the message, something that creates a causal link. In case of merit transference, for instance, it is not that someone simply sends out merit to another person who then automatically receives it, but by informing the other person of one's merits and that other individual agreeing with the action that generated the merit, they share the merit, one because of the action, the other because of agreeing with the action. So, there is no "merit-energy transfer" in any literal sense. A teacher giving blessings has to announce the act of blessing and the receiver has to acknowledge it. That acknowledgement is the receiving, or accepting. That's why people can receive a guru's blessing who is not even in their presence, simply by guruyoga. Same at the time of empowerment, the recipients have to actively participate in it by visualising this and that. I'm not denying here the efficiency of any of those practices, I'm debating the idea that there is something mystical (prana, blessing, the seed of enlightenment, etc.) sent from teacher to the student, because it would entail interfering directly with another's mind-stream that skips the usual process of perceiving and comprehending.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 22nd, 2013 at 2:18 AM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Mirage,

People have six senses. The five physical senses deliver impressions from what we call the outer world. The sixth sense is our thoughts and emotions. It is this sixth sense, consciousness, that is capable of many magical and supernatural things. For instance, among the five eyes the first one is the physical and the rest are mental. The divine eye is capable of seeing heavens and hells, things far and close, and this is what an experienced meditator (of any religion or tradition) can use to see another's mind. This is not so unusual if we think about it a little, since dreams, visions, hallucinations and everyday imagination show us the virtually infinite abilities of the mind. The question is if what we see with the divine eye is not just imagination. The difference between what we call real and imagined is that we can't change real things by wishing so.

Conventional reality has its rules. So, while I accept the existence of the six realms, its specifics (names of places and gods, etc.) as given in Buddhism is not definitive. There are many people who can travel to other worlds/realms by meditation (here using it as a very general term of spiritual techniques), but they experience more or less different things and they can't communicate with each other there. So, if a teacher transmits something not on the level of the five physical senses, in what realm does that happen and how can it be assured that anyone perceives it? What mental dharms can be sent from mind to mind and what transmits them? Although both the teacher and the student are given specific instructions regarding visualisations and attitudes at the time of empowerment, it is not explained how blessings, etc. go from one person to another, if it is indeed a phenomenon transferred. Rather it seems that it is a matter of imagination, wishing so, just like in the case of the divine eye. However, if there is a way to establish the specifics of giving blessings, etc., I'm happy to hear about it.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 22nd, 2013 at 2:22 AM

Title: Re: Mushin and Chuang Tzu

Content:

Astus wrote:

Mushin, that is, no-mind is a Zen term for prajnaparamita, and means non-abiding in any phenomenon, what is seeing their emptiness. And yes, it is the central idea of Zen, just as Mahayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 22nd, 2013 at 2:53 AM

Title: Re: Transgendered kids

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think that having a male or female genitalia is one thing, identifying with culturally defined gender roles is another.

If a child wants to identify with the opposite gender I see no problem, but he has to be aware of the difficulties (and will face them anyway). But under 18 no surgical or chemical modifications should be allowed.

Regarding Quite Heart's story, I say that people should stop mutilating (circumcision) children.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 22nd, 2013 at 3:49 AM

Title: Re: Mushin and Chuang Tzu

Content:

Astus wrote:

Not exactly. Zhangzi talks about following the natural appearance of things without contrivance. Zen talks about not attaching to ideas, seeing things clearly and acting compassionately. In Zen there is no natural order to follow or submit to.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 22nd, 2013 at 3:57 AM

Title: Re: Mushin and Chuang Tzu

Content:

Astus wrote:

It does indeed. And it shows how mushin in martial arts is not Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 22nd, 2013 at 5:04 PM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Mirage,

What I'm looking for is a coherent explanation for rddhis and the rest. It is easy to say that it's just magic and you don't have to fit it into the larger Buddhist system. Alas, I don't want to do that.

I can see the practical value of Tantric/yogic methods, they are fine as skilful means. My problem is that the way they explain the reason for its functioning (energy channels, magic) does not hold up to analysis. I mean, nobody can visibly perform the mundane super-knowledges (moving through walls, walking on water, etc.), but one can in meditation with a mind-made body. So I say that it's an internal practice and not something observable in our shared (physical) world. From this comes the impossibility of mind to mind communication and such.

How is prana defined? What is it made of? What are its properties? What faculty perceives it? What kind of dharma is it? I have yet to see answers to these questions. As in your quote from Wangyal Rinpoche, there are different bodily feelings and an imagined system one works with and then believes that it's all because an unseen, unknown phenomenon called prana.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 22nd, 2013 at 8:23 PM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Mirage,

Now we have arrived at the point then that all the unusual features cannot be explained or established and remains in the realm of personal belief. Similarly to the Zen transmission story, where this topic has started, there is nothing that could prove the existence of such phenomena besides relying on tradition and faith. Unlike the Zen lineages that can be shown to be historically inaccurate, but nonetheless existent to some level, supernatural abilities and events simply lack evidence and logical explanation. Another difference is that while there are living people who are members of different Zen lineages, there is yet to be someone who claims to have special abilities. On the other hand, it is said, and that's where we have started, that in the transmission of mantras there is something else besides mere words. And this claim cannot be verified, practically making it a myth.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 22nd, 2013 at 9:15 PM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

Jikan said:

Another way of making the same claim would be to say that Buddhism is a religion, no?

Astus wrote:

Partially. But even in a religion, that has a "theology" (i.e. a logical-philosophical system), it is a reasonable requirement that it is coherent. Even in Buddhist terms the way prana, etc. functions and exists can't be explained, it is an anomaly. Of course, we can say that higher Tantra cannot be connected to other teachings. But then there is no reason why we couldn't say that it is a teaching without valid basis within Buddhism itself. For instance, Tendai, Kegon and Hosso are different schools, but their teachings can be verified by different teachings and connected to each other. Also, none of them have a teaching that is taught beyond words (I mean, you don't need special transmissions to be able to read and study the Lotus Sutra and to benefit from it). In Zen they talk about the wordless transmission, but they also clarify there is nothing actually transmitted. So, if Mantrayana includes something else beyond verbal mantras, it seems logical to me to ask what that is.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 22nd, 2013 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: Mushin and Chuang Tzu

Content:

Astus wrote:

It does indeed. And it shows how mushin in martial arts is not Zen.

Luke said:

Then do you think that the quote by Takuan Soho which I posted in my OP is also "not Zen"?

I guess the first question in my OP really should have been "Is using the state of mind of mushin to improve one's performance of a martial art or another skill a Zen Buddhist idea or not?"

Astus wrote:

When it says, "is ready only to follow the dictates of the subconscious", either it's a bad translation or a very non-Buddhist idea. Using Zen to be a proficient killer, that's a perversion of the teachings. Zen is about becoming a buddha, it is about the perfection of bodhisattva action. Thinking that Zen is good for learning this or that skill is lacking the correct motivation, bodhicitta. It is mistaking Zen for some technique or therapeutic method. Zen is direct insight into the nature of mind. No insight, no Zen. One can use a calm mind to be more efficient in many things, yes. But that's just a calm mind, not Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 22nd, 2013 at 11:31 PM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

dude said:

"In Zen they talk about the wordless transmission, but they also clarify there is nothing actually transmitted."

That can't mean what it literally says.

Astus wrote:

What has been transmitted from Buddha to Kashyapa then?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 23rd, 2013 at 4:39 PM

Title: Re: Mushin and Chuang Tzu

Content:

Astus wrote:

Meido, thanks. I've enjoyed Takuan's work, a lucid presentation indeed, but the quote is very misleading.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 23rd, 2013 at 9:26 PM

Title: Re: Myth in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Just as the majority of the Zen stories, the "Flower Sermon" is fictional. The reason I mentioned is that it shows that what is transmitted is nothing but the direct understanding of the nature of mind. When one sees the nature of mind, that is receiving the transmission from mind to mind. That's why it is said that there is nothing actually transmitted. In fact, there is nothing actually realised either. Not seeing is true seeing.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 24th, 2013 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: Caodong lineage in China after Rujing?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Caodong lineage in China survived via the Shaolin monastery, where https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Xueting_Fuyu established its lineage and it was the source of the 17th century revival of the Caodong line. Even today the Shaolin monastery belongs to the Caodong lineage. Ven. Shengyan also has the Caodong transmission, you can see his lineage chart <http://www.westernchanfellowship.org/about-the-western-chan-fellowship/lineage-of-the-teachers/lineage-chart/>.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 24th, 2013 at 9:58 PM

Title: Re: Great Soto masters after Dogen?

Content:

Astus wrote:

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Keizan> is regarded as the second founder of Soto Zen. Menzan Zuiho (1683-1769) made Dogen and his writings the central source of doctrine in Soto, and https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Gento_Sokuchu de-emphasised the use of koans in Soto. In the modern era the most famous is probably https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kodo_Sawaki.

You may also look at this: <http://terebess.hu/english/zenschool.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 25th, 2013 at 4:34 AM

Title: Re: Caodong lineage in China after Rujing?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Maybe, but they have obviously not established any lasting community. In China the Linji school practically took over the Chan scene, just as in Korea and Vietnam. The Japanese who travelled to China and returned, or the Chinese who went to Japan during the 13th century belonged to the Linji school, Dogen seems to be an exception. It should be also noted that belonging to this or that lineage in China had little or no relevance to the everyday monastic life.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 25th, 2013 at 4:18 PM

Title: Re: Caodong lineage in China after Rujing?

Content:

plwk said:

Funny Astus, that DDM chart didn't mentioned http://www.tallahasseechan.com/guogu_bio.html amongst the five lay Dharma heirs listed or was his 'inka' unconnected to being a 'Dharma heir'?

Astus wrote:

It lists only Western heirs.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 25th, 2013 at 4:28 PM

Title: Re: Talking About Kensho

Content:

Astus wrote:

As I see it, kensho is personally verifying the truth of the Buddha's teaching that all phenomena are empty. Since this is a central teaching I don't see a reason why it couldn't be discussed.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 25th, 2013 at 5:30 PM

Title: Re: Has anyone else left Vajrayana?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I know someone who originally studied Vajrayana and Dzogchen in particular, but then read a book from Ajahn Sumedho and thought that since it's the same as Dzogchen why take all the fuss that it involves so switched to Theravada.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 25th, 2013 at 6:34 PM

Title: Re: Mulamadhyamakakarika and more

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are quite a few.

MMK:

<https://books.google.com/books?id=38WJRwP3nLgC> (annotated translation)

<https://books.google.com/books?id=FL4KAAAAYAAJ> (selections from Candrakirti's commentary)

<https://books.google.com/books?id=QpO5ykqRHJEC> (Tsongkhapa's commentary)

<https://books.google.com/books?id=54kV38QYrvoC> (Jay Garfield's commentary)

<https://books.google.com/books?id=0czByWU0US8C> (Khenpo Tsultrim Gyamtso's commentary)

Alamkara:

<https://books.google.com/books?id=hOb6M6Uo948C> (Mipham's commentary)

And there are lot of teachings in Mahayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 25th, 2013 at 8:08 PM

Title: Re: What a Zen Master is, and what a Zen Master isn't.

Content:

seeker242 said:

And how can this be done without having a hierarchy of people maintaining control over other people, telling them what to do? Who is going to be in charge of "the system"?

Astus wrote:

By recognising the qualities of others, their experience, knowledge, kindness and wisdom, there are people who one considers good friends from whom one can learn. Usually lay people learn from monastics, and in the monastery there is a seniority system. Buddhism doesn't work like the Catholic Church, there is no strict hierarchy, no <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Magisterium>. Whatever one teacher says is not compulsory for anyone else to accept it. The Zen tradition itself is diverse. And there is no need for any control over others. By "system" I mean the way people are taught about the Dharma. And either one accepts the idea that people are capable of comprehending and practising the teaching (one of the meanings of universal buddha-nature), or doesn't accept it.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 25th, 2013 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: Talking About Kensho

Content:

jeeprs said:

There are people who charge big money for seminars on it, and so on. So it does not hurt to be reticent about the subject. It is a very subtle thing. It is very easily exploited and misunderstood as I'm sure we would all agree.

Astus wrote:

But if you make it open and clear there's nothing left to misunderstand and exploit. Although even if it were part of the primary school's curriculum there would be a few people falling for charlatans.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 25th, 2013 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: Has anyone else left Vajrayana?

Content:

anjali said:

The most compatible with Zen teaching in the Tibetan tradition I've found is Mahamudra. There are some excellent manuals on Mahamudra meditation that can easily compliment a zen approach. Best wishes on simplifying your practice.

Astus wrote:

<http://www.wwzc.org/book/ven-anzan-hoshin-roshi> translated "The Practice of the Co-Emergent Mahamudra", and the late https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/John_Crook_%28ethologist%29 led Mahamudra retreats.

Since only a few meditation manuals have been translated so far to English from Chinese, Mahamudra is the closest in view one can find as a complement to Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 27th, 2013 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: Historical reasons for secrecy in Vajrayana?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Ronald M. Davidson writes in Indian Esoteric Buddhism: A Social History of the Tantric Movement:

Buddhist hermeneutics in service of the siddha-related literature had to accomplish several arduous goals. First, under the rubric of secrecy, it had to explain why the new literature diametrically contradicted the fundamental Buddhist values of virtuous restraint, since restraint and discipline (vinaya, sila) were the starting points to Buddhist institutional life. Second, siddha hermeneutics needed to generate a systematic interpretation of difficult passages, especially those tying erotic behavior to the Buddha himself. Finally, the exegesis needed to be sufficiently flexible both to reassure the conservative monastic community, while continuing to incorporate new developments in Indian religious life.

(p. 239-240)

Most Buddhist Mahayanist and esoteric scriptures explicitly acknowledge the question of reception with the introductory chapters (nidana) affording scenarios in which different communities are assembled, followed by their haggling over the meaning of the Buddha's message. The hermeneutics of reception, in fact, contributed to one of the great paradoxes of Indian esoteric Buddhism: the employment of secrecy for the purpose of propagating extensively the esoteric practices within multiple communities and subcultures. The esoteric method is arguably the most successful Indian Buddhist ritual system to market itself throughout both the traditional and modern worlds. Given the extraordinary spread and viability of the esoteric persuasion, it appears that one aspect of its popularity is exactly its claims to superiority by virtue of selectivity. Few themes fan the flames of desire like restricted access and an aura of incomparability. In their emphasis on secrecy, esoteric Buddhists shared systems of transmission with other institutions that required secrecy in the pursuit of hegemonic status: governments, trade societies, criminal conspiracies, and ritual specialists.

In recognition of these requirements, the rhetoric of esoterism directed that new material typically be introduced through the agency of a scriptural pronouncement that is presented as a challenge to the status quo. The language of the introductory chapters (nidana), introductory sections of threatening chapters, and sections on coded language (sandhyabhasa) often represent their content as causing grave doubts, sometimes about their referents, sometimes about the nature of the Buddha's message itself. Many of the literary techniques had already been introduced in Mahayana sutras, especially the Saddharmapundarika, but were used now to justify decidedly different content.

(p. 245-246)

At home, esoteric Buddhism demonstrated tenacious success in India for more than five centuries at a time when the dynamics of the subcontinent were rapidly changing, and Buddhist institutions were in retreat in the Krsna River valley and elsewhere. It assisted the maintenance of the great monasteries and stemmed the Saiva tide sweeping up from the south. It sponsored the development of aesthetic and artistic forms in other countries such as Tibet, China, Japan, Nan-chao, and Burma—and formulated models of a hierarchical sacred community that survive to the present. It developed some of the most popular rituals ever employed in Buddhist centers and propagated them with a rhetoric of intimacy and secrecy. Indeed, the overwhelming success of the Secret Path has propelled it into a position where it has become perhaps the least secret of all the Buddhist meditative systems.

(p. 339)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 28th, 2013 at 12:20 AM

Title: Zen is No Secret

Content:

Astus wrote:

Bojo Jinul's seminal work, the Secrets on Cultivating the Mind (Susimkyeol), contains the essential teachings of Zen that everyone eager to liberate all beings should study carefully. It answers many questions that people who learn about Zen find difficult to answer. It shows the actual nature of mind and advises on how to go on from the initial enlightenment.

http://www.buddhism.org/board/read.cgi?board=Dharma_Talks&y_number=19

<http://www.wonbuddhism.org/doc/4.buddhist.sutra%28english%29/6.2.Secrets.of.Cultivating.the.Mind.by.Dr.T.Cleary.pdf> (PDF)

"Since all dharmas are like dreams or conjuring tricks, deluded thoughts are originally calm and the dusty sense-spheres are originally empty. At the point where all dharmas are empty, the numinous awareness is unobscured. That is, this mind of void and calm, numinous awareness is your original face. It is also the dharma-seal transmitted without a break by all the buddhas of the three time-periods, the successive generations of patriarchs and teachers, and the spiritual advisors of this world. If you awaken to this mind, then this is truly what is called not climbing the rungs of a ladder: you ascend straight to the stage of buddhahood and each step transcends the three realms of existence. Returning home, your doubts will be instantly resolved, and you will become the teacher of humans and divinities. Endowed with both compassion and wisdom and fully endowed with the twofold benefit, you will be worthy of receiving the offerings of humans and divinities. Each day you can use ten-thousand taels of gold. If you can do this, you will be a great man who will have indeed finished the tasks of this life."

(Moguja's Secrets on Cultivating the Mind in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, Vol. 2, p. 219)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 28th, 2013 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: What does it mean to practice seriously?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think it depends on intention. What is the goal of practice? Worldly benefits, future life benefits, personal liberation or liberating others.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 28th, 2013 at 5:39 AM

Title: Re: Historical reasons for secrecy in Vajrayana?

Content:

Astus wrote:

If the reason for secrecy were the personal nature of practice, it'd be true for every Buddhist (and non-Buddhist) teaching. If the reason were to keep it holy, the same would apply for all religion. Rather, as Davidson says, the idea of secrecy was and still is used primarily as an attractive element, to make it look special and people who are initiated feel they are the chosen ones. Secrecy is also used to explain why Tantra was unknown to other Buddhist schools, the same excuse used by Mahayana. Western esoteric teachings are also meant to be secret, however, it is obvious that practically anyone who wants to know about it can get all the information. Same applies for Vajrayana that is arguably the most widespread form of Buddhism in the West with perhaps the largest number of publications and other media coverage from documentary films to Hollywood movies. It is a lot easier to learn about the Six Yogas, one of the highest and most secret practices, than to find information on such common practices as (East Asian) Pure Land funerary rituals.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 28th, 2013 at 6:24 PM

Title: Re: Historical reasons for secrecy in Vajrayana?

Content:

Astus wrote:

If the reason for secrecy were the personal nature of practice, it'd be true for every Buddhist (and non-Buddhist) teaching.

Pero said:

And who says it isn't?

Astus wrote:

However, Vajrayana as a teaching is not personal, it is very formalised and structural. Therefore, there is no reason for certain texts to be called hidden or secret that could harm an uninitiated person. One could misinterpret any Buddhist teaching. Also, since Tantra has been accepted as part of the orthodox monastic training, it rarely involves practices that are as extreme as it might have been once. Generally an empowerment doesn't involve actually swallowing "bodhicitta" and generating bliss by union, everything that was contrary to Buddhist ethics has been reinterpreted as only symbolic. Since tantras are included in both the Tibetan and Chinese canons, practically anyone has free access to them. So calling it secret does not mean that it is hidden or unknown. I'd say the names Secret Mantra, Secret School (Mi Zong 密宗), or Secret Teaching (Mikkyo 密教) is more like a style, an aesthetic value.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 28th, 2013 at 7:52 PM

Title: Re: What does it mean to practice seriously?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Once Zen Master To An was visiting another temple. He was not wearing his Zen Master clothes, but just the clothes of a wandering monk. He began a conversation with one of the monks at the temple, who did not recognize him. Soon the monk began to talk about his Master. "Everyday he does one thousand prostrations. He eats only one meal a day. He hasn't left the temple for thirty years. He is always sitting Zen. He is the greatest Zen Master in all of China."

To An replied, "Well, well, he sounds like an extraordinary man. I can't do any of these things. I can't bow a thousand times a day; but my mind is never lazy. I can't eat only once a day; but I never desire food. I can't stay in a temple for more than a short time; but wherever I go I have no hindrance. I can't sit Zen for very long; but I never give rise to thinking."

The monk said, "I don't understand." "Then go ask your Master," To An replied. The monk bowed and went into the temple.

Soon the Zen Master of the temple came running out to To An and prostrated himself three times in front of him. "You are a great Zen Master," he said. "Please let me become your disciple. I have been very attached to hard training. But now that I have heard your words, my mind is clear."

To An laughed and said, "No, I can't be your teacher. You are already a great Zen Master. All you need to do is to keep the mind you had when you were bowing to me. Already you are a free man. Before, you were bowing, sitting and eating only for yourself. Now it is for all people."

At these words, the Zen Master began to weep with joy. He bowed again to To An and said, simply, "Thank you."

(Dropping Ashes on the Buddha, p. 112-113)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 28th, 2013 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: Historical reasons for secrecy in Vajrayana?

Content:

Pero said:

True, but I think the danger of doing so is greater in Vajrayana. And for example, stuff like tsa lung without some instructions from someone experienced can lead to serious problems.

Astus wrote:

There are all sorts of physical and energy exercises people do without any problem. Sure, having a proper martial arts or yoga instructor decreases the chances of injury. And while it is uncommon that people learn any of them only from a book, it is not impossible (especially when one already has some experience in that area). Also, what kinds of serious problems do you mean here?

Pero said:

But there is a difference between the path and a practitioner on that path. I guess you could say that the former is not personal while the latter is.

Astus wrote:

The personal application of a path is unique regardless of the path followed. In this there is no difference between any teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 28th, 2013 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: Caodong lineage in China after Rujing?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Two things should be clarified.

1.

In China association with any particular lineage is mostly irrelevant in terms of doctrine and practices. At certain times in Buddhist history such lineages meant association with certain groups of elite monastics, but those times were rather exceptional. Normally life in a monastery goes on just as it did before, following similar rituals and daily routine. Individual monks can specialise in the area of their choice and do the practices they prefer. And when there is an outstanding (usually old and experienced) monk, younger monks go and study from him.

2.

Dogen didn't actually transmit a specific style of Zen to Japan but rather what he saw as the common form of Buddhist practice. It is Zen just before the reforms of Dahui - i.e. kanhua chan, using Zen stories for meditation - spread everywhere. Shikantaza is not an exclusively Caodong/Soto method but ordinary sitting meditation in the Zen way.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 28th, 2013 at 9:28 PM

Title: Re: Historical reasons for secrecy in Vajrayana?

Content:

Luke said:

For example, if a person never ate in public and only ate when he was in private with no one to observe him, only would eat using a silver spoon with a Buddha on the end of it, and if someone who was not part of his "eating with Buddha spoons group" asked him "Do you ever eat?", he would avoid answering the question, even though all people know about eating already; then the act of eating in such a ritualized way would take on a new intensity for him mentally.

Astus wrote:

Just a side note for eating privately: <http://en.memory-alpha.org/wiki/Kreetassan>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 29th, 2013 at 5:12 AM

Title: Re: Caodong lineage in China after Rujing?

Content:

Luke said:

Ah, so all Chan monks receive shikantaza instruction and can practice it whenever they wish?

Astus wrote:

Monks may receive a lot of instructions or almost nothing, depending on their ordination teacher and the community they live in. There is no such thing as a "Chan monk", there are only monks and nuns. Nowadays in Taiwan the major Buddhist churches have seminars for those who ordain and they study a curriculum. Same goes for Korea and Japan. But a hundred years ago you learnt what and from whoever you could. I don't know what is the situation in mainland China these days regarding monastic education.

Luke said:

Hmm, but didn't Rujing have his own "style" of Chan? If his style wasn't unique then why is it given its own special name (Caodong)?

Astus wrote:

Caodong is simply a lineage, a virtual system of relationships among elite monastics (primarily abbots). Theoretically the Caodong school's teaching style involved the Five Ranks of Dongshan, and (as mentioned in Fayan's Guidelines for the Zen Schools) "knocking and calling out" (whatever that means), and the five positions of prince and minister (mentioned in the Blue Cliff Record, case 7), and if I recall correctly they also liked to use the Yijing to illustrate teachings. Dogen apparently didn't follow any of that. As for the practice of "shikantaza", on the one hand every Buddhist monk knows sitting meditation, on the other hand the expression itself "just sitting" was most likely created by Dogen himself.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 29th, 2013 at 5:36 AM

Title: Re: Historical reasons for secrecy in Vajrayana?

Content:

Pero said:

Health problems. I'm not totally clear on the details as I haven't so far seen anything elaborating on it. As far as I remember my teacher just says one can become abnormal.

Astus wrote:

I've heard a few stories myself about people flipping out on meditation retreats, although there was no Tantra involved. Some Christians also believe that meditation makes you susceptible to demonic possession. And there are all sorts of mental and emotional problems one may face in meditation, although the worst I've seen was a few people crying or be frightened of some experiences. I'm not saying that one can't do harm with practices, but it sounds more like empty threats. As I see it, the worst thing that can happen when one is without an experienced guide is believing in things that are not there. Alas, without detailed and reliable information this is not a topic that can be explored.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 29th, 2013 at 5:14 PM

Title: Re: Caodong lineage in China after Rujing?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here are the four major Taiwanese Buddhist organisations' description of their aims and programmes:

<http://www.fgs.org.tw/english/orgainzations/objectives/objectives.html>

<http://www.ctworld.org/english-96/html/a7Threefold-SANGHA.htm>

<http://www.dharmadrum.org/content/about/about2.aspx?sn=52>

http://tw.tzuchi.org/en/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=281&Itemid=289&lang=en

Or you may look into the free e-books to see what topics they cover and how they present Buddhism:

<http://blpusa.com/category/buddhism-in-every-step>

<http://chancenter.org/cmc/publications/free-literature/>

An interesting fact is for instance that while Ven. Shengyan is called "Chan master" in English, he is "Dharma teacher" (fashi - common title of all monks) in Chinese. Another thing is that while Ven. Shengyan was known in Taiwan primarily as a scholarly monk, in the West his organisation is mostly about promoting a newer style of Chan.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 29th, 2013 at 5:17 PM

Title: Re: In Search of a Teacher

Content:

Astus wrote:

Are you looking specifically for a Zen teacher or just any Buddhist teacher? For a start, you may check what Buddhist communities are available in your area.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 29th, 2013 at 5:28 PM

Title: Re: Historical reasons for secrecy in Vajrayana?

Content:

yegyal said:

"Believing in things that aren't there"

Doesn't that describe most of the "things" people believe in?

As for health problems, the most widespread issue that Buddhist practitioners face are lung/wind problems, which covers a variety of nervous conditions. I think is what they refer to in Japan as "Zen sickness," and it's pretty much caused by those that either push themselves or practice in a very forceful or tight way. But this has much less to do with secrecy, than it does the need for the guidance of a teacher who can notice and help you correct these kinds of deviations.

Astus wrote:

I meant by things that are not there the misinterpretation of the teachings. Zen sickness is mistaking quiet and peace for enlightenment, or any other special experience one may have in meditation. It is like taking "bliss, clarity and non-thought" to be the nature of mind.

Can you specify "wind problems"?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 29th, 2013 at 7:36 PM

Title: Re: Historical reasons for secrecy in Vajrayana?

Content:

Astus wrote:

yegyal,

You say nervous conditions. Is that a reference to actual bodily problems, or only to energetic issues? I mean, can you describe probable health related dangers in modern medical terms, or does it only exist in the old Indo-Tibetan view of the human body? I think this is a relevant question as far as the reason for secrecy goes, because if it can be shown that certain practices cause actual physical and/or mental damage to people, it'd require stricter control (similarly to psychotherapists and doctors).

After reading the <http://meditatorswindimbalance.org/about-meditators-wind-imbalance-lung/> section on that site, I'd say such problems with trying too hard and doing the meditation wrong can occur with any type of practice. That is, Vajrayana doesn't require any special treatment in this case.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 29th, 2013 at 9:34 PM

Title: Re: Achieving Epistemic Certainty

Content:

Astus wrote:

Besides the advice to look into https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Pram%C4%81%E1%B9%87a#In_Tibetan_Buddhism and https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Buddhist_logic, the way to gain certainty about the Buddha's teaching is https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Wisdom_in_Buddhism. Wisdom includes the studying and understanding of the teachings, and then confirming them in meditation by direct experience. While epistemology and logic are subjects studied mainly in Tibetan Buddhism, wisdom is an essential part of the path to liberation in every school. Obtaining certainty in the Dharma is the first stage of enlightenment, so every practitioner has to work towards this in the beginning.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 30th, 2013 at 7:04 PM

Title: Re: Dzog Chen and Zen?

Content:

Astus wrote:

A related post: <http://earlytibet.com/2011/11/22/tibetan-chen-v/>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 30th, 2013 at 11:43 PM

Title: Re: Caodong lineage in China after Rujing?

Content:

Luke said:

So in reality, in modern China and Taiwan, there is little difference between a Chan monk who is a Linji lineage holder and a Chan monk who is a Caodong lineage holder? (Both Chan monks have probably studied mostly the same things.) Is this correct?

Astus wrote:

There are just monks (and nuns, in fact, a lot more nuns than monks in Taiwan). Whether they say they belong to this or that lineage (that includes even Tiantai, Huayan or anything else) is usually not relevant, because it is often defined by what monastery they were ordained or live in. For instance, Ven. Xingyun of Fo Guang Shan is Linji lineage but there isn't anything Linji (or even Chan) specific in his teachings. And while Ven. Shengyan has created the Dharma Drum lineage (combination of Linji and Caodong), his teachings are a mixture of Tiantai, Humanistic Buddhism and a bit of Japanese Zen (but mostly his own system), while at the same time in the Western Chan Fellowship (followers of Ven. Shengyan) they teach a mixture of Soto Zen, huatou practice and some sort of therapeutic techniques (just to show how Western perception and presentation can be quite different even if there is a direct relationship). Korea is another good example here, since the majority of monks belong to a single church, the Jogye Order, that actually promotes Ganhwa Seon (i.e. Linji style Chan), but individual monasteries and teachers can transmit very different things (even rejecting Ganhwa practice).

The sort of "objectless meditation" is called mozhao (silent illumination, mokusho in Japanese), just as Ven. Shengyan uses it. Interestingly, it was originally a derogatory term used by Dahui. That is, mozhao used in the Caodong context. Otherwise it can have many other names, like no-thought, no-mind, prajnaparamita, one act samadhi, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 30th, 2013 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: Historical reasons for secrecy in Vajrayana?

Content:

oldbob said:

Recognizing this, perhaps it is more responsible to explain, and put in context, all secret teaching and then expect common sense and peer pressure to control and limit harmful, or crazy making, behavior.

Astus wrote:

I can only agree with this. And just as in any Buddhist path, the majority wants to join a community and learn from teachers and experienced members. It is not easy to assume the correct meditation posture without some guidance, and that's even truer for the rest of the practices, although there are some very good meditation manuals too.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 1st, 2013 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: Historical reasons for secrecy in Vajrayana?

Content:

Jnana said:

Two reasons for maintaining secrecy in the Vajrayāna that are applicable across historical periods and cultures:

- (1) because it is undertaken as a commitment on the part of the student, and
- (2) because there are certain vajrayāna practices that can have negative karmic consequences if incorrectly engaged in.

Astus wrote:

Point one is actually saying that "it is secret because it is secret". Point two may be applied to non-vajrayana practices too.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 1st, 2013 at 5:16 AM

Title: Re: Caodong lineage in China after Rujing?

Content:

Astus wrote:

It seems to me that Caodong as a distinct form of teaching in China has disappeared around the 13th century, if it ever really existed at all. As for anyone interested in Dogen's teachings, I have no information, maybe there are a few.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 1st, 2013 at 5:18 AM

Title: Re: Historical reasons for secrecy in Vajrayana?

Content:

Jnana said:

The potential risk of serious negative karmic consequences increases significantly when venturing outside of exoteric orthopraxy.

Astus wrote:

How so? Can you give some examples?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 1st, 2013 at 5:59 AM

Title: Re: Historical reasons for secrecy in Vajrayana?

Content:

Jnana said:

Drinking alcohol would be one example. Sexual yogas would be another. The potential for negative consequences are far greater than if one maintains the lay precepts or the monastic discipline without engaging in such activities.

Astus wrote:

I see your point. Still, there are a few Mahayana sutras that give complete freedom to bodhisattvas in the name of emptiness and compassion, and there are Zen stories for instance that are as transgressive as those from Vajrayana. Although none of them constitutes a part of actual training.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 1st, 2013 at 4:40 PM

Title: Re: Caodong lineage in China after Rujing?

Content:

Luke said:

Did any of these "more significant masters" teach ideas from the Caodong tradition?

Astus wrote:

The mentioned Hongzhi Zhengjue is the most famous person. The "founders" of the Caodong lineage are also well known: Dongshan Liangjie and Caoshan Benji. Then there are Touzi Yiqing, Furong Daokai (Furong being the actual reviver of the Caodong school in the Song era and inventor of "silent illumination"), Zhenxie Qingliao and others of the Song era. But there's very little from any of them in English.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 1st, 2013 at 6:09 PM

Title: Re: Good practices for a householder

Content:

Astus wrote:

Originally the huatou method propagated by Dahui Zonggao was meant for lay people. Read the book Swampland Flowers, most of the letters in it from Dahui are sent to lay people. You may also study the teachings of Bankei Yotaku and Daehaeng Sunim, both of them taught very direct Zen and they had a large lay audience.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 1st, 2013 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Learning about Tendai

Content:

Jikan said:

To me this opens onto another question that I would like to discuss in another thread sometime: I've been told but I haven't confirmed it that Tendai training contains within it a Zen transmission, but not the "northern" or "southern" transmissions that have become so well known as Soto and Rinzai: the "Ox Head" school (Gozu) line. I know next to nothing about this except for some comments made in passing by my teacher, and the little bits I've read in Dumoulin's book on Zen.

Astus wrote:

You can read a little about the Niutou/Gozu school here:

<http://ccbs.ntu.edu.tw/FULLTEXT/JR-JOCP/henrik.htm>.

The poem in another translation with some modern commentary:

http://www.shambhalasun.com/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=1307&Itemid=0

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 1st, 2013 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: Good practices for a householder

Content:

shaunc said:

Pureland. I got into it for similar reasons.

kirtu said:

This is one reason we need something like Obaku Zen. DT Suzuki said something similar in the intro to his Pure Land book.

Astus wrote:

No need to rely on the very little information available in English on the Obaku school.

Just look at the teachings of practically any teacher from Chinese or Vietnamese Mahayana. Pure Land and Chan practices easily go together.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 2nd, 2013 at 4:45 AM

Title: Re: Historical reasons for secrecy in Vajrayana?

Content:

Pero said:

Anyway, in the end, none of you seem to be able to give any good reason against secrecy.

Astus wrote:

Against? We could explore that area too, although so far it was about examining the reasons for the secrecy, as that is one of the things that makes Vajrayana different from all the other methods in Buddhism that are not secret at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 2nd, 2013 at 4:47 PM

Title: Re: Historical reasons for secrecy in Vajrayana?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Separate topic: <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=66&t=12611>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 2nd, 2013 at 4:57 PM

Title: Re: Historical reasons for secrecy in Vajrayana?

Content:

Konchog1 said:

If you try to do [Completion Stage practices] without proper preparation-which means a thorough grounding in the graduated path-and without a stable deity practice, you will lose your mind. I mean that quite literally. You really need to know what you are doing; otherwise all sorts of things can start to happen. If the energies move into a wrong area, moving them back again is incredibly difficult. There are many mediators who have gone completely crazy because that have not followed the practices correctly or tried to take shortcuts.

-Tantra by Geshe Tashi Tsering pg. 117

Astus wrote:

All types of Mahamudra and Dzogchen are completion stage practices, still they are taught very openly and I doubt there were many who have lost their minds because of that. Or perhaps what was meant are specific wind related techniques? In that case, we're back to the subject discussed a few pages back.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 2nd, 2013 at 5:01 PM

Title: Re: Historical reasons for secrecy in Vajrayana?

Content:

yegyal said:

Again, I think it's a mistake to assume that you would even know about the things that are actually kept secret.

Astus wrote:

In that case, everything that can be learnt about Vajrayana without sitting at the feet of a guru are not secret at all. I wonder what could be left to teach to the actual disciples in secret...

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 2nd, 2013 at 6:58 PM

Title: Re: Good practices for a householder

Content:

greentara said:

'again, you don't need to sit and do anything. You just need to sit. Give up the obsessive human need to do something all the time and just be still. Let Silence teach you as you sit.

Astus wrote:

And why sit? What if you don't have time to just sit around? There are things to take care of, people to talk to, meals to cook, work to do, etc. How do you manage that?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 2nd, 2013 at 7:44 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism in Singapore?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here's a virtual tour of a monastery, as an example of traditional Chinese Buddhist structure, in Singapore: <http://www.buddhanet.net/e-learning/temple/temple.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 2nd, 2013 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: Historical reasons for secrecy in Vajrayana?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Shitloads of stuff. You cannot even begin to imagine how much more there is.

Astus wrote:

That's good, because it seems the entire path is well described in several versions, plus all the open teachings and empowerments, consequently none of them are secret or restricted.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 3rd, 2013 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: Good practices for a householder

Content:

Astus wrote:

ShaunC,

There are different levels of Buddhists, and everybody takes and uses as much of the Dharma as they want. The first thing is to take refuge in the Three Jewels, then on you are a Buddhist, no matter what. If you can keep, or aspire to keep, some precepts and vows, that's already part of the practice. And when I say practice, it means practising the Dharma in one's life, and not in a narrow sense of sitting on a cushion.

From a fundamental perspective, here is a collection of teachings addressed to lay people: <http://www.accesstoinight.org/index-subject.html#lay>. This discourse is highly recommended: <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.31.0.nara.html>

And if we are talking about Mahayana, the six paramitas are easily applicable to lay life. It includes methods to relate to others (giving, discipline), central qualities to nurture (patience, effort), and inner methods (meditation, wisdom). If that sounds too much, it can be reduced to a single practice: compassion. Devotion is another important part of Buddhism, and you can see its tangible presence in any Buddhist country. One part of that devotion is "mindfulness of Buddha", that is practised in the form of recitation and prostration. The central method of the Pure Land school is being mindful of Amitabha Buddha, and it is the most popular among both the laity and the monastics. But if you feel more connected to another buddha or bodhisattva, that's fine too.

If you are more drawn to Vajrayana, it has a lot to offer too. As an example: <http://www.dzogchenmeditation.com/about-us/what-is-dzogchen/13-teachings/16-the-pointing-out-instruction-to-the-old-lady.html>

I think that even for a busy lay person like you there are many many options. You just have to choose.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 6th, 2013 at 2:13 AM

Title: Re: How did Dogen present karma & rebirth?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dogen talks directly and indirectly about karma and rebirth. Some examples:

In the Shobogenzo (tr. Nishijima-Cross, Numata edition):

vol 1

ch9, Keisei-sanshiki (p. 118), on the power of confession cleansing past karma ch10, Shoaku-makusa, the entire chapter about retribution and precepts ch12, Kesa-kudoku (p. 159), on the power of kesa/kashaya cleansing karma ch14, Sansuigyo (p. 221), different beings see in different ways

vol 4

ch90, Shizen-biku (p. 272), criticises Kongzi and Laozi for their ignorance of past lives ch84, Sanji-no-go, the whole chapter is about the karma in three times

In the Eihei Koroku (tr. Leighton-Okumura):

4.275 (p264); 5.383 (p340) fruit of past lives

5.386 (p344) "If people who study Buddha Dharma have no genuine faith or true mindfulness, they will certainly dispense with and ignore [the law of] causality."

6.437 (p392) denying karma is wrong view, zazen with wrong view is useless

7.485 (p430); 7.517 (p460) 3 kinds of karma

7.504 (p450) "Tathagatas never go beyond clarifying cause and effect"

7.510 (p454) "Students of the way cannot dismiss cause and effect. If you discard cause and effect, you will ultimately deviate from practice-realization."

7.524 (p466) rebirth of relatives by the merit of one's leaving home

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 6th, 2013 at 2:47 AM

Title: Re: Jewel Ornament - Question about Dharmakaya

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dharmakaya is a word for the emptiness of the mind. For the emptiness of everything in general the word is dharmadhatu. While both mean emptiness, the difference is regarding to the emptiness of what.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 6th, 2013 at 6:14 PM

Title: Re: Jewel Ornament - Question about Dharmakaya

Content:

Konchog1 said:

So if the Dharmakaya is of the mind then what is meant by "Dharmakaya is all-pervading emptiness"?

Astus wrote:

As Cone said, all things are mind, and mind is empty. Don't forget that emptiness is not something in and of itself but the quality, the nature of phenomena. Dharmakaya is used in the context of the trikaya teaching (the term dharmakaya has other uses too, but they are not important here). So in order to say that the nature of the mind of every sentient being is the same as the mind of buddhas they use the term dharmakaya. Emptiness is a universal quality, so we can say that dharmakaya is the same as the emptiness of everything else, because the mind being empty is no different from other things being empty.

In the JOL (p. 289) all-pervading emptiness is explained under the 4th category: "Oneness. It is indivisible because the Dharmadhatu and primordial wisdom cannot be differentiated." That is, non-conceptuality includes not making differences between this and that, not grasping the extremes of sameness and difference, therefore it is all-pervading.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 6th, 2013 at 10:45 PM

Title: Re: Rinzai views on rebirth?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"the majority of Zen practitioners and teachers in the West are agnostic on this subject, leaning one way or the other. I, for instance, am agnostic on the subject, but lean toward nonbelief..."

<http://www.patheos.com/blogs/monkeymind/2008/09/some-questions-answered-regarding-soto-zen-in-north-america.html>

"It is not taught any place in the sutras that we will have a next life; these six realms are not something that we will experience when we are reborn in another life. They could apply to different parts of society; they could apply to different aspects of our current life; they could apply to our various states of mind."

<http://onedropzen.org/uploads/freshlyfallensnow.pdf>

"Whenever I've had the opportunity, I've asked the Zen masters I've encountered about rebirth. My first teacher, Sochu Roshi, said, "It's a nice story." I asked another teacher, Eido Roshi, about the same thing and he thought for a moment then he said, "It's better to say, 'Could be' than to say, 'No.'" When I asked Maezumi Roshi about it, he never answered me except with thunderous silence. Nonetheless, I overheard him telling others, "Yes, definitely, there's rebirth!" Rather than talk about it, they wanted me to find out for myself."

(Gerry Shishin Wick: The Book of Equanimity, p. 29)

"Another fundamental principle of Buddhism is the doctrine of the continuity of life and death. There is no sharp dividing line between this life and the next. ... Death does not disturb the continuity of life; for karma and rebirth are continuous, the one implying and being inseparable from the other. As sin and suffering bring death, so does death bring rebirth."

(Nyogen Senzaki: Like a Dream, Like a Fantasy p. 89)

"The Chan and Zen views of Rebirth are not the same. These schools make no assumptions or hold beliefs as to what happens after one dies. Because of this, rebirth is seen as being born into each moment, dying and being reborn into the next moment. This isn't something to be taken on faith, but to understood through your own practice."

<http://www.zen-georgia.org/ZenFaq.html#11> (a Rinzai Zen group)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 6th, 2013 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: Soto views on rebirth?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"In Zen we talk about rebirth in this lifetime. ... Karma is a word that expresses the process of how the way you live in this moment affects what happens in the next moment, or the next year, or the next decade."

http://www.dharma-rain.org/?p=about_faq#rebirth

<http://suicidegirlsblog.com/blog/the-myth-of-rebirth/>

<http://hardcorezen.blogspot.co.uk/2011/01/literal-rebirth.html>

"Heaven is a human supposition and Hell is also a human supposition. But when our autonomic nervous system is balanced, it is just Heaven, and when our autonomic nervous system is not balanced, it is just Hell."

<http://www.dogensangha.org/questions.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 7th, 2013 at 3:34 AM

Title: Re: Are Satipatthana, Shamatha and Vipashyana interrelated?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Satipatthana (smṛtyupasthāna) is a complete method in itself that includes both calming (samatha) and insight (vipassana/vipasyana). Although it is not necessary to master several stages of absorption (jhāna/dhyāna), some level of mental peace is always required by every meditation system in Buddhism that I know of (including modern Burmese vipassana). The method of calming doesn't lead to liberation because it is simply a temporary tranquillity one gains and without insight there is no turning away from grasping at phenomena.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 7th, 2013 at 4:24 PM

Title: Re: Nagarjuna's Mūlamadhyamakakārikā

Content:

Astus wrote:

Getting started with the text is probably the most difficult part, but if you can understand the way it gives its reasons in the first two chapters then I think you will have little problem with the rest. I recommend you just start reading and if you have questions start a topic for it in the Mahayana or Academic section.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 7th, 2013 at 10:07 PM

Title: Bankei on Zen Practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kosho Uchiyama wrote about "sesshin without toys" and how zazen is not playing with anything.

"It seems to me that we spend all our lives playing with toys. ... Doing zazen means to actualize the reality of life. zazen is the self which is only the self of the universe, without any playing with toys. Zazen is like the time just before our death when all the toys have been taken away. Yet, even then we look around for something to play with, if only for an instant."

(Opening the Hand of Thought, p. 62)

"Among all the human activities in the world, there is nothing in which we can live out our own life without amusing ourselves with toys. Only sitting zazen is free from self-amusement with toys. This is the point where zazen is wondrous."

(The Wholehearted Way, p. 127)

What I find missing is to say that zazen itself is a toy, a device, that they keep playing with, to the exclusion of other tools (recitation, repentance, etc.). While reducing Zen to zazen seems minimalist, there is one more step. See what Bankei says:

"If the Buddha-mind is clearly realized, that's enough. You need do nothing else — no practice, no precepts, no zazen or koan study. Nothing like that. You'll be free from care, everything will be taken care of, just by being as you are."

(The Unborn, p. 116, tr. Waddell)

"The only way any of you can become unborn and realize the Buddha-mind is to confirm what I'm telling you in your own mind. I won't tell you that you have to practice such and such, that you have to uphold certain rules or precepts or read certain sutras or other Zen writings, or that you have to do zazen. I'm not going to try to give you the Buddha-mind either — you already have it. If you listen carefully to me, and grasp the Buddha-mind that's already yours, then you become a genuine living Buddha. Wherever you are standing, that place is the Unborn. Whatever you want to do, you can do it. If you want to recite sutras or do zazen, observe precepts, recite the Nembutsu or the Daimoku, you should do it.⁵⁹ If you're a farmer or a tradesman and you want to work your farm or your business, then go ahead, do it; whatever it is, that will be your personal samadhi. My part in this is simply to tell you about it and to try to get you to confirm the Buddha-minds you were all given when you were born."

(The Unborn, p. 120, tr. Waddell)

"To exert yourselves in religious practice, trying to produce enlightenment by doing religious practices and zazen, is all wrong too. There's no difference between the mind of all the buddhas and the Buddha Mind of each one of you. But by wanting to realize enlightenment, you create a duality between the one who realizes enlightenment and what it is that's being realized. When you cherish even the smallest desire to realize enlightenment, right away you leave behind the realm of the Unborn and go against the Buddha Mind. This Buddha Mind you have from your parents innately is one alone—not two, not three!"

(Bankei Zen, p. 76, tr. Haskel)

"Now, you may be doing zazen and reading the sutras, but abide in the Buddha Mind that you have from your parents innately, just as it is, and realize the Unborn. If you practice zazen or read the sutras with some deliberate aim in mind, hoping to accumulate merit, or whatever, you'll only be changing the Buddha Mind for merit, or changing it for zazen and sutras! That's how it is, so all you've got to do is acknowledge with profound faith and realization that, without your producing a single thought or resorting to any cleverness or shrewdness, everything is individually recognized and distinguished of itself. And all because the marvelously illuminating Buddha Mind is unborn and smoothly manages each and every thing."

(Bankei Zen, p. 85, tr. Haskel)

"All of you should realize the vital, functioning, living Buddha Mind! For several hundred years now, [people in] both China and Japan have misunderstood the Zen teaching, trying to attain enlightenment by doing zazen or trying to find 'the one who sees and hears,' all of which is a great mistake. Zazen is just another name for original mind, and means to sit in tranquility with a tranquil mind. When you do sitting meditation, you're simply sitting, just as you are; when you do walking meditation, you're walking, just as you are."

(Bankei Zen, p. 96, tr. Haskel)

"Mind accords with all circumstances, yet doesn't arise or cease
The sages of old praised this, calling it zazen
Blind people wear out their cushions waiting for enlightenment
Just like trying to make a mirror by polishing a brick"

(Bankei Zen, p. 123, tr. Haskel)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 8th, 2013 at 4:24 PM

Title: Re: Cryonic Preservation and Rebirth

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm no expert in medicine or biology, however, as I've heard, frozen dead bodies can never be reanimated because by freezing the cells they are practically destroyed (just as freezing water can break the bottle).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 8th, 2013 at 5:43 PM

Title: Re: Sokushinbutsu - What do you guys think of this?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is no limit to what people can do once they have grasped on an idea.

Misunderstanding the Dharma is very easy. Understanding correctly the Dharma is also very easy. What you choose is what matters, that is your karma.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 8th, 2013 at 6:06 PM

Title: Re: Pureland study group anyone?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'd like to add Ouyi's <http://www.ymba.org/books/mind-seal-buddhas> among the commentaries. It is a good representative of inclusive interpretation.

Just for the first section of the part describing the buddha-land itself (in Ouyi's commentary this is still the introductory part).

Unknown said:

At that time Buddha said to the Elder Shariputra: "West of here, past a hundred billion Buddha-lands, there exists a world called "Ultimate Bliss". In this land there exists a Buddha called Amitabha, who is expounding the Dharma right now.

The Pure Land method takes in all people, whether they are of low, medium, or high capacity. It is beyond all relativities, in perfect fusion. It is inconceivable: it is perfectly all-encompassing, and goes completely beyond all other Buddhist methods. It is very profound and hard to believe in. Therefore it is specially announced to those of great wisdom: without the highest level of wisdom, you cannot arrive directly at the stage where you have no doubts about the Pure Land teaching.

"West" signifies the place where the Pure Land appears, which is west of here. A "Buddha-land" is a whole great galaxy of worlds that are all taught by one Buddha. In terms of our world, there is a central polar mountain, and four continents to the east, west, south, and north of it, illuminated by the same sun and moon, surrounded by a circular range of iron mountains: this is one world. A thousand of these makes a small world system, a thousand small world-systems makes a medium world system, and a thousand medium world-systems makes a great galaxy of worlds. West of a hundred billion of such Buddha-lands is the Land of Ultimate Bliss.

Question: Why is the Land of Ultimate Bliss in the west?

Answer: This is not a good question. If the Land of Ultimate Bliss were in the east, you would be asking why it is in the east. Isn't this just playing with words? What's more, if you look at the Land of Ultimate Bliss from the point of view of the hundred billion Buddha-lands, it is in the east. What is worth creating doubts about?

"There exists a world called Ultimate Bliss." This introduces us to the name of Amitabha's environment, to his domain. In the temporal dimension, its time is reckoned in terms of past, present, and future. In the spatial dimension, its boundaries are reckoned in terms of the ten directions [the four cardinal directions, the four intermediate directions, the nadir and the zenith].

The Sanskrit name for the Land of Ultimate Bliss is "Sukhavati". It is also called the Land of Peaceful Nurturing, the Land of Peace and Bliss, the Land of Pure Equanimity, and so on. The basic meaning is that it is utterly peaceful and secure, and forever removed from all forms of pain and suffering. This is explained at length below.

There are four kinds of Pure Land, and each category is in turn subdivided in terms of purity or defilement [see glossary, "Four Pure Lands"].

Buddhas have three bodies, which are discussed in terms of singularity and multiplicity [see glossary: "Three Bodies of the Buddhas"].

When the sutra says "there exists a world called Ultimate Bliss" and "there exists a Buddha called Amitabha," it is saying that both that world and that Buddha do actually exist. There are four meanings here.

It indicates that there is a real Pure Land, and makes us happy to seek it.

It gives us truthful instructions, to make us concentrate on the Pure Land.

It states that the Pure Land is not a figment of the imagination or a mirage, that it is not a provisional manifestation or a roundabout teaching not to be taken literally, that it is not an empty falsity, that it is not a land reached via the Theravada vehicle.[13]

It demonstrates perfectly that the Pure Land is part of our true nature, to enable us to have a profound realization of it and penetrate into the truth of Real Mark (the Mind).

"Buddha expounding the Dharma" on this occasion shows that both the Pure Land and Amitabha exist -- this is not a case of "the past is already gone, and the future has not yet taken shape." We must make a vow to be born in the Pure Land, and to personally hear Amitabha's teaching, so that we may quickly achieve true enlightenment.

The fact that the Pure Land and Amitabha Buddha are here in the present encourages us to have faith. The fact that Amitabha's world is called the Land of Ultimate Bliss encourages us to vow to be born there. The fact that the Buddha in the Pure Land is called Amitabha encourages us to engage in the wondrous practice of invoking his name.

The words of the sutra are concise, but the meaning is very profound.

This concludes my commentary on the introductory portion of the sutra.

[ADDITIONAL COMMENTARY: According to the contemporary Vietnamese Master To Lien: "If we are discussing the different manifestations of the universe, the Pure Land of Amitabha Buddha is indeed ten billion Buddha lands away. However, if we are speaking of the Pure Land of the Mind, then the ten billion Buddha lands are not outside the narrow confines of our own minds. If we recite the Buddha's name singlemindedly, the Pure Land can be found in every recitation -- the Pure Land is here and now."]

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 8th, 2013 at 8:36 PM

Title: Re: Soto views on rebirth?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Matylda,

People use the teaching of momentary rebirth as an exchange for life to life rebirth about what they are at least agnostic. You can read Brad Warner's two articles where he is explicit about his position.

"When people questioned Nishijima about this during talks, he always explained that these references were meant metaphorically, not literally."

"Rebirth is a myth that some Buddhists believe in. It might be loosely based on fact. But it might just be a fantasy."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 9th, 2013 at 6:52 AM

Title: Re: Bankei on Zen Practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

Of course, the practice is staying with the unborn, which is simply like Uchiyama's opening the hand of thought without the sitting posture. That is, Bankei doesn't give (nor exclude) anything besides the unborn.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 9th, 2013 at 4:31 PM

Title: Re: Bankei on Zen Practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jeeprs,

As I see it, Bankei returned to the central point of Zen. He didn't say people shouldn't do usual Buddhist practices, in fact, in some cases he advises people to recite sutras and do zazen. As for those who only need confirmation to their delusions, they are obviously misunderstanding it, since the very meaning of "unborn" is not giving rise to ideas.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 9th, 2013 at 4:37 PM

Title: Re: Zen, dhyana, and non-meditation

Content:

Astus wrote:

If my memories are correct, the term "Zen school" appeared rather late, around the 11th century, when a group of people wanted to strengthen their position in the Chinese Buddhist scene against the "others", namely the "teaching schools". And by Zen they never meant actual meditation, but rather the inexpressible experience of the true nature (while the "teachings" are the expressed side).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 9th, 2013 at 4:42 PM

Title: Re: Practicing Zen without a teacher

Content:

Astus wrote:

Whether you need a teacher or not is up to you. Most people need some level of instruction before they can get started on the path. As for what and where you learn from is again a question you have to answer. I think that unless you have serious obstacles you should visit one (or more) Zen (or at least Buddhist) communities to familiarise with the teachings and practices.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 9th, 2013 at 4:52 PM

Title: Re: Zen, dhyana, and non-meditation

Content:

oushi said:

And what is the difference between those two? There may be many methods and techniques, but isn't meditation an inexpressible experience of the true nature?

Astus wrote:

The gradual path of meditation (going through preliminaries, shamatha and vipashyana) culminates in the direct realisation of the true nature. So what counts as meditation is not actually that realisation but the path toward it.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 9th, 2013 at 5:28 PM

Title: Re: Dzog Chen and Zen?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Personally I find ChNN's work (or perhaps better to say Nubchen's) misleading regarding Zen, partially because it is outdated. As Jinzang said, the primary method of Zen is practically no different from those of Dzogchen and Mahamudra (and we could add Prajnaparamita, Madhyamaka and even Yogacara). The difference lies in almost all the other things. Guruyoga is one good example, and of course all the other ideas that are based on Tantra. On the other hand, Zen has koan practice, something that is unique to that school.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 9th, 2013 at 5:39 PM

Title: Re: Zen, dhyana, and non-meditation

Content:

oushi said:

What do you think about this?

Astus wrote:

It is a quote from a Zen text.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 9th, 2013 at 5:51 PM

Title: Re: Zen, dhyana, and non-meditation

Content:

oushi said:

What do you think Zen is, according to this Zen text?

Astus wrote:

A sudden path to realising the nature of mind. That is, not a gradual method that goes through stages, but simply the insight into emptiness.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 10th, 2013 at 2:33 AM

Title: Re: Zen, dhyana, and non-meditation

Content:

Holybla said:

Zen and nonmeditation are not meditation. Meditation is using the mind to concentrate on something. Your nature is beyond the mind.

Astus wrote:

Or rather there is nothing beyond mind. The true nature is no nature.

"There is a koan that asks, "What is your original face before your parents were born?" One might naturally assume that there is some special thing called "original face," but that is not the right approach. When we open the hand of thought, letting go, the original self is already there. It's not some special mystical state. Don't seek it somewhere else. When we open the hand of thought, what is there, in that moment, is our original face." (Kosho Uchiyama: Opening the Hand of Thought, p. 154)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 10th, 2013 at 5:58 AM

Title: Re: Artificial Intelligence & Sentience

Content:
Astus wrote:
Vinodh,

As I see it, true AI is not possible. Programming is based on mathematical principles, however, intelligence is not bound by such rules of logic.

Author: Astus
Date: Friday, May 10th, 2013 at 6:16 AM
Title: Re: Dzogchen, karma and ultimate truth
Content:

Holybla said:
Modernly, Rupert Sheldrake has theorized about laws of the universe as just habits rather than causal interactions. This is a philosophical doorway into the nonexistence of agents, objects and actions. Nagarjuna's whole spiels are all about This then that... It's cool to go from there into Dzogchen.

Jnana said:
It is. And Sheldrake is an interesting fellow.

Astus wrote:
Habits instead of causality is Hume's idea, further investigated by Kant (<http://plato.stanford.edu/entries/kant-hume-causality/>), then on influenced Husserl's phenomenology and through Hegel the process philosophy of Whitehead. As for Sheldrake, I'm not familiar with his thoughts, just wanted to add how in Western philosophy the idea of causality can come close to a Buddhist understanding while at the same time it is - being philosophy - a lot more complex.

Sorry for being

Author: Astus
Date: Friday, May 10th, 2013 at 4:45 PM
Title: Re: Artificial Intelligence & Sentience
Content:

Hickersonia said:
This sparked an odd vision in my mind of a bunch of supercomputers talking to eachother, arguing "...a biochemical processor, that is not possible..."

I agree that artificial intelligence is unlikely, but I won't use words like "impossible."

Astus wrote:
I say it's not possible because that would mean the mind is actually made of insentient elements and bound to a fixed causality. Intelligence requires the ability of reflection, to be able to review, modify and adapt. In short, this is called self-awareness. The mind is not bound to any fixed idea or system, that's why it is basically free, open, empty. If you program something, it means there is a fixed system and that sets its boundaries, it is not open.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 10th, 2013 at 5:01 PM

Title: Re: Zen, dhyana, and non-meditation

Content:

jeeprs said:

Right. So why bother getting up before dawn to meditate or taking the trouble to study sutras? Surely just better to open the hand of thought and just go about your daily routine. After all there's nothing special to attain and no 'special state'.

Astus wrote:

Hungry, eat.

Sleepy, close your eyes.

Fools laugh at me but the wise understand.

Followers of the Way, don't seek in words and letters. When mind is stirred, you will be exhausted. Even inhaling chilly air won't help you. It's better for you to realize with one thought that the world of causal relations is birthless, and go beyond the bodhisattva who surpasses the Three Vehicles.

(The Sayings of Zen Master Linji Yixuan, Shimano version, p. 47)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 10th, 2013 at 5:55 PM

Title: Re: Zen, dhyana, and non-meditation

Content:

jeeprs said:

But in our cick-driven pleasure-seeking instantly distractable social milieu, what it will usually be taken to mean is, Zen is easy, I don't have to do anything.

Astus wrote:

I can only agree with you. For instance, if one cares to read on after the quoted section Linji talks about his efforts to study and practice, and urges the audience not to waste their time. Still, since the topic is about non-meditation, I think it deserves to be answered. I personally prefer Zen to be truly a sudden path. But, as Hunagbo says, "Because one lacks the capacity for sudden Awakening, one must study the Tao of Dhyana for 3, 5, or 10 years." It is really up to the individual what path is fitting.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 10th, 2013 at 7:11 PM

Title: Re: Zen, dhyana, and non-meditation

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jeeprs,

I think it depends on which Zen community you go to. Not all of them are "samurai style", and the keisaku isn't used everywhere either. As for being easy or difficult, I can say that Zen is the easiest of them all. That's because there's nothing you need to do, you can "practise" anywhere and everywhere. At the same time, one can freely use any formal practice one prefers, from sitting meditation to prostration. It is very open and simple.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 11th, 2013 at 12:42 AM

Title: Re: Artificial Intelligence & Sentience

Content:

Jesse said:

In an AI, this would be accomplished by giving it access to it's own source code.

Astus wrote:

Wouldn't it still be a code to overwrite another code? That is, all possible actions are predetermined.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 11th, 2013 at 4:14 AM

Title: Re: Artificial Intelligence & Sentience

Content:

Jesse said:

In some ways yes, some ways no. AI works using learning algorithms, Their decisions are based on what they learn, and integrate. They are not based on hard-coded "mandates". These of course are loosely based on our own brains, and minds.

For example:

<https://io9.com/5820624/computer-teaches-itself-english-so-that-it-can-play-civilization>

Astus wrote:

Being able to adapt to some level is not the same as being free from codes. The difference I'm talking about is like this: a computer may be able to handle an artificial language (regular grammar, no phrases and other difficulties), and operates within the boundaries of that language. Human mind, however, is capable of learning several languages and reflecting on language, moving beyond grammar and words. That is, intelligence is more than just codes and rules.

The linked example is too brief a description (e.g. I doubt it could actually read the manual as you or I can) and I think we would need to be able to comprehend all the details to take it into account.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 11th, 2013 at 7:05 AM

Title: Re: Artificial Intelligence & Sentience

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jesse,

I don't equate the mind with the brain. If I believed that intelligence is simply a biochemical process I might as well agree with the idea that AI is possible. However, according to my understanding, mind is basically immaterial, therefore it's not possible to build an intelligent machine. Being a mechanic device is in itself contrary to intelligence, to sentience. And that's where I see the impossibility of achieving AI. Even if they could build a robot that has a human body - quite necessary to replicate ordinary experience - and add to that a set of very complex processors, it would still have to follow strict deterministic rules. Intelligence, on the other hand, has no rules, it is not bound by any thought, feeling or sensory impression.

Unknown said:

If you forget "code", and simply say that by the process of observation and reflection, it can learn, change it's views, and adapt to new situations, does it sound so different from any other living being?

Astus wrote:

To be able to observe and reflect you require consciousness, the very ability of knowing. But that knowing, that consciousness of the mind is open, not fixed. So it is not possible to build from fixed structures an unbound awareness. That is, mind is not simply a causality bound process, while a machine necessarily is.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 13th, 2013 at 3:38 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra and tantra

Content:

lama tsewang said:

originally there was just one practice of just sitting. later they developed koans, the original zen practice is done by the soto zen lineage.

Astus wrote:

Says so the Soto Zen people. But it is true that kanna zen (practice with koans) is a 12th century development. Although, so is the idea of emphasising zazen. However, this is not the forum for this topic.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 13th, 2013 at 4:30 PM

Title: Re: Essential Zen Practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

Both sequential and simultaneous cause and effect are mistaken, this has been shown by Nagarjuna and even the Lankavatara Sutra has a small chapter for it. As I see it, Dogen follows the general view of Zen as sudden enlightenment, just as in the Platform Sutra and others, with the exception of some special emphasis on seated meditation. Practice is enlightenment because the only practice is not grasping phenomena, what is the same as enlightenment. This is the "essential zen practice" stated in the OP.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 13th, 2013 at 5:40 PM

Title: Re: Nagarjuna's Mūlamadhyamakakārikā: Questions and Comments

Content:

rachmiel said:

Which is Buddhism closer to?

Astus wrote:

Neither of that. Buddhism is not about giving clever answers to difficult ontological-epistemological questions. Madhyamaka is about understanding that suffering comes from the reification of concepts, from the ignorance of imagining things to have self-nature. To see that all appearances are without essence, to see them insubstantial and fabricated, is the liberating wisdom of emptiness, i.e. the end of conceptual proliferation.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 13th, 2013 at 6:25 PM

Title: Re: short batchelor Critique

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Every major religion's teachings involve tensions, paradoxes, and apparent contradictions. They demand coexistence alongside our contemporary culture of individualism, liberal values, secularism, and scientific scepticism.[/b] We might find notions of no-self and rebirth or Dependent Origination irreconcilable with our personal worldview. But we will have to decide whether grappling with these doctrinal tensions is worth the authentic spiritual fulfilment offered by the progenitor of these tensions, the Triple Gem.

Astus wrote:

For me this argument sounds very weak. It is basically a "take it or leave it" statement that advocates pure faith while at the same time claims that it is only natural for Buddhism to be irrational and contradictory. Certainly there is space for religious sentiments in Buddhism where you can get "spiritual fulfilment" and all sorts of uplifting experiences. It is something common in religions. At the same time, one of the strong points of Buddhism is in its intellectual sanity, its logical system. Of course, trying to fit it into a scientific or any other world view is the wrong way to grasp the snake of Dharma. Buddhism is about eliminating suffering and not anything else. Also, the only big step required to establish rebirth is to apply the internal-subjective way of direct investigation of our own minds instead of the external-objective based proliferation of theories to confirm the mind-stream as non-material.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 13th, 2013 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: Nagarjuna's Mūlamadhyamakakārikā: Questions and Comments

Content:

Astus wrote:

Rachmiel,

1. It is possible to come up with different answers based on Buddhism. For the majority of Mahayana teachings, the answer is that there is nothing real outside, it is only the product of karma and ignorance, the conceptualisation of mind.

2. All teachings are only skilful means, they are not reified. So, when it is said that everything is mind made, the reason behind the teaching is to liberate beings from suffering. If it is used for something else, that is simply misunderstanding Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 14th, 2013 at 5:12 PM

Title: Re: Essential Zen Practice

Content:

Beatzen said:

That's kind of incredible to me... Can you give us a quote [preferably Nagarjuna] elucidating how effective and formal causality are "mistaken?" Also, what is the name of that Sutra chapter so that I can look into this?

Astus wrote:

Chapter 20 of the Middle treatise (MMK) analyses sequential and simultaneous causality. Similar reasoning occurs in other chapters, like chapter 11, 14, 16. It is also taught by later masters, like Candrakirti, reasoning like this:

"If it is something existent, what need is there for its production? But if it does not exist, what could be done to it?

If it is both [existent and non-existent], what can be done? And if neither, what can be done?" (<http://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/mipham/four-great-logical-arguments>)

Lankavatara Sutra, 2.31 (tr. Suzuki):

"there is no gradual nor simultaneous rising of existence. Why? Because, Mahamati, if there is a simultaneous rising of existence, there would be no distinction between cause and effect, and there would be nothing to characterise a cause as such. If a gradual rising is admitted, there is no substance that holds together individual signs, which makes gradual rising impossible."

However, none of the above is the denial of everyday common reality where we see causes generating results. I have mentioned this because you said that Dogen believed in simultaneous cause and result, which doesn't actually match normal reality where the cause must always precede the result.

Beatzen said:

"general view" is a strange way to put whatever you're talking about to me, as I have never actually seen a Dogen citation emphasizing "sudden enlightenment" above "gradual" or even a 'special emphasis' on Zazen over other forms of practice. If someone could cite those sources for me, i would greatly appreciate it.

Astus wrote:

<http://www.wwzc.org/sites/default/files/Bendowa-book.pdf>:

"The Buddhas and Thus Come Ones have all simply Transmitted an unfabricated wonderous means of realizing complete and utter Awakening, the Teaching of Wonder. In Transmitting it from a Buddha to a Buddha, its standard is self-enjoyment harmonization. To enter this through sitting up straight in zazen is the main gate."

"The person of zazen unmistakably drops through body and mind, cutting through the myriad distorted views of the past, and realizes essential Buddha Dharma. You thus raise up the work of the Buddhas at numberless practice places of the Buddhas and Thus Come Ones everywhere, causing everyone to have the opportunity of ongoing Awakening, and vigorously uplift the ongoing Buddha Dharma."

"Each moment of zazen is equally wholeness of practice, equally wholeness of realization for this and for that."

"Why do you urge only zazen?"

Answer: Because it is the main gate to the Buddha Dharma - this is my answer to them."

"You just sit idle and do nothing. How can this be a means to Awakening?"

...

Just understand that if sincere students and realized Masters correctly Transmit and receive the subtle Dharma of the Seven Buddhas, its essence manifests, and can be experienced. Those who teach only the words of the Discourses know nothing of this. So stop this doubt and delusion and follow a true Teacher and, through zazen, actualize the self- enjoyment harmonization of the Buddhas."

Beatzen said:

It is not true in Zen that non-grasping is "the only practice." That is a gross oversimplification and comes nowhere near explaining the practices of Shikantaza, or Kinhin.

Neither is it true that simple "non-grasping" constitutes "enlightenment" from a zen perspective.

Astus wrote:

"If you recognize your fundamental mind, this is the fundamental emancipation. And if you attain emancipation, this is the samādhi of prajñā, this is nonthought.

...

Good friends, to be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is for the myriad dharmas to be completely penetrated. To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to see the realms of [all] the buddhas. To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to arrive at the stage of buddhahood."

(Platform Sutra, ch. 2; tr. McRae)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 14th, 2013 at 8:36 PM

Title: Re: The ego and self-esteem

Content:

Astus wrote:

What you let go on the path are the bad things, unwholesome emotions. They are like: greed, anger, ignorance, arrogance, doubt (about the Dharma), envy, deceit, harmfulness, etc. Here is one list from the Theravada tradition:

<http://www.thisismyanmar.com/nibbana/mtinmon3.htm>. Another list under klesa (Mental Disturbances) and upaklesa (Secondary Mental Disturbances) that is used in Mahayana: <http://www.acmuller.net/yogacara/outlines/100dharmas-big5.htm>.

At the same time, you cultivate all the good qualities:

http://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/abhidhamma-in-daily-life_2/d/doc3113.html. Similar list under kusala (Advantageous) in the 100 dharmas collection.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 14th, 2013 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: Nagarjuna's Mūlamadhyamakakārikā: Questions and Comments

Content:

Astus wrote:

Just a side note: Tsongkhapa's madhyamaka is quite unique and differs from the others, usually (a lot) more complicated than madhyamaka is otherwise. As Jnana already did, I also recommend The Center of the Sunlit Sky as a thorough introduction. Other works by Brunnhölzl are also great.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 15th, 2013 at 4:34 PM

Title: Re: Bankei on Zen Practice

Content:

Fu Ri Shin said:

Benkei's realization of the Unborn was sudden and preceded by great exertion. Is he telling us that his own breakthrough was unnecessarily dramatic? Or is the near-death awakening story about him dubious in its historicity?

Astus wrote:

Bankei went through his troubles as he found no teacher who could actually help him, or you can say he had some negative karma he had to get rid of first. As for the veracity of the story, I'm unaware of any studies that investigated it, although I think it doesn't sound like anything unusual or unbelievable.

"All of you are extremely fortunate. When I was a young man, it was different. I couldn't find a good teacher, and being headstrong, I devoted myself from an early age to exceptionally difficult training, experiencing suffering others couldn't imagine. I expended an awful lot of useless effort. The experience of that needless ordeal is deeply engrained in me. It's something I can never forget.

That's why I come here like this day after day, urging you to profit from my own painful example, so you can attain the Dharma easily, while you're seated comfortably on the tatami mats, without all that unnecessary work. You should consider yourselves extremely fortunate, because you won't find a teaching like this anywhere else.

Just as I was foolish and bullheaded when I was young, sure enough, if I tell you about my experiences, some of the young fellows among you will take it into their heads that they can't achieve the Dharma unless they exert themselves as I did. And that would be my fault. But I do want to tell you about them, so let's make this point perfectly clear to the young men. You can attain the Dharma without putting your-self through the arduous struggle I did. I want you to remember that carefully as you listen to what I say." (The Unborn, p. 48, tr. Waddell)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 15th, 2013 at 4:43 PM

Title: Re: Soul split into multiple mosquitoes?

Content:

andyn said:

I just wish I could see if this whole idea was a fraud made up by someone then I can get this monkey off my back, but...

Astus wrote:

Hasn't it been clarified for you already in this thread that multiplication of mind-stream is impossible?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 15th, 2013 at 7:50 PM

Title: Re: Purification of Karmic Obscurations Thread

Content:

Astus wrote:

The idea is summed up in the sayings like "klesa is bodhi" (煩惱即菩提) and "samsara is nirvana" (生死即涅槃). It is to see the emptiness of all, in this case applied to afflictive emotions. Among the four (in Vajrayana five) knowledges/wisdoms it is the knowledge of equality (samatā-jñāna).

In the Samantabhadra Contemplation Sutra the great repentance is taught:

"Because you have now read and recited the Great-vehicle sutras, the buddhas in all directions will preach the law of repentance. The bodhisattva practice is not to cut off binding and driving nor to abide in the ocean of driving. In meditating on one's mind, there is no mind one can seize, except the mind that comes from one's perverted thought. The mind presenting such a form rises from one's false imagination like the wind in the sky, which has no foothold. Such a form of the law neither appears nor disappears. What is sin? What is blessedness? As one's own mind is void of itself, sin and blessedness have no existence. In like manner all the laws are neither fixed nor going toward destruction. If one repents like this, meditating on his mind, there is no mind he can seize. The law also does not dwell in the law. All the laws are emancipation, the truth of extinction, and quiescence. Such an aspect is called the great repentance, the greatly adorned repentance, the repentance of the non-sin aspect, and the destruction of discrimination. He who practices this repentance has the purity of body and mind not fixed in the law [but free] as flowing water. Through each reflection, he will be able to see the Bodhisattva Universal Virtue and the buddhas in all directions." (Threefold Lotus Sutra, p. 223)

There is also the teaching (or more like lecture) Vimalakirti gave to Upali in the 3rd chapter of the Vimalakirti Sutra regarding breaking the precepts and afflictions. From another sutra about instructing bodhisattvas:

"One should speak like this – do not give up your passion, do not fight your aversion, do not clear away your bewilderment, do not liberate yourself from your body, practise the bad things, do not hold back your views, do not be conscious of the bonds [to the worldly things], grasp for the parts of the personality, amass the spheres of sense-perception, move about among the fields of sense-perception, do not leave the stage of fools, frequent the bad, give up the good, do not think of the Buddha, do not reflect on religious teachings, do not give offerings to the congregation of monks, do not take the training upon yourself, do not seek the peacefulness of existence, do not cross over the river [of existence]. This kind of instructions one should teach and give to the bodhisattva in the beginning of his development.

Why? Because this state of the moments of existence and nothing else is their [true] state.

Foolish people explain things in accordance with moments of existence of arising and moments of existence of disappearance. But this sphere of all moments of existence distinguishes itself by being beyond thought-constructions, and understanding the essential character of all these moments of existence in this way is awakening."

(<http://www2.hf.uio.no/polyglotta/index.php?page=fulltext&vid=30&view=fulltext>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 15th, 2013 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: A question on Mahayana philosophical schools

Content:

Astus wrote:

In India there was only Madhyamaka and Yogacara as distinct branches of Mahayana thought, although we could say that they were not too separate. Tathagatagarbha didn't have its own philosophical system there. In East Asian Buddhism there are two other "philosophical" schools, Tiantai and Huayan, and they are strongly connected to the Tathagatagarbha teachings.

Although it is questionable what can be categorised as a "philosophical school". All Buddhist traditions have their own teachings, and all teachings are connected to practices. There is no such thing as a purely theoretical Buddhism, nor is there a purely pragmatic path.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 16th, 2013 at 7:05 PM

Title: Re: Essential Zen Practice

Content:

Beatzen said:

My argument is based on the fact that Dogen really believed that all there really "is" is this moment. period.

That implies, as he said, that causes and their corresponding effects emerge simultaneously in one moment. which is the only time they can emerge (right now). He is saying that causes and effects are immediate and co-emergent. It is actually quite logical. I mention this because it has bearing on why Dogen was so praxis-oriented. He utilizes these kind of thoughts to bolster arguments he makes about "making emptiness" and committing to a truly soteriologically-effective practice.

Astus wrote:

The problem is that if we restrict causality to a single moment there is nothing that can happen in a moment. Happening, movement, change, they all need time, need a sequence. A moment is fixed, it is still and motionless, nothing can emerge or disappear. (see: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Zeno%27s_paradoxes#Arrow_paradox; also chapter 2 of MMK) Thus not only past and future are empty but the present moment too. Both time and causality are illusions, mental fabrications. However, if we are talking about cause and effect it must needs include time, simply because that's what we all experience in this everyday world.

Beatzen said:

But your citation doesn't make me think that there is any doctrinal, set-in-stone, or else logically-sound emphasis on sudden enlightenment. Like I said, "gradually sudden."

Astus wrote:

Zazen is enlightenment itself. What could be more sudden than that? It is directly becoming/being buddha. Some quotes from Dogen and Keizan:

Bendowa:

"When we sit in zazen, through the virtue of the Buddha mudra we release all things, and move beyond limited views of delusion and enlightenment, sages and usual people, and can receive and enjoy great wisdom.

...

Even bodhi and nirvana are nothing but this nature of Awareness. All things and appearances without exception are totally and only this single Awareness and are embraced without disarray. The various Dharma Gates are all equally this single Awareness. This is how the nature of mind is understood in the Buddha Dharma."

Zazen-yojinki:

"Vow to cut off all delusions and realize enlightenment. Just sit without doing anything. This is the essence of the practice of zazen.

...

Although we speak of realization, this realization does not hold to itself as being "realization". This is practice of the supreme samadhi which is the knowing of unborn, unobstructed, and spontaneously arising awareness. It is the door of luminosity which opens out onto the realization of the Buddha, born through the practice of the great ease. This goes beyond the patterns of holy and profane, goes beyond confusion and wisdom. This is the realization of unsurpassed enlightenment as our own nature."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 16th, 2013 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: Contemporary Soto criticism of Yogacara (and Taoism)

Content:

Astus wrote:

If you want to trace back Zen to India, I recommend the following route:

Song Dynasty Chan (this is where everything got a final mature form with all the lineages, transmission texts, rhetoric, etc.) - Yongming Yanshou, who fought against the arising (and winning) Chan style and taught a combined approach, influenced Korean and Tangut Chan, eventually became prominent in China as a Pure Land patriarch and so in Chinese Buddhism in general - the Hongzhou school of Mazu and the Heze school of Zongmi (the sources of mature Song Chan and Yongming's Chan, respectively) - Shenxiu and Shenhui, the so called northern-southern debate

That is for Chan history in big steps. You can find that for Zongmi and Yongming the Huayan teachings had great influence, while for Shenxiu and the Northern School it was more Tiantai influenced in terms of meditation. Shenhui made the radical turn, basically reducing Shenxiu's teachings to sudden enlightenment and focusing on the Diamond Sutra and prajnaparamita teachings in general. However, Shenxiu was first in teaching a new style of Buddhism, which could be called a transformation of Tiantai sudden teachings. So, to eventually get back to India, one should look into the Tiantai school that was influenced by Sanlun, Kumarajiva and early Yogacara texts (but in its tathagatagarbha/dharmadhatu-oriented interpretation); so generally early Chinese Buddhism and prominent texts like Awakening Mahayana Faith.

If you want to skip all of the above then just look at the sutras usually referred to in Chan texts. On the one hand there are "apocryphal" works that already have a "Chan flavour" (e.g. Surangama, Vajrasamadhi, Perfect Enlightenment), and there are Indian works (e.g. Lankavatara, Mahaparinirvana, Vajracchedika, Vimalakirti). Instead of trying to identify some "philosophical school" as the source of Chan, the sutras themselves can serve as a good basis to find the roots. In the pre-Song Chan works there are often some level of apologetics preset where they try to prove how Chan is truly the essence of Mahayana. And there are people like Yongming Yanshou who try to prove to Chan people that the sutras already contain all the teachings they think are "beyond words and letters".

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 16th, 2013 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: Soul split into multiple mosquitoes?

Content:

undefineable said:

Buddhist texts already accept the possibility of the simultaneous experience of multiple first-person perspectives in the case of higher-level Bodhisattvas, though I can't see why this would happen to beings with just a basic level of awareness {It sounds as if it would be more confusing than painful in this case!}

Astus wrote:

There is no mention of simultaneous subjective perspective anywhere as far as I know. The multiplication of body is a basic magical power that practically any being can achieve, however, there is no discussion of the actual details of how that looks like from the personal point of view. Rather, those are all illusory bodies, tricks, not actual beings.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 16th, 2013 at 11:38 PM

Title: Re: Contemporary Soto criticism of Yogacara (and Taoism)

Content:

Astus wrote:

Beatzen,

Dogen is an heir to Song Buddhism (there's little need to specify as "Caodong Chan" as it's not much different from Buddhism in general) and Japanese Tendai. But both are quite far from the Indian sources. There are a couple of Dogen studies you can look into, if you are interested.

Steven Heine: Did Dogen Go to China?: What He Wrote and When He Wrote It

Steven Heine (ed): Dogen: Textual and Historical Studies

Taigen Dan Leighton: Visions of Awakening Space and Time: Dogen and the Lotus Sutra other related studies:

William M. Bodiford: Sōtō Zen in Medieval Japan

Jacqueline I. Stone: Original enlightenment and the transformation of medieval Japanese Buddhism

Robert E. Morrell: Early Kamakura Buddhism: A Minority Report

About the early times of Chan, these two works by John R. McRae are very good:

Seeing through Zen: encounter, transformation, and genealogy in Chinese Chan Buddhism

The Northern School and the Formation of Early Ch'an Buddhism

If you want a better understanding of Chan and its connection to Chinese (and Indian) Buddhism you may look into these books:

Song era:

Peter N. Gregory, Daniel A. Getz, Jr.: Buddhism in the Sung

Morten Schlütter: How Zen Became Zen: The Dispute Over Enlightenment and the Formation of Chan Buddhism in Song-Dynasty China

Early times:

Robert H Sharf: Coming to Terms With Chinese Buddhism: A Reading of the Treasure Store Treatise

Peter N. Gregory: Sudden and Gradual: Approaches to Enlightenment in Chinese Thought

Peter Gregory: Traditions of meditation in Chinese Buddhism

Robert E. Buswell: Paths to liberation: the Mārga and its transformations in Buddhist thought

Robert M. Gimello, Peter Nielsen Gregory: Studies in Ch'an and Hua-yen

On language you might like this:

Youru Wang: Linguistic Strategies in Daoist Zhuangzi and Chan Buddhism: The Other Way of Speaking

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 17th, 2013 at 12:17 AM

Title: Re: Question on a line from a Tibetan passage regarding Tant

Content:

Astus wrote:

This topic is somewhat related to the passage in question (repentance and emptiness): <http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=41&t=12740>.

Regarding the consort statement - sorry for bringing Mahamudra here -, Tilopa's poem says that in case one fails to follow the Mahamudra instructions, one can do the other anuttarayoga practices of breath and karmamudra. In <http://www.keithdowman.net/mahamudra/tilopa.htm>:

"If the mind is dull and you are unable to practice these instructions,
Retaining essential breath and expelling the sap of awareness,
Practising fixed gazes - methods of focussing the mind,
Discipline yourself until the state of total awareness abides.

When serving a karmamudra, the pure awareness of bliss and emptiness will arise:
Composed in a blessed union of insight and means,
Slowly send down, retain and draw back up the bodhichitta,
And conducting it to the source, saturate the entire body.
But only if lust and attachment are absent will that awareness arise."

On the other hand there is <http://www.keithdownman.net/mahamudra/saraha.htm>:

"Obsessed with the joys of sexual embrace
The fool believes he knows ultimate truth;
He is like someone who stands at his door
And, flirting, talks about sex."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 17th, 2013 at 3:16 AM

Title: Re: Question on a line from a Tibetan passage regarding Tant

Content:

Konchog1 said:

I don't understand his metaphor...

Astus wrote:

Sexual embrace is as close to the ultimate truth as talking about sex to actually doing it.

The same passage in Guenther's translation:

"For the delights of kissing the deluded crave
Declaring it to be the ultimately real--
Like a man who leaves his house and standing at the door
Asks a woman for reports of sensual delights."

In the Dohakosha he writes:

"For those unaware of the nature of everything,
Great bliss is attained in sexual union;
As if thirst-ridden, chasing after water in mirage,
They die from thirst, and do they ever drink the sky-water?
Whoever frolics in this bliss,
Living between vajra and lotus,
What for? This has no capacity for truth,
So {where} in the three worlds will you be complete?"

(Dreaming the Great Brahmin, p. 166)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 17th, 2013 at 5:11 PM

Title: Re: Is Buddhist "Sunya" the same as Hindu "Nirguna" ?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Emptiness (sunyata) in Buddhism means that things don't have a self-nature (svabhava). Emptiness is not a thing or being, it is the fact that things themselves are dependently arisen without a substance. So, it is not like Nirguna Brahman and/or the Tao at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 17th, 2013 at 11:15 PM

Title: Buddhism and Enlightenment

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Enlightenment is man's emergence from his self-imposed nonage. Nonage is the inability to use one's own understanding without another's guidance. This nonage is self-imposed if its cause lies not in lack of understanding but in indecision and lack of courage to use one's own mind without another's guidance.

...

I have emphasized the main point of the enlightenment--man's emergence from his self-imposed nonage--primarily in religious matters... Above all, nonage in religion is not only the most harmful but the most dishonorable."

(<http://www.columbia.edu/acis/ets/CCREAD/etscc/kant.html>)

Questions:

How do the ideas of Enlightenment affect our attitude toward Buddhism?

Are we prone to submission to authority or to independent thinking?

How much freedom is there for a Buddhist practitioner in the matters of Dharma?

Is Buddhism already Enlightened or does it need to be reformed?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 19th, 2013 at 3:10 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Enlightenment

Content:

Astus wrote:

How do the ideas of Enlightenment affect our attitude toward Buddhism?

While there is no clear definition of what those ideas are, I use Kant's short essay as a convenient reference here. The idea of freedom from sacred/traditional dogma, the superiority of reason, the individual as a capable thinker - these are among the outstanding novelties of the Enlightened view. The world we now live in reflects in many ways the manifestation of those ideas, like universal education, freedom of speech and religion and the general use of scientific methods. Buddhism in the West appeared as a rational philosophy - even its status as a religion is debated - and something that is in harmony with modern democratic, humanistic and scientific values.

The religious, magical and ritual elements of Buddhism are usually neglected by Westerners, instead Buddhism is taught as a personal path that emphasises inner reflection, peace, rational investigation and meditation.

Thanissaro Bhikkhu writes in the section on iddhipada (in <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/authors/thanissaro/wings/part2.html#part2-d>),

Because of their association with supranormal powers, the bases of power have generally been slighted in Western writings on Buddhism. If we count the five strengths as identical with the five faculties, the bases of power are the only set in the Wings to Awakening that has not yet been the subject of a book in the English language. The situation in Asia, however, is very different. There, the bases of power have been extrapolated from their specific context and are frequently cited as guides to success in general.

If you look through the topics on this forum it is hard to find any thread where the magical powers are discussed, especially not as actual attainments of the ordinary practitioners. Even the values of different actions in terms of merit and demerit are rarely talked about, not to mention the possible retribution in future lives. It may be that many accept the possibility of supernormal powers and other worlds, these things are not considered the core aspects of Buddhism. At the same time, especially Mahayana and Vajrayana texts, are full of extraordinary and wondrous events where buddhas appear in the sky and simple laymen conjure visions of other worlds.

Are we prone to submission to authority or to independent thinking?

Although it is a common enough response to "ask a teacher" (i.e. neither you nor me are good enough to even guess), the majority of Western Buddhist communities are independent from any Asian institution, however, it is actually normal in Buddhism that traditionally lacks a central hierarchy. Western Buddhist teachers who lack "correct transmission" are often disregarded as incompetent or even as charlatans. Besides the issue of authorisation, there is also the idea of a gap between "scholars" (pandita) and "practitioners" (yogin). Since Buddhism is understood as an inner path, an experiential enterprise, there is little use of books and studies on such a path. If people want enlightenment they shouldn't just go to the library (or a website) and study, but rather they should visit an enlightened teacher and do lot of meditation practice. This attitude defines what kind of Buddhism is popular in the West. People go to a Dharma centre to meditate and not to be instructed about the finer points of the sutras and shastras. They rather spend $600 for a five-day retreat with a well known guru than to buy the four-volume translation of the Abhisamayalamkara with commentaries for $345.

From an Enlightenment perspective, everybody should be able to study the Buddha's teachings and arrive at correct conclusions. The tendency is, however, more Romantic, where reason has almost no role, and one should follow ancient traditions.

How much freedom is there for a Buddhist practitioner in the matters of Dharma?

Can we accept that an ordinary human being can understand the Dharma? And can he do that on his own? What if his interpretation doesn't agree with another's? If the Sakyapa view disagrees with the Gelugpa, that's all right, since they are both respected traditions. If Mr Jones disagrees with His Holiness the Dalai Lama, well, who is this Mr Jones? Because the emphasis is on the person, the teachings are valued by the reputation of the teacher instead of the actual content presented. Although we can say that everybody is free to believe whatever they like, without the proper pedigree they are not taken seriously. Teachers are assessed not by what they teach but by who they are, in fact, you can't even measure a teacher since you are not a master yourself.

Is Buddhism already Enlightened or does it need to be reformed?

Since it is already accepted that Buddhism is in harmony with the modern ideas of rationality there is no need to question that. Buddhism is as good as it is. That is, as we have transformed it to our expectations. No magic, no philosophy, but only the inner realisation taught by proper masters. Because the thought that it is Enlightened is taken for granted, we are free to be Romantics. Thus, there is the illusion of freedom of thought, of individuality and science-friendliness, and with that the opposite is happily embraced.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 19th, 2013 at 8:13 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Enlightenment

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jeeprs,

Your arguments against positivism are fine, however, it came after Enlightenment, as a possible consequence, but definitely not the only one. The majority of the Enlightenment thinkers were at least believers in God and some devout Christians. And just as you wrote about finding a unity in religions, some of them, like Leibniz and Voltaire, imagined a unified and universal religion. So, just to be clear, Enlightenment ideas are generally not materialists.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 19th, 2013 at 8:18 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Enlightenment

Content:

tobes said:

I think it was Thurman who made the argument that without Kant, westerners would not be able to 'get' Madhyamika - and I agree.

There are of course enormous tensions particularly in the Varjayana, between the Kantian injunction to saphere aude with the injunction to follow whatever the guru says. Does one go with ones own understanding or does one forsake it on faith that the guru knows more?

Astus wrote:

Or perhaps it is because of using Kant and other Western philosophers to interpret teachings like Madhyamaka that people - at least those who are somewhat philosophically educated - misunderstand Nagarjuna.

Yes, that tension is one of the big issues I'm trying to look into here.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 19th, 2013 at 7:29 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Enlightenment

Content:

tobes said:

I took Thurman's point to be: not that one needs to explicitly adopt a Kantian epistemology to get Madhyamika, but rather, that before Kant 'the west' per se would not be able to understand the middle way.

I think he's quite right.

Astus wrote:

Nagarjuna could be interpreted quite well in the context of Plato and Aristotle. Madhyamaka is a good criticism of both abhidharma and the idealist-substantialist philosophies.

Madhyamaka might be popular among Western philosophers because it is viewed as logic and linguistics, a methodology instead of an actual statement, a counter-metaphysics. It another thing about Buddhism that many like to think of the Buddha as someone who labelled metaphysical questions meaningless/unanswerable, so it leaves our precious presumptions about the world intact.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 19th, 2013 at 8:09 PM

Title: Re: Is the attainment of Buddhahood the end of subjectivity?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Based on how Shakyamuni appears in the scriptures, he was not only aware of his life after his birth but also all the previous lives he lived. Apparently he did not cease to be a person.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 20th, 2013 at 3:25 AM

Title: Re: Is Zazen described in Sutras?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here's a list of early meditation sutras that existed in China:

<http://www.dhammadownload.com/viewtopic.php?f=29&t=13357>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 20th, 2013 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: True Pure Land and Parinirvana

Content:

Astus wrote:

The idea of "parinirvana" is generally not upheld by any Mahayana school but only as a skilful means, since buddhas remain helping sentient beings till the end of samsara. This is true for both the Jodoshu and Jodoshinshu as far as I know. Also note that one of the names of Amida is Infinite Life, i.e. he doesn't just "nirvana away" any time soon.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 21st, 2013 at 6:20 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Enlightenment

Content:

tobes said:

The obvious objection might be something like this: if true wisdom requires advanced meditative insight, doesn't that insight naturally have more epistemic truth and authority than someone who stays true to their own understanding, but lacks that insight? In that case, might sticking with ones own understanding be nothing more than sticking with ones own lack of insight?

Astus wrote:

How can you verify another's insight? By their teachings and conversing with them (<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/an/an04/an04.192.than.html>). The teaching should be matched with the canonical texts

(<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.16.1-6.vaji.html#fnt-37>) and should bear the eight qualities

(<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/an/an08/an08.053.than.html>; also: <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/study/recognizing.html>). That is, the only thing one can rely on is our understanding of the Dharma.

The above is of course what an intellectual person can agree with, something that is in harmony with the "Kantian injunction". In fact, however, people simply rely on faith based on temporary emotional moods most of the times. This results in statements about what they felt in the presence of the teacher, how they have a special connection, how the teacher inspires them, etc. Another thing that is likely thought of as a reliable source is reputation and hearsay. If they are told that such and such a teacher is magnificent, authentic, real, enlightened, then naturally that's how one starts to view that teacher.

While there is the idea that Buddhism is rational and not at all like other religions, there are many methods Buddhism has to emotionally convince people about its usefulness and superiority. The very claim that Buddhism is rational is such a tool to attract followers.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 21st, 2013 at 8:07 PM

Title: Re: True Pure Land and Parinirvana

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jodoshinshu.

From <http://www.amidanet.com/kgss-f.htm>:

If, when I attain Buddhahood, my life-span should be limited, even to the extent of a hundred thousand kotis of nayutas of kalpas, may I not attain perfect Enlightenment. (The 13th Vow - the Vow of Immeasurable Life)

The life of the Buddha of Infinite Life is so long that it is impossible for anyone to calculate it. To give an illustration, let us suppose that all the innumerable sentient beings in the worlds of the ten quarters were reborn in human form and that every one became a shravaka or pratyekabuddha. Even if they assembled in one place, concentrated their thoughts, and exercised the power of their wisdom to the utmost to reckon the length of the Buddha's life, even after a thousand million kalpas they still would not reach its limit.

(Fulfillment of the 13th Vows - the Larger Sutra)

Since Amida attained Buddhahood, ten kalpas have passed;

His life-span is indeed beyond measure.

(T'an-luan's Hymns in Praise of Amida Buddha)

From <http://www.scribd.com/doc/134106836/The-48th-Vows-of-Amida-Buddha>:

(<https://amida-ji-retreat-temple-romania.blogspot.com/2012/04/short-explanation-of-13th-vow-infinite.html>)

This vow simply means that his transcendent manifestation(Sambhogakaya body or Dharmakaya as compassionate means) will last forever for the benefit of all beings.

...

Amida Buddha as an Enlightened Person with his transcendent body, will last eternally as the 13th Vow promises. Even “a hundred thousand kotis of nayutas of kalpas” is still limited time when measuring the life span of Amida, so this symbolical number is mentioned again to suggest the infinite and impossible to calculate life of this Buddha’s body.

Jodoshu.

From Honen's Commentary on the Three Sutras of Pure Land Buddhism (Promise of Amida Buddha, p. 77):

Moreover, in order to provide eternal deliverance for sentient beings through the essential vow, Amida Buddha vowed that his lifespan will be immeasurable. This is the thirteenth vow. To summarize, while the vow of immeasurable light was designed to reach all sentient beings throughout space; the vow of infinite life was designed to benefit all sentient beings throughout time.

Chinese Pure Land.

From <http://www.ymba.org/books/mind-seal-buddhas/explanation-text/main-portion/description-wonders-amitabha>:

infinite life extends through time and reaches through past, present, and future ... Because sentient beings and Buddhas are inherently equal, those who invoke the name of Amitabha will be no different from him either in their light or in their life span. ... Given the truth of infinite life, the people in the Land of Ultimate Bliss are in the position that they are certain of attaining complete enlightenment in a single lifetime, and will not be reborn in different forms.

...

The life span of Amitabha Buddha is infinite, and here when the sutra just speaks of ten eons, this is just a provisional way of teaching. In fact Amitabha's time has been endless, and he has urged, is urging, and will urge all the sentient beings of the past, present, and future to quickly seek birth in the Pure Land, share in the infinite life of the Buddhas, and accomplish this all in one lifetime.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 22nd, 2013 at 4:24 PM

Title: Re: True Pure Land and Parinirvana

Content:

sinweiy said:

measureless, limitless Asankhyeya kalpas are actually number units of Buddhism.

1 Asankhyeya = 10^{59}

so we see, Asankhyeya, measureless, limitless is only the first three! "cannot be said, cannot be said" is last.

Astus wrote:

"even after a thousand million kalpas they still would not reach its limit"

If there were actual numbers that could be given in measurable time as you just did, it wouldn't take long at all to count it. By the way, what gives you these numbers, what is your source? Even in the Abhidharmakosha there is no actual number given for a kalpa that could be reduced to human years.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 22nd, 2013 at 4:58 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Enlightenment

Content:

Jnana said:

I think if we look at the sūtras and śāstras it's quite clear that they place significant emphasis on relying on the instructions of a learned and wise spiritual friend.

Astus wrote:

It should also be noted that the definition of such a good friend lies in that he is a learnt and experienced person who happily shares the Dharma. Like an older monastic (upadhyaya), or any sangha member who fits the criteria. The point is, being a teacher is defined by apparent achievements and not on recognition by a lineage or tradition. This is somewhat contrary to the prevalent notion in the West about teachers.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 22nd, 2013 at 5:29 PM

Title: Re: Mind and appearances

Content:

Astus wrote:

The point I wanted to make there is that as long as we try to understand Buddhism from a materialist-objectivist perspective (as used in science and taught in schools) there is little chance of a comprehensive knowledge. The source of information in Buddhism is meditative investigation and experiences. It is not unlike other religious and spiritual traditions in this sense. You will never see supernormal phenomena with the fleshly eyes. The divine eye is needed for all the "special effects" to appear. Practically that means one has to develop one's meditation and have faith in the teachings about other realms. Then it is possible to see gods, spirits and even buddhas.

Also, even one's everyday experience is defined by the mind that perceives it. It is common knowledge that different people experience the seemingly same event in different ways. We have a lot in common as humans, especially when we speak the same language and live in the same culture. But there's still enough difference among individuals to make understanding each other a difficult task. Our differences lies in our attachments, in what we like and what we dislike. Attachments are the habitual energy, the karma. Thus karma creates our daily experiences and it is what defines every birth too.

If we look at what we are, we can immediately see that thoughts and emotions are not the same as "thoughts out there" that we perceive by the five bodily sense-faculties. Mind is immaterial. It's impossible to confirm the immateriality of the mind by objective investigation, looking out there for a mind. In our subjective experience it is obvious. So, this is the first important step in understanding Buddhism. If we believe that mind is simply matter then the Dharma makes no sense. Once we can change our perspective it becomes quite easy to understand.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 22nd, 2013 at 5:37 PM

Title: Re: Apratishtita Nirvana

Content:

Astus wrote:

As I theorise it, non-abiding nirvana is based on nirvana with residue with the difference in emphasising that such residue (i.e. the aggregates) are empty so there is no need to get rid of them, and that's why the Mahayana criticism of the "sravaka nirvana" as nihilism.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 22nd, 2013 at 5:43 PM

Title: Re: Precious Human Birth

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'd like to add that, although less likely, gods can also attain different levels of enlightenment as shown in both the Nikayas and Mahayana sutras.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 22nd, 2013 at 9:23 PM

Title: Re: Shingon and Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Jikan said:

Does anyone have evidence of an intact transmission of esoteric Buddhism strictly within China's borders?

Astus wrote:

Depends on how you define "esoteric Buddhism". If as an independent school, it's probably never existed. If as certain practices, there are quite a few that are part of the yearly and even daily ceremonies in Buddhist monasteries.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 22nd, 2013 at 11:37 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Enlightenment

Content:

Jnana said:

There are likely a number of reasons for this, not the least of which is that many of them have received significant education and training in these matters.

Astus wrote:

I think probably because they have the living lamrim system, unlike East Asian Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 23rd, 2013 at 6:13 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Mahamudra experiences

Content:

Astus wrote:

An interesting question, to give the practical differences. As for all the theoretical things, there is already a thread: <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=100&t=6459>.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 23rd, 2013 at 5:57 PM

Title: Re: True Pure Land and Parinirvana

Content:

Astus wrote:

sinweiy,

On one hand, neither kalpa nor the modifying "numbers" are fixed. Here is a very nice summary with a chart at the end:

<http://www.drbachinese.org/vbs/publish/462/vbs462p042.pdf>. On the other hand, both the sutras and the commentaries state that Amita's lifespan is not limited by any temporal measurement. He is there as long as there are sentient beings to save, this is the essence of the 13th vow. While there are different interpretations of Sukhavati and Amitabha Buddha, several Pure Land teachers - including the Jodo and Jodoshin schools - view his life as literally unbound and infinite. Xing Guang in "The Concept of the Buddha" (p 168) explains briefly how this idea of infinity (of life and light) is very much based on Buddhist teachings (from Mahasamghika in this case) and not other sources as some thought (from Zoroastrian mainly). Ven. Xuanhua connects <http://www.cttbusa.org/amitabhacommentary/amitabha13.htm> the infinite lifespan to the permanent quality of nirvana.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 23rd, 2013 at 10:25 PM

Title: Re: Question about "location of mind"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Not knowing the location of the mind means that if you search in your personal experience for something that is your mind you don't find such a thing. This is first hand experience.

The scientific theories about how the brain functions and what is its relation to the mind is irrelevant here. Still, if you want to go into that area in the proper way, you should look at what is called the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Mind%E2%80%93body_problem in Western philosophy. No final answers are promised.

You should also know that the mind-body problem doesn't actually exist in Buddhism because it is resolved from the beginning by the Buddha teaching the five aggregates.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 23rd, 2013 at 11:31 PM

Title: Re: Question about "location of mind"

Content:

Astus wrote:

You are trying to fit a meditation instruction into a scientific idea. If you put aside your previous concepts about human biology and follow the steps as given, it works just fine. On the other hand, if you first want to engage in an intellectual investigation of the nature of mind, that's also possible, but not through Dzogchen teachings. Supposing that you want to stay in the Tibetan Buddhist structure, you should start with studying a lamrim text as an introduction and then go for learning pramana (epistemology). You may also just visit any qualified lama and debate about the matter.

For example, Shantarakshita's Tattvasamgraha deals with the problem of mind and matter to some extent. One of his reasoning is that unless direct correlation can be shown between physical and mental phenomena it cannot be established that mind is based on matter. Since the scientific research of the brain has not established that, there is no actual proof for the brain being the same as the mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 24th, 2013 at 3:15 AM

Title: Re: Question about "location of mind"

Content:

Astus wrote:

To show that the problem of mind being the body and the body producing the mind has been known before, here are some stanzas from the Tattvasangraha, ch. 22 (tr. Ganganatha Jha). Of course, the reasoning might seem strange, because on one hand it is Indian, and on the other because it was written in the 8th century.

Some arguments of the Lokayatikas (i.e. materialists):

The body, the cognition, the sense-organs and the rest being destroyed every moment, they could not pertain to the other world ; and there is nothing else that is admitted (by you, Buddhists). Hence consciousness must be regarded as produced from, or manifested by, certain material substances, just like fermented acids, liquors and such things.

The names 'body', 'sense-organ' and so on are applied to particular combinations of earth and other material substances; there is no other reality than these.

...

From this it follows that the right view is that consciousness proceeds from the body itself which is equipped with the five life-breaths prana, apana and the rest; as has been declared by Kambalashvatara.

To assert that consciousness resides in the foetus, etc. Is sheer audacity; nothing can be cognised at that stage, as the sense-organs are not there ; and consciousness can have no form other than the cognition of things ; it is for this same reason that there is no consciousness in the state of swoon, nor can consciousness exist there in the form of a latent potency ; because no potencies can exist without a substratum; and as there is no soul that could be that substratum of consciousness, the body is the only substratum possible for it. So that at the end, when the body has ceased to exist, wherein could the consciousness subsist ?

Some refutations from the Buddhist point of view:

The idea of the body being the cause (of cognition) has been already discarded, on the ground of its involving the possibility of all cognitions appearing simultaneously, on account of there being no other (contributory) causes. As a matter of fact, it is found that cognition in the form of remembrance, affection and so forth (which are cognitions) actually proceeds from pleasurable experiences and pleasant reminiscences of the same [which also are cognitions] ; and this cannot be denied. Then again, it is also seen that deterioration and improvement in one's later cognitions are brought about by deterioration and improvement in the practice of the learning and arts. It is also seen that when the functioning of the mind is defective, there is no apprehension of other things. On account of all these facts, the idea of cognition proceeding from cognition cannot be objected to.

...

If the cognition is of the same nature as the body, then why is not the consciousness (cognition) of love, hatred, etc. Not perceived by others as clearly as the body is ? In fact, cognition is cognised by the cogniser himself alone, while the body is cognised by himself as well as by others. Things that are so cognised are always distinct, e.G. Colic pain and the dramatic actor.

This reason is not admissible against the doctrine that * cognition (consciousness) alone exists ' ; as (under that view) what is cognised (by the cognition) is the appearance of itself ; as in the case of the man with defective vision. Further, cognition is always found to be destroyed immediately after appearance ; if then, the body with the cognition is of the same nature as the cognition, why is it not regarded as momentary ?

...

There is no audacity in asserting that there is consciousness in the foetus ; even though the sense-organs have not appeared in it, why cannot cognition be there in fact the assertion that does involve audacity is that all cognition proceeds from sense-organs and objects; because the contrary is found to be the case during dreams. In reality, cognition is apprehended also in a form which is distinct from that of the object, as is found in the case of swoon. From this it is clear that consciousness can be there in the foetus.

Consciousness is not present in the foetus merely in the form of a potency ; the view held is that consciousnesses are present there in their actual form. Whence do you derive the idea that there is no consciousness during sleep and swoon and such other conditions ? If it be argued that " the idea is obtained from the absence of consciousness ", then, the question is how has this absence been cognised ? In case your idea proceeds thus " we do not cognise any consciousness at the time ", then that itself proves the presence of consciousness at the time. It might be argued that " if consciousness is present during the said states, then why is there no remembrance of it on awakening, etc. ? " this fact (of non-remembrance) is not effective (in refuting our view) j the absence of remembrance is due to the absence of vividness and other conditions (in the consciousness) as in the case of the consciousness of the newborn infant.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 24th, 2013 at 6:14 AM

Title: Re: Question about "location of mind"

Content:

jeeprs said:

I agree with the statements in the Brihadaranyaka Upanisad about http://www.swami-krishnananda.org/brdup/brhad_III-04.html. Briefly this is that you cannot know the knower of knowing, you cannot see the seer of seeing. The hand cannot grasp itself nor the eye see itself.

Astus wrote:

Unless you are putting this argument forward as a skilful means to ease the frantic search, stating that the mind cannot be known is contrary to both Zen and Dzogchen. There is a form of self-awareness that is denied in Buddhism, but there is another kind that is affirmed.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 24th, 2013 at 7:05 AM

Title: Re: Question about "location of mind"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Zhihua Yao: The Buddhist Theory of Self-Cognition - discusses self-awareness (svasamvedana) from the early schools up to yogacara.

Paul Williams: The Reflexive Nature of Awareness - looks into Shantarakshita's and Mipham's arguments

Also, Brunnhölzl's "In Praise of Dharmadhatu" contains good sources and explanations about the different ways self-awareness is used.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 24th, 2013 at 4:53 PM

Title: Re: Question about "location of mind"

Content:

jeeprs said:

So I don't know why you're taking issue with what I have said here, as far as I am concerned it is totally orthodox.

Astus wrote:

Jnana has kindly answered the issue, so here I just add a little. The only reason I took up your post is because you stated that the mind cannot be known. It is actually a part of the instructions that not finding anything doesn't mean that one is incapable of knowing, rather it is the fact of not finding that shows its emptiness. This kind of instruction is not only Dzogchen and Mahamudra but also found in Madhyamaka and the sutras (Dogen also has a chapter in the Shobogenzo on it (at least on the term "unfindable", usually translated to English as "unobtainable", like in the Heart Sutra): Shin fukatoku 心不可得).

From Thrangu Rinopche's "A Guide to Mahamudra Meditation" (p. 33; <http://s151421314.onlinehome.us/nbp/docs/PDF/7.%20Guide%20to%20Mahamudra.pdf>):

"Not finding anything, you initially think that you have somehow failed. Either you misunderstood how to look, or you just haven't looked enough. But in fact this is not true. The reason you didn't find anything is that the nature of your mind is utter insubstantiality, which is why, according to the Buddha, it is empty. To thoroughly comprehend this emptiness, we need to experience this directly in meditation."

Also, in chapter 7 of Thrangu Rinpoche's commentary on the 9th Karmapa's Ocean of Definitive Meaning the fact of not finding anything is discussed.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 24th, 2013 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: Question about "location of mind"

Content:

rachmiel said:

Advaitans argue (passionately, unyieldingly!) that brahman cannot be refuted. Christians have thousands of pages of scripture explaining why their God/Truth is the only true God/Truth. Ditto for every religion and most (all?) scientific disciplines. Why should I -- anyone? -- believe any of these assertions? (I don't.) I see them all as metaphors, stories. Some no doubt come closer to modelling reality than others, but stories are just ... stories. Mind, awareness, consciousness, enlightenment ... compelling metaphors, not the real thing. But I digress ...

Astus wrote:

Very true. Buddhism has volumes of arguments to prove how the Buddhadharma is true and the others are wrong. If you go that way, it is called the path of the pandita. Those who already possess some faith but lack intellectual interest can go on the path of the yogi, following the instructions of a teacher. However, Buddhism is not that black and white. Everybody studies some scriptures and everybody does some meditation. Study and meditation has to strengthen and confirm each other. It's like the two ways of understanding something: by inference and by direct perception. So, the teachers say that it is very important to gain personal verification of the Dharma through one's own experience. It means that you can put the teachings to the test in your own life. And the proof is found in the decreasing of suffering and the increasing of wholesome qualities. That is, there is a clear benefit one can derive from the teachings of the Buddha on every level. And that benefit, that blessing is what makes Buddhism a worthwhile endeavour.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 25th, 2013 at 12:24 AM

Title: Re: Question about "location of mind"

Content:

rachmiel said:

I'm much more of a theorist than a practitioner. But I'm challenging that, am close to establishing a daily practice, on the cushion (actually, cross-legged on a straight-back armchair). It's not easy! Pondering comes very naturally for me, direct experience (meditation) not.

Astus wrote:

If you allow me, I'd like to recommend that instead of jumping for non-conceptual methods (i.e. Dzogchen), start with a more systematic approach. I say that because vipashyana as analytical meditation can very effectively remove conceptual attachments.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 26th, 2013 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: Question about "location of mind"

Content:

rachmiel said:

Which would you recommend: vipassana (which I did regularly a few years back) or kusulu-type "resting in being" meditation? I'm more keen on the latter, because it's new to me. But I'm still not sure, after all this time, what exactly "resting in being" means. Maybe I should mix it up, vipassana followed by kusulu 10-20 minutes each kind of thing?

Astus wrote:

You have to find it out for yourself, because only you can tell what works and what doesn't. First of all, in order to be able to do proper vipashyana, you have to practise yourself in shamata first, otherwise the whole thing is not meditation just thinking about this and that. There are many good manuals you can follow, more detailed than Vivid Awareness, or you go to a Dharma centre and follow their programme. Analytical meditation is meant to ease your mind, to help you get over your doubts about the truth of the Dharma. So the second thing to do is to learn the relevant teachings that you use for your investigation in meditation. Although the important points are covered in most manuals, it is useful to comprehend the details of such things as the five aggregates, the eighteen dhatus and the various forms of reasoning applied (as in Madhyamaka). Then if you are through with the analytical part in a session you finish by resting in the conclusion that is emptiness, thus the final result is no different from directly going for non-conceptual resting, except that this time you sorted out your doubts instead of just putting them aside for a short time.

If you don't know where to look for meditation instructions, here are some options (based on Madhyamaka):

Kamalashila: Bhavanakrama (commentaries are also available by HHDL, Thrangu Rinpoche, etc.)

Tsongkhapa: Lamrim chenmo

Gen Lamrimpa: How to Practice Shamatha Meditation; How to Realize Emptiness

Thrangu Rinpoche: The Middle-way Meditation Instructions

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 26th, 2013 at 7:39 AM

Title: Re: Question about "location of mind"

Content:

rachmiel said:

Please help me understand the Buddhist takes on these key terms. I'm hoping they can be "defined" in just a few words, i.e. the essence sans ornamentation ... ?

mind: ...

consciousness: ...

awareness: ...

Astus wrote:

Definitions are usually found in abhidharma works. That's what they were written for.

Generally, consciousness means the six sensory consciousnesses and the four mental aggregates. The below one has a Yogacara take on it. (the sanskrit is a bit garbled because of copy-paste)

What is the definition of the aggregate of consciousness (vijñānaskandhavyavasthāna)? It is the mind (citta), the mental organ (manas) and also consciousness (Vijñāna).

And now, what is the mind (citta)? It is the store consciousness of all the seeds (sarvabījakaṃ alayavijñānaṃ) impregnated by the residues (vasanāparibhāvita) of the aggregates (skandha), elements (dhatu) and spheres (āyatana). The result-consciousness (vipakavijnana) and the appropriating consciousness (adanavijnana) are the same thing also, because of the accumulation of those residues (tad vasanacitata).

What is the mental organ (manas)? It is the object of the store-consciousness (alayavijnanalambana) which always participates in the nature of self-notion {manyanatmaka} associated with the four defilements, viz. the view of "self" (atmadrsti), love of "self" (atmasneba), pride of "I am" {asmimana} and ignorance (avidya). And this is present everywhere (sawatraga), in favorable (kusala), unfavorable (akusala) and neutral {avyakrta} states, except in the case of one facing the Path {margasammukhlbhava}, the attainment of cessation (nirodbasamapatti), the stage of the learned (asaiksabbumiV5 and also the consciousness that has just this instant ceased among the six kinds of consciousness.

What is consciousness (Vijnana)? It consists of six groups of consciousness: visual, auditory, olfactory, gustatory, tactile and mental consciousnesses.

(Abhidharmasamuccaya, p. 21-22; tr. Boin-Webb)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 26th, 2013 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: True Pure Land and Parinirvana

Content:

plwk said:

Now you do...

Astus wrote:

That is, sutras propagating Amitabha say he lives indefinitely, those about Avalokitesvara say he will take over Sukhavati. So the answer lies in defining which sutras one regards as definitive. For the Pure Land schools it is the former.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 27th, 2013 at 4:57 PM

Title: Re: True Pure Land and Parinirvana

Content:

sinweiy said:

Sambhogakayas do have a beginning but do not have an ending. it's the beginning of the very first time a person attained Buddhahood(a.k.a Source). One attained the Bliss body, there after, the bliss is forever, we do not say when one attained Buddhahood, they will become deluded again. Dharmakaya, Truth body is the the one without beginning non ending. nirmanakaya always have a beginning and ending, on going cycle.

Astus wrote:

And that's why there was a debate regarding whether Amitabha is nirmanakaya or sambhogakaya. Shandao said it's the latter, consequently there is no end of Amitabha's presence to save all beings.

LastLegend said:

My reasoning is this Pure Land and manifestations of Amitabha are conditioned relatively to Samsara that they are merely there to help sentient beings. They are still subject to change. We must remember that "lives" and anything that takes "forms" are subject to change. But does not mean nothing exists in a nihilistic sense. Apparently things come to into being due to conditions, and depart due to conditions ending. Where does Buddha go after Parinirvana?

Astus wrote:

Sukhavati is not within samsara, see the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ten_spiritual_realms. Although there is change since beings come and go, etc., similarly to the fourth dhyana related heavens and above, it is not destroyed by anything. Parinirvana is related to nirmanakaya buddhas only, and it is only a display to urge beings for liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 28th, 2013 at 6:59 AM

Title: Re: True Pure Land and Parinirvana

Content:

LastLegend said:

Astus, Pure Land is there to liberate sentient beings. If there are no sentient beings to liberate, will Pure Land be there?

Astus wrote:

Of course, when there are no sentient beings there is no use of buddhas either. Alas, the number of beings to be liberated is endless.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 28th, 2013 at 5:11 PM

Title: Re: True Pure Land and Parinirvana

Content:

sinweiy said:

Amitabha is an Emanation body; the corresponding Enjoyment body is Amitayus, "infinite life"-propitiated for longevity; the Dharma body is Ananta-prabha, "boundless illumination."

Astus wrote:

That's not the same as what is taught in the Pure Land schools, but the Tibetan interpretation.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 28th, 2013 at 10:51 PM

Title: Re: True Pure Land and Parinirvana

Content:

Astus wrote:

Who is this Rev. Anraku you quote from, what is the source?

Here is a short series of answers regarding Amitabha from a Shinshu perspective:

<http://www.nembutsu.info/standard/amida.htm>

And the Jodoshu view: <http://www.jsri.jp/English/Pureland/LINEAGE/budbod.html>

As for the word Amituo/Amida (阿彌陀 / 阿弥陀), it is just the transliteration of the Sanskrit word "amita":

amita 2 mfn. (3 %{\mA}) , unmeasured , boundless , infinite RV. &c. ; without a certain measure S3Br. Sus3r. &c. ; (%{a4-mitam}) ind. immensely RV. iv , 16 , 5.

It is related to words like "measure" and "metre" via the <https://en.wiktionary.org/wiki/Appendix:Proto-Indo-European/med- root>.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 29th, 2013 at 4:38 PM

Title: Re: What state is this?

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is good not to get caught up in things, that's what non-clinging is about, and it requires mindfulness. Correct mindfulness in Zen is sometimes called the sword that kills and gives life, because you know when to let go and when to get hold of something. It is wisdom, discerning good and bad. While sitting on the cushion it's OK to let everything come and go, when you get up there are things to take care of, people to talk to, etc. So if you are mindful on the cushion you can bring that to all activities. Therefore, if you want to check your practice, see how you act in different circumstances, how thoughts and emotions sway you or if you are the captain of the ship.

When sitting in meditation you should check if there is any clinging to whatever state you think you are in. If you see how feelings and thoughts come up, do you imagine yourself to be the witness observing all this? Do you have thoughts about what you observe occurring and passing? Is there a gap between subject and object? If there is a gap, if you are the witness and you judge or consider occurrences, that is the beginning of watching the mind. If there aren't really any thoughts about phenomena but you are the watcher, that is still holding on to an imaginary self. If there is no position that you rely on and doing meditation is nothing special at all, and there is awareness, it is indeed proper Zen practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 29th, 2013 at 5:29 PM

Title: Re: True Pure Land and Parinirvana

Content:

sinweiy said:

he used to be from esangha i met last time, studying Japanese PL. that's his email.
although i am not into Jap PL.

using the triple bodies that all Buddhas have. why must it be a credit of Tibetan interpretation?

i was taught by MCK, that there are 3 kind of gate in Buddhism. Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha.

Astus wrote:

In that case I think I know who Rev. Anraku was (died a few years ago), and he wasn't really a representative of any actual Japanese Pure Land school, plus he had some peculiar ideas about Buddhism.

Amitabha Buddha as he appears in his land is sambhogakaya. Of course, just as every buddha, there is dharmakaya, however, it is generally irrelevant for the Pure Land path. Dharmakaya is simply the ultimate reality, and for ordinary deluded beings it is imperceptible. You can see that briefly explained on the Shinshu explanation regarding Amitabha I linked in my previous post.

What I referred to as Tibetan is the idea that Amitabha is nirmanakaya and Amitayus is sambhogakaya. In East Asia the two names are not differentiated that way, they are names for the same buddha. So, when they say Amituo or Amida, it stands for both names.

As for MCK's categorisation of different Buddhist paths, that's his interpretation. In Jodoshu and Shinshu the Pure Land gate (Jodomon) is contrasted with the gate of the sages (i.e. every other Buddhist schools where they try to attain enlightenment through wisdom). This site sums up Honen's ways of selecting the exclusive nenbutsu as the correct path: <http://www.jsri.jp/English/Honen/TEACHINGS/senchaku/process.html>. Shinran gives a similar explanation: http://www.shinranworks.com/majorexpositions/kgssVI-15_36.htm#35. As for Chinese Pure Land teachings, there are many views depending on teachers.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 29th, 2013 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Vairochana

Content:

Astus wrote:

In Mahayana generally buddhas are considered real beings, and they are also embodiments of different qualities and teachings most of the time.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 30th, 2013 at 3:58 AM

Title: Re: True Pure Land and Parinirvana

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

what does the True Pureland sects say about the sutras that say Amitabha Buddha will be going into Parinirvana???

or do they not have any material that covers that subject?

Astus wrote:

I'm sorry but I have no knowledge whether anyone has addressed that issue. Maybe someone did, maybe not. I don't have the sources to answer.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 30th, 2013 at 5:19 AM

Title: Re: True Pure Land and Parinirvana

Content:

LastLegend said:

If Nirmanakaya is the physical manifestation, then Sambhogakaya is the mental manifestation such as wisdom or compassion. Then the two cannot be separated.

Astus wrote:

There are many interpretations of the three bodies teaching, just like practically every Buddhist doctrine have various meanings taught by different masters. Still, such a distinction what you say about physical and mental is something influenced by our modern concepts. Something that has a form is rupa, and sambhogakaya buddhas definitely have forms and bodies, it's just a different kind than the nirmanakaya, similarly to the difference between gods and humans.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 30th, 2013 at 7:08 AM

Title: Re: True Pure Land and Parinirvana

Content:

Dodatsu said:

Also, one should remember that the interpretation on the concept of Nirvana differs in the Mahayana and Theravada traditions.

Astus wrote:

Regarding that point there was a separate topic created:

<http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=39&t=12817>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 30th, 2013 at 7:18 PM

Title: Re: Whatever happened to the wicked dwarf?

Content:

Astus wrote:

No mention of a wicked dwarf, but the story is the same:

"And the robber died to be reborn in a world of paradise." (The Skill in Means Sutra, p. 74)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 30th, 2013 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: Whatever happened to the wicked dwarf?

Content:

SunRay said:

The idea behind being that the Boddhisattva kills the evil being he takes it's karmic burden upon himself willingly entering the hell realms for the sake of the others? Demon dissolves into Rigpa kinda thing..

Astus wrote:

Taking over another's karma is impossible in Buddhism. In the story the captain simple prevented the robber committing murder, that is, generating very bad karma.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 30th, 2013 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Social Work & Christian Evangelism

Content:

Astus wrote:

"the concept of a religious master has existed in Western religions for many years. That is why Western religions have been able to spread all over the world. For example, among aborigine tribes in the mountainous regions of Taiwan, I have seen many Catholic nuns and priests as well as other Christian missionaries and ministers, who have gone deep into the aborigine regions to learn the native languages, live native lifestyles, and help the natives to live more comfortably and safely. Because of them most of the aborigines have become Christians. The dedication of these missionaries is worthy of our admiration. They are not reluctant to leave behind the free and comfortable life of Western society. Across the oceans, living a hard life in Taiwan's remote land and poor villages, they think nothing of enduring hardship. It is as if one were exiled to a barren region. Most of us probably would not want to go there.

...

A true Buddhist master must have the spirit of offering oneself and all one has in order to practice, uphold, and propagate Buddhadharma. A Buddhist master should have this kind of mindset and the will to be compassionate. If one becomes a monastic only to have a peaceful life or escape from reality, this attitude will certainly produce a selfish, vexed "ghost" and it would be impossible to attain liberation. In addition, without the proper mindset to begin with, vexation would get more serious and more frequent with time.

A correct starting mindset is what I have just said: "Practice, Uphold, and Propagate Buddhadharma." These attitudes are sequential and interrelated: when our practice begins to gain some footing, we need to protect and uphold the Buddhadharma – to spend our time and energy on all events related to spreading Dharma. As we protect and uphold Buddhadharma, we effectively propagate it, and in turn, we learn more about it. Spreading Buddhadharma can be carried out all the time and under all circumstances. One does not have to wait until one is as old as I am to feel comfortable doing it, and it does not have to be done all by talking. We can do it by our action, our mannerisms, and our viewpoint. In any case, there are many ways to spread Buddhadharma. Do not let a closed mind shrivel away or stifle your potential for growth."

(http://sanghau.ddm.org.tw/en/Teaching/TheSpirit_of_MonasticLife.aspx)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 30th, 2013 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Social Work & Christian Evangelism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Christians, Muslims and smaller groups like the Krishna followers all do charity works by helping the poor. And that is very good. If Buddhists want to follow that, by all means, there's never enough soup kitchen and shelter. On the other hand, Buddhism should also offer mental help. Now, religions are of course in the business of "saving the soul", and Christianity is founded upon converting the lower classes to Jesus. Buddhism is different in that, it's sramana style is not attractive for poor people who have more mundane worries, and when you are lost in debts and you have to feed your kids, just leaving it all behind to become a monk doesn't sound very ethical, so they are left where they are. Buddhism can offer similar afterlife heavens as any other religions, except that it won't last for ever and there is no saviour to ask help from. What Buddhism specialises in is mental training, and that's what makes it popular among richer citizens who want not only a nice home but also a cosy mind. So, it's more like a hobby, a therapy. Still, it is something that the other religions are not really known of, unlike social work.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 1st, 2013 at 11:46 PM

Title: Re: Noble Onefold Path?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Everything depends on what kind of books you read. If they are introductory teachings to Zen, it is only expected that they talk a lot about the basic practice, and even that can be a little simplified (e.g. zazen as breath counting). But I don't think this is a problem.

There are books that talk a lot about superficial things, like social philosophy, rituals, arts and such. They are more distracting than useful in terms of understanding Zen, although they can be entertaining nevertheless.

An important thing to understand about Zen in general is that as a Mahayana Buddhist school its primary style is very simple and direct. "See nature, become buddha", that's the motto. Philosophising about complex theories and the finer points of ethics can be beneficial, but it's not what Zen is about. Even the many forms of meditation and levels of attainment are pointless sophistries on the sudden path. But it's a mistake to think that Zen exists separately from the other teachings of Mahayana, rather it accepts and incorporates them all. The main difference between Zen and other schools is that it takes personal insight as the source and method of interpreting the teachings and not a specific scripture or teacher. And that doesn't mean the followers of other schools lack insight. Zen is just not that systematic.

Dogen himself studied the Buddhist canon and quoted from many sources in his writings and teachings. Sure, he taught about zazen, but that's just a small part of the entirety of his works. But only once zazen is comprehended and experienced is one ready to plunge into the other things.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 2nd, 2013 at 10:20 PM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism Compatible with Evolution?

Content:

Jikan said:

But the bigger question in this discussion is here: what use is a worldview as such? Why bother adopting worldviews, why take them on, why identify with one Weltanschauung or another? Better to try to get at the reality of the situation. here I'm following on jeep'r's post in this thread, which is a good one.

Astus wrote:

A philosophically conscious person who willingly adopts a view has a reason for taking it up - instead of staying in the usual naive slumber of ordinary humans. The philosophy of one's own, a worldview, has enormous consequences. It leads and organises almost everything what one does. Therefore the correct view, something that fits reality, is also important, as it defines one's success in life. Delusions are bad because they mislead one and fail to fulfil their purpose, i.e. assisting in life. That means that finding the truth is necessary.

It is not at all meaningless whether biological evolution is acceptable in Buddhism or not. Denying evolution is equal to rejecting natural science, and that sounds bad for Buddhism as it puts into the category of extremist religions. What has always been the method of Buddhists is to incorporate the ruling philosophy of a culture and transform it in a way that is fitting for the Dharma. For instance, the Buddha accepted all the ancient Indian gods but he denied the existence of their omnipotence, omniscience, eternal life and their creating power. Basically, gods were rendered meaningless. Natural science can be subdued in a similar way, saying that its area of expertise lies only within the realm of the four material elements. The physical universe has only a minor role in Buddhism. Just as formerly Buddhists could use traditional Indian and Chinese theories about the human body, they can do the same with modern scientific doctrines. The Dharma has no need for the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Prana#V.C4.81yus> and the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Meridian_%28Chinese_medicine%29, chemical elements are an acceptable explanations too. And if scientists say that life on this planet evolved from dead matter, it is because they understand life as the physical body. Buddhism in fact agrees with this, saying that the body is nothing else but the combination of the four elements.

What Buddhism has to leave behind to accept evolution is only its Indian cosmology, but that's something very few ever cared about. The teachings about consciousness and karma remain intact, just as the path of liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 2nd, 2013 at 10:24 PM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism Compatible with Evolution?

Content:

jeeprs said:

As I mentioned, I don't deny the fact of evolution. What interests me is the meaning of it - or the absence of meaning, which amounts to the same.

Astus wrote:

Evolution has no meaning in the sense that there is no higher purpose behind/above it. Samsara has no meaning either. Beings are stuck in their habits and that's it, it's just a fact of life. There is no big plan, nobody designed evolution nor samsara. The big difference is that if one looks only at evolution, i.e. the bodily life, it teaches only violence and hedonism. Understanding samsara, however, means realising the futility of all mundane pursuits and the true cause of suffering.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 4th, 2013 at 7:35 PM

Title: Re: Walking Away

Content:

Unknown said:

"And what is the stress of separation from the loved? There is the case where desirable, pleasing, attractive sights, sounds, aromas, flavors, or tactile sensations do not occur to one; or one has no connection, no contact, no relationship, no interaction with those who wish one well, who wish for one's benefit, who wish for one's comfort, who wish one security from the yoke, nor with one's mother, father, brother, sister, friends, companions, or relatives. This is called the stress of separation from the loved.

And what is the stress of not getting what is wanted? In beings subject to birth, the wish arises, 'O, may we not be subject to birth, and may birth not come to us.' But this is not to be achieved by wanting. This is the stress of not getting what is wanted. In beings subject to aging... illness... death... sorrow, lamentation, pain, distress, & despair, the wish arises, 'O, may we not be subject to aging... illness... death... sorrow, lamentation, pain, distress, & despair, and may aging... illness... death... sorrow, lamentation, pain, distress, & despair not come to us.' But this is not to be achieved by wanting. This is the stress of not getting what is wanted."

(<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.141.than.html>)

Astus wrote:

What is the way to become free from stress, from suffering, from being unsatisfied? There are just so many answers to that in Buddhism. The short one is to see how it is only you creating the trouble, it is a mind made experience and it originates from believing that it is real and not just some concept. And there are longer ways, as other's have already suggested.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 5th, 2013 at 4:19 AM

Title: Re: Condoms Available to Monks in Bhutan

Content:

Astus wrote:

In Thich Nhat Hanh's "Freedom Wherever We Go" (i.e. a revised pratimoksha) the precept against male masturbation is moved from "sanghavashesa" to the "payantika" rules, same level as it exists in the bhikshuni rules. So it is a minor offence for both, while in traditional pratimokshas it is minor only for nuns. On the other hand, touching or letting be touched by another person with both parties having sexual intentions is a defeat for nuns and community restoration for monks. There's hardly any way around the rules to justify the acceptance of sexual activities between monastics.

On the other hand, that's just the theory. There are also social factors to be considered, as mentioned already. In fact, the Vinaya itself was meant to harmonise the monastic community with the prevailing social norms. If the lay community is happy to support a family temple - as in Japan - it can also preserve and carry on the Dharma. There are family lineages in Tibet and they are also doing quite well. I'm not saying that the rules should be thrown out the window, but flexibility and diversity of the Buddhist clergy is a good thing. I believe that it is in agreement with the Mahayana idea to allow a greater variety of Dharma professionals than what is in the Vinaya.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 5th, 2013 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: "In One Lifetime"

Content:

Astus wrote:

The majority of East Asian Mahayana schools claim that enlightenment in this life is possible, the exception is the Pure Land school where they guarantee your liberation in your next life in Sukhavati. However, since Buddhism is not a centralised church, different teachers can say different things, including the requirement for aeons of bodhisattva practice. Or it can be also said that the important thing is to become a bodhisattva - who is an enlightened being by the way - and then continue to help all beings.

Talking about the Soto school, their basic doctrine is practice-enlightenment, i.e. that the moment you do zazen right there you are buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 6th, 2013 at 4:43 AM

Title: Re: "In One Lifetime"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Besides the usual teachings about enlightenment in this life, there is another view one can find.

"Sometimes, for the sake of weak-willed men, they show how to attain perfect enlightenment quickly by skipping over the stages of the Bodhisattva. And sometimes, for the sake of indolent men, they say that men may attain enlightenment at the end of numberless aeons. Thus they can demonstrate innumerable expedient means and suprarational feats. But in reality all these Bodhisattvas are the same in that they are alike in their lineage, their capacity, their aspiration, and their realization of Suchness; therefore, there is no such thing as skipping over the stages, for all Bodhisattvas must pass through the three terms of innumerable aeons before they can fully attain enlightenment. However, because of the differences in the various beings, there are also different ways of teaching them what to practice."

(http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Translations/Awakening_of_faith.html)

In Chan (and especially Korean Seon) there is a prominent idea called "sudden enlightenment, gradual practice", where while there is a direct entry, it is followed by gradual practice. At the same time this is not necessarily understood as the same level as the bodhisattva vehicle but rather the supreme one vehicle.

In modern Chinese Buddhism, thanks to the influence of Ven. Yinshun (1906 - 2005), the bodhisattva path is emphasised in Humanistic Buddhism instead of "buddhahood in this life". In his http://www.buddhanet.net/cbp2_f3.htm he differentiates bodhisattvas to those who attain no-birth (i.e. the stage of no regression, 8th bhumi) gradually and those who attain it suddenly. Then he says,

"It attains understanding of voidness, equality, and great wisdom. It does not attach itself any longer to the three realms of existence nor Nirvana. Nor will it attach itself to the fact that it is ferrying the suffering sentient beings over to the other shore of Nirvana. Neither will it attach itself to attaining Buddhahood. It will work vigorously to cultivate the Six Perfections. The awakened mind will utilize the expedient path to help all beings. These are the ones who have the Bodhisattva spiritual foundation."

Master Yinshun in the book Human-Centered Buddhism categorises both mature Chinese Buddhism and Esoteric Buddhism as Late Mahayana based on the Tathagatagarbha doctrine, something that teaches enlightenment in this life. He compares Late Mahayana to the old age period when people turn to theistic beliefs, fear decline and death, thus they are eager for fast and easy solutions. (p. 49-50) He also says later,

"People fantasize about instant buddhahood and are in such a rush to get there they cast aside the bodhisattva practice. What nonsense!" (p. 77)

Ven. Shengyan (1930 – 2009), discussing the question Can One Become a Buddha Instantaneously? (Orthodox Chinese Buddhism, p. 100-103), using the Tiantai teaching of six identities (六即), says that the Chan claim for sudden buddhahood is only rhetoric, and it's just an initial insight that they actually mean.

The meaning of this criticism of buddhahood in this life is that the theory is contrary to what we can actually see in the Buddhist world. Even respected teachers don't claim any high attainment, so what can we say about ordinary practitioners who have trouble following even the basic precepts? It is this gap between the ideal and the actual that these modern teachers address.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 6th, 2013 at 6:25 PM

Title: Re: "In One Lifetime"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Nilasarasvati,

I don't recommend taking the idea of sudden or gradual side too seriously. And the emphasis is on idea here, not the actual systems. The many teachings are there to address different inclinations people have. Or we can say, the teachings express certain individuals' approach to the Dharma. As I see it, a teacher's style is determined by his personal experiences he had on the path. Then specific teachers become prominent according to circumstances (within and without the Buddhist community). Naturally, all styles and forms of teaching claim superiority to itself, so such statements practically mean nothing when comparing teachings. What is important is to find what feels personally close and inspiring.

Seeing the teacher as buddha is central in Vajrayana as it uses devotion to allow students to receive blessings. That is, if you trust the teacher you are open to the teachings and can accept them and follow them. No devotion means a closed mind, no blessings means not hearing the teaching. This is a very skilful method, but it requires faith. Actually, faith is important on every Buddhist path, only its style is different.

A teacher is someone who can give you guidance on the path. It depends on the student whether this or that teacher is helpful for a specific problem. A teacher doesn't have to be someone in an official post. It really depends on what actually works. When you receive the Dharma from someone, that person is as the Buddha himself, the first refuge, and this is true for every Buddhist path.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 7th, 2013 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

wisdom said:

In essence the Mahayana approach goes beyond accepting and rejecting objects of the senses as inherently good or bad...

Malcolm said:

Well, no, it doesn't — Mahāyāna regards sense objects as negative, something to be rejected.

Astus wrote:

This is from a Theravada teacher (who was also a Vinaya specialist),

"For the really earnest student, the more sensations the better. But many meditators shrink away from sensations, they don't want to deal with them. This is like the naughty schoolboy who won't go to school, won't listen to the teacher. These sensations are teaching us. When we know sensations then we are practicing Dhamma."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/lib/thai/chah/living.html>)

The doctrine that "affliction is enlightenment" (煩惱即菩提) is well known in East Asian Mahayana schools like Chan and Tiantai. In Vajrayana they say that the sutra path is renunciation, the tantra path is transformation and the dzogchen path is self-liberation (e.g. <http://www.dzogchen.org.au/index.php?page=dzogchen>). And here is what a Chan master said,

"There are many methods in practicing Buddhism. The Lesser Vehicle practices "eradicating afflictions." The Great Vehicle (Mahayana) "transforms afflictions." In the Ultimate Vehicle "afflictions are bodhi." Each method is centered on the mind. In the end, they all enable sentient beings to attain unsurpassed complete enlightenment." (http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enUS/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=219&Itemid=59)

Although there are different traditions they are aware of the various methods that can be used in order to deal with desire, anger and ignorance. In a single teaching the Buddha gave five different methods to deal with unskillful thoughts, and these techniques could be matched with the above three:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.020.than.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 7th, 2013 at 5:02 PM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

Astus wrote:

The idea of the decline of Dharma has been around since the beginning. Piya Tan explores the concept in his <http://dharmafarer.org/wordpress/wp-content/uploads/2009/12/1.10-Dharma-ending-age-piya-proto.pdf> within the Pali Canon. In China the Three Stages School (Sanjie jiao 三階教) founded by Xinxing (信行, 540-594) was among the first to propagate the end of Dharma (mofa 末法) and based on that claim that its own teachings are the most appropriate and viable. The idea that only this or that path is the available one in this age has been in use for a while now, so any statement with such a reasoning has little weight, just like the grandiose claims for superiority.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 7th, 2013 at 7:09 PM

Title: Re: New to Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are some communities you could contact in Korea and they speak English (or at least some of them):

<http://www.hanmaum.org/eng/>

<http://wakeupandlaugh.wordpress.com/>

<http://www.bels.kr/>

<http://www.korea4expats.com/article-buddhist-temples-meditation-seoul.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 8th, 2013 at 12:46 AM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

Malcolm said:

You can find such statements in Mahāyāna sutras, but such statements do not constitute the path of Mahāyāna.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean that they teach one thing but practise another? The non-differentiation of samsara and nirvana exists in Mahayana from its early times. That view is part of the practice in both ethics and meditation. Chan and Tiantai are good examples. There are also sutras like the Samantabhadra Contemplation Sutra, Vimalakirti Sutra and others where it is expressed in practical terms.

Malcolm said:

In Vajrayāna one does not transform afflictions. That is not what "path of transformation" means in Vajrayāna. You don't experience anger, for example, and then try to change it into the mirror-like wisdom.

Astus wrote:

Later you write:

The path of transformation means transforming our relationship with the world, sentient beings and our own body (through empowerment and sadhana) from an impure relationship into a pure relationship. The path of transformation involves taking the result as the path -- for Buddhas, sense objects are not toxic, they are not afflictive, they are pure goddesses. When sense objects and consciousnesses are purified through the process of sadhana, the afflictive power of sense objects is lessened, and the links between sensation and craving is weakened and finally severed. For example, we replace our sense of identity with a Buddha identity -- the so called "divine pride" which is the essence of the creation stage, etc. In the course of working with pure vision, it is necessary to engage sense objects in every different way, smells, colors, tastes, sounds, sights, and so on.

You change the view from attachment to objects to non-attachment to objects. This is no different from what Ajahn Chah said, or what you find in Mahayana. True, no colourful deities are involved in the process most of the time.

Malcolm said:

Further, we have to examine what is meant by "affliction" is bodhi.

Astus wrote:

It means that affliction (klesa) is empty, therefore there is nothing to reject or transform.

Malcolm said:

Perfect example of the path of renunciation in toto. I do not see at all how, for example, this relates in anyway to the path of transformation.

Astus wrote:

These are the five methods:

1. Switching from unskilful to skilful object.
2. Understanding the drawbacks.
3. Abandoning the unskilful.
4. Abandoning proliferation.
5. Strengthening awareness.

For instance, changing from unskilful to skilful is no different from changing from impure view to pure view. Abandoning the unskilful object itself or the following proliferation is simply letting it self-liberate. Are the objects rejected? No, only the attachment to them, otherwise arhats would be blind and deaf. The sensation stays, only grasping goes.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 9th, 2013 at 10:51 PM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

Malcolm said:

this is the function of the two truths.

In truth, this statement by Nāgārjuna illustrates how to practice according to Mahāyāna:

Astus wrote:

It is a letter written to a worldly ruler. As Baizhang said, "If you are speaking to a deaf worldling, you should just teach him to leave home, maintain discipline, practice meditation and develop wisdom. You should not speak this way to a worldling beyond measure, someone like Vimalakirti or the great hero Fu." (in "Sayings and Doings of Pai-Chang", p. 29) Note that both Vimalakirti and Fu were lay people. This is simply recognising the different inclinations and the appropriate methods. Bodhisattvas have no trouble with samsara because they understand how afflictions are enlightenment, it is not some abstract far away goal but the path itself, because a bodhisattva practises prajnaparamita.

"To the extent that beings take hold of things and settle down in them, to that extent is there defilement. But no one is thereby defiled. And to the extent that one does not take hold of things and does not settle down in them, to that extent can one conceive of the absence of I-making and mine-making. In that sense can one form the concept of the purification of beings, i.e. to the extent that they do not take hold of things and do not settle down in them, to that extent there is purification. But no one is therein purified. When a Bodhisattva courses thus, he courses in perfect wisdom." (PP8000, ch. 22, tr. Conze)

Zen teaches the same thing,

"Those who seek the Dharma should not seek for anything. Outside of mind there is no other Buddha, outside of Buddha there is no other mind. Not attaching to good and not rejecting evil, without reliance on either purity or defilement, one realizes that the nature of offence is empty: it cannot be found in each thought because it is without selfnature. Therefore, the three realms are mind-only and 'all phenomena in the universe are marked by a single Dharma.'"

(Mazu Daoyi, in "Sun-Face Buddha", p. 62)

Malcolm said:

But in former, you do so without ever giving up such objects, and in the latter, one must give up objects. This is the essential difference between the path of renunciation and the path of transformation.

Astus wrote:

As above, the dharmas need not be rejected or removed. Even in Theravada it is taught that the problem is not with the skandhas but with attachment ("I-making and mine-making").

Malcolm said:

But Chan is still a path of renunciation, even if its view is beyond accepting and rejecting objects, there is still subtle and not so subtle accepting and rejecting concerning relative and ultimate truth.

Astus wrote:

It is with the realisation of emptiness that one can walk the bodhisattva path itself. If there were "subtle and not so subtle accepting and rejecting" then how could it be non-abiding?

Malcolm said:

Yes, this is why it is not part of the path of transformation because "...those evil, unskillful thoughts are abandoned and subside." And it is not teaching a path of self-liberation either because the refrain in each verse is "...those evil, unskillful thoughts are abandoned and subside."

Astus wrote:

Is there still attachment on the path of transformation and self-liberation? If yes, then how can it be called transformation and self-liberation? If no, it also abandons attachment.

Malcolm said:

It is unrealistic for lay people (and even bhikṣus) to abandon sense pleasures in this day and age, therefore, it is best to use a method where sense pleasures are used for one's own purposes as part of the path, hence the reason for the Vajrayāna path of transformation. Of course if you do not have Vajrayāna methods you try and be free from accepting and rejecting ala Chan and Zen, but that is a slow path since it lacks skill methods, from a Vajrayāna perspective.

Astus wrote:

Shinran quotes Shandao (http://www.shinranworks.com/majorexpositions/kgssVI-15_36.htm#34), "The Tathagata already knows that foolish beings of the latter age possessed of karmic evil and defilements are incapable of visualizing forms and fixing the mind on them. How much harder is it to seek realization without visualizing forms; it is like a person lacking transcendent powers building a house in the air."

From the perspective of the Pure Land school, Vajrayana is no different from the other schools of self-power and in the Dharma ending age it's unlikely that anyone is capable of attaining liberation through them. Therefore, the nenbutsu of the other-power is the best and virtually only choice anyone has who aims for enlightenment.

Obviously, only those following that path accept such an argument. Therefore, saying that renunciation is less possible than before is a statement valid only for those who want to practise something else.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 10th, 2013 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

Astus wrote:

Has any modern bhikshu/ni tried to actually live from begging? I mean, homeless people can manage somehow, why not a few bald people too?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 10th, 2013 at 1:20 AM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

So would it be possible for somebody to be a beggar monk while living in a western country? Sure, but they will have to live in shelters or on the street and rely on soup kitchens etc... run by the state and other religious organisations. Like all homeless people do.

Astus wrote:

Exactly. Like all homeless people do. Another thing that is not considered is that while "[w]e do not really have a donation culture" we have a tax paying culture, and at least in some European countries tax money also goes to churches. The key is to have enough followers who choose your church. Spiritual services (to some level) are expected to be free because (traditional) Christian churches are open for the public throughout Europe. But there are other religious communities that can manage quite well even without a large support base, have temples and community houses built, even establish their own theological colleges. The difference between those and Buddhists is that their followers are religious people and see themselves as such. Or maybe even this is not that big a difference. It's just that on the one hand the monastic lifestyle is not a popular one, and on the other Buddhism is simply not strong enough yet to support dozens of renunciates in every major city. It shouldn't be forgotten that in Asia the Buddhist monasteries usually had state support.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 10th, 2013 at 1:25 AM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

kirtu said:

Homeless people do not actually manage. They die on the streets.

Astus wrote:

Can't speak for every country, but in Hungary mostly those die who stay outside in the winter instead of going some place warm for the night. I've met people who have been homeless for 10+ years. And I'm not saying it's an easy life, but I'm quite sure you can beg enough money a day to have food and even more, plus the social services.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 10th, 2013 at 1:31 AM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

kirtu said:

Perhaps it's just best to make one's way to Thailand and take ordination in a small village and abandon the Mahayana institutions.

Astus wrote:

Plum Village is open for new applicants: <http://new.plumvillage.org/about/becoming-a-monastic/>, so you don't have to leave Mahayana institutions behind.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 10th, 2013 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

kirtu said:

Austria was briefly officially declared a Buddhist country by law.

Astus wrote:

There is some info here: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Church_tax, (also check the German version: <https://de.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kirchensteuer>). In Hungary you can choose to send 1% to an "established church" (new invention by the current government, but it still includes some Buddhists) and another 1% to a civil organisation. Similar tax based funding also exists in Slovakia for instance.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 10th, 2013 at 3:53 AM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

Malcolm said:

I see, so for you a bodhisattva is solely someone who has realized emptiness. Well, that certainly does leave a lot of people out.

Astus wrote:

"if a bodhisattva holds the notion of a self, the notion of person, the notion of sentient being, and the notion of life span, then she is not a bodhisattva." (Diamond Sutra, ch. 17, tr. C. Muller)

"Nothing real is meant by the word 'Bodhisattva.' Because a Bodhisattva trains himself in non-attachment to all dharmas. For the Bodhisattva, the great being, awakes in non-attachment to full enlightenment in the sense that he understands all dharmas. Because he has enlightenment as his aim, an 'enlightenment-being' [Bodhisattva], a great being, is so called." (PP8000, ch. 1, tr. Conze)

Of course, there are other views, like the 5 paths and the 52 stages, where they consider the realisation of emptiness and the practice of the paramitas a far away attainment. That kind of thinking naturally led to the emergence of sudden teachings where awakening came closer again. So while I don't make the difference here between ordinary and noble bodhisattvas, it is with the intention to show that the bodhisattvayana, as presented by the sutras and several teachers, is not just how it tends to be represented in later "sudden teaching" texts (i.e. as something that only incompetent fools choose over their direct path to buddhahood).

Malcolm said:

No, in terms of relative truth Mahāyāna teaches that phenomena themselves are afflictive. Also in the Nikāya schools, phenomena themselves are regarded as afflictive and a cause of suffering.

Astus wrote:

If "phenomena themselves" are afflictive, then are phenomena should be removed or the afflictions? If ignorance lies in appearances then shouldn't the realm of nothingness or complete annihilation be nirvana? As I understand it, the problem is with believing appearances to be self, and that's why the realisation of emptiness is the solution.

Malcolm said:

In reality the intent of such statements that you introduced is that in Mahāyāna, the contemplation of emptiness is for abandoning sense objects.

The victor stated that desire objects, wealth and the three planes of existence are similar to illusions, mirages, a moon in the water, and apparitions.

Astus wrote:

They are like illusions because they are empty, and seeing things as empty only means non-attachment but not annihilation. Why do you say then that they are abandoned?

Malcolm said:

But common Mahāyāna offers no methods for ordinary persons to take sense objects in to the path. How do ordinary Mahāyāna practitioners practice? For the most part their practice is no different than that of non-Mahāyāna Buddhists. i.e. śīla, samādhi and prajñā.

Astus wrote:

"you should understand that all the afflictions constitute the seed of the Tathāgata. It is like not being able to attain the priceless jewelpearl without entering the ocean. Therefore, if one does not enter the great sea of the afflictions, one will not be able to attain the jewel of omniscience." (Vimalakirti Sutra, ch. 8, tr. McRae)

This sutra says quite the opposite, that one needs all the defilements to walk the bodhisattva path. On the other hand, it is similar to what you say in that it attributes the "total renunciation" view to a lower path and the "freedom in samsara" view to itself. The prajnaparamita sutras in general recommend the realisation of prajnaparamita itself as the way of the bodhisattva, and that has no problem with the sense objects at all. And even if someone secludes oneself to have a nice and calm environment for meditation, I see nothing wrong with that, nor anything impossible or difficult to achieve.

Honen gave this advice regarding practice:

"If you cannot stay in one spot and do it, then do it when you are walking. If you cannot do it as a priest, then do it as a layman. If you cannot do it alone, then do it in company with others. If you cannot do it and at the same time provide yourself with food and clothing, then accept the help of others and go on doing it. Or if you cannot get others to help you, then look after yourself but keep on doing it. Your wife and children and domestics are for this very purpose, of helping you to practice it, and if they prove an obstacle, you ought not to have any. Friends and property are good, if they too prove helpful, but if they prove a hindrance they should be given up." (Honen the Buddhist Saint, p. 75)

Malcolm said:

Attachment is used on the path transformation to eliminate attachment. Desire is used to eliminate desire, etc.

The path of self-liberation is a little difference since self-liberation is non-attachment (but it is not so simple as that).

Astus wrote:

You don't use afflictions on the path of transformation just as they are, but with the view that they are essentially pure (empty), and so it associates pure visions to impure ones. Thus it is not exactly using the very same afflicted mentality to defeat another afflicted mentality, but more like a different way of using antidotes. Self-liberation is also based on the understanding that appearances are empty, so the only thing to do is to stay with that realisation thus stopping all contrivances (i.e. I-making and mind-making). As Traleg Kyabgon says, "It is simply a matter of maintaining our awareness (sampajanya)." (Mind at East, p. 14)

Ajahn Chah talks in a similar fashion,

"This is our foundation: to have sati, recollection, and sampajañña, self-awareness, whether standing, walking, sitting, or reclining. Whatever arises, just leave it be, don't cling to it. Be it like or dislike, happiness or suffering, doubt or certainty, contemplate with vicara and gauge the results of those qualities. Don't try to label everything, just know it. See that all the things that arise in the mind are simply sensations. They are transient. They arise, exist and cease. That's all there is to them, they have no self or being, they are neither "us" nor "them." They are not worthy of clinging to, any of them." (<http://www.accesstoinight.org/lib/thai/chah/heartfood.html#samma>)

Malcolm said:

It is obvious that renunciate paths (as opposed to the general dissatisfaction with samsara) are less possible then before. Actually, it is easier to be dissatisfied with samsara now, but it is much less easy to do something about it.

Astus wrote:

Obvious from what? In older times there were persecutions, wars, famine, no printing, no schools, no internet, and strong state control. Today you can go to quite a few Buddhist monasteries and just stay there, or travel around. If you want to sell everything and move into the mountains, nobody stops you.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 10th, 2013 at 9:18 PM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

Malcolm said:

Mahāyāna does not just exist as a teaching on ultimate truth.

Astus wrote:

Mahayana encompasses all teachings there are. However, the main path is the bodhisattva path as the practice of the six paramitas. Practising the paramitas requires insight into emptiness, that is the way emphasised by the prajnaparamita texts and others. Also, in Chan the first thing one needs is to see the nature of mind, practically the same thing as realising emptiness. Practising only on the level of everyday truth is good for accumulating worldly merit, but that's only the path of "humans and gods" and not even the sravakayana.

Malcolm said:

The path of renunciation suggests, in both Nikaya schools as well as Mahāyāna, that phenomena are to be removed -- and this is generally accomplished with vows. For example, monks remove the phenomena of others' genitals; they remove the phenomena of handling precious things. More importantly, the abandonment of sense objects is seen as a condition for development of samadhi in both Nikāya Buddhism and Mahāyana.

Astus wrote:

Yes, vows are useful. At the same time, if you look at the Skill in Means Sutra, the Definitive Vinaya sutra (in the Ratnakuta), or the Vimalakirti Sutra, it is an important quality of bodhisattvas to roam freely in samsara and liberate beings. Vimalakirti himself is a great example here. You may say then this is only the result of the path, however, as I write above, this is the path of the paramitas.

Malcolm said:

nothing of the sort. The citation you provide is no different than the peacock eating poisoned plants metaphor...

Astus wrote:

You said,

But common Mahāyāna offers no methods for ordinary persons to take sense objects in to the path. How do ordinary Mahāyāna practitioners practice? For the most part their practice is no different than that of non-Mahāyāna Buddhists. i.e. śīla, samadhi and prajñā.

And for that was my response quoting the Vimalakirti sutra about differentiating the sravaka and the bodhisattva path, and that the afflictions are not rejected but they are actually required. In this case I have not said that it represents the view that the afflictions equal enlightenment, although they are not completely different either. Zhanran in his commentary (T38n1778_p0683c26-28) on the section explains that the five aggregates become nirvana, like ice turns into water. It is in the commentary on chapter 4 where Zhiyi mentions regarding Vimalakirti's discussion with Maitreya how affliction is no different from bodhi (T38n1777_p0530c17-22). Since it is the 8th chapter that describes a rather common approach, as you have said, I don't see your above comment justified.

Malcolm said:

You don't change afflictions, you train in pure vision. By slowly transforming your vision, since ordinary vision is caused by afflictions which generate concepts, counteract that with sadhana practice, completion stage etc.

You use afflictions just as they are, but by changing how you relate to the world, by transforming your world, slowly you realize the state of Mahāmudra without giving anything up at all.

Astus wrote:

With establishing prajnaparamita as the correct view there is nothing to improve or get rid of. As it says in chapter 22 in PP8000, purification means simply the extent one uses prajnaparamita. To this you may say that this is again the ultimate view, and that in order to reach that one has to follow a sravaka-style practice by renouncing the world, etc. As I see it, to hop on the Great Vehicle, one needs prajnaparamita (ch. 1, PP8000).

The training on the path of transformation is with pure vision, correct view, and the application of visualisation, etc., therefore while it may be said that afflictions are left just as they are, affliction is something where there is impure vision. So once there is pure vision, it serves as an antidote. Being afflicted is one view of the world, being unafflicted is another. This is how prajnaparamita is a universal solution for all defilements, because it removes the root of the problem.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 10th, 2013 at 11:05 PM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Ultimately once the wisdom realizing emptiness is achieved this is true. But in order to realize emptiness one requires a substantial amount of merit which is why we need an integrative path that integrates method and wisdom. Also, from a Mahayana POV Sravakas and so forth have realized selflessness but due to their not cultivating the method side of the path they are not able to achieve the final goal of full enlightenment for the sake of sentient beings.

Astus wrote:

Saying that one needs merit to realise emptiness is equal to saying the requirement for good karma. Meeting with the Dharma, with Mahayana, with teachers, etc. is already the sign of merit. And as the sutras say, not becoming frightened of emptiness is the sign of a mind ready for realisation. Charity, repentance, morality, meditation and studying are all beneficial, however, to see emptiness one has to actually look at it (paraphrasing the Zen motto of "direct pointing" and "seeing nature"). Thrangu Rinpoche likes to say (e.g. Essentials of Mahamudra, p. 166-167) that the difference between sutrayana (madhyamaka) and vajrayana (mahamudra) is that the former uses analysis, inference while the latter uses direct perception. My small objection is that such a definition is true only where common Mahayana is reduced to a theoretical background. The sutras themselves are very practical, at least that's how many of them were intended to be used.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 10th, 2013 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

What do you mean by 'realizing emptiness', Astus?

Astus wrote:

To see that no appearance has a self(-nature), attaining the view that is free from the extremes. Just the usual.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 11th, 2013 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

Insofar as I know, 'realizing emptiness' in Vajrayana and Dzogchen means quite a different thing.

Astus wrote:

Something else than non-fabrication is fabrication. There is only one suchness, no matter what tradition.

As the 3rd Karmapa wrote (An Aspirational Prayer for Mahamudra, tr. J. Rockwell; <http://www.rinpoche.com/teachings/mahamudra.pdf>),

"Free from mental fabrication, it is Mahamudra.

Free from extremes, it is Great Madhyamaka.

This is also called the Great Perfection, the consummation of all.

May we have confidence that understanding one realizes all."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 11th, 2013 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

LastLegend said:

Is this for all practitioners of different levels/capacities? How does one enter the gate directly?

Astus wrote:

It really depends on who you ask. Different traditions say different things. Ask a Soto Zen teacher and they say you just have to do zazen. Ask a Dzogchen teacher and they advise you to do the preliminary practices and/or receive introduction. Ask a Jodoshu teacher and they might say you better just focus on the recitation of the name of Amita Buddha and aspire for birth in the Pure Land. The Lankavatara Sutra tells you that everything is only mind, and the prajnaparamita sutras teach you that all appearances are nothing but conceptualisations.

Some say that their practice is only for people of the highest capacity to boost your enthusiasm, while others say that it is accessible to all to strengthen your confidence. Usually both are said at the same time.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 11th, 2013 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

Astus wrote:

treehuggingoctopus,

Then let's say instead of "realising" it is experiencing emptiness, that is, I don't mean an intellectual comprehension of it but first hand personal experience. And that experience is the same for everyone.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 11th, 2013 at 5:43 PM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

Malcolm said:

It is not a statement about means.

Astus wrote:

Prajnaparamita is the basis of the bodhisattvayana, and there are no methods to apply without it. It is prajnaparamita that liberates all beings and it includes all means. Isn't the inseparability of compassion and wisdom the essential realisation of a bodhisattva?

Malcolm said:

Pāramitāyāna is a gradual path, one that requires infinite lifetimes to complete.

Astus wrote:

The bodhisattva liberates all beings without conceiving any person that liberates or is liberated. How can you complete such a path? Let me quote a bit from the "<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra13.html>" that was, and still is, popular in East Asia.

The Buddha asked Mañjuśrī, “When a Bodhisattva sits in a bodhimaṇḍa, does he attain anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi?”

Mañjuśrī replied, “When a Bodhisattva sits in a bodhimaṇḍa, he does not attain anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi. Why not? Because the appearance of bodhi is true suchness. Not finding a speck of dharma to capture is called anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi. Because bodhi has no appearance, who can sit and who can rise? For this reason, I see neither a Bodhisattva sitting in a bodhimaṇḍa nor anyone realizing anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi.”

Mañjuśrī said to the Buddha, “World-Honored One, bodhi is the five rebellious acts, and the five rebellious acts are bodhi. Why? Because bodhi and the five rebellious acts are free from duality. Hence there is neither learning nor learner, neither perceiving nor perceiver, neither knowing nor knower, neither differentiating nor differentiator. Such appearances are called bodhi. In the same way one should view the appearances of the five rebellious acts. If there are those who say that they see bodhi and have attained it, we should know that they are the ones with exceeding arrogance.”

Malcolm said:

Actually, prajñā takes many eons to perfect according to Mahāyāna.

Astus wrote:

The Buddha told Śāriputra, “If good men and good women, having heard this profound prajñā-pāramitā, can come to resoluteness in their minds, not shocked, not terrified, not baffled, and not regretful, know that they stand on the Ground of No Regress. If those who have heard this profound prajñā-pāramitā are not shocked, not terrified, not baffled, and not regretful, but believe, accept, appreciate, and listen tirelessly, they have in effect achieved dāna-pāramitā, śīla-pāramitā, kṣānti-pāramitā, vīrya-pāramitā, dhyāna-pāramitā, and prajñā-pāramitā. Moreover, they can reveal and explicate [the teachings] to others and can have them train accordingly.”

The Buddha asked Mañjuśrī, “In your opinion, what is meant by attaining anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi and by abiding in anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi?”

Mañjuśrī replied, “I have no anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi to attain, nor do I abide in the Buddha Vehicle. Then how should I attain anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi? What I describe is only the appearance of bodhi.”

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 11th, 2013 at 10:19 PM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

Malcolm said:

bodhicitta is the basis of the bodhisattvayāna, and that has both relative and ultimate aspects.

Your bodhisattvayāna is a bird that is wounded in one wing.

Astus wrote:

"When one is endowed with the meaning of emptiness, there is not a single thing which is not included in this path."

(The Jewel Ornament of Liberation, p. 252)

Bodhicitta without the ultimate aspect is a heap of good intentions, but that is not the same as saying that everything else is rejected.

Having generated the great mind to realize bodhi, it is necessary to recognize what constitutes the essence of the bodhi mind. Now, as for the substance of the bodhi mind, if one fails to generate it from one's true mind, there is no source through which one might succeed in reaching bodhi. On account of this, it is essential that one differentiate clearly [what it is]. Only then does this result in Dharma practice which corresponds to correct causality.

...

The Buddhas of the ten directions, all beings, and this mind of mine—"in these three, there are no distinctions." It is this which is identical with the essence of the bodhi mind. One forsakes this and, failing to recognize it, one instead recognizes [only] one's own false thoughts. Consequently one engages in a continual process of dying and being reborn again and thus endures suffering shoulder- to-shoulder with the various species of birds and beasts. How could it be that one who is truly a man would not feel shamed by this?

(Peixiu: Exhortation to Resolve on Buddhahood, p. 6-7; tr. Bhikshu Dharmamitra)

Also,

"Since it is the mother of the Bodhisattvas,

It is also the mother of the Buddhas:

The prajñāpāramitā

Is foremost among the provisions essential for enlightenment."

(Nagarjuna: Guide to the Bodhisattva Path, v. 5; tr. Bhikshu Dharmamitra)

Malcolm said:

In any event, this stream of replies and responses is far away from the original point, which is that Mahāyāna is a path of renunciation, just like Śrāvakayāna.

Astus wrote:

The topic is about dealing with desires, and you restrict Mahayana to a single approach that desires can only be rejected. My position is that Mahayana is more than that and encompasses several methods.

"For the bodhisattva, afflictions accord with his nature.
He is not one who takes nirvāṇa as his very nature.
It is not the case that the burning up of the afflictions Allows one to generate the seed of bodhi."
(Nagarjuna: Guide to the Bodhisattva Path, v. 79)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 11th, 2013 at 11:05 PM

Title: Re: The balance between compassion and wisdom

Content:

Astus wrote:

In formal sessions where there is the section on awakening bodhicitta and the section on dedicating merit, they cover the compassion part, while the vipashyana section in meditation and studying sutras the wisdom part. In daily life you maintain good intentions towards others and at the same time non-attachment to illusory appearances, thus compassion and wisdom are combined. In other words, you try to be nice and not to hang on to (unwholesome) emotions and thoughts.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 12th, 2013 at 12:42 AM

Title: Re: Uncertain steps...

Content:

Astus wrote:

Chan and Pure Land practices have no general structures, it is whatever the teacher says or what you follow. So for that practically any Chinese or Vietnamese community/temple is a good place to go. If you like Thich Nhat Hanh (based on your list of books), their website also contains teachings and he has introductory works too.

Besides the BuddhaNet site, for East Asian Buddhism there are some good places to start.

<http://blpusa.com/category/buddhism-in-every-step> - Ven. Xingyun's teachings covering lot of subjects

<http://chancenter.org/cmc/publications/free-literature/> - some of Ven. Shengyan's introductory works; there are also <http://chancenter.org/cmc/multimedia/video/>

<http://www.ymba.org/books/buddhism-wisdom-faith-pure-land-principles-and-practice> - Thich Thien Tam's great summary of the Pure Land teachings

<http://www.wwzc.org/book/long-distance-training-program> - they provide distance training in Soto Zen

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 12th, 2013 at 4:21 PM

Title: Re: Any translation of this volume 高僧傳

Content:

Astus wrote:

I've seen a translation of a collection of biographies of eminent nuns in English, alas I can't remember the book's title. Otherwise I don't think any biographical record has been fully translated, except for the travel stories.

It has an English wiki article: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Memoirs_of_Eminent_Monks

And those collections are also used to compare it with Chan records, like here:

http://www.chibs.edu.tw/ch_html/chbj/07/chbj0716.htm and here:

http://www.persee.fr/web/revues/home/prescript/article/befeo_0336-1519_1998_num_85_1_3835

In Chinese DDM/DDBC has a <http://dev.ddbc.edu.tw/biographies/gis/> to search for biographical info: <http://authority.ddbc.edu.tw/>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 12th, 2013 at 4:36 PM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

oushi said:

What if a faulty idea is introduced, or an ideas that can be easily misinterpreted later on? Is there a way of cleaning the standard Mahayana content? Because it is inevitable that some faults will/was introduced, and later structures were build upon them.

Astus wrote:

Doesn't really work like that. Mahayana contains a wide range of teachings, and then specific traditions and teachers select some they prefer and emphasise those. When someone starts talking about "cleaning the standard Mahayana" (or something similar), it is just a prelude to a new idea under the cover of "restoring the original".

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 12th, 2013 at 4:49 PM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

oushi said:

what standard Mahayana is?

Astus wrote:

There is no such thing. It simply means the general features that most of the Mahayana schools have.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 12th, 2013 at 6:22 PM

Title: Re: Standard Mahayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

I prefer to distinguish Tibetan/Northern and East Asian/Eastern Mahayana. We may also talk about different eras of Mahayana in India. In Tibetan Buddhism what is called common Mahayana is based mainly on specific shastras and it is very structured and mostly left as it is because it has little relevance to their actual daily practice that is primarily Tantra. In East Asia there is different situation, because Chinese Buddhism gradually developed its own systems based mostly on sutras.

While Madhyamaka is the main form of Mahayana philosophy in Tibet, in East Asia it has long been forgotten. The Abhisamayalamkara is used in Tibet to interpret the Prajnaparamita works, in China it was initially the Dazhidulun (大智度論; Mahaprajnaparamita-upadesha by Nagarjuna) but that was somewhat superseded by indigenous schools. Yogacara played a somewhat stronger role in East Asia than in Tibet, but while in Tibet they have it now as "Shentong Madhyamaka", in East Asia it is still a marginal thing.

In East Asia the ruling teachings are Tiantai, Huayan, Jingtu and Chan, in Tibet it is Madhyamaka and Vajrayana. To say that at least the paramitas and bodhicitta is common probably misses the point how such terms are used in the two Mahayana groups. For instance, saying that bodhicitta is separated to conventional and ultimate, that's a Tibetan thing. In East Asian Mahayana it is a given that a bodhisattva wants to liberate all beings, the 4 vows are regularly recited, but there is no special training for that like tonglen. The paramitas are known of course, but they are not emphasised and they are considered to belong to a gradual path while teachings like Chan are the sudden path.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 12th, 2013 at 7:49 PM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

Astus wrote:

Something regarding precepts (and renunciation):

"How is "keeping the precepts purely"? That means in twelve hours, stop all involvement outwardly, and still your mind inwardly.

Because the mind is still, you are peaceful while seeing a scene. Your eyes don't slip outward when consciousness arises by the seen, and your consciousness doesn't slip inward by the scene you see. The outward and the inward don't interfere each other, so we call blockade. We say blockade, but it doesn't mean "to block." The senses of ears, nose, tongue, body and mind are just like that.

That is called the Mahayana precepts, the unsurpassed precepts, also the unequalled precepts. All the monks, young or old, must keep the precepts purely like that."

(http://www.quangduc.com/English/zen/37zen_ancientmaster.html)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 12th, 2013 at 8:29 PM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

Malcolm said:

to give up attachment to the five desire objects, the five desire objects themselves are given up as part of the path.

Honestly, why is this so hard to understand?

Astus wrote:

Because it means, as I read it from your words, that one gives up what is seen, heard, smelled, tasted and touched. That is, the person becomes completely insensitive and incorporeal. I doubt that either sravakas or bodhisattvas would aim for that.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 12th, 2013 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

oushi said:

How would you people interpret the underlined part?

Astus wrote:

"Why? It is without creation and without destruction..." i.e. empty, without any essence. You just let it come and let it go, not grasping and not rejecting. So, you don't sever it and you don't not sever it.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 12th, 2013 at 10:20 PM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

Malcolm said:

When the householder bodhisattva possesses three Dharmas, having stayed at home, until perfect unsurpassed awakening, he never enjoys the five desire objects, and in that way develops the root of virtue.

Trisambaranirdeśaparivarta-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra

Because of this sūtra in the past, having abandoned the five desire objects, I will always take the [Mahāyāna] vows [samvara] at the six times.

Ārya-prabhāsādhana-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra

Astus wrote:

Not enjoying a sunset is not the same as not seeing a sunset. So, what is abandoned is attachment and desire, not the sense data. Even when contemplating the foulness of the body the point is not to see no bodies at all but not to see it as desirable.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 13th, 2013 at 3:44 AM

Title: Re: Dealing With Desire

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

The point of what has been said is that conventional Mahayana does not make use of the sense objects as Vajrayana does. It rejects them as unsatisfactory, relies upon antidotes, etc. such as the charming image you paint of women. The way to cultivate non-attachment in conventional Mahayana is by avoiding the objects. Of course, the goal is to develop mental non-attachment but the way to do it is to avoid the object and use thought constructs to condition oneself. That's all that has been said. It's really not a controversial opinion.

Astus wrote:

My point is that there is more than one method in Mahayana, not just avoiding objects. Sure, there are restrictive precepts, they are applied by every Buddhist who has taken vows from 5 to 250. Even Vajrayana samayas tell you things one shouldn't do. My argument is against the idea that outside of Tantra all there is is renunciation as the only way to deal with desire.

It is understood very well that desire doesn't lie in the object:

"The passion for his resolves is a man's sensuality, not the beautiful sensual pleasures found in the world. The passion for his resolves is a man's sensuality. The beauties remain as they are in the world, while the wise, in this regard, subdue their desire."
(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an06/an06.063.than.html>)

And there several methods known to handle passion (e.g. <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/kn/thag/thag.21.00.irel.html#ananda>). It is also not true that in Vajrayana you don't aspire to become free from desire, since it also uses several techniques to manage them. Saying that changing an impure vision into a pure vision constitutes a whole different system, while methods like switching an unwholesome mind to wholesome and such are just renunciation is overlooking how both are nothing but changing one's attitude.

The path of renunciation in a Dzogchen book is defined this way:

"In general, the Sutra teachings are known as the path of renunciation because an individual following this method may be obliged to give up a whole variety of things, such as sex and alcohol, and to avoid performing negative deeds. ... The idea is that by avoiding or eliminating the factors in our lives which inflame our feelings or fuel our emotions, we don't experience the same kind of problems. It is as simple as that!"

(Lawless & Allan: Beyond Words, p. 17)

That is, this statement is based only on the Vinaya, as if that were the essence of Hinayana and Mahayana. First of all, just by avoiding sex doesn't make one free from desire, so it'd be a very weak solution. Second, there are also lay practitioners who don't live a celibate life.

"People who see that their mind is the Buddha don't need to shave their head. Laymen are Buddhas too."
(The Zen Teaching of Bodhidharma, p. 39)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 13th, 2013 at 4:50 PM

Title: Re: Transgression, Tantra, Radical vs Conservative Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are always religious stories (hagiographies, myths, legends, etc.) that serve a purpose within their own context. It is an error to believe that such stories are actual historical accounts, that's not why they are told and retold again and again. It's like the tales told to children and films people like to watch, all that forms a cultural environment. Buddhist stories convey certain values and principles, but they are not direct reflections of actual historical events. Also, stories are usually written (long) after the events supposedly happened, and they are meant for a specific audience. For instance, Zen koans tell more about how people imagined Zen in the Song dynasty rather than anything historical from the Tang era.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 13th, 2013 at 7:38 PM

Title: Re: Transgression, Tantra, Radical vs Conservative Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

I believe that commodification and commercialisation of Buddhism is a necessary step in spreading the Dharma. Ordinary religious practice can be embraced by a growing number of individuals only when it seems useful, interesting, satisfying and it is easily accessible. Salvation of the masses takes simple practices. Scholars and ascetics are the elite specialists, the rest is satisfied with a few nice words and colourful pictures.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 14th, 2013 at 7:03 PM

Title: Re: Compassion and loving kindness in Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here are some Soto Zen related quotes:

"When great compassion is deep within you, and your wish to spiritually aid sentient beings everywhere is well seasoned, there are no such obstructions."

(Dogen: Keisei Sanshoku)

"If you can have compassion for your loved ones, have compassion for them. To have compassion for our loved ones means letting go of them."

(Dogen: Gyoji)

"Keep in mind that kindly speech arises from a loving heart, and a loving heart makes compassion its seed. You should explore the idea that kindly speech can have the power to turn the very heavens around, and it is not merely a matter of praising someone's abilities."

(Dogen: Bodaisatta Shishobo)

"Based on this, what is inherent in leaving home life behind is having compassion for all living beings as if they were one's own offspring. This means not giving rise to evil acts, and our body and speech being in mutual accord."

(Dogen: Shukke Kudoku)

"There is a very easy way to be a Buddha: Do not do any evil. Do not try to cling to life and death but, with deep compassion, work for all beings. Respect your elders and sympathize with those younger. When you do neither deny things nor seek them or think and worry about them - then you are called a buddha. Don't look for anything else."

(Dogen: <http://antaiji.dogen-zen.de/eng/sho.shtml>)

"Remain always compassionate, and dedicate the limitless virtue of zazen to all living beings. Do not be arrogant; do not be proud of yourself and of your understanding of dharma. Being arrogant is the way of outsiders and ignorant people."

(Keizan: <http://antaiji.dogen-zen.de/eng/zzyk.shtml>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 14th, 2013 at 11:54 PM

Title: Attention - Impending Structure Change

Content:

Astus wrote:

A new structure is going to be set up shortly:

Bodhisattvacarya

Mahāyāna Buddhism, East Asian Buddhism, Tibetan Buddhism, Sūtra Studies, Academic Discussion

Upāya

Meditation; Ethical Conduct; Engaged Buddhism; Prayers and Aspirations; Wellness, Diet and Fitness (sub: Alternative Health)

General Dharma

Exploring Buddhism, Open Dharma (previously: Dharma-free-for-all), Personal Experience, Dharma Events, Dharma Stories

Buddha Lounge

Lounge, Media, Language, News & Current Events

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 16th, 2013 at 6:27 AM

Title: Re: Compassion and loving kindness in Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

The question is what you consider Zen practice. Helping others, charity, teaching, and practically any act can come from compassion. Walking the Mahayana path itself is based on compassion, the wish to liberate all beings. If you are thinking of a Zen specific meditation technique to cultivate compassion, there is and there isn't such. There is, because buddha-mind is naturally compassionate, it is its active force. There isn't, because compassion is inherent in the buddha-mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 17th, 2013 at 3:02 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Manhood.

Content:

Astus wrote:

We should see that the changes in the conception of the Buddha (Shakyamuni, and a buddha in general) are results of doctrinal development in Buddhism. If we go through the stages in Mahayana (that is itself a syncretic view) we practically arrive where we have started. That statement that mind itself is buddha and there is no other buddha outside of the mind brings the entire colourful set of teachings back to everyday people who can realise and embody the principle of buddhahood in this very body. In East Asia this is called the "buddha vehicle", in Tibet it is simply Vajrayana.

"There are a bunch of shavepate monks who say to students, 'The Buddha is the Ultimate; he attained buddhahood only after he came to the fruition of practices carried on through three great asaṃkhyeya kalpas.' Followers of the Way, if you say that the Buddha is the ultimate, how is it that after eighty years of life the Buddha lay down on his side between the twin śāla trees at Kuśinagara and died? Where is the Buddha now? We clearly know that his birth and death were not different from ours. You say, 'The thirty-two [primary] features and the eighty [secondary] features indicate a buddha.' Then must a cakravartin also be considered a tathāgata? We clearly know that these features are illusory transformations.

...

Followers of the Way, true buddha has no figure, true dharma has no form. All you're doing is devising models and patterns out of phantoms. Anything you may find through seeking will be nothing more than a wild fox-spirit; it certainly won't be the true buddha. It will be the understanding of a heretic."

(Record of Linji, p. 19-20, tr. Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 17th, 2013 at 4:13 AM

Title: Re: What has Chinese Buddhism lost?

Content:

Astus wrote:

What you have listed as lost in China are art forms/objects and rituals. Chinese Buddhism didn't stop after the Song dynasty. And although this is a biased statement, I don't think that the Dharma lies in sculptures and ceremonies. Humanistic Buddhism is a newer trend, but it is just one of the many other schools. For instance, Chung Tai Shan doesn't seem to be strongly Humanistic (although they have their own modernisations to some extent). Besides the four big churches, Taiwan has others, and there is also mainland China where many ancient articles have been destroyed but some are still there. Have you seen the documentary "Amongst White Clouds"? I doubt that those hermits were influenced by new trends.

Similarly to the Japanese, Koreans like to say that they have preserved the original Tang era Buddhism. The Taisho canon itself was based on the Tripitaka Koreana. Nevertheless, saying that any school or country has the "original" and "ancient" is no different from "returning to the original". You can't have what existed thousand years ago. Religions change too. This is the fundamental doctrine of Buddhism, every compounded thing changes. Only the Dharma is eternal.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 17th, 2013 at 5:43 PM

Title: Re: What has Chinese Buddhism lost?

Content:

Indrajala said:

In the context of this discussion, I'm really talking more about Nara and Heian Buddhism which preserved a lot of Tang Buddhism. Shinran and Nichiren are not representative.

Astus wrote:

But it's quite obvious that Shinran and even Nichiren were in the end more successful in spreading the Dharma to a larger community than any Nara school, and Shinran beat even Heian schools. I think what is important is to find the right way to connect to the largest number of people and bring them the correct teachings.

From my perspective, old Buddhist art is more like curiosity than anything religious. I mean, I live in Europe, so the Buddhist temples I see are very recent or more likely a normal room or house decorated by some statues and pictures. True, they don't give the same impression as a Gothic church, but at the same time, old Christian churches are visited mostly by tourists rather than flocks of believers.

As I said before, religions change. Returning to "the original" is always an arbitrary choice. You could say that by simplifying the decoration in modern temples they are returning to an even earlier time of simple viharas uncontaminated by Hindu and Chinese popular beliefs.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 21st, 2013 at 12:46 AM

Title: Re: Dzigar Kongtrul Madhyamikavatara 2013

Content:

Nilasarasvati said:

distinctions between Cittamatra, Madhyamika, whatever!

Astus wrote:

It depends on which Madhyamaka or Yogacara you mean. There are quite a few versions of both of them, including unified theories found in later Mahayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 21st, 2013 at 10:43 PM

Title: Accumulate Merit

Content:

Astus wrote:

"With no understanding of the meaning of absence,

But engaging only in mere studies

And failing to engage in meritorious acts-

Such base people are lost."

(Nagarjuna: Sixty Stanzas of Reasoning, v. 31, tr. Thupten Jinpa)

"Practicing as a lay practitioner is conducive to cultivating merit, but disadvantageous to cultivating wisdom. For laypeople already possessing plenty of karmic blessings, it's even easier for them to cultivate merit."

(Shengyan: http://sanghau.ddm.org.tw/en/Teaching/TheMeaning_of_MonasticLife.aspx)

Doing good things generates good karma, that's a basic doctrine of Buddhism. Charity is the most straightforward way to accumulate merit. The laity supports the monastics by donations and in return harvests merit. But besides material support there is another kind. The Dhammapada says: "The gift of the Dhamma excels all gifts"

(<http://www.tipitaka.net/tipitaka/dhp/verseload.php?verse=354>). In chapter five of the Prajnaparamita Sutra in 8000 Stanzas it is explained that the greatest amount of merit is accumulated when one not simply copies and gives away the sutra but also explains them to others. In the Diamond Sutra it is regularly stated how memorising and spreading the sutra generates greater merit than any other kind of giving (e.g. ch. 11-16, 24). The Lotus Sutra has several chapters (17-19) describing all the immense merit gained by reading, reciting, teaching and simply hearing about the sutra. In the penultimate chapter (13) of the Vimalakirti Sutra we are told that the merit of that scripture is immeasurable, because "the enlightenment of the Buddhas arises from the Dharma, and one honors them by the Dharma worship, and not by material worship".

The <http://www.fodian.net/world/0599.html> Spoken by the Buddha for Ocean Dragon King, that teaches briefly about the four seals, states: "if one can accept, uphold, read, and recite them, and can understand their meanings, although he spends little effort, he will gain lots of blessings. The merits and virtues that he gains will be the same as reading and reciting eighty-four thousand Dharma-Stores." That is, by understanding the four seals one covers all the other sutras and the merit of their studying.

But there is more. Tendo Nyojo (teacher of Dogen) is often quoted, "Just-sitting is all you need. You don't need to make burning incense offerings, meditate upon the names of buddhas, repent, study the scriptures or do recitation rituals." The sole practice of zazen is enough. Linji goes one step further:

One day the Councilor Wang visited the master. When he met the master in front of the Monks' Hall, he asked, "Do the monks of this monastery read the sutras?"

"No, they don't read sutras," said the master.

"Then do they learn meditation?" asked the councilor.

"No, they don't learn meditation," answered the master.

"If they neither read sutras nor learn meditation, what in the world are they doing?" asked the councilor.

"All I do is make them become buddhas and patriarchs," said the master.

The councilor said, "Though gold dust is valuable, in the eyes it causes cataracts."

"I always used to think you were just a common fellow," said the master.

(Record of Linji, p. 301, tr. Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 22nd, 2013 at 12:59 AM

Title: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

Astus wrote:

Inspired by <http://www.patheos.com/blogs/monkeymind/2013/06/a-bit-of-what-kensho-is-and-a-bit-more-of-what-it-isnt.html>, I'd like to raise the topic here about the meaning of seeing the nature of mind. James Ford mentions the mystification of kensho. However, as long as "kensho" is considered some special experience, it is mystified. How can a sense of unity with every being or the entire world make a difference in our attachment to thoughts and emotions? In Shengyan's http://www.dharmadrum.org/content/chan_garden/chan_garden3.aspx?sn=48 the experience of unity is the second stage of three. But if you look at what Shangyan taught as the actual insight, does that sound clear or rather vague and mystical? How about the following descriptions:

Q: What does "not dwelling anywhere or on anything" mean?

A: Not to dwell anywhere or on anything means not to dwell on good or evil, existence or non-existence, within or without or on the middle, nor on concentration nor dispersion, and neither to dwell on the void nor on the non-void. This is the meaning of "not dwelling anywhere or on anything". Just this alone is real abiding. This stage of achievement is also the non-abiding Mind, and the non-abiding Mind is the Buddha Mind.

Q: What is the non-abiding Mind like?

A: The non-abiding Mind is not green, yellow, red or white. It is not long or short, nor does it come or go. It is not pure or impure, nor does it have birth or death. It is only deep and permanent stillness. This is the non-abiding Mind, which is also called the Original Body. The Original Body is the Buddha's Body, which is also called the Dharmakaya.

(<http://www.ymba.org/books/entering-cao-sudden-enlightenment/treatise-entering-cao-sudden-enlightenment>)

And this one:

Those whose mind has transcended
Existence and non-existence and abides no more [in them],
They've realized the meaning of conditioned existence,
The profound absence of objectification.

...

If one possesses a locus,
One becomes attached or detached;
But the great beings who're devoid of locus,
They have neither attachment nor detachment.

(<http://www.tibetanclassics.org/html-assets/SixtyStanzas.pdf>, 1, 58)

And this:

"Everything is coming and going, and we just let things come up freely and let them go away freely. We don't try to fight against our thoughts or any other mental condition, and we don't try to interact with them, either. The intention is not to grasp what is coming up from your consciousness. We actually do nothing but let the things happening within the mind just flow."

(<http://antaiji.dogen-zen.de/eng/okumura-zazen.shtml>)

What if we were told that the nature of mind is that all experiences are impermanent?
That's quite obvious, isn't it? Is there anything mystical about that?

Then the question is, why isn't that what is taught in Zen?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 23rd, 2013 at 10:05 PM

Title: Re: Where does Mahamudra fit in the Lamrim outline?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Thus, the explicit teaching of this Mahamudra is the Madhyamaka of emptiness free from discursiveness as taught in the sutra system. Ultimately, Maitripa's key notion of "mental nonengagement" or "mental disengagement" is nothing but the subjective side of what is called "freedom from discursiveness." The only way in which the mind can engage in this "object"—the absence of discursiveness—is precisely by not engaging in or fueling any discursiveness, thus letting it naturally settle on its own accord. In other words, the absence of reference points can be realized only by a nonreferential mind, since this is the only perceptual mode that exactly corresponds to it. This is stated many times in the sutras."

(Center of the Sunlit Sky, p. 55)

Brunnhölzl goes through the subject of Mahamudra's relation to Madhyamaka in that chapter on "The Transmission of Madhyamaka from India to Tibet". Also, if you look at the Jewel Ornament of Liberation, Gampopa brings up Mahamudra where he is discussing the practice of prajnaparamita.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 24th, 2013 at 4:41 AM

Title: Re: Where does Mahamudra fit in the Lamrim outline?

Content:

smcj said:

Which book of Brunnhölzl's?

Astus wrote:

It's the Center of the Sunlit Sky that I quoted from.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 25th, 2013 at 6:54 AM

Title: Dharma or Ethnic Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here is a recent article by Shravasti Dhammika that raises some very interesting questions: <http://sdhammika.blogspot.hu/2013/06/dhamma-or-ethnic-buddhism.html>

He writes there:

"When a western monk in the west asks to be addressed as ahjan or gelong, saydaw, roshi or sensei rather than their English equivalent he is identifying himself, not just as a Buddhist, but with a particular ethnic expression of Buddhism. When they chant in the Tibetan or the Burmese or the Chinese way the same impression can be created. ... Dhamma is universal, it transcends culture and ethnicity. The practice of the Dhamma is not the special preserve of any particular ethnic group. Let us practice the Buddha's teaching, not Thai Buddhism, not Tibetan Buddhism, not Burmese Buddhism or any other culturally-specific expression of the Dhamma."

What do you think?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 25th, 2013 at 4:50 PM

Title: Re: Dharma or Ethnic Buddhism?

Content:

Huifeng said:

So, using English is "universal", and not another "culturally-specific expression of the Dhamma"?

The irony!

Astus wrote:

I think he meant using the local language that people can understand. To make the message the important part and not the exotic smells and sounds. Although I think it should be recognised that a foreign look can be attractive, for a while, but it results in the high expectations discussed in the article that eventually result in disillusionment.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 2nd, 2013 at 7:50 PM

Title: Which Skandha is Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Is buddha-nature within one of the aggregates or not? The storehouse-consciousness in Yogacara is included in the consciousness aggregate (as shown in the Pancaskandhaprakarana). But often later schools claim that buddha-nature is beyond arising and ceasing, however, the aggregates are not. Assuming that buddha-nature is beyond the aggregates generates several problems (as argued in chapter 18 of the Mulamadhyakamakarikas).

Since the doctrine of buddha-nature is cardinal in both East Asian and Tibetan Mahayana, I'd love to hear some answers for the topic's question.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 3rd, 2013 at 6:54 AM

Title: Re: Which Skandha is Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The question about the relationship between buddha-nature and the aggregates occurred to me when I was reading Ringu Tulku's commentary to one of Gampopa's works. So, let's see first a Mahamudra work on the topic.

"The aggregates, the elements and the sense factors of beings have all from the beginning the true nature of awakened male and female buddhas and deities. As it is taught in all sutras and tantras, they are themselves buddha mind.

If, on the contrary, you assume that there is another superior buddha mind to be attained outside of your mind and believe that it is impossible that the extremely pure buddha mind exists within the mind stream of impure beings, that this is nothing but glossing things over and misinterpreting the vajra words of the secret mantra, you have distorted the meaning of the abiding nature and this is improper."

(Wangchug Dorje: Ocean of True Meaning, p 209-210, tr. Henrik Havlat)

Next, here is a Yogacara interpretation (note that there can be other Yogacara views, also note that what is discussed in the following passage from Xuanzang is not identical to the doctrine of "universal buddha-gotra" since there are several gotras):

"The 'meritorious qualities' (gunas) and the bodies and lands of the Tathagatas are comprised in the Skandhas, Ayatanas, and Dhatus, as it is fitting that they should be so comprised; but the Skandhas, etc., may be pure (anasrava) or impure (sasrava). ... It is certain that the qualities, bodies, etc., of the Buddha are comprised in the Dhatus. - Why? Because, according to the texts, all Samskratas (conditioned dharmas) are comprised in the five Skandhas, all dharmas are comprised in the eighteen Dhatus and the twelve Ayatanas ; there is no nineteenth Dhatu (Vimalakirti). ... Let us therefore conclude that the eighteen Dhatus are found in the body of the Buddha but are absolutely pure (anasrava)."

(Ch'eng Wei-Shih Lun, p 787-789, tr. Wei Tat)

The Tiantai understanding of buddha-nature is also interesting, as it is used to cover the entire path as shown in this essay: http://academia.edu/1138952/Chih-i_and_Buddha-nature. It is useful to have a deeper appreciation of Dogen's presentation of the subject in his writing on buddha-nature (<http://scbs.stanford.edu/sztp3/translations/shobogenzo/translations/bussho/pdf/bussho%20translation.pdf>). He writes (with reference to a passage in the Platform Sutra where Huineng explains buddha-nature as impermanent to a monk asking about the Nirvana Sutra),

"Therefore, that the grasses, trees, thickets and groves are impermanent is the buddha nature; that humans and things, body and mind are impermanent — this is because they are the buddha nature. That the lands, mountains, and rivers are impermanent — this is the buddha nature. Annuttara-samyak-sambodhi, because it is the buddha nature, is impermanent; the great parinirvāṇa, because it is impermanent, is the buddha nature. All those with the small views of the two vehicles and the tripiṭaka master teachers of the sūtras and treatises should be “alarmed, dubious, and frightened” at these words of the Sixth Ancestor. If they are alarmed and dubious, they are grouped with Māra and the aliens."

Also (with reference to a Zen story where Nagarjuna manifested the buddha-nature by appearing as full moon),

"Though the buddha nature has a “spacious clarity” that takes a “shape like” “the full moon,” it is not the case that it lines up with the “round moon form,” let alone that its “explanation” is “sound or sight,” or its “body manifesting” is form and mind, or the aggregates, fields, and elements. Even if we say it completely resembles the aggregates, fields, and elements, it is “showing by which”; it is “the body of the buddhas.” ... The buddha body is the body manifesting, has a buddha nature that is the body manifesting. Even the measure of a buddha or the measure of an ancestor that speaks of and understands it as the four major elements and five aggregates is the hurried act of the body manifesting. Since we have called them “the body of the buddhas,” the aggregates, fields, and elements are like this."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 3rd, 2013 at 3:45 PM

Title: Re: Which Skandha is Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

Astus wrote:

This all-pervading buddha-nature reminds me of the Huayan teaching on the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Four_Dharmadh%C4%81tu that end with the interpenetration of phenomena with phenomena, fully integrating relative and ultimate.

"First, [all] contain one to enter one.

Second, [all] contain all to enter one.

Third, [all] contain one to enter all.

Fourth, [all] contain all to enter all.

They simultaneously interpenetrate one another without obstruction or hindrance. ...

This is to say that all and one are simultaneous. Setting both against each other, each has the two-fold headings and four sentences just introduced. They fuse into each other in a total manner without any obstruction as seen in other aforementioned principles."

(<http://fodian.net/world/1884.html>)

Khenpo Tsultrim Gyamtso Rinpoche also has a nice poem, that fits more into the 3rd dharmadhatu view (interpenetration of principle and phenomena):

<http://www.ktgrinpoche.org/songs/concise-explanation-dharmadhatu-called-mind-itself-dharmadhatus-luminous-expanse>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 4th, 2013 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: If samsara had a theme song...

Content:

Astus wrote:

If there should be a single theme song, I vote for this (both song and lyrics):

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s = document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

"One who stays focused on the beautiful, is unrestrained with the senses, knowing no moderation in food,
apathetic, unenergetic:
Mara overcomes him
as the wind, a weak tree."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/kn/dhp/dhp.01.than.html#dhp-7>)

"Behold the puppets prancing on the stage, and see the man behind who pulls the strings."

(The Zen Teaching of Rinzai, tr. Irmgard Schloegl)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 5th, 2013 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: Which Skandha is Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

so does the Dharmakaya of the Buddha have Skandha's?

Astus wrote:

It doesn't have skandhas, it is the skandhas.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 5th, 2013 at 3:59 PM

Title: Re: Dharma or Ethnic Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"I heard that some students in the West went to a high-ranking Tibetan lama and asked if they could call their teacher "Rinpoche." In case you don't know, "Rinpoche" means "precious one." And the high lama said that they could call their teacher "Rinpoche" if they wanted to. That's how the Tibetan system works. There are no official pronouncements of what someone will be called. For example, I can take someone as my lama and use whatever title I prefer, like "His Holiness" or "Rinpoche" or "Yizhin Norbu," which is a name given to the Dalai Lama that means "wish-fulfilling jewel." The lamas wouldn't call themselves that; it is only the students who use those names to honor their teachers."

(Ringu Tulku: Confusion Arises as Wisdom, p 135)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 7th, 2013 at 3:18 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

Astus wrote:

What do you mean "at its core"?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 7th, 2013 at 9:38 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

jeeprs said:

'Mystical' is not 'vague' either. It is very precise and clear, but the subject is such that it is very hard to put into words.

Astus wrote:

Mystical, and the related word mystery, has always been connected to the concept of secrecy and hidden knowledge, therefore the meaning includes vague and difficult to understand. Just as you say, it is hard to put into words. And while it is common in a Christian and generally Western spiritual context to use "mystical" for a higher, divine knowledge, in Buddhism the expression for the highest realisation is "knowledge and vision of reality" (yathabhuta-jnana-darsana). It is not secret but apparent and as clear as day. As the original of the <http://www.fakebuddhaquotes.com/three-things-cannot-be-long-hidden-the-sun-the-moon-and-the-truth-buddha/> goes:

"Bhikkhus, there are these three things that shine when exposed, not when concealed. What three? (1) The moon shines when exposed, not when concealed. (2) The sun shines when exposed, not when concealed. (3) The Dhamma and discipline proclaimed by the Tathagata shines when exposed, not when concealed. These are the three things that shine when exposed, not when concealed." (AN 3.131, tr. B. Bodhi)

jeeprs said:

If it's not a special experience, why is there a Zen teaching? I think this is a misunderstanding of the intention behind 'nothing special'.

Astus wrote:

What I'm emphasising with not being special is the directness (zhi/jiki 直) of Zen. As Bodhidharma says,

"If you seek direct understanding, don't hold on to any appearance whatsoever, and you'll succeed. I have no other advice. The sutras say, "All appearances are illusions." They have no fixed existence, no constant form. They're impermanent. Don't cling to appearances, and you'll be of one mind with the Buddha. The sutras say, "That which is free of all form is the buddha.""

(Bloodstream Sermon, tr. Red Pine, p. 27; X1218p3c12-15)

It is the immediacy, the straightforwardness of the instruction that is the hallmark of Zen and the meaning of sudden enlightenment. Once the teaching is shrouded in technical terms and poetic nonsense it cannot function as a liberating method. On the contrary, it becomes a source of confusion.

jeeprs said:

recall that the nature of the tree from which the apple was taken in the Biblical genesis: it was the tree 'of the knowledge of good and evil'. I suggest the underlying meaning is the same. ... The act of renunciation involves rising above that or 'dying to the known'. But it is no small undertaking.

Astus wrote:

Good and evil in the Bible is based on divine law (obeying or disobeying God). In Buddhism it is based on intention. However, Huihai is not talking about abandoning morality but only abandoning reification and grasping. In the same text he writes:

"Wisdom is reached when you can discriminate between good and evil, as well as other dualities, but, grasping none of them, remain free." (X1223p19c6-7)

So, while in the Bible knowledge is evil, in Buddhism it is wisdom.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 8th, 2013 at 5:01 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

oushi said:

Why bother with impermanence if you have such a neat explanation which excludes everything without holding any exclusion?

Astus wrote:

Because unlike talking about an unseen "core", "it", or "ocean", saying that all phenomena are impermanent is easy to understand and confirm, and also it doesn't sound like implying some essence/substance one should find. Saying one shouldn't dwell on anything is good, however, it lacks the method to do that.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 8th, 2013 at 5:07 PM

Title: Re: Which Skandha is Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

Koji said:

The tathagatagarbha can't be a skandha. No way José! Here is why.

According to the Mahavastu, "There is no safety in the skandhas, but torment and great fear. There is no freedom in them: they are worthless."

Astus wrote:

What that quote refers to is not to identify with or attach to the aggregates. If you say that there is buddha-nature beyond the skandhas and dhatus then it has no relevance and no connection to any sentient being.

As Nagarjuna writes, "If the aggregates were self, it would be possessed of arising and decaying. If it were other than the aggregates, it would not have the characteristics of the aggregates." (MMK 18.1)

Substitute self with buddha-nature and you get the same problem.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 8th, 2013 at 5:54 PM

Title: Re: Which Skandha is Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Thats weird the Buddha said the exact opposite

SN 22.59 Anatta-lakkhana Sutta: The Discourse on the Not-self Characteristic

(the 5 aggregates are all listed) "Form, O monks, is not-self; if form were self, then form would not lead to suffering, O monks, since form is not-self, therefore form leads to suffering

Astus wrote:

Nagarjuna argues that assuming a self identical to or different from the skandhas are both wrong. How does that contradict what the Buddha taught?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 8th, 2013 at 6:15 PM

Title: Re: Which Skandha is Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

The contradiction is actually very obvious line up the quotes and you will see.

One says if the 5 aggregates were self it would lead to decay and ceasing.

The other says if the 5 aggregates were self they would not lead to suffering.

You dont see those 2 quotes being in contradiction?

Astus wrote:

If the skandhas were self they would not lead to suffering, therefore they are not self, this is what the Buddha says. Nagarjuna says that because the skandhas are impermanent they are not self. The three characteristics (trilaksana/tilakkhana) are impermanence, suffering, no-self. The SN quote mentions suffering, Nagarjuna mentions impermanence, and both prove that the skandhas are no-self. Where is the contradiction?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 8th, 2013 at 7:00 PM

Title: Re: Which Skandha is Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"If the aggregates were self, it would be possessed of arising and decaying."

That is, if self (self is necessarily something permanent) were identical to the skandhas

(that are impermanent), then the self would have to be impermanent, and that contradicts the very definition of self. This is what Nagarjuna says.

Here is Kalupahana's translation:

"If the self were to be identical with the aggregates, it will partake of arising and ceasing. If it were to be different from the aggregates, it would have the characteristics of the non-aggregates."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 8th, 2013 at 7:20 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

oushi said:

To understand something is to dwell on it. If you dwell on understanding of impermanence BAM! and you are confused needing to return to understanding of impermanence. How unstable, fragile and stressful it is. Not because impermanence is incorrect, but because nature of understanding is unstable, fragile and stressful.

Astus wrote:

If the instruction is "don't dwell on anything" or "don't understand anything" they can still be construed as conceptual objects, but unlike with impermanence, they are more difficult to comprehend thus giving way to incorrect application.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 8th, 2013 at 7:26 PM

Title: Re: Which Skandha is Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

that quote is saying IF the aggregates WERE self, it would lead to arising and decay
My quote says.....IF the aggregates WERE self, it would NOT lead to suffering.

Astus wrote:

Nagarjuna talks about the self, the Buddha talks about the skandhas. Different subjects.

Nagarjuna says that IF self=skandhas THEN self=impermanent (& suffering)

Buddha says that IF self=skandhas THEN skandhas=happiness (& permanent)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 8th, 2013 at 7:43 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

oushi said:

Why construct an object that is easier to comprehend? That would only make grasping easier. This quote you provided, about not dwelling, is ungraspable and makes everything ungraspable. That's the whole point, isn't it?

Impermanence is limited, because it enables temporary grasping. Everything will decay for sure, but some things last longer, thus we are tempted to grasp on them.

Astus wrote:

When it is easy to comprehend it can serve as a guideline. Without understanding the teaching it's not possible to apply it and gain results. It'd be like listening to the Dharma in a foreign language you don't understand. What's the benefit of that?

Yes, the whole point is to attain a non-dwelling mind. When everything is accepted and understood to be impermanent there is nothing left to dwell on. However, if we were told only "not to dwell on anything" then we didn't know how. Still, they are both fine and I posited the simpler teaching of impermanence against mystical-sounding teachings as outlined in the OP.

We are already in the habit of grasping everything. Impermanence shows that it's no use to do so. Some things seem to last longer, but understanding that they end anyway leads to letting them go. And when impermanence is applied to our actual experience, then it happens from moment to moment, and even in the present there's nothing that could be held on to, thus we arrive at not dwelling.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 8th, 2013 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: Which Skandha is Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

So which one leads to arising and ceasing the aggregates or the self?

Astus wrote:

It is already known and agreed upon that the skandhas are impermanent (arising and ceasing). The self is necessarily permanent, not arising and not ceasing. If the self were the skandhas, the self would have to be impermanent. That is, being impermanent is a contradiction for the self, not for the skandhas. Therefore, the self cannot be the same as the skandhas.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 8th, 2013 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

seeker242 said:

Was Bodhidharma wrong when he said it's hard to see, hard to fathom?

If it is not mystical, then how can a person hear 20 dharma talks about it, read 20 books about it, and still not experience it? If it is readily apparent and obvious, they should experience it after only 1 dharma talk yes? Or after only reading 1 book about it. But, that is highly unusual!

People hear the words "don't dwell on anything" and they say ok, that sounds good. I agree! Then they turn around and dwell on most everything. Why?
There are people who have been working on the Mu koan (or insert whatever koan here) for 20 years and still haven't got it. How can this be the case if it's readily apparent and obvious?

Astus wrote:

It all comes down to correct view and correct motivation. If one has the wrong motivation it is not possible to hear, understand and confirm the teachings. If one has wrong view, it is not possible to attain liberation. Motivation depends on one's personal background and then it is developed by the view. The view depends on the teachings received.

If a teacher can give the right teachings in an appropriate manner to a receptive student, there is no problem in getting results. You can look at the many sutras where the Buddha could help so many people. Huineng, Mazu and several other teachers of the Zen tradition helped hundreds of people attain sudden enlightenment.

If someone hears the teachings but fails to apply it, that is the lack of motivation. If someone hears only incomplete and misleading teachings, it results in the lack of correct view.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 8th, 2013 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

oushi said:

People found a workaround. It's called carpe diem. If everything is impermanent (and even science proves it is) lets enjoy the moment.

Astus wrote:

That is not the understanding of impermanence. When one thinks only about enjoying different sorts of pleasures then one believes the abiding existence of oneself, the object and even of pleasure. That is seeking happiness in pleasure. To see that pleasure is changing and lost every moment shows that it is not reliable, not a source of satisfaction, and attachment to it results in pain and sorrow.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 8th, 2013 at 11:04 PM

Title: Three Steps Insight Meditation

Content:

Astus wrote:

In Sakyapa instructions they use three steps for vipasyana (e.g. http://www.hhthesakyatrizin.org/teach_fourattach4.html):

Step One: Outer Appearances Are One's Own Mind

Step Two: Mental Objects Are Illusory

Step Three: Illusions Are Devoid of Inherent Nature

Why is there such distinction? If something is not really out there, it is illusory and without a self-nature. Is this meant to be investigating from different angles rather than separate stages?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 8th, 2013 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

oushi said:

1. Show me in which point carpe diem refers to permanence. It doesn't, because it doesn't have to. As I said, for atheists there is nothing permanent, and still they fall into ignorance.
2. In one hand you promote impermanence, and in the other you rebuke pleasure because it changes. If everything is impermanent what is a reliable source of satisfaction?

Impermanence is very useful if we apply it to the goal of the whole life. Still, that will not refute carpe diem. Impermanence needs to go hand in hand with Anatta and Dukkha refute it.

In a long run it will become a view and then we can ask, is impermanence permanent?

Astus wrote:

The permanence in carpe diem:

- assuming that there is a permanent self
- assuming that there are permanent things to enjoy
- assuming that there is a permanent desire

(Note: permanence is anything that lasts, that stays from moment to moment)

There is no reliable source of satisfaction, that the insight to be gained from contemplating impermanence.

From impermanence both no-self and suffering are established.

Impermanence is permanent (this is like saying that emptiness and buddha-nature are permanent). However, there is no such thing as impermanence as it is only the characteristic of phenomena. It is only a conceptual idea, and in that sense it is also impermanent.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 9th, 2013 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

oushi said:

1. We are grasping moment here, so it does not have to last longer than for a moment.

People go for pleasure knowing it will end. It is enough for the pleasure to be perceivable.

2. How do you define moment? Like Dogen? However, there is no such thing as impermanence as it is only the characteristic of phenomena.

Then why dwell on it?

Astus wrote:

A moment cannot be grasped. A moment is the present experience, and I use it in a similar way as point is used in Euclidean geometry, a conceptual element of time.

Why dwell on it? Just because something is conceptual it doesn't mean it is meaningless. In fact, concepts are the only things that have any meaning and they are probably the most important things we have.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 9th, 2013 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Which Skandha is Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

Astus wrote:

OK, then Batchelor's translation is misleading. The reason it was quoted for is its meaning that I think is now clarified.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 9th, 2013 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

oushi said:

When does the present experience end?

Astus wrote:

Now.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 9th, 2013 at 4:16 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

Koji said:

If the five skandhas cannot be transcended mystical unity and kensho are impossible.

Astus wrote:

There is nowhere to transcend them to. As the Heart Sutra says, they are to be recognised as empty.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 9th, 2013 at 4:55 PM

Title: Re: Three Steps Insight Meditation

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jinzang,

The order looks different than in the seven steps mind training. Establishing that all phenomena are mind is similar, but then here it emphasises first the dependent origination (2nd step) and then their emptiness (3rd step). Relaxing into the natural state comes after that with the unification of calming and insight (at least as I understand Sakya Trizin's explanation).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 9th, 2013 at 5:39 PM

Title: Re: Stream-entry help!

Content:

Astus wrote:

Theravada instructions:

http://www.accesstoinight.org/lib/study/into_the_stream.html

<http://www.thisismyanmar.com/nibbana/thtut03.htm>

Mahayana instructions:

http://www.buddhism.org/board/read.cgi?board=Dharma_Talks&y_number=19

<http://www.unfetteredmind.org/mindtraining/introduction.php>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 9th, 2013 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: Chinese vs Japanese pure land

Content:

shaunc said:

Does anyone know of a school of Buddhism that incorporates married clergy, meditation & pure land teachings.

Astus wrote:

Married clergy exists not only in Japanese but also Korean, Tibetan and Nepalese

Buddhism. (But I don't see why having married clergy is relevant to the issue.) Aspiration to be born in the Pure Land and meditation exists in practically every Mahayana tradition. At the same time, you don't have to become a monk to practise any of that. Although mainstream Jodoshu and Shinshu are "exclusive nenbutsu" paths, there are other Pure Land oriented traditions in Japan, and even in those schools it's not a sin to do some meditation (as long as it supports nenbutsu).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 10th, 2013 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: Chinese vs Japanese pure land

Content:

Greg said:

Really? I thought Korean monks followed the vinaya.

Astus wrote:

Yes, most of them. However, the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Taego_Order allows marriage.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 10th, 2013 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

Koji said:

Skandhas are the problem. Transcending them is the obvious solution. While it is true that the transcendent cannot present itself in the flux of inner, impermanent appearances, for example, the 3rd, 4th and 5th skandhas, we can, however, penetrate through such appearances, including even the 5th and, in doing so, recognize the transcendent, purely, on its own terms.

There is no mysticism with regard to the conceivable, impermanent mundane truth. There is only mysticism in recognizing the inconceivable trans-mundane truth.

Astus wrote:

Skandhas are not the problem, attachment is. If there is something beyond the skandhas, how could it be recognised? The skandhas include all mental functions, consciousness among them. If the transcendent you talk about is beyond the aggregates, it lacks all forms of perception and cognition.

"You who come here from here and there all have a mind to seek buddha, to seek dharma, to seek emancipation, to seek escape from the three realms. Foolish fellows! When you've left the three realms where would you go?"

(Record of Linji, p. 22-23; tr. Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 10th, 2013 at 4:55 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

Koji said:

The skandhas are suffering which is the first noble truth. They are also the killer (Mara). I would prefer to attach to the Buddha's teachings rather than the skandhas! If, as you imply, there is nothing beyond the skandhas, we are in deep doo-doo.

Astus wrote:

There is a difference between the five aggregates and the five clinging aggregates (<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.048.than.html>). The first noble truth is defined like this:

"the five clinging-aggregates are stressful. And which are the five clinging-aggregates? The form clinging-aggregate, the feeling clinging-aggregate, the perception clinging-aggregate, the fabrication clinging-aggregate, & the consciousness clinging-aggregate." (<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.028.than.html>)

Seeing the three characteristics of aggregates leads to liberation from clinging, but not annihilation (<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.085.than.html>). Indeed, the aggregates themselves are empty (<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.095.than.html>). When there is no identification, no obsession, then there is no problem (<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.036.than.html>). If, as you say, the aggregates themselves were suffering, the Buddha himself suffered since he had had all five aggregates.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 10th, 2013 at 5:59 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

jeeprs said:

Whatever 'it' is, is certainly beyond the realm of discourse. But beyond that, it is hazardous to say what 'it' might be. If you say that 'there is nothing beyond the aggregates and discursive thought' then you are throwing away the key to liberation. But if you assert that what is beyond it has substantial existence then you're guilty of reification.

What a bind!

The way I interpret that Lin Ji saying is the mistake of 'seeking elsewhere'. It is in line with his constant teaching 'what you are seeking is right here'.

Astus wrote:

If it is "beyond the realm of discourse" you can't say anything about, nor can you argue for or against it. Can't even think of it. Then how can you say it is "beyond the realm of discourse"?

As for something being outside the aggregates, the Lankavatara Sutra (2.18) says, "those who do not understand the teachings of the Tathagatas of the past, present, and future, concerning the external world, which is of Mind itself, cling to the notion that there is a world outside what is seen of the Mind and, Mahamati, go on rolling themselves along the wheel of birth-and-death."

At another section (2.53): "... the Nirvana which is attained when there takes place the severance of the bondage conditioning the continuation of individuality and generality of the Skandhas. ... [this view] of Nirvana belong to the philosophers and are not my teaching." Similar misunderstandings regarding Nirvana is stated in 3.74.

Also, as it is taught in Yogacara and followed by many (e.g. Hakuin), for buddhas the 8 consciousnesses transform (paravrtti) into the 4 wisdoms, thus from contaminated aggregates we get pure ones (see Xuanzang quote <http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=174056#p174056>).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 10th, 2013 at 8:25 PM

Title: Re: Stream-entry help!

Content:

lite said:

It's a study guide. I was looking for practice guide.

Astus wrote:

It includes practical teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 11th, 2013 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Context of "no practice"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Mazu Daoyi taught:

A monk asked, "What is the cultivation of the Way?"

The Patriarch replied, "The Way does not belong to cultivation. If one speaks of any attainment through cultivation, whatever is accomplished in that way is still subject to regress. That is the same as the Sravakas. If one says that there is no need for cultivation, that is the same as the ordinary people."

The Patriarch said to the assembly, "The Way needs no cultivation, just do not defile. What is defilement? When with a mind of birth and death one acts in a contrived way, then everything is defilement. If one wants to know the Way directly: Ordinary Mind is the Way!" What is meant by Ordinary Mind? No activity, no right or wrong, no grasping or rejecting, neither terminable nor permanent, without worldly or holy. The sutra says, 'Neither the practice of ordinary people, nor the practice of sages, that is the Bodhisattva's practice.

(Sun-Face Buddha, p 63, 65, tr. M. Poceski)

"No practice" is the highest form of realisation. In Theravada the arahant is an "asekha" (non-practitioner) because there is no more practice required. In Mahamudra and Dzogchen they call it non-meditation. This is the insight into the buddha-nature that requires no perfection, no purification. Linji's teaching that there is no need to seek anything means to rest all grasping and attachment, give up all fabrications and abide nowhere. This is the practice of Zen.

However, Baizhang Huaihai distinguished the different teachings and practitioners:

The complete teaching discusses purity; the incomplete teaching discusses impurity. Explaining the defilement in impure things is to weed out the profane; explaining the defilement in pure things is to weed out the holy.

Before the nine-part teaching had been expounded, living beings had no eyes; it was necessary to depend on someone to refine them. If you are speaking to a deaf worldling, you should just teach him to leave home, maintain discipline, practice meditation and develop wisdom. You should not speak this way to a worldling beyond measure, someone like Vimalakirti or the great hero Fu."

(Sayings and Doings of Pai-Chang, p 29. tr. T. Cleary)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 11th, 2013 at 4:36 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

Koji said:

If you are trying to say, in a round about way, that the five khandhas cannot be transcended it seems odd to me that the Tathgata has nothing to do with them, nor does a learned disciple. They reject them completely, in other words. So if they've left the burning house of the khandhas, where are they?

By the way, the Mahâsatipatthana Sutta says the 5 khandhas of grasping (upâdâna) are suffering.

Astus wrote:

If transcending the skandhas means not clinging to them, it is the very goal. If it means eliminating them and attaining a state beyond the skandhas, that is a false view of a self.

As in the above definition of the first noble truth, the "aggregates with grasping" are suffering. That's because of the grasping. Without grasping there is no suffering either. Just to make sure it is clear, the skandhas are simply the functions of seeing, hearing, feeling and knowing. A buddha without skandhas means that he can't see, hear, feel or perceive; no different from dead matter.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 11th, 2013 at 5:58 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

jeeprs said:

I think there is a sense in which that which is 'everlasting' is not something durable, which exists 'in itself', so to speak. It is imperishable in not being subject to change and decay, but it is not something completely separate to the realm of change and decay either - outside of time, rather than persisting through time.

Astus wrote:

It sounds like instead of choosing "yes" or "no" you select "yes and no". Alas, it's an impossible thing for something to be permanent and impermanent at the same time. What Dogen is saying, following Huineng (and Tiantai teachings), is that right here this impermanent, ephemeral world is buddha-nature itself. Same as Nagarjuna explained the non-difference of samsara and nirvana. Huineng's criticism of someone who proposed a separate dharmakaya:

"According to what you say, there is a Dharma-body that exists apart from physical form and a tranquil extinction to be sought apart from production and extinction. Moreover you propose that there is a body which enjoys the permanence and bliss of Nirvana. But that is to grasp tightly onto birth and death and indulge in worldly bliss."
(Platform Sutra, ch. 7)

jeeprs said:

But if you ask the question, 'what is it that is not annihilated at death', this question is not directly addressed.

Astus wrote:

It is answered. "And so, my friend Yamaka — when you can't pin down the Tathagata as a truth or reality even in the present life — is it proper for you to declare..." As Nagarjuna writes (MMK 22.15-16), "Those who make fixations about Buddha who is beyond fixations and without deterioration -- all those who are damaged by fixations do not see the tathagata. Whatever is the own-nature of the tathagata, that is the own-nature of this world. The tathagata has no own-nature. This world has no own-nature."

jeeprs said:

If your intention is to demonstrate that 'insight into impermanence' is not 'mystical', I don't think you can do that, because it is not as if such questions are clear and obvious for all to see.

Astus wrote:

My point is summed up with this: "as long as "kensho" is considered some special experience, it is mystified. How can a sense of unity with every being or the entire world make a difference in our attachment to thoughts and emotions?" As related to the linked article. It is arguing against the image of a special experience of unity with something transcendental. Not against that it takes time and effort to walk the path.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 11th, 2013 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

jeeprs said:

Consider this phrase from the quote of Nagarjuna's you provide:

Astus wrote:

So, let's look at that verse then.

Kalupahana in his commentary (p. 310) says regarding the expression Batchelor translated as "without deterioration": "The term avyaya in the present context expresses the same idea of stability and steadfastness achieved by a Buddha. This is not to assume his permanent existence." Tsongkhapa says (Ocean of Reasoning, p. 450), "being essentially unarisen, does not extinguish by essentially passing on". That is, just as the previous verse states, there is nothing that could be called existing or non-existing - not because there is something beyond those two, or because it cannot be said - but because it is not a thing but the lack of substance. As the Chinese commentary (tr. B.C. Bocking) says, "From the very beginning the Thus-Come was utterly empty; how much more so after his decease?" Same as the Yamaka sutta's "you can't pin down the Tathagata".

jeeprs said:

He doesn't really say what it consists of

Astus wrote:

He says that is is an experience of unity with lasting effect and leaves a vivid memory. If you compare that to the quote from Traleg Kyabgon Rinpoche, it is clear that such strong experiences are not insights but only visions. In Zen they count as afflictions, klesha, bonno. How could that equal to kensho?

jeeprs said:

And at that point the individual mind intuitively realises its non-difference from Mind

Astus wrote:

It sounds a like talking about the unity of jivatman and paramatman.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 12th, 2013 at 5:10 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

Koji said:

Transcending means, by definition, to go beyond the limits of the skandhas. Now this brings up an interesting question: Is the position of the one who is not clinging to the skandhas inherently transcendent or skandhic? If the latter, this implies the skandhas have somehow conspired not to cling to themselves!

One more point, in this passage it seems the Buddha is saying in so many words, eliminate the skandhas.

"These are the five aggregates subject to clinging. This Noble Eightfold Path is to be developed for direct knowledge of these five aggregates subject to clinging, for the full understanding of them, for their utter destruction, for their abandoning." The Connected Discourses of the Buddha (volume II), by Bhikkhu Bodhi, page 1565

Astus wrote:

The skandhas are what? All the experience there exists. It means seeing, hearing, tasting, smelling, touching. It means feeling, recognising, comprehending and knowing.

You propose that the experience of seeing is suffering, that being aware of something is suffering, that being able to speak and hear is suffering; therefore a buddha must be without all of this, incapable of any perception and comprehension. Even if there were something else beyond the skandhas, it would be without all forms of perception and understanding, it would be completely insentient and dead.

What I say is that the problem is not with the fact of sensing and knowing but with attachment. As your quote itself says, the "aggregates subject to clinging" must be eliminated. Aggregates not subject to clinging, that is the result, that is liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 12th, 2013 at 6:18 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

jeeprs said:

The fact that the tathagatha cannot be 'pinned down' does not amount to a description of a 'continually existing entity'. But that 'something is undefineable' or 'cannot be pinned down' is obviously not 'a definition' at all. Ideas of 'what exists' and 'what is permanent' can only be conceived in terms of 'the sense aggregates', and it is true that nothing in the realm of the sense aggregates is eternal or self-existent. But to say therefore that the Tathagata is impermanent, is to categorize the Tathagata with other phenomena.

The main point of the whole sutta is the idea that the view that 'the monk is nothing more than the total of the aggregates, and therefore ceases to exist at death, is a mistaken view - actually a grievously mistaken view ("evil supposition").

So I'm struggling to see how your views expressed in this thread differs from this same view which is being rejected in this sutta.

Astus wrote:

"Cannot be pinned down" is anupalabbha/anupalabdha/無所得. A central term, in Mahayana especially, as an equivalent of emptiness. It is often translated as unobtainable, unattainable and ungraspable.

In chapter 71 of the Lankavatara Sutra this "unobtainability" is explained as, "That [transcendental] knowledge is unobtainable is due to the recognition that there is nothing in the world but what is seen of the Mind, and that these external objects to which being and non-being are predicated are non-existent." And in chapter 83, "by 'right knowledge' is meant this: when names and appearances are seen as unobtainable owing to their mutual conditioning, there is no more rising of the Vijñanas, for nothing comes to annihilation, nothing abides everlastingly; and when there is thus no falling back into the stage of the philosophers, Sravakas, and Pratyekabuddhas, it is said that there is right knowledge. Further, Mahamati, by reason of this right knowledge, the Bodhisattva-Mahasattva does not regard name as reality and appearance as non-reality."

In the Heart Sutra there is this line, "Because there is nothing to be attained, the bodhisattva relying on prajna paramita has no obstruction in his mind." And Lok To writes in his <http://www.buddhanet.net/e-learning/harttr.htm>: "The Prajna Paramita Hridaya Sutra is the core of the Maha Prajna Paramita in six hundred scrolls. Its teaching is the teaching of supramundane Void as the only true existence, the true Void being mysteriously concealed in the existing. Therefore one might say the substance of this sutra is the characteristic of Void of all dharmas; non-obtaining is the purpose. There is nothing to be obtained from the manifestation of dharmas, all dharmas being void, or empty."

Because the aggregates are empty, there is no self found (unobtainable), there is liberation. It is indeed mistaken to think that someone perishes because there is no permanent self inside or outside the skandhas. Emptiness is not the same as annihilation, it is not an eternal substance either, but the dependent origination of all phenomena. Ignorance is taking the skandhas - that is, our realm of experience - as essentially real and graspable. Realising that everything is empty, unobtainable, is becoming free from suffering. But to think that there is something beyond this realm of experience as a place of escape is still grasping and self-construction.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 12th, 2013 at 8:35 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

jeeprs said:

So you are in fact saying 'As I understand the Teaching explained by the Blessed One, a monk with no more (mental) effluents, on the break-up of the body, is annihilated, perishes, & does not exist after death.'

Astus wrote:

No. Where did I say that the mind-stream is annihilated at death? Nowhere. All I'm saying is that looking for buddha outside the mind is mistaken.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 12th, 2013 at 8:39 PM

Title: Re: Koan practice in the light of the Nikāyas?

Content:

Astus wrote:

It depends on how you practise with koans. If you use them as a fixed object of meditation, that's samatha. If you use them to investigate the way the mind works, that's vipassana. If you use them to cut conceptual proliferation and maintain awareness, that's the combination of samatha and vipassana.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 13th, 2013 at 3:58 AM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

Koji said:

What then your theory implies is that the pañcakhandhâ, which are those of an arahant, are subject to Mara. The sutta doesn't mention upâdânakkandhâ are subject to Mara. So are we to conclude that upâdânakkandhâ are not subject to Mara and arahant pañcakhandhâ are?

Astus wrote:

There are definitive and provisional teachings. The Mara Sutta of SN 23.11 requires further interpretation in my view. To decide that, please clarify to me two things. According to your opinion:

- Where is suffering in sight (e.g. seeing a cloud) when there is no attachment?
- If the skandhas are to be abandoned, how can an arhat see, hear, sense and think?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 14th, 2013 at 6:36 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

Koji said:

Probably understanding what abandon means in Pali might help. Even the eye is to be abandoned according to the Buddha.

Astus wrote:

I'm simply asking for your explanation of the views you have put out here. Since at the moment I don't see it as in agreement with what is taught in the Pali Canon (and Mahayana especially), I don't see how it could be matched with any Pali term. But if you have one for it and references, please bring them here.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 14th, 2013 at 8:59 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

jeeprs said:

But there is, as you acknowledge, 'a mindstream' which functions as a quasi-self (or, more likely, a rhetorical device necessitated by a dogmatic interpretation of 'anatta'.)

Astus wrote:

Mind-stream simply refers to the mental aggregates. It's not some separate entity, but the flow of the moments of mental phenomena.

jeeprs said:

So when it is said that 'the Tathagata is deep, boundless, hard to fathom, like the sea' is this a reference to mere absence of lack of substance?

Astus wrote:

What is buddha? The mind is buddha. What is mind? The mental aggregates that are without substance. To believe that they have substance is the ignorance of self-view.

jeeprs said:

There is a state beyond ordinary sensory perception, but it cannot be discovered by 'the self'.

Astus wrote:

There is no self of any kind (provisional or ultimate). If there is a state that one is unable to discover how do you know about it? How can anyone know about it?

jeeprs said:

The phrase 'objectifies non-objectification' (vadaṃ appapañcaṃ papañceti) is key here.

Astus wrote:

Fabrication (prapañca) is the root of grasping the aggregates, and without it there is no grasping either. This is taught clearly in Madhyamaka and in Zen too. However, there is not something beyond to look for, otherwise we claim that there is buddha outside the mind.

"When the views of the self and being mine are extinguished,

With respect to the internal and the external,

Appropriation ceases.

Through this having been eliminated, birth is eliminated.

Through the elimination of karma and affliction there is nirvana.

Karma and affliction come from conceptual thought.

These come from mental fabrication.

Fabrication ceases through emptiness.

...

Not dependent on another, peaceful and
Not fabricated by fabrications,
Not conceptualized, without distinctions:
That is the characteristic of things as they really are."
(MMK 18.4-5, 9; Ocean of Reasoning, p. 376-376, 385)

And the buddha is nothing but the ending of fabrication, as <http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=174993#p174993> from MMK 22.15-16.

The Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment also says (ch. 2, tr. C. Muller), "the cessation of illusion is called 'unchanging.'" And in the next chapter explains, "the unchanging purity of the nature of enlightenment completely pervades—it includes everything without restriction. Therefore you should know that the six faculties completely pervade the realm of reality. Since the faculties completely pervade, you should know that the six sensory fields completely pervade the realm of reality. Since the sensory fields completely pervade, you should know that the Four Elements completely pervade the realm of reality."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 15th, 2013 at 5:14 AM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

Koji said:

While the typical profane person hangs on to them, the ariya disciple doesn't.

Astus wrote:

Not hanging on to the skandhas is not the same as eliminating them, because what is to be removed is one's attachment to the aggregates. This is explained often, as in SN 23.1 where the Mara theme is introduced.

Koji said:

When I read the Nikayas or Mahayana discourses I see only mysticism, which is all about transcending samsara, realizing the deathless—your read is probably different.

Astus wrote:

It is the kind of transcendentalism (similarly to Philosophia Perennis, Theosophy, etc.) that posits an ultimate thing above and beyond dependent phenomena that I'm arguing against, as that is the background of Ford's article. I'm not denying the validity of the third noble truth at all. What I'm saying is that the actual nature of all things is deathless and that there is no deathless beyond the things themselves, in other words, "Cyclic existence is not the slightest bit different from nirvana. Nirvana is not the slightest bit different from cyclic existence." (MMK 25.19)

Koji said:

Just curious, what is your basis for concluding there "is no self of any kind"? Are the skandhas your basis insofar as the Buddha said they are self-less (Pali, anattâ)?

Astus wrote:

The aggregates are neither self nor the possessions of a self, they neither me nor mine. That rules out both an internal and an external self.

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.007.wlsh.html> explains in brief how understanding this makes all the difference. A rather elaborate way of showing this is Candrakirti's http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Sevenfold_reasoning_of_the_chariot. As Nagarjuna summed it up:

"[The Buddha] has declared that form is not self, self is not form,

There is no form in a self, and there is no self in form.

These four ideas are conceived in relation to the form aggregate.

Any link of a "self" to the other aggregates is in all respects the same.

These twenty ideas are inverted views.

If one can cut them off entirely, this is the most superior [insight]."

(Letter From a Friend, v. 40; tr. Bhikshu Dharmamitra from Gunavarman's)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 17th, 2013 at 4:50 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

jeeprs said:

I am not claiming to know that, or to have realized that state, but I think the case can be made for it on the basis of documentary sources.

This is why there is a dimension of insight, knowledge, or prajna, which is totally beyond 'worldly knowledge'. You seem to deny that yet whilst quoting sources that I think are referring to such states.

Astus wrote:

So it is a matter of looking at the scriptures and treatises. I have brought here various works from different authors of Mahayana treatises to show how claiming that there exists something beyond the five aggregates cannot be established. Although Nikaya/Agama schools state that there is a nirvana without remainder where the skandhas are eliminated, that is not the Mahayana view (e.g. <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=167186#p167186>).

jeeprs said:

So, is the Buddha identical to 'the mind-stream'? I thought the theory was that when 'the effluents' were extinguished, the 'mind-stream' is no more, which would seem to indicate not.

Again, the point of the 'Yamaka sutta' which you introduced several pages back, is that it is incorrect to say that the nirvana of the enlightened monk is 'annihilation' or 'non-being'. When such a one has gone totally beyond 'mindstreams' yet they still are not non-existent. What kind of being is that?

Astus wrote:

The mind is not just the afflictions, in fact, those are only "adventitious defilements" and the nature of the mind itself is pure. This is the buddha-nature doctrine. When the mind-stream is purified we get to the buddha-mind (that includes the three bodies, four wisdoms, etc.). So, to say that the mind-stream is extinguished is not true.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 17th, 2013 at 7:56 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

jeeprs said:

In the first quote 'nothing beyond the aggregates'. In the second 'pure mind' which is 'not extinguished. Aren't these statements in conflict?

Astus wrote:

How so? The mind exists only from moment to moment, but there is a causal continuity. The death of the body is not the death of the mind. Liberation is not the elimination but the purification of the mind-stream. In other words, one has to see the nature of this mind and not go and find another one.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 17th, 2013 at 9:45 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

jeeprs said:

So I am still unclear. If body dies, but mind doesn't, this implies that a mind thoroughly purified is 'beyond death', does it not? And therefore not 'the same' as the aggregates. You said earlier that this mind was simply 'lack of substance'. But it is not merely an absence, simply nothing at all. That is nihilistic, isn't it?

Many of the Mahayana books I have talk about 'one mind' or 'Big Mind' or simply Mind with a capital M. That is a mystical idea, no matter how you slice and dice it. I'm not saying they're right, and you're not, but I prefer those intepretations, and as far as I am concerned, it is not nearly so cut-and-dried as you seem to think you have made it.

Astus wrote:

The skandhas can be split into two parts: rupa and nama (body and mind). The four mental aggregates represent one of the possible categorisation of mental functions. It doesn't mean there are 4 minds or anything like that. They are what the mind-stream is. Since the mind-stream is maintained not by material things (rupa) but by previous mental phenomena, with the death of the body the mind does not cease to function. That's why there is rebirth. And when the mind is purified there are the three bodies, etc., that is, all the buddha qualities and functions. This is not nihilistic at all, rather it might look like some eternal soul, but it isn't that.

The terms you mention are mostly the work of translators. There is no such thing as upper and lower case in Chinese or Sanskrit. Another difficulty is that in Zen literature they often use the same word (心 - mind) for both ordinary and buddha mind.

Capitalising it is meant to help the reader, but at the same time it gives the impression as if there were two minds. Zongmi often said, "That which is clear and capable of awareness right now is your Buddha-mind." (Jinul quotes it a few times, e.g. Collected Works of Chinul, p 272) Mystical or not, it is right here for everyone to recognise.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 18th, 2013 at 6:31 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

jeeprs said:

I think you are conflating the abhidhamma categories with the primarily mystical attitude that began to appear with Mahayana Buddhism. In fact in the abhidhamma mind is usually understood as 'manas' being the 'organ which grasps ideas'. I think the terms that are generally rendered as 'mind' in the more mystical sense are derived from 'citta' (as in 'bodhicitta') rather than 'manas'.

Astus wrote:

What mystical attitude started with Mahayana? Madhyamaka refutes the ultimate reality of the abhidharma categories, but as relative things they are OK. Yogacara embraces the abhidharma system and even expands it, further elaborating on the functioning of mind. Regarding mental activities in abhidharma, it sets up the two mental categories as citta and caitasika. Here is a Theravada explanation:

"According to the Pali or Sanskrit language, the citta, or mind, has many different synonyms. The most important ones are mano, manas, and vinnana. In the commentaries of the Abhidhamma, manas, vinnana and citta are considered to only be synonyms. Also in the Vissudhi Magga. Their difference is only in discussing different aspects of the subject matter.

Citta is defined as, "Alambanam cintati iti cittam," that which cognizes the object. That is the mind. When we speak of mana, what is emphasized is that which is thinking. "Yena minnyatae tat manas." So, the mind is considered as an instrument of thinking, as the action of thinking, cettana, and also as that which thinks about the object. Then, we have the vinnana, from vi- janati: that which differentiates. So, the mind is also that which differentiates the objects.

All of these meanings are there, and they are synonyms for the same thing. In the Theravada tradition, all are synonyms for the same phenomena, mind. What is most important is that the mind is understood as cetana, just thinking. What it means is that there is no possibility of what is common in European philosophy, "Cogito ergo sum," or "I cognize, therefore I am.”

In Buddhism, there is only, “Cogito er cognatio es,” or “I think therefore there is cognition.”

Cognition. There is nothing else to the mind. That mind, which is cognition, is also the instrument of cognition, and it is that by which the object is cognized."
(<http://www.phathue.com/buddhism/dharma-talks/abhidhamma-with-dhammadipa/>)

If you check Madhyamaka, they recognise the normal six consciousnesses, while in Yogacara there are eight. In Vajrayana they match the five aggregates with the five buddha families and the five wisdoms, in Yogacara the eight consciousnesses with the four wisdoms. In the Awakening of Faith in Mahayana the tathagatagarbha is matched with alayavijnana. And all these consciousnesses correspond to the mental aggregates in the five skandhas. Where is the extra mystical component?

jeeprs said:

My belief is that there are mystics within Buddhism itself, and have been from the very earliest times, and that there are a number of levels or layers within the teaching, mysticism being one of them. You can say that without saying that Buddhism is primarily or only mystical. It is many things.

Astus wrote:

What do you mean by "mystics"? Not that I have any problem with the term, but it'd be good if you could clarify what its significance is.

jeeprs said:

But there are somewhat 'quasi-theist' streams in Mahayana, notably, for instance, scriptures such as 'Awakening of the Faith in the Mahayana'.

Astus wrote:

What quasi-theist streams are you referring to? Could you point to it in Asvaghosa's treatise?

jeeprs said:

But there is another 'domain', if you like, namely the domain of laws, one form of which is the idea of 'dharmakaya', which is not the subject of the notion of 'impermanence'. Of course one has to tread carefully here because neither is 'dharmakaya' an 'object of perception' for that very reason, so discussing it in terms of permanence and impermanence might be misleading. However suffice to say that the Mahayana idea of the 'cosmic Buddha', a class of being that has appeared and will continue to appear 'through aeons of Kalpas', is only meaningful if the underlying principle, namely Dharma, is not something that is subject to change and decay.

Astus wrote:

If there is a domain that cannot be experienced it has zero relevance to us. On the other hand, in the Awakening of Faith and many other teachings it is explained how one can understand and realise the true nature of mind. For example:

"If they understand that, concerning all things, though they are spoken of, there is neither that which speaks, nor that which can be spoken of, and though they are thought of, there is neither that which thinks, nor that which can be thought of, then they are said to have conformed to it."

"There is only the insight into Suchness transcending both the seer and the seen; we call this the experience of the Dharmakaya."

And if you look at the practical instructions from the treatise:

Cessation:

"All thoughts, as soon as they are conjured up, are to be discarded, and even the thought of discarding them is to be put away, for all things are essentially in the state of transcending thoughts, and are not to be created from moment to moment nor to be extinguished from moment to moment; thus one is to conform to the essential nature of Reality (dharmata) through this practice of cessation. ... It should be understood that this "correct thought" is the thought that whatever is, is mind only and that there is no external world of objects as conceived; even this mind is devoid of any marks of its own which would indicate its substantiality and therefore is not substantially conceivable as such at any moment."

Observation:

"He who practices "clear observation" should observe that all conditioned phenomena in the world are unstationary and are subject to instantaneous transformation and destruction; that all activities of the mind arise and are extinguished from moment to moment; and that, therefore, all of these induce suffering. He should observe that all that had been conceived in the past was as hazy as a dream, that all that is being conceived in the present is like a flash of lightning, and that all that will be conceived in the future will be like clouds that rise up suddenly."

Their Unity:

"That is to say, he is to meditate upon the fact that things are unborn in their essential nature; but at the same time he is to meditate upon the fact that good and evil karma, produced by the combination of the primary cause and the coordinating causes, and the retributions of karma in terms of pleasure, pain, etc., are neither lost nor destroyed. Though he is to meditate on the retribution of good and evil karma produced by the primary and coordinating causes [i.e., he is to practice "clear observation"], he is also to meditate on the fact that the essential nature of things is unobtainable by intellectual analysis."

If you look through these teachings, these meditation instructions from Asvaghosa, it talks about not grasping at phenomena and also seeing that all phenomena arise inter-dependently. That is the realisation of the middle way. Same as in Madhyamaka and Yogacara. Also in Tiantai and Zen. It doesn't talk about anything beyond appearances, it says that the nature of appearances is unborn and empty. That is what has to be realised.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 19th, 2013 at 4:44 AM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

jeeprs said:

Yes, as a matter of fact. Zen Buddhism is deeply mystical. How did it start? With the Buddha gazing at a flower and smiling. One particular monk 'gets it' and also smiles. There you go, birth of a grand tradition, via 'mind to mind transmission outside the scriptures'. How is that not mystical? What do you think we're discussing?

Astus wrote:

The story of raising a flower was first mentioned in the Tiansheng Guangdeng Lu (Zen Classics, p 203), a Song Dynasty text propagating the Linji faction (The Linji Lu and the Creation of Chan Orthodoxy, p 39f) and their idea of "transmission outside the scriptures". Previous Zen records have no knowledge about it. It is at best the mythological beginning of Zen.

jeeprs said:

The alayavijnana is a mystical conception. It is often equated with Jung's idea of 'the collective unconscious'.

Astus wrote:

I agree, the alayavijnana is not a common term, however, it is well known among Mahayana Buddhists. On the other hand, it is definitely not a "collective unconscious". Everybody has their personal karma, their own habitual tendencies. Yogacara denies even the possibility of perceiving another's mind, sharing it among each other is even less likely.

jeeprs said:

Here I have a book called 'No River to Cross', by Zen Master Daehaeng. Almost every page is about 'one mind'

Astus wrote:

Look at how she defines the term Juingong:

"Why is it called Juingong? It is the doer, so it is called "Jui (主人)," and it is completely empty, that is, it is always changing, without any fixed shape, so it is called "Gong (空)". Thus Juingong means your fundamental, underlying essence, which is always changing and manifesting."

(No River To Cross, p10)

How is that different from Linji?

"What is dharma? 'Dharma' is the dharma of mind. Mind is without form; it pervades the ten directions and is manifesting its activity right before your very eyes."
(The Record of Linji, p 11. tr. Sasaki)

"Followers of the Way, mind is without form and pervades the ten directions.
In the eye it is called seeing, in the ear it is called hearing.
In the nose it smells odors, in the mouth it holds converse.
In the hands it grasps and seizes, in the feet it runs and carries.
Fundamentally it is one pure radiance; divided it becomes the six harmoniously united spheres of sense. If the mind is void, wherever you are, you are emancipated."
(p 9-10)

Later Linji also says,

"when it is realized that these six—color, sound, odor, taste, touch, and dharmas—are all empty forms, they cannot bind the man of the Way, dependent upon nothing. Constituted though he is of the seepage of the five skandhas, he has the supernatural power of walking upon the earth."
(p 20)

Daehaeng Sunim often explained that there is no point in praying to Juigong waiting for some sort of solution to our problems. What one has to do is to trust in Juigong, the true nature of the mind, and let go of everything, let Juigong take care of it. This is the essential practice of Zen, letting go. Although Daehaeng Sunim may sound like someone talking about Juigong as if it were God, a careful look at her teachings show that it's nothing like any deity of any religion, it is simply the nature of our own mind. Yotaku Bankei was also mistaken for a Christian by some because of his teaching of the Unborn. This is similar to people who confuse buddha-nature with a soul. It's all because people lack the necessary training in the fundamental teachings of the Buddha. It is one of the reasons I say that emphasising impermanence makes things easier.

jeeprs said:

Granted, many translations of the Awakening of the Faith are influenced by the fact that one of the original translations were by Samuel Beal who was a Christian chaplain. But the text is about 'the world soul' and 'the one mind'.

Astus wrote:

http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Translations/Awakening_of_faith.html is quite good. It does talk of one mind, and by that it means the mind of the sentient beings that is the tathagatagarbha, it has the two aspects of principle (emptiness) and function (dependent origination), and they are not two separate things or realms. This is what one recognises through the meditation practice described in the treatise.

jeeprs said:

And I emphatically disagree with 'seeing nothing beyond appearances'. The notion of the 'equality of nirvana and samsara' - and remember that is a very radical idea, which to this day the Theravada Buddhists have never accepted - is not that the uninstructed worldling is no different to the Buddha. How does Suzuki put it:

Astus wrote:

Is emptiness outside of appearances? No, appearances themselves are empty. The teaching of emptiness is a statement about the nature of phenomena. I don't know how radical this is when it is a core Mahayana doctrine and found in every tradition. It doesn't mean that there are no ignorance and enlightenment. In fact, wisdom is seeing that all things are empty, while not seeing that is being deluded.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 19th, 2013 at 5:26 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

jeeprs said:

What do you think is the significance of 'supernatural' in this quotation?

Astus wrote:

Its significance is in refuting the idea that one should attain paranormal powers. It points to the actual goal of Buddhism in attaining liberation in this body. That's why "walking upon the earth", a most ordinary activity, is supernatural.

jeeprs said:

Substitute the word Juigong with 'God' and any Christian would say the same. ... That seems to be the kind of 'God' that many people pray to and atheists deny. But the mystical understanding of 'God' is completely different to that.

Astus wrote:

That is, only a handful of esoteric oriented Christians would consider God as one's own mind, not mainstream Christian churches. But this is going to a "comparative religion" area that is not for this forum.

jeeprs said:

But she herself says in that passage I quoted, that it might be thought of as God. She doesn't have a problem with that, even if you do.

Astus wrote:

She says that one can call it god, father, mother, etc. It doesn't matter, because it's just a name. She is not talking about mashing up religious doctrines.

jeeprs said:

'The true nature', 'big mind', 'buddha nature', these are concepts from within a religious tradition, namely, Buddhism. I don't see how you can keep quoting them, referring to them, and saying 'this is what they mean', without acknowledging that elementary fact.

Astus wrote:

This discussion is taking place in the Zen forum. I happily acknowledge the contextual nature of terminology. As you say, context is very important. And, as far as I'm concerned, the entire topic has meaning only in a Buddhist context. Other contexts (philosophies, religions, literature, etc.) are irrelevant. And that's why bringing in Western mysticism and equating it with Zen - as done in Ford's article - is disregarding the context.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 19th, 2013 at 6:23 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

jeeprs said:

And if you spoke to a non-Buddhist about 'the nature of your own mind' what would that mean to them? If I stopped the man in the street and said 'look here, trust in the true nature of your own mind', how would he respond?

Astus wrote:

And what if you go to someone who knows nothing about Buddhism and ask them: Isn't it true that things change? Isn't it true that we give names to objects? Isn't it true that while things necessarily change we hold on to their concepts? Isn't it true that we have the freedom to grasp and let go of ideas? Isn't it true that holding on to unrealistic thoughts causes suffering? Isn't it true that if you find a view false you don't hold on to it any longer? Isn't it true that having a correct understand how we can see clearly what thoughts and emotions move us we can learn to avoid suffering and attain peace?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 19th, 2013 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

Koji said:

It better be something mystical like the attainment of nirvana which takes us beyond the kindergarten teaching.

Astus wrote:

Kindergarten is a pretty good place.

All the dharmas of this world and of the worlds beyond are without self-nature. Also, they are without produced nature. They are just empty names, and these names are also empty. All you are doing is taking these worthless names to be real. That's all wrong! Even if they do exist, they are nothing but states of dependent transformation, such as the dependent transformations of bodhi, nirvana, emancipation, the threefold body, the [objective] surroundings and the [subjective] mind, bodhisattvahood, and buddhahood. What are you looking for in these lands of dependent transformations! All of these, up to and including the Three Vehicles' twelve divisions of teachings, are just so much waste paper to wipe off privy filth. The Buddha is just a phantom body, the patriarchs just old monks.

(Record of Linji, p 19; tr. Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 20th, 2013 at 12:47 AM

Title: Re: The Two Truths

Content:

Astus wrote:

Relative is believing the relative to be absolute. Absolute is seeing that the relative is relative.

The knowledge that appearances arise unfailingly in dependence,
And the knowledge that they are empty and beyond all assertions—
As long as these two appear to you as separate,
There can be no realization of the Buddha's wisdom.

Yet when they arise at once, not each in turn but both together,
Then through merely seeing unfailing dependent origination
Certainty is born, and all modes of misapprehension fall apart—
That is when discernment of the view has reached perfection.

When you know that appearances dispel the extreme of existence,
While the extreme of nothingness is eliminated by emptiness,
And you also come to know how emptiness arises as cause and effect,
Then you will be immune to any view entailing clinging to extremes.
(<http://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/tsongkhapa/three-principal-aspects>)

Also see this brief and practical explanation: <http://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/patrul-rinpoche/two-truths-view-mahayana>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 20th, 2013 at 4:28 AM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

Koji said:

When you leave the house on fire, are you in the world of dependent originations? Are you still under the powers of the murderous demon of impermanence? Is there anything in the house on fire that can save you or other sentient beings?

Astus wrote:

Why leave? Linji says in your quote, "it will suffice for you to seek nothing outside."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 22nd, 2013 at 12:34 AM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

desertman001 said:

In dependent arising the first condition is ignorance, followed by mental formations then consciousness then mind and matter. This is all before the senses and before birth. So what is it that is being ignorant? Does this imply a mind prior to form? Is the condition prior to mental formation emptiness?

Astus wrote:

The 12 links don't describe some primal origination, it is an ongoing process from moment to moment, and from life to life.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 22nd, 2013 at 1:28 AM

Title: Re: The Two Truths

Content:

rachmiel said:

This, of course, doesn't help me if I don't understand what "relative" and "absolute" mean in this context.

Astus wrote:

To believe that there is something solid in our experience is the realm of the relative. To see that there is nothing substantial anywhere that could be grasped is the absolute. To perceive that appearances are dream-like without any basis is the middle way.

As Patrul Rinpoche explains under The Provisional Understanding In Terms Of The Two Truths:

"When we understand the natural condition of phenomena in general, and realize that they are similar to an illusion on the relative level because they appear although they are not truly existent, whereas they are like space on the absolute level because they can not be established as existent or non-existent, and we also understand that ultimately the truths are inseparable within the great Middle Way—the absolute space of reality beyond all conceptual extremes—the mind or awareness that has this understanding is relative."

rachmiel said:

Is "The knowledge that appearances arise unfailingly in dependence" = relative truth and "the knowledge that they are empty and beyond all assertions" = absolute truth?

Astus wrote:

Yes. However, as the verse goes on, it states one should not stay with the view that there are actually two truths.

Patrul Rinpoche writes, "The division into the two truths is only a provisional device, based on the distinct perspectives of two states of mind, that is made in order to facilitate understanding."

rachmiel said:

This sounds pretty much exactly like what I said: "Absolute truth is 'what is' (sans interpretation)." Am I misunderstanding something ... or is my take on absolute truth correct?

Astus wrote:

When there is still something, it is conceptual elaboration, it is interpretation. It's not that one should get rid of thinking and understanding, it is believing that concepts hold some sort of truth when one fails to see "what is". And by that "truth" the belief that they are contrary to reality is included. That is, as long as we think we should gain or get rid of something, that is the relative view and not the absolute.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 22nd, 2013 at 9:55 PM

Title: Mahamudra and Yogacara

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here it is shown how the practice of Mahamudra and Yogacara match:

Maitreya's Dharmadharmatavibhanga:

"The comprehension of the correct
Yogic practice in four points
Is the yogic practice of observation,
The yogic practice of nonobservation,
The yogic practice of the nonobservation of observation,
And the yogic practice of the observation of nonobservation."
(Karl Brunnholzl: Mining for Wisdom within Delusion, p 167)

Rangjung Dorje's Mahamudra Aspiration Prayer:

"When observing objects, they are seen to be the mind, devoid of objects.
When observing the mind, there is no mind, as it is empty of an entity.
When observing both, dualistic fixation is spontaneously freed.
May we realize the natural state of the luminous mind."
(Chokyi Nyima Rinpoche: Song of Karmapa, p 14)

Go Lotsawa's Commentary on The Distinction between Phenomena and the Nature of Phenomena:

"You may wonder, "Such is certainly the case, but if one holds that this text of the Bhagavan Maitreya is also a text of what is known as the yogas of Mahamudra, do the four yogas of this [Mahamudra] fit with those [four yogic practices in the Dharmadharmatīvibhaga]" They do fit very well. The first [Mahamudra yoga] is to look inside and then to focus on [everything being] one's own mind. As for the explanation [in] the second [yogic practice] that there is nothing external, it is the [Mahamudra yoga of] freedom from reference points in which one realizes that all phenomena that are objects of the mind lack any basis or root. The realization that both what appears as [if] external and the inner mind free from reference points are of one taste is the yogic practice of the nonobservation of observation. To not meditate through deliberately focusing on even the nonduality of subject and object is called "nonmeditation," which is the fourth [Mahamudra] yoga."

(Mining for Wisdom within Delusion, p 320)

Do you know of other correlations?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 22nd, 2013 at 11:38 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra and Yogacara

Content:

conebeckham said:

Which Yogacara? The one that posits an existent "mind?" Or later interpretations?

Astus wrote:

Which Yogacara posits an existent mind? It seems to me that only Tibetan apologetics invented that. Vasubandhu certainly did not.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 23rd, 2013 at 3:09 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra and Yogacara

Content:

smcj said:

Yogacara is the "Mind Only" school. I do not know of a variant that does not posit the existence of Mind, unless you mean "Absolute Yogacara", which is a Gelug pejorative for Shentong. Shentong does not posit an existent Mind, but they do posit something else. However my information comes from Tibetan sources, so I don't know the history in India. These things do evolve over time.

Astus wrote:

This is a useful summary by Dan Lusthaus:

<http://www.acmuller.net/yogacara/articles/intro-uni.htm>.

Mahayanasutralamkara, ch. 6:

"Realizing intellectually that there is nothing apart from mind, she understands then that mind (itself) has no (ultimate) existence. Understanding that duality has no existence, such a genius dwells in the ultimate realm which has no (duality)."

(tr. from "The Universal Vehicle Discourse Literature", p 52)

28th verse of Vasubandhu's Trimsika:

One does abide in the realization
Of mere [representation of] consciousness
When one does not perceive also a supporting consciousness,
For, the graspable objects being absent,
There cannot either be the grasping of that,
[Namely, the grasping of the supporting consciousness].
(tr. T.A. Kochumuttom in "A Buddhist Doctrine of Experience", p 258-259)

When consciousness itself
Does not observe any focal object,
It rests in the very being of mere consciousness
Since there is no apprehender without something apprehended.
(tr. K. Brunnholzl in "Mining for Wisdom within Delusion", p 262)

When in perceiving the sphere of objects, wisdom (jnana) no longer conceives any idea of object, then that wisdom is in the state of vijnaptimatratā. Because both the object to be grasped and the act of grasping by consciousness are not there.
(tr. Swati Ganguly in "Treatise in Thirty Verses on Mere-consciousness", p 130)

Mahayanasamgraha, ch. 3:

"When the mind encounters these objects, its knowledge of the rope is also negated. When with a parallel insight one eradicates the apparent names and objects that appear in these six images, then discriminative, defiled understanding in mental words will no longer arise, just as in the knowledge of the snake. In suppressing objectivity in these six images, just as was the case with the knowledge of the rope, by relying on the wisdom of suchness, the understanding of conscious construction only itself can be rejected.

In this fashion, in understanding that the images discriminated by the mental words appear as objective, the bodhisattva fully understands the imagined pattern. In understanding the meaning of conscious construction only, he fully understands the other-dependent pattern. But how does he understand the reality pattern? By abandoning any idea about conscious construction only! At that moment the bodhisattva clearly understands the imagining of mental words, which long since had been yoked to the permeations of hearing doctrine, and he suppresses any idea of their correspondence with the external world. These [ideas] no longer arise because their apparent objective status no longer has any cause and thus they do not even arise as an imagining of the mental words of conscious construction only. This implies that the bodhisattva dwells only in non-imagination in regard to all objects and names, and in virtue of non-imaginative wisdom he realizes and abides in the Reality Realm of suchness. He then enters the reality pattern because of the arising of non-imaginative wisdom wherein subject and object are entirely identical."
(tr. J. P. Keenan in "The Summary of the Great Vehicle" p 64)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 23rd, 2013 at 4:24 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra and Yogacara

Content:

smcj said:

Mahamudra isn't married to any one perspective.

Astus wrote:

True. But if you look at the initial post, it shows how a Yogacara practice - the four yogas - is actually identical to a Mahamudra method, stage by stage. And this is not only something I have noticed, but so did old masters like Go Lotsawa.

smcj said:

Since I'm a Kagyu, Khenpo Tsultrim Gyamtso's "Progressive Stages of Meditation on Emptiness" works just fine.

Astus wrote:

If you use a source that emphasises a different perspective you cannot learn the actual teachings of another school. You have to look at the authentic teachers of Yogacara to see what they say. It's just like reading a Theosophist or a Muslim writer in order to learn Buddhism - it is inevitable that they don't present a correct view. Since the three quotes from fundamental Yogacara treatises contradict the idea that they teach some sort of substantial mind, that criticism does not stand.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 23rd, 2013 at 5:54 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra and Yogacara

Content:

smcj said:

I'll stick to KTGR's synopsis.

Astus wrote:

When I said "authentic teachers of Yogacara" I meant those who uphold Yogacara as their primary doctrine and are regarded as Yogacara teachers. As for KTGR, when he talks about Shentong in that book, he identifies its source as the five treatises of Maitreya, and that includes the Dharmadharmatavibhanga where the four yogic practices are mentioned and then connected to the four yogas of Mahamudra by commentators. In Br nnholz's Center of the Sunlit Sky he practically identifies Shentong as Yogacara, since it is based on Yogacara texts:

"There is no Shentong-Madhyamaka nor any need to make one up. The subdivision of Madhyamaka into "self-empty" and "other-empty" is obsolete. ... It is all the more inappropriate to wrongly subsume it - as many Tibetan doxographies do - under the questionable category of "Mere Mentalism" and thus regard it as inferior to Centrism. It would definitely contribute to the appreciation of this Yogacara system for what it is if it were called neither Mere Mentalism nor Shentong but simply "the Yogacara System of Maitreya/Asanga" or "the lineage of vast activity."

(p 445)

Therefore, what is identified as Mind Only in KTGR's meditation book is only a lower stage to reach the correct understanding of actual Yogacara.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 24th, 2013 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: Who/what is the subject?

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://www.fodian.net/world/1564.htm#Investigation%20of%20the%20Presence%20of%20Something%20Prior>

Some say that whatever is involved in seeing, hearing etc. and feeling etc. exists prior to them.

If [that] thing is not evident, how can there be seeing etc? Therefore, the presence [of that] thing [must] exist before them.

What configures/makes known that thing which is present before seeing and hearing etc. and feeling etc.?

...

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 25th, 2013 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra and Yogacara

Content:

Astus wrote:

I didn't mean this thread to slip into a debate about what is and what isn't Yogacara. I find it most fascinating that a primary Mahamudra method actually has a Yogacara source. So I'm interested if there are other things within the Mahamudra tradition that can be connected to Yogacara.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 25th, 2013 at 6:03 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Silent Illumination/Shikantaza

Content:

beautiful breath said:

Well no other tradition seems to offer a clarity of teachings on Emptiness like the Tibetan schools do and I cannot find it in myself to mix traditions.

Astus wrote:

It is true that there are many great teachings from the Tibetan tradition on emptiness.

However, emptiness is a general Buddhist doctrine, so there is no need to feel bound to any tradition just because you like this or that teaching. Ven. Shengyan, following Ven. Yinshun, taught in a Madhyamaka style, so you might want to look deeper into their works.

As mentioned before, there are a number of differences between the path of Dzogchen and the path of Zen. It is mostly about Dzogchen being integrated into Vajrayana and carries with it methods like guru-yoga, empowerments, energy channels, etc., while Zen is not bound to any method.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 25th, 2013 at 5:43 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Silent Illumination/Shikantaza

Content:

flavio81 said:

Would you please elaborate on what do you mean with "Zen is not bound to any method"? This is puzzling me.

Astus wrote:

Zen is simply "seeing nature", i.e. realising buddha-mind. Because it teaches sudden enlightenment, it is not bound to this or that method, while at the same time there are no restrictions about what technique one could use.

Huangbo <http://www.abuddhistlibrary.com/Buddhism/C%20-%20Zen/Anccestors/The%20Zen%20Teachings%20of%20Huang%20Po/Zen%20Teachings%20of%20Huang-po.htm>, "The practice of the six paramitas and various other disciplines is known as the gradual method of becoming a Buddha. This gradual method, however, is a secondary idea, and it does not represent the complete path to Perfect Awakening. If one does not understand that one's mind is Buddha, no Dharma can ever be attained."

Also, "We are enlightened only by Mind, no matter whether we follow the Six Paramitas or other methods. All such methods and teaching are used only as expedients to help save all sentient beings. ... Since, in reality, the Mind is Buddha, the first and only teaching necessary for saving sentient beings is 'The Mind is Buddha.'"

It is summed up in Bodhidharma's four-line definition of Zen:

A special transmission outside the scriptures,

Not dependent upon words and speech;

Directly pointing at the mind,

See into one's true nature and become a Buddha.

(http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enUS/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=38&Itemid=59)

You call it "sutra school", but it's not based on sutras. You call it something, but it's not in words. You say there is a method, but it goes directly. You say it goes gradually, but this very mind is the buddha.

Linji says, "Outside mind there's no dharma, nor is there anything to be gained within it. What are you seeking? Everywhere you say, 'There's something to practice, something to obtain.' Make no mistake! Even if there were something to be gained by practice, it would be nothing but birth-and-death karma." (Record of Linji, p 17, tr. Sasaki)

Regarding sitting meditation, Huineng says, "In this teaching of seated meditation, one fundamentally does not concentrate on mind, nor does one concentrate on purity, nor is it motionlessness. ... In this teaching, there is no impediment and no hindrance. Externally, for the mind to refrain from activating thoughts with regard to all the good and bad realms is called 'seated' (za). Internally, to see the motionlessness of the self-nature is called 'meditation' (zen). ... The fundamental nature is naturally pure and naturally concentrated; it is only by seeing the realms and thinking of the realms that one is disturbed." (Platform Sutra, p 45, tr. McRae)

Dogen <http://antaiji.dogen-zen.de/eng/fzgi.shtml>, "Zazen is not a meditation technique. It is simply the Dharma gate of joyful ease, it is practicing the realization of the boundless Dharma way."

Keizan <http://antaiji.dogen-zen.de/eng/zzyk.shtml>, "Zazen is far beyond the form of sitting or lying down. ... Now, zazen is entering directly into the ocean of buddha-nature and manifesting the body of the Buddha. The pure and clear mind is actualized in the present moment; the original light shines everywhere."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 25th, 2013 at 6:00 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Silent Illumination/Shikantaza

Content:

Sönam said:

This is a total misconception (outsider view) about Dzogchen ... Dzogchen is not integrated into Vajrayana. Dzogchen is not integrating in anything, for it integrates anything ... even hinayana or any sutra teachings.

Method like GY exist, because the student has been introduced by the master to his real nature, Buddha nature. Therefore Dzogchen GY reactivates that process (being in the state of the master).

... because of the blessing of the master.

Astus wrote:

I don't know of any Buddhist tradition outside of Vajrayana that has guru-yoga, or the idea that a teacher is required to introduce the nature of mind, or that there are such things as blessings. You say all of that exist in Dzogchen, and that's what I meant by being part of Vajrayana.

As for claiming superiority (that anyone can do and has little meaning), Yogi Chen <http://www.yogichen.org/cw/cw33/bk090.html> about Zen, "It is really beyond doctrine at all. Just realization to realization, I use my realization to touch your realization. This means that at the same time the Guru and disciple are in Truth. It is very important, this is the real Chan. Beyond Mahamudra which uses four Yogas and the Great Perfection, which uses initiation too."

He also has an essay: <http://www.yogichen.org/gurulin/efiles/e0/e0164.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 25th, 2013 at 10:42 PM

Title: Re: Lineage and Individual Approaches to Practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

What is it to receive transmission from a lineage? It is to receive teachings. The same teachings can also be written down. Reading the sutras is receiving the teachings of Shakyamuni Buddha. Numerous Mahayana scriptures state that they are in and of themselves are authentic and sufficient sources of the Dharma. There are also sutras that describe the method to meet other buddhas and receive teachings from them. Sutras also teach how to attain different levels of enlightenment. What could be missing then?

Diamond Sutra (http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html#div-8):

"Subhūti, all of the buddhas and all of their teachings of peerless perfect enlightenment spring forth from this sūtra."

Some passages from the Lotus Sutra (tr. Tsugunari Kubo and Akira Yuyama; BDK English Tripiṭaka Series, 2007):

If there are any sons or daughters of a virtuous family who preserve, recite, explain, and copy even a single line of the Lotus Sutra, or who pay homage to this sutra with various offerings of flowers, perfumes, necklaces, scented powders and ointments, burning incense, canopies, flags, banners, clothing, or music, or who honor it with their palms pressed together, such people should be respected by the entire world. They should be revered in the same way as the Tathāgata is revered. Know that these people are great bodhisattvas who are to attain highest, complete enlightenment. Out of their compassion for sentient beings they wish to be born among them in order to expound and explain the Lotus Sutra far and wide. How much more to be honored are those who completely preserve the entire sutra and pay homage to it with various offerings!

(ch 10)

Wherever this sutra is taught, read, recited, copied, or wherever it is to be found, one should build a seven-jeweled stupa of great height and width and richly ornamented. There is no need to put a relic inside. Why is this? Because the Tathāgata is already in it.

(ch 10)

Those sons and daughters of a virtuous family, who preserve and recite this sutra after my parinirvāṇa will attain good qualities like those mentioned above. You should know that such people have already set out for the terrace of enlightenment, are near to highest, complete enlightenment, and are seated under the bodhi tree.

(ch 17)

O Mahāsthāmaprāpta, know that this Lotus Sutra will greatly benefit the bodhisattva mahāsattvas and lead them to highest, complete enlightenment. For this reason, after the Tathāgata's parinirvāṇa the bodhisattva mahāsattvas should always preserve, recite, explain, and copy this sutra.
(ch 20)

To sum up, in this sutra I have clearly revealed and taught all the teachings of the Tathāgata, all the transcendent powers of the Tathāgata, all the treasure houses of the hidden essence of the Tathāgata, and all the profound aspects of the Tathāgata. For this reason, after the parinirvāṇa of the Tathāgata, you should wholeheartedly preserve, recite, explain, and copy it, and practice according to the teaching. Those who accept, recite, explain, and copy it, and practice according to the teaching, in whichever land they may be, in a place where the sutra abides—either in a garden, a forest, under a tree, in a monk's chamber, in a layman's house, in a palace, on a mountain, in a valley, or in the wilderness—in all of these places they should erect and pay homage to a monument. Why is this? Because you should know that these places are the terraces of enlightenment where all the buddhas have attained highest, complete enlightenment, where all the buddhas have turned the wheel of the Dharma, and where all the buddhas entered parinirvāṇa.
(ch 21)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 25th, 2013 at 11:42 PM

Title: Re: Lineage and Individual Approaches to Practice

Content:

heart said:

If you want to master it, you need a master.

Astus wrote:

On the one hand, I think that people can read the sutras as they are. On the other, there are commentaries, written by various masters. I don't mean there is no use for a living teacher, however, receiving teachings on the Lotus Sutra, the Avatamsaka Sutra, or practically any sutra, is quite difficult to come by in the West. And there aren't many commentaries translated either. Although it is understandable in light of the popular concept that one just needs to visit a Dharma centre and follow whatever the local leader says. Probably it takes monastics to establish a solid scriptural system as lay people are rarely interested in such things.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 26th, 2013 at 9:14 PM

Title: Re: Vairocana

Content:

Astus wrote:

The "dharmakaya" is a very abstract concept, and it is without form. Vairocana had its own cult and other devotional and meditational elements that other popular buddhas. It is his symbolic aspect that is identified with the ultimate truth. The Wikipedia explains briefly: <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Vairocana>

Vairocana attained enlightenment, has his own buddha-land (Padma-garbha-loka-dhatu), etc. (Guang Xing: The Concept of the Buddha, p 169-171). There's also this essay that has some info on him: <http://ccbs.ntu.edu.tw/FULLTEXT/JR-PHIL/ew26987.htm>.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 27th, 2013 at 12:46 AM

Title: Re: Lineage and Individual Approaches to Practice

Content:

JKhedrup said:

The Tibetan tradition seems to value the shastras over the sutras generally, perhaps because they summarize and explain the extensive doctrines contained in the Mahayana Canon, which is extremely vast.

Astus wrote:

For that we might say that Tibetan and East Asian Buddhism are complementary as native Chinese schools are more focused on sutras.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 29th, 2013 at 4:38 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra and Yogacara

Content:

monktastic said:

Being endlessly curious (but end-fully knowledgable) about the finer philosophical issues, I'd like to ask: isn't this also true of Zen, and quite possible, Advaita Vedanta?

Astus wrote:

That's one of the problems with accepting the idea that one can just practise without understanding the relevant views. It is philosophical naivete, i.e. accepting things at face value without investigation. Mahamudra teaches to first establish "the view", although it doesn't mean a conceptual understanding but rather the experiential confirmation of the nature of the mind. Still, considering all the methods and underlying doctrines involved, it is superficial to claim being beyond dogmas and such. The same is true for every system that likes to appear as "strictly practical". In the starting post of this thread it is shown how Yogacara and Mahamudra have exactly the same meditation steps, making their "practical aspect" identical. But then you hear all the arguments how Yogacara is only Sutrayana and Mahamudra is the pinnacle of Vajrayana.

Dependent origination is a fundamental teaching of the Buddha. In terms of teachings, it means that one should remain aware of the context. If you change the context of a sentence you change its meaning. Same is true for personal experience, because raw experience itself lacks meaning, only concepts can give it importance and content. Even if we theorise that there is such a thing as a universal (religious) experience (as Theosophists believe), even then it is always dependent on the context it is experienced in. That's why it is not irrelevant according to what view one wants to attain what.

In Buddhism this comes up regarding meditation. In the Brahmajala Sutta the Buddha lists the various wrong views different philosophers/priests believe based on what level of absorption (jhana) they experienced. And while Buddhists also know about those, because they see that they are all impermanent and without self, there is no attachment. Whenever one considers any experience as the ultimate, deviates from the middle way of emptiness.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 30th, 2013 at 6:46 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra and Yogacara

Content:

monktastic said:

In my own understanding, what Advaita posits is transcendent and beyond the realm of intellect or concept, and the same is true of Zen. This is not to say that the three systems are equal (this is trivially falsifiable), but that nonconceptual views do not seem to have readily identifiable features that could reasonably differentiate them -- and this is not coincidental.

Astus wrote:

Leaving unrelated comparisons (except with Yogacara of course) behind, there are two ways non-conceptuality can be understood. One is the simple lack of concepts (like a gorilla staring into space), and the other is not being attached to concepts. The first kind is present in everyday life and in the various levels of absorption from the second dhyana on. Those who consider the complete lack of conceptuality the ultimate are categorised in the Brahmajala Sutta under Asaññivāda, and these unconscious beings (asaññasatta) have their own heaven. In Mahamudra it is called the deviation of grasping non-thought. The second type, that is what Buddhism generally aims for, and that is wisdom. Wisdom is called non-conceptuality because appearances are not reified and grasped but seen as they actually are: empty and interdependent. Or, as the nature of the mind is described: empty and aware. Empty, because it doesn't hold on to anything. Aware, because it clearly perceives everything. That's how, unlike other philosophies and religions, Buddhism doesn't have any ultimate being or essence, not even a special experience. And even when it calls something the true substance and source of everything, it is simply this empty awareness that is not found anywhere.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 30th, 2013 at 5:51 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra and Yogacara

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here are two commentaries on the Dharmadhatuvibhanga's stanza defining the nature of phenomena. Go Lotsawa states how it is the pure mind-stream, the luminosity, and Rangjung Dorje shows how it is the same everywhere and explains the emptiness of the three svabhavas.

Furthermore, the defining characteristic of the nature of phenomena
Is suchness, which lacks any distinction
Between apprehender and apprehended,
Or [between] objects of designation and what designates them.

Go Lotsawa's commentary (Mining for Wisdom within Delusion", p 303):

Therefore, what is called "the nature of phenomena" is the continuum of the mind that is of one taste, just like the expanse of space, because all phenomena of samsara do not go beyond this nature either. With regard to this, some [say] that [the nature of phenomena] is either [suitable as] a nonimplicative negation [in the sense] of being the nonexistence of apprehender and apprehended or that it is suitable as an implicative negation [in the sense] of existing as this very nonexistence of nonduality. Though there are assertions of such [negations] being the nature of phenomena, here it is not like that because the commentary [by Vasubandhu] explains it to be nothing but the continuum of stainless mind. For the Mahayanasutralankara also says that it is the pure luminous mind:

Mind is held to be always luminous by nature,
Contaminated [only] by adventitious flaws.
Apart from the mind that is the nature of phenomena,
Another mind's luminosity in nature is not taught.

The Third Karmapa's commentary (p 229-230):

This is what was stated above: "The defining characteristic of the nature of phenomena is suchness, which lacks any distinction between apprehender and apprehended, or [between] objects of designation and what designates them." This is the perfect nature, for which numerous synonyms are given in all the sutras and tantras. Glorious Naropa says:

This very being empty is awareness, mind.
Also bodhicitta is just this.
The tathagata heart is nothing but this.
Great bliss is precisely this.

What is called "secret mantra" is just this.
The reality of valid cognition is exactly this.
The fourth empowerment is this.
Connate joy is nothing but this.

The paramitas are precisely this.

Unity is simply this.
Great Madhyamaka is solely this.
Vairocana is this.

Vajrasattva is simply this.
The sixth family is only this.
The buddha disposition is just this.
Many enumerations, such as these,
Which are stated in the sutras and tantras,
Are for the most part based on this.

As for the meaning of noble Nagarjuna's statement that all phenomena lack a nature, the nature of all phenomena is that they neither arise by nature nor cease by nature. For this reason, since they are not real as being permanent or extinct, coming or going, or one or different, they are free from reference points. Therefore, they are both "all phenomena" and "the lack of a nature." The enumerations [of this lack of nature] are "the lack of nature in terms of characteristics," "the lack of nature in terms of arising," and "the ultimate lack of nature," which are taught in relation to the imaginary, {528} the dependent, and the perfect [natures], respectively. One should understand that all [kinds of] emptiness are also divisions [that are derived] from this.

As for extreme interpretations of annihilation and permanence, Taranatha rejects both (The Essence of Zhentong, p 19-20):

In the Laṅkāvatāra-sūtra others asked, "Aren't the major and minor marks of the enlightened essence the same features as those of the soul of the extremists?" In response, it was explained [by the Buddha] that "These are not the same features because they are of emptiness." So, it is said that this enlightened essence does not exist as real, and if these major and minor marks were to exist, then they would be from the system of the extremists. It is also said that like space, what is not established whatsoever is known as the "enlightened essence."

However, the mere recognition of different kinds of emptiness as meaning the unreal and the non-existence of anything whatsoever without definition is the mental fault of fixating onto one's own erroneous philosophical system. From the [Laṅkāvatāra-] sūtra it reads, "The reason why these are not the same features as the extremists is because of the manifestation of emptiness, not because these major and minor marks are not manifest." So, the claim that the enlightened essence of the completely radiant major and minor marks is explained to be interpretive in meaning is reduced to a mere deception within the world of lies.

The claim that the [enlightened] essence is permanent as asserted within the system of the extremists is also reduced to a refutation within the Essence Sūtras. Moreover, it is not acceptable to assert that the meaning of permanence is the permanence of a continuum. This is because saṃsāra, the entire subject-object complex, is merely the permanence of a continuum. So, if the mere permanence of a continuum was sufficiently permanent, then all conditioned phenomena would have to be permanent. Brühnholz (In Praise of Dharmadhātu) has a section for the question "Is Buddha Nature an Eternal Soul or Sheer Emptiness?" There he quotes Mipham (p 105):

In this way, Buddhist and non-Buddhist philosophical systems cannot be distinguished through mere words, but as far as the profound essential point is concerned, they are as different as the earth is from the sky. Hence, after his arrival in Tibet, Atiśa said that, in the India of his days, it is difficult to distinguish Buddhist and non-Buddhist philosophical systems.

And concludes (p 109):

To summarize, when not just clinging to the words but understanding what is conveyed by these words, let alone Nāgārjuna's Dharmadhātustava, in Indian Yogācāra texts too, there is no reifying interpretation of tathāgatagarbha. The teachings on buddha nature were never designed as a doctrinal or ontological alternative to or replacement of emptiness. Tathāgatagarbha—the luminous nature of the mind—is not regarded as a monistic absolute beside which all other phenomena have a mere status of emptiness. Rather, it is the natural state of our mind, in which no self-delusion is ever at work. The default example used throughout tathāgatagarbha texts for this nature of the mind being without reference points, inexpressible, and indemonstrable is space. Still, in order to clarify that the ungraspable expanse of the mind is not just a mere inert vacuum, but that this expanse is vivid sheer experience—the natural unity of expanse and wisdom—these texts also give many examples for the luminous aspect of mind's nature and its boundless inseparable qualities.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 30th, 2013 at 9:46 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra and Yogacara

Content:

jeeprs said:

It is true that this nature ought not to be reified, but not to reify it is not to say that it is non-existent. It is neither 'something that exists' or 'non-existence', being beyond opposites.

Astus wrote:

The problem is with the idea: it. The four yogas described in Yogacara and Mahamudra show the path and the result. Objects are only products of the mind, mind itself is nothing real whatsoever, without both subject and object the correct realisation of suchness is there, but even that shouldn't be grasped. All four possibilities (is, isn't, both, neither) presuppose something what one can make statements about, and that is reification.

If you want a Zen take on it, look at the discourses of Huairang, Xuanjue and Shenhui in the Platform Sutra (ch. 7 & 8).

the master asked "Where have you come from?"

[Huairang] said, "Mount Song."

The master said, "[No matter] what kind of thing, how would it come?"

[Huairang] said, "If you say it's like a single thing, then you're off the mark."

[Xuanjue] said, "How can the birthless have a meaning?"

The master said, "If there is no meaning, who is it that discriminates?"

[Xuanjue] said, "Nor is discrimination a meaning."

One day the master announced to the assembly, "I have a thing without head or tail, without name or title, without front or back. Do you know what it is?"

Shenhui came forth and said, "It is the fundamental source of the buddhas. It is my buddha-nature."

The master said, "I told you it was without name or title, but you have called it the fundamental source, the buddha-nature. You've just covered your head with thatch. You've become a follower with only discriminative understanding."

jeeprs said:

That is 'natural' for us, and what needs to be surmounted or abandoned. You can't deny the fundamental distinction between the Buddhas and the unenlightened. Otherwise, how would there be any path or training? What would there be to teach?

Astus wrote:

Calling it "natural" or "ordinary" mind is simply a matter of terminology, and it is not meant for those who are not already familiar with Mahayana. Teachings like Mahamudra are not really entry level. The four noble truths already establish the path and its role, and both Yogacara and Mahamudra describe various stages from deluded to complete enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 31st, 2013 at 7:24 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra and Yogacara

Content:

Astus wrote:

Gampopa taught about the mind in three aspects (Confusion Arises as Wisdom, p 212-213):

In relation to cutting through the perceiving mind, Rinpoche taught three aspects: the mind's characteristics (1), essence (2), and nature(3).

(1) The mind has two characteristics: it appears as various colorful, outer forms, and it emits various positive and negative mental states.

(2) What is meant by the —essence of the mind is your own awareness, that which you think of as —I or —me. The essence of the mind is clarity-emptiness. It cannot be pinpointed, yet it never ends. Awareness is baseless, fresh, naked, and spontaneous.

(3) You need to understand that the essence of the mind and its radiance as various thoughts and emotions are not two different things. When you understand that the essence and characteristics of the mind are naturally inseparable, this is called the nature. When you realize what this means, it is the heart essence of all the buddhas of the three times. This nature is present within all beings.

That is, there are all the internal and external appearances, there is the essence as empty awareness, and these are not two separate things at all. In a similar fashion, in Madhyamaka there is the conventional truth of appearances, the ultimate truth of emptiness, and the two truths are not separate from each other. It is famously summed up in the Heart Sutra as "form is emptiness, emptiness is form".

Vasubandhu explains in the Madhyantavibhaga (tr. Kochumuttom) this way:

(v3)

Neither void nor non-void :

So is everything described,

That indeed is the middle path,

For there is existence as well as non-existence,

And again existence.

That indeed is the middle path, for, on the one hand, there is the existence of emptiness within the imagination of the unreal, and, on the other, the existence of the imagination of the unreal within the emptiness. It is therefore neither exclusively void nor exclusively non-void.

(v14)

There is the negation of the pair of the graspable and grasper. The definition of emptiness, then, is the assertion of that negation. Thus, it is shown how the emptiness is to be defined in negative terms. And, what those negative terms are, [is further stated] :

It is neither [total] assertion,

Nor [total] negation.

Why not [total] assertion ? Because there is the negation of the pair of subject and object. Why not [total] negation ? Because there is the assertion of the negation of that pair. This indeed is the definition of the emptiness. Therefore, with reference to the imagination of the unreal, the emptiness is :

Neither different from the imagination of the unreal,

Nor identical with the imagination of the unreal.

If different, it would imply that the 'universal' (dharmata) is other than the particular things [dharma] , which is unacceptable. For example, 'impermanence' is not other than the impermanent things, and the state of suffering is not other than suffering itself. If identical, there would be no place for purifying knowledge, nor would there be the commonplace knowledge. Thus is shown a definition which states that emptiness is that which is free from being different from thatness.

The Yogacara teaching of the three natures gives a different perspective on the attainment of non-dual wisdom. By the elimination of the imagined (perceiving appearances as substantial) from the dependent (i.e. dependent origination) one realises the accomplished (the middle way). In the Trisvabhavanirdeśa (tr. Kochumuttom) Vasubandhu uses the example of the conjured elephant:

It is like the magical power,

Which by the working of incantations

Appears in the nature of an elephant;

There is altogether no elephant at all

But only its form.

The elephant stands for the imagined nature,
Its form for the other-dependent nature,
And, that which remains when the elephant has been negated,
Stands for the absolutely accomplished nature.

So, the imagination of the unreal
By the working of the basic thought
Appears in the nature of duality;
There is altogether no duality at all,
But only its form.

<http://www.turtlehill.org/uttara/vasu.html> (comment to v32) sums up the meaning:
"Abandonment of commitment and attachment to imagined phenomena is achieved through the transcendence of instinctive assent to the imagined nature. The attainment of freedom is accomplished through the direct, immediate understanding of the unity of the three natures, and hence the non-dual awareness of all phenomena in their consummate nature."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 1st, 2013 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: Vairochana

Content:

Astus wrote:

The role of different characters can change depending on the text and tradition. A good example is Vajrapani who in early texts is a spirit (yaksha), then a protector deity (dharmapala), then a bodhisattva, then in certain tantras a buddha and finally in later tantras reverted into a less important position. Vairochana, just like other buddhas (e.g. Akshobhya), once had his own devotional system, then he was rendered into a metaphysical symbol, again to be put into a lesser position in later tantras (one of the five dhyani buddhas) and superseded by Samantabhadra (in Nyingma) and Vajradhara (e.g. in Kagyu).

While it is often forgotten, Buddhism lived and spread not only via concepts, meditation and famous teachers, but the cults of buddhas and bodhisattvas was (and still is) an important element. Richard D. McBride in <https://books.google.hu/books?id=XpUyLqQ26ioC> explores exactly this. Therefore, just as certain doctrines and practices changed, so did the rituals and the importance and meaning of deities.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 1st, 2013 at 7:10 PM

Title: Re: Shingon and Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Anders said:

Isn't it possible to resurrect it the same way the original lineages presumably started? I.e, a Buddha or mahasattva emanating to start a line, or a yogin receiving such abhisheka by virtue of having the siddhis to communicate with such beings?

The impression I get is that this was more or less what Hsu Yun did when he resurrected the Guiyang school of Chan and passed it on to Hsuan Hua.

Astus wrote:

Good question. In Tibetan Buddhism there are both long and short lineages, and visionary empowerments and connections are accepted. Even the old lineages start with some buddha or bodhisattva manifesting for someone.

In Chan it's a bit different. One can claim distant lineage connection based on personal affiliation.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 2nd, 2013 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: Comprehensive List of Meditation Styles

Content:

Astus wrote:

Do you have a working definition of "meditation"? So that it becomes possible to consider styles.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 2nd, 2013 at 4:48 PM

Title: Re: Comprehensive List of Meditation Styles

Content:

Astus wrote:

Let me point to some problems.

Take buddha-remembrance (nianfo/nenbutsu) as an example.

The Amitayurdhyana Sutra (aka Visualisation Sutra) describes 13 methods. They are visualisations of various objects. But the tradition knows several other objects one could visualise, and the visualisation can be combined with different postures and movements. These are practices related to the Amitabha. Also, in the Pure Land tradition of East Asia the most common understanding of buddha-remembrance is not a visualisation practice but the recitation of the name. Reciting the name also has many forms and styles. Another factor is that not only those who consider themselves Pure Land practitioners use these practices but almost everyone. Also, Mahayana has several other buddhas, and they all have their own visualisations and recitations. That is, in the single category of buddha-remembrance there are numerous practices and interpretations of the practices. The single common feature is that they are all related to a specific buddha or bodhisattva. Just to complicate things, buddha-remembrance also means recalling the virtues of the Buddha (Shakyamuni), as it is used in Theravada, and it is more like an inspirational contemplation rather than a focused repetition or visualisation. Adding another factor, buddha-remembrance can also mean abiding in the buddha-mind, that is again not a typical meditation technique.

Thus, in this single term one can encompass so many things that talking about it as if it were a single method is being blind to the complexities that are actually there. That's why I asked if there is any definition of "meditation", because you can't really put all those methods into the categories of shamatha and vipashyana, and even specific traditions don't view all forms of buddha-remembrance as meditative practices.

If you want to follow traditional categories, you should look at the major meditation handbooks, like the Visuddhimagga, the Mohezhiguan and the Bhavanakrama. Theravada distinguishes samatha and vipassana, while Mahayana adds to this their combined practice (which doesn't mean that in actual practice it is not known in Theravada). If you want to encompass other meditation related practices, you can add to those three a fourth as preliminary practices conducive to meditation. Otherwise, as it shows in the current list posted previously, it won't be a list of meditation techniques but rather of various schools.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 2nd, 2013 at 5:28 PM

Title: Re: Grasping and Self

Content:

rachmiel said:

Ignorance -> push/pull -> reification of self (and other sundry nasties)

Astus wrote:

Not that linear. The moment one sees something as permanent (persisting from moment to moment) there is grasping. Although one can differentiate between that kind of subtle attachment and emotional clinging that comes after that. Thus in Mahayana they talk about grasping at self (emotional hindrance) and grasping at dharmas (conceptual hindrance).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 2nd, 2013 at 5:44 PM

Title: Re: Condensed Summarization of Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are numerous ways to sum up the teachings. In the Pali Canon you can find many suttas where the Buddha is asked to give a brief instruction. They are generally insufficient for people with no knowledge of Buddhism. Therefore, there is what is called <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/ptf/dhamma/index.html>, that the Dhammapada quote above covers.

Don't do evil, do good: Dana (generosity), Sila (virtue)

Result: Sagga (heaven)

Tame the mind: Adinava (drawbacks), Nekkhamma (renunciation)

Path and result: Four Noble Truths

If you want something less complicated, you can use the concept of "interbeing" or "dependent origination" as the cardinal doctrine of Buddhism. It is the best of you pick something that you can elaborate on if required. It doesn't matter if it's about ethics, meditation or wisdom, since all of them are connected to the other parts.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 2nd, 2013 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: Comprehensive List of Meditation Styles

Content:

dharmagoat said:

I no longer think that trying to force practices into categories will be productive.

Astus wrote:

Or you should use proper analysis. If a term like "phowa" includes various practices, it means it is not a single meditation method but rather a package of methods. It's like a Happy Meal. You have to dissect them, otherwise the toy will be confused with the hamburger.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 3rd, 2013 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: Comprehensive List of Meditation Styles

Content:

Roland said:

What about deity practices? There are so many and there are different variations according to different traditions and lineages.

Astus wrote:

They usually follow the same steps. There are only a few varieties and maybe a couple of exceptions.

Consult books like Jamgon Kongrul's "The Treasury Of Knowledge" (especially The Elements Of Tantric Practice, but also Systems Of Buddhist Tantra and Esoteric Instructions); Jeffrey Hopkins: Tantric Techniques; Daniel Cozort: Highest Yoga Tantra; Dharmachakra Translation Committee: Deity, Mantra, and Wisdom; etc. if you are more interested.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 3rd, 2013 at 5:13 AM

Title: Re: Comprehensive List of Meditation Styles

Content:

Astus wrote:

It seems to me you are not looking for a list of Buddhist meditations but rather all sorts of religious activities done in Buddhism. And that actually includes the entirety of Buddhism, like taking refuge, prostrations, reading, contemplating and listening to teachings, chanting, observing precepts, various rituals, freeing animals, and so on. Meditation is only a smaller part of those activities, and it is different from reciting texts, saying prayers, performing rituals, thinking about teachings, etc. Meditation is about actively calming (shamatha) and understanding (vipashyana) the mind with the purpose of attaining liberation. While for instance copying a sutra is a merit making activity, in itself it doesn't lead to seeing clearly the true nature of mind, and it doesn't even bring about any level of absorption, thus it is not a meditative practice, although it is certainly a Buddhist religious activity.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 3rd, 2013 at 5:28 AM

Title: Re: Grasping and Self

Content:

rachmiel said:

I'm having trouble understanding this, on two counts:

Astus wrote:

Momentariness is one classical way in Buddhism to express it, but let me rephrase it then. What a "beautiful sunset" is is simply a concept, and idea. And as every idea, it is complex and dependent, that is, it requires several other ideas to be meaningful. Nobody ever sees any "beautiful sunset". The eye has no such concept, no understanding of what the changing colours and forms are, it doesn't even know what colour is. It is a mental interpretation that there is a "beautiful sunset". The eye has no memory, it cannot connect one moment with the next one, therefore it is unable to perceive any motion. The eye also has no aesthetic evaluation of anything whatsoever, and cannot tell the difference between beautiful and ugly. So, again, a "beautiful sunset" is nothing but a concept. And if we look at concepts, we see that they don't stay in our minds but rapidly change. Also, a concept has no meaning in and of itself, it is not something actually graspable. Nevertheless, because we imagine that there is such a thing out there as a "beautiful sunset", we fail to see things for what they are, and in our ignorance have grasping at illusory ideas.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 4th, 2013 at 12:09 AM

Title: Re: Grasping and Self

Content:

jeeprs said:

So, do that mean that if we 'see things as there are', there is no beauty?

So the teaching of impermanence is an antidote to clinging to such temporal things.

Astus wrote:

It means that beauty is a concept. It is not the same as denying that we think something is beautiful, but pointing to the fact that it is only a thought. You may compare the Buddhist understanding of insubstantial beauty with the Platonic "ideal beauty". The Platonic explanation is quite a good representation of how ordinary people relate to beauty. And yes, the whole purpose of the entire Buddhist teaching is to liberate one from attachment as that is the cause of suffering.

jeeprs said:

Well, I agree - there is a lovely word from medieval philosophy, 'haeccity', which Wikipedia translates as

It is directly comparable with the Buddhist notion of 'Tathatā' or 'suchness', which again according to Wikipedia:

Astus wrote:

It seems to be related to the concept of "svalaksana" (individual/particular attributes) that is contrasted with samanyalaksana (shared/universal attributes), as described in Buddhist epistemology.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 4th, 2013 at 4:14 AM

Title: Re: Absolute teaching

Content:

Astus wrote:

As the Srimala Devi Sutra says, there is only one truth that is the ultimate among the four, the truth of extinction.

“The one noble truth, namely, ‘the extinction of suffering,’ is separate from the conditioned. What is ‘separate from the conditioned’ is permanent. What is ‘permanent’ is not false and deceptive in nature. What is ‘not false and deceptive in nature’ is true, permanent, and a refuge. Therefore, the noble truth of the extinction [of suffering] is the supreme truth.” (tr. Diana Y. Paul)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 5th, 2013 at 12:24 AM

Title: Re: Absolute teaching

Content:

Ramon1920 said:

What point were you trying to get across by that quote Astus?

Astus wrote:

That the essential message of the Buddha is not in any specific doctrine but the experience of liberation. One can emphasise the four noble truths (sravaka), dependent origination (pratyekabuddha), six paramitas (bodhisattva), four samadhis (Tiantai), four dharmadhatus (Huayan), wordless transmission (Chan), empowerments (Tantra), or any other aspect, even without mentioning anything else, as long as it results in liberation, it is the "absolute teaching". This is the meaning of the one vehicle teaching expounded in the Srimala Devi and other similar sutras.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 5th, 2013 at 4:43 AM

Title: Re: Absolute teaching

Content:

Sönarn said:

My point, precisely, deferes on that. What I highlight in that thread is that 4 NT IS, after elightenment, the direct introduction, ultimate teaching of Buddha Shakyamuni ... then 8 fold path is sravakas and so on as you explain.

Astus wrote:

In general Mahayana texts assign the four noble truths as the primary teaching of sravakas. It means that those with the so called sravaka attitude - because in Mahayana it is simply a wrong approach, not a specific school or teaching - focus only on eliminating suffering, removing themselves from this world, and abiding in nirvana, because they don't understand how both samsara and nirvana are empty, and that is represented by the four noble truths.

The eightfold path is the fourth truth, and the first of the eightfold path is the four noble truths. You can't really take them apart as they mutually include each other.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 5th, 2013 at 4:55 PM

Title: Re: Absolute teaching

Content:

Sönarn said:

I don't think 4NT can ONLY lead to Arhat Attainment

Astus wrote:

This means that there is only one kind of attainment and distinguishing arhats, pratyekabuddhas and buddhas have no relevance. The prevailing Mahayana interpretation is that the sravaka attainments are only skilful means, temporary, and what everyone eventually reaches is buddhahood. This is the One Vehicle concept. Theravada (and some Yogacara) says that while in terms of liberation arhats and buddhas are equal, there is a qualitative difference in terms of the buddhas ability to restart the wheel of Dharma and other supernatural things.

Not that I'm against this interpretation that there is only one sort of liberation and everything else are just skilful means. But it should be clear that this contravenes all the many schools' statements about their superiority (which I believe is a good thing, sectarianism is quite a bad illness).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 6th, 2013 at 7:02 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist ethics at a national level

Content:

Astus wrote:

About the need of armies and killing:

The last time Hungary was attacked was in the 16th century by the Ottoman Empire, and (unsurprisingly) most of the country got occupied until the end of the 17th century. Mostly before and after that the army was used to attack other countries. It seems to me that the whole concept of "you need weapons to defend yourself" is wrong and mistaken. Just as on a personal level there are certain individuals who are intent on killing, occasionally there are military leaders who want to conquer the world. But just as the majority of humans don't run around murdering others, countries rarely rise to take over everyone else's lands.

It might be that in the USA it is OK for the police to shoot people, but that is not normal in most European countries. Death sentence in the EU is also abolished.

I believe it is possible to have the law of non-violence and other basic Buddhist values govern a society. That's what the rule of a Cakravartin is about. And while there are wars on Earth even now, billions of people live in peace.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 6th, 2013 at 5:58 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist ethics at a national level

Content:

Astus wrote:

Nations don't exist outside of the imagination of people. Nations don't make decisions, nations don't do anything, only people do. And people simply means many individual humans. Ethical behaviour is possible only for individuals, because they can make choices and have views. If a person identifies with the concept of a nation it is accepting a community as one's own, and that includes the rules of that community. It is subjecting oneself to an ideology, the ideology of nationhood. This ideology can be used by those who are accepted as leaders within the same framework of community. Whether nations "do" this or that depends on each person's thinking. Since many are happy to relinquish the burden of thinking for himself in matters that don't directly concern him, leaders are invested with making decisions for those. But again, leaders are humans just like everyone else, and they make decisions based on their own thinking.

Buddhism exists also on the ideological level. And just as people can believe in nationhood, they can also do that with Buddhism. Of course, it has to be simple and easy, because unless one has strong interest in something, they don't care to ponder about abstract doctrines. That killing and stealing is bad is generally self-evident for everyone. The trick is that people can always come up with exceptions, or don't think of something as actually murder or theft. There is also a huge lack of general understanding about how emotions could be correctly managed. And it is this area, handling emotions, where Buddhism can provide useful and practical methods. But first it is important to establish the idea that emotions can actually be managed.

Jumping to unclear concepts of metaphysical entities like nations makes one lose sight of the daily reality. As I said, nations don't actually do anything, therefore they can't have any ethics either. Only living people can act in ethical and unethical ways.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 6th, 2013 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra and Yogacara

Content:

Astus wrote:

The first Bhavanakrama of Kamalasila also uses the Lankavatara quote where the four yogas are mentioned in explaining vipasyana. The Bhavanakrama is also referred to in the 3rd Karmapa's commentary (Mining for Wisdom in Confusion, p264 and related note: 683 on p422).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 7th, 2013 at 4:27 PM

Title: Re: Practice of the Lotus Sutra?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Lotus Sutra emphasises a few Mahayana ideas (skilful means, one vehicle, eternal buddha, sudden transformation, bodhisattva compassion) that became important. In East Asia the sutra's position was elevated because of Zhiyi, actual founder of the Tiantai school, who used it as frame for his synthesising ideas. It is because the sutra says very little about actual methods that one can just interpret it in dozens of ways. As for its repeated statement about its own superiority, the same you find in many other Mahayana sutras, and the same goes for the injunction to read, recite, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 7th, 2013 at 7:56 PM

Title: Re: Classifying Schools

Content:

Astus wrote:

Would you exclude Vajrayana from Mahayana? Shingon was removed from the Tibetan area years ago because they are two different systems with different history, and it was suggested by some Shingon followers who found the unending comparisons and such with Tibetan Vajrayana tiresome (IIRC). Tibetan and East Asian exist separately because they are distinct historical developments of Mahayana with several significant differences between the two, while the two groups share a lot within their own area. If anyone wants to discuss this topic about the differences between major Mahayana groups please open a topic for it in the Mahayana forum.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 7th, 2013 at 10:51 PM

Title: Re: Violence in late period Indian Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

I recall stories of Indian masters where they debated with tirthikas and it got violent.

Alas, I can't find sources now to give names. But it'd show that it's not necessarily connected to Vajrayana.

(not what I wanted, but for instance in Taranatha's History of Buddhism in India (p 30) Sankaracarya kills himself after losing in debate to Dharmakirti)

From the Mahaparinirvana Sutra (Adamantine Body chapter):

"One who upholds Wonderful Dharma does not receive the five precepts and practise deportment, but protects with the sword, bow, arrow, and halberd those bhiksus who uphold the precepts and who are pure."

"The eternal body of the Tathagata is one carved in stone, as it were." The Buddha said to Kasyapa: "O good man! For that reason, bhiksus, bhiksunis, upasakas, upasikas should all the more make effort and protect Wonderful Dharma. The reward for protecting Wonderful Dharma is extremely great and innumerable. O good man! Because of this, those upasakas who protect Dharma should take the sword and staff and protect such a bhiksu who guards Dharma. Even though a person upholds the precepts, we cannot call that person one who upholds Mahayana. Even though a person has not received [in formal ceremony] the five precepts, if he protects Wonderful Dharma, such a one can well be called one of Mahayana. A person who upholds the Wonderful Dharma should take the sword and staff and guard bhiksus." Kasyapa said to the Buddha: "O World-Honoured One! If all bhiksus are to be accompanied by such upasakas with the sword and staff, can we say that they are worthy of the name, or are they unworthy of such? Or is this upholding the precepts or not?" The Buddha said to Kasyapa: "Do not say that such persons are those who transgress the precepts. O good man! After I have entered Nirvana, the world will be evil-ridden and the land devastated, each pillaging the other, and the people will be driven by hunger. At such a time, because of hunger, men may make up their minds, abandon home and enter the Sangha. Such persons are bogus priests. Such, on seeing those persons who are strict in their observance of the precepts, right in their deportment, and pure in their deeds, upholding Wonderful Dharma, will drive such away or kill them or cause harm to them." Bodhisattva Kasyapa said again to the Buddha: "O World-Honoured One! How can all such persons upholding the precepts and guarding Wonderful Dharma get into villages and castle towns and teach?" "O good man! That is why I allow those who uphold the precepts to be accompanied by the white-clad people [lay people, non-monks] with the sword and staff. Although all kings, ministers, rich lay men [grhapati] and upasakas may possess the sword and staff for protecting Dharma, I call this upholding the precepts. You may possess the sword and staff, "but do not take life". If things are thus, we call this first-hand upholding of the precepts."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 8th, 2013 at 4:57 AM

Title: Re: Commonalities among all Buddhist traditions

Content:

rachmiel said:

Dependent Origination

Eightfold Path

Five Precepts

Five Skandhas

Four Dharma Seals

Four Noble Truths

Karma

The Three Universal Seals

Three Jewels

Threefold training of Precepts, Meditation and Wisdom

Twelve Links of Dependent Origination

Astus wrote:

A few more:

12 ayatanas & 18 dhatus

5/6 realms

37 factors of enlightenment liberation as arhat, pratyekabuddha, buddha

Basically you can take everything that were taught in the Vinaya and Agama/Nikaya as common teachings. The first strong differences occurred with the various abhidharma works and then other developments like the Bodhisattva/Vaipulya Pitaka, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 8th, 2013 at 6:27 AM

Title: Re: People's reaction to presence

Content:

Astus wrote:

If you want to move this discussion into a Buddhist context, I recommend you reconsider your thoughts and views in light of this essential teaching:

<http://www.tsoknyirinpoche.org/2575/web-teaching-i-2/>.

And I advise that because it seems to me that you have found yourself a level of inner peace, perhaps some special experience, and now you strongly identify with that. It can be a good beginning, if you don't stop there.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 9th, 2013 at 3:59 AM

Title: Re: pre-Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

From a Buddhist perspective, the Buddha only discovered what was known before him by previous buddhas. And, as mentioned, there were pratyekabuddhas when the Dharma was generally extinct.

As for the idea that Buddhism is some sort of offshoot of Hinduism, not at all. For instance, today reincarnation is a core element of Hinduism, however, it was most likely originally spread by Buddhism in India. In the Buddhist canon itself you get a nice description of the local religions, and that consisted mostly of various ascetic orders, among them the Jainas being the most outstanding, the old pantheon of gods that can be connected to the Vedas and generally to Indo-European paganism, and there were the brahmanas doing their rituals. What appears today as Hinduism, that's quite a different story.

You may want to look into some studies in this area, like those of Johannes Bronkhorst:

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=4GNG5KuH73QC>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=BaX58-E5-3MC>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 9th, 2013 at 5:02 PM

Title: Re: Mahavairocana empowerment applicability

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm no representative of any school, so I'm just sharing my thoughts on this.

Generally all practices have their own transmission. Even if abhiseka is not involved, such things as breath-meditation are taught differently by various masters and lineages. Learning breath-meditation from a Rinzai Zen teacher is not the same as the Tendai style (although related), not the same as it is taught in Burmese Theravada or the Thai Forest tradition. Knowing one form of breath-meditation doesn't mean you know all of them. Similarly, if you get one form of Vairocana empowerment it doesn't include all the other Vairocana related practices. Shingon and Tibetan Vajrayana are two distinct lineages and naturally they have various differences in their methods, so you can't presume that learning one includes the other.

From a personal point of view, everybody does whatever he likes. If you feel connected to Vairocana and you want to do practices that are found in Shingon nobody will stop you. If you make up your own Vairocana meditation, who can say it's all wrong? What you can't do, however, is to claim authority as if you were a specific Shingon or Sakyapa or XY school's lineage holder. Of course you can still say you are this or that kind of Shingon/Tantra master/yogi, whatnot, since that doesn't mean any actual lineage. But as long as you don't try to set up your own school and gather followers nobody will care, except if you start posing on the forum as some sort of authority figure (but that is again the position of a master).

So, if you want to follow the traditional, mainstream path, you need the necessary empowerments, teachers, etc. If you are content with your own interpretation, you are free to do as you like (i.e. the Buddhist police won't arrest you and burn you at the stake).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 9th, 2013 at 5:31 PM

Title: Re: pre-Buddhism?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Hmmmmmm... Interesting! Funny thing is that currently it is such a central teaching and add the fact that most Westerners know/understand reincarnation from a "Hindu" (atman-centred) perspective, that it seems bizarre that it was a concept that was introduced into "Hinudism".

Astus wrote:

I can't specify a source for this one, whether it is from India or not, but the idea of reincarnation was known to Europeans to some extent before the 19th century rise of Orientalism. In the ancient Greek context it is called <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Metempsychosis> and in Judaism it is <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Gilgul>. It is also known in https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Hermeticism#Posthumous_lives.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 9th, 2013 at 6:12 PM

Title: Re: The costs of different Buddhist traditions

Content:

Astus wrote:

Traditions don't have costs. Only one's practice has. If one is content with keeping some precepts, that has a low cost in terms of money and time. If you spend some time with formal practices, that has a time cost. If you go to retreats, that costs time and money. If you by books and/or go to teachings, that costs time and money, but if you do that online the costs are lower in money but not in time. If you buy Buddhist paraphernalia that costs money but not much time. And if you become a home leaver that has practically no cost in money but all your time.

It is perfectly possible to do low cost Vajrayana. A single transmission can be enough to give you all that you need for your practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 9th, 2013 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: pre-Buddhism?

Content:

philji said:

There has been some talk here about reincarnation being introduced into Hinduism BT Buddhism. however do not the Upanishads and Bhagavad Gita pre date Buddhism? These texts specifically teach the concept of an atman reincarnating. The Buddhist view of course is very different.

Astus wrote:

The Bhagavad Gita's current form was settled around the 4th century CE, although parts of it are assumed to be as old as the 5th c. BCE. The early Upanishads don't describe reincarnation but rather a path of the soul to Brahman through different stages (Sun and Moon).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 9th, 2013 at 9:49 PM

Title: Re: pre-Buddhism?

Content:

Anders said:

If nothing else, the Buddhist texts also tell us that there were other views of reincarnation current in the Buddha's day, given the Buddha's commentary on these.

Astus wrote:

Reincarnation is said to be known in the Magadha culture, but that's different from the Brahmanic-Vedic culture. Since it was Buddhism that spread out in India (empire of Ashoka) it served as the medium of the doctrine.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 9th, 2013 at 10:05 PM

Title: Re: Mahavairocana empowerment applicability

Content:

Indrajala said:

Funny one of the prominent Zhenyan teachers in Taiwan, who has revised a lot of material, told me in person he thinks what Koyasan is teaching nowadays isn't real Mijiao/Mikkyo.

I don't know what to make of that, but he has a sizeable following and the practices clearly work for him and his disciples.

However, what I'm asking really is a matter of theory and in my mind a good question given the cultural dynamics at work. Someone might ask why bother, but I like exploring possibilities.

Astus wrote:

In theory people give whatever explanation they like. In practice history decides which theories become generally accepted. "Tradition" only means that something survived for some time, it doesn't give it any authenticity.

Since the rules of Tantra require transmission you need to connect yourself in one way or another to a lineage. It's like Western Zen teachers who are nominally connected to this or that Japanese school but actually their teach is more or less modified. If that Mantra teacher in Taiwan has connection to Shingon but later changed this or that, the link to the original school remains but he ceases to be its representative.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 12th, 2013 at 5:08 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

desertman001 said:

Astus, when I said "at its core" back on page one, I have to say the experience of recognizing Mind as having unconditioned nature is also why I called it a "core". This insight passes but it can take a portion of the self concept with it and leaves with you a permanent(if practice continues) effect. It also allows you recognize true nature just by returning to the moment because "this mind is Buddha". Whether it is halucination or recognizing true nature it is both an experience and a continuing recognition when in the moment. So to your question "How can a sense of unity with every being or the entire world make a difference in our attachment to thoughts and emotions?" I would say if the Kensho rises to a certain level it creates a new view, less bound by self identification and able recognize nature as unconditioned .

Astus wrote:

This idea that there is something at the core is the basic self-view, the belief in substance. As the metaphor of the http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Plantain_tree illustrates, there is no core. The mind itself is made up of various instances of consciousness. What is called insight is the insight into the emptiness of phenomena, i.e. that they are without core, without self, without essence. And this unborn nature (unborn because there is no "thing" to become or cease) is the unconditioned, the fact that everything is conditioned.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 13th, 2013 at 4:42 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

Astus wrote:

desertman001,

You talk as if there were something unconditioned outside of the conditioned. If that were the case, as conditioned beings we'd had nothing to do with it at all. Thus such an unconditioned has no relevance to any of us.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 13th, 2013 at 6:03 PM

Title: Re: Whose Buddhism is Truest? The quest for "Original Buddhi

Content:

Astus wrote:

Another thing is that the article over-emphasise the importance of the Gandharan findings. We knew that there were various traditions of transmission. Even a thousand years ago they knew it. What modern scholarship found by comparing the Agamas and Nikayas is that there are lot of things shared in them, proving how connected the different traditions are, and that talking about a group of fundamental teachings ("original Buddhism") is not unfounded. It is also unlikely that those who are lost blind in their chosen traditions' claims of superiority will care about what scholars not within their tradition say.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 13th, 2013 at 7:39 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

jeeprs said:

How to account for sayings such as the Nibbana Sutta?

I have always thought it was the insight into this 'unborn' which constitutes kensho. That is why I understand the symbol for prajñāpāramitā to be the letter 'a-'. which signifies un-, and in 'unborn, unfabricated'.

Astus wrote:

That Nibbana Sutta has been misused by atman believers so often. While in fact all it says is that by the elimination of desire suffering does not arise any more. And that's an unconditioned "state" as there is no cause of pain any more. But not actually a state that is achieved or developed or discovered, otherwise it would be conditioned.

As I said before, it's not possible to find an unconditioned state, because finding it makes it conditioned. What is always instructed in Zen is to let go of conceptual and emotional attachments, to see that they are empty of substance and exist dependently. There is nothing else to be found beyond that.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 13th, 2013 at 10:56 PM

Title: Re: Scriptural Reference For This?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Using that simile of the tip of the fingernail occurs in various suttas, like these titled Nakhasikha Sutta (The Tip of the Fingernail): SN 13.1; SN 20.2; SN 22.97. But most of the similes are found in SN 56 (Sacca-samyutta): 51 and from 60 to 131. However, none of them is about enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 14th, 2013 at 4:51 AM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

Koji said:

Your position reads like the Sautrântika view, i.e., nirvana/asamskita is abhava (absence of klesas, etc.) being essentially nothing in and for itself which, I hasten to point out, Buddhaghosa attacked like a junkyard dog unchained, arguing that for an arahant it would amount to mere extinction which is a no-no. It appears that Stephen Batchelor has taken the Sautrântika position with regard to nirvana/asamskita. I find it interesting.

Astus wrote:

What relevance is there of two Hinayana systems - those that believe nirvana to have svabhava - and the ideas of a materialist? Look at Nagarjuna's Middle Treatise, and what it says in chapter 25 on nirvana is what I mean too.

"The phenomenal universe and Nirvana, activity and motionless placidity - all are of the one 'substance'. So also are the worlds and with the state that transcends worlds. Yes, the beings passing through the six stages of existence, those who have undergone the four kinds of birth, all the vast world-systems with their mountains and river, the Bodhi-Nature and illusion - all of them are thus. By saying that they are all of one substance, we mean that their names and forms, their existence and nonexistence, are void. The great world-systems, uncountable as Ganga's sands, are in truth comprised in the one boundless void. Then where can there be Buddhas who deliver or sentient beings to be delivered? When the true nature of all things that 'exist' is an identical Thusness, how can such distinctions have any reality?"
(The Zen Teaching of Huang-Po, p. 109)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 14th, 2013 at 5:10 AM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

desertman001 said:

Astus, the quotes provided by jeepers make it obvious that some type of mind exists after the conditioned, without claiming an atman exist, since no separate existence is implied. I get the logic you imply but that logic cannot escape the conditioned. If the unconditioned state is unaware how could it be any different from sleep. If that state has no awareness why are we even talking about it as relief from stress?

Astus wrote:

This radical separation of conditioned and unconditioned is what I'm calling false and not established. Appearances are already empty as they are, they don't need to be emptied nor one needs to switch to an empty state.

Awareness cannot be cut off from what it is aware of. An independent mind cannot exist because it would have no connection to anything and it couldn't know of anything. It doesn't mean that everybody is unconscious. Quite the opposite. Consciousness exists together with all forms of phenomena, it is present in every experience.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 14th, 2013 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: Scriptural Reference For This?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is also a logical problem with that hypothetical quote. And that is it would only serve as a deterrent for those who want enlightenment, it would be demotivating. In later Mahayana teachings there are talks about the Dharma ending age where enlightenment is near impossible, however, there is always a special teaching that one should use instead of the others and that guarantees success.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 14th, 2013 at 5:57 AM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

jeeprs said:

The reason it is put in such oblique terms is so as not to create a verbal representation of it, which becomes an idol. That is Buddhism's distinct difference from 'the atman believers' and many other religious types.

Astus wrote:

You mean, in your interpretation the only difference between Buddhism and atmavada teachings is that Buddhism fails to speak plainly and straightforwardly about it? The idea sounds to me similar to those who claim that Buddhism says nothing about God but one can just believe in whatever supreme deity one likes to; while actually there are numerous teachings refuting the possibility of such a being.

As for the atman vs anatman issue,

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=66&t=10864> is now available again for reading.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 14th, 2013 at 5:37 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

jeeprs said:

Buddhism rejects 'speculative metaphysics', but the teaching is nevertheless metaphysical.

Astus wrote:

What do you mean by metaphysics here?

jeeprs said:

As this state cannot be understood by the worldly mind, it can only be described in negative terms, but it is not mere absence, mere cessation.

Astus wrote:

So, either one has a non-worldly mind or one doesn't say anything meaningful. Do you see how that undermines what you or anyone says?

jeeprs said:

I will quote the passage from Suzuki again:

Astus wrote:

Emptiness is the negation of substance and affirmation of dependent origination. Suzuki's quote sounds like he interprets emptiness as a universal substance, and that is contrary to the very meaning of emptiness.

jeeprs said:

However 'higher states' or 'higher truths' are imperceptible to the verbal/symbolic mind. Hence the emphasis in Buddhism on dhyana which is, among other things, the suspension of discursive thinking.

Astus wrote:

From the second dhyana on there is no discursive thinking, however, rarely any Mahayana school or teacher emphasises deep absorptions. Also, while calming meditation does not require conceptual thinking, insight practice does. That is, you cannot reach liberation without actually understanding how the mind works. And that understanding is not some mystical revelation or state, it is looking at things and seeing them for what they are. If one just suspends discursive thinking the result is a blank vegetative stare and a dumb mind. This is what Dahui criticised as "silent illumination", and this is how Chan is misinterpreted in Tibet as Hashan's heresy. This negation of discursive thinking is mistaking emptiness for nothingness.

jeeprs said:

But this negation ought not to be interpreted as referring to mere nothingness, non-being, simple absence, or cessation, in itself. It simply acts as the 'gateless gate' to the higher realm (which is actually 'this realm' seen without the habitual conditions and verbal associations through which we habitually see it).

Astus wrote:

It is not nothingness but in order to see clearly one has to nevertheless remove thinking.

If you are saying that one should not be attached to concepts and ideas, I agree. If you mean that one should stop thinking completely, the above applies.

jeeprs said:

And it is not a part of that web, because it can never be 'brought down' to the level of symbolic mind and representational consciousness.

Astus wrote:

Words are just words. An apple is not identical to a noun. Is that mystical?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 14th, 2013 at 9:22 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

jeeprs said:

It is true that his interpretation is opposed to yours, but I think his is correct, which is why I quoted it. Suzuki would never propose a 'universal substance', the fact that you read his quotation like that indicates an interpretive problem in my opinion.

Astus wrote:

It is opposed to what I say if it claims a universal substance ("it is what makes these things possible; it is zero full of infinite possibilities, it is a void of inexhaustible contents"). But if he means what Nagarjuna says I can only agree: "Those for whom emptiness is possible, for them everything is possible. Those for whom emptiness is not possible, for them everything is not possible." (MMK 24.14)

jeeprs said:

What I mean is that 'the chain of dependent origination' cannot be described in scientific or even objective terms. It is a metaphysical concept.

Astus wrote:

You can't describe the joy of dancing in objective or scientific terms but it doesn't make it metaphysical in its philosophical sense. Dependent origination can be called "Buddhist metaphysics" if you want, as the ontological basis of the universe as causal processes. But unlike philosophy, the teachings are not meant to find the true reality of the world but to bring about liberation, and therefore every teachings is provisional (unlike in metaphysics).

jeeprs said:

the nearest to the Buddhist term for 'mind' would undoubtedly be the nous of neo-Platonism

Astus wrote:

Mind in Buddhism is understood only as a stream, as momentary successions of mental phenomena. It is dependently originated. It is not a background, basis or container of mental events, but the mental events themselves. So it doesn't seem to fit the idea of nous.

jeeprs said:

Certainly Zen criticizes metaphysics, but only insofar as it has become a verbal representation of non-conceptual realities, or a dogma (dṛṣṭi).

Astus wrote:

There are views (dṛṣṭi) and there is correct view (samyagdṛṣṭi).

Q: What is the right view?

A: To perceive without perceiving any object whatsoever is the right view.

Q: What does "to perceive without perceiving any object whatsoever" mean?

A: Perceiving all sorts of things without grasping -- that is, not being clouded by the arising of any thought of love or hate, etc. -- is perceiving without any objects. If one can see without seeing any object whatsoever, that is using the Buddha-Eye, which is like no other eye. On the other hand, if one sees all sorts of things that cause thoughts of love and hate, etc., to arise, that is known as "perceiving objects" with ordinary eyes, and sentient beings have no other kind of eyes. This is true, likewise, with all of the other sense organs.

(Ta-Chu Hui-Hai: Treatise On Entering The Tao of Sudden Enlightenment)

It is not that one does not recognise and know what one perceives, but one is not moved by them, there is no attachment or aversion.

jeeprs said:

Othewise why put yourself through the arduous hardships of learning Zen?

Astus wrote:

Disillusionment.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 14th, 2013 at 10:26 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism beyond the nation state

Content:

Astus wrote:

I prefer the linguistic-cultural differentiation. That often connects with national ideas but not necessarily. By the way, as I know there is a complete Mongolian canon, while there are no full Korean/Japanese/Vietnamese translations.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 14th, 2013 at 11:54 PM

Title: Owner/Host/Awareness

Content:

Astus wrote:

Heze Shenhui was the first to emphasise "awareness/knowing" in Chan and connected it with the practice of no-thought. This was later followed by practically every later Chan teacher but mostly by Guifeng Zongmi, Yongming Yanshou and Pojo Jinul. This teaching on awareness is easily misconstrued as an atman similar to Sankhya and other essentialist views. What shows that awareness is not an ultimate soul is the practice (see: <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=69&t=11398>) where it is not that one finds something eternal but does not abide in anything. Thus it is in harmony with the fundamental teachings of the Buddha on emptiness. Zen is a very practical path, therefore when one wants to compare it to non-Buddhist philosophies it is understandable that those ignorant of the doctrinal teachings confuse it with wrong views.

"The term "Owner" is used here to mean the non-birth-and-death essence within this body composed of the five aggregates. This essence will fully manifest itself when one's feelings, conceptions, mental formations, and consciousness calm down. It is never apart with these aggregates, but when they are operating, we rarely realize this essence. The Owner is the tranquil, aware essence that has never been agitated, changed, or eradicated. To experience it, try this contemplation: When meditating or sitting alone at a quiet place, note how your feelings, conceptions, mental formations, and consciousness calm down, yet your eyes, your ears, etc., are full of awareness. Then, ask yourself, "Who is it that is seeing, hearing, etc.? Is it the permanent, tranquil, aware nature inside?" Therefore, the theory of "the Owner" mentioned here does not contradict the Buddha's teaching about no self. When we have real experiences, we know it. It is useless to hang on to or argue over theories."
(Thich Thanh Tu: Keys to Buddhism, p 57-58)

"Foreign dust illustrates false thinking, and voidness illustrates self-nature, that is the permanent host who does not follow the guest in the latter's coming and going. This serves to illustrate the eternal (unmoving) self-nature which does not follow false thinking in its sudden rise and fall. Therefore, it is said: 'if one is unmindful of all things, one will meet with no inconvenience when surrounded by all things.' By dust which moves of itself and does not inconvenience voidness which is clearly still, one means that false thinking rises and falls by itself and does not hinder the self-nature which is immutable in its Bhutatathata (suchness, thatness) condition. This is the meaning of the saying: 'If the mind does not arise, all things are blameless.'

...

If there is singleness of thought abiding in that 'which is not born and does not die', without pursuing sound and form, this is 'going against the stream'; this is called 'looking into the hua t'ou' or 'turning inwards the hearing to hear the self-nature'."
(Hsu Yun: http://hsuyun.budismo.net/en/dharma/chan_sessions2.html)

"The bodhi mind is replete within us. If we look for it elsewhere, we will not find it. Just as a Chan patriarch said, "To move the mind is to err, to raise a thought is to stray." As soon as we look for it we lose it; it is like looking for an ox while riding an ox; we are already sitting on its back, but we do not know it. It is also like looking for a shadow at midday. At this moment, when you are listening to this teaching, the mind that does not raise a single thought is the profound and clear bodhi mind. A mind with no-thought is the mind of total clarity, knowing, and awareness, without a single bit of delusion, drowsiness, or scattered thoughts. When we realize this mind that is unborn and undying, we attain enlightenment."

(Wei Chueh:

http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enUS/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=219&Itemid=59)

"Since all dharmas are like dreams or phantoms, deluded thoughts are originally calm and the sense-spheres are originally void. At the point where all dharmas are void, the numinous awareness is not obscured. That is to say, this mind of void and calm, numinous awareness is your original face. It is also the dharma-seal transmitted without a break by all the Buddhas of the three time periods, the successive generations of patriarchs, and the wise advisors of this world. If you awaken to this mind, then this is truly what is called not following the rungs of a ladder: you climb straight to the stage of Buddhahood, and each step transcends the triple world."

(Pojo Jinul: <http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=105&t=12572> in "Collected Works of Chinul", p 145)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 15th, 2013 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

Koji said:

A good analogy might be made of the difference between a pot of clay and clay itself or of a gold lion and gold.

Astus wrote:

And for that a good explanation is http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Sevenfold_reasoning_of_the_chariot. Or, to make it more complicated, there is Fazang's http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Miscellaneous/Treatise_on_Golden_Lion.html. Candrakirti shows how no essence can be established anywhere, Fazang shows how emptiness and phenomena are inseparable and interpenetrated.

Koji said:

Reading your comments you seem to be championing samsara/conditionality and maculate minds over nirvana/unconditionality and immaculate minds.

Astus wrote:

As above, not established and interpenetrated. The dichotomy of samsara and nirvana is only a skilful means, but there is no nirvana outside of samsara.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 15th, 2013 at 12:21 AM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

Treetop said:

What about a "universal non-substance"? We all share a Buddha nature, is that universal?

Astus wrote:

Universal non-substance is emptiness, no-self, i.e. nothing has a substance. Buddha-nature has many interpretations, it generally refers to the capability to attain buddhahood and not some hidden soul.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 15th, 2013 at 6:01 AM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

Koji said:

My analogy fits perfectly insofar as Fa-tsang drew a distinction between the gold/noumenon and the lion shape/phenomenon. He described the noumenon as the substance or essence which is by nature clear and pure and all perfect, not to mention luminous. This substance he explains is Dharmata, the nature underlying all things.

As for your last remark "there is no nirvana outside of samsara," nirvana cannot exist in samsara because its own nature is unconditioned. Escape from all conditioned states is only possible because we have as our own nature that which is the antithesis of conditionality, namely, the unconditioned element (cp. Itivuttaka-atthakathâ II.2.6).

Astus wrote:

First let's look at what Fazang calls the five doctrines. This strong distinction you mention between gold and form is OK for the first stage of Sravakayana. But already at the second of basic Mahayana dependent origination is identified as emptiness, thus they are not two. In the final Round Doctrine of the One Vehicle there is the interpenetration of phenomena with phenomena (the fourth dharmadhatu) where "whatever arises is absolutely true" and "myriad manifestations, despite their variety, interpenetrate without confusion or disarray".

Right before the list of the five doctrines Fazang simply states: "There is nothing apart from the gold." And before that: "Emptiness does not have any mark of its own; it is through forms that [Emptiness] is revealed". That is, whatever is seen is gold, just as it is. He explains it in detail in the ten mysteries, where "the gold and the lion are simultaneously established", "the gold and the lion both establish and include each other in harmony", "The one is the other. The principal and the companion interchange their radiance." and "the gold and the lion may be manifest or hidden, one or many, but they are both devoid of a Self-being [Svabhāva]".

In practical terms Fazang teaches: "when we look at the lion, we see at once that all conditioned things, without going through the process of disintegration, are from the beginning in a state of quiescent non-existence." The appearances are not destroyed, no external peaceful state gained, simply the actual nature of appearances are seen. So he says: "To comprehend the fact that from the very no-beginning all illusions are in reality non-existent is called Enlightenment."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 15th, 2013 at 4:24 PM

Title: Re: Buddhas, omnipotence and mantras

Content:

Astus wrote:

So called "other power" works in Buddhism based on one's association with it. You do the mantras, you have faith in it, so you actually do the practice. Without practice there is no effect.

Honen's poem expresses this well:

Amida's Light

The Sutra says: "Amida's light illumines all sentient beings throughout the ten worlds, who call upon the sacred name, protects and never forsakes them."

There is no place where the moonlight
Casts not its cheering ray;
With him who has the seeing eye
Alone that light will stay.

(Joseph A. Fitzgerald: Honen the Buddhist Saint, p 79)

See also this Dharma talk on the poem:

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=bIG9YLW4AV4>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 15th, 2013 at 6:44 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

jeeprs said:

Where is the joy in all this? Where is the energy that fuels the bodhicitta that feels compassion for all beings? If Zen enlightenment is simply 'disillusionment', then why strive for anything? If it is such an ordinary matter, if there really is 'no gold', then what is the point?

Astus wrote:

Kensho, seeing nature, is disillusionment with one's objects of attachment. Because one sees the actual nature of mind as ungraspable, unattainable, unborn, that is, dependently appearing like dreams and magic tricks. As Zhiyan explains the metaphor of Indra's net (Entry into the Inconceivable, p 136), there is no special power involved when the teachings talk about things like "infinite buddha-lands in a single atom" etc. In Zen this is called the functioning of the mind. Case 4 of the Book of Equanimity is an example:

"When the World-Honored One was walking with his assembly, he pointed to the ground with his hand and said, "This place is good for building a temple." Indra took a stalk of grass and stuck it in the ground and said, "The temple has been built." The World-Honored One smiled."

Or as Yuanwu said in the intro to case 8 of the Blue Cliff Record: "Sometimes we take a blade of grass and use it as a sixteen foot golden body [of the buddha]; sometimes we take a sixteen foot golden body and use it as a blade of grass."

If this is viewed as mystical and magical one automatically distances oneself from the immediate reality. That is, thoughts come and go, change and move around, but they are no problem as long as one does not take them to be anything substantial.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 15th, 2013 at 7:11 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

jeeprs said:

how does this give rise to compassion? What is the link? In my experience it is not a matter of 'incorporating Bodhicitta' because it is something beyond your will. It has to happen to you. It is not something you do, but something you yield to, or so it seems to me.

Astus wrote:

Great compassion comes from opening up for all appearances, from not hanging on a supposedly unconditioned state (the usual theme of sravakas stuck in nirvana), but through seeing our human-sentient nature we understand the struggle of all beings and can only wish for their well being and liberation. That's how emptiness and compassion are inseparable.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 15th, 2013 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: I just want to hear your opinion. No offenses please,

Content:

Astus wrote:

Vaisnavas believe that Buddha was an incarnation of Visnu. Indian religions are often distinguished by Hindus whether they follow the Vedas or not (https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/%C4%80stika_and_n%C4%81stika). So the above commentary criticises the Jainas because they are neither orthodox Hindu nor Buddhists,

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 16th, 2013 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: Pure Land Resources

Content:

Mr. G said:

I recommend this: <http://www.ymba.org/BWF/bwf0.htm>

Luke said:

Unfortunately, that website doesn't exist anymore. But here is the web archive for it:

<http://web.archive.org/web/20081205151947/http://www.ymba.org/BWF/bwf0.htm>

Astus wrote:

The website is up and running, they just reorganised things:

<http://www.ymba.org/books/buddhism-wisdom-faith-pure-land-principles-and-practice>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 16th, 2013 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: Pure Land Resources

Content:

Mr. G said:

I recommend this: <http://www.ymba.org/BWF/bwf0.htm>

Luke said:

Unfortunately, that website doesn't exist anymore. But here is the web archive for it:

<http://web.archive.org/web/20081205151947/http://www.ymba.org/BWF/bwf0.htm>

Astus wrote:

The website is up and running, they just reorganised things:

<http://www.ymba.org/books/buddhism-wisdom-faith-pure-land-principles-and-practice>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 16th, 2013 at 5:53 AM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

Koji said:

As I read Astus he is saying that the conditioned cannot be transcended (nirvana-ed) because there is nothing beyond conditionality (nirvana is thus not real). In this respect, the unconditioned (nirvana) has no relevance for us. This is hardly a recipe for mystical unity and especially kensho which in every way implies transcendence of conditionality.

Astus wrote:

What I'm saying is that there is no unconditioned outside of the conditioned. Conditioned is essentially unconditioned. That is, appearances are originally empty. There is no emptiness outside of appearances. And looking for an unconditioned somewhere else is following mistaken ideas.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 16th, 2013 at 4:55 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

jeeprs said:

But in practice such an idea can be misleading.

Astus wrote:

Only if one believes that there is nothing to change about identifying with phenomena. Otherwise it is actually pointing to the practice to be done, because one has to see the emptiness of one's own everyday experience and not look for some supernatural realm outside of that. Also, obtaining the "ordinary mind" is right here and not some other place.

jeeprs said:

Again these passages stress the profound difference between the Buddha and the 'ignorant worldling'.

Astus wrote:

The difficulty is not in the teaching but the abilities of the practitioner. Thick and dull people should busy themselves with repentance, purification practices and merit accumulation, not high level wisdom teachings that only confuses them.

jeeprs said:

I think Astus is reading this in a somewhat 'deflationary' way, to dismiss or discount the essentially 'world-transcending' attributes and characteristics of 'the Tathagatha'. It is possible to interpret many Zen passages in support of that view, but I don't read those passages the same way.

Astus wrote:

As I see it, Zen is the path of sudden enlightenment for those with the proper abilities. Otherwise one should look at the general Mahayana teachings and follow the gradual training. It is useless to follow a method meant for high level practitioners when one has lesser abilities.

"Those of dull faculties who cannot bring this into effect
Must continuously strive at repentance
Of their beginningless crimes.
When all hindrances are extinguished
The Buddha-state appears before your eyes."
(Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment, ch 11)

"Therefore, being with no place to dwell is the way of all Buddha activity. The Mind that does not abide anywhere is the Perfect Awakening, Without understanding the Unconditioned Truth, even with much learning and diligent practice, one still does not recognize one's own Mind. ... Because one lacks the capacity for sudden Awakening, one must study the Tao of Dhyana for 3, 5, or 10 years. There is no special arrangement or negotiation for achieving Buddhadharma. However, this Teaching of the Tathagata exists as an expedient for the purpose of transforming all beings. For example, one shows a yellow leaf to a crying baby and pretends that it is gold. This is not really true, but it stops the crying of the baby. If a teaching says that there is truly something to obtain, then it is not the Teaching of my sect, nor would I be a member of such an heretical sect."

(Huang-po: Chung-Ling Record)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 16th, 2013 at 5:04 PM

Title: Re: Buddhas, omnipotence and mantras

Content:

Astus wrote:

brendan,

Purification happens because you practice. There is nothing magical here. Instead of thinking about one's desires and aversions, one focuses on the object of meditation, thus overwriting to some extent one's habits. This is purification.

Supernatural powers like having many bodies and reading minds are not exclusive for bodhisattvas and buddhas but practically any being (including the lower realms) with a not too dull mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 16th, 2013 at 5:54 PM

Title: Re: zixing or self-nature

Content:

some1 said:

the Sixth Patriarch HuiNeng was not a well educated person and he should be unaware of the Sanskrit terms

Astus wrote:

Except that the writer(s) of the Platform Sutra were well educated, but it still doesn't have to do anything with Sanskrit.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 16th, 2013 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: Does Zen have ethics?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sure it does. Japanese take the bodhisattva precepts, in other countries they take all the usual Buddhist precepts. Dogen wrote extensively on regulations, in modern Rinzai meditation on the bodhisattva precepts is the final and highest stage of koan practice. Also, Chan traditionally has an extra set of precepts for monastics called the Pure Regulations that is attributed to Baizhang.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 17th, 2013 at 12:54 AM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

Koji said:

This means also that emptiness cannot be established apart from the phenomenal world. But we can't stop here if we do this blossoms into nihilism.

Astus wrote:

In your interpretation how could the affirmation of the phenomenal world mean nihilism?

Koji said:

I forgot to mention it, but we can say that emptiness is the negation of false views. Naturally, too, there is no Buddha-nature to be found in emptiness since BN transcends causation (i.e. dependent origination). Hence, there is neither mystical unity nor kensho. As far as it goes we are still stuck in samsara. This is why we have to get beyond emptiness. It is inadequate. Emptiness is only descriptive, not essence. We have to be on guard not to reify emptiness making it, for example, into universal nothingness (sarva-abhavat). The true middle path leads to Buddha-nature or the same Mind-only. Here is where mystical unity or kensho kicks in.

Astus wrote:

Emptiness is not holding on to any view:

"If even my correct teachings are to be abandoned, how much more incorrect teachings?"

(Diamond Sutra, ch 6)

"The victorious ones have said

That emptiness is the elimination of all views.

Anyone for whom emptiness is a view

Is incorrigible."

(MMK 13.8)

If you say there is a view beyond no view, that is another view and it is attachment.

"Outside mind there's no dharma, nor is there anything to be gained within it. What are you seeking? Everywhere you say, 'There's something to practice, something to obtain.'

Make no mistake! Even if there were something to be gained by practice, it would be nothing but birth-and-death karma. ... Buddhas and patriarchs are people with nothing to do."

(Record of Linji, p 17; tr. Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 17th, 2013 at 2:46 AM

Title: Re: Does Zen have ethics?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Shel,

The question is whether Zen has ethics, not whether you can give a list of incidents where people behaved unethically. However, if you can logically show that Zen necessarily leads to bad morals it is a different matter, and there is already a topic like that: <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=69&t=9305>.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 17th, 2013 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: Does Zen have ethics?

Content:

shel said:

Not just any people who have behaved unethically. The people mentioned are transmitted and realized Zen masters and teachers of Zen. Are there any more relevant exemplars of Zen ethics? It goes to the very heart of what transmission and realization mean in Zen.

Astus wrote:

Zen is approximately 1500 years old. I don't see people bringing up the story of Nanquan's cat or Juzhi's finger to point out how bad Zen teachers are. And again, the cases like that of Shimano was already addressed in that other thread that is about the lack of morals in Zen. So, I think that if you want to run a debate about the ethicalness of Zen here - and I consider that a fine idea - instead of citing those few well known incidents, bring in some reasoning and such to support the argument that Zen has an ethical fault.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 17th, 2013 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: Buddha-lands and Pure-Lands

Content:

zamotcr said:

1. Saha world is just a world system (like a galaxy) or Saha applies to our complete universe?

2. What is the difference between a Buddhaksetra and a Pure Land?

3. Are Pure Lands always a reward land, a Sambhogakaya land?
4. If Saha World is just a world system, there can be other world systems like our saha world, impure?
5. All impure Buddha Lands are physical, I mean, material worlds, like the same physical plane or dimension as us?

Astus wrote:

1. Sahaloka (World of Endurance) signifies our universe (trichiliocosm) from hells to heavens.
2. The term "pure land" occurred first in Chinese language as an equivalent of "buddha land" and they are synonyms.
3. No, they can be both nirmanakaya and sambhogakaya.
4. There are many worlds, many universes.
5. Something physical is not automatically impure. Only the mind can be impure. And yes, from the very word "land" comes that buddha lands have an appearance perceptible by the five physical senses. In Buddhism only the highest heavens of the formless realm are without physical qualities.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 17th, 2013 at 5:07 AM

Title: Re: Mystical Unity and Kensho

Content:

Koji said:

Rather how is the phenomenal world not nihilistic insofar as the term nihilism means the world has no real existence?

Astus wrote:

Real and exist - that are negated - mean ultimately real and existent. Ultimately means substantially, independently. No Buddhist says that a 'table' doesn't exist at all, what emptiness and dependent origination means is that a 'table' does not exist in and of itself independently of everything else. There is no 'substance' in a table. A table is necessarily made of several parts and it has a limited existence as that. It naturally disintegrates eventually. But a table exists as something one can see, touch, smell and think of.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 17th, 2013 at 5:17 AM

Title: Re: Does Zen have ethics?

Content:

shel said:

I've done better than merely argue the case, I've shown evidence.

But okay, I reason that because an apparent sociopath (someone without a conscience or sense of responsibility for other beings) can be a transmitted and realized master of Zen, that therefor conscience and a sense of social responsibility is superfluous in Zen.

A Zen master can do pretty much whatever they like and still be considered a realized Zen master. Shimano, for example, is still considered a realized master of Zen.

Astus wrote:

Evidence would be if you could show in the canonised scriptures of Zen that it denies ethical behaviour. What you gave evidence to is that there can be individuals who act unethically, however, that does not discredit the entire tradition. Devadatta was a fully ordained monk, nevertheless, he did bad things.

You are giving lot of credit to the status of Japanese Zen priest. Such words as "transmitted" and "realised" have meaning only in a modern Western Zen context. It is quite unimaginable if a Chinese abbot behaved unseemly who wouldn't be shortly removed from his position and banished from the monastery.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 17th, 2013 at 7:01 PM

Title: Re: Buddha-lands and Pure-Lands

Content:

zamotcr said:

1. Each of this universes or trichiliocosm are limited in space right? It's like a big galaxy are they?

3. Thanks to previous discussions with you, I learned that Amitabha's PL is a Sambhogakaya realm, so other buddha-lands. Could you provide an example of a nirmanakaya pure land?

5. But isn't it true that for instance Amitabha's Pure Land is above highest heavens, outside samsara and triple realm? In which sense can the physical senses apply to Amitabha's Pure Land? Are beings there of physical matter, like us?

Astus wrote:

1. Yes, objects exist in space. Only mental phenomena are without form.

3. The present buddha Shakyamuni is the example of nirmanakaya, so all the previous buddhas are also nirmanakaya, and where we live is their land. I don't know if there is a clear definition somewhere of what counts as nirmanakaya and sambhogakaya realm. In East Asia it was through the development of Pure Land teachings that Amitabha is now considered a sambhogakaya land, but in Tibetan Buddhism they differentiate between Amitabha as nirmanakaya and Amitayus as sambhogakaya. I'd say - and this is just speculation - that where all the six realms exist count as nirmanakaya and where only select people - noble ones - are present are sambhogakaya. Or another interpretation is possible, the appearance of nirmanakaya and sambhogakaya depends simply on the perceiver's level of enlightenment, since sambhogakaya is visible only to noble bodhisattvas.

5. Yes, in the East Asian system of 10 realms worlds of buddhas are separate from the six samsaric realms. However, in Buddhism "physical" (rupa) means simply the four elements that actually correspond to fundamental sense-perceptions of heat, solidity, movement and cohesion. When there is a visible object, it is rupa. When there is an auditory object, it is rupa, etc. It's not like assuming some essentially physical behind perception.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 17th, 2013 at 7:39 PM

Title: Re: Does Zen have ethics?

Content:

shel said:

According to Bodhidharma (first Chinese patriarch) Zen follows a "special transmission outside scriptures" which "did not stand upon words". Does not stand upon words, Astus. But perhaps you know better than Bodhidharma.

Incidentally, Bodhidharma is credited with the physical training of the Shaolin monks

Astus wrote:

Both are later additions to the legend of Bodhidharma (attribution of the four-line slogan to Bodhidharma: 11th century (The Koan: Texts and Contexts, p 79); kungfu and Shaolin temple: 13th century; martial art book by Bodhidharma: 1642 (Seeing through Zen, p 26)). However, Zen existed within a strictly monastic environment from the very beginning, and they emphasised the upholding of precepts early on (Mario Poceski: Guishan jingce (Guishan's Admonitions) and the Ethical Foundations of Chan Practice in "Zen Classics", p 15f).

shel said:

In fact they ARE the tradition. They are the "special transmission outside the scriptures."

Astus wrote:

No. First of all, Buddhism is not a single centralised institution, nor is Zen. One person is not a representative of everyone else, and certainly not the entire tradition. Possessing a certificate of transmission only means that the one person who gave that believes that man worthy of it. But it is not a validation of a central examination. You are using the concept of collective responsibility, however, such a thing does not exist in Buddhism.

shel said:

I've shown that in effect the "special transmission outside the scriptures" doesn't need to have a conscience. Indeed, some in Zen go so far as to suggest that overriding conscience is necessary, or even indispensable.

Astus wrote:

You have shown that there are a few people how intentionally distort specific teachings to back up their immoral actions. This is nothing new, as some have misinterpreted the teachings like no-self and emptiness in the same way, but at the same time such perversities were regularly refuted by outstanding masters, starting with the Buddha himself. Per definition a bodhisattva must have great compassion. Without compassion there are no bodhisattvas, therefore no Zen practitioners.

Three books on Zen and ethics by current Zen teachers:

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=Jy0ArFx-YEgC>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=koijpgpwiHgC>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=EeXSq0GSwekC>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 17th, 2013 at 9:08 PM

Title: Re: Does Zen have ethics?

Content:

Luke said:

Right, but how much importance do they place on them?

Astus wrote:

One should not forget that there is a big difference between modern Western Zen and Zen in East Asian countries, especially before the 20th century. Zen was the philosophy of elite monastics and higher class laity. For older monastics you don't need to preach about the precepts, and enthusiastic aristocrats were also familiar with them. Also, there's a strong connection between the transmission of precepts and the transmission of Zen, as summed up here: <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=104&t=13679>. For instance, Heze Shenhui - the first propagator of radical sudden enlightenment and the so called southern school - made a career of giving bodhisattva and monastic precepts. The famous Platform Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch bears in its title that it is taught from the "ordination platform", and its central chapter is about precepts and repentance practice.

Luke said:

I guess there is also the question of how much Zen books reflect actual Zen practice, as opposed to just what sells.

Astus wrote:

Exactly.

Luke said:

But weren't most of his regulations morally neutral stuff like how to prepare soup with perfect concentration without wasting any ingredients?

Astus wrote:

The Eihei Shingi of Dogen contains various regulations. They are about monastic organisation. It also has rules against for instance bringing weapons, meat, secular books, musical instruments, etc. into the study hall. It regulates how unruly monks should be handled, managing financial matters, etc. The Shobogenzo contains writings on the 16 precepts and other ethical issues. Since becoming a monk includes taking the precepts, and Zen practice contains the bodhisattva vows, the essential ethical teachings are unavoidable and they are the backbone of the entire training.

Luke said:

Can you provide a link about this, please?

Astus wrote:

There are books discussing it briefly, like "The Zen Koan" of Miura & Sasaki that describe Rinzai training. As for Baizhang's rules, you can download it from the BDK site:

http://www.bdkamerica.org/digital/dBET_T2025_Baizhang_2006.pdf, and there's also Ven. Yifa's book "The Origins of Buddhist Monastic Codes in China".

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 17th, 2013 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: Does Zen have ethics?

Content:

Luke said:

This question of mine still hasn't really been addressed. How do these "mushin" ("no-mind") types of concepts imply any morality?

Astus wrote:

The Diamond Sutra explains it very well, how a bodhisattva should practice charity and save all beings without forming the concept of self, person, life-span or sentient being. That is no-mind practice.

Dogen starts the Jukai chapter in Shobogenzo (tr. Nearman) this way:

"All Buddhas in the three temporal worlds—past, present, and future—affirm that to leave home life behind is to realize the Truth. The twenty-eight Indian Ancestors and the six Chinese Ancestors, all of whom Transmitted the Buddha's Mind seal,* were, each and every one of them, monastics. Most likely, it was because they strictly observed the monastic regulations that they were able to become outstanding models for those in the three worlds of desire, form, and beyond form. Thus, in practicing meditation and inquiring of the Way with their Master, they made the Precepts and the monastic regulations foremost. Had they not distanced themselves from their faults and guarded against misdeeds, how could they have realized Buddhahood and become Ancestors?"

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 17th, 2013 at 10:21 PM

Title: Re: 'Mind' in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

As for the early scriptures,

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.061.than.html> states it clearly that only uninstructed people believe that there is something lasting in mind. As for nibbana not being mind: <http://sujato.wordpress.com/2011/05/13/vinna%E1%B9%87a-is-not-nibbana-really-it-just-isn%E2%80%99t/> Also check out Maha Boowa's teaching: <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/thai/boowa/straight.html#radiant>.

For Mahayana, the best source on what mind is is Yogacara, as they produced a substantial amount of generally recognised treatises on the subject. Within the eight consciousnesses there is nothing lasting, even the karmic seeds have only a momentary existence.

In chapter 14 of Xuanzang's Cheng Weishi Lun (tr. Cook), it explains eternity regarding the dharmakaya:

"This [result] is also ETERNAL, because it is endless. The pure realm of the Dharma is said to be ETERNAL, because it is devoid of origination, devoid of cessation, and by nature unchanging. Because the support of classes of mind of the four knowledges is eternal, they are endless and therefore said to be eternal, but not that they are eternal by nature, because they originate from causes, because of the categorical declaration that that which is born ends with cessation, and because we do not see form or mind that is not impermanent. However, as a result of the power of original vows and the inexhaustible number of sentient beings to be converted, the four classes of knowledge last forever, uninterrupted and endless."

In the same chapter:

"It is also said that the Dharma body is devoid of generation and cessation, only acquired through causes for its realization, neither form nor mind, etc."

Candrakirti in the Madhyamakavatara (11:17; tr. Leschly) says practically the same:

"When the dry firewood of everything knowable,
Is [consumed by the fire of wisdom], the peace of the victorious one's dharmakaya [is all there remains]
At that moment, there is no creation and no cessation;
When mind ceases, its [enjoyment]-body manifests in actuality."

However, the above only applies to a buddha's dharmakaya and not to the usual 6/8 consciousnesses. This is what later schools like Zen and Vajrayana call the (true) nature of the mind. The quoted "luminous mind" section doesn't fit the description of the dharmakaya as it cannot be defiled.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 19th, 2013 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: Does Zen have ethics?

Content:

Luke said:

Okay, but it still doesn't directly say that practicing evil actions without forming the concept of self, person, life-span or sentient being is the wrong way to go or is not Zen. I'm looking for a quote that clearly rejects this mistaken idea.

Or getting historical, were there any Zen masters in medieval Japan who were harsh critics of the samurai instead of being samurai apologists?

Astus wrote:

The Diamond Sutra speaks about what is to be practised by a bodhisattva. It doesn't go into avoiding evil actions but only talks about good actions. Texts that talk about avoiding evil are first of all found in the Vinaya collection, and that is part of every Buddhist canon. The Zen tradition kept the Vinaya, therefore it is part of it. Only the Japanese tradition dumped the complete Vinaya but it kept the Brahma Net Sutra that teaches the bodhisattva precepts.

Master Xuyun in explaining the prerequisites of http://hsuyun.budismo.net/en/dharma/chan_sessions2.html gives first the firm belief in karma and the observance of discipline:

"Whoever One may be, especially if striving to perform one's religious duty, one should believe firmly in the law of causality. If one lacks this belief and does whatever one likes, not only will one fail in the performance of religious duty, but also there will be no escape from this law (of causality) even in the three unhappy ways."

"In striving to perform one's religious duty, the first thing is to observe the rules of discipline. For discipline is the fundamental of the Supreme Bodhi; discipline begets immutability and immutability begets wisdom. There is no such thing as self-cultivation without observance of the rules of discipline."

Or if we want to go back in time, a 1000 years earlier Baizhang Huihai says at the beginning of his recorded sayings that for the uninstructed beginners one has to first teach about precepts and renunciation, but for those who have renounced the world should teach about the mind.

The very first mistake some people make is to think that Zen is somewhat outside of Buddhism. Zen is a Mahayana tradition that doesn't teach anything different from what the Buddha said. Zen doesn't have any separate ethics from what is already in the canonical texts.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 19th, 2013 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: Buddha-lands and Pure-Lands

Content:

Astus wrote:

The teaching of mind-only Pure Land supports the general Pure Land teachings. That is, people perceive based on their karma. Even if it is a buddha standing before one, only with the right karma - right mental seeds - can one realise it is a buddha. Although Shakyamuni lived in India, it didn't make the world pure and peaceful for everyone. Also, this world is generated by the karma of the beings living here, while the buddha-land of Amitabha is created by his vows.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 20th, 2013 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: Does Zen have ethics?

Content:

shel said:

...strayed from the teachings of Śākyamuni Buddha...

There is no question that Zen ethics are questionable. The better question at this point is why is that the case? Why can a sociopath so easily become a Zen master? What allows that to happen?

Astus wrote:

To acknowledge that they strayed from the teachings by committing immoral actions is also saying that there is an ethical norm expected to be upheld. That is, it confirms that there is such a thing as Zen ethics, and that is the measure of their behaviour.

As for how someone who acts unethically could become and remain a Zen teacher is not a question about the ethical teachings of Zen but rather the institutional structure. Or rather about Westerners who like to believe in omniscient gurus and crazy wisdom. Both are a different topic that has already been discussed previously in the Zen Has no Morals thread.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 20th, 2013 at 4:49 PM

Title: Re: Are samurai good symbols of Zen Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is interesting that while the Crusades are cited to show how the Christian(s / Church) can be vicious and bloodthirsty, Eastern warriors are acceptable. Although perhaps the whole romance surrounding chivalric virtues and stories is a more appropriate parallel to the idea of the samurai. Indeed, the acceptance of Buddhism in the West is part of the Romantic movement.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 20th, 2013 at 10:18 PM

Title: Re: Hsu Yun ---paralysis meditation---question

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here is an answer to the issue (in PDF):

http://www.chibs.edu.tw/ch_html/chbj/22/0619huimin.pdf

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 21st, 2013 at 12:08 AM

Title: Re: Are samurai good symbols of Zen Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The "five types of Zen" was created by https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Guifeng_Zongmi.

"Samurai Zen" doesn't fit in it anywhere, the so called outsider Zen is for non-Buddhist religious practitioners, particularly Taoists and Confucianists, as Zongmi explains in his "Origin of Humanity". He writes in Chan Prolegomenon (J. L. Broughton: Zongmi on Chan, p 103):

"The true nature is neither stained nor pure, neither common nor noble. Within dhyana, however, there are different grades, ranging from the shallow to the deep. To hold deviant views and practice because one joyfully anticipates rebirth in a heaven and is weary of the present world is outsider dhyana. Correctly to have confidence in karmic cause and effect and likewise practice because one joyfully anticipates rebirth into a heaven and is weary of the present world is common-person dhyana. To awaken to the incomplete truth of voidness of self and then practice is inferior-vehicle dhyana. To awaken to the true principle of the dual voidness of self and dharmas and then to practice is great-vehicle dhyana. (All four of the above types show such distinctions as the four [dhyanas of the realm of] form and the four [concentrations of the] formless [realm].) If one's practice is based on having all-at-once awakened to the realization that one's own mind is from the outset pure, that the depravities have never existed, that the nature of the wisdom without outflows is from the outset complete, that this mind is buddha, that they are ultimately without difference, then it is dhyana of the highest vehicle. This type is also known by such names as tathagata-purity dhyana, the one-practice concentration, and the thusness concentration. It is the basis of all concentrations. If one can practice it from moment to moment, one will naturally and gradually attain the myriad concentrations. This is precisely the dhyana that has been transmitted down from Bodhidharma."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 21st, 2013 at 3:46 AM

Title: Re: Are samurai good symbols of Zen Buddhism?

Content:

Luke said:

So this "Bompu Zen" idea was made up by Yasutani-roshi or by some other Japanese Zen teacher?

Astus wrote:

The order presented on the Wanderling's site is different from the original as it first puts ordinary Zen followed by outsider Zen. Originally the Zen of ordinary people means those Buddhist practitioners who don't aim for any liberation but rather to accumulating merit and gaining pleasurable birth as humans and gods. The difference in Zongmi's system between outsiders' and ordinary people's Zen lies in accepting the teaching of karma and rebirth or not, that is, Buddhist or non-Buddhist. Both follow basic precepts against the worst misdeeds and cultivate some sort of spiritual practice, that can be conveniently called the eight absorptions as they are the requirements for birth in the form and formless heavens. The Wanderling's site's description of Bompū and Gedō Zen focus more on pursuing worldly goals in defining them, however, those following a materialist philosophy don't qualify for any level of Zen in Zongmi's system. It is another thing that the other three levels are also understood differently by the Wanderling and Zongmi.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 21st, 2013 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: Are samurai good symbols of Zen Buddhism?

Content:

Luke said:

So did Yasutani-roshi invent this particular classification which starts with "bompū" and "gedō"?

Astus wrote:

Can't say whether it was his interpretation, he heard it from someone else, or some other way it got presented like that in the Three Pillars of Zen. Someone should have to do a research on the development of the theory of five types of Zen. All I can say is that Zongmi had a different idea.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 21st, 2013 at 6:12 AM

Title: Re: Are samurai good symbols of Zen Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

To add some more to what Meido said, as a consequence of established monasteries, Buddhism relied on the support of the ruling - i.e. warrior/aristocratic - class in every country. Chan spread and survived because of its close connection to Chinese regional landlords (it is a myth that Chan monasteries were self-reliant).

I think when we are talking about the connection between samurai and Zen it is primarily a modern image, a myth, that is connected to the Western fascination with Asian martial arts and all things oriental. It is not a historical question, as history is a lot more complicated thing. For instance, in Song China the Zen teachings were for educated lay people, for literati and aristocrats, and not the common people. And that's true for most of the well known Zen teachers themselves who came from upper class families. And so it is with Zen in Japan.

"Does Buddhist practice have anything to offer someone - like a police officer, a soldier, a government official - whose work involves the use of force or its authorization?"

Of course, and that depends on the individual's level of interest. I don't think that Buddhism should appear as some sort of judgement of character. It is an open market. People take and use whatever they want. One can be a soldier, a banker, an office clerk or even a criminal, and at the same time Buddhist. There is no such thing as excommunication from the religion. Only monastics can lose their robes, but not the refuge they take.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 22nd, 2013 at 10:30 PM

Title: Re: Who SHOULDN'T practice Vajrayana?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Who SHOULDN'T practice Vajrayana? People that don't want to practice Vajrayana! It's not like anybody is pointing a gun at your head or anything...

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 22nd, 2013 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: Stage of Non-retrogression

Content:

Astus wrote:

A whole chapter on the subject in Shinran's Kyogyoshinsho:

<http://www.amidanet.com/kgss-e.htm>.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 23rd, 2013 at 12:13 AM

Title: Re: Who SHOULDN'T practice Vajrayana?

Content:

Malcolm said:

It makes you wonder if the secrecy advocated in the Buddhist tantras is not so much about being secret as it is "Hey guys, this Hindu yoga stuff is freaking awesome, but if our Buddhist compatriots get wind of how effective this stuff is a) they won't believe us b) they will consider us heretics no matter how much we insist our view is grounded in Buddhadharma".

Astus wrote:

And that gives another group of who shouldn't practice Vajrayana. Those who don't believe in ("transcendent") energy and related ideas.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 23rd, 2013 at 5:39 AM

Title: Re: Who SHOULDN'T practice Vajrayana?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think it is only a stereotype that Tantra is complicated while Zen is simple. As already mentioned, there are many ways in Vajrayana that are simple and straightforward. On the other hand, if you have ever looked into a classic Zen work like the Blue Cliff Record, it is anything but simple.

Zen and Tantra (from "Dropping Ashes on the Buddha", p 79-80)

One evening, after a Dharma talk at the Boston Dharmadhatu, a student said to Seung Sahn Soen-sa, "At a recent seminar on Zen and Tantra, Chogyam Trungpa Rinpoche compared Zen to black and white and tantra to color. What do you think of this?"

Soen-sa smiled and said, "Which one do you prefer?"

(Laughter from the audience.)

The student shrugged his shoulders.

Soen-sa said, "What color is your shirt?"

"Red."

"You are attached to color."

The student hesitated for a few moments, then said,

"Maybe you are attached to black and white."

Soen-sa said, "The arrow has already passed downtown."

There was a long silence. "Do you understand?" (A few giggles.) "Okay, I will explain: The dog runs after the bone." There was another long nervous silence. "Okay, I will explain even more." (Loud laughter.) "When you are thinking, your mind and my mind are different. When you are not thinking, your mind and my mind are the same. Now tell me -when you are not thinking, is there color? Is there black and white? Not thinking, your mind is empty mind. Empty minds means cutting off all speech and words. Is there color then?"

"I don't know."

"You don't know? I hit you! Now do you understand?" (Laughter.) "In original mind there is no color, no black and white, no words, no Buddha, no Zen, no Tibetan Buddhism."

The student bowed and said, "Thank you."

Soen-sa said, "'Thank you?' What do you mean by 'Thank you'?"

"Only 'Thank you.'"

Soen-sa laughed and said, "Only 'Thank you' is good. I hope that you soon understand your true self."

The student said, "I've begun."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 23rd, 2013 at 6:22 AM

Title: Re: Who SHOULDN'T practice Vajrayana?

Content:

Luke said:

But still, I would argue that Zen meditations are simpler than tantric meditations. However, talking about Zen can certainly be as complicated as talking about any other Buddhist tradition.

Astus wrote:

If you were familiar with the full system of koan practice in Rinzai Zen you might reconsider that.

Very briefly:

http://www.thezensite.com/ZenBookReviews/Zen_Sand.html

Briefly (PDF):

http://www.thezensite.com/ZenBookReviews/Zen_Sand-Wu.pdf

The complete introduction as in the book (PDF):

<http://nirc.nanzan-u.ac.jp/en/files/2012/12/Zen-Sand-Introduction.pdf>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 23rd, 2013 at 4:48 PM

Title: Re: Who SHOULDN'T practice Vajrayana?

Content:

Meido said:

Bankei had several teachers.

Adding to Kirt's points, we might also recall that after his initial awakening Bankei still went looking for someone to confirm his experience [he found Dosha Chogen, who told him that he had indeed recognized his nature but had yet to clarify it...Bankei at first rejected this, but then realized Dosha was right and so stayed to practice under him for over a year].

Astus wrote:

But he realised the unborn on his own and, although visited teachers, later rejected them. That is, he tried to find someone who could give him the teachings but failed. He tried to follow the traditional route but it didn't work. So, I go with Kirt on this, that while certainly Bankei had sources to learn about Zen - and he was an ordained monk - it was not the case that he found the right teacher eventually.

"I can see now, looking back to that meeting, that even Dosha's realization was less than complete. If only he were alive today, I could make him into a fine teacher. It's a great shame. He died too soon." (Waddell, p 47-48)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 23rd, 2013 at 6:31 PM

Title: Re: Are samurai good symbols of Zen Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Bankei compares samurai to easily breaking china because their code of honour requires them to answer even the smallest disrespect as if it were a serious challenge, he also tells a story where a samurai intentionally bumped into people to call it an offence and give him reason to kill them (Waddell, p 108-109).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 26th, 2013 at 4:44 PM

Title: Re: Who SHOULDN'T practice Vajrayana?

Content:

Anders said:

I think this demonstrates more that Zen can be obscure more than that it can be complex.

Astus wrote:

I agree.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 26th, 2013 at 9:36 PM

Title: Re: Buddha-lands and Pure-Lands

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't know about a buddha-land classification system, so I'm just saying how I think about it.

The Saha world is the buddha-land of Shakyamuni only in the sense that he was present here, however, he is no more around. It is probably because of the absence of Shakyamuni that the search for other buddhas emerged, since there are infinite number of buddhas.

I don't know of a separate land of Shakyamuni. Do you have a source? Here is a short summary of how the buddha-land of Shakyamuni is often understood:

<http://jklr.net/2008/12/24/shakyamuni-buddhas-pure-land/>.

It is part of the bodhisattva work to establish one's own buddha-land when becoming a buddha. The difference between buddhas and lands is explained by the difference in their specific vows.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 26th, 2013 at 10:46 PM

Title: What is the Definitive Source?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Is there a definitive source of Dzogchen teachings? I mean, if I want to check whether a teaching given is authentic, is there a written canon that can confirm or deny the validity of a doctrine or method? Like, can the tantras be used for this, or the writings of certain masters? Or is it only the living lineage holders who can serve as accepted sources?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 26th, 2013 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: The FGS Buddha tooth

Content:

Astus wrote:

Is there a single tooth relic anywhere that was confirmed by an independent team of scientists to be at least from around the time of the Buddha? Or any other Buddha relic?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 27th, 2013 at 12:08 AM

Title: Re: The FGS Buddha tooth

Content:

Indrajala said:

As far as I know, no, but this tooth is purportedly from Tibet, though no record of it exists, and the prominent Tibetans consulted on the matter were unaware of its existence.

Astus wrote:

There are a couple of other questions.

Did Buddha live in Tibet? Does the Tibetan government/church have all there records intact from the time before the Communist occupation? Did they have a reliable record of every relics throughout the country? Is the tooth from a temple that is well known? Do other relics in general have some certificate next to them? Is there a way to tell the difference between genuine and fake relics? What is the importance of that tooth relic anyway?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 27th, 2013 at 12:11 AM

Title: Re: What is the Definitive Source?

Content:

Astus wrote:

So the three statements of Garab Dorje can be used in a similar way as the Four Dharma Seals?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 27th, 2013 at 12:23 AM

Title: Re: What is the Definitive Source?

Content:

Astus wrote:

That's good. It is then quite easy to tell the difference between Dzogchen and not Dzogchen.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 27th, 2013 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: The FGS Buddha tooth

Content:

Indrajala said:

Still, in this case the claim is made it was a Buddha tooth that was kept in Tibetan monastery, and yet the Tibetans were unaware of it.

Astus wrote:

Certain Tibetans currently are unaware of it. Do we have the records of the mentioned temple and information on the area?

Indrajala said:

Besides remains dug out of archaeological digs, I'm not likely to believe claims of Buddha relics.

Astus wrote:

Then why is this one so interesting unlike all the others around the world?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 27th, 2013 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: The FGS Buddha tooth

Content:

Indrajala said:

Are you implying in the absence of such details the legitimacy of the relic is enhanced?

Astus wrote:

The legitimacy is unknown without evidence. Isn't that logical?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 27th, 2013 at 6:18 AM

Title: Re: What is the Definitive Source?

Content:

Astus wrote:

So there are the 17 Dzogchen root tantras and their commentaries, however, they are not available in English, so those who can't read Tibetan can't really use them.

Does the three statements of Garab Dorje include a definition of rigpa that is to be introduced? Because it hinges on what is actually being shown, as pointed out by Pero. So if it is clarified then it's still a good measurement. If it isn't, perhaps there is some widely accepted commentary?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 27th, 2013 at 4:30 PM

Title: Re: What is the Definitive Source?

Content:

Dronma said:

It is not a matter of any definition, but of recognition through personal experience.
So, again a qualified Dzogchen Master is absolutely necessary!

Astus wrote:

In your opinion then only a Dzogchen teacher can confirm if one has the correct experience? But how do you confirm that the teacher is indeed giving you introduction to the nature of mind? Should one simply trust the appearance of authenticity of the teacher?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 27th, 2013 at 6:32 PM

Title: Re: What is the Definitive Source?

Content:

Sönam said:

NO, and that my point ... when one realize his real nature, thru the presence of the teacher, one can not mistake it. Knowledge is within the realization, with no possible mistake (to take it for chocolate pudding for exemple) That's why a master (or a realized practitioner) is a must. Without a master, doubt will always remain.
If one is not sure to have realized his true nature, with a teacher ... he has not.

Astus wrote:

But what guarantees the content of the realisation? There are numerous mental states one can believe to be supreme enlightenment. There are many versions of chocolate pudding, it can also be completely artificial flavouring, and a child or a foreigner could be cheated about what a chocolate pudding is.

You say a master is required. In what way is that an assurance? Also, how can one be sure of the master? Like, if you say that this or that person is the orthodox representative of Dzogchen and he decides who is correct and who is wrong, that's one way to go about it, like the Roman Catholics do.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 27th, 2013 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: What is the Definitive Source?

Content:

Sönam said:

Only confidence can help in this case ... and peoples having recognized there true nature recognize each others, that's the only point.
It is also not a question of being sure of the master, because the one who recognize is You, not the master.
If it is said that this realization is ineffable, it's because it is ... what ever would be the way we try.

Trust me, once, we the energy of the master, you've realized your nature ... doubt is eliminated.

Astus wrote:

That means there is no way to decide who is or who is not an authentic Dzogchen teacher. Either you recognise someone as such or not, but it's completely arbitrary. Consequently there is no basis for debating anyone's claim to being a realised Dzogchen master.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 29th, 2013 at 7:05 AM

Title: Re: Does Zen have ethics?

Content:

oushi said:

When it comes to free will, you may not see it, but it is inconsistent to say that there is no difference between karma (which is cause and effect mechanism) and will, because it would mean that will has its cause so it isn't free, but rather determined by its cause. Buddhism is pretty much deterministic, but because of anatta there is ultimately no one determined. All is karma and there is Tathagata, the unconditioned, who is not free to act good or bad, but is free from acting good or bad. And this is what you will find in Zen masters' teachings. This is why ethics are only a background framework, and not a major issue.

Astus wrote:

"The nihilistic approach evokes the psychological attitude of fatalism. You understand logically that if you do something, things happen in reaction to it. You see a continuity of cause and effect, a chain reaction over which you have no control. This chain-reactive process springs from the mystery of "nothingness." Therefore, if you murder someone, it was your karma to murder and was inevitable, foreordained. For that matter if you do a good deed, it has nothing to do with whether or not you are awake. Everything springs from this mysterious "nothingness" which is the nihilistic approach to reality. It is a very naive view: one leaves everything to mystery."

(Chogyam Trungpa Rinpoche: Shunyata in "Dzogchen Primer", p 225)

Karma is not universal cause and effect, it is ethical responsibility and mental habituation. Fatalism and pre-determinism are not Buddhist views.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 30th, 2013 at 7:39 PM

Title: Re: Chinese mahayana meditation

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Does anyone know of any resources on how meditation was practiced in the Hua Yen tradition?

Astus wrote:

This is the only work I know in English: <http://www.fodian.net/world/1884.html>. It's also found in Cleary's collection plus commentary.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 30th, 2013 at 11:44 PM

Title: Re: Chinese mahayana meditation

Content:

Astus wrote:

In the http://www.acmuller.net/kor-bud/collected_works.html there are two volumes on Huayan, although by Korean authors, but Uisang's seal is known throughout East Asia and it can also be used for meditation. Also, in the second Hwaeom volume it has a treatise on the Ocean Seal Samadhi.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 3rd, 2013 at 12:24 AM

Title: Re: which pure land do you seek?

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Amitabha Buddha is the Lord of the Western Pure Land, and Bhaisayaguru is the Lord of the Eastern Pure Land. My question is why the Western Pure Land is seen as a more desirable option, as Bhaisayaguru (Medicine Buddha) also made powerful vows for the benefit of sentient beings.

Astus wrote:

The Pratyutpanna Sutra was translated to Chinese in the 2nd century. In the 3rd century both Zhi Qian and Saṅghavarman translated the Larger Amitabha Sutra. Huiyuan established the first community dedicated to birth in Amitabha's Pure Land in the early 5th century, while Kumarajiva translated the Shorter Sutra a little later. Zhiyi's (6th century) constantly walking samadhi prescribes contemplation on Amitabha in his grand meditation manual. The so called patriarchs of Pure Land Buddhism (https://webcache.googleusercontent.com/search?q=cache:jL3dja0dBkkJ:www.thomehfang.com/kumarajiva/13Patriarchs/13Patriarchs_20Nov2003.htm+&cd=1&hl=en&ct=c&lnk&gl=us, <http://www.jsri.jp/English/Pureland/lineage.html>) show some traditionally outstanding teachers propagating this teaching.

Besides the above I don't have enough information or resources to provide regarding the social development of the cult of Amitabha.

<https://books.google.com/books?id=jhKVXrkVIZsC> can give some insights, just as <https://books.google.com/books?id=Wjv85t5E0hQC>, <https://books.google.com/books?id=n2h2Gf4dE4MC>, and on a linguistic level <https://books.google.com/books?id=48nRNu5PlOMC>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 3rd, 2013 at 3:13 AM

Title: Re: which pure land do you seek?

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Astus, Thanks so much. A few more "must reads" to add to my ever-increasing pile!

Astus wrote:

If you are interested in a more internal argument for Amitabha, Honen's

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=BT43aTdifVIC> (here's a <http://www.jsri.jp/English/Honen/WRITINGS/senchakushu.html>) is the work to look into.

The common argument everywhere is that the Pure Land path is simply the easiest and safest to buddhahood among all the other options. And frankly, this is something that no other Buddhist method or school can beat.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 4th, 2013 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: Madhyamaka, Nagarjuna and Meditation

Content:

Astus wrote:

Samatha meditation in Mahayana is not much different from what you find in Theravada (but no kasinas) and other Agama schools. A good meditation manual related to Madhyamaka is Kamalasila's Bhavanakrama. You may also use Zhiyi's teachings on samatha-vipasyana (http://www.kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/ebm_book_page.htm and http://www.kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/sgs_book_page.htm), or from the Tibetan side the lamrim and lojong teachings of various schools. From the Tibetan side, this is a superb summary of both theory and practice in Madhyamaka:

<https://books.google.com/books?id=8zeh8VAFCvAC>, and this one is also OK:

<https://books.google.com/books?id=dJQVkgEACAAJ>, and its pair:

<https://books.google.com/books?id=LHo4lw15XQC>.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 4th, 2013 at 3:37 AM

Title: Re: Books and Teachers

Content:

Astus wrote:

From the time when Buddhists started to write down the words of the Buddha the Dharma has been preserved in a literate medium. Customs, robes, styles, rituals, languages, cultures changed, while the texts were preserved to remain the authentic source. Shakyamuni died, the disciples died, teachers died, but their thoughts were kept in the canon. We can't meet Nagarjuna, Vasubandhu, Zhiyi, Gampopa, Dogen, Tsongkhapa, or even modern teachers like Yinshun and Tulku Urgyen. Famous masters today, like Thich Nhat Hanh and the Dalai Lama, are unreachable for most of us. What we have from all of them are their written teachings.

Besides the texts there is also a living, breathing tradition, the Sangha. It is very beneficial to become a part of that, to remove ourselves from the ideal images we might cherish in the confines of our rooms. To see that all Buddhists are human beings, and we are not alone with our troubles and doubts. It is only natural that we want to know others who share our views and interests. It is good to learn from those more experienced in the Dharma than us. In fact, those are also reasons for people joining this very forum.

"all of the buddhas and all of their teachings of peerless perfect enlightenment spring forth from this sūtra."

(Diamond Sutra, tr. C. Muller; ch 8)

"So then, if someone wants quickly to know full enlightenment, he should indefatigably and continually hear and study this very perfection of wisdom. For he will understand that in the past, when he was a Bodhisattva, the Tathagata trained in the perfection of wisdom; that also he should train in it; that she is his Teacher. In any case, when the Tathagata has disappeared into final Nirvana, the Bodhisattvas should run back to this very perfection of wisdom."

(The Perfection of Wisdom in Eight Thousand Lines, tr. Conze; ch 3, p 107)

"One should know that such a Bodhisattva is reborn here after he has deceased in other world systems where he has honoured and questioned the Buddhas, the Lords. Any Bodhisattva who, after he has deceased in other world systems where he has honoured and questioned the Buddhas, the Lords, is reborn here, would, when he hears this deep perfection of wisdom being taught, identify this perfection of wisdom with the Teacher, [1771 and be convinced that he is face to face with the Teacher, that he has seen the Teacher. When the perfection of wisdom is being taught, he listens attentively, pays respect to it before he hears it, and does not cut the story short. Such a Bodhisattva should be known as one who has practised for long, who has honoured many Buddhas." (ch 7, p 138)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 4th, 2013 at 4:12 AM

Title: Re: Budha was wrong about desire

Content:

Astus wrote:

In the video she says that the suffering is not the desire itself but focusing on what we don't have and what we don't want. So we should not resist desire and appreciate the present. We should also understand that desire never stops, there is no end of it, thus there is no state to reach and hold on to.

The above statements can be easily matched with the Buddha's teachings. Her ideas about the universe, etc. are a different matter, but fairly understandable considering the cultural background, and they serve the practical application of her teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 4th, 2013 at 5:14 PM

Title: Re: Books and Teachers

Content:

smcj said:

In my experience, they are completely different. A book can't see through you, know your mind, and know which teaching or practice is right for you--for starters.

Astus wrote:

A teacher can give appropriate advice if s/he knows you personally, as a good friend. And that is great. At the same time, if you study texts, in time you can find just the right answers to whatever questions you may have. And being in a community has lot more to offer than just a single wise fellow rephrasing the Buddha's teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 4th, 2013 at 6:33 PM

Title: Re: Books and Teachers

Content:

smcj said:

A book can't call you on your b.s. A good lama can and will.

Astus wrote:

Buddhist teachers are not exclusive to Tibet. You can even find a couple of them among registered users here. Who considers what b.s. is another matter. Teachers are not homogeneous, and who is a "good lama" is a subjective decision on the part of the seeker.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 4th, 2013 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Books and Teachers

Content:

JKhedrup said:

But there are some criteria that I think we can hold across the board

Astus wrote:

Yes. And those are both sensible and important.

Indrajala said:

It logically follows that placing spiritual authority in classical texts rather than fallible humans is probably a preferable arrangement given the numbers of degenerate individuals taking advantage of people, to say nothing of all the nepotism, corruption and politics you find in Buddhist institutions.

Astus wrote:

Buddhist institutions are not the work of Mara. I agree with you that one shouldn't glorify everything that is old and Asian, nor take hagiographies at face value. At the same time, communities seem to be doing fine most of the time, and they are usually reliable sources of the Dharma. Neither saints nor devils.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 4th, 2013 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: Books and Teachers

Content:

JKhedrup said:

I understood that "absence of living Buddhadharma" to be the absence of teachers and practitioners, not texts. But of course, if you have a different opinion I am interested in hearing it!

Astus wrote:

It is said in the Pure Land tradition that the last sutra to remain is the Larger Amitabha Sutra for another 100 years after all the others are gone. And even after that people will attain birth in Sukhavati for some time just by the name. Noble beings are already gone by the time of the Dharma ending age except for adventurous bodhisattvas visiting this realm. Even in the Dharma semblance age Buddhists mostly act out of customs rather than realisation. Also, in Chinese Buddhism it is believed that the first sutra to disappear is the Surangama Sutra.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 5th, 2013 at 12:20 AM

Title: Re: Ippen- Don't worry about your heart/mind.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Shinran's teaching from <http://www.shinranworks.com/relatedworks/tannisho1.htm#9>:

"Although I say the nembutsu, the feeling of dancing with joy is faint with me, and I have no thought of wanting to go to the Pure Land quickly. How should it be [for a person of the nembutsu]?"

When I asked the master this, he answered, "I, too, have had this question, and the same thought occurs to you, Yuien-bo!"

"When I reflect deeply on it, by the very fact that I do not rejoice at what should fill me with such joy that I dance in the air and dance on the earth, I realize all the more that my birth is completely settled. What suppresses the heart that that should rejoice and keeps one from rejoicing is the action of blind passions. Nevertheless, the Buddha, knowing this beforehand, called us 'foolish beings possessed of blind passions'; thus, becoming aware that the compassionate Vow of Other Power is indeed for the sake of ourselves, who are such beings, we find it all the more trustworthy.

"Further, having no thought of wanting to go to the Pure Land quickly, we think forlornly that we may die even when we become slightly ill; this is the action of blind passions. It is hard for us to abandon this old home of pain, where we have been transmigrating for innumerable kalpas down to the present, and we feel no longing for the Pure Land of peace, where we have yet to be born. Truly, how powerful our blind passions are! But though we feel reluctant to part from this world, at the moment our karmic bonds to this saha world run out and helplessly we die, we shall go to that land. Amida pities especially the person who has no thought of wanting to go to the Pure Land quickly. Reflecting on this, we feel the great Vow of great compassion to be all the more trustworthy and realize that our birth is settled.

"If we had the feeling of dancing with joy and wishing to go to the Pure Land quickly, we might wonder if we weren't free of blind passions."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 5th, 2013 at 1:07 AM

Title: Re: Lost foolish being

Content:

Astus wrote:

Fortunately birth in the Pure Land does not require special techniques or empowerments. Realising that one is full of karmic defilements, that only Amitabha's Vow can help in reaching enlightenment, and sincerely aspiring for birth in the Pure Land, these are the essentials for having right faith. And even in times of doubt one should keep the name in mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 5th, 2013 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: Books and Teachers

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Does this statement come from the Pure Land Sutras themselves, commentaries, or both?

Astus wrote:

It is in the Larger Sutra:

"In the future, the Buddhist scriptures and teachings will perish. But, out of pity and compassion, I will especially preserve this sutra and maintain it in the world for a hundred years more. Those beings who encounter it will attain deliverance in accord with their aspirations."

(Three Pure Land Sutras, p 61; tr. Inagaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 5th, 2013 at 3:58 AM

Title: Re: Books and Teachers

Content:

smcj said:

Do you know of any equivalent opportunity for practice anywhere in the world today?

Astus wrote:

There are strong retreat oriented communities in both Theravada and Mahayana countries. Some follow the traditional dhutanga, some a different type of practice. There are also hermits in mountains and forests. One can not only learn from such people but even join them. As I hinted before, Tibet is not the only Buddhist place on this planet.

Also, it is not even a strictly Buddhist phenomenon that people completely withdraw from the world (<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Anchorite>).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 5th, 2013 at 5:15 AM

Title: Re: Books and Teachers

Content:

smcj said:

The culture of Tibet encouraged and logistically supported people to do extended retreats to a degree not seen elsewhere. You don't see groups of 17 year olds committing to a lifetime of retreat these days, and being given the material support needed to do so (up until the society collapsed due to invasion).

Astus wrote:

Becoming a monk/nun is leaving home, leaving the secular world behind. It is the backbone of the Buddhist tradition, therefore it is very much supported by Buddhists everywhere. There are different types of monasteries, and among them you find those that are even more withdrawn and closed off from the world.

Some examples from China:

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=R6miAPuNYj8>

<http://www.tricycle.com/interview/the-chinese-hermit-tradition-an-interview-with-red-pine>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=UAD5m5f3oH0C>

And from Thailand:

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=FjKxHa07dfo>

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/authors/khantipalo/wheel083.html>

Outside of Buddhism, other religions also have monastic and eremitic orders, like the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Enclosed_religious_orders.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 7th, 2013 at 4:24 AM

Title: Re: Ippen- Don't worry about your heart/mind.

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

If you think you live maybe a long or short life, and then you die, and then you go to Amida's realm, you are still clinging to a self that is real.
in other words, you are still relying on self-power.

Astus wrote:

If we had to be free from clinging to self in order to attain birth in the Pure Land then ordinary beings could never make it. And that is against the very purpose of the Pure Land path, to provide a safe route to buddhahood for everyone.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 7th, 2013 at 5:59 AM

Title: Re: Impossible to follow?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The idea is that since we live in the Dharma ending age the capacity for difficult practices is virtually non-existent. Therefore the recommended method is the recitation of the name, as that does not require a concentrated mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 7th, 2013 at 7:36 AM

Title: Re: Impossible to follow?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The translator, <http://amidanet.com/inagaki.htm>, is a Shinshu follower, and as such he presented the orthodox view of the teachings of Shinran.

Shinran writes (http://www.shinranworks.com/majorexpositions/kgssVI-15_36.htm#34, <http://amidanet.com/kgss-g.htm>):

"Master [Shan-tao's] intent seems to be as follows: He says [in the Essential Meaning of the Contemplation Sutra], "The number of the gateways of the excellent practices provided for different capacities of people is eighty-four thousand and more. Gradual and sudden teachings are suited to their capacities. Those who follow favorable conditions all attain emancipation."

We note, however, that ordinary and ignorant people, who are ever sinking in the state of birth-and-death, find it hard to cultivate a meditative mind, because it requires cessation of thought and concentration of it. A non-meditative mind is also hard to cultivate, because it requires abolishing evil and practicing good. For this reason, visualizing forms and fixing the mind on them are hard to accomplish; hence, Shan-tao says [in the Commentary on the Meditative Practice] "Even if one dedicates a lifetime of a thousand years, the Dharma-eye will not be opened." How much more difficult it is for them to attain formlessness and no-thought! Therefore, he says, "The Tathagata knew beforehand that ordinary people of the latter age defiled by karmic evil would not be able to accomplish even the practice of visualizing forms and concentrating on them - to say nothing of seeking realization without visualizing forms. It would be like building a house in the air without magical means."

Also:

"It is impossible for us, who are possessed of blind passions, to free ourselves from birth-and-death through any practice whatever. Sorrowing at this, Amida made the Vow, the essential intent of which is the evil person's attainment of Buddhahood. Hence, evil persons who entrust themselves to Other Power are precisely the ones who possess the true cause of birth."

(<http://www.shinranworks.com/relatedworks/tannisho1.htm#3>)

"It cannot be said that the practitioner of self-power is equal to Tathagata. With one's own mind of self-power, it is impossible to reach the land of the Buddha of inconceivable light. It is taught that only by shinjin that is Other Power does one reach the land of the Buddha of inconceivable light."

(<http://www.shinranworks.com/shorterworks/virtueofname.htm>)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 7th, 2013 at 6:06 PM

Title: Re: Ippen- Don't worry about your heart/mind.

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

My point is that if you are waiting until you die, you have already missed that opportunity countless times even in this one lifetime.

Astus wrote:

From the perspective of the Pure Land teachings, the opportunity that should not be missed, but was missed countless times before, is to grasp and hold on to Amida's vow. Ordinary people are bound by their own habits and fail to comprehend emptiness. Even the most respected masters of various schools say that they are simple unenlightened human beings, although they are educated in the Dharma and spent many years in retreat. What hope can an average lay person have?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 8th, 2013 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Question About Chinese pure land

Content:

Arabic Buddhist said:

So what I shall follow ?

Just by practice the name ?

Or practice the Name with Morality ?

Astus wrote:

As Ven. Huifeng said already, Chinese Buddhism doesn't have schools like Japanese Buddhism. There are various outstanding teachers who say this or that about Pure Land. You follow what you have inclination to. Read widely and find the one that you feel drawn towards.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 9th, 2013 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: Question About Chinese pure land

Content:

Arabic Buddhist said:

I have inclination to Shan tao and Honen teaching .

But when I read the The pure land Sutra and I read Buddha Speak About morality practice to be born in pure land . Then I have Doubt about Shan tao and Honen teaching .

So I am Confused .

Astus wrote:

Honen's message is simple and straightforward: "There is no other reason or cause by which we can utterly believe in attaining birth in the Pure Land than the nembutsu itself." (<http://www.jsri.jp/English/Honen/WRITINGS/ichimai.html>)

It doesn't mean that we should act in an immoral way. Against that interpretation Honen spoke explicitly and emphatically. He says that doing good things is what all buddhas taught, but as ordinary beings evil acts are common. It should be clear that he means karmically evil, that is, acts that result in lower birth (see a summary here: <http://www.budsas.org/ebud/whatbudbelieve/156.htm>). It is true that some of us can uphold a high moral standard, but most of us fail now and then. But no matter what, the condition of birth in the Pure Land is the nembutsu and nothing else. If you can do good things and avoid the bad ones, by all means do that. But don't be arrogant because of it. And if you find yourself lacking in certain aspects, don't feel down about it, don't be afraid that you lose your chance with Amida. If you can, correct yourself. If not, minimise the harm.

"While believing that even a man guilty of the ten evil deeds and the five deadly sins may be born into the Pure Land, let us, as far as we are concerned, not commit even the smallest sins. If this is true of the wicked, how much more of the good. We ought to continue the practice of the Nembutsu uninterruptedly, in the belief that ten repetitions, or even one, will not be in vain. If this is true of merely one repetition, how much more of many!"

(Honen the Buddhist Saint, p 30)

"Do not be worrying as to whether your evil passions are strong or otherwise, or whether your sins are light or heavy. Only invoke Amida's name with your lips, and let the conviction accompany the sound of your voice, that you will of a certainty be born into the Pure Land."

(p 31)

"Let the Nembutsu of the Original Vow stand by itself and receive help from no other quarter. By outside help I mean that of one's own wisdom, the observance of the commandments (sila), religious aspiration, deeds of charity, and the like. But the good man, as he is, and the bad man too, as he is, each in his own natural condition, should seek help nowhere except in the Nembutsu. But he is in harmony with the mind of the Buddha who practices it by giving up his wickedness and becoming good. A man who cannot make up his mind, but is always thinking himself unfit in this way or that, will not be sure of attaining birth into the Pure Land."

(p 32)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 9th, 2013 at 3:27 PM

Title: Re: Question About Chinese pure land

Content:

plwk said:

If one is sincerely & properly practicing the Nembutsu, the practice of sila should also be naturally forthcoming, no? ... one's obscurations and obstacles becomes purified, hence, sila is no longer an issue for us but a natural consequence and response to the gift of Amida?

Astus wrote:

I have not seen such a connections stated anywhere, especially not Honen. Could you point to some sources here?

I'm also wary of equating other-power with no-self. From the point of view of the Path of Sages, it is neither a practice nor a realisation of emptiness. And from the Pure Land side, if other-power were a way to attain insight into no-self, one would not need to be born in the Pure Land.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 9th, 2013 at 3:32 PM

Title: Re: Question About Chinese pure land

Content:

Arabic Buddhist said:

" In the Amitabha Sutra, the Buddha further explained that to be reborn in the Western Pure Land, we have to be "good men and good women." The standard for this is the Three Conditions; thus, they are a crucial part of our practice, an integral component of rebirth in the Pure Land.

To achieve this rebirth, we need belief, vows, and practice—leading a moral life and chanting Amituofo mindfully.

...

For example . Do they said THREE CONDITIONS practice is useful just in first Dharma Age . Or they have other obinions ?

Astus wrote:

That's only Ven. Chin Kung's interpretation. It is not written like that in the sutra itself, nor did Honen explain it that way. If you want a different perspective from the Chinese side that is closer to Honen - but still not the same -, I recommend Ven. Yin Kuang.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 9th, 2013 at 3:50 PM

Title: Re: Zen, Buddhism, and Taoism

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

So yeah, what are the relationships between Zen, Indian Buddhism, and Taoism?

Astus wrote:

Zen is a Chinese form of Buddhism developed in China. It is doctrinally and practically a Buddhist teaching.

There isn't really such a thing as "Taoism". There are certain philosophical-religious schools in China that could be called Taoist, and there is just generally the Chinese folklore and native beliefs people may call Taoist. The two are not the same.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 10th, 2013 at 1:50 AM

Title: Re: Zen, Buddhism, and Taoism

Content:

LastLegend said:

While Tao or Taoism or whatever it may be called are Chinese folklore and native beliefs, I do believe the principle of yin and yang are practical and true to my experience. It is the foundation of Chinese medicine. For example, I can make a tea from red brown rice and aduzki red bean that can be as strong as viagra. No ingredients added-just red brown rice and aduzki red bean. I personally don't take the Tao lightly, and I am of the opinion that eating is a big part of the spiritual path. Not just being any vegetarian but being a vegetarian by applying yin and yang principle is the way to go, I feel.

Astus wrote:

If I take an Aspirin or some other modern medicine it doesn't make Western Buddhism a mixture of European philosophy and Indian ideas. When I distinguished between regulated Taoist doctrines and general beliefs I meant that while Chinese Buddhism - and not just Zen - adapted and absorbed the culture, starting with using Chinese language, it does not mean accepting ideas that contradict the Dharma or confusing the Buddha's teachings with those of Zhuangzi, Mengzi or any other Chinese thinker.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 10th, 2013 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: Zen, Buddhism, and Taoism

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

It seems at least certain Zen masters saw some value or connection between Zen and Tao, such as Takuan Soho's commentary on the Tao Te Ching, but what I think is questionable is that Zen is basically Taoism in Buddhist garb.

Though I suppose, again, considering Buddhism being influenced by Bon in Tibet or incorporating Shintoism in Japan, there is a likelihood of influence of Taoism in Chan but to what extent I am unaware.

Astus wrote:

These are inevitably huge generalisations that Taoism, Shinto and Bon influenced Buddhism here and there. Thing is, none of those three religions had any fixed canon or doctrine before Buddhism appeared. All of them were native beliefs. I'd say Confucianism had a greater impact on forming Chinese Buddhism than Taoism, although for some reason people tend to forget about that. There are some Buddhist commentaries on "Taoist" works like the Yijing, and there were some who propagated the unity of the three major Chinese traditions. Just as today you find people who believe that Christianity and Buddhism, or science and Buddhism, are somehow compatible or even one.

Zen perfectly fits into the Buddhist teachings and I have yet to see those peculiarly Taoist traits in it. What Zen adopted from the Chinese culture is the idea of the lineage of transmission, and it is based on the imperial succession. There are certain literary styles used in Zen that are also specifically Chinese. Oh, and again, the language they used was Chinese. Now, as we speak English, if someone analysed it, they could say that Western Buddhism got mixed with Christianity, materialism, phenomenology, utilitarianism, and probably a number of other thoughts, not to mention the pervasive romanticism and colonialism-orientalism in Western Buddhist discourse. And almost forgot, the purist idea of an "Original Buddhism".

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 10th, 2013 at 2:40 AM

Title: Re: Question About Chinese pure land

Content:

Astus wrote:

plwk,

Yes, as you say, there are various forms of Pure Land practice. Honen is kind of a special case because of his process of selecting (<http://www.jsri.jp/English/Honen/TEACHINGS/senchaku/process.html>) the Rightly Established Practice as the recitation of the name. And the form of nembutsu used is just the recitation and nothing more (<http://www.jsri.jp/English/Pureland/DOCTRINE/nembutsu.htm>). He did not reject other teachings. He said that for ordinary beings in this age the simple recitation is the best choice to attain buddhahood. And while recitation has innumerable merits, it doesn't follow that it makes someone a better person in this life. It may, but it's not necessary nor important.

Outside of Honen's teachings, the practice of remembrance and recitation has many uses. Already in Daoxin's (fourth Chan patriarch) teaching there are references to the Meditation Sutra and how buddha-mindfulness is identical to the buddha-mind, something that in the later tradition became the True Mark Buddha Remembrance. And this only shows how in Chinese Buddhism it is very misleading to talk of any distinct schools like Pure Land and Chan. In Tibetan Buddhism they also recommend meditation on Amitabha with the aim of attaining birth in Sukhavati, but nobody says there is a special Tibetan Pure Land school. Really, it was only Honen who rejected everything else in favour of focusing only on attaining birth with nembutsu.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 10th, 2013 at 3:32 AM

Title: Re: Zen, Buddhism, and Taoism

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

Though in the case of Taoism at least, Laozi and Zhuangzi were taken to be the major texts. Perhaps the way of uncovering what influences these indigenous faiths left is through comparing and contrasting them to Indian Buddhism.

Astus wrote:

"The Daode jing and Zhuangzi are the only Daoist texts that matter because they are the "essence" and "original teachings" of Daoism"

Response:

"There is no principal Daoist scripture. Although the Daode jing is probably the most central and influential scripture in Daoist history, different Daoist adherents, communities and movements revere different scriptures. The primary textual collection in the Daoist tradition is called the Daozang 道藏 (Daoist Canon). It is an open textual collection, with new additions having been made throughout Daoist history. The first version was compiled in the fifth century CE. The received version was compiled in the fifteenth century, with a seventeenth century supplement. It consists of roughly 1,400 texts, texts that come from every major period and movement of Daoist history. "
(http://www.daoistcenter.org/Daoism_Misconceptions.pdf)

Regarding Taoism this article is strongly recommended (in PDF):

http://faculty.franklin.uga.edu/kirkland/sites/faculty.franklin.uga.edu.kirkland/files/TEN N97.pdf.

And here find Guifeng Zongmi's criticism and at the same time inclusion of both Taoism and Confucianism: <http://www.slashdocs.com/ixrhyn/on-human-origins.html>.

Also see this post I made in a similar thread last year:

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=110688#p110688>

Vidyaraja said:

I would have thought Taoism would have considering both are spiritual systems with ascetic practitioners and would have thought Confucianism would have been more for informing ethics. DT Suzuki apparently said

Astus wrote:

Confucianism was the state philosophy most of the time, Confucian works were studied by every educated person and Confucian ethics and values were the social standard. The majority of outstanding and influential Buddhists were from the higher classes (aristocracy, literati), and thus were raised on Confucian teachings. While mountain hermits may have shared practices and ideas with each other to the point that distinguishing sources was nearly impossible, they were not the people who defined the mainstream doctrines or composed works on anything even if they could write at all.

DT Suzuki, well, his writings are mostly biased and fairly outdated.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 10th, 2013 at 3:34 AM

Title: Re: Zen, Buddhism, and Taoism

Content:

LastLegend said:

I sense that there is a general consensus among Western scholars to downplay the significance of Taoism or Tao as a religion. Maybe I am wrong?

Astus wrote:

I'd say it's rather the opposite, that Taoism was and is a religion and not a pure philosophy. See the links in my previous post.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 10th, 2013 at 4:44 PM

Title: Re: Question About Chinese pure land

Content:

plwk said:

During the time of Sakyamuni or Amitabha Buddha, where were Shan Dao and Honen? When Shan Dao and Honen read the Sutras, who do they refer to?

Astus wrote:

Honen's presentation of the Pure Land teaching is based on the sutras. To say otherwise is to reject him as a Buddhist teacher. Honen emphasised what is the bare minimum to attain birth, something that is still achievable by ordinary humans. That's what his process of selecting the nembutsu of the Primal Vow about. He didn't say that all the other practices are wrong, meaningless or don't exist.

While he remained a monastic till the end of his life, he didn't require of everyone else to do the same. He recited the name tens of thousands of times a day and regularly went to retreats, but he said that a single utterance suffices. He was a highly educated Buddhist master, and he said that the only thing needed is the nembutsu and one doesn't have to know what even the Three Minds are.

Honen's approach is like the not so bright student who wants to get over his university years and it is enough if he can pass all the exams. Sure, there are a few top students with the best grades and honours and whatnot. And there are many who can just survive. Honen included everyone in his teachings from the imperial court and elite monastics to the prostitutes and fishermen. For instance, even today you can't learn all the esoteric practices of Shingon unless you are ordained (and speak Japanese). But you can recite Namu Amida Butsu no matter who you are or what you know and attain buddhahood. Wasn't that the intention of the Buddha, to give a path that liberates all beings?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 10th, 2013 at 7:47 PM

Title: Re: Question About Chinese pure land

Content:

plwk said:

Let's face it Astus. In the Pure Land tradition, teachers are a mere reference point and not the main point.

Astus wrote:

I see it the other way around. Without teachers developing an interpretation there is no Pure Land tradition. First of all, there are more than three sutras mentioning Amitabha, so selecting those three as the primary source is already a traditional choice and not something said by the Buddha. Reciting the name, that's not taught in any of the three sutras, but again developed in China. The sutras can be interpreted in many ways. In Buddhism it is perfectly valid and acceptable to create one's own interpretation, maybe even start a new school if one can gather enough followers. I'm not saying it is some sort of heresy or something bad, especially when one does not come up with non-Buddhist views like a creator God and an eternal soul but stays within the boundaries of the four seals.

To follow up on your Christian example, it took a number of https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ecumenical_council to establish a generally accepted interpretation. Even defining what books are canonical took time and consensus. And there were and are Christian churches who don't agree with any of that. Luther may have believed that the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sola_scriptura, but he was already building on a 1500 years old tradition, and in fact accepted many of the traditional interpretations (e.g. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Lutheran_Marian_theology).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 10th, 2013 at 10:30 PM

Title: Re: Question: Other Power & Cleaning Karma

Content:

Astus wrote:

As you said, it is impossible in Buddhism for anyone to meddle with another person's karma. What makes all the difference is your attitude and your practice. Even the smallest thought can result in aeons of trouble or bliss. That way being mindful of a buddha is a positive influence on what and how you experience. So even if something bad befalls you, you could say that without the influence of a buddha/bodhisattva, it would have been much worse.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 11th, 2013 at 5:29 AM

Title: Re: Question: Other Power & Cleaning Karma

Content:

Astus wrote:

Repentance is among the daily practices in both Chinese Buddhism and Jodo Shu.

An example of a Chinese practice: <http://kongmu.wordpress.com/2011/10/09/88-buddhas/>.

And this is from the <http://english.jodoshuna.org/prayer/daily-prayer/>:

San Ge-ge

In the presence of Buddhas, we repent of harmful karmas we accumulated from the past to present.

GA SHAKU SHO ZO SHO AKU GO

KAI YU MU SHI TON JIN CHI

JU SHIN GO I SHI SHO SHO

I-SSAI GA KON KAI SAN GE

All harmful karmas I have ever accumulated from the past are caused by my wrong speech, conduct and mind, that are derived from my greed, anger and ignorance. I now repent of all of them.

And the same in different translation from <http://www.jsri.jp/English//otsutome/otsutome.html>:

SANGE-GE

(Confession)

GA SHAKU SHO ZO SHO AKU GO

KAI YU MU SHI TON JIN CHI

JU SHIN GO I SHI SHO SHO

I-SSAI GA KON KAI SAN GE

All the evil Karma ever accumulated by me in the past, which I realize is derived from my inherent greed, anger, and ignorance.

Whatsoever born of my body, words, and thoughts, I now make full confession of them wholeheartedly to the everlasting Compassion of Amida Buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 11th, 2013 at 5:59 AM

Title: Re: Zen, Buddhism, and Taoism

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

While I am personally not convinced, there must be some basis or reason for multiple figures to make these claims.

Astus wrote:

The question is where and why were Taoism and Zen connected by certain individuals. Without binging in actual quotes and references this can't really be answered. As for Zen itself, the tradition makes no connection to Taoism, Taoist teachers or teachings, but recognises only Buddhist scriptures and doctrines.

Vidyaraja said:

I haven't read much of Suzuki, but why is he biased and outdated?

Astus wrote:

He represented a specific interpretation of Zen defined by Japanese Rinzai rhetoric and modern Romantic/Theosophist/New Age ideas. That's why it is biased. And it is outdated because since then scholars have extensively reviewed and modified the understanding of Zen history and religion.

Vidyaraja said:

Huang Po also speaks of the Buddha-Nature or Mind being the source substance of all phenomena, which of course includes all that is merely human. Aside from that, if Zen is indeed a form of Buddhism, did not the Buddha teach that skandhas which comprise the human is anatta or "not myself"? What is merely human is denied in Buddhism as far as I can tell, whereas Buddha-Nature/Pure Mind is all there is.

Astus wrote:

It seems to me you are misinterpreting Zen as some sort of monism. Zen doesn't teach anything like a supreme absolute thing nor does it deny ordinary phenomena. Sure, certain translations and terms can be misleading. But, first of all, Zen does not discuss Buddhist doctrine, it talks about practice. So if you gain some sort of view from reading Zen texts, that's not what they were written for. It is very important to clarify the basic teachings of Mahayana before attempting to understand Zen, otherwise one fails to see the context and inevitably misconstrues the whole thing. If you don't know where to start with Mahayana, I recommend Shantideva's Bodhicaryavatara. Although it was never popular in East Asia, it is still a great summary. But if you want to stay within the Chinese Buddhism area, go through the works translated by Ven. Dharmamitra:

<http://kalavinka.org/>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 11th, 2013 at 5:31 PM

Title: Re: Zen, Buddhism, and Taoism

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

Perhaps Suzuki is wrong about his claims, I wouldn't know because I never read him, but I personally never understood the idea of views being outdated. Why is the 2013 understanding of Zen history and religion the correct one? If in the future scholars modify the current understanding, will we then be outdated? Is the Buddha outdated?

Astus wrote:

Certain philosophical and religious ideas are theoretically timeless as they are not bound to material evidence, nevertheless, they can change too by time. Suzuki's works are outdated in terms of their scholarly perspective, what they say about the history and development of Zen, and how it generalises his interpretation of Zen to all forms of Zen. And yes, even the current view of the history of Zen can expire if new sources and studies appear. Translations also require refreshment and corrections for several reasons.

Vidyaraja said:

Zen also doesn't say we are the human body with its thoughts, memories, expectations, etc. Zen and Buddhism in general is a doctrine of awakening to our true nature/the Absolute, not humanism. Buddha himself claimed the 5 skandhas to be anatta, and what else comprises the human organism but the 5 skandhas?

If Zen (and Buddhism by extension) doesn't teach an absolute Buddha-Nature or One Mind or Universal Ground Gnosis, which of course is not a "thing", what does it teach? What is beyond the 5 skandhas that are anatta, anicca, and dukkha?

Astus wrote:

The five aggregates are indeed impermanent, not self and empty. That is their true nature. That is our true nature. But if you look for something beyond that, a universal essence, that's "adding a head on top of your head". Look at the Heart Sutra and the Diamond Sutra - the two most prominent scriptures used in Zen - do they talk about anything like an absolute? And there's the Platform Sutra, right after the story of Huineng it gives an explanation of Mahaprajnaparamita, shows how the nature of the mind is empty, functioning and includes everything, that is, one should not block the senses but be aware without attachment. That is no-thought, the essential path of Zen, and no different from what are taught in the sutras.

If you look into Zongmi's criticism of Taoism (<http://www.slashdocs.com/ixrhyn/on-human-origins.html>), it is exactly this idea of a fundamental source and basis of everything that he refutes as nonsense. Similar arguments exist in both Madhyamaka and Yogacara works.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 11th, 2013 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: Zen, Buddhism, and Taoism

Content:

Huang Po said:

The Dharmakaya, from ancient times until today, together with the Buddhas and Ancestors, is One.

Astus wrote:

"If Dharma students wish to know the key to successful cultivation, they should know that it is the mind that dwells on nothing. Emptiness is the Buddha's Dharmakaya, just as the Dharmakaya is emptiness. People's usual understanding is that the Dharmakaya pervades emptiness, and that it is contained in emptiness. However, this is erroneous, for we should understand that the Dharmakaya is emptiness and that emptiness is the Dharmakaya.

If one thinks that emptiness is an entity and that this emptiness is separate from the Dharmakaya or that there is a Dharmakaya outside of emptiness, one is holding a wrong view. In the complete absence of views about emptiness, the true Dharmakaya appears. Emptiness and Dharmakaya are not different. Sentient beings and Buddhas are not different. Birth and death and Nirvana are not different. Klesa and Bodhi are not different."

(Chung-Ling Record in "The Dharma of Mind Transmission", tr. Lok To)

Also from Huangbo:

"Worldly and holy are very clearly explained in the Three Vehicles. You do not understand and grasp them as objects. Wouldn't it be incorrect to think of emptiness as really existing? Merely wipe out the worldly-and-holy view. There is no Buddha outside of the Mind. The Patriarch came from the West solely to point out that people's minds are Buddha. You do not recognize this and actively pursue the Buddha. You do not recognize this and actively pursue the Buddha outside, thus deluding your own mind. For this reason, I talk about the Mind as Buddha. Actually, giving rise to a single thought, one falls into heterodox paths. Since time without beginning, there is no differentiation or discrimination, Void-ness is the Unconditioned Awakening."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 11th, 2013 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: Zen, Buddhism, and Taoism

Content:

jeeprs said:

It is often said that the idea of dharmakaya is the nearest equivalent to the God idea. I don't think it's true, because it is not something along the lines of a personal deity. But there are many parallels between the Dharmakaya and the God of the mystics.

Astus wrote:

"All of the non-Buddhist paths are attached to the view of a self. If it was actually the case that a self existed, then it ought to fall into one or the other of two categories. Either it is characterized by destructibility or else it is characterized by indestructibility. If it is characterized by destructibility, then it ought to be something like a cow hide. If it is characterized by indestructibility, then it ought to be comparable to empty space. In the case of both of these positions, they are both such as would involve no offense entailed in killing and would involve no merit in refraining from killing. If it were like empty space, then neither rain nor dew would be able to moisten it and neither wind nor heat would be able to dry it out. If this were the case, then it would fall into the category of something which is permanent. If it were permanent, then suffering would be unable to torment it and happiness would be unable to please it. If it thus was something which did not experience suffering or happiness, then it ought not to be concerned with avoiding evil and striving to perform deeds which generate merit. If it was comparable to a cow hide, then it would be such as might be destroyed by wind and rain. If it was destructible, then it would fall into the category of something which is impermanent. If it were impermanent, then there could be neither [future punishments resulting from] offenses nor [future blessings resulting from] engaging in meritorious karmic deeds. If in fact the discourse of the non-Buddhist traditions corresponds to these characterizations, then what would be the point in having the teaching that refraining from killing is karmically meritorious and that engaging in killing constitutes a karmic offense?"

...

"[The beliefs of] you and other non-Buddhists like you are so extremely different from the Buddha's Dharma as to be as far apart as heaven and earth. Your dharmas and that of other non-Buddhists like you is a place for the production of afflictions. In the case of the Dharma of the Buddha, it is a place for the doing away with afflictions. This constitutes a great difference."

(http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/N6P_excerpts/N6P_X-Bk4_X-15.pdf)

jeeprs said:

But if one thinks that emptiness is a non-entity, that is also a wrong view.

Astus wrote:

"Thus because the view of existence and nonexistence of entities will have many faults, therefore that "lack of intrinsic nature of entities" is the vision of reality; it is the middle path; and just that is the attainment of ultimate reality (paramartha)."

(Buddhapalita's commentary to MMK chapter 15, tr. William L. Ames, "Buddhapalita's Exposition of Madhyamaka" in "Journal of Indian Philosophy 14 (1986), p 322)

"For us, there is no view of reification or nihilism based on essence, because we do not maintain that entities exist essentially. Suppose one charged, "Although you do not adopt the view of reification, you do adopt the view of nihilism!" We would reply that if one first maintained that the object of annihilation exists essentially and then later maintained that it does not exist, one would thereby repudiate the necessity of the eternal existence of that which exists essentially, and thus would fall into nihilism. But to say that that which never existed essentially in the first place does not exist is not deprecation, and therefore is not nihilism."

(Tsongkhapa's commentary to MMK 15, in "Ocean of Reasoning", p 325)

jeeprs said:

Actually, giving rise to a single thought, one falls into heterodox paths.

One has to think in order to write.

Astus wrote:

Thoughts are not eliminated or stopped. Not giving rise to means not attaching to, not having a view that there is an essence of a thought.

"What is nonthought? If in seeing all the dharmas, the mind is not defiled or attached, this is nonthought. [The mind's] functioning pervades all locations, yet it is not attached to all the locations. Just purify the fundamental mind, causing the six consciousnesses to emerge from the six [sensory] gates, [causing one to be] without defilement or heterogeneity within the six types of sensory data (literally, the "six dusts"), autonomous in the coming and going [of mental phenomena], one's penetrating function without stagnation. This is the samādhi of prajñā, the autonomous emancipation. This is called the practice of nonthought.

If one does not think of the hundred things in order to cause thought to be eradicated, this is bondage within the Dharma. This is called an extreme view."

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, tr. McRae, p 33-34)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 11th, 2013 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: Question: Other Power & Cleaning Karma

Content:

Nosta said:

Do you interpretate that way too?

Astus wrote:

There are various ways Buddhism is taught and explained. See:

<http://www.tientai.net/glossary/4siddhanta.htm>. The above one falls into the category of "worldly method".

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 12th, 2013 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: Zen, Buddhism, and Taoism

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

Our true nature is impermanent, without a self, empty, and merely the 5 skandhas?

Sounds like nihilism and materialism more than a spiritual doctrine of Awakening to me.

Aside from that, the 5 skandhas are all immanent and yet Buddhism often speaks of "transcendent wisdom." What is this wisdom that is transcendent if all that exists is the 5 skandhas?

Astus wrote:

The idea that there is a self (permanent being) inside or outside the five aggregates has never been accepted in Buddhism. Once the Vatsiputriyas/Pudgalavadins tried to walk around this by saying that the "person" (pudgala) is neither inside nor outside, and they have been regularly refuted. See chapter 9 of the Abhidharmakosabhasyam for a series of arguments against them. From the beginning of that chapter:

"Is there any liberation outside of Buddhism?

No, there is not.

What is the reason for this?

There is no liberation outside of this teaching, because other doctrines are corrupted by a false conception of a soul. The word as other doctrines conceive it is not a metaphoric expression for a series of skandhas. By the power of their belief in this soul as a substantial entity, there arises clinging to the soul, the defilements are generated, and liberation is impossible.

How do we know that the word "soul" is only a designation for a series of skandhas, and that no soul exists in and of itself? We know this because no proof establishes the existence of a soul apart from the skandhas, no proof by direct perception, nor any proof from inference. If the soul were a real entity, separate like other entities, it would be attained (i.e., known) either by direct perception as are the objects of the five sense consciousnesses and the objects of mental consciousness, or by inference, as are the five indriyas.

...

There is neither direct perception nor inference of a soul independent of the skandhas. We know then that a real soul does not exist."

Similar arguments are found in Nagarjuna's Middle Treatise (ch 18) or in Xuanzang's Cheng Weishi Lun (ch 1), just to name two fundamental Mahayana works. From the Zen side:

"There is a type of person (who holds that) there is a bright and intelligent nature that reasons and knows, that sees and hears, and is a lord over the corporeal field of the five skandhas. If one is like this and is an excellent teacher, one cheats people greatly. Do you know this? Now I ask you, 'If you acknowledge this bright intelligence as your true reality, why when you are profoundly asleep are you still not bright and intelligent? If when you are deeply asleep you are not so (bright and intelligent), you are (mistakenly) recognizing a bandit as one's own offspring, which is the root of birth and death and the conditional production of delusion.'" (Xuansha Shibe, Jingde Chuandeng Lu 18, T51n2076_p0345a18-24, tr. from http://www.buddhism.org/board/read.cgi?board=Dharma_Talks&y_number=51&nnew=1)

Or look at Dogen's writing on

<http://scbs.stanford.edu/sztp3/translations/shobogenzo/translations/bussho/intro.html>
l. From the introduction by Carl Bielefeldt:

"In his opening remarks, Dōgen dismisses several of the most common views: that the buddha nature is the potential to become a buddha, that it is the activity of cognition within us, or that it is a universal self pervading the world. Rather, he says, the buddha nature is existence itself — not an abstract principle of being, but the actual occurrence of things, or, as he puts it simply at the end of his essay, "fences, walls, tiles, and pebbles.""

And there's also Sallie B. King's book on the Treatise on <https://books.google.hu/books?id=VHQPXMqmHNIC>, about which there was some <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=53&t=2416> already.

Guifeng Zongmi, whose teachings are prominent in Jinul's Zen, also gives us a short analysis of the aggregates (Chan Prolegomenon in "Zongmi on Chan", p 126):

"There are no other dharmas beyond these, but, upon analysis, a self cannot be apprehended in any of them. Thus, one awakens to the realization that these [types of] body and mind are merely conditions, with the characteristic of seeming concord, but were never one substance. They are characterized as an apparent self and others, but there never existed a self and others."

And regarding the nature of mind as taught in Zen (p 88):

Therefore, thought of the unreal from the outset is calmed, and sense objects from the outset are void. The mind of voidness and calm is a spiritual Knowing that never darkens. This calm Knowing of voidness and calm is precisely the mind of voidness and calm that Bodhidharma formerly transmitted.

...

Because of delusion about this Knowing there arises the characteristic of a self. When one calculates self and mine, love and hatred spontaneously arise. According to the mind of love or hatred, one does good or bad, and, as retribution for this good or bad, is reborn in one of the six rebirth paths, life after life, birth after birth, cyclically, without end. If you find a good friend to show you [the path], you will all-at-once awaken to the Knowing of voidness and calm. Knowing is no mindfulness and no form. Who is characterized as self, and who is characterized as other? When you are aware that all characteristics are void, it is true mind, no mindfulness. If a thought arises, be aware of it; once you are aware of it, it will disappear. The excellent gate of practice lies here alone. Therefore, even though you fully cultivate all the practices, just take no mindfulness as the axiom. If you just get the mind of no mindfulness, then love and hatred will spontaneously become pale and faint, compassion and wisdom [prajna] will spontaneously increase in brightness, sinful karma will spontaneously be eliminated, and you will spontaneously be zealous in meritorious practices. With respect to understanding, it is to see that all characteristics are non-characteristics. With respect to practice, it is called the practice of nonpractice.

Both Zongmi and Jinul teaches no mindfulness/no thought as the essential path of Zen, just as it was taught in the Platform Sutra and later by Dogen.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 12th, 2013 at 4:38 AM

Title: Re: Zen, Buddhism, and Taoism

Content:

Astus wrote:

What is the path, the method to realise that self you say is taught in Buddhism? What meditation shows it?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 12th, 2013 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: Zen, Buddhism, and Taoism

Content:

jeeprs said:

So the answer as to whether there is self or not is neither yes nor no.

But large numbers of people seem to say that the answer was 'no'.

Astus wrote:

The sutta actually says that the "bewildered Vacchagotta would become even more bewildered: 'Does the self I used to have now not exist?'" There was no self any time, it does not disappear either, and that's the difference between no-self and nihilism, as already shown in what I quoted from Tsongkhapa before.

jeeprs said:

So what is 'the ground of existence'? What is it that is lacking? To have theories about that is to engage in speculation.

Astus wrote:

Actually, it is not speculation, it is defining the object of negation. And that object is the idea of independent existence, the concept that something exists on its own as it is. I say it is a concept because nobody ever experiences (or can experience) such a thing. And calling it a "non-thing" is simply saying that it doesn't exist at all and again it cannot be perceived in any way.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 12th, 2013 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: Zen, Buddhism, and Taoism

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

I suppose a generalized path to intuiting Truth is through faith, self-mastery, detachment, seeing the 5 aggregates as anatta, meditation (be it Zazen, Vipassana, or some tantric sadhana in Vajrayana), transcending concepts, looking inward/self-inquiry etc.

Astus wrote:

Could you be more specific? There are step by step instructions on realising the emptiness of self and phenomena, like Chengguan's <https://sites.google.com/site/dharmadepository/translations/examination-of-the-five-aggregates>, and other, more extensive works. Is there one to guide to the realisation of self?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 12th, 2013 at 6:05 PM

Title: Re: Zen, Buddhism, and Taoism

Content:

jeeprs said:

The ground of existence is not the object of negation, and is not what is being negated.

The idea that beings exist 'in themselves' is what is being negated. But the dharmadhātu cannot be negated, because without it nothing would exist.

Astus wrote:

If by dharmadhātu you mean a universal substance upholding all existence, it is negated by the same arguments that refute a creator god or the similar Taoist ideas. If dharmadhātu stands for emptiness and therefore dependent origination, it is not a shared substratum but simply interdependence of all phenomena.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 12th, 2013 at 6:09 PM

Title: Re: Zen, Buddhism, and Taoism

Content:

LastLegend said:

It is true that the original question asked for a historical question. Therefore, we are answering in the context of that. But how much do we know to pass on such information as something accurate or who influenced who?

Astus wrote:

If knowledge of the subject is denied it cannot be asserted whether any tradition borrowed from any other, and the validity of the question is removed. If historical knowledge is possible, then there are https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Historical_method to investigate past events.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 12th, 2013 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: Not Everything is Impermanent

Content:

Astus wrote:

The word in <http://buddhism.lib.ntu.edu.tw/BDLM/lesson/pali/reading/gatha5.htm> is <http://dsalrv02.uchicago.edu/cgi-bin/philologic/getobject.pl?c.3:1:3070.pali>, it means both ancient and eternal.

We could say that the laws of mathematics is eternal. Or the rules of chess. Or the laws of physics. Thus we have a quite old philosophical question here, the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Problem_of_universals.

From a Buddhist point of view, since we don't experience constantly anything, not even universal laws, it is not permanent. Such laws exist for us only as thoughts and nothing more. It should be noted that this is an epistemological answer to the question of a religious tradition.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 13th, 2013 at 4:13 PM

Title: Re: Not Everything is Impermanent

Content:

Astus wrote:

The teaching of the Buddha has its own frame of reference, and that is the four noble truths. The teachings are meant to help one become free from suffering. The three universal characteristics (impermanence, suffering, no self) are the topics to realise to reach the three gates of liberation (emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness). The characteristics are to be contemplated in our personal realm of experience (six senses). If there were anything permanent in our experience we would be experiencing it all the time. Since there is no such experience we can confirm that all of them are impermanent. We might theorise that there is something permanent outside of our experience, however, that is only a concept, an impermanent thought, and even if there were such a thing it'd have no relevance to us.

In Yogacara they count six unconditioned dharmas. Space, analysed cessation, non-analysed cessation, motionless cessation, cessation of feeling and perception, suchness. As unconditioned they are permanent. At least they would be permanent if any of them meant a specific experience, instead of the lack of experience or a theoretical generalisation that they actually signify. In the same category we could put for instance impermanence itself, and impermanence is permanent, just like emptiness and no self. But again, they are simply conceptual explanations and not experience.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 13th, 2013 at 6:39 PM

Title: Re: Not Everything is Impermanent

Content:

jeeprs said:

realization is a different thing to experience, as per the quotation

Astus wrote:

Nevertheless, experience is something that happens in one of the six sensory gates.

Even if we talk about the subtlest mental phenomena, they are impermanent. There is no seventh sensory gate beyond the six. And if any of them were permanent we would experience it constantly.

jeeprs said:
pertain to reality, not to experience

Astus wrote:
A reality beyond experience cannot be sensed or known, therefore it is nothing but speculation.

Author: Astus
Date: Friday, September 13th, 2013 at 8:02 PM
Title: Re: Not Everything is Impermanent
Content:

jeeprs said:
So this level of perception is beyond 'experience' in the sense we generally understand the term, which is the experience of the natural man in the world. That is why the Buddha understands such things as the factors that cause beings to be reborn, and which drive the whole process of birth and death; and why he is said to be 'lokkutara', 'world-transcending'.

Astus wrote:
Yogic direct perception (yogipratyaksa) is still a form of experience, something that occurs and passes, that depends on causes and conditions. A definition from Mipham's Blazing Lights of the Sun and Moon (p 41):
"unconfused knowledge free from conceptualization arising in dependence on the dominant condition of the yogas of shamatha and vipashyana."
Also (p 45):
"By the yogin's meditating well in accord with the precepts taught by the guru, the ultimate meaning of egolessness, the two emptinesses, and three and countless kinds are seen. Moreover, in a single atom as many buddha fields as there are atoms, and limitless pure phenomenal worlds, the mandalas of countless buddhas, are seen and so forth. Clearly experiencing its own sphere, this is yogic direct perception."

Author: Astus
Date: Friday, September 13th, 2013 at 8:14 PM
Title: Re: Not Everything is Impermanent
Content:

undefineable said:
I guess you're saying that 'permanent dharmas' refers to characteristics of reality rather than to states of mind in and of themselves. Is it not the case, though, that such dharmas can atleast be 'experienced' indirectly as a deep-seated change in one's way of seeing things (which one might of course nonetheless 'back-slide' from up to a point), rather than via some soupy altered state of consciousness?

Astus wrote:

In Yogacara there is nothing outside mind, i.e. nothing outside the realm of experience. Space is simply the lack of a physical object. Cessations are various ends of causal continua. Suchness is the fact that there is no self. Therefore these are not experiences per se, but the lack of certain factors in experience. This corresponds to the usual explanation about buddha-nature that one only has to remove the adventitious stains in order to recover it.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 13th, 2013 at 10:02 PM

Title: Re: Not Everything is Impermanent

Content:

undefineable said:

give me the impression that you see 'yogic direct perception' is an inferior state, and that we should simply 'achieve' literal cessations (rather than transcendence) of mental activity. I've also read the translated term 'space' as referring to the nature of mind rather than to a 'lack of a physical object', as you put it.

Astus wrote:

Yogic perception is a term used in Pramana for meditative experience, it is not an inferior state, just a category of direct sensing. Regarding the cessations and space, I was simply using the Yogacara categories of the unconditioned dharmas as you can find them in Vasubandhu's Treatise on One Hundred Dharmas and Asanga's Abhidharmasamuccaya. Space here is not a metaphor for emptiness or the nature of mind, it is simply empty expanse in its ordinary sense. Also, among the different types of cessations, analysed cessation (pratisamkhyā-nirodha) corresponds to the end of defilements as achieved via insight (vipasyana), and it is not the total end of all experience. The coma-like state you mentioned would be nirodha-samapatti (attainment of cessation, the 9th dhyana) or asamjñi-samapatti (thoughtless attainment) and both are among the conditioned dharmas. Involuntary cessation of something is the unanalysed cessation (apratisamkhyā-nirodha) and that covers cases like the involuntary loss of consciousness because of fainting or deep sleep, and other types of endings in causal continua.

undefineable said:

I can't find where you resolve the apparent contradiction and explain where you find a 'middle way'

Astus wrote:

There is no contradiction. Buddha-nature has various definitions. In the above post I used it in the sense of the original nature of mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 13th, 2013 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Not Everything is Impermanent

Content:

undefineable said:

Is this really meant to be taken literally

Astus wrote:

"What is space (akasa)? It is the absence of matter (rupa), because the latter permits the manifestation of all kinds of activities." (Abhidharmasamuccaya 1.1.1, p 24)

undefineable said:

is this really always necessary?

Astus wrote:

No. Not everything in Buddhism has to do specifically with the path, and not everything regarding the path is a necessary element. Buddhist teachings also talk about mistaken ideas and wrong goals.

undefineable said:

Which is distinct from nothing, I take it.

Astus wrote:

As I said, there are various definitions, and many misunderstandings. For instance, saying that empty awareness is buddha-nature is easy to be mistaken for a soul, while calling it no mind or empty mind is easily misunderstood as unconsciousness. What both means, however, is that all mental phenomena are without essence, thus one can let them come and let them go, they self-liberate.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 14th, 2013 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: Not Everything is Impermanent

Content:

smcj said:

You are in effect saying that the actual experience of enlightenment is a fiction.

Astus wrote:

How so? I say one can really be free from ignorance, clinging and all the causes of suffering. Otherwise I'd deny the very meaning of the Buddha's teaching.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 14th, 2013 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: Not Everything is Impermanent

Content:

smcj said:

Enlightenment is not a paradigm, attitude, or concept. It is an experience.

Astus wrote:

Could you define that experience, describe it?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 14th, 2013 at 3:04 AM

Title: Re: Not Everything is Impermanent

Content:

smcj said:

The experience of your own Buddha Nature after the adventitious defilements are removed. Retroactively it is then seen as having always been present, therefore permanent.

Astus wrote:

Yes, I asked about the experience of enlightenment you mentioned. Is the answer that it is always present? Because then I can only conclude that it simply does not exist. Unless you mean something nominal, like for instance although the water itself changes we call it the same river every day. But then it is not really an experience.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 14th, 2013 at 3:18 AM

Title: Re: Not Everything is Impermanent

Content:

smcj said:

Or you can conclude that you are presently unaware of it, that it is something beyond your imagination, as the teachings suggest.

Astus wrote:

If I am unaware of it now but can become aware of it later it cannot be permanent. If something is permanent either one is always aware of it or never, otherwise there is change and so impermanence.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 14th, 2013 at 3:42 AM

Title: Re: Not Everything is Impermanent

Content:

smcj said:

So the world is flat until it is discovered to be round? What changes? Does the world change or does the unawareness become aware to what actually is?

Astus wrote:

Your argument stands only when you presume there are objects independent of the mind, and you claim that buddha-nature is an external independent object to be discovered. But then, the idea that there are independent objects is only an inference and not experience. Is not enlightenment an experience?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 14th, 2013 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: Not Everything is Impermanent

Content:

smcj said:

No, Buddha Nature is the essence of mind, before subject and object. It can never be taken as an object of consciousness anymore than the retina of your eye can see itself.

Astus wrote:

Experience that is not divided into subject and object is simply just experience itself, and it is always changing. But if I consider you likening it to the eye, it sounds more like an ultimate subject rather than lack of duality.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 16th, 2013 at 6:44 AM

Title: Re: what is the Nirvana in zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Please see this thread about the Mahayana understanding of nirvana (including Zen) : <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=167186>. That's how non-abidance is the essential path and goal of Zen, both sudden enlightenment and the path of the bodhisattva.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 5:00 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

If that is the case, how are we to discern which form of continual revelation is true? Nichiren claims that only the Lotus sutra and the chanting of Daimoku can lead to liberation in this degenerate age of the Dharma.

Astus wrote:

The Lotus Sutra answers your question (e.g.: http://www.fodian.net/world/0262_05.html). Nichiren followed Saicho, Saicho followed Zhiyi, Zhiyi followed Nagarjuna, Nagarjuna followed Buddha. There is a very clear connection, but also changes according to times and circumstances. That is the bodhisattva's skill in adapting the teachings to the audience.

Nichiren <http://nichiren.info/gosho/EarthlyDesires.htm>, "To practice only the seven characters of Nam-myoho-enge-kyo may appear limited, yet since this Law is the master of all the Buddhas of the three existences, the teacher of all the bodhisattvas in the ten directions, and the guide that enables all living beings to attain the Buddha way, its practice is incomparably profound."

So, if you approach from the teachings of Nichiren, you find the Buddhadharma in the Daimoku. If you go from the teachings of Shinran, you find it through the Nenbutsu. There are many entrances, many teachings. But they are not unrelated, they don't come from nowhere, and every Buddhist teacher establishes the teachings on the words and realisation of Shakyamuni Buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 7:07 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

What I am saying is Nichiren claims that Daimoku is the only means for our era. That contradicts your very message about many entrances, at least for our Latter Day of the Law. Same thing with the issue of celibacy and tantric sexual practices. The latter isn't taught by the Buddha and contradicts his emphasis on celibacy.

Astus wrote:

Don't give too much credit to exclusivity and superiority. Every single school says that and almost every Mahayana sutra makes similar claims. It is meant to strengthen one's resolve.

You are either celibate or not, but can't be both at the same time of course. It's a matter of selecting this or that method. And as long as the method leads to liberation, it is taught by the Buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: What do you really think of Western monks and nuns?

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Well it depends. I mean, if one trains as a translator, of teachings or texts, can contribute to the running of the centre, becomes a qualified teacher, or serves the lay community, there can be very great benefit.

1) If there is any hope whatsoever or I should just throw in the towel, following this as my individual path and accepting that it just isn't going to happen in the West.

2) People are meeting a lot of Western monks and nuns who are not qualified or behave badly, but if the standards improved they might be interested in assisting sincere practitioners who have an affinity for the path of ordination.

Astus wrote:

Religion is not a matter of financial resources. Even poor communities can afford to build magnificent religious monuments and temples, plus support a strong clergy. (And then things turn and they blame the clergy for being greedy and oppressive.) What makes a religion stay alive and thriving is how well various people (classes) accept its message.

As long as Buddhism is either a hobby for relaxation, an inner quest or an intellectual curiosity - i.e. only the liberal-spiritual middle class follows it - it is a somewhat weak trend. And there is a competition for the same areas by other systems (New Age, psychology, other Eastern religions, Christianity). As I see it, Buddhism is gaining strength, many translations are published, a large number of universities have Buddhist Studies among its courses, new monasteries are established, and more and more Westerners become teachers and renunciates. It is only a matter of time to achieve bases among the larger population (or fail and disappear).

I don't see how improving behavioural standards among monastics have any relevance. In every religion there are various problems among its clergy, and Buddhism is not an exception. It is normal to struggle for perfection but that is something never reached. What is to be recognised is that the acceptance and popularity of any system or organisation depends on the social situation. As long as a tradition can change (without losing its identity) it can stay alive, but I have yet to see any example where such a change was a fully conscious event.

I believe that monasticism is important because it provides the ideal environment to train people in the Dharma. Although lay people may be able to reach a similar level of knowledge and experience, only those within the proper social situation can do that. A monastic life is open to both poor and rich. At the same time, the monastic tradition exists because there are people who want to live like that, and there are others who see them as holy individuals. That monastics are fields of merit is not a reason to establish an institution like that but an explanation for why it exists.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 18th, 2013 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: Does zen believe in pure land of buddhas ?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Trikaya doesn't mean three separate bodies. We'd then have three different buddhas for one buddha. The trikaya consists of the dharmakaya and the rupakaya (sambhoga & nirmana). Dharmakaya is the essence (emptiness) and rupakaya is the function (dependent origination), and they are inseparable. You can't actually have one without the others. The trikaya teaching is used to explain different aspects of a buddha, but they don't signify three distinct entities or even emanations. And just as the trikaya is used for external buddhas, they correspond also to the buddha-mind and buddha wisdoms. So it's both personal/subjective and universal/objective at the same time. A lot depends on the context the trikaya teaching is used. Buddha-lands are part of the work of the buddhas, so they come together actually.

Soto Zen - or any Zen school for that matter - does not posit a separate cosmology or "buddhology" different from common East Asian Mahayana. The unique qualities of Soto Zen lie in only certain aspects of wisdom related teachings and their application, plus certain ritualistic and organisational elements.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 18th, 2013 at 5:28 PM

Title: Re: in practice chan do I need teacher !

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is better to find a Buddhist community and learn from experienced people, teachers and monks. This is especially true if you are new to Buddhism. But Chan is not restricted in any way for anyone.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2013 at 4:44 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land and meditation.

Content:

Astus wrote:

The basic requirement is the faith and vow. What practice one uses to maintain that may vary. Honen made a distinction between different forms of nenbutsu and other practices. He propagated the recitation of the name because that's the easiest and simplest. That's not the same as negating or denying the validity of other ways. And outside of the teachings of Honen and his followers the Pure Land way encompasses virtually all forms of Buddhist techniques.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

As a short reference about previous topics discussing the same idea of "ultimate self in Buddhism":

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=36&t=14004>

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=69&t=13964>

And from the <http://www.accesstosight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.001.than.html>:

Uninstructed Run-of-the-Mill Person:

"He perceives Unbinding as Unbinding. Perceiving Unbinding as Unbinding, he conceives things about Unbinding, he conceives things in Unbinding, he conceives things coming out of Unbinding, he conceives Unbinding as 'mine,' he delights in Unbinding. Why is that? Because he has not comprehended it, I tell you."

The Trainee:

"He directly knows Unbinding as Unbinding. Directly knowing Unbinding as Unbinding, let him not conceive things about Unbinding, let him not conceive things in Unbinding, let him not conceive things coming out of Unbinding, let him not conceive Unbinding as 'mine,' let him not delight in Unbinding. Why is that? So that he may comprehend it, I tell you."

The Arahant:

"He directly knows Unbinding as Unbinding. Directly knowing Unbinding as Unbinding, he does not conceive things about Unbinding, does not conceive things in Unbinding, does not conceive things coming out of Unbinding, does not conceive Unbinding as 'mine,' does not delight in Unbinding. Why is that? Because, with the ending of delusion, he is devoid of delusion, I tell you."

The Tathagata:

"He directly knows Unbinding as Unbinding. Directly knowing Unbinding as Unbinding, he does not conceive things about Unbinding, does not conceive things in Unbinding, does not conceive things coming out of Unbinding, does not conceive Unbinding as 'mine,' does not delight in Unbinding. Why is that? Because he has known that delight is the root of suffering & stress, that from coming-into-being there is birth, and that for what has come into being there is aging & death. Therefore, with the total ending, fading away, cessation, letting go, relinquishment of craving, the Tathagata has totally awakened to the unexcelled right self-awakening, I tell you."

That is what the Blessed One said. Displeased, the monks did not delight in the Blessed One's words.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 25th, 2013 at 6:49 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Buddha rejected the interpretation that there is a self outside the aggregates, and some assumed this is somehow related to Samkhya (<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.022.than.html#fn-8>). Although I don't think it really matters whether Samkhya was known or not, as their views don't fit the Buddha's teachings anyway.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 25th, 2013 at 11:05 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Koji said:

There is no passage in the nikayas that states, unambiguously, the Buddha "rejected the interpretation that there is a self outside the aggregates." To assert such is also to assert there is nothing outside or beyond the five murderous aggregates (S.iii.114) which also happen to be Mara the killer (S.iii.189). Neither the Buddha nor his disciples identified their self with the aggregates anymore then they might identify their self with a burning pile of grass, twigs, branches and foliage.

Astus wrote:

Read the note that was linked, read the sutta that states how there are ignorant people who believe that outside the aggregates there is an eternal self. Look at the referred sutta in the note where it states the same again. And there are other works (DN 1, MN 1, MN 11, etc.) pointing out clearly that the Buddha's teaching is different from all the others because it does not assume any self in any way whatsoever. Later tradition also refutes it in many ways, just as it has been done several times by people on this forum.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 4:11 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm said:

Apart from a common agreement that klesas are what is responsible for transmigration, I don't see these systems as having much in common in terms of how they present the basis, the path and the result.

Astus wrote:

"Though certain recluses and brahmins claim to propound the full understanding of all kinds of clinging...they describe the full understanding of clinging to sensual pleasures, clinging to views, and clinging to rules and observances without describing the full understanding of clinging to a doctrine of self. " (MN 11)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 4:11 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Koji said:

How is it that one of Japan's greatly respected Buddhist scholars, who is also an expert in Indian religions, writes:

Astus wrote:

That has no relevance to what is and what is not stated in the Nikayas. Your quote is not even from a commentary, not to mention an actual sutta. If you can find a passage in the Pali Canon where the Buddha states explicitly that there is an eternal self beyond the aggregates, that is something pertinent here. Because I have already shown that he says exactly the opposite in several major suttas in a clear language.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 6:03 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

to be fair Not-Self was treated worse in the Nikayas than "Self"

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.059.mend.html>

"Form, O monks, is not-self; if form were self, then form would not lead to affliction and it should obtain regarding form: 'May my form be thus, may my form not be thus'; and indeed, O monks, since form is not-self, therefore form leads to affliction and it does not obtain regarding form: 'May my form be thus, may my form not be thus.'

people forget the Pali canon is like 20,000 pages long.....and many of those Nikayas say No self is suffering, No self is what leads to suffering, to abandon no self, one sutta even says no self is what belong to Mara("the devil")

Astus wrote:

No-self is not a thing, it is a statement that something is without self, that is, a permanent identity. Self, on the other hand, is the concept that there is a permanent identity. If form, etc. had a permanent identity, it wouldn't change, therefore we couldn't do anything about it, no matter whether it's pleasurable or painful. So, a permanent identity makes zero sense to me. If you say that an unchangeable thing or being is a useful idea, that's your decision.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 5:43 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Koji said:

He does this by dis-identifying with the whole aggregate package; this dis-identification, by any other name, is transcendence.

Astus wrote:

But if after that you identify with a "transcendental self" it is still clinging to the aggregates. If you suppose there is a self beyond the aggregates, that is the very ignorance resulting in suffering. If you believe that nirvana is self, that is, again, a self-view that results in rebirth. And if you think that there was a self that got removed is the extreme view of annihilation, just as a permanent (transcendent or not) self is the view of eternity.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 7:36 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

jeeprs said:

The Buddha nature is inconceivable, but not non-existent.

Astus wrote:

If it is inconceivable, how can you make any statement about it?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 11:57 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Sherab said:

If emptiness is equated with dependent origination, then if emptiness is unconditioned, dependent origination must also be unconditioned. If dependent origination is unconditioned, then causality must also be unconditioned. In other words, there is no cause for causality, which is a contradiction in terms.

Astus wrote:

Emptiness means the lack of independent essence. Because things are dependent they are not independent, that is, empty of independent essence. That's how dependent origination and emptiness mean the same. And that lack of independence is indeed unconditioned, it did not come from somewhere nor does it go anywhere.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Sherab said:

The problem is that "vertical" dependence demands a starting point. The question then is: Is this starting point conditioned or unconditioned? If it is conditioned, then it cannot be the starting point. If it is unconditioned, how can it be the cause of all the others that is above it?

Astus wrote:

Buddhism never posited a starting point, a fundamental essence, a creator god. And there is no need for that either. There is simply no beginning that could be assumed.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Sherab said:

So after quarks, it is turtles all the way down.

Astus wrote:

[Mañjuśrī] also asked, "What is the fundamental basis of good and bad [dharmas]?"

Answer: "The body is their fundamental basis."

[Mañjuśrī] also asked, "What is the fundamental basis of the body?"

Answer: "Desire is its fundamental basis."

[Mañjuśrī] also asked, "What is the fundamental basis of desire?"

Answer: "False discrimination is its fundamental basis."

[Mañjuśrī] also asked, "What is the fundamental basis of false discrimination?"

Answer: "Confused conception is its fundamental basis."

[Mañjuśrī] also asked, "What is the fundamental basis of confused conception?"

Answer: "The nonabiding is its fundamental basis."

[Mañjuśrī] also asked, "What is the fundamental basis of nonabiding?"

Answer: "Nonabiding is without any fundamental [basis]. Mañjuśrī, all dharmas are established on the fundamental [basis] of nonabiding."

(Vimalakirti Sutra, ch 7, p 126-127; tr. McRae)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Sherab said:

Understanding this is not as easy as it looks.

Astus wrote:

A similar series of questions is found at the end of MN 44 where they go through the stages of gradual training ending in nirvana (also see AN 10.58 and AN 4.174). Neither the Vimalakirti Sutra nor the suttas in the Pali Canon talk about an ontological problem but about how the mind works and what is to be practised. You may find clearer instructions in meditation manuals covering vipashyana, for instance those by Zhiyi or Kamalashila.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 3:45 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

conebeckham said:

Per 3rd Karmapa's Mahamudra prayer, Mind does not "exist." But Mind cannot be said to be "nonexistent." ... Consciousness at it's most basic level. A "Knowing."

Astus wrote:

A knowing/awareness cannot be experienced - only assumed - existing in and of itself.

There is always something known, there is always a content of awareness. Or rather we should change the words mind/knowing/awareness to experience. Experience cannot be separated from appearances, they are not two different things. Experience may or may not include the duality of subject and object, this is well explained in Yogacara.

Some quotes from Chökyi Nyima's "Song of Karmapa" (highlights by me):

"When we try to examine our mind, what do we find? We do not find a 'thing' which we can think of or perceive. Beyond being an object of investigation it is not existent, and therefore lies beyond the extreme of existence, of eternalism. But on the other hand, we have various sorts of feelings and thoughts, as well as our sense organs, which link objects and consciousness together. Different sense perceptions occur; we see forms, hear sounds and so forth. So because of perception, mind is not nonexistent. In this way the extreme of the mind as a complete nothing is also avoided."
(p65)

"Mind is not existent since even the perfectly enlightened ones, the buddhas who see everything in the three times distinctly and precisely, have not seen it as being a concrete thing of a certain size, color or shape. Therefore we cannot say that the mind exists. But as the basis of samsara and nirvana, in the sense that its nature is to manifest perception, thoughts and feelings, we cannot say it is nonexistent. There is no contradiction or conflict here. That is the view of the Middle Way. Samsara is not understanding the unity of the two truths; nirvana is having the right understanding of this unity. This is the dividing line between samsara and nirvana."
(p66)

"Things appear in that they are perceived, while in fact they are by nature nonexistent. While being empty or nonexistent they still appear, and this occurs without any contradictions or conflict between emptiness and appearance. This nature of things is what we must realize. May we see the vital point of the nature of things, the unity of appearance and emptiness."
(p70)

"Why is the nature of mind not nonexistent? Given the possibility of perception, of experience taking place, we cannot say that it is nonexistent. For example, based on the buddha nature you can prove that the mind is the unity of emptiness and cognizance. Whether we call it 'relative phenomena,' 'the cognizance of enlightened mind' or 'the apparent aspect of things,' still there is something that cannot be denied, and this refers not only to mistaken mind. But when we examine a thought or feeling, there is no concrete thing to find; it has no self nature. We have arrived at emptiness." (p72)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 4:48 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, if you are a follower of Madhyamaka.

Astus wrote:

I don't see how an independent awareness could fit into Theravada or Yogacara either. And, as Cone said, in Kagyu.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 5:12 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

daverupa said:

Vinnana arises dependent on namarupa, the six sense bases, or the first four khandas, and is nowhere in the Nikayas said to cognize itself.

Additionally, it is not the same vinnana which cognizes sounds and which cognizes sights, so to say that vinnana might cognize itself seems to take it as an existent entity which persists over time, rather than as one aspect of a process.

Astus wrote:

But if you take self-awareness in a different way, not analysed to the smallest particles, it is quite clear that one is conscious of one's thoughts, otherwise the whole mindfulness practice is impossible.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 6:52 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm said:

There exists a detailed defense of reflexive cognition in Ratnakarashanti's Madhyamakālaṃkāra, not to mention the fact that epistemologists like Dharmakīrti extensively advance the idea.

Further in secret mantra it is stated that the wisdom of a tathāgata is a reflexive cognition, not only is it a reflexive cognition but it does not operate through sense organs.

Astus wrote:

I know only Shantarakṣita's Madhyamakālaṃkāra and there self-awareness is a conventional phenomenon, and it's his way of explaining consciousness only. Also, self-awareness is not necessarily the same as an independent awareness. so I'm not sure why you brought in the topic of reflexive cognition.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 6:44 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm said:

The core of the conditioned is unconditioned.

Sherab said:

So the core of the compounded is un compounded, the core of the born is unborn, the core of the transcended is untranscended?

If yes, then it simply means what is experienced as conditioned is really unconditioned, what is experienced as compounded is really un compounded, what is experienced as born is really unborn, and what is experience as transcended is really untranscended. That would simply mean that there is no conditioned, no compounded, no born, no transcended. And that would simply mean that all that is experienced is nothing but an illusion, a hallucination.

And since, in a non-dual state, the experiencer is the experienced, the experiencer must also be an illusion. So we could all be merely part of a computer simulation such as The Matrix and the Buddha is part of that as well. Or the Hindu belief that we are all the dream of the God Brahma is correct and Buddha is also part of the dream.

And that would be a problem.

Astus wrote:

You talk of compounded and un compounded as two different things. Rather, because appearances are compound phenomena they are empty, dependent. Because things are born they are unborn. Unborn means that there is no actual fixed independent essence that is really born of something (or nothing, from itself or another...). If there were such an essence it could not be born, either it was existent or non-existent but change could never happen. That's why emptiness is not different from appearances at all.

There is neither an experiencer nor an experienced, there is just experience, and even that is empty.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 7:01 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Sherab said:

My view is that reflexivity has to be the nature of any form of awareness. Otherwise, there is no possibility of an awareness being an awareness. In other words, for awareness to be aware, it has to be aware that it is aware.

Astus wrote:

It is aware that it is aware, and it is aware that it is aware it is aware, etc. I think it's rather that appearances and consciousness are inseparable. Whatever is experienced is necessarily perceived. This need for a special self-reflection comes up when awareness is believed to be an entity on its own that shines outside, as if it were like the physical eye, however, I consider it an incorrect metaphor.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 11:23 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

you say a permanent Identity makes no sense to you.....so did Shakyamuni

Permanently get rid of greed anger and hatred when he became Enlightened or did those traits arise again in his life time???

once a person "becomes" Enlightened do they ever slip back into Samsaric ways, falling back into death and rebirth or are they Permanently Enlightened?

Astus wrote:

When there is no cause for something to occur it does not occur. When the root afflictions/causes are removed then there is no more birth, no more afflictions. That's how not just buddhas don't fall back but even a stream-enterer doesn't fall back from the path.

Son of Buddha said:

but again it all depends on your teacher what sect or tradition you follow and what suttas/sutras you adhere to.

Astus wrote:

I wonder, if you don't mind answering, what tradition do you follow?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

anjali said:

Just to confirm: you take the position that self-reflexive knowing is not possible (the knowing quality of the mind can't know itself in a direct, nondual way)?

Astus wrote:

Mind is itself knowing. Knowing is the essential quality of mind and a mind without awareness is not mind at all. There is no mental phenomena that could be without consciousness. Therefore, to say that "knowing knows itself" is redundant and unnecessary, as there is no mental phenomena without awareness, but also there is no fixed phenomena as "knowing itself" that should be self-aware.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

so Shakyamuni did put a Permanent end to greed anger and hatred when he became Enlightened correct??

so the "cause" was permanently put to an end correct?

is Enlightenment Permanent or can i slip back into Samsaric ways?

Astus wrote:

Of course, it is a permanent end of afflictions and there is no return. That's why it is also called, among other names, the Deathless.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 3:35 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Koji said:

I am just wondering, but how does one personally know "there is just experience"? Of course we all know that anyone can imagine such as state but what the imagination concocts doesn't mean it is either real or attainable.

Astus wrote:

If there is something that is not an experience you don't experience it, consequently you don't know anything about it. What is not an experience is nothing more than a presumption, a hypothesis, a fantasy, an idea.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 5:40 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Koji said:

When you said ealier: There is neither an experiencer nor an experienced, there is just experience, and even that is empty, does this pertain to "a presumption, a hypothesis, a fantasy, an idea"?

Astus wrote:

As Cone replied already, yes. Whatever is said here is always and inevitably a conceptual creation. One of the main aspects of the teachings on emptiness is to realise this fact, that concepts are concepts and not truths. Those who believe that one should therefore get rid of concepts still assumes that thoughts are somehow real and they are a hindrance. The only hindrance is the idea that concepts are more than concepts. Without attachment there are neither grasping nor rejecting of thoughts and appearances, they are simply dependent appearances.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 5:47 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

conebeckham said:

This leads to the question: for those who feel they have "had an experience" or "experienced" Wisdom or Buddhamind or whatnot, and have somehow consequently conceptualized that experience as a sort of "Self," is that "experience" really the experience of Wisdom that is talked about in Sutra, Tantra, and Upadesha? Or is it a mistaken experience?

Astus wrote:

As in my response above, I don't separate concepts and experience that strongly. Thoughts are parts of our everyday experience. One can taste honey, smell it, see it, touch it, and also name it and imagine it. Wisdom is seeing the nature of experience (mind, appearances, etc.), and it is readily apparent that experience is impermanent, dependently originated, empty, if looked at in the right way. At the same time, when there is mistaking this or that experience for some ultimate reality, truly abiding, permanent entity, attachment, suffering and habits occur. Even if that experience is assumed to be nirvana, the nature of mind, or any other lofty concept.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 6:12 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

anjali said:

I think we all accept the higher-order knowing model: I see an apple; I know that I see an apple.

The trikaya model takes this three-aspect approach. The three facets/dimensions are, 1. emptiness, 2. clarity (knowing), and 3. radiance or emanation. The knowing knows itself directly; the knowing knows it is emptiness; the knowing knows radiance as itself. Again, none of this involves a knower of any kind. We discuss these three aspects separately, but in fact they are a unity and are indivisible.

Astus wrote:

Since the beginning Buddhism has the six consciousnesses and eighteen areas of experience, among them the mental consciousness and the area of mental phenomena. Thus seeing an apple is an eye-consciousness where one already has awareness of that appearance, and generating another layer of recognising that one is aware of seeing an apple is mental consciousness. In terms of the aggregates seeing an apple is form, calling it an apple is perception, and knowing about both is consciousness. All of the eighteen areas and five aggregates work together without a problem.

In the internalised trikaya model, as you said, the three are explained separately but they are not actually three different things. There are a number of ways to explain that. The simplest is the statement of the third "kaya" that emptiness and clarity are inseparable; here it is understood that clarity includes all appearances, it is dependent origination. When clarity is meant only as awareness and the nirmanakaya as phenomena, one can add the fourth body to confirm their inseparability. It is also possible to turn to a Huayan explanation where there are 10 bodies, that is, each body includes the other two making nine and all of them together to arrive at ten. So, when you say that knowing knows itself, emptiness and radiance, that is actually the Huayan model. Although logically to say that knowing includes (knows) knowing is nothing but stating that knowing is knowing.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 6:25 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Sherab said:

Consider a situation when there is no internal or external stimulus for the mind. In that situation, the mind should still be aware that it is aware in spite of the lack of any form of stimulus (ie. appearance). So to me, reflexivity should be part and parcel of mind itself.

Astus wrote:

When there is no "internal stimulus", it means there is no mental movement, no mental phenomena. And that means unconsciousness, mindlessness. Mind does not exist as some container, it is not above and beyond mental content. That's why in Buddhism there is the teaching of the eighteen dhatus. There is no "consciousness itself" in Buddhism, not even in Yogacara (Asanga-Vasubandhu, Xuanzang). If there were such a thing it would mean that everyone is always aware, but that's not the case. It would mean there is a consciousness independent of everything else, consequently not conscious of anything other than itself. What would be the use of that kind of self-contained consciousness? It would be like an unmoved mover that doesn't actually move anything.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 29th, 2013 at 7:02 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

jeeprs said:

Why then is there significance given to dhyana states such as the 'immaterial dhyanas'? Do you think when yogis are in those states they are simply inert? Might they as well be asleep? The way I would understand it, this is what is implied by 'passing beyond duality', but it is not simply 'unconsciousness'. It is consciousness without the sense of there being an observer. "Contentless consciousness" is one description I have read.

Astus wrote:

Arupa-dhyanas only exclude rupa but not the mental aggregates. All the qualities of the fourth dhyana are also present, so it is far from being an inert state. And the formless absorptions are not "beyond duality" either, at least not as realisations or mental states. A contentless consciousness is a misleading poetical term, or a mistaken philosophical concept, depending on what you mean by it. The realm that is without all mental functions ("contents") in Buddhism is found within the form realm and it's called the realm/heaven of unconscious beings (asamjnisattva; 無想天).

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 29th, 2013 at 8:15 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

jeeprs said:

So you equate the jhanas with mindlessness?

Astus wrote:

Not at all. Absorptions are all mental activities themselves.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 30th, 2013 at 4:40 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Koji said:

Let's look at conceptual appearances. Upon what, specifically, do these "dependent appearances" depend?

Astus wrote:

The six senses depend on mentality-materiality, mentality-materiality depends on consciousness, consciousness depends on formations. In short, interdependence, and not dependence on an ultimate ground/base/substance as some believe.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 30th, 2013 at 4:52 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

anjali said:

The question on the table is whether the knowing quality of the mind can turn back on itself (self-reflexive knowing)? To hijack a zen phrase, is it possible to "turn the light and illuminate back?" From the perspective of self-reflexive knowing, this can be interpreted as taking the light of one's awareness and turning it back on itself. There are folks who say this can be done, and describe it as a singular experience.

Astus wrote:

The Zen phrase does not mean a self-contained knowing, it means to see the mental states we just follow and not recognise, that is, acting out of emotions and convictions. And in some sense this is in fact mind seeing mind, and in ordinary language it is appropriate to call it self-reflection.

There is no knowing quality on its own. Consciousness does not exist alone. Therefore, there is nothing to turn back on itself. In other words, mind is not a singular entity.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 30th, 2013 at 8:03 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

jeeprs said:

I have heard the argument that mind, being of the nature of clarity and awareness, must have clarity and awareness as its substantial cause, as like must come from like. This argument also says that mind is not something that can be produced or artificially created. So that would suggest that mind is not something that can be reduced or explained in terms of something else, would it not?

Astus wrote:

There is a mental continuum, series of thoughts, emotions, habits, etc. The idea is that the cause of rebirth lies in ingrained habits (taints/asrava and defilements/klesa; summed up as alayavijnana in Yogacara) and they are mental phenomena/dharma, therefore the demise of the physical body does not hinder the generation of further births. But stating a radical separation of mind and matter (nama-rupa) is unnecessary, as in the 18 dhatu system we see how external phenomena take part in forming various consciousnesses, and in the mind only systems we find the explicit inclusion of all appearances into a single realm of experience. The substantiation of mind as an independent awareness goes against the general meaning of dependent origination and postulates an ultimate self.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 30th, 2013 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

futerko said:

Correct me if I'm wrong here, but aren't formations (and hence the rest) dependent on ignorance? In other words, there is no first cause, and no origination.

Astus wrote:

Yes, as you say. Formations come from ignorance, ignorance is interdependent with ingrained habits, and both are maintained and generated by further actions, deeds that are themselves motivated by ignorance.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 30th, 2013 at 9:17 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

futerko said:

...the point being that this does not thereby refute the idea of the base/ground as the alternative to the causal chain of ignorance.

Astus wrote:

Such a ground is necessarily without cause, therefore does not agree with interdependence. A ground also has other problems, like a single cause of many results, independent while creating dependent things, permanence generating impermanent things, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 1st, 2013 at 12:24 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

anjali said:

Yes, the knowing quality of the mind is fundamentally empty. As far as I know, no one is saying otherwise. However, this doesn't preclude the possibility self-reflexive knowing. This is why, in a reply to daverupa, I noted that we need to be clear on the distinction between self-reflexive knowing and self-grasping. Self-knowing is just that, knowing that knows itself. Nothing more. Relative to the trikaya model, it is only the ignorance of self-grasping that imputes a substantial (instead of empty), isolated (instead of unified with it's radiance) self-knowing.

Astus wrote:

We know that we are sentient beings simply because we sense things and we are aware of this process. This is self-awareness. Would you call this knowing that knows itself? If so, this is not a problematic idea at all. Only if you suppose some independent knowing that knows itself is there a problem.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 1st, 2013 at 4:59 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm said:

what do you mean by independent knowing?

Astus wrote:

Knowing without an object, pure subjectivity, self-contained awareness.

Consciousness that does not require conditions to bring it about.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 1st, 2013 at 5:17 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

anjali said:

In response to devarupa, I commented that this is also known as self-awareness direct perception (rang rig mngon sum), and is defined http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Valid_direct_perception_of_self-awareness as, "the unmistakable non-conceptual reflexive awareness that accompanies all states of mind".

A further assertion is that self-reflexive knowing is primal. When the ignorance of self-grasping becomes wisdom, the self-illuminating quality remains.

Astus wrote:

Xuanzang in the Cheng Weishi Lun (Keenan: p 61-64, ch 3.11-12/ Wei Tat: 139-143, 2.3.2-3) describes a maximum of four aspects (bhaga) of consciousness. The seen (nimitta), the seeing (darsana), self-knowing (svasamvitti), and self-knowing knowing (svasamvitti-samvitti). The object is known by the subject, that by self-knowing what is known by the self-knowing knowing, and that is known by self-knowing itself to avoid infinite regression. That is: object <-- seeing <-- self-knowing <--> self-knowing knowing. Self-knowing and its knowing are both direct perceptions. An important point here is that there is know subject/seeing/knowing without object. Also, the four parts can be reduced to three (seen, seeing, self-knowing), two (seen and seeing) and even one (consciousness). These functions are not defined by whether one grasps a self or not.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 1st, 2013 at 5:20 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

futerko said:

For interdependence to be "truly true", as opposed to merely the play of appearances of that which is uncaused, you need to posit a first cause.

What you refer to here as, "many results", created "dependent things", and generated "impermanent things", all have their "first cause" as ignorance.

Astus wrote:

What do you mean by "truly true"? Appearances are like a dream, a mirage, an illusion, etc., as many sutras say, both Nikayas and Mahayana texts.

Ignorance is not a "first cause" because it has its causes too. If ignorance were without a cause it could not be ended.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 1st, 2013 at 4:51 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Koji said:

It's illusion all the way down.

Astus wrote:

Infinite regression occurs when you posit a ground, and when asked what that ground stands on you claim there is another ground. I don't say there is a ground. The orbit of the Earth is influenced both by the Sun and other planets, not to mention its own mass and other factors. That's interdependence. Proposing a ground without cause is just a turtle flying in space (like Great A'Tuin).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 1st, 2013 at 5:20 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't accept that explanation. I found the source for that argument, it was from the Dalai Lama's statement on reincarnation:

Similar causes produce similar results (samanantara-pratyaya), from a previous mental dharma a new mental dharma comes. This is a generally established factor in Buddhist teachings on causality and karma. From that it does not come that there is some ultimate substance that is maintained from moment to moment, or an independent consciousness persisting through time. It actually confirms the momentariness of mind and the concept of mind-stream.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 1st, 2013 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

futerko said:

There seems to me to be a marked difference between claiming that the basis is empty/illusory and simply denying it altogether. What you're calling interdependence here looks basically like a list of effects without any substantive cause, but still treating the objects as if they were substantial and actual.

There seem to be two basic ways to treat this; either as actual causes and effects, which would require some kind of exceptional causal event (such as the big bang, or and act of creation), or to see the effects themselves as symptomatic of the illusory nature of the ground of Being.

In other words, despite denying “another ground”, you still seem to be relying on a transcendent ontology.

Astus wrote:

An illusory basis is that there seems to be one but there is not. And that is true for those who believe in an ultimate ground/self, for them there appears to be such a thing while in fact there is not. What I say is that there are causes and effects. There is no cause without effect, and there is no cause that was not caused by another cause. A ground would be an effect without cause.

Why the need for an exceptional causal event? Do you assume that once there was nothing?

What transcendent ontology do you mean?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 6th, 2013 at 2:00 AM

Title: Re: "Four articles of conversion"

Content:

Astus wrote:

"I will practice the four all-embracing acts (giving, kind speech, benefiting others, and cooperation toward leading all beings to virtuous deeds) for all living beings, and not for myself. I accept all living beings without lust, without satiation, and without prejudice."
(Sutra of Queen Śrīmālā of the Lion's Roar, ch 2; tr. Diana Y. Paul)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 6th, 2013 at 2:22 AM

Title: Re: Christian Influences in Modern Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

On what bases are those influences attributed to Christianity? The 19th and 20th century Western intellectual elite was (and still is) secular. Those who did not reject Buddhism completely as idolatry were secular thinkers and not God fearing theologians. The romantic view of Buddhism as a human achievement was made up by those who did not agree with the whole idea of religion as it was perceived in Europe. Therefore to say that "The Buddha could be seen as a humane religious reformer on the model of Jesus, teaching through parables and other simple and straightforward means." is inappropriate. Turning Jesus into a mere human being is a detestable belief by all mainstream Christians and a heretic idea since 325 (First Council of Nicaea). Also, viewing Jesus as some sort of counter-culture hero is far from the Christian perspective, especially of the 19th century and before, since it has been the established order in Europe from the beginning of the Middle Ages that it is God who ultimately gives legitimacy to kings and other worldly rulers.

All in all, Christianity is the wrong place to look at for modern sources of changes in Buddhism. It is rather the secular thinkers (philosophers, artists, politicians, scientists) who made the greatest impact.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 6th, 2013 at 7:07 PM

Title: Re: Christian Influences in Modern Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Humanistic Buddhism is not necessarily a new idea. Maitreya cults existed in China centuries before and they tried to create a Pure Land on Earth (even with violent means). <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Taixu>, who is said to be the founder of this modern movement, was influenced by the political changes in early 20th century China, and it's said he also participated somewhat in overthrowing the Qing dynasty. But it is only in Taiwan that the idea could actually manifest through the works of people like Yinshun, Xingyun, Shengyan and others. In some sense we could say that this idea of "modernising Buddhism" is a good way to distance oneself from continental ("communist") Buddhism as it exists now, and deflect attacks that Buddhism is outdated and backward. However, this has very little, or rather nothing, to do with Christianity or even direct Western influence.

It is easy to make biased claims when one has a very partial knowledge of the various processes that took place in a far away land. For example, that reincarnation and meditation are strictly Eastern ideas is such an uninformed view. While New Age embraces Asian ideas, it is less an implementation of Indian thoughts than a renewal of Western esoteric ideas. See for instance <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Metempsychosis> and <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Gilgul>. Also, ancient Christian teachers rejected the idea of reincarnation (see <http://www.catholic.com/tracts/reincarnation>) without having a direct contact with Buddhism or any Hindu religion.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 7th, 2013 at 4:54 PM

Title: Re: Christian Influences in Modern Buddhism

Content:

rory said:

Western esotericism derived from Jewish and Christian magic and Kabbalism and that derived from Greek and Egyptian magical treatises (see the above).

Astus wrote:

I said "without having a direct contact with Buddhism or any Hindu religion" related to ancient philosophers. Also, "New Age ... is less an implementation of Indian thoughts than a renewal of Western esoteric ideas". Europeans knew about various Buddhist and Eastern ideas from the 16th century on. What I say is that the Western tradition, while had influence from Asia, it relied more on its own predecessors. And as an example I gave the idea of reincarnation, something that existed within the European tradition before Westerners started to colonise and convert Asian countries. I quoted ancient Christian writers only to show that they made no reference to any Indian thinker when refuting the idea of reincarnation, that is, they had no direct contact with India or other Asian territories. That in ancient times there was some sort of contact between India, Greece and the Romans is well known, but it does not mean any massive cultural influence. And even today, against all the popular books on Taoism, Yoga, Buddhism, etc., it is on one hand transformed in today's context, and they still represent only a minor and exotic aspect in Western thought.

And all that was just an example, as the topic is a supposed Christian influence on modern Buddhism, something that I don't see as an established fact.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 18th, 2013 at 3:42 AM

Title: Re: Provenance of Pure Land Practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

All Pure Land practices and teachings are Mahayana. Looking at the Agamas and Nikayas is pointless as those are not Mahayana. The exclusive nenbutsu is a teaching of Honen as described in his many writings.

In the Agamas and Nikayas only the sravaka path is taught. Mahayana is about the bodhisattva path. Infinite buddhas and buddha-lands are taught within the Mahayana scriptures, and the methods to establish a connection with various buddhas and attain birth in buddha-lands. Amitabha is one of those buddhas and Sukhavati is one of those buddha-lands. For numerous reasons, as Honen explained, the sole practice of nenbutsu is enough to attain birth in Sukhavati and be assured of reaching buddhahood.

So, what is the origin of Pure Land practice? The Mahayana sutras. Are the Mahayana sutras authentic? Only for Buddhists who follow them. Is authenticity based on verifiable historical findings? No. How could then modern research about the development of Buddhism have any relevance to the validity of Pure Land teachings? Even without all the scholarly arguments there are many past and present Buddhists who don't accept Honen's teachings, otherwise everybody were his followers.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 20th, 2013 at 6:36 AM

Title: Re: What has Chinese Buddhism lost?

Content:

Indrajala said:

I find Pure Land philosophy inconsistent and simply unappealing. It moreover seems contrary to a lot of what I would think constitutes Buddhadharma. The idea of attempting to escape the world and achieve eventual liberation by hoping for rebirth in a celestial paradise at death based on the purported vows of a buddha is hardly in line with early Buddhism or even more mainstream Indian Mahāyāna.

Astus wrote:

Bodhisattvas postpone their complete liberation till all beings are liberated. Also, bodhisattvas visit numerous buddha-lands to serve, respect and learn from many buddhas. This is taught in early Mahayana. Aspiring for birth in Amitabha's land fits into this perfectly. Sukhavati is recommended over other lands because it is said to be the easiest to get into, that it does not require one to be an arya-bodhisattva. Among the various practices recitation is recommended simply because it is easier than visualisation. How is all this contrary to Buddhadharma?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 27th, 2013 at 6:47 AM

Title: Re: Provenance of Pure Land Practice

Content:

Indrajala said:

Focusing exclusively on gaining entry into the Pure Land while largely ignoring and/or disregarding the core teachings of Buddhadharma is unwise.

Pure Land as it is commonly practiced is more Devayāna in my estimation. You attempt to gain the graces of a certain buddha in the hopes of being freed from the pains of this world and thereafter ascend into a higher realm, but this is said to only be possible postmortem.

You can say the whole point is to advance one's bodhisattva career thereafter, but this is hardly what I have observed in real life.

Astus wrote:

You refer to your observations among common Buddhists. However, no religion is defined by its lay followers, but by its canonical works and accepted interpretations. It is easy to point to ordinary people failing to follow the teachings of their chosen faith anywhere in the world. And here's an important difference between the Path of Sages and the Path of Pure Land (according to Honen): simply by nenbutsu people attain birth in the Pure Land. They don't need to understand anything about karma, buddhas, lands, or even the three minds and four practices. On the other hand, on the Path of Sages one needs not only to understand such concepts as emptiness, rebirth, mind only, merit, etc. but also actualise them. One needs to uphold not just the five precepts but also avoid minor offences and accomplish great deeds.

The Pure Land path is not Devayana, as the Pure Land is not merely a heavenly realm, and the goal of any informed practitioner is not to gain some sort of eternal salvation in Paradise but to fulfil the bodhisattva vows. One understands the impermanence of this world and every other realms in samsara, moreover one realises the deficiency in one's abilities and circumstances. As Shakyamuni was a rich prince who renounced worldly affairs, Honen was an erudite and respected monk who gave up all his studies and meditation for the nenbutsu.

The core teachings of Buddhism are not disregarded at all. In fact, the Pure Land teaching is built upon them. There is no meaning to the entire teaching of any Pure Land tradition without Mahayana. Madhyamaka teaches that the essence of the Buddhadharma is insight into emptiness. Yogacara teaches that the essence is insight into mind only. Zen teaches that the essence is insight into the nature of mind. All of them find insight into suchness as the cardinal point of the bodhisattva path, what separates ordinary people from noble beings. The path of Pure Land - in Honen's presentation - is something that presents an option for those who fail to gain such wisdom, and gives them a simple and easy practice to gain that liberating realisation in the next life. He does not say that such an insight is not important, nor does he say that practising the paramitas and upholding the precepts is meaningless. He just recognises that those are not easy things to accomplish, especially for common householders. He accepts that enlightenment in this life does not happen to everyone. How is that contrary to the Buddha's teachings?

What Honen observed in himself, and others, is not very different from what you say, that people mostly pretend to be practitioners, and even those who do it seriously often fail to show the qualities that the Blessed One's teachings should bring about. The majority of Buddhists are far from being saints, and among those with seemingly pure ethics it is difficult to find wise ones. But instead of criticising others, Honen pointed his finger to himself and said that he is just an ordinary human being who has no other choice but to rely on the nenbutsu. He did not write pamphlets and treatises about how wrong and corrupt everybody else are, rather he advised his followers to desist from quarrelling with other Buddhists and instead respect them. This is something one can rarely see even among the most outstanding masters.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 28th, 2013 at 6:55 AM

Title: Re: Provenance of Pure Land Practice

Content:

Indrajala said:

What you're referring to is the prescriptive. I'm referring to the descriptive.

Astus wrote:

Do you have a description of any Buddhist group/tradition where the majority of followers are fulfilling the prescribed teachings? And if your criticism is about how certain people act it does not address the teaching itself.

Indrajala said:

This is an article of faith that would seem contrary to traditional theories of karma, including what the Buddha described.

Astus wrote:

Karma is an article of faith. The possibility of birth in a buddha-land is not contrary to karma as I see it. Could you explain what you see here as a contradiction?

Indrajala said:

Saying you can neglect proper study and get superior results to one who actually put in the time and effort to study is like saying the amateur surgeon is commendable for their good intentions.

Astus wrote:

Nobody said that. The idea in gaining birth in the Pure Land is to postpone that required study and effort. And it is postponed because in one's current situation such study and effort is not possible and/or not certain to bring results. The attainment of buddhahood is guaranteed only on the stage of no regression. Since there's hardly any living teacher who claims to be anything but an ordinary person (pudgala), on what basis can one have faith that one would be more successful in practising the Dharma? Therefore it only seems logical that aspiring for birth in the Pure Land is the most sensible decision. To use your example, mastering surgery takes lot of education and practice, and that costs time and money. While a few may be rich and already finished primary and secondary education, many people have trouble not just with biology and chemistry, but with the basic skills of literacy and mathematics, plus they are quite poor and busy with making a living. And even among those who are qualified surgeons, only a handful of them are really good at what they do.

Indrajala said:

As I have demonstrated above, this is not so

Astus wrote:

Could you give a link to your explanation?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 4th, 2013 at 4:27 AM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

Astus wrote:

Following the breath is breath meditation (see <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Anapanasati> and http://kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/sgs_book_page.htm). Shikantaza is something else, as explained in that video. See the <http://antaiji.dogen-zen.de/eng/okumura-zazen.shtml> of Shohaku Okumura. You may also look at the <http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/practice/zazen/howto/index.html>, although as an end note there it mentions breath awareness (and makes an incorrect distinction between Hinayana and Mahayana), in the actual guide on what to do with the mind it only says, "Do not concentrate on any particular object or control your thought. ... Just leave thoughts alone, allowing them to come up and go away freely. The essential thing in doing zazen is to awaken (kakusoku) from distraction and dullness, and return to the right posture moment by moment." The http://antaiji.org/?page_id=7136&lang=en is also a very good classical instruction.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 8th, 2013 at 6:56 PM

Title: Re: Daesung Sunim

Content:

Astus wrote:

So there is a Korean monk who cannot make a difference between the Buddha's teachings and those who believe in an ultimate self. Perhaps they should strengthen their studies of actual Buddhist doctrines instead of spreading incorrect views.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 13th, 2013 at 5:56 PM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

Astus wrote:

Shikantaza is almost what in Theravada they call the awareness of rise and fall, the difference lies in the background explanation. So it's not difficult to integrate breath awareness and shikantaza, since shikantaza is basically prajnaparamita. As mentioned above, if you follow Zhiyi's Six Gates then you cover it all in an organised fashion.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 13th, 2013 at 8:55 PM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

Matylda said:

ST has nothing to do with rise and fall, neither it is integration of breath awareness and ST... nor Zhiyi taught ST.

The only close source for ST is Wanshi Shogaku teaching.

Astus wrote:

I said that based on what is found in Dogen's, Keizan's and Uchiyama's instructions, plus others, about shikantaza. How do you define shikantaza?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 16th, 2013 at 4:08 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana views on dying and intermediate state

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jinul writes (Chinul's Works, p 141; in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 2):

At the moment of your death, wind and fire will oppress you, the four material elements (mahābhūta) will separate and scatter, and the mind will go mad, feeling stifled and cramped, and become subject to the inversions (viparyāsa) and distorted views. As you have no stratagem for soaring into the heavens above nor any plan through which to enter the earth below, you will cower in fright, bereft of everything on which you used to rely. Your physical body will be left behind as if it were a cicada's cast-off shell. Confused about the road stretching before you, your lonely spirit will have to go on alone. Although you may have owned precious jewelry and priceless riches, you can take none of it with you. Although you may have relatives from prestigious households, ultimately not one of them can follow along behind to rescue you. This is what is meant by the statement, "What one makes oneself, one receives oneself; there is no one to take one's place."

Then quotes Baizhang (p 142),

"[At the time of your death,] all the unwholesome actions you performed throughout your lifetime will appear before you, either alarming or pleasing you. The six rebirth destinies (s.ad. gati) and the five aggregates of being (pañcaskandha) will appear before you, and you will see beautifully decorated houses, skiffs, carts, and palanquins all shining brilliantly. [These sights] make your mind dissolute so that the things you view with greed and lust are all transformed into pleasing sensory objects. You will be reborn at the spot where those sights are most intense, without one iota of choice in the matter; whether as a dragon or an ox, whether of high or low status, absolutely nothing is fixed."

Only enlightened beings are capable of choosing their birth. Jinul quotes Sengzhao (Straight Talk on the True Mind, in "Collected Works of Chinul", p 181):

"Saints abide in existence but are nonexistent; they dwell in nonexistence but are not nonexistent. Although they cling neither to existence nor nonexistence, they do not reject existence or nonexistence. Therefore, their light blends harmoniously with the troubles of the dusty world. They pass between the five destinies, calmly going, suddenly coming. Tranquil, they do nothing and yet there is nothing they do not do."

Therefore, ordinary people cannot do anything once dead to change their birth, and enlightened beings are free from the constraints of karma.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 19th, 2013 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: Advice for the young layperson

Content:

Astus wrote:

There's nothing special about being young or a layperson. Buddhism offers the same to everyone. The difference lies in the level of commitment. You can simply call yourself a Buddhist without any content. You can take one, two, three or dozens of precepts and follow them to the best of your abilities. You can read nice books and ponder about the meaning of life. You can do some sort of meditation regularly or not so regularly. And many many more. It is really up to you. You can follow a single teaching, a single practice, or you can follow a complex teaching with a variety of methods. Being young and a layperson has meaning only to you, as you define your level of interest in the Dharma.

The Mahayana has the six paramitas as the basic description of the path of the bodhisattva. You can read about them from <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Nagarjuna> in this book: http://www.kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/n6p_book_page.htm. <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Shantideva>'s inspiring poem is also a very good introduction to Mahayana: books.google.com/books?id=IEqvQBKyA6MC. And the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Vimalakirti_Sutra is a great example of how lay life and Buddhism can come together, not to mention it is a quite funny scripture: https://www.bdkamerica.org/digital/dBET_Srimala_Vimalakirti_2004.pdf.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 19th, 2013 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: Locality of nibbanna

Content:

Huifeng said:

Without being more specific where various ideas and views on nirvana come from, but all throwing them into the discussion, things are only going to get more confused than clearer. The understanding of this term -- and we were only given a term without any specific context or tradition point of view to be with -- vary a considerable amount over time and place.

Astus wrote:

Just as Master Huifeng says. Buddhism has many forms, many styles, many teachings. Without context all meaning is lost.

Simply put, samsara is being moved by greed, anger and ignorance. Nirvana is freedom from (putting out) those https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Three_poisons_%28Buddhism%29.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 21st, 2013 at 8:11 AM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

Astus wrote:

Yes, it is hishiryo for Dogen, as stated in the "Popular Fukanzazengi", and that corresponds to the following in his "Tenpuku Fukanzazengi" and Zongze's Zuochanyu (see correspondence here: <http://terebess.hu/zen/Fukanzazengi-6.pdf>):

"When thought arises, be aware of it. When you are aware of it, it will disappear. Put aside everything outside continuously, and make yourself into one piece."

This also goes back to the earlier teaching of Zongmi (Chan Prolegomenon), Huineng (no thought) and Zhiyi (<http://www.tientai.net/lit/mksk/v2/v2p2-1p5.htm>). As for Uchiyama, there is a complete book by him: Opening the Hand of Thought. Again, he says nothing different from the above. Or here's the instruction from his disciple, <http://antaiji.dogen-zen.de/eng/okumura-zazen.shtml>:

"In zazen we simply allow any thought, feeling or emotion to come up and then we simply let them go away; we actually do nothing. In sitting, any thought or condition of mind is like a cloud in the sky."

Also, on the official Soto Zen site, in an essay on hishiryo the same source (Tenpuku Fukanzazengi) and the same explanation is used by http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/key_terms/pdf/key_terms08.pdf:

"When a thought arises during zazen and we become aware of it, it disappears by itself. And when another thought arises, we again become aware of it and it disappears. If we maintain this process, we naturally put aside everything outside and become one with ourselves. This is exactly the state of mind during zazen and the content of hishiryo."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 22nd, 2013 at 5:36 PM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

Astus wrote:

All the above sources are presented as instructions and definitions of shikantaza. You claim they are not. Can you substantiate that with reliable sources?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 23rd, 2013 at 8:32 AM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

Astus wrote:

What you described with the example of a duel is an aware and unattached mind. I don't see the difference here between that and the above descriptions of hishiryo, aside from the dramatic metaphor.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 24th, 2013 at 12:08 AM

Title: Re: seeing my true nature

Content:

Astus wrote:

This short text sums up well Bodhidharma's teachings, explaining in brief the principle (true nature) and the function (practice) of zen:
<http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enBodhiDharmaSutraWithAnnotation.htm>.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 24th, 2013 at 9:09 AM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

Astus wrote:

They are about shikantaza, they claim so in those writings. That is, none of them are for specific problems. Keizan in the http://antaiji.org/?page_id=7136&lang=en gives specific instructions for specific problems, but he also simply says: "Be beyond thinking. This is the essence of zazen." Just as Dogen in the <http://www.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/shobogenzo/translations/zazengi/zazengi.translation.html>: "Nonthinking. This is the art of zazen."

From one of the teachers at <http://www.wwzc.org/> comes this explanation of hishiryō:

It's all very simple. So simple that we don't know what to think about it. We sit. The longer we sit, the more we see that any thought that comes up is just another thought and that all thoughts arise within the vastness of Awareness. When we think, we are experiencing thinking. Depending on the extent to which we are practicing, there is some awareness of the thinking. If we are not practicing at all, we have withdrawn, obsessed with our stories, recoiling from present experiencing into fabricated labyrinths that lead us nowhere and teach us nothing. When we practice, we can allow the thoughts to rise and fall and know simultaneously that they are only thoughts, without substance, and allow them to be simply a movement, like a breeze rustling through leaves.

(<http://www.wwzc.org/dharma-text/thinking-about-not-thinking>)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 24th, 2013 at 8:23 PM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

LastLegend said:

Is Shikantaza limited to just sitting in one place or "sitting" here means the mind sits undisturbed anywhere?

Astus wrote:

Dogen writes in the Fukanzazengi, "Don't think about "good" or "bad". Don't judge true or false. Your mind, intellect, and consciousness are spinning around – let them have rest. Give up measuring with thoughts, ideas, and views. Have no designs on becoming a Buddha. How could that be limited to sitting or lying down?"

And in the

<http://scbs.stanford.edu/sztp3/translations/shobogenzo/translations/zazenshin/zazenshin.translation.html>, "Then there is another type of person [who says,] "To pursue the way in seated meditation is a function essential for the "beginner's mind and the latter-day student", but it is not necessarily an observance of the buddhas and ancestors. 'Walking is Zen, sitting is Zen; whether in speech or silence, motion or rest, the substance is at ease.' Do not adhere solely to the present concentrated effort [of seated meditation]." Many of the type calling itself a branch of the Linji [lineage] are of this view. It is because they are deficient in transmitting the right life of the buddha-dharma that they speak thus. What is the "beginner's mind"? Where is there no "beginner's mind"? Where do we leave the "beginner's mind"?"

And in the Shinjingakudo (tr. Nishijima-Cross), "As we continue, moment by moment, to give up the body and receive the body—whether for three great asaṃkheyas of kalpas, for thirteen great asaṃkheyas of kalpas, or for countless great asaṃkheyas of kalpas—the momentary state of learning the truth is always to learn the truth in forward steps and backward steps. To do a prostration and to bow with joined hands are the moving and still forms of dignified behavior. In painting a picture of a withered tree, and in polishing a tile of dead ash, there is not the slightest interval."

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 24th, 2013 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

WuMing said:

True. Or course, it is simple! But not easy to do. Such a statement (as all other such similar statements do) comes from a person with a long history of practice, years of practice, the exchange with a teacher. It "requires" and demands a lot to come to this place.

Astus wrote:

I doubt that she's talking about of herself. It was meant for Zen followers. As for whether it is difficult or easy, there is a nice story of Layman Pang and his family.

The layman was sitting in his thatched cottage one day. "Difficult, difficult, difficult," he suddenly exclaimed, "[like trying] to scatter ten measures of sesame seed all over a tree!"

"Easy, easy, easy," returned Mrs. P'ang, "just like touching your feet to the ground when you get out of bed."

"Neither difficult nor easy," said Ling-chao. "On the hundred grass-tips, the Patriarchs' meaning."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 25th, 2013 at 7:42 AM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

WuMing said:

Or do you want to imply that Zen teachers do not speak from their own experience when they instruct their disciples and followers, just words out of the blue?

Astus wrote:

What I mean is that when anyone wants to teach another person, one tries to say things that are meant for the student. So, if the teacher says something is simple/complicated, easy/difficult, etc., it is meant for the listener, and it is neither bragging about one's own greatness nor complaining about one's former hardships. It is meant for the student to understand it in this way or that way. Teaching, as I see it, is not a therapy session where one talks about personal memories in front of others, especially when it does not benefit the audience.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 26th, 2013 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Cosmology and Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't think there are specific rules in Buddhism about how should various realms exist. There is certainly no sophisticated cosmological doctrine that explains all the details, as it'd be mostly a philosopher's job. Amitabha's land lacks oceans too. It is meant to be a very pleasant place. Yes, it is normally categorised beyond the samsaric realms, that's how beings can stay there indefinitely.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 26th, 2013 at 4:24 AM

Title: Re: Cosmology and Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is a huge gap between the modern understanding of the world and the ancient one. This difference could be grasped by the single word "physical". To us something is either physical/perceptible/comprehensible/regular/real or spiritual/mental/supernatural/fantastic. This is an old method of demonising and disqualifying an unwanted view. The Pure Land is not physical, so not like our world, so it is far away, and maybe even just a symbol or a pious myth. This way we end up reinforcing our received cultural education and rejecting/transforming anything that does not fit into it. And that's absolutely normal. The Pure Land teachings could spread because it fit well into people's preconditioning, that the world is inhabited by other forms of intelligent life. Modern scientific education comes from an opposite view, that denies all "superstitions" (although once the word superstition was applied to pagan beliefs by Christians).

My take on the matter is that if you want to understand Buddhist cosmology, especially its Mahayana version, you have to become a proper philosopher, and put aside everything (or rather, as much as you can) you think about the world and start anew, establishing yourself on the Buddha's words. That is, the world is what we experience as the world. Our experience is formed by our habits. Entire worlds can become out of beings' habitual impulses. This is what samsara is about. Buddhas are beings who have not only defeated their habits (karma), but out of compassion gained mastery over their experience. That way buddhas establish various lands to assist deluded beings in gaining liberation. All the abilities of the buddhas are made out of perfect merits that were created by perfect deeds (paramitas) and steered by vows - this is what the bodhisattva path is about. Amitabha is one of the many buddhas, and his story is about how he, as a bodhisattva, made his 48 special vows to create a land where every willing person can attain birth.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 26th, 2013 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

Rakshasa said:

To me Shikantaza sounds like Satipatthana of Pali canon? Or is there any difference?

Astus wrote:

Satipatthana is a complex system that includes numerous meditation techniques based on the early teachings. Shikantaza is a single method based on late Mahayana teachings. Without considering the doctrinal context of the two methods there is no point in making any comparisons. And even from the practical perspective, Satipatthana contains several stages of calming and analysing. Shikantaza has none of that, it has no stages nor goals, it is perfect from the beginning.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 26th, 2013 at 6:56 PM

Title: Re: Cosmology and Pure Land

Content:

zamotcr said:

Seriously, it is hard to drop for me the current view of the world. I will have to, but I don't know how and at the end, are Buddha and Science compatible or can both have an arrangement?

Astus wrote:

Dropping a view and putting it aside are two different things. There are many ways to analyse something, and you don't need to refuse physics to do an aesthetic evaluation. Religion is not philosophy, mathematics, sport or economics, but it also does not exclude any of them. It makes no sense to claim that only "purple" is true while "yellow" is false as they are just various colours. At the same time, it is also pointless to say that purple and yellow are compatible, they mean the same thing, etc.

zamotcr said:

If I can't use reasoning in which way is that better than Christianity?

Astus wrote:

First of all, reasoning has many forms and just because something is logical it doesn't mean it is true (or false). It is good to be reasonable, and denying the force of rationality is exactly what it is: irrational. Christianity has many forms too, and at least the older, mainstream churches (Catholic, Lutheran, Calvinist, etc.) have no problem with reasoning, philosophy and science. Theology itself is a combination of faith and reason.

Secondly, in what sense can one religion be better than the other? It is a matter of personal choice and taste. But of course, arguments for the truth/superiority of one belief over the other is abundant.

If you want to understand the way various Pure Land teachings are considered orthodox Mahayana, you need to study Mahayana. Explanations in Pure Land works assume that one is already familiar with general Mahayana.

zamotcr said:

And believing that Pure Land is a physical realm, is not materialism?

Astus wrote:

Physical in Buddhism means that something is perceived by the five bodily senses. The only purely mental realm in Buddhism is called the arupaloka, where no form exists at all. That means that from Avici to Akanishta everything is physical. Since Sukhavati has many physical characteristics, as described in the sutras, it is also considered physical in its Buddhist sense.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 27th, 2013 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: Cosmology and Pure Land

Content:

zamotcr said:

can you delineate the major principles of what Buddha said about cosmology? Which correct views one should adopt, a proper way of understanding. I want to know more to study in that line

Astus wrote:

See this: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Buddhist_cosmology and https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ten_spiritual_realms.

Further, the Abhidharmakosa (vol 2) has a description of the spatial and temporal cosmology.

zamotcr said:

I want to but I feel lost. There a lot of disagreements between masters, every Master explain the same things in very different ways.

Astus wrote:

Start with the basics: Nagarjuna, Vasubandhu, Zhiyi. And when you have a difficult topic, you can always open a discussion here on the forum.

zamotcr said:

Perhaps they are here, but our senses are limited by something that does not let us see them around us.

Astus wrote:

In Buddhism it is called the "divine eye" with what it is possible to see spirits and gods. You might also call it an "inner eye", like what is used in meditation. You might think then that it is mental, however, just as in dreams, you can see forms, hear sounds, etc., so it is physical.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 27th, 2013 at 1:38 AM

Title: Re: Cosmology and Pure Land

Content:

zamotcr said:

That does not mean that if the Pure Land is physical (in your description of the term) then it is observable by our own human eyes, as we can't see neither Devas realms, so why Pure Land would be an exception? After all is outside Samsara, and is a Buddha realm (would be wrong to consider Pure Land as or in the 10th Realm (Buddha realm)?)

My doubts started when I saw a video of Master Sheng Yen, when he said that Pure Land is a galaxy in the west, so I thought that is was visible by our normal human eyes (if we could get there somehow). Of course Pure Land is above all and inside everyone. Immanent and transcended?

Before starting to touch Nagarjuna, Vasubandhu, Zhiyi, do you think is a good idea to start with "Mahayana Buddhism: The Doctrinal Foundations"?

Astus wrote:

Being a buddha-land doesn't necessarily mean that it is outside of samsara, but that was a topic of another thread. Sukhavati is without suffering, so it is necessarily outside of samsara, and because it has all sorts of residents it is a mixed buddha land. Also note that in Tiantai's presentation of the ten realms there is also the teaching of "three thousand realms in a thought", that is, that all realms contain all the others.

You could say it is in a galaxy to the west. Why not? Not that we could just explore it anyway. Saying that Sukhavati is "immanent and transcendent" would imply a symbolic interpretation, and that's OK, but then it is a symbol for enlightenment, and as such it is not understood that way normally if one practises for birth in the Pure Land through the vow of Amitabha.

Yes, it is a good introductory book.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 27th, 2013 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: Cosmology and Pure Land

Content:

zamotcr said:

But, if Sukhavati were a "normal" galaxy, and with that I mean, observable or visible to human eyes, wouldn't that make it part of Samsara? Everything we see with our humans eyes born and dies, stars, planets, people, every living being.

Astus wrote:

Samsara and nirvana are not places but types of experience.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 27th, 2013 at 11:40 PM

Title: Re: Cosmology and Pure Land

Content:

zamotcr said:

Also, I thought that Samsara were the Six Spiritual Realms, which are basically the 28 planes of existence. But of course I'm always wrong

Astus wrote:

Yes, samsara consists of the six realms and 28 planes. At the same time, all of that are products of karma and forms of experience.

Sukhavati is outside of samsara in the sense that there is no suffering and people definitely attain enlightenment there.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 27th, 2013 at 11:46 PM

Title: Re: Cosmology and Pure Land

Content:

Arjan Dirkse said:

The Pure Land is right here. The problem is recognizing.

Astus wrote:

That's a very symbolist self-power approach. Most of the Pure Land teachings (e.g. Shandao, Yongming, Yinguang; Honen, Shinran) are not like that, and aspiring for birth in the Pure Land - as an actual place - is common in most Mahayana schools.

It is also quite pointless to give the same teachings already told in a complicated metaphorical way.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 28th, 2013 at 7:33 PM

Title: Re: Permanence of Recognition?

Content:

Bhadantacariya said:

My objection to this argument is with recognition, take of blue for example: how can my recognition of blue occur if I or it are not the same as we were the first time I cognized blue?

Astus wrote:

Recognising something as "blue" is a thought process, that attaches to a range of visual experience the idea of blue. Physically, there are always different photons contacting photoreceptor cells and triggering a number of biological processes. In the Buddhist system of the 18 dhatus, visual consciousness occurs only when there is a visual form, and it happens only moment by moment. So, there is nowhere to be found any constant element.

The argument usually goes that if there were any perception or cognition that was permanent it would always be experienced. That is, a permanent thing permanently causing.

Bhadantacariya said:

If I am not the person who cognized blue that first time, how is it that I can recognize it? If the color blue is not the same color as it was when it was first cognized, how can it be recognized?

Astus wrote:

A form/colour is perceived by various mental processes. Mental processes constantly change. You don't always think of blue, do you? That one can recognise in separate instances that something is blue only means cognitive connection between visual perception and ideas of colours. It does not mean that you see the same thing every time, that's only a very superficial (non-analysed, naive) approach.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 28th, 2013 at 9:08 PM

Title: Re: Struggling with the Concept of No/Non-Self/Emptiness

Content:

SittingSilent said:

I know that may sound strange but it seems very depressing to me to give up my identity.

Astus wrote:

You don't lose any identity or self in Buddhism. It is about seeing what that "self" actually is, i.e. a series of corporal and mental phenomena that we like to identify with. But there is no loss of body or mind in the process, it's the concept of being one and the same thing all the time that is discovered to be false. That lack of permanent identity is what is called emptiness and no-self. Bodily perceptions change, feelings change, thoughts change, that's all. Nothing really new or unknown. It's just that we are conditioned to think that there is a stable core that remains the same. Understanding emptiness means understanding change. Change means that you can overcome whatever problem you may have, that you can move and evolve. You are not stuck with any eternal attribute or personality trait. And why this is important in Buddhism is to see that whenever we identify with a specific quality we may or may not possess, we struggle all the time to keep it the same, to organise everything around it, instead of being free and open about our life.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 3rd, 2013 at 1:25 AM

Title: Re: Namó Amitabha Buddha, True and False

Content:

Astus wrote:

An old thread: <http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=60&t=1084>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 3rd, 2013 at 9:22 PM

Title: Re: Written texts from the 3rd, 4th, and 5th Chan Patriarchs

Content:

Astus wrote:

The works attributed to Hongren and Daoxin are considered works of the so called Northern Schools. Sengcan's poem is likely to be an even later work.

Hongren: <http://www.abuddhistlibrary.com/Buddhism/C%20-%20Zen/Anccestors/Treatise%20on%20the%20Supreme%20Vehicle/Treatise%20on%20the%20Supreme%20Vehicle.htm> or http://www.dailyzen.com/zen/zen_reading0705.asp and http://www.dailyzen.com/zen/zen_reading0706.asp

Daoxin: http://www.dailyzen.com/zen/zen_reading0811.asp

Both works are also found in the appendix of Daido Looi's "The Art of Just Sitting". More about early Chan read McRae's https://books.google.com/books/about/The_Northern_School_and_the_Formation_of.html?id=5M4KAAAAYAAJ.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 3rd, 2013 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: Anatta experience ?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Realising that there is no self means simply the recognition of the lack of a substantial being. In fact, there never has been any self anywhere, it is only an idea, a feeling that there is a self. There is no self in any sensory experience, or even in our thoughts and emotions. So, to experience no self does not mean a new experience, it is the recognition that there has never been any being/actor/thinker/feeler/perceiver as all there is is experience (five aggregates, six sense gates) and all experience is impermanent (etc.). But it's the same experience as always. The difference lies in the wisdom of seeing them for what they actually are.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 6th, 2013 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: It's a sign / Magical thinking is stupid

Content:

Astus wrote:

Magical thinking supposes unknown causal relations and/or an external intelligent force. It can serve as an explanation for not understood events, it provides a feeling of power. It is basically cheating oneself, accepting a lie for the sake of emotional comfort. Is it stupid to feel safe? Not at all. Can it generate positive mental states? Yes. It is not much different from conspiracy theories and paranoia.

Citing "interdependence" means very little. It does not mean in Buddhism that everything is connected to everything, and such. It is used to prove that all phenomena are composites without a substance. Although it is true that traditionally Buddhism accepts magic as a real thing, it has no explanation for it whatsoever, therefore it is nothing but accepting the ruling cultural beliefs, just as today many like to connect biochemical phenomena to meditation.

Magical thinking is also a sign of mental proliferation, the desire to explain everything. But that nobody can explain everything does not mean that simple concepts (e.g. God, karma, energy, UFO's) are the solution. They are not much better than children's stories.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 7th, 2013 at 1:31 AM

Title: Re: It's a sign / Magical thinking is stupid

Content:

Astus wrote:

We aren't limited to UFOs here. What Buddhism understands to be causal fails most criteria for non-magical thinking.

Yes, where Buddhism says that one's intention and action modifies physical reality it is magical thinking. Only when karma is restricted to a personal mental continuum and its way of perception could we say that there is no "magic" involved. See this one here: <https://eubuddhist.blogspot.com/2012/09/buddhist-magic.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 7th, 2013 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: Differences between Chan and Zen? If any?

Content:

Astus wrote:

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=147672#p147672>

Also: <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=53&t=9703>

In short, both Chan and Zen are generic terms for various teachings and traditions. To find actual differences one better picks something from the Chinese side and something from the Japanese side. And there can be numerous differences between teachers even of the same lineage.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 7:16 AM

Title: Re: Differences between Chan and Zen? If any?

Content:

Astus wrote:

It should be noted that many American Zen teachers actually belong to a modern Zen movement called the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sanbo_Kyodan. The founders of that organisation were open to foreigners and they accepted people of other religions as students, like the Jesuit priest Hugo Enomiya-Lassalle. Sanbo Kyodan is not representative of all the other Japanese Zen schools.

One should also be aware that while in Japan we can talk of independent Zen institutions, in Chinese Buddhism the name "Chan" is often synonymous with Buddhism for various reasons, and not restricted to a specific set of teachings and methods.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 8:30 AM

Title: Re: Differences between Chan and Zen? If any?

Content:

Huifeng said:

So, relying on English language material is only going to show a tiny corner of Chan.

Astus wrote:

Many of the important works are translated to English. Except that they are not necessarily titled as Chan, but simply as sutras and other works. It is also quite true for Korean and Vietnamese Buddhism that "Chan" is a general word and not really a school. So we can say that the way Japanese Buddhism is fragmented into various schools is an exception, a result of historical development and how the state controlled Buddhist institutions. Just as in China it was the Chan movement that gained imperial support and eventually became the organisational frame for the whole of Chinese Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 6:15 PM

Title: Re: True Self in Jodo Shinshu

Content:

Astus wrote:

The idea of inherent enlightenment (hongaku) was irrelevant for Honen and Shinran, just as the concept of buddha-nature. For the simple reason that ordinary beings have no knowledge of it. Believing that one is already enlightened can easily lead to the misconception that one is not an ordinary being. Believing that there is a buddha-nature can easily lead to the misconception of an eternal soul. The teaching of inherent enlightenment is avoided, since the very first thing to understand and accept on the Pure Land path is that we are deluded ordinary beings incapable of saving ourselves. The teaching of buddha-nature is avoided for the same reason, it has no relevance and easily leads to false views. As for the buddhas and Amitabha Buddha in particular, of course they are perfect, enlightened, wise, and complete with all the great qualities.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 9th, 2013 at 6:22 AM

Title: Re: True Self in Jodo Shinshu

Content:

Astus wrote:

Occurrences of "buddha-nature" in the KGSS (<http://amidanet.com/dharma-treasury-index.htm>):

1.6 - in a quote, used for describing the Buddha, in 1.7 Shinran sums up how all the above quotes confirm the Larger Sutra as the ultimate teaching

2.87 - in a quote, identified as the One Vehicle, previously in 2.84 Shinran says that the ultimate One Vehicle is the "One Buddha Vehicle of the Vow"

3.26 - in a quote, used to explain "true" for "true and sincere mind" (shijoshin) of the three minds. It was already explained in 2.13 that shijosin means "We should not show outwardly how wise, virtuous and diligent we are, because, inwardly, we entertain deceitfulness. Being possessed of all kinds of greed, anger, falsity, and crookedness, we can hardly remove our evil nature; we are indeed like snakes or scorpions." The quoted passage containing "buddha-nature" is meant to strengthen Shinran's statement that "the true and sincere mind endowed by the Buddha for our benefit through the inconceivable, indescribable and ineffable ocean-like Vow of great wisdom of the One Vehicle."

3.31 - in a quote, again used to establish that the Joyful Faith is based on Amitabha's compassion and not one's own effort, as introduced in 3.28.

3.105 - in a quote, used to praise nenbutsu practitioners

3.116 - in a quote, to show that the Buddha saves evil beings out of compassion

5.9 - in a quote, stating that the Buddha is not different from the buddha-nature

5.11 - in a quote, used as previously

5.15 - in a quote, used as previously

5.16 - in a quote, used as previously

5.17 - in a quote, icchantikas have buddha-nature, i.e. everybody can attain liberation

5.20 - in a quote, buddha-nature is hard to see

5.21 - in a quote, used as previously

5.37 - Shinran comments, liberation exists in the Pure Land

I wouldn't say he was "big on the attainment Buddha Nature" as he only uses it in one paragraph when not found in various quotes. The quotes are used in various contexts and they are not related to one's practice or anything that one should understand now. Buddha-nature is used as a synonym for various things (buddha qualities, compassion, liberation, potentiality of enlightenment, buddhahood) and not defined as anything central to the doctrine of Jodo Shinshu.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 9th, 2013 at 8:01 AM

Title: Re: True Self in Jodo Shinshu

Content:

Astus wrote:

As I also wrote, the expression buddha-nature occurs with various meanings, but mostly as a synonym for buddhahood. To say that the goal of being born in the Pure Land is to attain buddhahood is not an unusual statement at all. So, why do you say it is an important thing that the word buddha-nature occurs among all the other words used?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 5:20 PM

Title: Re: Differences between Chan and Zen? If any?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think the Surangama Sutra is the one text that is central in Chan but rarely used in other countries.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 13th, 2013 at 9:06 PM

Title: Re: Is the tulku system too exclusive?

Content:

Huifeng said:

When one throws a rock at a dog, the dog chases the rock,
When one throws a rock at a lion, the lion chases the thrower.

Astus wrote:

Problems exist in the mind. The tulku system worked for the Tibetans for centuries. Some may consider it an issue, but it seems to me most of the time people accept it as a unique feature of Tibetan Buddhism.

It is not easy to push through a revolution and it usually fails. In the realm of religion it is easier to go separately than to reform the existing structure. In Buddhism this is quite normal and happened in Tibetan too where there are some major and more minor sects. There is little meaning in endlessly criticising others. If you really don't like how it goes, work on finding or establishing a community that fits your ideals. There are already new independent groups making their own decisions about the administrative system and the teachings.

In the end every person is responsible for their Dharma practice. Blaming the church, the teachers or anyone else is meaningless. Your actions, your karma.

Dizang said, "I've heard you say several times that 'the three realms are only mind and the myriad dharmas are only consciousness.'" He pointed to a rock by the gate. "So do you say that this rock is inside or outside of mind?"

Fayan said, "Inside."

Dizang said, "How can a pilgrim carry such a rock in his mind while on pilgrimage?"

Dumbfounded, Fayan couldn't answer.

(Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 316; T47n1991_p0588b09-12)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 13th, 2013 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm said:

But I do have a mind, the last I checked (some may disagree of course), and as a matter of inference, is seemed unlikely to me (when I examined the question) that ultimately my stream of consciousness could have emerged from my brain alone (which is a necessary condition for sense cognitions, but in my opinion cannot account for knowing).

Astus wrote:

And that is the only topic where Buddhism needs to develop some proper arguments. Many of Shantarakshita's arguments against the materialists could be today refuted by the current understanding of neurology and biochemistry. For instance, he writes in relation to the body being the material cause of consciousness:

"What is a fact is that when the modification of one thing always follows the modification of another, then alone can the one be rightly regarded as the Material Cause of the other."

(Tattvasamgraha, §1886, vol 2, p 900)

Although there is no complete map of the human brain, but a strong correlation between the neural system and consciousness is quite apparent. There are many drugs people use daily to improve their mental functions, just as there are known physical symptoms of mental illnesses (p 912). There are also physical signs of one's emotional state (p 915), just as the brain still functions during the dream state and such (p 921).

Explaining the actions of newborn infants do not require assuming previous lives (p 926), and mental states can often be explained by physical elements (p 933). Thus the usual Buddhist position is hard to maintain that "Subjective Consciousness rests entirely upon the previous Consciousness; this is the idea expressed in the words 'Subjective Consciousness must be regarded as independent'. The reason for this 'independence' consists in the fact of its not requiring anything else, In all cases, this Subjective Consciousness proceeds entirely from its own Cause, because it does not stand in need of any causes other than its own, in the shape of the Eye, etc.; as is found to be the case during sleep."

(p 922)

As you say, Buddhists should update themselves to the 21st century, if they want to be taken seriously and not as narrow minded people lost in a long gone era. Of course, there are Buddhists for whom such things as the philosophy of mind are not unknown, however, it is too easy to end up on the materialist side and lose important elements of Buddhism.

For those who believe that it is pointless to engage in science and philosophy as religion is mostly for the uneducated simple folk who believe whatever the authority figure says, it is partially true. Still, most human beings want to rationalise what they believe in. That's why reasoning and arguments matter. And those who are considered authentic sources of truth tend to be people with at least a little higher intellectual capacity than the average humans. Also, the more effort one puts into one's religion the more one wants to understand the details behind the surface.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 1:52 AM

Title: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Zen is a specific form of Buddhism that developed at the beginning of the Common Era around five hundred years after Gotama Buddha's death as a reaction to the way Buddhism had strayed from its origin as a meditative practice and become more of a religion. The Zen movement sought to strip away all the inessential rituals, constuming, and other trappings and get back down to the basics. This is evident in the name of the sect. "Zen" is the Japanese pronunciation of the Sanskrit word dhyana, meaning "meditation."

(Brad Warner: Sex, Sin, and Zen, p 4) developed at the beginning of the Common Era

The beginning is usually attributed either to Shakyamuni Buddha or Bodhidharma, but it shows how actual historical information on Zen is hard to come by. And it doesn't matter anyway. Long ago somewhere far far away.

a reaction to the way Buddhism had strayed

Zen is returning to the original teachings of the Buddha. This is the real Buddhism.

from its origin as a meditative practice and become more of a religion

Buddhism is about meditation. It is not a religion, it only looks like one, but that is a mistake. That's why Buddhists in the West are called 'practitioners' because unless you meditate it is not even Buddhism.

Zen movement sought to strip away all the inessential rituals

Zen is a movement, not a religious sect or anything like that. And rituals are not important. Everything but meditation is inessential. Except for a little chanting, black robes, zafu, keisaku, gong, tea ceremony, prostrations, gardening, precepts, initiations, priests, etc. Those are just for decoration.

This is evident in the name of the sect. "Zen" is ... "meditation."

Meditate. Meditation. Zen is meditation. Buddhism is meditation. We could call this the "Meditation Only Movement".

p.s. No disrespect intended towards Brad Warner. It's just happened that it was his writing that caught my attention to this topic.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

tomamundsen said:

To be clear, you are disagreeing with both the words in bold and not in bold, correct?

Astus wrote:

Yes. I meant to highlight the nature of the myth created for Zen (and Buddhism).

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 7:32 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

matthewmartin said:

I would say that single practice Buddhism is a Japanese idea, post Chan, but pre-Brad.

Astus wrote:

There is no Buddhist school that I know of where they only have one kind of practice.

It is true that Honen emphasised the recitation of the name as the single practice that is sufficient for attaining birth in the Pure Land, but that is not the only practice he taught but also the miscellaneous practices of the Pure Land Path (zogyo) and the four auxiliary acts (jogo).

Dogen was definitely not the kind of "zazen only" teacher that some like to interpret him. Yes, zazen is a central method, but as it is apparent in his writings, he embraced and transmitted lot more than that. Most of his works in the Shobogenzo and his speeches in the Eihei Koroku are not about zazen. I just counted it, and the word zazen occurs in the 75-fascicle SBGZ only in eleven writings (10, 11, 12, 14, 16, 19, 43, 47, 50, 63, 69), and in three more (Bendowa, Butsuda/Doshin, Juundo Shiki) if you add 20 other works. That means 14.6% or 14.7% of the Shobogenzo works contain the word zazen, and even less talk about it to some extent. Plus, zazen has a wider meaning than just sitting in meditation.

And although I don't know much about Nichiren's teachings, I know that they do more than just repeating the Odaimoku endlessly.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

seeker242 said:

Personally, I would not go so far as to say that as chanting, prostrations, gardening, tea ceremony, Oryoki, etc, etc is all itself, meditation.

Astus wrote:

They are not considered meditation, unless the argument is that "everything is meditation as long as you are aware of what you do", i.e. meditation is "being in the present". They are elements carried on in various communities without much consideration. But of course there is no particular reason as for why wear robes mimicking monks, or why eat like they do (did) in Japan, or why a Zen garden is better than an English garden. However, if those "cultural trappings" were removed completely, Zen would look no different from the Insight Meditation Society or simple meditation groups outside the Buddhist frame. Thus Zen is defined not by what is actually taught but by its outward appearance. Zen is therefore a style.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Malcolm said:

Indeed, largely, though not entirely, based on Sung dynasty Neo-confucian aesthetics as interpreted by the Japanese.

Astus wrote:

There was a topic: <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=69&t=4385>.

My view is that seeing and/or presenting Zen as a style is losing what actual teachings were transmitted. But when it becomes a taboo to even consider that Zen has a doctrinal position, it is easy to reduce it to superficial techniques and artistic forms. And that's what this "Western Myth" does.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 11:23 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

ReasonAndRhyme said:

I'm not sure which part of your post is a quote and which part is you speaking, but concerning the above statement: this is not necessarily so.

Astus wrote:

Text not in bold are my comments.

There are various definitions. My point is that there is a tendency that Zen (and Buddhism in general) is primarily/only about meditative practice. That's what Zen people (and Buddhists) do. If you are a Zen follower you are necessarily a Zen practitioner, and practitioner means meditating. The programs of a Zen community consists mainly of meditation practice. Intensive practice is a retreat with lots of meditation. There is no Sunday school, nothing like a catechism, nothing particular to accept as true or a specific code of conduct to follow - or in Buddhist terms, no correct view and no correct ethics. Although there are talks about buddha-nature, emptiness, the bodhisattva precepts, but they are not really more important than ritual eating and drinking. Actually, even meditation is not a well developed subject, there are mostly generalisations and simple instructions.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 15th, 2013 at 10:26 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Meido said:

But if you mean to describe what is actually happening in Western Zen practice, I think the picture is much more varied and nuanced...certainly more so than one might think surveying the online Zen world.

Astus wrote:

I don't have any specific group or organisation in mind. And even if I did I would raise the subject only on the theoretical level because I don't think there's much good in a series of criticisms on an online forum. What I quoted in the OP here is to bring attention to the origin myth and definition of Zen as it is used many times, and that it has an impact on how Zen is perceived and practised. As you say, there are many groups and in those groups there are all sorts of people, so it'd take a thorough investigation to start a discussion on that, and that's not something I have the capacity to do, plus I think it's up to each organisation and individual members to decide what and how they want to do. So I'm writing about the "Western Myth of Zen" on the level of principle and theory and not about any actual institution, teacher or person. That kind of discussion is for those who are in close contact with them.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 15th, 2013 at 11:37 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

seeker242 said:

They are considered meditation at a real zen temple.

Astus wrote:

Isn't that the other extreme, saying that a real Zen temple must take everything (or certain things) as meditation? As above I mentioned, there is that view, when you "just do it" or when "you are aware doing it" means meditation. But then, what's the difference between "just bowing" and "just chanting", and "just listening to music" and "just swimming in a lake"? If there is no difference, then no point in doing those things instead of others. If there is a difference, then it is something else than "just doing it".

For instance, recitation is good for memorising a text. That's what it was/is used for. And if you memorise a text you can always go back to it, reflect on it, etc. And there are reciting mantras for magical effects and reciting the name of buddhas as a form of worship or contemplation. Saying that recitation is for "just reciting" makes it meaningless, as I said above. Same goes for other practices.

seeker242 said:

To someone who is not trapped by "cultural trappings", cultural trappings don't even exist. There is no such thing.

Astus wrote:

Cultural trappings is a sort of argument to reduce Zen (Buddhism) to a set of chosen methods and teachings. It doesn't mean that they are actually related to the source culture (Japanese, Chinese, Indian, etc.) or not. So, calling it "cultural" is based on the idea that there is a difference between the Dharma and the culture, a very modern idea actually (that is, the idea of cultural relativism and cultural identity).

seeker242 said:

The purpose of such activity is to practice "mind sitting". Huineng did not teach that "only sitting on the floor with your legs crossed" is meditation.

Astus wrote:

If there is an activity to be done, it is not "mind sitting". Chapter five of the Platform Sutra about seated meditation says clearly,

"In this teaching, there is no impediment and no hindrance. Externally, for the mind to refrain from activating thoughts with regard to all the good and bad realms is called 'seated' (zuo). Internally, to see the motionlessness of the self-nature is called 'meditation' (chan)."

That is, zazen (zuochan, seated meditation) is not a technique or practice, it is not an activity or teaching to follow. "Mind sitting" is not being hung up on sensory and mental phenomena based on the wisdom of emptiness. As the sutra says in the previous chapter,

"There is in the self-nature fundamentally not a single dharma that can be perceived. To think that there were any would be a false explanation, a disaster, a false view of enervating defilements. Therefore, this teaching takes nonthought as its central doctrine."

The Platform Sutra does not recommend or teach any other practice than "no practice". This is also true of Zen in general. Look at the followings.

If you don't see your nature, invoking buddhas, reciting sutras, making offerings, and keeping precepts are all useless. Invoking buddhas results in good karma, reciting sutras results in a good memory; keeping precepts results in a good rebirth, and making offerings results in future blessings-but no buddha.

(Bloodstream Sermon, The Zen Teaching of Bodhidharma, p 11)

In the authentic transmission of [our] religion, it is said that this Buddha-Dharma, which has been authentically and directly transmitted one-to-one, is supreme among the supreme. After the initial meeting with a [good] counselor we never again need to burn incense, to do prostrations, to recite Buddha's name, to practice confession, or to read sutras. Just sit and get the state that is free of body and mind.

(Bendowa, Shobogenzo, vol 1, p 5, tr. Nishijima-Cross)

Again [Master Tendō] said, "Practicing [za]zen is the dropping off of body and mind. We need not burn incense, do prostrations, recite the Buddha's name, confess, or read sutras. When we are just sitting, we have attainment from the beginning."

(Gyoji, SBGZ, vol 2, p 209)

One day the Councilor Wang visited the master. When he met the master in front of the Monks' Hall, he asked, "Do the monks of this monastery read the sutras?"

"No, they don't read sutras," said the master.

"Then do they learn meditation?" asked the councilor.

"No, they don't learn meditation," answered the master.

"If they neither read sutras nor learn meditation, what in the world are they doing?" asked the councilor.

"All I do is make them become buddhas and patriarchs," said the master.

The councilor said, "“Though gold dust is valuable, in the eyes it causes cataracts.”
“I always used to think you were just a common fellow,” said the master.
(Record of Linji, p 38, tr. Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 16th, 2013 at 5:43 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Meido,

Could you give some examples of those Zen communities where they give a well rounded Buddhist teaching? Where they view Zen as a form of Mahayana Buddhism, complete with a large written canon, religious beliefs and traditions. I'm just curious about who you think of as exemplary transmitters of the Buddhadharma.

From my end, as I don't even live in America, I can see only what they put online, publish in writings and maybe things I hear from others. As an example, on the Zen Studies Society (Daibosatsu Zendo) site <http://www.daibosatsu.org/onzen.html> they say,

""Buddha" simply means "awakened one." His great teaching was that we can all awaken; that fundamentally, we are all buddhas— Jewish buddhas, Christian buddhas, Hindu buddhas, Islamic buddhas, Ashanti buddhas, Haudenasaunee buddhas, secular buddhas."

Or here's one description from the <http://stillmindzendo.org/about/>,

"Still Mind Zendo emphasizes the practice of zazen (sitting meditation) above all else, recognizing it as a way for people to deepen their insight and realization of their essential self, which is nothing other than the realization of their lives. And because essential self, or essential nature, is not bound by the limitations of any religion or gender or path in life — not bound, in fact, by anything — we welcome people from all walks of life and from all religious or non-religious backgrounds to sit with us, practicing the development of a still mind as the necessary path to awakening.

Our singular commitment to zazen practice makes our sangha (community) a simple one. Apart from upholding the tradition of the basic Zen chants, we hold no services or other rituals, and we do not wear robes. We are, however, deeply committed to the teachings of the ancestors; to the discipline of the Way; to the attention to posture and detail; to the practice of being in the moment; and to the extension of that practice into every facet of our lives."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 16th, 2013 at 6:43 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Meido said:

What do you consider a well-rounded approach to Buddhist teaching? Particularly since we're talking about Japanese Zen, which has a large stream of self-view as Ekayana based on recognition of one's nature and transcending divisions of the Three Vehicles.

Astus wrote:

What I'm looking for/into is how Zen is presented in the West currently. Saying that Zen is all about meditation and there are no doctrines attached to it is one possible way. There are other options, like as you say, an Ekayana teaching beyond the three vehicles. I'm not saying this or that is good or wrong, but I believe that the definition has short- and long-term consequences. One example is <http://www.zenbuddhisttemple.org/> that was previously the Zen Lotus Society but changed name for Buddhist Society for Compassionate Wisdom, and they have a mission that includes elements of social engagement and Mahayana. Its difference from the <http://zenpeacemakers.org> is that the BSCW is explicitly Buddhist, while the ZPO is more secular.

Meido said:

So you get a lot of talk meant to stress welcome, accessibility and non-sectarianism.

Astus wrote:

Saying that a group is welcoming to everyone or that Islam and Buddhism can go together are two different things as I see it. There are some Christian priests who are also Zen teachers, so according to that view, Zen is not really bound by any religion. That's why I brought that part of Daibosatsu's introductory text. It continues that quoted part with this, "With this flexible and accommodating attitude toward the various cultures and beliefs it encountered, Buddhism was embraced throughout Asia. In China, it merged with Taoism and evolved into Ch'an, the Chinese word for meditation, which became "Zen" in Japan." So, this might be just an advertisement to invite everyone - although in that case it is questionable why they state something they don't actually believe in - or it is what they think. Don't get me wrong, I'm not picking on the Zen Studies Society, and I'm not saying this is heretical or anything like that. What I'm interested in is to see how various groups present/define Zen, thus creating the "Western myth of Zen".

Meido said:

In any case, from within the Zen view of itself I see no problem with saying that anyone, regardless of beliefs and self-identification, could experience awakening if they encounter a realized teacher.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean your interpretation of Zen is that it is above cultures and beliefs? If I were a devout Evangelical Christian I could still attain enlightenment without leaving behind my faith in the Saviour? Like, I could reach black belt level in some martial art regardless of my religion?

Meido said:

What's wrong with them benefiting in this way according to their capacity?

Astus wrote:

It's not wrong. It can be very beneficial, I'm not questioning that at all. Although I think that wisdom is an integral part of Zen, using meditation alone is not a bad thing at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 16th, 2013 at 6:52 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

seeker242 said:

The point in doing them is that there is no point in not doing them.

Astus wrote:

In that case one should do something enjoyable or socially beneficial, and then there is some meaning in doing them. The same nihilist (no point, no meaning) reasoning can be used practically for any sort of abuse and evil action too. It's not correct discernment and clarity but blank mind and blind faith.

seeker242 said:

"Mind sitting" precisely is the practice of no practice. So is bowing, so is chanting, so is sitting, so is cleaning the bathroom.

Astus wrote:

Same as above. This is denying all sense.

seeker242 said:

Following your own likes and dislikes is not zen.

Astus wrote:

This is an easily misinterpreted concept. It does not negate moral/ethical discernment, nor "common sense".

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 16th, 2013 at 7:17 PM

Title: Re: "All cognitions brought about by words are ultimately fal

Content:

Bhadantacariya said:

I have a hard time buying this since it seems to imply that the cognitions that his words are bringing about in me are ultimately false, including the cognition formed by the words in the title of this thread.

Astus wrote:

The problem is raised in Nagarjuna's

<http://leonlbreaux.files.wordpress.com/2012/03/refutation-of-objections.pdf>.

The question:

If no phenomena anywhere possess inherent existence, your statement, without inherent existence, cannot discard inherent existence.
But if your statement possesses inherent existence, you refute your initial position. Explain your lapse in logic.

His answer:

No thesis can address all causes and conditions, separately or apart.
This proves the lack of inherent existence in phenomena and, consequently, emptiness.
Emptiness occurs through the dependent nature of phenomena.
Dependent-natured phenomena lack inherent existence.
Similarly, a conjured phantom can deny a phantom its own magic conjures.
I make no claims of inherent existence, so you have not refuted an assertion.
No inconsistency occurs, so I need explain no grounds.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 16th, 2013 at 8:57 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

seeker242 said:

Common sense is not abandoned simply by chanting a sutra. Chanting is not unethical, nor is doing prostrations.

Astus wrote:

I'm not talking about chanting or doing prostrations. I'm criticising the argument, the reason you gave for doing those practices. That is, that there is no reason whatsoever and one should just do it.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 16th, 2013 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

seeker242 said:

If there was a significant reason for doing chanting in particular, it would not be the practice of no practice. So you are criticizing the practice of no practice? I thought that is what you were advocating? I don't understand! Do you think the practice of no practice is appropriate or not appropriate?

Astus wrote:

The teaching of "no practice" cannot be used to validate any sort of practice. If we put this into the Mahayana frame of the six paramitas, then it could be argued that while with prajnaparamita the view of emptiness is clear (no practice, no practitioner), the other five paramitas - while viewed with prajnaparamita - are to accumulate merit and develop qualities. The Zen teaching of sudden enlightenment may or may not agree with this, depending on how it is interpreted. If sudden enlightenment is truly sudden, then there is no need to develop wisdom and accumulate merit, because the buddha-nature is in and of itself perfect. But when it is taught as "sudden enlightenment, gradual practice", there is a reason for practising, as it agrees with the bodhisattva path of common Mahayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 17th, 2013 at 1:20 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Meido said:

Again, I believe that an awareness of this is growing in those quarters where it did not previously exist.

Astus wrote:

Thank you for your answers. I'm happy to hear that you see that as a general trend.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 17th, 2013 at 4:34 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

seeker242 said:

And likewise the teaching of "no practice" can not be used to invalidate any practice just like the teaching of "no thought" can not be used to invalidate thoughts. Because "no thought" does not actually mean no thought but no thought within thought. The same can be said about "practice". As for sudden vs gradual distinction, I prefer the platform sutra explanation of that in there really is no such distinction to begin with. I believe it says that the only difference is capacity of different individuals.

Astus wrote:

The Platform Sutra says (ch 4):

“Good friends, there are also those who teach meditation [in terms of] viewing the mind, contemplating tranquility, motionlessness, and nonactivation. You are supposed to make an effort on the basis of these. These deluded people do not understand, and in their grasping become mixed up like all of you here. You should understand that such superficial teachings are greatly mistaken!”

The master addressed the assembly, “Good friends, the correct teaching is fundamentally without either sudden or gradual—it is human nature that is either clever or dull. Deluded people cultivate gradually, while enlightened people suddenly conform [to the truth]. If you recognize your own fundamental mind and see your own fundamental nature, there will be no such distinctions! Thus it is that sudden and gradual are posited as provisional names.

That is, any sort of practice - as listed - is a mistake. Only deluded people cultivate gradually. If one sees one's true nature - sudden enlightenment - then there is no point any more to talk of either sudden or gradual path. As it says in chapter 2:

There are no sudden and gradual in the Dharma,
It is delusion and enlightenment that are slow or fast.
It is only this teaching of seeing the nature
Which stupid people cannot comprehend.

And,

Those with deluded minds appear to be cultivating and seeking buddhahood, but they are unenlightened to their self-natures. Hence are they of small capacities. If one is to be enlightened to the sudden teaching, one cannot cultivate externally (i.e., superficially): one should just constantly activate correct views in one's own mind, and the enervating defilements of the afflictions will be rendered permanently unable to defile one. This is to see the nature.

And in chapter 8:

The morality, meditation, and wisdom of your master is for exhorting those of small capacities to wisdom, but my morality, meditation, and wisdom is for exhorting those of great capacities to wisdom. If you are enlightened to the self-nature, you need not posit bodhi and nirvana, nor do you have to posit emancipated perceptual understanding.

The self-nature becomes enlightened itself, sudden enlightenment and sudden cultivation. There is no gradual progression. Therefore, one does not posit all the dharmas. The dharmas are quiescent—how could there be a progression?

So, yes, there are differences in capacity. Those with little affinity for the sudden teaching cannot understand it, and they need to follow the gradual path of Mahayana. Huangbo says the same thing,

"The practice of the six paramitas and various other disciplines is known as the gradual method of becoming a Buddha. This gradual method, however, is a secondary idea, and it does not represent the complete path to Perfect Awakening."

And,

"The attainment of one who has practiced the myriad Dharma doors throughout three kalpas, having passed through the many Bodhisattva stages, and the attainment of one who has suddenly awakened to the One Mind are equal. Both of them have just attained their own Original Buddha. The former type of disciple, the gradual attainer, upon arriving at his Original Buddha, looks back on his three kalpas of past practice as if he were looking at himself acting totally without principle in a dream."

And as you say, there isn't really any sudden and gradual path, since both ends in buddhahood. Huineng taught for those of the best capacity, to directly see the nature of mind, and so did Huangbo and others, but not everyone. But the distinction is there, that doing such practices as sitting meditation, recitation, chanting, etc. as practices are of the gradual path. The sudden path would not be sudden if there were methods to follow. It wouldn't be "no practice" if there were practices to use. Just as it wouldn't be "no thought" if there were thoughts to keep in mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 17th, 2013 at 8:08 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

seeker242 said:

So then what do you think is meant by "the practice of no practice"? Does that just mean you sit on the couch all day and just watch TV and don't do anything?

Astus wrote:

It means buddhahood. There is in fact an old term: aśaikṣa (Pali: asekha), it means non-training, and it is a term for arhats and buddhas who have completed the path. Of the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bh%C5%ABmi_%28Buddhism%29#Five_Paths it is the path of no more training (aśaikṣa-mārga).

seeker242 said:

I disagree as it's possible to not practice chanting, while practicing chanting.

Astus wrote:

That is the bodhisattva training in the paramitas, and that is for accumulating merit.

seeker242 said:

Which means it's possible for it to be "no thought" while at the same time, holding thoughts in mind.

Astus wrote:

I said that the meaning of no thought is not that one should keep a specific thought in mind for that. I didn't say there are no thoughts at all, or that one cannot have thoughts. But no thought is not to have this or that thought, and it is open to all thoughts. Saying that one should do this or that kind of practice for no practice is equal to saying that one should have this or that kind of thought for no thought.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 17th, 2013 at 5:57 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

LastLegend said:

It is of gradual path but to non-gradual path, meditation, recitation, and chanting are non-gradual. Why is it necessary and not necessary to do meditation, recitation, and chanting? If it is not necessary, then why and what is there to do? If it is necessary, then why?

Astus wrote:

On a gradual path, various practices can have their own role and relevance. It is summed up in the six paramitas, where prajnaparamita is for the accumulation of wisdom, and the other five are for the accumulation of merit. Yongming Yanshou discussed this in his Treatise on the Common End of Myriad Good Deeds, that incorporates various practices into a "sudden enlightenment, gradual practice" system (see Albert Welter's dissertation: <http://digitalcommons.mcmaster.ca/cgi/viewcontent.cgi?article=2714&context=open dissertations>).

On a genuinely sudden path, it is not really a path at all. As quoted previously, there are no practices to do, as there is nowhere to develop. It is buddhahood itself.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 17th, 2013 at 9:26 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

LastLegend said:

What is meant by genuine sudden path? Can you explain further? Many ancient masters have spoken, students realized their mind is Buddha. But they were not fully enlightened. Are chanting and other practices not good for "activating correct views?"

Astus wrote:

There is "sudden enlightenment, gradual practice" and "sudden enlightenment, sudden practice" within Zen. The first one was originally emphasised by Guifeng Zongmi primarily against the emerging Hongzhou school (disciples of Mazu Daoyi) and to some extent the Baotang school. The latter one is the argument of Heze Shenhui against the so called Northern School, and that concept spread to the later generations (everyone except the Northern School itself).

The "sudden-gradual" system is the reintroduction of the bodhisattva stages into the new frame of "sudden enlightenment" (i.e. the hallmark idea of the "Southern School"), while the "sudden-sudden" is upholding the "genuine sudden path" as done by the Hongzhou school. The "sudden-gradual" form developed a more systematic approach, while the "sudden-sudden" created most of the Zen dialogue collections. Their eventual fusion is most apparent in the teachings of Bojo Jinul.

Seeing nature means (originally meant) buddhahood. That is because only buddhas can see buddha-nature (see e.g. Nirvana Sutra, Lotus Sutra). The way kensho (seeing nature) is interpreted in the "sudden-gradual" system and post-Hakuin Rinzai is another matter, where they consider it only an initial fleeting experience, a momentary insight. So, seeing nature in the Platform Sutra and the Hongzhou school stands for full enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 17th, 2013 at 9:28 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

seeker242 said:

Saying one should do this or that kind of practice, is not the same as actually doing it. You don't need to say anything to actually do it. You don't need to have this kind of thought or that kind of thought, to actually do it.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean there is such a thing as action without intention?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 17th, 2013 at 10:56 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

seeker242 said:

Yes and no. When I sit down to actually do chanting, I'm not trying to practice making merit. ...There is just "om baara tobiya hum" and that's it. That's what I mean.

Astus wrote:

If I want to go from one place to another I don't need to keep in mind the other place I'm going to while travelling. But to start the journey I need to know where I am going to. Similarly, to sit down and chant you need to have the intention to do it, and behind that intention there is a reason. And that reason is why one does this or that, it's not simply "just chanting", etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 18th, 2013 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

LastLegend said:

basically seeking for instructional.

Astus wrote:

Could you explain that?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 18th, 2013 at 4:39 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

seeker242 said:

Precisely why the answer to your question is both yes and no. For example does a soto practitioner when they sit down to do shikantaza, are they trying to "get elightment"? Well, yes and no.

Astus wrote:

The starting point for the discussion about why one should do chanting, prostrations, sitting, etc. began with me questioning the validity of the argument that there is no reason at all, and "just chanting", etc. is all there is. If you agree that yes, there is first an intention with a particular goal in mind, then the original argument for "just chanting" is removed as non-existent. Consequently the question still stands. Why do any kind of practice if not for the sake of accumulating wisdom and merit, and ultimately for attaining enlightenment and liberating beings, that is, the bodhisattva motivation of the gradual path?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 18th, 2013 at 4:45 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Meido said:

They would just be considered insufficient for completely dissolving accumulated habit-energy, and also crucially for maturing the power and means to skillfully assist others.

Astus wrote:

Just as Jinul explains,

As for "gradual cultivation," although he has awakened to the fact that his original nature is no different from that of the buddhas, the beginningless proclivities of habit (vāsanā) are extremely difficult to remove suddenly. Therefore he must continue to cultivate while relying on this awakening so that this efficacy of gradual suffusion is perfected; he constantly nurtures the embryo of sanctity, and after a long, long time he becomes a sage. Hence it is called gradual cultivation.

(Moguja's Secrets on Cultivating the Mind, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 2, p 216-217)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 18th, 2013 at 6:24 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

seeker242 said:

The original argument is not removed when both yes and no are true, at the same time. When reason and no reason are both true at the same time. "Just chanting" is "just chanting" because it comes from the no perspective. Do you think a soto practitioner sits shikantaza for the purpose of attaining enlightenment or attaining anything at all?

Astus wrote:

Yes is true for there is a purpose for engaging in a form of practice. No is true when doing the practice itself and there is no need to keep in mind the intention behind it. If one is hungry one just goes and eats something. The intention is not to feel hungry. The reason for eating is satisfying the hunger. But while eating there is no need to think again and again that one is hungry. However, just because one does not keep thinking about hunger while eating, doesn't mean there is no reason for eating.

As for why various people feel the need to sit in meditation can be different for every individual. With a worldly mind it is for temporary benefits, like health and removing stress. With a sravaka mind it is for attaining liberation from samsara. With a bodhisattva mind it is for becoming a buddha and liberating all beings. There is no higher intention than bodhicitta.

seeker242 said:

What else is there to do?

Astus wrote:

Do you mean one engages in Buddhist practices because there's nothing else to do? Like, one could as well play football or read a novel, depending on the weather.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 18th, 2013 at 7:10 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Meido said:

Circling back to western myths of Zen, I would say what some popular Zen books have failed to stress is that kensho itself is not considered uncommonly difficult. And that the meat of Zen lies after.

Astus wrote:

That is likely because of the various texts not organised. In the teachings of Bodhidharma, Mazu, Dazhu Huihai, Linji and other Tang era teachers, seeing nature is buddhahood.

"Awakening is to awake to one's original nature. Once awakened, one is awakened forever, there being no more ignorance."

(Mazu in Sun Face Buddha, p 67-68)

Initial awakening followed up by gradual practice occurs first in Zongmi's teachings (published in English in 2009), and it's prominent in Jinul's works (published in English in 1983), however, they are not among the more popular works read by people interested in Zen, unlike the Teachings of Huangbo (translated to English in 1958) and various excerpts and collections. Also, I think there are still only partial translations of the works of Hakuin. And without good resources for the practices coming after kensho, only those who are in an actual Rinzai programme can know about it. Soto Zen is somewhat different in this regard, as it doesn't really have this concept of "sudden-gradual".

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 18th, 2013 at 6:16 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Meido said:

Episodes have been pointed out that do not support such a conclusion, for example the story of Linji's own training, Baizhang's experiences with Mazu, Bodhidharma's pronouncements regarding flesh/skin/bone/marrow (I recognize that appears late) and so on. But again, I have not seen the sudden-sudden model denied anywhere in Zen as a possibility at least.

Astus wrote:

Linji trained himself in general Mahayana before meeting Huangbo, but after meeting Dayu there is no further studying mentioned. Baizhang's record is sketchy, and it doesn't discuss any training, only some stories with Mazu. And at best we rather look at their teachings about what they said about enlightenment and not stories that are even less reliable, if we are considering historicity and not only the developed canonical view.

Meido said:

In terms of books I was thinking more of popular works in the west like Three Pillars of Zen, which presents kensho in a light that has to my mind caused some obstacles for people.

Astus wrote:

Yes, that is more appropriate. Alan Watts and DT Suzuki are also major players here.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 18th, 2013 at 7:43 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

seeker242 said:

Curious. What do you think of Linji himself sitting zazen, but at the same time, saying the below?

Astus wrote:

It is a repudiation of the gradualist view. But what makes you think he was sitting in zazen? No such thing is mentioned anywhere.

seeker242 said:

what happens to bodhicitta when one would believe "There is really nothing there that is real to save beings from to begin with"

Astus wrote:

From the path of seeing (i.e. the first bhumi; the 41st stage of enlightenment) bodhicitta is based on the realisation of emptiness. That's what the Diamond Sutra, and the prajnaparamita scriptures in general, talk about. It is the combined practice of wisdom and compassion. And it still has the intention to save all beings, while knowing that "beings" is only a conventional term. However, ultimate truth is not a negation of conventional truth, but the affirmation that conventional is in fact conventional and nothing more.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 18th, 2013 at 7:52 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

LastLegend said:

For sudden-gradual, if one does not practice chanting, recitation, or others, and since chanting or recitation is just an activity, is there an approach that can encompass all activities?

Astus wrote:

In the "sudden-gradual" system one does practise all sorts of things. At the same time, it is possible to reduce everything to a single practice, as long as it is with an enlightened perspective. In Zen that is normally the practice of no-thought, and its derived methods of shikantaza and huatou.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 18th, 2013 at 10:42 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

LastLegend said:

Explain more on no-thought.

Astus wrote:

From Thich Thanh Tu's Keys to Buddhism (p 52):

Also, if we look directly at the false thoughts, they will disperse like clouds or smoke. This is "directly pointing at the mind," not relying on any means. If we all practiced in this manner, no one would be unwise enough to run after their thoughts, trying to destroy illusions. We only need to know that thoughts are false and not follow them. This is the essence of Bodhidharma's pacification of mind.

From Hanshan Deqing's <http://chancenter.org/cmc/2011/10/13/essentials-of-practice-and-enlightenment-for-beginners/>:

What is commonly known as practice means simply to accord with [whatever state] of mind you're in so as to purify and relinquish the deluded thoughts and traces of your habit tendencies. Exerting your efforts here is called practice. If within a single moment deluded thinking suddenly ceases, [you will] thoroughly perceive your own mind and realize that it is vast and open, bright and luminous, intrinsically perfect and complete. This state, being originally pure, devoid of a single thing, is called enlightenment. Apart from this mind, there is no such thing as cultivation or enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 19th, 2013 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: Is Soto Zen Gradual?

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://archiv.ub.uni-heidelberg.de/ojs/index.php/jiabs/article/viewFile/8591/2498> (PDF).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 19th, 2013 at 4:51 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Meido said:

As for the recorded spoken teachings of these masters having greater historicity or being less subject to canonical revision, I couldn't say if that's the case.

Astus wrote:

"As I have shown in a previous publication, none of the encounter dialogue stories or exchanges, neither those that feature Baizhang nor any other Chan monk, can be traced back to the Tang period. From what we know, the encounter dialogue format was not even known during the Tang dynasty."

(Mario Poceski: Monastic Innovator, Iconoclast, and Teacher of Doctrine - The Varied Images of Chan Master Baizhang, in Zen Masters, p 15)

"The Extensive Record is an especially valuable source of information about Baizhang's teachings, and it is also among the most valuable resources for the study of Chan doctrine from the Tang period."

(p 21)

"The story of 'Ye yazi' or 'Wild Ducks,' for example, according to the early record in Wuxie heshang, in volume 15 of Zutang ji, originally was attributed to Baizhang Weizheng, but in later records, such as juan 3 of Wudeng huiyuan, juan 1 of Guzun su yulu, and juan 6 no 53 of Biyan lu, its attribution was changed, and it became the most important enlightenment dialogue written by Baizhang Huaihai."

(Zhaoguang Ge: History, Ideology, and General Ideological History - A Case Study of Chan Buddhism in the Tang Dynasty, in New Perspectives on the Research of Chinese Culture, p 65)

As for Baizhang's teachings in his Extensive Record, he was less a subitist than Mazu or Huangbo, as he used a three stages system of progressive elimination of attachment, nevertheless, it ended in buddhahood that could be accomplished in this life.

Regarding the relevance to the Western Myth, because Zen introduced itself primarily through the stories rather than the teachings, it gives the impression of unintelligible mysticism realised suddenly, as in both the wild ducks and the deafening shout story Baizhang attains enlightenment, but the stories do not give any useful information on how one could accomplish the same, besides the idea that one needs to find an enlightened master. And that brings us to the elevated status of the Zen teacher within the Western idea of Zen.

Meido said:

I think it safe to assume that since he participated in the monastic activities he did what others were doing, for example the several times he is mentioned participating in manual work.

Astus wrote:

My reply was for that particular situation when Linji gave that teaching. The record says, "At the evening gathering the master addressed the assembly" (師晚參示衆), the usual situation of shangtang, ascending the hall, i.e. giving a lecture. So, unlike what seeler242 said, the teaching was not given during a meditation session.

Meido said:

At the end of the day I'm rather fond of the approach which flexibly allows for any possibility, while having concrete methods matching the reality of most students' capacities.

Astus wrote:

Yes, that is the reality of a viable Buddhist community. And there is a palpable difference between the literary works of Zen and the daily activities of a Zen monastery. But at the same time, literary works can have a strong influence of what activities are considered Zen and what sort of Zen is expected by people. I think it is still the general scenario that those disillusioned by both the traditional religious and New Age arena, and by materialist consumerism, turn to Buddhism as a third alternative. In my opinion, while the "meditation only" approach can work to a certain extent, it fails to generate a stronger connection to the Dharma within a larger community, making Buddhism vulnerable to changes in social trends. For example, the lack of younger generation in Zen communities, as perceived by some (<http://nozeninthewest.wordpress.com/forum-young-people-in-dharma/>).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 19th, 2013 at 5:37 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Meido said:

But as Westerners encountered that armed with their own presuppositions and conditioning - and without a lot of key background information to clarify the situation, as you point out - I can agree that certainly confusion has sometimes resulted.

Astus wrote:

I think changing to a fully lay environment that lacks all knowledge of Buddhist tradition is a big change. Although lay practitioners have always participated in Zen to some extent - to the level that Dahui recommended kanhua practice only to lay people - but the teachings and methods were normally meant for ordained monastics.

Meido said:

Some folks who complain that in their experience Zen lacks such engagement may have just run into the latter approach without knowing it.

Astus wrote:

It's good that one can always choose whatever teacher or community one likes, such are the benefits of religious freedom. Although if I look around among the programmes offered by various Zen groups, it's not easy to find one that conducts lectures on sutras and treatises.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 22nd, 2013 at 7:21 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Huifeng said:

The quote you give in Chinese 晚參 means exactly "evening meditation session". It does not mean "evening gathering".

Astus wrote:

Yes, I see what you mean. But perhaps canchan is not that old a term to mean practice here, or the evening rituals were not the same as now. I can only rely on some other sources to clarify this, but I of course acknowledge that you may know better.

Footnote in Sasaki's version (p 150) says, Evening gathering 晚參. We have no definite knowledge of what this term referred to during Tang times, but in the Song it was an evening meeting of the assembly held in the master's quarters 方丈 (see page 131, above). It was informal in procedure, in contrast to the formal service held in the morning in the main hall, when the master took the high seat.

And if I understand it correctly, the <http://dictionary.buddhistdoor.com/en/word/61523/%E6%99%9A%E5%8F%83> also gives various meanings here, not only the current system of morning and evening sessions of meditation and recitation.

Burton translates it as "evening lecture" (p 21), Shimano "evening gathering" (p 12), Schloegl "evening question period".

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 22nd, 2013 at 8:24 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

seeker242 said:

The stories don't "give any useful information on how one could accomplish the same" but doesn't a person learn that when they get off the internet and go to a real life zen center or temple and meet with actual monks and teachers, etc?

Astus wrote:

Yes, experience in various communities is important. It is good to visit as many as one can, to see that Zen is not uniform. And then one can also see, that this is a human endeavour where anyone willing can take part.

seeker242 said:

The idea that one should "find an enlightened master", is that really an invention of "western zen"?

Astus wrote:

Zen was (and mostly still is) practised within a monastic environment, where one automatically has elders who are one's teachers. The idea that one should look for a "transmitted Zen teacher" was promoted in the Song era to strengthen the Zen school against others. Eventually that resulted in the complete takeover of Chinese monastic leadership, so abbots in China are almost always members of a Zen lineage, just as it is a requirement in Japan that all Zen monasteries are lead by a Zen teacher (thus the transmission became mostly hereditary after the Meiji era). And that's all quite different from the Western perception of the enlightened Zen master.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 26th, 2013 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: Cross Buddhist Upaya

Content:

Astus wrote:

Skilful means are means of liberation. Could you demonstrate how all you listed are methods to bring enlightenment?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 27th, 2013 at 6:13 PM

Title: Re: Cross Buddhist Upaya

Content:

kindergarden said:

First, let us look at the word "enlightenment." Is it something one finds in oneself or discovers outside and brings it in? In my tradition (Rinzai Zen), as I understand it, one rediscovers it within. Is it gradual or sudden or a combination?

Shall we start? What do you know of upaya, Astus? As far as I know, Buddha only mentioned speech but said there are 84000.

Astus wrote:

In Japanese Rinzai Zen, although they distinguish five levels of koan practice, it is not necessarily a clearly established path (Zen Sand, p 29). I think that Zen is not a good approach for devising methods, paths and stages of enlightenment, as it is rather against/without such schemes. Other Buddhist schools fit the requirements better for extensive analysis of the path to enlightenment, complete with methods, stages and definitions. Major works like the Mahaprajnaparamita-upadesha and the Yogacarabhumi-shastra in East Asia cover that, however, because of lack of complete English translations, one better looks at Tibetan Mahayana where we already have complete works in English (from Tsongkhapa, Mipham, Jamgon Kongtrul, et al).

I don't know if such a list of skilful means exists. If I think of teachings like the Vimalakirti and the Upayakausalya Sutra, they show how bodhisattvas work in a way to meet the needs of the individual. That's what skilful means is about, that's what the knowledge of aspects/characteristics (sarvakarajnata/道種智), also called discriminatory wisdom, is about. It is the same thing that Linji says (Sasaki, p 13) about meeting various people and teaching them accordingly. But while most of the Buddhist schools have an established structure for training (stages and methods), Zen rather leaves it to the individual teacher to act freely (although in practice there are traditional sets of methods, but no sophisticated philosophy).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 31st, 2013 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: Which Sutras make the Best Reading?

Content:

ylee111 said:

Which ones read more like epic novels rather than lectures? I am not necessarily looking for Game of Thrones but...

Astus wrote:

That Avatamsaka (Flower Ornament) Sutra is epic. And it's very popular.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 1st, 2014 at 5:21 PM

Title: Re: Meditation from Shurangama Sutra Volume 5

Content:

Astus wrote:

This sounds so much like a state of not simply being deaf but even dead mindless.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 1st, 2014 at 5:45 PM

Title: Re: Meditation from Shurangama Sutra Volume 5

Content:

Astus wrote:

Even the perception of awareness vanished, was emptied out. When the emptiness of awareness reached an ultimate perfection, emptiness and what was being emptied then also ceased to be. ... Then the mind capable of creating vanished, as did the states that were made empty, so that then there wasn't even any emptiness!

I mean that for instance the above quote sounds like total annihilation. It equates emptiness with ceasing, with non-existence. As I see it, that is not the view of the middle way, it is an extreme view.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 2nd, 2014 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Meditation from Shurangama Sutra Volume 5

Content:

Will said:

Says Master Hua: "there was no attachment. At that time it was "producing the mind that does not dwell anywhere." Further, he remarks that the state is "inexpressibly blissful".

A non-attached & blissful state is hardly 'total annihilation', nor is it an 'extreme view' but a view central to the path.

Astus wrote:

What is such a state where there is no hearing (or any other of the six consciousnesses) if not the cessation of all phenomena? And if what is meant is rather not being attached to phenomena, it is not the cessation or vanishing of anything but only attachment itself.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 6th, 2014 at 8:50 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

fckw said:

In (the highest stages of) Mahamudra, mind moments are allowed to arise from the ground, then instantaneously (in the very moment of arising) self liberate and dissolve back into the ground.

In Dzogchen, mind moments arise as the expressive aspect of the ground, i.e. not different from it. Therefore there is no need for self-liberation at all.

If this is true (and please correct me if I am mistaken), then there would actually be a very subtle difference in practice between the two systems, namely in terms of the view taken in regard to arising mind moments.

Astus wrote:

From the <http://www.rinpoche.com/dchng.html>:

Whatever arises, is the fresh nature of thought.
and
The essence of thought is dharmakaya, it is taught.

So, there is no substantial difference between appearances and the nature of mind, both are dharmakaya. It is quite an important part in Mahamudra vipasyana meditation to clarify this for oneself.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 8th, 2014 at 3:59 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

fckw said:

Claiming that the two systems are "basically the same" is therefore only true on a superficial level, but not in terms of various aspects of the practice - at least for the Kagyu, Sakya and Gelug-Systems. Unfortunately, Berzin does not elaborate on the Bons or the Nyingmas.

Astus wrote:

It seems to me all Berzin says is that Dzogchen deals only with rigpa while Anuttarayogatantra's clear light is a more inclusive term. That is, while AYT encompasses the Dzogchen teachings, that's not true the other way around. However, Mahamudra has more than one meaning or one interpretation, and that's not addressed in Berzin's article at all. On the other hand, previously there were several quotes given right from the beginning of this thread how the view of Dzogchen and Mahamudra can be the same.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 9th, 2014 at 8:06 AM

Title: Re: Great Doubt Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Great doubt is the determination to get an answer and at the same time not accepting (i.e. doubting) whatever answer one finds in the process.

Some related things:

Robert E. Buswell: <http://www.undv.org/vesak2012/iabudoc/04RBuswellFINAL.pdf>

Jeff Shore: http://beingwithoutself.files.wordpress.com/2011/07/great_doubt.pdf

http://www.buddhism.org/board/read.cgi?board=Hwadu&y_number=33&nnew=2

Also: Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, Vol. 3; p75-77 n132, n135

This looks like a good source, however, don't know where to get it:

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=EuYFOAAACAAJ>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 10th, 2014 at 6:12 AM

Title: Re: What is the Largest Buddhist Sect on Earth Today?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I have to second Master Huifeng's question. The word "sect" needs to be defined, even if loosely. Why?

Vajrayana, Mahayana and Theravada are not sects. That's because they lack the necessary identification in terms of organisation, doctrine and ritual. Buddhism is not like Christianity where most of the churches have a defined organisational structure and a set of beliefs. In fact, there are very few Buddhist groups with an explicit and exclusive teaching, i.e. statements of faith.

Technically speaking, all Buddhists take refuge in the Three Jewels. The monastic community is traditionally defined by the precepts followed, and while there are some minor differences between the three living traditions, they are fairly similar, while the lay community has the same five precepts everywhere. In that sense, there aren't really any sects, we are all followers of the very same Shakyamuni Buddha. (A recommended reading: <https://sites.google.com/site/sectsandsectarianism/>)

What defines Pure Land Buddhism? The simple intention to be born in Sukhavati. While the recitation of the name of Amitabha is the most popular form of practice for that, it is not the only one. It doesn't have any unique doctrine, precept, ritual or organisation.

What defines Zen Buddhism? There is nothing that is found in all Zen groups but not outside of Zen. No unique doctrine, precept, ritual or organisation. We could say that Zen has its own lineage system of transmission, but on the one hand there are other Buddhist groups with similar lineages, and on the other there are a number of highly respected Zen teachers without lineage affiliation.

What defines Theravada? That looks somewhat easier, because of the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kathavatthu>, however, if we look at the current state of what is called Theravada, it is something very diverse in their doctrines, practices, rituals and organisations. And since all of them are Theravada, there isn't actually one definitive Theravada school.

What defines Vajrayana? It feels easy to say that all things tantra. However, tantric teachings and practices are found not only in a couple of Tibetan Buddhist groups, but also in Tibetan Bon, in Chinese Buddhism and Taoism, in Japanese Buddhism (mostly Shingon and Tendai, but certain elements exist(ed) in other schools too), and most importantly in various Hindu schools. And if we start limiting the meaning of Vajrayana, we find that there are all sorts of traditions within Buddhism that don't agree with each other on certain points, so like for Theravada, there is no single orthodox school.

So, I think either there aren't really sects in Buddhism, or there are a whole lot of them. Thus some sort of definition is needed to answer the question about the largest Buddhist sect. Or change the question to something else, like "the most popular understanding of enlightenment", "the favourite colour for monastic robes", "the most popular buddha", "the most respected teacher", etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 10th, 2014 at 7:45 PM

Title: Re: Jodo Shinshu and personal morality

Content:

Astus wrote:

This is the problem of 'licensed evil', a known misinterpretation of the teachings of Honen and Shinran. The answer is that those who renounce the world and want to attain birth in the Pure Land don't wilfully commit any evil actions, don't intentionally engage in greed and hatred.

Things you may read:

<http://www.adelaideshinbuddhistdojo.com.au/shinranwasan/kw40.htm>

<https://amida-ji-retreat-temple-romania.blogspot.com/2010/06/meaning-of-there-are-no-precepts.html>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=Xb3BlmNUdRAC&pg=PA53&lpg=PA53&dq=shinran+licensed+evil&source=bl&ots=Gnr5frL6n8&sig=d6VTtaRBahxRJO5uLRbAP4UESYA&hl=en&sa=X&ei=TtjPUun2CtWysQsJ7YCYDA&ved=0CCoQ6AEwAA#v=onepage&q=shinran%20licensed%20evil&f=false>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 10th, 2014 at 7:53 PM

Title: Re: What is the Largest Buddhist Sect on Earth Today?

Content:

Astus wrote:

For the sake of statistics, it is easier to count monasteries, temples and community buildings. Making a headcount of ordained people is also something quite reliable as long as the government keeps track of them. However, neither monasteries nor ordination define one as belonging to this or that sect, lineage, whatnot.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 14th, 2014 at 6:31 PM

Title: Re: Faith in Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are various forms of faith. There is the general faith in the Three Jewels, common to all Buddhists. There is the very first stage of faith within the ten faiths in the 52 stages system of the bodhisattva path, something one could call Mahayana faith. Such Mahayana faith has various interpretations depending on what source we look at. In Zen it is discussed for instance by Bojo Jinul, who identifies it with faith in buddha-mind, an initial insight into the nature of mind. Then there is great faith among the three essentials of Zen practice as taught first by Gaofeng Yuanmiao, and that is mostly about faith in one's ability to reach enlightenment (i.e. a form of faith in buddha-nature) and faith in the practice itself. In general, Zen teaches the faith that mind is buddha, and that is the highest faith of suchness as taught in Mahayana, where faith is in fact equal to enlightenment.

Dogen writes (<http://terebess.hu/zen/mesterek/GakuDoYoJinShu.pdf>):

"In general, students of the truth want to be caught by the truth. To be caught by the truth is to lose all trace of enlightenment. Practitioners of the Buddhist truth should first of all believe in Buddhism. Belief in Buddhism should be the belief that we ourselves originally exist inside the truth, without delusion, without wrong images, without disturbances, without anything extra or anything missing, and without mistakes. These are the kind of beliefs we should establish, and this is how we should make the truth clear. Then according to these beliefs, we practice. This is our basis for pursuing the truth."

Sources to look at:

https://books.google.com/books?id=_A2QS03MP5EC

The Aspiration for Enlightenment through the Perfection of Faith in http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Translations/Awakening_of_faith.html

http://www.cttbusa.org/shurangama7/shurangama7_4.asp

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 14th, 2014 at 7:08 PM

Title: Re: What if Buddhism had become the dominant faith of Europe

Content:

Astus wrote:

Religion is not the only force in a society. Highlighting any factor and raising above the others results in serious distortion of one's perspective. History is often viewed as the history of politics, warfare and economics, and that is somewhat biased too, but still more encompassing and logical than putting religion to the front. No Buddhist country I have heard of achieved some sort of golden age where at least the basic five precepts were observed. I'd also be interested to hear of Buddhist scientists and inventors before European influence in Asia.

What if Buddhism had become the dominant faith? Nothing. Christianity had a widespread and influential monastic system, mostly wiped out either by Protestant rulers or by other political changes. Christians have a strong message to "love thy neighbour", but it didn't really stop people from waging wars, pillaging and ransacking towns, suppressing the poor, and persecuting intellectuals and other unwanted people. Buddhism cannot really show any better historical record in transforming societies, plus it mostly lacks the level of social engagement Christianity has always had.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 14th, 2014 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: 23rd Minor Precept

Content:

Jikan said:

The Brahma Net precepts are used for purposes of ordination in East Asia.

matthewmartin said:

I was sort of surprised to see this, since normally institutions like to keep tight control of membership.

Astus wrote:

It is used for such ordinations only in Japanese schools (and the Taego order?). And I presume no school there would accept self-ordination. At the same time, this feature of the bodhisattva vows allowed everyone to take them freely and thus helped establishing the bodhisattva precepts throughout China and related cultures. However, unlike in Japan, taking only the bodhisattva precepts does not confer any special rights or position.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 15th, 2014 at 1:58 AM

Title: Re: Omniscience and the future

Content:

Astus wrote:

Do buddhas know the future? Then lot of classical incidents of Shakyamuni would not have happened. Some discussed here: <http://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/fileadmin/pdf/analayo/BuddhaOmniscience.pdf>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 5:32 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

heart said:

So, thögal in tantric mahamudra?

Malcolm said:

Yes, so it seems.

Astus wrote:

Interesting. I have always had this impression that thögal with its channels and visions is a "step back" to tantra from the direct simplicity of trekchö and mahamudra.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 6:38 AM

Title: Meaningful in Tibetan

Content:

Astus wrote:

What is "meaningful" in this poem,

"Like the continuous flow of a great river,

Whatever you do is meaningful."

(Thrangu Rinpoche: Songs of Naropa, p. 99;

<http://luminousemptiness.blogspot.hu/2008/12/reflections-on-naropa-summary-of.html>;

<http://gdamsngagmdzod.tsadra.org/index.php/%E0%BD%95%E0%BE%B1%E0%BD%82%E0%BC%8B%E0%BD%A2%E0%BE%92%E0%BE%B1%E0%BC%8B%E0%BD%86%E0%BD%BA%E0%BD%93%E0%BC%8B%E0%BD%94%E0%BD%BC%E0%BD%A0%E0%BD%B2%E0%BC%8B%E0%BD%9A%E0%BD%B2%E0%BD%82%E0%BC%8B%E0%BD%96%E0%BD%A6%E0%BE%A1%E0%BD%B4%E0%BD%A6%E0%BC%8B%E0%BD%94%E0%BC%8B>)

Could someone explain this word, what it is in Tibetan, its use, etc.?

འབབ་ལྟར། ཁྱིམ་སྤང་ཡུང་དོན་དང་ལྡན།

'bab ltar / ji ltar spyad kyang don dang ldan

The <http://www.thlib.org/reference/dictionaries/tibetan-dictionary/translate.php> says "don dang ldan" stands for:

JH-ENG connected with the meaning

JH-OE {C}intent on what is beneficial

JH-SKT {C}artha-yukta

So I presume here "meaningful" (arthayukta - is that only a back translation, or there is such a term in Indian Buddhism?) actually stands for the unlimited compassionate activities of liberating all beings. However, if I just look at the English, the word does not convey such a meaning. Therefore my question.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 7:45 AM

Title: Re: Meaningful in Tibetan

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

As far as I know, 'dang ldan' and 'ldan' are synonymous,...

Astus wrote:

It still makes no sense in the text itself. I'd like to understand why the word "meaningful" is used. I assumed that it would be understandable in Tibetan, but if the original contains no other meaning either - and that is what I really want to find out - then there's no difference between the English and the original.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 7:58 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm said:

The problem I have always had articulating the unique feature of Vajrayāna view to you sutra guys is precisely summed above: wisdom merged into emptiness is the basis [sthana, gzhi], and this is what accounts for the visions in both Dzogchen [klong sde and man ngag sde] as well as Kalacakra.

Astus wrote:

But that's only those two systems. And even in thogal the fourth vision is the total dissolution, like going through creation and completion stages again. Mahamudra is complete with non-meditation, and there is no point in repeating the whole process of mandalas, mantras and buddhas based on the final realisation. So, I don't think I base my understanding on sutra, since that's how it looks like to me in Vajrayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 8:31 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm said:

Its not only those two systems, it is merely articulated most clearly in those two systems.

Astus wrote:

You mean you know some teachings from other schools too that give similar methods?

Malcolm said:

Also Astus, the four yogas are sūtra mahāmudra. If you do not practice the completion stage, mahāmudra according to the upadeśas is a slow path, or so it is asserted by the Sakyapas. This is the reason why vase breath is used extensively even in so called sems sde.

Astus wrote:

Yes, the criticism of the White Self-Sufficient Remedy. But from the Dagpo Kagyu perspective, the path of liberation is as valid as the path of transformation, and both are transmitted without putting one above the other. And I'm not trying to prove anyone's right here, there are enough versions of Dharma to satisfy all needs. I'd rather like to understand the reason behind considering the appearance of drops and buddhas - that result in their return to the natural state anyway - is the necessary next step.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 6:07 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm said:

in thogal the four visions appear not because the "natural" state is somehow lacking; they appear in their sequence because persons possess affliction and afflictions attenuate the visions as as they naturally unravel the visions first increase and then vanish. However, the idea that at the end of the four visions there are no appearances is a complete misconception.

Astus wrote:

The process is a removal of afflictions, and the visions are a sign of that, so they don't appear simply because of the natural state, and thus their disappearance is the final accomplishment. I didn't think dissolution here means total nothing, otherwise it wouldn't be the achievement of buddhahood for the benefit of all beings. Just as in mahamudra non-meditation is not about absolute non-activity. However, it seems to me that thogal and its visions is only one possible method of purification, and not the culmination of everything else, therefore other paths don't need it.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 6:15 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

mutsuk said:

I mean, you certainly know that in the two stages one works with the mind (sems) and does visualizations (dmigs pa, and other technical words for "visualize") while in Thögel one works with Rigpa (and its dynamism, rtsal) and has visions (snang ba) which are a completely different thing.

Astus wrote:

Working with rigpa means what? The view that appearances are only illusory phenomena, "the play of the nature of mind". Doesn't Vajrayana in general have the same understanding that deities are to be viewed as mental appearances without substance, and the understanding of the twofold emptiness? Doesn't thogal include instructions about how to induce such visions, using postures and other techniques? Dzogchen may have its own form of explanation that is different from anuttarayogatantra, but that doesn't mean that they don't follow the same process of the build up of a vision and then the vision's dissolution. That's why I said it is like creation and completion.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 9:17 PM

Title: Re: Shikantaza & Visions

Content:

Astus wrote:

Whatever occurs inevitably disintegrates and dissolves. The teaching of impermanence is at the heart of the Buddha's doctrine, and it is a straightforward guide to liberation. Zazen is about being buddha, and buddha is non-attachment. Zen is not being affected by the six kinds of appearances, so even if buddhas appear in one's meditation, that's only the work of the devil. At the same time, Dogen creatively combines the two truths in his Muchu Setsumu, stating that the realm of visions/dreams is the realm of buddhas, in other terms, there is no difference between ordinary and enlightened experience. Consequently, nice visions, bad visions, neutral visions and no visions are equal.

Your mind may feel as though it is sinking or floating, dull or sharp, or as though you can see outside the room, inside your body, or the body of buddhas or bodhisattvas. ...

These unusual and strange conditions are all sicknesses that occur when the mind and breath are not in harmony.

(http://antaiji.org/?page_id=7136&lang=en)

Someone who tries to discern me in form

Or seek me in sound

Is practicing non-Buddhist methods

And will not discern the Tathāgata

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html#div-26)

If one wishes to see the Buddha then one sees him. If one sees him then one asks questions. If one asks then one is answered, one hears the sutras and rejoices greatly. One reflects thus: 'Where did the Buddha come from? Where did I go to?' and one thinks to oneself: 'The Buddha came from nowhere, and I also went nowhere.' One thinks to oneself: The Three Realms—the Realm of Desire, the Realm of Form, and the Realm of the Formless—these Three Realms are simply made by thought. Whatever I think, that I see. The mind creates the Buddha. The mind itself sees him. The mind is the Buddha. The mind is the Tathagata. The mind is my body, the mind sees the Buddha. The mind does not itself know the mind, the mind does not itself see mind. A mind with conceptions is stupidity, a mind without conceptions is nirvana. There is nothing in these dharmas which can be enjoyed; they are all made by thinking. If thinking is nothing but empty, then anything which is thought is also utterly nonexistent.'

(Pratyutpanna Samadhi Sutra, ch 2, tr P. Harrison, p 21-22)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 9:48 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

mitsuk said:

In the perspective of the practice of Thögel, Rigpa remains conceptual at the level of Trekchö because its dynamism has not be "activated".

Astus wrote:

If such dynamism naturally unfolds from rigpa, there is nothing need to be done besides being in the state of rigpa. Being in the nature of mind is what mahamudra is all about, still, there are no such visions as in thogal. Trekcho is also being in the nature of mind, but no visions there either. So, either only in thogal one rests in the natural state and everyone else is deluded, or there are certain factors that induce the visions, and in that case it is a willingly used method. As you say, outside of thogal the natural state is a conceptual fabrication, so while others claim that their meditation is free from concepts, you deny that. Such a perspective is equal to saying that only one's own system is true and the rest are false, although here I fail to see the reason behind that, as I don't see how mahamudra (and others) still maintain a conceptual state.

mutusuk said:

With the two stages you do something with your mind , you visualize. With Thögel you don't visualize, you contemplate the arising of the dynamism of your natural state.

Astus wrote:

That depends whether only thogal knows of the nature of mind or others too.

mutusuk said:

They are natural visions not visualizations imagined by the mind.

Astus wrote:

Don't they occur to the mind, aren't they experienced within mind? If yes, they are no different from any other phenomena, being mental fabrications without any substance. If no, they are not experienced at all. Or is there a second mind besides mind?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

thigle said:

And if knowledge/transparency is "stabilised" while you looking at the sky like you looking at the sky, typical thögal-"developments" appear, because there's no grasping.

Astus wrote:

Then it should occur to everyone without grasping, not only those following the dzogchen teachings. However, they are not really discussed anywhere else. Or, those visions are induced by looking at the sky, remaining in darkness, and similar conditions conducive to visions.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 10:19 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm said:

The visions in dzogchen are not conceptual constructs like visualizations of the creation and completion stage.

Astus wrote:

Do those visions occur without any instruction or method whatsoever? If yes, then there's little point in teaching it. If no, how are they not conceptual constructs? True, during the creation stage one methodically and regularly needs to build up the visualisation, while in thogal one needs to let it unfold into a complex vision, and I'm not debating this difference in the method.

However, normal dreams are not intentionally created by oneself, still they are understood as conceptual constructs. Everyday experience of houses, trees, people, etc. are not intentionally created, but they are also conceptual constructs. Even the language is not something one creates for oneself, but it is clearly a conceptual construct. Visions of shamans and mystiques are not taken to be their own imagination, but they are mental creations nevertheless.

Visions in thogal have a special status based on the idea that because one remains in rigpa, it is not one's own doing. However, remaining in rigpa does not eliminate the six senses, does it? Still, lights, noises, etc. are not given any special status there, they are not the natural unfolding of the nature of mind.

Malcolm said:

It is not really a process of removing afflictions, it is more of a process of afflictions becoming undone on their own.

Astus wrote:

Being in the natural state is being free from afflictions, isn't it? One practises thogal by remaining in rigpa, that is, free from afflictions and concepts, so why the need for afflictions to unfold? True, this is a good explanation to back up the need for further practice and using thogal after one has ascertained the nature of mind and gained a stable footing in trekcho, so I'm not questioning the efficacy of the teaching, the method and the tradition. However, it seems somewhat illogical to me to say that on the one hand the nature of mind is the nature of buddha, and on the other that at the same time there are karmic imprints to clear out, because this presupposes that there are two minds.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 10:20 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm said:

They do, but very few people understand what they are.

Astus wrote:

Shouldn't it be widespread at least within Tibetan Buddhism then? Many mahamudra teachers were and are familiar with dzogchen.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 11:38 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

mutsuk said:

From a Dzogchen perspective, everything that is not Dzogchen is incomplete.

Astus wrote:

Claiming superiority over others is not a unique idea. The result of such a view is that there are many different sects, as they simply fail to convince each other. It seems many Kagyu teachers are more easy going in this regard. For example those already quoted at the beginning of this topic, and people like Lama Shang:

Just this mind alone, which is completely empty, clear, aware, and lucid, is what is called the perfection of wisdom, luminosity, mahamudra, dzokchen, and dharmakaya. (Mahamudra and Related Instructions, p 77)

or Tsele Natsok Rangdrol:

Resting in the unaltered mind is the essential meaning of all the countless, profound, and vast meditation instructions, such as mahamudra, dzokchen, result as the path (lamdre), severance (cho), and pacification (shiche). Nevertheless, these different kinds of instructions exist because individuals differ in their understanding. (p 301)

mutsuk said:

They are not mental fabrications, they are the visionary expression of the glow of Rigpa.

Astus wrote:

The nature of mind is without beginning or end, the visionary expressions are not. As they have beginning and end, they are dependently arisen, and as such, they are fabrications.

mutsuk said:

The mind (sems) is conditioned, Mind-itself (sems-nyid) is not. The ordinary mind (sems) functions in the mode (tshul) of ignorance (ma-rig-pa) while Mind (sems-nyid) functions in the mode of Rigpa.

Astus wrote:

Can there be a function that is not conditioned? That would mean eternal existence.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

mutsuk said:

No, but the visions are not objects of the senses. If you close your eyes, they arise anyway. They arise in the dark where your senses cannot perceive anything. They are not objects of the senses.

Astus wrote:

Dreams and imagination are not objects of the physical senses either, and it doesn't mean they are anything extraordinary.

mutsuk said:

Still, lights, noises, etc. are not given any special status there, they are not the natural unfolding of the nature of mind.

They are karmic perceptions. THogel visions are not like this.

Astus wrote:

Differentiating between products of mind and products of rigpa means separating mind and rigpa. Either then mind and rigpa separated as difference between ignorance and wisdom - both are functions of the same mental continuum - or they are separated as minds of two different beings. If they are like two different beings, it makes no sense to me to have two minds. If they are functions of the same mental continuum, it is not possible to have both function at the same time, thus either everything is perceived with ignorance or with wisdom. In other words, either everything is the product of karma or the vision of enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 20th, 2014 at 12:00 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm said:

You have a film on a movie projector. As you focus the image on the screen, the image appears to become brighter and more clear. But you have not changed or altered the film inside of the projector in anyway.

Likewise, though the visions appear to increase and decrease, they are not actually increasing and decreasing.

You can consider them to the visible expression of the mind essence, this is why these appearances are termed wisdom appearances since they do not arise from mind.

Astus wrote:

Are you saying that one always experiences the same visions, except that there are times when one properly focuses and times when not? That is, every experience is the same vision, but without the right eyes, they look like the ordinary five elements, but with the right eyes, they are the buddha families? Personally, I always thought of such a connection between elements and buddhas as rather symbolic, and not in a literal way that instead of a green recycle bin I see green Tara.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 20th, 2014 at 12:09 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

mutsuk said:

Mind functions with karmic winds, Rigpa functions with the wisdom wind.

Astus wrote:

You agreed that during remaining in rigpa one still hears noises, etc. and said that they are karmic products. At the same time, when remaining in rigpa, one has thogal visions, and they are wisdom products. Only sems has karmic products and only rigpa has wisdom products. Are sems and rigpa present at the same time? Can one be attached and non-attached concurrently? Because if yes, buddhas can still be afflicted. So that's why I don't really see how what you say is possible at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 20th, 2014 at 8:03 PM

Title: Re: Shikantaza & Visions

Content:

thigle said:

The experimental context for my question to the dogen-followers is: Sitting in front of the sky or in darkness, just the way like one is sitting in front of the sky or in darkness.

Astus wrote:

One can see strange things in front of oneself even by staring at the wall or the floor, if one stares long enough, and that's more about mental distraction than being aware and free. It doesn't really matter what kind of sensory experience one has during zazen, as that's not the point. I don't see how total darkness or open sky could make a difference in that, black or blue are both fine.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 22nd, 2014 at 8:36 PM

Title: Re: Shikantaza & Visions

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thigle,

If I can follow you, the difference between solid and pure visions are the presence or absence of duality (subject-object). The non-dual view, i.e. the middle way, is not defined by any visions, but whatever appears is either pure or impure depending on the view. Why should special rays and lights appear? I see no reason for that. But even if they appear, they cannot be but conditioned appearances, no different from any other. To use your example, the broken straw in the water is the pure vision itself, and there is no other vision (i.e. samsara=nirvana).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 23rd, 2014 at 7:51 PM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Astus wrote:

Self - that's a thought, a concept, an idea.

No self - that's a thought, a concept, an idea.

True self - that's a thought, a concept, an idea.

Thoughts come and go, they exist only dependently. And no matter what magnificent concept it is one likes to hold on to, it is definitely no different from any other concept in that it is impermanent, dependent, empty. On the apparent level thoughts are all different, but their nature, their essence is universally and permanently that they are without permanence, independence, self. This truth is clear and obvious for all who looks at it, and it's quite logical too. What use is there asserting or denying some imaginary self?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 23rd, 2014 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

smcj said:

If there is such a thing as an eternal "Truth", then it has to be active and present now.

Astus wrote:

I agree, an eternal anything must be obvious now or hidden forever, otherwise it is not eternal. Now what is apparently eternal? Emptiness, aka dharmadhatu, aka dharmakaya, etc. Eternal change.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 24th, 2014 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Jikan said:

What implications does this discussion have in terms of practice?

Sherab Dorje said:

My sentiments exactly, which is why I asked SoB what his practice was, to see how his theory integrates into his practice. To see if it can be liberatory.

Astus wrote:

I'm also curious to hear about the practical side.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 24th, 2014 at 1:38 AM

Title: Re: Shikantaza & Visions

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thigle,

Could you say it then in a less technical way? I don't think I understand what you mean.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 24th, 2014 at 7:42 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

"What is your practice SoB?"

Son of Buddha said:

Enlightenment is the True Self.....so whatever Buddhist practice leads to Enlightenment leads to the True Self.

but if you are asking if there are Buddhist monks who have claimed their practice lead them to True Self/Enlightenment then yes there are quite a few.

Ajahn Mun

Ajahn Maha Boowa

Vijja Dhammakaya is said to lead to True Self

Dolpopa stated one could gain True Self through Kalachakra practice.

and a bunch of chinese and japanese chan/Zen monks claim their meditations lead to True Self/Enlightenment....I can get you a list of a ton of names if you want it will take a little while cause I have to write my friend from Taiwan for it) also you will attain True Self in the Pure Land.

Astus wrote:

An interesting claim for universal validity. Although the majority of Theravada (unlike the Dhammakaya movement) is clear about anatta, as in the Abhidhamma and such; and the Madhyamikas (unlike a few Tibetan teachers) refute again and again all sorts of self - according to your interpretation, they in the end teach "True Self".

However, I still fail to see the practical value of such a belief in a self.

No mention of self in such classic meditation texts like the Anapanasati, the Satipatthana and the Kayagatasati Sutta. No self in Zhiyi's famous manuals like the Smaller Samatha-Vipasyana or the Six Gates. No self asserted in Kamalasila's three Bhavanakramas either. However, they do talk about removing the mistaken idea of a self, and such a practice has clear practical value in liberating one from suffering.

So, putting aside the theory, where is the practical side of the "True Self" concept? Or is it just another name for enlightenment, just a stylistic thing that some might prefer over such terms as nirvana and liberation?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 24th, 2014 at 6:07 PM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

steveb1 said:

When Buddha made self-references, just what kind of thing was he referring to, if it wasn't a self?

Astus wrote:

There is the relative, everyday truth, and there is the ultimate truth. Thus one should know the difference between the teachings and utterances of the Buddha.

in order to express the meanings they know, they follow the accepted language. Afterwards they are not forced to reconsider. Thus, good son, the saints, being freed from language through their holy wisdom and insight in this regard, realize the perfect awakening that reality is truly apart from language. It is because they desire to lead others to realize perfect awakening that they provisionally establish names and concepts and call things conditioned or unconditioned.

(Samdhinirmocana Sutra, ch 2; tr. Keenan)

The Buddhas have designated a self;
And have taught that there is no self;
And also have taught that
There is neither self nor selflessness.
What language expresses is repudiated because
The domain of thought is repudiated.
Unarisen and unceased:
Reality is just like nirvana.

(Madhyamaka Sastra, 18, 6-7; Ocean of Reasoning p380, 382)

Those who develop fabrications with regard to the Buddha—
The unextinguished one who has gone beyond all fabrication—
And are impaired by those fabrications,
Fail to see the Tathagata.
Whatever is the essence of the Tathagata,
That is the essence of the transmigrator.

The Tathagata has no essence.
The transmigrator has no essence.
(Madhyamaka Sastra, 22, 15-16; Ocean of Reasoning p450-451)

"And so, my friend Yamaka — when you can't pin down the Tathagata as a truth or reality even in the present life — is it proper for you to declare, 'As I understand the Teaching explained by the Blessed One, a monk with no more effluents, on the break-up of the body, is annihilated, perishes, & does not exist after death'?"

"Previously, my friend Sariputta, I did foolishly hold that evil supposition. But now, having heard your explanation of the Dhamma, I have abandoned that evil supposition, and have broken through to the Dhamma."

"Then, friend Yamaka, how would you answer if you are thus asked: A monk, a worthy one, with no more mental effluents: what is he on the break-up of the body, after death?"

"Thus asked, I would answer, 'Form is inconstant... Feeling... Perception... Fabrications... Consciousness is inconstant. That which is inconstant is stressful. That which is stressful has ceased and gone to its end.'
(Yamaka Sutta, <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.085.than.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 24th, 2014 at 6:52 PM

Title: Re: Shikantaza & Visions

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thigle,

"Solid vision" like "pure vision" can appear out of "ignorance", or as expression of knowledge, which is the end of "ignorance"

What is the difference then? The supposition that pure vision has no external source but "self-generated". That is not the case, however, as there are conditions for the pure vision just as for the solid one. Both appear as visual phenomena, and only mentally makes one a difference between solid and pure, but not visually. And that mental difference is just the supposition that pure vision is self-generated. And there is another assumption here.

Unknown said:

The described natural capacity and development of "knowledge" closes this important gap.

Astus wrote:

That idea of capacity and development do not exist in Zen, so it cannot be used as an explanation or basis for the occurrence of pure visions distinct from other sensory phenomena. Consequently, both solid and pure are interpretations not made in the Zen tradition, thus even if they came up during meditation, they would not be handled in any special way.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 1:24 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

But let's get to the real point. If the True Self is beyond the conditioned how can one achieve it by relying on relative (conditioned) methods?

Astus wrote:

That's one thing. But I have yet to hear about an actual practice that is a meditation on/with the "true self".

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 26th, 2014 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Sherab said:

Merely saying that emptiness is defined as unconditioned does not address my question, which was how is it possible to have a thing that is both conditioned and unconditioned at the same time. Perhaps, you are saying it is possible as long as it is defined as possible.

Astus wrote:

The problem you raise exists only because you suppose 3 separate things: a substance (the thing) and two opposing attributes (conditioned, unconditioned). (Although here it could be said that a box can be both big and small (1 substance, 2 attributes), but that's only because the attributes exist in different context.)

Emptiness means simply the lack of independent essence/substance. That is, empty = without essence/self/etc. and it is not an added quality of something. Empty = not eternal, not independent. And that lack of essence is an unconditional truth, because it is not created by something, not caused by anything. It is simply the absence of substance.

Such absence of independent essence is shown by things being dependently originated. Something does not exist on its own, it exists because of various causes and conditions. That interdependence is the fact of being conditioned.

Thus conditioned and unconditioned are true for everything at the same time. That is: nothing is eternal and everything is impermanent at the same time. Not being unchanging is the unconditioned part. Being of a changing nature is the conditioned part. Actually, it is stating the same thing from different perspectives. Neither part exists without the other.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 6:54 PM

Title: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Astus wrote:

There was a topic <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=77&t=3286>. I can only agree that life in Buddhism is meaningless. And it is not only meaningless, it is samsara, beginningless and endless dissatisfaction. Miao Yun wrote a chapter http://www.buddhanet.net/cbp2_f12.htm that sums up neatly that the only meaning Buddhism provides is to achieve liberation. Similar conclusions were drawn in the mentioned topic. What is forgotten is that Buddhism is not about saying how things are but how one should see them.

Renunciation and bodhicitta are qualities to develop. Before engaging in the path to enlightenment one naturally believes that life is full of meaning. That there are things (wealth, sex, power, knowledge, etc.) that are worth the trouble. And that is clinging, that is attachment, the great evil. Seeing that all phenomena are empty clears away that attachment. In other words, meaninglessness needs to be realised.

Such a view found in that realisation is not unique to Buddhism. Philosophers and religious thinkers all talk about it. It is in the face of apparent meaninglessness that people come up with various answers. They created answers because of the fear of nothingness. The Buddha, on the other hand, taught that it is that desire to have something to hold on to is the root of the problem.

The ideal life proposed by Buddhism is that of a beggar, who is content with the bare necessities of life. Thus, being busy with family, career, study and the other distractions of life that most of us call normal things to do, is meaningless and even harmful from the Buddhist perspective. And that makes Buddhism more than nihilism (in the Western philosophical sense), it is the ultimate refutation of what non-Buddhist everyday people call life.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 8:55 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

I believe that Buddhism makes life meaningful rather than meaningless.

Astus wrote:

Care to elaborate?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 8:57 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

it sounds nihilist to say this precious human rebirth is or should be meaningless.

also vajrayana offers such a wide variety of skillful means that having a normal life should not be a problem to a person of the highest capacity.

Astus wrote:

It is nihilist. Vajrayana offers skilful means to what end? Liberation. Liberation from life (and death). And while there is contemplation on the preciousness of life, it is precious only because one can practise the Dharma. And then there is the contemplation on the meaninglessness of samsara.

Also, why would one want to stick to any normal life?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

If you truly believed that life is meaningless, and that the only worthwhile activity is striving for liberation, you wouldn't have wasted time posting to this forum.

Astus wrote:

Besides that it is a waste of time, it could as well be considered bodhisattva activity.

PadmaVonSamba said:

If you read to the bottom of Miao Yun's "What is the Significance of Life?"
(the link you provided)

it reads:

Life is meaningful. Not only should we discover its worthiness, we should also realize its ultimate significance. With this human life, we can progress to the attainment of Buddhahood. How precious our lives are!

Astus wrote:

And so I wrote in the OP: "the only meaning Buddhism provides is to achieve liberation."
And that's what your quote says.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

we need not to be monks in forests to advance on the path.

Astus wrote:

I didn't say one must be a monk to be a Buddhist. It is simply the ideal way of life, full renunciation. And so aspiring on the path means aspiring for renouncing life.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 11:25 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

kirk5a said:

Do you mean - there are no goals, other than liberation, that are worth achieving?

Astus wrote:

Yes, like that.

kirk5a said:

If so, I don't agree that is all Buddhism is about. That's primarily because, since we do want to focus on that hard-core reality - the reality is, we are here. Therefore, the matter of liberation becomes tied to the matter of participation. One's manner of participation then, is entirely relevant and meaningful. And Buddhist teachings have a lot to say about that.

Astus wrote:

Participation in what? Life? One is already bound to all sorts of things, and liberation is about ending that. The path is moving away from being engaged in phenomena, in life.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 12:14 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

The path is about moving away from dualism. Phenomena is empty.

Astus wrote:

Away from being engaged, not phenomena themselves. We are ourselves phenomena. It is the attachment that needs to be removed.

PadmaVonSamba said:

I'll tell you an interesting story. ...

Astus wrote:

Seeing life's meaninglessness does not mean living in this or that way. Buddhism sets the ideal form of life as the renunciate (not necessarily an ordained monastic). The point is that all goals but liberation is futile in Buddhism, and liberation is leaving behind all aspiration and goals. As Linji said, "If you engage in any seeking, it will all be pain. Much better to do nothing." (Sasaki, p19)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 12:54 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

you seem to make it sound like renunciation and the path has something to do with the external. again, this is a hinayana/theravada monk approach.

Astus wrote:

If there is no motivation to build a career, a family, achieve fame and wealth, then it is only logical to say one does not pursue those things. From thoughts actions come. Renunciation is a mental attitude, but it necessarily appears in one's daily life. So, if one sees no point in hoarding plastic Pokémon figures, one does not collect them. Also, only in Japanese Buddhism exists such a thing as a bodhisattva monastic ordination, not anywhere else.

KonchokZoepa said:

it should be noted that Buddha opened 84,000 different Dharma Doors and no doubt this worldly life renunciation is one door.

Astus wrote:

All teachings are aimed at liberation from samsara. This is true for all Buddhist traditions. And that liberation is the complete renunciation of life and death. So, this is not only about what in Tibetan Buddhism they categorise as "the path of renunciation".

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 1:05 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Well, in the Great Vehicle it seems that the ultimate meaning of life is helping others along the way to our own liberation, or perhaps truly helping others after our own liberation, either way you want to slice it. To me it seems that the message is that life IS meaningful

Astus wrote:

Yes, the sole aim bodhisattvas and buddhas have is to liberate beings. Liberate from life and death, that is, show them that all is impermanent and empty, without any lasting or real value. And we may call that the meaning of the bodhisattva's life, that after they themselves have seen how meaningless everything is, to show others the same. Is teaching meaninglessness meaningful? Not for the bodhisattvas themselves, who see that all beings are nothing but empty fabrications.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 1:13 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Because, even if one merely applies the teachings of the Shravakayana, every life situation can become a vehicle for liberation. Even if it is not the "instantaneous" liberation promised by (some of the) Mahayana and the Vajryana, every situation is still an opportunity to gather merit.

Astus wrote:

So, life is meaningful, because there is always an opportunity to see its meaninglessness and become free from it. Gradually, or instantly.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 5:01 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Right, the problem is....the very concept of looking for "meaning" in things is samsaric, not just the samsaric "things". That's the whole point, meaning can't be found. So happiness, contentment, liberation, whatever, it has to come from something other than this apparent constant need we have for "meaning", which I think is connected entirely to false conception of a self.

Astus wrote:

Yes, the problem is with looking for a meaning, imagining a meaning. Thus, meaninglessness is something one has to arrive at, by removing that grasping for a meaning. Grasping a meaning is the attachment to an imagined essence and function, just as you say, it is the false conception of a self.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 5:15 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

1. what are you going to renounce?
 2. The point is not to 'take refuge' in composite phenomena as a source of the cessation of suffering. That's all.
- So, go and enjoy stuffing your self with pizza, just don't think it means you'll never feel hungry again.

Astus wrote:

Renunciation is renouncing all meaning one attributes to life, death and whatever else comes up.

Is there any sane person who believes that one never becomes hungry again after eating no matter what amount of food? I don't think so. Craving after food again and again, that's quite common. In the context of eating, what is it that one considers it meaningful or meaningless? Eating is meaningful when there are rules to follow, importance to believe in, purity to maintain, etc. Eating is meaningless when such views about food are seen as false. As you say, when it is not a refuge, not a religion.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Indrajala said:

One is aware all things lack inherent existence and hence can be tentatively qualified as meaningless, but simultaneous one sees the conventional nature of meaning and can freely operate within it without being emotionally or mentally compromised, or such is the ideal.

Astus wrote:

Yes, that's the bodhisattva ideal. And the only reason the bodhisattva "stays in samsara" is because of great compassion. That motivation is about showing the same meaninglessness of life, bringing about the renunciation of samsara, that the bodhisattva already possesses. There is no enjoyment of samsara, no suffering from samsara, there is only the compassion to save beings. Therefore, all engagement in samsaric things by a bodhisattva is illusory, as the Vimalakirti Sutra explains. So we can see that a bodhisattva's attitude toward samsara is different from an arhat only because of compassion, but the total renunciation is there at the same time, and no meaning is given to anything at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 5:28 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

flavio81 said:

What it is seeking is the ultimate liberation from all mental conditioning; from "wrong views" in the ultimate sense of the word.

Astus wrote:

All views are wrong views. Samsara, life and death, is being attached to a view. That is, grasping a meaning. No meaning, no view, no life, no death, and that is liberation. That's why I said it is liberation from life, the removal of all meaning.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 5:29 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Matt J said:

And if there is no meaning to be found in that, then it should be no surprise to be unable to find meaning in enjoying a cup of coffee, playing with one's kids, or suffering a toothache.

Astus wrote:

What meaning do you find in that?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 5:31 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

by 'meaning' aren't you referring, basically, to the notion of a pre-destined purpose?

Astus wrote:

Meaning is both essence and function. That is, both as something existent, essential, substantial, true, real. And something that has a purpose, a role in life, a goal to achieve, a future. A "pre-destined purpose" is one of the possible meanings of meaning.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 6:10 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

jeeprs said:

I don't agree with it. Bodhicitta is compassion, it is literally love or loving-kindness, it is not simply non-existence or vacuity.

So where does it come from? What is the source of compassion, if life is completely meaningless? What gives rise to 'compassion'? And isn't compassion meaningful? I find it tremendously meaningful, myself. Is that a mistake?

Astus wrote:

Compassion is seeing how those who believe in a meaning suffer because of that. It is exactly because the meaninglessness of existence is realised that one knows the root of suffering is the search for and grasping of meaning. If compassion becomes meaningful, if it is something of great importance and relevance, that is nothing but attachment to a self, to a view. Thus a bodhisattva sees no beings to save and that's how they are saved.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 6:34 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Been chewing on it and I think that maybe it is fair to say that Buddhism expects you to ultimately give up on "meaning", at least meaning in the sense that the term is used in other traditions.

Astus wrote:

Yes, such words as "meaningful" and "life" I use to fully put it in English and leave behind Buddhist terminology as "emptiness" and such that do not really have deep associations in one's mind and strike no emotional cords. If you look into Indian or Chinese Buddhist texts, you don't really find the topic of the "meaning of life" as it is a Western idea. One thing that triggered this topic was an essay written by a Calvinist minister in 1912 where he compared Buddhism with Christianity, and found that the teaching of the Buddha is in general against life. And he was quite correct, if you look at it from his perspective. And the Buddhist solution of nirvana is what else but removing oneself not only from this life but all sorts of life, the entire world of existence, and there is no promise of eternal heaven or eternal soul or anything like that, although some like imagining that to exist in the Dharma.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 6:40 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

It's important not to confuse arhatship with lacking compassion.

Astus wrote:

I see, it was ambiguous. I meant the "philosophy of compassion" that exists in Mahayana, that is used as an explanation for the bodhisattva activity. It should also be noted that (arya) bodhisattvas are free from samsara, and they could choose to leave everything behind, but there are many versions of what a bodhisattva is depending on what era of Mahayana we look at, what tradition, sutra, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 7:08 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

jeeprs said:

many people put an end to their life because they feel it is meaningless. It is a real and serious problem, one remedy to which is the practice of Dharma, which is, among other things, about learning to live in a meaningful way. I will never agree with nihilist interpretations of Buddhism.

Astus wrote:

"There is but one truly serious philosophical problem, and that is suicide." (Camus: The Myth of Sisyphus)

Buddhism, somewhat similarly to existentialism, is about facing the reality of life. Unlike existentialism, there are past and future lives that one should be free from, and it's an entire cosmology that poses the problem of unsatisfactory life. Meaning in Buddhism exists on the relative level of karma, where one can work for a better life through meritorious deeds, however, in the end it's all samsara. And because it is samsara, living in a meaningful way is impossible, spare striving for liberation from it. So, in Buddhism, suicide is simply pointless, because life goes on even after death.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 7:16 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

A beggar is not necessarily content with the bare necessities of life.

Astus wrote:

Beggar, that's what bhikshu means. I didn't refer to the modern situation of homeless people and such. It is the voluntary leaving of home and choosing the life of a beggar, a monk.

shel said:

In my opinion, the "ideal life" proposed by any viable religion would be one of responsibility and cooperation.

Astus wrote:

That's practically the same as the Confucian (and others, like Communists) critique of Buddhist monasticism. However, it is unlikely that suddenly a large number of people would go for higher ordination.

shel said:

It's unclear what you mean by "more than" nihilism.

Astus wrote:

I mean that is is more because it not only denies any meaning of this life but in fact the entire existence of everything. All are made by karma, and karma is what one needs to become free from.

shel said:

In that scenario what most people in the world do is get religion, they find meaning in religion, a religion like Buddhism for example, and suddenly rock rolling becomes a Dharma Gate.

Astus wrote:

A Dharma Gate is a method to leave behind all meaning, all attachment. And eventually leave behind that Dharma Gate too. Finally, leave behind leaving behind itself (not attached to nirvana).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 7:25 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

smcj said:

But since death is not the finality that secularists believe it to be, the continuity that experiences the significance (meaning) of prior actions is not. (imo)

Astus wrote:

That "continuity" is either a form of self-view - if taken to be one's personal identity - or it is samsara. And that is something to be free from.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 10:31 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

What would "meaning" look like? How would it manifest?

What would make "meaning" meaningful?

Astus wrote:

Meaning can be attributed to practically anything. Examples: raising a family, reaching a higher pay grade, climbing Mt Everest, buying new pants, learning a new skill, completing a retreat.

Something is meaningful because one believes it to be important, fulfilling, satisfying, true, real. In other words: self, independent, ultimate, eternal. Any object of attachment is being attached to because it is considered meaningful.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

kirk5a said:

If someone thinks life is meaningless, what's to stop them from causing trouble for others? Does such a person think it doesn't matter what they do or don't do? That would be a catastrophic mistake. Why would "meaningless" spur someone on to achieve liberation? Why not instead just wallow in despair? People with the "meaningless" view have been doing that forever, it's not exactly insightful.

Astus wrote:

You could raise the same questions regarding such terms as selflessness and emptiness. The difference here is that "meaningless" is a native English term/concept, while "emptiness" is kind of artificial and foreign.

The will to cause trouble to others presupposes a meaning to do that. Either personal gain or hatred. It can presuppose a sense of justice that needs to be served by punishing others. And so on. That's all meaningful.

Liberation is not attaching meaning to anything. Meaninglessness is not another meaning, that would be very stupid indeed, and that's when people feel despair and depressed.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 12:50 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

kirk5a said:

Someone who causes trouble for others might do it just for the sport of doing it, or out of sheer selfish arbitrariness, or whatever cookoo impulse happens to spring up in the moment. There doesn't have to be any meaning. I don't see how removing all meaning keeps one within right action, right speech, right livelihood. There is the 8-fold path, if we're trying to accurately represent what Buddhism actually teaches.

Astus wrote:

If it's all just impulses, there is no understanding of meaninglessness. That is only acting out of ignorance and habit. Meaninglessness is to see the impermanence and emptiness of all, to use Buddhist terms. Removing all meanings means removing craving and hatred, means liberation. So, you actually ask, what stops a buddha from committing all sorts of bad things.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 1:47 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Astus wrote:

From three posts, with practically the same points, and then how I translate that.

smcj said:

"No-self" means the continuity is fundamentally free, not that there is no continuity.

Indrajala said:

There's a kind of different perspective on that. In the absence of self, there is no bodhisattva, but that doesn't mean there is nothing at all, or some abyss to dissolve into.

There is still tattva, or reality as is. There's neither existence nor non-existence. At such a transcended level, the bodhisattva ideal is naturally manifest as all the cosmos is encompassed in a womb-like embrace. It isn't a matter of staying on in saṃsāra, but just that the transcended state is naturally active participation in reality. Saṃsāra is participation in reality with wrong view. Nirvāṇa is participation in reality with realization, not an escape hatch.

Anders said:

Bodhicitta may look like meaning in life, but actually, I think genuine Bodhicitta and meaning in life are sorta contrary to each other. To find meaning is to have concepts - true Bodhicitta is void of this - it's a signless impulse that grows from the realm where things are simply SUCH, wherein there is nothing that comes from here or goes to there that can be designated as having any purpose or meaning. To really manifest bodhicitta is to leave behind the ideation that gives rises to meaning in life and the one whom might appropriate such meaning as being relevant to him/her.

On a more relative level, where bodhicitta also involves concept, it works fine as a 'meaning of life' project though. And certainly, one must be wary of appropriating the idea that there is no meaning to life at all. The point is not to see no meaning to life. But rather to see how we construct it and then let it go. What happens beyond that is wordless.

Astus wrote:

To put them into the context of a meaningless life, being meaningless is not a negation of life but the affirmation of life as it is, without meaning. Hating life would be giving it a meaning, that it is something bad and detestable, like in some religions. Meaning removed is attachment removed. Without attachment there is no reason to be engaged in life, to pursue goals and hope for good things to happen. And that kind of meaningless life is what the Buddhist path is meant to achieve.

As for the great compassion towards all beings, it is about seeing how those who attach meaning to life suffer, and bringing them to the realisation of the futility of all their efforts to make life meaningful. Saving beings is making their lives meaningless, just as it is for the bodhisattvas who don't consider even saving beings and liberation meaningful.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 1:54 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Personally to me this is a much more claustrophobic, stifling idea than emptiness, which implies no beginning, middle, or end. Combine that with the non-abiding Nirvana concept and it's absolutely beautiful in comparison, IMO of course.

I don't really see how Buddhism is any more "anti-life" than other philosophies, even in it's Thervedan form, which I think is the easiest to accuse of that, theistic systems appear to posit meaning simply because they avoid explaining it, the exact same existential conundrums exist, Buddhism just actually looks at them.

Astus wrote:

In other religions, while they are rather anti-life regarding our earthly existence, they provide some hope for something far away. Buddhism eventually - not necessarily from the start - removes all hopes (and fears). First one learns that there are heavens, then instead of heavens one should aim for nirvana, then one should forsake even nirvana.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 5:00 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Nighthawk said:

Do you have a link for that essay? I'd be interested in reading it.

Astus wrote:

I do, but it's in Hungarian. However, no doubt you find similar sentiments in the writings of other Christians who consider Buddhism an atheist nihilist philosophy (not even a religion). I recommend late 19th and early 20th century texts.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 5:13 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

I am very curious as to why you neglect to mention Buddhism, the FNTs or the Eightfold Path in your examples of what meaning can be attributed to. If you believe that Buddhist practice is meaningless, that seems to mean that you don't believe it's true or has any purpose. It seems to mean that you don't believe practicing the Eightfold Path leads to the cessation of suffering, and like Sisyphus, we are all doomed to endless cycles of birth and death. But that can't be what you believe. Can you somehow explain how all this could possibly make any sense?

Astus wrote:

Sure, one can attribute meaning to Buddhism, and Buddhists do just that. However, unlike other things, the goal of Buddhism is to remove all meaning. If you look at the first post in this thread, it says just that.

How this makes sense? The belief in meaning is the cause of birth and death. Seeing the meaninglessness of life - past, future and present - is liberation from it, and that is the very goal of Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 6:35 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

What I want to know from you is how you would picture a perfectly meaningful existence.

Would you be a buddha statue floating on a lotus in outer space?

Give me some idea of the alternative.

...

So, is meaningful subjective or objective?

Astus wrote:

A perfectly meaningful existence is a perfectly ignorant existence. It is subjective, of course, because different people consider different things meaningful, although there are some cultural trends (school, career, family, consumption to no end, etc.). A floating buddha statue might be meaningful for some devote enough for that. One can make up an ideology for any activity, any attachment.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 6:36 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Nighthawk said:

Just curious though, are you having second thoughts about Buddhism or just engaging in intellectual exercise?

Astus wrote:

This is meant as an investigation into a possible angle on Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 6:40 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

You're not saying that Buddhism is meaningless, you're saying that it's the only thing that has real meaning. This is the normal attitude for any religious practitioner.

Astus wrote:

Buddhism is meaningless as well (raft parable, non-abiding even in nirvana). That is, meaninglessness is also meaningless.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 7:25 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

OBVIOUSLY, you do not find Buddhism meaningless, so how can you say that it is meaningless? To be frank, it sounds dishonest of you to say that it's meaningless.

Astus wrote:

If Buddhism were meaningful one would need only to become a Buddhist but never reach liberation. With liberation even Buddhism is left behind.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 7:39 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

I actually have a lot of sympathy for what you are saying in this thread, Astus. In English, I feel that the word "meaningless" is not really appropriate though, it's connotations are too "negative". There is a Buddhist word that seems related to what you are talking about, 'apranihita'. Does that have anything to do with what's on your mind?

Astus wrote:

I think its negative sound is not a bad thing. I consider it a shock value.

Apranihita is a good word, but "meaningless" has a bigger range. Apranihita is not seeing a nimitta to aspire for. Meaninglessness is that, but it also heavily points to the conceptual fabrication that one has in the background of every "sign" one "wishes" to reach. And as this thread shows as well, while most of us don't think much about the importance of signs and wishes, to find some meaning is important. Thus, calling life meaningless - although the title of this topic is actually "make life meaningless" and not "life is meaningless" - gives the opportunity to reflect on one's preconceptions and attachments.

By the way, Thich Nhat Hanh has a very positive

<https://curiouscrook.tumblr.com/post/46469553964/no-program-no-agenda-thich-nhat-hanh-on-aimlessness>.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 5:54 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

greentara said:

Astus, "The Third Door of Liberation is aimlessness, apranihita. There is nothing to do, nothing to realize, no program, no agenda." I like it, how sweet it is!

This Zen teaching also reminds me of neo advaita. Of course the mind is promiscuous and loves to wander. If no effort is made to bring it back to the here and now then it will chatter on endlessly. I'd say apranihita is only good for the very ripe.

Astus wrote:

Apranihita is actually an attainment, a synonym for nirvana, and not a practice, although in a sense it can be used as a method. It is achieved by contemplating suffering. The other two marks of existence correspond to the other doors: anitya-animitta, anatman-sunyata.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 6:01 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Fair enough. I guess what I'm thinking is that if most English speakers were to try to "make life meaningless", they would probably be generating what Buddhists would consider kleshas, like some of the things found in this list:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Mental_factors_%28Buddhism%29#Twenty_secondary_unwholesome_factors

Astus wrote:

I agree. It shows well, as Indrajala mentioned before, that the teaching of emptiness can be a dangerous one. And there is the old teaching on grasping the snake/Dharma correctly. Similar dangers are not considered where people emphasise positive sounding teachings like buddha-nature.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 7:45 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

tobes said:

Surely what is meaningless, from the Buddhist point of view, is a certain kind of life. Not life per se.

Astus wrote:

Life is samsara. One can spend innumerable lifetimes as a very good person, generate immense good karma, and that's still within samsara. From a Buddhist perspective, only the path of liberation makes sense. That path is about becoming free from samsara, from life and death. And that is done by seeing that life is meaningless, it is not worth being attached to. And the path of liberation - that exists only within samsara - is left behind as well, once liberation is reached.

tobes said:

i.e. the process of being on some kind of path is surely highly meaningful, and the outcome of arriving at bodhi is also surely meaningful.

Astus wrote:

Meaningful, as it is a process of realising the total meaninglessness of life. And once liberation is reached, all meaning has been abandoned. Even the meaning of liberation. So, it is a gradual path to complete meaninglessness, absolute non-attachment.

tobes said:

What seems to be missing from your analysis is that something follows from relinquishing the desire to hold on. To remain (philosophically) only at the point of relinquishing is to fail to see that relinquishing is simply the method. What is that something? Well, for one it is characterised by pretty glowing adjectives in the Nikayas, isn't it?

Astus wrote:

Nirvana, that glorious goal, is freedom from life and death. It is the negation of all meaning, and so the end of pain and suffering. Because there is no life and no pain, it can be called deathless and peaceful, even eternal bliss. It is not annihilation, but it is devoid of all meaning. To create a meaning out of meaninglessness, that is called the wrong way to grasp a snake.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 7:48 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

greentara said:

Astus, "Aimlessness, Apranihita is actually an attainment, a synonym for nirvana, and not a practice, although in a sense it can be used as a method."

Can't it be used as an enquiry such as who needs this, or who wants this? Or who is it that really has no agenda?

Astus wrote:

I don't think there are such rules for or against it. But it's not the intended meaning and context. The general rule is that one should use whatever helps in removing attachments and gives peace and freedom. So, if it works for you, go for it.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: Was Nāgārjuna a misogynist?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Nobody is disputing that, but if Mahasiddhas are misogynists too, it doesn't say much for enlightenment does it? Either that, or we will have to agree that women are actually an inferior category of human beings. Or we will have to say that Mahasiddhas are not enlightened.

Astus wrote:

There are other options.

1. Reinterpret the meaning of "woman". In the Nirvana Sutra there is a nice section where it says similarly nasty things about women, and then explains that all beings/humans are women who have not realised buddha-nature, and those who realised it are men, regardless of their biological sex.

2. What is considered appropriate changes by time and culture. Buddhist rules are mostly about monastic life, where there are no wives and concubines to rule over. Still, at least in Chinese monastic rules, beating is a possible punishment for misbehaving monks. So, advising the beating of women can be a compassionate thought.

3. As for women having more desire than men, nowadays it is believed that's the other way around. Both are worldly conventions. Why should enlightened beings be accountable for the beliefs of ordinary people?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: Was Nāgārjuna a misogynist?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

They may not be accountable for them but they are also not obligated to perpetuate them. We, as ignorant worldly beings, are not obligated to perpetuate them, so why would enlightened beings?

Astus wrote:

We copy the cultural ideas without even recognising them. In fact, "culture" is a modern Western cultural idea. And we want Buddhism to fit our perspective on reality, and that's only normal and expected. No different from the process of Buddhism integrating into the Chinese cultural sphere, and similar historical events. If once in the future an English Buddhist canon emerges it may not contain a single misogynist idea or reference. That's what canonisation is about after all. But to the Indians of that era even the concept of misogyny may not have occurred. It is another Western invention.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

smcj said:

If life were intrinsically meaningless there would be no such thing as karmic consequences. The very idea that the nature and quality of an action comes to fruition as circumstance and experience means the universe is, over time, "demonstrating" the truth of the action. If the Dharma is to be believed, we live in a world where the quality of actions are being illuminated by Truth.

Astus wrote:

Karma is generated by ignorance. Ignorance is believing that there is a meaning to hang on to. Karma is how all beings keep repeating the same things over and over again, following blind passions.

I don't know what you mean by "truth of the action" or "illuminated by Truth".

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 5:07 AM

Title: Re: Was Nāgārjuna a misogynist?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Nagarjuna was a Mahasiddha. He could not see past the cultural norms of his time? He could not recognise hatred (the miso- in misogyny is the Greek word for hate) when he saw it? As an Arhat wouldn't he apparently have overcome the fetter of ill-will? We (currently) label it misogyny, but even without the label one would think that an enlightened being would see the ill-will involved in the specific behaviour. One would hope.

Astus wrote:

I think there is too much attributed to concepts like enlightenment, arhat, bodhisattva, mahasiddha, etc. Sure, the root poisons of greed, hatred and ignorance are removed. But that doesn't include exaggerated qualities and superpowers, nor special knowledge not related to the path (see declared and undeclared teachings, <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.063.than.html>)

Beating women could be refuted as erroneous based on the Buddha's own teachings:

"Here someone, abandoning the killing of living beings, becomes one who abstains from killing living beings; with rod and weapon laid aside, gentle and kindly, he abides compassionate to all living beings."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.041.nymo.html>)

However, the above statement does not necessarily rule out beating as a form of education. Such an act could be argued to be done out of concern and kindness, not with the intention to kill or maim. Just like beating children was considered perfectly all right and proper parenting a couple of decades ago. So, calling it misogyny might be the wrong word, as there was no hate involved. Male chauvinism or something similar sounds more fitting, as women were considered inferior in almost all aspects. And that's why birth as a man is generally the desirable thing in Buddhism. But this is not because people hated women. They were simply viewed as very different from men, and that difference meant a lower status in every way.

Modern people may see many apparently degrading statements about women in Buddhism as misogyny. What is not taken into consideration is karma. Even today if we look at women's social status it is worse than men's. This means that women have worse karma than men. So, being a woman is worse than being a man. And although it could be argued that it's all because of social norms, education, wrong thinking, etc., however, that is a post-Enlightenment rationalist thinking. Modern people often believe that social status is a matter of other's doings, something that could be changed. Traditionally, Buddhism is unaware of such a concept, and teaches that everyone gets what they deserve because of their karma. Compassion, helping others, giving donations are all important, just as being kind and caring. But those are things done on a personal level, out of one's own level of Dharma practice, and not in order to bring about "heaven/Pure Land on Earth" but to generate merit and because those are the right things to do. Taking the teachings to the social and political level was a rare thing in the past, and didn't always mean something noble.

So, was Nagarjuna a misogynist? I don't think so.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 6:22 AM

Title: Re: Was Nāgārjuna a misogynist?

Content:

justsit said:

Really??

Guess it depends on who you ask...

Astus wrote:

I can only rely on those who work in that area. For instance:

<http://www.un.org/womenwatch/>

<http://www.womenlobby.org/?lang=en>

http://unstats.un.org/unsd/demographic/products/Worldswomen/WW_full%20report_color.pdf (PDF)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 7:36 AM

Title: Re: Was Nāgārjuna a misogynist?

Content:

rory said:

Buddhism originated in Magadha which was Jain the Jains had and have a very good opinion of women and there were and are women renunciants. Later Brahmanism took over and yes, only Brahmin males can perform those rituals necessary to the king. Buddhists started to compete and there we get that unnecessary patriarchy & misogyny. That's what ruined Hokkeji as the nuns there had no access to the state esoteric rituals, which were taught on Mt. Hiei and Mt. Koya (today women can train there:)

Astus wrote:

In the Nikayas there are some respected woman teachers, although there were a lot more men. Women are said to be incapable of being born as various higher gods or a buddha (MN 115). Wives serve their husbands (DN 31, AN 5.33, Thig 1.11, Sn 1.2).

Although ultimately there is no difference between genders (SN 5.2). All three ideas (birth restriction, servitude, genderlessness) were carried on in Mahayana, and as with practically everything else, they were extended and elaborated on. What new concept came up most prominently is women's impurity. However, impurity (because of giving birth and menstruation) resulted in strong restrictions only in Japan, so it'd be difficult to blame Brahmanism for that.

rory said:

And if Nagarjuna himself wrote that he definitely was not a mahasiddha.

Astus wrote:

A mahasiddha is someone who has realised that passion is actually wisdom. Does being a mahasiddha come with perfect body and mind? I don't think so. The realisation of emptiness does not require any scientific, scholarly or artistic knowledge. That is, being a mahasiddha doesn't mean one cannot speak utter nonsense. Enlightened beings are not infallible or omniscient. Or, if one wants to believe that enlightened ones are actually like superhumans, then no living person can ever match the criteria.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 7:41 AM

Title: Re: Was Nāgārjuna a misogynist?

Content:

justsit said:

To Astus: There is no doubt it is more difficult to live as a woman, but I'm not sure I'd describe it as "worse" to be a woman. At least in First World countries. I took your previous post to mean "worse" as in lesser or inferior. Hence my reply.

Astus wrote:

I meant only harder conditions (even in highly developed countries), and that harder conditions imply bad karma. In that sense, women have worse karma than men. And some Buddhist works point to the biological differences (primarily motherhood) as another implication of the more difficulties of a woman's life.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 6:55 PM

Title: Re: Was Nāgārjuna a misogynist?

Content:

reddust said:

I don't think men have it that good compared to women. Your reproductive parts are carried outside of your body and you seem to be distracted because of that.

Astus wrote:

Never thought of it that way.

reddust said:

I think it's difficult to be a human and gender is just a distraction.

Astus wrote:

It's great we can always find some reasons to feel superior. As I see it, gender is as good an excuse as any other.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 7:04 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

tobes said:

I suppose the disagreement is that where you say only the path of liberation makes sense (and therefore, all others are meaningless), I say many paths make sense, but the path of liberation is the highest, or most privileged, or most meaningful.

If life was truly meaningless, even from the standpoint of those who have relinquished it, then why do they not choose to take it? i.e. Why do enlightened ones not kill?

Astus wrote:

My argument here is not whether this or that is meaningful, but that the Buddhist path is about gradually making life and everything meaningless, including the path itself at the end. To reverse that, yes, at the beginning good deeds are meaningful, then liberation is meaningful, then there's nothing left to be meaningful.

Killing, like other actions, require a meaning, require an intention that is based on a concept. With meaning removed there is no concept, no intention, no action.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 7:15 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

tobes said:

Surely there is a difference between attachment and meaning?

Granted, one can be highly attached to meaning. But isn't there a case for saying that meaning simply happens? Is there no meaning in the dharma taught by those who are liberated? That seems to be an absurd proposition.

Astus wrote:

Meaning is grasping, it is the concept that something has an essence and a purpose. We could separate meaning as a verbal concept and there are non-verbal concepts, so it might be the case that there are two forms of attachments to phenomena. But this is not necessary.

The Dharma is a skilful means. It is not the ultimate, it is not liberation per se. So, first one believes Dharma has meaning, but eventually it is left behind as another meaningless thing.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 7:16 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

tobes said:

Nirvana is indeed beyond life and death, but where is it said that nirvana is the negation of all meaning? What Pali/Sanskrit/Tibetan/Chinese term are you pointing us to?

Astus wrote:

No P/S/T/C term. Meaninglessness can be related to emptiness mostly.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 7:29 PM

Title: Re: Saving all beings???

Content:

seeker242 said:

But of course that does not mean that you don't help the child. You would still help the child, but all the while still knowing that they are, and always were, perfectly ok to begin with.

Astus wrote:

You have already answered your question.

"All Buddhas pronounce the Dharma to teach and transform sentient beings, each delivering as many sentient beings as the innumerable sands of the Ganges, enabling them to enter nirvāṇa. Yet the realm of sentient beings neither increases nor decreases. Why not? Because the definite appearances of sentient beings can never be captured. Hence, the realm of sentient beings neither increases nor decreases."
(Sūtra of Mahā-Prajñā-Pāramitā Pronounced by Mañjuśrī Bodhisattva)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 1st, 2014 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

If what you're saying is true, it would mean that people with no inclination towards any sort of spiritual practice are actually more advanced spiritually, and that those who practice like their "hair is on fire" are desperately deluded. That makes no sense at all.

Astus wrote:

See what I what just before that: "The Dharma is a skilful means. It is not the ultimate, it is not liberation per se. So, first one believes Dharma has meaning, but eventually it is left behind as another meaningless thing."

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 1st, 2014 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

Why would anyone practice something that they felt was meaningless? Because it's entertaining and fun?

Astus wrote:

Meaninglessness is realised gradually. It means that one sees the futility of pursuing something, letting it go. Practice is to let go, release attachments.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 1st, 2014 at 4:57 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

Right, so especially because it happens gradually as you say, by your logic the more meaningless the Dharma is to someone the more realized they must be, and the more meaningful it is to someone the less realized they must be. People who devote their lives to practice, like Buddhist teachers, must be the furthest way from realization and the most deluded.

Astus wrote:

Do those teachers think of the Dharma as substantial, real, something to be attached to?

Since the arrogant say that they have apprehended something, they cannot be said to be firmly established in genuine pure conduct.

(Gangottara Sutra, in Treasury of Mahayana Sutras, p 39)

(After the Buddha had described the arrogance of sravakas and bodhisattvas, i.e., their attachment to various attainments and teachings) Upali asked the Buddha, "World-Honored One, how can a monk be free from arrogance?"

The Buddha answered Upali, "If he is not attached to any doctrine, no matter how inconceivable it is, he is completely free from arrogance."

...

One who thinks about the teaching of emptiness

Is a fool, lingering on the wrong path;

Explanations of emptiness are mere words;

Both words and emptiness are inapprehensible.

One who contemplates the teaching of quiescence
Should know the mind is empty and unborn.
The mind's reflections and observations
Are all futile and meaningless.

...

When I speak of the practice that leads to realization,
I mean detachment from all forms.
If one claims to have achieved anything,
He is far from realizing the Sramana's fruit.
No dharma has a self-entity;
What is there to realize?
The so-called realization is no attainment at all:
To understand this is called attainment

(The Definitive Vinaya, in Treasury of Mahayana Sutras, p 272, 273, 277)

'One does not attain Buddhahood through the body, nor does one attain it through wisdom.' Why? If one looks for wisdom one cannot find it. Even if one looks for the T, it cannot ever be found. Nothing is attained, nothing is seen. All dharmas are originally nonexistent. To think that they exist causes attachment. If they do not exist, to say perversely that they do is also attachment.
(Pratyutpanna Samadhi Sutra, BDK edition, p 36)

Resolute Mind asked, "Have you, sir, attained the Surangama Samadhi?" The Indra king replied, "Could the characteristics of 'attain' and 'not attain' exist within this samadhi?" Resolute Mind said, "No." The Indra king said, "Good youth, you should understand that when a Bodhisattva practices this samadhi, there is nothing that is attained in any of the dharmas."
(Surangama Samadhi Sutra, BDK edition, p 32)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 1st, 2014 at 8:13 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

that is why most of Buddhism, like most of Christianity and all other religions, is for people who hate themselves and are bitter and resentful towards life. Fortunately, in Dzogchen (and I'm pretty sure in Zen too) there is a breakthrough to an understanding of the nature of reality that is the exact opposite of <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ressentiment>: that is, that your nature is the same as the nature of all reality, and it is fundamentally pure (empty) and inexhaustibly creative and responsive. You don't need to do anything for this to be the case, it already is.

Astus wrote:

There's no need to go as far as Dzogchen or Zen for the idea that "your nature is the same as the nature of all reality", as that is a basic principle of the bodhisattva path. In practice, however, neither Tibetan nor East Asian Buddhism differ from their Indian predecessors in being a monastic tradition that teaches leaving home and various forms of hermetic life as the right course of action. It is one of the earliest Mahayana polemics to call Hinayana stuck in nirvana (for many: a false nirvana) and rejecting samsara.

"Jamgon Kongtrül said that, in order to begin our practice of getting used to the view, laying the foundation is most important. The foundation is renunciation mind. Renunciation means revulsion for this endless, meaningless, worldly life that is constantly creating suffering, whether directly or indirectly. Some amount of renunciation mind is very necessary as a foundation. This is a very important remark by Jamgon Kongtrül because we really cannot take refuge until we have renunciation mind. As long as we do not have renunciation mind, we always think that there is an alternative, a different way to solve the problem."
(Dzogchen Primer, p 104)

"when we realize that all the achievements of the six realms of samsara are futile, insubstantial, and meaningless, we lose our appetite for them."
(Tulku Urgyen: Repeating the Words of the Buddha, p 41)

"Perceiving that any attempt to renounce or accept anything is meaningless, you let go in a state of resting imperturbably."
(Longchenpa: Treasure Trove of Scriptural Transmission, p 396)

Here are the comments that partially answer each other and clarify this subject. Then I continue with summing them up and answering the missing points.

tobes said:

What about compassionately helping sentient beings? Not an action? Not a meaning? Not an intention?

...

emptiness implies the relinquishing of ordinary meanings derived from the conventional symbolic order. Plus desires, intentions, purposes which are predicated on that. But does it imply the relinquishing of any other forms of meaning?

PadmaVonSamba said:

You are really attached to this idea of meaningless, aren't you?

shel said:

And incidentally, something need not be substantial, real, or even particularly attached to, to be meaningful. Fiction, that we fully realize as being fiction, can be far more meaningful than mere facts.

tobes said:

Ah, I see that you mainly have in mind linguistic or discursive forms of meaning...which are necessarily conceptual.

...

Because it is coherent, it has meaning. Otherwise enlightened mind is just a random expression of chaos.

Indrajala said:

Again, in the Mahāyāna it is not about embracing meaninglessness. It is a double perspective: one understands both the conventional and ultimate without being attached to either one. This is because one sees how existence of meaning exists by virtue of a relative opposite: meaninglessness. In the absence of meaning, there is no substantial non-meaning to cling to either. One stands nowhere like empty space. This transcended perspective is where the path of language is cut away, and actually leads to a very active bodhisattva path rather than nihilism if properly achieved.

Affirmation of a negative is as problematic as affirmation of a positive. Both are views, and all views are to be abandoned. Emptiness as a view is consequently poison. Even emptiness dissolves under analysis.

Astus wrote:

In the OP I wrote:

Before engaging in the path to enlightenment one naturally believes that life is full of meaning. That there are things (wealth, sex, power, knowledge, etc.) that are worth the trouble. And that is clinging, that is attachment, the great evil. Seeing that all phenomena are empty clears away that attachment. In other words, meaninglessness needs to be realised.

And that makes Buddhism more than nihilism (in the Western philosophical sense), it is the ultimate refutation of what non-Buddhist everyday people call life.

But then, if we move on whether Buddhism itself is meaningful, or if meaninglessness is meaningful, then the answer to both are no, because they are need to be left behind in the end. That one tries to call something meaningful, that is the desire to hang on to something. To hold on to emptiness or nirvana, that's among the wrong views in Buddhism. What is left then to call meaningful? Compassion and saving all beings? The bodhisattva activities are possible only because they don't abide anywhere, they don't hold on to anything, not even liberation, much less the concept of "sentient beings" that need to be saved. Plus, what does saving beings mean? Saving them from their own lives, from what they believe in as important and meaningful, and make them realise it is all samsara.

"That all perception, all discrimination, all logic are meaningless from the supra-mundane point of view is the very nature of Buddhahood and of emptiness. Accordingly, even the Buddha's forty-five years of propagating the Doctrine is here wholly negated by the assertion that the Buddha preached not a word."

(Nagao: Madhyamika and Yogacara, p 42)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 1st, 2014 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Was Nāgārjuna a misogynist?

Content:

plwk said:

Nagarjuna is bad huh? Wait until you read these ones attributed to the Conqueror Himself...

<http://sujato.wordpress.com/2010/12/05/is-this-sutta-true/>

Astus wrote:

Today aggressiveness and promiscuity are (almost unquestioningly) attributed to men. Is that misandry? We don't call it that because various studies prove it. But if we consider gender differences not genetic but cultural (and mostly fictional generalisations and ignorant prejudices), then in the context of that sutta those attributes of women could have been true.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 2nd, 2014 at 5:34 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

tobes said:

As others have pointed out, if you assert meaningless as a the content of enlightened experience, it is just an assertion - not the experience.

Astus wrote:

Meaninglessness is not a content of enlightened experience, it is the path, the method used to relinquish attachment that is based on the idea that something has a meaning. So, meaninglessness is only as much an experience as non-attachment is.

Meaninglessness is the antidote for meaning, and when the sickness is gone, there is no need for the medicine. But this thread seems to show that meaninglessness is a medicine with too many side effects and causes confusion, although not too different from teachings like suffering that makes many reject Buddhism as a total pessimistic view, and then everyone tries to excuse the first noble truth that it's not what they think it is, although in fact it is indeed what they think, a clear statement that life is inevitably full of pain and sorrow.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 2nd, 2014 at 7:17 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

From the Dzogchen perspective, this is why so-called "lower yanas" are called "causal yanas": they all claim that you need to do something to "cause" or "achieve" liberation.

They say "we have been trapped in samsara since beginningless time, do this that and the other and after incalculable eons (mahayana) or in this life (vajrayana) you will finally, after lots of hard work, achieve liberation". Dzogchen asks "what makes you think you are in bondage? who has put you in bondage and where are your chains? Is waking from one dream into another dream an achievement?"

Astus wrote:

Aren't the five aggregates without any self from the beginning? Still, attachment doesn't go away just by hearing that.

"I do not say that the attainment of gnosis is all at once. Rather, the attainment of gnosis is after gradual training, gradual action, gradual practice." (MN 70; cf. Ud 5.5)

Zen has a different idea of course, as it propagates sudden enlightenment.

[At the place of] Great Teacher Third Ancestor [Jinazhi Sengcan], once the novice [Dayi] Daoxin at age fourteen made prostrations to the ancestor and said, "I entreat the master with your compassion to give me the Dharma gate of release and liberation."

The ancestor said, "Who has bound you?"

The novice daoxin said, "Nobody bound me."

The ancestor said, "Then why are you seeking for liberation?" Daoxing hearing these words had great realization, and worked as a follower there for nine years.

(orig. in Jingde Chuandeng Lu, vol 3, T51n2076_p0221c18-c21; tr. Leighton & Okumura, in Dogen's Extensive Record, p 540)

A fourteen-year-old boy sounds young for enlightenment, but it's not that exceptional. The Lotus Sutra talks about the eight-year-old daughter of the dragon king who turned into a buddha. The Dhammapada commentary has on record seven-year-old arhats (<http://www.tipitaka.net/tipitaka/dhp/> 96, 110, 406). But I think the winner is the three-year-old Ratnadatta, who instructs and corrects Maudgalyayana, Shariputra and Manjushri in the <http://www2.hf.uio.no/polyglotta/index.php?page=volume&vid=30>, although that's not when he attained enlightenment, so he could be disqualified from this list.

But that is a completely different topic.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 2nd, 2014 at 7:21 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

And because everything is supposedly left behind in the end, that doesn't make the vehicle meaningless.

Astus wrote:

Not is meaningless but has to be made meaningless. When it is made meaningless, it is left behind.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 2nd, 2014 at 7:25 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Buddhism doesn't reject "meaning". Buddhism rejects a self to which the concept of "meaning" has any application.

Astus wrote:

Without the concept of self there is no meaning. Without meaning there is no concept of self. Because the concept is the meaning, and self is a concept. Not conceptualising a self is not giving meaning to a self. Otherwise, self is the most meaningful thing we have.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 3rd, 2014 at 5:51 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

If you assert a self, then both meaning and meaningless apply.

If you assert no-self, then this thread has no point to it.

As long as you go on about "meaning vs. no meaning" you are and essentially asserting a self that denies itself.

Astus wrote:

Same could be said about self and no-self. There is the teaching of no-self to remove the concept of self. Once the self is removed, no need for no-self either. So it is with meaninglessness. As long as there is meaning, one needs to investigate it, and see that such a meaning is false. When all grasping to a meaning has been shattered, then meaninglessness has no value either.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 3rd, 2014 at 6:55 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

If meaninglessness is the antidote for meaning as you say, then the only workable course would seem to be giving up any sort of religious belief or practice, because religious belief and practice perpetuates a system of meaning.

Astus wrote:

Seeing the falseness, the illusoriness of meaning is the practice. And yes, all attachment needs to be given up.

"If even my correct teachings are to be abandoned, how much more incorrect teachings?"

(Diamond Sutra, ch 6)

shel said:

I don't know what life is inevitably full of but there is also pleasure, joy, and satisfaction in life. To deny this would be to deny your own experience, in favor of a belief system.

Astus wrote:

There are three types of suffering (SN 38.14), of what the suffering of conditioned existence is all-pervasive. It is the clinging to the five aggregates, that is present for all deluded sentient beings. All the good and joyful things, those are the "allure of sensuality" (MN 13). They are the bait. And once hooked on it, there is a drawback, i.e. suffering. And from this drawback, this trap of samsara, the Buddha offers an escape. This is seeing clearly (yoniso manasikara) the set of allure, drawback and escape (assada, adinava, nisarana).

"There is no satisfying sensual desires, even with the rain of gold coins. For sensual pleasures give little satisfaction and much pain. Having understood this, the wise man finds no delight even in heavenly pleasures. The disciple of the Supreme Buddha delights in the destruction of craving."

(Dhp 186-187)

Objection: Even though the body is impermanent, it still has pleasure. In response, Aryadeva says:

Harm is certain for what is impermanent.

What is harmed is not pleasurable.

Therefore everything that is impermanent

Is said to be suffering.

(CS II.25)

Harm is certain for an impermanent thing that is damaged by impermanence. What is harmed is also not pleasurable. Therefore, all things that are impermanent are said to be suffering because harm is the definition of suffering. Consider the example of pouring water on salt. All the water poured on salt will become salty. Similarly, because everything that is impermanent is painful, constructed things have only a painful nature. Here we say:

Since all constructed things

In this world are harmed

By being impermanent,

All constructed things are indeed painful

(Candrakirti: Four Illusions, p 152)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 3rd, 2014 at 6:01 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Jesse said:

There will always be pain, it's inevitable so long as we have a body which can feel it. Suffering isn't all pervasive though, once you stop thinking so damned much life can be quite enjoyable, this is exactly why people continue living in spite of so much suffering, and to suggest otherwise is crap. Pain and suffering are two completely different things.

To be honest, the ultimate joy is actually being alive, and we rarely see it because we are so caught up in shit philosophy, thinking, etc.

Astus wrote:

Physical pain is a different kind of suffering than suffering by change and suffering by conditioning.

As I see it, thinking and arguing that one should do things one way or the other is philosophising.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 3rd, 2014 at 6:15 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

When you say falseness or illusoriness you mean impermanence, right? Impermanence doesn't mean that something is false, it means that it changes. Impermanence doesn't mean illusion, it means that it changes.

Meanings change like everything else apparently changes. That doesn't make meanings meaningless. That doesn't make them false. That doesn't make them illusions.

Astus wrote:

Impermanence means illusion. Why? The past is already gone, the future doesn't exist yet, the present cannot be grasped. So, where do impermanence and change exist? In our mind only, in a conceptual realm. And the illusion is believing that it is something external and real. Meanings, like change, are conceptual creations of the mind, not something external and real. External and real means independent from the mind and self-existing.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 3rd, 2014 at 6:44 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

The links you provided in your original post essentially point out that there is no ultimate reason or purpose for our being here. There is nothing that really suggests that we are part of some divine plan or anything like that.

That's really pretty much all they were really saying, as far as I can tell.

Is that your basic point as well?

Astus wrote:

Yes.

PadmaVonSamba said:

What is the point of this thread again?

What is it you are trying to say?

can you sum it up some how?

Astus wrote:

See my previous posts:

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=212499#p212499>

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=212800#p212800>

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=212520#p212520>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 3rd, 2014 at 9:29 PM

Title: Re: putting an end to love

Content:

Sonrisa said:

I understand...sort of. I remember reading pne teaching where he said that we're born out of sexual desire. While I think that extreme sexual desire can be a hindrance, but if it wasn't for our parents engaging in intercourse, we wouldn't be here cultivating. Forgive me if I'm misinterpreting this.

Astus wrote:

There are three conditions for birth: mother, father, karma. Now, our birth is because of our karma, and the mother and father are conditions for the body. So, if we had had no desire/attachment to be born, we would not have been born.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 12:57 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

You believe that meaning is illusory because it exists in our minds and is not something "external and real." By this logic everything is an illusion, including "external and real," and the problem with that is if everything is an illusion then nothing is an illusion.

Astus wrote:

Except that this is not an ontological matter but Buddhist teachings that are used to remove a view that results in suffering. So, when everything is actually seen as only illusion one sees correctly.

All conditioned phenomena
Are like a dream, an illusion, a bubble, a shadow
Like the dew, or like lightning
You should discern them like this (Diamond Sutra, ch 32)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 5:03 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

It's just an idea to see everything as only illusion, so that too must be an illusion and false.

Astus wrote:

Naturally. As I have said before, meaninglessness is also meaningless, and the path to liberation is to be abandoned in the end as another useless idea. This I have said right from the beginning of this thread.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Does that include arguing that one should abandon "meaning"?

Astus wrote:

Arguing is better to be philosophising, as part of a systematic analysis. Otherwise it is just like people gossiping.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 5:25 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

Meaninglessness is not meaningless, significantly. You, for example, seem to find it quite meaningful.

If the path to liberation liberated then obviously it was not useless. How does that not make sense to you?

If the path to liberation did not liberate, well, then perhaps it offered essential meaning, so it's all good.

Astus wrote:

This has already been answered. Meaninglessness is gradually realised through various stages. The last thing relinquished is the raft.

Regarding the problems with the understanding of the illusoriness of keys and other things, I heartily recommend this work: <http://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/mipham/wheel-analysis-and-meditation>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 5th, 2014 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

If that's true then why is there no history of anyone doing this? Was everything meaningless to the Buddha?

Astus wrote:

Meaninglessness, just as meaning, is a Western concept, not Asian, as previously said.

shel said:

If you understand then why don't you address my questions?

Astus wrote:

Cone and Malcolm have already answered you in many ways.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 5th, 2014 at 6:18 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

tobes said:

That is it has a particular kind of casual functionality, which is not reducible to linguistic dependence. An empty appearance, sure. But one in which its particular causal functions are efficacious.

To say that all keys are illusions is to subtly obscure the critical point that some keys open some doors and other keys open other doors.

If you really believe that all keys are pure illusions, throw yours away.

Astus wrote:

That's a differentiation made between true (functional) and false (non-functional) conventional reality. However, both are conventional, in that in the ultimate analysis there is nothing found that one could attach to. Even true conventional phenomena are ungraspable when investigated. And the critical point from the Buddhist perspective is to remove all clinging, and not to set up a nice theoretical system for the sake of philosophical explanation. In other words, Buddhism is a type of key used to unlock ignorance, and not for anything else. When used for other things, that is incorrect and has no useful results. That doesn't mean there are no other keys, as one can happily research the nature of deep sea algae using the relevant scientific methods, while a microscope is only misleading if one wants to understand Serbian epic poetry.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 7:12 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Astus wrote:

Meaning can be sought for in the past, the present or the future.

Past meaning is nostalgia, the lost golden age. It is being saddened by the present situation and without hope for the future. It is a meaning for those who can't stop dreaming about an imaginary past world.

Present meaning is hedonism, enjoying life and seizing the day. It is a misguided struggle to hang on to whatever pleasure one can find, but it is mostly about failure to preserve happiness or strive for more delights. It is a meaning for those who can't see their own impotency to stop time.

Future meaning is utopianism, believing in a dream world. It is a faith in an unexplainable turn of events that makes everything perfect, that is, blind optimism. It is a meaning for those who believe that either themselves or some external power can do magic.

Some Buddhism related examples for all three.

Past: the three Dharma ages, that now we live in the era of decline and corruption

Present: be in the present, enlightenment is this present mindfulness

Future: enlightenment will come, sometime in the future in this life or the next, or perhaps even later

And then some quotes.

For emptiness does not proceed nor recede, and that holds good also for the Signless and the Wishless. To demonstrate that is to demonstrate all dharmas. But no one has demonstrated it, no one has heard it, no one has received it, and no one realizes it, in the past, present or future.

(PP8000 9.3; p 151, tr. Conze)

For the Tathagata has not apprehended any thought as past, as future, or as present, because thought is not really there.

(PP8000 12.3; p 176)

What lifetime will you use to experience this prediction, past, future, or present? If a past life, then the past life is already extinguished. If a future life, then the future life has not arrived. If the present life, then the present life is nonabiding. It is as the Buddha has explained, "O bhikṣus, you are in this immediate present born, aged, and extinguished. If you experience this prediction with birthlessness, then the birthless is the primary status [of Hinayanist enlightenment]. Yet within that primary status there is no receiving the prediction, and also no attainment of anuttarā samyaksambodhi.

(Vimalakirti Sutra, ch 4, p 97, tr. McRae)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 7:28 AM

Title: Re: Question on wake up sermone ?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Appearance (http://www.cbeta.org/result/normal/X63/1219_001.htm) means all the things that we see, hear, smell, taste, touch and think. So the <http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enHeartSutraWithAnnotations.htm> says, "no form, sound, smell, taste, touch, or dharmas".

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 6:35 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

oushi said:

For most of us, meaningless will be seen as a dead end, simply because we cannot allow ourselves to go for it. Although, all my experiences with meaninglessness are very positive when it comes down to daily life, my thinking is still based on predictions, so I am unable to go outside of hopes and fears. The main concern is thinking itself.

Although it continues in Meaninglessness, it is "unmanaged", that means, it's honest, and in nowadays society, being utterly honest is very risky. This way we come all the way down to the root of our problem. Culture and conditioned dishonesty. Those are not only those big lies, but also half-truths, white lies, cunning disinformation etc.

If you want to be a Buddha today, be utterly honest... if you dare.

Astus wrote:

I like what you say. And honesty, that's a whole different topic, but a fruitful one for sure.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 7:22 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

tobes said:

Is there meaning in enlightened aesthetics, activities and communications?

Astus wrote:

Yes, and this has been another part of this thread, that making something meaningless and being meaningless are not exactly the same. The path is to make it so, and therefore before it is made meaningless, it is meaningful.

tobes said:

Is there meaning in the domain of the sambhogakāya?

Astus wrote:

I think Linji explains well the two truths applied to the buddha-bodies.

What is my purpose in speaking this way? I do so only because you followers of the Way cannot stop your mind from running around everywhere seeking, because you go clambering after the worthless contrivances of the men of old.

Followers of the Way, if you take my viewpoint you'll cut off the heads of the sambhogakāya and nirmāṇakāya buddhas; ... Why is this so? Followers of the Way, it is only because you haven't yet realized the emptiness of the three asaṃkhyeya kalpas that you have such obstacles.

(Record of Linji, p 10, tr. Sasaki)

According to the masters of the sutras and śāstras, the dharmakāya is regarded as basic substance and the sambhogakāya and nirmāṇakāya as function. From my point of view the dharmakāya cannot expound the dharma. Therefore a man of old said, 'The [buddha-]bodies are posited depending upon meaning; the [buddha-]lands are postulated in keeping with substance.' So we clearly know that the dharma-nature body and dharma-nature land are fabricated things, based on dependent understanding.

Empty fists and yellow leaves used to fool a child! Spiked gorse seeds! Horned water chestnuts! What kind of juice are you looking for in such dried-up bones!

Outside mind there's no dharma, nor is there anything to be gained within it. What are you seeking? Everywhere you say, 'There's something to practice, something to obtain.' Make no mistake! Even if there were something to be gained by practice, it would be nothing but birth-and-death karma.

(p 16-17)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 7:10 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Lindama said:

he is speaking to the samsaric perspective only which seeks meaning.

Astus wrote:

Yes, and the programme of "making life meaningless" is about samsara. Buddhism is about becoming free from samsara, through realising that it is meaningless, an endless round of birth and death.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 8th, 2014 at 8:30 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

But free from samsara really must include not regarding phenomena as having any intrinsic value, or purpose.

this is what you mean by "meaningless".

But the contradiction is that by trying to be "free from samsara", to negate it as specifically "meaningless" you are imputing it with a meaningful (although admittedly uninviting) quality.

Astus wrote:

Meaningless means without meaning. It is not giving it a quality, it is removing the idea of meaning. Giving something meaning is giving it a value and a purpose. Removing that conceptual veil is seeing it without meaning, i.e., as meaningless. Making meaninglessness meaningful is still grasping a meaning, and not applying meaninglessness to it. It's like what they call in Tibetan madhyamaka a non-affirming negation. And here are two Chan examples.

Wuzhu often said:

It is because beings have thought that one provisionally teaches no-thought, but at the time of true no-thought, no-thought itself is not. (Mystique of Transmission, p 361)

And Baizhang's three stages elucidate the same:

For now just do not be confused and disturbed by any existent or non-existent objects; and do not stop and abide in disillusion, and yet have no understanding of nonabiding. (Sayings and Doings of Pai-chang, p 67)

PadmaVonSamba said:

Unfortunately, the trap of samsara is in thinking that such "fame", or the material gains one may make from such a career, will bring happiness, and they suffer when, ultimately, that does not last, and "fame and fortune" turns out to be hollow, or is quickly used up. But it isn't the job or the money that's the problem. It's "taking refuge" in that...believing it will bring lasting satisfaction, that is the problem. That's where samsara begins.

Astus wrote:

As above you have said, considering things meaningful is samsara. Seeing that they are without meaning, without the ability to provide lasting satisfaction, is liberation. And that's why it is the meaning that needs to be removed, not things that one attributes meanings to. However, once something has lost its meaning, why would one keep it or crave it?

PadmaVonSamba said:

But it is quite possible to engage in, and enjoy the temporary arising of the composites that fill our lives, without becoming attached to them, without relying on them as a source for something permanent. It is possible to be, for example, rich and famous, and not really care about that. We can be happy without relying on happiness.

Likewise, it is possible to experience appropriate sadness when those temporary things end, when loved ones and pets die, when the house is washed away, when one becomes ill, without dwelling in that sadness.

Astus wrote:

Enjoying without attachment is the same as suffering without attachment. As you say, one can be happy and sad without relying on them. That is, nothing actually changes. One loves good food, good films, good sex, it's just without any clinging. Similarly, one hates bad weather, bad smells, bad neighbours, except without relying on them. The difficulty I see in this is that it disconnects grasping from being delighted and disgusted by things. However, delight and disgust comes from the very attachment one has for various experiences. Not abiding in phenomena is not being moved by them. And not being moved emotionally is still not the level of non-conceptuality. Both pleasure and pain hold meaning. Pleasure is meaningful because it feels good, and pain is meaningful because it feels bad. Good feeling is something we like, and bad is something we hate. As the Buddha taught (<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn42/sn42.011.than.html>), we suffer only for the loss of people we are attached to, not for those we are not. Renunciation is not avoiding what happens, not shunning experience, it is seeing them for what they are without attributing any meaning, and so not being moved by them to one way or another. See this one about not taking the bait:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn35/sn35.189.than.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 5:03 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Objects which arise conditionally were empty of inherent existence long before the concept of emptiness was even conceived.

Astus wrote:

Things like "objects", "arise", "conditionally" are all concepts. Talking about a non-conceptual realm is a conceptual act involving concepts. Chapter 9 of the Vimalakirti Sutra makes this very clear.

Why is that? It is because no Buddhist teaching is interested in or relevant to explaining or discovering a physical or metaphysical reality. The Dharma is strictly and only about the fourth noble truth, the path of ending suffering. That's why positing an independent realm of objects arising conditionally is a mistaken view, a wrong approach. Mistaken and wrong in light of the path to liberation.

PadmaVonSamba said:

So, while 'emptiness' (sunyata) is, on the one hand, merely our correct understanding of phenomena the fact that phenomena are in fact empty is the same whether we 'convene' it or not.

If it were not already so, asserting emptiness would be false.

Astus wrote:

Asserting anything is false from the ultimate perspective, i.e. emptiness. Denying is false as well. On the conventional level it is fine to differentiate between correct and incorrect. That's the realm of concepts. Emptiness can be a conceptual view, and as such it can be a correct or incorrect understanding of the Dharma. What emptiness really stands for, however, is beyond all views. It is the very relinquishing of attachment to a conceptual reality. In other words, realising that reality is only conceptual, fictitious, illusory, a mental fabrication. So, there is nothing "before concepts". Assuming there is something, that's also just another concept.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 5:58 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

That may be the case. That doesn't change anything.

Just because you conceive of something or don't conceive of doesn't alter it.

Astus wrote:

That's all that matters. Because the perspective that needs to be considered is one's own subjective experience. And from that point of view there is nothing else but one's own experience. It does not matter at all whether there is or is not something beyond that. As I said, what Buddhism deals with is suffering and the ending of suffering.

Theories of a reality beyond one's experiential scope is for the philosophers to consider.

PadmaVonSamba said:

If you are suggesting that nothing arises conditionally prior to somebody thinking about it, that's total nonsense.

maybe your experience of things hadn't happened yet, but that's all.

Astus wrote:

Whether such an idea is nonsense or not is not that easy a question, but irrelevant to Buddhism. What matters, as I have said above, is one's own experience.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 5:38 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

so, are you going like a ping-pong ball back and forth between personal experience and this ultimate perspective?

Astus wrote:

No. In <http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=214590#p214590> you refer to I stated: "The Dharma is strictly and only about the fourth noble truth, the path of ending suffering." Suffering is not something out there, it is one's personal experience, just as the path is one's own personal journey.

PadmaVonSamba said:

composites do not require any cognitive awareness of them in order to occur.. They only require some kind of observance of them in order to arise as personal experience.

Astus wrote:

It is an irrelevant philosophical problem. What the Dharma is about is one's own experience. Experience exists only when there is awareness. Whether there are things outside one's experience or not is not related to the path of liberation.

PadmaVonSamba said:

If all that matters is one's own experience, then the statement 'life is meaningless' is false.

Astus wrote:

Life is one's own experience. What can of life could we talk about that is not experienced at all?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 10:22 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

So, nothing matters except that which should be abandoned, which is our personal experience because personal experience that is all the matters. Or, more succinctly, "nothing matters except what matters, which we should abandon."

Astus wrote:

Meaning exists in one's experience, and that's what should be abandoned. In other words, attachment to whatever occurs. Whatever occurs, that is, within one's personal experience. Because one cannot be attached what is not part of one's experience.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 11th, 2014 at 3:47 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

You are saying:

one should abandon one's experience

Astus wrote:

If by abandoning you mean not attaching, then yes. If you mean stopping all experience whatsoever, then no.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 11th, 2014 at 5:38 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

tobes said:

Abandoning attachment to experience = abandoning linguistic and conceptual forms of meaning.

Still having "experience" after that [that is: a coherent relationship with the phenomenal world] = out of necessity, the experience of phenomenological meaning.

Astus wrote:

Attributing meaning to experience is conceptual attachment. What is phenomenological meaning?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 11th, 2014 at 7:15 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

tobes said:

Phenomenological meaning is not an attribution - in the sense of an imputation imposed upon. It is rather the activity of consciousness in synthesizing sensory impressions into a coherent unity, such that an experience of reality can happen in the first instance. Without that, we have something like schizophrenia - a chaotic and fragmented jumble of impressions, perceptions, ideas etc.

Astus wrote:

That is assuming there is chaos that needs to be organised. But we don't need to go there, as it is another theory similar to things outside one's experience.

tobes said:

Yogacaran texts are far more overt in expressing this, but nonetheless, I think it is absurd to twist Madhyamika into a denial of yogic experience, on the basis of its critical metaphysical project.

Astus wrote:

Madhyamaka is about attaining wisdom, and not about turning people into mindless idiots, so there is no danger of falling into denial of the aggregates on the conventional level. The middle way is empty and apparent together. What is removed is only the mistaken understanding of appearances as real substantial things, as meaningful phenomena.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 12th, 2014 at 6:43 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

tobes said:

Not really - it only assumes that minds or consciousness have to have some kind of synthesizing or unifying ability such that a continuity of experience can occur. It doesn't assume anything about external reality, except perhaps that phenomenal content is 'given' to subjects. So the only assumption here is about what happens to subjectivity when that synthesizing ability fails - this is the text book definition of psychosis or schizophrenia, and I claim: very far from buddhahood or the direct realisation of emptiness.

Astus wrote:

As you say, it assumes that consciousness needs to interpret and synthesise external stimuli. That is, experience comes from some outer source and it needs to be transformed before it is understood in any way. That's why I said it is an assumption of chaotic external things.

tobes said:

Sure, so you take away the predication and misapprehension of svabhava. Phenomena can no longer have the meaning which relies on that predication and imputation. End of story?

No. To posit an end of story there is to reify emptiness into a something - in this case, a subjective state devoid of meaning.

Astus wrote:

You say that the realisation of emptiness results only in a subjective state devoid of meaning. As for the "subjective state", that's a questionable interpretation, as subject and object are both removed (emptiness of self). But I see no problem with being devoid of meaning, as that was the very goal.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 12th, 2014 at 10:56 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think the biggest mistake is to fail to see that Zen says nothing different from what is stated in the sutras. The second biggest mistake is to get lost in words and letters. Even the retarded version of Zen says that the transmission started with the Buddha, so it is the Buddha's teaching, and necessarily Buddhism.

The source of confusion is the way Zen is defined. In that sense, the word Dharma can be defined in several ways as well, both as something beyond all conceptual ideas and as something very much religious. Zen, just like Dharma, can be interpreted as the ultimate truth, and as such, it is beyond all methods and teachings. That's how people can say that Zen is not Buddhism, not a religion. And if we look at the everyday reality, it is no different from Buddhism, no different from a religious teaching. So, as Madhyamika masters have said several times, one needs to understand the two truths properly.

Here is what Sheng-yen says,

"People seek help, and their prayers are answered. It is common in every religion. In this respect. Buddhism is like other religions. Ch'an Buddhism, however, is different. Ch'an Buddhism penetrates directly to the original essence of Buddhadharma, and encourages practitioners to rely on themselves, and to solve their own problems. ... Since Ch'an espouses self-initiative, it can do without the religious, supplicating aspects of other Buddhist sects."

(Sheng-yen: Is Ch'an a Religion? in <http://ddc.shengyen.org/cgi-bin/ccdd/show.py?s=09-06p0217>)

And then he says the opposite:

"Many people think that Chan practice depends solely on their own efforts, requiring self-reliance, while those who practice by reciting the Buddha's name depend solely on external help. Both of these views are incorrect. In reality, Chan practice also requires external help, and the practice of reciting the Buddha's name also requires one's own effort. One can hardly become an accomplished Chan practitioner through one's own efforts. In India, China and Tibet, all meditators need the support and assistance of teachers, Dharma-protecting deities, and the Buddhas and bodhisattvas. That is why Chan monasteries in China erect and worship the statues of Dharma-protecting deities such as the eight divisions of divinities and the four deva kings."

(Sheng-yen: <http://chancenter.org/cmc/wp-content/uploads/2010/09/ChanPracticeandFaith.pdf>, p 2)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 4:21 AM

Title: Re: the ten dharma realms is states of mind ?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The five/six/ten realms are samsara itself, it is where beings are reborn. See this thread:
<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=107&t=12644>

"The basic teaching of the Buddha is that our life is suffering and we transmigrate within the six realms of samsara because we live and act based on three poisonous states of mind : greed, anger/hatred and ignorance. All Buddhist practices are about cessation of suffering in samsara by being released from these three poisonous minds."
(http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/pdf/dharma-eye/de13/de13_08.htm)

"In ten thousand kalpas and thousands of lives, how many times are we born and how many times do we die? This cycle of lives is samsara, caused only by blind clinging to worldly affairs."
(http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/common_html/zuimonki/01-16.html)

In the official <http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/practice/sutra/scriptures.html> we can find various references to the ten realms and even to birth in a pure land. The followings are from the http://www.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/gongyo_seiten/translations/part_1/kanromon.html.

"We also pray that your bodies, conveyed by this dharani-food, may leave suffering behind and gain liberation; that you may attain the joy of birth in heavens; that you may, in accordance with your wishes, be delivered to one of the pure lands in the ten directions; that you may give rise to the thought of awakening, practice the path to awakening, and in the future become buddhas; that you may never backslide; and that whoever first attains the way may vow to lead the others to liberation as well."

"With the good karma gathered in this practice, we repay the virtuous toils of our fathers and mothers, that the living may be blessed with joy and long life without distress, and the deceased freed from suffering and born in the pure land. May the four benefactors, sentient beings in the three classes of existence, and those born in the three evil destinies and eight difficulties all be able to repent their transgressions, purify their defects, entirely escape the round of rebirth, and be born in the pure land."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 5:54 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

tobes said:

But to say that these are empty of svabhava is not to deny them outright. And if they are not denied outright, then what is your explanation for how consciousness and phenomena interact?

Astus wrote:

There is no phenomena separate from consciousness. All we have is the flow of experience, and not anything beyond that. Since experience without awareness is impossible, I say that phenomena and consciousness are inseparable.

tobes said:

this is what I claim your position leads to.

Astus wrote:

As you can see, I don't posit any subject.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 1:16 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Yes, there is phenomena separate from consciousness, but there is no consciousness separate from phenomena.

It is important to make that distinction.

Consciousness is a level of interaction between awareness and objects of awareness (phenomena).

Astus wrote:

Phenomena are objects of awareness. How can there be an object of awareness without awareness?

PadmaVonSamba said:

Experience without awareness is impossible, but basic (ground of) awareness without experience is possible in fact, it is necessary because experience only occurs conditionally and physical objects of awareness cannot spontaneously generate awareness much less, consciousness which is why a brain does not know it's a brain.

Astus wrote:

You say that consciousness exists unconditionally? Then it were not consciousness/awareness at all, as it would be without anything to be conscious/aware of.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 7:42 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

There is plenty of stuff around that has not arisen along with awareness.

Astus wrote:

How do you know? What does it matter? It's like a discussion about the look of the most beautiful woman nobody has ever seen. Pure fiction.

PadmaVonSamba said:

There is no denying that awareness exists fundamentally.

Astus wrote:

An awareness without anything to be aware of is like seeing without anything to see. When one doesn't see anything, it is not called a sight. When there is nothing one is aware of, that is not called awareness. If not seeing is sight, then blind men are seers. If lack of awareness is awareness, then corpses are aware. Such a fundamental existence of awareness is like above, a baseless assumption, a work of imagination. As you agree: Awareness cannot observe itself directly, just as eyes cannot look into themselves directly. But awareness can be observed as an object of awareness, when it arises with phenomena and manifests as consciousness just as eyes can see themselves when looking at their own reflection in a mirror.

That is, there is no experience about such a fundamentally existent awareness that you say is there. It is indeed strange that while it is so real, there is no direct information about it at all. Eyes and other sensory faculties are all conditioned things, one can describe their qualities and such. None of that can be said about your ground of awareness. So, what is its fundamental existence?

PadmaVonSamba said:

Furthermore, if you are discussing meaning in life, then it is important not only to define what you mean by 'meaning' but also what you mean by 'life'.

Astus wrote:

I have <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=214690#p214690>: "Life is one's own experience. What can of life could we talk about that is not experienced at all?"

PadmaVonSamba said:

Since this basic awareness cannot be found to have a cause other than itself, and since it has no defining characteristics of its own, and since it cannot be denied, or separated into any kind of 'non-awareness' parts, I would suggest that it is truly existent, non-specific, non-self, synonymous with the meaning of Dharmakaya and the essence of realization.

Astus wrote:

That shows very well how the attachment to self is the root of all beliefs in meaning. Religions and philosophies often tend to posit an ultimate soul/god as the basis of all, and that's where the Buddha said that no such thing can be found and it is total ignorance and the root of samsara. All phenomena are impermanent, selfless and empty. Something that is not a phenomenon is no different from non-existence, in other words, it does not exist. Attributing meaning to a non-existent thing is the reason why there is no actual meaning, but only mistaken ideas that life is meaningful.

PadmaVonSamba said:

It is the basis of the three poisons, the reason why all beings experience dukkha, and why all beings possess the potential for enlightenment.

Astus wrote:

Exactly. It is ignorance about the emptiness of phenomena. And since that ignorance is empty as well, we can be free from it. If such a basis were real, then either we are permanently deluded or permanently enlightened.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 7:44 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm said:

People who think dharmakāya is truly existent are simply wrong, and suffer from an eternalist bias.

In reality the three kāyas are also conventions.

Astus wrote:

Linji says it clearly:

Therefore a man of old said, 'The [buddha-]bodies are posited depending upon meaning; the [buddha-]lands are postulated in keeping with substance.' So we clearly know that the dharma-nature body and dharma-nature land are fabricated things, based on dependent understanding. Empty fists and yellow leaves used to fool a child! Spiked gorse seeds! Horned water chestnuts! What kind of juice are you looking for in such dried-up bones!

Outside mind there's no dharma, nor is there anything to be gained within it. What are you seeking? Everywhere you say, 'There's something to practice, something to obtain.' Make no mistake! Even if there were something to be gained by practice, it would be nothing but birth-and-death karma.

(Sasaki, p 17)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

2.Does it matter? If one thinks, for example, that no cancer is developing in the body simply because one is not aware of it, and that because one is not aware of it it cannot possible exist, then this would certainly lead to problems. In that case, perhaps it matters.

Astus wrote:

How is that related to the path of liberation? It is not.

PadmaVonSamba said:

I am not referring to cognition, rather, the causes of that cognition.

Astus wrote:

An ultimate ground cannot be a cause of anything, otherwise it would be changing and conditioned.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 1:18 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

Is Picasso's art worthless/meaningless from a Buddhist POV?

Astus wrote:

If by that you ask whether a piece of art is relevant to the path of liberation, then the answer is most likely no. There might be some exceptions, considering primarily Buddhist art. And here's another question: is Picasso's art good for fixing a Unix server error? Probably not.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 1:40 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

Does Buddhism allow for meaning outside the path of liberation?

Astus wrote:

Buddhism is the path of liberation, and that's what it is concerned about. For everything else there are all the other things.

gad rgyangs said:

no, but people who fix unix server errors usually don't claim that anything that is not useful for fixing Unix server errors is meaningless and a waste of time.

Astus wrote:

The question is "useful for what?". Usefulness/meaning/worth does not exist on its own, it is within a specific framework of values. Buddhist values are about liberation, that's how Picasso's art is meaningless.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 16th, 2014 at 7:08 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

Buddhism is not like fixing unix servers: it makes universal claims about what is true and what is not, what is conducive to ending suffering or what creates more suffering, and basically it says that anything that does not aim towards liberation by definition will be creating more suffering. So recouch the question: does viewing a Picasso painting result in increased suffering, if for no other reason than it is delaying your "practice"? And if a non-Buddhist views a Picasso painting, is the idea that everything that person does is meaningless and only increases their suffering, including viewing the painting?

Astus wrote:

Buddhism is about fixing the problem is suffering. Nothing more, nothing less. It identifies the problem, describes the causes of the problem, identifies the solution and gives the method to reach the solution. The four noble truths. The rest Cone has already answered. Just a small supplement to that: seeing beautiful/pure (subha) what is ugly/impure (asubha) is one of the four distorted views (e.g. AN 4.49).

Something is meaningful when it is conducive to one's goal, and meaningless when it is not. Seeing the meaninglessness of life is meaningful on the path of liberation, and eventually, once the goal is reached, even the path becomes meaningless. Making up excuses to call various elements of samsara meaningful only strengthens attachment and hinders one's progress on the path. It shows that one still believes that there is some peace and contentment to gain from ephemeral experiences, while in fact true peace lies only in nirvana.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 16th, 2014 at 7:30 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

There, you see, you make empirical statements ("There is no phenomena separate from consciousness") as though it is a fact (when it isn't) and then base your argument on that, but when this sort of statement is challenged, your response is basically the challenge is irrelevant because that's merely a philosophical discussion and doesn't relate to one's subjective experience.

Astus wrote:

How do you know of any phenomenon without experience? By reasoning. But through reasoning you don't get to any phenomenon, only theories. So, is there a phenomenon separate from consciousness? We can only theorise about it. Does that philosophising have any relevance to the path of liberation? It has not (cf. MN 63: the parable of the arrow; MN 2: ideas unfit for attention).

PadmaVonSamba said:

then what is it that interprets the activity of the brain, the neurological and electrical activity of the brain, what experiences that as thoughts, as viewed objects, as emotions?

Astus wrote:

See the Avyakata-samyutta (SN 44) regarding why neither the sameness nor the difference of body and mind were asserted by the Buddha. In short, because the Tathagata does not posit a self (permanent substance) in one's realm of experience (i.e. the five aggregates and the six senses), as said for instance in SN 44.7 and SN 44.8.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Either phenomena is awareness, or it isn't.
And if it isn't, then what is?

Astus wrote:

As I said above, phenomena are inseparable from consciousness.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 16th, 2014 at 7:40 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

kirtu said:

But imho the complete meaninglessness of samsara is very difficult for even Dharma people to accept.

Astus wrote:

So is emptiness. And that's perhaps because their liberating quality is not apparent. As <http://www.accesstoinight.org/lib/thai/chah/atasteof.html#middle>, "The essence of Buddhism is peace, and that peace arises from truly knowing the nature of all things. If we investigate closely, we can see that peace is neither happiness nor unhappiness. Neither of these is the truth." Peace depends on grasping or not grasping phenomena, and grasping depends on attributing a meaning to something or not.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 16th, 2014 at 7:44 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

if you want to make the sole goal of your life the reduction and avoidance of all suffering, fine, but not everyone is going to agree that such an impoverished and limited life is either attractive or meaningful, thank god.

Astus wrote:

Yes, the four noble truths are not easy to accept. There are all sorts of other distractions one can busy oneself with.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 16th, 2014 at 8:11 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

you can reduce suffering while doing other things. otherwise its like hatha yogins who do nothing but exercise and purify their bodies so they can live as long as possible. what for? so they can live as long as possible so they can practice hatha yoga to live as long as possible.

Astus wrote:

I've once heard a Dharma teacher put it this way, "Sitting in meditation is just training. Everyday life is the actual practice." The teaching of the Buddha is for the living, and it is to influence one's every action. The bodhisattva vows are valid not only for life but until all beings are liberated.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 17th, 2014 at 6:32 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

I'm not even going to ask "who ever put you in bondage?" but, assuming that all beings eventually are liberated, then what? then we can go to the beach without anyone annoying us telling us that even when we think we're happy we're really suffering?

Astus wrote:

Is your question about life after enlightenment? There are many answers. First is that it is impossible to identify someone as an enlightened being as all attachments have ended (see: SN 44.2; MMK 22). Then there are the colourful descriptions of superpowers and buddha-fields. And there are answers like "chop wood, carry water" and "eat when hungry, sleep when tired". If you want, you can even combined them into the three bodies.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 17th, 2014 at 7:05 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

Not really, we can grasp at what we don't understand or know the meaning of. And we can be neutral about things that we know the meaning of.

Astus wrote:

Meaning, as the basis of grasping, is attributing an essence, a function and a purpose to something. A slice of cake is meaningful in being viewed as delicious. And those who follow some diet it becomes a more complex meaning. On the other hand, if we can't tell whether something is food or anything else, there is no attachment to it.

shel said:

We suffer meaninglessness. Religion offers meaning, hence a religious life can be far from impoverished, though it may still be rather limited.

Astus wrote:

Suffering is from the desire to find a reliable meaning in something. But meaning always expires because all appearances are impermanent. The want of meaning is the wish to find a constant element in a vanishing reality. Religion proposes an unseen realm that is eternal, and so truly meaningful. Buddhism, however, eventually shows that such an unseen eternity is nothing but another mistaken idea, i.e. meaningless.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 18th, 2014 at 6:17 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

It's funny you should say this in context of religion, where people are attached to all sorts of unknowables.

Astus wrote:

It is attachment to vague, often emotionally charged concepts like God, soul, self, ultimate awareness, etc. that people hold on to. They become meaningful as they appear to answer every question by being mostly undefined ideas. The Buddha has very well identified it as self-view and clinging to a self, the root of ignorance. Unfortunately, the same philosophical confusion exists in Buddhism where people like to smuggle in some sort of eternal soul into the Buddhadharma. This is because of the fear of meaninglessness and emptiness, that there is something to lose. This fear of loss (of meaning and substance) is the attachment to self. It is also a misunderstanding of emptiness as annihilation, thus the counter-argument is an eternal thing. The two extreme views. However, the Buddha's middle way is not the extreme of being nor the extreme of non-being. Also, meaninglessness is not another meaning, but only a method to remove attachment to samsara.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 18th, 2014 at 6:47 PM

Title: Re: The Prajñāpāramitā in One Letter

Content:

Astus wrote:

Two things. The "a" sound is part of every Sanskrit consonant letter, so it is sort of the "universal basis". The "a" is also a negating prefix, like "un-" in English. Therefore "a" is like emptiness that is both universal and negates substance.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 7:03 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

conebeckham said:

But the crucial point, Shel, is that the goal of Dharma practice is to transcend meaning, and relative meaninglessness. Enlightenment, for sentient beings, may be the ultimate meaning, but for the enlightened one, meaning is transcended. So, too, is the relative meaninglessness, really. Being "Meaningless" in an absolute way, is the state of being unattached from Samsara. It is freedom, Nirvana, the exhaustion of habitual patterns, which includes all concepts related to meaning.

Astus wrote:

I find this a wonderful summary, that highlights the way gradually everything is let go:

"If you are attached to this life, you are not a true spiritual practitioner;

If you are attached to samsara, you have no renunciation;

If you are attached to your own self-interest, you have no bodhichitta;

If there is grasping, you do not have the View."

(<http://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/sachen-kunga-nyingpo/parting-four-attachments>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 6:05 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

The Buddha was enlightened. The Buddha taught subsequent to enlightenment.

Teaching requires perception, feeling, and purpose on the part of the teacher.

Perception, feeling, and purpose are some basic components of meaning. There must have been meaning for him. There seems to be no way to deny this. Can anyone try to explain how there could not have been meaning for him?

Astus wrote:

"Not the aggregates, not other than the aggregates; the aggregates are not in him; he is not in them: the Tathagata does not possess the aggregates. ... Those who make fixations about Buddha who is beyond fixations and without deterioration -- all those who are damaged by fixations do not see the tathagata."

(<http://www.fodian.net/world/1564.htm#Investigation%20of%20the%20Tathagata>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 6:15 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

ground said:

What is more than "meaningless" (since you are writing "not only meaningless") ? You are contradicting yourself. Either life in Buddhism is meaningless or it is samsara which is meaningful. Buddhism makes life meaningful like any other religion or philosophy does. What is life without buddhism? It simply is assigned different meanings, maybe "worldly meanings" as buddhists would say or christian meanings or materialist meanings and what have you.

Astus wrote:

In Buddhism life/samsara is to be perceived as meaningless, thus "make life meaningless". That path can and should be seen as meaningful, as a contrast to staying in samsara, but that meaning is only temporary, and noble beings know that even the Dharma is part of the illusory creations of the mind. So it is not only meaningless, because in the end both meaning and meaninglessness are gone.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: a healthy sex life.

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

In terms of taking words literally, simply following the 3rd precept is pretty easy, I have actually done that my whole sex life, prior to even being a Buddhist. So obviously, what i'm asking goes beyond just "the basics" of literal interpretation, since to follow Buddhas historical suggestions for layfolks on the subject actually is not too taxing.

Astus wrote:

The first precept is not to kill (or torture) humans. That's not very taxing either. Isn't it important anyway? Most often keeping the five precepts and avoiding the ten wrong actions are difficult only in a given situation. What is actually karmically binding is not even the action itself but the intention and the attachment behind that (an important difference between Jainism and Buddhism). So, the third precept is good as it is, and it is about avoiding doing bad things, being free from the three lower realms.

Going beyond the basics can be done in various ways. To simplify, let's use the classic set of "avoid bad, do good, purify mind". Avoiding bad is keeping the third precept, and it can be extended with further restrictions (new and full moons, place, time, etc.), but it seems to me personally that those added rules are often more cultural than a logical consequence of the teachings, so we could as well switch them to our own cultural superstitions that we already abide by. To do good in terms of sex is likely to be about kindness and putting others in front of ourselves, giving up self-interest. In other words, being loving and caring. The most interesting part is purifying mind. This is about being aware and in control of our emotions and thoughts. It helps tremendously in accomplishing the first two points, and gives us a degree of freedom. Although Ajahn Brahm advertises jhanas by saying that it's better than sex, for the non-celibates, meditation makes sex better, as it helps removing the distractions from our mind and strengthens openness and focus.

Johnny Dangerous said:

I'll also be frank here, i'm interested in this question particular from the viewpoints of people (maybe with a few years under their belts) who have had normal, or abnormal sex lives, and how they view this stuff as regards their Buddhist practice.

Astus wrote:

As I see it, like with every other activity, one should incorporate sex into one's practice of embodying the bodhisattva virtues and perfections. I believe it is a problem to consider sex something extraordinary and special, while actually there are very few things that are more common among humans, like talking and hugging.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

Suffice to say that you cannot even try to explain?

Astus wrote:

I can try to tell the same in my own words. You say, "Perception, feeling, and purpose are some basic components of meaning." Those are the aggregates. The Buddha does not identify with any aggregate. He is also not separate from the aggregates. That is, it is not possible to pinpoint what the Tathagata is. Thus to ask whether there is or isn't a meaning for the Buddha is mistaking a who the Buddha is. By the way, the Buddha has not even taught anything.

shel said:

express something meaningless

Astus wrote:

A monk asked, "What is the most valuable thing in the world?"

The master said, "The most valuable is a dead cat's head."

The monk asked, "Why is a dead cat's head the most valuable?"

The master said, "Because nobody can price it."

(Record of Chan Master Caoshan Yuanzheng of Fuzhou, T47n1987Ap0529a04-06)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 5:34 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

ground said:

In the end life is gone and you do not have to do anything specifically. You may perceive life as meaningless or meaningful through equating it with "that path". It does not matter because in the end life is gone and the sound "life" or the sign "life" will not evoke any meaning in a brain that is dead.

Astus wrote:

As far as Buddhism is concerned, life is more than just body functions.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 6:55 AM

Title: Re: a healthy sex life.

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Is it ever possible to have sex with an altruistic, or even just conventionally "healthy" motivation, on any level? Can the act of sex under any circumstances create "white seeds"?

Astus wrote:

Keeping the precepts is generating white seeds. Attachment can be present in both good and bad actions, so it is not a qualifying factor in ethics. Sex, like other kinds of human interaction, can be harmful, neutral or beneficial. Beneficial sex can be kind, compassionate, caring, empowering and even altruistic. It can also be considered how the six paramitas can be applied to sex.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 6:57 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Are you just making excuses now?

Astus wrote:

Excuses for what? Life in Buddhism does not begin at birth and does not end at death. Abandoning clinging to this life is the first step, renouncing samsara is the next.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 1:48 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

Sounds lovely. Nevertheless the Buddha taught. He taught the Four Noble Truths. If you haven't heard of the FNTs try googling it.

Astus wrote:

"From the night of Enlightenment till that of Nirvana, I have not in the meantime made any proclamation whatever."

(Lankavatara Sutra, 3.61)

And a different passage,

"the great Parinirvana is neither abandonment nor attainment, neither is it of one meaning nor of no-meaning; this is said to be Nirvana."

(Lankavatara Sutra, 2.38)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Astus wrote:

"From the night of Enlightenment till that of Nirvana, I have not in the meantime made any proclamation whatever."

(Lankavatara Sutra, 3.61))

PadmaVonSamba said:

...including that proclamation?

Astus wrote:

As Cone said, yes.

"And there is also no set teaching that can be delivered by the Tathāgata. Why? The teachings explained by the Tathāgata can neither be appropriated nor explained. There is neither a teaching nor a non-teaching."

(Diamond Sutra, ch 7)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 7:53 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Well, since there is neither a teaching nor a non-teaching, then why quote it?

Astus wrote:

This might sound a little confusing at first.

"words are neither different nor not-different from meaning and that meaning stands in the same relation to words. If, Mahamati, meaning is different from words, it will not be made manifest by means of words"

(Lankavatara sutra, 3.65)

But if you read the section, it becomes clear that words (ruta) stand for concepts and meaning (artha) for beyond concepts.

There are many other passages in various sutras and teachings explaining how conventional and ultimate reality are not two different things. As I have said previously in this thread, seeing the meaninglessness of life is not the same as denying life.

Renunciation means not being attached to things, and not that one has to lock oneself up in a small dark cave.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 25th, 2014 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: Tendai is a Ch'an school.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Let's reverse this. Chan is a Tiantai school. See for instance Faure on Shenxiu's background in his "The Will to Orthodoxy", p 49-53, where you get a short description of how Huisi and later Tiantai teachings influenced early Chan, like Daoxin's "one act samadhi". Even the idea of a lineage was first invented by the Tiantai school.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 25th, 2014 at 6:41 PM

Title: Re: Tendai is a Ch'an school.

Content:

jikai said:

if we don't use the five houses categorization to differentiate between orthodox and otherwise Zen transmissions then what can we use in our determinations?

Astus wrote:

The "five houses" idea was made up in the Song as a method to organise lineages and stories in major collections, starting with the Jingde Chuandeng Lu (pub. 1009) that uses the scheme but does not name it (the reason behind the scheme of five houses is unknown), then the Guandeng Lu (pub. 1039) uses five discrete sections for the houses but does not call it as such, and the first clear mention found of the five houses is from around 1060. (source: How Zen Became Zen, p 22-23)

Talking about "orthodox" in Chan is a difficult question. When Saicho travelled China things looked very different from how later generations imagined it. At that time none of the five houses existed, as schools like Linji and Fayan were created much later.

By the way, could someone specify what kind of practice/teaching is recognised in Tendai as Oxhead?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 25th, 2014 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: Tendai is a Ch'an school.

Content:

Astus wrote:

As for Oxhead School texts, this is a really good one:

<http://terebess.hu/zen/jueguanlun.html>. But more interesting would be to see how it all appears in Tendai, if at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 25th, 2014 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: Tendai is a Ch'an school.

Content:

Matylda said:

I always thought that it was Kanchi Sosan, the 3rd patriarch of the lineage who wrote it.. it would mean 2 generations before oxhead appeared. Am I wrong?

Astus wrote:

It is as you say. Farong's work is the Xinming (心銘), <http://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/zen/mindins.htm>. Also this: <http://ccbs.ntu.edu.tw/FULLTEXT/JR-JOCP/henrik.htm>.

The mentioned Wikipedia article questions the authority of the Xinxinming:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Xinxin_Ming#Authorship

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 25th, 2014 at 11:44 PM

Title: Re: Tendai is a Ch'an school.

Content:

Matylda said:

Do you know Chinese or Japanese version of the oxhead's of inscription? The English translation is nice but I prefer original one.

Astus wrote:

The first link includes the original. Otherwise: http://21dzk.l.u-tokyo.ac.jp/SAT2012/T2076_,51,0457b25.html

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 26th, 2014 at 1:57 AM

Title: Re: Emptiness in Yogacara

Content:

Malcolm said:

we are dicussing emptiness in yogacara, and whether it really is true that they posit non-dual consciousness that substantially exists. I think in face of the evidence it is a little hard to deny that in fact they did so.

Astus wrote:

"ultimate reality is divorced from existence and divorced from nonexistence by nature"
(Cheng Weishi Lun, p 285, tr Cook)

Dependent nature with discrimination is the imagined, without it it is the perfected.
However, existence and non-existence are discrimination. Also, among the final verses it says,

"Whenever, regarding the objective realm,
Knowledge is completely devoid of something obtained,
Then it dwells in consciousness only,
Because it is divorced from characteristics of the twofold grasping."
(p 306)

Although in the commentary that Xuanzang accepts as valid it maintains "that the seeing part of this knowledge exists but the seen part does not", although it is still the path of seeing, and the seeing part is required to have suchness as object.

As for the ultimate accomplishment, Yogacara has non-abiding nirvana, so it doesn't look like something that accepts any substantially existent things or minds.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 26th, 2014 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Astus wrote:

As Vimalakirti corrected Ananda,

"the bodies of the Tathāgatas are bodies of the Dharma, not bodies of longing. The Buddha is the World-honored One, who has transcended the triple world. The Buddha's body is without flaws, the flaws having been extinguished. The Buddha's body is unconditioned and does not fit the [conventional] analytic categories. A body such as this—how could it be ill, how could it be vexed?"
(Vimalakirti Sutra, ch 3, tr. McRae)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 26th, 2014 at 4:04 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

When Guatama ate contaminated food from the blacksmith, did his body get poisoned and die, or not?

Astus wrote:

"Although I do not actually enter parinirvāṇa I proclaim that I do. It is through this skillful means that the Tathāgata leads and inspires sentient beings. Why is this? Because if the Buddha abides a long time in this world, those who have few qualities do not plant roots of good merit, acquire poor and superficial characters, are attached to the desires of the five senses, and enter into the web of illusions and false views. If they see the Tathāgata always existing without extinction, they then become proud, self-willed, and negligent."

(Lotus Sutra, ch 16, tr Kubo & Yuyama)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 26th, 2014 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: Tendai is a Ch'an school.

Content:

jikai said:

That is, many of the great Zen masters are quite 'unorthodox' in light of the sutra and commentary material...aren't they? (forgive me if I am mistaken, as i mentioned, Zen is not my specialty). At least as I understand it, many Chan masters really are in a seperate category of their own. Can they be evaluated in the normal way?

Astus wrote:

Zen teachers, at least those I know of from past and present, teach straight Mahayana orthodoxy. The major confusing source is how Zen took up a colloquial style in the Song era, although it could as well be considered nothing more than a literary technique, something that was then on copied by later generations and foreigners (i.e. non-Chinese). The casual style of Zen is a tricky one. It can easily become rigid and traditional, very formalised. At the same time, Buddhist teachers/practitioners can very well be spontaneous and friendly emanations of the Dharma who assume a direct form of communication. So, what is a Zen teacher? Many possible answers. Let's translate it to English: meditation instructor. And we know that Buddhism has meditation instructors in practically every school and monastery. Has anyone noticed how Ven. Dharmamitra in his translation of the Xiao Zhiguan says, "Great Tiantai Meditation Master & Exegete: Sramana Zhiyi"?

"The most important thing in recognizing masters is to be able to judge whether they have a correct view of Buddhadharma. If their views of the Dharma are correct, then even if their behavior reveals some weaknesses, they should not be considered false masters. On the other hand, if teachers do not have a correct view of the Dharma, they cannot be considered authentic or virtuous masters." (<http://ddc.shengyen.org/cgi-bin/ccdd/show.py?s=09-06p0027>)

"Whoever would bring out the vehicle of Zen and cite the doctrines of the Teaching must first understand what the Buddha meant, then accord with the mind of Zen masters. Only after that can you bring them up and put them into practice, comparing degrees of closeness.

If ... you do not know the doctrines and principles but just stick to a sectarian methodology, when you adduce proofs readily but wrongly, you will bring slander and criticism on yourself."

(Fayan Wenyi: Ten Guidelines for Zen Schools

(http://www.cbeta.org/result/normal/X63/1226_001.htm), in Five Houses of Zen, p 140.
see <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=160843#p160843>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 26th, 2014 at 7:01 AM

Title: Re: Tendai is a Ch'an school.

Content:

jikai said:

I hope my posts did not in any way come off as me dismissing the Chan/Zen transmission.

Astus wrote:

Not at all.

And since we're in this topic, let me bring this up. In "The Collected Teachings of the Tendai Lotus School" (BDK edition, p 117) Gishin writes,

"Only the samadhi of following one's own thoughts can be contemplated constantly by both monks and lay persons. Even though one is burdened by the duties of a royal court, one should not avoid [this practice]."

This practice seems to come closest to Zen (see <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=145499#p145499>). One thing is not mentioned in that text, however. How does it relate to the teachings on buddha-nature in Tendai?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 26th, 2014 at 7:45 AM

Title: Re: Tendai is a Ch'an school.

Content:

kirtu said:

Buddhist realization instructor/guide. Certainly not just a meditation instructor.

Astus wrote:

You are right, of course, that here "zen" does not actually mean meditation. Although, if we consider what is found in Rinzai Zen, and Korean and Chinese Buddhism, the "zen teacher" is normally the head of the meditation hall. Zen, as another word of buddha-mind, is a different matter. As Huangbo remarked, "Do you know that there are no teachers of Chan in all of China?" (Blue Cliff Record, case 11). And Deshan said, "My teaching has neither words nor phrases. It is actually without a Dharma that may be given to others." (Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 198) So, what is a Zen teacher then and what is there to guide to? Realisation is not given or taken, methods, however, are. Meditation is about working directly with one's mind, so giving the right instructions can indeed serve as a short cut to enlightenment. Thus, "meditation instructor" might as well do it.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 26th, 2014 at 7:56 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Well, I don't know how that even addresses the question at all, but it certainly is wordy.

Astus wrote:

The entire life story of the Buddha is only for the education of certain types of sentient beings. It is like a magic show, an illusion. The real body of the Buddha is the Dharma.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 26th, 2014 at 7:53 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Astus wrote:

Basically in Buddhism there are six consciousnesses: eye-consciousness, ear-consciousness, nose-consciousness, tongue-consciousness, body-consciousness, mind-consciousness. They stand for the momentary consciousnesses of the six sensory areas.

Consciousness exists when there is something to be conscious of. Besides the five bodily sensory consciousnesses, there is the sixth consciousness, and it is the consciousness of mental phenomena. Mental phenomena includes everything else besides the five bodily sensory consciousnesses.

Generally speaking, there is no separate consciousness from the above six. Together they could be called simply consciousness or mind. The important point is that mind is necessarily impermanent and dependently originated. Mind is a series of moments of mental awareness, and that's how it can also be called mind-continuum.

Rebirth is possible because mental phenomena like greed, hatred and ignorance don't cease with the death of the body, as they don't depend on the existence of the body. The mind continues to exist because mental phenomena are produced by previous mental phenomena, like one thought leads to another thought.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 28th, 2014 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

zerwe said:

Does your explanation encompass the notion of the final mode (nature) being "pure mind?"

Astus wrote:

Mind is constantly changing, so there is no final mode. It is always different. Pure mind is a mind without attachment, a mind that understands the nature of mind, i.e. that the mind changes all the time.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 4:49 PM

Title: Re: Some general questions about Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

1. The usual definition of "sentient being" is that it has senses (see, hear, smell, taste, touch), and can feel pain and pleasure just as humans do. This includes animals - as it was understood before the microscope - and beings of other realms like ghosts and gods. Living being is often used as a synonym for sentient being. Note that the texts were not only not written in English, but often well before the modern era. That is, they had concepts like very small beings, but not specifically cells and bacteria. One of the areas where the definition of a sentient being matters is ethics. Buddhist ethics is intention, and not action based. I think very few people hate virtually invisible bacteria and consider cleaning the bathroom with chemicals as mass murder.

2. Correct, there are infinite number of beings a bodhisattva wants to save. The meaning of that is again the intention, that a bodhisattva's compassion knows no limits. Becoming a buddha is the culmination of the bodhisattva path, but that doesn't mean buddhas don't work on saving all beings. They do, endlessly.

3. Omniscience in Buddhism often does not refer to godlike all knowledge. Rather it is knowing what the true nature of phenomena is, how everything is empty and dependently originated. It is true that the traditional Buddhist cosmology is at odds with our modern version. There's not much to do about it.

4. The tulku system of lamas reincarnating is a Tibetan invention. It's like when in Europe people were told that the king was invested by God, and other such "son of heaven" emperors and rulers over the planet. I leave it to others to give it further explanation.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 7:37 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Anders said:

All this talk about what Buddhas do, how truly realised beings are, etc though - No wonder if people are tying themselves into knots. How can we really talk about this with a straight face? I wonder if the Lonely Planet forums are full of people telling others what Indonesia, Burma et al is really like just from having read the travel guides.

I think it's fine to play around with a bit, polishing the concepts so to speak, but at the end of the day third hand knowledge needs a few grain of salt.

Astus wrote:

All those ideas are knots. One might go to countries, but there is no place to find the Buddha beyond one's mind. And within one's mind it's all just imagination.

"If there is no false thought, there is no Buddha. Why not? Just because if you have a view of Buddha, you will think that there really is a Buddha to be attained. If you have a view of sentient beings, you will think there really are sentient beings to be delivered. Such is the totality of your false thought. However, if you are without any thought or view at all, where then is the Buddha? So this is why Manjusri said, 'To have any view of Buddha whatsoever is like being limited and obstructed by the two iron-enclosing mountains'."

(Wan-Ling Record of Huang Po, tr. Lok To)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 2nd, 2014 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: Tendai is a Ch'an school.

Content:

Anders said:

Since the purpose of Buddhism is in fact inner peace, compassion and happiness, some evidence of such qualities strike me as fairly essential in a guru who would teach the path to these.

Astus wrote:

As for assessing others, I like

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an04/an04.192.than.html>. That is, through practically living together one has the opportunity to observe the other person's behaviour, and through discussion one learns the other's views. Living together is hardly for lay people who see their teachers mostly in a ritualistic environment (the temple/monastery/centre), so observing daily behaviour is virtually out of the question, while at the same time, because of the religious setting one can easily get the impression that the teacher is a holy being (same phenomenon with celebrities, priests, etc.).

I rather reverse your statement, that the growth of peace, compassion and happiness in the student is the real measure that listening to another person is beneficial. And if being a student involves full time discipleship or only reading a few passages, it does not matter as long as there are good results. A teacher can be anyone from whom one can actually learn something useful. And that can be as little as saying 'I dare not belittle you. You will become a buddha.' or even less, like raising a flower or moving a finger. Or sometimes decades of full time studying proves to be of little benefit. And the Buddha was the perfect teacher, however, the disciples had various capacities.

Indrajala said:

Bodhidharma was known for his temper. Linji used to whip his students ... often by the sounds of things. Some teachers are rather wrathful and downright mean, yet they're regarded well in history.

Astus wrote:

Zen stories are not history, they are for entertainment and education. Wrathful and mean teachers sound to me more like abusive individuals with psychological issues.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 2nd, 2014 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: Esoteric Buddhism: is it real? Why?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Esoteric Buddhism simply denotes a type of teachings. As for what qualifies as "free and open" is not necessarily an easy question. If by that you mean whether you can find things about it on the Internet without paying anything extra, then yes, the Dharma is free and open to all.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 2nd, 2014 at 1:44 AM

Title: Re: Esoteric Buddhism: is it real? Why?

Content:

Nosta said:

If I cant find it on internet, etc thats another issue. I was really talking about any form of Buddhism just to a few, like secret societies or secret because its dangerous...and so on.

Astus wrote:

Buddhism itself is just to a few, those with the right karma. If there are some secret groups, then first of all, you won't hear about them; and second, they are very small. As for being dangerous, I think that it would not be Buddhism then. Buddhism is about liberating beings, not harming them. True, people may get the wrong idea when they hear about things like selflessness, emptiness, rebirth, nirvana, suffering, etc., but that's a mostly unavoidable risk.

Bhikkhus, there are these three things that flourish when concealed, not when exposed. What three? (1) Women flourish when concealed, not when exposed. (2) The hymns of the brahmins flourish when concealed, not when exposed. (3) And wrong views flourish when concealed, not when exposed. These are the three things that flourish when concealed, not when exposed.

Bhikkhus, there are these three things that shine when exposed, not when concealed. What three? (1) The moon shines when exposed, not when concealed. (2) The sun shines when exposed, not when concealed. (3) The Dhamma and discipline proclaimed by the Tathagata shines when exposed, not when concealed. These are the three things that shine when exposed, not when concealed.

(AN 3.131)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 3:48 AM

Title: Re: Qualities of a teacher

Content:

Meido said:

Different things reveal the depth of different aspects of cultivation.

Astus wrote:

I have not investigated this area, so all I know is that Buddhism has the teaching of major and minor signs, but nothing else really. And even those signs are difficult to explain as real physical qualities. So, my question is, what is the source of the symptoms you have described? Is it something specific to Japanese Rinzai Zen?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 6:34 AM

Title: Re: Qualities of a teacher

Content:

Meido said:

So at least from the time of the Mongol invasions we have records of Chinese masters in Japan commenting on things like energetic cultivation centered on the abdomen and the evidence of its fruition, the use of a shout to facilitate recognition, and so on. I therefore wouldn't say it's a Japanese thing; I would probably say that some Japanese Rinzai lines have preserved this kind of approach and understanding.

And of course I don't consider all of this a purely Zen thing either. In my experiences with teachers from non-Zen and non-Japanese Buddhist traditions who were considered to have been greatly realized, I've also observed many of the same qualities, and have heard descriptions of practices and methods that are remarkably similar. For what it's worth.

Astus wrote:

Aren't those energetic cultivation techniques of Taoist (or indigenous Chinese) origins? And those signs you mentioned could be present in Taoist literature and art as well. But I'm just guessing here. Perhaps you or anyone familiar with that area could clarify this.

Besides observing the qualities yourself, do you know any other Buddhist tradition, besides some Rinzai lineages, where they mention them? Like, as the closest tradition, in Soto Zen?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 6:08 PM

Title: Re: Qualities of a teacher

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

The greats of the past (many times) start off as the degenerates of the present.

Astus wrote:

Those greats of the past through the ages get deified and given superhuman attributes. Naturally, it's impossible to find any real person comparable to them. It should be considered that whatever we know of past sages are very minimal and often fictitious. No wonder the "qualities of a teacher" people look for can be irrationally exaggerated. Learning Buddhism is not much different from learning some worldly skill like sculpting, programming, carpentry and such. Teachers and schools are there to help in the process of mastering the skill, to transfer proven knowledge and methods. As I see it, the whole process is too mystified, but I guess it is part of being a religion. At the same time, there have always been teachers who wanted people to grasp the simplicity of the whole thing, like the renowned patriarchs of Zen, but there are also a number of modern teachers, like the Dzogchen Ponlop Rinpoche and his Rebel Buddha programme.

Here are some harsh words from Linji (tr. Sasaki) about present teachers, past teachers, and those who prefer to stick to the scriptures.

Virtuous monks, time is precious. And yet, hurrying hither and thither, you try to learn meditation, to study the Way, to accept names, to accept phrases, to seek buddha, to seek a patriarch, to seek a good teacher, to think and speculate.

“Make no mistake, followers of the Way! After all, you have a father and a mother—what more do you seek? Turn your own light inward upon yourselves!

(p 10)

Followers of the Way, you seize upon words from the mouths of those old masters and take them to be the true Way. You think, ‘These good teachers are wonderful, and I, simple-minded fellow that I am, don’t dare measure such old worthies.’ Blind idiots! You go through your entire life holding such views, betraying your own two eyes. Trembling with fright, like donkeys on an icy path, [you say to yourselves,] ‘I don’t dare disparage these good teachers for fear of making karma with my mouth!’

(p 17)

Followers of the Way, even if you should master a hundred sutras and śāstras, you’re not as good as a teacher with nothing to do. If you do master them, you’ll regard others with contempt. Asura like conflict and egotistical ignorance increase the karma that leads to hell. Such was the case of Sunakṣātra bhikku — though he understood the twelve divisions of the teachings, he fell alive into hell. The great earth had no place for him. It’s better to do nothing and take it easy.

(p 31)

And one on Shakyamuni:

Followers of the Way, if you say that the Buddha is the ultimate, how is it that after eighty years of life the Buddha lay down on his side between the twin śāla trees at Kuśinagara and died? Where is the Buddha now? We clearly know that his birth and death were not different from ours.

(p 19)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 11:31 PM

Title: Re: Qualities of a teacher

Content:

Meido said:

Perhaps other folks could chime in.

Astus wrote:

Let's hope they do. And thanks for your input, it is interesting to hear about those things.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 8th, 2014 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Authentic Buddhist Scriptures?

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://web.archive.org/web/20030220183543/http://hjem.get2net.dk/civet-cat/mahayana-writings/entry-into-mahayana.htm> is a good answer.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 7:46 AM

Title: Re: Three Turnings.

Content:

Astus wrote:

"In the country of Benares at Rsipatana in the Deer Park, the World-honored One first turned the wheel of doctrine, [teaching] the four holy truths for those setting out in the word-hearers' vehicle. This turning of the wheel was marvelous and wonderful, such as nobody, whether gods or men, had been able to turn in the world before. Nevertheless there were superior teachings, for [this first turning] had to be interpreted and occasioned controversy. Then the World-honored One with an underlying intent turned the wheel for the second time for the sake of those setting out in the great vehicle, [teaching] that all things have no-essence, no arising, and no passing away, are originally quiescent, and are essentially in cessation. This turning of the wheel was marvelous and wonderful indeed. Nevertheless there were teachings superior to this, for it also had to be interpreted and occasioned controversy. The World-honored One then with an explicit meaning for the third time turned the wheel of doctrine for those setting out in all the vehicles, [teaching] that all things have no-essence, no arising, and no passing away, are originally quiescent, and are essentially in cessation. This turning was the most marvelous and wonderful that had ever occurred in the world. It had no superior nor did it contain any implicit meaning nor occasion any controversy."

(Samdhinirmocana Sutra, ch 5, p 49; tr. Keenan, BDK edition)

So, to sum up the teachings of the three turnings:

1. four holy truths for those setting out in the word-hearers' vehicle
2. all things have no-essence, no arising, and no passing away, are originally quiescent, and are essentially in cessation
3. all things have no-essence, no arising, and no passing away, are originally quiescent, and are essentially in cessation

The definitions of the second and third turnings are identical.

The same sutra also answers the question about the nature of the unconditioned.

"Good son, the term 'unconditioned' is also a word provisionally invented by the First Teacher. Now, if the First Teacher provisionally invented this word, then it is a verbal expression apprehended by imagination. And, if it is a verbal expression apprehended by imagination, then, in the final analysis, such an imagined description does not validate a real thing. Therefore, the unconditioned does not exist."
(ch 2, p 12)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 16th, 2014 at 11:38 PM

Title: Re: Can't Really Work with Mahayana by the Looks of it

Content:

Astus wrote:

I say I choose Mahayana over anything else because it is a Vast Vehicle. That is, it encompasses everything you can find within Buddhism. It is like the Great Collection (i.e. the Chinese canon) that includes all sorts of texts from the agamas to the tantras, from the Dharmapada to Zen poetry. At the same time, it allows reducing all that not only to a short list of doctrines but even to a single word (A, Evam, nenbutsu, emptiness, etc.), symbol (vajra, circle, finger, etc.) or even a posture (zazen). Mahayana can be anything and everything, an infinite number of skilful means, and at its core there is nothing to find.

You say you are bored of and confused by all the different explanations, methods and theories. No problem. You can choose whatever fits.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 20th, 2014 at 8:09 AM

Title: Re: Three Turnings.

Content:

kirtu said:

It's not a Cittamatrā or Madhyamāka view. It could however be a Mahayana POV since the view of reality has nothing to do with the motivation to attain enlightenment for all beings and since, at least in Śākya, one trains progressively in the lower views as steps to the higher views (with "lower" and "higher" seen from the TB perspective). Thus a bodhisattva could hold a Vaihashika or Sautrantika view.

Astus wrote:

A bodhisattva is not just the intention to attain buddhahood. Without the view of prajnaparamita there is no bodhisattva. Wisdom and compassion can go only hand in hand. Otherwise compassion is no different from those of worldly beings, and the intention to achieve buddhahood is nothing more than wishful thinking.

Wise Bodhisattvas, coursing thus, reflect on non-production,
And yet, while doing so, engender in themselves the great compassion,
Which is, however, free from any notion of a being.
Thereby they practise wisdom, the highest perfection.
(Verses on the Perfection of Wisdom, ch 1, p 11-12, tr Conze)

"the Bodhisattva, the great being, awakes in non-attachment to full enlightenment in the sense that he understands all dharmas. Because he has enlightenment as his aim, an 'enlightenment-being' [Bodhisattva], a great being, is so called."
(PP8000, ch 1, p 89, tr Conze)

"Good sons and good daughters who want to arouse the aspiration for peerless perfect enlightenment should think like this: 'I will save all sentient beings.' Yet when all sentient beings have been liberated, in fact, not a single sentient being has been liberated. And why not? Subhūti, if a bodhisattva holds the notion of a self, the notion of person, the notion of sentient being, and the notion of life span, then she is not a bodhisattva. Why? Subhūti, there is actually no such a thing as peerless perfect enlightenment."
(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html#div-17)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 20th, 2014 at 6:29 PM

Title: Re: Three Turnings.

Content:

kirtu said:

The bodhisattva is defined by his/her commitment to attain enlightenment for the benefit of all beings and their commitment to eventually bring all beings to enlightenment. Their view of reality is not a defining factor until they are further along the path - they can't become an Arya without refining their view to at least the Cittamatra view.

Astus wrote:

If the view does not matter then worldly merit brings about buddhahood. Without the right view there is no practice of the paramitas, and without the paramitas there is no path to buddhahood. The vow to liberate all beings means unlimited compassion, and it cannot be boundless as long as one grasps at the idea of truly existing beings and things.

kirtu said:

If we have to have the correct refined view of wisdom from the start then we will never get to Buddhahood.

Astus wrote:

From the start all we have is ignorance. Then we learn, reflect and realise. Isn't that the path?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 20th, 2014 at 8:47 PM

Title: Re: What makes practice so hard?

Content:

Astus wrote:

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Jinul> 's answer for the reason behind gradual cultivation:

"As for "gradual cultivation," although he has awakened to the fact that his original nature is no different from that of the buddhas, the beginningless proclivities of habit (vāsanā) are extremely difficult to remove suddenly. Therefore he must continue to cultivate while relying on this awakening so that this efficacy of gradual suffusion is perfected; he constantly nurtures the embryo of sanctity, and after a long, long time he becomes a sage. Hence it is called gradual cultivation. It is like the maturation of an infant: from the day of its birth, [an infant] is endowed with all its faculties, just like any other [human being], but its physical capacities are not yet fully developed; it is only after the passage of many months and years that it will finally mature into an adult." (Moguja's Secrets on Cultivating the Mind, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, Vol. 2, p 216-217)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 23rd, 2014 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in Wikipedia

Content:

Astus wrote:

For the tantra part:

"to ingest excrement or urine and do other similar acts is to apply the practice of total sameness of flavor of the sense faculties and their objects"
(JKLT: Systems of Buddhist Tantra, p 288)

"There are numerous methods of pointing out, directly and in actuality, the wisdom that is the union of emptiness and cognizance or emptiness and awareness."
(Tsele Natsok Rangdrol: Empowerment, p 44; see also pp 40-48) see also: David B. Gray: The Cakrasamvara Tantra, pp. 104-114, 117-124.

For a Mahamudra take on it:

Saraha:

"For those unaware of the nature of everything,
Great bliss is attained in sexual union;
As if thirst-ridden, chasing after water in mirage,
They die from thirst, and do they ever drink the sky-water?
Whoever frolics in this bliss,
Living between vajra and lotus,
What for? This has no capacity for truth,
So {where} in the three worlds will you be complete?
The bliss of means is the moment,
And this itself becomes both;
Through the kindness of the master,
A handful in a hundred will understand."
(Dreaming the Great Brahmin, p 166)

Takpo Tashi Namgyal:

"It is highly incorrect to claim as the state of mahamudra an experience of bliss that pervades the body and mind and which is transmuted with [awareness of] void as if through the process of imprint. This is because the sensation of bliss has emerged from the cyclic flow of the sexual fluid brought about by means of the third empowerment."
(Mahamudra - The Quintessence of Mind and Meditation, p 108)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 24th, 2014 at 7:11 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist neglect of academic findings.

Content:

Indrajala said:

So, with no immediate tangible benefits and no pedigree from the Buddha nor intense philosophical backing, Pure Land is basically undermined.

Astus wrote:

Not only PL teachings are undermined when historical authority is involved in backing up a teaching but all Buddhist doctrines and methods. Pure Land thinkers have produced enough philosophical material to give an acceptably solid basis not more shaky than other Buddhist schools.

To give a general example, the idea of the confirmation-transmission between teacher and student, present in various traditions, is historically at least questionable and in many cases refuted as later concoctions. So, the usual argument that having an "enlightened teacher" is enough, that is pure faith in a person and nothing more, as there is no proper criteria for such a teacher besides referring back to an invented lineage.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 25th, 2014 at 12:04 AM

Title: Re: Satori/Kensho

Content:

Astus wrote:

If someone says he can obtain it, he is indeed an arrogant person and indeed is one with those who left the Lotus Assembly, refusing to listen to the Lotus Teaching. Thus the Tathagata said: "There was really no Dharma by means of which the Tathagata attained Supreme Awakening."

(Huangbo Xiyun, Chung-Ling Record, tr. Lok To)

A thorough description of deluded states is found in the Surangama Sutra, chapter 8 (PDF): http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/surangama.pdf#G1011700

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 25th, 2014 at 6:57 AM

Title: Re: Satori/Kensho

Content:

Astus wrote:

The actual meaning of the words satori and kensho should also be given some consideration. Satori literally means understanding, comprehension of something, in this case that something is the ultimate truth of reality. Kensho means to see the nature, that is, to perceive the true nature of mind. Reality is of course the same as the nature of mind, so practically the two words can be used as synonyms. And the reality of mind to be understood and perceived is that no matter what experience there is, it is unstable and impermanent. So, when one calls something an experience of satori/kensho, it is necessarily not that, as it is only another fleeting mental phenomenon and nothing special at all. Understanding the ultimate truth means not attaching to any of our changing moments of life. Thus it is taught that the truth is unattainable and that there is nothing to attain. Seeing that there is nothing to attain is the real attainment, or rather non-attainment.

"Neither grasping at form and sound outside nor allowing a false thought to arise inside is known as attainment. However, when there is attainment, there should be no thought of attainment; and this is known as having non-attainment. Furthermore, when non-attainment is realized, there should be no thought of non-attainment; and this is known as not having non-attainment."

(Dazhu Huihai: Treatise On Entering The Tao of Sudden Enlightenment, tr. Lok To)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 25th, 2014 at 7:36 AM

Title: Re: Satori/Kensho

Content:

jeeprs said:

There are degrees of realisation and these are validated within Zen orders, as I understand it. Not everyone reaches the same level of realization.

Astus wrote:

Yes, of course, Buddhism has various forms of interpretations regarding the stages on the path, from the four levels of arya sravakas to the fifty-two levels of bodhisattvas. Scriptures popular in Zen, like the Diamond Sutra and the Shurangama Sutra, also mention them. That's part of being a gradual path. However, Dazhu Huihai was more of a representative of the immediate realisation (dunwu/tongo 頓悟) teaching, so talks about no attainment is the norm in such a text.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 25th, 2014 at 5:55 PM

Title: Re: Question about Bodhisattvas

Content:

Astus wrote:

Nirvana as annihilation is a misunderstanding. A bodhisattva realises on the very first stage that there is no difference between samsara and nirvana, so there is no attachment and no suffering. A bodhisattva liberates beings without the grasping of the idea of liberating beings.

As for the Zen view, even Shenxiu taught that the six realms are the six senses, and liberating beings is not clinging to the six types of impressions. So, if you want to liberate all beings, see that the nature of all experience is unattainable, that there is nothing to rely on or hold on to, as it's all constantly changing.

By the way, if bodhisattvas had delayed complete enlightenment until samsara was emptied of beings, there would have been no buddhas at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 28th, 2014 at 12:01 AM

Title: Re: How do you experience PL?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Is karma real or not? Buddhism says there is karma. Is the path of the bodhisattvas real or not? Mahayana says it is. If there is karma and there is buddhahood, then the buddha-fields can be real as well. And if there are buddhas and buddha-fields, then there can be an Amitabha Buddha with his specific vows.

Also, if one wants first hand experience, consult the Pratyutpannasamadhi Sutra and Tiantai's walking samadhi.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 31st, 2014 at 7:01 PM

Title: Re: What is Enlightenment?

Content:

Astus wrote:

What kind of enlightenment do you want? There are many to choose from in Buddhism. Of course, most - but not all - of them are temporary achievements on the path. If you want buddhahood, learn the paramitas. Know how to give without grasping at the giver, the receiver and the gift.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 1st, 2014 at 10:52 PM

Title: Re: Questions about bodhisattva vow

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm not sure what "root bodhisattva vow" you refer to. If it is the intention to attain buddhahood in order to liberate beings, i.e. bodhicitta, then yes, if one abandons that aspiration, there is no achievement of the various bodhisattva stages, as one ceases to practise on the path. It's like deciding not to go that way any more. But then, if one reconsiders, the wish for perfect enlightenment comes back, one can start to walk on the path again.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 2nd, 2014 at 4:42 PM

Title: Re: Huayan translations

Content:

Astus wrote:

http://www.acmuller.net/kor-bud/collected_works.html, volumes 4 & 5 contain translations of Huayan/Hwaeom works.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 3rd, 2014 at 6:28 PM

Title: Re: Zen's view of bodhisattvas

Content:

Astus wrote:

Besides what Master Huifeng has already pointed out that there is no such thing as "Zen orthodoxy", I'd like to add that Zen has never existed in some sort of vacuum independent of the larger Buddhist tradition. Dogen criticises "sectarianism" in his <http://scbs.stanford.edu/sztp3/translations/shobogenzo/translations/butsudo/translation.html> (Buddha Way):

"The treasury of the eye of the true dharma, the wondrous mind of nirvana, correctly transmitted by the buddhas and ancestors, they rashly call the "Zen school." They call the ancestral masters "Zen ancestors"; they call the students "Zen masters" or "Zen preceptors"; or they call themselves "lines of the Zen houses." These are all but "branches and leaves" that have taken a biased view as the "root." When, throughout the Western Heavens and Eastern Earth, from ancient times till the present, there has not been the term "Zen school," rashly to call oneself [by this term] is to be a demon who would destroy the way of the buddha, an unbidden enemy of the buddhas and ancestors."

And if we look at the larger tradition (as does Steven Heine in <https://books.google.com/books?id=mgOcmlCwZ5MC> and <https://books.google.com/books?id=me8hUT-pvw4C>) we find that Buddhists believed not only in the usual Mahayana cosmology but also the local common beliefs (Chinese/Japanese/etc. values, folklore and mythology). And that's not different from us today when we take modern ideas for granted. Therefore the conflict is not on the level of "Zen views" but rather modern conditioning against an ancient one.

As for what could be qualified as Zen, it is better understood as a higher level teaching within Mahayana that focuses on wisdom. As such, it emphasises direct understanding of the truth of the real nature of mind and appearances, i.e. emptiness. Direct means not mediated by explanations but experienced personally. So, it is the final moment before enlightenment on the path of sila, samadhi and prajna. Therefore external entities like bodhisattvas and buddhas have no place here. So, Dazhu Huihai writes (<http://terebess.hu/zen/huihai-eng2.html>, X63n1223, p23, a9-12):

"Sentient beings must seek to save themselves and not wait for the Buddha to do it. If the Buddha could liberate sentient beings, then, since there have been Buddhas as numerous as all the dust motes that have ever existed, surely all of them would have been delivered by now. So why do we still loaf about in these realms of birth and death, unable to become Buddhas? Everyone should understand that sentient beings must save themselves. The Buddha will not do it. Make an effort! Practice yourself! Do not depend upon the power of other Buddhas."

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 6th, 2014 at 6:38 PM

Title: Re: Zen's view of bodhisattvas

Content:

Astus wrote:

If you look at current Chinese Buddhism, most organisations are not centred around a specific doctrine or practice, thus they often claim - in line with the idea of Humanistic Buddhism - that they embrace all eight schools of Chinese Buddhism (i.e. Vinaya, Madhyamaka, Pure Land, Chan, Tiantai, Huayan, Yogacara, Tantra).

For instance, in the Fo Guang Shan's school customs (http://www.fgs.org.tw/fgs/fgs_introduction.aspx), defining their approach, it is stated:

"To propagate all eight schools of Buddhism, and promote the coexistence of monastics and laity." (八宗兼弘，僧信共有。) (also in "The Buddha's Light Philosophy", p 139)

Practically speaking, Chinese Buddhism has never seen strong sectarianism, and monasteries have always accepted all sorts of teachings as long as one abided by the general regulations of monastic life. This, because of projecting Japanese Buddhism on the Chinese, Western scholars often misinterpreted as some sort of syncretism, most often as a mixture of Pure Land and Chan.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 7th, 2014 at 5:30 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Astus wrote:

Mind is what knows, the presence of consciousness. If you say you imagine/feel your brain to be your mind, that is not your mind, it is an image/feeling that the mind is aware of. So, if you want to locate the mind, find what knows.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 7th, 2014 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Astus wrote:

Brains and neurology are besides the point. Mahamudra is not a https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Philosophy_of_mind but a practical method that is to be applied within one's personal sphere of experience. If there are bodily feelings one identifies with mind, those should be looked into using the correct path of analysis as presented in the Mahamudra instructions. Theorising about all that is a different thing.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 9th, 2014 at 7:19 PM

Title: Re: How to reconcile both views?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think the first big step is to accept that Buddhism is not a "practical philosophy" as late 19th century colonists liked to present it to the Western intellectual elite, but an Asian religion. And if we move Buddhism under the category of religion it is not surprising at all that it is full of religious things like rituals, spirits, deities, magic spells, holy places, relic worship, etc. And you may find all that from the very beginning. It doesn't mean you have to accept ancient Indian beliefs in order to benefit from the Buddha's teachings.

However, there's nothing you need to do about traditional concepts you see in Asian Buddhist communities where people pray in front of statues and pictures for health and prosperity.

It all depends on what one's goal is with Buddhism. Think of it as a supermarket where you have a large selection of services. It is completely up to you to choose whatever you like. You can do chanting, prostrations, visualisations, philosophy, all sorts of meditation, and many other things. These are not differing views to reconcile, they are methods. The view itself is quite universal within Buddhism, the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Four_Noble_Truths, the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Three_marks_of_existence, <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Prat%C4%ABtyasamutp%C4%81da>, the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bodhipakkhiy%C4%81dhamm%C4%81>, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 9th, 2014 at 9:25 PM

Title: Bankei's All Things Resolved

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'd like to get clear on the meaning of "resolved" in the "lion's roar" of Bankei.

Japanese says, 一切の事は不生で調うのではないか。

Both English translations render it as: all things are perfectly resolved in the unborn.

How 調うのではない becomes resolved? Is it like dissolved, dispersed, destroyed, melted, disassembled? Or is there another meaning? Is this something colloquial or can it be connected to any Buddhist terms?

Later it is said that Bankei's teaching can be summed up as 不生万調（不生の心で万（すべ）て調（ととの）う）, but this is contrary to the previous one where 調う is denied.

Japanese: <http://www.sets.ne.jp/~zenhomepage/nipponnzen.2.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 10th, 2014 at 6:22 AM

Title: Re: Bankei's All Things Resolved

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think Bankei's example might help with the meaning of "resolved/organised":

その不生でととのひまする不生の証拠は、皆の衆がこちらむひて、身どもがかふ云う事を聴いてござるうちに、後にて烏の声雀の声、それぞれの声を聞こうと、思う念を生ぜずに居るに、烏の声雀の声が通じわかれて、間違わずに聞こゆるは、不生で聞くといふものでござるわひの。

"In the Unborn, all things are perfectly resolved. I can give you proof that they are. While you're facing me listening to me speak like this, if a crow cawed or a sparrow chirped, or some other sound occurred somewhere behind you, you would have no difficulty knowing it was a crow or a sparrow, or whatever, even without giving a thought to listening to it, because you were listening by means of the Unborn." (tr. Waddel, p. 40)

So, thanks PorkChop for highlighting that in the original saying it is actually a negative question and not a statement.

Later Waddel (p. 55) actually translates 調 using a different expression: "the Buddha-mind puts all things in perfect order by means of the Unborn" (佛心は不生にして、一切事がととのう。)

Now I feel quite confident in saying that "resolves" has the meaning of solution by harmonisation. Thanks Qianxi for giving a summary on the meaning of 調 in Chinese, it is a useful set of associations.

And if anyone else has something more to add, please do so.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 11th, 2014 at 7:22 PM

Title: Re: Interesting look at Lotus Sutra at Fake Buddha Quotes

Content:

Astus wrote:

What is often forgot in the search for the "original teachings" is that there is no such definition in Buddhism of what should be considered the Buddha's saying. It is, as the OP's quote shows, a confusion with modern Christian ideas about looking for the "real (historical) Jesus". Unlike the Judeo-Christian world view, Buddhism is not based on a historical narration but on the Saddharma that is accessible to all. So, verification of a teaching relies not on historical investigation but on personal experience.

"As for the qualities of which you may know, 'These qualities lead to utter disenchantment, to dispassion, to cessation, to calm, to direct knowledge, to self-awakening, to Unbinding': You may categorically hold, 'This is the Dhamma, this is the Vinaya, this is the Teacher's instruction.'"

(<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/an/an07/an07.079.than.html>)

Also check: <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/study/recognizing.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 2:23 AM

Title: Re: Who is it that hears?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Now, there are many points at which to access the principle. I will point out one approach that will allow you to return to the source.

Chinul: Do you hear the sounds of that crow cawing and that magpie calling?

Student: Yes.

Chinul: Trace them back and listen to your hearing-nature. Are there many sounds there?

Student: At that place, all sounds and discriminations are unascertainable.

Chinul: Marvelous! Marvelous! This is Avalokiteśvara's method for accessing the principle. Let me ask you again. You said, "At that place, all sounds and discriminations are unascertainable.” But since they are unascertainable, at such a time isn’t the hearing-nature just empty?

Student: Originally it is not empty. It is always bright and never benighted.

Chinul: What is this essence that is not empty?

Student: As it has no form or shape, it is ineffable.

Chinul: This is the life force of all the buddhas and patriarchs—have no further doubts. Since it has no form or shape, how can it be either large or small? Since it is neither large nor small, how can it have any boundaries? Since it has no boundaries, it cannot have either inside or outside. Since there is no inside or outside, there is no far or near. As there is no far or near, there is no here or there. As there is no here or there, there is no coming or going. As there is no coming or going, there is no birth or death. As there is no birth or death, there is no past or present. As there is no past or present, there is no delusion or awakening. As there is no delusion or awakening, there is no ordinary person or sage. As there is no ordinary person or sage, there is no purity or impurity. Since there is no impurity or purity, there is no right or wrong. Since there is no right or wrong, names and words do not apply to it. Since none of these concepts apply, all sense-bases and sense-objects, all deluded thoughts, even forms and shapes, names and words are all inapplicable. Hence how can it be anything but originally void and calm and originally no-thing?

(From " Moguja’s Secrets on Cultivating the Mind " in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, Vol. 2, 221-222)

A topic with links to two translations of the text:

<http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=105&t=12572>.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 5:14 PM

Title: Re: What Buddha Actually Did According to pudgala2

Content:

Astus wrote:

http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html#div-3 is already clear that a bodhisattva should save beings without the concept of beings, otherwise he is not a bodhisattva at all.

Then, the Vimalakirti Sutra has a whole chapter (ch. 7) regarding how sentient beings to be viewed.

[Mañjuśrī] also asked, “If one wishes to save sentient beings, what should be eradicated?”

Answer: “If one wishes to save sentient beings, the afflictions should be eradicated.”
(BDK edition, p 126)

And the idea that beings are no different from afflictions has also been articulated in Chan from early on.

False thoughts are sentient beings. For the body and mind to be motionless is called “to save sentient beings.”

(Shenxiu: The Five Expedient Means, in "The Northern School and the formation of early Ch'an Buddhism"; tr. McRae, p 181)

So, I don't see how the definition of sentient beings has been misunderstood by the tradition or followers. That there is no self but only the five aggregates has been the teaching of the Buddha ever since. This is not a Zen specific teaching, it is fundamental in all Buddhist traditions. Even saying that sentient beings are no different from buddhas and afflictions are enlightenment is just common Mahayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 15th, 2014 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: A Physicalist Theory of Mind

Content:

Astus wrote:

The contradiction of mind versus matter is unresolvable simply because they are defined as different in nature (material-immaterial). Various solutions have been proposed, often reducing dualism into monism.

The Buddha was asked whether the soul (jiva) is identical or different from the body (sarira). And he said such a position "is a thicket of views, a wilderness of views, a contortion of views, a writhing of views, a fetter of views. It is accompanied by suffering, distress, despair, & fever, and it does not lead to disenchantment, dispassion, cessation; to calm, direct knowledge, full Awakening, Unbinding." (MN 72)

Some misunderstand that as avoiding so called "metaphysical questions", but that's not it. Rather, when there is no substance (difference in nature, material-immaterial), there is no contradiction. Instead of a body-mind dualism there are the five aggregates and the eighteen dhatus, various categorisations for the complete realm of experience, where things arise and cease in an interdependent causal nexus.

Kant refused to take a position in the idealist-realist debate, and it seems to me that phenomenology is the idea that avoids the idealist-positivist extremes. As for physicists trying to argue for a philosophical concept, they seem to be mixing up scientific results with philosophical reasoning. And that's not really better than confusing theology with biology.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 16th, 2014 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: Who is it that hears?

Content:

Ethan said:

Can anyone elaborate on the student's comment, "Originally it is not empty"?

Astus wrote:

Emptiness is not nothingness, that's what it means. Awareness is the function of emptiness, the substance. Function and substance are not two different things. Awareness itself is empty, emptiness itself is awareness. And awareness is the countless phenomena experienced all the time.

"Simply knowing that there is nothing you need to understand is in fact seeing the nature." (Moguja's Secrets on Cultivating the Mind, p 218)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 18th, 2014 at 5:19 AM

Title: Re: Instantaneous awakening.

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Instantaneous awakening to the ordinary mind being buddha." - that single sentence encompasses such a complicated conceptual system that in order to comprehend it intellectually can take years. And then comes actualisation of such an understanding, working for who knows how many years or even lives.

Let's put this idea of "instantaneous awakening" into ordinary English, so that those who know nothing about Buddhism can make sense of it. How would that sound?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 22nd, 2014 at 6:11 AM

Title: Re: Jodo Shinshu and the non-believer's "outcome"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Amida is not some kind of deity to enforce anything on beings. Everybody is a victim of their own doings. Therefore, only if one has the proper connection with the Vow it is possible to be born in the Pure Land. And that connection is faith itself.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 24th, 2014 at 7:52 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land Contradicts Buddha Teachings....

Content:

Astus wrote:

Besides the Pure Land being out of samsara, eternal life there doesn't mean permanent. In fact, whatever that is alive is necessarily changing, therefore not permanent. The Pure Land itself is a step on the path to buddhahood. Once buddhahood is reached, you don't stay in Amitabha's land.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 28th, 2014 at 8:15 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land Contradicts Buddha Teachings....

Content:

jeeprs said:

I am interested in how 'eternal' and 'permanent' might be distinguished.

Basically, the Pure Land teachings seem to me to arise from the deification of the Buddha. That is not meant as a criticism, but I find it hard to distinguish quite a lot of what is said in Pure Land philosophy from Christian theology.

Astus wrote:

Eternal in Amitabha's case means unending, continuing uninterrupted. Permanent means static, not changing. Samsara has no beginning or end, but it is not static.

Yes, the Pure Land teachings are part of the general trend to venerate buddhas, bodhisattvas and other superior beings. However, Christian theology is quite a different matter in a different context and world view. The resemblance is very superficial. In order to understand what Pure Land Buddhism is about and how it fits into Mahayana, one needs to study Mahayana. Otherwise it's all just speculation without any relevant knowledge.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 1st, 2014 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Instantaneous awakening.

Content:

White Lotus said:

it just cant be done. this points to the necessity of having travelled some way along the path in order to appreciate such expressions. there needs to be prior experience in order to appreciate the term: "Instantaneous Awakening". can anyone here put it into simple understandable language. I doubt it!

Astus wrote:

Could we then say that the myth of instantaneous awakening is busted?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 6th, 2014 at 3:06 AM

Title: Re: Three Steps Insight Meditation

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kunle,

The third step could be matched with Yogacara's parinispanna, the perfected nature, if one wants to follow their trisvabhava system.

"Through the perception of mind-only
One achieves the non-perception of objects;
Through the non-perception of objects

There is also the non-perception of mind."

(Vasubandhu: Trisvabhava-nirdeśa, v 36, <http://buddhism.lib.ntu.edu.tw/FULLTEXT/JR-EPT/garfie.htm>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 6th, 2014 at 4:55 PM

Title: Re: Three Steps Insight Meditation

Content:

Astus wrote:

By not out there I meant not independent of the mind. When something is not independent of the mind it is not an objective reality. As a mental creation it has no more reality than dreams and such. So it could even be said that things that seem to be independent of one's mind are non-existent, and existent only as mental products. Therefore real existence independent of mind is an illusion, a mistake. Since there is nothing left to attach to as reliable and real, there is no subject that could be attached either. So setting up three steps is pedagogical only, although this is no surprise as all teachings are nothing but skilful means.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 6th, 2014 at 6:11 PM

Title: Re: Three Steps Insight Meditation

Content:

kirtu said:

Cittamatra is in fact taught as a prelude to Madhyamaka in Sakya.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean Cittamatra in its limited sense of "all phenomena are only mind"?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 6th, 2014 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: Three Steps Insight Meditation

Content:

Malcolm said:

As in Shantaraskita's Yogacara Madhyamaka.

Astus wrote:

Yes, that's what I thought of, thank you.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 8th, 2014 at 6:21 PM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

Astus wrote:

It seems to me that the confusion regarding Yogacara originates from the unchecked presumption that Madhyamaka is some sort of pure communication of the ultimate truth in the form of total negation. That is a failure of taking account of common reality and the so called everyday truth. If we look at Nagarjuna's Middle Discourse, he uses classical abhidharma terms in chapter 17 to explain karma. As I see it, what Yogacara does is that it organises and explains in a detailed fashion how karma, mind and the whole path of liberation works, unlike Madhyamaka that leaves it to abhidharma. So, Yogacara was/is necessary to establish a more complete and complex view of Mahayana than what early Madhyamaka presents.

Later fusions and debates between Indian and especially Tibetan thinkers can easily distort the perception of the various ways Yogacara was interpreted by its followers. As far as I can tell, the argument that Yogacara posits an ultimate existence contrary to the understanding of emptiness is an (intentional/unintentional) mistake. That there is a really existing mind, or that dependent nature is an absolute reality are equally faulty concepts, as either it is a claim that the dreamer (grasper, self) is real or that the dream (grasped, dharmas) is real.

Regarding the meaning of the three natures, see Vasubandhu's Trisvabhava-nirdeśa 11-13 (tr. Kochumuttom, p 249; also: <http://buddhism.lib.ntu.edu.tw/FULLTEXT/JR-EPT/garfie.htm>), and also look at Trimsika-vijnaptimatratā 20-25, and chapter 10 of Chengweishilun (BDK edition: pp 281-296) for commentary.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 9th, 2014 at 8:24 PM

Title: Re: Obaku?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Besides that there are only a couple of books available in English on Obaku-shu, if anyone wanted to practice in a sort of zen-nenbutsu style, it is a lot easier to just go for Chinese Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 5:56 AM

Title: Re: Non-celibacy

Content:

Astus wrote:

First I'd like to extend the area of investigation to all sense pleasures and not only sex. This I find important, because while sex is supposedly the ultimate sense pleasure, it is hardly the only one. In fact, there are perfectly ordinary people, who are not even Buddhists, who spend years without any sexual relationship, but not without all sense pleasures.

Eating and drinking are the most common source of sense pleasure. Tasty food is practically a basic requirement even for the cheapest fast food products. And although infusion can sustain the bodily functions, just as various nutritional products, we don't even call them food. Something without any taste is almost inedible. Why is that? Because we like to eat and we like to feel good tastes. But I have yet to see Buddhists debating with each other about whether to switch to injecting themselves with some sort of nutritional liquid or stay with consuming common food. That's probably because eating is not considered a big issue. In the same fashion one could consider various drinks - and there's no need to include alcohol here - like tea, coffee, juices, milk, and all the other kinds. Other sensory areas also give us almost infinite forms of pleasure, like the melody of a sutra recitation and the golden colours of a Buddha painting. And the joys of an intellectual challenge is a whole different area, although something not considered sense pleasure.

Is it possible to enjoy a nice meal and still be a good Buddhist? Is it allowed for a zealous practitioner to find a few moments of happiness in the smell of spring flowers? How about the hermit living up in the mountains and writing poems about the beauty of the scene?

Can a buddha eat a slice of chocolate cake and not fall out of nirvana? If yes, is it because he feels no taste, or because he makes no difference between good or bad taste, or because he is not attached to it, or is it something else? If he feels no taste, that would be annihilationism. If he makes no difference between good or bad taste, that would be indifference. If he is not attached to it, that would be escapism.

It is easy to come up with some theoretical excuse that everything is empty and the mind is originally pure. Or a practical-looking attitude of "just be in the moment". Although they are good advice, unless one can live it, they are useless. Whatever solution one thinks is there, it is nothing but another identity view.

No matter what is the explanation, the very effort of trying to prove that enjoying this or that shows how one is stuck with a concept of purity. What one should pay attention to is rather the emotional and intellectual frustration one generates constantly regarding all sorts of phenomena. This approach of "I'm not good enough" is mistaken from the very beginning, and the same goes for such ideas as "I'm sinful because I like strawberry cake".

As I see it, besides the saintly stories of the enlightened masters of the past one should also recognise the human world. And only when samsara and nirvana are no different from each other, when things are simply what they are, then it becomes possible to stop being afraid of whatever comes or whatever goes.

Yunmen said (tr. App, p 95),

"when someone gets there, speaking about fire does not burn his mouth. He can discuss the matter all day long without it ever touching his lips and teeth and without uttering a single word. Though he eats and all day long wears his robe, he never touches a single grain of rice nor a single thread."

And Linji paraphrasing Lanza (tr. Sasaki, p 11),

"Followers of the Way, as to buddhadharma, no effort is necessary. You have only to be ordinary, with nothing to do -defecating, urinating, wearing clothes, eating food, and lying down when tired. Fools laugh at me, but the wise understand."

Dazhu Huihai explains (tr. Lok To),

Once a Vinaya Master came and asked: "In your practice of the Tao, do you still work hard?"

The Master answered: "Yes, I still work hard."

The Vinaya Master asked: "How hard?"

The Master retorted: "If I'm hungry, I eat. If I'm tired, I sleep. "

The Vinaya Master asked: "Do all other people work hard just as you do?"

The Master answered: "No, not in the same way."

The Vinaya Master asked: "Why not?"

The Master answered: "While they are eating, they are not really eating due to too much thinking. While they are sleeping, they are not really sleeping due to too much mental agitation. Therefore, they do not work in the same way I do."

The Vinaya Master, on hearing this, fell silent.

And Bodhidharma relates this to sex (tr. Red Pine, p 39),

But since married laymen don't give up sex, how can they become Buddhas?

I only talk about seeing your nature. I don't talk about sex simply because you don't see your nature. Once you see your nature, sex is basically immaterial. It ends along with your delight in it. Even if some habits remain, they can't harm you, because your nature is essentially pure. Despite dwelling in a material body of four elements, your nature is basically pure. It can't be corrupted.

Finally, <http://www.wisdompubs.org/book/wake-and-laugh/selections> sums it up,

"It's natural to think about and take care of the things that come up in your life. I've never said, "Don't make money, don't participate in society, don't fall in love, don't do anything at all." Just understand that everything is already flowing, and don't try to cling to it. Nothing remains stationary and unchanging."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 4:58 PM

Title: Re: Obaku?

Content:

Astus wrote:

As a background information on the origin of the Obaku school I recommend the book <https://books.google.com/books?id=Y7sueo8jsYwC>. It shows how Yinyuan Longqi (Ingen Ryuki, founder of Obaku-shu) was a member of a highly sectarian group that worked hard to take over the (Chan) Buddhist scene in China.

And an essay by the same author on Mount Huangbo:

http://www.eastasianhistory.org/sites/default/files/article-content/31/EAH31_02.pdf.

As for the idea that Soto Zen is a "one practice school", that is a major simplification. Dogen basically took everything he had seen and learnt in China back to Japan, including monastic regulations and architectural style. It is a very modern idea - strongly propagated by Kodo Sawaki - to reduce everything to seated meditation as the sole thing to do. Even the emphasis on Dogen and his works is an 18th century innovation of the Soto school started by Menzan Zuiho.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 5:12 PM

Title: Re: What is "mind" in mahamudra

Content:

Astus wrote:

You might also do some homework on the subject:

http://www.namsebangdzo.com/Distinguishing_Dharma_p/11445.htm

<http://www.rinpoche.com/teachings/conwisdom.pdf>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 19th, 2014 at 4:50 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land for the not very faith-inclined?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Besides just accepting/believing in the Vow (i.e., reciting the name connects one to Amita Buddha and brings about deliverance to the Pure Land after death), one can take this as a method (it is a Mahayana skilful means after all). The first thing to consider is if one can accept that there is such a thing as karma. Karma means that there is a non-material mental continuum that follows a specific type of causal law. If you cannot agree to that - either because of indecision or disbelief - then no matter what practice you choose, it is only for a temporary pacification of mind. If you want to move beyond that level, either you leave it to chance or you start investigating your mind and studying the teachings. On the other hand, if you accept karma, then it can be followed by considering first how one's attachment leads to various births, then a contemplation on the existence of bodhisattvas, buddha-lands and buddhas. Once that is understood, it becomes obvious how and why birth in the Pure Land is possible through buddha-remembrance.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 6:10 PM

Title: Re: Nothing Exists

Content:

Astus wrote:

Platform Sutra, chapter 9 (tr McRae, BDK edition, p 77-78):

Shenhui said, "Nonabiding is the fundamental, and seeing is the master."

The master said, "What will this novice say next!"

Shenhui then asked, "When Your Reverence sits in meditation, does he see or not?"

The master struck Shenhui with his staff three times and said, "When I hit you, does it hurt or not?"

[Shenhui] answered, "It both hurts and does not hurt."

The master said, "I also see and do not see."

Shenhui asked, "What is this seeing and also not seeing?"

The master said, "My seeing is to see constantly my own mind's errors. I do not see other people's right and wrong or good and evil. This is to see and also not to see. You said it hurts and does not hurt. How about this? If you do not hurt, then you're the same as a tree or rock. If you hurt, then you're the same as an ordinary [unenlightened] person, who would become resentful. When you just said 'seeing and also not seeing' [you thought] they were two extremes, and your 'hurts and does not hurt' were [your misconception of] birth and death. But you don't see your self-nature, so you're just playing around."

Shenhui bowed in gratitude.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 10:31 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

JKhedrup said:

It would be interesting to see how "speed" compares in Vajrayana vis a vis Pure Land.

Because of course if one goes to the Pure Land of Sukhavati after death one can bypass a great deal of samsaric experience. However, from the POV of the evolution of a Bodhisattva I am guessing on the theoretical level progress would be a bit slower, as one needs to receive teachings from Amitabha and cultivate the gradual Sutric approach towards realization. Also, there are the different "grades" of lotuses, which has always confused me a bit. How are these grades determined?

At first look, it seems PL is a pretty good deal too!

Astus wrote:

The Pure Land path is the easy method of guaranteed buddhahood in one life.

In the <http://www.amidanet.com/amida-sutra-b.htm>:

"sentient beings born in that land all dwell in the Stage of Non-retrogression, and will not fall again into an evil realm, be born in a border-land or in the state of debased people or mlecchas. They always enjoy visiting pure lands of other Buddhas. With their excellent vows and practice advancing and developing every moment, they will unfailingly realize the highest, perfect Enlightenment."

The <http://www.amidanet.com/contemplation-sutra.htm> says about birth on the lowest level of the lowest grade:

"Because he calls the Buddha's Name, with each repetition, the evil karma which he has committed during eighty kotis of kalpas of Samsara is extinguished. When he comes to die, he sees before him a golden lotus-flower like the disk of the sun, and in an instant he is born within a lotus-bud in the Land of Utmost Bliss. After twelve great kalpas the lotus-bud opens. When the flower opens, Avalokiteshvara and Mahasthamaprapta teach him with voices of great compassion the method of extinguishing evil karma through the realization of Suchness of all dharmas. Hearing this, he rejoices and immediately awakens aspiration for Enlightenment."

The 19th vow in the <http://www.amidanet.com/larger-sutra-1.htm>:

"If, when I attain Buddhahood, sentient beings in the lands of the ten quarters, who awaken aspiration for Enlightenment, do various meritorious deeds and sincerely desire to be born in my land, should not, at their death, see me appear before them surrounded by a multitude of sages, may I not attain perfect Enlightenment."

And vow 46:

"If, when I attain Buddhahood, bodhisattvas in my land should not be able to hear spontaneously whatever teachings they may wish, may I not attain perfect Enlightenment."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Malcolm said:

This is not a statement that they will achieve buddhahood in a single life in Sukhavati.

Astus wrote:

The 11th vow:

"If, when I attain Buddhahood, humans and devas in my land should not dwell in the Definitely Assured State and unfailingly reach Nirvana, may I not attain perfect Enlightenment."

Later in the Larger Sutra:

"Sentient beings who are born in that Buddha-land all reside among those assured of Nirvana."

Also:

"However hard you may practice in this life, it can only be for a short while. In the life to come you will be born in the land of Amitayus and enjoy endless bliss there. Being forever in accord with the Way, you will no longer be subject to birth-and-death and be free of the afflictions caused by greed, anger and stupidity. If you wish your life to be as long as a kalpa, a hundred kalpas, or ten million kalpas, it will be just as you please. You will dwell in effortless spontaneity and attain Nirvana."

Shinran's collection of quotes regarding enlightenment in the Pure Land:
<http://www.amidanet.com/kgss-e.htm>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 11:47 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Malcolm said:

None of these citations assure buddhahood in a single lifetime.

Astus wrote:

True, strictly speaking, all they assure one of is the stage of non-regression, and that guarantees buddhahood. However, life is unlimited in Sukhavati, so perfect enlightenment can happen in one lifetime.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 12:52 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kukai has a short treatise on <http://www.amidanet.com/sokushingi.htm>, as an answer to the original question.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 27th, 2014 at 6:18 PM

Title: Re: Daily life practice?

Content:

Astus wrote:

To me zen is to see life as life. Life is inevitably and unstoppably changing every moment. What does not change is dead. Trying to hold on to something is murder. The constant failure to keep things still is the dissatisfaction with oneself and with life. Thus, abiding nowhere is the buddha-mind, and buddha-mind is what zen is all about.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 28th, 2014 at 6:10 PM

Title: Re: Daily life practice?

Content:

duckfiasco said:

Is this related to the quote by Dogen, "Impermanence is Buddha-Nature"?

I notice that trying to remain aware of impermanence and see the rich interplay of things, life in general is far less painful.

The view is more keen curiosity than having preferences for certain outcomes.

I'm unclear what "abiding nowhere" means. I realize it's hard to put into words a stranger on the internet can understand.

Astus wrote:

You can relate it to Dogen's teachings if you want, but it's not necessary. What I'm saying is about first hand experience, that is, something to check for yourself.

Maintaining an awareness of impermanence is an important practice, but that's not what I meant. Everything is already changing, there's nothing you can do about that. The problem is when one happens to form a concept, views it as permanent, and thus grasps it and identifies with it. That is, ignorance is having a view and acting on it, it is not the lack of something but something added. Thus it is said that the buddha-nature is clouded and one simply has to remove the dirt. However, that dirt is just this mistake about appearances, of trying to fix things and make things happen (i.e. generating karma).

Abiding nowhere, or non-abiding, is the central teaching of prajnaparamita as well as zen. Understanding that already the mind is without any abode (fixed state) and phenomena are originally empty (without anything to hold on to), that is seeing nature (that change is universal) and not abiding anywhere.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 29th, 2014 at 5:07 PM

Title: Re: Arhats and Bodhisattvas

Content:

Astus wrote:

It reminds me of the common criticism found in the popular versions of Mahayana (e.g. Zen and Tantra), that the common path of the bodhisattva, as it is actually presented by most of the sutras, takes too long and it is too difficult. What hardly anyone dares to consider is that those popular versions actually teach sravakayana under the pretence of "buddhahood in this life". Also, both Zen and Tantra are famous for emphasising discipleship (sravaka-hood). So, I'd add to Bhikkhu Bodhi's quote that hardly anyone wants to take the bodhisattva path, and all the arguments against Theravada are practically valid against the same people who use them.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 6:36 AM

Title: Re: Daily life practice?

Content:

duckfiasco said:

I read something similar, and notice that each perception forms a mental wave of consciousness or an impression. Then that impression can be glommed onto and fantasies woven around it, long after the initial contact has faded. Is this where the grasping and identification you mean occurs? It's very, very deep and habitual in my mind, and daunting to try to maintain consistent awareness of something happening so frequently.

As for "understanding that already the mind is without any abode" what is this understanding? Surely not an intellectual set of ideas? It wouldn't matter anyway since I can't remember most of what I learn, so I'll forget. Then some experiential insight? If so, how does one come to see this without setting up goals to see something and doom zazen from the start? This is the paradox of Zen I keep running into: it's not nothing but at the same time it's not something in the realm of all the "somethings" I'm used to.

Astus wrote:

There is no state or perception you need to hold on to. If you want to figure out something extraordinary, that is just another impermanent experience. Whatever thought, feeling or sensory impression occurs, it inevitably disappears, and there is nothing you need to do about it. That is why it is often said that the mind is naturally peaceful and aware. Ignorance is mistaking impermanent phenomena for a permanent self, that is, intellectualising (trying to understand and/or explain things) and emotionalising (mostly liking or disliking something). The mistake lies not in the fact that there are thoughts and feelings, but in regarding them as real, as true, as self or a possession of the self. Knowledge is to see that all thoughts and feelings are momentary appearances. To see this you just need to sit down (or you can lie down, or stand, or walk, doesn't actually matter, sitting is recommended mostly because it can give a balance between relaxation and tension), and look at what happens. Is there any experience that stays? Can you even do anything to maintain an experience?

Non-abiding mind is just the natural - i.e. already present - awareness. Experience is always changing. Experience means that there is awareness, and since it changes, there is nothing to grasp, nothing that can be taken as reliable, as self. So it is an empty awareness, without attachment, and that is a mind without abode. Don't your thoughts come and go? So, there is no thought to hang on to from the very beginning. The first error we can make is to believe that we can maintain a thought, a state of mind, an experience. The second error is to believe that we have to get rid of a thought. Without attachment and rejection the mind is naturally as it is, open and aware.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 5:23 PM

Title: Re: Daily life practice?

Content:

duckfiasco said:

The difficult point I think is the ceaseless, instantaneous identification with what the mind does. I see dukka woven into the mind but think "well, what else is there other than this churning out of thoughts, feelings etc.?"

It feels like trying to watch the surface of a lake, and bugs keep skittering by. Now, they're going to do that no matter what, but I seem to pay attention to every single one to the point of exhaustion, and I've lost sight of the water's calm surface. All I see is bugs making endless ripples.

Astus wrote:

As long as one thinks that bugs should not be there, that the surface must be calm and peaceful, there will be dissatisfaction. What is dissatisfaction? When things don't match our expectations. Now, is the source of the problem found in the things or in the expectations? Or, in Zen lingo, do you hit the cart or the horse?

If you believe that you are your mind, your consciousness, your attention or whatever else, then you want to freeze it in some state you consider acceptable. If you want control over what happens, that is assuming a self. But if you want to disassociate from everything going on, that is also assuming a self. What you might want to see is that even when you get lost in a stream of ideas, that is as insubstantial as everything else. Don't consider one type of experience good and another type bad. That's because this kind of like-dislike attitude is the very problem. If you focus on the bugs, then just focus on them, it is the same awareness as the awareness of the whole lake. In fact, both are just temporary experiences. The question is whether you want to stay somewhere, want to move somewhere, or not.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 31st, 2014 at 5:09 PM

Title: Re: Arhats and Bodhisattvas

Content:

Malcolm said:

"Buddhahood in this life" means completing the two accumulations which lead to both freedom and omniscience.

It is impossible for someone to have generated bodhicitta to experience the fruit of an arhat, i.e. cessation, indeed, it is against the very principles of the bodhisattva path to do so.

Astus wrote:

Completing the two accumulations by what? If killing people in a dream is not the same karma as actually being a mass murderer, imagining doing the paramitas and actually practising them for at least three immeasurably long cosmic time periods might not be equal either. Or we can say that there is the buddha-nature already perfect and complete that requires no such accumulation of anything, although this practically means non-attachment to the aggregates.

As for cessation being the fruit, that is claiming that the Buddha answered the question regarding the life of a Tathagata after death with a negative statement.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 12:36 AM

Title: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Astus wrote:

If and when someone agrees that the whole of samsara from hells to heavens is painful and unsatisfactory, liberation from it is the logical choice. But when nirvana is presented as not only the end of all the inconvenient things in life, but the end of all the good things as well, how could enlightenment be desirable? When one is without all the attachments and goals that motivate human beings to get up in the morning, isn't that like being totally uninterested in everything, like losing one's appetite?

If one is free from like and dislike, hope and fear, there is no reason to do anything. The only type of action left is mechanical reaction without emotions, a robot made of flesh and blood. Although it is said that nirvana is the great happiness, it only means total contentment, that is, being satisfied and thus wanting nothing, again a state that lacks all motivation to achieve anything. When there's nothing left to do, why do anything at all?

It is taught that compassion motivates the buddhas and bodhisattvas. However, is it anything else than externalising what otherwise common beings have as internal motivation? Isn't it like a slave or a puppet who acts only as others will, or like natural phenomena like rain and wind?

Or if we say that attachment is already enlightenment, that emotions like anger and worry are naturally empty and harmless, what is the difference between a buddha and a common mortal? If through awareness one is not affected by whatever emotion or thought occur, that turns feelings dead and one is not moved by them at all, losing all motivation.

So, can the Buddha have a human face instead of a blissed out aloofness?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 3:17 AM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Lindama said:

The attachment stops, not the activity. One does the next thing... the aloof, empty robot thingy is a misunderstanding although it may appear as aloofness to others. As one example, when tired, sleep. further, the ending of samsara does not insure the end of so-called bad things happening.

Astus wrote:
What is the cause of activity?

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 3:22 AM
Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?
Content:

David N. Snyder said:
I thought this was just a Theravada dilemma. So Mahayanists struggle with this too? I thought you guys had Bodhisattva vows, Buddha-lands, Pure-lands, Buddha-fields.

Astus wrote:
Those are either pre-nirvana (bodhisattva activity) or manifestations of a buddha's pre-nirvana activities (accumulation of merit). There's also the idea of non-abiding nirvana, where buddhas work on saving beings out of compassion, but I have addressed this type in the OP.

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 3:23 AM
Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?
Content:

Sherab Dorje said:
Astus, I think the question you are asking is mistaken. I believe a more relevant question would be: Is Samsara Worth It?

Astus wrote:
See my first sentence in the OP. However, it still does not answer the nature of buddha/bodhisattva-activity.

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 6:08 AM
Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?
Content:

Vajrasvapna said:
Nirvana is seen as extinction only in the Hinayana's teachings.

Astus wrote:
A nirvana is just as empty in Mahayana as samsara. Nevertheless, one needs to realise that emptiness, and through that one is liberated from all afflictions and attachments. So, there is no difference in that nirvana is about freedom from both good and bad things. Therefore the question about the desirability of enlightenment is not resolved.

Vajrasvapna said:
The fact that a bodhisattva perceive the world as illusion, not taking his motivation for living

Astus wrote:

If someone realises that what one wants is unreal the desire to obtain it becomes pointless. If by motivation for living you mean compassion, that's a different question addressed later.

Vajrasvapna said:

Nevertheless we must try to improve our illusory life. Otherwise we will keep getting bruised by illusory events. Since we don't realize they're illusions, we suffer just as if they were real

Astus wrote:

That's not an answer, as it only says one has to try to improve one's illusory life only because one fails to see it as illusory. What if it is understood clearly to be an illusion?

Vajrasvapna said:

The compassion of Buddhas and bodhisattvas originates from emptiness, when we realize that all beings possess the same empty and luminous nature, then we can generate the four immeasurable.

Astus wrote:

That is when motivation becomes external, dependent on others in stead of one's own will. That is being a puppet.

Vajrasvapna said:

The difference is that a Buddha see the world free of dualistic perceptions, while ordinary beings remain trapped in a dualistic vision

Astus wrote:

Anger, fear, love, desire - they all exist within a dualistic perception only. But that eliminates the possibility of seeing attachment itself as empty, since there is no attachment present.

Vajrasvapna said:

Moreover, buddhas and bodhisattvas may use negative emotions as a tool for compassion

Astus wrote:

That does not qualify as actually having those negative emotions, it is only acting.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 6:12 AM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

One of the attributes of nirvana, in any case, is joyousness, sukha (as distinct from dukka). For various reasons many of the descriptive texts about Nirvana are couched in negative terms, but there are also positive descriptions, wherein it is described as 'blissful', 'peaceful' and 'sublime'.

Astus wrote:

Once total contentment and bliss is reached, what then? There isn't any motivation left to do anything, is there?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 7:01 AM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

That should give you plenty to go on with.

Astus wrote:

See third paragraph in the OP.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 2:44 AM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Lindama said:

there is no cause and no effect

Astus wrote:

That means action occurs without cause, same as claiming that from nothing comes something, or there is no activity at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 3:10 AM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

The idea of liberated or not liberated beings is just something conceptual

If you remain imprisoned in samsara, in fact, it makes no difference from the absolute point of view.

Samsara possesses great pleasures, but also great suffering, it is a matter of whether you prefer to live in a world of illusion or seek liberation. Red pill or blue pill?

Astus wrote:

Just as all questions, all answers are conceptual as well. But without concepts there is not even the teaching, not to mention nirvana.

From that absolute point of view there is no absolute point of view, therefore even referring to an absolute point of view is a relative statement, and as such necessarily recognises a difference between absolute and relative.

If one needs to choose between relative and absolute, the final view excludes all attachments, both good and bad things. Therefore, it is no solution to the question of the activity of an enlightened being.

Vajrasvapna said:

It means to live free from attachment to hopes and fears, no matter what happens you are always well

Astus wrote:

One is always well because there is nothing that could move him. Even if there are appearances, they are perceived as pure phenomena, unlike for an ordinary human being. And that means a very solid distinction between a buddha and a common mortal, where a buddha lacks all human qualities. Thus a buddha is practically an abstract concept that feels nothing and thinks nothing.

Vajrasvapna said:

in this state compassion arises naturally

Astus wrote:

What does it mean to arise naturally? Like, without an actual cause? If so, that violates dependent origination.

Vajrasvapna said:

even if he lives as a householder, is not affected by negative emotions or ego-clinging. Understanding the void nature of ordinary worldly activities, he is neither attracted to them nor afraid of them.

Astus wrote:

As a householder one has to take care of many things. If there is no attraction, there is no cause to have a spouse, have children, have tasty food, warm rooms, etc. If there is no fear, there is no reason to have doors and locks, to wear clothes, to clean the house, etc. Or if what is meant is stronger emotional states, like love and hatred, or even mania and paranoia, then one is like some emotionless robot, just doing what should be done according to some imagined set of programs and norms.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 3:13 AM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I think it comes from acting, and being, without selfish motives - which means you can do what the situation calls for, or what duty requires, without a sense of self-seeking. As such it is universally recognized in all the wisdom traditions.

Astus wrote:

Do what the situation calls for means a judgement call, and judgement requires a set of rules one follows. Duty is a good example of believing in rules. And when Arjuna massacres his relatives, it is perfectly fine according to Krishna, because that is a warriors duty. Just doing what the situation calls for. But I doubt that the Buddha would agree with Krishna.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 3:23 AM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Mkoll said:

Is the taste of an orange worth it? You won't know until you try it.

Astus wrote:

What makes a man taste a new food? Friends tell him it is good. An advertisement tells him it is good. It looks or smells good. Unlike food, nirvana is not something one can order online. So, why should one want nirvana? If what one gets renders the person totally content and peaceful, isn't it losing all interest in life and going on an eternal holiday?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 3:38 AM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Lindama said:

huh? no... it's more like we do the next thing. I have already explained this. it's not about nothing.... perhaps I was sloppy, I mean that we don't need a lot of mental constructs and reasons.

Astus wrote:

That sounds like a biorobot. I don't think anyone needs a lot of thinking to do the dishes and other daily chores. However, that is hardly the sign of living the life of an enlightened being.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Jesse said:

When we stop grasping at ideas, emotions, thoughts it's not like they go away, or we don't feel them anymore, it just becomes a choice, and we almost form a new relationship to these things, rather than being confused and consumed by them, we exist with them in a more healthy manner.

Astus wrote:

What is that more healthy manner?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 3:46 AM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Fa Dao said:

by not being slaves to these things they are free and no longer create actions/causes/karma...its not a bland state of nothingness but a dimension of pure potentiality.....

Astus wrote:

Experiencing emotions without attachment is practically not experiencing them at all, as most of the emotions come from attachment, like feeling sorry for losing one's favourite umbrella. A dimension of pure potentiality, when there is no actuality allowed to emerge, cannot be differentiated from nothingness.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 5:13 AM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

kirtu said:

Is Nirvana worth it?

No of course not. I'd much rather wander from life to life fixated upon total reactivity and enjoying the sufferings especially of the lower realms. Ignorance rules!

Astus wrote:

See the first sentence: "If and when someone agrees that the whole of samsara from hells to heavens is painful and unsatisfactory, liberation from it is the logical choice."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 5:49 AM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Lindama said:

how do you know

Astus wrote:

Because then all people without the inclination to use their minds are living buddhas.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 4:57 PM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

seeker242 said:

Curious. What do you make of Wu wei action? Or "wei wu wei"? It seems like you are saying it's just a load of BS.

Astus wrote:

It depends on what level we look at it. As a general, superficial, poetic description of unhindered non-karmic action, it is fine. But if you give it some thought, the expression of "doing without doing" or "non-doing" makes zero sense, because either there is or there is not something according to the basic principles of logic. The middle view in Buddhism is dependent origination, expressed as the unity of essence and function in East Asia, therefore assuming only a causeless substance is necessarily an extreme and wrong view. Also, once such a substance is taken to be the absolute, it is not possible to answer for activity.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 6:04 PM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Dan74 said:

I am still wondering whether you simply wrote it to challenge people to look into this rather than being a question you are seriously entertaining at this stage in your practice.

Astus wrote:

I consider it a very good question to investigate. I also find the usual answers often repeated in Buddhism lacking in many ways.

Dan74 said:

It's very much a natural action as other have said, like reaching for the pillow in the night.

Astus wrote:

Reaching for the pillow at night was an example used for the compassionate action of Guanyin by Daowu. But what separates ignorant (dark) action from non-discriminating (dark) action? I think <http://www.mro.org/mr/archive/24-2/articles/dogenandkoansdaido.html> has something important to say when he emphasises ethics. However, that is still not enough. As long as this body and mind are negated in order to find something beyond that is peaceful and supreme (the aloof buddha), it remains impossible even to reach for that pillow.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 6:09 PM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

oushi said:

It makes perfect sense as an act without intention. There is a subtle duality involved, that is why logic should be applied with caution.

Astus wrote:

What kind of action is without intention? If it is without intention, it is automatic, unconscious, like bodily functions and natural phenomena. It is like insentient things. It leaves no space for wisdom and compassion.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 6:21 PM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I think the basic idea of 'non-doing' is expressed in theistic religions in such sayings as 'not my will but thine be done', i.e. the subject having abandoned himself, doesn't act from any personal motive or sense of self. That also relates to the point raised earlier in this thread about 'detachment' 'equanimity' and 'apatheia' which are the ground of un-self-centred action.

Astus wrote:

Giving an external cause instead of an internal one is still being moved around by various things. Small children, soldiers and servants all do whatever they are told.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 6:55 PM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

oushi said:

Automatic? Depends on how you understand automatic. I would rather say independent of "you", and since this dependency is what defines "you", it's often expressed as selfless.

Unconscious? No.

Astus wrote:

Is there or is there not intention behind the action, as the cause of the action? If there is no intention, what is the cause and what is the role of consciousness? If there is intention, there is a decision, and that decision is a product of numerous mental factors, like perception, understanding and memory.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 7:33 PM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

oushi said:

Karma.

There are results of old intentions, but there is no generating of new intentions. Why? Because the generator (idea of free actor) is gone.

Astus wrote:

Then without intention there is no preceding mental action before an action, making the action unconscious. Or if you say that the mind is still involved, in what manner?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 8:19 PM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

oushi said:

Yes, we can assume that, although I don't know if we have similar understanding of your statement. As I understand it, there is no "blocking" involved.

This very involvement does not arise, and since the self is nothing more than this involvement, there is no self. Thus no mind.

Astus wrote:

That means that buddhas don't have mental aggregates, only a body. A body without mind is a corpse. Or in this case perhaps a zombie.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Dan74 said:

The action proceeds from causes and conditions but is not longer related to the self. No need to propitiate the non-existent self and conform to related ideas which are no longer clung to.

Astus wrote:

There has never been a self anyway, only the concept that there should be a self somewhere, so the actual function of the mind is not determined by any self, only the idea of an imaginary self is what plays a role in attributing "I and mine" to phenomena.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 9:48 PM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

oushi said:

Mind is a shape, not an actually existing entity. There is a small confusion here. When we talk about the mind, self, intention we see it as an added component of the body-skandhas thing.

Astus wrote:

When I say mind, it means the mental aggregates. There is no mind besides the aggregates in Buddhism. Intention (cetana), for instance, belongs to the fourth aggregate (samskara).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Dan74 said:

Yes, so what is the problem with understanding action when it is no longer conditioned by these ideas?

Astus wrote:

What is the motivation when there is no more attraction or rejection? Or, if we say that like and dislike are not dependent on ignorance that assumes a self, then either craving is not the cause of suffering as the second noble truth says, or there is no end of suffering as in the third noble truth.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Buddhas don't have minds. They have wisdom.

Astus wrote:

The four/five wisdoms/knowledges are the eight consciousnesses without the two hindrances, or in other words, a non-attached mind. As they include all the good dhammas (either developed over the bodhisattva path or inherently in buddha-nature) and exclude all the defilements, there is no hope and fear, no like and dislike, no attachment and rejection, thus no wish to do or achieve anything. The explanation often is that buddhas are driven by their previously made vows, but that drive is only a result of past actions and not an action itself. Therefore, buddhas are like some unintentional natural force, a product of someone who worked hard and was full of aspiration but who's now gone.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 4th, 2014 at 12:05 AM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

oushi said:

And what is that which can use aggregates? What is that which we know through the shape of those aggregates?

Astus wrote:

The aggregates mean all the functions and experiences there are. They are not things to be used by anything.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 4th, 2014 at 12:50 AM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Whatever the case may be, Buddhas do not have operations of vijñāna. They do not possess the eight consciousnesses because all the traces that constitute the ālayavijñāna are exhausted, thus there is no basis for the arising of the other seven.

Astus wrote:

It seems to me that there are only some differences between consciousness and wisdom. For example, there are various mental functions going on according to Xuanzang:

"Thus, the mind associated with the four Wisdoms (Jnanas) forms in each case a simultaneous group of at least twenty-two dharmas (the mind itself, five universal Caittas, five special ones, and eleven good ones). It comprises, like its Caittas, the Bhagas (that which manifests itself and that which is manifested), as well as Bijas and mental attributes in action. But the attribute of wisdom (Jnana) (which is the Prajna caitta) is particularly active. This mind is therefore indicated by the name of wisdom (Jnana)."

(Cheng Weishi Lun 9.4.5.2, p 769; tr. Wei Tat)

And explaining the Great Mirror Wisdom he quotes the Buddhahumi Sutra:

"in the Mirror Wisdom of the Tathagata there appear all images of the six Ayatanas (eye, ear, etc.), the six Visayas (colour, sound, etc.), and the six consciousnesses (visual consciousness, auditory consciousness, etc.)."

(p 775)

But that's kind of besides the point of this thread.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 4th, 2014 at 4:55 PM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Malcolm said:

But this contradicts the very sutra he is citing

Astus wrote:

Maybe not. As your quote says: "there is the appearance of many kinds of reflected images in the circle of a mirror". Xuanzang doesn't equate alayavijnana with darsanajnana, but describes the way the mirror wisdom works. There are various dharmas, there are mental functions, especially the ripening of good seeds. As a mirror, reflects everything but hindered by nothing.

"The mental attributes associated with the Great Mirror Wisdom (Mahadarsajnana) : The mind associated with this Wisdom is entirely dissociated from all mental discriminations (vikalpa). [According to the Buddhahumisastra, in this mind there is neither discrimination between atmagraha and atmiyagraha nor discrimination between grahyagraha and grahakagraha.] Its objects of perception and modes of activity are subtle and 'difficult to comprehend'. It carries all objects without failure of memory (because its objects are eternally present) and without error (because it is never troubled or obscured).² In its essential nature and characteristics it is pure (i.e., clear and good), being free from all impurities and confused states (samklesa) . It is the supporting basis for absolute qualities (superior to the pure qualities of non-Buddhas) which are pure (i.e., superior to impure qualities) and perfect (i.e., superior to the qualities of the two Vehicles) ; it is the receptacle of the Bijas of these qualities. It manifests the images of other Jnanas (which themselves are born of their Bijas) ; it gives birth to bodies and lands. Without interruption, universally and eternally, like a great mirror, it manifests the images of all Rupas."

(p 767-769)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 4th, 2014 at 7:11 PM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Dan74 said:

The motivation is natural response to the causes and conditions, like reaching for the pillow, like branches bending in the wind, except it is illumined by the clear light of wisdom and unswayed by the ideas of self and other obstructions.

Astus wrote:

I think this word "natural" only covers for a lack of clear discernment of what function (yong 用) means. Jinul writes: "That which is able to see, hear, sense, and know is perforce your buddha-nature." (Moguja's Secrets on Cultivating the Mind in "Collected Works of Korean Buddhism", vol 2, p 208) If we argue that one should abandon the present mind and find a new one that is without all the common activities of a human being, then in fact we are saying "this mind is not buddha", and there is no explanation for such simple things like eating and sleeping. However, if we confirm that "this mind is buddha", where lies the distinction between enlightened and unenlightened? (Jinul writes (p 224): "The only thing that makes them different is that they can protect their minds and thoughts, nothing more.") If it is the same body and same mind but without attachment, that vanished attachment cannot be responsible for one's daily activities but only for being dissatisfied with them. One shouldn't only be able to let go everything but also to hold on anything.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 4th, 2014 at 11:21 PM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The point is that none of those images are happening in the mirror.

Astus wrote:

Then what is the relationship between the images and the mirror? Before enlightenment all phenomena are mental appearances, after enlightenment they are somehow not?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 4th, 2014 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

LastLegend said:

So it's like you can pick it up, you can put it down.

But where does compassion, morals, precepts, etc fit into all of this?

Astus wrote:

Compassion is the wish to help. Wisdom is to know where and how. Correct action is the manifestation of compassion and wisdom. That's why both picking up and putting down are required. If nirvana is dropping everything, leaving behind all intention and comprehension, becoming a natural force, an automaton, then it is rather a fictional abstraction than anything realisable by humans.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 5th, 2014 at 3:05 AM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

smcj said:

The mirror transcends the images.

Astus wrote:

Can there be images without the mirror? If yes, then they are independent external things and not images. If no, then they are mutually dependent, or the two extremes of mirror (subject) and images (object) don't exist. What does "transcends" exactly mean?

smcj said:

"All phenomena are mental appearances" is the Cittamatra perspective.

Astus wrote:

Just as the four wisdoms and the eight consciousnesses are Yogacara teachings. Vasubandhu explains how phenomena are mere representations of consciousness (vijñapti-matra) in his Vimsatika-karika.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 5th, 2014 at 6:38 AM

Title: Re: Female Dzogchen or Mahamudra Teachers

Content:

Astus wrote:

http://tenzinpalmo.com/tenzin_palmo/biography.htm

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 9th, 2014 at 5:27 PM

Title: Re: Instantaneous awakening.

Content:

Astus wrote:

The constant excuse for saying anything shows some uncertainty regarding what instantaneous awakening is. However, Chan teachers, starting with Heze Shenhui, were quite clear about it that non-thought is all there is to realise. That there is nothing that could be grasped/attained, everything is originally empty, the mind is pure from the beginning - these were all known teachings well before the emergence of Chan. The difference between gradual and instantaneous lies in how the gradual path gives a step by step instruction to how to reach non-attachment, while the direct path is just not attaching to anything. That's how there is actually no such thing as sudden enlightenment, as it all depends on the individual's qualities. Either one understands it immediately or not. And even if there is a clear realisation that the six sensory impressions are insubstantial, it is easy to fall back to one's habitual clinging to phenomena, thus many Chan teachers emphasised continuous training, or the so called "sudden enlightenment, gradual practice" format.

So, how is there instantaneous awakening? One only needs to observe the emerging and disappearing phenomena of sights, sounds, feelings and thoughts to confirm that there is nothing anywhere in one's realm of experience that stays even for a moment, so there is nothing to hold on to or reject. Why is this information/instruction useless most of the time? Because knowing how to observe is already a technique one learns through calming the mind and detaching from constant conceptualisation. Because even if one can personally confirm that all sorts of identification and clinging are false and mistaken, that attachment is the true source of dissatisfaction and suffering, as a result of habits one easily forgets about all that.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 12th, 2014 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: Instantaneous awakening.

Content:

theanarchist said:

Nope, non-thought can also be a temporary result of shamata practice which does not equal with liberation/awakening.

And an awakened person can and will have thoughts. But unlike us the awakened/liberated person will have direct realisation that neither the thoughts nor any other phenomenon have a solid reality. That insight is in sutrayana archived by vipassana practice.

As long as you cling to non thought you are definitely not liberated.

Astus wrote:

Non-thought (wunian/munen) is not lack of thoughts, nor a temporary result of any calming practice.

The Sixth Patriarch taught:

"Nonthought is to be without thought in the context of thoughts."
(Platform Sutra, ch 4; p 43; tr McRae)

"in wisdom's contemplation both interior and exterior are clearly penetrated, and one recognizes one's own fundamental mind. If you recognize your fundamental mind, this is the fundamental emancipation. And if you attain emancipation, this is the samādhi of prajñā, this is nonthought.

What is nonthought? If in seeing all the dharmas, the mind is not defiled or attached, this is nonthought. [The mind's] functioning pervades all locations, yet it is not attached to all the locations.

...

to be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is for the myriad dharmas to be completely penetrated. To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to see the realms of [all] the buddhas. To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to arrive at the stage of buddhahood."

(ch 2; p 33, 34)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 13th, 2014 at 10:25 PM

Title: Re: Cognitive Surplus and its Discontents

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think the very idea that one wants to spend one's time on useful things is a symptom of uneasiness. Of course I agree that creating problems is pointless, but 90% of what modern people do are mostly a pretension of being useful, maintaining a false image of productivity and/or creativity. The other 10% is related to maintaining one's physical existence. It is only natural that an unruly mind cannot rest. And that is cognitive surplus. No wonder that there are hundreds of volumes of Buddhist scriptures and other works.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 16th, 2014 at 11:05 PM

Title: Re: Untraditional zazen?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are all sorts of methods that people call zazen. How is it different if you focus on your belly or your head? It is still something you focus on. And if you prefer your head, or your toe, or whatever, that's fine as long as it helps you gain some level of relaxed concentration. Once you are relaxed and focused at the same time, you can then start to go to the next level.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 18th, 2014 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: Untraditional zazen?

Content:

kirtu said:

The difference is that meditating on certain points on the body really has different effects.

Astus wrote:

If what matters is to gain a calm, steady, concentrated mind, then practically any meditation object can be used as long as it works. The 40 kammattana are as good as all the peaceful and wrathful deities. However, Huineng's tradition is not about developing a serene mind and gaining various levels of oneness. Although, it could be said that if one wants to master samatha, one might as well follow some reliable path for that.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 23rd, 2014 at 5:30 PM

Title: Unreality of Thoughts

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kyabgön Phakchok Rinpoche posted the following on 21 June:

If you see thoughts don't truly exist you are no longer a Buddhist, you are actually a Buddha.

Therefore, if you see for yourself that there is not a single thought that could be held on, you are enlightened.

What is there to stop one from this realisation?

Is it a matter of habit? Is it ignorance? Is it a lack of will?

If it is habit, one needs to clarify that the assumption of a self is based only on false thoughts. Habit needs repetition

If it is ignorance, once one understands that thoughts are unreal, the mistake won't happen again.

If it is lack of will, one has to learn that there is suffering only because the objects of attachment are illusory thoughts.

Seeing the unreality of thoughts then should be a remedy for all problems.

Is it? Is it not? Why?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 23rd, 2014 at 6:59 PM

Title: Re: Unreality of Thoughts

Content:

oushi said:

It's easy to say, but what does it actually mean that something "don't truly exist"?

Astus wrote:

That it seems reliable only as long as one does not look into it. True existence is something permanent, something one can attach to, identify with, possess. It means a thought stays for ever as it is. However, thoughts don't do that. We only imagine that thoughts are hidden in our mind or exist on another realm, but that is just our imagination. In actual experience thoughts cannot be grasped.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 23rd, 2014 at 7:46 PM

Title: Re: Unreality of Thoughts

Content:

seeker242 said:

Although, if you define "understanding" as mere intellectual understanding, I don't think that's good enough.

Astus wrote:

What understanding is enough? I think the stages of learning, understanding and applying are still valid here.

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, June 23rd, 2014 at 7:59 PM
Title: Re: Unreality of Thoughts
Content:
Malcolm said:
Obscuration.

Astus wrote:
Is that different from ignorance? If so, how?

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, June 23rd, 2014 at 9:42 PM
Title: Re: Unreality of Thoughts
Content:
oushi said:
I think that we all are perfectly aware of the fact that phenomena that we experience are not permanent.

Astus wrote:
To believe that there is anything enduring from one moment to the next, that is the belief in true existence, in permanence.

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 4:58 PM
Title: Re: Unreality of Thoughts
Content:
Wayfarer said:
Isn't seeing through thought, the whole point of the higher states of dhyana? These consist of going beyond discursive thought, don't they? That is why they are described as 'domains of neither perception nor non-perception', and the like.

Astus wrote:
From the second dhyana on there is no applied and sustained thought, that is, extra mental effort to keep the meditation object. The immaterial dhyanas are various levels of mental objects for the meditation. The (almost) complete cessation of mental processes happens only with the ninth dhyana (nirodha-samapatti). However, insight into the unreality of thoughts don't occur out of merely attaining any of those states, they are still bound to samsara. In fact, all mental states are conditioned and impermanent. Seeing that is the insight into their unreality.

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 10:40 PM
Title: Re: Unreality of Thoughts
Content:

Wayfarer said:

Which is, perhaps, why that teacher said that intelligence and thought are not the same thing - intelligence being what 'sees that'.

Astus wrote:

A seer/knower separate from thoughts couldn't even be aware of thoughts. Such an ultimate seer is the mistaken belief in a self, an incorrect thought.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 25th, 2014 at 12:19 AM

Title: Re: Unreality of Thoughts

Content:

seeker242 said:

I don't see the OP statement as a negation of thoughts, but rather simply a non-affirmation of their existence. A non-affirmation quite different from a negation. With simply a non-affirmation, rather than a negation, there can be a middle, so to speak, that is neither affirming or denying either existence or non-existence. "Thoughts don't truly exist" IMO is really just another way of saying "thoughts are emptiness". Seems to me that emptiness can't have existence or non-existence applied to it, because if it could, it would no longer be emptiness.

Astus wrote:

Emptiness means empty of permanence, of essence, of self. That is, thoughts are conditioned and impermanent. Anyone can see for themselves that thoughts don't stay around and they cannot even be held up or kept. One can also see in their first hand experience how thoughts define everything we do and experience. So, once there is certainty that thoughts come and go without any hindrance, there is no need even to train one's mind. In other words, they are already empty as they are.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 26th, 2014 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: Unreality of Thoughts

Content:

LastLegend said:

Are you talking about maintaining this view all the time or you talking about the mind seeing itself clearly all the time? There is still some training for the latter case.

Astus wrote:

Neither maintaining nor seeing. Seeing emptiness means not being fooled by appearances, not superimposing, not projecting an essentialist view. Once the mistake has been removed there is only clear perception.

"If you know the illusions and are separated from them, then you will not create expedient means. If you are separated from illusions and are awakened, then also there will be no (need for) gradual stages."

(Hyujeong: Seonga gwigam, §34; Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, Vol. 3, p. 100)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 26th, 2014 at 4:49 PM

Title: Re: Unreality of Thoughts

Content:

LastLegend said:

Ok. If mind is not seeing, what is it doing then? Clear perception all the time?

Astus wrote:

Is your question "What if mind is not seeing itself?" If yes: it is not that there is a seer and a seen, but that the wrong views and attachments are not present any more. If no: please clarify.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 26th, 2014 at 11:06 PM

Title: Re: Unreality of Thoughts

Content:

seeker242 said:

I would agree with all of that but would add that just because anyone can see that, does not necessarily mean that they do see that. If one can see for themselves that thoughts don't stay around and they cannot even be held up or kept, then one would not try to hold them up or keep them to begin with. But people do try to hold them up and keep them, which means they can't see they are already empty as they are.

Astus wrote:

Trying to keep a thought is itself not seeing. Not keeping a thought is seeing. What you call seeing but keeping is conceptualisation.

"A single moment's stupidity and prajñā is eradicated, a single moment's wisdom and prajñā is generated. The people of this world are stupid and deluded and do not see prajñā. They speak of prajñā in their mouths but are always stupid in their minds. They always say to themselves, 'I am cultivating prajñā.' In every moment of thought they speak of emptiness, without recognizing true emptiness.

...

To not cultivate this is to be an ordinary [unenlightened] person. To cultivate this in a single moment of thought is to be equivalent to the Buddha in one's own body. ... With a preceding moment of deluded thought, one was an ordinary person, but with a succeeding moment of enlightened thought, one is a buddha. To be attached to one's sensory realms in a preceding moment of thought is affliction, but to transcend the realms in a succeeding moment of thought is bodhi."

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, p 30, tr McRae)

"Within continuing moments of thought one should not think of the previous [mental] realm. If one thinks of the previous thought, the present thought, and the later thought, one's thoughts will be continuous without cease. This is called 'fettered.' If one's thoughts do not abide in the dharmas, this is to be 'unfettered.' Thus it is that nonabiding is taken as the fundamental."

(ch 4, p 43)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 2nd, 2014 at 10:37 PM

Title: The Single Solution of Honen and Dogen

Content:

Astus wrote:

It seems to me that these two fundamental texts display very similar ideas. Not in what they teach as the essential method, but regarding the role and importance of that method. Please consider the followings and let's discuss it.

<http://www.jsri.jp/English/Honen/WRITINGS/ichimai.html> (written in 1212, Honen's last writing)

<http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/practice/zazen/advice/fukanzanzeng.html> (written in 1227, Dogen's first writing)

It is not meditation.

In China and Japan, many Buddhist masters and scholars understand that the nembutsu is to meditate deeply on Amida Buddha and the Pure Land. However, I do not understand the nembutsu in this way.

The zazen I speak of is not meditation practice.

Not based on study or understanding.

Reciting the nembutsu does not come from studying and understanding its meaning.

put aside the intellectual practice of investigating words and chasing phrases ... Give up the operations of mind, intellect, and consciousness; stop measuring with thoughts, ideas, and views.

It is a self-sufficient practice.

There is no other reason or cause by which we can utterly believe in attaining birth in the Pure Land than the nembutsu itself.

Practice-realization is naturally undefiled.

It is a practice complete in itself and encompasses everything else.

Reciting the nembutsu and believing in birth in the Pure Land naturally gives rise to the three minds (sanjin) and the four modes of practice (shishu).

Although they say that there are ten thousand distinctions and a thousand variations, they just wholeheartedly engage the way in zazen.

This is all one needs to know and do.

If I am withholding any deeper knowledge beyond simple recitation of the nembutsu, then may I lose sight of the compassion of Shakyamuni and Amida Buddha and slip through the embrace of Amida's original vow.

Please, honored followers of Zen, long accustomed to groping for the elephant, do not doubt the true dragon. Devote your energies to the way of direct pointing at the real. Revere the one who has gone beyond learning and is free from effort. Accord with the enlightenment of all the buddhas; succeed to the samadhi of all the ancestors.

Everybody can do it.

Even if those who believe in the nembutsu deeply study all the teachings which Shakyamuni taught during his life, they should not put on any airs and should practice the nembutsu with the sincerity of those untrained followers ignorant of Buddhist doctrines.

This being the case, intelligence or lack of it is not an issue; make no distinction between the dull and the sharp-witted. If you concentrate your effort single-mindedly, that in itself is wholeheartedly engaging the way.

This is the essence of the tradition.

I hereby authorize this document with my hand print. The Jodo Shu way of the settled mind (anjin) is completely imparted here. I, Genku, have no other teaching than this.

It is simply the dharma gate of joyful ease, the practice realization of totally culminated enlightenment. It is the koan realized; traps and snares can never reach it. If you grasp the point, you are like a dragon gaining the water, like a tiger taking to the mountains.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 3rd, 2014 at 5:57 PM

Title: Re: The Single Solution of Honen and Dogen

Content:

kirtu said:

Yes, it is meditation as we understand it today. It is not analytical meditation, that is certainly true.

Astus wrote:

What is meant by meditation?

Honen uses 觀念 (kannen), and that refers to the visualisation or contemplation practices as it is (was) commonly used by Pure Land practitioners.

Dogen uses 習禪 (shuuzen), and that refers to the dhyana practices, what is often called calming the mind.

Kannen-nenbutsu (觀念念佛) is discarded in favour of kusho-nenbutsu (口称念佛), that is, the oral recitation of the name (持名念佛).

<https://fukan-zazengi.blogspot.com/2007/09/shuuzen-ni-arazu-not-end-gaining-zen.html> defines shuuzen as an "end-gaining" approach.

<https://susuddho.blogspot.com/2012/05/isho-fujita-zazen-is-not-shuuzen.html> calls it aspiring to "achieve a human ideal" and "an effort to control the mind and attain a certain state of mind by applying a certain method".

Honen's nenbutsu is not meditation, it is literally the repeating of the name, and does not require maintaining or achieving any special state of mind. Dogen's zazen is not meditation, as it is not training in anything nor meant as a method. In both cases the context is what is categorised under either samyag-samadhi or dhyana-paramita, and samadhi as the second element of the threefold training. If they were actually meditative practices, then all the other claims regarding their teaching would prove false and unfounded.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 7th, 2014 at 6:52 PM

Title: Re: Chan and Pure land

Content:

Astus wrote:

The merit of any practice can be dedicated to birth in the Pure Land. What matters is the intention behind the practice. While the recitation of the name is the simplest and easiest method for strengthening one's faith in Amitabha's vow, it is possible to use other techniques.

Chan is somewhat different. It is a http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/hwadu/content_view.asp?cat_seq=118&content_seq=26&page=1 to use <http://www.undv.org/vesak2012/iabudoc/04RBuswellFINAL.pdf> 's http://terebess.hu/zen/great_doubt.pdf as the basis of one's practice. This is summed up in the question "Who is mindful of the buddha?" (念佛是誰?) when it is combined with the practice of reciting the name. Here we could say that the recitation itself is the calming (samatha) part, and the investigation (kanhua 看話) is the insight (vipasyana) part, thus it follows the traditional gradual path.

The other Chan method is called the "Real Mark Buddha Recitation" (實相念佛). It is described by Cheng Wei-an as the 31st method in <http://www.ymba.org/books/taming-monkey-mind-guide-pure-land-practice/forty-eight-aspects-buddha-recitation>, and the three techniques preceding it are useful preliminaries. Practically speaking, this is the direct path of sudden enlightenment, the immediate realisation of buddha-mind. Therefore, it is not really a method but liberation itself.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 11th, 2014 at 4:35 PM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Khyentse on the importance of Mahayana

Content:

Unknown said:

hey have at least four malas around their neck, and they love to talk about power and magnetizing wealth. Their view often seems to be founded on a rather superstitious cast of mind. Whereas those who have first practised Mahayana seriously have a very mature and refined approach to practising the Vajrayana.

Astus wrote:

What the above seems to say is that when Vajrayana is used for worldly purposes, it is nothing but a system of magic techniques, whereas with the motivation of enlightenment it is a means of the bodhisattva path. However, I think most Westerners don't believe in magic anyway, so the mistakes about Vajrayana are different.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 17th, 2014 at 11:10 PM

Title: Re: What is your moment-to-moment Zen practice?

Content:

Astus wrote:

My not so moment-to-moment Zen:

When there is greed, see it as greed. When there is anger, see it as anger. When there is jealousy, see it as jealousy. When there is pride, see it as pride. When there is doubt, see it as doubt. When there is anxiety and agitation, see it as anxiety and agitation. When there is laziness and lethargy, see it as laziness and lethargy. Whatever affliction occurs, once recognised as such, see what is the allure, what is the danger and what is the escape.

When there is something to do, try not to think about something else to do. When there is nothing to do, try not to think about something else to do.

Remember that as long as there is food to eat, clothes to wear and a bed to sleep in, I am already rich. Remember that the time of death is uncertain. Remember that whatever I have I can also lose. Remember that wisdom without compassion is not wisdom.

As all experiences are ungraspable and unstoppable, there is nothing to be afraid of and nothing to hope for.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 24th, 2014 at 6:42 PM

Title: Re: "Eternal" Buddha?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think that reading the idea of eternal buddha as an immortal being is at best a provisional teaching. What in my view the eternity of Shakyamuni points to is no different from what Vimalakirti said to Ananda:

"You should understand, Ānanda, the bodies of the Tathāgatas are bodies of the Dharma, not bodies of longing. The Buddha is the World-honored One, who has transcended the triple world. The Buddha's body is without flaws, the flaws having been extinguished. The Buddha's body is unconditioned and does not fit the [conventional] analytic categories."

And as the Diamond Sutra teaches:

"Someone who tries to discern me in form
Or seek me in sound
Is practicing non-Buddhist methods
And will not discern the Tathāgata"

In other words, emptiness is the true nature of the Buddha (cf. SN 44.2), and that is eternal.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 24th, 2014 at 7:36 PM

Title: Re: "Eternal" Buddha?

Content:

Anders said:

The point the lotus sutra makes is basically that the 'seed of bodhi' can not be burned out. Hence, Arhats can continue on the path of Buddhahood despite having ended the afflictions and Buddhas likewise can continue to emanate bodies after their provisional "Parinirvana".

That said, the notion of individual Buddhas does look somewhat less true than it's conventional presentation.

Astus wrote:

Everybody can reach buddhahood, and buddhahood is the dharmadhatu, emptiness. Thus the arhat is the example of the practitioner who understands emptiness as annihilation and not as dependent origination, thus the parable of the illusory city.

As for individual buddhas, since the notion of individuality is about self, and enlightenment is realising the lack of self, the concept of individual buddhas is only a provisional skilful means.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 24th, 2014 at 8:08 PM

Title: Re: "Eternal" Buddha?

Content:

Anders said:

The point of Buddhahood is how much more capable of a Buddha is of helping other beings. If we're just talking about depth of realisation and how that realisation looks to the one attaining it, there is no point of even having a Mahayana.

Astus wrote:

And the point of the teaching of buddha-nature (and even prajnaparamita) is that the magical powers are inherent in the nature of mind, in other words, emptiness is inseparable from dependent origination and compassion. That's how the only true enlightenment is that of the buddhas and everything else is a mistake.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 25th, 2014 at 5:15 PM

Title: Re: Daily life practice?

Content:

Alex123 said:

I understand that I can't control mental states and that holding onto a certain state is futile. What often happens is that I can't seem to remember not to be abiding anywhere. This is a problem. I can't seem to always remember and do Hishiryo, etc. I wonder why.

Astus wrote:

You say that holding onto a certain state is futile, then you call it a problem that you can't always do hishiryo. Isn't there a contradiction?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 26th, 2014 at 2:39 AM

Title: Re: Daily life practice?

Content:

Alex123 said:

Right, and how does one reach state where grasping doesn't occur?

Astus wrote:

Through realising that there is nothing to grasp.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 26th, 2014 at 7:22 AM

Title: Re: Daily life practice?

Content:

Alex123 said:

And how to realize that?

Astus wrote:

The answer to that is the complete teaching of the Buddha. Within that vast amount of methods there are the Zen techniques. And among Zen techniques there is the option to directly look at your mind - your complete realm of experience - and see whether there is any concrete, stable thing you can identify and grasp or not. And once you let all experiences appear as they are, you can see for yourself that they are ungraspable. In fact, letting them appear and seeing their ungraspability are one and the same. Letting things be as they are is the same as not seeking anything to rely on.

It is when one cannot just, so to say, relax, let go and open up, that all the methods from sitting posture, phrase contemplation and all the other skilful means come into the picture. They give some reason to stop grasping at ideas and feelings, or rather they are substitutes to the normal objects of attachment, however, they are still attachments and delusions. But unlike ordinary delusions, they might help one get over all clinging and false concepts.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 30th, 2014 at 7:24 PM

Title: Re: Daily life practice?

Content:

LastLegend said:

Does this mean we use no effort or intention because things appear as they are? Flow like the Dao with no blockage? A medium that connects with everything else?

Astus wrote:

It is effortless if one has the clear realisation that appearances are without anything to grasp.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 1st, 2014 at 10:12 PM

Title: What is Blessing?

Content:

Astus wrote:

What is the definition of blessing (any and all types)? What dharma is it? What are its qualities and conditions?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 2nd, 2014 at 7:30 AM

Title: Re: What is Blessing?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Let me give an example for the blessing I'm asking about.

in Vision and Violence (p 107-109) Carl S. Yamamoto said:

In many ways, the English word "blessing" is simply not adequate to capture the full import of the Tibetan term byin rlabs. Byin rlabs is something that comes from direct contact with a buddha or a realized lama, and is often spoken of almost as a quasi-physical substance—or energy—that passes from the lama to the disciple at certain key moments.

...

Sometimes a blessing is like an electric shock delivered to the body of the recipient.

Other times, the body is paralyzed or goes limp.

Blessings are also thought to inhere in sacred objects and places, particularly ones that have a connection with an exalted figure.

...

It is this locally concentrated blessing energy that makes a place or object sacred, so that when pilgrims visit a holy site, or when lamas perform rituals centered on a consecrated object, one of their goals is to share in the blessing that resides in that site or object.

...

Though it lacks this important connotation of power, “blessing” seems to be the only translation of byin rlabs that fits all of its usages reasonably well. Still, some scholars have offered coinages that work well in particular situations. Lama Yeshe offers “inspiration,” Geoffrey Samuel “blessingpower” and “positive spiritual energy,” and David Jackson “spiritual impulse,” while Toni Huber suggests “empowerment,” which he says “fits better with most Tibetan conceptions of the term.” These translations— while not adequate substitutes for “blessing” as an all-purpose stand-in—do capture the sense of a dynamic and personal power that emanates from the lama to the disciple, charging body and mind with spiritual energy and inspirational zeal.

Indeed, as Huber points out, the notion of byin rlabs as “power” pervades all sectors of Tibetan culture and may in fact have its origins in the political realm. Though it is traditionally glossed as a Buddhist term, translating the Sanskrit word adhiṣṭāna, it in fact has a pre-Buddhist meaning, associated with the kings of the early Tibetan royal cult

...

In this sense, as a bridge between the political realm, represented by divine kingship, and the religious, represented by the spiritual power of the lama, the term “charisma” might not be an entirely inappropriate rendering of byin rlabs.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 2nd, 2014 at 3:56 PM

Title: Re: What is Blessing?

Content:

anjali said:

Perhaps this will be useful. From Rigpa Wiki's entry on <http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Blessing>

Astus wrote:

Both definitions are about achieving or developing a state of mind, and as such I don't see the connection to the idea of receiving blessing from other beings (or objects, places, etc.). If those were the meaning of blessing, then blessing would be synonymous with insight and correct effort.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 4th, 2014 at 5:22 PM

Title: Re: What is Blessing?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

You are looking for an objective phenomenon called blessing?

Astus wrote:

I'm looking for a usable definition that describes the way blessing exists and functions. As for "objective phenomena", that's a different discussion about the nature of reality, perception, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 4th, 2014 at 5:32 PM

Title: Re: What is Blessing?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Byin rlabs means quite literally "conferral [rlabs] of power [byin]."

Byin is defined in Tibetan as "the ability or power to transform the minds and vision/appearances of another."

The word Byin rlabs is defined in Tibetan as "the power to remain in any subject of the Dharma of the Noble Path."

Astus wrote:

Thank you. Does that mean then that a blessing is inducing insight/realisation/enlightenment in another being directly (instead of through giving instructions)? If so, what is being communicated/transferred between one being/thing to another? What connection exists at the time of receiving a blessing?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 4th, 2014 at 6:22 PM

Title: Re: What is Blessing?

Content:

muni said:

As long as me is there, as a solid independent wall - opposing another wall (person), the flow cannot flow.

So is it that nature like it is arises from itself by faith and devotion, and the blessings of Awaken Nature.

Astus wrote:

If blessing had existed only when there was no attachment to the idea of a self, it would have had no meaning because then there would be no attachment whatsoever thus no need for further liberation. Unless you equate blessing with enlightenment or ultimate reality.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 4th, 2014 at 7:49 PM

Title: Re: What is Blessing?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

This is why I asked if you are looking for an objective phenomenon called "blessing".

Astus wrote:

If things like money, stupa, bliss and hunger count as objective phenomena, then yes.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 4th, 2014 at 8:03 PM

Title: Re: What is Blessing?

Content:

muni said:

Blessings exist - does not exist; they are like nature: dependent-empty. An idea of a self makes this dependence-emptiness impossible.

It is also possible to call it a moment of openness, "to receive" the blessings.

There is the Zen cup, which must be empty, or the Master tells you to come back when "your cup" is empty.

Blessings are clear examples of intangible nature.

Astus wrote:

Heat, beauty, anger, vapour and radio transmission are all intangible as well, but they are not the same type of things as Excalibur, Narnia or the motherly grace of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 4th, 2014 at 9:01 PM

Title: Re: What is Blessing?

Content:

muni said:

The solidity, the object-subject can fade by blessings, while blessings are themselves an example of no separation (the idea being a subject and an object).

Astus wrote:

So what you mean is that when one is blessed by another person (or object), that individual will realise non-duality?

At the same time, blessing exists only as non-duality, what is something difficult for me to understand, because the ultimate nature of reality has the single taste of suchness and in that there is no place for giving or receiving anything, thus the word blessing appears to be meaningless.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 4th, 2014 at 9:02 PM

Title: Re: What is Blessing?

Content:

Malcolm said:

"Blessing" here just means the power of one person to inspire another to follow the path in some way. That's all. There is no Dharma called "blessing", no magical force called "blessing". If there was, the Buddha, being compassionate, would have blessed us all into nirvana long ago.

Astus wrote:

That makes sense. Thank you.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 4th, 2014 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: What is Blessing?

Content:

Malcolm said:

I should add, it can also be the power of an object such as a statue, book, incense, stupa, etc., to induce the same effect. But again, there is no Dharma called "blessing", no magical force called "blessing".

Astus wrote:

Yes, that is what I wanted to clarify. Inspiration from buddhas, bodhisattvas, teachers, places, objects, etc. are easily understandable and quite common even outside of religious context. Blessing as a power/authority transferred magically is a different matter.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 15th, 2014 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: Advice on Vajrayana and Rigpa meditation books

Content:

Astus wrote:

Further recommendations:

Sutra:

<https://books.google.com/books?id=68sGSKdE1OUC>

https://books.google.com/books?id=3g34_5impnUC

<https://books.google.com/books?id=g6m7T7v6tiYC>

Tantra:

<https://books.google.com/books?id=WQojn90vLA0C>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=sy2QAwAAQBAJ>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=4e7cAB1tO68C>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=tysQyPivYusC>

Dzogchen series (good overview):

<https://books.google.com/books?id=Il0dAgAAQBAJ>
https://books.google.com/books?id=_o3QDa536ikC
<https://books.google.com/books?id=r7Zr2Eyms4YC>

Dzogchen:

<https://books.google.com/books?id=LwS6RjZWd7QC>
<https://books.google.com/books?id=9gbrPjsEaVMC>
<https://books.google.com/books?id=cz0RAQAIAAJ>
<https://books.google.com/books?id=TDFTD6HRCU8C>
<https://books.google.com/books?id=Kj5QE-Tw6YkC>
<https://books.google.com/books?id=kPNRbhvNWG4C>

Scholarship:

<https://books.google.com/books?id=SJbxvDZOZz8C>
<https://books.google.com/books?id=vM5ivXPmxwoC> https://books.google.com/books?id=Tv_hE200rNkC

Biography:

https://books.google.com/books?id=_yo1BGZXODEC
<https://books.google.com/books?id=b344o95F-WEC>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 4th, 2014 at 3:50 AM

Title: Re: "a bridge round like a ball" --Chozen-Ji Canon

Content:

Astus wrote:

Did a little online search for: "丸橋の道", "円橋の道", "丸橋之道", "円橋之道", "まろばしのみち"

No results.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 4th, 2014 at 7:16 PM

Title: Re: Study Guides & Commentaries

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here I only mention some Mahayana sutra commentaries, but Theravada teachers published (book & online) even more on the Nikayas.

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=v5-0LLINNTEC>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=bQ7P7buVH74C>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=Xn8pAwAAQBAJ>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=n0A6AwAAQBAJ>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=PeBWAAAAQBAJ>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=Yx-KvflFhV0C>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=fHPjEP23D4YC>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=kGcwG9YrrL4C>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=HKgWxoLk0V8C>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=XH0JAAAAAYAAJ>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=pCHvfGyBtf4C>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=fslSW2tBG8UC>
https://books.google.hu/books?id=uXB1a6_dFBQC
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=jzzRtAsCbekC>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=8WZgR7gDTtYC>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=NR79g-BT2AcC>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=1wHYAAAAMAAJ>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=T3jlh-xPVhIC>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=GVeLJ16emHUC>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=xe4GAAAAAYAAJ>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=k1l9dUewsKgC>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=Yfuv-zFB1PoC>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=dYw5q40gCg8C>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=u0nyhBMsQtUC>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=yRnOPXXQE5AC>

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 7th, 2014 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: Root text in verse accompanied by autocommentary

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think the style goes back to how the Vedas are commented upon in the Brahmanas and Aranyakas.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 13th, 2014 at 10:57 PM

Title: Applied Wisdom

Content:

Astus wrote:

It may appear that scriptures and reasoning have little relevance to practice. There is even the commonly used pair of "scholars and practitioners" (cf. AN 6.46). In East Asian Mahayana they talk about the meditation and the teaching schools. In Tibetan Buddhism there are the panditas and the yogis. And for some reason Westerners often prefer what they believe to be practice oriented (practical) paths. So, I'd like to raise a case here for the view that the study of the Buddhadharma necessarily consists of learning (reading/listening), understanding (reasoning) and confirming (analysing), thus making the studying of the scriptures directly relevant to whatever meditative practice one may do.

"What is correct contemplation? This is the contemplation of the Bodhisattva who, with a very good understanding of the definitive and provisional meanings of the scriptures, will have no doubts about them, and thus thereby the meditation will be certain. Otherwise, riding on the swinging rope of doubt, there will be no certainty, and, like a traveler at the junction of two roads, one cannot decide which way to go."
(The Stages of Meditation by Vimalamitra, tr Lozang Jamspal, p 13)

"Those who do not meditate with wisdom by analyzing the entity of things specifically, but merely meditate on the elimination of mental activity, cannot avert conceptual thoughts and also cannot realize identitylessness because they lack the light of wisdom."
(The Dalai Lama: Stages of Meditation, p 134)

"An indispensable prerequisite for insight is to use the wisdom gained through study and reflection to develop knowledge of reality. For without a decisive view of how things exist, you cannot develop insight that knows the real nature, emptiness."
(Tsong-kha-pa: The Great Treatise on the Stages of the Path to Enlightenment, vol 3, p 111)

"That one should not be reflective, should not grasp, and should not discriminate - as the sutras teach - really means that one should not be reflective of the existence of inherent nature, should not grasp it, and should not discriminate it. It does not mean one should cultivate prajna by not remembering, not thinking, and not discriminating. If all discriminations are attachments, then would the wisdom that comes from listening, thinking, and practicing as taught by the Buddha not be distorted? If nondiscriminating wisdom could arise without the requisite awakening of wisdom from listening, thinking, and practicing, then it would arise without a cause."
(Yin-shun: The Way to Buddhahood, p 299)

"In general, Buddhism provides a large variety of skillful means to generate insight into the true nature of mind and phenomena, but analytical meditation is the way in which this insight is developed and enhanced in a very systematic and thorough way."

(Karl Brunnhölzl: The Center of the Sunlit Sky, p 273)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 16th, 2014 at 4:27 AM

Title: Re: Applied Wisdom

Content:

seeker242 said:

Do you think Huangbo and his like would disagree? After all he says "If you students of the Way wish to become Buddhas, you need study no doctrines whatever, but learn only how to avoid seeking for and attaching yourselves to anything."

Astus wrote:

"learn only how to avoid seeking" is something that requires learning. And what is there to learn from but the teachings of the Buddha? Those teachings are what one can learn from the scriptures. So, what Huangbo basically says is to use the teachings for one's and others' welfare instead of just satisfying one's intellectual appetite.

What I'm trying to highlight here is less about the importance of studying the sutras and shastras but how using correct analysis is the safe, traditional and direct path of insight that connects the teachings with practice and at the same time is understandable and open to everyone. And in fact even such seemingly non-analytical methods like Zen include analysis, as one needs to realise the emptiness of appearances in order to be free from them.

See what Mazu says (and quotes from the Vimalakirti Sutra),

"Just put an end to all mental calculations of the triple world. If one originates a single deluded thought, this is the root of birth and death in the triple world. If one simply lacks a single thought, then he excises the root of birth and death and obtains the supreme treasure of the dharma-king. Since countless kalpas, the deluded thoughts of ordinary man—flattery, deception, self-intoxication, and arrogance—have formed the one body. Therefore, the sutra says, 'It is only by many dharmas that this body is aggregated. When arising, it is only dharmas arising; when extinguishing, it is only dharmas extinguishing.' When the dharma arises, it does not say 'I arise'; when the dharma extinguishes, it does not say 'I extinguish.' The former thought, the later thought, and the present thought — all successive moments of thought do not wait for one another, and all successive moments of thought are quiescent and extinct. This is called the ocean-seal samadhi, which contains all dharmas."

(The Hongzhou School, p 126)

Compare that to Kamalashila:

"Analyze that, just like the mind, the nature of all phenomena, too, is like an illusion. In this way, when the identity of the mind is specifically examined by wisdom, in the ultimate sense it is perceived neither within nor without. It is also not perceived in the absence of both. Neither the mind of the past, nor that of the future, nor that of the present, is perceived. When the mind is born, it comes from nowhere, and when it ceases it goes nowhere because it is inapprehensible, undemonstrable, and non-physical."

(Stages of Meditation, p 131-132)

And to the <http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra13.html>:

"to know the appearances of a self means not to be captivated by it. Not knowing and not being captivated by anything is what Buddhas know. The inconceivable [state of] not knowing and not being captivated by anything is what Buddhas know. ... The inconceivable state is what Buddhas know, such as neither grasping nor not grasping, seeing neither the appearance of past, present, or future, nor the appearance of coming or going, and grasping neither birth nor death, neither cessation nor perpetuity, neither arising nor acting. This knowledge is called the true wisdom-knowledge, the inconceivable wisdom-knowledge."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 16th, 2014 at 4:56 PM

Title: Re: Applied Wisdom

Content:

LastLegend said:

How do you put correct analysis in practice? Is it the practice itself? How do you apply this correct analysis?

Astus wrote:

It is the practice and application itself, investigating the nature of experience and confirming directly the truth of the Buddha's teaching.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 16th, 2014 at 5:44 PM

Title: Re: Applied Wisdom

Content:

Dan74 said:

Huangpo, as we know him, is mostly invention, it would seem (see Philosophical Meditations on Zen Buddhism by Dale S. Wright). But even as such there is no actual rejection of texts, but re-examination of the way we read them.

Astus wrote:

Blofeld's translation can be misleading, unless one is aware of the language used and its relation to the original, and if I remember correctly, that's what Wright's work addresses. The texts of Huangbo are still considerably early and authentic, even if not strictly a clear report of one man's teachings. See:

http://www.thezensite.com/ZenEssays/HistoricalZen/HuangPo_Literature.html.

Dan74 said:

As I see it, the OP does not lack learning but still has many doubts about the practice and the fruit. So perhaps it is a matter of balance. Often in life it is precisely the direction that seems least likely, the part of us that gets least attention, that requires it the most. Thus a very intellectual person loath to get her hands dirty in a menial task like gardening, would really benefit from it, to use an example.

Astus wrote:

While to some extent I agree with the idea that facing unfamiliar situations can help reflection on one's habits, when it comes to practising Buddhism it is better to follow methods one can easily use. What would be the point to ask a mute person to learn chanting sutras, or an illiterate man to study abhidharma? As I see it, the majority of Western Buddhists are educated people, therefore trained from an early age to process texts and arguments. It is out of the romantic ideal that there is a desire to move from reason to intuition and mysticism, while at the same time arguing how Buddhism is a very rational doctrine (Kalama Sutta, et al).

Dan74 said:

'Safe and traditional' and 'analysis' are not the words I would use to describe Buddhist practice. There is nothing safe about discarding habitual patterns - it is indeed the opposite of safe. We cling to habitual patterns out of the instinctual craving for safety and control and discarding them, laying down the narratives and plunging into the unknown now - the jump off the 100-foot pole, does not feel safe.

Astus wrote:

Using learning, understanding and investigation is rather a step by step approach, a gradual climb up the pole. Jumping off of the top can happen only once it is reached. What I'm saying here is that instead of waiting for some insight to happen through doing mostly unrelated practices, one should go straight to investigating the nature of phenomena.

Dan74 said:

Analysis, as it is ordinarily used, doesn't reveal emptiness to us, even though it might convince us of the correctness of a certain philosophical position. Emptiness is realised, the way I see it (which is hazy and limited), by virtue of insight into reification (thing-making, me-making, mine-making, of owning mental objects, of intoxication by mental objects) and the step behind it so to speak, the not-knowing that is most intimate.

Astus wrote:

Emptiness is realised through looking into the experience at hand by following the correct method. And that method is analysing whether there is anything real one can grasp or not. Once the unreality of things is realised there is no more place for reification.

Dan74 said:

So learning can point the way, contemplating the teachings can point the way, but the way needs to be tread. And for that concepts, including Dharma concepts, need to be set aside.

Astus wrote:

Quite the contrary. It is through learning and understanding that one can apply the knowledge in one's experience. If it had to be put aside it would mean there is no use to it at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 17th, 2014 at 6:42 PM

Title: Re: Applied Wisdom

Content:

LastLegend said:

How do you do it exactly? Explain how you practice it. Thanks.

Astus wrote:

Analysing the five aggregates and six sensory fields are first of all to confirm if there is anything permanent or not. If there is nothing permanent, there is nothing to attach to and nothing to regard as self. This is realising the emptiness of self. Then by investigating the aggregates and sensory fields themselves, whether they are in any way independent or substantial, one confirms the emptiness of appearances. Longer instructions exist in many texts, like the Awakening of Faith in Mahayana, Zhiyi's shorter and longer meditation manuals, etc. Here is a very brief work on it:

<https://sites.google.com/site/dharmadepository/translations/examination-of-the-five-aggregates>.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 18th, 2014 at 5:07 AM

Title: Re: Applied Wisdom

Content:

seeker242 said:

Huineng must have had a good reason to lock the library.

Jikan said:

Yes, I'm sure he did; he was trying to help those who were addicted to their studies and the rather constipated one-up-manship that can ensue from debate culture to realize their nature directly.

Astus wrote:

What seems to be somewhat hidden from people is the simple fact that all the Zen stories, and practically everything we know of Huineng and the majority of famous teachers, are found in written form, actually most of them right there in the Buddhist canon. And those Zen texts are not really actual records but rather refined literary and religious works created for an educated audience. So, Zen iconoclasm and anti-textualism is as authentic as a multimillionaire preaching about the beauties of poverty.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 19th, 2014 at 5:19 PM

Title: Re: Do sentient beings gain merit when one generates Bodhici

Content:

Astus wrote:

Merit is the result of one's actions, a positive mental imprint. If one's lunch could fill another's belly there'd be no point in the whole karma teaching and people could appear in the hells and in buddha-fields randomly. It is good to wish others happiness and liberation, but ordinary people still suffer regardless of how many fully enlightened beings reside in the world.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 20th, 2014 at 4:03 AM

Title: Re: Do sentient beings gain merit when one generates Bodhici

Content:

LastLegend said:

Merit is transferable

Hieros Gamos said:

It is?

Astus wrote:

Not literally. Merit transference means that (1) one dedicates the merit generated by some good action (as a practice of generosity and non-attachment), and (2) another identifies with the giver's actions, agrees with them and rejoices in them (thus creating a similar mental attitude).

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 20th, 2014 at 4:20 AM

Title: Re: Is Tibetan Buddhism world-denying?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Buddhism itself is world-denying. Just look at the life story of Gautama.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 24th, 2014 at 5:39 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Accepting death

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Those people in Uruvelakappa whose murder, imprisonment, fining, or censure would cause me sorrow, lamentation, pain, distress, or despair are those for whom I feel desire & passion. Those people in Uruvelakappa whose murder, imprisonment, fining, or censure would cause me no sorrow, lamentation, pain, distress, or despair are those for whom I feel no desire or passion."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn42/sn42.011.than.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 24th, 2014 at 11:43 PM

Title: Re: ZenStories' Commentary - Daitso Chisho Buddha

Content:

Astus wrote:

"The Dharma of the buddhas appeared to the Buddha Mahābhijñānābhibhū [大通智勝佛 (Daitso Chisho Butsu)] after ten intermediate kalpas had passed, and he attained highest, complete enlightenment." (Lotus Sutra, ch 7, p 115, tr Kubo & Yuyama)

It should also be noted that while Siddhartha had practised asceticism for many years, in the end he realised it had been pointless and switched to sitting pleasantly in the shade of a tree after a good meal.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 29th, 2014 at 5:07 PM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Malcolm said:

It means that in Vajrayāna, the key to awakening lies in human anatomy, not in philosophical speculation. It means that all the qualities of the basis, path and result are complete in the human body, and do not need to be gathered elsewhere. It means that, according to Vajrayāna, that the mind is a function of the body and its anatomy.

Astus wrote:

Didn't what could be called Sahajayana, i.e. Mahamudra teachings, come later, as a further development from Vajrayana? Because it seems to me that it's distanced itself from the energy system established in HYT, and moved closer to established sutra teachings. Well, at least some teachers taught that way ((Saraha), Maitripa, Jnanakirti, Sahajavajra).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 29th, 2014 at 8:32 PM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, Astus. First, there is no such thing as a "sahajayāna" — this is fabricated term. Maitripa taught standard Vajrayāna, as did these other masters, complete with creation stage and completion stage.

Astus wrote:

A number of teachings by the mentioned Indian masters show something else. See for instance:

http://www.academia.edu/5614409/Mathes_2006_Blending_the_Sutras_with_the_Tantras_The_Influence_of_Maitripa_and_his_Circle_on_the_Formation_of_Sutra_Mahamudra_in_the_Kagyu_Schools

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 29th, 2014 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Malcolm said:

But the fact of the matter is that Maitripa promulgated a cycle of Vajrayogini teachings which is preserved to this day in both Kagyu and Sakya. Saraha wrote a famous commentary on the Buddhakapala tantra, and is credited with being the first master to promulgate the Cakrasamvara tantra and so on. Maitripa also bestowed many empowerments and teachings on Marpa.

Astus wrote:

They don't exclude each other. Kagyu has a large number of Tantric teachings besides Mahamudra, just as Gampopa taught both path of means and path of liberation. What the mentioned article attempts to show is that "not-specifically-Tantric" Mahamudra existed already in India, and those who taught it considered it beyond both Sutra and Tantra like Gampopa.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 29th, 2014 at 10:41 PM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Malcolm said:

since everyone he cites was already a well schooled Vajrayāna master, his argument is quite weak.

Astus wrote:

If they were competent Sutra and Tantra teachers, wouldn't that rather strengthen the validity of their assessment of the direct Mahamudra path?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 29th, 2014 at 11:26 PM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Malcolm said:

First of all, what do you mean by a "direct" Mahāmudra path? What are its characteristics, and so on. Then we will see whether or not it is part of Vajrayāna or not.

Astus wrote:

Direct in the sense that it does not require empowerments or other practices, only the instructions of the teacher pointing out the nature of mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 30th, 2014 at 2:32 AM

Title: Re: How do I know when to start shikantaza?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Shikantaza does not depend on how long you can concentrate on your breath. Just sitting means just sitting, nothing complicated.

"Shikantaza means "just sitting" in Japanese, and to just sit means that we really only sit without doing anything else. This is a really simple practice; we do nothing but sit in the zazen posture breathing easily, keeping the eyes open, staying awake, and letting go. That's all we do in zazen; we do nothing else." (Shohaku Okumura: http://www.sanshinji.org/pdf/zazen_instructions.pdf)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 30th, 2014 at 3:54 AM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yeah, this is not just not true Astus, the basic practice of this approach to Mahāmudra is guru yoga. It may not involve the two stages per se, but it does involve practices such as Vajrasattva, mandala offerings and so on which are characteristic of Vajrayāna practice, i.e., there is still purification and gathering accumulations. And more importantly, there is the practicing of integrating one's mind with the mind of the Guru based upon so called "direct introduction."

Astus wrote:

Mathes concludes in the mentioned article (and this is what I have said before):

"Our study of the Tattvadasakatika has shown that no Tantric empowerment or such skillful means as great bliss are required by this type of mahamudra, which merely depends on the pith-instructions of one's guru."

As further reference (although actually both works contain the preliminary practices you mentioned):

Takpo Tashi Namgyal writes (Mahamudra: The Quintessence, p 124):

"if one follows venerable Gampopa's system in elucidating mahamudra alone, it is not necessary to bestow the empowerment upon devotees. In keeping with his system one should adhere to the preparatory exercises he prescribed without incorporating the tantric meditation of Vajrasattva, the utterance of mantra, the transformation of oneself into yidam, and the visualization of one's guru in the form of Buddha Vajradhara, the source of the mystic empowerment."

Thrangu Rinpoche explains (Essentials of Mahamudra, p 89):

QUESTION: You said that mahamudra is taking direct perception as the path. Also, you said that mahamudra is the path of the blessing of faith and longing devotion. Could you explain the relationship of devotion to mahamudra practice?

RINPOCHE: I spoke about three different divisions of the path. They were taking inference as the path, taking blessing as the path, and taking direct experience as the path. The second of those, taking of blessing as path, is the meditation upon yidam deities, the practice of guru yoga, and the practices of subtle channels and drops. The third is being introduced directly to the mind as it really is. These latter two are not incompatible with one another. The introduction to mahamudra is the pointing out of your mind.

And even if we add the preliminary practices, there is still no requirement or even use of the channels and winds in one's practice of Mahamudra.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 30th, 2014 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

conebeckham said:

There most certainly CAN be the use of channels and winds in Mahamudra, in some way, even in a path that does not utilize deity yoga or the stages of creation and completion.

Astus wrote:

The only point I wanted to bring to this topic with mentioning Mahamudra was about the development of Buddhist philosophy in India. The gradual integration of Vajrayana to a monastic environment resulted, among other things, in the "blending of Sutra with Tantra". It also seems to me a natural evolution of things that there appeared some who were critical of Vajrayana and, according to their claim, they superseded even HYT.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 14th, 2014 at 5:20 PM

Title: Re: How to stop desiring in meditation

Content:

Astus wrote:

Trying to remove concepts with more concepts hardly ever works, unless you learn to be good at proper Buddhist reasoning. If you just want the zazen remedy, the skilful means is focusing on your posture, as it's been advised before. Of course, that's not exactly Zen but body-mindfulness, it can still work. There are other options as well, like using a koan, breath, or you could walk instead of sitting. Also check <http://terebeess.hu/zen/mesterek/meiho.html> for some inspiration.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 17th, 2014 at 12:34 AM

Title: Re: Jon Kabat-Zinn: authorization to teach?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't really see the relevance of authorisation. It counts if one tries to present oneself as the representative of someone else. However, there seems to be no claim for anything like that. Anyone can teach whatever they want to (science, art, religion, etc.). The important question is the content of the teaching, not who else claims that the teacher is fantastic. I don't see Candrakirti criticising Yogacara teachers for their lack of special authorisation. Buddhism is not copyrighted.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 17th, 2014 at 3:29 AM

Title: Re: So what is the Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

Astus wrote:

This is a fine summary:

"From the beginning, Suchness in its nature is fully provided with all excellent qualities; namely, it is endowed with the light of great wisdom, the qualities of illuminating the entire universe, of true cognition and mind pure in its self-nature; of eternity, bliss, Self, and purity; of refreshing coolness, immutability, and freedom. It is endowed with these excellent qualities which outnumber the sands of the Ganges, which are not independent of, disjointed from, or different from the essence of Suchness, and which are suprarational attributes of Buddhahood. Since it is endowed completely with all these, and is not lacking anything, it is called the Tathagata-garbha when latent and also the Dharmakaya of the Tathagata."

(http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Translations/Awakening_of_faith.html)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 18th, 2014 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: So what is the Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

Anders said:

As far as I am concerned, I think these debates about whether there really is a true self or not tend miss a big question, that is quite poignant for any Buddhist who accepts them as buddhavacana, even if only provisionally so: Is it useful to have such a view?

Astus wrote:

"The Buddhas have designated a self;

And have taught that there is no self;
And also have taught that
There is neither self nor selflessness."
(MMK 18.6, tr. Samten & Garfield)

I think those who teach about buddha-nature (true self) usually emphasise how it is both empty and not-empty. That is the case in both East Asian and Tibetan Mahayana, while at the same time there are not many Mahayana teachers who strictly distance themselves from the tathagatagarbha doctrine. Practically speaking, since the buddha qualities are inherent, it becomes possible to skip aeons of accumulating merit, so we have all the "enlightenment in this body" teachings as the mainstream of Mahayana.

Sherab Dorje said:

My opinion is that for westerners, this intense grasping to the concept, is just baggage from their Abrahamic past.

Astus wrote:

And that's why it is popular. And because of the promise of immediate liberation. As the wonderful Mazu Daoyi explained (tr. Ferguson, p 76):

A monk asked, "Master, why do you say that mind is Buddha?"

Mazu said, "To stop babies from crying."

The monk said, "What do you say when they stop crying?"

Mazu said, "No mind, no Buddha."

The monk asked, "Without using either of these teachings, how would you instruct someone?"

Mazu said, "I would say to him that it's not a thing."

The monk asked, "If suddenly someone who was in the midst of it came to you, then what would you do?"

Mazu said, "I would teach him to experience the great way."

And from Keys to Buddhism by Thich Thanh Tu (p 58):

"The Owner is the tranquil, aware essence that has never been agitated, changed, or eradicated. To experience it, try this contemplation: When meditating or sitting alone at a quiet place, note how your feelings, conceptions, mental formations, and consciousness calm down, yet your eyes, your ears, etc., are full of awareness. Then, ask yourself, "Who is it that is seeing, hearing, etc.? Is it the permanent, tranquil, aware nature inside?" Therefore, the theory of "the Owner" mentioned here does not contradict the Buddha's teaching about no self. When we have real experiences, we know it. It is useless to hang on to or argue over theories.

Question: In many sutras, the Buddha reprimanded views about permanence and annihilation while this section says, "the Owner is permanent and unchanging." Is this section similar to heterodox views of permanence?"

The heretic holds on to the idea that the five-aggregate body is permanent when, in fact, it is impermanent, bound to birth and death. Therefore, the Buddha reprimanded their viewpoint. That which takes form and belongs to birth and death is impermanent. Since the Owner is formless, beyond duality, and free from birth and death, how can it be impermanent? We make efforts to express the Owner by saying that it is permanent and unchanging. In fact, when practitioners realize this aware nature in themselves, they will understand this sense of permanence that cannot be described. Therefore, when we say that the Owner is permanent and unchanging, it is not similar to heterodox views of permanence, and, as such, there is no contradiction."

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 18th, 2014 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: So what is the Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Buddhaqualities may be inherent in the dharmakāya, but only buddhas can see the dharmakāya, just as only buddhas can see tathagātagarbha. Thus one cannot evade the two accumulations, whether it takes three incalculable eons as in common Mahayāna, or on one lifetime, as in Secret Mantra.

Astus wrote:

That may be so. But it would be hard to find any existing Mahayana school of the common type. Tiantai, Huayan and especially Chan teaches a sudden path, while Pure Land teaches liberation in the next life. Only those who deny buddha-nature, i.e. the followers of Xuanzang, talk about a minimal three aeons.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 20th, 2014 at 4:45 PM

Title: Re: Some of my confusions in a sutra

Content:

richardx888 said:

What is the meaning of that actually?

Astus wrote:

1. Dharma teachers should not fear.
2. Dharma teachers should not be attacked.

richardx888 said:

2. In some of the mahayana scriptures, the buddha suggest to rewrite the sutra out. The question is was there any written language during the buddha's life? If yes, was writing even that popular during that time? I thought the sutras was written later after the Buddha deceased.

Astus wrote:

As you may have heard, Mahayana scriptures are later than the Agamas/Nikayas, and most of them were transmitted in written form only. Or, if you want, you can think that the Buddha advised his audience to write down the scriptures.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 21st, 2014 at 7:00 AM

Title: Re: Vision going blurry?

Content:

Astus wrote:

If it happens only during meditation, you try to make something special of sitting there. You might be focusing somewhere for too long for instance. If it happens in other, everyday situations, consult with a medical expert.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 22nd, 2014 at 6:36 PM

Title: Re: Shin Buddhism: Amida's "Methodology" of Salvation

Content:

Astus wrote:

The sambhogakaya and the buddha-field are both the results of a bodhisattva's cultivation and accumulated merit. It is possible to conceive of any buddha as an active force that helps beings along the path to liberation, and also as a person full of compassion. Naturally, it is easier for ordinary beings to think of buddhas as superior humans, and that's fine. So, Amida saves beings as a result of his vows, as vows define the special qualities of buddhas. Connecting with Amida through faith one can be born in the Pure Land. But without that connection there is no way for ordinary beings to go to his buddha-field.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 23rd, 2014 at 8:11 PM

Title: Re: Which buddhism on this forum can be practised trough boo

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is up to you. There has been even outstanding teachers who relied primarily on the Buddha's teachings as contained in the sutras. In fact, only Vajrayana restricts itself to contact with teachers, and even then it is mostly for receiving empowerments. Otherwise, there is no such rule that you must have a teacher. Except for receiving ordination as a bhikshu, you can get everything from books. (Actually, there is a sutra in the Chinese canon that allows full ordination without a preceptor, but that's a different matter.)

"all of the buddhas and all of their teachings of peerless perfect enlightenment spring forth from this sūtra"

(Diamond Sutra, ch 8)

"This sutra is the treasure house of the hidden essence of all the buddhas."

(Lotus Sutra, ch 10)

"Those who grasp at emptiness slander the Sutras by maintaining that written words have no use. Since they maintain they have no need of written words, they should not speak either, because written words are merely the marks of spoken language. They also maintain that the direct way cannot be established by written words, and yet these two words, 'not established' are themselves written."

(Platform Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch, ch 10)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 27th, 2014 at 6:41 PM

Title: Re: Bankei and three nens question

Content:

Astus wrote:

This three nens system is fairly primitive and from Bankei's Zen perspective pointless.

It is primitive, as it shows how certain teachers know little to nothing about 'fundamental' teachings, Abhidharma and Yogacara, as both contain various explanations and systems for analysing mind and mind moments. (E.g. <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/authors/mendis/wheel322.html#citta>) But even before when turn to complicated Buddhist scholastic texts, the five aggregates explain quite well what the "three nens" tries to say. The first nen of direct sensual experience is the body aggregate, the second nen of judging and naming is the second and third aggregate, the third nen of reflection third and fourth aggregate. Now, according to the teachings, the problem is not with the aggregates themselves, but with attachment and wrong identification. Clinging to only bodily impressions (first nen) is not only pointless (does not lead to liberation) but also just another form of self view.

Zen in general, and Bankei in particular is not about setting up systems to explain how the mind works. First of all, there are already texts and traditions that do just that. So, if one wants an in depth teaching, there are sources and teachers to turn to. Bankei taught about the Unborn, that is, a mind that is not bound to any state but open and aware. It is unborn, as it is not born as this or that - e.g. angry, happy, mindful, senseless, etc. - in other words, without self, without identification. To say that one should practise with or stay in a particular state of mind, that is exactly giving birth to a mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 28th, 2014 at 6:00 PM

Title: Re: Understanding emptiness exercise

Content:

Astus wrote:

Emptiness is being empty of something permanent, real, solid. Appearances are not denied but seen for what they actually are, that is, conceptual constructs. In other words, a tree does not say it is a tree, we call it a tree. And with this single word we have a whole web of associated concepts to build an imaginary reality that we take to be factual. If you don't call it a tree, what is it?

Shuzan Osho held up his shippei [staff of office] before his disciples and said, "You monks! If you call this a shippei, you oppose its reality. If you do not call it a shippei, you ignore the fact. Tell me, you monks, what will you call it?"
(Mumonkan, case 43 [cf. case 40], tr. Sekida)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 30th, 2014 at 7:12 AM

Title: Re: Tendai vs. Gelug: Problems with Syncretization?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I consider it a mistaken line of thinking to believe that there are actually "pure traditions". It is similar to the idea of other purisms: linguistic, ethnic, artistic, philosophic, etc. They are actually in contradiction with dependent origination and how life is organic on both material and spiritual levels.

Zhiyi organised the various teachings he had access to into a loose system. Tsongkhapa did the same. Today in English there is no complete translation of all the works of either of them, but we have access to both to some extent. Why couldn't they be combined? I think if one wants to cross the river, one has to make use of whatever kind of wood is available. As long as it floats it is a vehicle of liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 9th, 2014 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: Bodhidharma's mind and form

Content:

Astus wrote:

Somewhat confusing text, isn't it? But all it talks about is quite standard, that is, the seeing of the 18 dhatus for what they are and thus attaining liberation from attachment to phenomena.

"Those who don't understand don't understand understanding. And those who understand, understand not understanding."

凡迷者：迷於悟，悟者：悟於迷。 - The common confused (mi 迷) [people] are confused (mi 迷) about understanding. Those who understand (wu 悟) [enlightened ones] understand (wu 悟) confusion (mi 迷).

"form isn't simply form, because form depends on mind. And mind isn't simply mind, because mind depends on form."

色不自色，由心故色；心不自心，由色故心 - form is not form in itself, because mind makes form; mind is not mind in itself, because form makes mind

"Mind and form create and negate each other."

是知心色兩相俱生滅 - that is to know: mind and form are both just birth and death (samsara).

"When your mind doesn't stir inside, the world doesn't arise outside. When the world and the mind are both transparent, this is true vision" 若內不起心，則外不生境，境心俱淨，乃名為真見 - If inside mind does not arise, then outside [sense-]objects are not born. Objects and mind are both pure, that is called true vision.

"And such understanding is true understanding."

作此解時，乃名正見。 - When you are freed from it, only then it is called correct seeing/vision.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 10th, 2014 at 7:30 PM

Title: Instant Mindfulness

Content:

Astus wrote:

The unique teaching of Zen is sudden enlightenment. Here I try to translate that to the current language using the popular thought of mindfulness.

The mind is already mindful, it cannot be increased or decreased. Whatever occurs it is naturally aware of it. The mind is not born out of conditions, so it is free and independent, unaffected by appearances. That is, experience is known and inconceivable at the same time. Experience cannot be unknown, otherwise it would not be experienced. Experience cannot be conceived, otherwise it would stay for ever. Mind and experience are one and the same. As mind is necessarily mindful, so is experience necessarily known. As mind is necessarily nothing concrete, so is experience necessarily inconceivable. See the experiencing mind for what it is and mindfulness is perfected immediately.

Question is, is it an acceptable idea that mindfulness is not developed and there is no training for it?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 10th, 2014 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: Instant Mindfulness

Content:

Jesse said:

At least what I know from mindfulness from TNH's teachings, it is the ability to stay grounded in the moment by not being attached to the arising of phenomena in the mind-stream.

What your talking about is closer to zazen or dzogchens presence teachings isn't it?
Your basically saying if your enlightened your mind will already be mindful?

Astus wrote:

Experience always happens in the moment and there is nothing we can do to stop it in its arising and passing. Because that is already so, that's why the mind is already mindful. It cannot be unmindful.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 10th, 2014 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: Instant Mindfulness

Content:

Jesse said:

That's true, but it can be distracted. Isn't the ability to be un-distracted what allows us to see the mind for what it is? Otherwise we'd be lost in the illusions of thought, attached to the arising and passing of experiences, which is samsara in it'self.

Astus wrote:

In order to be distracted there must be a desired state one is moved from by some other state. And if that can happen, both states are temporary phenomena, different moments of experience. Attachment is believing that there is something lasting, something that can be grasped. Seeing experiences for what they are is not the rejection of something existing nor a creation of something new.

See what Dahui wrote (Swampland Flowers, p 69),

"You say that you have dull faculties. Try to reflect back like this: see if the one who can recognize the dullness is dull too or not. If you don't turn the light around and reflect back, you're just keeping to your dull faculties and adding more affliction. That would be adding illusory falsehood to illusory falsehood, laying on optical illusion on top of optical illusion. Just listen: the one who can know that sense faculties are inherently dull is definitely not dull. Though you shouldn't hold to this dull one, you shouldn't abandon it to study, either; grasping and rejecting, sharp and dull – these have to do with people, not with Mind. This Mind is one substance with all the buddhas of the three worlds: there is no duality. If there were duality, the Dharma would not be of even sameness. "Receiving the teaching" and "transmitting Mind" are both empty falsehoods. Looking for truth and seeking reality seem even further off.

Just realize that Mind, with a single essence and no duality, definitely does not lie within sharp and dull or grasping and rejecting: then you'll see the moon and forget the finger, immediately making a clean break. If you linger further in thought, calculating before and after, then you're still understanding the empty fist as if it held something real, falsely concocting strange things amidst the phenomena of the sense objects, vainly confining yourself within matter, sensation, perception, volition, and consciousness, within the elements of sensory experience – you'll never get done."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 10th, 2014 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Instant Mindfulness

Content:

rachmiel said:

This "mind" that is being talked about ... it is clearly not the particular mind, i.e. what appears say in my field of awareness and not in yours.

So if it is not the particular mind ... what IS it? Alaya-vijnana?

Astus wrote:

There is only one mind, one awareness. Talking about six, eight or more consciousnesses is only differentiating and categorising various groups of mental functions. Still, experience is experience for one and not many. The above summary discusses just this experiencing mind all beings have.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 10th, 2014 at 11:30 PM

Title: Re: Instant Mindfulness

Content:

rachmiel said:

Is this a view that is shared by all schools of Buddhism?

I thought awareness/consciousness was a skandha, which would tie it to a particular body-mind.

Astus wrote:

That depends on how we present it. In a single moment there is a single moment of consciousness. That could be called one mind. Also, every being has a single stream of consciousness. That could be called one mind. Xuanzang says (Three Texts on Consciousness Only, p 64)

"Thus in many places in the scriptures it is said that there is only the one mind. "One mind" also includes mental activities. Therefore the mode of activity of consciousness is perception, and perception is the seeing part of consciousness."

But those are not exactly what is meant here, as the context is the teaching of buddha-nature. And as Huangbo says (Zen Texts, p 13, BDK Edition),

"It is only this One Mind that is Buddha; there is no distinction between Buddhas and sentient beings. However, sentient beings are attached to characteristics and seek outside themselves. Seeking it, they lose it even more."

The point is that when talking about buddha-nature teachings, the method is not really about dissecting experiences to reveal the illusion of solidity but to bring attention to the mind experiencing phenomena.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 11th, 2014 at 4:22 PM

Title: Re: Instant Mindfulness

Content:

Astus wrote:

Experience cannot be conceived, otherwise it would stay for ever.

LastLegend said:

Can you explain this please?

Astus wrote:

If experience could be conceived, grasped, held, it would mean that it is some real thing on its own, that we can stop the flow of change and time. Normally that's how we think about everything, as distinct objects that we can manipulate in one way or another, or objects that impact our mind. That is the deluded belief in substantial appearances, in permanent things. However, if we care to look a little closer, it is quite obvious that the present moment cannot be grasped at all, the experience is inconceivable. It is only in the realm of concepts that we attribute a substance, a self to our experience. But thoughts are also experience, nothing permanent or real.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 11th, 2014 at 6:31 PM

Title: Re: Bodhidharma's mind and form

Content:

LastLegend said:

not understanding is the awareness; awareness understands everything but it does not arise thought arise form.

Astus wrote:

It is unclear to me what you mean there. Please elaborate.

LastLegend said:

So both extinguished what remains is an empty mind, but when Buddha manifests (not by mind/thought) there is appearance?

Astus wrote:

Buddha is not a manifest object or emanation but the nature of mind. When the text says that one should not generate mind and form, it means clinging to mental and physical phenomena. That mind and form depend on each other is like seeing a beautiful object and feeling desire for it. Purity means that one is not deluded by either mental or material appearances.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 11th, 2014 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: Bodhidharma's mind and form

Content:

LastLegend said:

Yes, I understand that. But Buddha isn't just mind that is separate from object. It would be outrageous to people to say that Buddha is object and object is Buddha. It is also outrageous to imagine that Buddha is just mind dangling somewhere. If you say Buddha has mental activities, i.e., thinking, like we do, then Buddha is deluded. If Buddha is empty mind, why does he need thought to arise since thought arises from arises.

Astus wrote:

Consciousnesses and their related objects (the whole 18 dhatus) are the functions of a sentient being. If there is identification, attachment, it is delusion. If there is no concept of self, no clinging, then it is seeing clearly. And the latter is what being buddha means. Both mind and objects are originally empty, it is through realising that that one can relinquish attachment and attain liberation. It does not mean that one should strive for a mind without mental functions (i.e. thoughts).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 11th, 2014 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Bodhidharma's mind and form

Content:

LastLegend said:

Not understanding-because there is no object to understand since no thought arises, no form arises. That is the awareness. Bodhidharma said what mortals understand is delusion because there is object to understand. So in theory, there is nothing to be mindful-awareness is awareness.

Astus wrote:

That sounds like a self-contained state of senselessness. What's the use of that?

LastLegend said:

If the nature of mind is the nature of form, and the nature of form is the nature of mind, there is no separation there. If there is no separation, what is to be aware of but aware itself?

Astus wrote:

The nature of mind is that it is empty. The nature of form is that it is empty. Just because both a bowl of rice and a pile of brick are impermanent it does not mean you could eat either of them.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 12th, 2014 at 12:46 AM

Title: Re: Bodhidharma's mind and form

Content:

LastLegend said:

Why does it sound like a self contained state if there is no intention to contain such a state?

Astus wrote:

Self-contained, as it is without anything else but itself, awareness of awareness.

LastLegend said:

The nature of mind is empty in what aspect? And what is nature?

If you look at brick, you think there is division between you and brick, then you make a separation between you and brick-the object of brick to be seen and the one who sees the brick- the observer and the observed. Right there is the problem. If you see that because of brick, there is you and because of you, there is brick, there should not be any object to observe. Why? Because you is void and not a thing in yourself, not anything of substance in any shape or form that you can see because if you can see yourself, you would not be void and a thing in yourself with substance. If you try to find you, you create a division between you and the "you" you want to find-division between subject and object. So then it said, "You become the thing itself." If you become the thing itself, there is no object to see. I think that's what meant by seeing isn't seeing, understanding is isn't understanding because there is no object/place for thought to arise.

Astus wrote:

Emptiness means the lack of substance, a permanent self-essence. That's what they're empty of. That the nature of mind is empty means that there is no independent being or thing that is mind in and of itself. There are only interdependent mental phenomena.

Although there is no substantial mind nor substantial brick, one can still recognise a brick and use it for various purposes. That's the inseparability of essence and function, emptiness and interdependence.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 12th, 2014 at 4:59 AM

Title: Re: Bodhidharma's mind and form

Content:

LastLegend said:

If that's the case, one would be trapped in awareness of awareness and not going to work to pay bills.

Astus wrote:

In that case I misunderstood and we are in agreement.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 12th, 2014 at 6:54 PM

Title: Re: Instant Mindfulness

Content:

Bakmoon said:

Translating sudden Enlightenment teachings into terms understandable to non-secular Theravadins for example would probably have to use a different terminology.

Astus wrote:

Ajahn Mun's lineage has mostly covered that, while the Burmese have bare awareness (or is that only used in English?). But instead of mindfulness we could call it non-attachment or non-grasping and point out that all phenomena are already impermanent and empty.

"Awareness, the awakened state, takes you out of ignorance immediately, if you'll trust it. As soon as you are aware, ignorance is gone. So then, when ignorance arises, you can be aware of it as something coming and going, rather than taking it personally or assuming that you're always ignorant until you become enlightened. If you're always operating from the assumption that 'I'm ignorant and I've got to practise in order to get rid of ignorance,' then grasp that assumption, you're stuck with that until you see through the grasping of that view."

(http://www.dhammatalks.net/Books9/Ajahn_Sumedho_Personality.htm)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 15th, 2014 at 7:53 PM

Title: Re: Zen smell, Zen stink and Zen pong

Content:

Astus wrote:

Comparing the "three Zen fragrances" with a traditional list of stages shows that while the ancient ones discussed traps of realisation, the pong and stink are fascination with outer rituals and labels. But it is not surprising that people are mesmerised by the illusion of Zen when what is being presented as Zen is the illusion. So, either attachment to robes, labels and ceremonies is a skilful means, or it is wrong to have them from the beginning.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 17th, 2014 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: Zen smell, Zen stink and Zen pong

Content:

Meido said:

Yet it seems many folks are in a hurry to disparage or dump inherited forms...not because they've personally put them to the test over years of severe practice and found them lacking, but rather right at the outset. I can only think, therefore, that they do so because of personal prejudice and cultural allegiance, negative experience - or conflation with - other religious traditions, or just plain laziness and unwillingness to look beyond surface appearances. All very unfortunate.

Astus wrote:

It has been repeated over the centuries by various Zen works that Zen does not require any of the usual Buddhist practices, that Zen includes them and at the same time is beyond them. There are even some well known lines explicitly criticising various practices, teachings and attitudes. Then it is quite a different thing when in a Zen group what one finds are rituals, rules, various practices and such. That is, there is a discrepancy between Zen teaching and Zen praxis. It is not surprising then that people may reject those traditional elements as cultural superfluity. At the same time, this topic itself was started with a criticism of attachment to outer elements and rituals.

Bodhidharma in Bloodstream Sermon (tr. Red Pine):

"If you don't see your nature, invoking buddhas, reciting sutras, making offerings, and keeping precepts are all useless. Invoking buddhas results in good karma, reciting sutras results in a good memory; keeping precepts results in a good rebirth, and making offerings results in future blessings - but no buddha."

Linji (tr. Sasaki):

"You say, 'The six pāramitās and the ten thousand [virtuous] actions are all to be practiced.' As I see it, all this is just making karma. Seeking buddha and seeking dharma are only making hell-karma. Seeking bodhisattvahood is also making karma; reading the sutras and studying the teachings are also making karma. Buddhas and patriarchs are people with nothing to do."

Dogen in Bendowa (tr. Nearman):

"When we speak of the correct Transmission in our tradition, the straightforward Buddha Teaching of direct Transmission is 'the best of the best'. From the very moment when a disciple comes to meet face-to-face with the one who is to be his spiritual friend and knowing teacher, there is no need to have the disciple offer incense, make prostrations, chant the names of the Buddhas, do ascetic practices and penances, or recite Scriptures: the Master just has the disciple do pure meditation until he lets his body and mind drop off."

So, it is not a strange question to ask for a reason behind all the things going on in Zen communities.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 17th, 2014 at 4:24 AM

Title: Re: Zen smell, Zen stink and Zen pong

Content:

LastLegend said:

If you see your nature, then it's useful to do these [rituals]? So which one do or don't?

Astus wrote:

Linji says (tr. Sasaki, p 15):

"Gain understanding such as this, and then you can read the sutras."

Jinul writes in Moguja's Secrets on Cultivating the Mind (tr. Buswell, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, Vol. 2, p 217):

"It is like the maturation of an infant: from the day of its birth, [an infant] is endowed with all its faculties, just like any other [human being], but its physical capacities are not yet fully developed; it is only after the passage of many months and years that it will finally mature into an adult."

That is, with the view that one should initially attain a first hand realisation of the nature of mind and after that study the teachings and perform the numerous practices, one is in accord with the bodhisattva path where the skilful means (1-5 paramitas) are mingled with and based on wisdom (prajnaparamita). As the Diamond Sutra was quoted to Huineng, 'responding to the nonabiding, yet generating the mind' (tr. McRae), or as often repeated in the sutras, a bodhisattva saves all beings without conceiving any being to be saved. That is one way to approach this.

However, the Bodhidharma quote is in a different context. There, before awakening those practices are powerless, after awakening they are useless. Just before the previous quote in the same text you find the following:

"As long as you look for a buddha somewhere else, you'll never see that your own mind is the buddha. Don't use a buddha to worship a buddha. And don't use the mind to invoke a buddha. Buddhas don't recite sutras. Buddhas don't keep precepts."

That is how Zen is a direct pointing to the nature of mind and not a list of methods and practices to follow. One only needs to confirm personally that this mind reading and thinking, this very consciousness (awareness) is originally without anything to attain or anything to abide on, in other words, it is buddha. As Bodhidharma repeats again and again, there is nothing else transmitted but that the mind is buddha, and that is what can be called the Zen transmission.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 17th, 2014 at 7:03 AM

Title: Re: Zen smell, Zen stink and Zen pong

Content:

Meido said:

Thus my earlier comment that we should freely use these things and not be used by them.

Astus wrote:

I think it is repeated regularly in all Zen communities that one vows to learn immeasurable Dharma-gates. Although that's true for all Mahayana groups, so it's nothing unique to Zen. In fact, the different names and styles give the impression of many distinct sects and paths, including (real/imagined) differences between Soto and Rinzai.

Meido said:

But I did generally explain the utility of ritual, and (since robes were mentioned) also gave a few specific examples of how practice clothing is used.

Astus wrote:

Such approach to physical practice and internal energy seems to me a Rinzai speciality. Monastic robes are (supposed to be) defined by the Vinaya for instance. In China for physical practice there are martial arts, and for rituals there are various tantric elements for instance. But they don't necessarily count as anything related to Zen.

There is a Heine & Wright collection of essays with the title https://books.google.hu/books?id=Q_qAZWejjD4C but I have not yet gotten to read it.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 17th, 2014 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Interesting new book

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't see that this paradigm has changed, that is, the connection between meditation and teaching. Although there were reforms as the previous description has faded and lost power, but if someone looks around in current Buddhist teachings that are considered the "best and easiest", it is always strongly associated with meditation (Thai Forest Tradition, Burmese Vipassana, Pure Land, Zen, Vajrayana).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 19th, 2014 at 5:19 AM

Title: Top Ten Issues for Zen Today

Content:

Astus wrote:

Today's blog post by Dosho Port:

<http://www.patheos.com/blogs/wildfoxzen/2014/11/top-ten-issues-for-zen-today.html>

Topics:

1. Realization vs. Mindfulness
2. Aging white guys vs. everyone else
3. Thorough-going training vs. spiritual by-passing
4. Purpose vs. feeling
5. Ethical investigation vs. moralistic judgements

6. Public vs. private understanding
7. In-person vs. online
8. Monastic vs. householder training
9. Koan vs. shikantaza

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 5:38 PM

Title: Re: Existence And Causation

Content:

Astus wrote:

All phenomena exist as experience. If it is not experienced, it cannot even be imagined. The nature of experience is that it depends on other experiences, is associated with various memories and concepts, hangs in the duality of subject and object. The very presence of experience is a causal event. So, if something existed outside of causality, it would be only a conceptual supposition, and thus existed only as a mental phenomena within a causal chain.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 6:13 PM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

Astus wrote:

From the perspective of East Asian Mahayana - to what Zen belongs to - the validity of Vajrayana is rarely if ever questioned. There is even a "Secret Teaching Division" (volumes 18-21) in the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Taish%C5%8D_Tripitaka that includes all kinds of Tantric texts. In China many Vajrayana works were translated, especially during the Yuan (Mongolian) dynasty, as the court favoured Tibetan Buddhism. In Japan the Shingon school has existed since the 9th century. So, Tantric teachings and methods are recognised as valid in Mahayana beyond Tibet.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 9:48 PM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes of course, Astus, this was never disputed.

Astus wrote:

Just meant as an extension of Meido's response.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 10:46 PM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

Malcolm said:

As above, one cannot consider blessing protective amulets as falling under the heading of Vajrayāna practice, much less Yidam deity practice.

Astus wrote:

I did not mean yidams are used in practice by followers of Zen or other schools, it's just that I did not see people questioning the validity of it (except for some I have only heard of who despise Tantric/Tibetan Buddhism for some reason, but they are hardly if ever known among Western Buddhists).

Hanshan Deqing <http://terebess.hu/zen/mesterek/HanshanDeqing.html#c>:

"You may also recite mantras to receive the secret seal of the Buddhas; it will alleviate your hindrances. This is because all the secret mantras are the seals of the Buddhas' diamond mind. When you use them, it is like holding an indestructible diamond thunderbolt that can shatter everything. Whatever comes close to it will be demolished into dust motes. The essence of all the esoteric teachings of all Buddhas and ancestral masters are contained in the mantras. Therefore, it is said that, "All Tathagatas in the ten directions attained unsurpassable and correct perfect enlightenment through such mantras." Even though the Buddhas have said this clearly, the lineage ancestral masters, fearing that these words may be misunderstood, have kept this knowledge a secret and do not use this method. Nevertheless, in order to derive power from using a mantra, you must practice it regularly after a long and extensive period of time. Yet, even so, you should never anticipate or seek miraculous response from using it."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 11:57 PM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

Malcolm said:

If there is visualization of oneself as a deity, or you invite a deity in front of you, than this is exactly what yidam practice is.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean that visualisation practices like those found in the Pratyutpannasamadhi Sutra and the Amitayurdhyana Sutra count as yidam practice?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 25th, 2014 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

conebeckham said:

In addition to the parameters of "self visualization," or "inviting the deity in front," there must be "empowerment" of some sort. That's clear in all Vajrayana schools and lineages, whether Tibetan or not--and it's clear in Malcolm's posts, as well.

Astus wrote:

Yes, that's clear. My response was a result of a small surprised curiosity that came from focusing only on his short definition of yidam practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 25th, 2014 at 7:44 PM

Title: Re: Existence And Causation

Content:

Aemilius said:

There are several the buddhist examples of nonexistent phenomena: rabbit's horns, turtle hairs, crow's teeth, and a cloak of turtle hairs. All of these are found in sutras or commentarial literature.

Astus wrote:

"if something existed outside of causality, it would be only a conceptual supposition, and thus existed only as a mental phenomena within a causal chain."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 26th, 2014 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: Existence And Causation

Content:

LastLegend said:

"if something existed outside of causality, it would be only a conceptual supposition, and thus existed only as a mental phenomena within a causal chain."

Astus wrote:

Can you explain this further sir?[/quote]

Being outside of causality would mean something not experienced. If it is not experienced, it is neither a physical nor a mental phenomena. And although we may speculate about such things, it amounts to nothing more than conceptual proliferation. For instance, one could draw a rabbit with horns, it is still just a drawing and not a living being. So, whatever we think, it is just a thought, and whatever we name, it is just a name.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 26th, 2014 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: Existence And Causation

Content:

LastLegend said:

Does cause and effect still apply?

Astus wrote:

Causality always applies. Is there not a cause for a drawing, for a mental image, for a word, for a thought? Aren't they all impermanent and dependently originated? The only error is believing that they are more than what they are.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 29th, 2014 at 7:20 PM

Title: Re: Benefits of anthropomorphizing elements and aggregates?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Buddhas are perfectly enlightened beings. Ordinary beings are made of elements and aggregates. That all beings are made of buddhas is a statement connecting the beginning (samsara) with the end (nirvana). It is not that one should see a toenail as a buddha with arms, legs and a golden aura.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 1st, 2014 at 8:01 PM

Title: Re: Benefits of anthropomorphizing elements and aggregates?

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is not that one should see a toenail as a buddha with arms, legs and a golden aura.

Konchog1 said:

So we think "this a buddha with the appearance of a toenail"?

heart said:

No, it is a view where you see everything as inseparable purity and equality.

Astus wrote:

And

lorem said:

So, the heart of the matter is

To know that the dakini is your own mind.

Astus wrote:

So, on the path of means, is it through visualising a deity that one trains in the pure vision, because transforming the object of awareness also transforms the subject, while on the path of liberation one only changes the subject from deluded to knowing? In other words, one sees a shining buddha instead of a toenail on the vajrayana path, while in sutra it is just seeing the illusory nature of the toenail, but the result in both cases the relinquishing of the attachment to the toenail. Or is it in some other way?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 2nd, 2014 at 7:58 AM

Title: Re: Earthly Desires are Enlightenment

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is a work with that title by Nichiren: <http://www.nichirenlibrary.org/en/wnd-1/Content/35> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

At one point it says,

What is meant by this “wisdom”? It is the entity of the true aspect of all phenomena, and of the ten factors of life that lead all beings to Buddhahood. What then is that entity? It is Nam-myoho-renge-kyo. A commentary states that the profound principle of the true aspect is the originally inherent Myoho-renge-kyo. We learn that that true aspect of all phenomena is also the two Buddhas Shakyamuni and Many Treasures [seated together in the treasure tower]. “All phenomena” corresponds to Many Treasures, and “the true aspect” corresponds to Shakyamuni. These are also the two elements of reality and wisdom. Many Treasures is reality; Shakyamuni is wisdom. It is the enlightenment that reality and wisdom are two, and yet they are not two.

These are teachings of prime importance. These are also what is called “earthly desires are enlightenment,” and “the sufferings of birth and death are nirvana.” Chanting Nam-myoho-renge-kyo during the physical union of man and woman is indeed what is called “earthly desires are enlightenment,” and “the sufferings of birth and death are nirvana.” “The sufferings of birth and death are nirvana” exists only in realizing that the entity of life throughout its cycle of birth and death is neither born nor destroyed. The Universal Worthy Sutra states, “Without either cutting off earthly desires or separating themselves from the five desires, they can purify all their senses and wipe away all their offenses.” Great Concentration and Insight says, “The ignorance and dust of desires are enlightenment, and the sufferings of birth and death are nirvana.” The “Life Span” chapter of the Lotus Sutra says, “At all times I think to myself: How can I cause living beings to gain entry into the unsurpassed way and quickly acquire the body of a Buddha?” The “Expedient Means” chapter says, “The characteristics of the world are constantly abiding.” Surely such statements refer to these principles. Thus what is called the entity is none other than Nam-myoho-renge-kyo.

It seems to me he means the classic Mahayana doctrines of two truths and no-birth.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 3rd, 2014 at 11:37 PM

Title: Re: Request for something super specific

Content:

Astus wrote:

As an extension to Anders' post distinguishing wilful thinking and general mental activity, the fourth samadhi in Tiantai/Tendai of <http://www.tiantai.net/lit/mksk/v2/v2p2-1p5.htm> talks about the <http://www.tiantai.net/lit/mksk/v2/v2p3-1p1.htm>: "That not yet thought is called 'the mind that has not yet arisen'. The desire to be thought is called 'the mind that desires to arise'. The thought is called 'remaining in direct connection with the object'. That already thought is called 'leaving the connection with the object'." This is one possible source you can use. The other is the satipatthana (vipassana) method and all the commentaries, as it mentions what mind objects are to be observed and that one should be aware of their rise and fall. A brief look into abhidharma works can also help to inform oneself of what counts as mental dharma, thus no need to make up one's own system. For instance, the http://store.pariyatti.org/Comprehensive-Manual-of-Abhidhamma-A--PDF-eBook_p_4362.html can be of some help, especially the discussion of mental processes and impulses (<http://www.dhammadownload.com/index.php?title=Javana>) in chapter 4.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 4th, 2014 at 1:59 AM

Title: Re: Interesting new book

Content:

Astus wrote:

Robert Sharf:

<http://buddhiststudies.berkeley.edu/people/faculty/sharf/documents/Sharf1995,%20Buddhist%20Modernism.pdf>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 5th, 2014 at 7:18 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen all about "yogic action"?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"When no activity whatsoever is performed" - that is not what Zen is all about. From Patrul Rinpoche's text it is the "direct practice" rather than the gradual one that comes close to Zen. But even then, in Zen there is no difference between "in meditation" and "post-meditation". Recovering the nature of mind means not only freedom from appearances but the unhindered functioning of buddha-mind as well, that is the inseparable unity of the two truths. Here's an illustration:

One day while they were picking tea leaves, Guishan said to Yangshan, "All day today I've heard your voice but I haven't seen your form."

Yangshan then shook the tea tree.

Guishan said, "You attained its function, but you haven't realized its essence."

Yangshan said, "What does the master say?"

Guishan was silent.

Yangshan said, "The master has attained its essence but hasn't realized its function."

Guishan said, "I spare you thirty blows with the staff."

Yangshan said, "If I receive thirty blows of the master's staff, who then will receive thirty blows from me?"

Guishan said, "I spare you thirty blows."

(Zen master Xuanjue said, "I ask you, who made the error here?")

(Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 146)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 7th, 2014 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: Which Buddhist tradition has treated women the best?

Content:

Astus wrote:

What counts as treatment by a tradition? Is it the theoretical framework or the organisational status?

It should also be noted that Buddhist communities always exist within a society and the way the Dharma is interpreted is influenced by the culture. Thus, Westerners - at least those middle-class liberal people who are interested in Buddhism - want to see women as equal, and project that into the Buddha's teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 7th, 2014 at 11:26 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The teaching of Dzogchen is not confined to paeans of praise about our natural state. It consists of detailed instructions about the human body, its channels, functions and so on, all of which require ripening through empowerment. If Dzogchen were only about our natural state, it would not go beyond the Prajñāpāramita sūtras.

Astus wrote:

1. If Dzogchen necessarily includes teachings on the channels and such, does it mean that (a) public books on Dzogchen are actually sutra level teachings on emptiness and mindfulness, (b) whoever teaches/practises Dzogchen without deity yoga and/or togal only uses the name Great Perfection but not the real transmission, and (c) semde and longde, since they don't have togal as far as I'm aware, are not really Dzogchen or just preliminaries?

2. It is my impression that teachings where Dzogchen (and Mahamudra) is reduced to abiding in the natural state is practically no different from what is popularly understood as mindfulness, and similar or even identical instructions are given in modern Zen and Theravada. That is, all three of them matches the taste of similar Western practitioners who want a simple and practical technique and not a complete tradition/religion. Consequently the very question of this topic is so much like what can be seen in Theravada and Zen forums labelling Buddhism a cultural baggage, while the meditation practice is called the essence of the Buddha's teaching.

3. If the teaching on the natural state is no different from the Prajnaparamita sutras - that is, you seem to agree to the unity of Dzogchen, Mahamudra and Madhyamaka in terms of the ultimate view - is it your understanding that Dzogchen is a unique way because of its togal instructions and nothing else?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 2:19 AM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

Malcolm said:

As far as tregchö goes, there is really no difference between tregchö, Kagyu Mahāmudra and the meditation the view of the inseparability of samsara and nirvana — all three have the same point and all three depend on the experiential view imparted during empowerment.

Astus wrote:

Thank you for your answers. You did not mention anything about the view reached in Madhyamaka, as I take the unity of samsara and nirvana here means Lamdre. Is that because you take it to be a purely intellectual thing, or for some other reasons?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 2:39 AM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

Malcolm said:

because it is an intellectual based on analysis, it is not experientially equivalent with Mahāmudra and Dzogchen.

Astus wrote:

I think I don't fully understand what you mean here. Is it that Madhyamaka does not include experiencing emptiness, or is it that their practice results in something different than what they actually teach?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 3:43 AM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

Malcolm said:

it means that there is no method of experiential introduction in sutra.

Astus wrote:

You mean the lack of empowerment outside Vajrayana? So it's not that you disregard insight meditation, elements of what is used in Dzogchen, Mahamudra and Lamdre, is it?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 3:46 AM

Title: Re: Which Buddhist tradition has treated women the best?

Content:

odysseus said:

How should we interpret this? It's not a "want to see" or projecting anything... It's about Lord Buddha's reality.

Astus wrote:

Buddhism does not control lay society, nor does it really have teachings on political matters. Monastic organisation is regulated by the Vinaya, and there women are somewhat subordinate to men. In terms of Dharma practice, sexual identity is of no concern, never has been.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 4:06 AM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The key difference between sutra and tantra is empowerment.

Astus wrote:

I see. Thank you.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 6:23 PM

Title: Re: Which Buddhist tradition has treated women the best?

Content:

Astus wrote:

As far as I'm aware, there is not one school or tradition that has a female lineage, nor is there any outstanding (or even not so outstanding) treatise by a woman author. All the founders, thinkers and leaders are men. Some may cite here Machig Labdron, however, she is not much more than the legendary transmitter in Tibet of a practice that was only later canonised by male teachers (we are talking about women's social status here, not "religious stories of the past").

Although nunneries enjoyed some level of autonomy, a monastery can exist only from lay support. As men more often receive education and are considered the leaders in society, they have better connections with lay patrons, thus more donations.

Consequently nunneries often depend on male monasteries. Without financial independence and recognition of their merits, it is inevitable that women are generally exist in a lower status as subordinates of monks. There were exceptions, of course.

https://religiousstudies.artsci.wustl.edu/beata_grant:

<https://books.google.com/books?id=3-X1o6hA53QC>

"Poetry writing assumes, of course, a fairly high degree of literacy. This is particularly true in the case of traditional Chinese poetry, which requires a mastery not only of the classical language but also, because of the frequent use of intertextual references and allusion, of the larger literary tradition, including poetry, history, and philosophy. This is one of the reasons why women poets are considerably less represented in the Chinese poetic tradition. In China, literacy and literature were traditionally looked upon largely as a means to an end, the end being not so much self-expression and aesthetic fulfillment as an official post in the imperial bureaucracy. Because women were excluded from this career goal, it was not considered vital — indeed many felt it to be morally dangerous—that they be provided more than a rudimentary education, if any at all. Nevertheless, a significant number of women, mostly from elite families, of course, did manage to obtain the classical education that was necessary if they were to write."

(from the introduction to https://books.google.com/books?id=KP_7so49oA8C)

http://religion.columbia.edu/people/Bernard%20Faure:
<https://books.google.com/books?id=HidpRwrmx4AC>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 10:46 PM

Title: Re: Which Buddhist tradition has treated women the best?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Nonsense — Yeshe Tsogyal was prolific. There are many, many texts attributed to her.

Astus wrote:

Attributed to her as a terma? I don't consider that the same as being the actual author, although it is not negligible that she stands as an example of a female master.

Malcolm said:

This is also not so: Niguma, Sukhasiddhi, Siddhirajni, Laxminkara, etc., are just a few of the women authors whose works are prominent in Vajrayāna, who are also considered founders of lineages.

Machig is a historical person, and there is no reason to believe she did not author much of what has been attributed to her.

More recently there is Sera Khandro, Tara Lhamo and so on, twentieth century female authors.

They may be rare, but you are overstating the case by a considerable margin.

Astus wrote:

What level of use/importance do the writings (not the transmissions) of those four Indian female authors carry? What I could gather with a brief search is that the actual founder of the Shangpa Kagyu was Khyungpo Naljor, a male monk, who studied with two of the four yoginis. Don't get me wrong, I'm not saying that this is all irrelevant, but it seems to me that women had no better situation in Tibet than anywhere else. And even if there were some Indian woman siddhas, in their society they were not recognised as anyone important.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 10th, 2014 at 6:53 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I find most of the Mahayana arguments either fabricated or historically bound. Fabricated, as against fictitious sravakas. Historically bound, as to be interpreted within the context of struggle between interpretations and schools. As for the current Theravada and the nikaya texts, there are teachers I find inspiring and to the point, while the scriptures are really superb. I can see the nikayas as the foundational texts, and the rest of Buddhism is elaboration and commentary.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 10th, 2014 at 7:45 AM

Title: Re: Which Buddhist tradition has treated women the best?

Content:

odysseus said:

Anyhow, most Buddhists (and even non-Buddhists) have heard about Green and White Taras. Just for an argument.

Astus wrote:

I think mostly Vajrayana Buddhists and Hindus may know about Tara, as she's not prominent in East Asia where they have Guanyin, while Theravada doesn't really have anyone beyond Shakyamuni. While the cult of Virgin Mary has been strong in Western countries for more than a thousand years, women did not fare very well within society until the 20th century.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 10th, 2014 at 7:49 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Bakmoon said:

Well, among the 18 to 20 or so Shravakayana schools of pre-Mahayana Buddhism there were a number of groups who probably did hold a lot of the views ascribed to them in Mahayana texts, in particular most in the Sarvastivada school held that individual Dharma are intrinsically existing.

Astus wrote:

Let's say dharma have self-nature, that they are the final elements of reality. If this is used for meditation, it means one should become aware of distinct categories of experience instead of viewing them as a "personal matter". This becomes quite understandable if one starts to use the noticing-labelling method. From "I am angry" it becomes "there is anger", or just "anger", or just "unpleasant", or just "feeling". The point is that it loses its edge, its grasp on one's perception. And that's when one can see that it is impermanent, suffering and not self. Once their true characteristics are seen there is no more basis for attachment. If we were to claim that because dharmas are called svabhava there is still attachment it would mean that one has not actually seen the true characteristics of a given dharma, and that is contrary to the very insight gained. Concepts are within the realm of the five aggregates, just as every other possible experience, so they are necessarily released with liberation.

Dan74 said:

The view expressed by Astus is not really that uncommon among Zen practitioners, I think.

Astus wrote:

I think that's partially because if one considers a teaching authentic, i.e. the words of the Buddha, one tries to look at it from the view gained from one's school. That is, instead of interpreting a sutta based on Tsongkhapa, one just looks at it as a Dharma teaching, and tries to make sense of it as such. Practically speaking, many meditation methods used in Mahayana are identical to those used in Hinayana texts. Here's an example, a thesis on one of Kumarajiva's translation:

http://www.thichhangdat.com/files/Master_Thesis.pdf

Dan74 said:

"the rest of Buddhism is elaboration and commentary"

Astus wrote:

The following ideas play here:

- historical sequence of texts, that the nikayas are what the Buddha likely/actually taught
- one vehicle view, that there is only one message that is being transmitted
- teachings are skilful means, they are always adapted to the time and circumstances

So, the first manifestation of the one teaching is found in the nikayas, and then later generations had to apply it to various audiences. It is not that there are better and better teachings, rather only newer forms.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 10th, 2014 at 9:26 PM

Title: Re: Mind and Motion

Content:

Astus wrote:

Experience is motion and awareness. Motion means that there is change all the time, things come and go. Awareness means that there is consciousness present in experience. Whenever there is awareness, there is awareness of something, and that something changes.

There is no awareness found outside experience, therefore one should not strive for a blank state where nothing happens. Awareness is not the same as what is experienced, so one should not identify anything as one's true being. Because whatever is experienced always changes, there is nothing that could be held onto, nothing to serve as an abode.

Provisionally it can be said that there is a subjective awareness and the various objects occurring. Such a separation can help initially to put a distance between mind and phenomena, and cultivate detachment and mindfulness. But it's better to see right now that all problems arise from not recognising that awareness and motion exist inseparably in experience every moment. Thus there is nobody (mind) to obtain anything (object).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 11th, 2014 at 6:14 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

it makes them the Sravaka vehicle. I shouldn't need to defend that notion on this forum.

Astus wrote:

That's right, sravakas are important. If one can save oneself, that's already great. I think that those of us exposed to Mahayana teachings (sutra and tantra) can be a little fooled by the rhetoric about how superior the bodhisattvayana is. Although here I might add that the majority of popular Mahayana lineages don't emphasise the bodhisattva career, instead they promise buddhahood in this life or the next.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 11th, 2014 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Malcolm said:

the motivation of the bodhisattva path is infinitely superior to the motivation to become an arhat

Astus wrote:

By "bodhisattva career" I meant the aeons of walking the path and even delaying buddhahood intentionally. There is a difference between how buddhahood is interpreted in early and late Mahayana, and it is early Mahayana that focused on becoming a bodhisattva, while late Mahayana is focused on attaining buddhahood as soon as possible.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 12th, 2014 at 5:53 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Sherlock said:

Delaying Buddhahood is an odd concept if you accept a non-abiding Buddhahood, you can benefit beings on a far greater scale as a fully enlightened Buddha.

Astus wrote:

Yes, it is odd if buddhas can stay eternally to help beings. But here's a difference between early and late.

"It is noteworthy that, although the term apratisthita is found in the Prajnaparamitas as mentioned above, the compound word consisting of both apratisthita and nirvana is, in all probability, an innovation by the Yogacaras around the time of Asanga or by Asanga himself in his Mahayana-samgraha."

(Nagao & Kawamura: Madhyamika and Yogacara, p 223)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 12th, 2014 at 5:56 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The reality is that there are three different kinds of bodhisattva motivations spoken of in the sūtras, king-like, captain-like and shepherd-like. There really is no evidence to suppose that the shepherd-like motivation existed first, and the other two were taught later. The way this is taught in the Mahāyāna itself is that the King-like bodhicitta is for those with average capacity, with the shepherd-like motivation being for those of best capacity.

Astus wrote:

My knowledge is limited, but I have not yet encountered those three kinds of motivations in East Asian Buddhism, only Tibetan. Could you specify in what sutras, or even shastras (preferably those already translated to English) it is explained?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 12th, 2014 at 7:02 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Becoming a Buddha in Mahayana IS the greatest help to others. It's not as if you stop helping beings once you become one, and just hang in nirvana, that is actually describing personal liberation only, which again is the real big difference here to my mind. That goes for modern Theravada too. Personally most Theravadin teachers I've read are teaching the model of simply getting out of Samsara, this is not the same as Mahayana, and you see that even in context of things like Mahayana refuge vows, and things like nirvana being seen as merely the cessation of samsara, and not full Buddhahood. But yes, despite these differences, I can agree that renunciation of samsara, the FNT etc. from Sravaka teaching are indispensable, and that Sravakayana is important.

Astus wrote:

If the best choice were becoming a buddha then there would be no bodhisattvas mentioned who intentionally stay to help beings. They don't stay because they have not yet reached the point where they could become buddhas, but because they want to help all beings. As I have posted above, the option for non-abiding nirvana (and the trikaya doctrine) is a somewhat later development. It is no accident that the seventh vow of Samantabhadra is to request the buddhas to remain in the world.

"Again, O Noble-minded Man, what is meant by "beseeching the Buddhas to remain in the world"? The Buddhas are infinite in number as the minutest dust-motes of the ten quarters and three generations throughout the Dharma-realms and cosmic void; and so are the Bodhisattvas, the Sravakas, the Pratyeka-Buddhas, the wholly learned ones, the partly learned ones, and the well learned laymen. When they set their minds on the attainment of Nirvana; I entreat them all to remain in touch with mankind, instead of entering Nirvana; even to the duration of kalpas of Buddha-lands, equal to the minutest dust-motes in number, in order to benefit all living beings."
(http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/samantabhadra.pdf)

But if we consider the case where someone becomes a buddha, ultimately there is no distinction between the buddhas, as the dharmakaya equals the dharmadhatu, and from that appears all the other kayas. Thus the teaching that all buddhas are the manifestation of a single buddha (Vairocana). As the dharmadhatu is eternally present, whether a hundred more beings attain buddhahood or a thousand, it makes no difference in terms of buddha-bodies appearing in infinite number of worlds. In that sense, from the perspective of the individual practitioner, nirvana without remainder and non-abiding nirvana are the same.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 12th, 2014 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

LastLegend said:

Can you briefly explain how Mahayana and Sravakayana are identical in methods? From my understanding, Zen texts and Sutras such as Diamond and Shurangama have a very distinctive understanding of mind. For example, Bodhidharma's texts say knowing without knowing, seeing without seeing. It sounds like a lot of non-sense there. But I understand that to mean knowing without seeking to know, or contrive to know, or trying to actively to analyze any object/thought in order to know, this way we use not much effort because chasing thought/thinking/mind is delusion. That itself is awareness. Linji said let the mind be ordinary is the Way. While in Sravakayana, it is taught to concentrate a specific point or object, i.e., at the nose or behind the brain or mindfulness of breathing.

I don't think such understanding is conveyed in Sravakayana. Mahayana is hardcore with emptiness and manifesting in practice. To travel without traveling is because the mind has never moved an inch, though there is motion.

Astus wrote:

From Mazu Daoyi's record:

“What kind of knowledge should one have in order to understand the Way?” The master replied, “Self-nature is originally perfectly complete. If only one is not hindered by either good or evil things, he is called a man who cultivates the Way. Grasping good and rejecting evil, contemplating emptiness and entering concentration—all these belong to intentional creation and action. If one seeks further outside, he strays farther away. Just put an end to all mental calculations of the triple world. If one originates a single deluded thought, this is the root of birth and death in the triple world. If one simply lacks a single thought, then he excises the root of birth and death and obtains the supreme treasure of the dharma-king. Since countless kalpas, the deluded thoughts of ordinary man — flattery, deception, self-intoxication, and arrogance — have formed the one body. Therefore, the sutra says, ‘It is only by many dharmas that this body is aggregated. When arising, it is only dharmas arising; when extinguishing, it is only dharmas extinguishing.’ When the dharma arises, it does not say ‘I arise’; when the dharma extinguishes, it does not say ‘I extinguish.’ The former thought, the later thought, and the present thought—all successive moments of thought do not wait for one another, and all successive moments of thought are quiescent and extinct.

(Jinhua Jia: The Hongzhou School of Chan Buddhism in Eighth- through Tenth-Century China, p 126)

Putting an end to mental calculation, that is the cessation of mental proliferation (Pali: papanca). The description of arising and disappearing dharmas is virtually the same as what you find in the various insight meditation instructions in Theravada. Zen does not really discuss methods, it points to the final insight one needs to realise, that is: emptiness. The basic instruction for zazen is to let things come and go just as they are, because there is nothing to fix or modify. Insight meditation is not exactly like that, but it does come to the point where perceiving the rise and fall of dharmas brings one to liberation. That is, once it is seen clearly that dharmas are impermanent there is no more clinging to them, in other words, no abiding.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 12th, 2014 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: Mind and Motion

Content:

LastLegend said:

I pretty much I agree with what you said there, but it sounds like like mindfulness of thought. The real disagreement here is using effort to be aware/mindful of thoughts/motion.

Astus wrote:

If one thinks of something one necessarily knows about that. However, there are different levels of awareness of thoughts, as most of the time they are forgotten the next moment and we end up not understanding the source of the resulting emotions and actions. Thoughts themselves are mostly governed by beliefs and assumptions, and the most fundamental view of them all is that thoughts have essence. The insight required then is to see that thoughts are insubstantial. And even if one can gain that understanding in a single moment, it doesn't mean it cannot be forgotten in the next moment. So, effort may be required both before and after. Before one strives to see the nature of mind. After, one works on reminding oneself of the original realisation.

"Leaving the mind as it is in a relaxed ordinary state without trying to contrive thoughts or create motion in it", isn't that a choice, an effort?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 12th, 2014 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Malcolm said:

This is a very rash assertion — you are posting the opinion of one modern scholar as a fact when he himself in the very quote you cite is clearly guessing. This exemplifies exactly what is wrong with modern Buddhology.

Astus wrote:

I don't see how it is incorrect what the quote says. Can you find the term in a PP sutra or early Madhyamaka? Just did a quick search for it (無住涅槃) in the Great PP Sutra (大般若波羅蜜多經) and no match. Then I continued and found the followings (Taisho volume, number of texts): 16 (2), 18 (2), 19 (7), 20 (4), 25 (3), 26 (2), 30 (1), 31 (8), 32 (3), 33 (5), 34 (2), 35 (2), 36 (1), 38 (1), 39 (3), 40 (5), 42 (2), 43 (3), 44 (2), 45 (4), 46 (1), 48 (1). Here's a guide to what the various volumes contain:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Taish%C5%8D_Tripitaka.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 13th, 2014 at 1:29 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Such teachings as this are the basis for the term "non-abiding nirvana."

Astus wrote:

No question about that, that from one developed the other. My point is rather that first it was the bodhisattva that was perceived as a being possessing the active force to stay in samsara, while buddhas eventually attained parinirvana, although before that they did teach and were superior to bodhisattvas. The Mahaprajnaparamitasutra says that once a bodhisattva attained irreversibility, he has a choice whether to stay with beings until the end or go for buddhahood. However, if buddhas were superior and could have also stayed with beings, then choosing to remain a bodhisattva is indeed pointless. Nevertheless, Mahayana has a number of such bodhisattvas who intentionally stick around, although interestingly (or logically) some of them are regarded as buddhas in Vajrayana (e.g. Chenrezig and Kuntuzangpo).

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 13th, 2014 at 7:12 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Furthermore, if what you say is the case, how do can you reconcile that with the fact that Śakamuni Buddha in fact attained Buddhahood eons and eons ago?

Astus wrote:

And the Nirvana Sutra has a similar chapter as well on the Buddha's adamantine body. I don't see why there is a need for reconciliation. It is one of the first examples of transferring the eternal dharmakaya to an eternally active buddha, although it still says that Shakyamuni never goes extinct (nirvana), that is, it is either this shore or the other.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 15th, 2014 at 7:51 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Malcolm said:

However, you grandly claimed a few posts ago that non-abiding nirvana was a "late" development. But we see here that the Buddha taught it. So?

Astus wrote:

The Lotus Sutra does not say non-abiding nirvana, nor even contains the idea that there is any other nirvana than what was taught in the agamas and PP sutras.

's commentary (completed in 432) on the life-span chapter equates the Buddha with ultimate reality. His introduction to the chapter says,

"There is no way that the Sage can be in that category. Only the deluded would count the actual life-span of the Buddha as a hundred years. Now such a [mental] impediment is driven out. [The Buddha] relies on [the theory of] longevity to dispel it. Thus this chapter is titled "Life-Span."" (tr. Young-Ho Kim, p 294)

As the http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html says,

"What the World-honored One has explained as the view of self, view of person, view of sentient being, and view of life span, are actually not a view of self, view of person, view of sentient being, or view of life span. Therefore they are called view of self, view of person, view of sentient being, and view of life span."

And the 31st chapter of PP8000,

"Tathagatas certainly do not come from anywhere, nor do they go anywhere. Because Suchness does not move, and the Tathagata is Suchness. Non-production does not come nor go, and the Tathagata is non-production. One cannot conceive of the coming or going of the reality- limit, and the Tathagata is the reality-limit." (tr. Conze, p 291)

The Lifespan chapter agrees with the above when it says,

"Because the Tathāgata perceives all the marks of the triple world as they really are: that there is no birth and death, coming or going; that there is also no existence or extinction in the world, truth or falsehood, sameness or difference. The Tathāgata does not view the triple world as sentient beings in the triple world see it." (tr. Kubo & Yuyama, p 225)

This chapter of the Lotus Sutra also says,

"Although my Pure Land never decays,
The sentient beings see it as ravaged by fire
And torn with anxiety and distress;
They believe it is filled with these things.
Because of their misdeeds
These erring sentient beings do not hear
The name of the Three Treasures
For incalculable kalpas.
But all who cultivate merit,
And are receptive and honest,
Will see me residing here,
Expounding the Dharma."
(p 230)

And this,

"The lifespan that I first attained through practicing the bodhisattva path has not yet expired."
(p 225)

So, the chapter actually tells us that on the one hand the Buddha eternally abides in no birth, that is the ultimate reality that can be seen by anyone who practises correctly. On the other hand, the longevity is the result of the merit from the bodhisattva cultivation that eventually expires. Or, the two sides actually stand for the same, that is, suchness as the Buddha's true nature.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 16th, 2014 at 12:14 AM

Title: Re: the lesser yogi and the greater yogi

Content:

Malcolm said:

Since the merit cultivated on the bodhisattva path is limitless, its effects will be limitless. Or are you saying there is some limit to objectless dedications and so on that is not mentioned in the sūtras.

In short, it is very clear that in Mahāyāna the nirvana enjoyed by the Buddha does not entail the absolute cessation of his continuum. Further, there are the five certainties of the Sambhogakāya, and in terms of the two rūpakāya, the Sambhogakāya is definitive, whereas the nirmanakāya shows up here and there like the illusion of an illusionist.

Astus wrote:

I have only followed what the sutra implies by stating that the merit gathered on the bodhisattva path has not yet expired.

It seems to me that such an absolute cessation, as it is attributed to Hinayana, is a misinterpretation even from a Nikaya perspective where the Buddha explicitly denies that option (SN 22.85-86; MN 72; AN 4.174, etc.). And similarly to Mahayana's view on the true nature of the dharmakaya, nirvana is considered beyond conceptualisation (MN 44).

Where this discussion has started was that I have stated that early Mahayana favoured staying a bodhisattva, and one of the reasons for that was the lack of the concept of non-abiding nirvana of buddhas. Once buddhas got the same active position as bodhisattvas, the goal has moved to attaining buddhahood. Then almost everyone started to regard the bodhisattva path too long and arduous and various means to attain buddhahood swiftly occurred. So, we could say that there has never been the case that people had a far away goal in mind, instead they aimed for being an arhat/bodhisattva/buddha in this very life, because then that was the best and highest goal.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 18th, 2014 at 9:29 PM

Title: Re: Which Buddhist tradition has treated women the best?

Content:

quote said:

The number of realized women and women lineage holders in Tibetan Buddhism far outstrips any other tradition.

Astus wrote:

To this I'd like to add that where bhikshunis still exist there have always been abbesses and women in various positions within the confines of their monasteries, and occasionally they could gather some lay support as well. But they have been neglected both by the mainstream tradition, while at the same time there are not many studies out there either.

Malcolm said:

I don't know about Gelug or Kagyu, but there have been many outstanding women masters in both Sakya and Nyingma.

Astus wrote:

Have you reviewed your 2012 view on women in Tibetan Buddhism?

Malcolm said:

What it has come to mean in the context of Tibetan society is that women are more suited to menial work. Off the top of my head, I can think of only five Tibetan women who authored texts prior to the mid-twentieth century -- Yeshe Tsogyal, Machig Labdron, Jomo Menmo, Migyur Paldron (daughter of Terdag Lingpa) and Sera Khandro. There are only four or so significant Indian women who authored texts too, Siddhirajni, Niguma, Sukhasiddhi, and Laksminkara.

The fact is that Tibetan Buddhism is completely patriarchal and sexist -- in fact it is pretty toxic for women in general and is in much need of reform (some of which is happening).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 19th, 2014 at 1:33 AM

Title: Re: the lesser yogi and the greater yogi

Content:

Malcolm said:

The term "non-abiding nirvana" does not exist in sūtras, true, but it is a concept used to explain how nirvana explained in Mahāyāna sutras is different than Hinayāna nirvana.

...

Which I showed exists in the sutras such as the Lotus and so on, not merely in the Maitreya corpus.

Astus wrote:

The term is not in the early sutras and it is used in Yogacara works to explain the state of the buddhas. That is, before Asanga there was no such explanation for what the sutras contain, and the sutras themselves don't actually specify.

Malcolm said:

The criticism of Hinayanist nirvana-as-total-cessation is present in Mahāyāna everywhere.

Astus wrote:

Yes. And the idea of total cessation is rejected even in the Nikayas, not only in Mahayana sutras. It is actually among the set of questions not answered by the Buddha.

Malcolm said:

Since when were Buddhas ever inactive in Mahāyāna?

Astus wrote:

They do talk of parinirvana, and what people should do after the Buddha's demise, how stupas should be revered, etc. What sutras do you know that discuss the buddhas activities after their parinirvana? Besides the Lotus Sutra that does not actually say that as mentioned above already.

Malcolm said:

This is not what happened at all. No matter which Mahāyāna path one follows, one still has to gather the two accumulations via the bodhisattva path.

Astus wrote:

I see a significant difference between ideas that one should stay a bodhisattva indefinitely and that one can reach buddhahood even in this life. I don't see early Mahayana sutras emphasising that one should become a buddha, rather they talk about being a proper non-returning bodhisattva, someone who realises that there is actually nothing to attain, thus could become a buddha any time but chooses not to. Such a choice is nonsense if a buddha is simply a better bodhisattva.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 4th, 2015 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: To Study the Self.

Content:

Q said:

" To study the Buddha Way is to study the self. To study the self is to forget the self. " ~ Dōgen Zenji 1200-1253

What does it mean to study the self?. To forget the self?. How does studying lead to forgetting?

Astus wrote:

There is no Buddhadharma outside the mind, outside one's own realm of experience. The path is not beyond the six senses. Studying is taking a new look at what happens right now, instead of following concepts learnt previously. To forget is not to make up views and ideas that project permanence on the ever changing flow of perceptions.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 5th, 2015 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: Request for something super specific

Content:

Astus wrote:

Shamatha is about manipulating one's experience, to bring the mind to a peaceful and lucid state. Vipashyana is about understanding one's experience, to bring the mind to a peaceful and lucid state. While manipulation has temporary benefits, understanding can be permanent. The difference regarding thoughts is not that they do not occur but how they disappear. During shamatha the mind is occupied with an object and that's how everything else can freely come and go. During vipashyana one knows (learns) there is nothing to grasp, or rather there is no reason for attachment to arise, so everything can freely come and go. Being lost in concepts is an ordinary beings attitude. Blocking conceptualisation through meditative focus is a practitioners attitude. Seeing concepts to be mental fabrication without substance is the wisdom free from ignorance.

As long as there are states we want to keep or achieve the understanding of emptiness is missing. Once phenomena are seen to be without meaning or essence, what could be left to struggle for?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 9th, 2015 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: On uprooting samsara

Content:

Astus wrote:

As long as one perceives that there are beings there is inevitably the idea that all could eventually cease to exist. A bodhisattva has no such perception or idea, thus liberates all beings. Samsara is without a root.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 10th, 2015 at 10:02 PM

Title: Re: Can you purify past karma coming our way?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here is an example of how past karma is experienced by a liberated one:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/kn/ud/ud.3.01.than.html>

Explanation and commentary: <http://dharmafarer.org/wordpress/wp-content/uploads/2010/02/39.3-Sabbakammajaha-S-u3.1-piya.pdf>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 12th, 2015 at 4:25 AM

Title: Odaimoku and Insight

Content:

Astus wrote:

Could someone please sum up how the recitation of a sutra title relates to insight into interdependence? Recitation seems like good samatha, but where does vipasyana come into the picture?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 12th, 2015 at 7:48 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land Contradicts Buddha Teachings....

Content:

Astus wrote:

一食之頃 - short time of one meal

23rd vow:

"If, when I attain buddhahood, bodhisattvas in my land who would make offerings to buddhas through my divine power should not be able to reach immeasurable and innumerable koṭis of nayutas of buddha lands in as short a time as it takes to eat a meal, may I not attain perfect enlightenment."
(Larger Sutra, tr. Inagaki, BDK ed. p 15)

設我得佛。國中菩薩。承佛神力供養諸佛。一食之頃 不能遍至無量無數億那由他諸佛國者不取正覺。
(T12n0360_p0268b15-17)

"The Buddha said to Ānanda, "By the Buddha's power, bodhisattvas of that land go to innumerable worlds of the ten directions, in as short a time as it takes to eat a meal, in order to pay homage and make offerings to the buddhas and World-honored Ones."
(p 37)

佛語阿難。彼國菩薩承佛威神。一食之頃 往詣十方無量世界。恭敬供養諸佛世尊。
(273c04-05)

未食之前 - before meal

"After thus worshiping the buddhas, they quickly return home to the Pure Land before their meal."
(p 37)

供養佛已 未食之前。忽然輕舉還其本國。
(273c14)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 13th, 2015 at 6:34 PM

Title: Re: Odaimoku and Insight

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thank you for your answer, Queequeg. So if I got it right, Nichiren did not particularly teach anything in line with Tendai's shikan, instead formed a teaching that focuses on faith and worship of the Lotus Sutra and Shakyamuni, similarly to the Pure Land teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 14th, 2015 at 7:20 PM

Title: Re: Odaimoku and Insight

Content:

LastLegend said:

It does not. It does not need to. Interdependence is within concept while what is taught in Lotus Sutra and other Mahayana Sutras such as Diamond and Mahaprajnaparamita Sutra by Manjusri is the inconceivable teaching. By upholding the Lotus Sutra, one is upholding the inconceivable teaching.

Astus wrote:

I think there is no need to explain a faith based practice as if it were anything more than that. As I understand Queequeg's posts, Nichiren intentionally taught the recitation of the sutra title and the worship of the mandala. He was a trained Tendai priest familiar with Chigi's Makashikan and other meditation techniques. However, it seems to me that Nichiren's reason for emphasising recitation of the title is his belief that on the one hand training in shikan is too difficult for most in the mappo, and on the other hand that the title bestows (the seeds of) the Buddha's merits and wisdom (<http://fraughtwithperil.com/ryuei/2014/05/19/odaimoku-as-the-seed-of-buddhahood/>). So, reciting the title is not actually a practice of shikan, nor is it the realisation of interdependence.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 15th, 2015 at 7:45 AM

Title: Re: Odaimoku and Insight

Content:

Astus wrote:

Queequeg,

My knowledge of Tiantai doctrine is superficial, and I am even less familiar with its Japanese permutations. I know a little more about Chan and Zen, a tradition that is explicitly (and perhaps even extremely) teaches sudden enlightenment. In Zen one directly goes to total liberation, to freedom from views and attachment, the very goals of the Buddha's teaching in any vehicle. So, if reciting the title equals enlightenment, in what way can repeating specific words bring that about? Don't take this the wrong way, but it sounds to me like attributing magical powers to a set of syllables. Pure Land's recitation of the name is said to be effective because one intentionally and consciously connects with Amitabha, and through that one gains birth in his land - this is understandable on the basis of how devotional activity creates karma. Thus what I can see so far in Nichiren's teaching is the way how devotion towards Shakyamuni and the Lotus Sutra forms a karmic bond. But being devoted to the ultimate truth is not the same as realising it, otherwise taking refuge in the Three Jewels is equal to becoming a buddha and then all Buddhists are buddhas. Can you tell me how it is then that Odaimoku includes becoming enlightened to interdependence?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 16th, 2015 at 5:38 PM

Title: Re: Odaimoku and Insight

Content:

Queequeg said:

What does your superficial knowledge of Tiantai entail? What do you know about the Lotus and Mahaparinirvana Sutras?

Astus wrote:

I am aware of some general concepts in Tiantai, like the three truths, four samadhis, five periods and the six identities. I have also read the Smaller Calming and Contemplation (小止觀), the Six Wonderful Gates (六妙門), pieces of the Great Calming and Contemplation (摩訶止觀) that are available in English, and The Collected Teachings of the Tendai Lotus School (BDK publication). I have read the Lotus Sutra and some parts of the Nirvana Sutra.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 16th, 2015 at 6:02 PM

Title: Re: Emptiness and Depending Origination

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are clear and perfectly followable meditation instructions.

First of all, meditation on breathing is a fundamental one, and it is more than just watching it. It includes the whole path from ordinary being to enlightenment.

For the basics, look at the various instructions on "anapanasati", as it is presented in the suttas and the Theravada school. Lot of teachings. Vipassana in general is also about realising no self.

If you want the Mahayana version, one of the best is Zhiyi's http://www.kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/sgs_book_page.htm. But maybe it is a bit difficult because of the language used. So, as previously posted, there are quite a few books out there by modern authors giving you all the details. Some of those not yet mentioned:

Gen Lamrimpa: How To Realize Emptiness

The Dalai Lama: Stages of Meditation

Thrangu Rinpoche:

- Teachings on the Practice of Meditation
- Essentials of Mahamudra: Looking Directly at the Mind
- Essential Practice: Lectures on Kamalashila's Stages of Meditation in the Middle Way School
- The Middle-way Meditation Instructions: Developing Compassion Through Wisdom : Based on Mipham Rinpoche's Gateway to Knowledge

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 17th, 2015 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: Being introduced to the nature of mind -- ?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Might be of some interest: <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=100&t=5349>
(discussion in the Mahamudra forum)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 17th, 2015 at 10:02 PM

Title: Re: sex and romance

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are a number of answers for that out there.

1. Ideology and practical application rarely match.

in Buddhist terms:

- this is the Dharma ending age where few people can truly achieve liberation
- the path is only for a few exceptional beings

2. There is always a better ideology.

in Buddhist terms:

- bodhisattvas only manifest as worldly people with families to save beings
- desire is the path of a true practitioner

3. No ideology is the best ideology.

in Buddhist terms:

- desire is enlightenment
- it's all just illusion

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 17th, 2015 at 10:28 PM

Title: Re: Odaimoku and Insight

Content:

Queequeg said:

From the Mohochihkuan

Astus wrote:

That quote is like the idea that the first arousal of bodhicitta equals buddhahood in principle. It does not mean one actually is a buddha.
(<http://www.tientai.net/lit/mksk/v1/v1p1-4p9.htm>)

Queequeg said:

One more question: have you ever undertaken to Chant the Daimoku as a daily practice? That will be another factor in this discussion.

Astus wrote:

No, I'm not a Nichiren follower, just curious about the teachings. I want to know if it is a school where they use chanting as the primary practice but at the same time they rely on wisdom.

Here is something from Nichiren's <http://www.nichirenlibrary.org/en/wnd-1/Content/1> (a section that originally piqued my interest):

A mind now clouded by the illusions of the innate darkness of life is like a tarnished mirror, but when polished, it is sure to become like a clear mirror, reflecting the essential nature of phenomena and the true aspect of reality. Arouse deep faith, and diligently polish your mirror day and night. How should you polish it? Only by chanting Nam-myoho-renge-kyo.

What then does myō signify? It is simply the mysterious nature of our life from moment to moment, which the mind cannot comprehend or words express. When we look into our own mind at any moment, we perceive neither color nor form to verify that it exists. Yet we still cannot say it does not exist, for many differing thoughts continually occur. The mind cannot be considered either to exist or not to exist. Life is indeed an elusive reality that transcends both the words and concepts of existence and nonexistence. It is neither existence nor nonexistence, yet exhibits the qualities of both. It is the mystic entity of the Middle Way that is the ultimate reality. Myō is the name given to the mystic nature of life, and hō, to its manifestations. Renge, which means lotus flower, is used to symbolize the wonder of this Law. If we understand that our life at this moment is myō, then we will also understand that our life at other moments is the Mystic Law. This realization is the mystic kyō, or sutra. The Lotus Sutra is the king of sutras, the direct path to enlightenment, for it explains that the entity of our life, which manifests either good or evil at each moment, is in fact the entity of the Mystic Law. If you chant Myoho-renge-kyo with deep faith in this principle, you are certain to attain Buddhahood in this lifetime.

My naive interpretation is that it connects insight into the nature of mind (empty and functional) with recitation. But there is no further discussion there on that. Do you know more like the above?

BTW, why is it that they translate dharma as life? It is pretty confusing and unusual.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 18th, 2015 at 10:26 PM

Title: Re: Being introduced to the nature of mind -- ?

Content:

Astus wrote:

What is the relation between Lojong instruction on absolute bodhicitta and introduction to the nature of mind?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 19th, 2015 at 7:54 PM

Title: Re: Either/Or <---> And

Content:

Astus wrote:

Rainboyo,

If I get you, you mean that while we have all sorts of concepts it is through mental reflection - and here I guess you mean conducting an analytical meditation as prescribed in vipasyana instructions, or putting oneself into the position of the watcher and observing emerging concepts - one can discover a non-conceptual perception that connects directly with reality and results in clear awareness and compassion.

If that is what you mean, then yes, that is kind of the idea, although it is rather the first step whence one has to move on to see that concepts themselves are just concepts and there is no need to remove them.

Ayu,

As LastLegend says, all four options are extremes.

1. Existence - this is taking something to have a permanent substance.
2. Non-existence - this is taking something to disappear completely or not exist at all.
3. Existence and non-existence - this involves both errors of the first two positions.
4. Neither existence nor non-existence - there is no third option besides something either as existent or non-existent.

The problem with the fourth option is that (1) it still tries to fix a real entity, (2) it is trying to wiggle out of logical constraints, (3) it can still serve as a view one attaches to.

Just consider the followings:

- I am neither alive nor dead.
- I am neither pregnant nor not pregnant.
- I am neither at home nor somewhere else.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 19th, 2015 at 8:56 PM

Title: Re: emptiness wisdom, conceptual understanding, stepping sto

Content:

LastLegend said:

How does one go from conceptual understanding of emptiness to relinquishing of all views [even view of emptiness]? If conceptual understanding of emptiness is necessary, at which point it is no longer necessary? If conceptual understanding of emptiness is not necessary, how is one be able to relinquish of all views?

Astus wrote:

Wisdom is gained from (1) learning, (2) understanding and (3) confirming.

1. First one learns that appearances are without permanent substance.
2. Next one understands through various explanations and arguments what a substance is and why it cannot exist.
3. Finally one observes in one's own personal experience that the teaching is valid.

Example:

1. Statement: all phenomena appearing within the six sensory gates are impermanent.
2. Explanation: everything sensed and perceived change, they appear and disappear, there is nothing that stays.
3. Confirming: in a comfortable place with a calm and attentive attitude one observes that indeed there is nothing seen, heard, sensed or thought that does not change.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 20th, 2015 at 4:22 AM

Title: Re: emptiness wisdom, conceptual understanding, stepping sto

Content:

Astus wrote:

Learning, understanding and confirming are the various stages one has to go through to gain wisdom, not three separate ways. Prajnaparamita is the result, the wisdom attained at the end of the path of studying (i.e. learning, understanding and confirming).

Attachment is based on the thought that there is a substance. Through studying emptiness one's view is corrected and there is no more reason for grasping. Just as believing the rope to be a snake incites fear, correcting that belief removes fear. It is non-conceptual in the sense that the very attachment to concepts is what is corrected by learning that they have no true essence.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 20th, 2015 at 5:37 PM

Title: Re: emptiness wisdom, conceptual understanding, stepping sto

Content:

LastLegend said:

According to the Vietnamese Zen Master Thich Thanh Tu, each of us has the basic wisdom. He said, for example, when we see smoke from a far distance, we know all that something is burning. This basic wisdom is what we use to see the 5 skandhas as empty. I am not quite sure if this basic wisdom is different from conceptual understanding or separate from conceptual understanding. For example, when we see a tiger, is it the thought of "tiger" that knows that tiger or the know that knows the tiger along with the thought of "tiger"?

Astus wrote:

The example that from seeing smoke one assumes there is fire is a classic one for inference. Regarding the aggregates one does not need that as they are experienced directly, in fact, the five aggregates are what experience is. Still, one needs to reflect on one's experience and understand what it is and how it works. Without reflection there is no understanding and no wisdom. It is actually the lack of reflection why beings suffer. And yes, reflection is a conceptual effort.

If one sees a tiger, unless one knows what it is there is no way to discern whether it is a dangerous animal or not. Without knowing the difference between poisonous and harmless fruits one can happily eat both. There is no such thing as an inherent biologist in one's mind. But humans do have the ability to learn and understand.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 20th, 2015 at 7:29 PM

Title: Re: emptiness wisdom, conceptual understanding, stepping sto

Content:

LastLegend said:

is it necessary to know emptiness conceptually?

Astus wrote:

No, there are quite a few other teachings one can learn and use for liberation, like suffering, impermanence, dependent origination, buddha nature, mind only. But there is always some level of conceptual understanding involved.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 22nd, 2015 at 6:11 PM

Title: Re: Odaimoku and Insight

Content:

Queequeg said:

We generally don't break things down like that because we seek a direct connection to the True Aspect - not a circumscribed expedient. We are, as it is, inseparable from the True Aspect, so what can we do that is not involved in this path? Daimoku is an explicit statement of this teaching.

Astus wrote:

I think I still fail to see how a string of syllables and its recitation relates to any insight. Although theoretically it can be explained how the Lotus Sutra itself is the ultimate truth, I can't really put my finger on its actual and practical meaning.

For example, in the Six Wonderful Gates, there are clear stages: counting, following and stabilisation goes as the coarse, subtle and no object for calming the mind, gradually relinquishing objects. It is followed by contemplation, turning and purification where one recognises the emptiness of the object, the subject and thus gains liberation. If I want to consider the recitation of the sutra title as a practice, it fits into the same level as counting the breath. To say that recitation equals realisation, at least as far as I can understand, means that the whole path is pointless. while at the same time there is no practical relation shown between recitation and realisation besides stating that one just has to believe it.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 24th, 2015 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: Impermanence

Content:

Astus wrote:

All beings want peace and happiness. Things are impermanent and thus they provide neither peace nor happiness. Once no stability is sought for there is nothing else left to achieve. Then and there is peace and happiness.

Life with meaning is samsara. Life without meaning is nirvana.

(See previous topic: <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=66&t=15425>)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 24th, 2015 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: Odaimoku and Insight

Content:

Astus wrote:

I see no problem with the theory that the title represents the essence of the sutra, and the sutra contains the essence of the whole Buddhadharma. The whole world in a single atom, the three-thousand world in a single thought. And this all can be learnt and understood if one has the time and capacity to study the teachings. But, (1) that's not yet the direct realisation of interdependence, and (2) without actually going through the scriptures and treatises the title itself bears no meaning. Even in Pure Land Buddhism one needs some level of knowledge of Amitabha and Sukhavati, develop faith, and only after that has the recitation of the buddha's name any value. For the recitation of the sutra title to become a perfect practice and not just chanting some foreign words there has to be perfect realisation. To connect recitation and realisation it is not enough to explain how theoretically it could be one, as even a single letter can be the expression of the whole teaching, but just because almost every language has the 'A' sound doesn't mean people understand it as the ultimate truth. So, is there any teaching in the Nichiren tradition where they put down how insight is included in the practice, not in terms of theorising about the ultimate nature of things, but how the very act of pronouncing something contains insight.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 25th, 2015 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: Impermanence

Content:

Konchok Namgyal said:

However ultimate reality is a bit different.

Astus wrote:

What separate reality do you say there is besides impermanent phenomena? It is because things are impermanent that they can be called empty, and there is no emptiness besides appearances.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 26th, 2015 at 6:08 PM

Title: Re: eradicating defilements

Content:

Astus wrote:

"According to this teaching, simply the awareness that you are deluded, which comes from practising zazen, makes you, in reality, a Buddha. It's zazen that teaches us that we too are deluded, and hence delivers us from this delusion. When we actually practice zazen and look carefully at all the deluded ideas that keep popping up, we realize how ordinary we are and how little we have to be proud of or to brag about; nothing to do other than quietly hide away. This is, after all, what we truly are."

(<http://terebess.hu/zen/mesterek/yokoyama.html#2>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 28th, 2015 at 7:17 PM

Title: Re: "Gateless Gate" a correct translation?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The <http://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/zen/mumonkan.htm> answers the question.

From the preface:

Buddhism makes mind its foundation and no-gate (無門) its gate (法門).

The Great Way is gateless (無門),

Approached in a thousand ways.

Once past this checkpoint (關)

You stride through the universe.

From the comment on the first case:

In order to master Zen, you must pass the barrier (關) of the patriarchs. To attain this subtle realization, you must completely cut off the way of thinking. If you do not pass the barrier (關), and do not cut off the way of thinking, then you will be like a ghost clinging to the bushes and weeds. Now, I want to ask you, what is the barrier (關) of the patriarchs? Why, it is this single word "Mu." (無) That is the front gate (關) to Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 28th, 2015 at 9:18 PM

Title: Re: "Gateless Gate" a correct translation?

Content:

LastLegend said:

What does " Mu" mean?

Astus wrote:

http://cojak.org/index.php?function=code_lookup&term=7121 - not to have / no / none / not / to lack / un- / -less

Regarding the koan, start here: <http://blog.oup.com/2012/04/four-myths-about-zen-buddhisms-mu-koan/>.

The complete work: <https://books.google.com/books?id=1eLUAAAAQBAJ>

Might also look into this one as well:

<https://books.google.com/books?id=BGpH1Q3zK74C>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 29th, 2015 at 5:46 PM

Title: Re: "Gateless Gate" a correct translation?

Content:

Dan74 said:

I wouldn't go down that road. Heine is a scholar, not a teacher. When working with the Mu koan, it is far better, IMO, to work with a teacher and follow teachers' instructions, like Dahui's instructions. Later, it can be valuable to look at scholarly contributions, but early on, they are bound to just introduce more confusion.

Astus wrote:

That depends on how one approaches Zen. If you mean following the method of using the word or the story as an object of meditation, that does not require much explanations, the Mumonkan itself gives the basic instructions. However, that is not the only path in Zen, it is just one of the many options. Of course, it is a matter of personal taste.

Here's one from the Korean tradition on the 10 faults of hwadu practice, generally applied to the Mu koan:

There are ten kinds of faults for the points of stories (hwadu):

to ponder it with the faculty of intention (manas);

to estimate (subtle movements of the mind such as) where you raise eyebrows and blink eyes;

to seek your livelihood on the path of language;

to draw evidence from writings;

to try to be enlightened only where it is raised up;

to toss it away into a casket of no concerns;

to make understanding (of it in terms) of (it as) existence or non-existence; to make an understanding of (it as) the truly non-existent;

to make an understanding of it as reason;
and to hold onto delusion and wait to be enlightened.
(Mirror of Seon in Collected Korean, vol 3, p. 80))

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 30th, 2015 at 9:49 PM

Title: Re: How does movement arise?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Experience itself is change. If there were no change, either it would be constantly experienced or never at all. Because there is change there cannot be any permanent essence, substance, self or true being. Change itself is emptiness, because whatever changes must be empty of self (permanent entity). Change is experience, and experience is awareness. If we are not aware of it, it is not experienced, and if it is not experienced we cannot say there is or is not any change. All change happens because of causes and conditions, that is, because of previous changes, thus past, present and future form a single causally conditioned continuity.

So, based on the above:

"But, are these movements intrinsically empty/void, and thus illusory?"

Movement is necessarily empty. What is it empty of? A permanent essence.

"Or, are stillness and movement one and the same, with movement being intrinsically pure and real? Does the old analogy of the lake with ripples hold true? Are the ripples illusory and to be discarded, or are they one with the lake and share the same substance?"

Stillness is a passing experience, so it is actually movement. There is nothing that could be kept or discarded. Holding on and rejecting both contain the idea of a real thing, an essence, that one should manipulate. The will to manipulate, the desire for control, is the cause of suffering based on the ignorance of the true nature of reality, that is, that everything changes.

"If all suffering, joy, creativity and phenomena arise from conditions, and those conditions arise from movements in the mind, how does mind initiate the movement? If mind is essentially still and pure, how can movement arise?"

Still and pure means not deluded about the nature of reality, thus not grasping and rejecting. That the mind is originally pure and still means that grasping and rejecting comes from the belief that experience is the experience of substantial phenomena. It is not that there was first a pure mind that got contaminated, rather that one should turn one's attention from meddling with phenomena and see that there is no substantial entity anywhere, that everything changes according to causes and conditions.

"If there is nothing to be aware of, then there is no self. This seems to agree with some Zen teachings, I read about the senses being pollutants - as soon as I see something, I am polluted (can't remember the exact text). When I close my eyes, I can't see anything, so I am not being 'polluted' by visible things."

Pollution is attachment, not the object of attachment. Whether you open or close your eyes, attachment is still there. Realise that all experience comes and goes, then there is nothing to attach to.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 31st, 2015 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: Kwan-um: How to work with a koan?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Number one favourite answer: discuss it with your teacher. But let's put aside that for now.

Phrase investigation (ganhwa) is a great method. If you want some general info, start here: http://koreanbuddhism.net/bbs/board.php?bo_table=3020.

To sit with a gongan simply means "work on it". Working on it is carrying it with you all day long, asking questions, constantly knocking on the gate of no gate (i.e. using thoughts to realise what is beyond thinking). That is, exhausting all the possible answers until you arrive at the point where only a big question mark remains. Then you keep going on with that great doubt. Because great doubt is without conceptualisation but at the same time it is vivid and aware. Then comes a point where you realise for yourself that this whole process is just your own making, that problems and solutions are all just mental games, and once you don't grasp at an idea there is no further complication.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 1st, 2015 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: Non-Abiding Awareness

Content:

Astus wrote:

Non-abiding awareness is no different from your present experience, just as it is. The mind can be in any state, it does not matter. What matters is the ideology you come up with for your situation, for your actions. It is not that you cannot have thoughts, you cannot theories about any and every thing. Just consider the volumes of teachings by the Buddha and Dharma teachers throughout the ages. Non-abiding awareness is not establishing oneself in any ultimate truth, in any final reality, in any definite self.

Dissatisfaction comes from the conviction that one's present situation should be something different, from hoping for something better and fearing something worse. Underlying that conviction is a set of values and preferences, an ideology of how things should be. Not abiding anywhere is to see that such ideologies are conceptual constructs, mental fabrications without ultimate value or essence.

When one has to do the dishes there are various ways to go about it. Feeling bored, annoyed, motivated or perhaps even elated. All of those feelings can occur depending on one's thoughts about doing the dishes. Then there is the idea that one should do them mindfully. As long as being mindful means the exclusion of feelings and thoughts, concentrating only on the present moment, failure is guaranteed. That is because there is still the concept that one should remain in a specific state, that something should last for ever. However, when one is mindful of whatever thoughts, feelings and sensory inputs come up, there is no wish for a specific state, something to be, something to become, then there is no abiding in an idealised concept.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 1st, 2015 at 6:57 PM

Title: Re: Non-Abiding Awareness

Content:

Astus wrote:

Yes, there is awareness and there is acceptance. If by those words what is meant is on the one hand the primal awareness that is inherent in every experience, and on the other acceptance is the basic openness of the boundless consciousness that allows anything and everything to occur and also disappear as experience. It is not a special state to cultivate or discover but the original quality of life as it is. For example, hearing can happen because there is not a single sound that is constantly there, so all sounds can come and go without hindrance. You don't have to force hearing, you don't have to wish it, concentrate on it, there is simply hearing. Same goes for the other five senses. What brings us astray, what creates an abiding awareness is taking a mental image, a thought, as the ideal state we want to identify with. Like thinking of a single voice we want to hear and being agitated by all the other sounds. Again, it doesn't mean that one should not have any intention or direction. It is idealising a present, past or future state and holding to it as the truth, as a self that binds us and clouds our perception.

We can play with how we look at things, what kind of attention we cultivate, and we do that all the time. At the same time, attention is conditioned by our personality and our environment. When we are driven by an idea we forget to reflect on the situation, both inner and outer conditions, and go blindly. When we recognise our idea as an idea, as a mental figment, then we gain the freedom of awareness and see our situation.

"Can it be said also that non-abidance would be a state where you notice distractions? This includes thoughts and emotions - so that you're attention is not pulled away from what you are doing?"

That is just being attentive to one's present state. Non-abidance is just seeing oneself as one is, distracted or not. It does not limit one's mental functions.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 3rd, 2015 at 6:03 PM

Title: Re: How does movement arise?

Content:

Dan74 said:

In Tibetan Buddhism many texts are restricted and I sometimes wonder if the same would be good for Zen because we are liable to misunderstand things or if not misunderstand, misuse. All Zen teachings are aimed at seeing our original nature and attain liberation from delusion. They are not concepts or truths. They are pointers to be utilised and not to be clung to.

Astus wrote:

Zazen is open to all, anyone can practise it. It is nothing difficult either. Complications occur when one loses the correct posture of not grasping thoughts or the lack of thoughts. So, one should simply return to the right view. Then everything is clear and obvious.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 3rd, 2015 at 8:18 PM

Title: Re: How does movement arise?

Content:

Dan74 said:

Astus, from Zhiyi to Hakuin and modern masters, you must surely know the admonitions about wrong practice and the many who practice wrongly. The masters would not have wasted their breath if it was a trivial matter. Are you sure you're on the right track?

Astus wrote:

It is possible to give names of people who propagated a long and arduous path, and people who talked about an easy and direct entrance. Zhiyi was actually both, who covered gradual and sudden equally. For instance, Dogen travelled to China when he was 23, met Rujing when he was 25 and after two years went back to Japan to start his own school at the age of 28. Then among his first writings, in the http://web.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/gongyo_seiten/translations/part_3/fukan_zazengi.html, we find: "The zazen I speak of is not meditation practice. It is simply the dharma gate of joyful ease, the practice-realization of totally culminated enlightenment." And in the <http://www.zc.org/sites/default/files/Bendowa-book.pdf>: "This is the practise of realization, and so from the beginning practice is the whole body of original Awakening. ... Practice is always already inseparable from realization. Because practice, even from the beginning, Transmits an endowment of wonderful practice, we fortunately and naturally receive a share of original realization."

While there is a difference between correct and incorrect practice, it is hard to talk about stages in zazen without denying that it is practice-realisation. If there is no simple and easy access to zazen it is no use to anyone. That does not mean there is no effort or understanding.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 3rd, 2015 at 8:36 PM

Title: Re: How does movement arise?

Content:

LastLegend said:

I can say that in almost all Mahayana Sutras, there is no much emphasis on practicing meditation.

Astus wrote:

Sutras do talk about meditation. There are samadhi sutras like the Surangamasamadhi, Vajrasamadhi, Pratyutpannasamadhi and Samadhiraja Sutra. There are other such texts like the Sutra on the Concentration of Sitting Meditation, the Samantabhadra Meditation Sutra, the Contemplation on Amitayus Sutra, etc. Meditation itself is the fifth paramita, and one of the three trainings of the noble eightfold path is meditation. However, if you look at classical Zen teachings, like those of Bodhidharma, Huineng, Mazu, Linji and others, there is hardly any mention of meditation (on this subject <https://eubuddhist.blogspot.com/2011/03/instructions-needed.html>).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 4th, 2015 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: How does movement arise?

Content:

Astus wrote:

You may check them yourself (I don't want to overload the thread with long copies):

<https://www.scribd.com/doc/39077716/The-Sutra-of-Sitting-Dhyana-Samadhi>

<http://web.mit.edu/stclair/www/meditationsutra.html>

<http://www.fodian.net/world/0273.html>

<http://www.buddhisttexts.org/surangama.html>

<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra22.html>

The <http://www.fodian.net/world/0277b.html> contains a repentance practice that is mirrored in the Platform Sutra's central chapter. The <http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra13.html> talks about the One Action Samadhi that is referred to in the early Zen texts.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 4th, 2015 at 7:40 AM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

Buddha-remembrance and Chan has been practised together from the very beginning. Even before Huiyuan (334–416) and Bodhidharma (5th/6th century) the Pratyutpannasamadhi Sutra (translated to Chinese in 179) taught how one can meet Amitabha in samadhi and at the same time to realise that the whole visualisation is empty. Chan practitioners often aspired to be born in the Pure Land and buddha-remembrance practitioners often cultivated the mind-nature. There were many famous teachers who explained how the two are complementary methods.

Here's a saying, the fourfold summary, attributed to Yongming Yanshou (from "Yung-ming's Syncretism of Pure Land and Ch'an" by Heng-ching Shih in JIABS vol 10 no 1, p 118):

"With Ch'an but no Pure Land, nine out of ten people will go astray.
When death comes suddenly, they must accept it in an instant.
With Pure Land but no Ch'an, ten thousand out of ten thousand people will achieve birth [in the Pure Land].
If one can see Amitabha face to face, why worry about not attaining enlightenment?
With both Ch'an and Pure Land, it is like a tiger who has grown horns.
One will be a teacher for mankind in this life, and a Buddhist patriarch in the next.
With neither Ch'an nor Pure Land, it is like falling on an iron bed with bronze posters [i.e., one of the hells].
For endless kalpas one will find nothing to rely on."

Consider the following quotes from The Baizhang Zen Monastic Regulations (BDK edition):

"By intoning the ten sacred names, we have intended to assist [the deceased] in entering the Pure Land of Amitābha Buddha."
(from the funeral ritual of the deceased abbot, p 135)

"From three o'clock in the morning until dusk, every sentient being must reflect upon himself with the following prayer: "Even if my life should end at this very moment, may I immediately be reborn in the Pure Land."" (from the regulations of daily conduct, p 267)

"It is earnestly wished that Venerable So-and-so regain his health, as he has not lost the various supporting causes for his existence. If, however, it is unavoidable for him to come to the end of his life, may he swiftly realize the goal of rebirth in the Pure Land. Veneration to the Buddhas in the ten directions and the three times."
(from the prayer for ailing practitioners, p 294)

And these from <http://www.ymba.org/books/taming-monkey-mind-guide-pure-land-practice>:

"To recite the Buddha's name is to recite the Buddha of the Self-Mind; the ears hearing the Buddha's name actually hear the Self-Mind. The sound comes from the Self-Mind and returns to the Self-Mind, turning around and around in a circle. Not even a bit of deluded thought remains, and as a result, all mundane dusts, all deluded realms disappear."

(aspect 28 commentary)

"As the sound of the Self-Mind surrounds you and the light of the Self-Mind shines upon you, the Mind-Nature naturally reveals itself. This True Mind is like a huge, round, bright mirror that nothing can obstruct. The Ten Directions, the Three Periods of Time, ourselves, the Buddhas and sentient beings, the cycle of suffering in the impure world, the lotus seat in the Pure Land - all are but images in the mirror. Thus, to recite aloud is to recite in the light, to recite in the mirror; it is neither the same nor different. This is the ultimate auspicious realm, completely free of the deluded mind. You should strive with all your might to attain it."

(aspect 31)

"Zen is Pure Land because both Zen and Pure Land aim at reaching one-pointedness of mind. Although two expedients are involved, the result is the same. However, Zen is ten times as difficult! "

(aspect 35 commentary)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 5th, 2015 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

From what you write it seems to me your priority is enlightenment in this life. Only repeating the name of Amitabha is not enough for that, but it can be used as something that can assist in seeing the nature of mind. See

<http://www.ymba.org/books/buddhism-wisdom-faith-pure-land-principles-and-practice/essentials-pure-land/5-practice/four> and the

<http://www.ymba.org/books/buddhism-wisdom-faith-pure-land-principles-and-practice/essentials-pure-land/5-practice/buddha> that describe how realisation can be integrated into buddha-remembrance.

Unlike in Japanese Buddhism (except for the Obaku school), there is no controversy between Chan and Pure Land. I strongly recommend you read <http://buddhiststudies.berkeley.edu/people/faculty/sharf/documents/Sharf2003.%20TP%20Chan%20and%20Pure%20Land.pdf>. It can answer many questions you have about Chan and PL.

The source of this problem that Chan and PL are something totally different comes from Japan's Kamakura Buddhism when first Honen started the exclusive nenbutsu movement and then various Zen institutions started to emerge. But if you look into Honen's selection of the single practice, he intentionally excludes interpretations of buddha-remembrance that fall into the category of self-power. It was his invention, his innovation. That's why I find it particularly strange that there are certain people who are happy to mix Shinran's teachings with Zen. But if one looks into Chinese Buddhism "nianfo chan" is the general and most common practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 5th, 2015 at 7:17 AM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

DesertDweller said:

Wouldn't this be a possibility, though, if there is a one-pointed focus ("Buddha recitation samadhi") combined with a sort of opening of oneself to the deeper significance of "Namo Amitabha Buddha"?

Astus wrote:

That combination with opening to a deeper meaning is where insight practice comes in, where one has to learn to see thoughts for what they are instead of just following them. Reciting the name is focusing on a single thought, so it helps in not grasping other concepts. Then reflecting on one's ongoing experience can become easier. That is what the question "Who recites the name?" points at. Once it is clearly understood that appearances are without substance, without a fixed essence to hold on to, that is being enlightened to no-birth, the true nature.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 5th, 2015 at 7:15 PM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

If the goal is enlightenment in this life, that is not a Pure Land oriented attitude. Therefore, whatever practice one does, it is dedicated to one's own liberation now instead of awakening in Sukhavati. Thus the attainment of birth becomes a secondary matter at best.

<http://www.ymba.org/books/buddhism-wisdom-faith-pure-land-principles-and-practice/essentials-pure-land/5-practice/four:>

"If we were to use Buddha Recitation to discover the Mind-Ground and awaken to our Original Nature, the Pure Land method would be no different from other methods. However, when we rely on Buddha Recitation to seek rebirth in the Pure Land, this method has unique characteristics."

That is:

"What is operative in the terms Holy Path and Pure Land Path is thus the realm where people attain salvation. The Holy Path is the path of the few who attain it in this life and on their own. The Pure Land Path is the path of the many who need the help of Amida Buddha to attain it after death."

(<http://www.jsri.jp/English/Honen/TEACHINGS/otherself.html>)

Buddha-remembrance combined with Chan can mean two things. Either it is aiming for the Pure Land supported by Chan, or aiming for enlightenment in this life supported by buddha-remembrance. If birth is the goal, then seeing the nature is understood as part of the bodhisattva path. If realisation is the goal, then recitation is understood as a meditation technique. We can see well from Honen's method of selection that there are those who aim for birth using various methods and work on accumulating wisdom and merit. Among them there are those who focus only on Amitabha and those who use other methods, but they equally dedicate merit towards birth in the Pure Land. In other terms, they have faith and vow but take a different stance on practice than those who only recite the name. On the other hand, those who do not have faith and vow may meditate on Amitabha but they will not be born in Sukhavati. As <http://www.ymba.org/books/mind-seal-buddhas/explanation-text/main-portion/seeking-rebirth-pure-land>:

"If your faith and vows are solid and strong, then even you recite the Buddha-name only ten times, or only once, as you are on the brink of death, you are sure to attain birth in the Pure Land. Without faith and vows, even if you recite the Buddha-name until [you achieve a level of concentration the Zen literature describes as] "wind cannot enter you and rain cannot wet you" and "you stand like a silver wall or and iron wall", you will still not have a way to be born in the Pure Land."

http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/yin_kuang.pdf:

"With this method, as long as their Faith and Vows are true and earnest, even those who have committed the Five Grave Offenses or the Ten Evil Acts, may, on the verge of death, when the marks of the hells appear, follow the advice of a good spiritual advisor and recite the Buddha's name one to ten times. Then, thanks to the compassionate power of Amitabha Buddha, even they will be received and guided to the Pure Land – not to mention those who practice wholesome deeds and do not commit transgressions!"

(p 35)

"Rebirth in the Western Land thus requires, first of all, deep Faith and fervent Vows. Without these conditions, even if you were to cultivate, you could not obtain a response from Amitabha Buddha. You would merely reap the blessings of the human and celestial realms and sow the seeds of liberation in the future. Anyone who fulfills the conditions of Faith and Vows is assured of rebirth in the Pure Land."

(p 37)

As for the idea that recitation itself brings about wisdom, that would mean (1) there is no need for Amitabha's vows and (2) there is no need for the teachings and insight practices. Honen and all the other Pure Land teachers could not have said that they were ordinary deluded people as they had recited the name thousands of times in a single day.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 5th, 2015 at 11:06 PM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

Astus wrote:

I see it as a natural tendency throughout Buddhist history. There is a fairly simple teaching on the correct view (emptiness) and the practice (non-attachment) that emerges from it. Then it gets theoretically and mythologically complicated. Then again it is reduced to some simple instruction. It is not that people change radically during the centuries, but languages and cultures do, thus the need for newer and newer translations and explanations.

In terms of the actual time it takes to attain liberation, there are stories already in the Nikayas about those who directly understood from a single sentence and those who couldn't reach nirvana even after decades. In my opinion both are extremes and possibly literary elements, although at the same time there are very bright and very dull people.

The reason we almost always see only unenlightened beings is because we don't actually have a way to tell for sure who is what. Maybe some people behave very saintly, some people are really knowledgeable, some people have various impressive abilities, but none of that makes them enlightened unless we are so mesmerised by them.

What I think is a common phenomenon is that some may understand the meaning of emptiness (selflessness, nature of mind, whatever term you like) for a moment or two but then conceptualisation kicks in and it gets confused. So theoretically there could be people who don't fall back into their established thinking patterns, but it is very unlikely. Nevertheless, we could say that those who manage to get an initial glimpse are the sudden learners, while those who need some preliminary training are the gradual ones.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 6th, 2015 at 6:35 AM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

Punya said:

This doesn't seem like non-gradual to me. Wouldn't the non-gradual be complete enlightenment, not just a glimpse?

Astus wrote:

That depends. As there is nothing more to realise than emptiness there is no development in what one learns or achieves.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 6th, 2015 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: How does movement arise?

Content:

LastLegend said:

In conclusion, meditation methods are actually secondary. Thus, by understanding the message of non-attachment, one is using less effort.

Astus wrote:

If one actually understands emptiness and drops all attachment, that is liberation. While it is possible to do that - that's what Zen normally aims for, directly introducing the nature of mind - often people cannot gain insight because of their strong delusions. That's when all the methods come in. Meditation is first of all to help calm the mind, as it is only once all the habitual inner monologues and disoriented jumping from one subject to another can people attain clarity and focus required for seeing the reality of their present experience. Studying the teachings is a different approach, it already requires a level of clarity and concentration, and then it is meant to generate trust in the Dharma and then reflection on one's views to be exchanged for correct ones. And there might be some individuals who can learn to let go of their attachments simply by realising that nothing lasts. But since practically all human beings know that things eventually decay and die, knowledge of the general impermanence of appearances is hardly ever liberating. In general people are also aware of the benefits of not attaching to this and that, but that is of little help most of the times.

On the other hand, what is hard to accept is that there is nothing at all that one could attach to. It's not "should not attach" but the actual impossibility of any attachment. That is what universal emptiness really means. Even for Buddhists that is not easy to accept, as you can see in numerous topics the regular arguments over whether there is some real self, real consciousness, or any ultimate truth that one can actually hold on to. The debates over methods and the repeated affirmations of the great distance of liberation are also about clinging to something tangible. So while it is easy to claim that all beings have buddha-nature, it rarely ever means that it is readily available right now. That's why we have all the teachings and meditations, just to keep us busy and allow us to remain convinced that not everything is empty yet.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 7th, 2015 at 4:26 AM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

PorkChop,

"The basis of my practice was mindfulness of the Buddha. I became patient with the state of mind in which no mental objects arise."

Focusing on the Buddha is a mental object. By the way, in the Surangama Sutra it was Guanyin's method that was announced as the best.

"Nembutsu is superior, and other practices are inferior."

If it is superior because of its connection to the infinite virtues of Amitabha, the same could be said about any other buddha who all possess identically infinite virtues and wisdoms. Still, the practitioner of the nenbutsu cannot actually partake the Buddha's attributes, so I fail to see their relevance.

"When you consider that he himself, and a LARGE number of his followers (at least one while remaining illiterate) achieved Nembutsu Samadhi, that says something."

What does it say? That samadhi is a vision of Amitabha and his land. The Contemplation Sutra actually gives instructions for visualising it. However, neither the vision nor the visualisation turns one into a sage (arya).

"True Realization of beings and realms [No. 3] is the ultimate goal of Pure Land practitioners."

Yes, the ultimate goal is buddhahood. Something that is hardly ever attained by ordinary beings, thus the need for birth in the Pure Land.

"The first part of this statement displays (whether intentional or not) a complete and total misunderstanding of recitation"

I don't see how. I don't recognise any difference between what you and I say, that is, that for birth one needs faith, vow and practice.

"The second (bolded) part could lead one to believe that you've completely glossed over my repeated recommendations"

My point is that recitation of the name does not bring about insight. The three minds do not contradict that, nor do I see their relevance here.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 7th, 2015 at 4:59 AM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

Duckfiasco,

"This isn't the contention of the Jodo Shinshu school, as far as I know."

Deep faith is being assured of birth, thus the stage of non-regression in a certain sense. But that is not the same as what the Vimalakirti Sutra says about the pure mind observing a pure land. Although through faith one has almost attained buddhahood, one is still an ordinary being who can only rely on the vow and not even a bit on his own wisdom.

"the nembutsu has been like a merit transfer from Amida, or a catalyst to insight."

I have not questioned for a moment the varied usefulness of the nenbutsu in this life. My statement is simply that only by reciting the name there is no insight (that is, realisation of emptiness) generated. It is something one will gain after birth in Sukhavati.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 7th, 2015 at 6:08 AM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

DesertDweller said:

I appreciate your posts and insight and truly don't wish to argue unnecessarily, but I find statements all over the place saying that nembutsu/Nienfo alone can indeed lead to Awakening in this life.

Astus wrote:

Could you be more specific please, like quoting from Ouyi's commentary?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 7th, 2015 at 7:01 AM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

DesertDweller,

"Those of the highest faculties cannot go beyond this level while those of the lowest capabilities are also able to reach it."

What nobody can go beyond and anybody can reach it is buddhahood, and that is what is guaranteed once born in the Pure Land. It doesn't say anywhere one reaches it in this life but rather through birth.

Although Ouyi writes:

"Thus, the name of Amitabha is the inherently enlightened true nature of sentient beings, and reciting the name of Amitabha reveals this enlightenment. Inherent enlightenment and the enlightenment as it is revealed [through cultivation and realization] are fundamentally not two different things, just as sentient beings and Buddhas are not two different things. Thus if we are in accord [with our inherently enlightened true nature] for a moment, we are Buddhas for a moment, and if we are in accord [with our inherently enlightened true nature] moment after moment, we are Buddhas moment after moment."

That is talking theoretically, what the name stands for, what it symbolises. This is shown by the following passage in the commentary:

"Although they are going to attain enlightenment in one lifetime, still, they must be called ordinary people, and they cannot be called Bodhisattvas with enlightenment equal to the Buddhas."

The most relevant question to be asked, if recitation can result in insight, how so? What is the process? How does the practitioner come to the patience of non-birth from repeating words? What are the actual steps?

"From a perspective of non-dualism, where does one level end and the other begin?"

That is a theoretical perspective. If one truly has left behind dualism there is no birth to attain, thus recitation is a pointless activity.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 8th, 2015 at 1:12 AM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

Let's say the name recitation can generate insight into emptiness. My question is: how? How goes one from focusing on a word to realising non-birth?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 8th, 2015 at 8:10 PM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

PorkChop,

"First off you're not focusing on a word, you're focusing on a Buddha (which involves a very specific narrative)"

That is, a word with a specific set of associated concepts. It is not actually a buddha, as that would mean direct realisation of buddha-nature. But during recitation one does not think about all the teachings regarding Amitabha as that would be a distraction from focusing single-mindedly.

Hsuan Hua said,

"As you recite the Buddha's name, every sound of the Buddha's name is a thought of purity. When every sound is recitation, every thought is clear and pure. When every thought is clear and pure, you obtain the Buddha Recitation samadhi."

That is, only the name remains and nothing else. It is a relative purity resulting from concentration and it disappears once the concentration is interrupted. Insight is something that removes the causes of attachment, while concentration just covers it up for a while. That's why attaining various dhyanas result only in birth in higher realms but not liberation. Similarly, focusing on Amitabha establishes the connection necessary for birth in the Pure Land, but it lacks the practices and methods required for insight, i.e. contemplation on the nature of reality.

Elder Master Liu Yu said,

"when he has exerted the utmost effort and reached the goal, right in the midst of present thought, worldly delusions suddenly disappear -- the mind experiences sudden Awakening"

It does not specify how one moves from concentration to insight, it only asserts that it happens.

The Pratyutpannasamadhi Sutra teaches how buddhas can be visualised and that all visions are mind made and empty. It is not enough to visualise or recite the name, one has to reflect on the nature of one's experience and see them as insubstantial. And this is what I have said before, that recitation in and of itself is not enough to attain insight. Unlike the above quotes from Hsuan Hua and Liu Yu, this sutra is explicit about how one attains the patience of non-birth. And that way is contemplating emptiness.

When they reflect on the Buddha they ought not to reflect on [him as] an existing thing, nor should they have [the notion: it is something] set up by me. As they would conceive of emptiness so should they reflect on the Buddha standing there, like a precious gem set on beryl. In this way bodhisattvas will have a clear vision of the innumerable Buddhas of the ten quarters.

(p 20, BDK edition)

When the forms are clear, everything is clear. If one wishes to see the Buddha then one sees him. If one sees him then one asks questions. If one asks then one is answered, one hears the sutras and rejoices greatly. One reflects thus: 'Where did the Buddha come from? Where did I go to?' and one thinks to oneself: 'The Buddha came from nowhere, and I also went nowhere.' One thinks to oneself: The Three Realms—the Realm of Desire, the Realm of Form, and the Realm of the Formless—these Three Realms are simply made by thought. Whatever I think, that I see. The mind creates the Buddha. The mind itself sees him. The mind is the Buddha. The mind is the Tathagata. The mind is my body, the mind sees the Buddha. The mind does not itself know the mind, the mind does not itself see mind. A mind with conceptions is stupidity, a mind without conceptions is nirvana. There is nothing in these dharmas which can be enjoyed; they are all made by thinking. If thinking is nothing but empty, then anything which is thought is also utterly nonexistent.' So it is, Bhadrapala, such is the vision of the bodhisattvas who are established in the meditation."

(p 21-22)

Those who reject this precious jewel of a sutra are stupid and unwise, they regard their own attainment of perfection in the trances as transcendence, they perversely claim that the world exists, they do not immerse themselves in emptiness or know nonbeing.

(p 28)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 8th, 2015 at 8:39 PM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

LastLegend said:

Buddha is the inconceivable. The inconceivable is prajnaparamita. By reciting Buddha is reciting the inconceivable, prajnaparamita. That is the practice of 6 paramitas because at the moment when one recites Buddha, one is truly taking refuge in the 3 jewels and not in Samsara.

Astus wrote:

On that Huineng says in the Platform Sutra (p 28, BDK edition):

"people of this world always recite prajñā with their mouths, but they don't recognize the prajñā of the self-natures. This is like talking about eating, which doesn't satisfy one's hunger. If you just talk about emptiness with your mouths, you won't be able to see the nature for a myriad eons. Ultimately, this is of no benefit at all."

The sutra you quoted says,

"they should first hear prajñā-pāramitā and next train and learn it accordingly. Then they will be able to enter the One Action Samādhi"

It is the same paragraph quoted by Daoxin (4th Chan patriarch), who wrote (tr. David W. Chappell in Early Ch'an in China and Tibet, p 107):

"i-hsing san-mei means that the mind which is aware of the Buddha is the Buddha, whereas [the mind which] does false thinking is the ordinary person,"

And Huineng said (p 42):

"If you speak of the samādhi of the single practice with your mouth, you will not practice the straightforward mind. Just practice the straightforward mind, and be without attachment within all the dharmas."

That is, the practice of yixing-sanmei is based on one's study of the prajnaparamita teaching and only after that can one enter it. It is more than just reciting a name and visualising a buddha as it comes from understanding emptiness.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 8th, 2015 at 8:50 PM

Title: Re: The Mahayana idea of karma and vegetarianism

Content:

Astus wrote:

It sounds accurate to me. At least some think like that.

The Surangama Sutra argues:

"To wear parts of a being's body is to involve one's karma with that being, just as people have become bound to this earth by eating vegetables and grains. I can affirm that a person who neither eats the flesh of other beings nor wears any part of the bodies of other beings, nor even thinks of eating or wearing these things, is a person who will gain liberation."

(BTTS new translation, p 269)

On the other hand, the Nirvana Sutra says (tr. Yamamoto, p 52, 53),

"Kasyapa said again to the Buddha: "If the Tathagata means to prohibit the eating of meat, such things as the five kinds of flavours as milk, cream, fresh butter, clarified butter, and sarpirmanda, all kinds of clothing, silk cloth, horse-shoe shell, hide and leather, bowls of gold and silver should not be received." "O good man! Do not muddle things up with what the Nirgranthas [Jains] say."

"When one eats meat, this gives out the smell of meat while one is walking, standing, sitting or reclining. People smell this and become fearful. This is as when one comes near a lion. One sees and smells the lion, and fear arises. O good man! When one eats garlic, the dirty smell is unbearable. Other people notice it. They smell the bad smell. They leave that person and go away. Even from far off, people hate to see such a person. They will not come near him. It is the same with one who eats meat. It is a similar situation with all people who, on smelling the meat, become afraid and entertain the thought of death. All living things in the water, on land and in the sky desert such a person and run away. They say that this person is their enemy. Hence the Bodhisattva does not eat meat. In order to save beings, he shows [pretends] that he eats meat. Though he [seems to] eat meat, in actual fact he does not. O good man! Such a Bodhisattva does not even take pure food. How could he eat meat?"

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 9th, 2015 at 4:22 AM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

PorkChop,

"Again, you're spouting Ch'an interpretation as if it was universal law."

True, I take Chan as the default doctrine. At the same time, it looks contrary to what I find in instructions on reciting the name that one should not only focus on pronouncing clearly the syllables but at the same time think about all the merits and virtues of Amitabha. Although there are such complex practices, like the one taught by Zhiyi as the walking samadhi, but teachers like Honen have a different interpretation of buddha-remembrance. Still, if there are thoughts about other things than the name, it is not single-minded.

"You recite, thinking about the narrative, you receive a vision of the Buddha, from there the wisdom arises for Awakening. You don't actually engage in a separate practice other than recitation/mindfulness of the Buddha for this to happen. In the meantime, you treat the Buddha just as real as anything else."

It is not the vision that gives wisdom, rather it is what one learns from the Buddha there. But even before that one should know that all appearances are empty.

The sutra itself says in that chapter (Rulu's translation): "All are impermanent and all are unstable. Recognize that there has never been an everlasting ruler in one, Only convergence and divergence of causes and conditions. Understand and know that nothing in existence is real." Also, once one has the vision of Amitabha, "He teaches, in the assembly of Bodhisattvas and bhikṣus, that dharmas [in true reality] are empty and, therefore, indestructible. Why? Because indestructible are all dharmas, such as form, pain, itch, thinking, perception, birth, death, consciousness, spirit, earth, water, fire, wind, the human world, and the heaven world, including Great Brahma Heaven. By thinking of a Buddha, one attains the Samādhi of Emptiness."" and the chapter concludes: "The mind with perceptions is saṃsāra; the mind without perceptions is nirvāṇa. Dharmas as perceived are not something pleasurable. They are empty thoughts, nothing real. This is what Bodhisattvas see as they abide in this samādhi.""

So, although it teaches visualisation, it is also strong in affirming the importance of contemplating emptiness and how the vision itself is mind made, like a dream.

"Nowhere in that passage does it mention that."

It is there on p 20: "Through reflecting on emptiness, that man then and there attained happiness in dharmas which do not come into existence from anywhere [anutpattika-dharma-ksanti], and straightaway attained non-regression."

"Sorry, don't have access to that translation. It doesn't exist in the one I have."

You can read that version http://lirs.ru/lib/sutra/Pratyutpanna_and_Surangama_Samadhi_Sutras,1998,BDK25.pdf.

It is that Rulu translated T417 (one fascicle), while Harrison translated T418 (three fascicles). You can also read Harrison's <https://digitalcollections.anu.edu.au/handle/1885/10662> on the sutra where he translated the Tibetan and compared it with three Chinese versions. The referenced section there is on p 34-35.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 9th, 2015 at 4:40 AM

Title: Re: The Mahayana idea of karma and vegetarianism

Content:
Astus wrote:
The Surangama Sutra argues:

"To wear parts of a being's body is to involve one's karma with that being"
(BTTS new translation, p 269)

Based on these two Sutras it does not sound accurate.
See above. The Surangama Sutra actually says that somehow those who consume animal products or use them in other ways are involved with that being's karma. On the other hand, the Nirvana and the Lankavatara talks about the bad smell that frightens others, and that somehow eating meat changes the mind of the person.

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, February 9th, 2015 at 7:36 PM
Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land
Content:
Astus wrote:
PorkChop,

"This is a description in Pure Land terms of the result of Nembutsu/Nianfo as a direct experience of emptiness. ... The practice starts with subject "I" thinking of object "Buddha".
Eventually, subject falls off (no more I, me, mine), object falls off (no more external object Buddha), all that's left is the name."

That is not an experience of emptiness, it is the result/level of concentration practice, at best the fourth dhyana.
Inka means that one person thinks the other person has a correct view of the Dharma. It is far from a general approval as a Zen teacher can dismiss entire Zen lineages as false, or schools can call each other deficient.

"To be clear, I'm not arguing some complex compendium of all of the teachings with each recitation, just the basic narrative that all Pure Land teachers cover. "

There is a difference between the reason one recites the nenbutsu and what happens during recitation itself. If the reason, the motivation is birth in Sukhavati, that is the definitive PL attitude. But during recitation itself one does not have to remind oneself about the PL doctrines.

"By the final stage, one is Awakened to the true nature of mind."

And the original point was that recitation itself does not include insight. The practice described in the Pratyutpanna Sutra goes well beyond oral buddha-remembrance, thus it is not a text often quoted by PL teachers who follow Shandao or Honen. Such so called higher level practices as visualisation and contemplation of the true mark/emptiness is normally left in the realm of theory as they are considered out of scope for most in the Dharma ending age.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 9th, 2015 at 7:44 PM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

duckfiasco said:

one does not realize non-birth; that is the Holy Gate, beyond my personal limitations. One is grasped by Amida and birth in the Pure Land is a matter of course

Astus wrote:

And that's then primary topic here. How Chan and Pure Land can be put together, how one can attain enlightenment in this life through recitation of the name. And, as you say, such an approach belongs to the Holy Gate.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 9th, 2015 at 7:50 PM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

LastLegend said:

They are two different things. First one is study prajnaparamita and train. The other is Buddha recitation

Astus wrote:

They are not separated.

"Mañjuśrī asked, "World-Honored One, what is called the One Action Samādhi?"

The Buddha replied, "The dharma realm has the one appearance. Focusing one's mind on the dharma realm is called the One Action Samādhi. If, among good men and good women, there are those who aspire to enter the One Action Samādhi, they should first hear prajñā-pāramitā and next train and learn it accordingly. Then they will be able to enter the One Action Samādhi"

LastLegend said:

Merit from reciting Buddha is immeasurable and boundless.

Astus wrote:

Merit is still within samsara. One needs wisdom to go beyond ordinary merit accumulation.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 9th, 2015 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:
Astus wrote:
PorkChop,

My questions are the following then:

1. Honen writes in his famous <http://www.jodo.org/teachings/teachings02.html>: "In China and Japan, many Buddhist masters and scholars understand that the nembutsu is to meditate deeply on Amida Buddha and the Pure Land. However, I do not understand the nembutsu in this way. ... they should not put on any airs and should sincerely practice the nembutsu, just as an illiterate fool, a nun or one who is ignorant of Buddhism"

That is, simply reciting the name leads to birth in the Pure Land. It is not a visualisation or contemplation but an oral repetition of Namu Amida Butsu. One does not even have to have a focused mind for it to be effective. In fact, Honen considered most incapable of doing the simplest of meditation practices:

"Let devotees of the present day give up their so-called meditations as if they were required by the Law. Even though a man would meditate upon the images of the Buddhas and Bodhisattvas in Paradise, the fact is he is incapable of picturing to himself the Buddhas as represented in the images made by such famous sculptors as Unkei and Kokei. Even though he tries to meditate upon the things which beautify the Land of Bliss, he finds it hard even to picture to his mind the beauties of the flowers and fruit of the cherry, plum, and peach of this world with which he is so familiar."
(Fitzgerald: Honen the Buddhist Saint, p 33)

And on the Pure Land methods themselves he says:

"But if we inquire into the essential nature of these various disciplines, we find that the number of the meditative reaches thirteen, and of the nonmeditative nine, and they are all difficult to practice. Anyone who would enter the gate of the meditative will find that his mind races about like a horse among the six objects of sensation, and when he wants to get near to the gate of the non-meditative, he is like a monkey that sports on the branches of the tree of the ten evils. Try as he will to quiet his mind and subdue his heart, he finds himself unable to do so."
(p 72)

Since it is considered difficult to do anything but the simplest form of recitation, how could then one perform the type of buddha-remembrance you talk about?

2. There is a difference between the Holy Path and the Pure Land Path where only the Holy Path includes liberation in this life.

"By the Holy Path is meant the way a man even in this corrupt world can get free from his evil passions, and attain enlightenment, while by the gate of the Pure Land is meant the way to secure this by being born into the Land of Bliss at death."

(p 71)

If recitation itself brings about enlightenment in this life, is it not the Holy Path?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 9th, 2015 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

LastLegend said:

There are two types of merit. One is with limit (in anticipation of rewards or holding rewards) and one without limit. One without limit is Buddha.

Mañjuśrī asked the Buddha, “World-Honored One, what actions can one take to attain anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi quickly?”

The Buddha replied, “Mañjuśrī, those who practice prajñā-pāramitā as explained will quickly attain anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi. Furthermore, there is the Samādhi of the One Action. If good men and good women train in this samādhi, they will also quickly attain anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi.”

Pay attention to the bolded word.

Astus wrote:

Limitless merit is when one knows and sees that it is empty. And that is wisdom. Without wisdom, it is limited merit.

All it says that those who practice the One Action Samadhi will also quickly attain perfect enlightenment. It does not specify what such a samadhi involves. And as it says later, it involves learning and understanding prajnaparamita. The difference is that while some can manage just with learning prajnaparamita, others require some further practice, or even gaining birth in the Pure Land.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 11th, 2015 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

PorkChop,

"Now you want me to bend Honen's teachings to say something they never intended to, the idea that Enlightenment is capable through one's own efforts in this lifetime?"

Not at all. Honen and his followers explicitly say that enlightenment happens only in the Pure Land. That is the whole point of the entire Pure Land teaching, that one aspires for birth because that's where one can gain liberation and not in this life. So it is strange to me how you seem to defend the idea that the Pure Land path includes insight into emptiness now.

"most likely an image will arise"

That sounds like a measurement to me, or a promise that eventually one will get a vision. But while there are stories about Honen attaining it, I have not encountered any statement by Honen that would hint at such an experience for nenbutsu followers. Also, if the meaning of the recitation samadhi is equalled to becoming an enlightened being, then again it seems to go against the whole difference made between the Holy and the Pure Land path.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 11th, 2015 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

LastLegend,

"Great faith is as just powerful as wisdom. ... recitation is the practice of prajnaparamita"

The two problems I see with that:

If faith equals wisdom, it is enough to believe in liberation to be liberated, and all those who believe in buddha are in fact buddhas.

If recitation is practising prajnaparamita then there is no point in translating it or studying it, we can all just read the words in Sanskrit.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 11th, 2015 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

PorkChop,

"On the other hand, the idea of giving up the entire idea of Self Power in order to receive Other Power is part of the method."

As I see it, there are various ways to approach attaining birth in Sukhavati. All methods there are within the context of that goal, therefore, attainments in this life can go from none to the highest bodhisattva stage. However, recitation itself is one of the possible methods, and it is at best a type of calming meditation. Buddha-remembrance can mean other things as well, including realisation of buddha-mind. But when it is in the realm of reciting a buddha's name, contemplating a buddha's virtues and attributes and visualising him, then generally it may not even fall within the category of meditation but it is a form of motivational practice. Part of that motivation is thinking how blessed one becomes just from thinking about a buddha.

Saying that one should rely on other power instead of one's own practically means that birth in the Pure Land is not because of one's achievements but because of Amitabha's vows. The level of effort required from an aspirant is regularly remembering him, because that is how one conditions the mind. Deep faith itself is simply that, changing one's way of thinking. Through remembering Amitabha there is a reconditioning of the mind and one's direction is changed from samsara to the Pure Land. Technically it is not much different from non-Buddhist devotional religions where people want to be born in a heaven or some other state. The important difference is that being born in the Pure Land is for eventually attaining buddhahood. Because of taking the Pure Land as one's goal and Amitabha as the ideal form of existence there can be many beneficial changes in this life as well, no doubt.

It can even happen that one attains the stage of a noble being, an enlightened one, from insight into emptiness during one's path to Sukhavati. However, the recitation method as it is does not include that function. And that has been my only argument here from the beginning.

"It's not equal to Enlightenment, just a signpost to mark that one is forming a strong karmic relation with Amida and considered a necessary step for the other realizations explained by the Pratyutpanna Samadhi Sutra, which culminate with Enlightenment. I imagine it's kind of like a kensho for the Self Power schools."

Although it sounds good and fascinating to experience such visions, and can be relevant for certain individuals, I'm of the opinion that hearing about Amitabha and believing is proof enough of one's connection. If someone started to question why there has been no visions and such it could lead to losing faith, or at least to some bad feelings and anxiety over the uncertainty of birth.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 11th, 2015 at 7:22 AM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

DesertDweller said:

Astus, I think you are simply not acknowledging the numerous statements regarding the dynamic power of the nembutsu itself that have been posted from page 1 of this thread. And you are sticking to a single valid but limited view of Pure Land as a "devotional religion."

Astus wrote:

I have replied to various statements raised here and gave my reasons. Reciting the name is just reciting the name, repeating the same words over and over. The difference between various kinds of recitations is the ideology associated with it but not the act - and I do not mean that theory does not matter, in fact, that is what really matters. Using a single object as the focal point of concentration is the basic form of calming practice. While calming the mind is required for gaining insight, in and of itself it is not enough. That is why meditation is described in Theravada, Mahayana and Vajrayana within the categories of calming and insight, both are necessary for liberation. The Pure Land path includes various methods aimed for birth in the Pure Land. It is part of the Mahayana branch of the religion called Buddhism. It is devotional in the sense that its practitioners devote themselves toward a single buddha's land mostly through devotional practices for a single buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 11th, 2015 at 7:08 PM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

PorkChop said:

This interpretation is a straw man.

No Pure Land school anywhere would recognize this as a valid interpretation of Buddha Name Recitation.

Yet you won't let this straw man go no matter how many times it gets burned down.

Hence no more point in debating.

Astus wrote:

Let me start with some quotes regarding that straw man first. This is to show the general Chan approach to buddha-remembrance. After all, the topic here is Chan and Pure Land.

"Don't use a Buddha to worship a Buddha. And don't use the mind to invoke a Buddha. Buddhas don't recite sutras. ... If you don't see your nature, invoking Buddhas, reciting sutras, making offerings, and keeping precepts are all useless. Invoking Buddhas results in good karma, reciting sutras results in a good memory; keeping precepts results in a good rebirth, and making offerings results in future blessings-but no buddha. ... All day long they invoke Buddhas and read sutras. But they remain blind to their own divine nature, and they don't escape the Wheel."

(Bodhidharma: <http://www.fodian.net/world/dmhml-e.html>)

"The sutras say that someone who wholeheartedly invokes the Buddha is sure to be reborn in the Western Paradise. Since is door leads to Buddhahood, why seek liberation in beholding the mind?

If you're going to invoke the Buddha, you have to do it right. Unless you understand what invoking means, you'll do it wrong. And if you do it wrong, you'll never go anywhere. Buddha means awareness, the awareness of body and mind that prevents evil from arising in either. And to invoke means to call to mind, to call constantly to mind the rules of discipline and to follow them with all your might. This is what's meant by invoking. Invoking has to do with thought and not with language. If you use a trap to catch fish, once you succeed you can forget the trap. And if you use language to find meaning, once you find it you can forget language. To invoke the Buddha's name you have to understand the Dharma of invoking. If it's not present in your mind, your mouth chants an empty name. As long as you're troubled by the three poisons or by thoughts of yourself, your deluded mind will keep you from seeing the Buddha and you'll only waste your effort. Chanting and invoking are worlds apart, Chanting is done with the mouth. Invoking is done with the mind. And because invoking comes from the mind, it's called the door to awareness. Chanting is centered in the mouth and appears as sound."

(Bodhidharma: <http://www.fodian.net/world/dmpsl-e.html>)

"The deluded person recites the Buddha's [name] and seeks for rebirth in that other [location], while the enlightened person purifies his mind. Therefore the Buddha said, 'As the mind is purified, so is the buddha land purified. ... If you recite the Buddha's [name] and seek rebirth [in the Pure Land] without being enlightened, how will you ever be able to travel such a long road?'"
(Huineng: Platform Sutra, ch 3, p 38, 39, BDK edition)

"To strive for the Way of Awakening by moving the mouth thousands or tens of thousands of times is like steering a cart north but intending to go south. It is like putting a square peg in a round hole. Looking over words and phrases but not practising is as worthless as reading a prescription but forgetting to take the medication. Ceaslessly repeating the Buddha's Name is as worthless as a frog in a spring field, croaking day and night."
(Dogen: <http://wwwzc.org/sites/default/files/Bendowa-book.pdf>)

"Is it not the innate self-nature with which you yourself are endowed, standing bright and clear before your eyes? If you have not seen into your own nature it will not be easy for you to see this land. Yet nowadays those who practice the Pure Land teaching recite the name daily a thousand times, ten thousand times, a million times, but not one of them has determined the Great Matter of salvation. Don't they realize that Amida Buddha refused to accept true enlightenment? Still more, don't they realize that one instant of thought is this very Paradise of Salvation?"

...

"But if you are looking for something that will help you attain continuous uninterrupted true meditation and insight into your own nature, then calling the Buddha's name is fine, but you could as well recite the grain-grinding song instead. Do not think you are going to become a Buddha by deliberately discarding the essentials of seeing into your own nature and turning instead to the virtues gained from calling the Buddha's name."
(Hakuin: Orategama Zokushu in "The Zen Master Hakuin: selected Writings" tr P. Yampolsky, p 127, 133)

From the above it is quite clear that the common Chan view of buddha-remembrance is that at best it can be used as an object of focus to generate concentration. At least that's what Hakuin came up with, who otherwise criticised those who mix Chan with Pure Land, like the famous Zhuhong Yunqi. Others just emphasise that one should first and foremost should see the nature of mind or else all practices are just mundane activities. Here is the same sentiment by Xuyun:

"Reciters of the Buddha's name should never cling to that name for it can become as harmful as poison. We now recite the Buddha's name because our habits are deeply rooted from time without beginning and our thoughts cannot be easily stopped. So we use his name as a prop in our striving to wipe out all rising thoughts until they eventually vanish completely and give way to the Pure Land which will then manifest itself. So why should we seek it from outside?"

(http://hsuyun.budismo.net/en/dharma/two_discourses1.html)

As I see it, this kind of Chan approach to buddha-remembrance is contrary to the whole concept of the Pure Land path that aims for birth through the vow of Amitabha. That is why in this thread from the beginning I have been against confusing the two. And if one were to use recitation for training the mind in concentration and cutting off conceptual proliferation, that is neither Chan (seeing nature) nor Pure Land (attaining birth).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 11th, 2015 at 7:17 PM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

Dan74 said:

Basically I can very easily see a strong Pure Land practice leading to insight in the presence of the right karmic disposition. So at the end of the day, there is just a question of what works better and this will surely depend on many factors, chief of which probably being one's karmic disposition.

Astus wrote:

Where lies the difference between practitioners of other faiths who focus on a single object and attain various levels of absorptions and Buddhist meditators doing the same? Probably none, and they can both attain birth in specific heavens related to their achievements. Theoretically both types of practitioners could attain insight, however, it is generally believed that only through learning of the Buddha's teachings can one engage in correct contemplation and gain insight into no-self and emptiness.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 11th, 2015 at 7:46 PM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

LastLegend said:

You are right recitation is not practicing prajnaparamita directly. It's practicing One Appearance Samadhi which will lead to prajnaparamita.

Astus wrote:

One Act Samadhi is explained in the sutra that has the prerequisite of learning and understanding prajnaparamita teachings. Without that, it is just a devotional practice of recalling a buddha and his virtues.

LastLegend said:

If by wisdom you mean conceptual knowledge of emptiness, then I disagree. If wisdom is defined as understanding itself that is leading to liberation, then conceptual knowledge of emptiness is not wisdom. However, knowledge of emptiness can lead to wisdom. If one has to come back to the conceptual knowledge of emptiness from time to time to remind oneself of non-attachment, then how is that different from the practice of coming back to reciting Buddha. That's still playing with antidote. Liberation is defined by Bodhidharma Wake-Up Sermon as:

To see form but not be corrupted by form or to hear sound but not to be corrupted by sound is liberation. Eyes that aren't attached to form are the gates of Zen. In short, those who perceive the existence and nature of phenomena and remain unattached are liberated. Those who perceive the external appearance of phenomena are at their mercy. Not to be subject to afflictions is what's meant by liberation. There's no other liberation. When you know how to look at form, form doesn't give rise to mind and mind doesn't give rise to form. Form and mind are both pure.

Astus wrote:

First one needs to hear about the teachings, then understand it, then it can be confirmed in one's experience. Without the first two steps there cannot be the third one.

Afflictions arise from the misconception that there is a substance. Such misconception is eliminated by learning, understanding and confirmation. If one only holds a single object in mind to block the occurrence of afflictions, that can be a temporary state, but once one has to engage in daily activities one reverts to the afflicted mind. In other words, even gods of the highest (dhyana) heavens eventually fall to lower realms. That's why the Chan practice is being aware of everything without attachment, and not being aware of a single thing, attached to that one thing, and barring everything else.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 11th, 2015 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

PorkChop,

There seems to be some gap between what I say and comes through.

"Chanting and invoking are worlds apart, Chanting is done with the mouth. Invoking is done with the mind."

If this refutes what I say then that is not what I say. The question was whether recitation of the name can bring about enlightenment in this life. Recitation is what is called chanting in the Bodhidharma quote. Buddha means "awareness of body and mind that prevents evil from arising in either" and invoking it means "to call constantly to mind the rules of discipline and to follow them with all your might" and "As long as you're troubled by the three poisons or by thoughts of yourself, your deluded mind will keep you from seeing the Buddha and you'll only waste your effort." That is a description of the Holy Path, of realising the buddha-mind. Contrary to that, the oral recitation - that is called the easy path what has been emphasised by numerous Pure Land teachers as the essential method - is the chanting.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 11th, 2015 at 9:29 PM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

Dan74 said:

In Pali canon alone there are many examples of people who were liberated after very brief teachings, Astus. You must surely remember them? Bahiya comes to mind, then there is the lovely sutta quoted above, etc etc

Astus wrote:

Sure, they did not follow any meditation practices or pursued studies but realised directly from the Buddha's utterance. Usually those were teachings asked as summaries of his Dharma, similarly to what were later called direct instructions and upadeshas. I don't think I have denied that option anywhere.

Dan74 said:

But in other faiths, wrong view might be the obstacle on the way to liberation, whereas Pure Land practitioners are not encumbered by wrong views. Whether prajnaparamita or any other aspect of the Dharma, they are all pointers, as we know, not the 'thing' itself. So they are not something one needs to 'possess' as a prerequisite. The dharma doors are many!

Astus wrote:

Wrong views are what we all have from birth, an even from before that. That's why one needs the teachings. The only question then is whether within the practice of recitation the teachings on non-birth are included or not.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 11th, 2015 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

plwk,

"And how convenient in forgetting that when deliberating on your pet topic of how nian fó is done the Chán way, the opposite on Pure Land within the dynamics of a dual practice is neglected and even when mentioned, it's oft made to look inferior or subservient to the former, when it should not be the case."

Dual practice either means that one does both nianfo and canchan in separate sessions, or they are practised together either in the form of real-mark buddha-remembrance. or applying phrase investigation and raising the great doubt. Done in separate sessions is fairly universal, as most monastic rituals include name and sutra recitation of Amitabha. Practising with "Who recites?" is the most common form in Chinese Buddhism, while awareness of the real-mark seems rare. If the practice is with the question, then it is no different from kanhuachan. If it is with the real-mark, it is abiding in buddha-mind and no different from wunian. In both cases recitation serves only as the basis upon what is built further practice, thus we arrive at the usual calming and insight formula.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 11th, 2015 at 11:37 PM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

The only question then is whether within the practice of recitation the teachings on non-birth are included or not.

Dan74 said:

Could you spell this out for me, please?

Astus wrote:

It is by realising non-birth, i.e. emptiness, that one gains liberation. Normally such attainment is through insight meditation where one contemplates the lack of self in both people and dharmas. If someone only recites the name then it can produce concentration and calm, but somehow one also needs to learn about dependent origination, etc. in order to be able to think about them and investigate their validity in one's present experience.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 12th, 2015 at 1:48 AM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

PorkChop,

The question asked from Bodhidharma is about the point of contemplating mind (觀心) if one can attain liberation through buddha-remembrance (念佛). The entire Breakthrough Sermon is about this single practice of contemplating the mind and throughout the text it is explain how it is enough in itself, how it includes and at the same time surpasses all other practices. What Bodhidharma does with the term buddha-remembrance is simply turning it into the practice of contemplating the mind, just as it is explained for other common terms like the six paramitas, six realms, meritorious actions, three immeasurable aeons, etc. Contemplating the mind itself is the same as seeing nature, the enlightenment of the buddha-mind, the realisation of emptiness.

So, buddha-remembrance is explained in a way that buddha stands for being conscious (覺察) of body and mind and thus not raising any evil (惡), while remembrance is keeping in mind (憶持) and not forgetting (不忘) to observe the precepts. This is related to what is written at the beginning of the text that there are the pure and the impure minds, one is occupied with good (善) and the other with evil (惡). In other words, good is buddha-mind, evil is samsara. That way buddha-remembrance is keeping the buddha-mind. When it says that remembering (念) lies in the mind (心) and not in words (言) he emphasises contemplating mind. And that in order to recall the name (念佛之名) one already has to know the recalling of the way (念佛之道), what is meant is not that one should recite with understanding but that one should have realisation in order to properly remember the buddha. That is because unless the three poisons are removed one cannot see the buddha. He differentiates recitation (誦) and recalling (念), that one is a verbal while the other is a mental act. That is again strengthened by the statement that all the enlightened beings of the past (過去諸聖) practised exclusively mentally (唯只推心) and never verbally (皆非外說), as that would have been grasping at external phenomena.

"Now your entire straw man rests on this fictional idea that there is a Buddha Recitation that does not involve thinking of that Buddha and the associated narrative."

No. It rests in the difference between calming and insight practice.

On the Fukeshu I recommend this essay:

https://web.archive.org/web/20130408103143/http://www.japanese-religions.jp/publications/assets/JR32_a_Deeg.pdf

(I will continue my response later)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 12th, 2015 at 4:50 AM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

PorkChop,

"Now your entire straw man rests on this fictional idea that there is a Buddha Recitation that does not involve thinking of that Buddha and the associated narrative."

If by that you mean one recites the name with the intention to attain birth based on the faith in the vow, I have not questioned that. What I said is that during a single-minded recitation one does not think about anything else but the name, otherwise it is not a single-minded but a distracted recitation. But the main point, that is, the difference between calming and insight practice, is that contemplation of the nature of phenomena, of dependent origination, of emptiness, is not included in reciting the name, or even in visualisation. The topic of no-self is not one of the common Pure Land narrative, but I don't see you would argue for that either. Naturally, all Pure Land schools teach buddha-remembrance within a specific context, that's what makes them Pure Land schools. Vajrayana can explain buddha-remembrance in a quite different fashion, just as it happens in other sects. Although all may recite the name, they do it with a different perspective. But that has not been questioned by me at all. It is still and only the lack of contemplating the nature of reality that I have brought up as the reason why recitation in and of itself may not bring about enlightenment in this life. To repeat, I do not question the validity and functionality of buddha-remembrance as effective in getting one to the Pure Land. It is just its relation to enlightenment in this life that would require insight into the nature of reality that I have talked about before and now.

"You've made the claim that Recitation falls under the first with absolutely NO PROOF"

Yes, my claim is that recitation is calming without insight. Should I prove the lack of contemplating emptiness in recitation how? If you have a specific work where a Pure Land teacher actually describes how emptiness is to be meditated upon within the frame of recitation then right there you can disprove my claim. Note that I have already mentioned how recitation can be connected with what is called real-mark buddha-remembrance and investigating who the reciter is.

"you made the claim that there is nothing inherently Buddhist about the Pure Land path"

I presume what you refer to is the part where I say that calming practice is common to both Buddhist and non-Buddhist schools. It is not about what the Pure Land path is or is not.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 12th, 2015 at 8:46 PM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

Last Legend,

"I want to discuss how Chan works exactly if one is doing the gradual practice because it is still within the conceptual framework."

Chan is sudden enlightenment. Following a gradual path is common Mahayana. If you want to clarify the gradual process, the best sources in English are from the Tibetan tradition (e.g. <http://www.dharma-friends.org.il/libitem/the-middling-stages-of-meditation-by-acharya-kamalashila/> and <http://kagyumonlam.org/Download/TEXT/Lamp%20For%20the%20Path%20to%20Enlightenment/English%20Root%20Text%20Bodhipathapradlpa.pdf>), or you can try to go through such works as Zhiyi's http://www.kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/ebm_book_page.htm and the http://www.kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/sgs_book_page.htm.

In short, the basis of ignorance is conceptual attachment, that is, believing in essentially existing things and beings, from that comes emotional attachments and from that all sorts of deluded actions. One can go gradually by first restricting one's actions with the precepts, calming emotional states with meditation and eliminating false ideas through insight. Or one can go directly to the root cause of clinging to thoughts and see that there is nothing to grasp. The result is the same.

All learning is necessarily conceptual as our primary communicational form is through words. But just as one can understand through instructions how to ride a bike or set the air conditioner, similarly one can understand the teachings and confirm it in one's experience. For instance, it is taught that within the five aggregates there is no self, nor is there an self beyond nor between the two. So one has to learn what the five aggregates are, what a self is, and then search for that hypothetical self within the aggregates. Once it is definitely confirmed that no such self can be found, the belief in a self is refuted and dissolved.

"If during recitation, one is be able to hear one's own recitation, that's hearing without distortion. That's practicing Zen because hearing without distortion is Zen."

That is concentration and calming. Zen is no-thought, where although everything appears but there is no attachment. A peaceful mind induced by focusing on a single object is temporary and conditioned. If the basis of attachment is removed and there is no delusion, then attachment cannot happen in any situation.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 12th, 2015 at 9:08 PM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

PorkChop,

"Vasubandhu clearly states that the visions of the Pure Land (and it's adornments, which are clearly linked to mental qualities) that arise are Vipassana (觀), that's even in the name of the Visualization Sutra."

What <http://www.euroshinshu.org/www12.canvas.ne.jp/horai/jodoron.htm> means by insight "is to contemplate wholeheartedly those glorious adornments and so practice vipashyana; by this one can reach that Land, where one will enjoy various flavors of the Dharma." and "The contemplation is of three kinds: (1) contemplation of the glorious manifestations of the merit of the Buddha-land; (2) contemplation of the glorious merit of Amida Buddha; (3) contemplation of the glorious merit of various Bodhisattvas."

What I have written <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=270911#p270911>: "the difference between calming and insight practice, is that contemplation of the nature of phenomena, of dependent origination, of emptiness, is not included in reciting the name, or even in visualisation." still holds for what is contained in the Jodoron.

"So what do you mean there's no Emptiness in Pure Land?"

I mean that reciting the name, visualisation or the other commonly used practices do not include contemplation on the absence of self. Impermanence and suffering is considered to the point where one can renounce samsaric existence as undesirable, but the solution to that is birth in the Pure Land instead of removing the obscurations. Otherwise there would be no need to attain birth.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 13th, 2015 at 12:52 AM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

plwk,

"the name of Amitābha Buddha is recited slowly, and the mind is emptied out after each repetition. When idle thoughts arise, the phrase is repeated again to clear them. With constant practice, the mind is able to remain peacefully in emptiness, culminating in the attainment of samādhi."

That kind of dual practice is not that emptiness is achieved during recitation, but it uses recitation to assist in cutting off thoughts and arrives at the total cessation of recitation. There was a Chan school similar to that in the Tang era.

From the Chan Notes by Guifeng Zongmi (in Zongmi on Chan, p 186, 187):

"South Mountain Buddha-Recitation Gate's practice is "maintaining the buddha-recitation consisting of the one syllable for 'buddha.'" This is a musical buddha-recitation in which the practitioners sing the single syllable for "buddha" in a gradually lowering pitch, until their voices die out. Eventually they reach no thought.

...

At the beginning they chant this buddha-recitation as a gentle [or slow] song. Later they gradually lower the sound to a finer and finer sound, up to and including no sound. They are dispatching the "{hut" to [the seventh consciousness,] the manas, but in the manas the buddha-recitation is still coarse. They go on to dispatch [the "fhut"] to [the eighth consciousness,] the citta [that is, the storehouse consciousness], maintaining thought recitation after recitation. They have the "{hut" constantly inside the citta, up to and including the nothought concentration. [By such a practice] how could they not attain the path?"

"every Buddhist practice comes with a contemplation on śūnyatā ultimately"

The argument I proposed was that within recitation there is no contemplation of emptiness. But even within visualisation and other common practices used in one's devotion to Amitabha there is no emptiness contemplation. Still, the original question is whether with recitation one can attain liberation in this life, and that is to what I have said no, with the condition that it is only recitation practice. But if you have a source where there actually is contemplation of no-self within recitation, please quote that.

"From the Anguttara-Nikaya: Ekanipata: Ekadhammapali: Pañhamavagga Bhikkhus, if you develop and make much this one thing, it invariably leads to weariness, cessation, appeasement, realization and extinction. What is it? It is recollecting the Enlightened One. If this single thing is recollected and made much, it invariably leads to weariness, cessation, appeasement, realization and extinction."

From Bhikkhu Bodhi's note to that section where he quotes the commentary (Numerical Discourses, p 1614, n161):

"But one can also use this meditation subject directly for the purpose of developing insight. After recollecting the Buddha, one dissects the act of recollection into the five aggregates and defines them thus: 'These five aggregates are, in brief, the truth of suffering. The craving that produced them is the truth of the origin. The cessation of craving is the truth of cessation; and the practice that understands cessation is the truth of the path' Thus one has defined the four truths in the preliminary portion [the stage of insight] and one step by step reaches the stage of the noble ones."

As it can be seen from the above, it is not the recollection in and of itself that leads to insight. The sutta itself only gives a general point regarding how the six forms of recollection can boost one's practice ("The first six recollections — of the Buddha, the Dhamma, the Sangha, virtue, generosity, and the devas — are meant to induce a sense of joy and confidence (pasada) in the practice. The first two induce a sense of confidence in the practice itself;" from <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/study/recollections.html>).

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 14th, 2015 at 12:24 AM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

plwk said:

Hence, I tend to be much more attracted to the Chinese approach to Chan and Pure Land.

I totally forgot to recommend you this fabulous work as found

<https://www.google.com.my/url?sa=t&rct=j&q=&esrc=s&source=web&cd=1&cad=rja&uact=8&ved=0CBwQFjAA&url=https%3A%2F%2Fjournals.ub.uni-heidelberg.de%2Findex.php%2Fjiabs%2Farticle%2Fdownload%2F8711%2F2618&ei=hfeVPjHAoeGuATstYDYAQ&usg=AFQjCNE8u6QXkTJkMDuTCiNdCbFKaARrBA&sig2=ZYzx4mAWtQLeDAPJ-kj6aA>. A bit on the author's profile http://www.peterlang.com/download/datasheet/42913/datasheet_61681.pdf and one review <https://nirc.nanzan-u.ac.jp/nfile/2528>. What I have failed to present in this thread, this work does it by leaps and bounds. Take your time to digest it...

Astus wrote:

More on Yongming Yanshou:

Online:

<http://terebess.hu/zen/mesterek/Yongming3.pdf>

<https://macsphere.mcmaster.ca/bitstream/11375/16409/1/Keenan%20Cox%20MA%20Thesis%20Final.pdf>

<http://terebess.hu/zen/mesterek/Yongming1.pdf>

<http://terebess.hu/zen/mesterek/Yongming2.pdf>

Books:

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=2Kc-zsuweBoC>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=ZBzlqhA7m1QC>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 14th, 2015 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

DesertDweller said:

is this attitude really characteristic--or "required"--for Shin Buddhism, or is it merely a polemical distortion?

Astus wrote:

A topic from 2010 related to your question:

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=60&t=1084>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 14th, 2015 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Daily Discipline: Chan and Pure Land

Content:

DesertDweller said:

The "totalitarianism" I was referring to in the passage above had more to do with the author's strident rhetoric and intolerance for other methods or even layers of meaning in Shin doctrine. To put it in a slightly more direct way, if this is what the Shin school really represents, I fail to see how it can serve as a saving means for any but the most literalistic fundamentalists--and this, again, seems contrary to my understanding of the spirit of Pure Land, which is mercy and compassion for ALL types of people, saints, sinners, fools and metaphysicians alike.

Astus wrote:

Any and every teaching says that it is the best of all. Otherwise why even bother with that path? The reason this approach may sound bad to some is that they associate it with religious intolerance and violence. Individualist relativism is a fairly modern thing and it either means a lack a faith in anything or more often the disguised rejection of everyone else who do not agree with whatever idea one has and at the same time calling them intolerant thus blocking all meaningful discourse.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 24th, 2015 at 2:21 AM

Title: Re: Non duality for teenagers

Content:

Astus wrote:

Millions and millions of children have been taught magnificent and profound ideas before in practically every human society. But I have yet to see if it made any difference in people's day to day lives or on a historical scale. And this concept that kids should learn about non-duality or anything like that is not different from sending them to ecclesiastic schools. I wonder how many members here believe that religious education produces better humans.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 24th, 2015 at 3:22 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm said:

Anyway, the point is that no amount of study of Buddhist "history" will get you any closer to the Dharma.

Astus wrote:

At the same time Buddhist schools are happy to establish their authority on historical claims and they regularly transmit stories about events supposedly happened in the past. The very idea of lineage is a claim for historical origins. If it is irrelevant to understanding the Dharma, why not leave all those out?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 25th, 2015 at 3:54 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm said:

buddhology is forensics, lineage and tradition are living and breathing.

Astus wrote:

Tradition is the idea that certain patterns of thinking and activity are inherited through time without change. Historical research includes investigating such claims, looking into the origin and development of traditions. For instance, through findings in the 20th century it has become obvious that the Platform Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch is a later creation and not an account of actual events and teachings. Since all living Zen lineages originate from the Sixth Patriarch, and lineage is the single basis of authority in Zen, it is not at all irrelevant whether the tradition has a historical validity or not, exactly because lineage is a powerful argument only as long as it can be perceived as true.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 25th, 2015 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm said:

You conflate two things here: the Platform Sutra and the Sixth Patriarch.

Did Hui-Neng live? Yes? No?

It does not matter if all the details in the book about Hui-neng's life are "correct."

Astus wrote:

Yes, based on the available texts there was such a person, although there is nothing else known about him besides his name. Heze Shenhui was the first to claim that Huineng was the true heir of Hongren and not Shenxiu. However, no later lineages derive themselves from Shenhui - who might have been a disciple of Huineng - instead they probably made up two fake disciples to connect Huineng with later generations. So, even if Huineng might have existed, there is no lineage from him. On the other hand, it was the Platform Sutra that propagated Huineng as the true heir and made him the one true Sixth Patriarch.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 25th, 2015 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm said:

Huh? You are proposing a speculation, "...instead they probably made up two fake disciples to connect Huineng with later generations" as a fact, "...there is no lineage from him."

Astus wrote:

Let's start with how Huineng was invented by Shenhui only to connect him to Hongren and establish a lineage separate from those of the so called Northern School, i.e. the disciples of Shenxiu. The earliest version of the Platform Sutra, written after the death of Shenhui, does not even mention Nanyue Huairang, who was later mentioned as the teacher of Mazu Daoyi in order to connect Mazu to Huineng. So, I could say that not only the name of Nanyue was added to the lineage of Huineng, but Huineng himself was added to the lineage of Hongren, both by people who wanted to establish their own authority. This is not to say that there might not have been people with names like that, however, it is clear that the lineage connections are later creations. That is, Huineng was not an outstanding disciple of Hongren and all we know about him from fairly contemporary sources is his name, and Nanyue was not a disciple of Huineng and besides his name we know nothing about from the earliest sources - and that source is actually the stele of Mazu.

So, yes, we can only speculate if they existed at all or not. What we can know is that the stories and their places in the lineage are creations of later generations, and such lineages were made up in order to claim authority.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 26th, 2015 at 3:29 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm said:

So now you have moved from a tentative Huineng maybe existed to a full on "Huineng was invented."

Astus wrote:

On Huineng there is this work: <https://books.google.co.in/books?id=zTCoxPEXWNwC>. As I have said before, in the earliest sources there is only the name and nothing else. It was Shenhui who created the story of Huineng first and then it was further developed by later generations.

Malcolm said:

Then why do you say "However, it is clear that the lineage connections are later creations." Why is that clear, because you did not find another ancient book in which to confirm this? It seems to me that you are jumping to a lot of conclusions based on an astonishing lack of evidence for them.

Astus wrote:

There is evidence enough to tell that Shenxiu - later labelled as the founder of the Northern School - was the first Chan teacher to gain fame and he was recognised in the imperial records as well. Then Shenhui launched an attack on the disciples of Shenxiu by fabricating the transmission story of the robe to Huineng. Then other factions came up with their own versions of how the transmission happened, as shown in for instance Adamek's <https://books.google.co.in/books?id=dKgl-jPvHiUC>.

Malcolm said:

On the other hand, there is a clear narrative, and clear history. Just accept it and move on. That helps the tradition of Zen. The opposite undermines it. Is that what you want?

Astus wrote:

Yes, there is a story of transmission developed over a thousand years and debated by numerous factions. There is hardly any clear narrative unless we believe in a single account of our chosen lineage, in other words, we stick to a sectarian bias and accept whatever that group wants us to believe. How can that be called living up to the ideal of realising the nature of mind?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 27th, 2015 at 1:38 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here are some quotes from John McRae's Seeing Through Zen, a work that gives a general overview of the historical development of the Zen narrative. There are individual studies as well on the various eras from the early beginning up to the 17th century. This early era of Zen, the time of Huineng, has been reviewed quite completely 30 years ago in the works of McRae (<https://books.google.co.in/books?id=BTOsAAAAIAAJ>) and Faure (<https://books.google.co.in/books?id=BTOsAAAAIAAJ>).

On Shenhui and Huineng (p 55):

"Shenhui set up his own lineage hall in imitation of Puji, even as he worked to establish the transmission from Bodhidharma to Huineng (and then implicitly to Shenhui himself) as the sole lineal succession of Chan"

On the historical Huineng (p 68):

"It is probably fair to think of the historical Huineng as a reasonably conventional Chinese monk, whose teachings differed only slightly if at all from those of other members of the Northern school."

On Shenhui's knowledge of Huineng's life (p 67):

"if the matter had been known to Shenhui, who was a master storyteller dedicated to promoting Huineng's identity as sixth patriarch, he certainly would have included it in his writings. We have good evidence to show that in the late 730s Shenhui was ignorant of most of the details of Huineng's life."

On the Platform Sutra (p 60):

"The Platform Sutra appeared in about 780, over a century after the events it describes were supposed to have taken place. Many scholars have struggled to identify the contents of some "original" or "core" version of the text that might date back to Huineng himself, but the utter failure of these attempts has only confirmed the late provenance of the text as we have it. Barring some miraculous discovery, we must consider the text as we first discover it, in its Dunhuang version."

On Huairang and his connection to Huineng (p 82-83):

"In the case of Huairang, the little that is known about his biography definitely undermines the historicity of the filiation between him and Huineng. First, Huairang's epitaph was written in the year 815, some seventy years after his death, at the request of two of Mazu's disciples, so it can hardly be used to suggest that the connection between Huineng and Huairang was historical rather than legendary. In addition, the paucity of detail concerning Huairang's biography—he is said to have been a mountain practitioner who did not “open the Dharma” to others— suggests that he was historically insignificant. And, needless to say, nothing like the story introduced above occurs in the epitaph. In fact, the Transmissions of Treasure Grove [Temple] (Baolin zhuan), the Hongzhou school's important contribution to the “transmission of the lamp” genre of Chan literature, written about 801, describes Huairang's enlightenment as having been gained under the guidance of the Northern school monk Lao'an. Actually, none of the men traditionally recognized as Huineng's most important successors—Huairang, Qingyuan, Yongjia Xuanjue, and Nanyang Huizhong—are mentioned in the Dunhuang version of the Platform Sutra."

...

"Ultimately, our main conclusion would be that Mazu had a typically variegated life of religious training, so that even if the interaction between Huairang and Mazu was historical in some sense—and it would be rash to deny this possibility out of hand—this would not be enough to make Mazu Huairang's successor, let alone a direct second generation successor to Huineng."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 27th, 2015 at 1:43 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Astus wrote:

Regarding the mentioned criticism of academic studies, please consider

McRae's Rules of Zen Studies

(Seeing Through Zen, p xix-xx)

1. It's not true, and therefore it's more important.

The contents of Zen texts should not be evaluated using a simpleminded criterion of journalistic accuracy, that is, “Did it really happen?” For any event or saying to have occurred would be a trivial reality involving a mere handful of people at one imagined point in time, which would be overwhelmed by the thousands of people over the centuries who were involved in the creation of Zen legends. The mythopoeic creation of Zen literature implies the religious imagination of the Chinese people, a phenomenon of vast scale and deep significance.

2. Lineage assertions are as wrong as they are strong.

Statements of lineage identity and “history” were polemical tools of self-assertion, not critical evaluations of chronological fact according to some modern concept of historical accuracy. To the extent that any lineage assertion is significant, it is also a misrepresentation; lineage assertions that can be shown to be historically accurate are also inevitably inconsequential as statements of religious identity.

3. Precision implies inaccuracy.

Numbers, dates, and other details lend an air of verisimilitude to a story, but the more they accumulate, the more we should recognize them as literary tropes. Especially in Zen studies, greater detail is an artifact of temporal distance, and the vagueness of earlier accounts should be comforting in its integrity. While we should avoid joining a misguided quest for origins, we should also be quick to distinguish between “good data” and ornamental fluff. Even as we ponder the vectors of medieval polemics.

4. Romanticism breeds cynicism.

Storytellers inevitably create heroes and villains, and the depiction of Zen’s early patriarchs and icons cripples our understanding of both the Tang “golden age” and the supposedly stagnant formalism of the Song dynasty. If one side is romanticized, the other must be vilified, and both subjects pass incognito. The collusion between Zen romanticists and the apologists for Confucian triumphalism—which has Song Neo-Confucianism climbing to glory on the back of a defeated Buddhism—is an obstacle to the understanding of both Chan and the Chinese civil tradition. The corollary is this: Cold realism eliminates dismissive misapprehension.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 27th, 2015 at 4:37 PM

Title: Re: "Householder Chan"

Content:

Astus wrote:

First of all, I really like your question. It is the most important one for any householder who wants Chan.

As I see it, this idea that one should be free of all attachments is a misleading one. The solution is not in reducing one's life to the bare necessities. The source of suffering is the idea of permanence, substance, meaning, importance, etc. Attachment is wanting things to be in a specific way, and that desire is based on concepts that declare what is true and what is false, what is good and what is bad ultimately. It is this projection of absolute reality that creates the duality between ordinary life and ideal life. Emptiness means that whatever supreme concept we have of ideal life is nothing but a passing thought.

It can be really difficult to know what "kleshas are bodhi" stands for. Either we are attached to something or not, there is no third option. Either we live a pure life or an impure one. But to see that this tainted realm is itself the pure land, that often feels nothing but clever sophism. What should be understood is there is nothing beyond this present reality. All humans can do are eat, shit and sleep. Whether you eat a seven course meal or a single bowl of rice makes little difference. Trouble comes when we want to force an ideal life on our ordinary one. And religious ideals are not much different from secular goals. We can dream about how sitting crossed leg facing the wall the whole day is the ultimate achievement, but that's just another false idea.

This existential unease that can drive us to philosophy and religion is the understanding that life is in general meaningless and without any real basis. The error most people make is that they look for some supreme truth beyond the present realm of experience. But as the Buddha taught, even the highest heavens are impermanent and unreliable. In other words, even the deepest meditative trance and the most wonderful realisation are meaningless and without essence.

As human beings we have bodily senses, we have emotions and we have thoughts. That's our complete realm of experience, our life. Senses, feelings and concepts are all temporary. Whether we enjoy our situation or hate it, does not matter. It will pass anyway. In fact, right in this present moment we cannot hold on to a single experience even for a millisecond. It's all inconceivable.

So, instead of labeling one idea as true and arranging, measuring, judging everything else relative to that, we need to realise that there is always a network of associations without any true centre. Our attention constantly moves from one thing to another, and whatever happens to be in the focus, that becomes our true world, our self, the most important thing ever. Ignorance comes in the moment we explain it to ourselves as the only truth, that is, we build an ideology, a personal story.

Facing everyday events may give us the desire that we want only the good states, the good moments, the good situations. Actually, that's what we and everyone else wants. This cannot be helped. This is life itself. Life without this basic intention to want the good things is an imaginary dead state. Instead what we should see is that nobody else but us label things as good and bad, we are the ones driven by our conditioning to highlight one thing and forget about the rest. That is the work of our conceptual network of associations. It's not good or bad, it's just how we are. We may not like how our nose looks like, but that's just how it is. The moment we want an ideal nose instead of the present one, we fall into a big trap. Because while we can go for surgery. our actual problem lies in this feeling of "not good". Changing the object, reshaping our nose, our mind, whatever, does not change the cause of the problem, that the present experience is labeled as not good. However, the Buddha says that it is never good, it is unsatisfactory, it is suffering. It is never good because we want it to be something else, something ideal, meaningful, substantial, self.

Chan is seeing the nature of mind, that is, the reality of our present experience. What we can easily see is that it is changing no matter what we do. If we want it not to change or change in a specific way - i.e. want the ordinary to be the ideal - we only strengthen this feeling of unease and pain. Practising Chan is the practice of not setting up and following ideologies and personal stories. However, there is no clear recipe but just a general instruction. First one has to clarify the nature of mind, then go on from there and face whatever comes on the basis of that. That is, acting without raising the mind. Then life is just ordinary.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 2nd, 2015 at 3:03 PM

Title: Re: Written texts from the 3rd, 4th, and 5th Chan Patriarchs

Content:

Loren said:

These would be the East Mountain Teachings? Guess one of the twenty-five disciples of Guru Rinpoche, Namkhai Nyingpo, practiced this school.

What modern day tradition places emphasis on these?

Astus wrote:

Yes, the East Mountain school, the earliest era of Chan that later got renamed to Northern School. It has basically gone extinct by the 10th century. Only Sengcan's poem remained in circulation, but that is somewhat later than the others, and it is not exactly a central text either.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 2nd, 2015 at 3:05 PM

Title: Re: Written texts from the 3rd, 4th, and 5th Chan Patriarchs

Content:

Malcolm said:

Because after all, McRae is even more authoritative than Bodhidharma.

Astus wrote:

It depends on the topic. Texts attributed to Bodhidharma are good for studying Chan, McRae's works are good for studying Chan history.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 3rd, 2015 at 3:38 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

LastLegend said:

Give a good reason why they had to go through all the troubles to make things up? To protect the tradition? For selfish reason? What is the deal here what we are talking about involved Buddhist monks who held precepts right?

Astus wrote:

The reason: "prestige, patronage, and special privileges"

See also e.g.: <https://books.google.co.in/books?id=0D0IUv8NeWMC>

"The controversies that simmered in the Sung over the status of the Ch'an lineage as a "separate transmission", in short, were more about securing prestige, patronage, and special privileges within the Buddhist order than about practical matters of monkish training or spiritual cultivation. The "separate transmission" slogan was used successfully by proponents of Chan to argue that members of their lineage, having inherited the enlightenment of the Buddha in a direct line of "mind-to-mind transmission," were the monks most qualified for positions of leadership within the existing Buddhist monastic institution. The slogan was not used to promote any particular reforms of that institution, nor was it associated with any schismatic attempt to establish independent Ch'an monasteries that were "sectarian" in the technical sense of splitting off from an ecclesiastical mainstream.

The success of the Ch'an school in the Sung was largely predicated on its bold, quasi-historical claim to represent an elite lineage of patriarchs or "ancestral teachers" (tsu-shuh) within the Buddhist order."

(Griffith Foulk: Sung Controversies Concerning the "Separate Transmission" of Ch'an in "Buddhism in the Sung", p 221)

Also, if we actually want to accept literally the Chan claim of transmission, it is an exclusive statement of the superiority of Chan above everyone else. And per definition every Chan teacher has to be viewed as a living buddha. Then it becomes a bit problematic when there are such controversies in the past and present, like Chan masters wielding political power, supporting war, seducing disciples, mismanaging wealth, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 3rd, 2015 at 5:07 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

LastLegend said:

If Chan is nothing more than what you just described there, then there should not be any real Chan practitioners today. How do you explain the surviving Chan today?

Astus wrote:

What practice is it you call Chan? What doctrine?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 3rd, 2015 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

LastLegend said:

There is a forum here called Chan. Why do you think that is?

Astus wrote:

My point is that it is not easy at all to tell what Chan practice and doctrine actually is. Actually, the word Chan is used in such a general way in Chinese Buddhism that virtually every monastery is a Chan temple and every abbot is a Chan master. Even when there is a monastic ordination people are automatically members of a Chan lineage. But in terms of the doctrine and practice monastics follow there can be great varieties. The most Chan-like practice is kanhua, but that was invented by Dahui Zonggao in the 12th century and not every lineage and teacher subscribes to it. As for some unique Chan doctrine there is not easy to find one that is on the one hand specific to Chan and on the other accepted by at least some majority of Chan teachers. So the question is, who qualifies as a Chan practitioner?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 4th, 2015 at 2:04 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm said:

Sure it is, just read Nubchen Sangye Yeshe if you have any doubts.

Anders said:

Ah come on. You're eelwriggling now. The point is valid - If that is all there is to Chan, it wouldn't have the lifeblood of realisation in its lineage that it has.

Astus wrote:

There are ways to define Chan, no question about that. A common way to do that since the middle Song era (first appearance in the Zuting Shiyuan, 1108) is to quote the four lines attributed to Bodhidharma, although even Eisai (1141-1215) left out the first line (Zen Classics, p 92; Zen Texts, p 144).

There are those who say that buddha-nature includes insentient beings (e.g. Caodong teachers), and those who say it does not (e.g. Hongzhou teachers). There are those who teach scriptural study (e.g. Yongming Yanshou) and those who don't (e.g. Miyun Yuanwu). There are those who emphasise lineage (e.g. Dogen) and those who are not even parts of any (e.g. Jinul). There are those who teach a gradual curriculum (e.g. Hakuin) and those who have nothing like that (e.g. Bankei). Most likely we could find a similar diversity among modern teachers who associate themselves with the Chan school.

The mentioned "lifeblood of realisation" is similarly a problematic matter that can be clear just by considering the amount various Chan teachers complain, ridicule and reject other Chan teachers and lineages. Theoretically all members of the lineage should be equal, but then for instance Dogen should not have left Japan and Zongmi should not have put others on a lower level than himself.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 4th, 2015 at 3:24 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I think the Western standard of what constitutes 'truth' is very different from the traditional one.

Astus wrote:

I don't see that the Chinese (or many other ancient civilisations) lacked historical consciousness. There were debates and studies related to the authenticity and historical truth of various texts and claims within the Chinese Buddhist community, similarly to how Tibetans tried to sort out the original from the false scriptures.

Here is a passage from the Blue Cliff Record (p 5):

"According to tradition, Master Chih died in the year 514, while Bodhidharma came to Liang in 520; since there is a seven year discrepancy, why is it said that the two met? This must be a mistake in the tradition. As to what is recorded in tradition, I will not discuss this matter now. All that's important is to understand the gist of the matter."

That is, Yuanwu recognises the error in the records, but it is not a topic he discusses in his commentary.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 4th, 2015 at 4:05 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm said:

Oh, it is pretty clear what Astus is up to. Next he will start attacking Vajrayāna lineages. Then, once he has satisfied himself that lineage is just a bunch of hokum, he will set himself up as a guru, indiscriminately mixing mahāmudra and Chan teachings.

Say it ain't so, Astus, come on.

Astus wrote:

You caught me. I've already ordered my guru hat from Amazon.

As for mahamudra + Chan, there was John Crook and we still have Ken McLeod. There might be others as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 4th, 2015 at 9:27 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Dan74 said:

Sure there are inaccuracies and even myths and hagiographies - plenty of grist for the mill of doubt. But what does that all have to do with practice?

Astus wrote:

It has, because as can be seen above in Indrajala's post, Chan can be defined as whatever a Chan teacher says. Without other measurements the only thing that matters is whether the teacher is a member of a lineage or not, and the lineage is held to be valid because it comes from Shakyamuni Buddha. Also, because Chan is often perceived as something ungraspable for ordinary humans and totally mystical, what any seeker can rely on are the credentials provided through the transmission. Even if you look at the various debates that happened during the history of Chan, they are mostly about lineage claims and not anything practical or doctrinal.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 6th, 2015 at 3:36 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Astus wrote:

A story is kept alive as long as people can draw something from it relating to their present situation. There are thousands and thousands of Zen stories, but only a few hundreds are regularly used. Not because of their historical value, because they have zero of that, but because they can be reused again and again. Same goes for the whole lineage idea. It was popular in China because it was actually copied from the imperial system of descendants and fit well with Confucian concepts. Same goes for Christianity actually that copied the Roman system. Since today in Western countries nobility plays almost no role in politics and family bloodlines are mostly irrelevant and even unknown, copying a feudal model is nothing else but romanticism, just like the again popular stories like the Lord of the Rings. But arguing that there was actually a Middle Earth or the planet Coruscant cannot be taken seriously, even if some claim to be followers of Jediism and such. Ever since the finding of the Dunhuang manuscripts more than a hundred years ago we can actually know that things did not exactly happened as later generations liked to describe. People can still believe that events like the flower sermon did occur, but that only shows their insecurity about the effective functioning of the Dharma.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 6th, 2015 at 5:08 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

plwk said:

The latter? Legions of property, wealth, followers, guarded legacies and generations of heirs & disciples at stake... Is this not obvious to you and the academicians?

Astus wrote:

Sure it is. Actually, recent studies usually cover political and social aspects of various traditions, and how for instance Zen literature developed during the Song and Ming dynasty to cater to the needs of the literati, the people who could donate a lot. That again can give the wrong impression that everything is about money and power, and people are all hypocrites. But that would be the other extreme.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 6th, 2015 at 5:14 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I can fully accept it as apocryphal but the point of the simile is such that understanding what the so-called real story or historical account of what really happened may amount to missing the point. In other words, you might unravel the actual history, but miss the metaphorical point, without which there would be no story to tell.

Astus wrote:

Even the meaning intended within the Zen tradition has different levels. The idea of a wordless transmission is not just pointing to the nature of mind but it is posited in contrast to the verbal transmission that "store of the true Dharma eye" originally meant. It is more a sectarian than a doctrinal statement, that besides all the sutras there is a higher level truth that only those who are members of this special transmission know. Otherwise the whole concept of "truth beyond words" has been there in numerous sutras, nothing special about that.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 17th, 2015 at 6:57 AM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't think it's a question of respect. People can say all sorts of things, some clever and some quite stupid. Take what you find sensible and leave the rest. Buddhist tradition has for this practice the terms neyārtha and nīrārtha.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 4:48 AM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is interesting how the usual human obsession with food appears in religious contexts. Chan fitness diet.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Mentioning that this is the Chan section of the forum, since when has Chan come to mean diet?

"In India, the twenty-seven patriarchs only transmitted the imprint of the mind. And the only reason I've come to China is to transmit the instantaneous teaching of the Mahayana: This mind is the buddha. I don't talk about precepts, devotions or ascetic practices such as immersing yourself in water and fire, treading a wheel of knives, eating one meal a day, or never lying down. These are fanatical, provisional teachings." (Bloodstream Sermon in "The Zen Teaching of Bodhidharma", p 41)

The Governor of Hung-chou asked, "Master, should I eat meat and drink wine or should I not?"

The Master replied, "To eat and drink is your blessing. Not to do it is also a blessing." (Mazu Daoyi, in "Original Teachings of Chan Buddhism", p 152)

"There are people in every quarter who assert that the ten thousand practices and the six pāramitās constitute the buddhadharma. But I say to you that they are merely means of adornment, expedients for carrying out the buddha's work; they are not buddhadharma [itself]. Even those who keep the rules regarding food and conduct with the care of a man carrying a bowl of oil so as not to spill a drop, if their dharma-eye is not clear they'll have to pay their debts, and the day will come when the cost of their food will be exacted from them."

(Record of Linji, tr. Sasaki, p 28)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

srivijaya said:

How crucial is it to establish a correct ontology of the two truths within Mahayana Buddhism. Is it a prerequisite for spiritual advancement and enlightenment - and if so, why?

Astus wrote:

In Indian Mahayana we have Madhyamaka and Yogacara. For Madhyamaka understanding the two truths is crucial. For Yogacara you have to comprehend the three natures (trisvabhava). In Chinese Buddhism you can find systems with two, three and four categories of truths. Tibetan Buddhism simply follows Indian Mahayana. And since the two truths go back to the four noble truths and the general path from samsara to nirvana it is very much a basic element of Buddhism.

"Those who do not meditate with wisdom by analyzing the entity of things specifically, but merely meditate on the elimination of mental activity, cannot avert conceptual thoughts and also cannot realize identitylessness because they lack the light of wisdom."

(Kamalashila, in HHDL: Stages of Meditation, p 134)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 21st, 2015 at 2:24 AM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

srivijaya said:

This is interesting Astus because for me, it would depend upon what is meant by "wisdom analyzing the entity of things". Does he mean a correct interpretation of the tenets, or perhaps insight from within meditation? The point he makes about those who just seek to eliminate mental activity is spot on and does indicate that he is referring to meditative wisdom.

So, I think it may come down to how wisdom/knowledge is used as a term. As an ontology gained and refined via logic and debate - requiring acceptance and rejection, or direct insight within meditation. I realise it can mean both in different contexts, just don't see any necessary link between the two.

Astus wrote:

Analysis means conceptual investigation that is based on knowing the teachings. One learns the meaning of selflessness and then looks at one's present experience to confirm the doctrine's validity. Once one knows first hand that indeed there is no self to find anywhere the analysis ends.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 21st, 2015 at 2:31 AM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

Malcolm said:

not even in your Brahmajala Sutra.

Astus wrote:

<http://www.ymba.org/books/brahma-net-sutra-moral-code-bodhisattva/brahma-net-sutra/secondary-precepts>:

3. On Eating Meat

A disciple of the Buddha must not deliberately eat meat. He should not eat the flesh of any sentient being. The meat-eater forfeits the seed of Great Compassion, severs the seed of the Buddha Nature and causes [animals and transcendental] beings to avoid him. Those who do so are guilty of countless offenses. Therefore, Bodhisattvas should not eat the flesh of any sentient beings whatsoever. If instead, he deliberately eats meat, he commits a secondary offense.

4. On Five Pungent Herbs

A disciple of the Buddha should not eat the five pungent herbs -- garlic, chives, leeks, onions, and asafoetida. (44) This is so even if they are added as flavoring to other main dishes. Hence, if he deliberately does so, he commits a secondary offense.

The Baizhang Zen Monastic Regulations, ch 7, p 219, BDK edition:

One must not partake of improper food (buyingshi). (There are three kinds: 1) alcohol, 2) spicy vegetables, and 3) animal flesh. Onions, leeks, garlic, scallions, coriander, and so on, are classified as the second spicy food, whereas various meats are classified as the last one. One should not partake of these kinds of food.)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 21st, 2015 at 6:48 PM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

PorkChop said:

Going back to an earlier statement that the Indian tradition is the only definitive tradition that all Mahayana schools should accept, ... In other words, instead of completely ruling something out as Chinese apocrypha, maybe the case could be made that China was a valuable source of Buddhist knowledge.

Astus wrote:

That is absolutely true. Chinese Buddhism gradually moved away from relying on Indian sources to stand on its own. Xuanzang (602–664) was probably the last monk who visited India and brought back new texts that had some level of impact on a larger scale, however, his Yogacara based Buddhism did not really gain followers and was put aside by the indigenous systems of Tiantai, Huayan and eventually Chan. It is telling that Chan itself, the dominant school during the second millennium, relies mostly on Tiantai and Huayan doctrines but not on Yogacara or Madhyamaka. Also, Chinese Buddhism did not rely much on Indian commentaries and they have started to favour their own scholars, like the disciple of Kumarajiva, Sengzhao (384–414), whose Zhaolun treatise is still quoted occasionally by Chan teachers. And the idea of Dharma transmission in Chan is another step in saying that Chinese teachers are very much the equals of Indians.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 25th, 2015 at 5:30 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Astus wrote:

If curing people magically is interfering with karma then there should be no doctors at all. Theories of physics, chemistry, medicine, etc. are proven through observation of the material world. Religions and some other beliefs claim magical powers but none can actually provide any proof besides hearsay and legends. As I take it, siddhis are literary tropes and spiritual experiences, not actual forces in the physical world.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 25th, 2015 at 7:16 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Karma_Yeshe said:

When people are becoming sick, it can be the fruit of past karma. The moment the fruit is there, the karma is ripend (if the sickness occurred due to karma). Then when a doctor cures the disease, the doctor may generate new karma for himself. All this has nothing to do with changing the karma of people.

Could you please show some Sutra that supports your idea of separating "spiritual experiences" and the "physical world"?

Astus wrote:

Then using supernatural powers to cure another should not have anything to do with manipulating karma either.

There are the five eyes, particularly the distinction between ordinary human and the divine eyes, and there is also the separation of nirmana- and sambhogakaya. I think it would be harder to find a scripture discussing literary tropes.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 25th, 2015 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, and Edit

Astus wrote:

Powers appear from/in dhyana. Although in SN 51.22 we are told that the Buddha reached the Brahma world with both a physical and mind-made body, the description of that achievement says that he merged his mind and body to make what is heavy (the four elements) into something light (the mind), thus rising up to the heavens is easy.

Taking the position that anyone who practises the right type of meditation can manipulate the physical world in a supernatural way raises numerous questions, beginning with the apparent lack of anyone who can actually perform them. Common excuses, like that the Buddha has forbidden it, or that it is a distraction for practitioners, seems to have no relevance in thousands of well known Buddhist stories where we can read about the Buddha, his disciples and later yogis do all sorts of wonderful things. But if you have some explanation for that, please share it.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 12:52 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, people are not properly cultivating dhyāna. But we have modern examples of people, like Dipa ma, who have. There are also a lack of experienced teachers, like Dipa ma's teacher.

And I still think it is a pity that you are going down the secular "buddhist" road.

Astus wrote:

There is no shortage of accounts of special powers both within and outside Buddhism. But I have not yet heard of any living teacher of some credibility to claim it for him/herself (e.g. Ajahn Sumedho, Hsing Yun, Chokyi Nyima), although they are often accepted as enlightened masters. Scientists cooperate with several meditation teachers to investigate its effects, but there is no record of siddhis.

I don't see how secular it is that you see. I have had this view of magic for a while now (see this from 2012: <http://eubuddhist.blogspot.in/2012/09/buddhist-magic.html>). And as I quote there, it is not without precedent that superpowers are not taken literally in Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Nonsense Astus, your post shows no such things, quite the opposite, it merely shows that you do not take such things literally, and this is normal for those who subscribe to physicalist view of reality. But then, we already know that Zen people are throwing away rebirth, tossing out karma, reducing the Dharma to mindfulness techniques to make us better programmers and managers. In fact, the departure of many Zen and Vipassana teachers from Buddhadharma has hastened rise of so called secular "Buddhism".

Astus wrote:

I don't subscribe to physicalism, never did in my life. I simply have a logical and an evidential problem with powers. The logical is that even in Buddhism there is no explanation for how the human body could multiply or levitate, how someone could read another's mind, and if such abilities were available for the Buddha, why did he not use them in various situations, like when certain disciples committed suicide as a result of meditating on the foulness of the body. The evidential I have already explained.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm said:

But there is such a explanation, you merely seem immune to understanding it.

Astus wrote:

And that explanation is what?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 5:34 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Jesse said:

Not sure about some other siddhis but telepathy is probably just making use of shared consciousness, collective unconscious or whatever. There is actually quite a bit of evidence for this.

I guess it really depends on what you consider "real". Is this human body anymore real than the dream body or any other body we happen to be conscious of? If we are to believe this physical body is all that we are then sure. Otherwise this body is no more real than any other.

Astus wrote:

Buddhism does not recognise such a shared/collective consciousness. Mind-streams are individual and karma is personal.

To me the question is not whether there are supernatural powers but rather what they are and how they work. What I have ruled out is that they cannot exist on the same level as everyday physical forces but they are spiritual, inner experiences. That is, we don't see people flying and walking through walls because they are physically impossible, nevertheless, one can have such experiences during meditation (and other altered states of consciousness). And people can and do experience such things, it is not uncommon among certain groups of individuals (not only Buddhists). One just has to look into some New Age books and communities where they practise magical arts. However, there is not even one man who can perform supernatural powers in front of a group of independent observers, and those who pretend to do so are eventually disproved as frauds.

So we can say that once we move beyond defining reality as purely material there is ample evidence for higher powers and abilities. My argument is just that abhijñānas are not like electricity and steam power but more like friendships and love.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 5:45 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Research kashina meditation.

Astus wrote:

The Visuddhimagga is probably the most thorough in discussing the supernormal powers among works available in English, however, while it does contain instructions for attaining them, it does not and cannot provide an explanation that would satisfy modern critics. It does not discuss the powers relation to physical laws, primarily because the author could not have viewed physics the same way as modern people. But, as stated in my previous post here, that is not to say that it's all nonsense, rather that such powers exist in a different context.

When you say that I have fallen to some physicalist view, it only confirms that modern physicalism knows nothing about spiritual powers. It also means that within the physical realm such powers do not exist. And that's why I say that they are spiritual and not physical. So, the counter-argument would be to say that it is actually possible within the physical world to transform matter according to one's wish (one to multiple, big to small, heavy to light, etc.), but then if that's not just an unfounded repetition of hearsay, one should provide reasons for how bones, flesh and blood can be changed in such a way.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 7:30 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Anders said:

The yogacarin in me would tend towards seeing many physical laws as being more akin to shared causal karmic "contracts" that we are more or less obliged to follow in our shared representation of "physical existence". Siddhis then being the ability to recognise this and how mutable they are.

Astus wrote:

Vasubandhu in the Vimsatika (verse 3-4) explains shared perception by similar karmic causes, but one mind does not restrict or influence the other, otherwise all beings would be stuck and one could not reach liberation in the human or heavenly realms.

"All these experiences are obtained inspite of the fact that in reality there are no infernal guards etc. [If, therefore, all the inhabitants of hells have similar experiences], it is owing to their own matured [seeds of] deeds of the same kind. Thus in places other than hells, too, the four factors, namely spatio-temporal determinations etc., should be understood as obtained."

(Kochumuttom, p 263)

"That is, even though in hell there are no real sentient beings that include such things as infernal guardians, still, because of the dominant power of the maturation of identical acts of those sentient beings, many [individual] mental continuities (scuntāna) in the same place, at the same time, all alike see infernal guardians, dogs, crows, iron mountains, etc., coming to them to inflict injury. As a result of this [example, I even though there are no real objects of perception apart from consciousness, still, the four concepts of restriction of place, etc., are demonstrated."

(Cook, p 393)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 7:37 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Ironically, you are actually supporting a positivist theory of reality, which holds that physical laws are inherently real and impose inherent limitations which cannot be overcome. This is why I claim you have succumbed to physicalism.

Astus wrote:

How do you account for the lack of people who can perform supernormal powers, even though there are many who study and practice such methods? In fact, all those people who just want meditation out of Buddhism should have some experiences with siddhis, not to mention a perhaps even larger number of people who directly aim for higher powers. On what reasons can one accept the existence of magic as a physical force?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 7:40 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Anders said:

That's not really true though. Minds influence each other all the time. This is for example called, in one guise among many potential ones, "social interaction".

Astus wrote:

That is indirect influence. But seeds don't wander from one mind to another or can be shared. That is, interaction happens through the five senses. Or not even that, as all experiences are the products of one's own mental stream.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm said:

As I already pointed out, very few people develop the level of concentration needed to develop the abhijñas, for example. But some people do.

Astus wrote:

Why are those few not known? The living ones. If they can control the four elements then they should come forward. It would definitely be a greater sensation than the discovery of radio waves. And it could definitely upset the current physicalist worldview. But again, there must be some excuses for them to stay hidden, like the Masters of the Ancient Wisdom in the Himalayas.

Once people like John Dee and Paracelsus were employed by European rulers as "court wizards", and East Asian imperial houses had their own army of Buddhist and Taoist magicians to fight evil forces and assure the continuation of the dynasty. However, gradually such people were removed and today governments have medical doctors and engineers as advisers and "miracle makers" who control the four elements. To me it seems that the old ways of ruling over matter have lost against natural science in every possible area. Once it was no problem for any religion to provide the required number of "element controllers" to rulers and village people alike. Actually, it would take only one proper master of elements to demonstrate that there are other ways to raise tons of rocks than heavy machinery. Why don't we see any?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 8:22 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Anders said:

Well yeah, but that doesn't contradict any of what I wrote. If any, it reinforces it. We communicate through the shared frequencies of our 'shared' (or 'similar') contracts of manifesting a shared/similar 'saha world' environment as a product of our karma. But since there is only so much influence 'I' can have on 'your' part of the tapestry, though one may be able to manifest siddhis for himself, he might not be able to manifest them for someone else, due to the karmic circumstances of that person.

The only unusual thing here is that it considers even physical laws subject to karmic laws.

Astus wrote:

Yes, that I can agree with. People see what they are inclined to see. Supposedly that is what scientific experiments are meant to filter out.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 8:40 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Who ever said that lifting tons of heavy rocks was possible for someone who had gained control over the four elements? Attaining control over the four elements does not mean omnipotence. You are venturing into lala land here. Why don't you study the matter and actually find out what these things actually mean.

On the other hand, when the Buddha levitated to the height of fourteen palm trees to prove a point, this means he had gained control over the four elements. And in fact he had forbid monks who had mastered siddhis to demonstrate them.

Astus wrote:

A few tons of rocks are nothing compared to the powers displayed openly for everyone in the Vimalakirti Sutra and others. Influencing the weather is significantly more difficult than lifting weight.

Vsm. quotes the Patisambhidamagga (p 378):

“What is success through the sciences? Masters of the sciences, having pronounced their scientific spells, travel through the air, and they show an elephant in space, in the sky ... and they show a manifold military array”

I.e. it is no problem to have even an army in the air.

In the Samannaphala Sutta (DN 2 / D i 77) the stock passage includes: "he even touches and strokes with his hand the sun and moon, mighty and powerful as they are". Although I think it is noteworthy that the process begins by the creation of the mind-made body that performs the supernormal powers.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 8:49 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Anders said:

Supposedly. What such a cosmology would suggest though, is that if the karmic world the scientists inhabit/manifest won't budge that far, then the siddhis can not manifest to them. Kuhn's paradigm shift elevated to cosmological/karmic principle.

In other words, a universe designed to reinforce the preconceptions you came here with make its true nature as obscure to you as possible (or at least, it looks like it does that). Now what does that remind me of.... Oh, right. Samsara!

Whoever said avija was a most powerful siddhi is not too far off to my mind.

Astus wrote:

That sounds a bit too restricting as it does not allow changes in one's view and experience. Although we could say that the area science can investigate is somewhat limited, it is a basic principle to be open for new discoveries and be willing to review previous assumptions. It is an attitude that old traditions don't really have and they don't leave space for disproving any established doctrine. That is, just because the majority fails to attain siddhis and enlightenment the truth of the Dharma is not negated, while if an experiment cannot be repeated then it loses credibility.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Anders said:

Rejecting or even reviewing physicalism would represent a momentous paradigm shift. That is not to be expected from science at its current stage.

I can understand why too. The physical sciences have been enormously successful in describing and predicting the world. It's not that irrational to expect that they should be able to explain everything.

Astus wrote:

It took a few hundred years for science to overtake the place of religions, but even today it's not 100%. What I meant regarding science's openness is its theoretical basis, not how it happens on the ground where money, politics and other social conventions are involved. But as you know, Buddhism managed to gain popularity in Asia not because of its magnificent philosophy but because of other features, and the same goes for other religions as well. Siddhis are among those few elements that were once considered beneficial for the ruling class and the society in general. And just as science gained a foothold because of its success in the areas of medicine, engineering, social control, economics and warfare, something similar was true for Buddhism and other religions. Buddhism today can spread because it promises help with mental problems like stress and such, not because people are interested in the true nature of reality and similar abstract issues. So, if there were actually supernormal powers that people could learn, it would definitely be a big thing. But it's just not happening. Occult studies are very much marginal today and generally ridiculed as fake and nonsense. And that attitude is not totally without any reason.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: Mahāyāna sūtras

Content:

Astus wrote:

East Asian Buddhism often uses the Five Periods system developed first in the Tiantai school as the explanation for various sutras. See https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tiantai#Five_Periods.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 5:37 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm said:

That is because you are blind to it. I already pointed out to twice a master who definitely exhibited the ability control the weather. At this point, I have to concluded you are just too locked into the "scientific" worldview to be open to any such experiences.

Astus wrote:

What you cited were stories of two deceased people who have supposedly had the ability to change the weather. Stories like that and even more fantastic we have a lot from all over the world. For instance, canonised Catholic saints have performed various miracles, and there are thousands of them, including many from the 20th century. And while in all practical matters the veracity of such stories are at least irrelevant and not much different from superhero films, if someone claims for whatever reason that powers like levitation and weather changing exist, it is not a strong argument to say that only those with faith can perceive supernormal events. Although saying that actually fits what we briefly discussed with Anders here that experiences of siddhis are a matter of mind set, and that matches what I have said from the beginning that powers are not physical but spiritual. Similarly, if I were to argue that there are pegasi, I would have to provide some evidence for that, and excusing the lack of proof would not make my argument any stronger, even if I called unbelievers materialists.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 10:46 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Apparently you don't read well, I cited twice one master who had this capacity, someone I knew personally, someone who I watched die, actually.

Astus wrote:

Yes, Ngagpa Yeshe Dorje. And there was Dipa Ma you brought up before as an example as well. But I did misread you. Still, no living weather controllers or others to show yet. By the way, if there are people who can control weather, they could save whole countries from a lot of suffering. There can be millions who starve because of bad weather.

I've found a talk by Sheng-yen on <http://chancenter.org/cmc/1986/05/12/supernormal-power/> where he says,

"If there were a mantra that could really accomplish such miraculous cures, there would be no need for doctors and hospitals. All we would need is the mantra. But even famous lamas in Tibet can fall prey to death and disease. There is no mantra that can defend against every sickness."

"Supernormal power can be used occasionally, but it should not be used too often. If you do use it, it should benefit others, and hopefully it will bring some benefit to you. Using this power should not place you in jeopardy. If it does, it means that you are transferring someone else's karma onto yourself. Most practitioners refrain from using their supernormal power."

"The sage performs activities just like ordinary people. But unlike ordinary people, the sage no longer has a sense of self. As a result, there is no karmic consequence. Karma follows ordinary people like a shadow. No karma follows the sage."

"The power of Buddhas and Bodhisattvas exists at all places and at all times, and far surpasses the power of other beings: Arahats, deities, and common people."

So, from that we can understand that:

1. Mantras don't necessarily work, at least not as some might expect.
2. Ordinary people can/should not use their powers because they take up others' karma.

3. Enlightened beings are free from karma, have unlimited powers and they are everywhere.

And that leads to the problems that

1. If the power of mantras/powers are limited, there couldn't be certain yogis and enlightened ones who can do almost anything, even creating entire worlds.
2. If it is possible to redirect people's karma, buddhas could save all without a problem and should not refrain from using their powers.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 28th, 2015 at 1:13 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Both you and Astus thus far have demonstrated only that you are basically materialists in your orientation towards these questions.

Astus wrote:

Isn't it you who claim that powers are physical phenomena, like in Harry Potter and Lord of the Rings? How is it anti-Dharma to ask for physical evidence then? And you call it materialism if I say that such powers are not physical manifestations, therefore cannot be observed in any ordinary, natural or scientific way, but rather spiritual. Is the reference to mental phenomena a materialist view?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 28th, 2015 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Gyurme Kundrol said:

If you show it off you attract people who just want to take it from you. In the same way, showing off Siddhi is likely to attract so called "students" who just want power.

Astus wrote:

It seems we should all feel sorry for film stars, celebrities, politicians, business people, bankers, and in general the rich and powerful. And if one lives in a rich country others will start to immigrate. Better be poor and unknown in a destitute state?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 28th, 2015 at 3:17 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm said:

As to your contention that these things are merely mental experiences, well, that does not save you from my charge that your orientation towards these questions is basically materialist. I am surprised in fact that you still accept literal rebirth, or is rebirth just another "spiritual experience", like recall of past lives, knowing the minds of others, seeing into deva realms and so on and so forth?

Astus wrote:

My orientation towards the topic of supernatural powers is materialist because the idea that they manifest within the material realm requires that. Natural science is what analyses matter, so physical phenomena falls within that area of study. Rebirth is the continuation of the mind-stream, and since mind is non-physical it is out of scope for material investigation. And for more than a hundred years experts of material sciences were unable to find any sound basis for supernormal powers, and not one person could actually https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/List_of_prizes_for_evidence_of_the_paranormal anything paranormal so far, I cannot see any basis for accepting such claims. It is another matter that even if there were such powers they would have nothing to do with the path of liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 8:00 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Dechen Norbu said:

And mind doesn't manifest within the material realm? Really? How do you move an arm by will then?

Malcolm said:

It follows then that since rebirth manifests in the material realm, you therefore must also come up with an explanation for it according to natural science. ... The mind clearly interacts with matter every time rebirth occurs. How is this possible? How can a nonmaterial entity interact with a material one?

Astus wrote:

The material realm is what is within the experience of the five senses. Can the mind be seen, heard, smelt, tasted or touched? Does it have a form, a colour, a spatial or temporal existence? It does not. How could then we say it manifests as a physical object? On the connection between mind and matter, there are the 18 dhatus, abhidharma literature and yogacara works. That is, the four elements are solidity/extension, cohesion/fluidity, heat and motion, so they are what is experienced by consciousness and not a separate realm. Nevertheless, various experiences are categorised differently, thus the distinction between name and form, feeling and concept, etc. In other words, instead of choosing either that body and mind are one or two, the Buddha taught the five aggregates.

What various sources agree on is that powers are samadhi (Kosa, p 1168) and they are within the rupadhyanas:

"one enters into the fifth fine-material-sphere jhana occurring by way of the direct knowledge with respect to such objects as visible forms, etc."
(Comprehensive Manual of Abhidhamma, p 343)

"The first five supernormal knowledges exist in the Four Dhyanas, that is to say, they are obtained by an ascetic in any of these Dhyanas."
(Abhidharmakosabhasyam, vol 4, p 1159)

And such powers' production are in the mental realm:

"What is matter included in the sphere of mental objects [dharmadhatu]? It is of five kinds: ... [5] that which is produced by the supernormal powers."
(Abhidharmasamuccaya, p 6)

However, it is stated that the powers' spheres are where they are developed and below that (Kosa, p 1161), that is, all can manifest within the kamadhatu. It is also said that powers can be obtained not only through meditation but other means like mantras and plants (Kosa, p 1176; MPPS 1, p 312).

Since those with power can create illusory beings and material objects (Kosa, p 1168-1173), it could be considered as actual magical power just as it is commonly understood. Then it raises a number of problems nobody so far has cared to answer. We don't even have to go as far as the problem raised at the beginning of the Vimalakirti Sutra regarding the buddha-lands - i.e., for instance Sukhavati is free from all suffering, and buddhas all possess powers in an unlimited fashion, therefore there should be no pain in this world either - but just consider stories where if Shakyamuni had used his supernormal senses and abilities the whole thing could not have happened (see e.g. this essay: "<https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/buddha-omniscience.pdf>"). That's why regarding superpowers I take the position presented in the Vimalakirti Sutra, that it depends on one's perception, and there is no such power that could be demonstrated for everyone, thus my distinction between physical and spiritual powers.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm said:

None of which really explain from a scientific point of view how this mysterious interaction between mind and body works.

Astus wrote:

Scientifically there are no non-physical objects to investigate or establish a connection with. Otherwise the duality of mind and body in Buddhism is only a conventional term as all phenomena are within the experiential realm and distinguished as form and names as a way to talk about categories of experiences. If we begin to analyse such conventions in Buddhism then we gradually end up with mind-only and emptiness.

Malcolm said:

The four elements are clearly properties of material entities.

Astus wrote:

They are called material entities because they exhibit such properties and are experienced with the first five consciousnesses. Supposing a noumenal substance, independent object, beyond the phenomenal level is either a conventional approach or a substantialist philosophy.

Malcolm said:

You have not addressed my objection in the slightest, you have not explained to us how it is that consciousness, which is a non-material entity, functions through the sense organs via patches of atoms located on the various physical structures in their respective locations such as the eye, and so on.

Astus wrote:

Such distinctions as mind and matter are only nominal, thus establishing a connection between them is unnecessary. They form a single realm of experience.

Malcolm said:

Your contention however was that such things as levitation, manomayakāyas, and so on were simply subjective experiences of adepts, were not part of physical reality, and solely the domain of fantasy — even though of course Buddha, and other mahasiddhas displayed these miraculous events to others present.

Astus wrote:

Yes, supernormal phenomena are not part of our everyday physical reality, not part of what is commonly called physical - the area of study of physics - and cannot be explained with physical laws. They can happen only if conceived within a subjective experiential realm where one doesn't have to account for the conservation of mass and energy (small becomes big, one becomes many, etc.). In other words, the mechanism of supernormal powers cannot be logically described within the confines of the general laws of this physical reality.

But if you say that buddhas and ordinary beings as well can perform such abilities in the common physical world, then - as referred to before - there are a number of questions not yet answered, beginning with the first post of this thread.

Regarding this criticism that modern Zen is more and more materialist, in Korean Zen both Seung Sahn and Daehaeng taught about a stage where people experience supernormal powers, so it is not necessarily unknown for practitioners.

Malcolm said:

But despite all these things, you have not provided any reason at all that suggests that your acceptance of rebirth is rational and your rejection of iddhi-patis and so on is also rational. Your acceptance of former is actually irrational because you reject the latter.

Astus wrote:

I do not reject supernormal powers. What I find problematic is the idea that they exist within the physical context. But instead of answering for the questions and problems pertaining to the view that they manifest as ordinary physical phenomena, there are only evasive responses and irrelevant comments.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: The Gelug/Kagyu Tradition Of Mahamudra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Not sure what part you mean.

For instance http://www.berzinarchives.com/web/en/archives/e-books/published_books/gelug_kagyu_mahamudra/pt3/mm_11.html:

"While in a state of total absorption as before, and, with a tiny (portion of) awareness, like a tiny fish flashing about in a lucid pond and not disturbing it, intelligently inspect the self nature of the individual who is the meditator."

Absorption is just the samatha/calming part.

And then,

"When you search and, like that, cannot find even a mere atom of a total absorption, someone totally absorbed, and so on, then cultivate absorbed concentration on space-like (voidness), single pointedly without any wandering."

This is single-pointed meditation on emptiness.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 11:25 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Wait, mass and energy are real? They impose hard, factual limitations? How you can escape the charge of substantialism by making this assertion?

Astus wrote:

Causality is still accepted as the way phenomena function, isn't it? It's not just anything goes and things appear out of nothing.

Malcolm said:

The common physical world is either substantially real or it is not. If it is not, then there should be no problem accepting such things as iddhi-patis even if they do not normally conform to conventional expectations of 20th century humans. There are certainly plenty of anecdotal evidence of yogis who leave their footprints and handprints in rocks and so on in the Himalayas and certainly plenty of people, even westerners who have observed such events. It is rank substantialism to claim that such events are impossible because some imputed "general laws of this physical reality."

Astus wrote:

There is no need for a substantial reality as it is against causality. And while even causes and conditions are nominal and conventional, without that there is no phenomena to talk about at all. True, plenty of anecdotal evidence, and there is no need to go far back in history or to exotic countries for those. But the problem is how such stories of supernatural events are explained within a systematic order.

Malcolm said:

Right, and you have this problem because you have realist tendencies, not unlike Sarvastivadins. The abhijñās are one thing, of course these are mental abilities, the iddhi-pattis/siddhis are something else again, they are not just mental abilities, though they come from having developed powers over the mind, having done so, they lend the ability to have power over matter, which according what you state above, is either a convention or mind-only.

Astus wrote:

You may call it a realist tendency to think that whatever occurs requires appropriate causes and conditions. Natural sciences study the way matter works, what conditions bring about what results. For something to float there needs to be a force to lift it up or it has to be lighter than air. Instructions to learn levitation say that one has to make the body light - I guess they had no idea of how animals can actually fly - however, there is no explanation or even the question where the lost weight/mass goes from the body. And that is why I have mentioned the principle of mass conservation.

On the other hand, if we take the position of considering the world as a purely mental realm of experience that is regulated only by the conditioning of the mind, it cannot be allowed for one mind to manipulate another one, otherwise we face the problem of buddhas not saving all beings and the confusion of the law of karma. Since minds cannot manipulate other minds, one man's experience is only his and not shared by others, as it exists exclusively within that stream of consciousness. This is why I say that only here can supernatural powers occur.

That is, within the realist/materialist view there is no place for magic. Only in the realm of subjective experience.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, so finally you admit it, your view is realist and materialist, as I have been maintaining for some time.

As far as your contention goes that minds cannot influence other minds, this is merely an assertion on your part, and not something you have proven.

Astus wrote:

As WeiHan pointed out, I don't reject supernatural powers. But I reject being a materialist.

If one mind can control another, how come buddhas cannot make everyone enlightened? Then one person could make another think (and feel, and do) whatever that one wants, rendering the other a mere puppet.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

WeiHan said:

They are self contradictory unless you mean you don't reject people who claim that they witness supernormal powers as long as they agree that it is only their own imagination.

Astus wrote:

How could I reject anyone's experience? It is the interpretation of that experience that can be debated.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm said:

You put too much faith in the delusion known as "relative truth," Astus.

Astus wrote:

Are you on the position that ultimate truth contradicts and/or negates the relative? That dependent origination is something else than emptiness?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 12:20 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

WeiHan said:

You said you reject materialist. Why so? Because everything is ultimately experience by mind?

Astus wrote:

Experience itself happens in the mind / it is the mind itself. Materialism is the idea that there is an independent realm of objects beyond/behind experience.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 12:23 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm said:

I said influence, you said control, there is a world of difference between these two words.

Astus wrote:

What form of influence do you mean?

Mental influence was already discussed a bit in this thread

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=275349#p275349>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Anything that dependently originates that is said to be empty, it is true.

But this does not mean that when someone has the ability control the element of air, etc., they cannot fly.

Astus wrote:

In what context do you mean controlling the air element and flying? Like someone can produce a wind strong enough to lift a human body? Produce it from where and how?

Malcolm said:

For example, the traces in the minds of sentient beings are sufficiently strong that they can influence the minds of others in terms of what appearances they see.

Astus wrote:

Is there then a direct contact between two minds? Like, two people have a single thought?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, an idea that you subscribe to by insisting that there are immutable physical laws.

Astus wrote:

Isn't karma immutable?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 4:43 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

WeiHan said:

Materialist also agrees that it is the mind that experiences. So I don't see why you reject them . What is the difference between your view and theirs?

You stated that there is a set of real physical laws that govern the physical world. that means that you are implying that this physical world (realm of objects) has an independent real inexistence of its own but then you reject it yourselves. This is self contradicting.

Astus wrote:

Materialism bases mind within the material world, I say that mind is non-physical and not derived from matter.

The physical world works on its own way and it can be observed that it is not without logic, that way certain laws can be established that can predict what happens within certain conditions. Similarly, Buddhism describes areas that are relevant for liberation and how that can happen. If there was no order whatsoever, then the physical and the mental realm were both unpredictable, and not only could we not tell if we take the same route as before that we end up at the same place as before, but there could be no path of liberation either, as it'd all be random. Just as mind has its patterns and chains of causes and effects, so does the physical world. While theoretically it is possible to adhere to various views on what comes from what, in almost every interpretation one must account for causality. In other words, without dependent origination there is no sensible view.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 4:51 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Karma is unerring, but it is not immutable.

Astus wrote:

Past actions cannot be changed. The effects of those actions, as they are present as causes, need to happen once the conditions are there. The difference is in how a person takes those results, with what kind of mind, so the fruits can be significantly milder or stronger. But to say that there are causes without effects is problematic. Also, as noted by Ayu, the question is if one being can change another's karma.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 7:50 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

WeiHan said:

But then, since there are also laws that must be obeyed in the mind realm, how did the Buddha then make the supernormal phenomena happens in some people mind but not others?

Astus wrote:

People experience what they are conditioned to experience. Even today numerous teachers, preachers, gurus and such are perceived by their followers as miracle makers.

"There is now a man in Korea who has proclaimed himself as Christ. Many people believe in him. After he washes his face and his feet, they take the water and drink it as medicine. And indeed, their sicknesses are miraculously cured. But it is their minds that are curing their bodies. They believe in this man so completely that he can do miracles. If they didn't believe, he wouldn't be able to do miracles. In the same way, when a boy and girl are in love, the first time they kiss, their lips are filled with magical energy. This man can touch his followers and it is as if his fingers were flowing with electricity. There are many religious leaders like this in India."

(Seung Sahn: Dropping Ashes on the Buddha, p 100)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

kirtu said:

Even so karma can be purified as long as it hasn't ripened. This is also true from a sutric perspective.

Astus wrote:

Not taking up a separate topic (i.e. what is purification?), the question is whether it can be purified by others or is it something the owner has to manage?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 1st, 2015 at 6:50 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

WeiHan said:

However, the Buddha's teaching held that whatever outer physical environment we experienced is also a result of our karma (which is somewhat a mind thing). ... If the Buddha can influence the mind of certain people so that he seem to witness a supernormal phenomena from his perspective in the outer world. It is almost the same as saying that the Buddha can influence change in the physical law since whatever physical laws that the world obeys depend on our mind and karma (as for the example of hell and heaven which I given).

Astus wrote:

And we arrive at the problem that if the Buddha can change others' karma then he can liberate them as well by the same power. Since nothing like that happened, and the whole point of the teaching is that everyone has to accomplish it on one's own, changing others' karma is not possible.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 1st, 2015 at 6:53 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Gyurme Kundrol said:

The process can be accelerated by others in peaceful or wrathful ways. However without some effort on the owners part, the effects are temporary since karma will keep being created and strengthened if the person doesnt realize emptiness, practice, and so forth.

Astus wrote:

If it is possible once to manipulate others' karma, it is always possible.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 1st, 2015 at 8:29 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm said:

If the first were true, the second would not necessarily follow since liberation is freedom from afflictions, not freedom from karmavipaka.

In any case the Buddha has already instructed is that he cannot remove our suffering, nor can he hand us liberation, he can only instruct.

Astus wrote:

It is within the realm of action and result to walk the path of liberation. So, buddhas could put everyone on the way to nirvana, practically making everyone noble beings. It's then just a matter of time for everyone to reach total freedom. But as you cited, buddhas only show the way.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 1st, 2015 at 8:39 PM

Title: Re: The Gelug/Kagyü Tradition Of Mahamudra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Mahamudra can use both calming and insight. Here are some instructions from the 9th Karmapa:

http://www.berzinarchives.com/web/en/archives/advanced/mahamudra/karma_kagyu_mm/mahamudra_eliminating_darkness/part_2.html. However, it does not use the dhyana system as it exists in Theravada.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 1st, 2015 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: What beliefs are prerequisite for practicing Zen?

Content:

Astus wrote:

1. Essentials for Practice

The quoted "prerequisites/essentials" are actually for kanhua/kanhwa/kanna zen where they focus on the huatou or koan.

There is a short translation from Xuyun:

http://hsuyun.budismo.net/en/dharma/chan_sessions1.html. But it is in http://hsuyun.budismo.net/en/dharma/chan_sessions2.html where you get an even shorter summary: (1) Firm belief in the (law of) causality (2) Strict observance of the rules of discipline (commandment) (3) A firm faith (4) Adoption of the method of training.

The difficult question lies in first defining what is meant by zen practice. The short answer could be that the only prerequisite is bodhicitta. But that actually covers the general elements like taking refuge, observing precepts, respecting the teachings and the teachers, renouncing samsara, aiming for buddhahood, having compassion for all beings, avoiding evil actions, and so on. Another, perhaps even simpler prerequisite could be belief in buddha-nature. Still, it could be argued that all those are just unnecessary traps and there are no prerequisites on a sudden path. At the same time, like Jinul explains it, the prerequisite is sudden enlightenment, then it is followed by gradual cultivation.

2. Progression of Beliefs

Zen - again, depending on how it is understood - is not about any set of doctrines but seeing the nature of mind. So, either there is already a basic Mahayana set of values and doctrines, or one just goes straight to buddhahood. There are some teachers who talk about levels of practice, stages that people may go through, but that is not about believing this or that, although it could be said that the levels are actually different forms of incorrect views (where the correct view is no view). For instance, Zongmi mentioned the five dhyanas, Baizhang discussed the three levels of non-attachement, Linji the four relations/types of host and guest, Dongshan the five ranks, and so on.

3. Believing in the Sutras

What you mention as reinterpretation of the scriptures, that is the original zen way. You can find it from the early times, just look into Shenxiu's teachings. It does not mean questioning the content and doubting its validity. It is about bringing people back from fantasising about flying arhats and transforming dragons to the actual practice and investigating what their own mind is. It is about putting aside pointless debates and abstract theories and instead highlighting the truly important matter of birth and death. It is stated in the well known slogan: not relying on words and letters, pointing directly to the mind. That's why Bodhidharma went from India to China. There is no negation or denial of any established teaching, rather it is showing the true and essential meaning of them.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 1st, 2015 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: What beliefs are prerequisite for practicing Zen?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Lotus Sutra is quoted mainly because of how the dragon girl transformed to a buddha as an example of sudden enlightenment. At least in earlier Chan texts. Otherwise it is not specifically Zen but rather general Mahayana. On the other hand, the Lankavatara Sutra has more a legendary value than as an actual source of teachings, since hardly anyone quotes from it or refers to it. Texts like the Vajrasamadhi Sutra, Surangama Sutra, Perfect Enlightenment Sutra are all "Chan sutras", that is, they contain teachings that are directly found in Chan. The Diamond Sutra is probably the most important of all, and it has many commentaries on it by Chan masters.

Just found this one: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Zen_and_Sutras

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 2nd, 2015 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

WeiHan said:

But we can also see at a different angle. If how the external world sentient beings lived in depends on their karma, then there isn't any objective physical laws. It becomes unnecessary to differentiate that supernormal phenomena can only happened in mind realm but not in physical realm since afterall physical realm is a reflection of what is in the mind. In other words, you don't have to say that Buddha can only manifest supernormal abilities in some beings mind stream and not in the physical realm because there are fixed physical laws (this is your previous position), we just have to say

"some beings have the karma to see Buddha manifesting supernormal abilities while others don't have the karma.

Astus wrote:

Yes, some beings perceive one thing, others perceive something else. The problem with supernatural occurrences within the physical realm was raised regarding the original topic of this thread. And there I also wrote that powers exist on the spiritual level. If we say that the world is what we perceive it to be, that it is formed and governed by our mind, then that is the spiritual realm.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 2nd, 2015 at 4:48 AM

Title: Re: What beliefs are prerequisite for practicing Zen?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here is what Korean monastics have to study before full ordination:

<http://chungamsa.org/eng/02/03.asp>. Special emphasis is on: Diamond Sutra, Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment, Awakening of Mahayana Faith, Surangama Sutra, Avatamsaka Sutra. More information on the system in general:

<http://phathoc.net//PrintView.aspx?Language=en&ID=5E5418>.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 2nd, 2015 at 4:59 PM

Title: Re: What beliefs are prerequisite for practicing Zen?

Content:

Matylda said:

Thank you for these links... however this is not traditional zen education I guess, since it was made in the 80's? and the content is unusual for zen studies I guess.. the so called chan sutras by the way are only for instruction purpose.... they are not this what may be considered to be a definitive meaning which had some importance in zen in the context of sutras only, but not absolute importance. In zen most important teachings were always zen teachings..

Astus wrote:

Different traditions have different approaches. Japanese Buddhism is not the same as the others. For instance, the Surangama Sutra has been very important in Chinese Buddhism at least since the 16th century, or even before that. The Korean monastic curriculum reflects the most important works there, and while the concept of a compulsory seminary for novices is a new thing, the content is traditional, that is, a result of centuries of development.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 2nd, 2015 at 8:46 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Which position still leaves you a realist, believing that there are inherently existing natural laws that govern physical phenomena. In other words, you accept that physical phenomena exist by virtue of intrinsic characteristics, a common tenet among Hināyāna schools.

Astus wrote:

I only make a difference between various interpretations. If we say there is a shared physical world then there are certain rules. If we say that perception is the reality we have, then independent laws are nonsense.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 2nd, 2015 at 9:39 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Now you are squirming, having boldly declared no such phenomena as siddhis or ṛddhi-patti can exist.

Astus wrote:

From the very beginning in this thread I have been saying that they cannot exist in the physical world but as spiritual experiences. Since in Buddhism the world is a product of one's mental conditioning and exists as a flow of personal experience, it is the second category (spiritual), thus there are powers.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 3rd, 2015 at 3:43 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

WeiHan said:

Previously, you agree that rebirth is a phenomena of the physical world.

Astus wrote:

No, I did not. See <http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=275674#p275674>: "Rebirth is the continuation of the mind-stream, and since mind is non-physical it is out of scope for material investigation."

WeiHan said:

As I said, adding a new category (i.e. spiritual) which requires much explanation itself but does not add to our understanding of the phenomena is actually quite redundant.

Astus wrote:

Don't we normally talk about "body and mind"? As Daehaeng Sunim used to say, there is the fifty percent seen and the fifty percent unseen (e.g.: No River to Cross, chapter 3:

Mind and Science). Conventionally we separate things to material and immaterial, mundane and spiritual, etc. I think the difficulty in making sense of supernormal phenomena lies in thinking about it in the wrong context, i.e. as material and mundane, and that is what makes it incredible. Or for those who just believe in the supernatural while still taking the physical realm as the primary one tend to mystify it to the extreme where only special beings can actually perform and experience them, while throughout the Buddhist (and other) tradition it has been fairly common, leading to such views that we are in a degenerate era and such.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 3rd, 2015 at 4:34 PM

Title: Re: tantric sex real or form of abuse?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Abuse can happen regardless of calling it tantric or anything else. As for the validity of using sex for practice, I don't see it as a problem in and of itself. Although Vajrayana provides a formalised version, practically any Buddhist in a relationship can reflect on and use sex for developing virtuous qualities and improving one's insight into reality. Same with any other everyday thing. Once one has internalised the Buddha's teachings they are there as part of one's personality in every decision and action.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 3rd, 2015 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: tantric sex real or form of abuse?

Content:

smcj said:

According to him the only time it is ever appropriate is for extremely advanced yogis to take them over the last hurdle to full enlightenment. That scenario is of course extremely rare.

Astus wrote:

Interestingly, Tilopa has a different view on who should utilise karmamudra:

"When your mind is less acute and does not truly rest,
Work the essentials of energy and bring out the vitality of awareness.
Using gazes and techniques to take hold of mind
Train awareness until it does truly rest.
When you practice with a sexual partner, empty bliss awareness arises.
The balancing of method and wisdom transforms energy.
Let it descend gently, collect it, draw it back up,
Return it to its place, and let it saturate your body.
When you are free from longing and desire, empty bliss awareness arises."
(<http://www.unfetteredmind.org/pith-instructions-on-mahamudra/0/>, 26-27)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 4th, 2015 at 5:38 PM

Title: Re: tantric sex real or form of abuse?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are two general reasons why not to disclose one's personal practice openly to everyone: 1. it is personal; 2. leaves too much for misinterpretation. Again, while Vajrayana has a specific instruction for this in a formal way, the same holds true for every other school. At the same time, if one is actually interested in what karmamudra and other methods are, there are a couple of books to look into (one already suggested here), and it is also possible to approach individual teachers and practitioners. So, I would say it is not really secret, it's just somewhat similar to the difference between discussing sex in general and your experiences from last night.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 4th, 2015 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: What beliefs are prerequisite for practicing Zen?

Content:

Matylda said:

As for chan sutras, one more thing, they were not yet popular in Tang or Sung dynasties, if they were, for sure there would be clear transmission of those texts within zen lineages to Japan. But it did not happen for over 300 years of intensive zen relation between China and Japan. They became more popular during Ming dynasty when in China zen was in decline and became more syncretic religion with strong pure land influence and other elements, which was strongly opposed before. And in fact they have hardly any connection to zen, though they may be used as some means of education.

Astus wrote:

The Perfect Enlightenment Sutra was commented on by Zongmi (780–841). Wonhyo (617–686) commented the Vajrasamadhi Sutra. The Surangama Sutra gained popularity in the Ming Dynasty because of Hanshan Deqing and his fellows, so in Japan the Obaku school should favour it, for instance Tetsugen Doko did lecture on it. Hakuin also taught it in 1756, and Torei makes reference to the sutra in his Inexhaustable Lamp.

As for the supposed decline of Zen during the Ming era, it is quite the opposite, there was actually a great renaissance of Chan (see e.g. <https://books.google.hu/books?id=Y7sueo8jsYwC>). One of the effects of that was the appearance of the Obaku school in Japan.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 6th, 2015 at 5:44 PM

Title: Re: Is Vajrayana the best Buddhist sect for modern westerner

Content:

Astus wrote:

Unlike other Buddhist cultures, Tibetans were practically forced to come out from their homeland, and as an exiled people what they have to offer (in exchange for material support) is sharing their religious and cultural heritage. Theravada and Japanese Zen have been modernised during the 19th century and they are more straightforward without all the "cultural baggage". Vajrayana is just catching up with Dzogchen being removed from preliminaries and other rituals to turn into another form of mindfulness practice.

It is a misrepresentation to say that Vajrayana is the party bus of Buddhism. Also, religious art exists everywhere in Buddhism, so again its nothing extraordinary in Tibetan Buddhism. As for products, just search for "zen" in any web shop.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 6th, 2015 at 6:26 PM

Title: Re: Is Vajrayana the best Buddhist sect for modern westerner

Content:

Astus wrote:

Every Buddhist tradition has a larger lay community. If any, then Japanese Buddhism consists almost exclusively of family people, and of the Japanese schools the Pure Land traditions are particularly for householders.

On Chan and lay life, see <http://wenshuchan-online.weebly.com/master-jing-hui---dharma-words.html> from Ven. Jinghui:

"In reality it is the mind that decides whether the spiritual centre is continuously present, and which draws a distinction between worldly affairs and Buddhist practice in temples. In this deluded state the mind prefers the temple life and disdains the ordinary life. People are continuously worrying about what practice method they should use, or how much time per day should be spent practicing. ... It seems realistic that having children prevents the Dharma from being practiced. You need to gain good experience. If you believe that Buddhism can not be practiced in everyday life, then it will seem that the Dharma can not be applied in ordinary situations. This is incorrect. It is important to expertly cultivate Unified Practice Samadhi when walking, standing, sitting and lying down, and then the mind will be unified in purity. Then all situations become the Bodhimandala without exception, this is the true meaning and practice of Unified Practice Samadhi."

That is in line with the Platform Sutra, chapter 4:

The master said, "Good friends, if you wish to cultivate this practice, you may do so either as a householder or in a monastery. Householders who are able to practice this are like those persons of the East whose minds [harbor] good. Those in the monastery who do not cultivate it are like those people of the West whose minds [harbor] evil. It is only that the mind should be pure—then it is the Western [Paradise] of the self-nature!"

Theravada also has a substantial lay community, and lay people are not excluded from achieving enlightenment. Just consider the many Vipassana communities.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 7th, 2015 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: Vajrayāna/Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

It might be so that Dzogchen is an integral part of Vajrayana and the 9th vehicle. My statement that it's moving to a generic mindfulness practice is not a reflection on the teachings in the scriptures but how it appears to me among some who follow the Great Perfection, both on- and offline. That is, when it is simplified to the point of "just stay in the natural state". I assume you have noticed this trend as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 8th, 2015 at 6:44 PM

Title: Re: Zen vs Nichiren Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

What is the question?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 9th, 2015 at 5:29 PM

Title: Re: Need help in guidance to find my monastic school

Content:

Astus wrote:

As Dan said, Theravada seems like the most direct choice. They also have a fairly strong presence in Western countries. You should also be aware that every monastery has its own style and aura, so it's less the organisation/church you should consider (unless it's a very centralised one) but the individual places and the residents there. In most cases monasteries are quite independent.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 10th, 2015 at 2:40 AM

Title: Re: Need help in guidance to find my monastic school

Content:

Astus wrote:

Becoming a monastic in any ordination lineage does not mean commitment to a specific school or doctrine. Monastics themselves move around to other places where they can and study what they like. Normally it is not a problem if you are interested in all sorts of Buddhist teachings and practices. But, it all depends on the actual community, so you should check them out one by one.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 11th, 2015 at 8:23 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Karma is completely individual. It means the separate mind-streams are self-generating and self-contained. It is a series of causes and conditions. At the same time, there is no "self" in the sense that the mind-stream is not a fixed permanent entity but a flow of mental states. That does not mean the mind-stream can somehow mix with others or totally dissolve. So, yes, the mind is individual. Just as our body is individual, although we consume food every day and cells constantly reproduce.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 12th, 2015 at 4:08 AM

Title: Re: Zen equivalent of Rigpa

Content:

Astus wrote:

Depends on what and how you define rigpa. If we go with the actual meaning, that is, knowing (vidya), then a similar Zen word with relation to the nature of mind, it is zhi/chi (知) as used in the Heze lineage. See this essay:

<http://terebess.hu/zen/mesterek/Tsung-Mi-and-the-Single-Word-Awareness.pdf>.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 13th, 2015 at 3:34 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jesse said:

If mind is entirely self contained how do you explain other people's presences? They also exist in your mind. Your mind to begin with only exists by contrast of other.

The propagation of memes, personality traits we adopt and other forms of knowledge we share. The mind is not self contained. It is interdependent.

Astus wrote:

Look into the first few stanza's of Vasubandhu's Vimsatika (Twenty Verses on Consciousness Only) where he argues against the idea that there must be external references. The Lankavatara Sutra (e.g. 3.64) as well confirms that all perceptions are mental discrimination without real objects.

This idea of universal substrate is against interdependence and no different from views ascertaining a creator god, a view that has been refuted from the beginning in Buddhism. Buddhas don't have access to others' minds either, or they could just turn beings into enlightened ones that way. Rather, we are responsible for our own actions and no external force or being can save us from the consequences. We are the ones creating our own hell and heaven. To say that ultimately there is some common ground is nothing but mere fantasising without any logical or experiential basis.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 13th, 2015 at 9:37 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

Could you explain your logic to such a comment? Think of it more like overlapping concentric circles, where a buddha overlaps or has access to all circles.

Additionally, how can you describe a buddha of being all knowing or also as the Avatamsaka Sutra states...

...

They are able to shake infinite worlds in the ten directions by spiritual powers; their minds are broad, being equal to the cosmos. They know various explanations of truth, they know how many sentient beings there are, they know the differences among sentient beings, they know the birth of suffering, they know the extinction of suffering; while knowing all acts are like reflected images, they carry out the deeds of bodhisattvas. They sever the root of all subjection to birth.

Astus wrote:

If there were a universal ground, all things would come from that ground and it would be without a cause and would not depend on anything. As such an independent thing, it could not serve as a cause for anything else, and its very existence could not be possible either, since nothing occurs without a cause. More on the refutation of erroneous views of causality you may look into many madhyamaka teachings, like this one: <http://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/mipham/four-great-logical-arguments>.

That buddhas don't have control over others' minds, it comes from the fact that we are not all liberated. What your quote says does not touch on the ability to manipulate beings. In fact, the quote mainly talks about the fact that buddhas are those who know the four noble truths and that all phenomena are empty.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 13th, 2015 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

Where and why would it be without a cause and would not depend on anything? I have made no such statement and the statement definitely does not follow logically. Did you not notice my overlapping concentric circles example?

On effecting other beings... Have you never felt your guru? Never felt the difference of group meditation? Also, why do you think there are all of stories of Buddha telling people to just stay with him for a year before he would answer any questions and by the end of it no one ever has a question? Finally, in your tradition is there no concept of a "buddha field"?

Astus wrote:

If it is a universal ground of all beings it doesn't have a cause, otherwise it would not be the final basis of everything.

The psychology of guru devotion and being in a group are fairly known phenomena. As for the Buddha not answering people's questions, I don't know what stories you mean. The concept of buddha-field is known everywhere in Mahayana, and as the Vimalakirti Sutra says, it depends on one's own mind's purity whether one sees it or not.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 13th, 2015 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

I will take that response to mean that you have never actually experienced such a connection. How about feeling any energy flow (or chakra) while doing meditation/practices?

Astus wrote:

It's not a question of experience but of interpretation. It can very well happen that while we feel something similar, you take it to be some energy flow and I take it to be a bodily function or an emotion.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here is a quote from Huangbo on Transmission of the Mind with the Mind as stated in the famous Essentials of the Transmission of Mind (Zen Texts, BDK Edition, p 36, tr. McRae):

The master said: To not attain a single dharma is called the transmission of the mind. If you comprehend this mind, then there is no mind and no dharma.

[The questioner] said: If there is no mind and no dharma, why do you call it a transmission?

The master said: You have heard me say "transmission of the mind" and have taken it that there is something that can be attained. It is for this reason that the patriarch said, “When one recognizes the mind-nature, it should be called inconceivable. Clearly and distinctly without anything that is attained, when one attains it one does not speak of it as understanding.” If I taught this to you how would you be able to understand it?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 3:09 PM

Title: Re: Non-Abiding Awareness

Content:

dgomez said:

What is the difference between "non abidance", " choiceless awareness", and "mindfulness"?

Astus wrote:

It depends on the context, as always.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 3:18 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Astus wrote:

A story by Ven. Shengyan (<http://chancenter.org/cmc/1985/05/15/esoteric-and-exoteric-buddhism/>):

In Taiwan, I have a disciple who has been practicing with me for quite sometime. He has a good command of English, so when a certain Tibetan rinpoche was scheduled to lecture, he was asked to translate. He was very nervous. He had never practiced Tantra, and was afraid that he wouldn't understand what the rinpoche said. In a quandary, he finally decided that if he didn't understand, it was the rinpoche's responsibility to make him understand. With this thought he went to sleep. The rinpoche came to him in a dream, placed his hand on the disciple's head, and said, "You don't have to be nervous. You will understand everything I say tomorrow. You don't have to worry." He had a wonderful feeling when the rinpoche touched him. The next morning it was the rinpoche who woke him up. My disciple immediately prostrated to the rinpoche and thanked him for entering his dream. Curious, the rinpoche asked, "What happened last night?" The disciple told him, and after a few more questions from the rinpoche, he concluded that it might not have been the rinpoche but a "yidam," a Dharma protector, who came to him.

Later I asked him if he had ever dreamed of me. He said, "Yes, indeed, many times." Then I asked if he thought that it was me who had entered his dreams. He said, "No, because Shih-fu doesn't have a yidam." So then I said to him, "O.K., I will go and find myself a yidam so that the next time you dream of me, you will be sure that it is my yidam that is entering your dream." My disciple objected, "But in Ch'an there is no such thing as a yidam."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: Non-Abiding Awareness

Content:

dgomez said:

It seems to me that non dwelling is included in choiceless awareness and choiceless awareness is the same as mindfulness and they involve the non dual watching of sensations - including thoughts - that arises.

Astus wrote:

One should not dwell on non-dwelling.

http://buddhiststudies.berkeley.edu/people/faculty/sharf/documents/Sharf_Mindfulness%20and%20Mindlessness.pdf

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=c6Avs5iwACs>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 9:27 PM

Title: Re: Non-Abiding Awareness

Content:

srivijaya said:

Nice thread Astus. Do your sources have anything to say about non-abiding awareness during sleep?

Astus wrote:

It is no different from when awake.

"If you stay awake, you stay awake. If you sleep, you sleep. When you sleep, you sleep in the same Buddha-mind you were awake in. When you're awake, you're awake in the same Buddha-mind you were sleeping in. You sleep in the Buddha-mind while you sleep and are up and about in the Buddha-mind while you're up and about. That way, you always stay in the Buddha-mind. You're never apart from it for an instant.

You're wrong if you think that people become something different when they fall asleep. If they were in the Buddha-mind only during their waking hours and changed into something else when they went to sleep, that wouldn't be the true Buddhist Dharma. It would mean that they were always in a state of transmigration.

All of you people here are working hard to become Buddhas. That's the reason you want to scold and beat the ones who fall asleep. But it isn't right. You each received one thing from your mother when you were born—the unborn Buddha-mind. Nothing else. Rather than try to become a Buddha, when you just stay constantly in the unborn mind, sleeping in it when you sleep, up and about in it when you're awake, you're a living Buddha in your everyday life—at all times. There's not a moment when you're not a Buddha. Since you're always a Buddha, there's no other Buddha in addition to that for you to become. Instead of trying to become a Buddha, then, a much easier and shorter way is just to be a Buddha."

(Bankei in Waddell: The Unborn, p 57-58)

and

"Would someone whose mind is really somewhere else be inquiring whether it was or not? If your mind were somewhere else, you would hardly be aware of it. You wouldn't be asking questions about it. You're not even away from it when you sleep, because if someone calls to you and tells you to wake up, you will respond to him and wake right up. You've never been apart from your mind in the past, you won't be apart from it in the future, and you're not apart from it right now. None of you here has ever been separated from your mind, just as none of you is an unenlightened person. You've each been born with the Buddha-mind. It's your birthright."

(p 75)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

Thank you for the story Astus. Does that mean that you disagree with Malcolm and such is possible in the Buddhadharma?

Astus wrote:

So far in this thread I have not seen anything from Malcolm that I disagreed with.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 15th, 2015 at 10:34 PM

Title: Re: Zen equivalent of Rigpa

Content:

frank123 said:

In Zen is there a distinction made between Shamatha and Vipassana? Is Zazen basically the two combined?

Astus wrote:

Zazen is supposed to be the two at the same time, the unity of samadhi and prajna, as stated in the Platform Sutra. What actually happens in a community is a different matter.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 16th, 2015 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: Zen is No Secret

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here is <http://terebess.hu/zen/mesterek/Secrets-of-Cultivating-the-Mind.pdf>.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 17th, 2015 at 5:06 AM

Title: What is Authorisation?

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is mentioned <http://www.charliemorley.com/full-bio/> that there was an authorisation given to teach. What form, if any, does such an authorisation take in Tibetan Buddhism?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 17th, 2015 at 3:30 PM

Title: Re: What is Authorisation?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Mostly it means you claim that some lama tapped you on the shoulder. Sometimes it means you are actually qualified.

Astus wrote:

You mean there are no papers and procedures - besides those given by educational institutions - in Tibetan Buddhism?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 20th, 2015 at 7:55 PM

Title: Re: Non-Abiding Awareness

Content:

dgomez said:

So as long as one attends effortlessly and choicelessly to sensations physical, mental, and emotionally (and not even identify these sensations like so but simply as sensations) then one is in choiceless awareness (also no mind? also non abiding awareness?)

Astus wrote:

How do you attend effortlessly? If you work on or want to do something, that is already effort. The Buddha taught <http://www.accesstoinight.org/ptf/dhamma/sacca/sacca4/samma-vayamo/> and the <http://blog.meditation-presence.com/jetsunma-tenzin-palmo-virya-paramita-or-effort/> as parts of the path to liberation.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Aimlessness_%28Buddhism%29 is the result, it is liberation itself, when there is nothing more to do.

The problem lies in the concept that there is a state or mentality to achieve and maintain. That idea comes from believing in some sort of actual reality that one needs to manage. However, there is nothing you can do to make things impermanent and empty. They are already such. What you can do is to understand and experience them as they actually are. How to do that? To understand, study the teachings of the buddhas and patriarchs. To experience, check for yourself if there is any bodily impression, emotion or thought that stays even for the shortest period of time.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 21st, 2015 at 3:09 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://www.mahamudracenter.org/>:

To support those interested in Mahamudra or working with Mahamudra study and practice groups, MMC's Meditation Manual is made available at:

<http://www.chagchen.com/index.htm>.

Also, it is recommended to look into the Jewel Ornament of Liberation by Gampopa and follow the practices of mind training (lojong). They are very useful for mahamudra.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Astus wrote:

From Mahamudra the Moonlight (2nd edition):

"In recent times meditators of Mahāmudrā sought to make adjustments according to both the sūtras and the tantras. They have incorporated [in the Mahāmudrā tradition] many practices that require preparations, such as the mystical empowerment that sows the seed of a spiritual blossom, devotion to preliminary exercises, and methods of enhancing experiences. It is for that reason that it is not contradictory to regard Mahāmudrā as identical with the common and profound path of the sūtras and tantras, due to the fact that many superior and inferior minds are going to benefit from it."
(p 112)

"Regarding the manner of imparting the profound path [of Mahāmudrā], the venerable Gampopa considered it to be an independent path of tantra. So he did not make the esoteric empowerment a prerequisite for receiving the Mahāmudrā teachings."
(p 123)

"On the other hand, if one follows venerable Gampopa's system in elucidating Mahāmudrā alone, it is not necessary to bestow the empowerment upon devotees. In keeping with his system one should adhere to the preparatory exercises that he prescribed without incorporating the tantric meditation of Vajrasattva, the utterance of mantra, the transformation of oneself into the yidam, and the visualization of one's guru in the form of Buddha Vajradhara – the source of the empowerment."

(p 124)

"In the present age, Mahāmudrā and Mantrayāna [tantric mysticism] are being blended and meditated upon in order to enhance realization. Many tantric elements are also incorporated into the preparatory practices. For those who wish to practice these, the empowerment for actualizing the inner potentiality is certainly essential. One should receive either an elaborate or short empowerment, based on a genuine tantra, associated with a realization deity such as Chakrasamvara with his consort. Such a tradition must be sustained by the living masters of a spiritual lineage, for they are the source of blessing."

(p 125)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 4:13 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Astus wrote:

From a teaching by <http://www.samyeing.org/about/buddhism-and-meditation/teaching-archive-2/mingyur-dorje-rinpoche/vajrayana-and-empowerment/> (underlines added):

Within the Secret Mantra Vajrayana path there are two divisions. The first one is the path of skilful means and the second is the path of liberation. If we explain further what the path of skilful means is, there are various methods through which to realize directly our nature of mind. It is revealed to us through these various types of practice.

With skilful means we go indirectly to realize the nature of mind, we don't come directly to that realization.

...

When we practise the path of liberation, we have a direct method to realize the nature of mind, but there is no shape or colour for that. This is the mahamudra.

...

The Vajrayana path can be divided into three sections. There is the development stage, completion stage and path of liberation (kyerim, dzogrim and drollam). Within these three paths one can decide whatever one likes to do, whatever one is feeling positive towards. But the best actually is the path of liberation.

Malcolm said:

Yes, this is a mistaken tradition that cannot be defended in anyway whatsoever.

Astus wrote:

You mean you cannot accept the Dakpo Kagyu teaching of the white panacea, the method independent (and superior) of tantra, the path of liberation?

Johnny Dangerous said:

you can use Mahamudra techniques, but their result and function would be like sutra meditation

Astus wrote:

If the techniques provided in Mahamudra cannot produce the results promised, how can they be even called Mahamudra?

Tsongkhapa said:

it is impossible to gain realisations without having a Guru and without receiving a Highest Yoga Tantra empowerment and practising the two stages sincerely

Astus wrote:

From http://www.berzinarchives.com/web/en/archives/e-books/published_books/gelug_kagyu_mahamudra/pt3/mm_08.html (underlines added):

As for the actual basic methods, although there are many ways of asserting mahamudra, there are two when divided according to the sutras and tantras.

The latter is a greatly blissful, clear light mind manifested by such skillful methods as penetrating vital points of the subtle vajra-body and so forth. The mahamudra of the traditions of Saraha, Nagarjuna, Naropa and Maitripa, it is the quintessence of the anuttarayoga class of tantra as taught in The (Seven Texts of the) Mahasiddhas and The (Three) Core Volumes.

The former refers to the ways of meditating on voidness as directly indicated in the expanded, intermediate and brief (Prajnaparamita Sutras). The supremely realized Arya Nagarjuna has said, "Except for this, there is no other pathway of mind leading to liberation." Here I shall give relevant instruction on mahamudra in accord with these intentions of his and discuss the methods that lead you to know the mind, face to face, in keeping with the exposition of the lineage masters.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 8:22 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Malcolm said:

These two ideas — that there is such a thing as mahāmudra in the sūtras, and that there is a mahāmudra path independent of Vajrayāna — are meritless delusions.

Astus wrote:

Do you think that the mahamudra instructions regarding seeing the nature of the mind are incorrect?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 9:08 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Malcolm said:

Whose instructions? Which ones?

Astus wrote:

E.g.: Wangchuk Dorje, Dakpo Tashi Namgyal, Tsele Natsok Rangdrol, Traleg Kyabgon, Khenchen Thrangu, Tsultrim Gyamtso, Tenzin Palmo, Ken McLeod.

For instance this one: <http://www.lionsroar.com/meditating-on-the-mind-itself/>; or this short manual:

<http://s151421314.onlinehome.us/nbp/docs/PDF/7.%20Guide%20to%20Mahamudra.pdf> (PDF, or just the http://www.thranguhk.org/buddhism_teachings/en_vipashyana.html?keepThis=true&TB_iframe=true&height=600&width=1050 from p 30-35).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Malcolm said:

If someone asserts there is an actual mahāmudra result outside of the practice of the two stages or guru yoga, that person is mistaken, regardless of their title, position or rank.

Astus wrote:

Well, that one was Gampopa. See how in the Jewel Ornament of Liberation he included all practices within prajnaparamita <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=111558#p111558>.

Malcolm said:

If the introduction to the nature of mind occurs outside the context of having received the four empowerments, that instruction does not go beyond prajñāpāramitā meditation — which is a perfectly fine practice, but it is not mahāmudra. It is something like calling an ordinary geshe a "buddha" in order to arouse faith in his disciples.

...

However, meditating on the intimate instructions of mahāmudra divorced from completion stage practices and or the intense devotion of guru yoga is a slow path even if one has received the four empowerments in a proper way. If one has not received the four empowerments at all, the idea that one is going to realize mahāmudra is a completely hopeless fantasy, like wishing for a stone to be saturated with water because one leaves it in a pond.

Astus wrote:

If the view and the conduct are identical, how could the result be different because of the empowerments/guru yoga? Although, as above, all the empowerments and guru yoga are included in resting in the natural state, at least according to certain Mahamudra teachers.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 3:54 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Malcolm said:

Well, which "prajñāpāramitā" is he discussing? The practice of prajñāpāramita? Or the result, Prajñāpāramita?

Astus wrote:

Gampopa writes: "Setting the mind this way is the unmistakable method of practicing wisdom awareness." (p 249) and where he gives the list of all those things he beings with: "When one is endowed with the meaning of emptiness, there is not a single thing which is not included in this path." (p 252) In the commentaries by Ringu Tulku and Thrangu Rinpoche they both talk about resting in the natural state as taught in Mahamudra.

The difference between sutra and tantra in terms of Mahamudra are quite practical: "According to Mahamudra teachers, the sutric Mahayana approach uses external phenomena as the object of vipashyana meditation, whereas the tantric Mahayana approach of Mahamudra uses the mind itself as the object."
(<http://www.lionsroar.com/meditating-on-the-mind-itself/>).

Also,

"Gampopa said that there are three different paths with different practices, but these three paths have the same nature. These are taking inference as the path, taking blessings as the path, and taking direct experience as the path. Taking inference as the path refers to, for instance, the various reasonings set forth in the Madhyamaka that show that all things are neither single nor multiple. Taking blessings as the path refers to, for instance, meditation upon the body of a deity or the practices involving the subtle channels and subtle energies. Taking direct perception as the path is mahamudra. Mahamudra is pointed out to us, and we recognize it, become accustomed to it, and take direct experience as the path.

We can also classify the different paths into three groups: the paths that abandon the ground, paths that transform the ground, and paths that recognize the ground. The first path of abandoning the ground is the vehicle of transcendent action of the sutra vehicle, in which some things are abandoned and others are remedies for those things to be abandoned. The second path, transformation of the ground, refers to the practices of the Vajrayana in which we purify our body and mind by meditating on our body being a deity. Our body is thus transformed into the pure body of the deity, and our mind is transformed from discursiveness into wisdom. In the third path, recognizing the ground, is mahamudra. We know that we do not need to abandon or transform the ground; rather, we know it as it is. When we know the ground as it is, we recognize all appearances as the magical display of the mind. Thus, mahamudra is a matter of using direct perception as the path. This is also called the quick path."

(Thrangu: Essentials of Mahamudra, p 78-79)

As for the so called Sutra Mahamudra (that actually stands for Gampopa's Mahamudra):

"The meditation of Sutra Mahamudra essentially consists of resting one's mind, free of mental activity, in the state of nonconceptual wisdom. This is the fundamental definition of Sutra Mahamudra: mind resting in the state in which it experiences the dharmadhatu, which is the expanse or nature of all things. This resting is essentially a nonconceptual wisdom beyond all elaboration, or the unity of clarity and emptiness. In this context, one meditates in the following way: The object of one's meditation is luminosity free of any projections; the perceiving subject is the lack of mental engagement; and one meditates without mental engagement. There are many extensive explanations on meditating without mental engagement, found primarily in the teachings of Maitripa and Sahajavajra.

The Sutrayana approach to Mahamudra is seen as a very profound method because it does not require any of the sophisticated and complex tantric rituals, deity yoga visualization practices, or samayas. It is a simple sutra approach, yet it conveys the direct transmission of the tantric essence of awakening."

(Dzogchen Ponlop: Wild Awakening, 31-32)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 3:17 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Malcolm said:

Settling mind in what way? In which path is everything included? How is this path introduced, can you just look it up on the internet?

Astus wrote:

Settling in the correct view, emptiness/prajnaparamita, and in that everything is included. It is introduced, in the Jewel Ornament of Liberation, through analysis of the two no-selves. Otherwise, Mahamudra vipasyana (and this is what the JOoL follows as well) has analysis (pandita) and resting (kusulu), very much like the Bhavanakrama, but, as quoted, teachers of the tradition say that the difference between Mahayana and Mahamudra vipasyana is in what is looked into first, phenomena or the mind.

Malcolm said:

How is that possible? Have these teachers never heard of Yogacara? And even here, why make a distinction between the tantric Mahāmudra approach and the sūtra Mahāyāna approach if in reality they are both "mahāmudra"?

Astus wrote:

The difference between the purely sutric method and the Mahamudra method lies in whether there is pointing out the nature of mind or not, as mentioned above.

Malcolm said:

Drogmi Lotsawa states that the difference between sūtra and tantra is that tantra uses direct perception as the path. This direct perception is the basis of all Secret Mantra meditation and is the experiential view introduced in the very beginning during the empowerment, this is why Secret Mantra is a quick path. But there is no separate means of introducing this experiential view outside of the empowerment, there is no mahāmudra that exists outside of Vajrayāna.

Astus wrote:

As noted earlier, tantra uses an indirect method with deity yoga and the channels to reach buddha-nature, while Mahamudra goes there directly. Also, the fourth empowerment is generally equated with the pointing out instruction.

Malcolm said:

It does not in any way shape or form go beyond Prajñāpāramita, and since there is no empowerment, there is no experiential view to be cultivated. As Khenpo Tsultrim Gyatso told me, and as you can confirm by reading Kongtrul, sūtra mahāmudra was invented for those Gampopa deemed unready for Secret Mantra.

Astus wrote:

As above, the specialty of Gampopa's Mahamudra is the direct introduction without empowerment.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 26th, 2015 at 4:53 PM

Title: Re: Few questions related to Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

1. It depends on how "full enlightenment" is understood. Zen generally views its own patriarchs/ancestors as enlightened beings. More importantly, every being has buddha-nature, so what really matters is whether you have seen this yourself or not.

2. Even in Japanese Zen - where they don't follow the Pratimoksha (Vinaya) - there are monasteries where they remain celibate and live mostly isolated from the mundane life, and there are also individuals who live like hermits. At the same time, the seriousness of one's dedication towards enlightenment (bodhicitta) is not a matter of ordination or monastic precepts.

3. It is not the robe or the title that makes one a good person. Also, being a Buddhist is a question of religious conscience, not moral behaviour. Once you take refuge in the Triple Jewel, you are a Buddhist. Even if you break all the precepts. On the other hand, you can live like a saint, but if you believe that salvation/liberation exists somewhere else than the Buddhadharma, you are not a Buddhist.

4. Mahayana is not a split from Theravada. Schism in the monastic community would be setting up a different set of precepts, however, nothing like that has ever really happened. Japanese Buddhism could be considered an exception here, however, they did not actually made a new Vinaya but rather abandoned it for a different kind of rules.

You may read this work: <http://santifm.org/santipada/2010/sects-sectarianism/> by Bhikkhu Sujato.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 26th, 2015 at 6:50 PM

Title: Re: The simplicity of Zen practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

Related to "nothing remarkable in having learned to go with the flow" one interesting line:

"Trusting in the flow, what's needed comes."

or in Sasaki's translation:

"Trust in fate produces expedients"

originally (X69n1336_p0135c22): 任運生方便 - Allowing/Trusting (任) luck (運) generates/gives birth to (生) skilful means (方便)

運 (luck) also means "to transport", thus it connects to the next line about "all together [travelling in the] prajna-boat.

It is very much like what is the central teaching of Daehaeng sunim on "entrusting everything to Juigong" (Juigong = buddha-nature). And that is really what Zen is all about. In some ways the difference between Buddhism and other religions is that others teach one should trust in some external force to manage things ("thy will be done"), while in the Buddhadharma it is only letting go based on understanding the nature of reality.

The difficulty is always the habit of trying to take control of events. But how can we not fear bad (黑闇女 - dark woman) and desire good (功德天 - virtue god)? When I get lost in a series of ideas of what should be done - and that usually happens when I have no inclination to any option - in the end I arrive at the same conclusion that there is nothing I can foresee or control. Sometimes that is just a few seconds, sometimes I pursue various activities and struggle for days with, but the inner tension and the frustration really ends when I can realise my own error of giving in to some unfounded idea. And ideas always turn out to be without any foundation.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 26th, 2015 at 8:35 PM

Title: Re: The simplicity of Zen practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

Lazy_eye,

Very good question. I think the conflict comes from putting teachings in the wrong context. Zen is about internal attitude, not behavioural precepts. The instruction of "neither taking nor rejecting" cannot apply to physical activities, just consider how we must be able to tell the difference between edible and inedible objects. Zen (and Buddhism in general) pertains to the problem of existential dissatisfaction generated by emotional and conceptual attachments. On the physical level of precepts, what one is recommended to follow are rules based on cultivating harmlessness, goodwill and compassion. Thus, one saves all beings without the concept of beings, gives without the ideas of giver, gift, and receiver. In other words: eat when hungry, sleep when tired. Daily activities and ordinary experiences are not the problem, people already know how to dress, wash the dishes, do their job - and if not, information and instructions are readily available from many sources. Problem arises if we feel dissatisfied with our life, when we are bothered by the weather, others, the colour of the sky, and such. Suffering is when we don't find our place, can't find the meaning of life, when we are stressed and frustrated by whatever event there is because we think it should be something else. Neither taking nor rejecting is opening up to whatever happens, not making issues out of non-issues.

If it itches, scratch it. Don't blame the world for the itch, don't be afraid of scratching, don't feel guilty because you scratched it. And if it is not the right time to scratch, don't get angry.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 27th, 2015 at 3:14 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

bryandavis said:

What mechanism in empowerments makes it work when it is live and fail when it isn't? Im sure Loppon Malcom can elucidate much more clear but, the teacher (in theory) would be in a certain space while giving the empowerment; so during the 4th empowerment for example, the teacher would actually be in a state of non dual awareness. There is a real time transference or potential.

A recording is devoid of sentience, of a mind, of wisdom.

Astus wrote:

That assumes a type of mental connection that is bound by time (and perhaps space). First, such a direct connection of minds is a violation of the teachings on mind-streams and karma. Second, non-dual awareness is supposed to be beyond time and space.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 27th, 2015 at 7:09 PM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Astus wrote:

Buddhas have the mind of sentient beings.

"to recognize the sentient being in one's own mind is to see the buddha-nature in one's own mind. If you wish to see the Buddha, just recognize the sentient being [in your mind]. It is only sentient beings who are deluded as to the Buddha; the buddhas are not deluded about sentient beings. If you are enlightened to your self-nature, then the sentient being is the Buddha; if you are deluded as to the self-nature, then [what might be] a 'buddha' is [only] a sentient being."

(Platform Sutra, ch 10, p 89-90, BDK Edition)

"It is only this One Mind that is Buddha; there is no distinction between Buddhas and sentient beings. However, sentient beings are attached to characteristics and seek outside themselves. Seeking it, they lose it even more. Sending the Buddha in search of the Buddha, grasping the mind with the mind, they may exhaust themselves in striving for an entire eon but will never get it. They do not understand that if they cease their thoughts and end their thinking, the Buddha will automatically be present.

This mind is the Buddha; the Buddha is the sentient being."

(Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, ch 1, in Zen Texts, p 13, BDK Edition)

"Since there is neither more of it in the saint nor less of it in the ordinary man, how are the Buddhas and patriarchs any different from other men? The only thing that makes them different is that they can protect their minds and thoughts—nothing more."

(Bojo Jinul:

http://www.buddhism.org/board/read.cgi?board=Dharma_Talks&nnew=2&y_number=14)

"this very awareness or sentience is the bodhi mind that is originally pure. When enlightened, this mind is the buddha; this mind is the Way."

(Ven. Weijue: <http://www.ctworld.org/english-96/docs/DharmaLectures2.pdf>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 2:34 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

WeiHan said:

What assumes a type of mental connection that is bound by time?

Astus wrote:

That the mental state of the person giving the empowerment influences the receiver's mind, as if there were a direct connection between two mind-streams.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 3:31 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, that is never the case, it is more like a stamp and its impression. A recorded empowerment can never be a stamp, it can only be an impression. In this case, an inert impression. A student, who receives an empowerment, is an animate living person upon whom an impression has been made, and when they have realized the meaning, they too can make impressions on others.

This is essentially why, for all who reading, the idea that one can receive an empowerment from a recording is a corrupt idea that will destroy lineages if people take it seriously.

Astus wrote:

How does the stamp meets the wax? Isn't it through the five outer senses?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 4:07 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Malcolm said:

Of course, who ever said it was otherwise?

Astus wrote:

Then there is no difference between a live broadcast and a recording in terms of visual and auditory impressions. Maybe even mass empowerments are similar as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 3:16 PM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

Malcolm said:

For example, a master has to create the mandala: there is the master's creation of himself as the mandala, the front created mandala, the mandala in the vase and so on and so forth.

Once the ritual has finished, all these mandalas and so on are dissolved so they do not exist anymore since they are not being maintained by the master's visualization, having been dissolved. I explained all of this already in the other thread on this point.

Not only that, but the recording generally only covers the activities for the disciple. All the activities that the master has to do before conferring the empowerment are not recorded.

Thus the recording is incapable of doing recreating these things since a recording has no mind, no volition and so on.

Astus wrote:

What the master visualises and does before the empowerment does not show for the receiver either when he is present physically or when it is through a live broadcast. How is it any different for the person watching a recording? Whether the master followed the prescribed procedure to give the empowerment or not, it cannot be known by the receiver. Whatever is received by the disciple exists only as physical sensory perception, so anything beyond that does not have any role in receiving the empowerment. But if you say it does, then what and how?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 3:56 PM

Title: Re: Path to Buddhahood in Chan/Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

The nature of mind is buddha. Any other buddha besides the mind itself is illusion. In other words, once you've dropped fabricating objects and identities to hang on to there is no new identity to make up.

"Bring to rest the thoughts of the ceaselessly seeking mind, and you will not differ from the patriarch-buddha. Do you want to know the patriarch-buddha? He is none other than you who stand before me listening to my discourse. But because you students lack faith in yourselves, you run around seeking something outside. Even if, through your seeking, you did find something, that something would be nothing more than fancy descriptions in written words; never would you gain the mind of the living patriarch. Make no mistake, worthy Chan men! If you don't find it here and now, you'll go on transmigrating through the three realms for myriads of kalpas and thousands of lives, and, held in the clutch of captivating circumstances, be born in the wombs of asses or cows.

Followers of the Way, as I see it we are no different from Śākya. What do we lack for our manifold activities today? The six-rayed divine light never ceases to shine. See it this way, and you'll be a man who has nothing to do his whole life long."

(Record of Linji, p. 8, tr. Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 4:57 PM

Title: Re: Path to Buddhahood in Chan/Zen

Content:

Wayfarer said:

And what was the context of Lin Chi's words there? What kind of audience was he addressing when he said that, and in what circumstances?

Astus wrote:

That section starts with "At the evening gathering the master addressed the assembly".

Note says (p 150):

"Evening gathering 晚參. We have no definite knowledge of what this term referred to during Tang times, but in the Song it was an evening meeting of the assembly held in the master's quarters 方丈 (see page 131, above). It was informal in procedure, in contrast to the formal service held in the morning in the main hall, when the master took the high seat."

But it's not very relevant, as the Linjilu is hardly an actual record of speeches, rather a literary work. Also, the previously quoted teaching is among the central doctrines in the text and repeated regularly.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 5:56 PM

Title: Re: Path to Buddhahood in Chan/Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Wayfarer,

You think there is a different instruction for lay people in Chan? Huangbo's records primarily consist of teachings given to and edited by a lay official, Peixiu. See how Huangbo's matches Linji's instructions:

"It is only this One Mind that is Buddha; there is no distinction between Buddhas and sentient beings. However, sentient beings are attached to characteristics and seek outside themselves. Seeking it, they lose it even more. Sending the Buddha in search of the Buddha, grasping the mind with the mind, they may exhaust themselves in striving for an entire eon but will never get it. They do not understand that if they cease their thoughts and end their thinking, the Buddha will automatically be present."
(Essentials of the Transmission of Mind in Zen Texts, p 13, BDK Edition)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 7:13 PM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Malcolm said:

If one can achieve Buddhahood in a single life via Chan there is no reason to follow Vajrayāna at all, let alone Dzogchen.

Astus wrote:

The Pure Land path promises not only buddhahood in a single life (i.e. either taking this birth and the birth in Sukhavati as one, or one lifetime in Sukhavati), but it is open for all capacities, offers practices from the simplest to the highly complicated, and most importantly, unlike other paths where fallback can only be avoided through strict adherence to the methods, it guarantees perfect liberation through the vow of Amitabha. In light of that every other teaching that cannot give buddhahood in this body for everyone are redundant and unnecessary.

It should also be noted that not only Chan teaches buddhahood in this life, but also Tiantai, Huayan, and Zhenyan (Shingon), so it is not particularly a uniquely Chan idea. What is a Chan specialty is sudden enlightenment/direct understanding, while Tiantai, Huayan, and Vajrayana all present a step by step path.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 7:16 PM

Title: Re: Path to Buddhahood in Chan/Zen

Content:

Wayfarer said:

No. I think that the word 'mind' has a different meaning in Mahayana Buddhism than it does in other contexts. So the instruction may not be different for 'Chan lay-people' - i.e. those who lived in Lin Chi's place and time - but it might be very different for 'modern urban lay-people'.

Astus wrote:

I see your point and I agree. Chan has its own language that should be translated to modern everyday speech when using to for teaching people unfamiliar with East Asian Mahayana literature.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 7:19 PM

Title: Re: Path to Buddhahood in Chan/Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

You think there is a different instruction for lay people in Chan?

Anders said:

Often, that is the case.

Astus wrote:

That I consider a broader teaching of Mahayana. Baizhang discussed this a bit at the beginning of his longer record, although there he specified that the difference lies not in whether one is a householder or a monastic, but in their level of understanding the Dharma. Same sentiment goes for the Platform Sutra as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 8:35 PM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

BuddhaFollower said:

According to the other thread you believe recognizing nature of mind is Buddhahood.

Astus wrote:

"When one sees the Buddha-Nature, one attains unsurpassed Enlightenment."
(Nirvana Sutra, ch 9, p 93)

"Although innumerable Bodhisattvas may well perfectly practise the paramitas [spiritual perfections], they might only reach the stage of the ten abodes ["bhūmis"] and yet may not be able to see the Buddha-Nature. If the Tathagata speaks, they may see to some extent. When these Bodhisattvas have seen all, they will say: "Oh, wonderful, O World-Honoured One! We have been repeating birth and death and have been worried by selflessness. " O good man! Such Bodhisattvas may well reach the stage of the ten soils ["bhumis" - stages of Bodhisattva development], and yet they cannot clearly see the Buddha-Nature. How could sravakas and pratyekabuddhas well see [it]?

...

The Buddha-Nature that one has is the deepest and the most difficult [thing] to see. Only the Buddha can know it well. It is not within the reach of sravakas and pratyekabuddhas."

(Nirvana Sutra, ch 12, p 110-111)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 9:28 PM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

BuddhaFollower said:

And those quotes are supposed to show what?

Astus wrote:

The basic Chan tenet is that the nature of mind is buddha. The quote says that seeing buddha-nature is attaining perfect enlightenment. Thus it is not at all unfounded that Chan teaches that one becomes buddha by seeing the nature of mind.

"To simply right now suddenly comprehend that one's own mind is fundamentally Buddha, without there being a single dharma one can attain and without there being a single practice one can cultivate—this is the unsurpassable enlightenment, this is the Buddha of suchness."

(Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, in Zen Texts, p 20, BDK Edition)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 30th, 2015 at 1:59 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Sherlock said:

Dharmata is not buddhahood.

Astus wrote:

"Dharmata is the Tathagata. Hence, the Tathagata is Eternal and Unchanging."

(Nirvana Sutra, ch 8, p 84)

"For the Suchness of the Tathagata, and the Suchness of all dharmas, they are both one single Suchness, not two, not divided."

(PP8000, ch 16, p 193, tr Conze)

"‘Tathagata’ means thusness of all dharmas."

(Diamond Sutra, ch 17, p 198, BTTS Edition)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 30th, 2015 at 2:33 AM

Title: Re: Mirror and Dust: different?

Content:

DesertDweller said:

if there is only One Mind, then how is it, first that I perceive "things" as separate from my basic consciousness? In other words, if I go back into my mind as far as I can to what seems like bare consciousness, then are the objects--mental, emotional, physical, etc--which that consciousness perceives merely "forms" of the one Mind showing itself to itself?

... am I correct to say that in Reality the dust is not separate from the Mirror, the Host is not separate from the Guest? If so, how can they seem so distinct? Even when the mind approaches no-thought in meditation, the distinction still seems apparent....

Astus wrote:

As long as you propose a "knower", a consciousness, there must be things that are "known". When you say you go back to your mind, can you really find a consciousness without any objects, or objects are always present? In fact, when you say you look at your mind, it is still the same dichotomy of knower and known. Rather than maintaining the idea of a perceiving subject, just take whatever is experienced - physical and mental - as simply experience. Investigate for yourself if there really is a duality of knower and known, or is it rather an interpretation with what you cut into two a unitary flow of experiences.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 30th, 2015 at 5:10 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Yamamoto translation says,

"Being based on Dharma means nothing other than basing oneself on the Mahaparinirvana of the Tathagata. All Buddhist teachings are none but "Dharmata" [essence of Dharma, essence of Reality]. This "Dharmata" is the Tathagata. Hence, the Tathagata is Eternal and Unchanging. Any person who says that the Tathagata is non-eternal does not know "Dharmata"."

Mark Blum's translation (p 194, BDK Edition):

"the dharma to be taken as one's refuge is none other than this mahaparinirvana of the Tathagata. As the dharma of all buddhas, it is the dharmata, the nature of reality. And as the dharmata, it is what the Tathagata is. This is why the Tathagata is a permanently abiding presence without change. If someone were to say that the Tathagata is impermanent, that person would not understand, he has not seen the nature of reality."

Here's my simple version from the same 40-fascicle Dharmaksema translation (T12n374, p401c3-5):

依法者。即是如來大般涅槃。一切佛法即是法性。是法性者即是如來。是故如來常住不變。若復有言如來無常。是人不知不見法性。

Relying on the Law is [relying on] the Thus Come One's Great Parinirvana. All Buddha Laws are the Law-nature, the Law-nature is the Thus Come One, so the Thus Come One is eternal and permanent. If it were said that the Thus Come One is impermanent, that person would not know and would not see the Law-nature.

But to further clarify this section, a little later the sutra says:

Yamamoto:

"Basing oneself upon Dharma means basing oneself upon "Dharmata"; not basing oneself on man refers to the sravaka. "Dharmata" is the Tathagata, and the sravaka is the created. The Tathagata is Eternal, but the sravaka is non-eternal."

Blum:

"The dharma to take refuge in is the reality of dharmata; the person not to take refuge in is a sravaka disciple. The reality of dharmata is a tathagata; a sravaka disciple is a created phenomenon. A tathagata is permanently abiding; a created phenomenon is impermanent."

So, it is not really discussing differences between teachings, it turns it into the difference between unconditioned and conditioned. Same happens with the other three seals.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 30th, 2015 at 5:45 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Malcolm said:

None of this changes my basic point that the passage in question concerns the four reliances (dharma, meaning, wisdom, definitive meaning), not the equivalence dharmatā = tathāgata, which is not found in the Indian version of the text.

Astus wrote:

The Chinese translation is from the early 5th century. Is there actually an original Sanskrit anywhere, or you call the Tibetan Indian? Still, it was not the only quote.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 30th, 2015 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Malcolm said:

If it's missing in the Tibetan text, it was not there in the Sanskrit original. But we can do a passage by passage comparison if you like. But it should be in another thread.

Astus wrote:

I don't think it's that important. If you say it's not in the Tibetan, it is not there.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 30th, 2015 at 3:23 PM

Title: Re: Mirror and Dust: different?

Content:

DesertDweller said:

Very true--it is basically impossible for me to get back to the Absolute Source of consciousness--and believe me, I've tried! There is always "awareness that I am aware," though this may be quite subtle. I suppose this awareness of awareness, when it is tranquil, is like the clear mirror in the analogy.

Astus wrote:

There is no such "Absolute Source" you want to find. As they say, the very fact of not finding any ultimate consciousness or self is the true insight into the emptiness of mind.

Huangbo says,

"Ordinary people all chase after the [sensory] realms and generate the mind, so that the mind [has feelings of] enjoyment and detestation. If you would have there be no realms, then you should forget the mind. When the mind is forgotten, then the realms are empty, and when the realms are empty the mind is extinguished. If you do not forget the mind but only eliminate the realms, because the realms cannot be eliminated you will only increase your [inner] agitation. Therefore, [you should understand that] the myriad dharmas are only the mind. The mind is also imperceptible (lit., "unattainable"), so how can it possibly be sought?"

(Zen Texts, p 24, BDK Edition)

Asanga quotes,

"In states of quiescence the bodhisattva
Understands that images exist only in his mind,
And, abandoning externalized ideas of objects,
He assuredly understands them to be only his own thoughts.
Abiding within himself, the bodhisattva
Understands that the objective realm does not exist,
And also that the subjective realm is empty.
He then directly experiences the unobtainability of both."
(Summary of the Great Vehicle, p 69, BDK Edition)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 30th, 2015 at 6:28 PM

Title: Re: Mirror and Dust: different?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

So when Huangbo says that 'The mind is also imperceptible (lit., "unattainable"), so how can it possibly be sought?', the fact that it can't be sought, doesn't mean that it is non-existent, but that it is indeed never an object of knowledge or something that can be cognized.

Astus wrote:

The dual version of false and true minds is fine as long as they are not turned into extremes as if there were actually two minds. Beings have only one mind, this very mind that is conscious right now. The difference between false and true lies in grasping at phenomena or not. Unattainable means that there is nothing actually to grasp as all appearances are empty and baseless. But as long as we believe in solid, independent, external objects, we are hooked up on them and driven by them. So, better to just clarify for oneself right now that no matter what experience occurs, it cannot ever be held onto, as it disappears in the next moment. All that we can ever attach to are concepts and ideas, but even thoughts are ungraspable as they just come and go incessantly.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 4:14 AM

Title: Re: Like fish in a shrinking pond

Content:

Astus wrote:

是日已過 命亦隨滅 如少水魚 斯有何樂

"The day is already done. Our lives are that much less

We are like fish in a shrinking pond. What joy is there in this?"

The above is found in the Chinese translations of Dharmapada and the Udanavarga (T210 & T212), matches

<https://www2.hf.uio.no/polyglotta/index.php?page=record&vid=71&mid=208325> but it has no corresponding stanza in the Pali Dhammapada.

當勤精進 如救頭然 但念無常 慎勿放逸

"We should be diligent and vigorous, as if our own heads were at stake.

Only be mindful of impermanence and be careful not to be lax."

Found in for instance the Ming era compilation "Admonishment for Monastics" (T2023).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 5:12 PM

Title: Re: Mirror and Dust: different?

Content:

DesertDweller said:

What is meant here by "mind"? How can one "forget" the mind? He makes it seem like an act of will, but it seems impossible to forget anything intentionally, since the will to forget simply places renewed emphasis on the object of forgetting.

Astus wrote:

Mind means thinking. Something occurs, one grasps it and connects it with further concepts to create a string of associations and ideas. It is also called mental proliferation (prapanca). Grasping what occurs means identifying it as me or mine, like "I am angry" and "My head hurts". Forgetting the mind means not grasping phenomena and thus not making up whole series of concepts.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 5:50 PM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

The argument that the Buddha only negated the self within the aggregates is clearly incorrect. The repeated statement is "assumes [X aggregate] to be the self, or the self as possessing [X aggregate], or [X aggregate] as in the self, or the self as in [X aggregate]." It excludes self 1. as the aggregates, 2. as the owner of the aggregates, 3. as outside the aggregates, 4. as inside the aggregates. Based on this well known instruction found all over the suttas there have developed numerous arguments and meditation guides to show anyone interested that there is nothing anywhere to identify as self.

So, it is difficult to see how a book on putting a self in the Buddha's teachings is any more sensible than The Gospel According to Biff where Jesus learns Zen in a Tibetan monastery.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 6:33 PM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

Malcolm said:

The misconception which Astus has is the notion that an empowerment is merely communicating information received through the five senses, thus for him there is no difference between an empowerment and a recording of an empowerment, it is merely information. While it is true that information is being communicated through the five sense, that is not all that is happening, there are samadhis involved on the part of both the master and the students at the same time, there is the dependent origination which needs to be actively created between the master and the student at the same time, particularly in the lower empowerments; there are the samaya vows conferred and received and the agreement to follow them (Whatever you say boss, all that I will do....), and so on — all of the things which I have now explained exhaustively.

Astus wrote:

Yes, my basic assumption is that what benefits one on the path must be learnt, understood and experienced personally. So for the disciple what can have any effect for him is what he visualises during the empowerment, not what the master. You say it is the rite that matters, and it can be completed only when both the master and the student works together at the same time. But isn't the very point of performing the rite is to benefit the disciple? The question then is how the presence of the master and what he visualises affects the disciple. How can one enter a mandala that is mentally created by another?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 8:08 PM

Title: Re: Mirror and Dust: different?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Tathagata cannot be defined as this or that, simply because there is no identification, no grasping as something. But just because there is no attachment to appearances/experiences does not mean there are no appearances/experiences at all. Thus the ultimate view is that appearances and emptiness are one and the same, that mind is clear and aware.

"Use all your might, my friends, so that you may attain liberation by Sudden Enlightenment. When your eyes see a form, clearly distinguish every form, and yet be unmoved by these varying forms. When in their midst, be unaffected, and among them attain liberation. Then you have attained the samadhi of forms. When your ears hear a sound... when your nose smells an odor... when your tongue tastes a flavor.... when your body feels a sensation.... when your analytic mind (manas) distinguishes a dharma, remain unmoved by these various dharmas. When in their midst attain liberation. Then you have attained the samadhi of dharmas. When in this manner all the organs are clearly seen, that is original prajna; when nothing arises, that is original samadhi."
(Shenhui: <http://www.purifymind.com/DiscourseSudden.htm>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 8:37 PM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think I understand that for empowerment to happen the described procedures have to be followed, as that is the definition of what an empowerment is. Similarly to marriage that is defined in a specific way by the law, and regardless of how people live or what they do, they are not married as long as the correct procedure was not followed. However, people can do the same things both with and without a marriage certificate. That is, one can still live together and have children without marriage, while it is said that without empowerment one cannot practise Vajrayana effectively. So, the disciple must obtain something during empowerment that makes him different from the uninitiated. That is why I first of all try to analyse from the perspective of the receiver and ask the question of what is transmitted from master to student. Everything delivered through the five senses can be obtained from a recording as well. The methods of the practice and the precepts to follow can also be learnt from other sources. What makes the recipient of a correctly performed empowerment different from the one who did not receive it when they both engage in the same practice and uphold the same precepts? Is it perhaps related to the knowledge that "I have the empowerment" in the former that is missing from the latter person?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 9:45 PM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

Malcolm said:

And as I have written elsewhere, logic and inference are not authorities in Vajrayāna, scripture is. The Abhibodhikramopadeśa of Master Āryadeva states:

At the time of the ultimate view of secret mantra, the direct perception by the mind and sense organs as well as inferences are not authorities;
the profound scriptures and intimate instructions are authorities.

Astus wrote:

That clarifies it then for me why there aren't really works discussing the functioning of Vajrayana in a way that other Buddhist methods are usually discussed, describing the various mental elements and conditions at work. And thank you for the previous responses as well, you're really helpful.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Everything delivered through the five senses can be obtained from a recording as well.

fckw said:

Of course not. Only visual and auditory sense stimuli can. Or have you ever heard of a 5D-cinema?

Astus wrote:

If live broadcast and physical presence are equally valid, other senses don't really count.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: Mirror and Dust: different?

Content:

DesertDweller said:

if the objective world is an illusion or fabrication, then how do we understand "individual minds"?

Astus wrote:

Fabrication is to take ideas and concepts as if they were real or correspond to something real. Here real means something that exists on its own, independently of other things. When it is said that "external objects are only mind", it means that we take concepts to be more than just concepts. This is not an ontological or metaphysical view, an idealism, but an experiential observation with a very practical value, since grasping at ideas is the root of suffering.

"All the dharmas of this world and of the worlds beyond are without self-nature. Also, they are without produced nature. They are just empty names, and these names are also empty. All you are doing is taking these worthless names to be real. That's all wrong! Even if they do exist, they are nothing but states of dependent transformation, such as the dependent transformations of bodhi, nirvana, emancipation, the threefold body, the [objective] surroundings and the [subjective] mind, bodhisattvahood, and buddhahood. What are you looking for in these lands of dependent transformations! All of these, up to and including the Three Vehicles' twelve divisions of teachings, are just so much waste paper to wipe off privy filth. The Buddha is just a phantom body, the patriarchs just old monks."

(Record of Linji, p 19, tr Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 2nd, 2015 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

David Reigle said:

This quotation comes from Vasubandhu's own commentary on his Vijñapti-mātratā-siddhi Viṃśatikā, verse 10:

Astus wrote:

Perhaps check some other translations. Might turn out that the one presented in that book is somewhat (intentionally) misleading. Also, what does Vasubandhu have to do with the early texts? But if there are doubts about Vasubandhu's position on the matter, there are other works to read. For instance this work by https://books.google.hu/books?id=KWYcVO_kptMC

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 5:01 PM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

Anders said:

This is just a sort of pseudo-essentialist assumption. I.e., 'my physical body may be greatly affected by interaction with other physical bodies but my mind can not be greatly affected by other minds'.

But it can. A turning word is not as physical as you imagine it to be, the energy field of the mind of an awakened master can have a profound impact on the minds of people in his or her vicinity (sometimes, you don't even need vicinity - I've heard of certain thera who, when sensing their students are in distress, will brighten their minds with metta samadhi, even across countries).

The idea that minds are isolated pockets within physical bodies that have no interaction except through the physical senses just doesn't hold up.

Astus wrote:

It's not because of some materialist assumption, but the problem of interaction between minds without the mediating role of the five senses.

If the mentioned thera can brighten his students' minds without the students knowing anything of that, other yogis could do the same, not to mention bodhisattvas and buddhas. But apparently not all people are brightened.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 6:02 PM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

Anders said:

And why is this a problem?

Astus wrote:

A person's mental autonomy is the requirement for ethical responsibility for one's actions. Otherwise it becomes the same case as when one can blame a creator for one's fortune (<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an03/an03.061.than.html>). If a being can put thoughts in another's mind, that is practically taking control of how one sees things and acts in the world. Unlike external influences, it leaves no space for reflection, for inclination, and other mental factors that filter and select impressions. That's because the very act of reflecting, etc. is controlled by another.

Anders said:

In fact, you should consider the possibility that the buddhas and bodhisattvas are in fact already giving you an optimal amount of help that your karmic circumstances will allow them to (as opposed to the usual notion that they are 'out there', helping someone else luckier than ourselves).

Astus wrote:

If we suppose such influences that can take effect depending on one's mental conditioning, it is virtually the same as if there were no such influences at all, as in both cases it is only the individual's mind that matters. The argument for those influences are very much like when theists claim that a Creator and Lawgiver is necessary in order to have a world and ethical rules.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

I can also imagine "mind to mind" influences, or whatever, that would leave such space.

Astus wrote:

What is your view then, how can there be direct influence without assuming control over another?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 2:24 AM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Gyurme Kundrol,

While one can readily tell the difference between sounds from outside and one's own thoughts, how could one tell that a thought is from somebody else?

If two rivers merge they become a single river and cannot be separated again. If two mind-streams meet at a single moment of thought, all subsequent thoughts are the results of that one thought, so they become a single mind-stream.

Energy is a different subject.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 5:00 PM

Title: Re: Amida Is A Real Buddha

Content:

Astus wrote:

As mentioned before, there are different levels of meaning. The confusion comes from assuming that they are contradictory or exclusive instead of complementary and inclusive. That is, the reality of Amitabha and that all appearances are mind only are not opposing views. In fact, they perfectly support each other. For those who naturally incline for viewing Amitabha as a real entity, they are gradually introduced to the teaching of emptiness, if they are open for it in this life. For those who prefer everything as empty, they definitely have to understand that there is no emptiness besides dependent origination, and the Pure Land path is real and effective exactly because reality is mind made. An important difference is that while relying solely on buddha-remembrance leads to birth in the Pure Land, failing to see that there is no emptiness besides appearances leads only to some higher heavens at best, or to lower realms if one also denies the functioning of karma.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 5:35 PM

Title: Re: On destroying Virtue VS Unable to exhaust others' Karma

Content:

Astus wrote:

1.

The past is already gone, it cannot be changed. Effects in the present situation is subject to present conditions, internal and external. External conditions mean that one only feels craving when there is a desirable object (physical or mental). Internal conditions mean that one can view things with a narrow or with an open mind, with kindness or with hate. So, while one might normally like chocolate cakes, if one feels sick, even cakes can look disgusting.

Purification of the mind does not mean one can actually erase past events. It means learning to become open, caring, attentive, wise and kind. Then no matter what effect ripens, one can remain untainted by it. On the other hand, if one cultivates only greed, anger and ignorance, even the most insignificant situations can bring out one's inner evils.

2.

One can spend lot of time in a friendly environment where no harmful emotions occur, but once in a new situation those inner defilements bloom in no time. Then it becomes apparent that the previous peace was only temporary. That is, in a sense, there was no real merit accumulated during all that peaceful time, since there is no change in one's habits of how one acts.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 6th, 2015 at 3:42 PM

Title: Re: Zhiyi's Edonsho

Content:

Astus wrote:

Isn't it actually from Guanding's preface? So, it's not really a writing by Zhiyi.

Here's another translation from <http://www.tientai.net/lit/mksk/v1/v1p1-2p1.htm>:

The Total, Sudden Method:

From the beginning, there is the True Aspect of Reality. One creates an Object that agrees with the middle way and is not without the absolute truth. Being focused on the Spiritual Realm¹⁶, and with the Spiritual Realm being in each single thought, each form and fragrance is not without the middle way. It is one's own realm as well as that of the Buddha. In fact, it is also the realm of all living beings.

1. The aggregates of self and the senses are everywhere as they are, and so there is no suffering that may be discarded.
 2. With there being ignorance and the dusts from one's labors, so there is enlightenment Therefore there is no origination of suffering that may be detached from.
 3. Extremes and falsehoods are within the bounds of truth, and so there is no path that may be cultivated.
 4. With there being Life & Death, so there is Nirvana. Therefore there is no extinction that may be realized.
- Without suffering or origination, there is no being of the world.
 - Without a path or extinction, there is no leaving the world.

There is simply one True Spiritual Aspect of Reality. Beyond the True Spiritual Aspect of Reality, nothing is distinguished.

- The Nature of Spirituality is a serene tranquility called Calm.
- It is serene and yet it is always illumined, and so it is called Observation.

Although we speak of there being a beginning and an end, they are inseparable and indivisible, and it is called The Total & Sudden Calm-Observation.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 6th, 2015 at 6:12 PM

Title: Re: Zhiyi's Edonsho

Content:

Astus wrote:

It reads quite well together with the <http://www.cttbusa.org/heartsutra/hs1.htm>:

Insight into the nature of reality.

When Avalokiteshvara Bodhisattva was practicing the profound prajna paramita, he illuminated the five skandhas and saw that they are all empty, and he crossed beyond all suffering and difficulty.

The perfect and sudden [method of practicing cessation-and-contemplation] involves taking the true aspects [of reality] as the object from the very beginning. Whatever is made to be the object [of contemplation], it is the Middle; there is nothing that is not truly real.

That reality is the whole of our experience.

Shariputra, form does not differ from emptiness; emptiness does not differ from form.

Form itself is emptiness; emptiness itself is form. So, too, are feeling, cognition, formation, and consciousness.

[When one attains the state of contemplation wherein] reality itself (dharmadhatu) is fixed as the object [of cognition and contemplation], and one's thoughts are integrated with reality itself, [then one realises that] there is not a single color nor scent that is not the Middle Way. It is the same for the realm of the individual [mind], the realm of the Buddha, and the world at large [i.e., the "realm of sentient beings"].

Experience is itself such, nothing to grasp, relinquish or attain.

Shariputra, all dharmas are empty of characteristics. They are not produced. Not destroyed, not defiled, not pure, and they neither increase nor diminish. Therefore, in emptiness there is no form, feeling, cognition, formation, or consciousness; no eyes, ears, nose, tongue, body, or mind; no sights, sounds, smells, tastes, objects of touch, or dharmas; no field of the eyes, up to and including no field of mind-consciousness; and no ignorance or ending of ignorance, up to and including no old age and death or ending of old age and death. There is no suffering, no accumulating, no extinction, no way, and no understanding and no attaining.

All [phenomena experienced through the] aggregates and senses are thusness [i.e., reality as it is]; therefore there is no [substantial] suffering that needs to be removed. Since ignorance and the exhausting dust [of passionate afflictions] are indivisible with bodhi-wisdom, there is no origin [of suffering, i.e., craving] to be severed. Since the extreme [dualities] and false views are [indivisible with] the Middle and the right [views], there is no path to be cultivated. Since [this cyclic world of] samsara is [indivisible with] nirvana, there is no extinguishing [of craving] to be realized. Since there is no [substantial] suffering and cause [of suffering], there is no mundane world [to be transcended]; since there is no path and no extinction [of craving], there is no transcendent world [to be gained].

Since experience is such, it is perfect enlightenment.

Because nothing is attained, the Bodhisattva, through reliance on prajna paramita, is unimpeded in his mind. Because there is no impediment, he is not afraid, and he leaves distorted dream-thinking far behind. Ultimately Nirvana! All Buddhas of the three periods of time attain Anuttarasamyaksambodhi through reliance on prajna paramita.

There is purely the single true aspects [of reality]; there are no separate things outside these true aspects. For things in themselves (dharmata) to be quiescent is called "cessation"; to be quiescent yet ever luminous is called "contemplation." Though earlier and later [stages] are spoken of, they are neither two nor separate. This is called perfect and sudden cessation-and-contemplation.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 6th, 2015 at 8:23 PM

Title: Re: On destroying Virtue VS Unable to exhaust others' Karma

Content:

Astus wrote:

Regarding purification, please consider this discussion between the Buddha and some Jains (<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.101.than.html>):

"So I said to them, 'But friends, do you know that you existed in the past, and that you did not not exist?'

""No, friend.'

""And do you know that you did evil actions in the past, and that you did not not do them?'

""No, friend.'

""And do you know that you did such-and-such evil actions in the past?'

""No, friend.'

""And do you know that so-and-so much stress has been exhausted, or that so-and-so much stress remains to be exhausted, or that with the exhaustion of so-and-so much stress all stress will be exhausted?'

""No, friend.'

As for what karma removes past karma

(<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/an/an04/an04.235.than.html>):

And what is kamma that is neither dark nor bright with neither dark nor bright result, leading to the ending of kamma? Right view, right resolve, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, right concentration. This is called kamma that is neither dark nor bright with neither dark nor bright result, leading to the ending of kamma.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 7th, 2015 at 3:11 PM

Title: Re: the two truths

Content:

Astus wrote:

The teaching of the two truths is meant to point out that what common people believe to be absolute is relative. Once phenomena are understood as relative, that is the absolute truth. That is, as long as one grasps at words and concepts as something real and independent, that is taking the relative as absolute. Once it is obvious that words are just words and concepts are just concepts, that is seeing the absolute. It is not the case that we should find some absolute beyond the relative, rather just know that the relative is relative.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 7th, 2015 at 7:28 PM

Title: Re: the two truths

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I had the idea that the two truths were originally about how to interpret the teachings.

Astus wrote:

For interpreting the teachings, there is the distinction between neyartha (figurative) and nitārtha (literal). Literal is mostly where there is an explicit teaching on no-self and emptiness, figurative is the rest. The two truths of samvrttisatya (conventional) and paramarthasatya (absolute) are similar, however, conventional stands for dependent origination and absolute for emptiness. Still, there can be a literal teaching that talks explicitly about conventional reality, and there can be figurative teaching that means emptiness. Also, dependent origination and emptiness are actually one, but conventionally talked about separately.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 8th, 2015 at 2:11 AM

Title: Re: Practice/Life difficulties - do you want to see more or

Content:

Astus wrote:

I voted 1. Practising Buddhism must be personal. There is nothing else but making it one's daily life. At least that's how I take it. The difficulty with a forum environment is mostly the same as in any situation: not listening to others as human beings but as if they were some schematic ideas. That is, one individual talking to another or "Soto Zen" versus "Drukpa Kagyu". At the same time, the large amount of personal remarks is quite harmful and discouraging in every conversation, when one "virtual member" tells another "virtual member" what s/he is like (e.g. "You don't understand this"; "You are not qualified for this"; "You need to grow up"). While we are all human beings (or some are nagas perhaps), even in meatspace it is rarely a good idea to be arrogant and presume one knows the other person. Still, I believe that it could work.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 8th, 2015 at 5:10 PM

Title: Re: Stabilising insight

Content:

Astus wrote:

I look at any experience or state of mind gained/developed during meditation or retreat with suspicion. When I tried to keep a specific mental state for a prolonged time, there was just more and more tension generated by the ups and downs of "I want to have it" and "I must keep it".

To me "stabilising insight" means reminding myself that the mind is never stable, and if it looks stable it is just wishful thinking and conceptualisation. Insight for me is that there is nothing to rely on. Stabilising that then is about removing the habit of I-making and my-making, that is, the usual craving for something nice and fearing all the bad stuff. Contemplating a bit the ephemeral nature of all experiences can be helpful. Or just looking at how things are at the moment. There are actually many other ways to remind oneself, but it's already available in the teachings anyway. Taking refuge itself is not getting bogged down in all the self-made hells and heavens.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 11th, 2015 at 9:14 PM

Title: Re: Do our thoughts effect others?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I voted no.

First of all, among the precepts and the ten evil acts there is no description of one's thoughts directly affecting others. Second, there are numerous problems that come from supposing that minds can make direct contact. Third, there is a lack of explanation in Buddhism for how direct mental contact could happen, as far as I'm aware.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 11th, 2015 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: Do our thoughts effect others?

Content:

Ayu said:

So, what about practicing for the benefit of other beings? Prayers & wishes?

Only humbug?

Astus wrote:

There is ill-will as a negative, unvirtuous attitude. Goodwill is a positive, virtuous attitude. Naturally, one should cultivate the latter but not the former.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 11th, 2015 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Do our thoughts effect others?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Every being experiences the result of actions performed by that being. Karma cannot be switched with others where one being acts and another experiences the result. Also, in the case of merit transference, it works only when one being rejoices in and agrees with another's action. Even our physical actions' effects on another are defined by that being's conditioning, while the results of our actions remain ours, both good and bad.

See e.g. <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an05/an05.043.than.html> and <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn42/sn42.006.than.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 12th, 2015 at 4:35 PM

Title: Re: Do our thoughts effect others?

Content:

Jesse said:

I think the biggest assumption people make is thinking that emotions and thoughts that arise in the mind-stream belong to them. That thoughts are contained by anything, where does a thought exist? Is it in the mind? Where is the mind? etc.

So when a certain feeling arises in our mind, if it doesn't belong to us, to whom does it belong? "Belonging", is the creation of an I, and the assigning of some object to that 'I'. Which we all know is illusory, right?

Astus wrote:

Mind-stream means that current thoughts come from past thoughts, there is a causal sequence. Two streams connecting means that another's past thought causes one's current thought. This then invalidates both the causal system of mind-streams and karma in general. That is one of the main problems if such direct mental connection is assumed.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 12th, 2015 at 5:23 PM

Title: Re: Brad Warner Video Interview

Content:

Astus wrote:

Based solely on what was said in the interview: Zen sounds like "believe what you want" and "as long as you sit you do Zen". It is like a group of lazy yogis who try to master a single asana and nothing else. Wanted to say freethinkers instead of yogis, but even free thinking is not involved here. In a sense it is an interesting and strange phenomenon, this whole "sitting Zen". On the other hand, it takes Buddhism and even the Zen tradition as something completely marginal or irrelevant.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 12th, 2015 at 6:52 PM

Title: Re: Do our thoughts effect others?

Content:

Jesse said:

Why would that invalidate anything? If another person crashed their car into yours, whos karma is responsible? Streams of thought exist as casual processes, only their belonging to an individuals mind is invalidated. Our perception of these streams of thought as mine, or as representing 'me', is what's wrong.

Everything is relative, when you are reading a book by a teacher, who's thoughts are you understanding, yours or theirs? Are they different? How about when tibetan Buddhist's do deity visualization practices? The mind becomes its object, or something along those lines right? How is that so different than direct mental connection? Isn't that what makes guru practices so powerful? Your mind becomes one with your teachers etc.

Astus wrote:

What one being experiences, that is that being's experience only. Even if we drank from the same cup, what I tasted and what you tasted could not be shared. I may read what you have written, but that only exists in my perception and my interpretation.

There is a difference between the sequence of experiences, i.e. the mind stream, and the habit of presuming a "doer", a "thinker", or an "owner". That is, there is the storehouse-consciousness, the basic mind stream, there is the manas that appropriates phenomena, and there are the six active consciousnesses. Direct mental connection would be like sharing not only a single eye between two beings, but a single eye-consciousness. And because eye-consciousness comes from the storehouse consciousness, that would have to be the same for both, consequently there would be only one being and not two.

While things are relative, that also means things occur based on causes and conditions. Two trees producing a single fruit is not possible. Whatever is the object of mind, it is not the same as the subject that perceives the object. The seer cannot become the seen, that is a basic condition for relative phenomena. And if we move on from the everyday appearances to the level of dependent origination, there is still a requirement for causal consistency. However, on the final absolute level, it is pointless to talk about one sharing with another.

As for deity and guru yoga, that happens in the practitioner's mind, it is his own imagination.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 12th, 2015 at 7:40 PM

Title: Re: Do our thoughts effect others?

Content:

Saoshun said:

What make you think that your thoughts are yours?

Astus wrote:

There are two things to consider here:

1. One does not need to think that the thoughts are his own, one simply follows whatever thoughts occur and acts on them.
2. The sophisticated, ideological view of a thinker comes from parents, teachers, the culture, reflection and learning.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 12th, 2015 at 8:51 PM

Title: Re: Do our thoughts effect others?

Content:

Astus wrote:

How about this one from Tenzin Wangyal rinpoche discussing "vision is mind":

"Now invite the image of your famous person to come into your awareness. They always come anyway, but this time you are inviting them so that you can look more deeply into this experience. What exactly is this famous person composed of? See the image of the person, the character of this person who bothers you so much. Sense the energetic or emotional presence of this person. When your famous person was born, he or she did not show any physical signs or marks of what you now see. And not all people share your view of this person. What you perceive is your mind, your karmic vision, which is more karma than vision."

(Discovering the True Nature of Mind, in http://www.ligmincha.eu/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=3:ligmincha-magazine-no-05-summer-2012&catid=8&Itemid=117, p 27)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 13th, 2015 at 4:47 AM

Title: Re: Do our thoughts effect others?

Content:

Astus wrote:

More on connection between minds:

"Even if another mind is known in some sense by the yogins who have not completely abandoned the erroneous distinction of subject and object, the validity of their knowledge is limited to the fact that it does not betray them in daily life. As long as the yogins have not abandoned the subject-object distinction, they have not attained the full stature of the Buddha.

By the power of meditation the yogin can have such clear representations that they appear to him almost like the specific forms of the mind of another person, just as deities will bestow grace on a person by appearing in their dreams etc. So even the yogin does not directly grasp another person's mind through his representations. He can be said to know another person's mind only in the sense that the representations which appear in his own mind have the same form (akara) as those in another person's mind. Therefore yogi-pratyaksa is called perception only for the sake of convenience. As long as the essential distinctions are made, we go along with this way of speaking, for the representations which appear to the yogin are so clear that they look almost like the specific forms of another mind. The Buddha cognizes everything, but his cognition cannot be grasped by analytical thinking."

(Dharmakirti: Samtanantara-siddhi, in T. E. Wood: Mind Only, p 217-218)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 13th, 2015 at 5:27 AM

Title: Re: Do our thoughts effect others?

Content:

Jesse said:

My entire point is that conventional reality, is completely relative on every level, and the way we view things completely changes that reality. There is no correct 'view', all views are equal in a place where all things are mere illusions.

Astus wrote:

That interpretation of relativity denies causality, thus negates both morality and the path of liberation. If there is no correct view, there is no noble eightfold path either.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 13th, 2015 at 4:51 PM

Title: Re: Do our thoughts effect others?

Content:

Dan74 said:

The suttas and sutras contain many references to telepathy - knowing thoughts of another.

Astus wrote:

Please see my previous <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=283422#p283422>.

Dan74 said:

I don't think what you are saying, Astus, is supported by the tradition, or for that matter, by logic. Why should the thought-streams be completely isolated from direct contact? Well, obviously they are at least indirectly connected through action. And direct connection happens sometimes too, I believe.

Astus wrote:

Direct contact means that a single thought is produced by two mind-streams, and in that moment the two streams are one. It is not like shaking hands, it is two hands becoming a single hand. Every being experiences their own mental constructs, their own karma. To say that one person can put a thought in another's mind, that is equal to one committing a crime and another suffering its consequences. What is your reasoning for direct contact?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 13th, 2015 at 4:54 PM

Title: Re: Do our thoughts effect others?

Content:

Jesse said:

astus, I don't think the relativity of reality dismisses karma, or causality. It just means even karma and casualty is insubstantial.

Astus wrote:

Insubstantial means that there is no permanent essence. It is exactly because there is no such eternal substance that there is causality. Based on causality action is followed by its fruit, every being is an heir to their own karma.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 13th, 2015 at 6:21 PM

Title: Re: Do our thoughts effect others?

Content:

Jesse said:

The idea we are separated from everything else is delusional, that our karma is not everyone's karma is delusional. We can't move a muscle without effecting everything around us.

Astus wrote:

Are you saying that it is accidental that people are born where they are born, and it is not the result of their past actions that some are born in a pleasurable environment, while others in a bad one?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 13th, 2015 at 7:58 PM

Title: Re: Do our thoughts effect others?

Content:

Jesse said:

I didn't choose to be born a human. I didn't do anything so far as I can tell.

Astus wrote:

I don't remember my last month's breakfast, but that doesn't mean I didn't have one. As far as the Buddha's teaching goes, birth is determined by one's karma.

Jesse said:

There is almost certainly individual and collective karma though.

Astus wrote:

Karma comes from intentional action and impresses one's mind-stream. A collective has neither intention nor mind, thus karma cannot occur.

Jesse said:

We can't be separated from the world no matter what.

Astus wrote:

The world is what and how we experience it. That experience is completely individual.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 13th, 2015 at 8:59 PM

Title: Re: Do our thoughts effect others?

Content:

Jesse said:

https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Swarm_intelligence

Astus wrote:

That does not establish a mind, just how certain beings behave in larger groups.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 14th, 2015 at 4:43 PM

Title: Re: Do our thoughts effect others?

Content:

Jesse said:

If I throw a rock at someone's head, who did absolutely nothing to me. How did their karma cause it?

Astus wrote:

Then Ven. Angulimala, early in the morning, having put on his robes and carrying his outer robe & bowl, went into Savatthi for alms. Now at that time a clod thrown by one person hit Ven. Angulimala on the body, a stone thrown by another person hit him on the body, and a potsherd thrown by still another person hit him on the body. So Ven. Angulimala — his head broken open and dripping with blood, his bowl broken, and his outer robe ripped to shreds — went to the Blessed One. The Blessed One saw him coming from afar and on seeing him said to him: "Bear with it, brahman! Bear with it! The fruit of the kamma that would have burned you in hell for many years, many hundreds of years, many thousands of years, you are now experiencing in the here-&-now!"

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.086.than.html>)

"if there is a good son or good daughter who memorizes and recites this scripture, but is belittled by others, it is because this person committed crimes in a prior life which resulted in negative rebirths. Through enduring the disparagement of others in the present life, the bad karma from the prior lives can be removed, and one can attain peerless perfect enlightenment."

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html)

What is the practice of accepting adversity? When suffering, a practitioner of the Way should reflect: "For innumerable kalpas, I have pursued the trivial instead of the essential, drifted through all spheres of existence, created much animosity and hatred, maligned and harmed others endlessly. Even though now I have done no wrong, I am reaping the karmic consequences of past transgressions. It is something that neither the heavens nor other people can impose upon me. Therefore I should accept it willingly, without any resentment or objection."

(http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enUS/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=146&Itemid=57)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 14th, 2015 at 7:46 PM

Title: Re: Do our thoughts effect others?

Content:

Dan74 said:

There is also plentiful mention of collective karma in the scriptures such as when Buddha's clansmen the Sakyas were about to be slaughtered and Mauggalana with his magic powers attempted to rescue some, etc etc.

Astus wrote:

Collective karma does not mean a separate karma from individual karma, only that there are mental habits similar to others. That is, karma does not exist outside of a mind-stream, and there is no such entity as a group mind. People on this forum may all like the Buddha's teachings, but that doesn't mean there is then a "forum mind". Another examples are language and culture that many people share, but it would be difficult to show where is a "nation-consciousness" and a "language-consciousness". Ideas - like the idea of a nation - does not obtain an existence on its own, it remains an abstract concept regardless of how many people believe in it.

Can you quote some teachings where "collective karma" is explained? First of all, what is "collective karma" in Sanskrit/Chinese/Tibetan?

Dan74 said:

Also, Astus, perceiving a thought of another is not akin to two minds giving rise to the same thought. A thought of another may be perceived as having a different 'flavour' to one's own thought. I'm sorry but telepathy, as you much know, is recognised as a siddhi, by all Buddhist traditions and I don't find your reasoning to be compelling at all.

Astus wrote:

As <http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=283422#p283422>, perceiving another's mind is not the same as actually perceiving another's mind, there is no direct contact. But here's more:

"Who says that another person's mind is not the object of one's own consciousness? We only deny that it is its immediate and direct object. This means that, when the consciousness of another person's mind manifests itself, it (that other mind) has no real function in one's own consciousness. Thus, the case is different from that of the hands, etc., which directly grasp external things themselves, or the sun, etc., which directly spreads its light itself, thus shining upon external objects. (In its relationship to another person's mind,) one's consciousness is only like a mirror in which there appears what seems to be an external sphere of objects. One's mind is then said to understand the mind of the other person, but it cannot understand another mind immediately and directly. What it does understand directly is only what it itself develops. That is why 'the Samdhinirmocana Sutra says : 'There is not the least thing [one's own mind] that can apprehend (i.e., perceive) any other thing [other minds]. The only point is that, when consciousness is born, it manifests a semblance of another thing, and is then said to apprehend that thing. In this way, one's own mind seems like perceiving another person's mind as an object, as it perceives material things, etc., (which are evolved out of that mind)," (Xuanzang: Cheng Weishi Lun, tr. Wei Tat, p 523, also in Three Texts on Consciousness Only, p 239; see comments in Buddhist Phenomenology on p 490)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 14th, 2015 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: Do our thoughts effect others?

Content:

PorkChop said:

Perceiving the thoughts of another is not the same thing as directly perceiving the mind of another.

Astus wrote:

Mind and thoughts are not two separate things. Mind is just a series of mental dharma (thoughts and emotions in common terms).

As a summary:

First, here as in many other places in the Ch'eng wei-shih lun, the text is quick to point out that 'consciousness-only' (vijñāna-mātra, vijñapti-mātra, wei-shih) never means an isolated citta or a single solitary consciousness, but always includes the caittas, the felt, lived textures and cognitive fields within which cognition occurs and from which its characteristics (e.g., angry, doubtful, attentive, etc.) are inscribed. Consciousness is never apart from its caittas, and thus 'consciousness only' never means that only a subjective projector exists; what is discriminated, perceived, objective, etc., also exists, but the term 'exists' will be qualified to include only that which can be experienced (directly or indirectly), i.e., only that which exerts some efficient causal effect which is (in principle) observable can be said to 'exist.'
(Buddhist Phenomenology, p 485)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 14th, 2015 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: Numbered series

Content:

Astus wrote:

Personally, the four foundations of mindfulness. The first teaching I've encountered from the Buddha. Plus: "This is the direct path for the purification of beings, for the overcoming of sorrow & lamentation, for the disappearance of pain & distress, for the attainment of the right method, & for the realization of Unbinding"

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 14th, 2015 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: Do our thoughts effect others?

Content:

PorkChop said:

Sorry, but luminous mind is not a thought, nor is it riddled with random thoughts when one is residing in cessation samadhi.

Astus wrote:

The point is that the quote from the Cheng Weishi Lun is not discussing perceiving "luminous mind", but just consciousness in general. During cessation there is no active consciousness anyway.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 14th, 2015 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: Do our thoughts effect others?

Content:

Astus wrote:

What I'm saying is that there cannot be direct contact between minds. That's it. And just as the sight of a chair is a product of one's mind, so is whatever is imagined to be another being's mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 15th, 2015 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: Do our thoughts effect others?

Content:

PorkChop said:

"Outflow" in the sense of "leaks" or "faults" is probably not the right term here. But I believe that was the term used in the other thread.

Astus wrote:

Here's one on "leaking thoughts": <https://youtu.be/ZgBqqJyRaa4?t=326>

PorkChop said:

The stains are not the mind.

Astus wrote:

"Thoughts and dharmakaya are inseparable. We have this dualistic approach of seeing dharmakaya as pure and thoughts as impure, but we need to understand the inseparability of thoughts and dharmakaya."

(http://www.kagyumonlam.org/english/news/Report/Report_20130103.html)

Further explanation:

In the Kagyu Lineage Supplication, Jampal Zangpo says, "The nature of thought is dharmakaya." Some scholars may say this statement doesn't make sense. How, they ask, could confused thoughts and the pure dharmakaya be the same thing? They have a point, for if you look at all the different aspects you would have to say that in some respects thoughts are not dharmakaya. On the conventional level, mind and thoughts appear to be different. But in the context of meditative experience, the nature of thought is the dharmadhatu, and the dharmadhatu is the dharmakaya. Therefore, the nature of thoughts is dharmakaya. From this point of view thoughts are coemergent-there is no difference between thoughts and mind.

Some people misunderstand the teaching "thought is dharmakaya" to mean that when a thought arises, it is pacified or dissolved, and then we are left with dharmakaya. Others misunderstand it to mean that if we realize thought to be dharmakaya, it is dharmakaya. The word dharmakaya, however, is made up of dharma meaning "the truth" and kaya meaning "embodiment." Thus dharmakaya refers to the ultimate mind of the Buddha. These two ways of misunderstanding the teaching stem from not understanding that, from the very beginning, thought is nothing other than the ultimate reality of the Buddha's omniscient mind. Thought doesn't become dharmakaya at some later time, and it doesn't depend on whether or not we are aware that it is dharmakaya. The first dharma in the Four Dharmas of Gampopa is, "May the mind be one with the Dharma;" the second is, "May the Dharma go on the path;" the third is, "May the path destroy confusion;" and the fourth is, "May confusion dawn as wisdom." The fourth dharma refers to thoughts. When we look into the nature of the thoughts, we see the union of luminosity and emptiness; in that way, thoughts are seen to be of the very nature of wisdom.

(Essentials of Mahamudra, p 158)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 15th, 2015 at 5:10 PM

Title: Re: Do our thoughts effect others?

Content:

PorkChop said:

Now you can quibble over these passages and what they mean all you want, but they are extremely clear. You can let this drop, or you can continue, but after a certain point one of two things is going to happen - 1. people are just going to see it as obstinacy and 2. people are going to question your English capability - because not a single one of the passages you've posted asserts what you are asserting and not a single tradition would uphold it as such.

Astus wrote:

The passages you have cited I have no problem with at all. The six abhijnas were not questioned. The difference I have been emphasising from the beginning is between direct and indirect contact. And that's what the quotes I have provided before speak of. And why is it a relevant question if there is a direct contact or not? Because only direct contact would allow influencing others' minds in the way it was raised here as a topic for discussion.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 15th, 2015 at 5:28 PM

Title: Re: Do our thoughts effect others?

Content:

Dan74 said:

Or perhaps there can be no actual separation between minds. Any separation that appears to be there, is the separation between the streams of deluded habits.

Astus wrote:

Since minds are not physical objects, the way they are separated are by conditioning. That is, what is called a mind-stream consists of series of mental causal chains. Consequently, non-separation would mean one stream affecting another, becoming the cause of another stream. That then would mean a merging of two streams into a single stream, or rather the takeover of one stream by another, and other problems mentioned before.

I think one of the difficulties in this discussion is that if someone imagines mind to be some sort of box (or "infinite space", functionally the same) containing all the thoughts, one can think that no matter what happens to the contents of the box, the box remains the same. But that is practically supposing an atman that remains independent. On the other hand, regardless if we take the six or the eight consciousnesses, both are understood to be momentary instances of mental dharmas forming a causal stream, thus there is no space left for some higher consciousness to remain unaffected.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 15th, 2015 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: Zhiyi's Edonsho

Content:

Jikan said:

It also makes some radical claims that should provoke some healthy discussion.

Astus wrote:

Apparently those claims are not radical any more to incite some debate.

Here's another one from a later Tendai master:

"Thus, if while walking, standing, sitting, or lying down, or while performing any kind of action, you think, "I am suchness," then that is realizing Buddhahood. What could be an obstruction [to such contemplation]? You should know that suchness is to be contemplated with respect to all things. Clergy or laity, male or female - all should contemplate in this way."

(Genshin:

<http://www.princeton.edu/~jstone/Articles%20on%20the%20Lotus%20Sutra%20Tendai%20and%20Nichiren%20Buddhism/The%20Contemplation%20of%20Suchness%20%28translations%20from%20Shinnyokan.pdf>, tr J. I. Stone in "Religions of Japan in Practice", p 208)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 17th, 2015 at 6:49 PM

Title: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Is there anything else to attach to beyond the five aggregates? If yes, what is it? If no, isn't there only one kind of liberation?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 17th, 2015 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Astus wrote:

As your quote says, there is nothing to objectify, nothing to attach to beyond the six sensory areas. The question raised here asks if there is anything else one could be attached to, what one would need to attain liberation from. If no, then there is only one kind of freedom, the cessation of clinging to the aggregates/senses.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 17th, 2015 at 9:39 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

seeker242 said:

I would say so. According to the "one vehicle" or "Ekayāna", yes, only one kind of liberation.

Astus wrote:

However, if it is just not being attached to the aggregates, sravakas attain that, not only buddhas.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 18th, 2015 at 12:08 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, there is something beyond the skandhas, the āyatanas. Specifically, the skandhas include only conditioned phenomena, while space and the two kinds of cessations, the unconditioned phenomena, belong to the dharma-āyatana/dhātu.

Astus wrote:

Although "Unconditioned things are not named with respect to the skandhas, because they do not correspond to the concept" (Kosha, vol 1, p 81), there is a matching between the skandhas, ayatanas and dhatus (Kosha, vol 1, p 74; Inner Science of Buddhist Practice, p 241). In that way, the aggregate of consciousness includes the dharmadhatu. The unconditioned dharmas are practically just absences, and as referred to before by the Khotthita Sutta, they need not be discussed, plus as you say, they are not related to attachment ("Thus unconditioned things, which are neither the cause of defilement, nor the cause of purification, cannot be placed either among the upadanaskandhas nor among the skandhas"; Kosha, vol 1, p 82).

Malcolm said:

And yes, there is only one kind of liberation. Liberation is being free from the afflictions that cause rebirth in the three realms, there is no other kind of liberation beyond that. However there is something to attain beyond liberation, and that is omniscience. But there is only one liberation.

Astus wrote:

Omniscience is blocked by attachment to concepts, but concepts themselves belong to the aggregates, so if there is no attachment to the aggregates, there cannot be attachment to concepts either.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 18th, 2015 at 1:01 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Arhats and pratyekabuddhas are not at all attached to the aggregate of consciousness, or concepts, and yet still have non-afflictive ignorance. Because of this non-afflictive ignorance, they do not have omniscience. So it is pretty clear the attainment of omniscience is more than mere nonattachment to concepts and aggregates.

Astus wrote:

That non-afflictive ignorance is the cognitive hindrance, not knowing the emptiness of appearances, that is, considering phenomena to be real. Such reification is conceptual attachment. What more is there to it? Is there a third hindrance?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 18th, 2015 at 3:58 AM

Title: Re: Do our thoughts effect others?

Content:

WeiHan said:

I don't see the statement above as true as indirect contact can also influence others' mind. I am actually thinking of interaction of minds through a medium and other factors. Why not? In science, interaction between particles are understood to be through a medium field, for example, charged particles through electromagnetic field.

Astus wrote:

Indirectly it happens all the time during all sorts of interaction between people. Like on this forum.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 18th, 2015 at 4:09 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

So you disagree with Tsongkhapa when he asserts that the realization of emptiness in Hinayāna and Mahāyana is the same?

Astus wrote:

I'm rather questioning if there is a point in setting up two kinds of hindrances, as by not identifying with any of the aggregates there is no basis for any of them.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 18th, 2015 at 4:40 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

No one "set them up." They are there unless or until you can dwell in direct perception of ultimate truth 24/7/365.

Astus wrote:

If both are removed at the same time when freed from identification with the aggregates, then one cannot be free from afflictions but still limited by concepts.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 18th, 2015 at 3:01 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Astus, what are you talking about? The emptiness of persons or the emptiness of phenomena? They are not the same thing.

Astus wrote:

This is just one of my thought experiments.

Premises:

1. The root of all hindrances and ignorance is conceptualisation.
2. Concepts fall within the area of the aggregates.
3. Arhats are free from the aggregates.

Conclusion:

4. Arhats attain complete enlightenment.

So the question:

Is there anything else beyond the aggregates to be free from?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 18th, 2015 at 5:45 PM

Title: Re: Liberation from the Six Realms & other Religions

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is the teaching of the Buddha from the beginning. Either one follows the correct path, i.e. the Buddhadharma, or there is no escape. Anyway, most of the other religions aim for heavenly birth, not nirvana.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 18th, 2015 at 8:28 PM

Title: Re: Liberation from the Six Realms & other Religions

Content:

Astus wrote:

It might be so that many Buddhists (ordained or not) have little interest in their own liberation - thus the common view that it is a far away goal beyond one's abilities - but that shouldn't concern those who aspire for the best of the best. At the same time, even those on the path of freedom can be on various stages, but that is already being within the community of noble practitioners.

Here is a definition of a "proper disciple" of the Buddha

(<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.035.than.html>):

"Now, Master Gotama, to what extent is a disciple of Master Gotama one who carries out his message, carries out his instruction, one who has crossed over & beyond doubt, one with no more questioning, one who has gained fearlessness and dwells independent of others with regard to the Teacher's message?"

"There is the case, Aggivessana, where a disciple of mine sees with right discernment any form whatsoever — past, future, or present; internal or external; blatant or subtle; common or sublime; far or near: every form as it has come to be — as 'This is not mine. This is not my self. This is not what I am.'

"He sees with right discernment any feeling... any perception... any fabrications... any consciousness whatsoever — past, future, or present; internal or external; blatant or subtle; common or sublime; far or near: every consciousness as it has come to be — as 'This is not mine. This is not my self. This is not what I am.'

"It's to this extent, Aggivessana, that a disciple of mine is one who carries out my message, carries out my instruction, one who has crossed over & beyond doubt, one with no more questioning, one who has gained fearlessness and dwells independent of others with regard to the Teacher's message."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 19th, 2015 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

If you are a Hinayānista, then yes. If you are Mahāyānista, then no.

Astus wrote:

If it is the conclusion you have a problem with, what else would you add where an arhat is still deluded?

daverupa said:

Well, except (1) isn't accurate & (3) should probably be unpacked... and, (2) goes without saying -anything will be within the All, not outside of it.

Astus wrote:

How is (1) inaccurate? (conceptualisation - vikalpa, prapanca)

That arhats are free from the aggregates means that they have no attachment, no identification with the skandhas. They have realised that whatever occurs (whatever aggregate it is), it is impermanent, suffering and without a self.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 19th, 2015 at 5:27 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

First stage bodhisattvas realize two-fold emptiness, and yet still have to eliminate the two obscurations. I guess you better study Abhisamaya-alamkara.

Astus wrote:

A bodhisattva's realisation is not completely stable until buddhahood, thus their attachments are not totally cut, unlike an arhat.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 19th, 2015 at 3:55 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

daverupa said:

Papanca is not the root of ignorance, ignorance is the root of papanca. You have it backwards.

Astus wrote:

It is being ignorant of the emptiness of appearances that generates grasping, and from grasping comes proliferation. In other words, upholding that a concept has reality results in conceptualisation. Grasping at a concept and conceptualising something is practically the same, one does not happen without the other. Thus, realising the emptiness of mind (mental aggregates) ends proliferation.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 19th, 2015 at 5:36 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

An eighth stage bodhisattva has eliminated all afflictive obscurations, like an arhat, but they have not eliminated all knowledge obscurations, like an arhat.

As I said, time to get out the old Abhisamaya-alaṃkāra so you can understand the difference between the abhisamaya of a śrāvaka, pratyekabuddha and a buddha.

Astus wrote:

It seems that what bodhisattvas need to eliminate as cognitive obscurations are basically the conceptions of apprehender and apprehended, in other words, realising the emptiness of self and phenomena. The difference between the stages they go through is only a matter of depth of that realisation. Since it all ultimately depends on attachment to concepts assuming real phenomena, through relinquishing the identification with the mental aggregates arhats should be completely free as well.

From Gone Beyond, vol 1, appendix 2, page 673-674:

BOUNDARY LINES OF RELINQUISHMENT

afflictive obscurations

hinayana

a) afflictive obscurations that agitate the mind stream and those that are latencies—the nirvana with remainder

b) same plus karmic and maturational afflictive obscurations—the nirvana without remainder mahayana

a) the afflictive obscurations that agitate the mind stream—first bhūmi (dharma readiness of suffering of the path of seeing)

b) the afflictive obscurations that are latencies (causes for taking birth in saṃsāra)

- those that are factors to be relinquished through seeing—simultaneously with the 108 conceptions that are the cognitive obscurations to be relinquished on the path of seeing

- those that are factors to be relinquished through familiarization—simultaneously with the 108 conceptions that are the cognitive obscurations to be relinquished on the path of familiarization cognitive obscurations

pratyekabuddhas

the conceptions about the apprehended being substantially other than the apprehender— arhathood (starting from the path of familiarization onward)

mahayana

A) the conceptions on the path of preparation (in the manner of suppressing them)

- seeing that the apprehended in terms of afflicted phenomena is without nature—heat
- seeing that the apprehended in terms of purified phenomena is without nature—peak
- seeing that substantial apprehending is without nature—poised readiness
- seeing that imputational apprehending is without nature—supreme dharma

B) the conceptions about apprehender and apprehended (the conceptions plus their seeds that cling to characteristics and obstruct the thorough analysis of what is to be known)

a) the conceptions that apprehend by conflating terms and referents and cling to the duality of apprehender and apprehended—the dharma cognition of suffering on the path of seeing (starting with the dharma readiness of suffering)

b) the false imagination of dualistic appearances

- the latent tendencies that produce the false imagination of dualistic appearance and are factors to be relinquished through seeing— simultaneously with the obscurations to be relinquished on the path of seeing
- the latent tendencies that produce the false imagination of dualistic appearance and are factors to be relinquished through familiarization— simultaneously with the obscurations to be relinquished on the path of familiarization

C) the impregnations of negative tendencies (the alaya-consciousness or the latent tendencies of duality)—vajralike samadhi

In other words:

- the imputational clinging to real existence: bhūmi 1
- the innate clinging to real existence: bhūmis 2-10
- the imputational clinging to characteristics:
 - manifest: bhūmis 2-7
 - retaining a certain potency: bhūmis 8-10

Some definitions:

The innate clinging to phenomenal identity is the sheer clinging of thinking, “This is a sprout” when focusing on a sprout. [This clinging] is unaltered by philosophical systems. The imputational [clinging to phenomenal identity] refers to imputing all kinds of things onto the [innate clinging]. The classification [of the imputational clinging] is into

a) saying that the apprehended is really established

b) saying that consciousness is really established.

(Gone Beyond, vol 1, p 218)

For, in terms of general isolates, conceptions are cognitive obscurations, but they also represent the afflictive obscurations of bodhisattvas. Therefore, through primarily relinquishing conceptions, as a matter of course, [bodhisattvas] also relinquish the afflictive obscurations. With this in mind, venerable Vasubandhu declared [in his Mahayanasutralamkarabhāṣya on 1.5]: The afflictions of bodhisattvas are conceptions. (Gone Beyond, vol 1, p 589-590)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 19th, 2015 at 7:53 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

seeker242 said:

Isn't it taught that arhats are still attached to something and thus have a fear and/or aversion to samsara?

Astus wrote:

Depending on which scripture you take up, you can find various lists of faults of arhats. At the same time, since arhats are at least free from attachment to the aggregates, it becomes somewhat problematic to point out what it is exactly where an arhat's view is obscured, if there are only the aggregates to what any being can rely on and identify with.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 19th, 2015 at 10:31 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

You are making the mistake of assuming that liberation = buddhahood. It doesn't.

Astus wrote:

They don't have to be. The question is, where is the difference? The Abhisamayalamkara (or at least what is in Gone Beyond, haven't checked other works) follows the Yogacara interpretation, that with the complete transformation of the basis cognitive obscurations are completely removed and thus buddhahood is attained. Since the hindrance to knowledge is a set of attachments to concepts, basically various forms of subject-object duality, and that should no longer exist for an arhat who does not identify with any aggregate, there should be no difference.

What could make a difference - if it is accepted that an arhat has no clinging at all - is just the time spent with accumulating merit that generates the karmic force for the buddha attributes. But then there cannot be a tathagatagarbha. Or if we want there to be buddha-nature, then there is the Lotus Sutra model where arhats don't actually reach nirvana, only a temporary stay in nothingness, therefore they are not totally free from the aggregates, but that's contrary to some other teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 20th, 2015 at 3:49 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

daverupa said:

But it seems like one trouble you might be having is the lack of perfect overlap between these various schools of Buddhism. You're just going to have to find a criterion that sets some of it aside, so you can get to work (I chose text criticism & history, etc.). Otherwise you're going to end up with spools of Astus-Abhidhamma, which might not be ideal.

Astus wrote:

In some ways I like to think that all vehicles are actually the ox-vehicle. Not because eventually sravakas are removed from their nirvanic slumber to move on as bodhisattvas, but because all the teachings of the Buddha bring about the same result: i.e. freedom from identification with the aggregates.

"those who are stupid talk of the trinity of vehicles and not of the state of Mind-only where there are no images."

(Lankavatara Sutra, 2.18, tr Suzuki)

"There is really no establishment of various vehicles, and so I speak of the one vehicle; but in order to carry the ignorant I talk of a variety of vehicles."

(Lankavatara Sutra, 2.56)

"All the dharmas of this world and of the worlds beyond are without self-nature. Also, they are without produced nature. They are just empty names, and these names are also empty. All you are doing is taking these worthless names to be real. That's all wrong! Even if they do exist, they are nothing but states of dependent transformation, such as the dependent transformations of bodhi, nirvana, emancipation, the threefold body, the [objective] surroundings and the [subjective] mind, bodhisattvahood, and buddhahood. What are you looking for in these lands of dependent transformations! All of these, up to and including the Three Vehicles' twelve divisions of teachings, are just so much waste paper to wipe off privy filth. The Buddha is just a phantom body, the patriarchs just old monks."

(Record of Linji, p 19, tr Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 20th, 2015 at 4:47 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

zengen said:

According to Mahayana, the stage of an Arhat is that of partial enlightenment, not the complete enlightenment attained by the Buddhas. There are many stages of realization beyond the stage of Arhatship. These stages are mentioned in Mahayana sutras such as the Lotus Sutra, Shurangama Sutra, Lankavatara Sutra, Avatamsaka Sutra etc.

Astus wrote:

Hsuan Hua says in his commentary to the 9th chapter of the Diamond Sutra (p 117-118, http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/prajparagen2.pdf):

The Arhat of the Small Vehicle kills the thieves of affliction. The Bodhisattva should not only kill the thieves, but should also kill that which is not the thief, that is to say, ignorance. At the realization of Arhatship, ignorance is not considered a thief, but at the culmination of Bodhisattvahood it is, because of the realization that all affliction comes from ignorance.

Although the Arhat has realized The Position of No Study, he still has ignorance. Even equal enlightenment Bodhisattvas still have one last particle of ignorance which acts as a thief and which Bodhisattvas recognize to be the greatest thief. Therefore it is said that they must kill that which for the Arhat is not a thief.

Subh ti was asked if an Arhat can have the thought that he has obtained Arhatship, and he replied, "No, because although he has certified to the fruit of Arhatship, it is just a name and nothing more." Not only upon certification to the fruit of Arhatship is there no realization, but even upon attainment of Buddhahood there is none. There is no tangible dharma which can be called Arhat. It is an empty name. If one thinks it exists, one has an attachment to dharmas and has not realized the emptiness of dharmas.

If an Arhat did have the thought that he has obtained Arhatship, he would be attached to self, others, living beings, and a life. He would not have realized the emptiness of self or of dharmas, nor would he have obtained Arhatship. The thought of obtaining Arhatship carries with it the mark of self, which in turn produces its partner, the mark of others. Having the paired dharmas of self and others creates the mark of living beings, which in turn leads to the mark of a life. He would therefore be attached to the four marks.

That is, according to Hsuan Hua, an arhat does realise the emptiness of self and the emptiness of dharma. The sutra itself uses the often repeated lines here, that an arhat is free from the "attachment to self, to others, to living beings, and to a life", that is, the four marks/characteristics. At the same time, he says that an arhat does not destroy ignorance. But what else ignorance could be than grasping at the four marks? See further from his commentary:

Ch 6 commentary, p 100:

"If those living beings' hearts grasp at marks, if they hold to the mark of people, they still grasp at the four marks and have not obtained liberation. They have not genuinely put everything down. If they grasp at the mark of dharmas they are still attached to the four marks; if they grasp at the mark of the non-existence of dharmas, they are also attached to the four marks, because they have not seen through and smashed them. They have not realized the emptiness of people, of dharmas, and of emptiness itself."

Ch 14 commentary, p 161:

"Such people will. Have no mark of self, meaning they have no greed. No mark of others, meaning they have no anger. No mark of living beings, meaning they are not stupid. No mark of a life, meaning they have no desire. They have no greed, anger, stupidity, or desire — these four kinds of attachments. The four marks are without a mark. No mark is real mark. Real mark is no mark. And why? Because real mark is also distinct from all which has no marks. If you can obtain real mark, that is obtaining the principle substance of the self-nature of all Buddhas. Those who have relinquished all marks are called Buddhas. Therefore you too can certainly become a Buddha."

So there is a contradiction here in a single commentary. The same problem raised by this thread, that if an arhat is free from the aggregates, then what else could be left to relinquish?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 20th, 2015 at 4:55 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

And yet there is a difference.

You might be better off securing Sparham's four volume translation of Vimuktesena and Haribhadra's text.

However, it is mostly covered in chapter two and three the AA and its commentaries.

This issue is deep and not easy to understand, it certainly cannot be summarized in internet sound bites.

Astus wrote:

I appreciate your suggestion to look further into the AA, however, the edition you recommend I have in a not that user friendly copy. Could you specify by page numbers perhaps the section you think is relevant here? Or quote here the arguments, if they are any different from what is listed in Gone Beyond regarding the 108 types of cognitive obscurations?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 20th, 2015 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The differences are principally described in chapter two, and somewhat and three. I am afraid you are going to have to slog through it because it cannot be simply summarized. But for example, Pratyekabuddhas do not relinquish the subjective, but do relinquish objective entities.

There are many differences related to the path.

Astus wrote:

I've read through the chapters discussing the paths of sravakas, pratyekas and bodhisattvas (vol 2, p 4-18, 51-55, 82-135), and also searched for key words, but found nothing new and relevant. In fact, so far the Gone Beyond seems significantly more informative and extensive than Vimuktisena and Haribhadra.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 21st, 2015 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Just on page four alone there is a significant difference. Also, Gone Beyond has the benefit of being a compilation of later Tibetan exegesis; however that is also its defect.

Astus wrote:

What significant difference do you mean?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 21st, 2015 at 1:03 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

"The knowledge of the paths of bodhisattvas does not totally eliminate cankers"...etc., and so on.

Astus wrote:

"The enhancing factor is to have the nature of not relinquishing the afflictions that are the causes for rebirth in [samsaric] existence for the sake of accomplishing the welfare of others." (Gone Beyond, vol 1, p 332)

I thought you meant difference between those two works, not differences between the paths. As for the differences between arhats and others, <http://dharma wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=284151#p284151>, and that's when you directed me to check the Indian commentaries, but so far you have not answered how can there be something left for arhats to be attached to.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 21st, 2015 at 2:00 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Thus, it is as I already explained to you. Arhats and pratyekabuddhas have an species of non-afflictive ignorance. There are other differences, but this is the main one.

Astus wrote:

And that non-afflictive ignorance has been taken up before. What does that ignorance consist of? It is the mentioned 108 types of cognitive hindrance, that is basically the ignorance about the emptiness of dharmas and the delusion of apprehender and apprehended. So the question: how can there be such an ignorance if an arhat has no attachment to mental phenomena?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 21st, 2015 at 2:17 AM

Title: Re: What is shikantaza?

Content:

Astus wrote:

As you know, it is "just sitting". And that is what it is, although it is not restricted to the seated position. As for what happens during sitting, it can be anything. The only thing that matters is whether one is sucked in by the ongoing events or not. It is not deliberately thinking of something (shiryō 思量), nor is it deliberately not thinking of something (fushiryō 不思議), but simply being aware of thoughts coming and going (hishiryō 非思量). Or in other words, not a busy mind, not a sleeping mind, but an aware mind.

In zazen we simply allow any thought, feeling or emotion to come up and then we simply let them go away; we actually do nothing. In sitting, any thought or condition of mind is like a cloud in the sky. Somehow clouds appear in the sky, changing form as they stay for a while, and then they disappear. Similar to clouds in the sky, any thought that appears in zazen simply stays for a while and then disappears. I have been practicing this style of meditation for more than 35 years, and in my experience, no thought stays in the mind forever. Everything is coming and going, and we just let things come up freely and let them go away freely. We don't try to fight against our thoughts or any other mental condition, and we don't try to interact with them, either. The intention is not to grasp what is coming up from your consciousness. We actually do nothing but let the things happening within the mind just flow. Yet when you become aware that you are interacting with what is happening in your mind, just stop interacting and return to the zazen posture while breathing with the eyes open. That means you let go of whatever thoughts come up, and you also don't sleep. This is the point in our sitting practice.
(<http://antaiji.org/dharma/okumura-mind-and-zazen/?lang=en>)

Zazen means to clarify the mind-ground and dwell comfortably in your actual nature. This is called revealing yourself and manifesting the original-ground. In zazen both body and mind drop off. Zazen is far beyond the form of sitting or lying down. Free from considerations of good and evil, zazen transcends distinctions between ordinary people and sages, it goes far beyond judgements of deluded or enlightened. Zazen includes no boundary between sentient beings and buddha. Therefore put aside all affairs, and let go of all associations. Do nothing at all. The six senses produce nothing.
(<http://antaiji.org/dharma/english-zazen-yojinki/?lang=en>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 21st, 2015 at 3:10 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Absence of attachment does not equal knowledge.

Astus wrote:

In one way, that is very true and spot on. On the other hand though, the obscurations in question are hindrances to knowledge and not lack of knowledge. Not seeing the emptiness of dharmas means being attached to dharmas, so without attachment there is seeing. In tathagatagarbha terms, one needs to remove the dirt and not add more gold. So, in this case, the absence of attachment does equal knowledge.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 21st, 2015 at 3:30 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

daverupa said:

The arahant is asekha; the training is complete; the arahant has done what needed to be done. This later sort of slander is intriguing, but not worth tying yourself in knots over, Astus.

Astus wrote:

As Malcolm said, even sravakayana teachings talk about non-afflictive ignorance in case of arhats, although I'm not aware if Theravada has anything to say about it. What it is meant to explain is the various behaviours and odd actions by arhats. So, in a sense, it is a very human thing. Mahayana, as it is used to do this, idealises the enlightened being and considers it a fault that arhats are not as perfect as buddhas. Or rather we could say that almost from the beginning the Buddha has been seen as somewhat superior to the others, and Mahayana simply follows this trend in Buddhism.

I think an important thing to note here is that while arhats are "blamed" for still having human traits, in other traditions as well we can find that those who are considered the enlightened ones of the tradition (bodhisattvas, zen masters, siddhas, etc.) look and act very much like human beings. So, while theoretically the title arhat got demoted in Mahayana, practically only the name changed to something else.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 21st, 2015 at 5:35 PM

Title: Re: The 'Neither One Nor Many' argument (partless particles)

Content:

Astus wrote:

Partless particles are impossible. If it is a particle, it exists in space and has extension. That extension, no matter how small, can be divided. If it can be divided, it is not partless.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 21st, 2015 at 9:15 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Nevertheless, arhats have subject-object conceptualization and pratyekabuddhas have subject conceptualization. Buddhas, of course, have neither subject nor object conceptualization and so their awakening is superior to that of the former pair.

Astus wrote:

This kind of conceptualisation is what I don't see how can be there while there is no attachment to the aggregates. Where does that conceptualisation reside, what does it come from, what keeps it going on? It cannot be the aggregates, but there is no conceptualisation outside them either.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 21st, 2015 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

What Sanskrit term to you mean by "attachment"?

I think the problem lies with your definitions.

Astus wrote:

I think upadana is very appropriate here, like in pancopadanaskandha.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2015 at 3:07 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Upādāna means "addiction", not attachment.

Astus wrote:

I have not seen that kind of translation yet.

<http://dsal.srv02.uchicago.edu/cgi-bin/philologic/getobject.pl?c.0:1:3973.pali> (nt.) [fr. upa + ā + dā] -- (lit. that (material) substratum by means of which an active process is kept alive or going), fuel, supply, provision

<http://dictionary.buddhistdoor.com/en/word/4365/upadana> is the common rendering for upādāna, though 'grasping' would come closer to the literal meaning of it, which is 'uptake'; s. Three Cardinal Discourses

(<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/authors/nanamoli/wheel017.html>), p.19.

<http://www.buddhism-dict.net/ddb/indexes/term-sa-u.html> of it include: 取 (take, receive, obtain), 受 (receive, accept, get), 依 (rely on, be set in), 執 (hold in hand; keep)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2015 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: What is shikantaza?

Content:

zenman said:

I wonder how thoroughly they study buddhist psychology in the Soto-tradition? I think shikantaza can very easily become mere shamatha which is not bad but in the long run doesn't manage to put an end to dukkha.

Astus wrote:

What do you mean by Buddhist psychology? Abhidharma and Yogacara texts are certainly not unknown, but not directly relevant either. Komazawa University offers "Zen psychology" and "Introduction to psychology" in its http://www.komazawa-u.ac.jp/cms/gakubu_bukkyo/bukkyo_cur/ and http://www.komazawa-u.ac.jp/cms/gakubu_bukkyo/zen_cur/ Studies curricula, but I don't know what those cover, plus it is not a requirement to get a degree in order to do zazen.

Shikantaza is not shamatha as there is no object to focus on nor concentration to maintain. Nor is it vipashyana as there is nothing to analyse or clarify. As Dogen writes:

"Zazen is not a meditation technique. It is simply the Dharma gate of joyful ease, it is practicing the realization of the boundless Dharma way. Here, the open mystery manifests, and there are no more traps and snares for you to get caught in."
(<http://antaiji.org/dharma/fukanzazengi/?lang=en>)

In other words, zazen is the same as prajnaparamita, not abiding anywhere. When there is no mind abiding anywhere, there is nothing to gain and nothing to lose. Here are two well known stories as illustration (from Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 22, 26):

Huike said to Bodhidharma, "My mind is anxious. Please pacify it." To which Bodhidharma replied, "Bring me your mind, and I will pacify it." Huike said, "Although I've sought it, I cannot find it." Bodhidharma then said, "There, I have pacified your mind."

Daoxin said, "I ask for the master's compassion. Please tell me of the gate of emancipation." Sengcan said, "Who has bound you?" Daoxin said, "No one has bound me." Sengcan said, "Then why are you seeking emancipation?" Upon hearing these words, Daoxin experienced great enlightenment.

zenman said:

I'd be really interested to know if this formula actually works to put an end to suffering.

Astus wrote:

Suffering is from grasping at phenomena, making up a self, engaging in a narrative. When there is nothing accepted and nothing rejected, how could there be any problem?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2015 at 4:29 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Upādāna means "to take again."

Hence, we have craving, addiction, etc. We are addicted to the aggregates, hence they are "addictive aggregates."

Astus wrote:

In any case, it is clinging to / taking up / relying on / identifying with / grasping at the aggregates that one is bound and deluded, while relinquishing that hold is being free from all that one can be free from. So this does not seem to solve the problem.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2015 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Astus, you really do seem to miss the point here — arhats etc, do not have bodhicitta to become buddhas, they do not have knowledge necessary to teach the whole path, they do not know the entire path, this is what is meant by non-afflictive ignorance, they have subject-object conceptuality and so on.

Astus wrote:

I'm clear about that list. What is missing for me is that all that non-afflictive ignorance must be there because of some clinging, but there is nothing else to cling to but the five aggregates.

Malcolm said:

But none of this means they do not realize the emptiness of persons. It simply means their realization of emptiness is not sufficient for buddhahood, but only for liberation.

Astus wrote:

The realisation of the emptiness of persons means that whatever phenomena is experienced by an arhat it is not grasped, whether it is a bodily or a mental dharma. Although in Mahayana there is the teaching of the emptiness of dharmas, practically it means not grasping at, not relying on dharmas. So what is it that arhats still hold on to?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2015 at 3:27 PM

Title: Re: What is shikantaza?

Content:

zenman said:

There is dokusan but there is no transmission of experience from master/teacher to student. Of course the teacher would have to have reached twofold emptiness/somplete end of suffering due to confused mind before being able to guide his students to this same state, whether with or without tantric transmission or dokusan.

Astus wrote:

"In the conventional Soto Zen world (meaning temples and teachers who do not use koans as teaching tools), there is no such thing as dokusan. I'm sure there are some exceptions to that, but in my 12 years in Japan, I have yet to find even one. A student can always meet formally with a teacher — structures exist for that. But even then — even if the meeting opens and closes with prostrations, even if it produces all the intensity we might expect — it is also more likely than not that tea will be served, and that the conversation will stretch on for an hour or more. There will not be a line of students waiting their turns; there will not be an attendant guarding the door."

(Koun Franz: <http://nyoho.com/2012/11/26/behind-closed-doors/>)

As for such a thing as "transmission of experience", that does not really exist. Experience is per definition personal. Buddhas cannot feed the Dharma to beings, they can only give instructions and serve as examples. But it is for each and every student to taste the truth. You may read this from the same Soto priest:

<http://nyoho.com/2012/12/12/teacher-student/>

And here's this one:

"There's an ongoing discussion about whether or not Zen is therapy. And I know that for many in the West, the experience of relating to a teacher is very much like a form of counseling. But speaking in terms of the Soto tradition, I would say this: Zen is therapy only if your idea of therapy is spending years in the same room as your therapist silently observing your therapist; if, after all those years, there's a very real possibility that your therapist might turn to you, prostrate three times, and say, "Now we're both therapists," then yes, Zen is therapy."

(<http://nyoho.com/2013/08/31/my-teacher-doesnt-get-me/>)

As for the effectiveness of shikantaza, besides quoting others, what I can say is that it is the cultivation of the enlightened view. And since one practises with the Buddha's eyes and ears, there is nothing more to gain or lose. It is not polishing the mirror but the mirror is naturally unbound by the reflected images.

Here is a totally non-Zen and non-Soto citation, that nevertheless explains the same:

"The realization of samsara is the condition of Nibbana. As we recognize the cycles of habit and are no longer deluded by them or their qualities, we realize Nibbana. The Buddha-knowing is of just two things: the conditioned and the unconditioned. It is an immediate recognition of how things are right now, without grasping or attachment. At this moment we can be aware of the conditions of the mind, feelings in the body, what we're seeing, hearing, tasting, touching, smelling and thinking, and also of the emptiness of the mind. The conditioned and the unconditioned are what we can realize. So the Buddha's teaching is a very direct teaching. Our practice is not 'to become enlightened', but to be in the knowing, now."

(<http://www.buddhanet.net/nowknow2.htm>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2015 at 4:26 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Astus, let me ask you a question: are arhats in a state of equipoise 24/7/365? Are pratyekabuddhas in a state of equipoise 24/7/365? Are bodhisattvas in a state of equipoise 24/7/365? Are buddhas in a state of equipoise 24/7/365?

The answer to those four questions is your answer to how someone can be liberated from rebirth in the three realms and yet, still have some nonafflictive ignorance, conceptuality about subject and object and so on.

Astus wrote:

Arhats have cut all bonds, so they cannot fall back from being unfettered by the aggregates. Bodhisattvas, on the other hand, are still in training, and only with the attainment of buddhahood are they eternally free. So, both arhats and buddhas have the stage of non-meditation, while bodhisattvas are still working on reaching that.

As noted before, the superior qualities of a buddha can be explained if we consider them the results of merit accumulation, and that is the model found in both Theravada and basic Mahayana. But once the tathagatagarbha is introduced, the doctrine fundamental to later Mahayana whence the still living traditions of Tiantai, Chan, and Tantra come from, buddhahood becomes available in this life exactly because all the buddha-powers are readily available in every being's mind, and one just needs to be free from the obscurations to reach it. That's where emptiness is inseparable from compassion, so even an arhat must have compassion if s/he has wisdom.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2015 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Notice, Astus, that you did not answer the question. The answer is of course that only buddhas are in equipoise on reality 24/7/365, this is because they free of all obscurationNs.

Arhats are at a stage of a kind of no more training, but whoever said they were at the level of non-meditation? Only a buddha is at that stage.

Astus wrote:

With the complete elimination of conceptualisation there is no grasping at subject or object. That is the level of non-meditation (e.g. Direct Path to the Buddha Within, p 385-386). Since an arhat does not grasp any mental dharma how could there be distraction from the perfect view? That's why I started with saying that an arhat has nothing more to train in, there is nothing more to be free from, and at the same time does not fall back to attaching to phenomena.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 23rd, 2015 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Ayu said:

Reading through this wonderful topic, I have some doubts here and there if these both thinking-systems are really comparable. A bodhisattva from mahayana view is maybe different than a Bodhisattva from palicanon view.

Astus wrote:

It is different, because in Theravada there is only one kind of nirvana for all. Difference between arhats and between arhats and buddhas are not in what they are free from, not in their wisdom (see:

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.058.than.html> that equates the Buddha's and the arhats liberation by wisdom (paññāvimutti)), but in abilities that come from merit. So, one can become an arhat without any powers or special attainments, just simply by mastering the basics of calming and insight (<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.070.than.html>), very much like what is commonly practised everywhere in Buddhism.

Once it's been introduced in Mahayana that there are two kinds of hindrances, primarily in the mind-only sutras, it is not any more just the accumulated merits that count but the level of wisdom as well. And that's where the problem raised here arises, that if arhats are free from the aggregates then there is nothing else left to let go of.

Ayu said:

What you stated about Bodhisattvas is true for the lower bhumis. But according to Prasangika teachings a bodhisattva attained liberation from the 8th bhumi on.

So this discussion - sometimes - is a bit like comparing apples with carrots.

What do you think of this overview about the differences of the shravaka paths and the bodhisattva paths?

http://www.berzinarchives.com/web/en/archives/sutra/level4_deepening_understanding_path/path/five_pathway_minds_five_paths/5_pathway_minds.html

Astus wrote:

That description of the paths and stages are like what's been discussed here, as it also separates arhats from buddhas by the cognitive hindrance.

Ayu said:

As far as I understood, the difference between an arahat and a bodhisattva is bodhicitta. Which means the intense wish to liberate all beings. This is considered to be of prime importance for the attainment of buddhahood. Reaching nirvana, like an arahant, is something different.

Astus wrote:

That would be fine to say the difference is in intention, however, once we move on to say that arhats are limited not only by the merit accumulated but by wisdom as well, it is more than just intention.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 24th, 2015 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

It is not a problem, as has been explained to you now several times: arhats, pratyekabuddhas as well as bodhisattvas on the bhumis are subject to varying degrees of conceptuality when not in equipoise. And in the Agamas/Nikayas it is recognized that the knowledge of arhats is in no way equal to that of a Buddha.

The two obscurations are mentioned in the Āryāṣṭasāhasrika-prajñāpāramitā-sūtra.

Astus wrote:

How is an arhat subject to conceptualisation if there is no grasping of mental dharmas? This is the question not answered yet.

Although the Great Prajnaparamita Sutra in the Chinese canon (Taisho 220) is not necessarily the same, but that is the only one to contain the term "two hindrances" (二障) among the prajnaparamita texts, and even there it is just one section repeated at three different places where the qualities of the bodhi of great bodhisattvas are described, and contains no explanation what the afflictive and cognitive hindrances (煩惱所知二障) mean. It is also noteworthy that it was translated by Xuanzang, who brought many Yogacara works to China.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 24th, 2015 at 1:31 AM

Title: Re: What is shikantaza?

Content:

monktastic said:

The "Mind and Zazen" quote you give sounds like what we might call "objectless shamatha" in my tradition. It sounds like there's still a divide between "me" and "my mind", and I am engaging it in a dualistic manner. But probably I am just misunderstanding?

Astus wrote:

If it is objectless, one should have no object occur at all, thus thoughts are considered a fault. In zazen, whether there are thoughts or not is not a problem.

But compare it to these instructions then:

"Simple recognition of thoughts as they arise breaks their flow. Release thoughts within that recognition. When you remain in that state, arising thoughts will all be liberated equally within awareness, the expanse of dharmakaya."

(Wisdom Nectar of Dudjom Rinpoche, p 50)

"Whenever a thought arises, whether positive or negative, one should avoid deliberately concerning oneself with it, and let the mind rest spontaneously in the nature of the thought; without being sidetracked by the thought one should rest in the mind of nowness."

(Cloudless Sky, p 45)

As for the duality of the watcher/knower and the watched/known, it is still somewhat artificial but not that big a problem. One just has to learn to trust that the mind does not slip away if one stops trying to uphold it. Whatever is experienced is already known. No need to add another awareness. At the same time, experiences don't stay even for a second. No need to forget about them or chase them away. Thus reality as it is is buddha-nature. In other words: mind is buddha. So, just relax.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 24th, 2015 at 2:55 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Where does it say that arhats are free from all grasping?

Astus wrote:

All that can be grasped are included in the aggregates. Arhats do not grasp the aggregates.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 24th, 2015 at 4:35 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

While arhats do not grasp the aggregates as a self, that is not mutually exclusive with still believing in ultimate atoms, subject and object, etc.

Astus wrote:

Believing in any view is itself contrary to not identifying with the aggregates. Like establishing a duality of subject and object when it is perfectly clear for an arhat that there is no subject to establish anywhere.

Malcolm said:

Anyway, it is very clear that the Buddha has taught in the PP and other sūtras that Arhats etc., are not completely free of all traces of affliction. And why? Because they do not have all-knowledge.

Astus wrote:

Sure, Mahayana has all sorts of distinctions like that. This is a nice collection that discusses theories on the two hindrances: <http://www.uhpress.hawaii.edu/p-8624-9780824835736.aspx>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 25th, 2015 at 4:38 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

According to PP and AA, arhats view nirvana as real. Moreover, there is no contradiction between understanding there is no self in the aggregates, and nevertheless, regarding the twelve āyatanas as real.

In this case, the subject is not a self, it is simply a consciousness which cognizes an entity, which is nevertheless, not a "self" or an identity. Arhats regard that consciousness and its object as real, pratyekabuddhas only regard the subject as real.

Astus wrote:

What does it mean that they regard it as real? If no aggregate is grasped, then no views of eternity or annihilation are held.

Malcolm said:

I was going to mention it, but I forgot, but Bryan Davis's post elsewhere prompted my memory — according to you, there is no difference between stream entrants and buddhas, since even stream entrants are free from a view of self in the aggregates.

Astus wrote:

Stream-entrants are convinced that the Buddha's teaching is true, but they have not yet abandoned grasping at the aggregates. This section illustrates the difference (<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.035.than.html>):

"Now, Master Gotama, to what extent is a disciple of Master Gotama one who carries out his message, carries out his instruction, one who has crossed over & beyond doubt, one with no more questioning, one who has gained fearlessness and dwells independent of others with regard to the Teacher's message?"

"There is the case, Aggivessana, where a disciple of mine sees with right discernment any form whatsoever — past, future, or present; internal or external; blatant or subtle; common or sublime; far or near: every form as it has come to be — as 'This is not mine. This is not my self. This is not what I am.'

"He sees with right discernment any feeling... any perception... any fabrications... any consciousness whatsoever — past, future, or present; internal or external; blatant or subtle; common or sublime; far or near: every consciousness as it has come to be — as 'This is not mine. This is not my self. This is not what I am.'

"It's to this extent, Aggivessana, that a disciple of mine is one who carries out my message, carries out my instruction, one who has crossed over & beyond doubt, one with no more questioning, one who has gained fearlessness and dwells independent of others with regard to the Teacher's message."

"And to what extent, Master Gotama, is a monk an arahant, one whose mental effluents are ended, who has reached fulfillment, done the task, laid down the burden, attained the true goal, laid to waste the fetter of becoming, and is released through right gnosis?"

"There is the case, Aggivessana, where a monk — having seen with right discernment any form whatsoever — past, future, or present; internal or external; blatant or subtle; common or sublime; far or near: every form as it has come to be — as 'This is not mine. This is not my self. This is not what I am' is, through lack of clinging/sustenance, released.

"Having seen with right discernment any feeling... any perception... any fabrications... any consciousness whatsoever — past, future, or present; internal or external; blatant or subtle; common or sublime; far or near: every consciousness as it has come to be — as 'This is not mine. This is not my self. This is not what I am,' he is, through lack of clinging/sustenance, released.

"It's to this extent, Aggivessana, that a monk is an arahant, one whose mental effluents are ended, who has reached fulfillment, done the task, laid down the burden, attained the true goal, laid to waste the fetter of becoming, and is released through right gnosis.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 25th, 2015 at 4:52 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

monktastic said:

Didn't read through the whole thread, but found this perspective interesting. It's from Ajahn Pannavado's "Uncommon Wisdom." Not Mahayana, of course, but then again the Thai Forest tradition isn't exactly traditional Theravada either.

Astus wrote:

As a practical instruction it is often said that there is a mind/awareness beyond all phenomena. But it is not the final teaching, otherwise it is no different from teaching an eternal soul. See <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.001.than.html> how one is taught to move into an unafflicted mind, and what that actually means. And <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.086.than.html> on how it is not OK to posit an enlightened being as beyond the five aggregates. And on the Mahayana part, there is the http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Sevenfold_reasoning_of_the_chariot.

There are 20 kinds of personality-belief, which are obtained by applying 4 types of that belief to each of the 5 groups of existence (khandha):

(1-5) the belief to be identical with corporeality, feeling, perception, mental formations or consciousness;

(6-10) to be contained in them;

(11-15) to be independent of them;

(16-20) to be the owner of them (M.44; S.XXII.1).

(<http://www.wisdomlib.org/definition/sakkaya-ditthi/index.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 25th, 2015 at 5:31 PM

Title: Re: Eurovision Songcontest

Content:

Astus wrote:

As I see it, Belgium was the best. Second Serbia, third Israel, fourth Sweden (but only because of the graphics). The rest was too generic and nothing interesting.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 25th, 2015 at 9:17 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Thus there is the contradiction in your thinking that I mentioned before. Arhats abandon ten fetters, but as the view of self is the one of the three lower fetters, it is abandoned only once, at stream entry, and at that time, it is abandoned totally.

Astus wrote:

Knowing that there is no self, that is, obtaining correct view, and abandoning all clinging to the aggregates are not the same. A stream-enterer is convinced of the four noble truths, an arhat has completely realised the four noble truths. See also:

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn48/sn48.053.than.html>.

"In the same way, friends, it's not that I say 'I am form,' nor do I say 'I am other than form.' It's not that I say, 'I am feeling... perception... fabrications... consciousness,' nor do I say, 'I am something other than consciousness.' With regard to these five clinging-aggregates, 'I am' has not been overcome, although I don't assume that 'I am this.'

"Friends, even though a noble disciple has abandoned the five lower fetters, he still has with regard to the five clinging-aggregates a lingering residual 'I am' conceit, an 'I am' desire, an 'I am' obsession. But at a later time he keeps focusing on the phenomena of arising & passing away with regard to the five clinging-aggregates: 'Such is form, such its origin, such its disappearance. Such is feeling... Such is perception... Such are fabrications... Such is consciousness, such its origin, such its disappearance.' As he keeps focusing on the arising & passing away of these five clinging-aggregates, the lingering residual 'I am' conceit, 'I am' desire, 'I am' obsession is fully obliterated.

(<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.089.than.html>)

"My friend, although I have seen properly with right discernment, as it actually is present, that 'The cessation of becoming is Unbinding,' still I am not an arahant whose fermentations are ended. It's as if there were a well along a road in a desert, with neither rope nor water bucket. A man would come along overcome by heat, oppressed by the heat, exhausted, dehydrated, & thirsty. He would look into the well and would have knowledge of 'water,' but he would not dwell touching it with his body. In the same way, although I have seen properly with right discernment, as it actually is present, that 'The cessation of becoming is Unbinding,' still I am not an arahant whose fermentations are ended."

(<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.068.than.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 25th, 2015 at 10:02 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, and the point is that, according to the Buddha in Mahāyāna sūtras, arhats have not abandoned "a lingering residuum", i.e. the traces I mentioned in a previous post. Also here it is clear that distinction between the noble disciple with these lingering residuums is precisely the difference between equipoise and post equipoise, as I also stated above, the idea being that arhats in this instance have nothing left to remove so that whether they are in equipoise or not is a matter of preference, not of liberation.

Astus wrote:

I don't really understand what is a matter of preference here.

As for the other part, do you mean that from a Mahayana perspective it is fine to say that arhats have not actually gave up all clinging to the aggregates? So, the very assumption that arhats are completely free from grasping the skandhas is not true in the Great Vehicle?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 25th, 2015 at 10:20 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

They are not free of all traces of affliction and have no path to realize complete freedom from all traces of affliction because they do not possess sarvakārajñāna, knowledge of all aspects. And, according to AA, they "take a stand" in nirvana, believing it to be real.

Astus wrote:

Then we could say that sravakayana teachings say that arhats are free from the aggregates, bodhisattvayana teachings say that they are not completely free from them. Rather, from the Mahayana perspective, arhats grasp at calmness, have some inclination to annihilation, thus are attached to an imaginary nirvana. And from this it is clear that the interpretation of arhatship is quite different in the two doctrines.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 25th, 2015 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

And since when was this ever in question?

Astus wrote:

No, it wasn't. Although since I have started from the beginning with stating that arhats are free from the aggregates, the counter-arguments toward their being still bound by various things did not actually apply to the arhats that are free, simply because the Mahayana-type arhat is not free from the beginning. As Ayu <http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=284539#p284539>: "a bit like comparing apples with carrots". Then the total freedom from the aggregates in Mahayana is only for buddhas, while in Theravada for arhats and buddhas.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 27th, 2015 at 5:07 PM

Title: Re: Why no Tantrism in Zen?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Similarly to what Matylda said, there is some contact between various schools in the West. Zen teachers like <http://www.westernchanfellowship.org/about-the-western-chan-fellowship/lineage-of-the-teachers/chan-master-john-crook/> and <http://www.wz.org/ven-anzan-hoshin-roshi> studied Mahamudra and even taught it to some extent, while for instance <http://www.unfetteredmind.org/ken-mcleod/> incorporated some Zen in his teachings. And I think the ultimate example is http://www.yogichen.org/gurulin/gc/gc_e.html, who was both a Vajrayana and Chan teacher at the same time.

In Dogen's Bendowa there is a question about the relationship between his teachings and those of the Shingon and Kegon schools. He writes in answer:

"Remember, among Buddhists we do not argue about superiority and inferiority of philosophies, or choose between shallowness and profundity in the Dharma; we need only know whether the practice is genuine or artificial. Some have entered into the stream of the Buddha's truth at the invitation of grass, flowers, mountains, and rivers. Some have received and maintained the stamp of Buddha by grasping soil, stones, sand, and pebbles. Furthermore, the vast and great word is even more abundant than the myriad phenomena. And the turning of the great Dharma wheel is contained in every molecule. This being so, the words "Mind here and now is buddha" are only the moon in water, and the idea "Just to sit is to become buddha" is also a reflection in a mirror. We should not be caught by the skillfulness of the words."

(Shobogenzo, vol 1, p 9-10, BDK Edition)

Although, in the same text admonishes against combining zazen with mantra:

"[Someone] asks, "Is there nothing to prevent a person who practices this zazen from also performing mantra and quiet-reflection practices?"

I say: When I was in China, I heard the true essence of the teachings from a true master; he said that he had never heard that any of the patriarchs who received the authentic transmission of the Buddha-seal ever performed such practices additionally, in the Western Heavens or in the Eastern Lands, in the past or in the present. Certainly, unless we devote ourselves to one thing, we will not attain complete wisdom."

(p 16)

As noted before already, it is only Vajrayana followers who believe Vajrayana to be the best. Others believe it is theirs that is the best.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 27th, 2015 at 6:55 PM

Title: Re: Why no Tantrism in Zen?

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

And that is totally natural. Why would anyone, ever, continue to follow a path which they thought was not the best?

Astus wrote:

Exactly. At the same time, it should be kept in mind that what the official books say and how it goes in daily practice hardly ever match. There are too few Buddhists out there to isolate oneself from everyone who does not wear the preferred colour of robe. Same goes for publications. Those who don't read in the traditional languages but in English or other European ones normally encounter the Nikayas as the basic teachings of the Buddha, Zen stories as entertaining Buddhist riddles, films with Tibetan monks doing strange things, etc. I consider that true Mahayana spirit, that encompasses everyone and learns all paths.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 27th, 2015 at 9:02 PM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Astus wrote:

A bodhisattva sees that there are no beings to liberate, that is how all beings are liberated. By the way, do you have some other plans for the next billions and billions of uncountable aeons?

<http://www.abuddhistlibrary.com/Buddhism/C%20-%20Zen/Ancestors/The%20Zen%20Teachings%20of%20Bodhidharma/The%20Zen%20>

Teachings%20of%20Bodhidharma/THE%20ZEN%20TEACHINGS%20OF%20BODHIDHARMA.htm:

But the Buddha said, "Only after undergoing innumerable hardships for three asankhya kalpas did I achieve enlightenment," Why do you now say that simply beholding the mind and over-coming the three poisons is liberation?

The words of the Buddha are true. But the three-asankhya kalpas refer to the three poisoned states of mind. What we call asankhya in Sanskrit you call countless. Within these three poisoned states of mind are countless evil thoughts, And every thought lasts a kalpa. Such an infinity is what the Buddha meant by the three asankhya kalpas, Once the three poisons obscure your real self, how can you be called liberated until you overcome their countless evil thoughts? People who can transform the three poisons of greed, anger, and delusion into the three releases are said to pass through the three asankhya kalpas. But people of this final age are the densest of fools. They don't understand what the Tathagata really meant by the three-asankhya kalpas.

<http://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/zen/mumonkan.htm>, case 9:

A monk asked Kōyō Seijō, "Daitsū Chishō Buddha sat in zazen for ten kalpas and could not attain Buddhahood. He did not become a Buddha. How could this be?"

Seijō said, "Your question is quite self-explanatory."

The monk asked, "He meditated so long; why could he not attain Buddhahood?"

Seijō said, "Because he did not become a Buddha."

Record of Linji (tr Sasaki, p 29):

Someone asked, "[The sutra says:]

The Buddha of Supreme Penetration and Surpassing Wisdom

Sat for ten kalpas in a place of practice,

But the buddhadharma did not manifest [itself to him],

And he did not attain the buddha-way.

I don't understand the meaning of this. Would the master kindly explain?"

The master said, "'Supreme Penetration' means that one personally penetrates everywhere into the naturelessness and formlessness of the ten thousand dharmas.

'Surpassing Wisdom' means to have no doubts anywhere and to not obtain a single dharma. 'Buddha' means pureness of the mind whose radiance pervades the entire dharma realm. 'Sat for ten kalpas in a place of practice' refers to [the practice of] the ten paramitas. 'The buddhadharma did not manifest' means that buddha is in essence birthless and dharma (dharmas) in essence unextinguished. Why should it manifest itself! 'He did not attain the buddha-way': a buddha can't become a buddha again.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 28th, 2015 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm said:

So you mean, you are not responsible for your own liberation? When someone first stage bodhisattva sees your emptiness, you are liberated.

Were it so easy...

Astus wrote:

That wouldn't make much sense, would it?

All the different types of sentient beings, whether they be born from eggs, born from a womb, born from moisture or born spontaneously; whether or not they have form; whether they abide in perceptions or no perceptions; or without either perceptions or non-perceptions, I save them by causing them to enter nirvana without remainder. And when these immeasurable, countless, infinite number of sentient beings have been liberated, in actuality, no sentient being has attained liberation. Why is this so? Subhūti, If a bodhisattva abides in the signs of self, person, sentient being, or life-span, she or he is not a bodhisattva.”

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html, ch 3)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 28th, 2015 at 5:06 PM

Title: Re: Zen sutra study?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Diamond Sutra covers both wisdom and compassion, and it is the basic scripture in the Zen tradition. Whether it is easy or difficult, that's up to you.

As for the list so far I'd like to add the Vajrasamadhi Sutra and the Awakening Faith in Mahayana.

As a template, here is a description of the basic training in the Jogye Order:

http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/bbs/board.php?bo_table=0010&wr_id=154&page=35

In terms of practical instructions it is the Platform Sutra, the Perfect Enlightenment Sutra, the Shurangama Sutra and the Vajrasamadhi Sutra that stand out, since they are products of East Asian Mahayana. But if you want those that are definitely of Indian origin, go with the Diamond Sutra, the Vimalakirti Sutra, the <http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra13.html> and the Lankavatara Sutra.

Regarding the Lotus and the Avatamsaka, the former one contains little actual teaching, the latter one is very long. The Nirvana Sutra also falls into this category, as it contains some fundamental teachings, but otherwise a long text with so much repetition.

Otherwise, it is recommended to read and study all available scriptures, especially as there are not many of them available in English, and those that are are usually the popular and important ones.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 28th, 2015 at 5:09 PM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

zengen said:

<http://www.khenposodargye.org/2014/04/attainment-in-a-single-lifetime-and-cultivation-for-three-great-countless-eons-asamkhyeya-kalpa/> is an interesting article on this topic. In the article, the "incalculable" eon is taken to be literal.

Astus wrote:

It is interesting indeed, especially that this is the first time I see a Tibetan teacher accepting not only the Tibetan but also the Chinese canon, to the level that he actually quotes the same Bodhidharma passage cited in this thread already.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 28th, 2015 at 7:06 PM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Dan74 said:

Perhaps it is holding to the notion of stages that makes the path take aeons and aeons? Sounds like the good old polishing the brick into a mirror story...

Astus wrote:

The sutras themselves give some indication on one's state.

"If good men and good women, having heard this profound prajñā-pāramitā, can come to resoluteness in their minds, not shocked, not terrified, not baffled, and not regretful, know that they stand on the Ground of No Regress. If those who have heard this profound prajñā-pāramitā are not shocked, not terrified, not baffled, and not regretful, but believe, accept, appreciate, and listen tirelessly, they have in effect achieved dāna-pāramitā, śīla-pāramitā, kṣānti-pāramitā, vīrya-pāramitā, dhyāna-pāramitā, and prajñā-pāramitā. Moreover, they can reveal and explicate [the teachings] to others and can have them train accordingly."

(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra13.html>)

Having presently heard the teaching of this scripture, I do not have difficulty in adequately grasping its point. But if there is someone five hundred years hence who is able to hear this scripture, and believe, understand, and commit it to memory, then this person will be most rare. Why? This person will not be abiding in the notion of self, the notion of person, the notion of sentient being, or the notion of life span. And why? Because the notion of self is not a notion. The notion of person, the notion of sentient being, and the notion of life span are also not notions. And why? Those who are free from all notions are called buddhas."

The Buddha said to Subhūti: "Yes, yes. You are right. You should know that if someone hears the teaching of this scripture and is neither shocked, afraid, or alarmed, this person is extremely rare. And why? Subhūti, what the Tathāgata calls the greatest transcendence, is not the greatest transcendence. Therefore it is called the greatest transcendence.”

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html, ch 14)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 28th, 2015 at 8:04 PM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm said:

the above refers to a thought that bodhisattva has, not an actual fact of his or her saving anyone

Astus wrote:

I did not intend anything else with it, just to demonstrate what I have referred to.

Malcolm said:

You left out the next passage

Astus wrote:

It's part of the whole point. Even encountering the Dharma is a sign of previous good karma. Thus it fits Dan's remark: "Maybe we've already been on it for incalculable kalpas minus one lifetime!"

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 28th, 2015 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm said:

The point is that to attain full buddhahood it takes three asaṃkhyakalpas (asaṃkhyā does not really mean incalculable, it is the name of a large number). The point of knowing where one is on the path is to know that, for example, if one is not yet on the path of seeing, one has a long way to go in common Mahāyāna terms. Even if one is on the path of seeing, one has a long way to go in common Mahāyāna terms.

For example, when it is says that bodhisattvas can attain full buddhahood in seven lifetimes, this is not referring to bodhisattva on the path of accumulation, it is referring to bodhisattvas on the eighth bhūmi, etc.

Astus wrote:

What number asaṃkhyā is?

Schools like Huayan, Tiantai and Chan do not consider themselves common Mahayana, and they don't fit the system Tibetan's use.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 28th, 2015 at 10:03 PM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm said:

1×10^{56} , i.e. 1 followed by 56 zeros.

Astus wrote:

That is, the minimal time to complete the entire bodhisattva path is 3×10^{56} years?

Malcolm said:

Vajrayānists, including Indian Vajrayānists, consider everything that is not Vajrayāna part of common Mahāyāna. Huayan. Tientai, etc., are all schools based in Mahāyāna sūtra.

Astus wrote:

Just like those schools have their own classification systems. For instance, from a Huayan perspective Vajrayana would fall into the category of Final Mahayana, that is above Madhyamaka and Yogacara but below the Sudden Enlightenment teaching. And from the Chan view Tantra is still a gradual path based on temporary skilful means.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 28th, 2015 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes. And that is just an an eye blink in time.

Astus wrote:

I'm curious, what is the source for that number?

Malcolm said:

Chan lacks the direct introduction found exclusively in Vajrayāna

Astus wrote:

Do you mean empowerment here? How about pointing out the nature of mind?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 29th, 2015 at 12:46 AM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm said:

There is pointing out the nature of mind even in Hinayāna.

Astus wrote:

Is one directly introduced to a different nature than what is pointed out?

(<http://www.khenposodargye.org/2013/11/attaining-buddhahood-by-revealing-the-nature-of-reality-and-attaining-buddhahood-in-a-single-life/> seems to say no.)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 29th, 2015 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm said:

It is the same nature, the mind that recognizes it however is much more subtle.

Astus wrote:

How can non-conceptual wisdom have levels?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 29th, 2015 at 3:47 AM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm said:

Don't you distinguish between the nonconceptual wisdom of a first stage bodhisattva and a tenth stage bodhisattva? The object is the same, but the degree of subtlety is not.

Astus wrote:

There can be only one state that deserves the name non-conceptual wisdom, in other words, non-abiding awareness. Anything else would be conceptual, would be abiding somewhere. What do you mean by difference in subtlety?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 29th, 2015 at 4:55 AM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm said:

So as far as you are concerned the non-conceptual wisdom of a first stage bodhisattva and the non-conceptual wisdom of a buddha is exactly alike?

Astus wrote:

Yes. What difference do you see?

"a Bodhisattva gives alms in the same way as would a Tathāgata, without any difference. This is how a Bodhisattva takes Bodhisattva actions. Likewise a Bodhisattva observes the precepts, endures adversity, makes energetic progress, does meditation, and develops wisdom in the same way as would a Tathāgata, without any difference. This is how a Bodhisattva takes Bodhisattva actions."

(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra46.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 29th, 2015 at 4:51 PM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

frankc said:

I don't know how much relevance this talk of compassion and helping people will be if we end up in the hell realms having our tongues cut out, being impaled by spears, kicked off cliffs, our organs being shattered by the cold, etc. If you are not enlightened and are in the lower realms then compassion and helping people I think will be the opposite of what you will be doing. Feeling pain and making others experience pain is more likely. Of course compassion and helping people will make it less likely for you to fall downwards but we all have bad karma from the past, even good people fall.

Samsara is dangerous. I don't understand how anyone can be satisfied being here for anymore than one life. What if you forget your religion in your next life and end up a Satanist? Staying here for anymore than one life is completely dangerous I feel and if you're not getting out in this life than who knows where in the world you will end up.

Astus wrote:

There is an easy and safe path to escape samsara for everyone:

http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Translations/Awakening_of_faith.html:

"suppose there is a man who learns this teaching for the first time and wishes to seek the correct faith but lacks courage and strength. Because he lives in this world of suffering, he fears that he will not always be able to meet the Buddhas and honor them personally, and that, faith being difficult to perfect, he will be inclined to fall back. He should know that the Tathagatas have an excellent expedient means by which they can protect his faith: that is, through the strength of wholehearted meditation on the Buddha, he will in fulfillment of his wishes be able to be born in the Buddha-land beyond, to see the Buddha always, and to be forever separated from the evil states of existence. It is as the sutra says: "If a man meditates wholly on Amitabha Buddha in the world of the Western Paradise and wishes to be born in that world, directing all the goodness he has cultivated toward that goal, then he will be born there." Because he will see the Buddha at all times, he will never fall back. If he meditates on the Dharmakaya, the Suchness of the Buddha, and with diligence keeps practicing the meditation, he will be able to be born there in the end because he abides in the correct samadhi."

Karma Chagme, A Spacious Path to Freedom, p 200:

"For individuals with mental afflictions, there is a loophole that can enable them to take birth in a Buddha realm. The Protector Amitabha promised that one may take birth in his pure realm due to the power of his prayers. Thus with your body, speech, and mind focus on this goal; it is good to offer prayers from the stitras and hidden treasure teachings to be reborn in Sukhavati. Many such prayers are found in each of the four orders of Tibetan Buddhism, as well as in the Chinese Buddhist tradition. Like prepared food and drink, they are ready to be eaten and drunk."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 29th, 2015 at 4:52 PM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Dan74 said:

Of course the Sutras speak of liberation. Malcolm spoke about stages though. The gradual enlightenment path is one of the paradigms, not the only one. That was the only point I was trying to make.

Astus wrote:

I quoted those because they specify a level of attainment.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 29th, 2015 at 7:45 PM

Title: Re: bhuddist dharma versus buddhist practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dharma is actualised in one's life. Practice is about actualising it more and more. That actualisation is leaving behind greed, hatred and ignorance. Once the causes of suffering are gone, actualisation is complete, one is the very embodiment of the Dharma. Thus there is nothing more to achieve, practice, actualise, or leave behind.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 29th, 2015 at 8:25 PM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm said:

Well, one difference I see is the translation of this passage you refer to seems to be an abbreviation when compared with the same passage as translated into Tibetan:

Astus wrote:

What about the difference regarding non-conceptual wisdom?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 30th, 2015 at 12:08 AM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm said:

I don't see that passage as pointing out the nonconceptual wisdom of a bodhisattva and a tathāgata are the same.

It is not actually a very common term in the sūtras, occurring in only three sūtras in the bka' 'gyur.

Astus wrote:

Nirvikalpajñāna (無分別智) should be a fairly common term in sutrayana, at least in yogacara and tathagatagarbha works. According to the Cheng Weishi Lun, this is what a bodhisattva gets at the path of seeing, what a bodhisattva practises with on the path of meditation, and it is the great mirror wisdom's perception of suchness.

Malcolm said:

The difference between the nonconceptual wisdom of bodhisattvas of one stage and another, as well as buddhas, is the degree to which they have developed sarvakārajñāna.

Astus wrote:

However, I still don't see how can there be any difference between not abiding anywhere for a bodhisattva and a buddha.

Thanks for the recommendation of Aryadeva's Lamp.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 30th, 2015 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm said:

There is only a difference in the coarseness or subtlety of the mind that apprehends suchness.

Astus wrote:

And what does that stand for? How can non-abiding be coarse or subtle? There is nothing to grasp or apprehend in suchness.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 1st, 2015 at 6:33 AM

Title: Empty House

Content:

Astus wrote:

Mazu Daoyi said:

"The mind can be spoken of [in terms of its two aspects]: birth and death, and suchness. The mind as suchness is like a clear mirror which can reflect images. The mirror symbolizes the mind; the images symbolize the dharmas. If the mind grasps at dharmas, then it gets involved in external causes and conditions, which is the meaning of birth and death. If the mind does not grasp at dharmas, that is suchness."

(Sun Face Buddha, p 67)

A dharma is an instance of experience. Grasping at a dharma means making it one's own self and interacting with everything else from that perspective. That is when the true mind is not known, when a thief is taken to be one's own son. If it is known that an instance of experience is just an instance of experience that does not abide even for a moment, then there can be no grasping. There the true mind is known to be originally pure, it is like an empty house where there's nothing to steal.

Paichang asked, "What is the direction of the Buddhas?"

"It is the very place where you let go of your body and mind." replied the Patriarch.

(Sun Face Buddha, p 69)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 1st, 2015 at 5:04 PM

Title: Re: Empty House

Content:

seeker242 said:

Does he say how to not do that? What if the mind already grasps at dharmas? What do you do then? How are you supposed to not grasp at dharmas? Isn't Mazu's teaching itself a dharma? If we don't grasp Mazu's teaching, then how can it help?

Astus wrote:

As I have commented there, grasping is not knowing what a dharma is, grasping is not knowing what the original mind is. One just has to realise that the mind, the present fact of awareness, is itself without a single dharma. Dharmas themselves are just coming and going. It is similar to a mirror that itself contains no objects, while reflections pass through unobstructed. A mind that does not grasp is seeing that the six sensory areas always change, there is not a single thing that could be taken to be real, solid and substantial. One can observe this at any moment, as sights, sounds, feelings and ideas are by themselves unstable and transitory. So dharmas are actually ungraspable, taking them to be one's self is completely an unfounded illusion. The only difference between an ordinary being and an enlightened one is whether one chases the six kinds of impressions or by reflecting on one's mind of this present experience one realises it to be without anything to hold on to.

"It is because of not knowing how to return to the source, that they follow names and seek forms, from which confusing emotions and falsehood arise, thereby creating various kinds of karma. When within a single thought one reflects and illuminates within, then everything is the Holy Mind."

(Sun Face Buddha, p 64)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 2nd, 2015 at 6:12 AM

Title: Re: Empty House

Content:

Astus wrote:

Paichang asked, "What is the direction of the Buddhas?"

"It is the very place where you let go of your body and mind." replied the Patriarch. (Sun Face Buddha, p 69)

Nothing said:

The coloured bits are very interesting.....anyone knows what it means?

Astus wrote:

It means that the buddha is letting go of body and life. That's what buddhas want all beings to reach.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 4th, 2015 at 6:30 PM

Title: Re: Poll: Should Zen/Chan/Seon have a separate Forum?

Content:

Astus wrote:

1. There are separate sections for 'Tibetan Buddhism' and 'East Asian Buddhism'. That is in recognition of their different historical development.
2. There is no Vajrayana forum in and of itself anywhere here, unless one counts Shingon as that, but that is in the EA section, exactly because it is an EA school.
3. Sub-forums in the Zen area were created years ago because at that time people thought it is worth trying. It might be reconsidered, but I don't think it makes a difference in any way.
4. ZFI is a different type of forum that focuses mostly on Zen, not even EA Buddhism.
5. I cannot account for the low traffic in the Zen area here, but I don't see either how setting up a Falun/Hourin 法輪 (i.e. Law Wheel) forum separately could bring in more people, unless perhaps by drawing in more English speaking Asians.
6. Just because there is not the same amount of interaction in the Zen area as in other parts does not mean there is a problem. Dogen was happy with training only a couple of monks in the countryside, just as Zhaozhou spent his teaching years in a small remote monastery.
7. As perhaps mentioned already, it is better not to think of all the traditions as separate Buddhisms but as various skilful means. Both EA and Tibetan Buddhism developed a fairly unified set where every section of the Tripitaka has its place. The difficulty is that the Tibetan and the East Asian systems have not yet been harmonised. And to this process I'd add Theravada as well, since all three major parts of Buddhism meet in the West and also globally.
8. There are at least a few of us who have benefitted from studying various traditions. And for everyone on the Mahayana path there is a universal vow: "Dharma-gates are measureless, I vow to learn them." (Famen wuliang shiyuan xue 法門無量誓願學)
9. It may seem that Zen has a sectarian approach, and certainly there are examples for that. But if we take a closer look, in China, Korea and Vietnam it was and still is mostly a unifying idea and not a dividing one. As for Japan, its modern history is different, but Dogen's words should be remembered: "Those who randomly call themselves by the name "Zen sect," which has never existed in India in the west or in the Eastern Lands, from the past to the present, are demons out to destroy the Buddha's truth." (Butsudo, in Shobogenzo, vol 3, p 88, BDK Edition) Those who believe otherwise have yet to find out that the <http://www.tricycle.com/web-exclusive/green-koan-50-d%C5%8Dgen%E2%80%99s%C2%A0eyes-and-nose>.

10. As I see it, this forum provides space both for discussions among Zen followers and among followers of different paths. Conflicts are inevitable, the question is whether one can solve them or not. Monasteries are rarely defined by what doctrine they follow, and people can live together simply by observing the precepts in general and the local rules and customs in particular. I think that should be the example here as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 4th, 2015 at 11:05 PM

Title: Re: Good introductory books to Buddhist meditation/mindfulness

Content:

Astus wrote:

General Mahayana:

http://kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/ebm_book_page.htm

http://kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/sgs_book_page.htm

<https://books.google.com/books?id=y6HzxLUC7rQC>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=5VuSpV3plz0C>

Zen:

<https://books.google.com/books?id=okE6AwAAQBAJ>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=Tz46AwAAQBAJ>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=ov7DAwAAQBAJ>

https://books.google.com/books?id=bQcmoHqW_AIC

Mahamudra:

https://books.google.com/books?id=_C8qAwAAQBAJ

<https://books.google.com/books?id=aiiMI0WpKRcC>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=lKd9CAAAQBAJ>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 5th, 2015 at 10:46 PM

Title: Re: Why no Tantrism in Zen?

Content:

Dan74 said:

If anyone here has experience with both Zen and Tantra, could you suggest how Tantra could be helpful in a Zen framework?

Astus wrote:

It depends on the person, but any practice can be helpful both on its own and combined with another. If we want to look at it really strictly, Zen is nothing else but immediate realisation of buddha-mind. Anything besides that is only skilful means. And there is no special reason why only practices like counting breath and contemplating phrases can be used to assist practitioners. Visualisation is not a foreign idea, since there are many methods described in various sutras, like Amitayus' Contemplation Sutra, a scripture quoted in the text of Hongren. It is also well known that Japanese Rinzai uses some energy practices at least since Hakuin introduced them. And in terms of doctrinal and practical studies, Tibetan sources are easier to find in English, since the major works of Chinese Mahayana have not yet been translated fully.

Keizan, a Dharma successor three generations after Dogen, is credited, along with his successors, with widely popularizing the Soto school in Japan. Keizan actively developed forms for extending Zen practice to the general lay populace. He incorporated into the Soto tradition the earlier Japanese spiritual context and was personally strongly influenced by Shugendo, the mountain ascetic tradition, as well as the Shingon school of Vajrayana Buddhism. Much of the ritual Keizan developed, which is still used in Soto temples, was derived from the Shingon tradition.

(Dogen's Pure Standards for the Zen Community: A Translation of Eihei Shingi, p 23 - although Bodiford in "Soto Zen in Medieval Japan", p 87, says that connecting Keizan with esoteric practices is often exaggerated)

In Kamakura Japan, the question was not about pure Zen versus Zen syncretism, but about the degree and kind of Zen syncretism in which one engaged. Eisai's disciples, Gyoyu and Eicho, for example, practiced forms of Buddhist syncretism that hardly distinguished them as "Zen." As head of the Kongozammai'in, Gyoyu was a devoted practitioner of Shingon ritual and the study of Zen. Eicho, too, lacked interest in an independent Zen tradition, and preferred to absorb Zen into the general structure of Mahayana Buddhism. He was especially devoted to Daimitsu, or Tendai esotericism. In addition, Enni Ben'en, who transmitted the Yangqi (Yogi) Linji lineage to Japan, was an avid proponent of syncretic zen, melding Tendai and Shingon rituals with Zen practice. He was an avid proponent of Yanshou's Zongjing lu, on which he often lectured, and his model for Zen syncretism. Although the Soto school generally regards the syncretistic process as initiated largely through the evangelical efforts of the fourth patriarch, Keizan, and his disciples, who readily assimilated Tendai and Shingon elements and folk religious customs, is clear that Soto zen teaching in Japan was highly syncretic from the outset. The teachings of Dogen, as seen above, were highly accomodating - even preferential - toward the scriptural tradition, as the "word of the Buddha". Throughout Kamakura Zen, Zen teaching and practice were not conceived as something separate from, different from, or antagonistic toward scriptural teaching. If anything, Zen was regarded as the "value added" component that gave Buddhist practice an intensity and richness it otherwise may have lacked. This is essentially the same perspective that Yongming Yanshou held with regard to Chan, and it was this spirit that infiltrated and animated many of the practice halls of Song Chan monasteries. It was this spirit that was transmitted to Japan by Zen pioneers in the Kamakura period.

(Dogen: Textual and Historical Studies, p 191-192)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 7th, 2015 at 9:14 PM

Title: Re: How effective are liberation-upon-seeing dharma doors?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Things have no power, karma is made by the mind. When something is seen, the effect depends on the seer. It might be the Buddha himself, but a mosquito sees only a source of blood. People may read as many teachings as they like, but correctly understanding them is up to the individual. While the Diamond Sutra (ch 8, tr Muller) says that it is the source of all buddhas, it is of course not the physical book or the words themselves that are the source. As Huineng says in the Platform sutra (ch 2, tr McRae): "people of this world always recite prajñā with their mouths, but they don't recognize the prajñā of the self-natures. This is like talking about eating, which doesn't satisfy one's hunger. If you just talk about emptiness with your mouths, you won't be able to see the nature for a myriad eons. Ultimately, this is of no benefit at all." Liberation can happen when seeing, when hearing, or with any other object, as the Surangama Sutra explains in detail. But as long as one is lost in words and ideas, even as obvious objects as the sun and moon are invisible for the deluded.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 9th, 2015 at 2:51 AM

Title: Re: Distraction in shikantaza

Content:

Astus wrote:

You don't have to be aware of your body or the environment. Whatever comes, comes. If you try to regulate your experience then there is a grasping at an idea, a vision of what and how things should be. And that is exactly what should not be done. Where there is no meaning given to whatever occurs then phenomena are unobstructed and the mind is unbound.

Sometimes a bodily feeling is the most prominent, sometimes a thought. It is a distraction only when you take it to be something important, when you try to keep it or push it away. Sitting is just sitting, nothing special. Like sitting on a bus and watching the landscape pass by. The moment you want to hold onto a sight, it is already gone. Remembering that sight is just another landscape passing by. Worrying about remembering is again a new vision coming and going. Distraction is to think that there is something that stays. But is there such a thing?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 9th, 2015 at 7:20 PM

Title: Re: Distraction in shikantaza

Content:

Astus wrote:

A daydream is being lost in a series of thoughts, following a story. That is delusion, and it can happen because we are lured into it by giving meaning and importance to the initial thought. That is what ordinary people call life, that is the monkey mind. Awakening is seeing that thoughts are without basis, without essence, without anything to grasp.

Zen is about cultivating awakening / awakened cultivation. While it is normal that the mind drifts off, at the moment one remembers (becomes mindful) of what is going on - that is, there is a reflection on the mind/thoughts - then the chain of thought is released and one has regained awareness. This returning to/of awareness during zazen in Soto is called kakusoku (覚触/覺觸), i.e. awareness or becoming aware. It is not a question whether there are or are not any thoughts, but whether one is aware of it or sucked into a story. It is in some ways similar to the type of meditation when one focuses on an object, then gets distracted by various experiences (thoughts or anything else), but then one realises that and returns to the object. That point where one realises the distraction is when one is mindful. The important difference is that in zazen what one should be mindful of is that there is nothing to be mindful of, because every experience is ungraspable. That is the awakened awareness that one cultivates, awakening again and again.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 15th, 2015 at 5:46 PM

Title: Re: Beholding the mind

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are so many ways to observe and watch the mind, they all come with various feelings and views that one can try to maintain and practise. But that is still not accepting the simple truth that there is not a single thing that could be grasped. In order to accept that, one just has to confirm in one's personal experience that all the six sensory areas are utterly unstable. That is called seeing the nature of mind.

Platform Sutra, ch 7, p 62, BDK Edition said:

Not seeing a single dharma but maintaining the view of nonbeing

Is much like floating clouds blocking the face of the sun.

Not knowing a single dharma but maintaining one's knowledge of emptiness

Is just like the great void generating lightning and thunder.

When such perceptual understanding arises for the slightest instant,

How can mistaken recognition ever understand expedient means?

You should understand the error of this yourself, in a single moment of thought,

And the numinous brilliance of the self will be constantly manifest.

Platform Sutra, ch 5, p 45, BDK Edition said:

In this teaching of seated meditation, one fundamentally does not concentrate on mind, nor does one concentrate on purity, nor is it motionlessness. If one is to concentrate on the mind, then the mind [involved] is fundamentally false. You should understand that the mind is like a phantasm, so nothing can concentrate on it. If one is to concentrate on purity, then [realize that because] our natures are fundamentally pure, it is through false thoughts that suchness is covered up. Just be without false thoughts and the nature is pure of itself. If you activate your mind to become attached to purity, you will only generate the falseness of purity. The false is without location; it is the concentration that is false. Purity is without shape and characteristics; you only create the characteristics of purity and say this is 'effort' [in meditation]. To have such a view is to obscure one's own fundamental nature, and only to be fettered by purity.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 15th, 2015 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: Which type of Buddhist tradition do Shaolin monks belong

Content:

Astus wrote:

Shaolin monastery has belonged to the Caodong Chan https://shaolinchancity.blogspot.com/2008/12/three-lineages-of-shaolin_11.html since https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Xueting_Fuyu (1203-1275) became the abbot there.

But practically speaking it is simply Chinese Mahayana as being a member of this or that lineage is only nominal. It should also be noted that those who actively pursue martial arts are not ordained monks, they only take novice precepts (see https://shaolinchancity.blogspot.com/2008/12/shaolin-monasticism-discipleship_944.html).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 16th, 2015 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: Which type of Buddhist tradition do Shaolin monks belong

Content:

Astus wrote:

State influence in Chinese Buddhism has been present for the last 2000 years. Just like in probably all the other Asian countries. It doesn't mean that they're illegitimate. At the same time, mainland Chinese Buddhism does not seem to try to invite foreign followers anyway.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 16th, 2015 at 2:56 AM

Title: Re: Beholding the mind

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

If ending suffering is a matter of seeing our nature, and our nature is impermanence, and seeing our nature is seeing impermanence, then why in the world do even people who see impermanence (e.g. meditators) fall back into self-views, and why do ordinary people inexorably driven by impermanence fail to see the nose on their face?

Astus wrote:

Ordinary people know that eventually things decay and die. But at the same time they believe that for a while it can stay, that there are actually eternal things like truth, laws, love, soul and God. Meditators can be of all kinds, so that itself does not mean they are not common people. Those who have actually confirmed for themselves that phenomena are empty and impermanent have eliminated the concept of self, but that's still not the same as getting rid of the habitual grasping at appearances. That's why training with the correct view is the path of liberation where one bases one's practice on the insight into emptiness. And that practice is simply not abiding anywhere, and when there is something grasped, mindfulness reminds oneself not to be fooled. So it is practising enlightenment, it is enlightened practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 16th, 2015 at 4:19 AM

Title: Re: Beholding the mind

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

So in short, the practice is remembering, a billion times if need be, to stop fooling oneself?

To repeat the question, why are a billion times necessary instead of just a few, or even one?

Astus wrote:

The Buddha had all sorts of disciples. There were those who could understand his teaching just from a few sentences and realised complete liberation in a short time. And there were others who required many years. Giving up attachment to body and mind is a decision. And that decision depends on seeing the drawbacks of grasping. It does not need explanation why one shouldn't hold on to a burning ball of iron. But a nice ball made of gold is apparently desirable to keep. So one has to come to the insight that attractive things cause suffering. Then one has to understand that by letting go one is free (e.g. <https://suttacentral.net/en/sn35.71>, <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn36/sn36.006.nypo.html> and <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn36/sn36.015.nypo.html>). Practising mindfulness should not be restricted to occasionally sitting comfortably and trying to figure things out. At the same time, habits can stay because one has not yet uncovered the actual centres of holding on to something as one's self. But once it is clear that no phenomena whatsoever is graspable, it is quite natural that one falls into deluded states less and less.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 16th, 2015 at 6:27 PM

Title: Re: Beholding the mind

Content:

LastLegend said:

There is the one that looks through those two eyes. That's the one that participates in it's activity.

Astus wrote:

Just beware of what Dogen calls the Srenika view.

"Who said that the buddha nature has knowing and comprehending? While perceivers and knowers may be buddhas, the buddha nature is not knowing and comprehending."
(<http://stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/shobogenzo/translations/bussho/translation.html>)

"According to that non-Buddhist view, there is one spiritual intelligence existing within our body. When this intelligence meets conditions, it can discriminate between pleasant and unpleasant and discriminate between right and wrong, and it can know pain and irritation and know suffering and pleasure—all [these] are abilities of the spiritual intelligence.

...

we should realize that living-and-dying is just nirvana; [Buddhists] have never discussed nirvana outside of living-and-dying. Moreover, even if we wrongly imagine the understanding that "mind becomes eternal by getting free of the body" to be the same as the buddha-wisdom that is free of life and death, the mind that is conscious of this understanding still appears and disappears momentarily, and so it is not eternal at all. Then isn't [this understanding] unreliable?"
(Bendowa, SBGZ, vol 1, p 14-15, BDK Edition)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 16th, 2015 at 6:35 PM

Title: Re: Beholding the mind

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

"Why don't they see it?"

Astus wrote:

When ordinary beings want to see something it means perceiving an object, looking at something outside. It is based on the incorrect view that subject and object are separate. But if we examine the present realm of experience there is neither subject nor object, only passing moments of phenomena. Examining means not looking for anything outside, not grasping at anything inside. Examining also means first contemplating the concepts relating to self and other, refuting them, and confirming in experience.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 16th, 2015 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: Beholding the mind

Content:

LastLegend said:

If you don't know don't understand, would you not be like a rock? What's there to be attached about looking through your two eyes? Walking? Sitting? It appears to be spontaneous as such when you turn your head or lift your finger or hear a sound.

Astus wrote:

The point is not to take some sort of constant subject or active agent as the real self. Also, spontaneity, as something without a cause, cannot exist.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 17th, 2015 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: Beholding the mind

Content:

LastLegend said:

So you are not real and impermanent, then what makes Buddhahood permanent? Why are you always present?

Astus wrote:

What is real cannot be impermanent. What do you call Buddhahood? As for always being present, please clarify that.

LastLegend said:

By 'appears to be spontaneous,' I mean something like you scratch when you itch.

Astus wrote:

That is satisfying a desire. It is quite conditioned and intentional.

LastLegend said:

Whether you recognize that you walk or not, you still walk. Whether you recognize your mind and its activity or not, they still happen. Your aware activity is your mind your nature. You are not maintaining your aware nature. Why do you maintain something that happens naturally? Your nature is aware. Your awareness is always present whether you see it or not. Is your awareness your true self? Well your awareness does not question itself whether its real or not real true or not true because it is not within the domain of language and does not operate within it.

Astus wrote:

How do you know it happens if there is no awareness of it? Is there an awareness separate from an object?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 17th, 2015 at 9:58 PM

Title: Re: Beholding the mind

Content:

LastLegend said:

There is awareness of it, but you are not constantly aware. If you are, you are Buddha. Why is it important that awareness is separate from an object or not? Suppose that it is or suppose that it isn't, so what?

Astus wrote:

<http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=288641#p288641> you wrote: "Your aware activity is your mind your nature. You are not maintaining your aware nature. Why do you maintain something that happens naturally? Your nature is aware. Your awareness is always present whether you see it or not."

If it is always and unintentionally aware, how could one not be constantly aware?

If there were a separate awareness, then it could not be aware of anything, thus it were not awareness at all. If awareness were the same as the object, it would cease once the moment of consciousness of something has gone.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 18th, 2015 at 4:37 PM

Title: Re: Beholding the mind

Content:

LastLegend said:

Your subtle mind does not need to be intentional aware. While you are driving your car, are you always intentional aware that you are driving? Your subtle mind is not concerned with language because it does not operate within the domain of language. If your subtle mind is conditioned by language, then it is conditioned by appearance or object since language is referring to appearance or object. If it's conditioned, it will disappear when object is not present. That's like saying your mind is present because a table is present. If I remove the table, does your mind disappear?

Astus wrote:

Where is the difference between aware and intentionally aware? If there were no intention to be conscious during driving, one could as well start reading a book or fall to sleep, not to mention that drinking and driving could pose no problem either.

What is the difference between mind and subtle mind? The Buddha talks about six consciousnesses, and neither of them are permanent nor independent. He also said: "It would be better for the uninstructed run-of-the-mill person to hold to the body composed of the four great elements, rather than the mind, as the self." (<http://www.accesstosight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.061.than.html>) That is because the mind apparently changes moment to moment. Assuming an unaffected awareness looming above passing phenomena is the same as assuming a self.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 18th, 2015 at 6:53 PM

Title: Re: Beholding the mind

Content:

LastLegend said:

You have not answered the question: are you always intentional aware that you are driving while you are driving?

Intentional aware is with the intention to be aware. When you are not intentional aware, it does not mean your awareness disappears. If it does, you cannot function at all.

Astus wrote:

When driving does one intend to be aware of what happens on the road? Yes. Otherwise why look forward? Unintentional awareness would be something like hearing the birds in the morning. And on the same level every sensory impression can be called unintentional most of the times, since we cannot manipulate every impression that occurs. We can also ask whether intention is intentional, or is it rather just another thought that comes up and then disappears? What we get in the end is just a series of conditioned processes without any overseer or controller.

LastLegend said:

The sensual mind is affected by language. The subtle mind is not affected by language, how can it be self if self is a construct of language? You only assume a self because you operate with language and you are concerned with self.

Astus wrote:

If there are two minds, one linguistic and one non-linguistic, then they cannot know of each other. Consequently the subtle mind you talk about is still the sensual mind. Also, since the subtle mind is originally free from language, it cannot be realised through any teaching, thus it cannot be the goal of the Buddha's teachings.

LastLegend said:

I have a problem when you say mind is conditioned. If mind is conditioned, it will disappear when conditions for it to arise are not present. I am not concerned if it's conditioned or not conditioned. Attachment is within the realm of language. Whether there is self or no self, I don't if that is true. There is a problem only when you become attached to a statement.

Astus wrote:

An unconditioned mind cannot be aware of anything conditioned. Thus it is either always aware of the same thing, or not aware at all. Because all experiences are conditioned, there cannot be an unconditioned mind that experiences any of that. What is the point of even supposing such an unconditioned mind?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 1:31 AM

Title: Re: Homage to Wonhyo

Content:

Astus wrote:

Some resources:

<http://terebess.hu/zen/mesterek/Wonhyo.html>

http://ftp.buddhism.org/Publications/IABTC/Vol02_02_Sung-bae%20Park.pdf http://ftp.buddhism.org/Publications/IABTC/Vol07_03_Pyeong-rae%20Lee.pdf

http://international.ucla.edu/media/files/01_Wonhyo_web-sz-ujs.pdf
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=k1l9dUewsKgC>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=Aio1KQEACAAJ>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=MGEkmAEACAAJ>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 1:44 AM

Title: Re: Right View

Content:

Astus wrote:

Right view is the middle way. The middle way is what is free from taking something to be eternal or to be annihilated (see:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.015.than.html>). There is rebirth but no eternal soul. There is dependent origination but no substance. There is experience but no self. There is reading but no reader.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 30th, 2015 at 5:11 PM

Title: Re: Homage to Wonhyo

Content:

muni said:

Whether dream or awaken. The good news is that our dream is not actually existing - not true, while Buddha is always. Courage given!

Astus wrote:

It does not talk about such a duality that only the Buddha is real and the phenomenal world is unreal. It is quite the opposite, there is no other reality, no Buddha outside of sentient beings.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 1st, 2015 at 5:49 PM

Title: Re: Homage to Wonhyo

Content:

Simon E. said:

it takes considerable loyalty and commitment to a particular tradition and lineage to make progress.

Astus wrote:

"In those days different sects were never established; just to clarify the three vehicles and the twelve divisions of the teaching was accepted as the customary way of learning the teaching. That many people today, out of stupidity, individually establish principles and suppose the Buddha-Dharma, is not the legitimate standard in Buddhism."

(Dogen: Inmo, Shobogenzo, vol 2, p 158, BDK Edition)

All the founders of the traditions and many outstanding teachers studied directly and widely the teachings of the Buddha and his descendants. Wonhyo is one example. That doesn't mean it is wrong to focus on a single teaching or system, just as the Buddha's disciples often concentrated only on a few utterances of Shakyamuni and thereafter gained liberation. But it is a narrow view to say that practising with the five aggregates is better than with dependent origination. Progress on the path depends on one's commitment and effort towards enlightenment, not on extensively praising this or that teacher. Don't we all take refuge in the Triple Jewel? Aren't all teachers only representatives of the original teacher Shakyamuni Buddha? People like Gampopa and Tsongkhapa were not bound to the feet of a single master.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 2nd, 2015 at 3:18 AM

Title: Re: No, the external world is an illusion, right?

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://online.sfsu.edu/rone/Buddhism/Yogacara/basicideas.htm>

<http://www.acmuller.net/yogacara/articles/intro.html>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=1C4qAwAAQBAJ>

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 5th, 2015 at 7:01 PM

Title: Re: Help contribute Quotes for 'Just dharma quotes' blog & A

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are such collections of sayings in the canons. In the Pali Canon the most well known is the <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/kn/dhp/dhp.intro.budd.html>. The other collection is called the <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/kn/ud/>. Zen has many similar collections, in English probably the biggest one is https://books.google.hu/books/about/Zen_s_Chinese_Heritage.html?id=qWrYGZG2yd4C.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 8th, 2015 at 6:33 PM

Title: Re: About enlightenment in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

In terms of liberation from suffering, the difference is made between arhats and buddhas by saying that arhats only remove afflictive emotions (klesha), while buddhas remove also conceptual hindrances (jneyavarana). This difference lies in recognising the emptiness of self (atmasunyata) or no-self of person (pudgalanairatmya), and the emptiness/selflessness of dharmas (dharma-sunyata/dharmanairatmya). In other words, arhats see that there is no self in the aggregates but still take the skandhas themselves as substantial (svabhava), while buddhas also see the aggregates as without substance, that is, empty. That is the wisdom part. The bodhisattva path also emphasises the practice in skilful means, as that is required to be able to liberate sentient beings. Thus while an arhat may or may not have various abilities, a buddha necessarily has a complete set of skills. For instance, look at the qualities described in the <http://www.accesstosight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.012.ntbb.html>.

This is a general description of the usual Mahayana interpretation. You can find it in many sutras, like the Vimalakirtinirdesa Sutra.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 2:38 AM

Title: Re: About enlightenment in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Fortyeightvows said:

Can we say that one is an arhat at the level of stream enterer once one has had a direct perception of emptiness?

And if so which emptiness?

And if so then mustn't one become an arhat in order to become a buddha?

Astus wrote:

A stream-enterer is not yet an arhat, it is the first arya level on the sravaka path. Insight on the sravaka path is into the emptiness of the self (only Gelugpas say otherwise, but it's their business). The sravakayana is not the same as the bodhisattvayana, so one does not have to become an arhat to reach buddhahood. Actually, one view is that sravakas can never reach buddhahood. The other view is that eventually arhats switch to the bodhisattva path.

(It should be noted that in Mahayana sravakas and arhats are generally symbols/representatives of practitioners who misunderstand the Dharma.)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 5:33 PM

Title: Re: Vimalakirti Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

That small quote talks about:

- Distancing oneself from appearances is still conceiving appearances as real.
- The female form is just a concept like the male form
- The problem ultimately is being bound by concepts and ideas

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 10th, 2015 at 5:39 PM

Title: Re: About enlightenment in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Modus.Ponens said:

Can you explain, from the point of view of tibetan buddhism, what is it that is missing in the arahat to be a Buddha? And what would the arahat have to do to arrive at that level?

Astus wrote:

The key is bodhicitta: the wish to attain complete enlightenment in order to liberate all beings. Bodhicitta has two aspects: compassion and wisdom. Compassion is what is required for the development of skilful means and for that purpose accumulating merit. Wisdom is required for perfect liberation and insight into the emptiness of all phenomena. Combining the two as a single path is the Mahayana view.

An arhat is free from afflictions, but lacks compassion for all beings, thus has not developed the skilful means necessary to liberate all. Also, while an arhat is liberated, there is still the view that samsara is suffering, nirvana is peace, and does not realise that samsara is empty and there is nothing to escape from. So, arhats have a reified view of both nirvana and samsara as a duality.

An arhat cannot on its own switch to the bodhisattva path as there is the belief that the path is complete and there is nothing more to do. It is only because of the compassion of the buddhas that an arhat is eventually aroused from the nirvanic slumber to move on, and it is at that point when bodhicitta is developed.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 10th, 2015 at 5:46 PM

Title: Re: About enlightenment in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

bryandavis said:

First you would have to let us know what school view of Theravada you are positing your position from, as there is not one Theravada school. As well there is not only one interpretation of Tibetan Schools.

Astus wrote:

Theravada is neither Vaibhasika nor Sautrantika. Theravada was mostly unknown to Tibetans, as it's existed in Sri Lanka and other far away lands, not Northern India. So, it'd be difficult to find arguments that actually deal with specific Theravada views. Also, Theravada is one of the many Sravakayana schools, not a proper euphemism for Hinayana as some people happen to use it.

Author: Astus
Date: Friday, July 10th, 2015 at 5:54 PM
Title: Re: About enlightenment in Tibetan Buddhism
Content:
maybay said:
...

Ayu said:
This assertion is illogical. An arahat has no conceptual hindrances anymore.

Astus wrote:
Except for the Gelugpas, the general view is that arhats do have it. As for the Gelugpas, they came up with some unique terminology and ideas to explain it in an even more complicated way.

Author: Astus
Date: Saturday, July 11th, 2015 at 12:27 AM
Title: Re: Spread of Buddhism
Content:
Astus wrote:
The classic work:
https://books.google.com/books?id=_9yvCQAAQBAJ

A summary:
https://books.google.com/books?id=kr_M1e7ylmoC

Later events:
https://books.google.com/books?id=blBTHAY_A4wC

The mixing:
<https://books.google.com/books?id=pSazfSorJzgC>
<https://books.google.com/books?id=VF4R8rfZ9QkC>
<https://books.google.com/books?id=xP0QBQAAQBAJ>
<https://books.google.com/books?id=4GH7oQEACAAJ>
<https://books.google.com/books?id=u0BTahwalocC>

Something modern:
<https://books.google.com/books?id=FqOpAgAAQBAJ>

Author: Astus
Date: Saturday, July 11th, 2015 at 3:39 AM
Title: Re: About enlightenment in Tibetan Buddhism
Content:
bryandavis said:
Do you know of any good philosophical text on Theravada proper in English? I would like to be more educated in that area.

Astus wrote:

If you want something very philosophical, you can start with this one:

http://store.pariyatti.org/Comprehensive-Manual-of-Abhidhamma-A--PDF-eBook_p_4362.html

A more extensive and generally accepted classic work:

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/authors/nanamoli/PathofPurification2011.pdf>

At the same time, Theravada has its own varieties. In the West the two common traditions are those from Myanmar/Burma and from Thailand, and there are others as well within and without those "lineages". Many don't rely on the above mentioned two works at all but prefer using directly the suttas. I don't know of any single work that sums up all that there is to know about Theravada (for that matter, Mahayana doesn't have one like that either). So, keep in mind that just as there is no such thing as Mahayana proper, there is no Theravada proper either.

However, if you are fairly new to Buddhism and Vasubandhu is not among your favourite authors yet, visit: <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/>

And this site gives a good summary of the whole path: <http://measurelessmind.ca/>

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 12th, 2015 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: About enlightenment in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Modus.Ponens said:

I already got a partial answer: it involves bodhicitta and eliminating the cognitive obscurations. How is the latter done?

Astus wrote:

Cognitive obscurations are removed by investigating the dharms and seeing that they are all empty.

This is how the Buddha rouses arhats, as stated in the Lotus Sutra, chapter 7 (p 132, BDK Edition):

If sentient beings hear only about the single buddha vehicle they will then want neither to see nor approach a buddha. They will think that the buddha path is long and attainable only after enduring severe and protracted suffering. The Buddha, knowing their minds, knowing that they are weak-willed and of lowly aspiration, teaches them the two nirvanas through skillful means in order to let them rest halfway to the goal. If there are sentient beings who abide in either of these two stages, the Tathāgata immediately teaches:

What you have accomplished is not complete. The stage you abide in is close to the wisdom of the buddhas. You should observe and consider that the nirvana you have obtained is not the true one. It is only through the power of the Tathāgata's skillful means that the single buddha vehicle is explained as three.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 12th, 2015 at 1:38 AM

Title: Re: About enlightenment in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

fckw said:

How do you proceed with the practice after initial stream entry?

Astus wrote:

Simple and straightforward:

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.122.than.html>. Some more in the <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.001.than.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 14th, 2015 at 7:26 PM

Title: Re: Enlightened yet fat

Content:

Astus wrote:

Recommended book:

<https://books.google.co.in/books?id=0LZRt8i7Xq8C>

Info:

The androgynous, asexual Buddha of contemporary popular imagination stands in stark contrast to the muscular, virile, and sensual figure presented in Indian Buddhist texts. In this groundbreaking study of previously unexplored aspects of the early Buddhist tradition, John Powers skillfully adapts methodological approaches from European and North American historiography to the study of early Buddhist literature, art, and iconography, highlighting aspects of the tradition that have been surprisingly invisible in earlier scholarship.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 22nd, 2015 at 4:47 PM

Title: Re: Does Zen result in Buddhahood as described in sutras?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Zen does not result in Buddhahood. Zen is Buddhahood.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 22nd, 2015 at 7:45 PM

Title: Re: Loss of Japanese traditions

Content:

Queequeg said:

Once the opportunity to make converts was precluded, and once the congregation is locked in by law, there is no institutional motivation to minister to the congregation or adapt in response to the changing needs

Astus wrote:

If the only reason to make Buddhism alive is to gain more and more adherents, and it cannot do anything with existing followers, then it is quite a faulty system.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 22nd, 2015 at 11:00 PM

Title: Re: Loss of Japanese traditions

Content:

Queequeg said:

human nature tends toward complacency, laziness and stagnation.

Astus wrote:

Isn't it the very meaning of Buddhism to go beyond those defilements? Blaming conditions for the lack of will to aspire on the path sounds more like an excuse to me than a valid reason. At the same time, Dharma taught just because they cannot make a living otherwise may not be a Dharma that's worth spreading.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 25th, 2015 at 6:40 PM

Title: Re: A question about stream entry in Mahayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is mentioned as part of the sravaka path - for instance in the Diamond Sutra. But if one has bodhicitta - aims for buddhahood - then it is not relevant. Sravakas eventually turn to the bodhisattva path according to the one vehicle scheme as presented primarily in the Lotus Sutra.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 27th, 2015 at 4:46 AM

Title: Re: A question about stream entry in Mahayana

Content:

Phenomniverse said:

Stream entry may not be relevant but if already attained does it undermine the bodhisattva path?

Astus wrote:

No. If there is a desire to follow the bodhisattva path, it can be done at any time. The very fact of that desire is proof of being capable of raising bodhicitta.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 28th, 2015 at 1:39 AM

Title: Re: Section of my favorite sutra that is bewildering

Content:

Astus wrote:

This is a common theme of the Vimalakirti Sutra, it is present right at the beginning where Vimalakirti's actions are described.

Here's another translation of the same section:

"He manifests acting out of lust but forsakes both internal and external and does not begrudge his own life; manifests the practicing of moral infractions but peacefully resides in the pure precepts, even unto harboring great fear about even minor transgressions; manifests acting out of anger but is always sympathetically forbearant; manifests acting out of laziness, yet vigorously cultivates merit; manifests acting out of a disturbed mind, yet is always mindfully concentrated; manifests acting out of stupidity, yet penetrates both mundane and supramundane wisdom." (tr McRae, BDK Edition, p 133)

See also Lankavatara Sutra 2.58, and further discussion with other references:

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=39&t=2882>.

The point is, no matter what happens, don't take it to be anything but empty. This is not the case of " <http://www.adelaideshinbuddhistdojo.com.au/shinranwasan/kw40.htm> " (as they call it in Japanese Pure Land), but freedom from all dharmas and the complete use of skilful means.

Actually, karma cannot be removed, actions of infinite births affect our every moment. Either we realise that experiences themselves are empty, or we remain dissatisfied no matter what happens.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 28th, 2015 at 2:37 AM

Title: Re: A question about stream entry in Mahayana

Content:

seeker242 said:

Although, it's said that a theravada defined stream enterer cannot fall back to a non-ariya stage and is only capable of 7 more rebirths. Can First bhumi fall back to pre-bhumi stage?

Astus wrote:

No, they can only fall into the sravaka path if they abandon bodhicitta.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 28th, 2015 at 6:55 AM

Title: Re: Emptiness meditation

Content:

Astus wrote:

This clearly worded work contains teachings on both theory and practice of emptiness:

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=8zeh8VAFcVAC>.

If that's not direct enough, go for <https://books.google.hu/books?id=uoCa1aEVAzwC> and possibly the commentary <https://books.google.hu/books?id=pYT5Eww5gdIC>.

And in case you want something utterly direct:

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=okE6AwAAQBAJ>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 28th, 2015 at 6:52 PM

Title: Re: Does Chan/Seon/Zen practice mudra?

Content:

Astus wrote:

It depends on what you mean by "practising mudra". As far as I know, in Chinese Buddhism it is a ritual element of certain ceremonies.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 29th, 2015 at 4:41 AM

Title: Re: Enlightenment

Content:

Astus wrote:

First we need a definition of enlightenment. Then we can see how that definition matches the definitions by others.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 29th, 2015 at 7:37 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here's one from the Buddha

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.011.ntbb.html>):

"Bhikkhus, only here is there a recluse, only here a second recluse, only here a third recluse, only here a fourth recluse. The doctrines of others are devoid of recluses: that is how you should rightly roar your lion's roar."

...

"Though certain recluses and brahmins claim to propound the full understanding of all kinds of clinging... they describe the full understanding of clinging to sensual pleasures, clinging to views, and clinging to rules and observances without describing the full understanding of clinging to a doctrine of self. They do not understand one instance... therefore they describe only the full understanding of clinging to sensual pleasures, clinging to views, and clinging to rules and observances without describing the full understanding of clinging to a doctrine of self."

Is there any other doctrine where no-self is taught?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 29th, 2015 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: A question about stream entry in Mahayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

Aemilius,

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/kn/dhp/dhp.24.budd.html> 344 talks about people who abandon the monastic life, not people falling back from enlightenment. Can you give exact references to Sarvastivada sources, or anything in the Abhidharmakosha for instance?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 6:29 AM

Title: Re: Luck and Karma

Content:

Astus wrote:

Don't Tibetans pray for numerous reasons, like good weather and dispelling harmful spirits? Or the long life of Garchen Rinpoche.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 5:13 PM

Title: Re: Luck and Karma

Content:

MalaBeads said:

Sorry but I don't understand your response. Are you saying Tibetans pray for luck? How does your response relate to my question?

Astus wrote:

Prayer is an expression of one's wishes. Buddhism has incorporated that common human behaviour in various forms. Thoughts and words are not without consequences, although it is true that often magical beliefs contradict the view of karmic causality. At the same time, karma is not exactly the same as fatalism, so even simple utterances can count. While anyone can pray for good luck and long life, it doesn't mean it will have any effect. But what matters is the type of mental attitude that it strengthens. If it is about greed, fulfilling one's desires, then it is unwholesome. If it is about renunciation, good will and compassion, it is wholesome. Otherwise, it is just a fairly neutral habitual activity that can make someone feel better.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 7:37 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan worldview.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Could it be a Western mentality that wants to force a culturally foreign view on every aspect of one's interpretation of the world?

As Buddhism spread it has adapted to the local beliefs. It's not the same pantheon in different countries that ordinary Buddhists believe in, even if the ancient Indian gods are integrated to some extent.

Should those who follow Japanese Buddhism erect altars not only for Shakyamuni and Amitabha but also for Amaterasu, Hachiman and the current emperor?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan worldview.

Content:

Malcolm said:

Buddhadharma has always recognized the existence of bhumipatis and granted them respect, and occasionally forceful conversion.

Astus wrote:

Buddhism has a very good system that describes the "spiritual/other" world. Therefore it is adaptable. One can posit various pantheons there, like Indra can be exchanged to Zeus any time. Perhaps one could fit in various angels for devas. My point is that currently many who turn to Buddhism in the West are virtually materialists in their ordinary perception of the world, since the brahmans of this era are the scientists. Also, in cultural terms one may also have a Christian/Jewish background, but then it's unlikely that they would choose Buddhism while still accepting that world view. Less likely is a New Age type of background, however, that is fairly internaliser/psychological (everything is mind-made) as well.

So, if there are any local spirits to be integrated/converted to Buddhism, that spirit is science. That is what influences people the most and has a strong effect on everyday activities and rituals (e.g. washing hands, cleaning the house, all sorts of medical and dietary stuff).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan worldview.

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

If by science you really mean science then this might be possible. If you mean, which most people do as a default, scientific materialism or scientism, then this would be one of the most destructive things possible to the dharma. As I see it, the greatest hindrance to the transmission of the dharma in the west is scientific materialism and the impoverished worldview it provides everything.

Astus wrote:

By "real science" I presume you mean the type of philosopher-scientists who are open and curious about discovering the world and may even have some form of metaphysical/spiritual inclination. Not those who are somewhat closed in their view of the world and what they regard as truth, i.e. physicalism. However, that's similar to differentiating between monastics in terms of whether they have the intellectual capacity to reflect on the Dharma and the world or they just go along and follow whatever the tradition says. I think it is quite normal that there are significantly more of the latter than the former in both science and Buddhism. Thus, if there is science and scientism, then there is Dharma and Dharmism.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan worldview.

Content:

Malcolm said:

Astus, you are really off your rocker here.

Astus wrote:

How so?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan worldview.

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

So dharma marrying science-- I think that's already been done. Buddha was the greatest physicist ever.

Dharma marrying scientific materialism or scientism-- disaster. We're already seeing that as dharma comes west and comes modern. Buddhism Without Beliefs.

Astus wrote:

I don't see it as easily separable. It's like distinguishing Dharma and cultural elements. Theoretically there is a pure Dharma, actually it's not that easy to find it.

Urgyen Dorje said:

Science has a more limited ontological scope than scientific materialism.

Astus wrote:

And that's why I say it's not really a worldview, but more a technology, a method. As such it has little influence on one's take on life. Because it leaves the philosophical and religious questions unanswered, that vacuum is naturally filled by physicalism or some other views. That's how it can be that Buddhism has nothing to do with science, just like it has nothing to do with building roads and computer programming.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan worldview.

Content:

Malcolm said:

Science is not an invisible sentient being.

Astus wrote:

And it doesn't believe in one either. Isn't that the whole issue here?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 31st, 2015 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan worldview.

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Dharma takes its view very seriously, but not its methods. The methods change and adapt as the dharma moves from culture to culture and from time to time.

Astus wrote:

It depends on what level you mean that. The path of discipline-concentration-wisdom is what makes Buddhism. As the Buddha says in the Mahaparinibbana Sutta: "In whatsoever Dhamma and Discipline, Subhadda, there is not found the Noble Eightfold Path, neither is there found a true ascetic of the first, second, third, or fourth degree of saintliness. But in whatsoever Dhamma and Discipline there is found the Noble Eightfold Path, there is found a true ascetic of the first, second, third, and fourth degrees of saintliness."

Also, it is questionable how much of Buddhist cosmology and theology is an essential part of the view. As I see it, the general rules of karma, rebirth and the three worlds are essential, but not the specifics, like the names of various gods.

Urgyen Dorje said:

What we seem to have are Buddhist dilettantes who extrude dharma through the view of scientific materialism and who keep what is left. A less extreme is to find oneself in a limbo where one can not completely commit to the dharma because of one's commitment to the narrow view of scientific materialism.

Astus wrote:

That materialist re-interpretation of Buddhism results in a limited view where the teachings are used for therapeutic purposes. But how much it actually restricts one's capability to gain insight into the emptiness of oneself and all phenomena is debatable. I think that the bigger problem is not in denying rebirth and the existence of various realms but in maintaining the assumption that one is identical with one's body.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 31st, 2015 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan worldview.

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Is the most direct insight into the nature of reality scientific method or the valid cognition of a Buddha? What makes us a "buddhist" isn't relying on the three higher trainings or the three principle paths or whatever outline of path we might want to use. It's refuge. Refuge is a bit meaningless without committing to rely on the valid cognition of the Buddha.

Astus wrote:

I don't see how Buddhism and science share the same area of investigation to even give rise to a debate about whose cognition is valid. The Buddha wanted and attained freedom from suffering. Science is about understanding how the physical world works. Buddhism offers a path of liberation, science a path of learning. As such, Buddhism is internal, subjective, personal, while science is not supposed to be like that. How can there be a meeting point?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 1st, 2015 at 2:38 AM

Title: Re: Did the Buddha teach about the The Five Skandhas directl

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

The whole third book of Samyutta Nikaya is about this.

Astus wrote:

I.e. the <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/index.html#khandha>.

It is also found in the basic definition of the <http://www.accesstoinight.org/ptf/dhamma/sacca/sacca1/dukkha.html>:

"Birth is dukkha, aging is dukkha, death is dukkha; sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief, & despair are dukkha; association with the unbeloved is dukkha; separation from the loved is dukkha; not getting what is wanted is dukkha. In short, the five clinging-aggregates are dukkha." ()

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 2nd, 2015 at 10:34 PM

Title: Re: Ratnagotra & Bhagavad Gita verses

Content:

Astus wrote:

Gaudapada - a pre-Shankara teacher of Advaita Vedanta - uses Madhyamaka and Yogacara reasoning in his most well known work, the Mandukya Karika. It doesn't make him a proponent of Buddhism, and the text itself rejects such an assumption.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 3rd, 2015 at 4:34 AM

Title: Re: Help with the Mahāyāna Sūtras Please?

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://www2.fodian.net/world/index.html> - lists Mahayana scriptures according to the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Taish%C5%8D_Tripitaka.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 6th, 2015 at 5:51 AM

Title: Re: Dharma or Law?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I've seen it only in translations from Chinese, and there it is fairly sensible, since there they translate the Chinese word law (fa 法) into English. For instance, "saddharma" in Chinese is miao-fa (妙法), thus what can be translated as true/correct teaching becomes wonderful law.

"Good man, the recondite language of the Tathagata is profound and difficult to understand. It is analogous to what happens when a great king tells his retinue to bring him saindhava. The one word "saindhava" refers to four different products [from Sindhu] : salt, a drinking cup, water, or a horse. Since the same word is used to designate four different things, only the wise attendant understands what the king means when he calls for it. If the king seeks saindhava when he is bathing, he is to be given water. If the king is eating and asks for saindhava, then he is to be given salt. If the king asks for saindhava when he has finished a meal and wants to drink alcohol, then he is to be given something to drink with. And if the king requests saindhava when he wants to travel, then he is to be given a horse [of the type bred in Sindhu] . In this way the wise attendants are able to decipher the four ways this abstruse word is used by the king." (Nirvana Sutra, vol 1, 9.4.6, p 297, BDK Edition. Yamamoto-Page tr: ch 16, p 133. see also: Shobogenzo, vol 4, "O-saku-sendaba - A King's Seeking of Saindhava")

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 10th, 2015 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana/vajrayana abhidharma

Content:

Astus wrote:

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=CkChrAwwsvGkC>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=wHHAmVPmrEC>
https://books.google.hu/books?id=KWYcVO_kptMC
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=xa0VBgAAQBAJ>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=bnCdJgvaWrQC>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=W1JbBAAAQBAJ>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=uYwyLgEACAAJ>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=1C4qAwAAQBAJ>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=Aio1KQEACAAJ>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=jdxRTxqaTicC>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=jk8lmgEACAAJ>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=QMrKAqAAQBAJ>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 10th, 2015 at 4:59 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana/vajrayana abhidharma

Content:

zenman said:

Thank you Astus. Which book would you recommend?

Astus wrote:

All of them. But you can start with:

- A Buddhist Doctrine of Experience
- Seven Works of Vasubandhu, the Buddhist Psychological Doctor
- Living Yogacara: An Introduction to Consciousness-Only Buddhism

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 11th, 2015 at 4:01 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana/vajrayana abhidharma

Content:

zenman said:

Which one of those three? I am a terribly poor reader!

Astus wrote:

Then go for Living Yogacara: An Introduction to Consciousness-Only Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 11th, 2015 at 8:40 PM

Title: Virupa's Mahamudra Doha

Content:

Astus wrote:

Is <https://awakeningtoreality.blogspot.com/2014/02/virupa-treasury-of-doha.html> known among Sakyapas? If so, how do they explain it, especially the following stanza:

"Some are completely tortured with empowerment rites, some always count their rosary saying hum phat!
some consume shit, piss, blood, semen and meat, some meditate the yoga of nadi and vayu, but all are deluded."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 11th, 2015 at 10:41 PM

Title: Re: Virupa's Mahamudra Doha

Content:

Malcolm said:

Since this is my translation, I will answer. Until you are realized, you are deluded.

Astus wrote:

The poem seems to advocate entering Mahamudra directly and not through various stages, so the question if this is interpreted in a different way.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2015 at 2:52 AM

Title: Re: Virupa's Mahamudra Doha

Content:

Malcolm said:

It is not about that, it is about being attached to methods.

Astus wrote:

Thank you.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2015 at 5:20 PM

Title: Re: Infinite past

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here are the words of the Buddha:

complete: <https://suttacentral.net/sn15> selection: <http://www.accesstinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/index.html#sn15>

And from Nagarjuna (MMK 11.1):

When asked if the beginning is known,
The great sage said “no.”
Cyclic existence is without origin or terminus.
Because there is no beginning or end.

Tsongkhapa's commentary:

Various non-Buddhist teachers, including Purana, held a discussion and decided to ask the Buddha whether he knew that this cyclic existence has a beginning or end. They said that if he says that he does, this would contradict the many statements that there is no creator and that nothing arises without a cause, but if he says that he does not, he would contradict his statement that he is omniscient. Then they asked him “Hey, Gautama! Do you know that this cyclic existence has a beginning?” The great sage replied, “There is no knowledge of a beginning.” Thus, having said that cyclic existence has no beginning or end, he said clearly that it does not exist essentially. Therefore, since the origin and terminus are not seen, cyclic existence does not exist essentially; cyclic existence is like the circle made by swinging a glowing ember.

(Ocean of Reasoning, p 266-267)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2015 at 6:05 PM

Title: Re: Using floating tank as part of meditation practice?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Some words from Huineng (Platform Sutra, BDK Edition):

there are also those who teach meditation [in terms of] viewing the mind, contemplating tranquility, motionlessness, and nonactivation. You are supposed to make an effort on the basis of these. These deluded people do not understand, and in their grasping become mixed up like all of you here. You should understand that such superficial teachings are greatly mistaken!
(ch 4, p 43)

if you cultivate motionlessness, just see all people: when doing so, do not see the right and wrong, the good and bad, the transgressions and disasters of people. This is the motionlessness of the self-nature. “Good friends, the deluded person may be motionless in body, but he opens his mouth and speaks of the right and wrong, the strength and weakness, the good and bad of others. This is to go against the Way. If you concentrate on the mind or concentrate on purity, this is to impede the Way (i.e., enlightenment).
(ch 5, p 45)

If you are sentient, then you are able to move;

That which is insentient is immobile.
If you cultivate the practice of motionlessness,
You become identical to the immobility of insentientcy.

If you are seeking the true motionlessness,
[Then realize that] there is a motionlessness of motion.
Motionlessness is motionlessness;
Insentient [objects] lack the seeds of buddhahood.

If you are able to discriminate well characteristics,
The cardinal meaning [of Buddhism] is motionlessness.
Just to have such a view
Is to have functioning that is suchlike.
(ch 10, p 85)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2015 at 6:27 PM

Title: Re: purest meditation practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

Purest by what standard? And what form of nenbutsu do you mean?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2015 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: Using floating tank as part of meditation practice?

Content:

Anders said:

Meh. I love Huineng but this is such a stale context to quote him in. The discussion has been about the effects of technology Huineng never knew and has been well based in questions of conditions, circumstance of the practitioner, results and outcomes. Attempting to situate it in a context of orthodoxy is just... whatever floats your boat I guess.

Astus wrote:

The point of being in a floating tank or anechoic chamber is sensory deprivation. Similarly, one can block external stimuli on the cushion in a meditation hall or any ordinary place. And that approach is what is criticised by Huineng, don't you think?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 13th, 2015 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: purest meditation practice

Content:

amanitamusc said:

Purest as in the most highly regarded and that one practices. Any form of Nembutsu compared to any other Buddhist meditation practices one has done.

Astus wrote:

Those who regard it most highly are often called Pure Land practitioners. Others regard other methods as the best.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 13th, 2015 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: Using floating tank as part of meditation practice?

Content:

Anders said:

I think attachment to it is. Quoting Huineng in a discussion like this to me just comes across as close-minded and unwilling to explore different avenues of practise.

Astus wrote:

The point I have intended to deliver via those quotes is that there are certain reasons against using sensory deprivation, not unlike to what was said about body posture previously.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 14th, 2015 at 2:37 AM

Title: Re: Direct introduction. What is it?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Zenman,

Regarding your experience with Dzogchen transmission, it should not be forgotten that it happens within the context of guru yoga. As they quote from Padmasambhava in Beyond Words (p 71-72): "If a practitioner views the master, the transmitter of the lineage, as a totally realized being - a Buddha - then he can become a Buddha. If the Guru is seen as a normal teacher, then the one who sees him this way will realize the state of normal person. If seen as a little dog, he will obtain the realization of a dog."

Also, comparing Zen with Dzogchen is problematic on many levels, basically because very few know enough of both. And even if one has studied Zen in depth at one place, there are numerous other Zen lineages and traditions to study.

It could be said that in the end various teachings lead to the same realisation of suchness. The difference lies in the method, however. Dzogchen has guru yoga, Zen does not. Zen teaches sudden enlightenment, Dzogchen does not. Dzogchen is based on tantras, Zen is not. Zen has nothing to transmit, Dzogchen does. Etc.

I recommend you read the book Beyond Words, as a basic introduction to ChNN's tradition of Dzogchen. See the following quote:

Julia Lawless and Judith Allan: Beyond Words - Dzogchen Made Simple, p 76-77 said:
Direct Transmission

Frequently, direct transmission takes place in a most unorthodox way. With Tilopa and Naropa, Naropa was awakened by being slapped on the face with a wet fish. Patrul Rinpoche, the much-loved Tibetan vagabond saint of the nineteenth century, was awakened by his master Do Khyentse, whom he took to be a drunk! Do Khyentse, guessing his thoughts, spat in his face. Insulting him, he showed him his little finger and called him an Old Dog. At that point total clear realization of the luminous state of intrinsic awareness dawned in Patrul Rinpoche's mind: his mind and the non-dual mind of his master, the Buddha's mind, were completely merged.

Symbolic Transmission

Symbolic transmission means that the transmission is done in a wordless fashion or without direct explanation. Generally it is done through a crystal, a mirror or even a peacock feather. Both the mirror and the crystal are symbols of the primordially pure state of mind, able to manifest infinite reflections without changing their own intrinsic pure nature. A peacock feather is a natural manifestation of infinite potentiality, symbolized through a circle or thigle of five colours.

Oral Transmission

Oral transmission takes place when the teachings are explained orally by the teacher so that the student can understand their primordial and perfected state of mind. It also includes methods of practice which are taught to enable the experience of this state of knowledge.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 14th, 2015 at 3:31 AM

Title: Re: Direct introduction. What is it?

Content:

zenman said:

Is Guru Yoga so far off from what takes place between a zen roshi and a student? From what I have experienced in both, I'd say no. And what is it then that takes place at each dokusan/sanzen if not direct dharma transmission?

Astus wrote:

I have not met any teaching in Zen telling students to see teachers as buddhas.
Teachers are teachers.

What do you call direct dharma transmission? Transmitting the Dharma means teaching it. If you talk to someone about the Triple Jewels, you transmit the Dharma. If you post a quote from a sutra, you transmit the Dharma.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 14th, 2015 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: Direct introduction. What is it?

Content:

zenman said:

No, no, that is not what I meant, that zen students should see their teachers as Buddhas. To put my comment in that context, the student should have reverential attitude his teacher, that's all.

This thread is about direct introduction, originally in the dzogchen context. Let's stick with that. In short, mind to mind, heart to heart transmission of dharma whether in the form of a shout, explanation or a poke in the eye.

Astus wrote:

Every student should have some reverence towards a teacher, that's not even anything specific to Buddhism. If you agree that Zen does not teach seeing the teacher as a buddha, then clearly it cannot be like guru yoga.

Using a shout or other unconventional methods cannot really be categorised as anything, that's why they are unconventional.

Mind to mind transmission simply means that the student understands what the teacher understands. In a Zen context, that means seeing buddha-nature. However, buddha-nature is inherent in everyone, so it is not literally transmitted in any form.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 18th, 2015 at 5:03 PM

Title: Re: "If you can understand the mindfulness of no mindfulness

Content:

Astus wrote:

In vol 30 of the Jingde Chuandeng Lu it is quoted from Shenhui:

無念念者即念真如。無生生者即生實相。無住而住常住涅槃。無行而行即超彼岸。

Mindfulness of no mindfulness is the mindfulness of suchness. Birth of no birth is the true character. Nature and no nature is the eternal nature of nirvana. Movement and no movement is to cross to the other shore.

Compare that to what is said in chapter 4 of Platform Sutra:

真如即是念之體，念即是真如之用。

Suchness is the essence of thought, thought is the function of suchness. (tr. McRae)

Note: I took the term "no mindfulness" from Broughton's "Zongmi on Chan", as he translates wunian that way. From p 88:

"Knowing is no mindfulness and no form. Who is characterized as self, and who is characterized as other? When you are aware that all characteristics are void, it is true mind, no mindfulness. If a thought arises, be aware of it; once you are aware of it, it will disappear. The excellent gate of practice lies here alone. Therefore, even though you fully cultivate all the practices, just take no mindfulness as the axiom. If you just get the mind of no mindfulness, then love and hatred will spontaneously become pale and faint, compassion and wisdom [prajna] will spontaneously increase in brightness, sinful karma will spontaneously be eliminated, and you will spontaneously be zealous in meritorious practices."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 18th, 2015 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: "If you can understand the mindfulness of no mindfulness

Content:

Unknown said:

where do you find all these interesting passages?

Astus wrote:

I searched for "mindfulness of no mindfulness", came up with a quote from Shenhui in the book Zongmi on Chan where the endnote contained the original in pinyin, then searched for the Chinese equivalent on the internet and in CBETA.

Unknown said:

Do you read chinese? How did you learn all this stuff?

Astus wrote:

I can cope with Chinese Buddhist texts, but I'm not proficient in the language. I learn by being curious of what the original passage says using online dictionaries.

Unknown said:

Is the Jingde Chuandeng Lu the same as Record of the Transmission of the Lamp? Or a volume within it?

Astus wrote:

Chuandenglū means "record of the transmission of lamp" and there are various collections that contain that title. Jingde is an era (1004–1007 AD) within Chinese history, and the Jingde Chandeng Lu itself was published in 1004, the first of its kind followed by several others.

Unknown said:

What % of chan texts do you think are translated into English so far? What % are available on the internet in English do you think?

Astus wrote:

Perhaps about 5% of texts are available in English of the entire Chan corpus, but that percentage is significantly higher if we consider only the most important records attributed to Tang era masters. You can find a lot online of the English materials, but not everything.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: Looking for Online Trisvabhava Nirdesha

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://buddhism.lib.ntu.edu.tw/FULLTEXT/JR-EPT/garfie.htm>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 5:27 PM

Title: Re: 'What are you saying'?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

A Zen story about the importance of holy books.

Astus wrote:

I guess it's not about scriptures in general - i.e. canonical texts of sutras, shastras, etc. - but about the practice of keeping secret notes of teachings.

In Japanese Rinzai they're called missan-roku (密参録 - records of secret interviews), in Soto it is monsan (門参, from monto hissan 門徒秘参 - secret instructions of the lineage) and there are also the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kirigami_%28Soto_Zen%29 (切紙 - strips of paper, i.e. secret instructions on pieces of papers).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 21st, 2015 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: 'What are you saying'?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I interpreted it as in line with the basic Zen idea of 'transmission outside scriptures' and so of non-attachment to externals. As the last line says, 'Sho-ju had no attachment to possessions', i.e. had no wish to rely on a material form. I would have thought there was a similarity to the well-known drawing of Hui Neng tearing up sutras:

although as you observe in this case the book in question was not a sutra.

Astus wrote:

In what story does Huineng actually tear up a sutra? By the way, teachings attributed to him are recorded in a text with the title Platform Sutra. The expression "special transmission outside scriptures" is itself in scriptures.

There was a tradition of keeping secret records and such within various Chan communities. See this essay:
https://www.academia.edu/7858031/Who_Has_the_Last_Word_in_Chan_Transmission_Secrecy_and_Reading_During_the_Northern_Song_Dynasty

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 21st, 2015 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: 'What are you saying'?

Content:

seeker242 said:

As long as you look for a Buddha somewhere else, you'll never see that your own mind is the Buddha.

If you don't see your nature and run around all day looking somewhere else, you'll never find a buddha.

The "somewhere else" in this case would be "in the sutras". In other words, you don't find a Buddha in the sutras, you find the Buddha in a mirror, so to speak.

Astus wrote:

How come then that the phrase is interpreted instead of "look at your own mind" as "go see a teacher"? Thus modern people who favour Zen seem often reluctant to study the words of the Buddha and rather spend years and decades listening to a person whom they believe to be the holder of all the teachings supposedly originating from the Buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 22nd, 2015 at 7:40 PM

Title: Re: 'What are you saying'?

Content:

seeker242 said:

Because it can't be a transmission "outside the scriptures", if it's inside the scriptures?

Astus wrote:

Quite the opposite. Whatever is transmitted cannot differ from the scriptures.

"There is no mystery in the authentic transmission from the ancestral Master that differs from the Buddhist sutras, or even from a single word or half a word therein."

(Dogen: Bukkyo, in Shobogenzo, vol 3, p 148, BDK Edition)

"The sutras are buddha word, while Chan is the intention of the buddhas. The mouth and mind of the buddhas cannot possibly be contradictory. The lines of descent of all the [Chan] patriarchs go directly back to the disciples of the Buddha."

(Zongmi: Chan Prolegomenon, in Zongmi on Chan, p 109)

Also in the same text Zongmi basically says that Chan is a direct and simplified form of the teachings aimed for its Chinese audience:

"The teachings are the sutras and treatises left behind by the buddhas and bodhisattvas. Chan is the lines of verse related by the various good friends [on the path]. The buddha sutras open outward, catching the thousands of the beings of the eight classes, while Chan verses scoop up an abridgment, being oriented to one type of disposition found in this land [of China]. [The teachings,] which catch [the thousands of] beings [of the eight classes], are broad and vast, and hence it is difficult to rely upon them. [Chan,] which is oriented to dispositions, points to the bull's-eye and hence is easy to use."
(p 105)

seeker242 said:

True, but the masters of old like Huangbo kinda did both, before they became masters themselves. IIRC, it was the traditional custom to travel around visiting other masters. I don't think it's appropriate for a student of zen shun the Platform sutra, etc.

Astus wrote:

Even before people could receive ordination they had to memorise various sutras and learn the rules of monastic life, not to mention that ordinary lay people had the basic teachings karma and accumulating merit taught to them since childhood.

seeker242 said:

But at the same time, recognizing that you don't get enlightenment just from reading books or hearing speeches. Some people of course put too much stock in teachers, but that's really still just "looking somewhere else" IMO.

Astus wrote:

Huineng himself attained enlightenment simply by hearing the Diamond Sutra and nothing more. Jinul read the Platform Sutra and a commentary on the Avatamsaka Sutra when he experienced enlightenment. Hanshan Deqing studied the Surangama Sutra. And see what Yongming has to say:

"All [the patriarchs] are descendants of the Buddha. I now cite the words of the original teacher [Śākyamuni] to train and instruct disciples, encouraging their practice by having them follow his statements; to know the implicit truth [zong] through reading the Dharma, and not rush around searching for it elsewhere; to personally realize the Buddha's intention. After they understand the message, they at once enter the ranks of the patriarchs; none of them argues over sudden and gradual methods. When they see their nature, they exhibit evidence of their perfect comprehension; how can they advocate ranking one patriarch over another? If this is the case, what contradiction is there between the scriptural teachings and the message of Chan patriarchs? In the case of the twenty-eight patriarchs of former ages in India, the six patriarchs in this land, as well as Great Master Mazu of Hongzhou, and National Preceptor [Hui]zhong of Nanyang, Chan master Dayi of Ehu, Chan master Benjing of Mount Sikong, and so on, all of them perfectly awakened to their own minds through thorough knowledge of the scriptures and treatises."

(Yongming Yanshou: Zongjinglu, in Conception of Chan, p 249)

seeker242 said:

But, I know you want to blame the teachers and the institution of the lineage for that. Because that's what you always do! I partially agree with that, but not completely. I've personally found my one to one encounters with Zen Master Dae Kwang Sunim to be more helpful than anything I've ever read in a book. Mostly because he says things like "Sorry, nothing I can say can help you!" LOL A good teacher will know when to cut a student off and force them to go out on their own. But of course, not all teachers are like that.

Astus wrote:

Teachers are important as they can teach in today's language. I have myself benefited from numerous teachers in various ways. My point is, however, that teachers are not wizards or fairies to magically transform people into buddhas. They can be great examples and explain things lucidly. On the other hand, the scriptures and treatises can serve the same purpose as well. The Chan idea is not that one should cling to the words and actions of teachers instead of the Buddha. It is to attain realisation right now.

"Bodhidharma came from the West only to transmit the One-Mind Doctrine. However, since the mind of all sentient beings is the same as original Buddha-Nature, there is no need to practice; for if one recognizes one's own Mind and sees one's own Nature, there is nothing at all to seek outside oneself. But how is one to recognize one's own Mind? Just that Mind itself that wants to perceive the Mind that is your own Mind, which is as void as Original Mind and is without words and function."

(Huangbo: Wan-Ling Record, tr Lok To)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 22nd, 2015 at 10:21 PM

Title: Re: 'What are you saying'?

Content:

Dan74 said:

