It appears that the Higashi Honganji uses it anywhere, in multiple places, to explain their understanding of Amida Buddha

Astus wrote:

I see, thanks. Apparently Higashi is the modernist branch that is based on the ideas of https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kiyozawa_Manshi.

However, there is still no explanation for how mere recitation can ever result in liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 25th, 2017 at 7:16 PM

Title: Re: How can I be sure its valid

Content:

Zafutales said:

how do I know the relative ease in which I find I can 'just sit' is not some sort of self delusion and I am in fact wasting my time?

Astus wrote:

"like a man who drinks water knowing [immediately] whether it is cold or warm."
(Platform Sutra, ch 1, BDK ed, p 25)

If you cannot verify for yourself, who can?

"Are not these matters to be perceived by the eye of wisdom?"

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn35/sn35.152.wlsh.html>)

Perhaps the relevant question is whether one can tell the difference between delusion and enlightenment. So here is a summary of what the goal is in Zen:

"Put down the four elements, do not cling to anything;
In this Nirvanic nature, feel free to eat and drink.
All phenomena are impermanent; all are empty.
This is the complete enlightenment of the Tathagata."

...

"The mind is a sense organ; dharmas are its object.
The two are like marks on a mirror.
Once the dust is rubbed off, the light begins to appear.
When both mind and dharmas are forgotten, this is true nature."
(Song of Enlightenment, in <http://ddc.shengyen.org/mobile/text/09-04/55.php> and <http://ddc.shengyen.org/mobile/text/09-04/171.php>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 26th, 2017 at 5:16 PM

Title: Re: Shinran Shonin: "There is no Buddha apart from the mind."

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

What matters is whether they can quote Shinran's writings in support of their views.

Astus wrote:

That doesn't seem to be the case, nor is there much logic in the idea of calling oneself a Pure Land Buddhist while at the same time denying the existence of the Pure Land.

"Whoever clings to his/her own views in such manner and does not hold Pure Land and Amitabha as truly existing neither understands Ch'an nor Pure Land."

(<http://ymba.org/books/direct-approach-buddhadharma/part-ii-pure-land-sect/principle-and-action>)

"Some people say that the Pure Land is nothing but mind, that there is no Pure Land of Ultimate Bliss beyond the trillions of worlds of the cosmos. This talk of mind-only has its source in the words of the sutras, and is true, not false. But those who quote it in this sense are misunderstanding its meaning.

Mind equals objects: there are no objects beyond mind. Objects equal mind: there is no mind beyond objects. Since objects are wholly mind, why must we cling to mind and dismiss objects? Those who dismiss objects when they talk of mind have not comprehended mind.

...

Let me ask [the person who thinks Pure Land is mind-only], "When hell appears to you at the moment of death, is this not mind?" "It is mind." "Does the person fall into hell?" "Yes, he falls into hell." "Then it is obvious that since the person falls into hell, hell exists. Is it then only the Pure Land that does not exist? When the mind manifests hell, the person falls into a hell that really exists. When the mind manifests the Pure Land, isn't the person born in a Pure Land that really exists?"

(Pure Land Teachings of Master Chu-Hung, in Pure Land, Pure Mind, p 47-48)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 28th, 2017 at 5:06 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

If the Buddha isn't concerned with the enlightenment of others, how do we square this with the Bodhisattva ideal? I appreciate your help.

Astus wrote:

Neither a bodhisattva nor a buddha has this concept that there are beings who need saving, so why should they have a concern for something that doesn't even exist? A buddha's activities are without effort, without aim, without intention. I might say that talking about the influence or activity of a buddha is merely a figure of speech for ordinary people who cannot help keep thinking in terms of agents and actions.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 29th, 2017 at 5:15 AM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

Is this because all beings are empty of inherent existence?

Astus wrote:

Yes, although it might be better to say that beings are empty of beings, just as the picture of an apple is not an apple.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 29th, 2017 at 6:10 AM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Except that such an expression could easily be construed as nihilism.

Astus wrote:

What do you mean by nihilism?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 29th, 2017 at 6:45 AM

Title: Re: Shinran Shonin: "There is no Buddha apart from the mind."

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

What I've said is, in the absence of evidence for the existence of such a literal Buddha, I choose to look for the meaning beyond literal factuality, that Amida is another way of describing Dharma-body or Buddha-nature, a finger pointing to the moon.

Astus wrote:

Do you perhaps have evidence for the dharmakaya or buddha-nature?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 29th, 2017 at 6:55 AM

Title: Re: Shinran Shonin: "There is no Buddha apart from the mind."

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

The power of reciting Amida's name is not dependent on our belief or doubts

Astus wrote:

"The text of the sutra says sentient beings must take a vow to be born in the Pure Land. This word "must" points to deep faith. Making vows with deep faith is precisely the Mind of Supreme Enlightenment. In sum, faith and vows are truly the guiding compass to the Pure Land. Relying on faith and vows and consistently invoking the Buddha-name is correct practice.

If your faith and vows are solid and strong, then even you recite the Buddha-name only ten times, or only once, as you are on the brink of death, you are sure to attain birth in the Pure Land. Without faith and vows, even if you recite the Buddha-name until [you achieve a level of concentration the Zen literature describes as] "wind cannot enter you and rain cannot wet you" and "you stand like a silver wall or and iron wall", you will still not have a way to be born in the Pure Land."

(<http://ymba.org/books/mind-seal-buddhas/explanation-text/main-portion/seeking-rebirth-pure-land>)

"You should pay particular attention to Faith and Vows, and wish wholeheartedly to achieve rebirth in the Pure Land ... [and not as a celestial being or a Dharma Master, however awakened, as these are still within the realm of Birth and Death]. Only then will your Faith and Vows reach Amitabha Buddha so that His Compassionate Vow may embrace you."

(Yin Kuang: Pure Land Zen, p 32)

"Rebirth in the Western Land thus requires, first of all, deep Faith and fervent Vows. Without these conditions, even if you were to cultivate, you could not obtain a response from Amitabha Buddha. You would merely reap the blessings of the human and celestial realms and sow the seeds of liberation in the future. Anyone who fulfills the conditions of Faith and Vows is assured of rebirth in the Pure Land. When Elder Master Yung Ming stated that "out of ten thousand who cultivate Pure Land, ten thousand will achieve rebirth," he was referring to those with full Faith and Vows."

(Yin Kuang: Pure-Land Zen, Zen Pure-Land; p 37)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 29th, 2017 at 4:52 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

smcj said:

'cause we ask 'em to.

Astus wrote:

Do you think they have no knowledge of the suffering afflicting beings, or that they have no compassion to help?

smcj said:

Didn't you just say they had activities that were spontaneous?

Astus wrote:

Spontaneity is a denial of causality, so it doesn't really fit into Buddhism. The explanation used for the buddha activities is that they are motivated by their vows and appear in response to specific circumstances, while at the same time what is perceived by individual beings depends entirely on their karma.

smcj said:

That's me!

Astus wrote:

The point is to recognise that even when one encounters buddhas it's a product of one's own mind.

"Virtuous monks, you must recognize the one who manipulates these reflections. 'He is the primal source of all the buddhas,' and the place to which every follower of the Way returns."

(Record of Linji, p 9, tr Sasaki)

But this should be understood in the context of the two truths.

"If even the correct teachings (Dharma) should be abandoned, how much more so the incorrect teachings (non-Dharma)?"

(http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enUS/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=141&Itemid=57, ch 6)

That is, buddhas are the most perfect beings, and even they are only mere concepts, so how much more so everything else?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 29th, 2017 at 5:13 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Wayfarer said:
Nothing is real, or nothing matters.

Astus wrote:
Nothing is real, that is a common Buddhist doctrine.

"All conditioned phenomena
Are like a dream, an illusion, a bubble, a shadow,
Like dew or a flash of lightning;
Thus we shall perceive them."
(http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enUS/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=141&Itemid=57, ch 32)

"If those endowed with excellent faith, diligence, and devotion meditate on the illusion-like [nature] of illusion-like phenomena, illusion-like buddhahood will manifest."
(Niguma: Stages in the Path of Illusion, v 4, in "Niguma, Lady of Illusion", p 54)

However, this idea of "nothing matters" is absolutely wrong, an immoral and incorrect view.

"And what is wrong view? 'There is nothing given, nothing offered, nothing sacrificed. There is no fruit or result of good or bad actions. There is no this world, no next world, no mother, no father, no spontaneously reborn beings; no contemplatives or brahmans who, faring rightly & practicing rightly, proclaim this world & the next after having directly known & realized it for themselves.' This is wrong view."
(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.117.than.html#micchaditthi>)

Wayfarer said:
Beings are actually just representations, really they're not beings.

Astus wrote:
I'd say even "representation" is a misleading word, as it implies something behind the appearance that is represented, while the point of "vijñaptimātra" is to realise that there is nothing beyond mere conceptualisation.

Wayfarer said:
Buddhism is often accused of being nihilist. This is said to be on account of the fact that the Buddhist śūnyatā really is just total nothingness, and the aim of the Buddhist path is complete non-existence.

Astus wrote:
Emptiness means that appearances are empty, not that there are no appearances. Also, the aim cannot be complete non-existence if there is nothing that exists in the first place.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 29th, 2017 at 7:03 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I don't believe that śūnyatā equates to non-existent. In other words, empty \neq non-existent.

Astus wrote:

The first meaning of emptiness is the emptiness of person (pudgalasunyata), that there is no self (nairatmya/anatma). So, the deluded worldly person assumes that there is a self, but there are only the five aggregates. There has never been a self, but that truth is not known by a deluded being. And then if we look further, it turns out that even the aggregates are nothing concrete or substantial, therefore appearances are empty as well.

Wayfarer said:

When it is said that phenomena are unreal, that is spoken from the understanding of the tathagatha, who sees through the illusion of worldly existence. But to say that worldly things are unreal from the viewpoint of worldly life, does lead to the mistake of nihilism, which is that things are merely non-existent. That is how I understand the 'two truths'.

Astus wrote:

The reason for the teaching of emptiness is to have worldly people realise it. Buddhas do not need the teaching, deluded people need it.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 29th, 2017 at 8:48 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Anonymous X said:

Maybe you should explain what you mean about spontaneity being a denial of causality.

Astus wrote:

Spontaneity means to be without cause.

Anonymous X said:

Zongmi states many times that the nature of mind is spontaneous Knowing and perfect with all merits.

Astus wrote:

Knowing/awareness is a basic quality of mind, just as a box has sides. Zongmi points to knowing in the sense of the mind being aware and at the same time unattached, in other words, neither grasping nor rejecting phenomena, it is the five aggregates without seeing them as self. It doesn't mean that there is a separate consciousness without a cause, only that consciousness is empty.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 30th, 2017 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Anonymous X said:

Maybe your choice of words confuses me. You said 'spontaneity is a 'denial' of causality'. This is a different definition than 'to be without cause'. There is no denial of causality that I can see. Maybe you didn't mean to put it that way?

Astus wrote:

If something can exist without any cause for its existence, that is denying causality, as it means that something can come out of nothing.

"If things arose without any causes at all,
Everything would always arise from everything.
Worldly people would not have to go through hundreds of hardships to engage causes,
Such as planting seeds, to make results arise.
If beings were empty of causes, then, just like the scent and color
Of utpala flowers in the sky, they would be imperceptible.
Yet the world, in all its intense brilliance, is perceptible.
Therefore, just like your own mind, understand that the world arises due to causes."
(Madhyamakavatara 6.99-100, in Feast of the Fortunate, p 309-310)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 30th, 2017 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

PuerAzelis said:

And yet when I have a piece of metal touching my peripheral nervous system these ideas become philosophical.

Astus wrote:

Check this: <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn36/sn36.006.than.html>

PuerAzelis said:

Does that mean the story about existence or non-existence is true?

Astus wrote:

What story?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 30th, 2017 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Anonymous X said:

Maybe we are talking about two different things here. Things arise from causes, but Mind's nature does not.

Astus wrote:

Awareness as the nature of mind means that every instance of consciousness necessarily has the quality of awareness. Besides awareness - as an inextricable aspect of every experience - other universal qualities can be mentioned, like impermanence and emptiness.

"It is like a bronze mirror. The bronze material is the intrinsic substance. The brightness of the bronze is the intrinsic functioning. The reflections that the brightness gives off are the conditioned functioning. The reflections appear [when the mirror] is face to face with objective supports. They appear in a thousand varieties, but the brightness is an intrinsically constant brightness. The brightness is just one flavor. In terms of the metaphor, mind's constant calm is the intrinsic substance, and mind's constant Knowing is the intrinsic functioning."

(Zongmi: Chan Letter, in Zongmi on Chan, p 96)

It doesn't mean that there is a separate thing called the "nature of mind" or "awareness" independent of conditioned appearances. It is, just as the term implies, the nature, the quality, an aspect of mind. But mind is simply the six kinds of consciousness and the four mental aggregates.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 31st, 2017 at 3:04 AM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Admin_PC said:

Just a quick note. Primordial mind is 本心 (běn-xīn/hon-shin) in Chinese/Japanese; translated as "fundamental mind" by the Digital Dictionary of Buddhism. It appears in the Taisho canon 1948 times, starting with multiple references in the Madhyama Agama and even in volume/fascicle 5 of the Lotus Sutra. It's not new.

Astus wrote:

The real question is what the "original mind" is understood as. For instance, in MA 196 the term "original mind" refers to the situation where a monk has temporarily gone insane but then regained his original mind. In MA 203 the term is again used for a person with a sane mind. And those are all the results for 本心 in the Madhyamagama.

"To speak of the mirror awareness is still not really right; by way of the impure, discern the pure. If you say the immediate mirror awareness is correct, or that there is something else beyond the mirror awareness, this is a delusion. If you keep dwelling in the immediate mirror awareness, this too is the same as delusion; it is called the mistake of naturalism.

To say the present mirror awareness is one's own Buddha is words of measurement, words of calculation - it is like the crying of a jackal. This is still being stuck as in glue at the gate. Originally you did not acknowledge that innate knowing and awareness are your own Buddha, and went running elsewhere to seek Buddha. So you needed a teacher to tell you about innate knowing and awareness as a medicine to cure this disease of hastily seeking outside. Once you no longer seek outwardly, the disease is cured and it is necessary to remove the medicine. If you cling fixedly to innate knowing awareness, this is a disease of meditation."

(Extensive Record of Baizhang, from Sayings and Doings of Pai-Chang, p 33-34)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 31st, 2017 at 5:19 AM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Admin_PC said:

Imho the way mind is spoken of in the Pabhassara Sutta is fairly consistent with the idea of 本心 as I've seen it presented elsewhere.

Astus wrote:

That is a sutta quoted frequently by those who want to see atman in Buddhism, even when there are thousands of teachings explaining again and again that the mind is dependently arisen.

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/an/an01/an01.049.than.html#fn-1>,

<https://dhammawheel.com/viewtopic.php?p=378555#p378555>,

<https://sujato.wordpress.com/2014/10/29/on-the-radiant-mind/>, and

<http://dharmafarer.org/wordpress/wp-content/uploads/2009/12/8.3-Radiant-mind.-piya.pdf> unanimously agree that the radiance mentioned in that sutta is about a state of mind experienced during absorption. So it is not like what could be understood as the nature of mind, or anything of primordial status. But there are a number of suttas where the Buddha talks about things that are always true, and those things are impermanence, suffering, no-self, and dependent origination.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 31st, 2017 at 5:19 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Admin_PC said:

There are countless examples of the Buddha referencing defilements & the mind that abandons them throughout the suttas.

Astus wrote:

Your references are about purification, cleansing, the gradual path to develop and attain an unblemished mind. The doctrine of "original mind" / "buddha-nature" is quite the opposite, as it means that the mind is already pure and perfect, that it does not require any cleansing but only discovery/recognition. Although it can be said that if we look into the actual details of these teachings then they are not contradictory, nevertheless, they represent different approaches, particularly at the beginning.

Admin_PC said:

Again, I'm taking the term 本心 as it's presented in places like here:

http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enUS/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=140&Itemid=57

Astus wrote:

The Platform Sutra is a good example of how the original mind is understood in Chan - and generally in Mahayana to some extent. While those Theravada teachers talk about " http://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/authors/bodhi/bps-essay_04.html ", that "

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/thai/lee/demons.html> ", so "

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/thai/suwat/blatant.html> " Compare that to what http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enUS/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=140&Itemid=57 says: "When you understand this one truth, you can understand all truths.",

"the ordinary person is Buddha. Affliction is enlightenment.", "Why not immediately realize in your own mind the intrinsic nature of suchness?", "those who realize the doctrine of "no thought" thoroughly understand all dharmas; those who realize the doctrine of "no thought" perceive the realm of the buddhas; those who realize the doctrine of "no thought" attain Buddhahood."

Admin_PC said:

I'm not sure where the miscommunication is, but my only intention was to define 本心 within a Buddhist context.

Astus wrote:

Original mind stands for buddha-nature in the sense of inherently pure mind. That concept does not really fit into the teaching of consciousness taught as momentary instances of experiences appearing as an effect of the contact between a sense faculty and a sense object. It also suspiciously sounds like an atman, so the whole doctrine of tathagatagarbha was apparently not too popular in India itself, unlike in East Asia.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 31st, 2017 at 6:54 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Wayfarer said:

What do you think of this quote

Astus wrote:

It points to falling into the extreme views of existence and non-existence. In fact, grasping at any view is an error, as it is still maintaining the idea that there is something to hold on to.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 31st, 2017 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Admin_PC said:

The passage I quoted from HuiNeng contains some portions that sound fairly gradual

Astus wrote:

What section do you see as gradual? For instance:

"If you give rise to genuine prajna contemplation, in an instant all deluded thoughts will cease; if you realize your inherent nature, you awaken and you arrive at the stage of a buddha"

That is direct access to buddhahood, from delusion to perfect enlightenment.

"Realization of the original mind is true liberation."

Again, one just needs to realise it. No purification, no stages, only immediate liberating insight.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 31st, 2017 at 10:52 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Admin_PC said:

This is almost verbatim from the "gradual" links I posted above: What is "no thought"? To understand and perceive all dharmas, with a mind free from attachment and defilement, that is "no thought." When in use, this mind pervades everywhere, yet it does not cling to anything. We only have to purify our (original) mind so that the six consciousnesses exit the six gates (senses) without being contaminated or defiled by the six dusts (sense objects).

Astus wrote:

No thought in Huineng's teaching is arrived at directly and is equal to buddhahood. The gradual path - not the sudden teaching of Huineng - is where one gets to no thought stage by stage.

"When you are awakened to this teaching, there is "no thought"— you are free from recollection and attachments, and do not give rise to delusions. From your own true suchness, illuminate and observe with wisdom, neither grasp nor reject anything—this is to see your true nature and attain Buddhahood."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 1st, 2017 at 3:09 AM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Admin_PC said:

I'm just talking about how 本心 is used in that passage. He says in that passage that it is something that needs to be realized and requires purification.

Astus wrote:

The mind is originally pure, it does not require purification. In fact, the very attempt to purify it is wrong. So Huineng says:

"If one is to concentrate on purity, then [realize that because] our natures are fundamentally pure, it is through false thoughts that suchness is covered up. Just be without false thoughts and the nature is pure of itself. If you activate your mind to become attached to purity, you will only generate the falseness of purity. The false is without location; it is the concentration that is false. Purity is without shape and characteristics; you only create the characteristics of purity and say this is 'effort' [in meditation]. To have such a view is to obscure one's own fundamental nature, and only to be fettered by purity."

(Platform Sutra, ch 5, BDK ed, p 45; T48n2008p353b10-14)

Admin_PC said:

I have no problem with the idea that HuiNeng's method is described differently elsewhere.

Astus wrote:

In my previous posts it was from the very same chapter, and the above one is from the same text, so it's not really elsewhere.

Admin_PC said:

One of the Samyukta Agama passages with 本心 is T0099_02.0278. I took a stab at translating it, but it came out ugly. It's explicitly talking about awakening in that context though.

Astus wrote:

In that sutra 本心 stands for "original intention", that is, the reason why someone goes forth from home life to homelessness.

Admin_PC said:

I totally understand there may be different nuances of the term & paths to get there, I just think when multiple passages are talking about a mind free of defilements and obscurations, they're essentially pointing to the same thing.

Astus wrote:

Except that there is no such thing as an "original mind" in the Nikayas/Agamas, nor in the Abhidharma. Even Madhyamaka and Yogacara refute such a concept. That is, the concept that the mind is inherently pure. On the other hand, it is of course the goal of all Buddhist tradition to attain complete purity, i.e. freedom from afflictions and obscurations.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 1st, 2017 at 4:21 AM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Admin_PC said:

While, a mind purified of defilements is a common theme - the idea of original purity is not.

Astus wrote:

So it is. And then what an original mind stands for in those teachings that actually speak about it is another matter.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 1st, 2017 at 6:59 AM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Wayfarer said:

There is indeed something to hold on to i.e. the raft, the teaching.

Astus wrote:

And this is the teaching:

"Therefore one should not cherish dharma or non-dharma. For this reason, the Tathagata often teaches: Bhiksus, know that my Dharma is like a raft. If even the correct teachings (Dharma) should be abandoned, how much more so the incorrect teachings (non-Dharma)?"

(http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enUS/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=141&Itemid=57, ch 6)

Wayfarer said:

And, 'original purity' is not something fabricated.

Astus wrote:

"Good son, the term 'unconditioned' is also a word provisionally invented by the First Teacher. Now, if the First Teacher provisionally invented this word, then it is a verbal expression apprehended by imagination. And, if it is a verbal expression apprehended by imagination, then, in the final analysis, such an imagined description does not validate a real thing. Therefore, the unconditioned does not exist."

(Samdhinirmocana Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 12)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 1st, 2017 at 5:04 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Indeed, and that was the very verse I alluded to. But there is a raft, a teaching, and there needs to be.

Astus wrote:

I meant that the teaching was to abandon all attachments.

Wayfarer said:

Of course it doesn't exist, because 'everything that exists' has a beginning and an end in time. The unconditioned doesn't come into and go out of existence, therefore could not 'exist'.

Astus wrote:

What the sutra says is that both "conditioned" and "unconditioned" are words, teachings meant for instructing people, that's why they don't actually exist.

Wayfarer said:

I find Astus' interpretation consistently falls into the side of saying 'non-existent'.

Astus wrote:

"You must discern the words of the complete teaching and the incomplete teaching; you must discern prohibitive words and nonprohibitive words; you must discern living and dead words; you must discern medicine and disease words; you must discern words of negative and positive metaphor; you must discern generalizing and particularizing words.

To say that it is possible to attain Buddhahood by cultivation, that there is practice and there is realization, that this mind is enlightened, that the mind itself is identical to Buddha - this is Buddha's teaching; these are words of the incomplete teaching. These are nonprohibitive words, generalizing words, words of a pound or ounce burden. These are words concerned with weeding out impure things; these are words of positive metaphor. These are dead words. These are words for ordinary people.

To say that one cannot attain Buddhahood by cultivation, that there is no cultivation, no realization, it is not mind, not Buddha - this is also Buddha's teaching; these are words of the complete teaching, prohibitive words, particularizing words, words of a hundred hundredweight burden. These are words beyond the three vehicles' teachings, words of negative metaphor or instruction, words concerned with weeding out pure things; these are words for someone of station in the Way, these are living words."

(Extensive Record of Baizhang, tr Cleary, p 37-38)

Wayfarer said:

Reality, the real, the dharmadhatu, is not existent or non-existent, but that which all notions of existence and non-existence presupposes.

Astus wrote:

In other words, it seems you are proposing that there is an actual substratum.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 1st, 2017 at 5:42 PM

Title: Re: Shinran Shonin: "There is no Buddha apart from the mind."

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

The highest level is reciting the Buddha-name to realize there's no Buddha apart from the mind.

Astus wrote:

How can the repetition of some syllables bring one to the realisation that there is no buddha apart from the mind?

As the Platform Sutra (ch 2, BDK ed, p 28) states:

"This must be practiced in the mind, not recited by the mouth. To recite it orally without practicing it in the mind is [as unreal] as a phantasm or hallucination, [and as evanescent] as dew or lightning."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 1st, 2017 at 10:24 PM

Title: Re: Shinran Shonin: "There is no Buddha apart from the mind."

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

"If our Mind accords with the Mind of Buddha Amitabha for one moment"

Astus wrote:

How does it accord with the mind of a buddha? Although your quote says "the image of the Pure Land's golden thrones appear before us", I doubt that buddha-mind means seeing golden thrones.

Then your next quote says "reciting the name of Amitabha (Namu-Amida-Butsu) reveals this enlightenment" - however, that again does not say how or for what reason. If it were that simple and direct, then everyone reciting the name would be enlightened right there, but that is apparently not the case.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 2nd, 2017 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Shinran Shonin: "There is no Buddha apart from the mind."

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

Please read the books and articles you recommended previously, and you will find the answers you are seeking. May you be happy and well.

Astus wrote:

I don't recall any of them claiming that mere recitation is sufficient for insight, that's why I'm asking you about it.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 2nd, 2017 at 4:23 AM

Title: Re: Shinran Shonin: "There is no Buddha apart from the mind."

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

If Buddhahood is a principle which pervades the universe, then reciting the Buddha-name helps to remove the delusion of separateness between ourselves and Buddhahood. The purpose of Zazen is the same, to remove our delusion of separateness.

Astus wrote:

Emptiness is the ultimate nature of the whole world, but merely repeating the word "emptiness" will not get one even to understanding, much less actually realising it.

As for "Reciting the Buddha's name while concentrating on Compassion and Wisdom for instance, produces great energy, concentration and joy." that is what one can get with it, although if one aims for concentration, it is better to just focus on one thing. Still, wisdom needs more than being focused. One has to use that calm and concentrated mind to actually investigate appearances in order to gain insight.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 2nd, 2017 at 5:11 AM

Title: Re: Shinran Shonin: "There is no Buddha apart from the mind."

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

Have you read The Awakening of Faith in the Mahayana?

Astus wrote:

Yes.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 2nd, 2017 at 6:54 AM

Title: Re: Shinran Shonin: "There is no Buddha apart from the mind."

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

Then there's no further need to question me regarding the gradual cultivation of enlightenment through Buddha-name recitation.

Astus wrote:

And what the

http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Translations/Awakening_of_faith.html says is that "through the strength of wholehearted meditation on the Buddha, he will in fulfillment of his wishes be able to be born in the Buddha-land beyond". Not insight, not enlightenment, but birth in the Pure Land.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 2nd, 2017 at 6:09 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Wayfarer said:

This is your interpretive problem in a nutshell. Because you think any reference to a transcendent reality is 'like Atman' or 'substantialist', then you reject them, the consequence being that ultimately nothing is real. That is what 'nihilism' means - it is literally the assertion that nothing exists, or nothing is real.

Astus wrote:

Let's try to be more specific and concrete. All possible experiences can be categorised as the six sensory areas: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, thinking. So, anything that can ever occur happens only within these six. It can be easily confirmed - both logically and experientially - that all experiences are impermanent and conditioned. To propose something beyond experiences, something permanent and unconditioned, means that that something cannot be experienced, it has no connection to neither bodily nor mental phenomena, therefore it does not and cannot exist, and even if it did it would be irrelevant and useless.

What is taught by the Buddha and all his descendants is that suffering is the product of clinging that comes from the ignorance about the six types of experiences being impermanent and conditioned. Therefore, any teaching that postulates a doctrine contrary to that is merely propagating ignorance.

Wayfarer said:

When I challenged you on that point, you said, sure, many Buddhists texts say that nothing is real. But they don't.

Astus wrote:

Could you show those teachings that don't?

Wayfarer said:

That is why Madhyamika is a dialectic, not a systematic philosophy.

Astus wrote:

Madhyamaka is a method, a skilful means, just like every Buddhist teaching.

Wayfarer said:

Things that exist from one level of understanding, don't exist from another level. So for us worldly beings, chairs, tables, illnesses, accidents, and so on, really do exist, and have real consequences. Of course from another perspective, they're unreal, empty of inherent existence. But to say they're merely or simply non-existent as you do, is the mistake of nihilism (in my opinion anyway).

Astus wrote:

If you accept that things are empty of inherent existence, that means you accept that they are not real. If you say that things do have inherent existence, that means you claim that chairs, tables, illnesses, accidents, etc. are independent, eternal phenomena. Besides either having or not having inherent existence there is no third option.

Wayfarer said:

On the level of conventional reality, conventional distinctions are vital.

Astus wrote:

Where has that been denied anywhere?

Wayfarer said:

That is why the two truths teaching is so important. Things that are real on one level are unreal on another. To mistake or mix up the two levels creates a problem, it is mistaking the relative for the absolute.

Astus wrote:

The conventional truth is dependent origination, the ultimate truth is emptiness. These two truths actually stand for the same single reality. To think of them in terms of one being existence and the other non-existence is assuming an impossible duality.

So Nagarjuna says,

"That which is dependent origination
Is explained to be emptiness.
That, being a dependent designation,
Is itself the middle way."
(MMK 24.18, in Ocean of Reasoning, p 503)

And Tsongkhapa sums it up as,

"So long as the two understandings - of appearance,
Which is undeceiving dependent origination,
And emptiness devoid of all theses - remain separate,
So long you have not realized the intent of the Sage."
(<http://www.tibetanclassics.org/html-assets/Three%20Principal%20Aspects.pdf>, v 11)

And before this is all assumed to be mere dialectics or rhetoric, the meditation on dependent origination and emptiness together is an essential practice.

"Whether walking, standing, sitting, lying, or rising, he should practice both "cessation" and "clear observation" side by side. That is to say, he is to meditate upon the fact that things are unborn in their essential nature; but at the same time he is to meditate upon the fact that good and evil karma, produced by the combination of the primary cause and the coordinating causes, and the retributions of karma in terms of pleasure, pain, etc., are neither lost nor destroyed. Though he is to meditate on the retribution of good and evil karma produced by the primary and coordinating causes [i.e., he is to practice "clear observation"], he is also to meditate on the fact that the essential nature of things is unobtainable by intellectual analysis."

(http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Translations/Awakening_of_faith.html, part 4)

Wayfarer said:

But it is also the meaning behind many Zen koans, as you yourself know - 'first there is a mountain' - relative truth - 'then there is no mountain' - realising emptiness - 'then there is' - harmonising both perspectives which is mastery.

Astus wrote:

Yes, there are such gradual methods, where the point is to eventually understand and realise that emptiness and appearances are not two different realms. In other words, nirvana is samsara.

Wayfarer said:

That sutta I referred to, the Nibbana Sutta, is unequivocal: there is an unborn, unconditioned, unmade, were there not, there would be no escape from the conditioned, the born, the made.

Astus wrote:

Escape to where?

Wayfarer said:

As I said, if you go to Sutta Central and search for 'unconditioned', you find many references, including many which refer to 'merging with' or 'realising' the unconditioned.

Astus wrote:

And that unborn and unconditioned is emptiness.

Wayfarer said:

That is not Vedanta - the Buddha has a different way of going about it. But their mokṣa and the Buddhist Nirvāṇa are not worlds apart.

Astus wrote:

Vedanta believes there is an ultimate perceiver, Buddhism shows that perception is a conditioned phenomenon. Vedanta's solution is to identify only with the ultimate subject as the only real thing, Buddhism's solution is to not identify with, not cling to anything, because there is nothing to rely on.

Wayfarer said:

There is a higher truth, that is the meaning of 'abhijna'. Higher, compared to what?

Astus wrote:

Higher compared to the false idea of self.

Wayfarer said:

It doesn't mean there is a substratum or permanent unchanging substance (or subject of experience).

Astus wrote:

What does it mean then?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 2nd, 2017 at 6:15 PM

Title: Re: Shinran Shonin: "There is no Buddha apart from the mind."

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

The conclusion to The Awakening of Faith in the Mahayana says that we take refuge in Amida Buddha, not as a literal flesh and blood Buddha, but instead as Suchness or Dharma-body

Astus wrote:

And even if one does that, the result is birth in Sukhavati, not enlightenment.

Dharma Flower said:

If he meditates on the Dharmakaya, the Suchness of the Buddha, and with diligence keeps practicing the meditation, he will be able to be born there in the end because he abides in the correct samadhi.

http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Translations/Awakening_of_faith.html

It seems that, no matter what I say, you have a desire to say the opposite, instead of recognizing differences in interpretation between Buddhist paths. I even was able to find two instances in a liturgical book from the Nishi Honganji saying that Amida attained Buddhahood in the "beginningless past," just as Shinran taught. Everyone must find the Dharma path that's right for them.

Astus wrote:

There are differences. And the question I've been asking is how can mere recitation result in liberation, as there seems to be neither logical nor textual basis for that.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 2nd, 2017 at 6:38 PM

Title: Re: Path to Buddhahood in Chan/Zen

Content:

Jesse said:

Doesn't that describe the realization of an Arahant?

Astus wrote:

In Mahayana the arhat falls into identifying with the annihilation of appearances and clings to a formless absorption.

Jesse said:

In Mahayana, once this stage is realized, we intentionally take rebirth as a Bodhisattva, correct?

Astus wrote:

Mahayana is the bodhisattva path from the beginning.

Jesse said:

And this rebirth as a Bodhisattva is the pledge we take -- rebirth as a bodhisattva until all sentient beings are liberated.

Astus wrote:

The bodhisattva path begins with the arousal of bodhicitta. The goal is to become a buddha and save all beings. One does not remain stuck on a lower level intentionally.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 2nd, 2017 at 7:01 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Wayfarer said:

But the reality of the world is not being called into question, it's the attachment to it, the taking it to be something that it is not, namely, substantial, satisfying, and 'mine', which it is not.

Astus wrote:

That's the whole point of seeing that appearances are merely appearances and not substantial things, to discover that the object of attachment is purely imagined, therefore attachment itself is false. As long as one assumes real objects attachment remains.

Wayfarer said:

It is unreal, from the understanding of the Tathagata.

Astus wrote:

Isn't it the Buddha's wisdom that we all aspire to and intend to realise?

Wayfarer said:

Not ultimately real. But as I said, if you have an illness, and you are prescribed a cure, then the difference between the cure, and a false cure, is a real difference - a matter of life and death.

Astus wrote:

What is the difference between "ultimately real" and simply "real"? As long as one is filled with hope and fear one suffers.

Wayfarer said:

That why there are degrees of reality, which is symbolised in the dharmachakra, by the eight realms of existence.

Astus wrote:

The dharmacakra (wheel of law) symbolises the noble eightfold path. The bhavacakra (wheel of existence) symbolises the six realms of rebirth. The six realms are not degrees of reality but places of birth that come from ignorance.

Wayfarer said:

We're in 'the human realm'. But the Tathagata is always shown as outside the human realm altogether. From that perspective, what we take to be real is unreal - but it's real for us, and what we do has real consequences in that context. Emptiness is not mere non-existence, it's more complicated than that.

Astus wrote:

As long as one clings to appearances, one is in samsara. With the end of clinging there is no more samsara. The cause of clinging is the belief in a self, a substance, a real existence. Seeing emptiness is how clinging is eliminated. So, why argue for being in the human realm and not aim for the vision of the buddhas?

Wayfarer said:

That is why Traleg Kyabgon Rinpoche differentiates 'realisation' and 'experience'. When the distinction between 'self and other' and 'knower and known' is overcome, then one is in the domain of realisation, not experience as such.

Astus wrote:

Are you saying there is a "domain of realisation" beyond the six areas of experience?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 2nd, 2017 at 8:08 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

muni said:

'Beyond' the duality of sense and sense object, how to express that other than again having subject and sense object?

Astus wrote:

There has never been a self in any of the sensory areas, so it's not them that are the problem, only the false assumption of there being a substance.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 3rd, 2017 at 5:53 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Wayfarer said:

If there were not, then why wouldn't everyone who hears, sees, and has normal sense-perception, already have realised Nirvāṇa? Is there no difference between those who have realised it, and those who have not? If there is a difference, what is that difference? What do the Noble Ones see, that the puthujjana do not see? Is what the Noble Ones see an object of sense perception?

Astus wrote:

The difference is whether one clings to appearances or not. It is the difference between "my car has been stolen" and "a car has been stolen", where in the former case one is moved by various thoughts and emotions, but not in the latter case.

Wayfarer said:

That is not a matter of asserting that objects don't exist

Astus wrote:

Asserting and negating are both imprisoning views. The reason one is taught to see that appearances are empty is to eliminate the false object of attachment.

Wayfarer said:

The way I understand it, is that realisation pertains to those who 'realise the truth of the teaching'. And the truth of the teaching is not an object of sense, but understanding of emptiness, Śūnyatā. So that is why it is 'transcendental wisdom' - because it goes beyond the domain of sensory perception. ('Gone beyond'). If it didn't 'go beyond' then Buddhists would simply be empiricists.

Astus wrote:

Emptiness is simply that the six sensory objects are unestablished, without essence, ungraspable. Experiences are already empty as they are, so it is not that there is something new to gain, but the mistake of imagining a self is what needs to be removed.

"The self-notion itself does not have the identity of a self, nor does the (selfish being's) deforming habit; their natures are different.

Apart from these two there is no other (self), so it arises only as an error; liberation is therefore the termination of a mere error."

(Mahāyānasūtrālamkāra 6.2, in The Universal Vehicle Discourse Literature, p 50)

Wayfarer said:

But you also know that the way that a bodhisattva and a hell-being sees things, are entirely different. That is often quoted here on this forum: the bodhisattva sees a 'glass of water' as ambrosial nectar and the hell-being sees it as boiling pus (or something revolting).

Astus wrote:

That difference in the perception of water you mention is between hell dwellers and gods. Being a bodhisattva is not a matter of birth or perception.

Wayfarer said:

Certainly, we all aim for that understanding, but we're not there yet. So saying that the objects of ordinary experience are merely non-existent, doesn't reflect that perspective, in my view.

Astus wrote:

The point of the teaching is not to just give a description of one's erroneous views but to direct one to the correct view, and that correct view is that appearances are empty and unreal.

Wayfarer said:

So how does saying that they are non-existent, apply or help, in respect of our situation in the world? There is still relative and conventional truth, it can't simply be all swept aside. I don't think that is what 'realising emptiness' means.

Astus wrote:

Emptiness cures the dissatisfaction caused by hope and fear that come from mistaking appearances as substantial. It is not the denial of appearances or of causality.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 4th, 2017 at 5:49 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Wayfarer said:

If 'ignorance' gives rise to suffering, and ignorance is caused by clinging

Astus wrote:

The order is: ignorance -> clinging -> suffering.

Wayfarer said:

is 'understanding the nature of ignorance' a sensory experience?

Astus wrote:

Understanding ignorance is like understanding anything else, it is a mental process, thoughts. It's like the story of riding a boat on a foggy lake and seeing another boat coming towards you. You shout at the other boat to avoid you, but when it gets next to you it turns out to be an empty boat without anyone controlling it. Similarly, one can be upset about all sorts of things, but when it becomes clear that there is no person doing it, who can one be angry at? One can make a difference between learning that boats go without handlers and seeing empty boats with one's own eyes. That is the difference between learning the five aggregates to be empty and actually perceiving it to be true. What perception means in this case is not finding a self anywhere.

"In the same way, a monk investigates form, however far form may go. He investigates feeling... perception... fabrications... consciousness, however far consciousness may go. As he is investigating form... feeling... perception... fabrications... consciousness, however far consciousness may go, any thoughts of 'me' or 'mine' or 'I am' do not occur to him."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn35/sn35.205.than.html>)

Wayfarer said:

I don't see how it could be.

Astus wrote:

First one assumes that there is a self who perceives and does things, that is ignorance. Then one reviews that assumption in theory and in actual experience (experience means phenomena of the six sensory domains). That way one can confirm that such assumption of a self is unfounded and false. Or as Rangjung Dorje put it:

"Looking again and again at the mind that can not be looked at,
One sees clearly just as it is the truth of not seeing.
Resolving any doubt as to how it is or is not,
May we recognize our unconfused nature by ourselves."
(<http://www.rinpoche.com/teachings/mahamudra.pdf>)

Wayfarer said:

Seeing through or gaining insight into the cause of ignorance is not itself an experience - it's a realisation, although such realisations do sometimes trigger experiences (as per the excerpt from Traleg Kyabgon).

Astus wrote:

That kind of difference between experience and realisation is important to know, but there the word "experience" carries a meaning different from how I used it. Here experience stands for temporary meditative phenomena, like bliss, clarity, and thoughtlessness, while realisation stands for the personal confirmation that all experiences are impermanent and empty. Realisation is enduring because it removes the cause of suffering, that is, it is discovering that our conception of a self is unfounded. But as a mental process realisation is a temporary phenomenal event just like everything else.

Wayfarer said:

Yes, tables and chairs are dependently arisen. But they serve a purpose and have an identity, even if they are not 'ultimately real'. They are not eternal or independent, but they're also not non-existent. They're neither completely real nor simply non-existent. That is what I take the 'middle way' understanding to be.

Astus wrote:

When it is accepted that an object is dependent, it means it does not exist on its own. Not existing on its own means that there is no object that is dependent. So whatever object and its relations one may consider, it's all a conceptual fabrication and nothing more, a product of fiction. Again, that is not saying that there are no appearances at all, it is about understanding how appearances actually are. And the only reason for that understanding is to eliminate ignorance.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 5th, 2017 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Nevertheless, the Buddha doesn't fall back from the state of realisation. In that sense, it is not a temporary state, is it?

Astus wrote:

When the cause, ignorance, is gone, then clinging does not occur again, because the cause does not occur any more. It is not a state one stays in.

Wayfarer said:

The problem I am having with this point is that, in any encyclopedia entry on Buddhism, the 'two extreme views' are given as 'the object really exists' ('eternalism') or 'the object does not exist' ('nihilism'). So to say that objects don't exist, seems to me to be the 'extreme' of nihilism. Perhaps I am not understanding it correctly.

Astus wrote:

The two extreme views are sassatavada and ucchedavada, that is: eternalism and annihilationism. The definitions from the <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.01.0.bodh.html>:

"There are, bhikkhus, some recluses and brahmins who are eternalists, and who on four grounds proclaim the self and the world to be eternal."

"There are, bhikkhus, some recluses and brahmins who are annihilationists and who on seven grounds proclaim the annihilation, destruction, and extermination of an existent being."

As for how it becomes the extremes of existence and non-existence, Nagarjuna explains:

"It exists" is an eternalist view; "It does not exist" is an annihilationist idea.

Therefore the wise one should not have recourse to either existence or nonexistence.

For whatever exists by its intrinsic nature does not become nonexistent; eternalism then follows.

"It does not exist now [but] it existed previously"—from this, annihilation follows.

(MMK 15.10-11, tr Siderits)

There isn't actually a view that says "nothing exists", since even saying it contradicts it. Rather, it's probably best illustrated with the teaching on rebirth, where some believe that there is an eternal soul, and some believe that with death everything is over - these are the extreme views of existence and non-existence, better put as eternalism and annihilationism (not nihilism).

"If the existent is unestablished, then the nonexistent (abhāva) too is not established. For people proclaim the nonexistent to be the alteration of the existent."
(MMK 15.5, tr Siderits)

"In fact, people say that what is the alteration of a thing is "non-existence"; however, the very thing does not exist. If it does not exist, of what would there be non-existence? Without non-existence, how do you say its antithesis, existence [of a thing], is possible?"
(Buddhapalita: Mulamadhyamakavṛtti, 15.5, tr Akira Saito, p 202)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 6th, 2017 at 2:46 AM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Anonymous X said:

Realization is a mental process? Perhaps you can explain this to us.

Astus wrote:

It is a mental process, as it is about confirming in personal experience the truth of the Dharma. To stay with Nagarjuna:

"Through the elimination of karma and affliction there is nirvana.
Karma and affliction come from conceptual thought.
These come from mental fabrication.
Fabrication ceases through emptiness."
(MMK 18.5, in Ocean of Reasoning, p 377)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 6th, 2017 at 6:16 AM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Wayfarer said:

And I think that is a dogmatic view. The transitoriness of everything applies to the domain of name and form and to sensory experience. Power, possessions, children, the body, life, status, history, and everything else that can be experienced is transitory. But I don't believe 'awakening to the deathless' is a transitory state.

Astus wrote:

If you say that awakening is a state, it is an impermanent mental phenomenon. What I said is that with the cessation of the cause (ignorance) the effect (suffering) cannot occur. This is what the four noble truths talk about. And that is how liberation cannot turn into bondage again.

Wayfarer said:

That is the exact phrase I was referring to. I think a lot of what is said about the non-reality of experience falls into the latter category.

Astus wrote:

The unreality of appearances would fall into the category of non-existence if there were something that could actually cease to exist. But since there has never been a self, liberation is not the destruction of self.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 6th, 2017 at 5:37 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Anonymous X said:

If this were a mental process, then many of the posters here would have realization as many have understood the Madhyamaka emptiness. But, this is clearly not the case as most of the understanding is an intellectual one and is not on the intrinsic level of being.

Astus wrote:

There are three stages of wisdom (prajna): learning (sruta), understanding (cinta), application (bhavana). In other words, one cannot understand what one hasn't learnt, and one cannot apply what one has not understood. It is at the stage of application that one personalises the teaching on an experiential level.

Anonymous X said:

Madhyamaka is seen as a stepping stone in the so called step by step schools because it is not a direct pointing to the original nature or Tathagatagarbha. I'm not trying to diminish its importance, though. This is why I don't accept that realization is a mental process. It may 'seem' like it, but this is not realization. Of course, your definition may be different, but I see it as another concept you believe in.

Astus wrote:

Those you call "direct pointing" merely say that one should realise that the mind is empty. How is that different from Madhyamaka?

"The fields of the Buddha are all identical to space. The wondrous natures of people of this world are empty, without a single dharma that can be perceived. The emptiness of the self-natures is also like this."

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 28)

"since the past this teaching of ours has first taken nonthought as its central doctrine, the formless as its essence, and nonabiding as its fundamental. The formless is to transcend characteristics within the context of characteristics. Nonthought is to be without thought in the context of thoughts. Nonabiding is to consider in one's fundamental nature that all worldly [things] are empty, with no consideration of retaliation—whether good or evil, pleasant or ugly, and enemy or friend, etc., during times of words, fights, and disputation."

(ch 4, p 43)

Zhihuang said, "What does the Sixth Patriarch take as meditation?"

Xuance said, "What our master preaches is the wondrously peaceful and perfectly quiescent: the essence and functions are suchlike, suchlike. The five skandhas are fundamentally empty, the six [types of] sensory data are nonexistent. One does not enter and come out of [samādhi], one is neither concentrated nor disturbed. Meditation is in its nature nonabiding, and the serenity of meditation transcends abiding. Meditation in its nature is birthless, and the thoughts of meditation transcend birth. The mind is like space, but it is without any thinking of space."

(ch 7, p 69)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 6th, 2017 at 6:35 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Anonymous X said:

No one denies the importance of emptiness, but that is only a gateway, and still a view. Even Nagarjuna cautioned against holding on to this view. It is still the self-thought grasping for a foothold.

Astus wrote:

Since Nagarjuna cautioned about taking emptiness to be a view, how could he have taught it as a view?

"The victorious ones have said

That emptiness is the elimination of all views.

Anyone for whom emptiness is a view

Is incorrigible."

(MMK 13.8, in Ocean of Reasoning, p 298)

In other words, emptiness is not a view. But, to relinquish all views, one needs to first learn and then understand what emptiness means.

Anonymous X said:

What Padmasambhava is saying in his 'Self Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness' treatise is not 'merely' that mind is empty. He is inviting us to let go of all our views, thoughts, concepts about mind and anything else, for that matter

Astus wrote:

Letting go of everything, that has been the teaching of the Buddha from the beginning, that is what it's all about, and that's what you find in Madhyamaka as well.

Anonymous X said:

and meet/be this Intrinsic Awareness that is right here, right now.

Astus wrote:

What is that intrinsic awareness? Is it the same or different from the aggregates?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 6th, 2017 at 7:30 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Anonymous X said:

Read...

Astus wrote:

I'm asking about your interpretation, your view, what you call "intrinsic awareness". If one takes it to be something other than the aggregates, it is no different from the mistaken view of the self. If it is not different from the aggregates, it cannot be called intrinsic.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 6th, 2017 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Anonymous X said:

My view is unimportant.

Astus wrote:

If so, then why say "It is worthless without your own engagement, just like repeating Madhyamaka views. It's quite boring, actually to listen to it all. There's no energy in this kind of repetition."

As for my take on the matter of inherent enlightenment, the true nature of mind, etc., it is too easy to mistake these expressions as some sort of ultimate self, while the whole point is just to recognise that this whole realm of experiences is unestablished as it is, and that non-abiding is the original nature of appearances.

"This dharma body is everything, it is like an illusory dream, continuously changing.
The passions of greed, anger, and stupidity are all invisible, changing, and immaterial, like flowing scum.
Observe clearly the human body.
It is not solid but fragile and inconsistent
(once separated, once reassembled).

All the intentions and all the calculations are empty."
(Dharma Flower Samadhi Sutra, T9n269p286b21-24, tr Nguyen Hien)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 7th, 2017 at 4:54 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Anonymous X said:

My only question to you is do you know this throughout your entire being? Otherwise, it is still intellectual.

Astus wrote:

Know what exactly? Whatever is written is necessarily a verbal-conceptual product. As for the intended meaning, that phenomena are unstable, that is directly perceivable to anyone. But, even though there has never been anything to cling to, it is exactly conceptualisation that creates the illusion of independent objects and subjects. So, what other knowledge is there but intellectual?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 7th, 2017 at 6:08 PM

Title: Re: "All Buddha-Nature is One"

Content:

DGA said:

True or false: "all Buddha-nature is one"

Astus wrote:

False.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 7th, 2017 at 6:38 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Wayfarer said:

How to make pottery. How to play the piano. How to raise a child. How to ski.

Astus wrote:

Do those knowledges reside in the mind or the body?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 7th, 2017 at 7:32 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Anonymous X said:

Zongmi's Knowing/Jnana is not intellectual knowledge.

Astus wrote:

If you can tell what kind of knowledge it is, how is that not intellectual?

Anonymous X said:

There is no subject/object duality. If you've never experienced this, I can see how you could ask this question.

Astus wrote:

As there is neither subject to experience it, nor object to be experienced, how could anyone ever experience it?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 7th, 2017 at 9:29 PM

Title: Re: "All Buddha-Nature is One"

Content:

PuerAzelis said:

So how can we determine Buddha Nature at all, even in a conventional sense, using language?

Astus wrote:

Once such concepts as buddha-nature are brought up, I think it is better to clarify what is meant by them. Going for the excuse that this or that concept cannot be explained only tells that it is a concept not clearly understood. There are actually quite a few treatises and sutras on buddha-nature, not to mention meditation techniques meant to help discovering it.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 7th, 2017 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Malcolm said:

Both — the division between mind and body (nāmarūpa) is formal, not actual.

Astus wrote:

In what interpretation? Rupa stands for earth, water, fire, and wind - neither of them carries any sentience. As for nama, it consists of feeling, perception, intention, contact, and attention - of those perception is associated with memory.

But if the distinction is taken away - i.e. it's all just mind - then again every form of knowledge is of the same kind.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 8th, 2017 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Malcolm said:

There are no minds without bodies, and no bodies without minds. Mind and matter are coterminous.

Astus wrote:

There is a whole realm for minds without bodies. There are also bodies without mind.

Also, if bodies are defined in terms of the experiential perspective, then they refer to the instances of certain sensory occurrences, that is: sight, sound, smell, taste, and touch, and those are not always present.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 8th, 2017 at 1:09 AM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Malcolm said:

As I pointed out already, the idea the formless realms are actually formless is a debatable point upon which there is disagreement. According to the the Theravada tradition as well as the Dzogchen tradition, there are no disembodied minds anywhere in the three realms, and with respect to the latter, not even in the bardo.

Astus wrote:

It is a debatable point that is addressed in the Kathavatthu (VIII.8, XVI.9) and refuted, i.e. the arupaloka cannot contain rupa, i.e. matter.

"You can predicate them truly of the Rupa-sphere, where there yet is matter. But this sphere is not identical with the Arupa-sphere. And if you predicate matter of the Arupa-sphere, you must show that matter agrees with the description you can truly give of the Arupa-sphere as a state of existence, a destiny, etc."

(Kathavatthu, VIII.8, tr Aung & Davids, p 220)

What source do you use regarding the Theravada interpretation?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 8th, 2017 at 4:41 PM

Title: Re: "All Buddha-Nature is One"

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

Also, according to the Huayan teaching, all Buddha-nature is one:

Astus wrote:

The interpenetration of phenomena does not mean there is a single buddha-nature, but that appearances are interdependent. The quote provided does not even mention buddha-nature. Furthermore, in the article given as the source mentions buddha-nature as the principle, that principle is simply emptiness, but once we arrive at the fourth dharmadhatu there is no mention of the principle at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 8th, 2017 at 4:54 PM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Supramundane said:

Buddhism is insistent that the skandhas are not the self, but does this mean necessarily that there is no self?

Astus wrote:

What kind of self could there be? Either it is the same as the aggregates or different from them. If it is the same, then it is impermanent, consequently is not a self. If it is different, then it does not have any of the qualities of the aggregates, it is unconscious and inactive, and that is something that cannot function as a self.

Supramundane said:

We can agree that the skandhas are not the self, but that does not necessarily rule out the existence of a self beyond the skandhas.... right?

Astus wrote:

It does rule it out.

Supramundane said:

could it be that once we erase the defilements obscuring the mind, the unobscured mind is the True Mind which can be conceived of as a sort of positive, a "selfless Self"?

Astus wrote:

Mind is conditioned, impermanent, empty. A self should be unconditioned and permanent. If there were a permanent self, it would either be eternally tainted or eternally pure, and no path to it would make any sense, hence Buddhism would be totally pointless and meaningless.

Supramundane said:

Perhaps it too can be viewed in a positive way instead of solely negative: then it would be a Near-vana... closer to us than we ever expected.

Astus wrote:

There are positive terms for nirvana, like peace and bliss.

Supramundane said:

It is not a negation but a presence... inside all of us.

Astus wrote:

If it is inside all of us, what is it?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 8th, 2017 at 6:56 PM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Supramundane said:

the mind is conditioned and impermanent? i'm not sure about that...

Mind and consciousness are different...

Astus wrote:

If you posit a permanent mind, that means such a mind is always aware of the same thing, or not aware at all, otherwise there is change, conditioning, impermanence. That is why an unconditioned mind is impossible and cannot exist.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 8th, 2017 at 7:12 PM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Supramundane said:

the mind can be cleaned of defilements, after all.... it is not intrinsically conditioned and impermanent. there is hope.

Astus wrote:

It is exactly because the mind is not permanent that it can be purified, otherwise it would be permanently tainted.

Supramundane said:

if mind is intrinsically conditioned and impermanent then what hope do we have of reaching Nirvana?

Astus wrote:

A permanent and unconditioned mind can never be changed. So either one would be already liberated or will never be liberated at all. That is why an eternal self denies the possibility of cultivation and the eventual attainment of nirvana.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 8th, 2017 at 7:34 PM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Supramundane said:

but isn't the mind boundless and intrinsically untainted?

Astus wrote:

What do you call the mind? In Buddhism there are six consciousnesses: visual-, auditory-, olfactory-, gustatory-, tactile-, and mental-consciousness. The six consciousnesses are defined by the six possible objects, as they exist dependent on each other (cf. MN 38, SN 35.93). So, when you talk of mind as boundless and intrinsically pure, what kind of mind is it?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 8th, 2017 at 7:53 PM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Supramundane said:

i am referring to the former. am i right to do so, according to strict interpretation of Buddhist teaching?

Astus wrote:

There are six consciousnesses, as noted above. Ideas about some sort of universal mind, etc., are neither reasonable nor proven by experience, therefore they are incorrect views. So, no, there is no basis in Buddhism for anything like what you propose here.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 8th, 2017 at 10:42 PM

Title: Re: Unconscious and Inactive

Content:

Astus wrote:

That is only regarding the assumption of a self. If something is permanent it is necessarily in a fixed state, hence cannot be an agent interacting with impermanent phenomena.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 9th, 2017 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Unconscious and Inactive

Content:

PuerAzaelis said:

Why can we not say that it is possible that there is an unconscious element which is active in some manner, whether impermanent or not?

Astus wrote:

What has no consciousness has no intention, hence no action. That does not mean that the wind is static, but it has no will of its own.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 9th, 2017 at 3:35 AM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Anonymous X said:

it is not an entity separate from the eighth consciousness.

Astus wrote:

The eighth consciousness is a provisional teaching, not something that anyone is aware of, consequently if this "knowing" is posited as one of its aspects, it makes knowing itself a mere theory.

Anonymous X said:

In its [principle] of not being in concord [with unreal thought], its substance is constant and immutable, and we view it as thusness.

Astus wrote:

Thusness is everything's true nature, not unique to the storehouse consciousness.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 9th, 2017 at 5:04 AM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Malcolm said:

According to whom? Even Candrakīrti accepts it.

Astus wrote:

Provisional, in the sense of being a convenient explanation of karma, a conventional model.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 9th, 2017 at 5:45 AM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Is there anything that isn't a conventional model?

Astus wrote:

Right. My point is that it is a secondary teaching in the way that it is not directly connected to the path of liberation, it is not a necessary element.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 9th, 2017 at 6:28 AM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Of course it is directly connected with the path of liberation. Otherwise there would be no purpose in teaching the ālayavijñāna.

Astus wrote:

What is the purpose of teaching it? To give a plausible explanation of the continuity of being. But as it is shown in MMK 17, establishing a continuity is not possible. How is it connected in your view?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 9th, 2017 at 5:06 PM

Title: Re: Unconscious and Inactive

Content:

PuerAzaelis said:

How do you know?

Astus wrote:

Intention is a mental factor, so without a mind how can there be a function of mind?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 9th, 2017 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: Unconscious and Inactive

Content:

PuerAzaelis said:

Sure but what I'm asking is what we do with this idea that there is something alive and active that isn't my conscious intention.

Astus wrote:

I guess by not your intention you mean:

My anal personality, libido, denial, repression, catharsis, Freudian slips, and neuroses aren't my conscious intention.

But they seem to have an activity and a "life of their own".

A distinction is given in the <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.038.than.html>, where cetana (intention) and anusaya (obsession, tendency) are discussed in relation to consciousness. However, what you seem to talk about are not latent tendencies but rather habits that seem unintentional only because of the lack of clarity (<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an03/an03.068.than.html>) regarding one's own mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 9th, 2017 at 10:28 PM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Malcolm said:

MMK 17 shows only that there can be no ultimate continuum.

Astus wrote:

Since it's illusory anyway, why struggle with building a whole system of it? I mean, alayavijnana is not perceptible by anyone, it is admittedly based only on "holy teaching and proper reasoning" (Cheng Weishi Lun, BDK ed, p 83), so it's posited as a mere theoretical workaround, but even if it's better than those proposed before it, if investigated a bit, it suffers from a number of inconsistencies, starting with the problem of being a consciousness nobody is conscious of. Aside from that, alayavijnana has no practical role on the path.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 10th, 2017 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, its role on the path is to undergo transformation through recognizing that the seeds within it that ripen as the appearances of the three worlds are nothing other than appearances to one's mind that arise from the ālaya.

Astus wrote:

The seeds are unknown and never seen, in other words, latent, even though they're said to be the objects of the storehouse consciousness. The very supposition of such a storehouse is purely theoretical, as it's never perceived by anyone. So, when it's claimed that "it" is transformed, such a transformation doesn't occur to any being.

Malcolm said:

Your objection does not hold at all.

Astus wrote:

What part doesn't hold? Unless you know a case where there is awareness of the alayavijnana, it is nothing more than a hypothesis.

Malcolm said:

According to some kinds of Madhyamaka, no one is conscious of their own consciousness at all.

Astus wrote:

That issue of self-awareness is another matter. Alayavijnana is per definition unknown.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 11th, 2017 at 6:50 AM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The supposition of everything is purely theoretical. When is the last time you perceived your mental consciousness? Your statements amount to "I did not see it, so it does not exist."

Astus wrote:

Thoughts are apparent, just as the five other types of objects of consciousness. The alayavijnana, even though it is called a consciousness with innumerable seeds as its objects, there is nobody who can be aware of those seeds, so it is a consciousness without consciousness.

Malcolm said:

The seeds are inferable, and inference is a valid basis of knowledge in Buddhadharma, etc.

Astus wrote:

The seeds are deductible, but my point is that the argument used for that deduction is not good enough, as the existence of an alayavijnana is self-contradicting.

Malcolm said:

Nāgārjuna accepts the Sammitya theory of the avipranasha, but when is the last time you saw one?

Astus wrote:

He does not, but rejects both the seed theory and the non-disappearing dharma theory, and gives his interpretation at the end where he talks about empty karma. This is made clear in the commentaries and similarly summed up in Madhyamakavatara 6.39-40.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 12th, 2017 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The ālayavijñāna is nothing other than the vijñāna skandha.

Astus wrote:

"What is the characteristic of consciousness? Knowing is the characteristic of consciousness."

(Abhidharmasamuccaya, I.1, p 4)

"What is consciousness? It is awareness of an object."

(Pancaskandhaprakarana, in Inner Science of Buddhists Practice, p 239)

This is held true for the six active consciousnesses, not the other two (i.e. they are not actually aware). The role of manas and citta is to maintain the continuity of afflictions when the six active consciousnesses cease. While the extra parts are said to serve as a bridge, it is also maintained that the seeds, just as the storehouse, are momentary. So, if there is no problem with the alayavijnana ceasing every moment, why is it a problem with the six active consciousnesses? And because the alayavijnana is unconscious and momentary, the very theory of it is problematic and redundant.

Malcolm said:

Yes, he most certainly does accept this theory of karma, and states quite clearly he likes it the best out of all the Hinayāna options, before moving onto a deconstruction of karma framed in ultimate terms.

Astus wrote:

I guess you're referring to 17.13 (tr. Siderits): "I, however, shall here propose the following hypothesis that is suitable and that has been expounded by buddhas, pratyekabuddhas, and śrāvakas."

The commentaries of Kumarajiva, Mabja Jangchub, and Tsongkhapa attribute that part to an opponent, not Nagarjuna's own view or anything he accepts, but rather something that he refutes.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 12th, 2017 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The ālayavijñāna is called the appropriating consciousness with respect to its role in rebirth. It is synonymous with citta.

Astus wrote:

How does that answer the problems with it?

Malcolm said:

Either there are slight errors in the translations, or the authors themselves have erred. It is very clear that Nāgārjuna finds the concept of karma being like a debt reasonable.

Astus wrote:

Putting aside then the commentators and the tradition, why do you say it is reasonable to think that Nagarjuna finds it acceptable that there can be such a thing as a non-disappearing dharma?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 12th, 2017 at 2:07 AM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Malcolm said:

in the same way that debt, though not tangible, doesn't vanish until it is either paid off or forgiven.

Astus wrote:

That is the example given in 17.14, My question is, what is your reason to say that it is proposed there as a theory acceptable by Nagarjuna?

Malcolm said:

What is the object of consciousness during gestation prior to the appearance of the six sense organs?

Astus wrote:

How could there be a consciousness without anything that it is conscious of?

Malcolm said:

If you answer it has none, then you have also removed your own objection to ālayavijñāna.

Astus wrote:

No, because the problems are that it is claimed to be a consciousness that no being can ever be aware of, and that it is proposed to solve the problem of continuity when actually it is itself only momentary.

Malcolm said:

If you answer that it has one, then what is the object and what is the sense organ?

Astus wrote:

The set of manovijnana-dharma-dharmadhatu is not material to require a physical organ.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 12th, 2017 at 3:57 AM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Malcolm said:

He states that he accepts it provisionally.

Astus wrote:

May interpret it so if you read the opponent's position as if it were Nagarjuna's. But then similarly other sections could be read like that as well. Furthermore, Nagarjuna accepting such an eternalist view seems more contradictory than Tsongkhapa's idea of disintegratedness (zhig pa).

Malcolm said:

So the fetus is just an inert lump of matter until stage of six sense organs? Then how does it become conscious at all?

Astus wrote:

Consciousness is not the product of physical development, so why would being a fetus matter?

Malcolm said:

Evidence of this unsubstantiated claim?

Astus wrote:

Evidence of what part? That the alayavijnana is momentary, or that no being can be aware of alayavijnana?

Malcolm said:

So what is the object of the manas in the womb? If it has none, you have again removed your own objection to ālayavijñāna. If it has one, what is it?

Astus wrote:

Do you mean the seventh consciousness by manas?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 12th, 2017 at 5:15 PM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Anonymous X said:

I don't think you can separate consciousness from its object. Analysis cannot solve the problem you put forth. This is all about the 'substance'. Gold is the substance, all modifications are the ring, characteristics. The nature axiom takes substance as existent, Gold. Negation can never come to this understanding. This is a big distinction between the Tathagatagarbha sutras and Madyhamaka. Voidness talks about extremes, what things aren't. The 'nature axiom' talks about substance, what things actually are. For myself, Zongmi clearly explains all of this using the sutras to seal it.

Astus wrote:

Zongmi may sound very positive, but then it is taking "knowing" to be some special substance. However, that's not different from calling emptiness the self-nature of phenomena. If we care to investigate this "knowing" a bit deeper, here are Zongmi's words:

"Knowing is no mindfulness and no form. Who is characterized as self, and who is characterized as other? When you are aware that all characteristics are void, it is true mind, no mindfulness. ... With respect to understanding, it is to see that all characteristics are non-characteristics. With respect to practice, it is called the practice of nonpractice. When the depravities are exhausted, the rebirth process will cease; once arising and disappearing has extinguished, calmness and illumination will become manifest, and responsive functions will be without limit. It is called becoming a buddha."

(Chan Letter, in Zongmi on Chan, p 88)

Is there a special "knowing" to be found? No, it is just realising appearances to be empty and signless, and that is what is called the actual "knowing", and that is why it is buddha-nature. The difference Zongmi emphasises between his version and the Chan of other lineages is that Zongmi not only talks about the empty part but also the aware aspect, as illustrated in his jewel metaphor.

"When one truly sees the color black, the black from the outset is not black. It is just the brightness. The blue from the outset is not blue. It is just the brightness, up to and including: all the [other colors], such as red, white, yellow, etc., are like this. They are just the brightness. If, at the locus of the color characteristics, one after the other you just see the perfect brightness of jade-like sparkling purity, then you are not confused about the jewel."

(Chan Letter, in Zongmi on Chan, p 92)

And further specifies regarding the expression of "the Knowing of voidness and calm":

""Voidness" means to empty out all characteristics; it is still a negative term. Just "calm" is the immutable principle of the real nature; it is not the same as voidness and nonexistence. Knowing is the principle of revealing the thing-in-itself; it is not the same as discrimination. Just this is the original substance of the true mind."

(Chan Letter, in Zongmi on Chan, p 94)

In the end, what all this talk of knowing and buddha-nature is about is to highlight that the goal is not insentience and unconsciousness, but functional wisdom that does not separate itself from appearances.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 12th, 2017 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Malcolm said:

It is not an eternalist view. The avipranashas do not survive death. They are therefore not permanent. They "imperishable" only in the sense that while one is alive that "debt" remains current.

Astus wrote:

There is actually one such unperishable dharma that carries over karma to the next life.

"At the moment of rebirth there occurs a single [unperishing] with respect to all actions of the same sphere, both dissimilar and similar."
(MMK 17.17, tr Siderits)

It explains in the preceding verse the reason for maintaining one such dharma:

"If it were to be relinquished by abandonment or by transference of the action, various difficulties would result, including the disappearance of the [past] action."

(MMK 17.16)

And, if as you say, the Vaibhasika idea is something Nagarjuna agrees with, why then follow it up with a refutation of those ideas and replacing the unperishing dharma with showing that action is unperishing because it has not arisen in the first place?

"Why is an action not arisen? Because it is without intrinsic nature.

And since it is unarisen, it does not perish."

(MMK 17.21)

Malcolm said:

Because in a fetus there is no differentiation of sense perception and there can be no consciousness according to you because even the mental organ requires a mental object, otherwise it does not exist. Since a fetus prior to the six sense organ stage and contact stage (19 weeks) has no sense organs and cannot perceive anything, is it merely a lump of flesh or is it sentient?

Astus wrote:

Since the mental organ is not physical, how is it influenced by fetal development in any way?

Malcolm said:

The latter.

Astus wrote:

See <https://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=132789#p132789>. In brief, the seeds are latent, so if they were perceived, they would not be latent any more.

Malcolm said:

I mean the sixth consciousness.

Astus wrote:

The object of the mental consciousness are mental phenomena, i.e. thoughts. How is that related to fetal status?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 13th, 2017 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Just because some traditional scholars have not understood the point Nāgārjuna was making

Astus wrote:

Rather, there is no classical commentary that supports that interpretation. But let me quote a study's commentary on 17.13:

"Having refuted the santāna -theory, it is stated in Mmk 17.13 that the proper explanation will now be given. This is the explanation, which was taught by the buddhas, pratyekabuddhas and śrāvakas . None of the commentaries comments on this verse. However, it seems that it may be interpreted in at least two ways. First, it could be presumed that this verse is spoken by the opponent, i.e. the avipraṇāśa - proponent, who is probably a Sāṃmatīya as stated above. This is how the verse is interpreted by all the commentaries, because all the commentaries introduce Mmk 17.21 as a refutation of the preceding verses presenting the avipraṇāśa -view. In that case, it may be asked why the opponent needs to refer to the buddhas, pratyekabuddhas and śrāvakas when introducing his view. A reasonable explanation would be that he makes this reference to lend authority to his view, since he could not allow himself simply to take it for granted that the reader knew this view to be taught in the sūtras . In other words, the opponent's reference to scriptural authority (āgama) could indicate that his view was not commonly accepted. This would also be supported by the extreme lack of sources describing this view, which will be discussed below.

Secondly, it could be presumed that this verse is not spoken by an opponent but by Nāgārjuna himself.³⁷⁵ Such an interpretation could be supported by the usage of the first person in this verse, but this is not supported by the commentaries. The verse-structure in the remaining part of the chapter does not necessarily imply a refutation of the avipraṇāśa -view as it is interpreted by the commentaries. Verses Mmk 17.13-20 merely present the avipraṇāśa -concept in general terms. Mmk 17.21 onwards show that actions can be non-perishing only if they are unarisen. It is thus possible to read the latter part of the chapter in such a way that the avipraṇāśa -view is not rejected but merely (re)interpreted in a way, which agrees with the Madhyamaka-view. In that case, the reference to the buddhas, pratyekabuddhas and śrāvakas in the present verse (Mmk 17.13) would merely serve to alert the reader that the author now is going to present his own view. However, such an interpretation is quite conjectural. It is very difficult to interpret the verses of Mmk as to who says what and perhaps it is also of little consequence. It may be established as a fact that all the commentaries imply verses Mmk 17.13-20 to be spoken by an opponent and this was the interpretation, which became important for the ensuing textual tradition."

(Ulrich T. Kragh:

https://www.academia.edu/3243408/2003_PhD DISSERTATION_Karmaphalasambandha_in_verses_17.1_20_of_Candrak%C4%ABrtis_Prasannapad%C4%81, p 222-223)

Malcolm said:

Since the mental organ is not physical, how is it influenced by fetal development in any way?

I guess you refuse to answer the question, since you cannot.

Astus wrote:

The question seems to be based on the assumption that the mind is produced by the body, so it should be influenced/defined by fetal development. But if it is not based on the body, then the question makes no sense.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 13th, 2017 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

PuerAzaelis said:

according to that translator there is no doubt that 17.13-14 is Nagarjuna's response to an opponent's critique in 17.12.

Astus wrote:

Where does Siderits write that?

In the intro to ch 17 he writes: "The following thirteen verses give solutions proposed by different schools. Then beginning in verse 21 Nāgārjuna subjects these to his own critical examination."

For v 12: "The objection in verse 12 is said to come not from Nāgārjuna but from another opponent."

And for v 20: "This opponent claims his is the orthodox Buddhist view."

Then introduces v 21: "At this point we are to imagine Nāgārjuna entering the discussion. The Ābhidharmika opponents have given their different accounts of the relation between action and fruit. These accounts presuppose the real existence of action and fruit and some sort of real connection between them. Nāgārjuna retorts that no action is to be found."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 13th, 2017 at 2:51 AM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Malcolm said:

So, what kind of a consciousness does a fetus experience in absence of sense inputs prior to the formation of the six sense organs and contact?

Astus wrote:

The mind can function just fine without input from the five bodily senses, like during sleep. As for the experiences of the fetus, the Garbhāvakrāntisūtra looks like the one giving the most detailed account. As it is summarised in http://www3.nccu.edu.tw/~ckeng/doc/Kritzer_Reading_3.pdf:

"First of all, the sūtra, in its description of each of the first four weeks, stresses the suffering of the embryo, which is said to lie in filth, like a lump. The sense organs and consciousness are all in the same place, as if in a pot, and the embryo is very hot and in great pain."

Apparently there is a whole book dedicated to the matter as well -

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=6zUIDwAAQBAJ>

Malcolm said:

You are basically advocating for a Cartesian substance dualism, Astus. It is a very problematical view, apart from your dogmatic and unreasonable rejection of ālayavijñāna.

Astus wrote:

I have not advocated any sort of dualism, merely questioned the assumption that somehow consciousness requires a physical basis. As for the issue of alayavijnana, I do not reject it as a convenient and provisional teaching that can be used to some extent. What I have an issue with is that the alayavijnana does not really solve the problems it is claimed to fix in terms of presenting a logical foundation for the continuity of being, while at the same time it is not even necessarily the only way to tackle the difficulty of comprehending karma.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 13th, 2017 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

PuerAzelis said:

But then his note to 17.13-14 includes ideas from the Akutobhaya and Chandrakirti which appear to support those stanzas.

Astus wrote:

They are explaining the points presented by the opponent, not supporting them. Candrakirti also brings up the matter in Madhyamakavatara-bhasya 6.39 (tr Tsultrim & Jampa):

"In the case of some [systems], in answer to the dispute stating, "the action is ceased; how would the effect arise from that action that has already ceased?" – in order to present the capability of an action that already ceased [they] imagine

1. a consciousness-basis-of-all (alaya vijñāna), or
2. another feature like a debt-contract, not not wasting, or
3. acquisition, or
4. a continuum of consciousness that is stained by imprints of actions.

In the case of that [system] in which an action is not produced by its own essential nature (i.e., the Prasangika), ceasing that [action] does not [inherently] exist and nor is it impossible for the effect to arise from the non-disintegrated. Hence, actions not disintegrating, the relationship of actions and effects, becomes very extremely admissible."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 13th, 2017 at 4:45 PM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

PuerAzelis said:

I can't see how that helps your point it only appears to hurt it.

Astus wrote:

Candrakirti lists four different ways others tried to solve the problem of connecting a ceased cause with a later arising effect. Among those ways he lists the concept of the unperishing dharma exemplified by the debt-contract. Then he offers the Madhyamika solution that since there has never been an arisen cause there cannot be a ceased cause either.

Because the difficulty with karma comes from connecting cause and effect, what is behind that problem is the concept of a cause that was annihilated, in other words, one of the extreme views. Recognising that there is no such thing as a cause that could cease to exist, the problem of connecting separate things turns out to be false. Then if it's asked how can there still be cause and effect, the answer is that it's a mere nominal appearance, an illusion, just like with everything else.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 13th, 2017 at 7:22 PM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Supramundane said:

So there is a True Mind? How do we access it then?

Astus wrote:

There is a very simple and practical instruction:

"When you are aware that all characteristics are void, it is true mind, no mindfulness. If a thought arises, be aware of it; once you are aware of it, it will disappear. The excellent gate of practice lies here alone. Therefore, even though you fully cultivate all the practices, just take no mindfulness as the axiom. If you just get the mind of no mindfulness, then love and hatred will spontaneously become pale and faint, compassion and wisdom [prajna] will spontaneously increase in brightness, sinful karma will spontaneously be eliminated, and you will spontaneously be zealous in meritorious practices."

(Chan Letter, in Zongmi on Chan, p 88)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 13th, 2017 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, like a debt.

Astus wrote:

The problem with the position mentioned in the MMK and by others is the idea that there needs to be a connection between action and fruit, as it's based on a substantialist approach, something that Madhyamaka does not need to posit. A debt is something that stays around until it is repaid, so it is conceived as an enduring entity. But I think the alayavijnana is still a better concept for conventional use than an unperishing thing.

Malcolm said:

He also proposes a solution: causes are neither the same as nor different than their effects, taking care of both the identity and difference issues with one stone, and avoiding the issue of temporal simultaneity and discontinuity.

Astus wrote:

Where is that proposed by him? As for the simple approach:

"Sometimes, a long period of time elapses after the action has ceased, but no matter—know that its fully ripened result will most certainly arise, and there is absolutely nothing contradictory about its doing so."

(Mikyo Dorje, in The Moon of Wisdom, p 111)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 13th, 2017 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Malcolm said:

all that remains is the idea that I owe you some money.

Astus wrote:

What holds the idea of a karmic debt then?

Malcolm said:

With the example of milk and butter.

Astus wrote:

Could you please be more specific about the location of that section?

Malcolm said:

Yes, like a debt collector calling in a note.

Astus wrote:

What/Who is karma's debt collector?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 14th, 2017 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Malcolm said:

if you consider karma a convention, it does not really matter which convention you choose to use as long as it is rational, and functions conventionally. If we call karma a debt, it is just fine.

Astus wrote:

I do not disagree with that. The only contention that there was was about whether using the debt metaphor and the unperishing dharma as a Madhyamaka version should be acceptable. Otherwise, as long as the basic functions of karma remain intact, any explanation can work, just as you say.

Malcolm said:

Milk and curd location is MMK 13:6

The only rational way to understand this section is to understand that causes and their effects are neither the same nor are they different. It is more fully explained by Buddhapaṇita than Candrakīrti.

Astus wrote:

"Therefore, neither a thing itself nor another thing can alter. Because neither a thing nor another thing can alter, there is consequently no "alteration".
(Buddhapaṇita: MMK-vṛtti 13.6, tr Saito, p 184)

I'm not sure if this is the right example for "causes are neither the same as nor different than their effects, taking care of both the identity and difference issues with one stone, and avoiding the issue of temporal simultaneity and discontinuity". Rather, as it says in the commentary, the idea of something becoming another thing is mistaken, because there is no thing in the first place.

As for causes and effects:

"Since things devoid of intrinsic nature are not existent,
"This existing, that comes to be" can never hold."
(MMK 1.10, tr Siderits)

"Since origination, duration, and cessation are not established, there is nothing that is conditioned.

And in the absence of the establishment of the conditioned, what unconditioned thing will be established?

Like an illusion, like a dream, like the city of the gandharvas, so origination, duration, and cessation are declared to be."
(MMK 7.33-34, tr Siderits)

"Effect and cause, as well as the characterized and the characteristic, feeling and that which feels, and whatever other things there are,
Not only is there no prior part of saṃsāra,
there is as well no prior part of any existents."

(MMK 11.7-8, tr Siderits)

So about karma:

"Defilements, actions, and bodies, agents, and fruits, are similar to the city of the gandharvas; they are like a mirage, a dream."

(MMK 17.33, tr Siderits)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 14th, 2017 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, it clearly states that milk does not become butter, but there can be no butter in absence of milk: enforcing two things, homogeneity of causes and effects (i.e., butter will not come from water) and avoiding the identity issue I mentioned above.

Astus wrote:

Yes, milk cannot become curd, nor can there be curd from something other than curd.

"If alteration pertained to it, then milk itself would be curds.

On the alternative, what else but milk would come to have the nature of curds?"

(MMK 13.6, tr Siderits)

So, according to Buddhapalita (tr Saito, p 183, 184), the two options mean that

1. "If a thing itself were thought to alter, in that case, according to you, milk itself would necessarily be curd."
2. "If you do not say that because "curd" belongs to milk, milk itself is curd, what other than milk can be "curd"? Do you say that curd itself can be "curd" and is curd itself, or do you say that water can be "curd" and water is curd? Therefore, neither a thing itself nor another thing can alter. Because neither a thing nor another thing can alter, there is consequently no "alteration"."

Since curd cannot come from milk, nor from something else, alteration is impossible. It does not give a third option of how there can be curd.

Mabja Changchub comments:

"Change is something that, without analysis, is merely apparent to what the opponent accepts as being direct perception. When the reality of the situation is investigated, however, change is seen to be impossible."

...

"Similarly, if the earlier situation were itself what changed, it would mean that milk could become yogurt while still remaining milk. On the other hand, if it were something other than the initial situation that undergoes change, it would be something other than milk, such as water, that turns into yoghurt. This, however, is impossible. Discussing this point, the Noble Sūtra of the Source of Jewels states:

No phenomenon arises or disintegrates;

There is no death, no transference, and no aging.

This is what the Lion of Men has taught,

And in this he has established hundreds of beings."

Malcolm said:

Madhyamaka is not just a simple refutation of entities, as you seem to think.

Astus wrote:

What more is there to it?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 14th, 2017 at 3:55 AM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Malcolm said:

It enforces rationality with respect to conventional truth through the negation of essences.

Astus wrote:

That is a very good point.

On the other hand, every Buddhist tradition seems to attempt to build a rational system, beginning with Abhidharma. And compared to others, Madhyamaka does not build much, but rather relies on what others have already set up.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 14th, 2017 at 6:20 AM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Madhyamaka is charged with making sure it all makes sense.

Astus wrote:

How so? Madhyamaka is a complete teaching as it is, so are others as well. Even in a several vehicles setting, as in Tibetan Buddhism, Madhyamaka is used separately, not as a correction. So, I'm not sure what you're referring to here.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 15th, 2017 at 10:34 PM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Madhyamaka is strictly a critical school, and does not offer basis, path, and result that is in anyway distinct from Yogacāra.

The role of Madhyamaka is to make sure that Buddhist assertions remain in line with the Buddha's teaching of emptiness and dependent origination — that's all.

Astus wrote:

If one should apply the reasoning provided in Madhyamaka to all doctrines, there can be neither basis nor path, much less anything to attain as a result.

"One who is a real goer does not perform a going of any of the three kinds.

Neither does one who is not a real goer perform a going of any of the three kinds.

One who is a both-real-and-unreal goer does not perform a going of any of the three kinds.

Thus there is no going, no goer, and no destination."

(MMK 2.24-25, tr Siderits)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 16th, 2017 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Malcolm said:

This passage does not negate the convention of going. It only negates the motion of nondependent entities.

Astus wrote:

As the Madhyamaka convention goes, conventions are not debated. But once conventions are analysed, there is nothing left to posit or rely on. That's why establishing things like basis, path, and result are not the Madhyamaka method.

By the way, a "dependent entity" (unreal goer) doesn't make more sense than an independent one (real goer).

"Given the nonexistence of intrinsic nature, how will there be extrinsic nature (parabhāva)?

For extrinsic nature is said to be the intrinsic nature of another existent (parabhāva)."

(MMK 15.3, tr Siderits)

"Moreover that on which he depends does not exist by virtue of intrinsic nature.

And how can what does not exist intrinsically exist extrinsically?"

(MMK 22.9)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 16th, 2017 at 12:58 AM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:
Anonymous X said:
Zongmi states:

Astus wrote:
That is Zongmi's take on the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Yogachara#The_Three_Natures, not a teaching on tathagatagarbha.

Anonymous X said:
To my mind, you must add in to the Madhyamaka equation the truth of the Tathagatagarbha to complete the picture.

Astus wrote:
Can you define what the tathagatagarbha is and why it would need to be added?

Author: Astus
Date: Friday, June 16th, 2017 at 2:49 AM
Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:
Malcolm said:
Madhyamaka does not establish a basis, a path, and result. No one said they did. They accept the basis, path, and result put forward by general Mahāyāna, as witnessed by the Madhyamaka commentaries (by Vimuktisena, Haribhadra, etc.) on the Abhisamayālaṅkāra. You were the one who claimed that Madhyamaka was a complete and independent teaching, not me.

Astus wrote:
I wrote that Madhyamaka is a complete teaching, and not something that is meant simply to be used as a correction for other systems. But if it were used as an arbiter over others, then their methods would suffer from it. And before calling it a complete teaching, I also noted that it is not a doctrine establishing things on its own but relying on others, as a response to you stating that Madhyamaka not only negates but enforces rationality. So now when you write that they accept what others put forward, that is exactly what I meant by building on others, and not rationalising others.

Author: Astus
Date: Friday, June 16th, 2017 at 3:57 AM
Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:
Malcolm said:
Madhyamaka is just a means of enforcing correct view.

Astus wrote:
Do you not consider it a valid path for non-conceptual wisdom?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 16th, 2017 at 5:07 PM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Madhyamaka is not a path. If you want a path, look at Mahāyāna.

Astus wrote:

Then call it a method, doctrine, system, teaching, school, tradition, etc. The question is whether Madhyamaka (and Yogacara perhaps) is taken as a theoretical basis, or something that has extensive role in how the bodhisattvayana is applied, particularly in the area of prajnaparamita. Reducing Madhyamaka (and probably the whole of sutrayana) into a mere theoretical background may be fine from a Vajrayana perspective, but the way its own authors seem to have thought of it is quite different.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 20th, 2017 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Supramundane said:

But what is Nirvana? Is it nothingness or is it eternal life of some non-self consciousness? Or non-dualist consciousness?

Astus wrote:

Trying to establish oneself in some form of consciousness is the root of suffering. Nirvana is relinquishing all that clinging.

"Not even "non-existence" qualifies as nirvāṇa.

How much the less might "existence" qualify as such?

The complete end of attachments to existence or non-existence—

The Buddha described this as essential to nirvāṇa."

(http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/Ratna_excerpts/Ratna_X-20_X-01.pdf, v 42, tr Dharmamitra)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 20th, 2017 at 4:55 PM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

Supramundane said:

but we have no choice but to have a consciousness

Astus wrote:

What is that consciousness? Certainly nothing independent or unconditioned (see:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.061.than.html>), consequently it is impermanent, unsatisfactory, impersonal, and empty.

Supramundane said:

the buddha was very clear that Nirvana is not nihilism nor is it a heaven.

Astus wrote:

See this from Nagarjuna

(http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/Ratna_excerpts/Ratna_X-20_X-01.pdf, v43-45):

"Were one to provide a summary description of "wrong view,"
One would refer to "dismissing cause-and-effect as non-existent."
This causes one to become filled with non-meritorious karma
And is the weightiest cause for entering the wretched destinies.

Were one to provide a summary description of "right view,"
One would refer to "believing in the existence of cause-and-effect."
This is able to cause one to gain a full measure of merit
And is the most superior cause for rebirth in the good destinies.

Through wisdom, "existence" versus "non-existence" is stilled,
One steps beyond [ideas about] "merit" versus "non-merit,"
And one transcends [concern over] "good" versus "bad" destinies.
The Buddha described this as tantamount to gaining liberation."

That is how nirvana is neither existence nor non-existence. Furthermore (http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/Ratna_excerpts/Ratna_X-20_X-02.pdf, v 58-60):

"Disinclination to seize on [views asserting] existence or non-existence
Originates with discernment of the meaning of reality.
If [one claims this entails] falling into a "non-existence" attachment,
Why not [also] claim this entails falling into "existence" attachment?

If one claims that, by refuting [views validating] "existence,"
One falls by force of logic into implicitly validating "non-existence,"
Then, following this same logic, by refuting "non-existence,"
Why wouldn't one fall into implicitly validating "existence"?

This non-validation of words, actions, or thoughts [as ultimately real]
Is a result of reliance on bodhi.
If one claims this entails an implicit fall into validating non-existence,
Why would that not also entail a fall into validating existence?"

That is how both extremes are averted and there is no falling into "nihilism".

Supramundane said:

if it is a state then one would suppose that such state would end upon our deaths but in fact if Nirvana is 'the deathless door', then i assume it would continue even after the death of our earthly bodies. am i right?

Astus wrote:

All states are conditioned, therefore unstable, unreliable, and illusory. Nirvana is seeing the various states of consciousness for what they are and so not making up any attachment to them. Also, the idea that one's existence ceases at death is what is called the wrong view of annihilationism (or as somewhat erroneously simplified: "nihilism"), while the idea that one has a non-ceasing existence is the view of eternalism or permanence.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 22nd, 2017 at 6:35 AM

Title: Re: Is the "Self" a "Rabbit's Horn"?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"In that case, what is the root of bondage?" asked Drom.

Atisa: "It is the grasping at self."

"What is this grasping at self?" enquired Drom.

"This is something that wants all positive qualities for oneself alone and wants others alone to take on all misfortunes."

"Then please explain this in such a manner so you can say 'This is selfgrasping,'" asked Drom.

Atisa replied: "Where would one find something of which it could be said that 'This is the reified self-grasping?'"

"In that case, please explain to me how it is that [this self-grasping] wants everything and transfers [all] blames onto others."

Atisa replied, "Upasaka, why even ask me? This is pervasive in sentient beings. You know this, so what need is there to ask? Even so, I have also seen attachment and aversion labeled as self-grasping."

"Atisa, there are people who possess such forms of grasping?"

"Where do they exist?" responded Atisa.

"They are [within] our own mental continuum," replied [Drom].

"Upasaka, what is one's own mental continuum?"

"It is that which wants everything and grasps [at it all]replied Drom.

Atisa: "I, too, would say the same."

"Where does this self-grasping reside?" inquired Drom.

"It is devoid of parts, and I have never seen it myself. There is nothing that abides where there is nowhere to abide. I do not know the colors and shapes of something with no reality," replied [Atisa].

Drom then asked, "If this is so, how can something so feeble exist?"

Atisa responded, "Can't one perceive mirage water, a double moon, dream horses and elephants, and so on?"

"Master, these are delusions."

Atisa said, "I accept this to be so. It is not that he, self-grasping, indulges in attachment and aversion on the basis of being existent. Dogs bark in the wilderness because of an empty container, and our mindstream is greatly perturbed with no ground [at all]."

(The Jewel Garland of Dialogues, ch 6, in The Book of Kadam, p 121-122)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 23rd, 2017 at 7:05 PM

Title: Re: Do we have free will?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"I have not, brahmin, seen or heard such a doctrine, such a view as yours. How, indeed, could one — moving forward by himself, moving back by himself — say 'There is no self-doer, there is no other-doer'?"

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an06/an06.038.niza.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 25th, 2017 at 5:10 AM

Title: Re: Do we have free will?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Could you expand on what 'other-doer' refers to?

Astus wrote:

It's just "others", everyone else, other beings, other people. There's also an analysis of the sutta by Piya Tan <http://dharmafarer.org/wordpress/wp-content/uploads/2009/12/7.6-Attakari-S-a6.38-piya.pdf>.

Wayfarer said:

I think the parallel view in Buddhism would be the idea that 'all human actions are bound by karma, nobody can act in any way other than what their karma dictates.' And that is not what Buddhism teaches, obviously, because if it were true, then there would be no point in teaching!

Astus wrote:

It is a difference made between old and new karma, i.e. past acts and present acts (see: <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn35/sn35.145.than.html>). On a conventional level there is agency, there is intention. But when analysed, it's all empty (no doer) and dependently arisen (causally bound). Where this topic of "free will" actually comes up is how karma is interpreted in Buddhism and by others, and that shows that the moral responsibility lies with the individual being according to Shakyamuni, while other theories (see: <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.02.0.than.html>) deny that.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 28th, 2017 at 7:43 PM

Title: Re: "Near-vana"....?

Content:

White Lotus said:

Is a Buddha empty? Or is a Buddha independent and unconditioned. If so, how?

Astus wrote:

"What do you think, Anuradha: Do you regard form as the Tathagata?" "No, lord." "Do you regard feeling as the Tathagata?" "No, lord." "Do you regard perception as the Tathagata?" "No, lord." "Do you regard fabrications as the Tathagata?" "No, lord." "Do you regard consciousness as the Tathagata?" "No, lord."

"What do you think, Anuradha: Do you regard the Tathagata as being in form?... Elsewhere than form?... In feeling?... Elsewhere than feeling?... In perception?... Elsewhere than perception?... In fabrications?... Elsewhere than fabrications?... In consciousness?... Elsewhere than consciousness?" "No, lord."

"What do you think: Do you regard the Tathagata as form-feeling-perception-fabrications-consciousness?" "No, lord." "Do you regard the Tathagata as that which is without form, without feeling, without perception, without fabrications, without consciousness?" "No, lord."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn44/sn44.002.than.html>)

"The Tathāgata is neither identical with the skandhas nor distinct from the skandhas; the skandhas are not in him nor is he in them; he does not exist possessing the skandhas. What Tathāgata, then, is there?"

...

"But one who has taken up a mass of beliefs, such as that the Tathāgata exists, so conceptualizing, that person will also imagine that [the Tathāgata] does not exist when extinguished.

And the thought does not hold, with reference to this (Tathāgata) who is intrinsically empty, that the Buddha either exists or does not exist after cessation.

Those who hypostatize the Buddha, who is beyond hypostatization and unwavering, they all, deceived by hypostatization, fail to see the Tathāgata.

What is the intrinsic nature of the Tathāgata, that is the intrinsic nature of this world.

The Tathāgata is devoid of intrinsic nature; this world is devoid of intrinsic nature."

(MKK 22.1, 13-16, tr Siderits)

"The notion of person, the notion of sentient being, and the notion of life span are also not notions. And why? Those who are free from all notions are called buddhas."

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html, ch 14)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 29th, 2017 at 6:37 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Buddhahood?

Content:

tomamundsen said:

I am vaguely aware of a controversy between sudden and gradual approaches in Ch'an.

Astus wrote:

There wasn't really such a controversy, it was something made up initially by Shenhui to criticise Shenxiu's descendants. But that's like charging Buddhists with idolatry.

tomamundsen said:

At any point, did Ch'an masters advocate for sudden enlightenment being perfect Buddhahood? Or is it simply kensho?

Astus wrote:

First of all, "kensho" means "seeing nature" and seeing nature is becoming buddha, even if some teachers have altered the meaning and came up with this distinction of "kensho" and "satori", the classic doctrine is as it's been stated from the beginning. As it's in the "Bloodstream Sermon" of Bodhidharma (tr Red Pine): "To find a Buddha, you have to see your nature. Whoever sees his nature is a Buddha." (X63n1218, p2b19) "To find a Buddha all you have to do is see your nature. Your nature is the Buddha." (p2c3-4) "Whoever sees his nature is a Buddha; whoever doesn't is a mortal." (p2c19)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 29th, 2017 at 7:13 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Buddhahood?

Content:

Temicco said:

a lack of discussion of post-awakening practice in Tang dynasty Zen texts associated with Huineng's line, as well as in most gongan collections.

Astus wrote:

There is no post-awakening practice aside from the practice of awakening itself. This is clarified by Jinul, a known advocate of "sudden enlightenment, gradual cultivation" very well:

"Nevertheless, although you must cultivate further, you have already awakened suddenly to the fact that deluded thoughts are originally void and the mind-nature is originally pure. Thus you eradicate evil, but you eradicate it without actually eradicating anything; you cultivate the wholesome, but you cultivate it without actually cultivating anything. This is true cultivation and true eradication."

(Moguja's Secrets on Cultivating the Mind, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 2, p 226-227)

"One has the sudden awakening to the fact that one's nature is originally free of affliction and that one is originally in full possession of the uncontaminated (anāsrava) wisdom-nature that is no different from that of the buddhas. To cultivate while relying on this [awakening] is called Supreme-Vehicle Seon; it is also called the pure Seon of the tathāgatas. If thought-moment after thought-moment one continues to develop one's training, then naturally one will gradually attain to hundreds of thousands of samādhis." (p 227)

"Some people do not realize that the nature of merit and demerit is empty; they sit rigidly without moving and suppress both body and mind, like a rock crushing grass. To regard this as cultivation of the mind is a great delusion." (p 228)

"If you claim, "Initially control conditioned thought with calmness and subsequently control dullness with alertness; these initial and subsequent counteractive techniques subdue both dullness and agitation and one thereby will access quiescence": this is [samādhi and prajñā] as practiced by those of inferior faculties in the gradual school. Although [this approach also] claims that alertness and calmness should be maintained equally, it cannot avoid clinging to stillness as its practice." (p 230-231)

"In the case of an accomplished person, the meaning of maintaining samādhi and prajñā equally does not involve any specific activity, for he is inherently spontaneous and unconcerned about place or time." (p 231)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 30th, 2017 at 4:34 AM

Title: Re: Sudden Buddhahood?

Content:

tomamundsen said:

So are you effectively saying that Ch'an is entirely a sudden school? And that the "controversy" was more about polemics of accusing other schools as being gradual (inferior)?

Astus wrote:

Yes. Also note that the idea of a sudden teaching is not exclusive to Chan, but applies to Tiantai and Huayan as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 1st, 2017 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: Sudden Buddhahood?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I'm interested in the apparent conflict between this statement, and the often-observed practice in Buddhist monasteries, where zazen does indeed comprise long hours of sitting motionless in dhyana, according to many accounts.

Astus wrote:

As it is said in the quote you provided from Buswell, "meditators comprise only a small percentage of the monks", while the majority in Korea are Jogye monastics, a Seon school. It is rather a myth that Chan equals Dhyana just because the words are etymologically related.

Wayfarer said:

Why do you think in some places, the idea of 'sitting motionless' is admonished, but in other places, it seems to be regarded as fundamental to Zen practice?

Astus wrote:

Hardly any classic Zen text talks of sitting meditation. Even Dogen's Shobogenzo is mostly about other topics (see a little calculation <https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=202742#p202742>). As for what is considered the daily routine of a monastery, that is quite a different matter, and it is nothing universal, except perhaps the morning and evening ceremony. In any case, a good number of Zen works are critical of practically every aspect of monastic life, from prostrations to pilgrimages, and seated meditation is just one of the many things one can be overly occupied with. But being critical does not mean rejecting or forbidding, only that none of those constitute the essence of the Buddhadharma.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 1st, 2017 at 7:04 AM

Title: Re: Sudden Buddhahood?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Although I have always found that commitment to daily sitting is a basic part of engaging with the dharma, because otherwise I'm just another urban-dweller who thinks about it.

Astus wrote:

"When I was first at the temple, we simply practiced. We worked and prostrated. Every day we chanted and read sutras. We were not told their meaning. It didn't matter. We simply went through the process. We cut down on our attachment to the things around us, cut down on the things in our heads, cut down on our discriminations. This was a good method for us. However, for modern lay people such training would be inadequate. Many of my disciples have questioned these methods. With no emphasis on what they think practice is — meditation, prostrations, chanting — they feel that life in the monastery is not particularly different from their lives at home. What's the point, they say. At home we work, here we work. At home we cook, and we cook here, too. Why did we bother to leave home? Where is the practice?

What would you say to such disciples? Is life at home and life at the monastery the same? Someone just mentioned attitude, and that is entirely correct. The way we approach what we do at the monastery is not quite the same as the way most lay people approach what they have to do."

(<http://chancenter.org/cmc/1992/05/31/life-in-a-chan-monastery/>)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 1st, 2017 at 5:38 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Buddhahood?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Practice is remembering what we have forgotten, and we have to practice continuously, but never with the idea of gaining something.

Astus wrote:

Zongmi writes this about the Jingzhong school's main teaching:

"The 'three topics' are: 'no remembering, no mindfulness, and do not forget.' The idea is as follows. Do not recall past sense objects. Do not anticipate glorious events in the future. Constantly be yoked to this wisdom, never darkening, never erring; this is called do not forget. Sometimes [the three topics are]: no remembering external sense objects; no thinking of internal mind, dried up with nothing to rely upon (do not forget as above). 'Precepts, concentration, and wisdom' correspond respectively to the three topics." (Zongmi on Chan, p 181)

Wayfarer said:

Actually there are two meanings to 'right recollection' (smṛti) which in Buddhist terminology is both 'remembering' and 'mindfulness'. The external meaning is recollecting the teachings i.e. being able to recite them. The inner meaning is 'remembering the True Nature'. That is more what I was referring to.

Astus wrote:

In Chan "right recollection" (zhengnian 正念) is no recollection (wunian 無念 / asmṛti). Being mindful is practice, no-mindfulness is enlightenment.

"To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to arrive at the stage of buddhahood."

(Platform Sutra, ch2, BDK ed, p34; T48n2008, p351b5)

"All [deliberate] activation of cultivation is false activity.

To guard one's abiding is not true serenity."

(ch7, p61; p356b21)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 1st, 2017 at 6:03 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Buddhahood?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

So there is 'true serenity'? Or is that also 'no serenity'? It seems whatever one says, there is a quotation that it negates it. Better probably to make no statement, as no statement seems to be a true statement.

Astus wrote:

The point is simply to recognise that all states are impermanent and empty. Thus there is no state to cultivate. That is true serenity.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 1st, 2017 at 8:27 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Buddhahood?

Content:

seeker242 said:

However, what about cultivating "the state" that recognise that all states are impermanent and empty? Because the fact that all states are impermanent and empty, is not immediately obvious, if it was then no one would attach to them.

Astus wrote:

First there is the path (prayogamarga & sambharamarga) to gain recognition (darsanamarga), then there is the training to habituate (bhavanamarga) it, eventually arriving at no practice (asaiksamarga). That is called the http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Five_paths. The sudden way is going directly to the realisation of no practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 2nd, 2017 at 5:08 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Buddhahood?

Content:

Anonymous X said:

It's a lot easier and quicker to simply recognize that all practice is an attempt to change, modify, or become something rather than go through all 'paths' that only lead back to this recognition of deception. Contemplation of this is the only requirement that I can see which can reveal what the 'search' is all about and how it prevents one from being present in the moment.

Astus wrote:

Practice is about learning to let go by comprehending the emptiness of appearances. The sudden path differs from the gradual in that it goes directly to wisdom instead of building up morality and meditation first, and that's how it is less a matter of method and more of individual capacity. As for "being present in the moment", while I don't know what you exactly mean, it doesn't sound like anything but a futile attempt of being somewhere.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 3rd, 2017 at 1:56 AM

Title: Re: Sudden Buddhahood?

Content:

Anonymous X said:

What is the sudden path? What does that have to do with what is, presently, at any given moment? Isn't any path something you do, engage in? What does that have to do with your present experience of the body?

Astus wrote:

"The self-nature is without error, without stupidity, and without disruption. In moment after moment of thought, prajñā illuminates, constantly transcending the characteristics of dharmas. Independent and autonomous, he apprehends everything—how could there be any positing? The self-nature becomes enlightened itself, sudden enlightenment and sudden cultivation. There is no gradual progression. Therefore, one does not posit all the dharmas. The dharmas are quiescent—how could there be a progression?"

(Platform Sutra, ch 8, BDK ed, p 75)

"If one comprehends the mind and the objects, then false thinking is not created again. When there is no more false thinking, that is acceptance of the non-arising of all dharma. Originally it exists and it is present now, irrespective of cultivation of the Way and sitting in meditation. Not cultivating and not sitting is the Tathagata's pure meditation."

(Record of Mazu, in Sun-Face Buddha, p 68)

Q: What method must be practiced to attain liberation?

A: Only by practicing the Dharma of Sudden Enlightenment can we attain liberation.

Q: What is Sudden Enlightenment?

A: "Sudden" means instantly stopping false thought. "Enlightenment" means [awareness] that one attains nothing.

(Dazhu Huihai: <http://ymba.org/books/entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment/treatise-entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment>)

"Question: What is the essential method for sudden enlightenment in the great vehicle? The master said,

You all should first put an end to all involvements and lay to rest all concerns; do not remember or recollect anything at all, whether good or bad, mundane or transcendental - do not engage in thoughts. Let go of body and mind, set them free.

With mind like wood or stone, not explaining anything with the mouth, mind not going anywhere, then the mind ground becomes like space, wherein the sun of wisdom naturally appears. It is as though the clouds had opened and the sun emerged."

...

"Question: How can one attain a mind which is like wood or stone in the presence of all situations?

The master said,

All various things have never of themselves spoken of emptiness; nor do they themselves speak of form, and they do not speak of right, wrong, defilement, or purity. Nor is there mind which binds and fetters people; it is just because people themselves give rise to vain and arbitrary attachments and that they create so many kinds of understanding, produce so many kinds of opinion, and give rise to so many various loves and fears.

Just understand that the many things do not originate of themselves; all of them come into existence from one's own single mental impulse of imagination mistakenly clinging to appearances. If you know that mind and objects fundamentally do not contact each other, you will be set free on the spot. Each of the various things is in a state of quiescence right where it is; this very place is the site of enlightenment."

(Extensive Record of Baizhang, in Sayings and Doings of Pai-Chang, p 77-78, 79)

"No-mind refers to the absence of all [states of] mind. ... This mind is the mind of no-mind. Transcending all characteristics, there is yet no difference between sentient beings and Buddhas. If you can just [attain] no-mind, then that is the ultimate [state of enlightenment]. If a trainee does not instantly [attain] no-mind but spends successive eons in cultivation, he will never achieve enlightenment. He will be fettered by the meritorious practices of the three vehicles and will not attain liberation."

...

"To simply right now suddenly comprehend that one's own mind is fundamentally Buddha, without there being a single dharma one can attain and without there being a single practice one can cultivate—this is the unsurpassable enlightenment, this is the Buddha of suchness."

(Huangbo: Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, in Zen Texts, BDK ed., p 15, 16; 20)

"One thought of doubt in your mind is Māra. But if you realize that the ten thousand dharmas never come into being, that mind is like a phantom, that not a speck of dust nor a single thing exists, that there is no place that is not clean and pure—this is Buddha. Thus Buddha and Māra are simply two states, one pure, the other impure.

In my view there is no Buddha, no sentient beings, no past, no present. Anything attained was already attained—no time is needed. There is nothing to practice, nothing to realize, nothing to gain, nothing to lose. Throughout all time there is no other dharma than this. 'If one claims there's a dharma surpassing this, I say that it's like a dream, like a phantasm.' This is all I have to teach."

(Record of Linji, p 12-13, tr Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 3rd, 2017 at 3:16 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Buddhahood?

Content:

Anonymous X said:

Is this really any different from what I've been saying? I agree with all of the above, but don't see any 'path', Buddha, or self-nature.

Astus wrote:

That's the point, it is not a path in the sense of going somewhere stage by stage, but a realisation. Hence I said that its main character is arriving directly at wisdom.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 3rd, 2017 at 4:36 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Buddhahood?

Content:

Anonymous X said:

Then why do you refer to the quotes instead of your own wisdom?

Astus wrote:

Those are words from canonised texts, thus they are more definitive in Chan than whatever I'd write on my own.

Anonymous X said:

The realization must be your own, happening in your body complex, not a re-ification of another's words.

Astus wrote:

It doesn't matter what my realisation is, since on a forum there are just words.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 3rd, 2017 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: Synthetic view of Chan / Zen / Seon

Content:

Astus wrote:

Might start with Wikipedia:

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Zen>

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Chan_Buddhism

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Korean_Seon

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Japanese_Zen

Then there is <https://books.google.com/books?id=smNM4ElP3XgC>.

Finally there is Dumoulin's two-volume work:

https://books.google.com/books?id=Y1_YAAAAMAAJ, https://books.google.com/books?id=hfMkpD_Xr3sC. It is somewhat outdated, but nothing similar has been published yet as far as I know.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 5th, 2017 at 4:05 PM

Title: Re: From Impermanence to Buddhahood

Content:

Strive said:

Can Buddhahood be considered immortality? When I read things like the bliss body or rainbow body that's what it sound like.

Astus wrote:

Normally it is a being that is called immortal, and in that sense nobody of the six realms has a never ending life, eventually even gods die and are born again. On the other hand, samsara has no beginning, nor do beings simply stop being reborn, hence in a way everyone is already immortal. And that sense of immortality is what may give rise to the view of an eternal soul, just as people assume an enduring identity based on the continuity of day to day life. Projecting this very flawed view on buddhas is twice wrong. First because it lacks the understanding of what life is, and second because it lacks understanding of what a buddha is.

The one thing that is called immortal (i.e. deathless - amata; unceased - aniruddha), and that is nirvana. Similarly, it is also called the unborn (ajāta), the unarisen (anutpāda). So Nagarjuna sums it up:

"Not abandoned, not acquired, not annihilated, not eternal, not ceased, not arisen, thus is nirvāṇa said to be."
(MMK 25.3, tr Siderits)

At the same time, not only nirvana can be described as such, but also the nature of everything as well:

"The nature of things is to be, like nirvāṇa, without origination or cessation."
(MMK 18.7)

That is why

"There is no distinction whatsoever between saṃsāra and nirvāṇa.
There is no distinction whatsoever between nirvāṇa and saṃsāra."
(MMK 25.19)

Hence the nature of the world is no different from the nature of a buddha:

"What is the intrinsic nature of the Tathāgata, that is the intrinsic nature of this world.
The Tathāgata is devoid of intrinsic nature; this world is devoid of intrinsic nature."
(MMK 22.16)

From here when the matter of the rupakaya is looked at, and in particular the unceasing activities of the sambhogakaya, it has to be viewed on the basis that assuming a being, an entity is already a false concept, and a view that buddhas are completely free from.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 5th, 2017 at 8:30 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Shikantaza

Content:

Matylda said:

Today people can say whatever they like, teach whatever they THINK and call all this junk ZEN. Scary...

Astus wrote:

I don't see how it is scary to have freedom of religion, but you can find most of the traditional state control for instance in China. Otherwise, aside from https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Persecution_of_Buddhists, weird things might come up as well, like the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sanghyang_Adi_Buddha. Also, the fusion of various forms of nationalism and Buddhism in Asia is also a product of state control (e.g. <http://www.webpages.uidaho.edu/ngier/BudJapNat.htm>, found in <https://books.google.com/books?id=0LBhBAAAQBAJ>).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 5th, 2017 at 10:41 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Shikantaza

Content:

Matylda said:

What scary is, is not religious freedom, but freedom to say uneducated folks whatever one thinks and sell it nicely wrapped in ZEN decoration.

Astus wrote:

That is what freedom of religion means.

Matylda said:

zen is simply not represented by Japanese teachers in the West

Astus wrote:

There might be a few Zen groups without direct connection to Japanese teachers, but it seems that the majority of them has Japanese origins. And since most of the teachers were authorised by Japanese ones, the current quality is not some independent event.

Matylda said:

Tibetan tradition is on the contrary represented by many lamas and Rinpoches in the West, so it is much easier to see what is true dharma and what is not.

Astus wrote:

What constitutes true Dharma should not be defined by the person saying it. So perhaps the http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Four_reliances should be one of the first things people learn of Buddhism.

Matylda said:

With zen it simply happens that the education level is simply very low, knowledge is on the verge of ignorance.

Astus wrote:

That is most likely what appeals to many, that in Zen you don't study things, you just sit.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 6th, 2017 at 10:42 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Shikantaza

Content:

Matylda said:

Buddha did not teach freedom of religion

Astus wrote:

Did he teach then to restrict the beliefs of other people? Did he establish an authoritative institution to govern religion? Did he advise rulers to support only some but not other religious groups?

Matylda said:

it is recent concept

Astus wrote:

The 12th <https://www.cs.colostate.edu/~malaiya/ashoka.html#FOURTEEN>:

Beloved-of-the-Gods, King Piyadasi, honors both ascetics and the householders of all religions, and he honors them with gifts and honors of various kinds. But Beloved-of-the-Gods, King Piyadasi, does not value gifts and honors as much as he values this -- that there should be growth in the essentials of all religions. Growth in essentials can be done in different ways, but all of them have as their root restraint in speech, that is, not praising one's own religion, or condemning the religion of others without good cause. And if there is cause for criticism, it should be done in a mild way. But it is better to honor other religions for this reason. By so doing, one's own religion benefits, and so do other religions, while doing otherwise harms one's own religion and the religions of others. Whoever praises his own religion, due to excessive devotion, and condemns others with the thought "Let me glorify my own religion," only harms his own religion. Therefore contact (between religions) is good. One should listen to and respect the doctrines professed by others. Beloved-of-the-Gods, King Piyadasi, desires that all should be well-learned in the good doctrines of other religions.

Those who are content with their own religion should be told this: Beloved-of-the-Gods, King Piyadasi, does not value gifts and honors as much as he values that there should be growth in the essentials of all religions. And to this end many are working -- Dhamma Mahamatras, Mahamatras in charge of the women's quarters, officers in charge of outlying areas, and other such officers. And the fruit of this is that one's own religion grows and the Dhamma is illuminated also.

Matylda said:

in the context of dharma talking freely nonsense is really bad

Astus wrote:

However, there is no single person or organisation to tell what is nonsense and what is not. Already in India there were 18/20 early schools, and more appeared later and in other countries. If there had been only one group that decided things, likely Mahayana could not have ever emerged, not to mention all the numerous changes and reforms over the centuries.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 7th, 2017 at 6:05 PM

Title: Re: Are demons mentioned in Buddhism actually just bad karma?

Content:

Ervin said:

I was wondering if demons mentioned in Buddhist scriptures are simply the bad karma that we experience?

Astus wrote:

All painful events are products of bad karma, from annoying neighbours to the hell realms.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 16th, 2017 at 9:18 PM

Title: Re: Are demons mentioned in Buddhism actually just bad karma?

Content:

pael said:

Events or experiences? Loud sounds disturbs me very much, but everyone I know loves loud sounds. Is this karma or what?

Astus wrote:

Events are experiences. Liking something is taking it as good, disliking something is taking it as bad. That's how one's mental conditioning (karma) defines all perceptions.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 17th, 2017 at 6:34 PM

Title: Re: Term in Rinzaï Roku

Content:

Astus wrote:

The term lingyin 靈音 seems particular to the Linjilu, so here ling 靈 is a qualifier for yin 音, thus the translation "wondrous voice" (Sasaki) or "miraculous sound" (Watson). <https://en.wiktionary.org/wiki/%E9%9D%88> has a good number of meanings, and can be a member of <http://www.buddhism-dict.net/ddb//rad-stroke/b9748.html>.

From the http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/X69n1322_001#0006b02 (tr Cleary):

In the teaching hall the master said, "The spiritual light (<https://www.buddhistdoor.org/tc/dictionary/details/%E9%9D%88%E5%85%89>) shines alone, far transcending the senses and their fields; the essential substance is exposed, real and eternal. It is not contained in written words. The nature of mind has no defilement; it is basically perfect and complete in itself. Just get rid of delusive attachments, and merge with realization of thusness."

From Jinul (Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 2, p 129):

"When falsity is extinguished, the mind will be numinous and dynamic (靈通); then the effulgence of superpowers will appear in response."

He also quotes Zongmi (p 214):

"When delusion is extinguished, the mind will become numinous and dynamic (靈通) and, in response, will make manifest its function of penetrating illumination."

Another compound often used by Jinul (p 219):

"Since all dharmas are like dreams or conjuring tricks, deluded thoughts are originally calm and the dusty sense-spheres are originally empty. At the point where all dharmas are empty, the numinous awareness is unobscured. That is, this mind of void and calm, numinous awareness (靈知) is your original face"

Now if we turn to Linji, the use of ling 靈 is mainly for the vividness of apparent experiences (tr Sasaki, p 240):

"The three realms do not of themselves proclaim: 'We are the three realms!' But you, followers of the Way, right now vividly (目前靈靈) illumining all things and taking the measure of the world, you give the names to the three realms."

(p 273):

"Moreover, names and phrases are not of themselves names and phrases; it is you, who right now radiantly and vividly (目前昭昭靈靈) perceive, know, and clearly illumine [everything]—you it is who affix all names and phrases."

To connect the two meaning of vividness and wondrous, it means the unabiding perception (e.g. of sound 聲, p 227):

"Those are not the six supernatural powers of a buddha, which are entering the world of color yet not being deluded by color; entering the world of sound yet not being deluded by sound; entering the world of odor yet not being deluded by odor; entering the world of taste yet not being deluded by taste; entering the world of touch yet not being deluded by touch; entering the world of dharmas yet not being deluded by dharmas. Therefore, when it is realized that these six—color, sound, odor, taste, touch, and dharmas— are all empty forms, they cannot bind the man of the Way, dependent upon nothing."

And comparing to an echo (p 275):

"When the place of arising or extinguishing of a single thought in your mind is not to be found, as with a sound reverberating throughout space (響應空), and there is nothing anywhere for you to do"

Finally, the original sentence to be considered (p 252):

"if you don't seek him, then he's right there before your eyes, his wondrous voice (靈音) resounding in your ears."

We can say that his voice being wondrous stands for hearing without attachment.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 17th, 2017 at 9:56 PM

Title: Re: Reliance on Rites and Rituals

Content:

Astus wrote:

"What is adherence to observances and rituals (śīlavrataparāmarśa)? It is the admission, inclination, idea, point of view, opinion of him who considers observances and rituals or the five aggregates of attachment constituting the basis, as being pure, just (or providing deliverance) and leading to emancipation. Its function is to supply a basis for fruitless efforts."

(Abhidharmasamuccaya, p 13)

"The view which considers as cause that which is not cause, or as the path that which is not the Path, is called śīlavrataparāmarśa: namely, to consider Maheśvara, Prajāpati, or any other entity which is not a cause of the world as a cause of the world; to consider the rituals of suicide,—entering into fire or drowning—as a cause of a heavenly rebirth when they do not in fact procure heaven; or to consider morality and ascetic practices as the only path to deliverance when they are themselves not the only path to deliverance, nor the "knowledges" (jñāna) of the Sāṃkhya and the Yogins which are not a path to deliverance; and so too the rest."

(Kosha, vol 3, p 778)

"Rules-and-vows clinging is the adherence [to the view that] purification comes through rules and vows, according as it is said: "Herein, what is rules-and-vows clinging? ... That purification comes through a rite, that purification comes through a ritual, that purification comes through a rite and ritual: such view as this ... such perverse assumption is called rules-and-vows clinging""

(Visuddhimagga, p 591 / online ATI p 649)

"Any precept & practice life whose essence is training, and the holy life whose essence is service:

This is one extreme.

Any who say, "There's no harm in sensual desires":

This, the second extreme."

(<http://www.accesstosight.org/tipitaka/kn/ud/ud.6.08.than.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 18th, 2017 at 6:28 PM

Title: Re: Reliance on Rites and Rituals

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I take this reference to 'considering as a cause, that which is not a cause' is reference to the idea of a Creator?

Astus wrote:

The cause as

- "to consider Maheśvara, Prajāpati, or any other entity which is not a cause of the world as a cause of the world"

- "to consider the rituals of suicide,— entering into fire or drowning—as a cause of a heavenly rebirth when they do not in fact procure heaven"

So it is both to the idea of a creator, and the idea of certain actions leading to heavenly birth (could add other actions as well, like the heroic actions of a warrior, as taught in SN 42.3-5).

Wayfarer said:

One could easily think that the first 'extreme' is what Buddhists generally do - but one would be mistaken.

Astus wrote:

The reason such an extreme is avoided is that the precepts are not the whole of the path, nor do they bring about liberation on their own. Furthermore, the various elements and stages of the path are understood as only means to an end, not end in themselves, hence there is no precept, practice, or view one should remain bound to, as stated in the <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.024.than.html> and the <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/kn/snp/snp.4.09.than.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 15th, 2017 at 11:26 PM

Title: Re: Soto Zen Quotes

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Kind speech" means, when meeting living beings, first of all to feel compassion for them and to offer caring and loving words. Broadly, it is there being no rude or bad words. In secular societies there are polite customs of asking others if they are well. In Buddhism there are the words "Take good care of yourself!" and there is the disciple's greeting "How are you?" Speaking with the feeling of "compassion for living beings as if they were babies" is kind speech. We should praise those who have virtue and should pity those who lack virtue. Through love of kind speech, kind speech is gradually nurtured. Thus, kind speech which is ordinarily neither recognized nor experienced manifests itself before us. While the present body and life exist we should enjoy kind speech, and we will not regress or deviate through many ages and many lives. Whether in defeating adversaries or in promoting harmony among gentlefolk, kind speech is fundamental. To hear kind speech spoken to us directly makes the face happy and the mind joyful. To hear kind speech indirectly etches an impression in the heart and in the soul. Remember, kind speech arises from a loving mind, and the seed of a loving mind is compassion. We should learn that kind speech has the power to turn around the heavens; it is not merely the praise of ability.

(Dogen: Four Elements of a Bodhisattva's Social Relations, in SBGZ, vol 3, BDK ed, p 41)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 16th, 2017 at 3:32 AM

Title: Re: Soto Zen Quotes

Content:

CedarTree said:

Seems you haven't been around much! Hopefully you are a Zen monk these days?

Astus wrote:

"When we fail, it is already progress to understand that we have failed. We train ourselves by making that failure a stepping-stone for a pace forward. The practice of Buddhism is to realize that the present success is the hundred failures of the past. When we understand that, no confusions or disturbances will arise."

(Takashina Rosen: A Tongue-Tip Taste of Zen, in T. Leggett: A First Zen Reader, p 49)

"I wonder why we are always avoiding and running away from the real purpose of life. I think is because of our anticipatory nature, a dream of something else, something better, than what one already is. This dream arises from our attachment to the ego. So we continue to roam about, motivated by our unconscious fixed idea that we dislike ourselves as we are."

(Hogen Yamahata: The Other Shore, p 32)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 17th, 2017 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Zen

Content:

Sherab said:

When something is dependently arisen, it implies that the something is not unconditioned. If you assert that emptiness is dependent arising or dependent co-arising, and if you also assert that emptiness is empty as well, then you would be implying that emptiness is not unconditioned. Your reply did not address the logical problem raised.

Astus wrote:

Emptiness merely stands for the absence of substance in appearances, that's why the problem raised as a contradiction between conditioned and unconditioned is a non-issue. It is the fact of being conditioned that makes appearances empty, since a substance means not being subject to conditions. Because appearances are conditioned, they are without a substance. That is how dependent origination and emptiness are one and the same. It also explains why there is no ultimate reality, only the ultimate truth that all phenomena are without essence.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 18th, 2017 at 3:09 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Zen

Content:

Sherab said:

Are you arguing that the emptiness of emptiness is therefore superfluous, irrelevant or over-reaching in meaning, etc.?

Astus wrote:

There can be over http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Twenty_kinds_of_emptiness, including emptiness of emptiness. The reason behind that is to clarify that there are no exceptions, everything is without an essence, and being without essence is also not an essence. The whole of Buddhadharma is about ending attachment. To posit anything that is ultimately worth being attached to (note: skilful means should be grasped up to a point) goes against the very basics of the Buddha's teaching. So, even the teaching of emptiness is only a means to an end. As the http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html says, "If even my correct teachings are to be abandoned, how much more incorrect teachings?"

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 19th, 2017 at 6:56 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Zen

Content:

Sherab said:

it is unskillful to use words that results in logical contradiction

Astus wrote:

What contradiction?

A passages from Mazu:

"Not obliterating the conditioned; not dwelling in the unconditioned. The conditioned is the function of the unconditioned; the unconditioned is the essence of the conditioned."

(Sun-Face Buddha, p 67)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 22nd, 2017 at 3:12 PM

Title: Re: buddhas and sex

Content:

Astus wrote:

One of the 32 major marks is the retracted male organ.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 22nd, 2017 at 5:32 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Zen

Content:

Malcolm said:

There is "no existence in a cessation of which we can describe its nonexistence" (Sutta Nipatta). Thus there is nothing left over, positive or negative.

Sherab said:

I could not find your quotation in Sutta Nipata.

Astus wrote:

The matter of what happens after death to a liberated one is discussed in several suttas:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.085.than.html>,

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.086.than.html>,

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/index.html#sn44>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 23rd, 2017 at 3:06 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Zen

Content:

Sherab said:

And your point is?

Astus wrote:

It is about what Malcolm mentioned: when there is nothing that ceases, it is not annihilation.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 24th, 2017 at 3:30 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Zen

Content:

Sherab said:

It still does not mean that there is ultimately no natural state of any sort.

Astus wrote:

That sounds like an argument for an invisible elephant in a room where no elephant is found.

Sherab said:

I was arguing for an ultimate reality which is the source for our illusory relative reality.

Astus wrote:

An ultimate cannot cause a relative thing, first because a cause cannot be ultimate, and second because of different nature (ultimate-relative). There is neither an ultimate basis nor a source in Buddhism, there is only dependent origination.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 25th, 2017 at 3:06 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Zen

Content:

Sherab said:

That is because you have assumed the ultimate as something permanent and unchanging.

Astus wrote:

Something is either permanent or impermanent. If the proposed ultimate is impermanent, why even call it the ultimate? If you may respond that it is not something, then it is necessarily nothing, in which case it does not exist, hence there is no ultimate at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 25th, 2017 at 3:44 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Zen

Content:

Anonymous X said:

It always seems to me that trying to talk about the ultimate is sort of a waste of time. What is the point?

Astus wrote:

The ultimate is what one wants to achieve, to understand, to become. An ultimate existence is the false belief in a self, and as such it needs to be clarified and seen through in order to be free from it. The ultimate truth is what liberates from all suffering, and as such it is the final goal of the path. So there are good reasons to talk about the ultimate.

Anonymous X said:

If the point of Nagarjuna is to bring us to the abandonment of all views, is this not the same as the abandonment of discursive thinking?

Astus wrote:

The aim is never a blank, wordless state, but wisdom and clarity. If it were the case that thoughts and concepts are bad and their absence is good, then one could gain liberation just by losing consciousness. But the point is to recognise the nature of thoughts as insubstantial, as empty, thus end attachment and identification.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 25th, 2017 at 6:30 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Zen

Content:

Anonymous X said:

I can tell you that it is not a blank, wordless state. ... Wisdom begins to function without the obstruction of discursive mind.

Astus wrote:

If there is no discursive mind, there are no words, no concepts, no comprehension. How is it not a wordless state then?

Anonymous X said:

It is not that thoughts are bad. It is that they cannot comprehend what is.

Astus wrote:

The whole world is whatever is defined by thoughts, hence terms like vijñaptimātra and nāmamātra. Also consider what mind actually is as defined by the four mental aggregates (vedanā, saṃjñā, saṃskāra, vijñāna), and the five universal mental functions (vedanā, saṃjñā, cetanā, sparśa, manaskāra).

Anonymous X said:

Attachment and identification are absent when you let go of your view, that is if you don't reify another view.

Astus wrote:

Clinging is gone, but the functions are not.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 26th, 2017 at 6:16 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Zen

Content:

Sherab said:

I repeat, you are stating something that I have addressed early in this discussion.

Astus wrote:

The only place you seem to have addressed this was on <https://dharmaheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=401570#p401570>. There you state that the ultimate is both functional and impermanent. Such a statement actually turns the ultimate into the relative.

Sherab said:

If you do not address my reasoning or arguments, it is difficult to make headway in the discussion as we are merely talking past each other.

Astus wrote:

If there are other arguments from you I missed, please quote/link them.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 27th, 2017 at 4:26 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Zen

Content:

Sherab said:

As I have mentioned before, it is because you have assumed that dependent arising is identical to temporal causality.

Astus wrote:

There is no atemporal causality, as effect must follow cause. If it is not causality, then there is neither dependence, nor origination. That's why it can only be temporal causality.

Sherab said:

I have explained previously that dependent arising is very broad and can encompass more than mere temporal causality.

Astus wrote:

It wasn't an explanation, it was a simple statement.

<https://dharmaheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=403789#p403789>:

"You have also assumed dependent origination as identical to temporal causality."

That's all.

Sherab said:

When I discuss a subject with others, I make it a point to read and understand what is being said so that I don't waste the other person's time and effort with a reply that is not to point.

Astus wrote:

Very good approach. So are there any arguments aside from the claim that they exist somewhere?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 28th, 2017 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Zen

Content:

Anonymous X said:

No-mindfulness is often spoke of in Chan terms.

Temicco said:

I think you maybe mean "no-mind". Zen is about having no conditioned mind. It does teach mindfulness -- namely, mindfulness of ones nature, stability in unconditioned mind.

Anonymous X said:

I believe Zongmi is one of the worthies that used the term no-mindfulness.

Astus wrote:

no-mind: 無心 (wuxin / mushin)

no-mindfulness (also: no(n)-thought): 無念 (wunian / munen)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 29th, 2017 at 1:47 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Zen

Content:

Temicco said:

The translation nuance for that second one is huge, though. Is 念 the word normally used for smṛti?

Astus wrote:

Yes, 念 is the word normally used for smṛti. E.g. 正念 saṃyaksmṛti, 念佛 buddhānusmṛti, 念安般 ānāpānasmṛti, 四念處 catvārisṛtyupasthānāni. However, that is not the word's exclusive meaning, so it is not that straightforward. Rather, what one should look for is the definition provided in the same text where a term is used.

A recommended reading:

<http://buddhiststudies.berkeley.edu/people/faculty/sharf/documents/Sharf,%20Mindfulness%20and%20Mindlessness%20in%20Early%20Chan.pdf> by Robert Sharf.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 29th, 2017 at 7:53 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Zen

Content:

Anonymous X said:

One more quote: Zongmi “Even during delusion there is Knowing. Knowing from the outset is non-delusion. Even the arising of thoughts is Knowing, [but] Knowing from the outset is no mindfulness, up to and including: [at the locus wherein] pity, joy, happiness, hatred, love, and dislike [appear] one after the other they are all Knowing. Knowing from the outset is voidness and calm. It is void and calm and yet Knowing. Then you are not confused at all about the mind nature. The above all differs drastically from [the ideas of] the other lineages.”

Vasana said:

Maybe it would be useful to see what the translation of 'knowing' is in that excerpt since there are definitely nuances related to the knowing capacity of mind in T.B. I don't claim to know much about Zen but I suspect that your interpretation isn't representative of the teachings given the clarifications in this thread on mindfulness/no-mindfulness.

Astus wrote:

Knowing/awareness 知 in the teachings of Shenhui and Zongmi might be equated with terms like rigpa/vidyā and yeshe/jñāna. However, the later tradition (i.e. Patriarchal Zen) was quite critical of that concept.

"Knowing and understanding are the great faults of the Buddhadharma. Heze, who was an illegitimate heir of Caoqi, used them. The Vimalakīrti(nirdeśa) sūtra says, "Remove what it has." The Lotus Sutra says, "Remove the shit and take the wages." These are all states of knowing and understanding. For this reason knowing and understanding are obstacles to correct views, like rancid rice offered to starving ghosts, like bad water being used to pollute the field of the mind, which is not as good as looking at Zhaozhou's character mu."

(Hyujeong: The Greatest Faults in Seon: the Two Characters Knowing and Understanding, in The Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 3, p 239-240)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 29th, 2017 at 10:24 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Zen

Content:

Vasana said:

is it clear if the schools you're talking about are distinguishing between the 'knowing' related to dualistic mind or to the 'knowing' related to non-conceptual, direct cognition? Both might be called 'knowing' but the latter is not a conceptual view.

Astus wrote:

Knowing/awareness 知 is a specific term here, and it is not confused with the conceptual mind.

"The mind of voidness and calm is a spiritual Knowing that never darkens. This calm Knowing of voidness and calm is precisely the mind of voidness and calm that Bodhidharma formerly transmitted. Whether you are deluded or awakened, mind from the outset is spontaneously Knowing. [Knowing] is not produced by conditions, nor does it arise in dependence on sense objects. Even during delusion the depravities are Knowing, but [Knowing] is not the depravities. Even during awakening the divine transformations are Knowing, but Knowing is not the divine transformations. Thus, the one word "Knowing" is the source of all excellence. Because of delusion about this Knowing there arises the characteristic of a self. When one calculates self and mine, love and hatred spontaneously arise. According to the mind of love or hatred, one does good or bad, and, as retribution for this good or bad, is reborn in one of the six rebirth paths, life after life, birth after birth, cyclically, without end."

(Zongmi: Chan Letter, in Zongmi on Chan, p 88)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 7th, 2017 at 3:56 PM

Title: Re: Can you practice without a teacher?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dogen writes:

"If you want to study the supreme Buddhist Truth, you have to visit excellent Buddhist masters in far-off China. Reflect upon the vigorous road that is far beyond intellectual thinking. If you cannot find a true master, it is better not to study at all."
(<https://terebess.hu/zen/dogen/GakuDoYoJinShu.pdf>)

Brad Warner comments:

"Notice, though, that Dogen never said don't do zazen without a teacher, he just said don't study Buddhism without one. Although doing zazen is a form of studying Buddhism, it won't do most folks any harm at all to sit zazen on their own. Just don't get too gung-ho about it."
(<http://hardcorezen.info/do-i-need-a-teacher>)

After all, <http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/practice/zazen/howto/index.html> is a fairly simple practice, and you can find several <http://antaiji.org/en/dharma/okumura-mind-and-zazen/>. If you actually do zazen you can recognise for what role you need a teacher for.

Huineng said:

"If you do not become enlightened by yourself, then you must seek a great spiritual compatriot, someone who understands the Dharma of the Supreme Vehicle, to indicate directly the correct path for you. ... If you can become enlightened yourself, don't rely on external seeking — don't think I'm saying you can only attain emancipation through [the help of] a spiritual compatriot other than yourself."
(Platform Sutra, ch2, BDK ed, p 33)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 19th, 2017 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: Relative vs. Ultimate Truth

Content:

spiao said:

I just want to check if I'm thinking in the right direction.

Astus wrote:

The conventional/relative truth is whatever is held as valid by people, or simply dependent origination. The ultimate truth is the absence of substance, i.e. emptiness.

So, unlike in your file, inter-dependence is the relative truth, causality, appearances. The middle way is not a third option, but the lack of extreme views.

As for your questions:

- "the conclusion is already built in the premise", the two truths doctrine is not an argument but an educational device
- "Is there any phenomenon that has inherent existence?", no
- "what about abstractions and concepts", they are the products of imagination, nothing more

Explanations:

Wikipedia: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Two_truths_doctrine

Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy: <https://plato.stanford.edu/entries/twotruths-india/>

Patrul Rinpoche: <http://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/patrul-rinpoche/two-truths-view-mahayana>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 28th, 2017 at 4:15 PM

Title: Re: NOT another Jhana Thread

Content:

Zafutales said:

I have seen reference at times to Shikantaza being likened to the Fourth Jhana - can someone elucidate the rationale for this please?

Astus wrote:

There can be three reasons for that assumption: not understanding shikantaza, not understanding dhyanas, not understanding either.

If it's the first one, then one mistakes a stable and calm mind as the proper mental state of zazen. In other words, the ghost cave of liberation.

If it's the second one, then one mistakes only a little bit of concentration as a dhyana.

If it's the third one, then one is completely lost in one's own ideas and fails to rely on the correct teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 28th, 2017 at 7:44 PM

Title: Re: NOT another Jhana Thread

Content:

Zafutales said:

I mean if one was sitting in Zazen and specifically Shikantaza how would one be able to rely upon or validate one's experience?

Astus wrote:

There are two sides here. First, the typical answer is that it is for the teacher to validate the disciple. As it is stated in the <http://www.cttbusa.org/6patriarch/6patriarch16.asp>:

“That was acceptable before the time of the Buddha called the Awesome-Voiced King. But since the coming of that Buddha, all those who ‘self-enlighten’ without a master belong to other religions which hold to the tenet of spontaneity.”

Second, shikantaza is itself the practice of verification, whereby one directly recognises that all experiences are ungraspable, hence there is no experience to be validated.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 28th, 2017 at 2:30 AM

Title: Re: Nothing further to seek...

Content:

Wayfarer said:

It's rather easy to believe that as Nirvāṇa and samsara are not two, then we have nothing further to seek, that we are already enlightened. You hear that a lot in various forms of modernised Buddhism and other spiritual philosophies - you perfect as you are, there is no need to strive for anything. 'Lucky is one with nothing further to seek'.

Astus wrote:

The misleading word here is "perfect". The true nature of life, the universe, and everything is: impermanent, dissatisfying, and impersonal. Those are not exactly the common associations for the word "perfect". What sentient beings love is stability, pleasure, and importance, the very opposites of how things really are. But even though one ceaselessly pursues the illusion of perfection, there is no end to the chase. Therefore, when the real qualities of existence are seen, it is through the relinquishing of the lives long pursuit of perfection that one arrives at aimlessness, the total extinction of seeking. Such peace is attained not because there is anything to gain, nor because there is something to let go, but because it has become clear that life cannot be fixed, that all hopes and fears are utterly baseless and fabricated.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 28th, 2017 at 10:04 PM

Title: Re: Nothing further to seek...

Content:

Wayfarer said:

there remains a quality of perfection

Astus wrote:

Remains where?

Wayfarer said:

I am reminded of Lex Hixon's commentary on the Prajñāpāramitā: when perception of the world is no longer burdened with the imputed meanings that are attached to it on account of attachment, it is perceived in its suchness, tathata, as an aspect of boundless Reality: ineffable, limitless, boundaryless, frontierless, divisionless, identityless, infinite, transparent, harmoniously functioning, open, free, elusive, deep, pure, empty, sublime, calmly quiet, at peace, and blissfully awakened. (Hixon 1993) That is why Prajñāpāramitā is referred to as the 'perfection of wisdom', isn't it?

Astus wrote:

Not really. That kind of perfection you mention is more of a poetic interpretation.

“Pāramitā” means “reaching to the other shore.” Because it is able to reach to the other shore of the great sea of wisdom and because it reaches to its very boundaries and utterly exhausts its most ultimate limits, it qualifies as “perfect” in its “reaching to the other shore.”

(http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/N6P_excerpts/N6P_X-Bk4_X-15.pdf, ch 30, tr Dharmamitra)

"What is meant by Paramita? It is a Sanskrit word which in our language means 'arrived at the other shore,' and is explained as 'apart from production and extinction.' When one is attached to states of being, production and extinction arise like waves on water. That is what is meant by 'this shore.' To be apart from states of being, with no production or extinction, is to be like freely flowing water. That is what is meant by 'the other shore.' Therefore it is called 'Paramita'."

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, tr BTTS, p 124)

Wayfarer said:

which is expressed in the Buddhist-inspired artwork and iconography of China and Japan. Actually I recall being told that Chinese fine ceramics often have a deliberate slight imperfection or flaw so as to denote the imperfection of all compound things. But they are beautiful, nonetheless.

Astus wrote:

I think you mean <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kintsugi>.

Here is Nagarjuna on not seeking anything:

"Then again, if the bodhisattva refrains from taking up the practice of any particular dharma, because he does not apprehend any dharma whatsoever, he may thereby succeed in realizing prajñāpāramitā. How can this be the case? All practices are essentially false and unreal. In some cases, they possess faults in the near term. In other cases, they possess faults in the more distant term.

In the case of unwholesome dharmas, in the near term, they are involve karmic transgressions. In the case of good dharmas, there may be a time when, after a long while, they become so transformed that one becomes attached to them and thus generates distressful suffering on their account. In that case, they involve karmic transgressions in the distant term.

These circumstances are analogous to the certain cases involving both fine food and bad food, both of which have been mixed with poison. When one eats the bad food, one immediately becomes displeased. When one eats the fine food, although one will immediately be pleased, still, after a long while, in both cases, one's life will be stolen away. In fact, neither of the two should be eaten. All good and bad practices are comparable to these circumstances.

...

If one is able to practice the dharma of "no practice" in this manner, in every case, nothing whatsoever is gained. Inverted views, falseness, and afflictions are finally not produced at all. Because one remains as pure as empty space, one succeeds then in realizing the true character of dharmas. One takes having nothing whatsoever which is gained as that which is gained."

(http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/N6P_excerpts/N6P_X-Bk4_X-15.pdf, ch 30, tr Dharmamitra)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 29th, 2017 at 6:09 AM

Title: Re: Nothing further to seek...

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

As long as there is suffering, there is enlightenment, freedom from suffering. This is the Third Noble Truth.

Astus wrote:

How does that relate to the <http://www.buddhanet.net/e-learning/heartstr.htm>?

"There is No Truth of Suffering,
Of the Cause of Suffering,
Of the Cessation of Suffering,
Nor of the Path.
There is No Wisdom, and
There is No Attainment Whatsoever."

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 29th, 2017 at 7:06 AM

Title: Re: Nothing further to seek...

Content:

Wayfarer said:

The definition of Prajñāpāramitā which I am familiar with is 'perfection of wisdom'. I am inclined to retain that definition.

Astus wrote:

Perfection is an English rendering of paramita, but not the only one. A standard Chinese translation is du 度 that means to pass, to cross over, while the Tibetan is pha rol tu phyin pa, i.e. go to the other side. So apparently they both followed the traditional Buddhist understanding when translating the word. After all, the paramitas are not the end but the means.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 29th, 2017 at 5:15 PM

Title: Re: Nothing further to seek...

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

Astus, which term would you prefer for paramita? I leave it untranslated when talking about them.

Astus wrote:

I don't really have one.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 29th, 2017 at 5:34 PM

Title: Re: Nothing further to seek...

Content:

seeker242 said:

Everywhere! If samsara is nirvana and nirvana is perfect, then it must follow that samsara is perfect also.

Astus wrote:

What does it mean to be perfect then?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 30th, 2017 at 3:53 AM

Title: Re: Nothing further to seek...

Content:

seeker242 said:

It could mean "stability, pleasure, etc." like in the previous examples. It could also mean "complete, not lacking anything, etc.". In this context, I think the latter is more appropriate.

Astus wrote:

Are you saying that samsara can be described as stable, pleasurable, and not lacking anything? Those would be the very opposites of impermanent, dissatisfying, and insubstantial.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 30th, 2017 at 4:01 AM

Title: Re: Zen Forum International

Content:

anjali said:

Also, maybe the Zen community is utilizing other online platforms like facebook more effectively.

Astus wrote:

For one, the " <https://www.facebook.com/groups/SotoZenGlobal/> " group on facebook is quite active.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 30th, 2017 at 7:10 AM

Title: Re: Zen Forum International

Content:

jake said:

Why do you think people prefer FB?

Astus wrote:

A number of logical reasons have already been given here by Passel and Kim. Or we could just say that nowadays discussion boards are not trending as much as social networks.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 1st, 2017 at 9:49 PM

Title: Re: The concept of the teacher's "blessings"

Content:

Astus wrote:

"So when you supplicate them, even though, like your root guru, they cannot hand you attainment. or fruition; yet, like your root guru, they can influence and help you. It is not panicularly that by supplicating them they are pleased and therefore decide to share their spiritual wealth with you. It is rather that the devotion you generate in your supplication causes this blessing simply to occur."

...

"Supplication produces blessing, and although the blessing is understood as something given to you, something that somehow engulfs you from outside, in fact blessing really isn't given to you at all. When you supplicate, you generate faith and devotion. That faith and devotion cause the appearance of what we call blessing."

...

"To say that the blessing of Dharma enters into you does not mean that through receiving an empowerment you can immediately fly in the sky, or that you become intoxicated with some kind of mysterious spiritual drunkenness. It means simply that having received the empowerment, something changes. There will be at least a little increase in your faith and devotion, at least a little increase in your diligence. These changes in you are the principal blessing or benefit of the empowerment process. For example, many people have told me that they were previo·usly unable to understand or settle on the validity of Buddhism, but then, for one reason or another, they received the Kalachakra empowerment from His Holiness the Dalai Lama and thereafter have been intensely involved in practice. That is an instance of the blessing of empowerment. It is not necessarily that they are practicing Kalachakra, but that, because of that empowerment, they are practicing Dharma."

(Khenchen Thrangu: Creation and Completion, p 114, 117, 151)

"The Tibetan is jin gyi lab pa and means to be transformed through a certain environment and influence. This is the meaning of "blessing" from the Buddhist point of view. It denotes a total transformation from the core of our being, which is induced by different things happening around us. Empowerment, in its actual sense, should lead us to receive this blessing and to undergo a genuine and complete transformation."

(Ringu Tulku: Daring Steps Toward Fearlessness, p 133)

"Such an infusion of blessing can take place without any difficulty. It comes through invocation originating from one's faith and veneration. A devotee with deep faith receives a powerful blessing. One with medium faith receives a medium blessing. One with lesser faith receives the lesser blessing. It is the nature of things that one cannot receive spiritual blessing without faith. For those practitioners who have failed to gain deep understanding, there is no other way except that of worshiping the guru with faith, and through meditation invoking his blessings. Even those who have gained understanding should continue to have faith in their guru as a means of strengthening and perfecting their inner development."

(Gampopa quoted in Mahamudra the Moonlight, p 136-137)

"Our capacity to receive the compassion and blessings of the teacher and the Three Jewels, therefore, depends entirely on devotion and faith.

Once, a disciple called out to the master Jowo Atisa, "Jowo, give me your blessing!"

"Lax disciple," Atisa replied, "give me your devotion ... "

So absolute unwavering trust, arising from extraordinary faith and devotion, is indispensable. It opens the door to taking refuge."

(Patrul rinpoche: Words of My Perfect Teacher, p 176)

"The guru's blessings are always present, day and night. The buddhas and bodhisattvas, all the masters of the lineage, and your personal root guru are always full of blessings, continuously, throughout the three times. But how do these blessings saturate our own mind-stream to bring us to maturation? This happens when the concepts of me and mine have melted away in the state of devotion. It is this ego that prevents blessings from ripening our stream-of-being. The concept of self melts away in the atmosphere of devotion. This is when the warmth of blessings permeates you completely."

(Tsoknyi rinpoche, in Dzogchen Essentials, p 13)

"Devotion is the root of blessings, the basis for receiving blessings. Blessings definitely do exist, so we should know what they are and what the role of devotion is in receiving blessings. Otherwise, there is not much point in devotion.

Blessings are contagious, so to speak, and are transmitted in a fashion that is rather like catching a cold. If somebody has a cold and you are too close, you catch a cold too.

Likewise, if you get close to a master who has blessings, they can be transmitted to you. Blessings here mean the sense of some power of realization or power of samadhi, some kind of atmosphere of realization that is naturally present. You move close to him, in the sense of opening yourself up through devotion and making sincere, heartfelt supplications. In other words, you lower your defenses, whatever doubts and suspicions that prevent you from being "infected" with the blessings. The moment you do that, you catch a cold as well. Devotion is a very deeply felt and sincere emotion, which comes from the bottom of one's heart. It is partly a sense of really rejoicing, rejoicing in the qualities that are embodied in the teacher. At the same time, there is a sense of gratitude for the teacher's incredible kindness. This combination of rejoicing and gratitude is what opens us up, what generates devotion.

Devotion can be toward the Buddha, the Dharma, the Sangha, in terms of truly rejoicing in and appreciating their amazing qualities, of knowledge and compassion, and so forth. To be open toward that and rejoice in those qualities is one aspect of devotion. At the same time, when we understand how it benefits ourselves to train in the recognition of our basic nature, we feel gratitude, an appreciation of the kindness.

Otherwise, there could be many kinds of devotion. There is the devotion that is simply love, love generated by the thought, "He was nice to me, so I like him." There is devotion that is an admiration, in that you feel in awe of a person or thing. Then there is devotion inspired by some kind of longing to emulate someone-you want to be like that as well. However, in the beginning, devotion is some kind of fabrication. We are trying to feel in a certain way, trying to open up. It is artificial, but it makes us grow closer to understanding the view, in the sense that devotion opens us up to realize emptiness, makes it easier. When some authentic experience of emptiness strengthens devotion even further, at that point it is no longer artificial or contrived. We may begin by trying to feel devotion, and then, later on, actual experience allows it to become totally uncontrived. Uncontrived devotion springs out of the experience of the view. Because when there is some seeing in actuality of what is called rigpa or ordinary mind, the natural mind that really solves or liberates disturbing emotions-when the conceptual frame of mind is opened up. by this recognition-then we have a personal taste of the value and the worth of the practice. It is that real appreciation that is uncontrived devotion. In this way, devotion and the view of emptiness mutually strengthen one another."

(Tsoknyi rinpoche, in Dzogchen Primer, p 163-164)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 2nd, 2017 at 5:37 PM

Title: Re: The concept of the teacher's "blessings"

Content:

smcj said:

There is no Dharma called "blessing", no magical force called "blessing". If there was, the Buddha, being compassionate, would have blessed us all into nirvana long ago. Buddhas are neither omnipotent or capable of unilateral action. The request/receptivity must be initiated by sentient being.

Astus wrote:

Blessing is a positive change in relation to one's progress on the path to liberation. It is a specific case of receiving merit transference that comes from the appreciation of enlightened beings, while the generic meaning of receiving merit is the agreeing with any wholesome act, and that is a beneficial form of shared karma.

On the one hand, it can be said that it's all in one's mind, particularly for two reasons: all perceptions are mental fabrication, and karma is strictly individual. On the other hand, it is an inspiration originating from others, because without awareness of enlightened beings, no appreciation can occur, and without appreciation there can be no blessing.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 3rd, 2017 at 6:12 AM

Title: Re: Nothing further to seek...

Content:

seeker242 said:

I'm saying a world that is impermanent, dissatisfying, and insubstantial can be considered complete, not lacking anything when you don't desire it to be some other way.

Astus wrote:

"Originally there being no moving and nothing to be obtained is called the Buddha-Dharma, the Buddha's truth. The Buddha-Dharma lies just in walking, standing, sitting, and lying down. Adding even a bit to it is impossible, whereas taking away just a bit is also impossible. Realizing this, you will not waste even the slightest energy. As soon as you estimate it by deliberation to be something marvelous and mysterious, you already have nothing to do with it."

(Eisai: A Treatise on Letting Zen Flourish, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 145; emphasis added)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 5th, 2017 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: Satthipathana Sutta: Best Translation AND original text

Content:

Astus wrote:

Soma Thera: <https://www.accesstoinight.org/lib/authors/soma/wayof.html>

Ven. Analayo: <https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/direct-path.pdf>

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 5th, 2017 at 3:09 AM

Title: Re: Satthipathana Sutta: Best Translation AND original text

Content:

Astus wrote:

For the originals:

<http://www.tipitaka.org/romn/cscd/s0102m.mul8.xml>

<http://www.tipitaka.org/romn/cscd/s0201m.mul0.xml>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 6th, 2017 at 4:14 PM

Title: Re: How is the Mind-Body Problem Treated in Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

This relationship between body and mind is what falls under the so called unanswered questions regarding the identity of sarira (body) and jiva (soul). The short answer is that Buddhism has an experiential view, as shown in the teachings on the five aggregates and six sensory domains, where physical and mental phenomena are not substantially differentiated.

"If there is the view, 'The soul and the body are the same,' there is no living of the holy life; and if there is the view, 'The soul is one thing, the body is another,' there is no living of the holy life. Without veering towards either of these extremes, the Tathagata teaches the Dhamma by the middle: 'With birth as condition, aging-and-death.'"
(SN 12.35)

"Bhikkhus, when what exists, by clinging to what, by adhering to what, does such a view as this arise: 'The soul and the body are the same'?"

...

"Bhikkhus, when what exists, by clinging to what, by adhering to what, does such a view as this arise: 'The soul is one thing, the body another'?"

...

"But without clinging to what is impermanent, suffering, and subject to change, could such a view as that arise?"

"No, venerable sir."

(SN 24.13, 14)

"Master Gotama, what is the cause and reason why these various speculative views arise in the world: ... 'The soul and the body are the same' or 'The soul is one thing, the body is another'..."

"It is, Vaccha, because of not knowing form/feeling/perception/volitional formations/consciousness, its origin, its cessation, and the way leading to its cessation that those various speculative views arise in the world"

(SN 33.1-5)

"As to the various views that arise in the world, householder, 'The world is eternal' "" - these as well as the sixty-two speculative views mentioned in the Brahmajala: when there is identity view, these views come to be; when there is no identity view, these views do not come to be."

(SN 41.3)

"Vaccha, wanderers of other sects regard the eye thus: 'This is mine, this I am, this is my self.' They regard the ear . . . the nose . . . the tongue . . . the body . . . the mind thus: 'This is mine, this I am, this is my self.' Therefore, when the wanderers of other sects are asked such questions, they give such answers as: 'The world is eternal' . . . or 'The Tathagata neither exists nor does not exist after death.' But, Vaccha, the Tathagata, the Arahant, the Perfectly Enlightened One, regards the eye thus: 'This is not mine, this I am not, this is not my self.' He regards the ear . . . the mind thus: 'This is not mine, this I am not, this is not my self.' Therefore, when the Tathagata is asked such questions, he does not give such answers."

(SN 44.7)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 6th, 2017 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: The Bamboo Flutes of Japan's 'Monks of Emptiness'

Content:

Astus wrote:

A recommended reading from Gunnar Jinmei Linder is https://books.google.com/books/about/Deconstructing_Tradition_in_Japanese_Mus.html?id=NeekMwEACAAJ (<http://su.diva-portal.org/smash/get/diva2:488776/FULLTEXT01.pdf>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 6th, 2017 at 11:21 PM

Title: Re: The Void

Content:

Relinquish said:

In truth, any given 'particular thing' (for example, a 'tree') exists in a state of constant change, which is to say that 'the tree' is in fact a 'process' rather than a 'thing'.

Astus wrote:

A process is no less an illusion than a thing. For something to be a process you need past, present, and future. For a process you need something to change from one moment to the other. So, a "process tree" is as absurd as a "thing tree".

Relinquish said:

This process can ONLY be occurring if the necessary conditions are present.

Astus wrote:

Here the process is already used as a thing that is in relation with other things.

Relinquish said:

In this way, 'the tree' naturally includes the entirety of the rest of the universe within it's own existence, and so there is no REAL difference between 'the tree' and 'not the tree'.

Astus wrote:

That's saying that the child includes the entirety of its ancestors, however, a child is not the parents, so such a statement is nonsense.

Relinquish said:

Fundamentally, all the different processes are actually arbitrarily delineated, impermanent 'features' of the eternally cyclic Process of Being (the only Process that ever actually occurs in Reality, commonly known as the universe).

Astus wrote:

While a simple tree may be called conceptual, fabricating capitalised terms like "Process of Being" is only drawing legs on a painted snake.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 9th, 2017 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: Yunmen Wenyan

Content:

pokii said:

Yunmen is , was, will, be..one of the most important moments in chan/zen history...

Astus wrote:

How so?

pokii said:

Why are his words not used, explained, understood, and so on..

Astus wrote:

Shenxiu and Shenhui were verifiably important historical teachers, however, their teachings were abandoned and forgotten almost completely in a few hundred years.

"in the course of the future there will be monks who won't listen when discourses that are words of the Tathagata — deep, deep in their meaning, transcendent, connected with emptiness — are being recited. They won't lend ear, won't set their hearts on knowing them, won't regard these teachings as worth grasping or mastering. But they will listen when discourses that are literary works — the works of poets, elegant in sound, elegant in rhetoric, the work of outsiders, words of disciples — are recited. They will lend ear and set their hearts on knowing them. They will regard these teachings as worth grasping & mastering."

(<https://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn20/sn20.007.than.html>)

pokii said:

Would you please say, if you will, something about him, or anything you would about Yunmen?

Astus wrote:

If one examines this thoroughly, it's stone-dead.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 10th, 2017 at 8:23 PM

Title: Re: By way of welcome: Let's drink some tea!

Content:

Astus wrote:

Tea washes the mouth.

"Meditation was a labour, all night long, but
When you brewed tea, I felt infinitely glad.
Just one cup of tea, and the dark clouds were banished,
Feeling cool to my very bones, all worry vanished."
(Muuija: With Thanks for the Tea and an Answer to the Questions, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 9, p 90)

Tea washes the bowl.

"When one is hungry, and can eat, the rice is tastier,
Waking from sleep, and sipping tea, the tea is sweeter.
This place is poor, and since no one knocks at the door
In the empty hermitage, its a joy to be with Buddha in a niche."
(Wongam: Written at leisure, in CWKBv9, p 131)

Tea washes the brain.

"Everything is just as it is from the beginning, not created.
Why toil away to seek the truth from outside?
All you need is concentration, not arousing the mind.
If thirsty, boil tea, if you feel tired, go to bed."
(Preceptor Naong: Reply to Monk Bo's Request for a Verse, in CWKBv9, p 214)

The kettle can never be emptied.

"All his life, the novice should Brew tea for Master Zhaozhou.
When the mind is gone and the hair is white
What need is there to recite Nanzhou?"
(Cheongheodang: Seon Master Toun, in CWKBv9, p 320)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 14th, 2017 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: Dont follow a lineage (etc.), follow a teacher

Content:

Meido said:

It doesn't make sense to seek out lineages, methods, styles and so on, and certainly not to choose a teacher based on them. This is because the path is actualized within human relationship with a teacher with whom one shares affinity. One should therefore just seek one's shisho, the teacher (of any tradition) with whom one has deep affinity, and take that relationship as the foundation of one's path and the source of lineages, methods, and the rest. To seek a teacher based on those things rather than affinity is exactly backwards.

In Zen this ties into what is meant by "transmission outside the scriptures, not dependent on words and letters": the lifeblood of the path is realized within face to face human relationship, that is, within the ba ("field") of the teacher. It is also related to what is meant by "direct pointing at the mind" as the function of the teacher.

Astus wrote:

That sounds to be the very opposite of one of the four reliances: "Rely on the teaching rather than the person." (Nirvana Sutra, 4.3, BDK ed, p 193; http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T12n0374_006#0401b25, also Vimalakirti Sutra ch 13 http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T14n0475_003#0556b17), that Nagarjuna explains as "Relying on the truth in itself is keeping to the twelve categories of texts and not keeping to the authority of a person." (MPPS, ch 15, tr Lamotte-Chodron, p 425; http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T25n1509_009#0125a28). Mipham explains this point in the following manner: "No matter what kind of person a teacher is, he cannot purify or liberate you. If the teaching he gives is truly meaningful, it is proper to adhere to it. But if it is not meaningful, it is improper to adhere to it. Thus, one should not rely on the person but on the teaching." (Gateway to Knowledge, vol 3, p 123) Shengyan talked in a similar fashion: "If their views of the Dharma are correct, then even if their behavior reveals some weaknesses, they should not be considered false masters. On the other hand, if teachers do not have a correct view of the Dharma, they cannot be considered authentic or virtuous masters." (<http://ddc.shengyen.org/cgi-bin/ccdd/show.py?s=09-06p0027>)

In light of the above, why would the person be the most important in Zen?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 15th, 2017 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: Dont follow a lineage (etc.), follow a teacher

Content:

Malcolm said:

You apparently missed the word "qualified."

Astus wrote:

That word was not used in that post. Still, even if it goes without saying that only qualified teachers are meant, why focus on the individual rather than the message? For instance, what qualifies a teacher in PP8000 (tr Conze) is the teaching:

Subhuti: Who are those good friends of a Bodhisattva?

The Lord: The Buddhas and Lords, and also the irreversible Bodhisattvas who are skilful in the Bodhisattva-course, and who instruct and admonish him in the perfections, who demonstrate and expound the perfection of wisdom. The perfection of wisdom in particular should be regarded as a Bodhisattva's good friend. All the six perfections, in fact, are the good friends of a Bodhisattva. They are his Teacher, his path, his light, his torch, his illumination, his shelter, his refuge, his place of rest, his final relief, his island, his mother, his father, and they lead him to cognition, to understanding, to full enlightenment. For it is in these perfections that the perfection of wisdom is accomplished.

Similarly in the Lotus Sutra (ch 10, BDK ed, p 158):

"After my parinirvāṇa, if there are any sons and daughters of a virtuous family who expound even a single line of the Lotus Sutra in private to even a single person, they should be acknowledged as the ambassadors of the Tathāgata. They have been dispatched by the Tathāgata and carry out the Tathāgata's work. As for those who extensively teach among the common people, know that they are yet greater ambassadors."

And the Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment (ch 5, BDK ed, p 77):

"When they meet a good friend (kalyāṇamitra) and rely on the dharmic practice of the causal ground taught by him, there will be sudden and gradual [aspects] in their approach to practice. If they encounter the path of the true practice of the unsurpassed enlightenment (bodhi) of the Tathāgata, all will attain buddhahood regardless of whether their capacities are great or small. If sentient beings encounter someone with errant views in their quest for a good friend, they will never attain true enlightenment"

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 15th, 2017 at 1:38 AM

Title: Re: Dont follow a lineage (etc.), follow a teacher

Content:

DGA said:

Who has done this?

Astus wrote:

How do you read then Meido's words?

"In Zen this ties into what is meant by "transmission outside the scriptures, not dependent on words and letters": the lifeblood of the path is realized within face to face human relationship, that is, within the ba ("field") of the teacher. ... I'd have just told him to go elsewhere. The reason is that it means to me he is not seeking relationship with a teacher and community in order to actualize Zen."

DGA said:

The point is that you need a relationship with a living teacher to actualize the teachings, to realize them for yourself.

Astus wrote:

I think "need" is too much. Rather it is recommended.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 15th, 2017 at 1:55 AM

Title: Re: Dont follow a lineage (etc.), follow a teacher

Content:

Dan74 said:

I think the importance of the relationship with a qualified teacher is that

1. He/she can identify where a student is stuck and given the students karmic package, how best to deal with this 'stuckness' - which practice/teaching is appropriate
2. Can act as a mirror to the student in which he/she can see their own projections/clinging/aversion reflected back to them
3. Basically do all they can to motivate and inspire the student to persevere with practice including modelling and giving a taste of what it is like

Astus wrote:

According to the Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment one better avoid having expectations toward teachers:

"The Buddha preaches that in the gradual perfection of such a person, he should seek a good friend so as not to fall into errant views, but that if he produces likes and dislikes in regard to what he seeks, then he will not be able to enter the ocean of pure enlightenment."

(ch 9, p 96)

"If those good friends are close to them, they should cut off their pride. If those good friends are distant from them, they should cut off their anger. The occurrence of states of attraction and aversion is like empty space."

(ch 10, p 101)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 16th, 2017 at 2:21 AM

Title: Re: Anyone knows Vinitaruci or his zen practice?

Content:

Temicco said:

The early Thien tradition has a particularly bad track record as far as blatant fraud is concerned

Astus wrote:

Do you know any tradition with a good record?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 16th, 2017 at 2:21 AM

Title: Re: Dont follow a lineage (etc.), follow a teacher

Content:

Meido said:

Is this controversial?

Astus wrote:

No. Thank you for the clarification.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 22nd, 2017 at 5:41 AM

Title: Re: and because they are synonymous with Mind, they are sentient beings

Content:

Coëmgenu said:

how Ven Dōgen connects the dots from mental objects to sentient beings? What does "mind" and "sentient being" in this context mean without the intersection of 5 sense consciousnesses?

Astus wrote:

There are no mental objects outside the mind, and what has mind is a sentient being.

Look at some other translations:

The meaning of “all living beings,” as described now in Buddhism, is that all those that have mind are “living beings,” for minds are just “living beings.” Those without mind may also be “living beings,” for “living beings” are just mind. So minds all are “living beings,” and “living beings” all “have the buddha-nature.” Grass, trees, and national lands are mind itself; because they are mind, they are “living beings,” and because they are “living beings” they “have the buddha-nature.”

(tr Nishijima-Cross, SBGZ BDK ed, vol 2, p 21)

In “all living beings” spoken of here on the way of the buddha, those with minds are “all living beings”; for the mind is living beings. Those without minds are similarly living beings; for living beings are mind. Therefore, all minds are living beings, and living beings all “have the buddha nature.” The grasses, trees and lands are mind; because they are mind, they are living beings; because they are living beings, they “have the buddha nature.”

(tr Carl Bielefeldt in <http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/dharma/pdf/26eF.pdf>, p 19)

Then consider the followings:

"When stupid people hear talk of “mind here and now is buddha,” they interpret that ordinary beings’ intellect and sense perception, which have never established the bodhi-mind, are just buddha. ... “The mind that has been authentically transmitted” means one mind as all dharmas, and all dharmas as one mind.” ... “Mind as mountains, rivers, and the earth is nothing other than mountains, rivers, and the earth. There are no additional waves or surf, no wind or smoke. Mind as the sun, the moon, and the stars is nothing other than the sun, the moon, and the stars. There is no additional fog or mist. Mind as living-and-dying, coming-and-going, is nothing other than living-and-dying, coming-and-going. There is no additional delusion or realization. Mind as fences, walls, tiles, and pebbles is nothing other than fences, walls, tiles, and pebbles. There is no additional mud or water. Mind as the four elements and five aggregates is nothing other than the four elements and five aggregates. There is no additional horse or monkey. Mind as a chair or a whisk is nothing other than a chair or a whisk. There is no additional bamboo or wood. Because the state is like this, “mind here and now is buddha” is untainted “mind here and now is buddha.””

(Soku-shin-ze-butsu, SBGZ BDK ed, vol 1, p 65, 68, 69)

"Thus, the words now spoken by the Tathāgata, “The triple world is only the mind” are the whole realization of the whole Tathāgata, and his whole life is the whole of this one saying. The triple world is the whole world; we do not say that the triple world is the same thing as mind. The reason is that however brilliant in all aspects the triple world is, it is still the triple world." ... "We should clearly realize in practice that “the suitably transforming Dharma bodies of the buddhas” are all of “the triple world.” The triple world has “no outside,” in the same way, for example, as the Tathāgata has “no outside,” and in the same way as fences and walls have “no outside.” Just as the triple world has “no outside,” living beings have “no outside.””

(Sangai-yuishin, SBGZ BDK ed, vol 3, p 62, 64)

"The realization of the Buddhist patriarchs is perfectly realized real form. Real form is all dharmas. All dharmas are forms as they are, natures as they are, body as it is, the mind as it is, the world as it is, clouds and rain as they are, walking, standing, sitting, and lying down, as they are; sorrow and joy, movement and stillness, as they are; a staff and a whisk, as they are; a twirling flower and a smiling face, as they are; succession of the Dharma and affirmation, as they are; learning in practice and pursuing the truth, as they are; the constancy of pines and the integrity of bamboos, as they are."

(Shoho-jisso, SBGZ BDK ed, vol 3, p 62, 64)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 22nd, 2017 at 5:55 AM

Title: Re: and because they are synonymous with Mind, they are sentient beings

Content:

Coëmgenu said:

There are no mental object outside the mind, but are there no objects outside the mind?

Astus wrote:

An object is what is perceived, what is perceived is a mental object.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 22nd, 2017 at 3:17 PM

Title: Re: and because they are synonymous with Mind, they are sentient beings

Content:

Coëmgenu said:

So it's not that the rock has a separate mindstream, according to the Ven Dōgen quote, it's that the rock is in your head. Not sepearte after all

Astus wrote:

Dogen does not discuss things in that way. Look at his comment on the story quoted in Sangai-yuishi (SBGZ BDK ed, vol 3, p 66-67):

They never understand "the triple world is mind alone," they never negate understanding of "the triple world is mind alone," they never express "the triple world is mind alone," and they never negate expression of "the triple world is mind alone."

His point is simply to see without clinging to concepts. That's why insentient things are buddha-nature.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 22nd, 2017 at 3:25 PM

Title: Re: Wall Gazing

Content:

lovekuanyin said:

If you stare long enough, the mind turns into emptiness. ... it is important to continue practicing this everyday until all delusions are emptied.

Astus wrote:

Insight (vipasyana) is to recognise that all thoughts are empty as they are. Trying to make the mind empty is an endless endeavour. So, as Huineng said (Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 29):

"If you empty your minds and sit in quietude, this is to become attached to the emptiness of blankness." and

"there are deluded people who empty their minds and sit in quietude without thinking of anything whatsoever, claiming that this is great."

furthermore (ch 6, p 47):

"One must not become immersed in emptiness, protecting one's tranquility. One should study extensively and become learned [in the scriptures], recognizing one's own fundamental mind and attaining the various principles of Buddhism."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 22nd, 2017 at 3:49 PM

Title: Re: Dharma Wheel Heavy Weights

Content:

CedarTree said:

Tell us about your practice history, what were some big stand out things that you think happened or insights or things you learned or experienced and so forth that helped bring you to where you are now.

Astus wrote:

I can mention some generic titles, but I'm not at the point of working on my autobiography.

- Nanquan's cat & satipatthana
- Nothing is still something
- One mind and no mind
- This bamboo is long, that one is short
- The mind cannot be found
- Karma is thoughts

CedarTree said:

And where are you now? Meaning what are you doing, studying, practicing, and how do you see your life and practice as well as others and others practices

Astus wrote:

This week I began to read The Great Commentary by Vimalamitra.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 22nd, 2017 at 8:48 PM

Title: Re: and because they are synonymous with Mind, they are sentient beings

Content:

Coëmgenu said:

I think it's likely a translation issue.

Astus wrote:

It is true that there is no plural marker, however, there is the word "all" (一切 / みな) used in places to clarify that it is all beings.

いま佛道にいふ一切衆生は、有心者みな衆生なり、心是衆生なるがゆゑに。無心者おなじく衆生なるべし、衆生是心なるがゆゑに。しかあれば、心みなこれ衆生なり、衆生みなこれ有佛性なり。草木國土これ心なり、心なるがゆゑに衆生なり、衆生なるがゆゑに有佛性なり。

(<http://www.shomonji.or.jp/soroku/genzou03/index.html> / T2582_.82.0097c11-T2582_.82.0097c17)

It would also be a good idea to look into other works in the Shobogenzo where this concept of "insentient buddha-nature" is discussed.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 23rd, 2017 at 4:39 AM

Title: Re: and because they are synonymous with Mind, they are sentient beings

Content:

DGA said:

What is meant by mind in the passage quoted and ensuing discussion?

Astus wrote:

Seeing, hearing, sensing, thinking. The six consciousnesses.

DGA said:

How does it follow that all things have Buddha nature if one sees without clinging to concepts?

Astus wrote:

Buddha-nature is suchness. When there is no attachment to ideas, that is seeing things as they are.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 23rd, 2017 at 5:53 AM

Title: Re: Nothing further to seek...

Content:

Wayfarer said:

What troubles me about this is that only detachment, only letting go, is an end in itself. But what about that gives rise to bodhicitta? Where is the 'energy of compassion'?

Astus wrote:

Bodhicitta is the will to enlightenment, the aspiration to buddhahood, so it comes at the beginning, not at the end. The energy of compassion is what? Do you mean the effort to <https://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=320928#p320928>?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 23rd, 2017 at 3:30 PM

Title: Re: Nothing further to seek...

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I don't know what! I just know that it is.

Astus wrote:

As an extension to what Malcolm said, it is one of the main points of the buddha-nature teachings that through removing the defilements the buddha qualities appear. In other words, there is nothing else needed but getting rid of the afflictions.

"It is only this One Mind that is Buddha; there is no distinction between Buddhas and sentient beings. However, sentient beings are attached to characteristics and seek outside themselves. Seeking it, they lose it even more. Sending the Buddha in search of the Buddha, grasping the mind with the mind, they may exhaust themselves in striving for an entire eon but will never get it. They do not understand that if they cease their thoughts and end their thinking, the Buddha will automatically be present."

(Huangbo: Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 13; highlight added)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 23rd, 2017 at 11:30 PM

Title: Re: Vipasyana Meditation

Content:

Dharmasherab said:

I want to know about the Vipasyana meditation methods used in Mahayana as well as in Vajrayana (but not Theravada).

Astus wrote:

Zhiyi:

http://kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/ebm_book_page.htm

http://kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/sgs_book_page.htm

<http://www.uhpress.hawaii.edu/p-9843-9780824873776.aspx>

Madhyamaka:

<https://books.google.com/books?id=qylyQHr3AacC>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=y6HzxLUC7rQC>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=pbQDAAAACAAJ>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=vJVDCUcwirgC>

Mahamudra:

https://books.google.com/books?id=_C8qAwAAQBAJ

<https://books.google.com/books?id=Ty-Kp4co9-wC>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=lKd9CAAAQBAJ>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=rUjUBgAAQBAJ>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 24th, 2017 at 1:07 AM

Title: Re: Dharma Wheel Heavy Weights

Content:

CedarTree said:

Only one thing you mentioned was unclear to me and I would like you to explore it a bit.

"This bamboo is long, that one is short". I have an idea but I rather you show me your understanding and the origin of this teaching.

Astus wrote:

Master Yunmen quoted Dharma teacher [Seng] Zhao's words:

"All individual entities (dharma) are without difference — [yet] one must not stretch the duck's [legs] and shorten the crane's, level the peaks and fill up the valleys, and then think that they are not different!"

(Record of Yunmen, p 193, tr App)

"Within and without (the cosmos) is calm. Co-operation has ceased.

Thus, restoring the union, the Sage withdraws into silence.

Therefore a sutra says: 'Dharma do not differ (from each other)'. Does it tell us 'to stretch the legs of the duck and cut short those of the crane', to pull down the mountains and fill up the valleys in order to smooth out life? If only you can understand that the diverse is of the relative order then it loses its diversity. Therefore a Sutra says: 'Marvellous, World-honoured One, taking your stand in oneness you say that the dharma vary'. It also says: 'Prajna and the dharma are neither one nor two'. This we may believe."

(Chao Lun, ch 3, p 79, tr Liebenthal)

"He who holds to True Rightness does not lose the original form of his inborn nature. So for him, joined things are not webbed toes; things forking off are not superfluous fingers; the long is never too much; the short is never too little. 9 The duck's legs are short, but to stretch them out would worry him; the crane's legs are long, but to cut them down would make him sad. What is long by nature needs no cutting off; what is short by nature needs no stretching. That would be no way to get rid of worry."

(Zhuangzi, ch 8, p 61, tr Watson)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 24th, 2017 at 1:24 AM

Title: Re: Vipasyana Meditation

Content:

Dharmasherab said:

Seems very useful.

Astus wrote:

Here are some good classical works containing vipasyana instructions that are available online:

<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra13.html>

http://www.bdkamerica.org/system/files/pdf/dBET_T0614_SutraConcentration_2009_0.pdf

http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Translations/Awakening_of_faith.html

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 24th, 2017 at 4:33 AM

Title: Re: Vipasyana Meditation

Content:

Coëmgenu said:

Śāriputra asked, "The inconceivable samādhi cannot be attained?"

Mañjuśrī replied, "The conceivable samādhi has an appearance that can be captured while the inconceivable samādhi has no appearance to be captured. All sentient beings have attained the inconceivable samādhi. Why? Because all mental appearances are not the [true] mind. Therefore, the [mental] appearances of all sentient beings and the appearance of the inconceivable samādhi are the same, not different.”

It is the interpretation of the latter part that I am wondering on: "Because all mental appearances are not the [true] mind." I am wondering about "not" and "[true]" here.

Astus wrote:

舍利弗言：「不可思議定不可得耶？」

文殊師利言：「思議定者，是可得相；不可思議定者，不可得相。一切眾生實成就不思議定。何以故？一切心相即非心故，是名不思議定。是故一切眾生相及不思議三昧相，等無分別。」

(http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T08n0232_002#0729c08)

As the square brackets suggest, the word "true" was added by the translator, but it does not really belong there. The inconceivable samadhi cannot be attained (不可得), because it has no characteristics (相 - this is translated by Rulu as "appearance") that could be grasped (得 - attained, Rulu: captured). Sentient beings have the inconceivable samadhi, because they are empty, as was discussed in the first fascicle (T232p726b23-c19). Similarly, thoughts (心相 - Rulu: mental appearances) are mindless/inconceivable (非心 - acitta, acintya), in other words: empty.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 25th, 2017 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Astus wrote:

You need a teacher for what? If it is information, they are all found in books. If realisation, how can anyone make you realise anything?

As far as the Nikayas go, it is not a teacher (acariya) one needs, but good friendship (kalyanamittata).

"And what is good friendship? Here, in whatever village or town a clansman lives, he associates with householders or their sons—whether young but of mature virtue, or old and of mature virtue—who are accomplished in faith, virtuous behavior, generosity, and wisdom; he converses with them and engages in discussions with them. Insofar as they are accomplished in faith, he emulates them with respect to their accomplishment in faith; insofar as they are accomplished in virtuous behavior, he emulates them with respect to their accomplishment in virtuous behavior; insofar as they are accomplished in generosity, he emulates them with respect to their accomplishment in generosity; insofar as they are accomplished in wisdom, he emulates them with respect to their accomplishment in wisdom. This is called good friendship."

(AN 8.54, tr Bhikkhu Bodhi,

<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an08/an08.054.nara.html#friendship>; see also:

https://accesstoinight.org/lib/authors/bodhi/bps-essay_26.html)

As for the Mahayana:

"Bodhisattvas on the beginning level, intent on practising prajna
To seek unsurpassed bodhi, get close to good and wise friends.
How to obtain great wisdom and merit? Should be from prajnaparamita.
That is how all buddhadharma and merit are attained from good friends."
(Ratnagunasamcayagatha 15.1-2, tr from http://21dzk.l.u-tokyo.ac.jp/SAT2012/T0229_,08,0680a28.html)

"The mind not being intimidated and such,
Those who teach the lack of nature and so on,
And abandoning the antagonistic factors of these Means being mentored in every way."
(Abhisamayalamkara 1.36, tr Brunnhölzl)

Both the Astasahasrika (PP8K) and the AA commentaries explain that the good friend is the one who teaches prajnaparamita, in particular that all appearances are empty, while the bad friends are those who teach hinayana. See: PP8K 1.2, 15.1, 22.1, 30.1; and Gone Beyond, vol 1, p 282-283; Groundless Paths, p 123-124, 422.

The Diamond Sutra gives the following summary of who teaches what:

"The dharmas spoken by the Tathagata cannot be grasped and cannot be spoken. They are neither dharmas nor no dharmas. And why? Unconditioned dharmas distinguish worthy sages."

and

"all Buddhas and all Buddhas' Dharma of Anuttarasamyaksambodhi come forth from this Sutra. Subhuti, the Buddhadharmas spoken are no Buddhadharmas."
(ch 7 and 8, in www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/prajparagen2.pdf, p 102, 106)

Huineng explains that like this:

"Good friends, if you wish to enter into the profound dharmadhatu and the samadhi of prajna, you must cultivate the practice of prajna and recite the Diamond Sutra. Thus will you attain seeing the nature. You should realize that the merits of this sutra are immeasurable and unlimited. They are clearly praised within the sutra; I cannot explain them fully here. This teaching is the Supreme Vehicle: it is preached for those of great wisdom, it is preached for those of superior capacities. Those of small capacities and small wisdom who hear it will generate doubt."
(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 31)

He also says,

"You should each contemplate your minds and each see the fundamental nature. If you do not become enlightened by yourself, then you must seek a great spiritual compatriot, someone who understands the Dharma of the Supreme Vehicle, to indicate directly the correct path for you. This spiritual compatriot will have a great background and will, so to speak, lead you to the attainment of seeing the nature. This is because the spiritual compatriot is able to manifest the causes of all the good dharmas. All the buddhas of the three periods of time and the twelve divisions of the canon are fundamentally and naturally immanent within the natures of people, but if you cannot become enlightened yourself, you must seek a spiritual compatriot's instructions in order to see [the nature]. If you can become enlightened yourself, don't rely on external seeking — don't think I'm saying you can only attain emancipation through [the help of] a spiritual compatriot other than yourself. This is not the case! Why? Within your own minds there is a spiritual compatriot [who will help you] become enlightened by yourself! If you activate the false and deluded, you will become all mixed up with false thoughts. Although some external spiritual compatriots may be teachers, they cannot save you. If you activate the correct and true and contemplate with prajna, in a single instant [all your] false thoughts will be completely eradicated. If you recognize the self-nature, with a single [experience of] enlightenment you will attain the stage of buddhahood."

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 33)

There are people who believe that a teacher is needed to point to the nature of mind and transmit the Dharma. However, the nature of mind cannot be shown, nor is there a Dharma that could be transmitted.

"In my view there is no Buddha, no sentient beings, no past, no present. Anything attained was already attained—no time is needed. There is nothing to practice, nothing to realize, nothing to gain, nothing to lose. Throughout all time there is no other dharma than this. 'If one claims there's a dharma surpassing this, I say that it's like a dream, like a phantasm.' This is all I have to teach."

(Record of Linji, p 12-13, tr Sasaki)

What do teachers give then?

Yaoshan hadn't been to the lecture hall for a long time.

The temple supervisor said, "We've all been looking forward to your giving us a lecture."

Yaoshan said, "Ring the bell."

As soon as the monks had gathered for the lecture, Yaoshan got up from his seat and went back to the abbot's quarters. The supervisor followed and asked why he didn't say anything, since he had agreed to speak to the monks.

Yaoshan said, "They have teachers to teach them sutras and they have teachers to teach Abidhamma, so what is there left for me to do?"

(Record of Yaoshan, in Soto Zen Ancestors in China, p 63)

So Yunmen made it clear:

Having entered the Dharma Hall for a formal instruction, the Master said:

"All of you who come and go for no reason: What are you looking for in [this monastery] here? I only know how to eat and drink and shit. What else would I be good for?"

"You're making pilgrimages all over the place, studying Chan and asking about the Dao."

Let me ask you: What have you managed to learn in all those places? Try presenting that!"

Again, he said: "In the meantime, you cheat the Master in your own house. Is that all right? When you manage to find a little slime on my ass, you lick it off, take it to be your own self, and say: 'I understand Chan, I understand the Dao!' Even if you manage to read the whole Buddhist canon— so what?!"

(Record of Yunmen, p 154, tr App)

And Huanglong explained further:

Huanglong addressed the monks, saying, "Before I came up here to speak there was nothing in my mind. But now that I've come up here there are a lot of questions. I dare to ask you whether the great vehicle of our school is found in such questions and answers. If it were to be found in such speech, then doesn't the scriptural canon have questions and answers? Yet it is said that [the way of Zen] is transmitted outside of the scriptural teachings. It is transmitted to individuals who are great Dharma vessels. If it can't be found in words, then even if you ask all sorts of excellent questions, what, after all, is the point of doing so? ... If you want to talk about it, then you can say that it can't be realized through mystical perception or self-perfection. Nor may it be said to be a result of some all-encompassing understanding. The buddhas of the three worlds have only said you must know yourself. In the entire canon of scripture this can't be explained. ... Those who leave home must have heroic resolve, cut off the two heads, and practice in seclusion in the house of the self. Afterward they must throw open the door, get rid of the possessions of that self, and then receive and meet whatever comes, giving aid to any in need. In this way the deep compassion of Buddha can be in some small measure repaid. Aside from acting in this manner, there is nothing else."

Huanglong then struck the meditation platform with his whisk and left the hall.

(Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 403-404)

The story of Dongshan is a good example:

Once, when Yün-yen was making some straw sandals, Tung-shan approached him and said, "I would like to have the Master's eyes."

Yün-yen said, "Where have yours gone?"

"Liang-chieh has never had them," replied Tung-shan.

Yün-yen said, "Supposing you did have them, where would you put them?"

Tung-shan said nothing. Yün-yen said, "Isn't it the eye that desires eyes?"

"It is not my eye," replied Tung-shan.

"Get out!" thundered Yün-yen.

(Record of Dongshan, p 26-27, tr Powell)

And later when asked about Yunyan:

Because the Master was conducting a memorial feast for Yün-yen, a monk asked, "What teaching did you receive while you were at Yün-yen's place?"

The Master said, "Although I was there, I didn't receive any teaching."

"Since you didn't actually receive any teaching, why are you conducting this memorial?"

asked the monk.

"Why should I turn my back on him?" replied the Master.

"If you began by meeting Nan-ch'üan, why do you now conduct a memorial feast for Yün-yen?" asked the monk.

"It is not my former master's virtue or Buddha Dharma that I esteem, only that he did not make exhaustive explanations for me," replied the Master.

(p 28)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 25th, 2017 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Malcolm said:

One cannot get Dharma from black marks on white paper.

Astus wrote:

I think a good number of sutras disagree with that.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 25th, 2017 at 11:21 PM

Title: Re: Vipasyana Meditation

Content:

Anonymous X said:

And, why does no one here refer to the Mahasatipattana Sutta for instruction in Vipassana practice?

Astus wrote:

Because it's not a Mahayana scripture.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 25th, 2017 at 11:21 PM

Title: Re: Wall Gazing

Content:

Anonymous X said:

Vipassana, via wise reflection, seems to be much more than this. Not only are thoughts empty, not self, all experience is seen to be dependently originated, unstable, and unsatisfying. This manifests the 4 Noble Truths in its entirety, I think.

Astus wrote:

Dharmas are merely thought products. Hence seeing the emptiness of thoughts is seeing the emptiness of everything.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 26th, 2017 at 2:18 AM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Malcolm said:

No they don't.

Astus wrote:

"Those who grasp at emptiness slander the Sutras by maintaining that written words have no use. Since they maintain they have no need of written words, they should not speak either, because written words are merely the marks of spoken language. They also maintain that the direct way cannot be established by written words, and yet these two words, 'not established' are themselves written."

(http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Translations/PlatformSutra_DharmaJewel.pdf, ch 10,, p 383-384, tr BTTS)

"Wherever this sutra is taught, read, recited, copied, or wherever it is to be found, one should build a seven-jeweled stupa of great height and width and richly ornamented. There is no need to put a relic inside. Why is this? Because the Tathāgata is already in it."

...

"The bodhisattvas are exactly like this. If they have not yet heard, understood, or been able to practice this Lotus Sutra, they should be known as people who are still far away from highest, complete enlightenment. If they hear, understand, contemplate, and are able to practice it, they realize that they are certainly nearing highest, complete enlightenment. Why is this? Because the highest, complete enlightenment of all the bodhisattvas is within this sutra. This sutra opens the gate of skillful means and reveals the marks of the truth."

(Lotus Sutra, ch 10, BDK ed, p 161, 162)

Mañjuśrī said: "In the ocean I always expounded only the Lotus Sutra."

Then Prajñākūṭa questioned Mañjuśrī, saying: "This sutra is profound and subtle. It is a jewel among sutras and rare in the world. If sentient beings diligently strive to practice this sutra, will they immediately become buddhas or not?"

Mañjuśrī answered: "Yes, they will."

(ch 12, p 183)

"if there are sentient beings who hear this sutra and who devoutly understand, accept and maintain, and read and recite it, they will definitely attain this Dharma, and will not doubt it. How much more so if they cultivate according to its explanation!"

...

"This sutra extensively explains the inconceivable anuttarā samyaksaṃbodhi of the buddhas of the past, present, and future. Therefore, heavenly emperor, if good men and women accept and maintain, read and recite, and make offerings to this sutra, that is tantamount to making offerings to the buddhas of the past, present, and future."

(Vimalakīrti Sutra, ch 13, BDK ed, p 171-172)

"Sutras of this type should, during the final period after my nirvana, be circulated extensively throughout Jambudvīpa by you and others with your numinous power, so [the Dharma] is not cut off."

...

"If in the future there are good men and women who seek the Mahayana, I will make certain that they get hold of such sutras. Using their power of mindfulness, I will cause them to receive and maintain, read and recite, and extensively explain them for others. "World-honored One, if in the latter age there are those able to receive, maintain, read, recite, and explain them for others, one should understand that these will all be established by Maitreya's numinous power."

(ch 14, p 177, 178)

"Those who study this scripture will gain an opening into the true dharma, becoming excellent physicians themselves. You should understand, however, that those who never study it will be blind, lacking eyes of wisdom, their sight clouded by ignorance." (Nirvana Sutra, ch 3, BDK ed, p 105)

"To his disciples the Tathagata teaches in succession the ninefold canon of scriptures so that they may become thoroughly familiar with that dharma. It is only after this that he teaches the hidden treasury that is the tathāgatagarbha, expounding the Tathagata's permanence for his disciples. The Tathagata expounds the Mahayana scripture, the Great Nirvana Sutra in this way for those who have already made their resolution for awakening as well as for those who have not, thereby creating a karmic cause for bodhi in both, with exception of the icchantikas. Thus, good man, this Mahayana scripture, the Great Nirvana Sutra, is immeasurably, innumerably, and inconceivably rare. You should understand it to be the most skilled of all skilled physicians, foremost and superior, the king among sutras."

(p 294)

"If one hears this sutra or retains even one four-line verse of it, that person will then access the stage of the Buddha's knowledge; one will be able to proselyte sentient beings with appropriate expedients and become the great spiritual mentor (kalyanamitra) of all living things."

(Vajrasamādhi Sutra, ch 1, p 58, tr Buswell)

"If there is a sentient being who keeps this sutra, then in all other sutras he will have nothing more to seek. The dharma of this scripture encodes all dharmas and includes the essentials of all sutras. It is the unifying thread of the dharmas of all these sutras." (p 302)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 26th, 2017 at 7:45 AM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Malcolm said:

Your citations do not support your point.

Astus wrote:

Hearing is mentioned, yes, next to reading, although the premise in the text is that all sutras were verbally given by Shakyamuni, so even referring to any textual format is contradictory. At the same time, all the sutras exist as scriptures, in written form, and not as memorised speeches, hence the very fact of being able to quote them here supports my point.

Also, hearing doesn't necessarily mean hearing from another. Here is how Asanga/Maitreya describes studying the scriptures:

"The teaching as objective is discovered by the three wisdoms, (born of) learning, (reflection, and meditation, respectively,) when one with faith focuses on its stated meaning (learned) through mental verbalization, when one recognizes the fact that its objective appearance is because of mental verbalization, and when one fixes the mind itself (exclusively) upon the nominal (life systems). And this discovery of the threefold objective is based upon the previously mentioned (three baskets of the teaching)." (Mahayanasutralamkara 11.6-7, p 116-117; ed Thurman)

Mental verbalisation makes it inner hearing, and that is learning. But look at the words of https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Yongming_Yanshou, from the first fascicle of his major work, the Zongjing Lu:

"I now cite the words of the original teacher [Śākyamuni] to train and instruct disciples, encouraging their practice by having them follow his statements; to know the implicit truth [zhong] through reading the Dharma, and not rush around searching for it elsewhere; to personally realize the Buddha's intention." (Albert Welter: Yongming Yanshou's Conception of Chan in the Zongjing Lu, p 249)

"beginners commencing their studies, at a point prior to initiating self-reflection themselves, deny the correct implicit truth [zhengzhong] of the sage's teaching [i.e., the scriptures], what practices will they rely on for their progress? Even if they do not conceive erroneous views themselves, they will still encounter heterodox teachers wherever they go. As a result, I look to the original truth [i.e., the scriptures], because what [other] teachers convey is erroneous." (p 257)

"if one wants to investigate the Buddha-vehicle, one will read extensively from the treasure storehouse [i.e., Buddhist scriptures]. Each and every [scripture] forces one to understand the truth about one's own self; utterance after utterance causes one to mysteriously unite with true mind. One simply should not grasp onto written texts as the highest meaning, forming [artificial] views according to the words. One should directly seek out the message written down in the corpus of Buddhist scriptures, tacitly uniting with the truth that is inherently implicit [benzhong]. At that point, the wisdom that does not depend on any teacher reveals itself, and the way of heavenly truth is no longer obscure.

...

On account of this, realize that the teaching has the power to assist one on the Way [to awakening]. Those beginning their study of Buddhism should never forget this, even for an instant. I know very clearly that the benefits of Buddhist teaching are immeasurable. That is why I sought out [the sources of Buddhist teaching] and collected them here."

(p258)

Yongming's words agree with what Asanga wrote:

"If one has not yet awakened to suchness in wisdom in regard to conscious construction-only, then how can he infer this understanding? He can do so by reflecting upon the scriptures and by true reasoning."
(Great Vehicle Summary, ch 2, BDK ed, p 39)

Malcolm said:

Without hearing the Dharma from a qualified teacher, one will not understand what one is reading.

Astus wrote:

Unless you mean someone explaining the contents, what difference is there between listening to somebody reading the words aloud, and just reading them for oneself?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 26th, 2017 at 6:38 PM

Title: Re: Syncretism between different schools/sects of Buddhism

Content:

Dharmasherab said:

As a prospect for the future, the same principles behind the formation of Buddhist syncretic movements like Fo Guang Shan and Rime movement could be used on a larger scale to help mutual understanding and corporation between Mahayana and Theravada.

Astus wrote:

I think FGS and Rime are fairly different. FGS is an actual organisation, while Rime is more a philosophy. The philosophy upheld in FGS is the Humanistic Buddhism of Yinshun, and that itself is not particularly syncretic. There is a still existing misunderstanding about Chinese Buddhism that there were/are distinct schools like in Japan, while it's actually more like various fields of study that people can pursue within the framework of a shared monastic institution.

Among the challenges in establishing Buddhism in a new place, one of the bigger ones is consolidating the monastic system within a society. However, renouncing the worldly life doesn't look like a major concern on this forum for instance.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 26th, 2017 at 7:07 PM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Isn't instruction by the guru fundamental in Vajrayana? The guru embodies the dharma, and unless the student has a relationship with the guru, then their own obstructions will always undo whatever effort they try to make.

Astus wrote:

Empowerment is fundamental. After that it is for the individual to put in the necessary effort.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 27th, 2017 at 2:10 AM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

conebeckham said:

you cannot take refuge or any sort of personal liberation vows from a book, not to mention bodhisattva vows, in any extant lineage, from a book either

Astus wrote:

"As far as receiving the lay precepts is concerned, you can visit this temple if you have the means and the capacity to do so. Otherwise, why get so fixated on travel? All you need is to have an earnest, sincere mind, repent your transgressions before your home altar for seven consecutive days and express the wish to receive the precepts by yourself. ...

The most important thing is to do so in an utterly sincere frame of mind – in which case, the benefits and virtues of receiving the precepts are the same whether you do so by yourself or through a monk or nun.

You should not think that receiving the precepts in such a manner is not in accord with the Dharma. You should know that the method described above follows the wise teaching of Sakyamuni Buddha in the Brahma Net Sutra."

(Pure-Land Zen, Zen Pure-Land: Letters from Patriarch Yin Kuang, p 43-44)

Brahma's Net Sutra:

"If, my disciples, after my passing, you want with a sincere mind to receive the bodhisattva precepts, you should take the vows on your own in front of a buddha or bodhisattva."

Taehyeon's Commentary:

"Carrying out the reception of precepts on one's own is done as is explained in roll 41 of the Bodhisattvabhūmi-śāstra. As for "[No teacher] within a thousand li": If you receive the precepts on your own like this, won't your merit will be weak? No. Because even if there is a lack of present conditions, your mind is intense. As it says in roll 53 of the Yogācārabhūmiśāstra: "Whether receiving the precepts on your own or receiving them from someone else, if your sincerity in maintaining them is equal, there is no difference in merit.""

(Exposition of the Sutra of Brahma's Net, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 11, p 360, 362)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 27th, 2017 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Malcolm said:

The main point however is that one cannot receive the Dharma by reading books. One must hear the Dharma from living teachers.

Astus wrote:

"Of course if you have someone to teach the texts to you, that is best. But even if you do not, you should read them and rely upon them as the guru of the dictates of the sugatas. By studying these texts you will actually learn things that will help your experience of meditation, chiefly by comparing what you have experienced to what is described in the text.

...

If you read these texts with the motivation that you are doing so in order to help your practical experience of meditation, then you will discover a great deal in them that will be helpful in just that way. You will come across something that will reveal a point that you have been unable to understand or unable to apply, and you will all of a sudden be certain saying, "Ah, this is how it is!" That is actually receiving the pointing out from the guru who is the dictates of the Sugatas.

Great masters of the past said that dharma texts are "the teacher who never gets mad at you," [laughter] because your relationship with the book is entirely up to you. For example, if you do not understand something and you read it again and again and again, unlike a teacher who might get upset at being asked the same question a hundred times, the book will never get angry at you for reading the same passage again for a hundred times. If while studying the texts you all of a sudden run out of time and have to put the book away abruptly and quickly, the book will never get angry at you for closing it. In that way, this guru who is the dictates of the Sugatas is very convenient to study with and very beneficial to your experience and realization."

(Khenchen Thrangu Rinpoche: Pointing Out the Dharmakaya, p 157, 158)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 27th, 2017 at 5:44 AM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Malcolm said:

As for the rest of his statement, he is merely being kind. But it is not to be taken very seriously.

Astus wrote:

He discusses the "dictates of the Sugatas" at an earlier section, in the context of the four types of guru as a prerequisite for mahamudra.

"In short, the basic instructions of meditation cannot be gained simply through reading books, or [by figuring it out by oneself, or from unqualified teachers without authentic lineage.]

However, while relying upon the root guru, the personal guru who holds the lineage, one comes also to rely upon the second guru, which is the dictates of the Sugatas, or the teachings of the Buddha [and other realized beings]. While one bases one's practice upon the oral instructions of one's root guru, one augments this by studying the teachings of the Buddha, the commentaries on his teachings by the great mahasiddhas, and the texts of instruction of the lineage of practice and accomplishment. Through augmenting the oral instructions of one's guru in this way, one clarifies and reinforces them by relying upon the written teachings of other Buddhas and bodhisattvas. It is therefore important to actively pursue the study of dharma texts."

(p 25-26)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 27th, 2017 at 6:44 AM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Malcolm said:

As I said, you cannot learn the Dharma from books. You need a teacher.

Astus wrote:

If it is as you say, what is the role of all the scriptures, treatises, etc.?

Here's what Ven. Shengyan said:

"First, by reading the scriptures we can realize mind, or "illuminate the mind." When we engage in sutra recitation, we make use of the sutra as a mirror to reflect back the reciting mind. This mind, prior to practice, is full of darkness and ignorance. We take the sutra as a mirror by which we can model our behavior, until our minds fuse with the sutra, and we directly realize the nature of our minds.

Second, sutra recitation helps us to understand the meaning behind the sutras. Many recitations help clarify the meaning. When I was a novice, I asked my master the meaning behind the scriptures, and all he said was, "Just keep reading, and you'll understand." Now I realize that complete familiarity with the sutras will naturally elicit the meaning behind them.

I tell this to my disciples in Taiwan, but my monks and nuns refuse to understand. They ask, "Why don't you explain the sutra first? Then it will be easier to read and memorize."

Third, sutra recitation can be samadhi or one-pointed concentration practice. I teach my disciples to use their ears to listen while they follow the chanting and not think about the meaning. Use the mind to be fully aware of hearing as well as of one's own recitation."

(<http://chancenter.org/cmc/1996/05/26/reading-sutras-as-a-spiritual-practice/>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 27th, 2017 at 7:26 PM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Malcolm said:

I already explained this to you.

Astus wrote:

Could you point to the post in this thread about it? I could not find it.

Malcolm said:

Reading is part of reflecting on the Dharma, the second wisdom. All those texts you mention, however, are meant to be heard first.

Astus wrote:

That looks like a concept that exists only in the Tibetan tradition. So, for instance, if anyone wanted to study the Golden Light Sutra, they could go to <https://fpmt.org/education/teachings/sutras/golden-light-sutra/> and then they "must listen to the entire sutra in order to receive the full transmission from Lama Zopa Rinpoche." Then, once hours of Tibetan chanting has been heard, they can go and read the text in English.

Is there any reason for this system?

Does it also work in Chinese? Just because one can listen to not only two hours of the <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=pOFIjdLI-M0>, but also 8 hours of the https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=a7iF_lU1gJI, 9.5 hours of the <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=erYePBILVP4>, and 50+ hours of the 80 fascicle <https://www.youtube.com/playlist?list=PLpJd3xvoJYHdZ3T1oJuwBVuexAr7u7TcB>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 28th, 2017 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

conebeckham said:

Find me a Buddha who reached nirvana without a teacher.

Astus wrote:

Being a buddha - aside from Vajrayana perhaps - means awakening on one's own, without a teacher, hence one of the names of buddhahood is wisdom without a teacher (無師智), also called self-made wisdom (自然智).

Shakyamuni told this to Upaka, the first person to meet after his enlightenment: "All-abandoning, released in the ending of craving: having fully known on my own, to whom should I point as my teacher? I have no teacher, and one like me can't be found." (<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.026.than.html>). And there is also this contemplation of the Buddha in another sutta: "in this world with its devas, Maras, & Brahmas, in this generation with its brahmins and contemplatives, its royalty and common-folk, I do not see another brahmin or contemplative more consummate in virtue than I, on whom I could dwell in dependence, honoring and respecting him" (<https://accessinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn06/sn06.002.than.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 28th, 2017 at 4:34 AM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Losal Samten said:

Without empowerment in Akanishta Gandavyuha from the buddhas, a bodhisattva can never pass beyond the 10th bhumi.

Astus wrote:

Bodhisattvas learn from countless buddhas. But who was the teacher of Siddhartha Gautama?

"Which teacher did you apply to for teaching?"

[The Tathāgata] answered, "I have no teacher nor any teaching. I am unsurpassed. I have my own insight into the very profound Law. I have obtained what others could not obtain."

(Buddhacarita 15.5-6, BDK ed, p 107)

"Venerable Gautama, with whom did you practice religion?"

Monks, the Thus-gone One replied to the Ājīvika with this verse:

"I do not have any teacher;

There is no one like me.

I alone am the perfect Buddha,

Cool and without any flaws."

(<http://read.84000.co/#UT22084-046-001/chapter%2026.10-11>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 28th, 2017 at 4:54 AM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Astus wrote:

also called self-made wisdom (自然智).

Admin_PC said:

Interesting, because that's not the only way to use that term. 自然 (Cn = "ziran", Jp = "jinen") is used (esp by Shinran) for "naturalness" or "spontaneous" - not anything "self-made". It's defined

<https://books.google.com/books?id=hQ6lGvyMZMMC&pg=PA3&lpg=PA3&dq=%E8%87%AA%E7%84%B6+one%27s+own+nature&source=bl&ots=TXWlR->

Kx0Z&sig=HqhZBR_DF2zfJv-jHnFJbsWfOGY&hl=en&sa=X&ved=0ahUKEwir36igsN_XAhWL6YMKHUuVARkQ6AEIOjA
E#v=onepage&q=%E8%87%AA%E7%84%B6%20one%27s%20own%20nature&f=false:
ziran is doing what comes naturally, out of one's own nature.
So in that sense, it could either be thought of in the sense of "spontaneous wisdom" or "wisdom of one's own nature".

Astus wrote:

Ziran 自然 as spontaneity or naturalness is a non-Buddhist/Daoist interpretation. In Buddhism it is a translation for svayambhū and 自然智 is svayambhū-jñāna. The two terms (無師智, 自然智) are combined in the http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T12n0374_018#0468a12 as 無師自悟 - teacherless self-enlightenment.

Zongmi criticised spontaneity (自然) in his Inquiry into the Origin of Humanity (tr Peter N.
Gregory; http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T45n1886_001#0708b09):

"Again, their claim that the myriad things are all spontaneously engendered and transformed and that it is not a matter of causes and conditions means that everything should be engendered and transformed [even] where there are no causes and conditions. That is to say, stones might engender grass, grass might engender humans, humans engender beasts, and so forth. Further, since they might engender without regard to temporal sequence and arise without regard to due season, the immortal would not depend on an elixir, the great peace would not depend on the sage and the virtuous, and benevolence and righteousness would not depend on learning and practice. For what use, then, did Lao- tzu, Chuang- tzu, the Duke of Chou, and Confucius establish their teachings as invariable norms?"

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 28th, 2017 at 5:00 AM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Malcolm said:

All kinds of buddhas.

Astus wrote:

I specifically asked Siddhartha, as within the context of that life.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 28th, 2017 at 6:00 AM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Malcolm said:

The question is inapplicable to nirmanakāyas.

Astus wrote:

How so? The whole life of a nirmanakaya is for the education of beings. So it is not some accident that Siddhartha had no teacher, that one of the primary characteristics of a buddha is that it is he who turns the wheel of Dharma in a time when there is no Dharma.

“The Tathagata, bhikkhus, the Arahant, the Perfectly Enlightened One, is the originator of the path unarisen before, the producer of the path unproduced before, the declarer of the path undeclared before. He is the knower of the path, the discoverer of the path, the one skilled in the path. And his disciples now dwell following that path and become possessed of it afterwards.

“This, bhikkhus, is the distinction, the disparity, the difference between the Tathagata, the Arahant, the Perfectly Enlightened One, and a bhikkhu liberated by wisdom.”
(SN 22.58, tr Bhikkhu Bodhi, p 901)

"the Buddha is omniscient, independent, without a teacher; he preaches the Dharma without having heard it from another."

...

"The Buddha, who is omniscient (sarvajñā), independent and without a teacher, cannot say: "Thus have I heard." If the Buddha said: "Thus have I heard", the objection could be made that the Buddha did not know the thing [before having heard it]."

(Nagarjuna: MPPS, vol 1, ch 3, tr Lamotte-Chodron, p 82, 87)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 28th, 2017 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Malcolm said:

It is inapplicable because while the Buddha demonstrated the play of attaining buddhahood, in fact he did not attain buddhahood in that lifetime.

Astus wrote:

And the demonstration had a purpose, didn't it?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 28th, 2017 at 6:47 AM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Malcolm said:

However, the Buddha taught it was necessary to rely on a teacher.

Astus wrote:

Necessary/needed and beneficial/recommended are not the same.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 28th, 2017 at 7:26 PM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Admin_PC said:

I'm not exactly sure what Yongmi's on about, but I seriously don't see how "self-made wisdom" even fits here. That would mean it was something fabricated.

Astus wrote:

The problem Zongmi highlights is the assumption that there is such a thing as causeless becoming. The Ratnagotravibhaga explains this buddha quality in this way:

"Being realized by oneself.

It is cognizable without any help of others;"

(RGV 1.7ab, tr Takasaki, p 156)

And the commentary (p 157):

"Thus, not having heard the Buddhahood, which is a quite marvellous and unthinkable sphere, from somebody else, but having perfectly cognized its unutterable nature 'by one self', i.e. by means of self-born knowledge which needs no teacher"

Jamgon Kongtrul's commentary (Buddha Nature, p 104):

"Since it must be realized by means of self-sprung primordial wisdom being self-aware, it is not a realization due to outer conditions such as other people's utterances and so on."

So the reason I translated it as "self-made" (cf. "self-generated" in Lotus Sutra, ch 3, BDK ed, p 61) is because it refers to a buddha attaining it on his own, not because it just appears for no reason at all, since if that were the case, buddhahood would be a random event.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 28th, 2017 at 7:35 PM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Malcolm said:

Necessary, not just beneficial.

Astus wrote:

The quotes you provided talked of the benefits and recommended having a good friend. Do you perhaps have some sources stating it as a necessity?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 28th, 2017 at 11:42 PM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Admin_PC said:

At the same time, one of the listed synonyms is 無功用智.

...

So I imagine the full nuance is somewhere between cause-less & gained directly through one's own struggle. Wisdom that manifests naturally through the ripening of original vows & practices - with no direct, intentional exertion.

Astus wrote:

The definition in RGV (tr Takasaki, p 157) is: " It is free from efforts [anābhoga / 自然] because all dualistic views [prapañca / 戲論] and false discriminations [vikalpa / 虛妄分別] have ceased to exist [upaśānta / 寂靜]." And it is also used in the context of buddha activity: "Thus, as being Tathāgata, though it is immutable and of the characteristic of non-activity, the whole action of the Perfectly Enlightened One proceeds without any effort, ceaselessly and uninterruptedly as far as the world exists."

So, the sense of manifesting naturally because of past efforts applies to the second part, however, even there the absence of discrimination is a key factor.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 29th, 2017 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Malcolm said:

The quotes I provided are imperatives.

Astus wrote:

Imperatives are what one should do, it is the recommended way. A necessity, a need, is somewhat stronger and more restrictive.

"If one should find a judicious companion,
a fellow wanderer, of good behavior, resolute, having overcome all obstacles, one should live with him, satisfied and mindful.

But if one does not find a judicious companion,
a fellow wanderer, of good behavior, resolute,
like a king who has abandoned a conquered realm,
one should live alone like a rhinoceros horn.

Surely, we praised the excellence of companionship:
one should resort to companions one's equal or better.
Not obtaining these, as one who eats blamelessly

one should live alone like a rhinoceros horn."
(Snp 1.3, tr Bhikkhu Bodhi, p 163)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 29th, 2017 at 3:25 AM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Malcolm said:

This is talking about associates, not teachers. It is therefore irrelevant.

Astus wrote:

The word translated as companion (sahāya) is a synonym for friend (mitta), as it's shown clearly in the same poem a few stanzas later where the "evil companion" (pāpaṃ sahāyaṃ) is opposed to the "eminent friend" (mittaṃ uḷāraṃ). There are also the Sigalovada Sutta (DN i.186) and the Meghiya Sutta (AN 9.3 / iv.357) where the two words are exchangeable.

"One should avoid an evil companion, who shows what is harmful, one settled in unrighteousness.
One should not freely associate with one who is intent and heedless;
one should live alone like a rhinoceros horn.

One should resort to the learned, a bearer of Dhamma, an eminent friend gifted with ingenuity.
Having known the benefits and removed doubt,
one should live alone like a rhinoceros horn."
(Snp 1.3, tr Bhikkhu Bodhi, p 164-165)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 29th, 2017 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, so what? You are still citing passages about what kind of associates one should have. Thus, they are entirely besides the point.

Astus wrote:

They are about the good friend one should have, or as you translated, the virtuous mentor, what is often simplified to the word teacher. Furthermore, the point that is still left unaddressed is that a recommendation is not a requirement.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 29th, 2017 at 9:23 PM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Malcolm said:

The Nirvana Sūtra states:

Son of a good family, all sentient beings are just the same — without serving a virtuous mentor, they will not perceive the nature of the Buddha.

And:

Those who do not know how to serve the virtuous mentor will not know the very secret tathāgatgarbha.

And:

One who does not rely on a virtuous mentor is a person who has not entered into the teaching of the Bhagavan Buddha, called "one with perverted craving." Such a person cannot be cured by the Bhagavan Buddha.

Astus wrote:

Yes, that's more along the line of what I thought of as a requirement, a necessity.

"By not being able to get close to a good spiritual advisor, despite the fact [that each of them] has the buddha-nature, they cannot see it.

...

Like the athlete in the story who bemoaned the loss of his jewel when it was in fact inside his body, living beings are in a similar situation. Because they do not know how to approach a good spiritual advisor, they remain unaware of the hidden treasury that is the tathāgatagarbha, and they study and practice the doctrine of nonself. This is analogous to the mundane person who asserts the existence of self but does not understand the true nature of self. My disciples may also be like this. Because they do not know how to approach a good spiritual advisor, they study and put into practice the doctrine of nonself but they, too, do not understand the point of [the doctrine of] nonself. And if they do not understand the true nature of nonself, then how could they understand the true nature of self?"

(Nirvana Sutra, BDK ed, vol 1, p 231)

Apparently the Pratyutpannasamadhi Sutra has significantly more to say about teachers than the Surangamasamadhi or even the Nirvana Sutra.

"If this bodhisattva regards his teacher as he would regard the Buddha, he will master the meditation quickly. If he does not honor his good teacher, if he is disrespectful to his good teacher and imposes upon him, then even if he studies this meditation for a long time, keeps it for a long time, and practices it for a long time, if he does not honor his good teacher he will quickly lose it. ...

This bodhisattva should regard as a buddha whatever monk, nun, layman, or laywoman from whom he hears this meditation, and he should venerate the place where he hears the meditation."

(BDK ed, p 46; also on p 29)

The sutra also has advice for lay men and women (p 50-52), stating that "he should always have great love for his good teacher" and a "laywoman should always honor her good teachers", but there are also other things they should do. A layman: "he should not drink wine or give it to other people to drink; he should not have intercourse with women—neither should he himself do so, nor should he advise other people to do so; he should not have any affection for his wife and children; he should not long for sons and daughters; he should not long for property; he should always think longingly of abandoning [household life] and undertaking the life of an ascetic; he should always maintain the eightfold fast and for the duration of the fast he should always keep the fast at a Buddhist monastery;" And a laywoman: "she should not take any notice of lucky days; she should not be flirtatious; she should not be unrestrained; and she should not have desires."

Further clarifications on the requirement to have a teacher and the service provided to them:

"they should first honor and serve their good teachers and regard them as buddhas, and only then should they recite this meditation."
(p 85)

"Bhadrapāla, any bodhisattvas who, hearing of this meditation, wish to go to that place and hear and strive for this meditation, should serve their teachers for ten years or one hundred years; they should make them offerings and venerate them totally. These bodhisattvas should not be self serving but should follow their teachers' teaching. They should always be grateful to their teachers."
(p 97)

"Setting aside these offerings, which are simply not worth mentioning, you should always cut off your own flesh and offer it to the good teacher; you should never begrudge him your person, much less anything else. You should serve the good teacher just as a slave serves his master. Those who seek this meditation should know this. Having mastered this meditation they should hold fast to it and always be grateful to their teachers."
(p 101-102)

Malcolm said:

As I said, it is an imperative, not an option.

conebeckham said:

Im-per-a-tive.

Adjective 1.Of vital importance; crucial. 2. Giving an authoritative command; imperative.

Noun An essential or Urgent thing.

Sounds necessary to me.

Astus wrote:

The difference I mean is like between "do not be lustful" and "no lustful mind can attain absorption", or in this case: "one should have a teacher" and "cannot be done without a teacher".

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 30th, 2017 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: keep up (meditative) awareness in anethaesia

Content:

Dolma said:

keep up (stay in) (meditative) awareness when getting an anethaesia (narcosis) during an operation.

Astus wrote:

If it is something to be maintained, it is conditioned. If it is conditioned, it is impermanent and empty. One might maintain whatever state of mind one imagines, but the next moment it is gone anyway, and then who can say whether it was real at all?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 30th, 2017 at 3:26 AM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Bristollad said:

They just seem like instructions and reasons for the instructions, not instructions and recommendations

Astus wrote:

There can be various reasons for an instruction. To establish the necessity of something, other options have to be excluded.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 30th, 2017 at 5:20 AM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Bristollad said:

I still don't understand the distinction you are trying to draw.

Astus wrote:

A common instruction is to renounce worldly life, and even to leave communal life and stay in an isolated place. It does not mean that everyone has to become a hermit, or that everyone has to leave their home, even when those conditions are considered beneficial on the path. For instance, here are some strong words from Dogen:

"None has succeeded to the right action of the Buddha-Dharma, and none has received the authentic transmission of the great truth of the Buddha-Dharma, without leaving family life. Notwithstanding scant pursuit of the truth by laypeople as upāsakas and upāsikās, there is no past example of one arriving at the truth. When we arrive at the truth, we inevitably leave family life. How can people who are not able to leave family life succeed to the position of a buddha? Nevertheless, for the last two or three hundred years in the great kingdom of Song, people calling themselves priests of the Zen sect have habitually said, "Pursuit of the truth by a layman and pursuit of the truth by one who has left family life are just the same." They are a tribe of people who have become dogs, for the sole purpose of making the filth and urine of laypeople into their food and drink. Sometimes they say to kings and their ministers, "The mind in conducting the myriad affairs of state is just the mind of patriarchs and buddhas, other than which there is no mind at all." Kings and ministers, never having discerned right preaching and right Dharma, delightedly bestow on them gifts such as the titles of master. The monks who speak such words are Devadattas. In order that they might feed upon tears and spit, they produce childish and demented talk like this. They are deplorable. They are not the kindred of the Seven Buddhas. They are demons and animals."

(Sanjuichi-bon-bodai-bunpo, in SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 4, p 14)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 30th, 2017 at 7:06 AM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Malcolm said:

No teacher, no path.

Astus wrote:

So it is stated clearly for Vajrayana.

"Entering the door to the teachings of Secret Mantra Vajrayana depends upon two things: ripening and liberation. Unless you first obtain the ripening empowerments, you are not authorized to hear even a single verse of the tantras, statements and instructions. (Unauthorized) people who engage in expounding on and listening to the tantras will not only fail to receive blessings; they will create immense demerit from divulging the secrecy of these teachings."
(Tsele Natsok Rangdrol: Empowerment, p 15)

"The door to Secret Mantra is empowerment that brings maturity.

The generation and perfection stages both bring freedom.

Observance of samaya is the favorable condition.

These three define the path of Mantra, faultless and supreme.

Without reception of empowerment,

No attainment can there be,

For that would be like wanting ghee from pressing sand.

And though one strives in teaching, learning, meditation,

One will go to hell.

While those who have empowerment

Are the Buddhas heirs."

(Jigme Lingpa: Treasury of Precious Qualities, 10.14-15, in vol 2, p 8)

But is there anything like that in the sutras and treatises? Are Abhidharma, Pramana, Madhyamaka, or Yogacara bound to a teacher as Tantra is?

For instance, Jamgon Kongtrul writes in the Treasury of Knowledge (Buddhist Ethics, p 41-42):

"There are countless scriptural references to the need for working with a spiritual guide. The Condensed Transcendent Wisdom Scripture states: Worthy students who respect spiritual teachers

Should always remain close to learned masters

Because from them the virtues of the wise spring. The Flower Array Scripture states: O child of the universal family, all your virtuous qualities issue from your spiritual guide. You can encounter and receive instructions from one only if you have cultivated merit and wisdom for oceans of eons. Otherwise, to meet a spiritual guide may prove more difficult than coming upon the most rare of gems. Therefore, never tire of honoring your spiritual guide. Given that a student wishes to attain the state of an omniscient buddha, the basic premise is that it is necessary for him or her to work with a spiritual guide. The reason is that the individual does not know how to cultivate merit and wisdom or to clear away obscurations. Examples consistent with this proof are the enlightened ones of the three times. The converse can be illustrated by solitary sages and other examples."

The above is under the heading of "The Necessity of Working with a Spiritual Guide". However, this is not the exclusive necessity as it is for Vajrayana, plus the reasoning contradicts the second quote.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 1st, 2017 at 3:25 AM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Admin_PC said:

Maybe we should talk about the various nuances of the term "teacher"? Astus touched on it before with discussion of the term "kalyanamitra" vs "guru". There seems like there may be different levels to the term.

Astus wrote:

If the monastic side of things is put aside, then there aren't really any clear cut definitions, even though there seem to be a few general ideas of what a teacher is. So, here's my first take on it:

Primarily, when there is a talk of a personal teacher, that sounds like having a therapist/coach who guides one's every step on the way to enlightenment. Naturally, such a teacher is assumed to be enlightened, who can tell whatever the disciple needs, hence no instruction or request is absurd enough. This vision of the awakened master - a fairly romantic notion - is the basis of guru worship gone wrong.

Secondly, there are the great teachers who one can listen to from the crowd, and their mere presence is a blessing, or at least that's how you can feel. They can talk like as if they were personally answering your deepest questions, and if you have the rare chance of asking, the reply is something that at the same time touches your heart and keeps you contemplating it even years later. These masters keep the system of teaching tours alive.

Thirdly, there are the rather ordinary looking local teachers, who regularly lead the weekly meditation sessions and perhaps give speeches too. There seems to be no reason to think much about them, since they themselves are devoted disciples of a great teacher (who may occasionally visit).

Fourthly, there are those not called teachers at all, but who are the long standing members of the group, and who help with event organisation and guiding the newcomers.

Finally, there can be someone, who is likely just a fellow practitioner, but with whom you can talk to about both mundane and supramundane topics, a person you can spend quality time with, and whom you may actually call a good friend.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 1st, 2017 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

conebeckham said:

There are also personal teachers who have ongoing relationships with students, and who can guide students gradually based on that relationship.

The sort of personal communication that exists in such relationships is the basis by which students are guided. This was frankly the norm in Vajrayana in Tibet, for those who were committed to practice, whether in retreat or not.

Astus wrote:

Is that not the local teacher?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 1st, 2017 at 7:00 AM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

conebeckham said:

not according to your definition...

These personal teachers are much more than that.

Astus wrote:

It can be extended, or call it another type, etc. I was mostly referring to the requirement of availability for such a personal teacher you mentioned.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 1st, 2017 at 7:04 AM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Malcolm said:

Of course there are. There are reams of passages that define the qualities of a kayānamitra. The terms guru and kalayānamitra are intimately connected in Mahāyāna Sūtras.

Astus wrote:

The reason I mentioned the exclusion of the monastic side is because it seems most of the kalyanamitras are within a renounced environment. Also, what types of good friends would you list?

"Great enlightening beings have ten kinds of spiritual friends. What are they? Spiritual friends who cause them to persist in the determination for enlightenment; spiritual friends who cause them to generate roots of goodness; spiritual friends who cause them to practice the ways of transcendence; spiritual friends who enable them to analyze and explain all truths; spiritual friends who enable them to develop all sentient beings; spiritual friends who enable them to attain definitive analytic and expository powers; spiritual friends who cause them not to be attached to any world; spiritual friends who cause them to cultivate practice tirelessly in all ages; spiritual friends who establish them in the practice of Universal Good; spiritual friends who introduce them to the reaches of knowledge of all buddhas. These are the ten."

(Flower Ornament Scripture, p 1027)

"Now, one who has resolved to begin practice and who desires to cultivate calming-and-insight must first fulfill five conditions related to outward circumstances. The first is the requirement that one maintain purity in practice of the moral precepts [as a bhikshu/ni].

...

The fifth [of the five prerequisite conditions] requires that one draw near to good spiritual friends. Good spiritual friends are of three types:

1)

[Externally-Protective Good Spiritual Friends]

The first is the "externally-protective" good spiritual friend who provides necessary provisions, makes offerings, and is well able to take care of the practitioner's needs, doing so in a fashion which precludes any mutual disturbance.

2)

[Identical-Practice Good Spiritual Friends]

The second is the "identical-practice" good spiritual friend together with whom one cultivates a single path. Each provides the other with encouragement and inspiration while refraining from mutual bother or disturbance.

3)

[Instructive Good Spiritual Friends]

The third is the “instructive” good spiritual friend who instructs and delights the practitioner with teachings about the internal and external skillful means associated with the Dharma entryway of dhyāna absorption. This is the conclusion of the summary clarification of the five kinds of necessary prerequisites."

(Zhiyi: Xiaiozhiguan, in Essentials of Buddhist Meditation, p 39, 51)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 4th, 2017 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Yes, you need a teacher.

Content:

Yuren said:

But I disagree if someone wants to make an absolutist statement and say: "it's impossible to make any progress without a personal teacher"

There are always rare exceptions: <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Mushi-dokugo>

Astus wrote:

That is not the appropriate example, because the need of a teacher discussed here is about starting on the path and not about qualifying as a teacher. And while there were some notable teachers (e.g. Hanshan Deqing, Zibo Zhenke, Hakuin Ekaku, Gyeongheo Seong-U) in the history of Zen who never received certification from another, they were all monks. Although it is another question if a general training could qualify people to master specific methods, as those Zen teachers actually did. Nevertheless, the bigger question at this point is whether it is possible for someone to learn Buddhism only from books (also perhaps audio/video materials) and that way gain correct understanding.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 5th, 2017 at 6:19 PM

Title: Re: Did the Buddha teach the Mahayana sutras?

Content:

KiwiNFLFan said:

Maitreya spoke of seven reasons why Mahayana Buddhism is the teaching of the Buddha. Does anyone have the text?

Astus wrote:

It's in chapter 1, verse 1 of the Mahayanasutralamkara (The Universal Vehicle Discourse Literature, p 7-8).

(The universal vehicle is the word of the buddha) because it was not previously predicted (as a danger); because the (vehicles) began together; because it is beyond the scope (of theology); because it is self-evident; because it must be since it exists, and there would be no such thing if it did not; because it has medicinal power; and because it has more to it than words.

Commentary:

"Because it was not previously predicted;" if the universal vehicle was fabricated by someone at a later time in order to interfere with the true Dharma, why did the Lord not predict it, as he did predict other future dangers?

"Because (the vehicles) began together;" it is obvious that the universal vehicle began at the same time as the disciple vehicle and not later. So why should one imagine it is not the word of the buddha?

"Because it is beyond the range (of theology);" this magnificent and profound Dharma is not within the range of theology (tarkikanam), since such a (Dharma) is not found in the theological treatises of the religious (tīrthikas). It is quite impossible that they should have taught this, since they do not believe in it even (now) when they hear it taught.

"Because it is self-evident;" even if the universal vehicle was taught by some enlightened being other (than Sākyamuni Buddha), that also proves it to be buddha-word, since a buddha is anyone who becomes perfectly enlightened and then teaches such (a vehicle).

"Because it must be since it exists, and there would be no such thing if it did not;" since there is a universal vehicle, its very existence proves it to be the word of the buddha, since there is no other universal vehicle. Or, if there were no universal vehicle, its nonexistence would entail the nonexistence of the disciple vehicle as well. It is unreasonable to insist that the disciple vehicle is the word of the buddha and the universal vehicle is not; for without a buddha-vehicle, buddhas could not originate, (and could not teach any disciples).

"Because it has medicinal power;" if one practices the universal vehicle, it serves as the ground of all nonconceptual intuitions, thereby becoming the medicine for all the mental addictions. It is therefore the word of the buddha.

"Because it has more to it than words;" its import is not just its literal meaning.

Therefore, adherence to its literal meaning cannot support the notion that it is not the word of the buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 6th, 2017 at 1:55 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Meido said:

The primary Western myth of Zen is that Zen practice and awakening are psychological affairs.

Astus wrote:

Aside from Hakuin's incorporation of breath techniques, do you know of any other Buddhist school in East Asia that did something similar?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 6th, 2017 at 5:11 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Meido said:

The general approach to Zen practice as a yogic or wholly psycho-physical undertaking rather than something purely psychological and intellectual doesn't originate with Hakuin, as I have said before in other threads. The records of early (Kamakura) Zen in Japan clearly show that this emphasis existed strongly in the teachings of the late Song Chan masters (e.g. Bukko) who arrived in Japan.

Astus wrote:

Are there instructions or descriptions discussing such practices? For instance, Wumen Huakai and Gaofeng Yuanmiao were mostly the contemporaries of Bukko, but I have not seen them discussing such techniques, so that suggests - perhaps incorrectly - that physical practices were not part of mainstream kanhua Chan. Dogen could also be mentioned, even though he was in China in the early 13th century. So, while it might be a misconception that Chan (and Buddhism in general) is rather disembodied, some sources to the contrary could help clarify it.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 6th, 2017 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Malcolm said:

It must be the case that he carried these kinds of instructions with him, though whether they were passed on in any significant way is anybody's guess.

Astus wrote:

The https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Yijin_Jing is a "qigong" manual attributed to Bodhidharma, and one of the sources of "Shaolin kung-fu", even though it was actually written in the early 17th century.

Malcolm said:

Perhaps these Indian techniques never gained the popularity they experienced in India and the Himalayas because China already had a sophisticated medical system with an elaborate and functional anatomy and physiology.

Astus wrote:

Likely such methods from India were incorporated in some format into Daoist teachings, as similar techniques (https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tao_yin) have been applied by them even before Buddhism appeared in China.

Malcolm said:

In any case, after the fall of the Gupta, In India we see the evolution of body-based systems of practice and trend away from the intellectual edifices of Madhyamaka and Yogacara, a trend away from intellectual analysis towards yogic experience. It is obvious to me, that this fusion of yogic praxis with local understandings of anatomy and physiology becomes a more prominent feature of Mahāyana practice as time moves on.

Astus wrote:

Xuanzang visited India after the Guptas, but apparently his Yogacara couldn't compete with the native works of Zhiyi and Fazang. Even during the Yuan dynasty the later Indian developments in Buddhism could not penetrate Chinese Buddhism.

Malcolm said:

My point is that there is no reason to assume that Chan and Zen practice are not similarly influenced by body-based yogic experience, and that there has been very little translated yet into English that really speaks to such things — since academic scholars are generally more interested in intellectual analysis, even when they dress it up in poetry.

Astus wrote:

If there are translations of Daoist alchemy and yoga, not just philosophical works, why would Chan be an exception?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 8th, 2017 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Matylda said:

The point is that one cannot find in any early and later Chinese zen texts much information about zazen direct instructions, if any then they are very obscure.

Astus wrote:

That's because Chan was not conceived as the "meditation school", especially not in the format of emphasising sitting. Quite the contrary, as one can see in the Platform Sutra and other teachings, that approach of focusing on calm contemplation was rejected, simply because that is at best the gradual path of the bodhisattva. At the same time, since meditation sutras and treatises were already available, it would have made no sense to repeat them, so instead one could just read those if needed, as for instance recommended by Zongze's manual (坐禪儀) in his/Baizhang's Qinggui (百丈清規, The Baizhang Zen Monastic Regulations, BDK ed, p 255-257).

Matylda said:

And it does not mean that they were not existant. They were passed simply in face to face manner.

Astus wrote:

Don't you think it strange that while it was the Chan school that started to publish private instructions and personal stories on a large scale somehow wanted to keep their take on meditation secret?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 8th, 2017 at 3:10 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Matylda said:

What do you mean by 'Chan school that started to publish private instructions'? Where and how?

Astus wrote:

Mainly in the lamp transmission (傳燈) and sayings records (語錄).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 8th, 2017 at 3:21 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

SunWuKong said:

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Anapanasati>

Astus wrote:

That is mindfulness and not control of breath (pranayama).

SunWuKong said:

Tiantai and Chan.

Astus wrote:

Tiantai has the "http://kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/sgs_book_page.htm", while in Chan the whole curriculum of calming and contemplation was categorised as a lower level practice.

SunWuKong said:

its worth noting in this context, that the four foundations it is practiced in is body (the body as the body, distinct from perceptions of the body), feelings (perceptions), mind (mind/heart), and Dharms

Astus wrote:

The smṛtyupasthāna is considered mainly a śrāvakayāna method.

SunWuKong said:

Also worth noting is the practice spills over into what's termed Wuji (primordial) QiGong - which is practiced awareness of breathing + centering the awareness of the body in the dan tien + allowing the mind to be empty

Astus wrote:

In what teaching?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 8th, 2017 at 7:51 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Matylda said:

They do not contain zazen instructions which we are talking about.

Astus wrote:

I did not write zazen instructions, I wrote "private instructions and personal stories". It could also be added that meditation manuals were very much present both in the format of translated scriptures and treatises from India, and those authored in China. So if Chan had had anything to add there, it would have done so.

Matylda said:

Moreover academic assertions that zen was not conceived as the "meditation school", especially not in the format of emphasising sitting etc. is mere intellectual fabrication and misses greatly the point.

Astus wrote:

Can you show something that proves the "academic assertions" wrong? As for how I take it, Chan was posited as the supreme vehicle above the bodhisattvayana, so the standard Mahayana methods are not within the scope of Chan teachings. Of course, that does not mean those are rejected.

I think Baizhang explains this quite well:

"The complete teaching discusses purity; the incomplete teaching discusses impurity. Explaining the defilement in impure things is to weed out the profane; explaining the defilement in pure things is to weed out the holy.

Before the nine-part teaching had been expounded, living beings had no eyes; it was necessary to depend on someone to refine them. If you are speaking to a deaf worldling, you should just teach him to leave home, maintain discipline, practice meditation and develop wisdom. You should not speak this way to a worldling beyond measure, someone like Vimalakirti or the great hero Fu. If one is speaking to an ascetic, the ascetic has already given his assent three times and his discipline is complete. This is the power of discipline, concentration, and wisdom. To still speak in this way to him is called speaking at the wrong time, because the speech is not appropriate to the situation; it is also called suggestive talk. To an ascetic one must explain the defilement in pure things - you should tell him to detach from all things, existence, non-existent, or whatever, to detach from all cultivation and experience, and even to detach from detachment.

While in the course of asceticism, one strips away influences of habit. If an ascetic cannot get rid of the diseases of greed and aversion, he too is called a deaf worldling; still he must be taught to practice meditation and cultivate wisdom."

(Sayings and Doings of Pai-Chang, p 29-30)

Zongmi put it this way:

"(In the Buddha's preaching of the previous five teachings, some are gradual and some are sudden. In the case of [sentient beings of] medium and inferior capacity, [the Buddha] proceeded from the superficial to the profound, gradually leading them forward. He would initially expound the first teaching [of Humans and Gods], enabling them to be free from evil and to abide in virtue; he would then expound the second and third [teachings of the Lesser Vehicle and the Phenomenal Appearances of the Dharmas], enabling them to be free from impurity and to abide in purity; he would finally discuss the fourth and fifth [teachings], those that Refute Phenomenal Appearances and Reveal the Nature, subsuming the provisional into the true, [enabling them] to cultivate virtue in reliance on the ultimate teaching until they finally attain Buddhahood. In the case of [sentient beings of] wisdom of the highest caliber, [the Buddha] proceeded from the root to the branch. That is to say, from the start he straightaway relied on the fifth teaching to point directly to the essence of the one true mind. When the essence of the mind had been revealed, [these sentient beings] themselves realized that everything without exception is illusory and fundamentally empty and tranquil; that it is only because of delusion that [such illusory appearances] arise in dependence upon the true [nature]; and that it is [thus] necessary to cut off evil and cultivate virtue by means of the insight of having awakened to the true, and to put an end to the false and return to the true by cultivating virtue. When the false is completely exhausted and the true is present in totality, that is called the dharmakāya Buddha.)" (Inquiry into the Origin of Humanity, p 58)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 12th, 2017 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Malcolm said:

By whom?

Astus wrote:

By those who say that the sravakayana is the four noble truths.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 12th, 2017 at 6:09 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, the four foundations of mindfulness are found throughout all Buddhadharma.

Astus wrote:

And the four noble truths are not? Also, do you know a Mahayana tradition that actually practises what is written in the Satipatthana Sutta? However, even if the four foundations of mindfulness are discussed, it is differentiated from the sravakayana version, or simply reinterpreted.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 12th, 2017 at 7:22 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Malcolm said:

There are far more sources for the four foundations of mindfulness than that sutta. Mahāyāna is very rich with them.

Astus wrote:

The question still remains: who practises them? Also, what constitutes a "Mahayana smṛtyupasthāna" is not the same as in Theravada. Hence it is neither practised nor accepted because it is viewed as a sravaka method.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 12th, 2017 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: All is One

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Two comes from one,
Yet do not even keep the one.
When one mind does not arise,
Myriad dharmas are without defect."
(Sengcan: <https://terebess.hu/english/hsin3.html#7>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 13th, 2017 at 6:36 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Malcolm said:

There are of course differences in the presentations, but it is incorrect to state that the four foundations of mindfulness are absent in Mahāyāna, which was your contention above.

Astus wrote:

My points above were: 1. the four foundations of mindfulness is considered a hearer method, 2. the method taught within Mahayana is different from those in the sravakayana. So, I am not debating that there are various methods called four foundations of mindfulness in Mahayana, it's just that they are not identical to what one finds in Theravada.

Malcolm said:

People studying Abhidharma in the Tibetan tradition practice them in the same manner.

Astus wrote:

I presume you mean the Kosha here, hence it is in the context of the Sarvastivada and Sautrantika teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 14th, 2017 at 12:00 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Malcolm said:

Obviously your first contention is wrong since the four foundations of mindfulness are found by that name in countless Mahāyāna sūtras.

Astus wrote:

The name is there, the content varies.

Malcolm said:

Any practice done with Mahāyāna motivation becomes a Mahāyāna practice.

Astus wrote:

Motivation is only one half.

"If a bodhisattva abides in the signs of self, person, sentient being, or life-span, she or he is not a bodhisattva."

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html, ch 3)

"Having generated the great mind to realize bodhi, it is necessary to recognize what constitutes the essence of the bodhi mind. Now, as for the substance of the bodhi mind, if one fails to generate it from one's true mind, there is no source through which one might succeed in reaching bodhi. On account of this, it is essential that one differentiate clearly [what it is]. Only then does this result in Dharma practice which corresponds to correct causality."

(Peixiu: http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/Bcitta_excerpts/Bcitta_X-01_X-05.pdf)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 15th, 2017 at 6:01 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Malcolm said:

This refers strictly to āryabodhisattvas. It does not refer to bodhisattvas on the paths of accumulation or application.

Astus wrote:

What I meant is that vow is not enough, one also needs some level of understanding, faith, renunciation, and compassion, since without those even the vow is baseless. So for instance the Surangama Sutra teaches that even before one enters the ten stages of faith, one must obtain "dry wisdom", called dry because it is without sensual desire.

Then the ten stages of faith means faith, remembrance, zeal, wisdom, concentration, non-retrogression, protection of the Dharma, reflection, discipline, and vow show the necessary qualities needed to progress to the following three times ten stages, then four additional practices, until one reaches the ten bhumis.

Hyjeong wrote about those 55 levels:

"The fifty-five stations are simply the results obtained after resting the mind and removing falsities. Therefore, before completing the full (final) station (of buddhahood), if you reach level one, you will be satisfied with gaining a little and give rise to a pride in knowing and understanding the Dharma (completely). But in the end, if you enter great awareness (enlightenment), the former stations you passed through will all be illusions, and be useless states. Therefore a patriarchal teacher said, "I would rather die than walk through the fifty-five stations.""

(Abstracts of the Essentials of the Mind Dharma, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 3, p 231)

And Huangbo:

"there is fast and slow in realizing this mind: there are those who attain no-mind in a single moment of thought after hearing the Dharma; those who attain no-mind after [passing through] the ten faiths, the ten abodes, the ten practices, and the ten conversions; and those who attain no-mind after [passing through] the ten stages [of the bodhisattva]. In spite of the length of time it takes them to [attain it, once they] reside in no-mind there is nothing else to be cultivated or realized. Truly without anything to be attained, true and not false [is no-mind]. Whether it is attained in a single moment of thought or at the tenth stage [of the bodhisattva], its efficacy is identical. There are no further gradations of profundity, only the useless striving of successive eons."

(Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 16)

So Linji said:

"But because you students lack faith in yourselves, you run around seeking something outside. Even if, through your seeking, you did find something, that something would be nothing more than fancy descriptions in written words; never would you gain the mind of the living patriarch. Make no mistake, worthy Chan men! If you don't find it here and now, you'll go on transmigrating through the three realms for myriads of kalpas and thousands of lives, and, held in the clutch of captivating circumstances, be born in the wombs of asses or cows."

(Record of Linji, p 8, tr Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 15th, 2017 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Malcolm said:
I don't accept the 55 level scheme.

Astus wrote:
I don't think that's a problem, since it is not important in Zen except for some advocates of gradual practice. The point still remains, however, that to have the bodhisattva motivation one needs some level of faith and understanding as well.

Author: Astus
Date: Friday, December 15th, 2017 at 10:51 PM
Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen
Content:
Malcolm said:
Your answer is a non sequitur.

Astus wrote:
In that case I was simply wrong in my presumption that by that you were rejecting the whole section on there being more to Mahayana than having motivation.

Author: Astus
Date: Saturday, December 16th, 2017 at 12:21 AM
Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen
Content:
Malcolm said:
any practice one with Mahāyāna motivation becomes a Mahāyāna practice

Astus wrote:
How can motivation be a sufficient criteria? That would mean even a mistaken idea about the path leads to buddhahood.

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, December 18th, 2017 at 4:10 AM
Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen
Content:
Malcolm said:
Mistaken ideas about the path are impediments to awakening, but they are not impediments to gathering accumulations, devotion, and so on, and gradually, one will overcome such mistakes, especially if one learns to train in ultimate bodhicitta, śamatha and vipaśyāna.

Astus wrote:
True, it is the beginning of the path and one may have erroneous views. Still, in order to establish motivation, it has its own conditions.

The Awakening of Mahayana Faith (ch 3, tr Hakeda, p 79) talks of three possible types: "Briefly, three types of aspiration for enlightenment can be distinguished. The first is the aspiration for enlightenment through the perfection of faith. The second is the aspiration for enlightenment through understanding and through deeds. The third is the aspiration for enlightenment through insight." There faith is the very beginning, where one has to cultivate three minds: "The first is the mind characterized by straightforwardness, for it correctly meditates on the principle of Suchness. The second is the mind of profoundness, for there is no limit to its joyful accumulation of all kinds of goodness. The third is the mind filled with great compassion, for it wishes to uproot the sufferings of all sentient beings." (p 80-81)

Asanga defines a mahayanika this way: "What is a person belonging to the Great Vehicle? It is a person who, having obtained or not the attainments, dwelling in the Dharma of the Bodhisattvas, having sharp faculties by nature, set on the liberation of all beings, having the intention of attaining unestablished Nirvana, dependent on the Canon of the Bodhisattvas, practicing the major and minor virtues by means of the cultivation of vigor, ripens beings, cultivates the pure stage of the Buddhas, receives the prediction and attains Perfect Awakening." (Abhidharmasamuccaya, tr Boin-Webb, p 200)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 22nd, 2017 at 5:34 PM

Title: Re: Upside Down Thinking

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Buddhism is about being clear about the mind that you have."

Mindfulness is a popular cloud.

"See what is actually happening in the moment."

It is seeing only if one can tell the difference between the wholesome and unwholesome, but it becomes practising only when unwholesome thoughts are not generated anew and those already there abandoned, and wholesome thoughts are generated and those already there are cultivated. It is then that there is some difference made.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 25th, 2017 at 4:57 PM

Title: Re: "Summarizing" Buddhadharma

Content:

Coëmgenu said:

The profoundly, truly, and absolutely clear mind encounters any thing/dharma whatsoever, and awakening is understood/has happened.

Astus wrote:

That seems to attempt to summarise only awakening, not the whole of Buddhadharma.

1. "profoundly, truly, and absolutely" - What do these adverbs stand for? What is a superficial compared to profound, a false to true, a relative to absolute type of clear mind?
2. "clear mind" - What mind and clean from what?
3. "encounters" - Since mind and thing encounters, does that mean they exist separately? If they are not separate, how can they encounter?
4. "awakening" - Awakening to what?
5. "is understood/has happened" - If understood, was it understood after the encounter, or simultaneously with encounter? If it's happened, has it happened only once or every time there is an encounter?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 25th, 2017 at 5:14 PM

Title: Re: What practices would Madhyamakin and Yogacarins actually have done?

Content:

Astus wrote:

See: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dhy%C4%81na_sutras and https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Buddhist_texts#Samadhi_Sutras.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 25th, 2017 at 7:15 PM

Title: Re: What practices would Madhyamakin and Yogacarins actually have done?

Content:

Vasana said:

The end of analysis results in the nonconceptual union of shamatha/vipassana.
Correct madhyamika view leads to direct cognition / direct yogic perception.

Astus wrote:

That is a fairly late interpretation that fuses Madhyamaka with Yogacara and Pramana, furthermore, it does not specify the methods used.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 26th, 2017 at 3:27 AM

Title: Re: What practices would Madhyamakin and Yogacarins actually have done?

Content:

ItsRaining said:

Any particular sutra out of these you recommend?

Astus wrote:

Unless you read Chinese, just go through everything available in English. Also, there are mainly two additions to what was already taught in the sravaka texts: the contemplation (through visualisation and recitation) of buddhas and bodhisattvas, and the contemplation (through analysis) of the emptiness of appearances. Because of the latter addition, Madhyamika and Yogacarīn works are also instructions for meditation.

Some meditation focused scriptures and a treatise:

-

http://www.bdkamerica.org/system/files/pdf/dBET_T0614_SutraConcentration_2009_0.pdf

-

http://www.bdkamerica.org/system/files/pdf/dBET_Pratyutpanna_Surangama_1998_0.pdf

- http://www.bdkamerica.org/system/files/pdf/dBET_ThreePureLandSutras_2003_0.pdf

- <http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra13.html>

- <http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra20.html>

- Kumārajīva:

https://web.archive.org/web/20150518100726/http://www.thichhangdat.com/files/Master_Thesis.pdf

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 26th, 2017 at 6:41 PM

Title: Re: Karma in Mahāyāna

Content:

markatex said:

In the Nikayas/Agamas, it's said that not everything that happens is the result of karma. I was under the impression (perhaps wrongly) that the Mahāyāna sutras state otherwise. Is this correct? Are there Mahāyāna texts where this is discussed?

Astus wrote:

Even the Nikayas do not say that there are experiences not from action. Please read Thanissaro Bhikkhu's introduction to the <https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn36/sn36.021.than.html>. As it is stated in the Kosha (vol 2, p 477): "by reason of the collective action of beings, there appears the first signs of a future physical world", so the physical world itself appears because of past action. As for Mahayana, the three worlds are nothing but the fabrications of mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 26th, 2017 at 8:38 PM

Title: Re: How did the originally pure nature become defiled?

Content:

ItsRaining said:

Many texts and practitioners talk about how the mind was originally pure: Huineng, Shen Xiu, Chen Guang, Awakening of Faith, etc but if so how did it become deluded?

Astus wrote:

It is not that first there is a pure ground that gets defiled, but the true nature of defilement has always been purity. The Awakening of Faith in Mahayana, for instance, has an extensive explanation on what being deluded means.

ItsRaining said:

And if something pure can be deluded what stop the pure minds of the Buddhas from becoming afflicted again?

Astus wrote:

Ignorance has no beginning, while if the cause of delusion is removed, there is no basis upon which it can recur.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 27th, 2017 at 6:46 PM

Title: Re: How did the originally pure nature become defiled?

Content:

ItsRaining said:

The Awakening of Faith says that Ignorance can perfume Tathata, so ignorance which in reality Tathata itself can effect the pure suchness? But then this ignorance can't rise again once removed because it's cause is extinguished?

Astus wrote:

The treatise differentiates between the permeation of ignorance and the permeation of suchness. The former is how delusion originates, the latter is how enlightenment comes about. Then "Because of the cessation of ignorance, there will be no more rising of the deluded activities of mind." But it is not the case that suchness is in any way affected or changed: "The essence of Suchness knows no increase or decrease in ordinary men, the Hinayanists, the Bodhisattvas, or the Buddhas. It was not brought into existence in the beginning nor will it cease to be at the end of time; it is eternal through and through."

Let's translate this into other terms. The aggregates are impermanent. Conceiving the aggregates as permanent is ignorance, but it does not negate impermanence. Realising that the aggregates are impermanent is liberating knowledge, but it does not make the aggregates impermanent. Once the wrong view of permanence is completely gone, there is no more basis for attachment to arise again.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 27th, 2017 at 11:44 PM

Title: Re: Eternal != Perpetual

Content:

MiphamFan said:

"eternal" to the mediaevals was not the same as "perpetual". "Eternal" means something outside of time completely, while "perpetual" is something that still exists within time itself.

Astus wrote:

What is atemporal is not functional, has no connection to anything, therefore it simply does not exist. At the same time, whatever exists is necessarily functional and temporal. See arguments in chapter 9 of Aryadeva's Catuhsataka.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 6th, 2018 at 7:01 PM

Title: Re: Sarvāstivāda vinaya section

Content:

Coëmgenu said:

the section of the Sarvāstivāda vinaya

Astus wrote:

http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T23n1435_037#0269c15

cf. <http://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/sbe20/sbe20018.htm>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 18th, 2018 at 10:34 PM

Title: Re: How do I go deeper into Zen practice?

Content:

mddrill said:

What should I do if I want to go deeper into my Buddhist practice, but don't really know how to go about it or even I'm looking for? I've heard something about taking refuge and vows, would that be a good place to start?

Astus wrote:

While seeking for the ideal teacher, you could try to clarify the basics of Buddhism:

<http://hsingyun.org/books/core-teachings/>

<http://chancenter.org/cmc/publications/free-literature/>

<http://www.fgsitc.org/booklet/page/7/>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 23rd, 2018 at 6:51 PM

Title: Re: What counts as a Buddhist teaching?

Content:

Astus wrote:

“There are five things, Bhāradvāja, that may turn out in two different ways here and now. What five? Faith, approval, oral tradition, reasoned cogitation, and reflective acceptance of a view. These five things may turn out in two different ways here and now. Now something may be fully accepted out of faith, yet it may be empty, hollow, and false; but something else may not be fully accepted out of faith, yet it may be factual, true, and unmistakable. Again, something may be fully approved of...well transmitted...well cogitated...well reflected upon, yet it may be empty, hollow, and false; but something else may not be well reflected upon, yet it may be factual, true, and unmistakable. Under these conditions it is not proper for a wise man who preserves truth to come to the definite conclusion: 'Only this is true, anything else is wrong.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/en/mn95>)

"Though certain recluses and brahmins claim to propound the full understanding of all kinds of clinging...they describe the full understanding of clinging to sensual pleasures, clinging to views, and clinging to rules and observances without describing the full understanding of clinging to a doctrine of self. They do not understand one instance...therefore they describe only the full understanding of clinging to sensual pleasures, clinging to views, and clinging to rules and observances without describing the full understanding of clinging to a doctrine of self."

(<https://suttacentral.net/en/mn11>)

"Wherever, Subhadda, the Noble Eightfold Path is not found in a Teaching and Discipline there a true ascetic is not found, there a second true ascetic is not found, there a third true ascetic is not found, there a fourth true ascetic is not found. But wherever, Subhadda, the Noble Eightfold Path is found in a Teaching and Discipline there a true ascetic is found, there a second true ascetic is found, there a third true ascetic is found, there a fourth true ascetic is found. In this Teaching and Discipline, Subhadda, the Noble Eightfold Path is found, here a true ascetic is found, here a second true ascetic is found, here a third true ascetic is found, here a fourth true ascetic is found."

(<https://suttacentral.net/en/dn16>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 25th, 2018 at 8:38 PM

Title: Re: Seeking enlightenment (satori/bodhi)

Content:

MattiV said:

Now, one of the most remarkable things about certain ideas in Zen Buddhism is that it seems to be aimless in the every day sense of the word.

Yet millions of practitioners of various schools of Buddhism seek enlightenment. But in Zen Buddhism - as I have understood it - the very act of seeking is an obstacle, a hindrance, a no-no. Am I right or just confused?

Astus wrote:

A Zen practitioner definitely must have goals, particularly those specified in the four great vows of every bodhisattva: save all beings, eradicate defilements, learn all teachings, and attain buddhahood. Without those vows there is no Zen.

Aimlessness (apramiti) is one of the three gates of liberation, the other two are signlessness (animitta) and emptiness (sunyata). When it is taught that one should not seek anything, it means that there is nothing to seek, because all appearances are ungraspable. It is not about intentionally trying to not look forward to enlightenment or to pretend that one is merely sitting without any purpose.

MattiV said:

As for me, I'm happy to just sit and try to improve my awareness. I'm seeking neither my true self nor an egoless pure awareness.

Why? Because I don't have the slightest idea what those are about, what they mean.

Astus wrote:

If, as you wrote, your practice is counting/following the breath, then you should consider reading up on how breath awareness should be actually cultivated. On the one hand, you can find good resources by Theravadin authors on Anapanasati, or you can check out teachings closer to Zen, like http://kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/sgs_book_page.htm,

http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/chanmed1.pdf,

<http://www.thienvientuquang.org/kinhsach/english/KeysToBuddhism.pdf>, and various works by Thich Nhat hanh.

MattiV said:

Of course I want to become a better person. But it seems to me that words like 'trying' 'improving', 'wanting', 'becoming' etc. have been blown to pieces in Zen Buddhism, or in some versions of it.

Astus wrote:

That is a misinterpretation, somewhat. True, if one can actually get to see that all experiences are originally unestablished hence there is nowhere to abide, then that is realising the futility of seeking. But to intentionally not seek peace, liberation, and wisdom, that is the wrong direction.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 30th, 2018 at 4:49 PM

Title: Re: Zazen and liberation

Content:

Zafutales said:

Can someone help me understand how 'Silent Illumination' (Shikantaza) can help bring about an end to suffering?

Astus wrote:

There are some differences between Mozhao and Shikantaza, mostly that the latter has a special emphasis on posture. But they both teach the same old practice of no-thought and no-mind as you can find it in the Platform Sutra. In other words, when the mind does not grasp at the six senses, there is no abiding anywhere, hence no craving nor suffering emerges. And in order to to grasp, not to abide, one only has to see directly that the six sensory phenomena are absolutely unstable, in other words empty, and that emptiness is the true nature.

Zafutales said:

if we can sit quietly allowing thoughts to drop away then we will experience our true nature – is it a similar ‘method’ when using Silent Illumination and Shikantaza?

Astus wrote:

Dogen wrote:

"In recent years, however, stupid unreliable people have said, "In the effort of zazen, to attain peace of mind is everything. Just this is the state of tranquility." This opinion is beneath even scholars of the Small Vehicle. It is inferior even to the vehicles of humans and gods. How can we call such people students of the Buddha-Dharma?"
(Zazenshin, in SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 2, p 116)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 30th, 2018 at 6:00 PM

Title: Re: Silent Illumination and Liberation?

Content:

Zafutales said:

how ‘Silent Illumination’ (Shikantaza) can help bring about an end to suffering?

Astus wrote:

Silent means to be without attachment, illumination means to be aware. Consider your hearing. The ear contains no sound, it is totally silent, and at the same time, it hears all sounds, it is totally illuminating. If there were an original sound, no other sound could occur. If one wanted not to hear any sound at all, it would only mean a constant struggle with noises. Hence the only thing to do is to not do anything, the ear naturally hears without getting stuck at any sound. This is true for the other five senses as well. Therefore, there is no ending of suffering, because suffering itself is false. Suffering is the delusion of trying to hold on to or avoid some sound. Once it becomes clear that no sound can be kept or pushed away, there is no more craving and no more dissatisfaction.

Zafutales said:

if we can sit quietly allowing thoughts to drop away then we will experience our true nature

Astus wrote:

The true nature should be seen before a thought arises, when a thought arises, when a thought has arisen, when a thought disappears, and when a thought has disappeared. If it is a nature that can be hidden, it is not true at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 30th, 2018 at 6:08 PM

Title: Re: How are Madhyamaka and Yogacara teachings actually realised?

Content:

ItsRaining said:

But how did they realise the specific teachings in their systems? If they practiced the same things why were their teachings/realisation different?

Astus wrote:

While there are shared practices, just as Buddhism in general shares techniques with other Indian religions, when it comes to the wisdom part, Madhyamaka and Yogacara use different contemplations than the Sravaka Abhidharmikas. So you could say that samatha practices are mostly common, vipasyana is mostly not.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 5th, 2018 at 8:37 PM

Title: Re: "All Buddha-Nature is One"

Content:

DGA said:

"all Buddha-nature is one"

Astus wrote:

Buddha-nature is a quality, not an object, and that quality is emptiness.

"The Mind is Buddha. All Buddhas and all sentient beings have the same Buddha-Nature and one Mind. Therefore, Bodhidharma came from the West only to transmit the One-Mind Doctrine. However, since the mind of all sentient beings is the same as original Buddha-Nature, there is no need to practice; for if one recognizes one's own Mind and sees one's own Nature, there is nothing at all to seek outside oneself. But how is one to recognize one's own Mind? Just that Mind itself that wants to perceive the Mind - that is your own Mind, which is as void as Original Mind and is without words and function."

"Just know, above all, that non-differentiating Mind is the Buddha, that Buddha is the Mind and that the Mind is voidness. Therefore, the real Dharmakaya is just voidness. It is not necessary to seek anything whatsoever, and all who do continue to seek for something only prolong their suffering in samsara."

(Huangbo, in the <https://ymba.org/books/dharma-mind-transmission/wan-ling-record>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 7th, 2018 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen Buddhism the "Successor" of Classic Taoism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Please look at Chengguan's words:

豈言象之能至。故云迴出。又借斯亡絕以遣言思。(T36n1736_p0002b19)

Words may resemble very much. But the cause (behind it) is very different. We borrow the words but not accept their meaning.

言有濫同釋教者。皆是佛法之餘。(T35n1735_p0521 b15-16)

Those who go too far and equate [false teachings] with Buddhism are all outside of the Buddhadharma.

無得求一時之小名。渾三教之一致。習邪見之毒種。為地獄之深因。開無明之源流。遏種智之玄路。誠之誠之。(T36n1736_p0107 a11-13)

Do not seek after the trivial reputation of a single age and confuse the three teachings as one. Studying the poisonous seeds of false views is a deep cause for being born in hell, opens up the wellspring of ignorance, and blocks of the road to omniscience. Take heed! Take heed!

Guifeng Zongmi on Confucianism and Daoism:

"The main thrust of the non-Buddhist teachings, however, is to establish the conduct for humanity, not to inquire into its ultimate origin. The myriad things discussed in the two teachings are limited to the phenomenal world. Although they point to the great Dao as the root, they do not completely explain agreeability and adversity, arising and ceasing, purity and defilement, or causes and conditions. Consequently, those who practice these teachings are not aware that the doctrines are provisional and cling to them as perfect teachings."

(Treatise on the Origin of Humanity, in Three Short Treatises, BDK ed, p 149)

Dogen wrote:

"no student of Kongzi and Laozi has ever fathomed the Buddha-Dharma. People today of the great kingdom of Song mostly uphold the principle of agreement between Kongzi and Laozi and the Buddha's truth. It is the gravest of wrong views"

"Kongzi, Laozi, Zhuangzi, Huizi, and suchlike are just common people. They could not reach the level of even a srotāpanna of the Small Vehicle; how much less could they reach the level of the second [effect] or the third [effect] or an arhat of the fourth [effect]? That students, however, out of ignorance, put them on a par with the buddhas, is "in the midst of delusion, deepening delusion." Kongzi and Laozi are not only ignorant of the three times and ignorant of the many kalpas; they are not able to know one instant of mindfulness and not able to know one moment of the mind. They do not bear comparison even with the gods of the sun and the moon and they cannot equal the four great kings and the hosts of gods. Whether in the secular sphere or beyond the secular sphere, [seen] in comparison with the World-honored One, they are straying in delusion."

(Shizen-biku, in SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 4, p 268, 275-276)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 8th, 2018 at 5:38 AM

Title: Re: Pure Land teachings from a Zen perspective

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

The point is whether or not reciting the name of Amida Buddha brings one closer to realizing our true Buddha-self.

Astus wrote:

Mere recitation of words may facilitate achieving a concentrated mind, but that is as far as it can bring oneself.

"People say, "Your own mind is the Pure Land, so you cannot be born in the Pure Land; your own nature is Amitābha, so Amitābha cannot be seen." These words seem to be correct and yet are wrong. That buddha has no craving or anger, so do I also have no craving or anger? That buddha transforms hell into lotus flower (realms) as easily as turning over his hands, yet I always fear falling into hell because of the power of karma, so how can there be this transformation into a lotus flower (realm)? That buddha contemplates the endless worlds as if they were in front of his eyes, but I still do not even know matters beyond the intervening wall, so how can I see the worlds of all directions as if they are in front of my eyes? Therefore, even though everybody's nature is Buddha, since in practice they are sentient beings, if we refer to their attributes and functions, they are as far different as heaven and earth."

(Hyujeong: Seonga Gwigam, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 3, p 123-124)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 8th, 2018 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land teachings from a Zen perspective

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

This is from the Surangama Sutra

Astus wrote:

That is not a reliable translation. See the <http://www.buddhisttexts.org/surangama.html> (p 232-233; cf. <http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra08.html>):

"The basis of my practice was mindfulness of the Buddha. I became patient with the state of mind in which no mental objects arise. Now when people of this world are mindful of the Buddha, I act as their guide to lead them to the Pure Land. The Buddha has asked us how we broke through twenty-five sages speak of enlightenment to enlightenment. In order to enter samādhi, I chose no other method than to gather in the six faculties while continuously maintaining a pure mindfulness of the Buddha."

Two things should be specifically noted. The first one is that in the sutra this method is not selected as the best one. The second is that it talks about how one establishes a connection with a buddha, and it is used in the Pure Land school as a reference about how one can gain birth in Sukhavati. What is used as the Chan/Zen method is that of Avalokitesvara, not Mahasthamaprapta.

Dharma Flower said:

According to the above passage, those who recite the name of Amida Buddha can, in the present time or in the future time, attain Buddhahood "without any other expedient means." This is to say that the Nembutsu itself is sufficient for seeing into and realizing our own Buddha-nature.

Astus wrote:

It says only mindfulness of buddha, not recitation. Mindfulness of buddha in Zen is not recitation by mouth, nor even focusing on thoughts, but as Daoxin said:

"the mind which is "thinking on Buddha" is called thinking on no object ... Why is this? Consciousness is without form. The Buddha lacks any outer appearance. When you understand this truth, it is identical to calming the mind"

(Early Ch'an in China and Tibet, p 108, tr David Chappell; <https://www.dailyzen.com/journal/the-fundamental-expedient-teachings>)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 10th, 2018 at 6:09 AM

Title: Re: Pure Land teachings from a Zen perspective

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

This is from Master Chin Kung speaking on the Surangama Sutra

Astus wrote:

Master Chin Kung is a teacher of the Pure Land path that does not seek enlightenment in this life. He considers Mahasthamaprapta as the one to introduce single minded concentration. But it is not about gaining enlightenment in one life. Please see the below quotes from <http://www.amitabha-gallery.org/pdf/mck/BuddhismAwakeningCandW.pdf> your quote is originally from:

"Without being born into the Pure Land and meeting Buddha Amitabha, we will only fulfill the second and third vows of severing all afflictions and mastering all methods but will find it difficult to attain Buddhahood.

In the Avatamsaka Sutra, both Manjusri Bodhisattva and Samantabhadra Bodhisattva had reached the level of equal enlightenment and vowed to be born into the Pure Land. I was surprisingly pleased to discover this when I gave talks on the Avatamsaka Sutra. I wondered why enlightened Bodhisattvas in the Avatamsaka World would want to be born into the Western Pure Land. Considering how wonderful their own world was, it seemed unnecessary for them to do so but after thinking about it, I realized that they had vowed to go there to be able to attain Buddhahood in a shorter time. If not for this, there would be no reason to go to the Pure Land of Buddha Amitabha.

Suddenly, I realized that if we wanted to attain the perfect complete enlightenment, we needed to go to the Western Pure Land."

(p 57)

"It was the Avatamsaka Sutra that guided me to Pure Land Buddhism. I lectured on this sutra for seventeen years. Later, I only lectured on the "Chapter of Samantabhadra's Conduct and Vows" from the Avatamsaka Sutra. During these seventeen years, I deeply comprehended the meaning of the Ten Great Vows of Samantabhadra Bodhisattva in guiding beings to the Western Pure Land. This Pure Land is the essence and the final destination of the Avatamsaka. From this experience, I realized that the ancient masters were right."

(p 95-96)

"most people do not realize the true value of Buddha Name Chanting. So, the Buddha had to teach all the sutras to guide sentient beings to the Pure Land. Master Shandao told us that the only purpose for all Buddhas to manifest in the world is to tell us of the original vows of Buddha Amitabha."
(p 99)

Talking about himself:

"What about me? I am determined to go to the Pure Land. I will not remain in this world to continue to bear the suffering."
(p 109)

The closing words of the book:

"When we recite consistently without interruption, we will soon feel an increase in our wisdom, serenity, and purity of mind. Diligent practice of this method together with unwavering belief, vows, and living a moral life can ensure fulfillment of our wish to reach the Western Pure Land."
(p 136)

Dharma Flower said:
According to Master Chin Kung above, the Surangama Sutra teaches that we can attain Buddhahood, in this lifetime, from mindfully reciting the name of Amida Buddha.

Astus wrote:
Master Ching Kung definitely does not teach such a thing, nor does the Surangama Sutra state that.

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, February 11th, 2018 at 5:58 PM
Title: Re: Pure Land teachings from a Zen perspective
Content:
Dharma Flower said:
Master Chin Kung advocates the dual practice of Ch'an and Pure Land.

Astus wrote:
Dual practice means cultivating the mind in this life and vowing to be born in the Pure Land in the next life. The level of one's cultivation now defines the rank one can gain in the Pure Land. Here are the four possibilities of Zen-PL practice connection from Yongming with the explanation of Zongben:

"First: Zen without Pure Land. Nine out of ten people take the wrong road here. If objects appear before them [as they meditate], they immediately follow them off. This choice means that people only [strive to] illuminate reality-nature, and do not make vows to be born in the Pure Land. But as long as they flow along in this world "Endurance," there is the danger of falling back [into delusion] ... Second: Pure Land without Zen. Of ten thousand who practice [Pure Land Buddhism], ten thousand go [to the Pure Land]. They just get to see Amitabha Buddha: what worry is there that they won't be enlightened? This choice means that they have not yet illuminated reality-nature, but they just vow to be born in the Pure Land. Because they are riding upon the power of Buddha, they are sure to be free from doubt. Third: Both Zen and Pure Land. This is like putting horns on a tiger [adding to its already formidable powers]. In this life these people will be teachers, and in lives to come they will be buddhas and patriarchs. Since they profoundly comprehend the Buddha Dharma, they can be teachers to devas and humans. Moreover, they take vows to go to the Pure Land and ascend quickly to the stage from which there is no falling back ... Fourth: Neither Zen or Pure Land. This brings the torments of hell for ten thousand eons, with no one to rely on. They do not understand the principles of Buddha, nor do they make vows to be born in the Pure Land. They sink down [into the sea of suffering] for eternal ages with no way to get out."

(Pure Land, Pure Mind, p 68-69)

As you quoted:

"These three factors are the cornerstones of Pure Land Buddhism. If they are present, rebirth in the Pure Land is achieved. Faith means faith in Amitabha Buddha's Vows to rescue all who recite His name, as well as faith in one's own Self-Nature, which is intrinsically the same as His (to recite the Buddha's name is to recite the Mind). Vows are the determination to be reborn in the Pure Land – in one's pure mind – so as to be in the position to save oneself and others. Practice generally means reciting the Buddha's name to the point where one's Mind and that of Amitabha Buddha are in unison – i.e. to the point of singlemindness. Samadhi and wisdom are then achieved."

These three elements clarify the requirements of practice very well. Based on faith and vows one can gain birth, without them there is no birth in the Pure Land. The aim of practice, the way the mind is cultivated, is through developing one-pointed concentration, and that is called union. This type of buddha-remembrance samadhi is a high level of samatha/calming practice. Although it might be called a Zen practice, it is Zen only in the common sense of dhyana, not the Zen of Bodhidharma. The practice that matches the Zen of the patriarchs is the real mark buddha remembrance. You can read more about the four methods <https://ymba.org/books/buddhism-wisdom-faith-pure-land-principles-and-practice/essentials-pure-land/5-practice-buddha>.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 12th, 2018 at 6:03 AM

Title: Re: Pure Land teachings from a Zen perspective

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

I think we might need to politely agree to disagree.

Astus wrote:

What is there to disagree with? The term "one mind" does not appear in that passage in any of the translations in Chinese, nor even in Suzuki's English translation.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 13th, 2018 at 4:29 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land teachings from a Zen perspective

Content:

ItsRaining said:

I see this quote a lot from the Lanka a lot in Chinese That which is void is know as the One Mind. The One Mind is the Tathagatabarbha. Tathagatabarbha is the trapped Dharmakaya

寂灭者，名为一心。一心者，即如来藏。如来藏，亦是在缠法身

Astus wrote:

That is not in the Lankavatara, but the http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T48n2016_004#0434c04, where it is claimed to be a quote from the Lankavatara. Only in http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/zh-cn/T16n0671_001#0518c20 there is something similar: Nirvana is called one mind, one mind is called tathagatagarbha, entering the realm of personal wisdom (sva-pratyatma-gati-gocara) is the anutpattika-dharma-ksanti-samadhi. (寂滅者名為一心，一心者名為如來藏，入自內身智慧境界，得無生法忍三昧。)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 14th, 2018 at 4:36 AM

Title: Re: Traces of scholasticism in (Zen) Buddhism

Content:

MattiV said:

do I really have to spend a lifetime to understand the various distinctions in the (Zen) Buddhist tradition?

Astus wrote:

If you want to understand the various distinctions, then most likely. If you want to focus on gaining a foothold in the tradition - entering the gate of no gate - then the quickest way is to follow an authentic teacher's instructions and practise as if your head were on fire.

As for some practical/companion literature for Zen practice:

Yunqi Zhuhong: <https://books.google.hu/books?id=qGPDBAAAQBAJ>

Seosan Hyujeong: Seonga Gwigam (http://www.acmuller.net/kor-bud/collected_works.html)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 16th, 2018 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: Best Taisho Tripitaka translation?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The http://21dzk.l.u-tokyo.ac.jp/SAT/index_en.html has not been translated to English, only some texts in it.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 19th, 2018 at 8:05 PM

Title: Re: Recommendations for Yogacara works?

Content:

Astus wrote:

-

http://www.bdkamerica.org/system/files/pdf/dBET_Beta_T1593_SummaryoftheGreatVehicle_2003.pdf?file=1&type=node&id=475 (PDF)

- <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Mahayana-sutra-alamkara-karika>

- <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Madhyanta-vibhanga-karika>

- <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Abhidharma-samuccaya>

-

http://www.bdkamerica.org/system/files/pdf/dBET_ThreeShortTreatises_2017.pdf?file=1&type=node&id=787 (PDF)

-

http://www.bdkamerica.org/system/files/pdf/dBET_Alpha_ThreeTextsonConsciousnessOnly_1999.pdf?file=1&type=node&id=456 (PDF)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 20th, 2018 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Recommendations for Yogacara works?

Content:

Matt J said:

The prime text of Chan used to be the Lankavatara.

Astus wrote:

The Lankavatara was relevant within the East Mountain ("Northern") School, but the Diamond Sutra was the most prominent with the Southern School, and continues to be up until today. There are only three commentaries on the sutra itself in the Taisho: T1789, 4 vols, by Zongle (Linji Chan, 1318–1391); T1790, 1 vol, by Fazang (Huayan, 643–712); T1791, 10 vol, by Baochen (?-688?). But there are other commentaries in the Zokuzokyo, in volumes 17 and 18 there are 14 in all (2 from Tang, 3 from Song, 8 from Ming, 1 from Qing era), like X321, 3 vols, by Zhiyan (671?-722?); X323, 6 vols, by Shanyue (Tiantai, 1149-1241); X324, 4 vols, by Zhengshou (Yunmen Chan, 1147-1209); X329, 9 vols, by Zhixu (Jingtu, 1599-1655).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 21st, 2018 at 4:28 AM

Title: Re: Recommendations for Yogacara works?

Content:

Matt J said:

Is it your position that the Lankavatara was not passed down from Bodhidharma to the early Patriarchs?

Astus wrote:

As for the role of the Lankavatara Sutra: "Although this scripture apparently had some kind of mysterious appeal to the followers of early Ch'an, there is no evidence that its contents had any particular impact on the development of the school." (John R. McRae: The Northern School and the Formation of Early Ch'an Buddhism, p 29)

And even if the Lankavatara Sutra was used to some extent by the early Chan teachers - although there is little evidence for that - the later tradition clearly did not use it much. Just a quick search showed that in the Blue Cliff Record the sutra is referenced twice, in Dahui's letters and the Book of Serenity quoted once and referred to once, and in the Collected Works of Chinul, in Dogen's two works (Shobogenzo, Eihei Koroku), in the Records of Baizhang and Linji there is no mention of it at all.

Matt J said:

I would say now that Zen draws a lot of its teaching from the Tathagatagarbha/Yogacara strands of Buddhism.

Astus wrote:

Chan was supplemented mostly by Sanlun (Madhyamaka), Tiantai, and Huayan teachings, if we want to specify particular sets of doctrines. Neither the Faxian (Yogacara) teachings, nor the Yogacarabhumishastra is used as a source material to support Chan teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 21st, 2018 at 7:16 PM

Title: Re: Recommendations for Yogacara works?

Content:

Matt J said:

I'm not really sure why you want to divorce Zen from the Buddha.

Astus wrote:

This is only about the role of the Lankavatara Sutra in Zen, nothing more.

Matt J said:

Some quips from Red Pine, who knows more than me about Chan and the Lankavatara

Astus wrote:

That does not show the role of the sutra in Zen, it only makes a number of generic statements based on personal assumptions.

Matt J said:

As for Yogacara, you're probably the first scholar/practitioner I've come across who denies that Yogacara had an influence on Zen/Chan.

Astus wrote:

Perhaps it'd be better to be more specific about what is meant by "Yogacara" and what counts as an influence. Xuanzang died in 664, Shenhui was born in 684, Mazu was born in 709, so if there had been a Yogacara influence, it should have been that of Xuanzang's. But even if we consider the Dilun and Shelun, as thecowisflying noted, there should be some doctrinal correspondence pointed out for that. However, it doesn't look like that Zen had anything like that, but if you have something to the contrary, please show.

This doesn't sound very Yogacara to me:

"since the past this teaching of ours has first taken nonthought as its central doctrine, the formless as its essence, and nonabiding as its fundamental."
(Platform Sutra, ch 4, BDK ed, p 43)

Another summary from a few hundred years later:

"Question: What is the characteristic of this school?

Answer: The Zen school has the Diamond Sutra and the Vimalakirti Sutra as its main references. Its principle is that the mind is nothing other than the Buddha. A mind freed from clinging to anything constitutes its religious act. Its purpose is [to cause people to realize] that everything that has its own characteristics is empty of self-nature. Since the Buddha handed down the robe and bowl to Kasyapa, transmission from master to disciple has not changed. Details are known from the records."

(A Treatise on Letting Zen Flourish, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 101)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 22nd, 2018 at 6:18 PM

Title: Re: Dharma Wheel Heavy Weights

Content:

Drenpa said:

Have you commented here on DW at greater length about the insights gained from these stories/koans?

Astus wrote:

No, I have not. But if there is a koan you want to discuss with others, why not open a topic for that in the Zen section?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 23rd, 2018 at 8:30 PM

Title: Re: Recommendations for Yogacara works?

Content:

Matt J said:

Many Zen practitioners seem to take it as a given--- ... After all, Vasubandhu is listed as a Zen Patriarch

Astus wrote:

In that case it shouldn't be difficult to compare some works of Vasubandhu with the works of some Zen teachers and show the correspondences.

Matt J said:

You can also read Hakuin elucidate on the Eight Consciousnesses and the Four Cognitions in Cleary's Kensho: The Heart of Zen. The Four Cognitions is interesting because he talks about the three kayas and the transformation of consciousness, both very Yogacara.

Astus wrote:

Talking of the eight consciousnesses, the three bodies, and the four wisdoms is not unique to Yogacara. Both Hakuin and Jinul teach that the bodies and wisdoms exist inherently, but that is contrary to what you find in the Mahayanasamgraha or the Cheng Weish Lun. Furthermore, Hakuin very much simplifies the function of the bodies and wisdoms, as it is common within Zen.

Matt J said:

One can look at Chinul's Straightforward Explanation of the True Mind in the same text.

Astus wrote:

That text differentiates right at the beginning the scriptural and the patriarchal teachings. Furthermore, it talks of inherent buddha-nature, a concept that is denied not only by the doctrine of the five gotras, but also how the mind is understood in Yogacara.

Matt J said:

Yogacara flavored ideas

Astus wrote:

It seems that is a different flavour.

Matt J said:

Here's a bit from Ma Zu, in Zen's Chinese Heritage by Andy Ferguson: Believe that your own mind is Buddha. This very mind is buddha mind.

Astus wrote:

Not according to Yogacara, where this mind is very much the product of defilements.

Matt J said:

he brought with him the text of the Lankavatara Sutra

Astus wrote:

It already existed in Chinese.

Matt J said:

using it as the seal of the mind-ground of sentient beings.

Astus wrote:

The ground is the alayavijnana in Yogacara, not some sort of pure consciousness.

Matt J said:

A bit of Hui Hai, from Zen: Teaching of Instantaneous Awakening by John Blofeld:

A: Mind is the root.

Astus wrote:

Again, nothing specific to Yogacara. Look at the first two stanzas of the <https://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/kn/dhp/dhp.01.budd.html>:

"Mind precedes all mental states. Mind is their chief; they are all mind-wrought. If with an impure mind a person speaks or acts suffering follows him like the wheel that follows the foot of the ox. Mind precedes all mental states. Mind is their chief; they are all mind-wrought. If with a pure mind a person speaks or acts happiness follows him like his never-departing shadow."

Matt J said:

While on Blofeld, here is some Huang Po, from his Zen Teaching of Huang Po: This Mind, which is without beginning, is unborn and indestructible

Astus wrote:

All eight consciousnesses are momentary, definitely not indestructible.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 26th, 2018 at 3:16 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land teachings from a Zen perspective

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

In Zen practice, it's often said there's nothing to attain. This is because the practice itself is an outward expression of the Buddha-nature we already are, which has been obscured by the deluded ego.

Astus wrote:

As long as the nature is obscured, it cannot be expressed.

Dharma Flower said:

From a Zen perspective, Pure Land practice is an expression of our original nature, which is the same as Amida Buddha's. In reciting the name of Amida and bowing to his image, we humble the ego-self to let the Amida-self shine through.

Astus wrote:

With the obscuration present, all actions are the products of ignorance.

"If you don't see your nature, invoking Buddhas, reciting sutras, making offerings, and keeping precepts are all useless."

(Bodhidharma: Bloodstream Sermon, tr Red Pine)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 26th, 2018 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land teachings from a Zen perspective

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

The point is not to purify the mind, but instead to uncover the innately pure mind, through gradual cultivation.

Astus wrote:

What's the difference between purifying and uncovering? Both stands for removing all elements of obscuration. But how can recitation remove them?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 27th, 2018 at 3:52 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land teachings from a Zen perspective

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

has been endorsed by trustworthy teachers and masters throughout Buddhist history.

Astus wrote:

By those who aimed for birth in Sukhavati, not as a method for liberation in this life.

Dharma Flower said:

Amitabha is our own Buddha-nature, and that the Pure Land is the innately pure mind.

Astus wrote:

That doesn't validate recitation as the appropriate practice to realise it.

Dharma Flower said:

Whatever motivates you to practice a good Buddhist practice is the right motivation.

Astus wrote:

Not really. Motivation itself is a defining factor of what one's practice is good for.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 27th, 2018 at 4:09 PM

Title: Re: The Interpenetration of Principle & Phenomena

Content:

Astus wrote:

If it were as you stated, why cannot reciting "bodhi, bodhi" make one awakened? Also, how come that those millions of Pure Land practitioners were/are not all enlightened beings despite regularly reciting the name? Even such well known Amitabha devotees like Honen remained deluded beings all their lives, furthermore, it is a basic point of the Pure Land teachings that one should recognise being ignorant and sinful.

Dharma Flower said:

In reciting the name of Amida Buddha, we are calling the name of our true nature, awakening the Buddha within. This is due to the interpenetration of principle and phenomena.

Astus wrote:

True nature, the principle, is just the absence of self-nature, while the phenomenal aspect, the conventional nature, is the name, the concept. So, while people have names, there is no person behind the name, there is nobody to call. Therefore, calling the name of true nature is no different from shouting in an empty house. There is none to answer.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 27th, 2018 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: "One Mind" in Hua Yen thought

Content:

Sherab said:

even ultimate truth is merely a conventional truth.

Astus wrote:

Ultimate has a meaning only relative to conventional, hence it is a conventional concept like all other concepts, otherwise one would have to claim that there is an ultimate concept.

Sherab said:

This would mean that the ultimate is a convention just like the relative.

Astus wrote:

So it is.

Sherab said:

As the ultimate truth is also a conventional truth, and since you said that the ultimate truth is the perception of emptiness of dependently originated phenomena, that very perception is not a perception of emptiness etc. but is merely labeled as a perception and is every bit as illusory as any perceived relative phenomena.

Astus wrote:
Even emptiness is empty.

Sherab said:
So even perception of emptiness cannot be trusted as a true perception. In fact, nothing can be trusted as true whether relatively or ultimately once the statement that the ultimate truth is merely a conventional truth is accepted.

Astus wrote:
Nothing should be trusted at all. When the mind abides nowhere, that is when it is free from clinging.

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, February 27th, 2018 at 10:33 PM
Title: Re: Pure Land teachings from a Zen perspective
Content:
Dharma Flower said:
Numerous books are freely available on Pure Land teachings from a Ch'an/Zen perspective, particularly through the YMBA.

Astus wrote:
Could you quote a few sentences from those works that clearly state one can attain liberation in this life through the exclusive practice of recitation?

For instance, in <https://ymba.org/books/mind-seal-buddhas/essence-sutra> to the Shorter Sutra it's explicitly stated that recitation is the way to attain birth:

"Reciting the Buddha-name with faith and vows is a true causal basis for the Supreme Vehicle. The four kinds of Pure Land [the Land Where Saints and Ordinary Beings Dwell Together, the Land of Expedient Liberation, the Land of Real Reward, and the Land of Eternally Quiescent Light] are the wondrous fruits of the One Vehicle. If you have the causal basis, then the result is sure to follow.

...

The powerful function of this sutra is to enable us to be reborn in the Pure Land and never fall back. Rebirth in the Pure Land can be categorized in terms of the Four Pure Lands, and also into nine grades in each land. Here I will give a brief explanation of the characteristics of the Four Lands.

If you recite the Buddha-name without cutting off your delusions of views and thoughts, depending on how scattered or how concentrated you are, you are reborn in the level of the Land Where Saints and Ordinary Beings Live Together.

If you recite the Buddha-name to the point of singlemindedness (phenomenal level), your delusions of views and thoughts are cut off and you are born in the land that is the fruit of practicing expedient means: the Land of Expedient Liberation [where Arhats live].

If you recite the Buddha-name to the point of singlemindedness (noumenon or inner truth level), and you smash from one to forty-one levels of delusion and ignorance, then you are born in the Pure Land of Real Reward [where Bodhisattvas live].

If you recite the Buddha-name to the point that ignorance and delusion are totally cut off, this is the highest reward and you will be reborn in the Land of Eternally Quiescent Light [where the Buddhas dwell]."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 28th, 2018 at 4:03 AM

Title: Re: The Interpenetration of Principle & Phenomena

Content:

Sentient Light said:

the point you're trying to make here

Astus wrote:

It is simply that recitation in itself is insufficient as a method for liberation in this life. The biography of Hai Xian shows that he practised many virtues and lived a renunciate life, and that is already a lot more than simply intoning the six syllables a few times in one's living room every day.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 28th, 2018 at 7:04 PM

Title: Re: The Interpenetration of Principle & Phenomena

Content:

Sentient Light said:

Solid point, but afaik, only Shinran explicitly teaches only recitation. Honen was well-practiced in many additional methods.

Astus wrote:

Honen was the one who started the teaching of senju nenbutsu in Japan, where simply the oral recitation of the name is sufficient for attaining birth. The four auxiliary practices are subordinate to nenbutsu and their application is conditional.

Sentient Light said:

Many of the masters I listed also practiced Chan/Thien and some Tantra.

Astus wrote:

In other words, they practised buddha remembrance within the larger framework of the six paramitas.

Sentient Light said:

the quiescence of the mind results in direct perception of one's Buddha-nature and penetrating insight into the nature of phenomena.

Astus wrote:

Even non-Buddhists can attain the various dhyanas, so a quiet mind is insufficient for liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 2nd, 2018 at 7:19 PM

Title: Re: What are the General Mahayana Teachings?

Content:

Grigoris said:

It seems like a fine distinction based on the fact that there was no conception of an atman in phenomena so the Buddha's teaching on anatman was not enough to cover the emptiness of phenomena too.

Malcolm said:

Yes, this is the observation made about Nikaya/Agama sūtras.

Astus wrote:

The view that sravakas do not know the emptiness of phenomena is more a Yogacara interpretation than a universal one. After a number of quotes - e.g.

<https://suttacentral.net/en/sa297>

(<https://www.accesstosight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.035.than.html>) - from the Agamas the

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Mah%C4%81praj%C3%B1%C4%81p%C4%81ramit%C4%81upade%C5%9Ba> states:

"In place after place within the sutras of the Śrāvakas are discussions such as these which explain the emptiness of all dharmas."

(http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/N6P_excerpts/N6P_X-Bk4_X-15.pdf, http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T25n1509_018#0193c01)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 3rd, 2018 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: What are the General Mahayana Teachings?

Content:

Coëmgenu said:

But also: the āgamāḥ do not necessarily equal "śrāvaka Buddhadharma". Śrāvaka Buddhadharma is also Abhidharma, treatises, etc.

Astus wrote:

If it is said that sravakas do not see the emptiness of dharmas, but believe that dharmas are self-existent, and that belief is taught not in the agamas but in the abhidharma, then which abhidharma is taught by the Buddha before the Mahayana sutras?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 3rd, 2018 at 5:37 AM

Title: Re: What are the General Mahayana Teachings?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The Great Discourse on the Emptiness of Dharmas and its analogue do not really discuss the emptiness of phenomena, it refers to the emptiness of persons.

Astus wrote:

It might not be the best example, but that's how it is interpreted in the MPPS. And there is a reason to say that it confirms the emptiness of appearances, because it talks of how there is no self in dependent origination, in other words, appearances are empty.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 3rd, 2018 at 7:09 AM

Title: Re: What are the General Mahayana Teachings?

Content:

Malcolm said:

One can infer the selflessness of phenomena from teachings in the Agamas, but it is not directly taught there.

Astus wrote:

Nor is it taught that they are self-existent, hence nothing to oppose the emptiness of appearances to. And as far as the aggregates and sense-areas go, they are taught to be without self many times.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 3rd, 2018 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: What are the General Mahayana Teachings?

Content:

Malcolm said:

This the selflessness of the person, not of phenomena.

Astus wrote:

The selflessness of person is that there is no person, only the aggregates, while the selflessness of phenomena is that the aggregates themselves are without essence. The sutra talks about how phenomena themselves are dependent and without any will of their own, so it matches what the Lankavatara Sutra (2.24, tr Red Pine) says: "And what does it mean to know that dharmas have no self? It means to be aware that the self-existence of the skandhas, dhatus, and ayatanas is imaginary, that the skandhas, dhatus, and ayatanas are devoid of a self or anything that belongs to a self, that the skandhas, dhatus, and ayatanas are assemblages tied to desire and karma and that they arise from the interplay of conditions but are themselves passive, and that all dharmas are like this."

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 4th, 2018 at 2:12 AM

Title: Re: What are the General Mahayana Teachings?

Content:
Malcolm said:
it is not extensively mentioned in these texts.

Astus wrote:
And the reason for that is that dharmas are not taught to have/be svabhava in them either, furthermore, even the concept of dharma as a fundamental element is missing. And according to Bhikkhu Bodhi (Comprehensive Manual of Abhidhamma, p 3): "Even in the Abhidhamma Pitaka itself the dhamma theory is not yet expressed as an explicit philosophical tenet; this comes only later, in the Commentaries."

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, March 4th, 2018 at 5:04 AM
Title: Re: What are the General Mahayana Teachings?
Content:
Malcolm said:
Whatever the case may be, the issue is not addressed at length in the Nikayas/Agamas.

Astus wrote:
So it is.

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, March 11th, 2018 at 4:49 AM
Title: Re: Nāgārjuna's Fourfold Negation & Śrāvakayāna
Content:
Coëmgenu said:
How does venerable Nāgārjuna's fourfold (or eightfold) negation build, via logic, inference, sūtra-citation, etc, upon the various negations presented in śrāvakayāna (i.e. Sarvāstivāda, Mahāsāṃghika, Theravāda/Pāli, etc) literature?

Astus wrote:
It is merely a format to negate all possibilities, an extension on denying the extremes of existence and annihilation. It is not an argument in itself.

Coëmgenu said:
And, a last question: from where does this treatment of the Chariot simile by the venerable Candrakīrti originate? Which text does he discuss it in?

Astus wrote:
Madhyamakavatara 6.151-161.

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, March 11th, 2018 at 6:06 PM
Title: Re: Tradition shmadition, lineage shmineage

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thinking in terms of tradition and lineage is not a particularly useful approach, because it focuses only on people and communities instead of the precepts and the teachings. Neither tradition nor lineage mean much in terms of view and practice. At the same time, traditions themselves usually try to include everything that there is in Buddhism, and build a more or less systematic interpretation of all the teachings, thus showing the same approach of inclusiveness as those who today want to embrace the divergent teachings and methods.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 12th, 2018 at 1:28 AM

Title: Re: Tradition shmadition, lineage shmineage

Content:

Malcolm said:

This is not true. They mean everything. For example, you will never find creation and completion stage in common Mahāyāna, nor the view of four-fold emptiness in Śrāvakayāna.

Astus wrote:

Is common Mahayana a tradition? What lineage claims to be its upholder?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 12th, 2018 at 2:07 AM

Title: Re: Tradition shmadition, lineage shmineage

Content:

Malcolm said:

we define traditions based on the disciplines we follow.

Astus wrote:

In that case those who take the five precepts, the bodhisattva vows, and the samayas, can follow sravaka, bodhisattva, and vajrayana teachings at the same time. After all, one of the four main Mahayana vows is mastering all teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 12th, 2018 at 7:17 PM

Title: Re: Tradition shmadition, lineage shmineage

Content:

Malcolm said:

as long as they take care not to mix up the different levels of teachings.

Astus wrote:

So being "Drukpa Kagyu" or "Rinzai Zen" is not an issue and has no relevance. That's why I said that tradition and lineage were not the key factors.

Malcolm said:

With respect to the last point, however, that is really oriented towards mastering the five sciences.

Astus wrote:

What I referred to was the https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/glossary/individual.html?key=verse_of_four_universal_vows, and that says "Dharma gates", meaning Buddhist teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 12th, 2018 at 9:00 PM

Title: Re: Tradition shmadition, lineage shmineage

Content:

Malcolm said:

If you start practicing Vajrayana, you will no longer be someone who practices Rinzai, and vice versa.

Astus wrote:

Neither Vajrayana nor Rinzai Zen means a specific method but they include various teachings and techniques, don't they?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 12th, 2018 at 11:32 PM

Title: Re: Tradition shmadition, lineage shmineage

Content:

Malcolm said:

Vajryāna does in fact mean a specific method: creation stage and completion stage, which themselves depends on empowerment.

Astus wrote:

Is there anything in Vajrayana that could not be categorised under those two stages? If no, are all creation and completion stage practices equal? If no, why call it a specific method, when they are actually large categories of numerous methods? Furthermore, what would not allow someone to practise first a sadhana of Tara, then contemplate on Joshu's Mu, and finish off with observing the disgusting nature of the body?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 13th, 2018 at 5:38 AM

Title: Re: Tradition shmadition, lineage shmineage

Content:

Grigoris said:

Nothing would "not allow" you to do this. But why would you?

Astus wrote:

There might be some who find it beneficial to combine practices like that.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 13th, 2018 at 5:41 AM

Title: Re: Tradition shmadition, lineage shmineage

Content:

Simon E. said:

Sounds like a smorgasbord

Astus wrote:

How is it any different from complex groupings of teachings like what you see in Huayan, Tiantai, Nyingma, and Kagyu?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 13th, 2018 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: Tradition shmadition, lineage shmineage

Content:

Malcolm said:

one cannot randomly use one completion method given in one system with that of another system

Astus wrote:

But one can use them systematically, like what is itself a combination of different methods from all three systems: the six dharmas of Naropa. And if one has learnt different techniques from different teachers, it is quite normal to practise them, from which comes a person who can then teach such previously diverse techniques as a single set. Isn't that rather the usual situation, while knowing only one technique and having a single teacher is fairly rare?

Malcolm said:

What people do in their own caves is their own business, but I have never heard Vajrayāna master teach Joshu's mu. It isn't needed.

Astus wrote:

The need arises from what works.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 13th, 2018 at 4:23 PM

Title: Re: Tradition shmadition, lineage shmineage

Content:

Malcolm said:

This is how we roll in Vajrayāna. If you mix systems, it is considered very bad.

Astus wrote:

What was the point in history when systems became frozen and no new lineages emerged?

Malcolm said:

That is very bad, not allowed, and the Dharmapālas of both systems will become unhappy and punish the offender.

Astus wrote:

That being so, it seems to be more of a Vajrayana issue, as nobody else is concerned with keeping the teachings and methods separate, even if there were periods when "purity of the tradition" was deemed important.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 13th, 2018 at 6:04 PM

Title: Re: Tradition shmadition, lineage shmineage

Content:

Simon E. said:

the teachings of those two schools are posited on a relationship with a bone fide teacher of the lineage. They are not stand alone buffets.

Astus wrote:

Are all teachers the same, or are there differences in terms of what they specialise in? If there are specialists, it means one has to study with more than one in order to learn things beyond the basics (or sometimes even just the basics).

The Brahma Net Sutra (BDK ed, p 50) has this as one of the minor precepts:

"Do Not Miss a Chance to Attend Dharma Lectures

My disciples, the Vinaya scripture is lectured on everywhere. When a large house is the venue for a Dharma lecture, newly awakened bodhisattvas should bring their sutra and vinaya scrolls and go to the place of that Dharma teacher to listen and ask questions. Whether the venue is under the trees in the forest, or in a room owned by the sangha, or any other place, you should listen to the best of your ability. If you fail to attend such a lecture, this constitutes a minor transgression of the precepts."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 13th, 2018 at 6:39 PM

Title: Re: Tradition shmadition, lineage shmineage

Content:

Miroku said:

do you mix suddenly rinzai things into your teachings although you might be only slightly familiar with them?

Astus wrote:

Zen is not a matter of method but a matter of realisation. Once the nature of mind is realised, the buddha-mind can manifest the skilful means. So the main benefit a teacher can provide is appropriate, personal instructions, therefore they can be practically anything.

"If they use their hands, I hit them on the hands. If they use their mouths, I hit them in the mouth. If they use their eyes, I hit them in the eye. ... There is no fixed doctrine to give to people, only methods to cure diseases and release bonds."

(Recorded Sayings of Linji, in Three Chan Classics, BDK ed, p 33)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 14th, 2018 at 1:13 AM

Title: Re: Tradition shmadition, lineage shmineage

Content:

Malcolm said:

Tsongkhapa was really the last Tibetan to initiate the founding of a new lineage of teachings.

Astus wrote:

How does that compare to the revealed teachings in Nyingma, like the Longchen Nyingthig and the Lamrim Yeshe Nyingpo?

Malcolm said:

The original question involved mixing different levels of teachings.

Astus wrote:

It was along the lines of "we don't need to limit ourselves to one tradition, and we can take the best parts of many traditions as it helps us in our practice and daily life".

Malcolm said:

Lineage is the most important thing in Vajrayāna because the practice in general involves initiation into various mandalas, and the procedure must be like impressing a seal in wax.

Astus wrote:

Although this I haven't really heard about actually happening - except perhaps by Yogi Chen - if the method and transmission is left intact, any Vajrayana practice could be incorporated into another system, like in Tendai, could it not? Tantric rituals are still present in Chinese Buddhism, just as they were there in Zen in Japan before the 18th century reformations.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 14th, 2018 at 4:27 AM

Title: Re: Tradition shmadition, lineage shmineage

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, this means mixing levels of teachings.

Astus wrote:

Integrating into one's practice the various levels of discipline for instance is a viable and recommended approach, while at the same time it's also possible to stick to only one type. On the other hand, at least for sravaka and bodhisattva precepts, there are arguments (and traditions) both for and against such mixing.

Malcolm said:

There is no such thing as the "best parts of many traditions" because all Buddhadharma is perfect in the beginning, middle, and end.

Astus wrote:

But there are always individual preferences. And although it may not seem fruitful to mix one's own salad, eventually, through increasing familiarity and deepening of understanding, one arrives at a view that matches one of the systems. And even if not, one's discipline, concentration, faith, and mindfulness strengthens.

Malcolm said:

once you have joined Vajrayāna teachings, you won't really be a Tendai, etc., practitioner anymore.

Astus wrote:

Why would that be?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 14th, 2018 at 4:52 PM

Title: Re: A Zen story that stayed with me for decades

Content:

Drenpa said:

some definitive source re how these stories are used traditionally with a teacher

Astus wrote:

The classic way where stories are used for training is phrase contemplation (<http://sweepingzen.com/kanhua-chan/>). For the short version, read Wumen's comment on Zhaozhou's Wu. For a longer explanation see http://hsuyun.budismo.net/en/dharma/chan_sessions2.html. For an extensive explanation read http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/bbs/board.php?bo_table=3020

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 16th, 2018 at 4:04 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land teachings from a Zen perspective

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

My particular favorite are these words from the Tientai and Ch'an master Ou-i

Astus wrote:

That quote does not say that simply reciting the name is equal to the realisation of buddha-nature. In fact, <https://www.ymba.org/books/mind-seal-buddhas/explanation-text/main-portion/practice> about the practice, just before explaining its two levels:

"If you hear [the Buddha-name] and believe in it, if you believe in it and make vows, then you are fit to recite the Buddha-name. If you do not have faith and do not make vows, it is as if you never heard [the Buddha-name] at all. Merely hearing the name of Amitabha [without faith and vows] may become a long-term causal basis [for your enlightenment], but it cannot be called the "wisdom that comes from hearing""

Dharma Flower said:

In terms of my personal practice, I am interested in learning about Pure Land teachings from a Ch'an/Zen perspective.

Astus wrote:

Then you might also consider those who did not view name recitation as equal to Zen practice. Such teachers were Bodhidharma, Huineng, Linji, Dogen, and Hakuin, just to mention the most well known ones.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 16th, 2018 at 6:21 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land teachings from a Zen perspective

Content:

ItsRaining said:

A lot of teachers do use recitation as a Chan practice though, I think Chinul and Hanshan Deqing both wrote a short text on recitation from a Chan perspective.

Astus wrote:

Of course, recitation can be used for meditation. But for what purpose is the important question. There are two goals one can reach with it: calming the mind, and attaining birth in Sukhavati. Insight, or in Zen terms: seeing the nature of mind, is not within the practice's scope. One common difference between the interpretations of Pure Land and Zen teachers is that those who advocate recitation (and other forms of recollection) of Amitabha within Zen emphasise the need to have not only pure morality but also a calm mind in order to attain birth, while Pure Land teachers emphasise vow and faith as the essential conditions of birth, and recitation as a support for them. What nobody seems to claim is that with recitation alone one could actually attain enlightenment in this life.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 16th, 2018 at 7:26 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land teachings from a Zen perspective

Content:

ItsRaining said:

Though by the end it is no longer just a verbal recitation.

Astus wrote:

That's the thing, it changes into a different sort of practice than repeating the name, hence it is no longer recitation. Such a practice of buddha-remembrance was already taught by Daoxin (see <https://www.dailyzen.com/journal/calming-the-mind>), and in the Pure Land tradition it is called the <http://eubuddhist.blogspot.hu/2015/10/real-mark-buddha-remembrance.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 26th, 2018 at 4:34 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land teachings from a Zen perspective

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

distinction Zen makes between kensho and full Buddhahood

Astus wrote:

That's not a generally accepted distinction.

Dharma Flower said:

According to Zen master Hakuin, a Nembutsu practitioner can experience kensho or small enlightenment through reciting the Nembutsu, with the understanding that the Buddha-nature within is ultimately the same as Amida Buddha's:
<https://www.lionsroar.com/the-hidden-lamp/>

Astus wrote:

That is a story - not a statement by Hakuin on nenbutsu - but even there, the realisation does not come about because of nenbutsu.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 27th, 2018 at 4:38 AM

Title: Re: Pure Land teachings from a Zen perspective

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

Please see this post from Meido Moore Roshi, I'm sorry if I've misinterpreted it:
<https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=441660#p399918>

Astus wrote:

He did not write that Hakuin had confirmed such a view where nenbutsu could be the cause of kensho. In fact, he wrote: "nothing to do with Nembutsu itself really".

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 27th, 2018 at 5:33 PM

Title: Re: Mind-streams: Separate?

Content:

Matt J said:

These traditions rely on at least three claims to support its contention: 1) that consciousness, stripped of all bliss, mental, energetic, and physical bodies, has no distinguishable characteristics;

Astus wrote:

If one removes all characteristics, clearly there are no characteristics left. The difference between substantialists (e.g. Vedanta) and insubstantialists (Buddhists), is that the latter does not assume an invisible essence once the onion layers (pancakosa/panca(upadana)skandha) are gone.

Matt J said:

The issue with the Buddhist view is that the mind is not physical, so what keeps minds apart? If the mind is bound or bordered in some way, this boundary or border should be discoverable within the mind.

Astus wrote:

What keeps thoughts apart? Does being apart make any sense without spatial dimensions? In any case, minds have different causes and conditions.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2018 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: Mind-streams: Separate?

Content:

Rick said:

To call Brahman an "invisible essence" is to impute attributes to attributelessness.

Astus wrote:

As long as it is assumed to exist, (not to mention being conscious and blissful), there is an assumption of essence. But if it is not considered existent, then there is nothing to talk about.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2018 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Mind-streams: Separate?

Content:

Queequeg said:

it suggests that it is possible to peel the layers back and get to some "zero".

Astus wrote:

In a way it is possible, and that is the standard analysis performed in vipasyana.

"when they are broken into subtle particles and the nature of the parts of these subtle particles is individually examined, no definite identity can be found."
(Bhavanakrama, in Stages of Meditation, p 129)

Queequeg said:

one utilizes concepts to remove concepts... in practice it would seem this would just lead to infinite regression

Astus wrote:

Not at all. One first has to eliminate wrong views with the right view, then it is possible to become free from views.

"Remedying illusion by means of an illusion is like rubbing sticks together to make fire: with the two sticks serving as cause to one another, flames burst forth, the sticks are consumed, their ashes fly away, and the smoke disappears, [leaving nothing behind]."
(Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment, ch 2, in Apocryphal Scriptures, BDK ed, p 62)

Queequeg said:

If I'm conceptualizing, I prefer the idea of a nexus of causes and conditions to illustrate the nature of self. One can leave the causes and conditions in place, without peeling them back, and still get some notion of the "self" to be some meta effect of these intersecting causes and conditions.

Astus wrote:

Either by contemplating the elements or dependent origination, in both cases one looks into how experiences lack an enduring essence.

"If a bodhisattva attains a fixed mind, he should observe that the twelve links are empty and without a proprietor. Ignorance does not perceive that it creates conduct. Conduct does not perceive that it has arisen from ignorance. Conduct simply arises conditioned by ignorance. It is just like a sprout arising from the seed of a plant. The seed does not perceive that it produces the sprout. Nor does the sprout perceive that it has arisen from the seed. Likewise up to old age and death. [The bodhisattva] observes and realizes that each of these twelve links has neither proprietor nor self. It is just like plants of the external [world] that have no proprietor. Merely out of wrong views one misconceives that there is self."
(Sutra on the Concentration of Sitting Meditation, BDK ed, p 74)

Queequeg said:

Incidentally, I think the concept of a nexus of causes and conditions very aptly illustrates how discrete mindstreams can be posited while also illustrating how such mindstreams can relate to each other.

Astus wrote:

Minds cannot intersect, nor relate to each other directly.

"The conscious construction of the difference between oneself and others is engendered from the seminal permeation of belief in self."
(Summary of the Great Vehicle, BDK ed, p 37)

And,

"Knowledge of those,
[Who claim] to know other minds,
Is unreal,
Just as one's knowledge of one's own mind
[Is unreal]."
(Vimsatika, v 21, in A Buddhist Doctrine of Experience, p 274)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2018 at 3:12 PM

Title: Re: Mind-streams: Separate?

Content:

Queequeg said:

My point is, the onion or plantain tree as a metaphor leaves something to be desired.

Astus wrote:

Is <https://dharmaheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=441900#p441900> that "it assumes characteristics to peel back, suggestive of a process replete with all manner of concepts - one utilizes concepts to remove concepts... in practice it would seem this would just lead to infinite regression."? If so, let me answer to the below point.

Queequeg said:

This is using a process of analysis which I suggested above leads to an infinite regression. If done meticulously. Why? Because there is always a remainder.

Astus wrote:

The quoted example of sticks burned by their fire is quite universal in Mahayana. Let me give here Tsongkhapa's (The Great Treatise on the Stages of the Path, vol 3, p 344-345) more extensive response to the objection.

Objection: Since analytical discrimination of the meaning of selflessness is conceptual, it is contradictory that it should produce the nonconceptual sublime wisdom. This is because there must be harmony between an effect and its cause.

Reply: The Bhagavan himself spoke about this using an example. The Kasyapa Chapter Sutra (Kasyapa-parivarta-sutra) says:

Kasyapa, it is thus. For example, two trees are dragged against each other by the wind and from that a fire starts, burning the two trees. In the same way, Kasyapa, if you have correct analytical discrimination, the power of a noble being's wisdom will emerge. With its emergence, correct analytical discrimination will itself be burned up.

This means that the wisdom of a noble being emerges from analytical discrimination.

Kamalasila's second Stages of Meditation says:

Thus, yogis analyze with wisdom and when they definitely do not apprehend the essence of any thing ultimately, they enter into the nonconceptual concentration. They know that all phenomena lack essence. There are some whose meditation does not involve the use of wisdom to investigate the essence of things; they only cultivate the sheer and complete elimination of mental activity. Their conceptions never end and they never know the absence of essence because they lack the light of wisdom. Thus, when the fire which is a precise understanding of reality arises from correct analytical discrimination, then - as in the case of the fire from the friction of two sticks rubbed together - the wood of conceptual thought is burned up. This is what the Bhagavan said. Otherwise, since it would be impossible for an uncontaminated path to arise from a contaminated path, an ordinary being could not attain the state of a noble being because of the dissimilarity between the cause and the effect. In the same way, it is evident that there are limitless cases of dissimilar causes and effects, such as the production of a green seedling from a gray seed, the production of smoke from fire, and the production of a male child from a woman. A noble being's nonconceptual sublime wisdom is perceptual knowledge of the meaning of selflessness - the emptiness of the object of the conception of the two selves. In order to develop that sort of wisdom at a higher stage, your meditation must now precisely analyze the object of the conception of self and realize that it does not exist. Therefore, although this is conceptual, it is a cause which is very conducive to the nonconceptual sublime wisdom. As previously cited, the King of Concentrations Sutra says:

If you analytically discriminate the lack of self in phenomena

And if you cultivate that precise analysis in meditation,

This will cause you to reach the goal, the attainment of nirvana.

There is no peace through any other cause.

Therefore, Kamalasila's third Stages of Meditation says,

Even though it has a conceptual nature, its nature is one of proper mental activity.

Therefore, because it engenders the nonconceptual sublime wisdom, those who seek the sublime wisdom should rely upon it.

Queequeg said:

In practice, one takes the analysis to the limits of one's experience, but if you're completely honest, there is always a remainder, and so one can't be sure all analysis has been exhausted; we can only extend to the limits of our analysis.

Astus wrote:

There are very clear boundaries given in Buddhism, commonly in the format of the five aggregates and six sensory areas (see the Loka Suttas at SN <https://www.accesstoinsight.org/ati/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.044.than.html>).

<https://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn35/sn35.082.than.html> and

"Subhuti: How does perfect wisdom instruct the Tathagatas in this world, and what is it that the Tathagatas call 'world'?"

The Lord: The five skandhas have by the Tathagata have declared as 'world' [loka].

Which five? Form, feeling, perceptions, impulses, and consciousness."

(PP8K, 12.2, tr Conze)

A larger list of "all things" is found in the abhidharma works.

Queequeg said:

The whole point of the metaphor suggests that the mistake that the nexus is a self is unsupported.

Astus wrote:

One relevant issue here is whether that nexus is real or not. If there is a network of things, one could just call that one's true nature, one's self, like one can call the conglomeration of parts one's body.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2018 at 7:14 PM

Title: Re: Mind-streams: Separate?

Content:

Queequeg said:

There is something more in the analytical approach that is not mentioned. It's the Buddha's teaching of the selflessness of dharmas.

Astus wrote:

The insubstantiality of appearances is covered within analysis.

Queequeg said:

That bridges the chasm between analytical consideration and real wisdom. When the Buddha's teaching is heard, then our analysis is not primary exploration but rather evaluation and confirmation of the Buddha's teaching. When we have analyzed enough that the Buddha's word is true, we leap the chasm and enter the Buddha wisdom through faith.

Astus wrote:

If the end result is not direct perception, then it is not wisdom one achieves. Accepting the teaching because one trusts it is OK, but it's not enough for eliminating ignorance.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2018 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: Mind-streams: Separate?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Accepting the teaching because one trusts it is OK, but it's not enough for eliminating ignorance.

Queequeg said:

Agreed, except not just ok, essential.

Astus wrote:

There are faith followers and there are dharma followers.

"What is a person who follows trust (sraddhanusarin)? It is he who, having acquired the equipment and having weak faculties, applies himself to the comprehension of the Truth while recalling the instruction given by others.

What is a person who follows the teaching (dharmanusarin)? It is he who, having acquired the equipment and having sharp faculties, applies himself to the comprehension of the Truth, by himself recalling the teaching dominated by the Truth." (Abhidharmasamuccaya, p 202-203, tr Boin-Webb)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 30th, 2018 at 4:21 PM

Title: Re: Mind-streams: Separate?

Content:

Queequeg said:

I'm referring to faith as the necessary disposition to even begin the path. If there is no faith, then one will not even hear the teaching. There has to be a disposition where one accepts what one hears is true, at least tentatively, without knowing whether it actually is true. All of us, without exception, started that way. We did not know Dharma before we heard it, but we listened with a modicum, at least, of faith, and thereby internalized it enough to take it seriously.

Astus wrote:

That initial faith is not related to the move from analysis to insight, as it is a condition for hearing, not for contemplation and application.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 31st, 2018 at 12:19 AM

Title: Re: Mind-streams: Separate?

Content:

Queequeg said:

With wisdom our analysis does not become an endless austerity.

Astus wrote:

What do you mean by endless austerity?

Queequeg said:

From whence wisdom?

We receive it from the Buddha.

How do we receive it?

By listening with faith.

Faith is essential.

Astus wrote:

I did not say there is no need for faith on the path. What I say is that faith is not the bridge between contemplation and insight.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 31st, 2018 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: 'Dharmas do not arise'

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I do encounter this declaration on DharmaWheel regularly, but I don't understand it.

What I always want to say is 'but I still have to mow the lawn'. So - what does it mean?

Astus wrote:

Consider the basic definition of conditionality:

"When this is, that is.

From the arising of this comes the arising of that.

When this isn't, that isn't.

From the cessation of this comes the cessation of that."

(<https://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/kn/ud/ud.1.03.than.html>)

Arising and ceasing are one of the common characteristics of phenomena. The goal in Buddhism is to leave the unstable conditioned realm for the stable unconditioned liberation. When extinction is realised, there is no more birth. That way no birth, or no arising, as a synonym of nirvana.

"The Knowledge of Destruction with the Knowledge of Non-Arising is Bodhi."

(Kosha ch 6, v 67a-b; vol 3, p 1023)

So when it comes to Mahayana, that dharmas are unborn is like that dharmas are emptiness, as these terms emphasise not only that there is no svabhava, but also that nirvana is not apart from samsara. The reason for calling appearances unborn can be summarised like this:

"Being does not arise, since it exists. Non-being does not arise, since it does not exist.

Being and non-being [together] do not arise, due to [their] heterogeneity. Consequently they do not endure or vanish.

That which has been born cannot be born, nor can that which is unborn be born. What is being born now, being [partly] born, [partly] unborn, cannot be born either."

(Sunyatasaptati 4-5, tr Lindtner)

On the practical side, the realisation of appearances as unborn is one of the central attainments of a bodhisattva.

"They are wholly detached from mind, intellect, consciousness, thought, and ideation. Unattached, not grasping, equal to space, having entered into the nature of openness - this is called having attained acceptance of the nonorigination of things.

Then, imbued with this acceptance, as soon as enlightening beings attain the eighth stage, Immovability, they attain the profound abode of enlightening beings"

(Flower Ornament Scripture, ch 26, p 765)

"And how do bodhisattvas become adept at avoiding views of arising, duration, and cessation? Since whatever exists is like an illusion or a dream and its existence does not arise from itself, from another, or from a combination of both, but as a distinction of one's own mind, they therefore see external existence as nonexistent, consciousness as not arising, and conditions as not combining but arising due to projections. When they see that all internal or external dharmas in the three realms cannot be grasped and are devoid of self-existence, their views of arising cease. And once they know that the self-existence of everything is illusory, they attain the forbearance of non-arising. And once they attain the forbearance of non-arising, they avoid views of arising, duration, and cessation. This is how bodhisattvas become adept at distinguishing and avoiding views of arising, duration and cessation."
(Lankavatara Sutra, ch 30, tr Red Pine)

"Mañjuśrī, all dharmas are equal [in their emptiness]. Because they are equal, they do not abide. Because they do not abide, they do not move. Because they do not move, they rely on nothing. Because they rely on nothing, they have no place. Because they have no place, they have no birth. Because they have no birth, they have no death. If one can see dharmas in this way, one's mind is not deluded. Because one's mind is not deluded, one accords with true reality. Because one accords with true reality, one does nothing. Because one does nothing, one does not come. Because one does not come, one does not go. Because one does not go, one is in unity with true suchness. Because one is in unity with true suchness, one follows dharma nature. Because one follows dharma nature, one's mind does not move. Because one's mind does not move, one has no expectations. Why not? Because one has attained bodhi. If one has attained bodhi, one does not abide in any dharmas. Because one does not abide in dharmas, one realizes that they have neither birth nor death, neither names nor appearances. Mañjuśrī, if sentient beings are attached to dharmas, their afflictions arise. If their afflictions arise, they cannot attain bodhi."
(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra46.html>)

"If you can comprehend that the myriad phenomena are unborn, that [deluded] mind is like an illusory transformation, so that you are everywhere pure, this is enlightenment."
(Recorded Sayings of Linji, in Three Chan Classics, BDK ed, p 21)

At that time, the Buddha proclaimed to Simwang Bodhisattva: "Oh son of good family! The acquiescence to the nonproduction of dharmas [means to realize that] dharmas are originally unproduced. Since all practices produce nothing, there is no way to practice this nonproduction. So achieving the acquiescence to nonproduction is in fact a deception."
(Vajrasamadhi Sutra, p 118, tr Buswell)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 4th, 2018 at 5:10 PM

Title: Re: Samatha and vipassana in Seon

Content:

Varis said:

From what I understand jigwan practice comes from Tiantai.

Astus wrote:

Not so. Samatha and vipasyana are standard categories in Buddhism everywhere. Furthermore, Huayan teachings, and not Tiantai, are the most prominent in Korea aside from Chan. As an example, Dushun, first teacher of Huayanzong, wrote (in Cleary's translation): "Cessation and Contemplation in the Five Teachings of the Hua-yen" (http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T45n1867_001). But as for what Chou himself practised, that would require studying his writings first.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 10th, 2018 at 3:26 PM

Title: Re: Mind-streams: Separate?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are some whose meditation does not involve the use of wisdom to investigate the essence of things; they only cultivate the sheer and complete elimination of mental activity. Their conceptions never end and they never know the absence of essence because they lack the light of wisdom.

Queequeg said:

They go on contemplating endlessly trying to find "nothing", ie. analysis without remainder. Pursuing an impossible end is, in my view, and endless austerity.

Astus wrote:

Kamalasila in the quote says that those who do not perform proper analysis do not end their conceptualisation, even if they temporarily suspend it. So it is the opposite of what you say.

Queequeg said:

Do you yourself know your assertion to be true? You don't need to answer that. Its rhetorical. You can if you want to, though.

Astus wrote:

The assertion that one can eliminate wrong views through learning, understanding, and contemplation? It works in science, works in philosophy, works in everyday life, and it works in Buddhism as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 11th, 2018 at 2:31 AM

Title: Re: Mind-streams: Separate?

Content:

Queequeg said:
Their conceptions never end
What do you call that? I call that an endless austerity.

Astus wrote:
"Their conceptions never end" refers to those who do not analyse correctly but merely suspend thinking. If analysis is correct, it ends all conceptualisation, because it brings about the realisation that all appearances are empty.

See also the commentary on the quoted section by HHDL (Stages of Meditation, p 134):

"In order to understand the true nature of things, it is vital that a practitioner use intelligence and wisdom in the process of examination. As the author clearly states, the mere elimination of mental activity does not constitute meditation on suchness. When mentally inactive, an individual may not be misconceiving the self, but he or she also lacks any sense of discerning selflessness; this sheds no light, and so the individual is not free from the fabrications of misconceptions."

Queequeg said:
Again, do you know this? Or are you inferring?

Astus wrote:
It is an inference.

Queequeg said:
If sheer analysis worked, then the Buddha's insights about reality should have emerged ubiquitously.

Astus wrote:
Did non-violence emerge ubiquitously? If not, does that make it an incorrect morality?

Queequeg said:
the Buddha's insights have been limited to the Buddha and those who have taken refuge in him and his teachings.

Astus wrote:
Why wouldn't it be so? Even among those who have faith in the Triple Jewel there are people without correct morality, correct meditation, and correct wisdom.

Author: Astus
Date: Wednesday, April 11th, 2018 at 2:43 AM
Title: Re: Mind-streams: Separate?
Content:

Queequeg said:
My point, and I'm not sure where you stand based on this statement, is that the realization of emptiness is not possible without the Buddha pointing it out to you first.

Malcolm said:

Revise "Buddha" to "virtuous mentor," and we are in perfect agreement, though Astus will vehemently disagree.

Astus wrote:

The disagreement is not whether one needs to learn, but how learning can happen. For instance, Nichiren did not have a teacher who told him all he had then imparted on his disciples.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 11th, 2018 at 4:55 AM

Title: Re: Mind-streams: Separate?

Content:

Queequeg said:

From whence wisdom?

Astus wrote:

To quote from the same book (p 77):

"Without the practice of wisdom, the first five of the six perfections cannot actually become practices of perfection. In order to cultivate such wisdom, you must first cultivate the genuine unmistakable philosophical view that is known as the view of the Middle Way, or Madhyamika."

Also, on the relationship between wisdom and faith (p 90):

"Unless the "child of noble family," or a practitioner, is able to develop the wisdom of special insight, generation of faith based on knowledge is not possible. Of course, a person can have devoted faith, but when he or she develops faith as a result of comprehending ultimate reality, it is supported by reason and knowledge."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 11th, 2018 at 5:03 AM

Title: Re: Mind-streams: Separate?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Nichiren studied under many Dharma teachers. Thus, your example is invalid.

Astus wrote:

So by the requirement for a teacher you accept any Buddhist teacher, even if the encounter is minimal and later one does not even (fully) agree with that person?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 11th, 2018 at 2:40 PM

Title: Re: Mind-streams: Separate?

Content:

Queequeg said:

If this is a general question, that's another story.

Astus wrote:

It is a general one, not about Nichiren in particular.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 11th, 2018 at 3:18 PM

Title: Re: Mind-streams: Separate?

Content:

Queequeg said:

All this is well and good, but none of it accounts for the source of wisdom. Hence, without wisdom, no wisdom.

Astus wrote:

It does account for it: "cultivate the genuine unmistakable philosophical view"

The traditional triplet (<https://suttacentral.net/dn33/en/sujato>): "wisdom produced by reflection (cintāmayā paññā), learning (sutamayā paññā), and meditation (bhāvanāmayā paññā)"

<https://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=443398#p443398> summed it up nicely:

"Prajñā, wisdom, is the result acquired from hearing the Dharma, reflecting upon it, and cultivating what was heard and reflected upon."

Asanga (Summary of the Great Vehicle, ch 8, BDK ed, p 92; elaborated on in chapter 3):

"For all bodhisattvas the cause is
The permeation of hearing [scriptural] discourse,
For nonimaginative wisdom is True and correct reflection."

Summary of the relationship between the three causes (Abhidharmasamuccaya, p 188-189, tr Boin-Webb):

"How does one become [a person] dwelling in the teachings (dharmaviharin)? One does not become [a person] dwelling in the teachings only through the practice of listening (erudition) and reflection (srutacintaprayoga) without having recourse to meditation (mental cultivation) (bhavanam anagamyā). Neither does one become [a person] dwelling in the teachings only through the practice of meditation (mental cultivation) (bhavanaprayoga) without having recourse to listening (erudition) and reflection (srutacintam anagamyā). It is by having recourse to both, by living according to both, that one becomes [a person] dwelling in the teachings. What consists of listening (erudition) (srutamaya) should be understood by means of study, recitation and predication (udgrahayasvadyayadesana). What consists of mental cultivation (bhavanamayd) should be understood by means of the practice of concentration (samadhiprayoga) and dissatisfaction (asamtusti). The practice of concentration should be understood by means of constant and careful practice (satatyasatkrtyaprayoga) and unperturbed practice (aviparitaprayoga). Dissatisfaction should be understood by means of practice aimed at an [as yet] untasted (anasvadita) higher tranquillity (uttarasamatha)."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 13th, 2018 at 4:03 PM

Title: Re: Zazen and breathing

Content:

rory said:

Bhikshu Dharmamitra translated:

Zhiyi: Six Dharma Gates to the Sublime: A Classic Meditation Manual on Traditional Indian Buddhist Meditation

Astus wrote:

In that work Zhiyi modifies and expands on one of the Indian methods of anapanasmrti. It does not include any sort of "energy" (qi/prana) practices.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 15th, 2018 at 5:42 PM

Title: Re: Zazen and breathing

Content:

ItsRaining said:

I remember reading a Tiantai text that did teach it, I don't remember if it was by Zhiyi or someone else though. It recommended Zhiyi's six sounds as well as the movement of Qi around the body.

Varis said:

Zhiyi taught the six sounds? They feature quite prominently in various texts about nourishing life practices in the Daoist cannon, and in particular in the writings of Dao Hongjing, who organized the teachings of the Shangqing sect.

rory said:

Livia Kohn in Daoist Body Cultivation University of Hawaii Press, 2006 states that Zhiyi in Xiuxi zhiguan zuochan fayao discusses the 6 healing breaths.

Astus wrote:

It is found in chapter 9 of http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/EBM_excerpts/EBM_X-16_X-09.pdf, on page 8 of that pdf. The same in the Chinese original is http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T46n1915_001#0471c26.

Salguero (in Translating Buddhist Medicine in Medieval China, p 103-105) writes that Zhiyi makes use of Chinese healing concepts there and differentiates it from the Indian method of twelve breaths by using different words (qi 氣 and xi 息) for "breath".

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 16th, 2018 at 5:27 PM

Title: Re: Zazen and breathing

Content:

Anders said:

"some dude somewhere sat down and discovered this"

Astus wrote:

Would you say the same of other beliefs, like the five elements and the forces of yin and yang? Then Zou Yan might be that "some dude". But there are several other "energy" views out there, so just as combination with Chinese concepts can be acceptable, we might as well integrate readily available Hermetic, Kabbalistic, or any New Age system.

Anders said:

The more essential proof is, I think, in the continuous upholding of such methods in the lineages as the seal of authentication.

Astus wrote:

Tradition is no proof, otherwise the Vedas should be accepted as well. As the Buddha said (<https://suttacentral.net/mn95/en/bodhi>):

“There are five things, Bhāradvāja, that may turn out in two different ways here and now. What five? Faith, approval, oral tradition, reasoned cogitation, and reflective acceptance of a view. These five things may turn out in two different ways here and now. Now something may be fully accepted out of faith, yet it may be empty, hollow, and false; but something else may not be fully accepted out of faith, yet it may be factual, true, and unmistaken. Again, something may be fully approved of...well transmitted...well cogitated...well reflected upon, yet it may be empty, hollow, and false; but something else may not be well reflected upon, yet it may be factual, true, and unmistaken. Under these conditions it is not proper for a wise man who preserves truth to come to the definite conclusion: ‘Only this is true, anything else is wrong.’”

Anders said:

What matters is that great masters over many centuries have used it as a scripture of great profundity and utility.

Astus wrote:

Some did, some did not, and some rejected them. So, instead of relying on one's choice of great masters, why not on doctrinal and practical qualities? After all, where the authenticity of the Vaipulya sutras are defended (e.g. Mahayanasutralamkara, ch 1), the argument is not that "Nagarjuna liked it", or "Sthiramati commented on it".

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 16th, 2018 at 7:06 PM

Title: Re: Zazen and breathing

Content:

Anders said:

Tradition and living lineage is not the same thing. At least not in the sense that the pali canon uses the term.

Astus wrote:

How so? A tradition that is still alive (and not, for instance, recreated or revived) means that it's been passed down through the generations.

Anders said:

it more or less is.

Astus wrote:

What does 'it' stand for here? That the argument for the Mahayana scriptures is mainly just references to respected teachers?

Anders said:

What has been ignored, or rejected, by the great masters is generally subsequently ignored and rejected by later lineages.

Astus wrote:

If this refers only to Zen lineages, then it's one of the differences between lineages what textual materials they rely on. Being of a particular lineage then also defines whom they consider to be "great masters".

Anders said:

When it comes to stuff like energetic practices - sure, why not?

Astus wrote:

It is only a matter of fitting them into a Buddhist context.

Anders said:

I think there is a difference between tom dick and harry doing so and generations of realised masters doing so though.

Astus wrote:

Since there can be no realisation outside Buddhism, nothing could be accepted that cannot be traced back to the Buddha himself. If that is not an important criteria, then there is no difference between there being or not being a history of past teachers.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 17th, 2018 at 5:10 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Astus wrote:

Karma is intentional action. Only beings have intention, not groups, hence there is no such thing as collective karma.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 17th, 2018 at 6:49 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Grigoris said:

You think that a group of people acting together with a single goal cannot have similar or identical motivations?

Astus wrote:

People can have numerous things in common and imagine there to be an identity based on seemingly shared attributes, but that will not make them identical, nor create a new sentient entity. Even on a conventional level group identities are nominal. For example, people can eat together, but it doesn't mean they have one mind and one stomach.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 17th, 2018 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: Academic learning is not directly proportional to realization

Content:

Ogyen said:

The point is to not confuse academic learning for realization, which happens a lot.

Malcolm said:

people read some eloquent words and think the person who wrote them is a great realizer

Astus wrote:

It is just forgetting not to rely on the person but rely on the teaching. A common mistake. On the other hand:

'It's through discussion that a person's discernment may be known, and then only after a long period, not a short period; by one who is attentive, not by one who is inattentive; by one who is discerning, not by one who is not discerning'
(<https://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an04/an04.192.than.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 17th, 2018 at 9:18 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Mantrik said:

the real debate is whether they share any vipaka or if that only arrives individually.

Astus wrote:

It's always an individual's decision, hence the consequences are individual as well.
There is no such thing as a group mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 17th, 2018 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: Academic learning is not directly proportional to realization

Content:

Malcolm said:

If that is the case, than you and I have been found out for the frauds that we are.

Astus wrote:

Quotes are meant to lend credibility to the content, thus avoiding the misperception of being considered the source. It is also standard academic (and Buddhist) procedure. E.g. Shinran's Kyogyoshinsho is like 90% quotes. Therefore I can keep drinking Coke, etc., without worrying about what I share on FB.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 17th, 2018 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Grigoris said:

we know that our shared reality is formed as a consequence of our similar past actions.
We also know that the actions of others effect us.

Astus wrote:

No reality is shared, because experience is not shared. It is rather just conceptual categories that seem to create a shared world. Similarly, others' actions cannot affect us, as all experiences are the products of one's own conditioning.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 17th, 2018 at 11:40 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Grigoris said:

So you disagree with the Six Realms model then?

Astus wrote:

No, why would I? Although the 5 realms model has its advantages.

Grigoris said:

It is ridiculous to say that the actions of other's do not effect us. If I punch you in the head, believe me, it will effect you. For quite some time too.

Astus wrote:

"Even though now I have done no wrong, I am reaping the karmic consequences of past transgressions. It is something that neither the heavens nor other people can impose upon me."

(http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enUS/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=146&Itemid=5)

"Through enduring the disparagement of others in the present life, the bad karma from the prior lives can be removed, and one can attain peerless perfect enlightenment."

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html, ch 16)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 18th, 2018 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Academic learning is not directly proportional to realization

Content:

Malcolm said:

Serious much?

Astus wrote:

A monk asked, "What do you say about finding meaning in speech?"

Baofu said, "What speech is that?"

The monk looked down and didn't answer.

Baofu said, "The sword of function is like lightning. Thinking about it is futile!"

(Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 302)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 18th, 2018 at 2:01 AM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Grigoris said:

This is talking about karma vipakka arising from our previous actions, it is not prove that my actions do not effect you. ... The fact that something needs to be endured (from others), is evidence of the effect (of others).

Astus wrote:

If beings suffer/enjoy the consequences of their own actions, how could they also suffer/enjoy the actions of others?

"This third category, ascription of karma, means that you experience the results of the karma you create. Results will ripen in the skandas related to the actor, and not to others. The Collection of the Abhidharma says:

What does the ascription of karma mean? One experiences the maturation of the karma one has created. It is uncommon to others and, so, is called ascription.

If that were not the case, the karma that was created could be wasted or there could be the danger of facing a result that one had not created. Therefore, in the sutra it says:

That karma that is created by Devadatta will not mature in the earth, water, and so forth

But that karma will ripen in the skandas and ayatana of that particular individual To whom else would this karma result?"

(Jewel Ornament of Liberation, p 119-120)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 18th, 2018 at 6:00 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

cyril said:

Then, in this case, by analogy, the positive karma acquired by rejoicing in another one's meritorious deeds wouldn't result in vipaka similar to that of the doer?

Astus wrote:

Agreeing with the actions of another is a mental, and possibly a verbal act, but not a bodily one. Because it strengthens a similar intention, the result is similar. However, the act is not the same, and when the result occurs the conditioning of the mind is not the same either.

Furthermore on "sharing karma":

"By oneself is evil done; by oneself is one defiled. By oneself is evil left undone; by oneself is one made pure. Purity and impurity depend on oneself; no one can purify another."

(<https://www.accesstosight.org/tipitaka/kn/dhp/dhp.12.budd.html.165>)

"It can't be wrested away. It follows you along. When, having left this world, for wherever you must go, you take it with you. This fund is not held in common with others, & cannot be stolen by thieves."

(<https://www.accesstosight.org/tipitaka/kn/khp/khp.1-9.than.html#khp-8>)

"It may seem like a contradiction to dedicate merit when each person in samsara enjoys or suffers the results of only his or her own negative or positive actions, but no conflict really exists. Just as the results of the virtuous or evil deeds we create cannot be transferred to another person, neither can we take away someone else's negative karma or take our own virtue and transfer it to another person."

(Khenchen Thrangu Rinpoche: King of Samadhi, p 120)

"we do not really exchange the karma we haven't created, with karma created by others.

Karma cannot be transferred or eliminated by giving and taking practice"
(Khenchen Thrangu Rinpoche: <http://www.rinpoche.com/teachings/sevenpoints.htm>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 18th, 2018 at 8:00 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

shaunc said:

At the moment in South Africa there's political parties calling for the killing of white people. Considering white South Africa's previous treatment of black people couldn't this be a case of collective karma ripening.

Astus wrote:

It rather sounds like anger.

"He abused me, he struck me, he overpowered me, he robbed me." Those who harbor such thoughts do not still their hatred.

(<https://www.accesstosight.org/tipitaka/kn/dhp/dhp.01.budd.html.3>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 18th, 2018 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Grigoris said:

The actions of white people in the past is ripening as anger against them.

Astus wrote:

That is not karma. If one is angry with another, that anger does not hurt the other person, it hurts the one who is angry. Furthermore, the anger is not caused by the other person, it is generated by one's own thinking.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 19th, 2018 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Queequeg said:

As I understand, it's not that we share karma with our fellows, but I think it's fair to conceive that beings have complementary karma - our friends influence our thoughts, words and actions.

Astus wrote:

We hear what we "want" to hear, and listen to those who say things that we like, that way strengthening how we are conditioned.

Queequeg said:

We can influence each other to habituate thoughts, words and deeds.

Astus wrote:

Every experience is defined by one's interpretation. That's how ignorance is the root of samsara.

Queequeg said:

In acting out our karma, good and bad, others have complementary karma in the sense that when we harm others, those others were karmically inclined to suffer harm, and the same for helping others.

Astus wrote:

Sounds to me like a possible justification of evil acts.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 19th, 2018 at 5:42 AM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Grigoris said:

We all live in a completely sealed and self-enclosed vacuum after all.

Astus wrote:

"Since the Buddhas have stated

That the world is conditioned by ignorance,

So why is it not reasonable [to assert]

That this world is [a result of] conceptualization?"

(<http://www.tibetanclassics.org/html-assets/SixtyStanzas.pdf>, v 37)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 19th, 2018 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: On Buddhism and Nominalism

Content:

Malcolm said:

Only in Sarvastivada.

Astus wrote:

How so? Who says that conventional phenomena are not based on dharmas?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 19th, 2018 at 5:56 AM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Grigoris said:

it ridiculous to say that we do not effect each other through the actions of our three doors, when we so glaringly obviously do.

Astus wrote:

In other words, your view is that there are experiences that are independent of one's mental conditions (aka karma), that they happen to people because of sheer coincidence. Is that what you mean?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 19th, 2018 at 4:27 PM

Title: Re: On Buddhism and Nominalism

Content:

Malcolm said:

All buddhist tenets (Sautrantika on up) apart from Sarvastivada, subscribe to Anya-apoha theory, which is the Buddhist refutation of truly existent universals.

Astus wrote:

It's not a question if they take those dharmas as empty or not, but whether they are conceived as elements behind conventional appearances. They are considered a background layer, even if there are other layers beyond.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 19th, 2018 at 5:08 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Ogyen said:

where did the "sheer coincidence" idea come into play from?

Astus wrote:

If an experience is not a result of one's own doing, that means one can suffer the consequences of external causes and conditions. Those personally unrelated events were what I called coincidence, because anything can happen to anyone without the individual being responsible for them. So, if a branch falls on somebody, that is just "bad luck".

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 19th, 2018 at 5:52 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Queequeg said:

If things were the way you say, there'd be no intelligible conversation between anyone.

Astus wrote:

Not exactly. If it were the case that one could influence the other, then one could make the other understand. However, even the Buddha could not enlighten Ananda nor change the mind of Devadatta.

Queequeg said:

I think your idealism is a handicap.

Astus wrote:

What I say is that because experiences are defined by one's mental conditioning, no matter what occurs, it is not because others' make it happen, or because of some external force, but because of one's own delusion. If it were the case that independent factors controlled one's experience, there would be nothing to be done about those, and neither one's behaviour nor one's mental purity would matter.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 19th, 2018 at 6:52 PM

Title: Re: On Buddhism and Nominalism

Content:

Malcolm said:

That does not make Dharmas universals. A universal is cowness, for example.

Astus wrote:

But the dharmas could be called universals for actual instances of experience, however, I don't know of anyone who conceived a theoretical list of dharmas existing separately from dharmas as experience, hence they are not universals.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 20th, 2018 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Ogyen said:

Is it your doing that you were raped? No! So is it a coincidence because it isn't your doing?

Astus wrote:

Good and bad experiences are the result of good and bad deeds. That is the basic concept of how action and result work (see: <https://suttacentral.net/mn135/en/bodhi>). Furthermore, the results are not produced by someone else, but everybody is an heir to one's own actions. At the same time, it is also not the case that there are really agents, it is only dependent origination (<https://suttacentral.net/sn12.18/en/bodhi>; also <https://suttacentral.net/sn12.37/en/bodhi>). In fact, not just one or two things, but the whole world is a product of dependent origination (<https://suttacentral.net/sn12.44/en/bodhi>). So, to say that there are things happening to oneself because of others' will or because of different independent factors, does not fit into what the Buddha taught about karma.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 20th, 2018 at 4:40 AM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Grigoris said:

So how does learning happen then? What is the role of a Buddha if, as you posit, essentially there is no interaction and influence between beings?

Astus wrote:

"If one wishes to see the Buddha, then one sees him. If one sees him, then one asks questions. If one asks, then one is answered, he hears the sutras and rejoices greatly. He reflects thus: "Where did the Buddha come from? Where did I go to?" and thinks to himself: "The Buddha came from nowhere, and I also went nowhere." He thinks to himself:

The three realms—the realm of desire, the realm of form, and the formless realm—these three realms are simply made by thought. Whatever I think, that I see. The mind creates the Buddha. The mind itself sees him. The mind is the Buddha. The mind is the Tathāgata. The mind is my body, the mind sees the Buddha. The mind does not itself know the mind, the mind does not itself see the mind. A mind with conceptions is stupidity, a mind without conceptions is nirvana. There is nothing in these dharmas that can be enjoyed; they are all made by thinking. If thinking is nothing but empty, then anything that is thought is also utterly nonexistent."

(Pratyutpanna Samadhi Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 26)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 20th, 2018 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Ogyen said:

We were talking about "coincidence" in the way you had posited

Astus wrote:

I simply put forward the reasons why no coincidence can happen, but that both good and bad experiences are the products of one's karma.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 20th, 2018 at 6:14 AM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Grigoris said:

Yes, ultimately. But at the relative level? That's what we are talking about when it comes to Nirmanakaya.

Astus wrote:

It does explain the relative level being a product of the mind. In the case of ordinary beings, experiences are what a deluded mind imagines out of ignorance. The nirmanakaya that is seen by beings, it is called illusory, and it exists as the mistaken perception of deluded beings, who are, however, have the right level of merit to encounter a buddha in some form. Here is Mipham's summary for how the nirmanakaya can be understood:

"The appearance of bodily form is like the reflection of Indra, the resounding of enlightened voice is like the great drum of the gods, the pervasiveness of the knowledge and compassion of enlightened mind resembles a cloud, the various ways of displaying emanations resembles Brahma, the pervasiveness of wisdom is like the sun, the secret of enlightened mind is like a jewel, the secret of enlightened speech is like an echo, the secret of enlightened body is like the sky, and the deeds that benefit others are like the ground."

(Gateway to Knowledge, vol 3, 21.172)

Another explanation, from Jamgon Kongtrul's commentary on the Uttaratantra Shastra:

"Being of the nature of a [mere] representation, the nirmana[kaya] is similar to the golden image."

...

"The nirmanakaya, which appears to all sentient beings in common, is like the golden image. Because of the power resulting from the realization of the absolute kaya, it has the effect or nature of appearing to the minds of the disciples as a mere representation of whatever form is suitable to train any of them."

(Buddha Nature, p 173)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 20th, 2018 at 5:30 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Grigoris said:

We know that all appearances have the nature of illusion, but this does not mean that there are no appearances.

Astus wrote:

Being illusion means it is conditioned by ignorance, it is distorted by mental habits, by karma. In other words, all beings experience what they project as the inner and outer world. That is why I say there is no shared karma, no mutual influence, rather the very idea that there are interacting beings is one of the core delusions.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 20th, 2018 at 8:45 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:
Grigoris said:
So we are not interacting?

Astus wrote:
We are interacting in our own minds. We each have the concept of communicating with another person, but it all happens within the scope of separate minds. Experience is individual, as there are no shared sense-fields, and the interpretation applied to experience is also individual.

Author: Astus
Date: Friday, April 20th, 2018 at 10:16 PM
Title: Re: Collective karma
Content:
Malcolm said:
the traces of other minds are sufficiently strong to generate appearances for ours.

Astus wrote:
Such a possibility would mean that one could put thoughts into another's mind, and if that could happen, then one stream of consciousness could cross another stream and become one.

Author: Astus
Date: Friday, April 20th, 2018 at 10:24 PM
Title: Re: Collective karma
Content:
Grigoris said:
of course there are shared sense fields, even if we experience them individually.

Astus wrote:
As Malcolm said, what I meant was that things are experienced individually. What you see as light is not what I see as light. What you think as light is not what I think as light. Furthermore, you cannot even show me what you see, what you think.

Author: Astus
Date: Friday, April 20th, 2018 at 10:30 PM
Title: Re: Collective karma
Content:
Malcolm said:
The material aggregate is defined as all physical sense organs and AND objects made of the four elements.

Astus wrote:
There are both sense-faculties and sense-objects for all 6 sense-fields, and from their meeting arises the respective sense-consciousnesses. Or this can be looked at from the experiential perspective, where there are sense-consciousnesses conceptually split into faculties and objects.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 20th, 2018 at 10:37 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Queequeg said:

No, it doesn't.

Astus wrote:

Why not? The mind stream consists of one momentary thought followed by another momentary thought. If there is a moment that is identical for two streams, it becomes the single cause of the following moment of thought, thus there is only one stream of thought left.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 20th, 2018 at 11:00 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Queequeg said:

You equate the perception of an appearance with "having thoughts put into one's mind"

Astus wrote:

Perception exists in consciousness. If one can make another's consciousness perceive something, that is no different from being able to put a thought into another's mind, as it means one can control another's mind.

Queequeg said:

Do we need to break down how that is silly?

Astus wrote:

Please do.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 20th, 2018 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Queequeg said:

What you are arguing is a philosophical point that presumes our subjective consciousness is some unique mystery.

Astus wrote:

The argument is regarding the subjective experience. Brain scans and biological analysis have nothing to do with it.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 20th, 2018 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Queequeg said:

You're skipping several steps.

Astus wrote:

Going with the abhidharma model makes no difference, as the external factors are not experienced, only the resultant consciousness is what is registered at all. There the moments of sensory consciousnesses are meaningless, it is only with the processing of impressions by the mind-consciousness that any basic apprehension can occur.

Queequeg said:

this view of the individual as being hermetically isolated in the mind is a biased view.

Astus wrote:

Even when the original source of a consciousness is an external object, since such objects do not possess any meaning or value, everything is necessarily interpreted and defined according to each beings mental conditioning. In what way is one not bound by one's preconceptions?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 21st, 2018 at 7:46 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Malcolm said:

minds can appear directly to each other without the need for some intermediary. This is what the ability to know the minds of others shows us. Thus is not an ability restricted to awakened folks.

How does it work? A mind which grasps signs is something which can appear to the mind of others.

Astus wrote:

It is exactly direct perception that cannot happen, as that would mean having the same state of mind. What might be said is that one can conceive a representation of another mind, just as one can see only representations of physical objects.

"[Consciousness] is only said to perceive the minds of others because it is like a mirror in which appear seemingly external objects. It cannot immediately perceive [others' minds]. What it immediately perceives are its own transformations. Therefore, a scripture says, "There is not the slightest dharma that is capable of seizing other dharmas. It is just that when consciousness is born, it appears resembling images and is said to seize things." As with having the minds of others as objects, so with form, etc." (Cheng Weishi Lun, ch 7, in Three Texts on Consciousness Only, BDK ed, p 239; in Tat: p 523; http://21dzk.l.u-tokyo.ac.jp/SAT/T1585_,31,0039c15:1585_,31,0039c16.html)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 21st, 2018 at 8:01 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Astus wrote:

you cannot even show me what you see, what you think.

Grigoris said:

Of course I can.

Astus wrote:

Showing it would mean that I experience exactly the way you experience, that my visual consciousness is identical to yours, etc.

Grigoris said:

The fact that there can be mutually understood communication is a testament to that. The fact that teaching and learning can occur is a testament to that. The fact that socialisation occurs is a testament to that.

Astus wrote:

Those do not explain how within anyone's experience there can be something independent of one's mental conditioning. Even when there are group activities, each member experiences and comprehends alone, without any means to perceive with the mind of others.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 21st, 2018 at 8:03 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Malcolm said:

The above is mistaken, and is posited on a realist perspective.

Astus wrote:

What do you mean by direct perception of others' minds then?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 22nd, 2018 at 3:33 AM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Grigoris said:

For example: $1+1=2$ REGARDLESS of your mental conditioning.

Astus wrote:

Mathematical truths mean nothing to those who know nothing about mathematics, i.e. they do not exist for them. If you propose that mathematics is real, independent of minds, that might be so, but they still do not exist for those without relevant knowledge.

Grigoris said:

In most situations communication occurs via a medium. But it seems that you believe that communication cannot occur at all, unless it is directly from mind to mind.

Astus wrote:

Let's review again what I said:

Karma and its results are strictly individual

(<https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=444263#p444263>).

Experience is defined by one's own interpretation

(<https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=444461#p444461> &

<https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=444463#p444463>).

Therefore:

Individual experiences are the results of karma of the individual

(<https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=444540#p444540> &

<https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=444727#p444727>).

Interaction with others is within the scope of individual karma

(<https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=444732#p444732>).

Grigoris said:

If that is your hypothesis, you have to prove it.

Astus wrote:

Which one of the above you do not agree with? Is your view then, that:

- Karma is not strictly individual?
- Ignorance is not the root of dependent origination?
- Karma is not responsible for one's experiences?

I presume it is the third one. In other words, there must be exceptions from what occurs to a being, that are not the products of one's karma and not distorted by one's mental conditioning.

Grigoris said:

So you think that a Buddha's awakened mind is conditioned?

Astus wrote:

A mind is necessarily conditioned. But that's another matter. The problem with assuming that not all experiences are the results of karma means that even when one has attained liberation from karma, all sorts of experiences continue to occur that one can never be free from. In other words, there is no liberation from a conditioned mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 22nd, 2018 at 3:46 AM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Malcolm said:

can perceive the intrinsic characteristics of the conceptual image existing in the other person's mind. It does not mean they share the same "thought."

Astus wrote:

That is a perception of a reflection, a copy, a simulacrum of those characteristics, in other words, a representation. Why? Simply because it is the god's perception of a characteristic, not that other being's. To make it not merely a representation, there should be thoughts apart from minds.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 22nd, 2018 at 5:43 AM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Grigoris said:

Even if I have no grasp of mathematics, I know that two individual phenomenon make a pair.

Astus wrote:

How do you know? Is that an information inherent in the perceived object, or is it rather an understanding arrived at by inference?

Grigoris said:

So you believe a Buddha's mind is conditioned and thus cannot see things for what they are. You believe that a Buddha is afflicted by ignorance.

Astus wrote:

A mind is conditioned, because it is functional, and functioning requires change, causes, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 22nd, 2018 at 5:59 AM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Malcolm said:

an image is a representation. All perceptions of characteristics are representational.

Astus wrote:

Then why do you call that a direct perception?

Malcolm said:

For example, there is a story of a monk of whom devas were fond. They cast their mind forth one day, looking for this monk, and unable to locate him, they went to the Buddha and asked what had become of him. The Buddha replied, "Why, he became an arhat, he is sitting right there in samadhi."

What had happened? The arhat in samadhi was not grasping any signs, and so his mind disappeared from the mental sight of these devas.

Astus wrote:

Check out Dogen's Tashintsu (BDK ed: vol 4, ch 79). Aside from stories, do you know any text that explains knowing other's minds like that? By the way, the standard list of what kinds of minds are perceived includes whether it is liberated or not.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 22nd, 2018 at 3:47 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Malcolm said:

Astus, surely you know what a pratyakṣa is and what it entails.

Astus wrote:

"The cognition in which there is no conceptual construction is perception."

(Dignaga: Pratyaksapariccheda, in Dignaga on Perception, p 25, tr Hattori)

However:

"By the power of meditation the yogin can have such clear representations that they appear to him almost like the specific forms of the mind of another person, just as deities will bestow grace on a person by appearing in their dreams etc. So even the yogin does not directly grasp another person's mind through his representations. He can be said to know another person's mind only in the sense that the representations which appear in his own mind have the same form as those in another person's mind. therefore yogipratyakṣa is called perception only for the sake of convenience."
(Dharmakīrti: Samtanantara-siddhi, in Mind Only, p 217-218, tr Wood)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 22nd, 2018 at 3:51 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Grigoris said:

But now you are avoiding my question again: Of course I can. The fact that there can be mutually understood communication is a testament to that. The fact that teaching and learning can occur is a testament to that. The fact that socialisation occurs is a testament to that.

Are you denying these occur?

Astus wrote:

I do not deny the occurrence. What I say is that they can only occur
<https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=39&t=28365&p=444984#p444984>.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 23rd, 2018 at 2:07 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, this is what we mean when we say that one can have a direct perception of another's mind.

Astus wrote:

In that case, knowing other's mind is not a counter-example to all experiences being within the scope of individual karma.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 23rd, 2018 at 7:47 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Vasana said:

To me it seems to reconcile the points made in this thread. A Summary of Shared and Unshared Abodes there are no external objects to function as observed conditions aside from consciousness, nor are the external environment or other seemingly shared appearances anything more than the objective aspect of the inner consciousness.

Astus wrote:

Good catch. The difference is that in this topic it is through the way karma is defined that it can be deduced - at least in my interpretation - that experiences are exclusively personal as a consequence of karma being personal.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 23rd, 2018 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Grigoris said:

I think that the major mistake you are making is in reifying the personal/subjective. You seem quite happy to point to the emptiness of everything, except yourself. You grasp at the importance of your subjective experience but do not seem to recognise that ultimately this is empty too.

Astus wrote:

So far it's been only about the concepts of collective and then shared karma. I might note here that I have not gone into discussing how they are empty, rather how those ideas are contrary to individual karma. As for the nature of individual karma, it is of course fictional.

"There is no doer of a deed
Or one who reaps the deed's result;
Phenomena alone flow on—
No other view than this is right."
(Visuddhimagga 19.20)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 24th, 2018 at 2:41 AM

Title: Re: Collective karma

Content:

Vasana said:

2-truths alarm bells ring

Individual karma may ultimately be fictional but it's still conventionally functional as the ongoing flow of the Twelve Nidānas and the serial linking of the aggregates between lives.

Astus wrote:

Why ring?

"Phenomena alone flow on"

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 24th, 2018 at 4:48 PM

Title: Re: Beginning

Content:

Mila said:

as a pure practitioner, how should one consume food?

Astus wrote:

"And how is physical food to be regarded? Suppose a couple, husband & wife, taking meager provisions, were to travel through a desert. With them would be their only baby son, dear & appealing. Then the meager provisions of the couple going through the desert would be used up & depleted while there was still a stretch of the desert yet to be crossed. The thought would occur to them, 'Our meager provisions are used up & depleted while there is still a stretch of this desert yet to be crossed. What if we were to kill this only baby son of ours, dear & appealing, and make dried meat & jerky. That way — chewing on the flesh of our son — at least the two of us would make it through this desert. Otherwise, all three of us would perish.' So they would kill their only baby son, loved & endearing, and make dried meat & jerky. Chewing on the flesh of their son, they would make it through the desert. While eating the flesh of their only son, they would beat their breasts, [crying,] 'Where have you gone, our only baby son? Where have you gone, our only baby son?' Now what do you think, monks: Would that couple eat that food playfully or for intoxication, or for putting on bulk, or for beautification?"

"No, lord."

"Wouldn't they eat that food simply for the sake of making it through that desert?"

"Yes, lord."

"In the same way, I tell you, is the nutriment of physical food to be regarded. When physical food is comprehended, passion for the five strings of sensuality is comprehended. When passion for the five strings of sensuality is comprehended, there is no fetter bound by which a disciple of the noble ones would come back again to this world."

(<https://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.063.than.html>; see also: <https://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/authors/nyanaponika/wheel105.html>)

"O Subhūti, if you are able to be universally same about eating, then the dharmas are also universally same; if the dharmas are universally same, you should also be universally same about eating. If you can practice begging like this, you may accept the food.

If, Subhūti, you refrain from eradicating licentiousness, anger, and stupidity, yet are not equipped with them; if you do not destroy the body, yet accord with the single characteristic; if you do not extinguish stupidity and affection, yet generate wisdom and emancipation; if you use the characteristics of the five transgressions to attain emancipation, without either emancipation or bondage; if you do not perceive the four noble truths, yet do not fail to perceive the truths; neither attaining the results [of becoming a streamenterer (srotāpanna), and so on,] nor not attaining the results; neither being an ordinary [unenlightened] person nor transcending the state (lit., "dharma") of ordinary person; neither being a sage nor not being a sage; accomplishing all the dharmas yet transcending the characteristics of the dharmas — then you can accept this food.

Subhūti, you should only accept this food if you can neither see the Buddha nor hear the Dharma, nor the six teachers of heterodox paths— Pūraṇa Kāśyapa, Maskarin Gośālīputra, Saṃjayin Vairāṭīputra, Ajita Keśakambala, Kakuda Kātyāyana, and Nirgrantha Jñātiputra, who were your teachers, following whom you left home, [so that] at the defeat of those teachers you were also defeated—then you can accept this food. If, Subhūti, you can enter into the heterodox views and not reach the other shore; abide in the eight difficulties and not attain the absence of difficulty; identify with the afflictions and transcend the pure dharmas; attain the samādhi of noncontention; if all sentient beings generate this concentration; if the donors do not name you their field of blessings; if those making offerings to you fall into the three evil destinations; if you join hands with the host of Māras and make them your co-workers; if you do not differentiate yourself from the host of Māras and the sensory troubles; if you bear resentment toward all sentient beings; if you revile the Buddha, denigrate the Dharma, and do not enter the Sangha; and if you never attain extinction— if you are like this then you can accept the food."

(Vimalakīrti Sūtra, ch 3, BDK ed, p 88-89)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 2nd, 2018 at 10:35 PM

Title: Re: Romance of the Heart Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

<https://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.31.0.nara.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 13th, 2018 at 4:07 PM

Title: Re: If the Mahayana Sutras were not spoken by the Buddha what authority do they hold?

Content:

ItsRaining said:

what of the texts which speak from the perspective of the Buddha about the state of being a Buddha and other extremely high attainments?

Astus wrote:

The descriptions of the paths and attainments are works based on the Buddha's words just like other parts of the Dharma. Even if they are not found in the early texts, there is a logical development, so they can be viewed as teachings drawing out the implications, in other words, exegetical and explanatory writings. Furthermore, many of the so called Mahayana ideas can be found in Northern Indian abhidharma works.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 14th, 2018 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: If the Mahayana Sutras were not spoken by the Buddha what authority do they hold?

Content:

ItsRaining said:

So do you think basing concepts of the Buddha from expansions of logical implications is accurate or something that should be relied on? For example, the Lotus Sutra says: Because the Dharma that the buddhas have attained is foremost, unique, and difficult to understand. No one but the buddhas can completely know the real aspects of all dharmas—that is to say their character, nature, substance, potential, function, cause, condition, result, effect, and essential unity.”

Astus wrote:

The higher/greater wisdom/knowledge of a buddha is accepted by all Buddhist schools. For instance, a buddha is omniscient, as the Patisambhidamagga (ch 72, PTS ed, p 131, tr Nanamoli) states: "It knows without exception all that is formed and unformed, thus it is omniscient knowledge".

ItsRaining said:

What Mahayana ideas are found in Northern Abhidharma works?

Astus wrote:

I don't know such a list, but here are some examples: intermediate state, the various differences between the three vehicles, the buddha qualities, the difference between afflictive and non-afflictive ignorance, and even the emptiness of dharmas (in the Satyasiddhi-shastra).

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 20th, 2018 at 5:58 AM

Title: Re: Enlightenment

Content:

shanyin said:

How do you attain enlightenment in Mahayana Buddhism?

Astus wrote:

With bodhicitta and the six paramitas.

For more:

http://www.kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/bsam-ez_book_page.htm

http://www.kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/n6p_book_page.htm

http://www.kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/vbcitta_book_page.htm

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bodhisattvacary%C4%81vat%C4%81ra>

<http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Shikshasamucchaya>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 26th, 2018 at 3:41 PM

Title: Re: Dharmavidya's Authorization to teach

Content:

SonamTashi said:

if he can't prove his own transmissions and permissions from all of these schools are legit, should he be taken seriously at all?

Astus wrote:

The question is rather why take someone seriously as a teacher. Transmissions and permissions (if and when they even exist) are representatives of a certain level of commitment, effort, and learning. But it is what is represented that can make someone worthy of respect.

To be a teacher, the basic requirement is to know more than the student. To be a teacher of a specific subject, the requirement is knowledge of that subject. To be a Dharma teacher, the requirement is that what is taught is in accordance with the Buddhadharma. So what could be looked into is whether Dharmavidya teaches what he claims to teach.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 27th, 2018 at 3:18 PM

Title: Re: Shakyamuni stabilizing his wisdom?

Content:

Temicco said:

Are there any Mahayana teachings, sutra or otherwise, that discuss the matter of Shakyamuni stabilizing his awareness of his nature and bringing it to its full expression?

Astus wrote:

Any account, description, or explanation of the bodhisattva path is that.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 28th, 2018 at 5:02 AM

Title: Re: Shakyamuni stabilizing his wisdom?

Content:

Temicco said:

Sure, but I am wondering about its relation to Shakyamuni in particular.

Astus wrote:

The Jatakas tell many stories of his past lives. So do numerous sutras. I am unaware of any particular scripture describing Siddhartha's journey on the bodhisattva path in a systematic manner.

Temicco said:

Also, sutras generally don't present the path quite like a tradition's own teachings do, to my knowledge.

Astus wrote:

The Avatamsaka Sutra is one of the main sources in East Asian Buddhism, as it is the basis of both the 10 bhumis and the 52 stages system.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 28th, 2018 at 5:44 PM

Title: Re: Shakyamuni stabilizing his wisdom?

Content:

Temicco said:

Yes, it just does not present things in the same way as vernacular teachings.

Astus wrote:

The bodhisattva path describes how one grows in abilities, masters teachings and samadhis, and eliminates various hindrances. How is that any different?

Examples related to specific samadhis:

"To learn archery, a student has to practice for a long time to acquire the skill. Because of his longtime practice, he now shoots without using his mind, and all his arrows hit the target. I have trained in the same way. When I started learning the inconceivable samādhi, I had to focus my mind on one object. After practicing for a long time, I have come to accomplishment. I now am constantly in this samādhi without thinking."
(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra13.html>)

"One who wants to develop insight into true suchness should ponder that one's mind in its true nature has neither birth nor death, nor does it abide in perception through faculties, such as seeing, hearing, and knowing. One should ignore the thoughts of differentiation. Then one can gradually pass the four samādhis of the formless realm—Boundless Space, Boundless Consciousness, Nothingness, and Neither with Nor without Perception—and attain the Samādhi of the Likeness of Emptiness. After one has attained the Samādhi of the Likeness of Emptiness, one's coarse differentiation through sensory reception, perception, mental processing, and consciousness will not be active. From then on, one's training and learning will be under the protection and care of beneficent learned friends who have great lovingkindness and compassion. As one trains assiduously, overcoming all obstacles, one can gradually enter the Samādhi of the Silent Mind. Once one has attained this samādhi, one can then enter the Samādhi of the One Action. After one has entered this Samādhi of the One Action, one will see innumerable Buddhas and will take wide-ranging and far-reaching actions, with one's mind set in the Position of Firm Belief."
(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra12.html>)

An example for the stages and practices:

"Good son, you should understand that all these stages are included in the four purifications and the eleven aspects. The four purifications are able to encompass the ten stages because the purification of superior intention encompasses the first stage, the purification of superior discipline encompasses the second stage, the purification of superior thought encompasses the third stage, and the purification of superior wisdom encompasses the excellences evolved in the subsequent stages. You should understand that [this purification] is able to encompass all the stages from the fourth to the last Buddha stage. You should understand that in this fashion these four purifications are able to encompass all the stages."
(Samdhinirmocana Sutra, ch 7, BDK ed, p 77)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 4th, 2018 at 4:50 AM

Title: Re: Nagarjuna on Awareness

Content:

Tirisilex said:

I'm talking about like that Yogacara and cittamatra says that only the mind exists.

Astus wrote:

Neither Asanga nor Vasubandhu say that somehow mind would be ultimately real.

"But how does he understand the reality pattern? By abandoning any idea about conscious construction-only!"

(Asanga: Mahayanasamgraha, ch 3, BKD ed, p 65)

"One does abide in the realization
Of mere [representation of] consciousness
When one does not perceive also a supporting consciousness,
For, the graspable objects being absent,
There cannot either be the grasping of that,
[Namely, the grasping of the supporting consciousness]."
(Vasubandhu: Trimsika, v 28, tr Kochumuttom)

As for Nagarjuna, how could anything be exempt from being empty, when even nirvana is such?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 4th, 2018 at 6:46 PM

Title: Re: How Does One Purify the Five Heinous Crimes in Sutra?

Content:

WeiHan said:

5. Splitting the Sangha - I have read that this is also impossible unless you lived in Buddha's time.

PeterC said:

It's possible today, but you would need to cause a certain number of members of the ordained Sangha to oppose others on a specific doctrinal topic - so basically it's very unlikely that you would have achieved this without consciously trying to do so

Astus wrote:

Doctrines do not define the Sangha, precepts do. So someone would actually have to reconstruct the Vinaya in order to cause a split. And that has not really happened, ever.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 4th, 2018 at 8:44 PM

Title: Re: How Does One Purify the Five Heinous Crimes in Sutra?

Content:

PeterC said:

Sanghabheda is defined pretty well in the sutras. I can dig out the references if you'd like. It is, as they say, a thing.

Astus wrote:

If you have a different definition, please provide it.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 5th, 2018 at 4:36 AM

Title: Re: How Does One Purify the Five Heinous Crimes in Sutra?

Content:

WeiHan said:

5. Splitting the Sangha - I have read that this is also impossible unless you lived in Buddha's time.

PeterC said:

It's possible today, but you would need to cause a certain number of members of the ordained Sangha to oppose others on a specific doctrinal topic - so basically it's very unlikely that you would have achieved this without consciously trying to do so

Malcolm said:

No, WeiHan is correct, in fact, just the other day during the Lamdre Triple vision teachings, HH Sakya Trizin mentioned this specifically.

Astus wrote:

Vasubandhu writes about the schism that causes birth in Avici for a kalpa:

"Where does schism take place?

100b. Elsewhere.

Not where the Tathagata is found Schism is impossible where the Master is to be found, for the Tathagata cannot be conquered and his word is full of authority."

(AKB 4.100, vol 2, p 683)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 5th, 2018 at 3:45 PM

Title: Re: How Does One Purify the Five Heinous Crimes in Sutra?

Content:

PeterC said:

Decent summary of the relevant citations here: https://info-buddhism.com/sangha_schism.html

Astus wrote:

Apart from the Parikuppa Sutta (AN 5.129), that's all Vinaya proceedings. There is also the Sanghabheda Sutta (Iti 18) not mentioned in that article.

As for a not Vinaya but Sutra definition, here's a Mahayana take:

"And what is meant by disrupting the sangha? When the assembly of different characteristics that form the skandhas is utterly destroyed, this is what is meant by disrupting the sangha."

(Lankavatara Sutra, ch 57, tr Red Pine)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 5th, 2018 at 3:49 PM

Title: Re: How Does One Purify the Five Heinous Crimes in Sutra?

Content:

Motova said:

How Does One Purify the Five Heinous Crimes in Sutra?

Astus wrote:

From the Platform Sutra (ch 6, BDK ed, p 52-53):

"I have a formless verse, which, if you are able to recite it, will cause you upon hearing these words to melt away in a single instant the delusions and transgressions of numerous eons. The verse goes:

Deluded people cultivate blessings but do not cultivate the Way,
Saying only that to cultivate blessings is the Way.
The blessings from charity and offerings may be unlimited,
But the three poisons are originally created in the mind.

Attempting to cultivate blessings and wanting to extinguish their transgressions,
They may attain blessings in later lives, but their transgressions will still exist.
They should simply eradicate the conditions of transgression within their minds:
This is called true repentance within the self-nature.

Suddenly enlightened to the true transgression of the Mahayana,
Eradicating the false and practicing the correct, they are without transgression.
Studying the Way is to always contemplate the self-nature:
This is to be identical with all the buddhas.

Our patriarchs have transmitted only this sudden teaching,
And you should all vow to see the nature and be identical to them.
If you wish to see the dharmakāya in the future,
Transcend the characteristics of the dharmas and wash them out of your minds.

Make an effort to see for yourself, don't be despondent!
Later, in a single moment, you will suddenly cut off [your thoughts, thus] ending them forever.
If you would be enlightened to the Mahayana and see the nature,
Reverentially hold your palms together [in the anjalimudrā] and seek it in utter sincerity."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 12th, 2018 at 10:26 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Mahamudra: differences and similarities

Content:

Astus wrote:

The three/four bodies exist inherently and perfectly as the nature of mind according to both Dzogchen and Mahamudra. What more could one ever attain than buddhahood?

"The Dharmakaya is the emptiness of the natural state of reality; the Sambhogakaya is the clarity of the natural state; the Nirmanakaya is the movement of energy that arises from the inseparability of emptiness and clarity.

...

"In Dzogchen, realization means understanding that the mind is Buddha. The empty nature of mind is Dharmakaya, the clarity of mind is Sambhogakaya, and all the manifestations of mind (including the passions) are Nirmanakaya. ... When we practice, the emptiness we discover within the mind, within ourselves, is the Dharmakaya; the subtle existence of clarity, self-understanding, is the Sambhogakaya; and whatever concepts, memories, or passions manifest are the Nirmanakaya."

(Tenzin Wangyal: Wonders of the Natural Mind, p 157, 163)

"In the teaching there is an explanation of the three dimensions, the three kayas of the Base, Path, and Fruit. If you read many books, particularly Mahayana texts, then you understand that these three kayas explain some qualities of enlightened beings. In the real sense, it is not only the explanation of enlightened beings, but also the explanation of our condition. It is very important to know this from the beginning. Essence is empty, and is Dharmakaya. Nature is clarity, and means manifestation, and is Sambhogakaya. And Energy without interruption means Nirmanakaya. When we are in a state of contemplation, we are in those three states. When we have that knowledge through introduction, we have discovered our real Base."

(Chogyal Namkhai Norbu: Dzogchen Teachings, p 78)

"one's mind that does not exist anywhere and is free from all conceptual elaborations and is experienced as empty space is the dharmakaya. Yet this emptiness is not like nothing whatsoever or like inanimate matter, rather this emptiness is self-cognizing, self luminous awareness with the characteristic of manifold cognition, this is the sambhogakaya. The unobstructed radiance of this emptiness manifesting its own forms as manifold objects is the nirmanakaya."

(Karmapa Wangchug Dorje: Mahamudra - The Ocean of True Meaning, p 292)

"The nonarising essence of the mind itself is dharmakaya, its unobstructed expression is sambhogakaya, and its function manifesting in any way whatsoever is nirmanakaya. These three kayas are again spontaneously present as an indivisible identity. To recognize and settle on this natural state is called perfectly realizing the faultless and correct view. A view different from this-a view or meditation imputed through intellectual concepts of assumption or through attributes of reference such as being free or not free from extremes, high or special, good or bad, and so forth-has never been taught as the view of mahamudra."

(Tsele Natsok Rangdrol: Lamp of Mahamudra, p 13)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 13th, 2018 at 4:34 PM

Title: Re: Pointing-Out-Instructions and Zen

Content:

DesertDweller said:

would you say there is the substantial difference between these and what we learn in Zen about the nature of the Mind, for instance in the Platform Sutra or Bodhidharma's sermons?

Astus wrote:

All Buddhist schools agree that the nature of the mind is insubstantial.

"Those who wish to become the Sugata's Disciples,
Or Pratyekabuddhas, or likewise, Kings of the Dharma –
Without resort to this Patience they cannot reach their respective goals.
They move across, but their eyes are not on the other shore."
(Ratnagunasamcayagatha 2.38)

"The Buddha's offspring, the Disciples and Pratyekabuddhas,
The gods, and the dharmas which lead to the ease and happiness of all the world, -as many as there are,
They all have issued from wisdom, the foremost perfection,
And yet wisdom does not ever get exhausted, nor does it increase."
(28.466)

"Whether one wants to train on the level of Disciple, or Pratyekabuddha, or Bodhisattva,
- one should listen to this perfection of wisdom, take it up, bear it in mind, recite it, study it, spread it among others, and in this very perfection of wisdom should one be trained and exert oneself."
(PP8K 1.2)

"Since thus, in ultimate truth and as things stand, such a dharma which could constitute a being whose heart is set on enlightenment cannot be apprehended, where do you get the idea that "this one belongs to the vehicle of the Disciples, that one to the vehicle of the Pratyekabuddhas, that one to the great vehicle"?"
(16.4)

"There is really no establishment of various vehicles, and so I speak of the one vehicle; but in order to carry the ignorant I talk of a variety of vehicles."
(Lankavatara Sutra, 2.56)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 13th, 2018 at 6:23 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Mahamudra: differences and similarities

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

if the Path is different the Fruit is also

Astus wrote:

Buddha-nature is obscured by the two types of defilements. Once they are gone, that is complete buddhahood. So it is understood to be the path and fruit in all Mahayana. How is Bön any different from that?

"Twofold wisdom causes release from the two veils.
Since there is the one that is free from ideation and the one ensuing from this in post-meditation, it is held that there are [two] primordial wisdoms."
(Uttaratantra v 174, in Buddha Nature, p 186)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 14th, 2018 at 4:45 PM

Title: Re: Pointing-Out-Instructions and Zen

Content:

DesertDweller said:

I'm interested in the essential difference, if any, between the Dzogchen pointing-out and Zen's.

Astus wrote:

Pointing out instruction can have different meanings in Vajrayana. First of all, it is useful to differentiate between the instruction given and the instruction received. The instruction given can have various forms, including the common threefold set of mental, symbolic, and verbal transmission. The instruction received can have three main forms, as something learnt, as something understood, and as something recognised. Ideally a pointing out happens when the listener gets a taste of the so called natural state. Practically I'd say it's more often the case that one receives the instructions as a teaching, then goes to comprehend and realise it on one's own.

Zen does not have any formal set of pointing out instructions, because on the one hand it is always up to the situation, and on the other the student has to make the journey on his own (i.e. the teacher's job is not to feed people with more ideas, but to assist in overcoming pre-existing concepts).

DesertDweller said:

what is it about these Dzogchen instructions that makes them "work"? And do they "work" differently than they do in Zen?

Astus wrote:

Both Zen and Vajrayana have prajnaparamita as their essence. What distinguishes them are the assisting methods applied. Vajrayana focuses on devotion, hence guruyoga is the core practice. Zen is somewhat more diverse and flexible, but taking the most common method of Kanna Zen (看話禪), there are three essentials (三要): great faith, great determination, and great doubt (大信根, 大憤志, 大疑情), from which the feeling of doubt is emphasised the most, thus the saying: Great doubt, great awakening. Small doubt, small awakening. No doubt, no awakening. (大疑大悟。小疑小悟。不疑不悟。) The feelings of devotion and doubt are somewhat on the opposite sides, however, they are equally understood to be important emotional supports for gaining insight, even if they don't function the same way (that is, in Zen doubt is eventually broken through, while in Vajrayana devotion is perfected to the highest level where the guru is the nature of mind).

DesertDweller said:

do the pointing-out instructions in Dzogchen actually "work" as an "initiation" (empowerment), or merely as an effective means, accompanied by a certain grace, of directing the student to his/her Mind?

Astus wrote:

Empowerment is itself an effective means of directing the student to the nature of mind. A pointing out instruction is not exactly an empowerment in the sense that it focuses only on showing the student the nature of mind, but does not provide a whole set of creation and completion practice of a deity. That's why a pointing out instruction is equated to the fourth empowerment, but not the first three.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 15th, 2018 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra and Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Depending on whether one is using the Mahamudra or Dzogchen approach, there are different terminologies, but the actual training is essentially the same."

(<https://www.lionsroar.com/two-great-paths/>)

"Although the teachings on essence mahamudra and dzogchen of the natural state use different terminology, in actuality they do not differ at all. ...

As the great master Trampo Terton Sherab Oser wrote:

Mahamudra and dzogchen

Differ in words but not in meaning.

In terms of ground, path, and fruition, ground mahamudra is the nonarising essence, unobstructed nature, and expression manifest in manifold ways. The dzogchen teachings describe these three aspects as essence, nature, and compassion."

(Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche, in Lamp of Mahamudra, p xiii, xiv)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 16th, 2018 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: original as misnomer

Content:

Supramundane said:

I often come across references to Original Mind, Nature, etc.in discussions of Buddhism (especially Zen).

Astus wrote:

If you want the East Asian teachings on such matters, start with the Awakening of Faith in Mahayana. It talks of "original enlightenment" (benjue 本覺).

"The essence of Mind is free from thoughts. The characteristic of that which is free from thoughts is analogous to that of the sphere of empty space that pervades everywhere. The one [without any second, i.e., the absolute] aspect of the world of reality (dharmadhatu) is none other than the undifferentiated dharmakaya, the "essence body" of the Tathagata. [Since the essence of Mind is] grounded on the dharmakaya, it is to be called the original enlightenment. Why? Because "original enlightenment" indicates [the essence of Mind (a priori)] in contradistinction to [the essence of Mind in] the process of actualization of enlightenment; the process of actualization of enlightenment is none other than [the process of integrating] the identity with the original enlightenment."

(Awakening of Faith, BDK ed, p 17)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 18th, 2018 at 2:00 AM

Title: Re: original as misnomer

Content:

Supramundane said:

Perhaps the Trikaya is a reflection of the middle way too?

Astus wrote:

Not really. The trikaya doctrine is meant to explain the different aspects of a buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 20th, 2018 at 3:40 PM

Title: Re: original as misnomer

Content:

Supramundane said:

how then can there be an 'original mind' or 'true self'???

Astus wrote:

The purpose of such terms is to encourage people, to inspire, to posit an attractive goal.

"Self" is what "buddha" means. "Permanence" is what "dharma body" means. "Bliss" is what "nirvāṇa" means. "Purity" is what "dharma" means.

...

"Nonself" [actually] denotes "saṃsāra." "Self" denotes "tathāgata." "Impermanence" denotes "śrāvakas" and "pratyekabuddhas." "Permanence" denotes the "dharma body of tathāgatas." "Pain" (*duḥkha) denotes "all other paths." Bliss (*sukha) denotes "nirvāṇa" itself. "Impurity" denotes "created dharmas." "Purity" denotes "the true teaching of the buddhas and bodhisattvas.” All these are what I call the “noninversions.” It is by means of what is not inverted that one can understand the meaning of letters. If you want to separate yourself from the four inversions, you must understand permanence, bliss, purity, and self in this way.”

(Nirvana Sutra, vol 1, BDK ed, p 59, 60-61)

"the reason why the Tathagatas who are Arhats and Fully-Enlightened Ones, teach the doctrine pointing to the Tathagata-garbha is to make the ignorant cast aside their fear when they listen to the teaching of egolessness and to have them realise the state of non-discrimination and imagelessness."
(Lankavatara Sutra, 2.28, tr Suzuki)

"[The sutras of the second turning of the wheel of Dharma] state in numerous places that all knowable [phenomena] are in all ways empty like a cloud, a dream, or an illusion. Why is it then, that in [the sutras of the third turning of the wheel of Dharma] the Buddha, having said this, declared that buddha nature is present within beings?

With regard to faintheartedness, contempt for inferior beings, perceiving the untrue, disparaging the true nature, and exceeding self-cherishing, he said this to persuade those who have any of these five to abandon their defects.

The final truth is in every respect devoid of anything compounded.
The poisons, karma, and their product are said to be like a cloud and so on."
(Uttaratantra, v 156-158, in Buddha Nature, p 40-41)

Supramundane said:
do the three bodies --the Nirmanakaya, Dharmakaya and Sambhogakaya --- correspond to:

- 1) physical body, mental body and the Law
- 2) Body, Mind and Enlightenment
- 3) Form, Essence and Clarity
- 4) Body, Mind and Emptiness
- 5) Body, Mind and Rainbow Body?

Does one mediate between the other two?

Astus wrote:
The nirmanakaya is how ordinary beings perceive/conceive a buddha, i.e. the human aspect. The sambhogakaya is how arya-bodhisattvas perceive/conceive a buddha, i.e. the devotional and meditational aspect. The dharmakaya is the true nature of a buddha, i.e. emptiness, free from perceptions/conceptions.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 20th, 2018 at 7:23 PM

Title: Re: original as misnomer

Content:

Supramundane said:

Some Zen masters seem to advocate such a state of non-conceptual thoughts as the goal of meditation, changing the awareness of observing the world into becoming part of it.

Astus wrote:

What sort of Zen is that? Huineng is quite clear on the matter of what is the proper method and what is a mistake:

"The most important thing is not to become attached to emptiness. If you empty your minds and sit in quietude, this is to become attached to the emptiness of blankness. ... Furthermore, there are deluded people who empty their minds and sit in quietude without thinking of anything whatsoever, claiming that this is great."
(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 28-29)

"What is nonthought? If in seeing all the dharmas, the mind is not defiled or attached, this is nonthought. [The mind's] functioning pervades all locations, yet it is not attached to all the locations. Just purify the fundamental mind, causing the six consciousnesses to emerge from the six [sensory] gates, [causing one to be] without defilement or heterogeneity within the six types of sensory data (literally, the "six dusts"), autonomous in the coming and going [of mental phenomena], one's penetrating function without stagnation. This is the samādhi of prajñā, the autonomous emancipation. This is called the practice of nonthought.

"If one does not think of the hundred things in order to cause thought to be eradicated, this is bondage within the Dharma. This is called an extreme view."
(ch 2, p 33-34)

"Nonthought is to be without thought in the context of thoughts."
(ch 4, p 43)

Supramundane said:

However, IMO, if our goal in life is to recapture some sort of Eden of childhood, whereby we think like a child and are unable to avail ourselves of language, we would be no further ahead.

Astus wrote:

The Buddha himself rejected such an approach:

"If an individual is endowed with these four qualities, I do not describe him as consummate in what is skillful, foremost in what is skillful, an invincible contemplative attained to the highest attainments. Rather, he stands on the same level as a stupid baby boy lying on its back. Which four? There is the case where he does no evil action with his body, speaks no evil speech, resolves on no evil resolve, and maintains himself with no evil means of livelihood. If an individual is endowed with these four qualities, I do not describe him as consummate in what is skillful, foremost in what is skillful, an invincible contemplative attained to the highest attainments. Rather, he stands on the same level as a stupid baby boy lying on its back."

(<https://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.078.than.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 25th, 2018 at 8:22 PM

Title: Re: Is everything "one" or are we just inter-connected without a center?

Content:

Polarbear said:

is just interconnected or if also everything is part of something bigger

Astus wrote:

Interconnected means how one thing is always caused and sustained by other factors, in other words, nothing is self-reliant. In case of a human body, it cannot function without air and food for instance. Contemplating that sort of dependency one should recognise that the body cannot be trusted, as it exists only because of factors we do not control.

The point of the teaching of interdependence is not to imagine some sort of magical bond between all beings, but to recognise how fragile and causally bound life is. Then it becomes clearer that assuming a oneness or something bigger is also the wrong approach that looks for stability where there is none.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 25th, 2018 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: Is everything "one" or are we just inter-connected without a center?

Content:

Vasana said:

there is at least some connection between all beings as taught in Mahayana.both in terms of 'mother sentient beings' and the fact that the clothes on our back, food on our plate, technology were using and so on is due to the kindness and/or efforts of others.

Astus wrote:

Contemplating that samsara has no beginning

(<https://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn15/sn15.014.than.html>) is meant to raise the sense of renunciation, while considering other people's kindness is to develop gratitude (<https://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/an/an02/an02.031.than.html>).

Neither are about establishing the concept that there is an invisible connection. And the reason for that is that all beings are responsible for their own actions and reap the fruits of their own deeds (<https://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.135.than.html>).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 26th, 2018 at 6:48 PM

Title: Re: Satipatthana practice and Shikantaza

Content:

JMGinPDX said:

reflecting on satipatthana during shikantaza practice?

Astus wrote:

I don't know what exactly you mean by satipatthana, as that practice has various approaches in Theravada itself, and there are other forms preserved in Mahayana traditions too. If you want to see a Zen take on it, check out Dogen's Sanjushichihon Bodaibunpo (三十七品菩提分法 / 37 bodhipaksadharma) found in his Shobogenzo. There are also Thich Nhat Hanh's works, in particular his commentary (Transformation and Healing).

In a way, the essence of satipatthana is the cultivation of sati and sampajanna (e.g. <https://suttacentral.net/sn47.2/en/bodhi>), as emphasised by the disciples of Ajahn Chah, and such qualities can be seen as very much present in zazen as well. So if you take satipatthana less as a four staged method and more as a practice of mindfulness in general, it comes closer to the ideal form in Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 26th, 2018 at 7:34 PM

Title: Re: Is everything "one" or are we just inter-connected without a center?

Content:

seeker242 said:

And what about Metta? Is metta not used to "establish a connection"?

Astus wrote:

One develops kindness in order to attain the 11 benefits (see: <https://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/an/an11/an11.016.than.html>), and possibly even liberation (<https://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.052.than.html>). Even the four means of attraction (samgrahavastu / 四攝法) are about liberating beings.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 26th, 2018 at 10:19 PM

Title: Re: Is everything "one" or are we just inter-connected without a center?

Content:

Vasana said:

Connectivity and interdependence are a fact of reality it's just that on the ultimate side, no entities are truly established.

Astus wrote:

I'm not talking of any ultimate level, more like "middle level" (conventional analytical/philosophical), that I think the OP is asking about. Of course, connections do make sense on the ordinary conventional level, but that does not require much Buddhist explanation.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 27th, 2018 at 8:51 PM

Title: Re: Accuracy of internet koans

Content:

shanyin said:

Are some koans on the internet innacurate (imperfect)?

Astus wrote:

Many are usually from " https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Zen_Flesh,_Zen_Bones ", like that story you quoted. If you want to know the classical koans, check classical collections (the three most popular that are available in English:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/The_Gateless_Barrier, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Blue_Cliff_Record, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Book_of_Equanimity). But there are several large collections of Zen stories, both canonical and extra-canonical.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 28th, 2018 at 5:49 PM

Title: Re: Tradition shmadition, lineage shmineage

Content:

kausalya said:

The destination is the same, but the steps are different. All roads lead to Rome, but it is only prudent to stick to one road if you want to get there as fast as possible (and you should, if the goal is to develop bodhichitta).

Astus wrote:

There is only one road, ekayana, to the same destination. Stylistics and terminology may differ, but that does not change the content.

kausalya said:

Lineages also exist so that some measure of control can be exerted over who is allowed to teach, and their realizations can be verified as genuine beforehand.

Astus wrote:

That is an idealistic reinterpretation of lineage. People are not only allowed to teach, but they should teach, especially those committed to liberating all beings. There is no general supervising institution exerting some sort of quality control on monastics or the laity.

kausalya said:

A free-for-all would result in people having access to inappropriate methods, running the risk of injuring themselves or others in the process.

Astus wrote:

The Buddha's words are available to everyone, as they should be. Grabbing the snake at the wrong end is always a risk.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 28th, 2018 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: Tradition shmadition, lineage shmineage

Content:

kausalya said:

Ekayana, as far as I understand it, is an expression of shunyata.

Astus wrote:

Ekayana means one vehicle.

"A Tathāgata teaches sentient beings the Dharma only through the single buddha vehicle. There is no other, neither a second nor a third."

(Lotus Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 31)

"There is really no establishment of various vehicles, and so I speak of the one vehicle; but in order to carry the ignorant I talk of a variety of vehicles."

(Lankavatara Sutra, 2.56, tr Suzuki)

"To dispel all impurities, there is no antidote to apply apart from knowing the suchness of phenomena.

Suchness does not rely on the divisions of phenomena's manifestations,

And the intelligence that perceives suchness is also not multiple.

Therefore, you taught the unequalled and inseparable vehicle to sentient beings."

(Madhyamakavatara 12.36, in "The Karmapa's Middle Way", p 544-545)

kausalya said:

It doesn't negate the need to find a coherent path and stick to it.

Astus wrote:

The Buddhadharma is a path.

kausalya said:

when the Buddha said for us to light our own way

Astus wrote:

It is actually explained quite clearly:

"Therefore, Ananda, be islands unto yourselves, refuges unto yourselves, seeking no external refuge; with the Dhamma as your island, the Dhamma as your refuge, seeking no other refuge.

And how, Ananda, is a bhikkhu an island unto himself, a refuge unto himself, seeking no external refuge; with the Dhamma as his island, the Dhamma as his refuge, seeking no other refuge?

When he dwells contemplating the body in the body, earnestly, clearly comprehending, and mindfully, after having overcome desire and sorrow in regard to the world; when he dwells contemplating feelings in feelings, the mind in the mind, and mental objects in mental objects, earnestly, clearly comprehending, and mindfully, after having overcome desire and sorrow in regard to the world, then, truly, he is an island unto himself, a refuge unto himself, seeking no external refuge; having the Dhamma as his island, the Dhamma as his refuge, seeking no other refuge."

(<https://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.16.1-6.vaji.html>)

Interestingly, this island of mindfulness is also called the one-way path (ekayana):

"this is the one-way path for the purification of beings, for the overcoming of sorrow and lamentation, for the passing away of pain and displeasure, for the achievement of the method, for the realization of Nibbāna, that is, the four establishments of mindfulness."
(<https://suttacentral.net/sn47.1/en/bodhi>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 29th, 2018 at 4:58 PM

Title: Re: Prayers, to who?

Content:

Astus wrote:

A teaching to be considered here:

"Householder, there are these five things that are wished for, desired, agreeable, and rarely gained in the world. What five? Long life, householder, is wished for, desired, agreeable, and rarely gained in the world. Beauty ... Happiness ... Fame ... The heavens are wished for, desired, agreeable, and rarely gained in the world. These are the five things that are wished for, desired, agreeable, and rarely gained in the world. These five things, householder, that are wished for, desired, agreeable, and rarely gained in the world, I say, are not obtained by means of prayers or aspirations. If these five things that are wished for, desired, agreeable, and rarely gained in the world could be obtained by means of prayers or aspirations, who here would be lacking in anything?"
(<https://suttacentral.net/an5.43/en/bodhi>)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 1st, 2018 at 12:52 AM

Title: Re: Accuracy of internet koans

Content:

shanyin said:

Can someone give me a koan from one of those books?

Astus wrote:

"Daily life itself is a hwadu, so there is no need to receive a hwadu from others or to give a hwadu to others. Your very existence is a hwadu. Thus, if you are continuously holding on to a hwadu someone else gave you, when will you be able to solve your original hwadus? Trying to solve another person's hwadu is like turning empty millstones or spinning a car's wheels without moving forward.

Your body itself is a hwadu. Birth itself is a hwadu. Work itself is a hwadu. The vast universe is a hwadu. If you want to add more hwadus to these, when will you be able to taste this infinitely deep world we live in?"
(Daehaeng Kun Sunim: No River to Cross, p 55)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 3rd, 2018 at 2:53 PM

Title: Re: Accuracy of internet koans

Content:

shanyin said:

What's a hwandu?

Astus wrote:

Wikipedia: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Hua_Tou.

Jogy website:

http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/bbs/board.php?bo_table=3020&wr_id=37

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 5th, 2018 at 1:55 AM

Title: Re: Differences in the practice of satipatthana among followers of different turns of the wheel of Dharma.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here is some literature:

Mahaprajnaparamitasastra, ch 31 (Migme Chodron translation: vol 3, p 947-965)

Sikhsasamuccaya ch. 13

(https://archive.org/stream/FourApplMindfulnessMahayana/SgiksnasamuccayaOn4ApplicationsUpdatedJuly2017_djvu.txt)

Madhyantavibhaga 4.1 (look into commentaries for details)

Mahayanasutralamkara 18.43-45 (lists 14 unique qualities found in smrtyupasthana as bodhisattva practice)

Dōgen: Sanjūshichi-bon-bodai-bunpō (BDK ed. of Shobogenzo, vol 4, p 3-6)

Niguma: Lady of Illusion, p 95, 98-100

Berzin: <https://studybuddhism.com/en/advanced-studies/abhidharma-tenet-systems/comparison-of-buddhist-traditions/the-four-close-placements-of-mindfulness-in-mahayana>

Sujato: http://santifm.org/santipada/wp-content/uploads/2012/08/A_History_of_Mindfulness_Bhikkhu_Sujato.pdf,

17.5

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 6th, 2018 at 4:15 AM

Title: Re: Dont follow a lineage (etc.), follow a teacher

Content:

clyde said:

Must one size fit all?

Astus wrote:

One size must fit all, otherwise there is no path. It is rather a matter of what size one imagines there.

clyde said:

But the goal of Zen (and all Buddhist traditions) is awakening and living in accord with the Dharma.

Astus wrote:

There is actually no rule that one has to train under a specific teacher for a specific length of time in Zen in order to attain awakening. It is a fairly individual matter how long it takes for a person to realise that there is nothing to gain nor to lose. Nor is it said that one should simply settle with the first person that looks like what one imagines a teacher to be. Furthermore, following a teacher is no guarantee for anything.

But(!), there can be, and likely is, a huge amount of misconception about Buddhism in anyone's head who is just getting to know it. A proper teacher is really a convenient way to learn, just as becoming a member of a community is similarly beneficial. While in the end it is up to each person to develop the factors of enlightenment, it can hardly happen without being clear about what they are and how to make them come about.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 6th, 2018 at 3:19 PM

Title: Re: Dont follow a lineage (etc.), follow a teacher

Content:

Matylda said:

Ultimately without teacher there is no zen practice

Astus wrote:

So Huineng said,

"If you can become enlightened yourself, don't rely on external seeking — don't think I'm saying you can only attain emancipation through [the help of] a spiritual compatriot other than yourself. This is not the case! Why? Within your own minds there is a spiritual compatriot [who will help you] become enlightened by yourself! If you activate the false and deluded, you will become all mixed up with false thoughts. Although some external spiritual compatriots may be teachers, they cannot save you. If you activate the correct and true and contemplate with prajñā, in a single instant [all your] false thoughts will be completely eradicated. If you recognize the self-nature, with a single [experience of] enlightenment you will attain the stage of buddhahood."

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 33)

And Dahui,

"I just believe that this matter can't be transmitted and can't be learned. You must realize on your own, awaken on your own, affirm on your own, stop-to-rest on your own, and then you will for the first time get to the end of things."

(Letters of Dahui, p 89)

But even if it is maintained that there is no Zen without a teacher, it is taught that there is no Zen without the pure precepts of the renunciates.

The Buddha taught,

"Therefore, Ānanda, one who practices entering samādhi while practicing meditation in stillness without renouncing sexual activity is like one who cooks sand in the hope that it will turn into rice. A hundred thousand eons might pass and it would still be nothing but hot sand, since it wasn't rice to begin with. It was merely sand.

In seeking the wondrous enlightenment of the Buddha while you still have sexual desire, you may gain some understanding of that wondrous enlightenment, but that understanding will be rooted in sexual desire. If the basis of your understanding is sexual desire, you will continually be reborn among the three lowly destinies, bound to the cycle of death and rebirth with no hope of escape. Then how will you find your way to practice and realization of the Thus-Come Ones' nirvana?"

(Surangama Sutra, ch 7.1, new BTTS translation, p 265)

And Eisai,

"The Buddha's teachings regard keeping precepts as preceding everything else. If anyone breaks moral precepts regulated by the Buddha, and calls himself a child of the Buddha, it can be compared to a subject who won't obey the monarch's orders but who [still] calls himself a subject of the monarch."

(Treatise on Letting Zen Flourish, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 125)

And Dogen,

"The lifeblood of the buddhas and the patriarchs is nothing other than their leaving family life and receiving the precepts. Someone who has not left family life is never a Buddhist patriarch. To see the buddhas and to see the patriarchs is to leave family life and to receive the precepts."

(Shukke, in SBGZ, vol 4, BDK ed, p 148)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 7th, 2018 at 4:32 AM

Title: Re: Dont follow a lineage (etc.), follow a teacher

Content:

Matylda said:

There is no zen practice without zen teacher.

Astus wrote:

What counts as Zen practice?

If it is non-thought, then if one can do it, there is nothing more to explain, and if one cannot do it, one is not yet practising.

If it is something other than non-thought, but rather various methods to achieve it, then it is no different from the gradual path that is explained in all the scriptures and treatises.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 7th, 2018 at 4:35 AM

Title: Re: Dont follow a lineage (etc.), follow a teacher

Content:

WuMing said:

... and in order to do so, you have to receive the instructions of a teacher to be able to do it, right?

Astus wrote:

Dahui's letters are filled with instructions. But of course it might help to hear the same repeated from the high seat.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 7th, 2018 at 5:56 AM

Title: Re: Dont follow a lineage (etc.), follow a teacher

Content:

WuMing said:

so, there is a difference between reading instructions in a book and receiving instructions directly from a teacher, isn't it!?

Astus wrote:

Is there a difference between writing and speaking?

"Since they maintain they have no need of written words, they should not speak either, because written words are merely the marks of spoken language. They also maintain that the direct way cannot be established by written words, and yet these two words, 'not established' are themselves written."

(Platform Sutra, ch 10, tr <http://www.cttbusa.org/6patriarch/6patriarch20.asp>)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 7th, 2018 at 4:06 PM

Title: Re: Dont follow a lineage (etc.), follow a teacher

Content:

WuMing said:

here is a quote from Dogen's Bendowa (emphasis is mine): practice the way of zazen under the guidance of a true teacher

Astus wrote:

That means only one thing in Dogen's writing, himself. That is because he denies the realisation of all Buddhist teachers who brought the Dharma from China before him, and he viewed only his teacher as the sole upholder of not simply Zen but the whole Buddhadharma. In other words, what Dogen claims (or rather propagates) is that unless you become his disciple, you cannot attain liberation.

WuMing said:

To understand the dharma and attain the way can only be the result of studying with a teacher.

Astus wrote:

Any reason why that would be so?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 7th, 2018 at 5:06 PM

Title: Re: Dont follow a lineage (etc.), follow a teacher

Content:

clyde said:

I defer to Zen teachers to define the "Zen tradition" and most (all?) Zen teachers hold that the tradition requires a living, face-to-face student-teacher relationship. So, a 'true Zen student' has a Zen teacher, which is why I consider myself a 'student of Zen' and not a Zen student.

Astus wrote:

Every skill and science has its teachers, because on the one hand there are people who like to share their knowledge, and there are people who like to listen to others. This is nothing unique in Zen. But while a discussion on history means talking about historical events, apparently lots of discussion about Zen is about the people who teach and who study it. In that way Zen looks more like the shallow analysis of modern politics where people consider only the individual politicians and their followers, instead of politics on the social, economic, and the philosophical level. Probably the reason for that is the idea that Zen is some undefinable practice that cannot be spoken of, hence instead of clarifying what is what, it is left to those who are assumed to be the experts in this mostly unknown matter. At the same time, there is the fear that unless one attends a specialist, one will fall into unfounded conceptual constructs and misinterpret everything. But isn't it because of leaving Zen a vague something that it is so easy to be trapped into wrong views about it? Just because there are hundreds and thousands of reliable sources to study mathematics, it does not mean people no longer want to learn it from the experts of the field, and at the same time there is little confusion about the difference in expertise of a freshman, a secondary school teacher, and a Fields Medalist. Similarly, there are village Zen priests, there are abbots, there are highly ranked masters, and as for genuinely enlightened teachers, that is rather a matter of personal opinion. But none of that actually informs us what Zen is, just as living with a mathematician does not magically make one understand mathematics.

clyde said:
practiced without a teacher

Astus wrote:
Is practice a communal activity, or two-person activity? If not, and it is an individual effort, then no practice happens with a teacher. A teacher can explain and advise, but can neither show it, nor give it.

Author: Astus
Date: Saturday, July 7th, 2018 at 5:22 PM
Title: Re: Dont follow a lineage (etc.), follow a teacher
Content:
smcj said:

Because without a teacher one must rely on one's own faulty awareness as one's guide. Unawareness will always interpret Dharma as something other than what it is.

Astus wrote:
All practitioner must develop for oneself correct mindfulness (samyaksmṛti) and wise attention (yoniso manaskara). But I think you mean right view, i.e. correctly knowing and understanding the Dharma, what is obtained by learning, and learning happens through listening to Dharma speeches and reading Dharma books. Of course, without learning there is little chance of arriving at correct view, and without correct view there is no correct understanding and correct cultivation.

Author: Astus
Date: Saturday, July 7th, 2018 at 9:21 PM
Title: Re: Purify a disease
Content:
Norden said:
I am kind of fear I will develop the disease

Astus wrote:
It seems that the disease you actually have is fear, so what could be treated is fear.

Norden said:
what particular wholesome deed do I need to do to neutralize or counteract this particular disease, if any?

Astus wrote:
You might want to look into some teachings on karma first:
<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an03/an03.099.than.html>,
<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.101.than.html>,
<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.014.than.html>.

"The result of kamma is an inconceivable matter that one should not try to conceive; one who tries to conceive it would reap either madness or frustration."
(AN 4.77, tr Bodhi)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 7th, 2018 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: Dont follow a lineage (etc.), follow a teacher

Content:

WuMing said:

Of course, no doubt about that, but it is very wise to check back with the teacher in order to not go astray. This is the danger of doing it by oneself alone, as I see it. It is good to check ones understanding with a teacher, a real person, to avoid fooling oneself.

Astus wrote:

According to <http://ddc.shengyen.org/cgi-bin/ccdd/show.py?s=09-06p0027> the primary factor is that a teacher should have a correct view, and in order to be able to tell that, the disciple must have knowledge of the Dharma. So in the end it always comes down to matching view with what is taught in the scriptures. As it's said in the <https://suttacentral.net/dn16/en/sujato>:

"If they're not included in the discourses or found in the Vinaya, you should draw the conclusion: 'Clearly this is not the word of the Buddha. It has not been correctly memorized by those senior mendicants.' And so you should reject it. If they are included in the discourses and found in the Vinaya, you should draw the conclusion: 'Clearly this is the word of the Buddha. It has been correctly memorized by those senior mendicants.' You should remember it."

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 8th, 2018 at 3:35 PM

Title: Re: Dont follow a lineage (etc.), follow a teacher

Content:

clyde said:

Zen, the tradition, is a religious institution (or institutions)

Astus wrote:

Zen is a very loose term applied to a chain of concepts within East Asian Buddhism. Institutionally it has always existed within the framework of the monastic tradition, and to that added its main defining idea of lineages.

clyde said:

and as such it's to its leaders to determine what is and is not part of their tradition.

Astus wrote:

Today there are bigger and smaller organisations (Soto, Jogye, Fo Guang Shan, etc.), but even within those there isn't much of doctrinal unity, not to mention all the Western Zen communities that can operate in complete independence apart from any Asian hierarchy.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 9th, 2018 at 4:29 AM

Title: Re: Purify a disease

Content:

Norden said:

If we do not know the precise cause and result, can we at least know the general idea?

Astus wrote:

Of course, there are such descriptions, see:

<https://accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.135.than.html>

Norden said:

Then why in order to counteract the karma of leper is inconceivable?

Astus wrote:

What's already done is done, it cannot be changed. What one can do is to avoid repeating the same, thus reaping the results again.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 9th, 2018 at 5:56 AM

Title: Re: doctrinal unity

Content:

clyde said:

While there are differences in doctrinal emphasis (and practices) between the lineages, I think there is a fair degree of doctrinal unity.

Astus wrote:

What I meant is the absence of a requirement to comply with a specific set of doctrines within the various organisations. It can be said that there is a fair degree of unity even in the whole of Buddhism, more in East Asian Mahayana, and even more if we look at only e.g. Korean Zen. But I have not yet heard of an institution that outlines the particular teachings that they consider orthodox, unlike the major Christian churches.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 9th, 2018 at 6:12 PM

Title: Re: Purify a disease

Content:

Norden said:

What I meant was the general idea of cause and effect of leper. Cula-kammavibhanga talks more about five precepts and the transgressions.

Astus wrote:

Leprosy is an illness that can turn one ugly, hence look at the causes of those two: anger and ill-temper.

Norden said:

Since we do not know what type of unwholesome deed causes leper, therefore it's imponderable, is that what you're saying?

Astus wrote:

What that quote says is that it is futile to guess all the consequences of an action. Even if you had the ability to remember your previous lives, you still could not tell what actions would cause what in your present and future lives.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 9th, 2018 at 8:38 PM

Title: Re: No gods / No superior entities

Content:

croco said:

Which form of Buddhism fits the criteria?

Astus wrote:

Buddhism is a path of developing oneself and helping others to develop. In that way every Buddhist has complete freedom in what they are willing to undertake as their practice. However, as with any group of people, communities have their own set of practices that often involve rituals. Such rituals within Buddhism normally involve at least some references to so called supernatural entities, like guardian deities and ghosts, although groups run by Westerners may lack most or all of that.

Buddhist practice as a lay person is primarily about upholding the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Five_Precepts, and this is quite universal within all schools. So, teaching those five precepts to one's children is the optimal approach, as <https://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/kn/iti/iti.3.050-099.than.html#iti-074>. There are also some <https://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.31.0.nara.html#to-children> regarding the duties of parents toward their children, where the first two elements are restraining them from evil and encouraging them to do good. You may also read how the Buddha taught his own son, Rahula, when he was only 7: <https://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.061.than.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 11th, 2018 at 5:39 PM

Title: Re: The 'Democracy' of the Pure Land Path

Content:

如傑優婆塞 said:

<https://www.ymba.org/books/buddhism-wisdom-faith-pure-land-principles-and-practice/note-pure-land>

It is a democratic method that empowers its adherents, freeing them from arcane metaphysics as well as dependence on teachers, gurus, roshis and other mediating authority figures

Astus wrote:

That is a half-truth. There are still teachers in the various PL organisations, there is also a hierarchy within those communities, etc. It is just a common human desire/behaviour to follow other people. At the same time, all Buddhist paths require the individual to proceed on the way on his own, nobody can push or pull instead of the practitioner.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 14th, 2018 at 3:53 PM

Title: Re: proclaiming awakening

Content:

clyde said:

The Buddha proclaimed

Astus wrote:

The regular affirmation of the Buddha's enlightenment all over the sutras is not really about what he claimed but about affirming Buddhism as true. That is why you can find that statements about the Buddha come to be grander and grander as you go from the Nikayas towards the Tantras.

clyde said:

reluctant to talk about their attainments or that of their students

Astus wrote:

There is little need for that when the system does that for you. For instance, a Zen master is supposed to be an equal of the Buddha by the fact of being affirmed as a Dharma heir; similarly, a tulku - i.e. nirmanakaya, or the telling Chinese term "living Buddha" (huofo 活佛) - is a fairly obvious expression defining the status of someone as enlightened.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 14th, 2018 at 3:58 PM

Title: Re: Reliance on a master

Content:

Rion said:

Can anyone explain the contradiction?

Astus wrote:

There are some significant differences between traditions in terms of how the Buddha is conceived.

You might want to check Guang Xing's study

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=DTWZLMGFFgkC> as a little background info.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 14th, 2018 at 8:01 PM

Title: Re: doctrinal unity

Content:

Anders said:

Is this needed?

Astus wrote:

No. It's actually the point that Zen does not mean a specific teaching or method.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 15th, 2018 at 5:28 PM

Title: Re: doctrinal unity

Content:

clyde said:

there are practices and teachings that differentiate Zen from other Buddhist (and non-Buddhist) traditions and define the Zen tradition, yes?

Astus wrote:

What are those unique teachings and practices?

Kanna Zen is likely the most unique element, and it encompasses almost everything one can associate with the general view of Zen. The problem with that is that it was first propagated in the 12th century, and it is not embraced universally.

As for teaching, sudden enlightenment is possibly the term that can cover the central theme of Zen teachings, as long as we take it to include the belief that it is possible to directly perceive the nature of mind without prerequisites (discipline, meditation, study), and that the nature of mind is identical to the nature of buddhahood. As for practice, non-thought is likely the essence of all methods, meaning the absence of grasping at concepts, behind what lies the view that from grasping at thoughts emerge everything.

Why then does not this mean a doctrinal unity? Because not setting up a doctrine to be upheld is the very path itself.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 15th, 2018 at 5:37 PM

Title: Re: proclaiming awakening

Content:

clyde said:

The Buddha's affirmation wasn't merely claiming that the path was true

Astus wrote:

It's not the Buddha's claim, it is the tradition's claim, the disciples' validation of themselves by asserting the trustworthiness of their teacher.

clyde said:

I don't believe that all Buddhist teachers are enlightened regardless of their status or title

Astus wrote:

Apart from the Buddha and the Dharma, the third jewel is the Sangha. Trust in the Sangha is as important as trust in the other two.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 16th, 2018 at 3:29 AM

Title: Re: proclaiming awakening

Content:

clyde said:

Why don't living Buddhist teachers do the same? Or are none of them enlightened?

Astus wrote:

Because such a claim is basically counterproductive. It only deepens the divide between teacher and student, strengthens unrealistic expectations, and generates an unhealthy personality cult. On the other hand, saying that one's teacher was a great being, a buddha in person, etc., means that the teaching transmitted is beneficial, valuable, and true.

"If he claims to have gained something, he is arrogant. If he claims to have realized something, he is arrogant. If he claims to have attained liberation, he is arrogant."
(The Definitive Vinaya, in Treasury of Mahayana Sutras, p 271)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 16th, 2018 at 4:34 AM

Title: Re: proclaiming awakening

Content:

clyde said:

We read this of the Buddha and other Buddhist teachers in the suttas, sutras, and other ancient texts.

Astus wrote:

Apart from the Buddha himself, who do you know of who proclaimed their attainment, especially in front of lay people?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 16th, 2018 at 5:13 AM

Title: Re: doctrinal unity

Content:

clyde said:

This was summarized by Bodhidharma, the First Zen Patriarch: A special transmission outside the scriptures;

No dependence on words and letters;

Direct pointing to the mind of man;

Seeing into one's nature and attaining Buddhahood.

Astus wrote:

How does that quatrain match with what I wrote?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 16th, 2018 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: doctrinal unity

Content:

clyde said:

(admittedly this is a bit of a stretch)

Astus wrote:

It is.

clyde said:

“No dependence on words and letters;” = “the absence of grasping at concepts”

Astus wrote:

That may fit, unless one reads it with the previous line and takes it to mean rejecting doctrines and scriptures.

clyde said:

“Direct pointing to the mind of man;” = “directly perceive the nature of mind”

Astus wrote:

Somebody else pointing it out and oneself perceiving it are not the same, even if there can be a causal relationship.

clyde said:

“Seeing into one's nature and attaining Buddhahood.” = “the nature of mind is identical to the nature of buddhahood”

Astus wrote:

It sounds more like one being the cause and the other the result.

Why all that doesn't really give a doctrinal unity is that neither the nature, nor the way one can see it is specified.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 20th, 2018 at 9:12 PM

Title: Re: Bodhicitta is fleeting...

Content:

MatthewAngby said:

“Why bother to save you if you’re such a jerk!”

Astus wrote:

All beings are jerks. To expect otherwise is delusion that, obviously, all beings suffer from. Also, the idea that one can save another is one more delusion. The bodhisattva path is therefore to save all beings while it is clear that there is nobody to save anybody. Without the latter part it is not the bodhisattva path, rather some sort of messiah complex.

For usual teachings on the issue, check topics like relative and ultimate bodhicitta, and kshanti-paramita.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 23rd, 2018 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

Rick said:

Is there anything that cannot be negated in Buddhism? Can one's existence be negated?

Astus wrote:

A monk asked Zen master Dasui, “When the aeonic fire engulfs everything, is this annihilated or not?”

Dasui said, “Annihilated.”

The monk said, “Then it is annihilated along with everything else?”

Dasui said, “It is annihilated along with everything else.”

The monk refused to accept this answer. He later went to Touzi Datong and relayed to him his conversation with Dasui.

Touzi lit incense and bowed to the figure of the Buddha, saying, “The ancient buddha of West River has appeared.”

Then Touzi said to the monk, “You should go back there quickly and atone for your mistake.”

The monk went back to see Dasui, but Dasui had already died. The monk then went back to see Touzi, but Touzi had also passed away.

(Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 181; also partly in Blue Cliff Record 29)

Rick said:

Or would it be right-er in Buddhism to say: I neither am, nor am not, nor neither, nor both?

To what extent does the answer depend on the Buddhist school/tradition?

Astus wrote:
The buddhas said “I am.”
They taught as well that self does not exist.
They also said that self
And no-self are completely nonexistent.
(Mulamadhyamakakarika 18.6, tr Padmakara)

A monk once asked Mazu, “Apart from the four propositions and beyond the hundred negations, I ask the teacher to directly indicate to me the meaning of [Bodhidharma’s] coming from the west.”

The great teacher [Mazu] said, “I am tired today, and cannot explain it for you. Go ask [Xitang] Zhizang.”

The monk asked [Zhi]zang, and [Zhi]zang said, “Why don’t you ask the teacher?”

The monk said, “The teacher had me come ask you.”

[Zhi]zang said, “Today I have a headache, and cannot explain it for you. Go ask brother [Baizhang Huai]hai.”

The monk asked [Baizhang Huai]hai, and [Huai]hai said, “When I reach here, after all I do not understand.”

The monk related this to the great teacher [Mazu], and Mazu said,

“[Zhi]zang’s head is white, and [Huai]hai’s head is black.”

(Eihei Koroku, p 591; also in Blue Cliff Record 73)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 25th, 2018 at 5:55 PM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

Rick said:

What about the kind of existence with which a process is said to exist?

Astus wrote:

Belief in continuity is that something exists from one moment to the next. That is basically eternalism. Madhyamaka goes to the point where even momentary existence is refuted, not just a continual one.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 25th, 2018 at 11:27 PM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

boundless said:

is this true for all Buddhists?

Astus wrote:

Yes.

boundless said:

I mean at least for Nirvana, the Theravada view seems quite different. ... Note the description of Nirvana as "permanent". Is the Madhyamaka view that Theravada is "eternalist" in some sense?

Astus wrote:

Quite the opposite, sravakayana is often characterised in Mahayana as annihilationist, because of nirupadhisesa-nirvana. Nirvana is permanent in the sense that there is no more birth, ever.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 25th, 2018 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

Rick said:

Per process philosophy what 'exists' are dynamic events. Madhyamaka refutes the existence of fixed substances, not of dynamic events. Or?

Astus wrote:

Does that dynamic event exist in the present, the past, or the future? If it is in the past or the future, it is non-existent. If it is in the present, how is it an event?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 27th, 2018 at 5:42 PM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

boundless said:

Here, maybe Nirvana can be said to be "permanent" in the sense that it is unrelated to time.

Astus wrote:

Nirvana is the complete extinction of the three poisons, see this repeated again and again in the Asankhata-samyutta. Without the afflictions there is no more rebirth, this is clear from all the teachings on dependent origination (e.g. Nidana-samyutta).

Everything that can be called a type of awareness or consciousness is included under the five aggregates and six areas, all of them conditioned. If nirvana is posited as an existent object, either it is conditioned (can be perceived), or it is fictional (cannot be perceived). The reason nirvana is not called non-existent is twofold: because there is liberation, and because it is the end of conceptualisation (see:

<https://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an04/an04.174.than.html>).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 27th, 2018 at 5:48 PM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

Rick said:

no enduring substances, only 'momentary events of experience' called actual entities

Astus wrote:

If there are momentary events, those events themselves have a becoming phase, an enduring phase, a decaying phase, and a cessation phase; in other words: birth, ageing, illness, death. That way a momentary event has its own past, present, and future as well, and that is how even momentary existence cannot be established.

Rick said:

The flow exists, but there is no-thing (no substance) that is flowing.

Astus wrote:

Is there a river without water?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 27th, 2018 at 9:49 PM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

Rick said:

Yes, an actual entity has duration = its own localized past, present, and future.

Astus wrote:

Hence while there is an assumption of momentary existence, it cannot be established as actually a momentary existent.

Rick said:

Is there a solid table without any solid particles?

Astus wrote:

A river without water would be a wooden table without the wood. A table without solid particles would be water without wet particles. So one is movement/form without an object that moves/has a form; the other is an object with constituents that lack the qualities present in the object. Both are problematic, but in different ways.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 27th, 2018 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

Rick said:

Is there solidity without any solid particles?

Astus wrote:

If a composite object's quality does not exist in its elements, where is the quality from? If it cannot be from its constituents, and it cannot be from something other than what it is made of, nor is it possible for something to occur from nothing, then such a quality cannot exist at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 27th, 2018 at 11:45 PM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

Rick said:

Nice in theory

Astus wrote:

It is a theoretical proposition that an object may have a quality without there being any cause of that quality. No matter how long you beat the table, it cannot have any relevance to prove the theory correct or wrong.

Rick said:

Not sure how Buddhism explains it

Astus wrote:

Buddhism does not debate conventional reality. It only points out that it is merely conventional, that is, conceptual fabrication.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 28th, 2018 at 4:45 PM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Neither exists nor doesn't exist; beyond the vicissitudes of existence. ... That is why it can only be known by un-knowing, hence, back to via negativa and apophaticism. 'He that knows it, knows it not.'

Astus wrote:

The position of "neither is nor isn't" is one of the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Catu%E1%B9%A3ko%E1%B9%ADi>, while the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Aj%C3%B1ana> approach of https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sanjaya_Belatthiputta is clearly not the Buddha's version, as also refuted in the Brahmajala Sutta under the "doctrines of endless equivocation".

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 29th, 2018 at 5:49 PM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

Wayfarer said:

So nirvana must be existent, then?

Astus wrote:

Of course, in the Theravadin abhidharma nirvana is one of the four ultimate (paramartha) dharmas, and it is the sole unconditioned (asamskrta) dharma. In other abhidharma systems, including the Yogacarīn, nirvana is an unconditioned dharma. So what should be looked into is what being a dharma means, after all, in Buddhism everything is eventually a dharma.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 29th, 2018 at 5:55 PM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

Rick said:

Advaita does pretty much the same thing.

Astus wrote:

Vedānta posits a single existent being and negates everything else. Buddhism only points out that appearances are fictional, and does not establish a true being apart from that. Hence one is atmavāda, the other is anatmavāda.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 29th, 2018 at 6:15 PM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

boundless said:

prof. Peter Harvey in the chapter 2 of his book

Astus wrote:

It is not stated that nirvana is self. One simple reason is that sentience, or consciousness, cannot be unconditioned. So, there are all sorts of nice sounding teachings about nirvana that can be easily confused with notions like Soul, God, etc., but those are expedient teachings, that are meant to motivate people, to build some level of faith. When it eventually comes to reasoning and cultivation, nirvana is just the complete end of afflictions. And as the extinction of the cause of suffering - i.e. the third noble truth - it is necessarily permanent and happy, therefore, in a sense, as it happens in Mahāyāna, it can even be called self.

But remember the Mulapariyāya Sutta, that while an ordinary person conceives a self in some relation to nirvana, the practitioner "should not conceive [himself as] Nibbana, he should not conceive [himself] in Nibbana, he should not conceive [himself apart] from Nibbana, he should not conceive Nibbana to be 'mine,' he should not delight in Nibbana. Why is that? Because he must fully understand it, I say."

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 29th, 2018 at 8:25 PM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

Wayfarer said:

So the argument about whether conventional objects really exist, or the way in which they exist, is really about whether they embody or comprise 'own being' - which they don't. But it doesn't mean they don't exist.

Astus wrote:

If we go by the abhidharma approach, then all dharmas - conditioned and unconditioned - are svabhava, in that they are distinct, individual categories. If we go by the prajnaparamita approach, then all dharmas - conditioned and unconditioned - are nihsvabhava, in that they are contextual and conceptual categories. Therefore there is no difference between nirvana and other dharmas in terms of having or not having self-existence.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 30th, 2018 at 12:01 AM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

Rick said:

it cannot be (rightly) said that brahman is the single existent being.

Astus wrote:

Is vedanta undecided on the nature of Brahman? Here is a little Sankara then:

"Then, what is the Atman? It is of the nature of <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Satcitananda> (Existence-Knowledge-Bliss).

What is Sat? Sat is that which remains unchanged in the three periods of time."

(<http://practicalphilosophy.in/wp-content/uploads/2012/09/tattvabodha.pdf> 16.1-2)

"The wise should discriminate between the Self and the not-Self for the bondage. Only then does one know the Self to be Absolute Existence-Knowledge-Bliss, only then, does one become happy."

"Brahman is Existence-Knowledge-Absolute, extremely pure, Supreme, Self-existing, Eternal, Indivisible-Bliss, not essentially different from the inmost Self , and absolutely without parts. It is ever victorious."

(<https://realization.org/down/sankara.vivekachudamani.chaitanya.pdf> 152, 225)

"Unlike the knowledge gained through the eye etc. the Knowledge of the Knower does not cease to exist. It is said that, 'the Knowledge of the Knower does not go out of existence '. The Knower, therefore, is always of the homogeneous nature of Knowledge."

"That oneself exists is undoubted. You may call it Knowledge, Self or whatever i you like.

But Its non-existence cannot be admitted as It is the Witness of all things existing and non-existing.

That by which the non-existence of things is witnessed must be real. All would be ignorant of the existence and non-existence of things if that were not the case. Therefore yours is a position which cannot be accepted."

(Upadesasahasri 2.15.18; 2.16.31-32, tr Sw Jagananda)

"That is, it is through this Self known as 'Being' that all this Universe is imbued with Self ; and there is no other Self for this which passes through births and deaths ; as has been declared in such other Vedic texts as-'other than this, there is no Seer, other than this, there is no Heaven' (Brhada. Upa. III. viii. 11.)-that through which all this Universe becomes imbued with Self is its origin, called 'Being', which is True and Absolutely Real. Hence, it is this that is the Self of the Universe, its counter-form, its very essence, its very Soul."

"Objection: - "The assertion 'that thou art' may be a figurative one, just as a man endowed with courage and other qualities is spoken as 'you are a lion'. (So 'That thou art ' may mean that thou art like the That, 'Being')."

No; because it has been taught that Being, one, without a second, is the only real Entity-like 'clay' being the one entity pervading all products of clay. If it were a more figurative expression, the knowledge thereof could not be spoken of as bringing about that mergence into Being where 'the delay is only so long' etc., because all figurative notions are false (unreal). - just like the notions 'you are Indra', 'you are Yama'."

(Chandogya-Upanisad-Bhasya, 6.8.7; 6.16.3. p 339, 365)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 30th, 2018 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

Rick said:

has zero attributes

Astus wrote:

Existence (sat) is not an attribute (guna).

"After rejecting the object portion one should accept the Self as the knower free from all qualifications. The ego, the object portion, is also like the part of the body cut off. The Self of which the whole of the object portion is the qualification is different from it. Bereft of all qualifications It has an independent existence like that of a man possessing a variegated cow."

(Upadesasahasri 2.6.4-5, p 99)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 30th, 2018 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

Rick said:

how do we reconcile

Astus wrote:

Your quote refers to the difference between conceptual and experiential, learning and realisation.

" (Question):—Then how is it that Brahman is said to be known through the śāstras or scriptures?

(Answer):—All the words which are used to impart a true knowledge of Brahman only give us to understand Him indirectly, by implication; they fail to denote Him directly. The mental cognition which is generated by a word has a form, and so fails to reach the self-conscious Brahman; thus cognitions recede from Him along with the words."

(<https://www.wisdomlib.org/hinduism/book/the-taittiriya-upanishad/d/doc79846.html>.16)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 30th, 2018 at 1:37 AM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

Rick said:

The question of whether or not existent is a predicate

Astus wrote:

The quote is from the Bhagavad-Gita-Bhasya 13.12, and if you read on to the next two stanzas, Sankara reinforces that the Brahman exists. Furthermore, in his commentary to 13.12 he explains the Gita as it is referring only to objects, and of course the "knower of the field" is not the field, hence not an object of cognition that could be labelled. But the point is always to lead one to the true self, so even when seemingly everything is negated, a single ultimate remains. Without that soul left alone the whole teaching of Vedanta would just turn into a different doctrine.

Rick said:

brahman cannot be said to existent, but it can be experienced to be existent

Astus wrote:

It is not only called existent, but has to be named existent. A small section of one of Sankara's many commentaries should not serve as a basis of interpreting all his teachings. But yes, there is a recognised difference between words and realisation, just like in everyday life, otherwise there would be no need for all the religious practices.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 30th, 2018 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

Rick said:

Can we agree that brahman does not exist in the way that people (non-enlighteneds, like me) think it exists?

Astus wrote:

That basically means that one is incorrect until one is correct, that is, until one understands as it is, one has the wrong idea. Once it is understood correctly, it becomes clear that it is not the thoughts but the perceiver.

Rick said:

The trick here is that brahman cannot be experienced, because it is not an object.

Astus wrote:

It is the always present final subject, i.e. the self. As it is conscious, it is experienced by itself.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 30th, 2018 at 2:26 PM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

boundless said:

That's was the point that I was making, i.e. that not all Budddhists went as far as the Madhyamaka (and the Sautrantika) in their negation of ontological status of Nirvana (and of "dharma" in general).

Astus wrote:

Ontologically talking is perhaps going a bit too far, as the meaning of "dharma" is more along the line of category than substance.

boundless said:

in Shravakyana the anatman teaching does not rule out the possibility of something unconditioned and not unreal

Astus wrote:

Being a cessation does not make it unreal.

"is called Nibbāna because it is a departure from craving, which is an entanglement. Though Nibbāna is onefold according to its intrinsic nature, by reference to a basis (for distinction), it is twofold, namely, the element of Nibbāna with a residue remaining, and the element of Nibbāna without the residue remaining. It is threefold according to its different aspects, namely, void, signless, and desireless."
(A Comprehensive Manual of Abhidhamma, p 258-259)

"In fact nibbāna, as an unconditioned reality, has simply the nature of cessation called "the characteristic of peacefulness" (santilakkhaṇā). It is the cessation of the defilements and the rounds of suffering. Or, it is the nonexistence of conditioned phenomena (saṅkhāra), the cessation of conditioned phenomena, and the opposite of what is conditioned."

"If the nibbāna element does not exist, then the cessation of the mental and physical processes or the aggregates could not happen. Thus it is not true that the nibbāna element is nothing, like the concept of nonexistence. Being the object of path and fruition, it is obvious in an ultimate sense. And because it is so obvious, the constantly arising mental and physical processes or aggregates in a person who practices correctly do not arise anymore after that person's parinibbāna. Then, they are able to cease forever. It means that the cessation is something that can be obvious."

(Mahasi Sayadaw: Manual of Insight p 454, 456)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 30th, 2018 at 9:26 PM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

Malcolm said:

Cessations are not nonexistences, since in cessation there is no existence of which one may speak of a nonexistence.

Astus wrote:

Cessation refers to the end of afflictions, so it is in a way the non-existence, or annihilation of afflictions. What it is not the annihilation of is the self, since that has never existed in the first place.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 2nd, 2018 at 5:06 PM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

boundless said:

more or less the same as darkness. Darkness is unreal

Astus wrote:

Is there or isn't there darkness? If you say darkness does not exist, there should always be light. But quite clearly there is darkness, as a sensory object. Similarly with nirvana, there is a perception of the end of suffering, called path-consciousness and result-consciousness in Theravada (<https://www.budsas.org/ebud/nina-abhidhamma/nina-abhi-23.htm>). But the key part is that the defilements are eliminated permanently, and that's how the different levels of the noble path are defined, while following the entry of each stage - change of lineage consciousness - there is always a few moments of perception of the unconditioned, meaning the experience of the cessation of suffering.

boundless said:

because it is simply the absence of light (and nothing else).

Astus wrote:

One standard definition of nirvana is that it means peace. Peace, similarly to darkness and space, is a type of absence, a lack of trouble. While one can sing odes to how great and wonderful peace is, it is still simply no struggle.

boundless said:

Nirvana is seen as "real", non-fictional, not a mere designation, not a blank nothing, not a mere absence and so on etc

Astus wrote:

<https://discourse.suttacentral.net/t/nature-of-nibbana/3096/4> put it nicely:

"Extinguishment is ontologically negative but psychologically positive."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 3rd, 2018 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: Does Consciousness Continue After Cessation?

Content:

Matt J said:

what happens to an arhat after death

Astus wrote:

No ignorance, no consciousness, no birth.

"Just as if a great mass of fire of ten... twenty... thirty or forty cartloads of timber were burning, into which a man simply would not time & again throw dried grass, dried cow dung, or dried timber, so that the great mass of fire — its original sustenance being consumed, and no other being offered — would, without nutriment, go out. In the same way, in one who keeps focusing on the drawbacks of clingable phenomena, craving ceases. From the cessation of craving comes the cessation of clinging/sustenance. From the cessation of clinging/sustenance comes the cessation of becoming. From the cessation of becoming comes the cessation of birth. From the cessation of birth, then aging, illness & death, sorrow, lamentation, pain, distress, & despair all cease. Such is the cessation of this entire mass of suffering & stress."

(<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.052.than.html>)

Destination of arhat: <https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.085.than.html>

Destination of the Tathagata:

<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.086.than.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 4th, 2018 at 6:11 AM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

boundless said:

as Ven. Dhammanando <https://dhammawheel.com/viewtopic.php?t=25336#p364997> in the other Wheel, according to the "classical" or "traditional" Theravada view Nirvana was not seen as the mere absence.

Astus wrote:

I think Mahasi Sayadaw is a fairly traditional teacher of Theravada. He writes in <http://www.aimwell.org/On%20the%20Nature%20of%20Nibbana.pdf> (p 60-61 and 63-64):

"Since nibbāna means the cessation of mind, matter, and mental formations, suggestions have often been put forward that it signifies nothing and is thus useless. However, nibbāna is absolute reality, the reality of the nullification of the activities of mind, matter, and mental formations to which the knowledge of the Path, Fruition, and reviewing (paccavekkhaṇa) is inclined. ... It is only the Path and its Fruition that can exterminate defilements, and this extermination will bring the cycle of suffering to an end. This cessation of suffering is real. Buddhas and Arahants actually reach this stage, and after their parinibbāna all sufferings come to an end."

"In nibbāna there are no such things as mind or mental concomitants, which can be met with in the sense-sphere or form-sphere. It naturally follows that mind and matter that belong to the thirty-one planes of existence are totally absent in nibbāna. However, some would like to propose that after the parinibbāna of the Buddha and the Arahants, they acquire a special kind of mind and matter in nibbāna. Such an extraordinary way of thinking may appeal to those who cannot do away with self or ego.

With regard to this proposition a learned Sayādaw reasoned that if there is a special kind of mind and matter in nibbāna, there must also be a special kind of rebirth which gives rise to a special kind of old age, disease, and death, which in turn bring about a special kind of sorrow, lamentation, suffering, distress, and despair. When the teachings explicitly say cessation, it will be improper to go beyond it and formulate an idea of a special kind of existence. Extinction points to nothing other than Nothingness. Nibbāna, which is not involved in mind and matter, cannot be made to get involved either in this world or in other worlds."

boundless said:

I do not find a "mere absence" as "inaccessible to ratiocination"

Astus wrote:

It likely is, since there is a common tendency to turn it into a mystical object that, although cannot be clearly defined, but is assumed to be definitely an eternal existent.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 4th, 2018 at 3:54 PM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

boundless said:

Nirvana is not nothing

Astus wrote:

It is not nothing, in the sense that it is indeed the liberation from suffering. Saying that nirvana does not exist means that there is no end of birth and pain. Not to believe in nirvana means denying the goal of the path. But it does not mean a different form of existence or a special state of mind, it is rather the cessation of dependent origination.

boundless said:

he does not say that there is mind or matter in Nirvana.

Astus wrote:

Without consciousness there is no experience, no sentience. So if it is accepted that the five aggregates come about because of ignorance, when ignorance ceases there is no cause for the becoming of aggregates, and without the aggregates there is no being to talk of in any sense. But that is about nirvana in itself. The other part is where nirvana is the object of consciousness, when it is actually experienced by a noble person. To quote another sayadaw on this:

"When The Buddha says we must know and see the world as void, He means that we must know and see it as void of permanence (nicca), void of happiness (sukha) and void of self (atta). In ordinary language, we may say that you must see absolute zero. But this does not mean that your consciousness is absolute zero: your consciousness is fully aware: it is the object that your consciousness knows and sees which is absolute zero. The object that your consciousness is fully aware of and knows and sees is the Nibbana element: the Unformed Element (Asankhata-Dhatu)."
(Pa Auk Sayadaw: Knowing and Seeing, p 27)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 5th, 2018 at 4:33 AM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

Malcolm said:

Correction, there is no coming about of the upādāna-skandhas.

Astus wrote:

Further extension then, that there is the saupadisesa-nibbanadhatu and the anupadisesa-nibbanadhatu, as per the <https://suttacentral.net/iti44/en/ireland> and others. The aggregates without clinging remain only until parinirvana.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 5th, 2018 at 4:48 AM

Title: Re: Does Consciousness Continue After Cessation?

Content:

Malcolm said:

This the extreme of cessation. Not acceptable in Mahāyāna as CW points out.

Astus wrote:

It is not acceptable for a bodhisattva to go for total cessation, but it was not an agreed concept that the sravaka nirvana is only a temporary samadhi, as it is apparent in the five-gotra teaching of Yogacara.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 5th, 2018 at 5:32 PM

Title: Re: Does Consciousness Continue After Cessation?

Content:

Malcolm said:

In Mahāyāna, it is certainly the case, for example, the Lanka Sutra.

Astus wrote:

Only those of the undetermined lineage change to the bodhisattva path.

"[The Buddha] has taught a single vehicle to lead word-hearers of undetermined [lineage], other bodhisattvas [of undetermined lineage], and [bodhisattvas] of determined lineage into the Great Vehicle."

(Mahayanasamgraha 10.32, BDK ed, p 115-116)

Here is Xuanzang's explanation on the state of nirupadhisesa-nirvana (Cheng Weishi Lun, book 9, chapter 4, part 5, section 1.2.2, p 761-763, tr Wei Tat):

"The Sravakas and the Pratyekabuddhas, you say, are in possession of the Nirupadhisesa. Is there not a Sutra which teaches that they are not in possession of Nirupadhisesa? If they are in possession, why is it said that they are not? But the same Sutra [the Srimala Sutra] teaches that they do not in any way possess Nirvana. Is one going to maintain that Sopadhisesa is also lacking in them? In fact, as long as their 'body and intelligence' (i.e., their body and their mind) remain, the Sravakas and other saints of the two Vehicles - that is to say, the niyatagotras (saints of indeterminate nature) - have Jneyavarana. The duhkhopadhi (that is to say, 'that which serves as support for suffering') not having been exhausted, the principle of Parinirvana remains latent. It may therefore be said that they are not possessed of Nirvana.

This does not mean that they are really devoid of Sopadhisesa Nirvana, that is to say, the 'Reality' or Tathata revealed by the exhaustion of Klesavarana.

But, since they have not yet realized the complete Parinirvana, one says that they have not the Nirupadhisesa: this does not mean that, later, when their body and intelligence have been destroyed, they will not suffer the exhaustion of duhkhopadhi and the resultant Nirupadhisesa Nirvana.

In other words, if the Srimalasutra teaches that the saints of the two Vehicles are not possessed of Nirvana, one should understand that this refers to the fourth Nirvana, i.e., the Apratisthitanirvana, in which the Bodhisattva does not stay or reside, not the first three.

Furthermore, this declaration that the saints of the two Vehicles have not the Nirupadhisesa refers only to the aniyatagotras (saints of indeterminate nature) : these Arhats, at the very moment of their attainment of Sopadhisesa Nirvana, determine to turn their mind towards the supreme Bodhi. By the power of their pure meditation and contemplation and of their pious vows and resolutions, which proceed from compassion, they 'conserve' their bodies and continue their residence for long periods of time in Samsara instead of entering into the Nirupadhisesa as do the niyatagrota saints of the two Vehicles.

The latter, i.e., the niyatagrota saints whose mind is fixed on arhatship, and not on Buddhahood, have a great predilection for Parinirvana. They obtain the contemplation of pudgalasunyata, thus realizing immediately the Bhutatathata which results from this sunyata; they completely destroy the Klesavarana, the cause of rebirth, thereby attaining the Sopadhisesa Nirvana which is revealed on the basis of 'Reality'. The klesas which produce rebirth for these saints having been exhausted, there is no reason for a new existence to be produced, especially when the actual duhkhopadhi (the physical body) comes to perish spontaneously. The other samskrtadharmas (active, functioning dharmas), since they no longer serve as a supporting basis (upadhi), are abandoned at the same time as the duhkhopadhi. As a result of this, the Nirupadhisesa Nirvana which supports itself on Reality will be manifested. Although at this moment (when the duhkhopadhi has come to an end) the body and intelligence of the two Vehicles no longer exist, nevertheless, as these saints have previously effected the destruction of this duhkhopadhi, one can attribute Nirupadhisesa to them.

At this moment, [in view of the complete disappearance of all cittanimitta,] there remains only the pure Tathata (the first of the ten Tathatas set out at the beginning of this section), exempt from the ten nimittas, placid, tranquil, non active, beatified. From the point of view of Tathata, it is said that the saints of the two Vehicles are not different from the Buddhas; but since they are not possessed of Bodhi and those activities that are directed to the salvation of others, it is said that they are different from the Buddhas."

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 5th, 2018 at 5:50 PM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

Malcolm said:

This is a Mahāyāna forum. Pure aggregates continue in buddhahood. See Mahāyānasamgraha. In Mahāyāna, there is also so-called nonabiding nirvana.

Astus wrote:

The issue is related to the Theravadin view of nirvana, where all conditioned dharmas must cease at the end, as they are the products of ignorance.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 5th, 2018 at 7:59 PM

Title: Re: Does Consciousness Continue After Cessation?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Nevertheless, Yogācāra does not teach that the aggregates utterly cease.

Astus wrote:

It would not be remainderless nirvana if aggregates remained. The alayavijnana ceases for arhats, as Vasubandhu says in the 5th stanza of the Trimsika.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 5th, 2018 at 8:02 PM

Title: Re: Via Negativa

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, this is also wrong. What about rocks, are they products ignorance in the Theravada view? No.

Astus wrote:

Dharmas, as in reference to the sentient being, i.e. nama and rupa.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 5th, 2018 at 10:54 PM

Title: Re: Does Consciousness Continue After Cessation?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The ālaya contains the seeds of affliction, so of course during liberation it reverts in everyone, thus even the Tathāgata is an arhat.

Astus wrote:

According to the Cheng Weishi Lun, arhat there refers to arhats, pratyekabuddhas, and buddhas equally.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 6th, 2018 at 12:47 AM

Title: Re: Does Consciousness Continue After Cessation?

Content:

Malcolm said:

So, therefore your idea that Yogacara advocates a total cessation for arhat is completely unfounded based on the reasoning you gave, i.e., that there is no continuation upon the cessation of the ālaya.

Astus wrote:

Why would that be? Just because the alayavijnana ceases for both arhats and buddhas, it does not mean that their attainment is the same. For buddhas there are the causes accumulated over the bodhisattva path to generate the buddha-bodies. But the causes are absent for arhats, hence there is no cause for the emergence of anything.

"Samanantarapratyaya, a condition qua antecedent, means that the eight actual consciousnesses (darsana and samvittibhaga) and their Caittas (to the exclusion of Rupa, the Viprayuktas, the Bijas, and the Asamakrtas) constitute a preceding group which passes away to give place to a subsequent group of the same species, opening the way to that group and acting in such a way that it immediately comes into being. ... At the moment of entry into Nirupadhisenanirvana (Final-Nirvana-without-residue, i.e., Nirvana without vestiges of reincarnation), the mind is extremely weak and, in consequence, has not 'the strength to open the way and lead'. Further, it does not produce a subsequent dharma of a similar nature. Hence it is not Samanantarapratyaya. How do you explain this?

It has been truly said in the Yogasastra that 'if, immediately after the former consciousness-associates, the latter consciousness-associates are born, then the former are the Samanantarapratyaya of the latter.' (Yogasastra, 3 and 51, and Vikhyapana, 18)."

(Cheng Weishi Lun, 4.1.2, p 537-539)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 6th, 2018 at 5:57 AM

Title: Re: Does Consciousness Continue After Cessation?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Śravaka arhats take on a mental body due to their traces of ignorance, as Asanga explains clearly in the Mahāyānottaratantraśāstravyākhyā

Astus wrote:

Such a mental body is fine if it is not considered the final destination of an arhat, hence it is of the undetermined category who moves on to the bodhisattva path. After all, the Ratnagotravibhaga is about the buddha-gotra. So unless you say that Yogacara does not posit the doctrine of different gotras, arhats and pratyekabuddhas must attain true nirupadhisena-nirvana.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 6th, 2018 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: Does Consciousness Continue After Cessation?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The point is that the pure aggregates do not cease contra your assertion.

Astus wrote:

The pure form of the aggregates are present during sopadhisena-nirvana - that is what the word means - but its other part, nirupadhisena, means exactly that there is no support (upadhi), i.e. skandhas present. However, Yogacara works discuss the transformed skandhas only for buddhas (Mahayanasutralamkara 9.41-45; Mahayanasamgraha 10.5), but not mentioned for those of the two vehicles. Xuanzang also discusses the issue as

<https://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=459641#p459641>. Also, arhats without nirupadhisena-nirvana can only fit into the system of ekayana, but not of the five gotras where sravakas and pratyekabuddhas reach a final and definite goal. As Vasubandhu notes in his commentary to the Lotus Sutra (Tiantai Lotus Texts, BDK ed, p 135): "It is not the case that those who have not originally produced the thought of enlightenment, such as ordinary people and the disciples who are fixed [in the Small Vehicle], are able to attain it."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 6th, 2018 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: Does Consciousness Continue After Cessation?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Nevertheless, since arhats have traces of ignorance, this is sufficient to maintain their continuums, albeit not as a birth in any of the three realms.

Astus wrote:

I'm not arguing to prove that the Yogacara interpretation is correct, only to show that they had no problem accepting what is taught by sravakayana schools about the destination of arhats.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 7th, 2018 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: Does Consciousness Continue After Cessation?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The fault is that śravakas enter into a mental body in a permanent cessation with no chance of escape without intervention. Otherwise, the yogacarins too would be at fault for accepting cessation as an extreme.

Astus wrote:

"A case may exist where there is neither the mental organ nor the element of the mental organ, as in the case of him who has attained Nirvana without a remainder (nirupadhisesanirvana)."

(Abhidharmasamuccaya 1.1.1, p 26)

If arhats of a fixed nature - i.e. no change to the bodhisattva path - are in a mental body that is permanent, then that is actually an eternalist interpretation. Accepting nirupadhisesa-nirvana is not an extreme of cessation, rather the reverse of dependent origination. It is also less problematic than to claim an eternal continuum.

"One might claim that things exist—

That there is neither permanence nor yet annihilation.

For existence is a continuity

Of causes and effects that rise and then subside.

But if existence is a continuity

Of causes and effects that rise and are destroyed,

Since what has been destroyed does not arise again,
It follows that the cause has been annihilated."
(MMK 21.15-16, tr Padmakara)

When there is an end, it is annihilation. When there is no end, it is eternity.

"Since the aggregates' continuum
Is like the light shed by a lamp,
To say they have an end is incorrect—
As also that they are unending."
(MMK 27.22)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 10th, 2018 at 6:27 PM

Title: Re: Gaden Mahamudra

Content:

Lobsang Chojor said:

I've received received a HYT empowerment and the lama indicated the importance of practicing mahamudra and said we had permission to practice it. My question is, is the lung of the 1st Panchen Lama's mahamudra root text vital before you start the practice of mahamudra in the gelug tradition?

Astus wrote:

Can't say anything about the Gelug setup, but in HYT the fourth empowerment is mahamudra, so technically you already know what to practice. The specific teachings focusing on mahamudra itself might be used as theoretical support.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 13th, 2018 at 2:55 PM

Title: Re: Gaden Mahamudra

Content:

Astus wrote:

in HYT the fourth empowerment is mahamudra

Malcolm said:

No.

Astus wrote:

Why?

"The "word empowerment" is given in order to introduce you to the actual innate wisdom, which is the seven aspects of mahamudra"
(Dakpo Tashi Namgyal: Light Rays from the Jewel of the Excellent Teaching, in Mahamudra and Related Instructions, p 487)

"The fourth empowerment is that of the word or mahamudra. It's like talking or pointing out instructions with the words. But the meaning is mahamudra. So then one practises with the essence of one's mind."

(Mingyur Dorje Rinpoche: <http://www.samyeling.org/buddhism-and-meditation/teaching-archive-2/mingyur-dorje-rinpoche/vajrayana-and-empowerment/>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 14th, 2018 at 12:23 AM

Title: Re: Kenshō the first Bhumi?

Content:

shanehanner said:

is Kenshō considered the first Bhumi

Astus wrote:

Going by the stages is the gradual path. Seeing nature means the realisation of buddha-mind, and as such it is the attainment of buddhahood.

"[The teaching that one can] cultivate the six perfections and the myriad practices in order to achieve Buddhahood—this is the progressive [approach to Buddhahood]. Since beginningless time, there has never been a Buddha [who achieved that state] progressively. Just be enlightened to the One Mind and there will not be the slightest dharma that can be attained—this is the true Buddha."

(Huangbo: Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 14)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 14th, 2018 at 5:38 AM

Title: Re: Kenshō the first Bhumi?

Content:

krodha said:

Realization and insight are always sudden and immediate

Astus wrote:

An unstable realisation is not realisation at all, only a passing feeling. Attaining a stage of the path means not losing it later.

krodha said:

but just as in other Buddhist systems, that knowledge is unstable and must be carefully cultivated from then on in order to eventually actualize buddhahood.

Astus wrote:

Knowledge does need actualisation, hence the process of learning, understanding, and cultivation. But then seeing nature would mean not the perception of buddha-mind, but merely the concept that mind is buddha.

krodha said:

Temicco shared some excerpts that demonstrate this

Astus wrote:

Clearly, there are various teachers with various teachings.

krodha said:

I found this quite interesting, especially given the much asserted “non-gradual” view of Zen.

Astus wrote:

Yangshan said:

"The roots of delusion are deep. They're difficult to cut off and uproot. So [the Buddha] established expedient means to grab your attention. These are like showing yellow leaves to a crying child, who imagines they're gold and thus stops crying. You act as though you're in a shop where someone sells a hundred goods made from gold and jade, but you're trying to weigh each item. So you say that Shitou has a real gold shop? Well in my shop there's a wide range of goods! If someone comes looking for mouse turds then I give him some. If someone comes looking for real gold then I give it to him."
(Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 187)

krodha said:

Evidently the equipoise and post-equipoise process that other systems deal with is also very much the case for Zen, and in this sense initial awakening can be viewed as something like first bhūmi, with equipoise beginning as fragmented and becoming slowly less so as obscurations are exhausted.

Astus wrote:

"Those with deluded minds appear to be cultivating and seeking buddhahood, but they are unenlightened to their self-natures. Hence are they of small capacities. If one is to be enlightened to the sudden teaching, one cannot cultivate externally (i.e., superficially): one should just constantly activate correct views in one's own mind, and the enervating defilements of the afflictions will be rendered permanently unable to defile one. This is to see the nature."
(Platform Sutra, ch 2, p 32)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 14th, 2018 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: Does Consciousness Continue After Cessation?

Content:

Coëmgenu said:

What about the Lotus Sūtra, which appears to make the very audacious claim that there is no "pari" nirvāṇa, in it's Tathāgatāyusṣpramāṇaparivartaḥ Ch 15?

Astus wrote:

Yogacara teaches apratisthitanirvana for bodhisattvas, just like Madhyamaka. There is no cessation of anything, as there is nothing to cease.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 15th, 2018 at 1:07 AM

Title: Re: Kenshō the first Bhumi?

Content:

krodha said:

The insight is what one does not lose, but the experiential equipoise resting in a direct knowledge of one's nature does indeed come and go.

Astus wrote:

If there is an equipoise, that is a temporary state of mind, not the buddha-mind.

krodha said:

But equipoise in jñāna does indeed lapse back into normal vijñāna because the view is unstable due to habitual patterns of grasping and conceptual proliferation.

Astus wrote:

An arya bodhisattva from the first bhumi is free from samsara, and does not perceive anything as real, but it is taught that not even on the tenth bhumi can they perceive the dharmakaya. So, if one sees buddha-mind, one is a buddha.

krodha said:

Initial knowledge merely requires a recognition of the dharmatā of mind or phenomena. The equipoise that the knowledge results from is initially fragmented and unstable however.

Astus wrote:

That is fine for the gradual path of the paramitas, but not for the supreme buddha-vehicle, i.e. Zen.

krodha said:

However these are Zen teachers, and their description of the path is very much like those we find elsewhere, such as Dzogchen for example. The fluctuation between equipoise and post-equipoise is a common theme.

Astus wrote:

What you cannot find is any precise description of the path, like what you see in practically every other school. That's because Zen is per definition not gradualist. That doesn't mean teachers cannot employ methods meant for less capable people, hence Yangshan's remark about selling both gold and mouse turd.

krodha said:

a rare few may have that capacity, but not the vast majority

Astus wrote:

Zen was meant for the rare few only.

krodha said:

This is addressing those who have not yet known equipoise at all.

Astus wrote:

It explicitly says that cultivation of anything is the gradual path of the deluded, while seeing the nature eliminates defilements permanently. Without defilements what is there to practice?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 15th, 2018 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: Kenshō the first Bhumi?

Content:

Meido said:

Of course you can. The Rinzai Zen path for one is extremely well defined.

Astus wrote:

Could you be more specific here please? I mean, the descriptions of the path are like the Visuddhimagga, Yogacarabhumisastra, Abhisamayalamkara, or the various lamrim texts. The closest to those I know of are the works of Zongmi and Yongming, but even those are quite sketchy, relatively speaking.

Meido said:

Crucial details to actualize the path are not found in popular books, however, and are largely clarified through oral instruction.

Astus wrote:

If it is not clearly delineated how ignorance is turned into wisdom, how could they qualify for explaining the path?

Meido said:

I read it rather to say that common cultivation of external practices must always fall short lacking seeing the nature, so it seems I agree with Krodha's take.

Astus wrote:

If so, how is there any difference between the gradual path of the paramitas and Zen?

Meido said:

If one does not know what is actually meant by that samadhi, then even with kensho the path is still barely begun in terms of actualization.

Astus wrote:

Is there a definition of that samadhi, that specifies it and points out how it is different from, for instance, the Surangama-samadhi?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 16th, 2018 at 4:08 AM

Title: Re: Kenshō the first Bhumi?

Content:

Meido said:

Zen considers the paramitas to be wholly fulfilled within the path of recognizing one's nature and then, taking that as the foundation of subsequent practice, dissolving habitual delusion along the path of embodying seamless realization.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean that the paramitas are fulfilled at seeing the nature, or after eliminating all afflictions at the end of subsequent practice? The former does not make sense to me, while the latter option seems to mean that Zen proposes a parallel path, or maybe the same path in a different format.

Meido said:

Who cares about gradual vs. sudden at that point?

Astus wrote:

It is a matter that concerns the status of Zen in relation to the other schools and the general Mahayana teachings. If it does not offer a method more efficient than others, it is simply a Chinese, and then a Japanese, presentation of Mahayana, and not a separate path (at least in terms of substance).

Meido said:

the fulfillment of vipashyana and shamatha in non-departure from the seamless upwelling of what is recognized in kensho.

Astus wrote:

Usually the unique views of a school has their role in vipasyana, where one has to experientially validate them. So if there is such a samadhi in Zen, what is the view that is confirmed there?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 17th, 2018 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: Kenshō the first Bhumi?

Content:

Meido said:

I meant they are fulfilled within the overall path.

Astus wrote:

I asked because of what is found in Huangbo's teachings that those who do not find a teacher to instruct them in the sudden path should follow the gradual Majayana of the sutras. It is also said there that the result of three uncountable kalpas and sudden awakening is the same buddhahood. But if such subitism is not accepted, there is only the gradual bodhisattva way.

Meido said:

It's fine to describe this as a different or uncommon approach. Torei describing this:...
None of this applies to our patriarchal school, which surpasses expedient means. ...

Astus wrote:

But there are all sorts of expedient means in Rinzai Zen, aren't there? On the other hand, every genuine practitioner strives for full awakening, no matter the school. What I gather from what you write is that it's OK to call Zen an instance of Mahayana that conforms to the general progressive way of the bodhisattva path, whereby kensho can be equated with the attainment of faith, as taught by Jinul.

Meido said:

What is the view of kensho?

Astus wrote:

It is supposed to be the cessation of views, wouldn't you agree?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 17th, 2018 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: Post-awakening cultivation in Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

The works of Guifeng Zongmi are from the Tang era, and he was the proponent of sudden awakening followed by gradual cultivation. He also writes that the Hongzhou school taught sudden awakening and sudden cultivation. That double suddenness is there in the few teachings of Mazu, the whole of Huangbo, and Dazhu Huihai, all from the Tang times. The extensive record of Baizhang is a little less subitist, while the Platform Sutra, and the teachings of the Oxhead and Baotang schools are quite on the sudden side of cultivation.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 26th, 2018 at 3:53 AM

Title: Re: Information about Bodhisattvas and other Buddhist teachings

Content:

Trilobyte said:

can you all recommend any resources that are not too confusing to read?

Astus wrote:

http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/ancientsgrfx.pdf is a useful summary.

Other works of possible interest:

<http://chancenter.org/cmc/wp-content/uploads/2010/09/ChanPracticeandFaith.pdf>
<http://chancenter.org/cmc/wp-content/uploads/2010/09/The-Bodhisattva-Precepts.pdf>

<http://www.fgsitc.org/ghosts-and-the-afterlife/>
<http://www.fgsitc.org/the-buddhist-perspective-on-the-supernatural/>
<http://www.fgsitc.org/on-becoming-a-bodhisattva/>
<http://www.fgsitc.org/the-eighteen-arhats/>
<http://www.fgsitc.org/the-wheel-of-rebirth/>

You can also go through what Wikipedia offers:

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Manjushri>
<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/K%E1%B9%A3itigarbha>
<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Avalokite%C5%9Bvara>
<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Samantabhadra>
<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Maitreya>
<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Mahasthamaprapta>
<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/%C4%80k%C4%81%C5%9Bagarbha>
<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Vajrapani>
<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Budai>

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Skanda_%28Buddhism%29
<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Acala>
<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Mahakala>
<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Yamantaka>
https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Yama_%28Buddhism%29

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 30th, 2018 at 3:03 AM

Title: Zen without Lineage

Content:

Astus wrote:

"One thing that clergy affiliated with all the Zen denominations in Japan hold in common is the belief in a Zen lineage (Zenshū 禪宗) of dharma transmission said to have been founded by the Buddha Shakamuni, established in China by the Indian monk Bodaidaruma, and subsequently transmitted to Japan by numerous Japanese and Chinese monks."

(https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/glossary/individual.html?key=zen_school)

Historical studies of Zen, over nearly a hundred years, have shown in depth that the lineages of Zen were fabricated and re-fabricated from the beginning down to the modern era. So far I have not seen anyone addressing that from the Zen side. But without a historical lineage what is the "separate transmission"? Without lineage all the "transmission of lamp" collections are mere literary works. Without lineage there is no family to be a member of. Without lineage what is left to call Zen?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 30th, 2018 at 2:33 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

seeker242 said:

That's almost like saying without any historical genealogy records of your family, that go back all the way to your first ancestors, you don't have one.

Astus wrote:

The birth of a human has definitive conditions, but not so the birth of a patriarch. So it is rather like claiming nobility and a castle with half a dozen villages by writing a story about how one's great-great-grandfather was knighted by the king of Estonia.

seeker242 said:

Seeing true nature and saving all beings with it.

Astus wrote:

Can you tell the true nature is seen without a master's confirmation?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 30th, 2018 at 2:52 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

passel said:

Three lineages, not one.

Astus wrote:

Primordial lineage - it's not actually a lineage, but rather renaming buddha-nature to look like the supposed content of transmission

Transmission lineage - without such a transmission being unbroken, how can it come down through the ages?

Organizational lineage - such a lineage holder is mainly a Tibetan idea

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 30th, 2018 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

seeker242 said:

the real problem in that scenario is not the lack of confirmation, but the requirement of "nobility".

Astus wrote:

So are you basically saying, what I assume KeithA meant as well, that there is no need for lineage in Zen?

seeker242 said:

Even without a master, that is still what is left to call "zen".

Astus wrote:

Wouldn't you say that practising Zen requires an authentic, i.e. someone with a transmission, master?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 30th, 2018 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

KeithA said:

if a proposed lineage is easily disproved by basic historical research, it doesn't change my practice. ... No teacher = no Zen. The lock can't be opened without the key.

Astus wrote:

If the lineage is untrue, who qualifies as a Zen teacher?

KeithA said:

There are certainly lineages that go far enough back to be useful.

Astus wrote:

What is far enough? A century, two centuries, or five? Or perhaps it's the number of generations, like three or thirteen? In any case, the Zen lineage gains its meaning from going all the way back to Shakyamuni. Without that it's not the transmission of the Buddha's seal.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 30th, 2018 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

seeker242 said:

If "authentic" means "can be historically traced back 2,000+ years", no I don't think that's required.

Astus wrote:

Then who is authentic, without a lineage?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 30th, 2018 at 10:17 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

KeithA said:

My belief is that the Buddha's Seal has been transmitted. We just don't have an accurate list of human beings to portray that.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean that you believe it was not transmitted by humans? Or it was transmitted by humans, but it is somehow not known by whom exactly?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 31st, 2018 at 3:17 AM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

KeithA said:

In a mundane sense, the latter.

Astus wrote:

Then it seems you are on the same page as Ven. Shengyan was:

"There may be inaccuracies in the history, but there need be no doubt about the reality of the transmission. I know very well that I had a Shih-fu, and that my Shih-fu likewise had a Shih-fu. From Sakyamuni Buddha on, throughout the history of Buddhism in India, great emphasis was placed on the transmission between a Master and a disciple. ... The names of the people in the line of transmission may not be correct, and the history of the lineage may also be confused by the appearance of monks with the same name at different times and in different places. I do not know the name of the grandfather of my grandfather, but I would never doubt that my grandfather had a grandfather."

(<http://www.chancenter.org/chanctr/ddp/channews/12-1996.html>)

However, that interpretation does not fit how lineages were created, as there are not simply administrative errors in the records, but rather they were produced on the tip of the quill of the authors those texts. To give a modern example, <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Gyeongheo> is the father of modern Korean Zen, but he not only had never received transmission in person, he didn't have a Zen teacher either, nevertheless, there is apparently a lineage that was created for him by the subsequent generation.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 31st, 2018 at 3:29 AM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

Dan74 said:

But they are still meaningful (to me).

Astus wrote:

But what is that meaning? A degree from an accredited educational institution means something because there is some level of quality control. But I guess you would not really find a degree trustworthy if it had been bought online from some no-name virtual university. There isn't really any officially appointed committee that reviews the qualifications of a teacher and to whom he may then nominate as an heir, so comparing dharma-transmission with a medical degree only works if that degree signifies a training given by a single individual and then printed on his home computer.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 31st, 2018 at 3:36 AM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

Sentient Light said:

I think a lot of academics say the patriarchs' lineage is not historically backed, because they are working with the idea that "lineage" refers to something like the Rule of Two with the Sith.

Astus wrote:

It's not an academic invention, rather it is how the tradition presents itself, and how it is believed to be by most (Western) adherents.

Sentient Light said:

What are we calling authentic exactly?

Astus wrote:

What you described is about how outstanding individuals are incorporated into quasi-historical representations. It lacks the point where such lineages serve as the basis of strengthening one's own agenda, i.e. the very reason that a lineage is set up, as that is how it gains relevance in the present.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 31st, 2018 at 2:48 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

Dan74 said:

If there is such a great master from 80 years ago and your teacher studied under his student for 20 years, who in his turn studied under the master for a long time, yes, this is meaningful.

Astus wrote:

The great master from 80 years ago was great because of his reputation in his life, or a reputation spread by those claiming to be his heirs. There are a good number of possibilities of how someone is eventually viewed as a great master. When one can be called great because of his own merits, the spiritual sons and grandsons may just use his renown to seem great - and that is usually the purpose of calling someone one's ancestor, especially when what was supposedly passed on is not a particular doctrine, so it's not like being the propagator of a unique meditation technique or a distinctive explanation of the Dharma.

Dan74 said:

Whether or not the master's lineage is unbroken matters little.

Astus wrote:

Broken lineage means that at one point a link had no teacher, no ancestor. If it does not matter whether the chain is continuous, then it does not matter at all, since it is not functional any more in connecting the present with the past.

Dan74 said:

It is simply that there are so many subtleties to the Dharma and even more to teaching it, that discovering them without a proper guide is extremely unlikely. Lineage is some partial guarantee of such a guide.

Astus wrote:

Being a member of a lineage is not the same as extensive learning and in depth practice. They may match, but there is no causal connection. What qualifies someone to be a guide is usually just a question of where the student is.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 31st, 2018 at 3:18 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

Jeff H said:

Where lineage seems to me to be important is in presenting a holistic model, as opposed to DIY Buddhists who try to cobble together a personal practice based on cherry picking bits and pieces from very different schools. In this sense a lineage arises from a collection of similarly inclined and trained masters over time who have evolved a cohesive system of study/practice that can be shown to produce positive results for students who apply it holistically.

Astus wrote:

That's rather the opposite of what lineage stands for in Zen. A cohesive and systematically set up package of doctrines is what's called jiao/kyo (教) and in Zen it is put in opposition to chan/zen (禪), although there have also been those who talked of a harmony or unity between them, but that just shows how separate they are viewed (note the slogan: separate transmission outside doctrine jiao wai bie chuan 教外別傳). See also the quote <https://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=463178#p463178> of this topic.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 31st, 2018 at 5:22 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

Dan74 said:

Or one may indeed be a pratyekabuddha, very unlikely but possible and legitimate and it restarts the chain.

Astus wrote:

A pratyekabuddha by definition cannot teach, nor has any connection with the Dharma. Someone who first turns the wheel is called a buddha. Since I have already mentioned him, let's look at Gyeongheo's story. First of all, he was a monk and he was able to study the scriptures (unlike monastics who were illiterate). That already puts him in the category of people who maintain a higher level of moral discipline and has an advanced level of knowledge of the Dharma. He also did intensive practice to attain realisation. (N.B. all these qualities are also true for Shenxiu in the Platform Sutra) And what actually made him the reviver of Seon was his work in teaching and organising.

Dan74 said:

To me, it stands to reason that one is more likely to find depth of practice and mastery of teaching methods within a lineage than outside.

Astus wrote:

Lineage does not mean training. For instance, Ven. Shengyan received Dharma transmissions not because he studied under Dongchu and Lingyuan but as a recognition of the work he's been doing.

Dan74 said:

My wife is a potter, and not a day goes by that she doesn't feel grateful to her teacher who imparted to her so many secrets and tricks of the trade that could only be discovered over many generations, ie lineage.

Astus wrote:

Lineage is not about learning, it is a quite different matter. Again, think of the Platform Sutra's (fictional, not historical, but still important) story about Shenxiu and Huineng. Shenxiu was the good disciple, Huineng an illiterate layman who spent very little time there. Even though Shenxiu was proficient in the three trainings, but Huineng was the true embodiment of the real teaching, a living buddha, and that's what the transmission signified.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 31st, 2018 at 10:04 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

Jeff H said:

implications for present day practitioners

Astus wrote:

That there is no transmission apart from the teachings.

Jeff H said:

if it could be proven that there is no direct line back to Shakyamuni.

Astus wrote:

First of all, what would need to be proven is that there is a line. Secondly, it's been made clear long ago that the Zen lineage going back to the Buddha is a fabrication.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 31st, 2018 at 11:44 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

Dan74 said:

This is basically your long-term quest to prove that teachers aren't as important in Zen as they are made out to be, Astus?

Astus wrote:

Not really. It is primarily about the very concept of lineage, and the implications that such a concept has. The role and qualities of a teacher is not the only thing that it involves.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 31st, 2018 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

Jeff H said:

there is a qualitative difference between reading Tsongkhapa and sitting at the feet of my teacher as she talks about his teaching.

Astus wrote:

The difference between a transmission apart and inseparable from the teachings lies in whether you can measure what a teacher says against what you find written in the works of Tsongkhapa. In other words, a teacher explains but does not own the tradition.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 31st, 2018 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

passel said:

If 'lineage' or 'transmission' are hard to describe, 'the teachings' is just as hard.

Astus wrote:

The transmission, at least in Zen, is per definition indescribable and inconceivable. The teachings, however, are clearly within the realm of language.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 1st, 2018 at 12:04 AM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

passel said:

But didn't you say earlier in this thread that the only transmission is the teachings?

Astus wrote:

That was in response to the question of what should be the implications of the disappearance of the concept of lineage.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 1st, 2018 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

Wayfarer said:

not necessarily in need of external legitimization. What is being 'handed over' or communicated, after all, is an understanding, a way of seeing, a realisation. Nothing material is handed from master to disciple.

Astus wrote:

Transmission (as confirmation) of enlightenment is exactly an external legitimisation, the very opposite of the idea taught in the sutras of confirming the truth of the Dharma for oneself.

Wayfarer said:

an institutional legitimacy which is used to distinguish the bona fides of genuine teachers to distinguish them from the self-appointed.

Astus wrote:

Quite far from it. Remember the monastic system where the most important authority, the power to ordain, is based on ordination-age. Similarly, older monks taught younger ones. The system of a special lineage was meant to elevate a select few above everyone else, an elite community who claimed to be above the rest.

Wayfarer said:

It's like a quality control mechanism.

Astus wrote:

Not quality, power control.

Wayfarer said:

the gist of the teaching is as elusive as Mahakasyapa's smile, isn't it?

Astus wrote:
How so?

Wayfarer said:
And I think to question whether the flower sermon is historically accurate is to miss its point.

Astus wrote:
The point is to elaborate on an event that is assumed to have actually happened. The only thing it talks of is affirming the transmission, but intentionally does not discuss the content.

Wayfarer said:
Think back to the original sermons - the Buddha and the wanderers who heard him. What were they actually given, apart from an understanding?

Astus wrote:
Not understanding but a teaching, that is practically a summary of the whole of the Dharma. Even the Buddha couldn't make others gain understanding, he could only talk of it. Note that only one of the five actually attained insight.

Wayfarer said:
But there still has to be some way of sorting genuine teachers from enthusiasts and hangers-on.

Astus wrote:
That seems to be a concern of today's Westerners and not the tradition, likely because of the general absence of the monastic community. Traditionally if one person disagreed with another's interpretation of the Dharma, or another's views in general, it resulted in a reasoned refutation of the other's doctrines, or they simply disregarded each other, and sometimes there were other types of unseemly attacks. But in general the harmony of the community is more important than whether one believes that Amitabha is a nirmanakaya or a sambhogakaya, just as you can see current institutions accommodating monks and nuns of various views and practices.

Wayfarer said:
And I'm sure the Mandarin bureaucracy would demand some kind of documentation if Buddhism was to be countenanced as a State religion (which it was).

Astus wrote:
That is a fairly positive image of a state that cares about the quality of religious education, or a supremely powerful and oppressive regime that pays attention to the details. However, that didn't really happen. First of all, Buddhism was only occasionally the favoured religion, but never the state religion. The main form of control the emperor used over Buddhism was the limitation of ordination, and it was the ordination certificates that actually mattered. The second important form of control was over the nomination of abbots that needed approval from the local landlord who was the main sponsor of the monastery. But as for what sort of Buddhist doctrine an individual monk follows, that is quite inconsequential, as long as it is not some sort of agitation against the status quo.

Wayfarer said:

So there's plenty of reasons to provide such a legitimising account as the lineage records.

Astus wrote:

As you can see, there was no need for that, not from the perspective of the government, nor from the perspective of the people.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 1st, 2018 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

Jeff H said:

A teaching is given by the teacher and a subsequent understanding arises within the student. Isn't that a transmission?

Astus wrote:

It is a form of transmission, but not what is meant in Zen. In Zen it is about the direct transmission, so called "mind to mind", of buddhahood. Let's turn again to the <https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/glossary/index.html>:

https://global.sotozen-

net.or.jp/eng/library/glossary/individual.html?key=seal_of_the_buddha_mind

"Buddha-mind (busshin 佛心) is the awakening (bodai 菩提, S. bodhi) that turns ordinary beings into buddhas. The Zen lineage is said to transmit Shakamuni's buddha-mind from master to disciple "without relying on scriptures" (furyū monji 不立文字). That wordless "mind to mind transmission" (ishin denshin 以心傳心) is likened to the kind of non-verbal communication that takes place when a carved seal (in 印), used in East Asia as a legally binding signature, is inked and pressed on a piece of paper. The awakened mind of the master presses directly, as it were, on the mind of the disciple, thereby replicating itself. A disciple whose understanding of the dharma is formally approved and documented by a master is also said to have received a "seal of approval" (inka 印可)."

https://global.sotozen-

net.or.jp/eng/library/glossary/individual.html?key=dharma_lineage

"An unbroken line of dharma transmission that is traced back through many generations of teachers and disciples."

https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/glossary/individual.html?key=dharma_lamp

"A metaphorical expression, which likens the dharma (hō 法) to the "flame of a lamp" (tō 燈) which can be passed to another lamp (i.e. from master to disciple) and thus be kept burning forever. In the Zen tradition, the transmission of the formless, ineffable buddha mind (busshin 佛心) down through the lineage of ancestral teachers (soshi 祖師) is referred to metaphorically as "transmission of the flame" (dentō 傳燈)."

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 2nd, 2018 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

Dan74 said:

The very concept of lineage is a bloody good idea

Astus wrote:

What do you find good about it?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 2nd, 2018 at 3:38 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

Dan74 said:

close teacher-student relationship, necessary training and realisation as well as a family spirit, all of which I find to be of immense value in Zen training.

Astus wrote:

That is about community and its organisation, something that you find all over Buddhism and practically any religion, not lineage.

Dan74 said:

As someone who is not part of a lineage (not transmitted or authorised in any way), I may be completely off-base.

Astus wrote:

But you can be a part of the community, so that shows well how lineage and community are two different matters.

Dan74 said:

a transmitted teacher

Astus wrote:

That is where lineage has a role, the nomination of a teacher, and how a teacher is perceived by others.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 2nd, 2018 at 4:18 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I think 'power control' is a rather cynical view, isn't it? Is there only 'power' at stake? Isn't 'quality' intrinsic to it?

Astus wrote:

Power is connected to lineage, as it was created and used for that purpose. If there were an intrinsic quality there, and that quality is stated to be buddha-mind, then it would mean all patriarchs, past and present, are buddhas.

Wayfarer said:

The elusive nature of Zen realisation is intrinsic to Zen, isn't it? Its nature is such that literally can't be simply written down or specified.

Astus wrote:

It can be easily written down and specified, as it's actually been by people from Bodhidharma to Shengyan, although views can show differences, as it was delineated first by Guifeng Zongmi.

Wayfarer said:

I give you a formula for creating X, you repeat the steps in the formula and you get X.

Astus wrote:

That is what a path is. If you deny that there is a path, that is practically the negation of Buddhism.

Wayfarer said:

I added the bolds to note the emphasis on metaphor in such descriptions.

Astus wrote:

Calling it a seal and a lamp are the metaphors. The point is what they are metaphors of: the direct communication of buddhahood.

Wayfarer said:

The awakened mind of the master presses directly, as it were, on the mind of the disciple, thereby replicating itself.

Astus wrote:

As it were - that is not "as if it were", but just as it is, meaning perfect enlightenment is replicated perfectly.

Wayfarer said:

I wonder if you have read Bernard Faure and Stephen Heine's critical accounts of Asian Buddhist traditions? Particularly Faure's The Rhetoric of Immediacy?

Astus wrote:

Reducing Zen to mere rhetoric is another topic. For the current one about lineage the relevant sources are works like "The Northern School and the Formation of Early Ch'an Buddhism", "Seeing through Zen", "Fathering Your Father", "The Mystique of Transmission", "The Will to Orthodoxy", "Hongzhou School of Chan Buddhism", "How Zen Became Zen", "Monks, Rulers, and Literati", "Enlightenment in Dispute", "Leaving for the Rising Sun", etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 2nd, 2018 at 5:34 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

Wayfarer said:

only one was enlightened, right? Yet they all heard the same thing. So what's the difference between the one who got enlightened and those who didn't?

Astus wrote:

In one word: karma. Understanding is not automatically attained by learning, and realisation is not automatically attained by understanding. They are conditions, but there are other conditions as well that need to be met, hence the seven factors of enlightenment.

Wayfarer said:

the meaning has to be realised. That's why it's different to science.

Astus wrote:

Reading Fermat's last theorem and understanding it are not the same, then being able to prove it is again another matter.

Wayfarer said:

it's not in the least dependent on anything other than your ability to follow those steps.

Astus wrote:

The Buddha taught the path. It's up to each person to follow it. How is that different?

Wayfarer said:

The result is the same for anyone who is capable of following the instructions.

Astus wrote:

That is the idea in Buddhism as well. Follow the path and attain liberation.

Wayfarer said:

But there's something else involved in Zen, which is the 'realisation of the way'. And that is 'first person'.

Astus wrote:

The difference between the realisation of following through a chemistry handbook and a Dharma handbook is that the end result of the former can be confirmed by others, but for the latter only the individual can confirm it. But if it is believed that a master can tell whether the disciple attained liberation - and that is a highly debatable point, also relevant to the topic of transmission - then both the scientific and the Buddhist path are objectively verifiable.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 3rd, 2018 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

Dan74 said:

Yes, indeed lineage and community are different.

Astus wrote:

Since communities do not depend on it, what is the good about lineage?

Dan74 said:

Lineage, the way I see it, is an empowerment to lead a community, to foster and continue one in which these qualities, this functioning, live on.

Astus wrote:

Dharma transmission in Zen is about the passing on of enlightenment. Where does that include community management? Is it only buddhas who can lead communities? The Vinaya itself does not talk about the need for Dharma transmission to become an abbot.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 3rd, 2018 at 3:47 AM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

Dan74 said:

Since master-to-student transmission is important in Zen, the very core of Zen

Astus wrote:

As the Zen lineage is historically not true, what is transmitted?

Dan74 said:

Do you have a better method in mind for achieving these aims?

Astus wrote:

There are numerous ways to pass on a tradition, to educate people, to measure the level of understanding of students, and to manage a community. Lineage is not needed for any of that.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 3rd, 2018 at 2:41 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

passel said:

If you keep looking for something called 'lineage' outside of all these other things you keep describing you will never find it. But that's just basic Madhyamaka- I'm not really sure what this thread is even about

Astus wrote:

Here are some examples of what a lineage is:

<https://kwanumzen.org/our-lineage/>

<http://londonzen.org/lineage/>

<http://www.ciolek.com/wwwvlpages/zenpages/haradayasutani.html>

<https://boundlesswayzen.org/our-lineage/> (this accepts the Indian patriarchs to be fabricated)

<https://www.pacificzen.org/ancestors-relatives-and-welcome-guests/> (this one not only openly says that the lineage is fictional, but also intentionally added new names)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 3rd, 2018 at 2:44 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Well haven't you answered your own question, then?

Astus wrote:

How so? The Zen lineage is an East Asian thing, even the Tibetan idea works differently, so clearly lineage is not the only possible organising method in Buddhism, but at the same time it is quite central to Zen. The question is: if this central element of Zen is unfounded, what then?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 3rd, 2018 at 3:15 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

Dan74 said:

what I don't get is what specifically do you object to.

Astus wrote:

Lineage, and its transmission, is based on the idea that it is an unbroken connection between today's living master going back to Shakyamuni Buddha. That is where the legitimacy of the transmission lies, that it is the seal of the buddha-mind. If there is no chain of ancestors going back to the Buddha, then there is no legitimacy, it is not the transmission of the buddha-mind.

That's why the topic, that in light of modern historical studies of Zen, the idea of an unbroken lineage does not hold up, therefore its basis of legitimacy has disappeared. What can then be pointed to that can uphold Zen's validity?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 3rd, 2018 at 4:04 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

Wayfarer said:

The fact that the understanding that is at its basis is real.

Astus wrote:

Whose understanding is it? Also, does it have to be given by another, or can someone arrive at it on one's own?

Wayfarer said:

I think the idea that something has to be literally transmitted is interpreting the idea a little too literally.

Astus wrote:

If there is a real understanding transmitted, how is that not something literal?

Wayfarer said:

Maybe re-phrase it as 'the historical veracity of the lineage records are not needed for any of that'. That appears to be the view taken by at least some of the organisations you link to above. Why not go with it?

Astus wrote:

If there is no need for historical veracity, would you accept someone as a legitimate teacher who made up his own lineage?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 3rd, 2018 at 4:33 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

Dan74 said:

they didn't take such a literal interpretation of many 'tenets of faith'.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean they did not think that the transmission from teacher to disciple actually happened in the past, as it is described in the many volumes of transmission records?

Dan74 said:

But in Zen, the point has always been to see it and then to pass on the Lamp, whoever gets it, sees Chaochou face to face, see the Buddha face to face. So fundamentally, it's never been obsessed with historical accuracy, AFAICT.

Astus wrote:

Dogen's view was rather strict - and that's what the 18th century https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/key_terms/pdf/key_terms20.pdf of Soto relied on - regarding transmission. He wrote (Menju, in SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 3, p 211): "If even one ancestor, one master, or one disciple failed to give or to receive the face-to-face transmission they would not be the buddhas and the patriarchs." In the same text he criticises Jianfu Chenggu who claimed Dharma inheritance directly from Yunmen (partly because he was basically dissatisfied with the teachers of the era). Similar concerns regarding the truth and purity of the lineage emerged later in both China and Japan. At the same time, if it is fine to be flexible with lineage, would it be alright today if somebody claimed to be a direct heir of Yunmen? (Side note: a modern case of similar situation is that of Hsuan Hua who is said to be an heir of the long ceased https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Guiyang_school.)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 3rd, 2018 at 6:16 PM

Title: Re: Zen without Lineage

Content:

Dan74 said:

I take it as an expression of gratitude to all those who carried and passed on the Lamp.

Astus wrote:

If the lineage is not real, there was no passing on of any lamp, unless the nature of transmission is reinterpreted, like for instance saying that those who studied with Kusan Sunim can all be considered his heirs, or those who follow his particular style in teaching, or some other version.

Dan74 said:

I don't recall ANY teisho or Dharma talk who even mentioned literal interpretation of the lineage. So from where I stand it's a bit of a strawman you are fighting here.

Astus wrote:

It doesn't look like a straw man to me. Look at what is said by the following major institutions:

The official site of the Rinzai-Obaku school states:

"With Shakyamuni's recognition of Mahakashyapa began the "direct transmission from master to disciple" that Zen emphasizes as the particular characteristic of its history as a tradition."

(http://zen.rinnou.net/whats_zen/history.html)

The Soto Zen Buddhist Association site informs everyone:

"Lineage is a very important aspect of Soto Zen. The appropriate and authentic transmission of the Soto Zen tradition from teacher to student occurs when a fully authorized teacher formally recognizes one of their students as ready to carry and teach the Soto Zen tradition. Transmission is marked by ceremony and is publicly communicated as a way to help establish the authority of a Zen teacher. The chain of transmission over time and multiple generations is called a "lineage."

(<http://szba.org/lineage-identifications/>)

The Jogye Order's website teaches:

"The Dharma that the Buddha gave to the Venerable Kāśyapa through the mind-to-mind transmission like a lamplight so that it would not die out, has passed through many teachers and has been inherited up till today. These teachers are called the proper masters of the lineage or true masters of the lineage. Patriarchal Seon and Ganhwa Seon have cherished the tradition that has transmitted the Dharma that has given the seal of approval to the state of enlightenment and the pride in that distinctive enlightenment."

(http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/bbs/board.php?bo_table=3020&wr_id=6)

See also the introduction of the current patriarch of the Jogye order, Jinje seonsanim, http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/bbs/board.php?bo_table=2030, and the account of his awakening:

"At this time the Master made Jinje sunim his Dharma successor and the 79th Patriarch of the lineage passed on through Master Huineng and Master Linji of China, one of the few intact lineages in the world. "

(http://www.jinje.kr/eng/01_master/03_3.php)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 5th, 2018 at 1:33 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Texts

Content:

pemachophel said:

Most of you in the West think that by reading dharma books, you will develop understanding of the dharma. While it is natural to read, you will only develop an intellectual understanding. Wisdom, however, must come from meditation. For example, you cannot understand the teachings of the Great Perfection, Dzogpa Chenpo or any of the secret mantrayana teachings through reading. In fact, if you read Dzogchen books, you are likely to harm your understanding when the real teachings are given to you.

Astus wrote:

On the other hand, reading the sutras not only teaches one the very words of the Buddha, but also grants one incalculable amount of merit. Also, reading the various treatises gives one correct intellectual understanding, that can shed light on the genuine meaning in a reasonable fashion, thus give it into the reader's hand to use the view for authentic insight and ultimate enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 5th, 2018 at 2:36 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment

Content:

MatthewAngby said:

1) Is there any bliss , joy or enjoyment in enlightenment actually? If not, why do we aim for that?

Astus wrote:

"This Unbinding is pleasant, friends. This Unbinding is pleasant."

When this was said, Ven. Udayin said to Ven. Sariputta, "But what is the pleasure here, my friend, where there is nothing felt?"

"Just that is the pleasure here, my friend: where there is nothing felt.

(<https://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an09/an09.034.than.html>)

To see how nirvana is bliss it is necessary to comprehend how samsara is pain. As the second noble truth states, from craving arises suffering. The object of craving is primarily something we see as pleasurable. That perception of enjoyment is the gratification (assāda), then the suffering ensuing is the danger (ādinava), but there also a way out from it, i.e. the path, called the escape (nissarana). So there is a clear difference between how the ignorant and the wise experiences things, as you can see for yourself in the <https://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn36/sn36.006.nypo.html>.

MatthewAngby said:

Do we become vegetable state beings in enlightenment , sitting tightly in blank space?

Astus wrote:

There is actually a realm of nothingness exactly for those who find such an existence desirable. That is still samsara. As long as there is a longing towards any state of being or non-being, for that long there is birth and pain.

"Bhikkhus, there are these two views: the view of being and the view of non-being. Any recluses or brahmans who rely on the view of being, adopt the view of being, accept the view of being, are opposed to the view of non-being. Any recluses or brahmans who rely on the view of non-being, adopt the view of non-being, accept the view of non-being, are opposed to the view of being.

Any recluses or brahmans who do not understand as they actually are the origin, the disappearance, the gratification, the danger and the escape in the case of these two views are affected by lust, affected by hate, affected by delusion, affected by craving, affected by clinging, without vision, given to favoring and opposing, and they delight in and enjoy proliferation. They are not freed from birth, aging and death, from sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief and despair; they are not freed from suffering, I say."

(<https://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.011.ntbb.html>)

MatthewAngby said:

If everyone became buddhas and there is no more to liberate , can buddhas still do anything at all?

Astus wrote:

That is assuming buddhas to be just like common beings. They look like that only for common beings, who cannot comprehend anything else. But that is not the true nature of buddhas.

"Someone who tries to discern me in form

Or seek me in sound

Is practicing non-Buddhist methods

And will not discern the Tathāgata"

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html, ch 26)

MatthewAngby said:

Can Buddha perceive sentient beings and environments or pure lands? Or do they see nothing and sort of become blind? Can Buddha hear sounds and music? Do they enjoy music or do they become lifeless and emotionless when they hear it? Do buddhas have thoughts? If they don't, then won't it be like brain dead and like emotionless beings?

Astus wrote:

The problem is not with the senses or the sense objects, but with craving and attachment.

"the eye is not the fetter of forms, nor are forms the fetter of the eye, but whatever desire & passion arises in dependence on the two of them: That is the fetter there. The ear is not the fetter of sounds... The nose is not the fetter of aromas... The tongue is not the fetter of flavors... The body is not the fetter of tactile sensations... The intellect is not the fetter of ideas, nor are ideas the fetter of the intellect, but whatever desire & passion arises in dependence on the two of them: That is the fetter there. There is an eye in the Blessed One. The Blessed One sees forms with the eye. There is no desire or passion in the Blessed One. The Blessed One is well-released in mind."

(<https://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn35/sn35.191.than.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 5th, 2018 at 10:26 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment

Content:

MatthewAngby said:

Why wouldn't we strive to become a god then, and also accumulate merit to sustain our next rebirth in a good realm...

Astus wrote:

That is what everyone does normally in samsara, but hardly anyone attains. And even if heavenly birth is attained, it shall pass.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 6th, 2018 at 1:38 AM

Title: Re: Enlightenment

Content:

MatthewAngby said:

Have to sacrifice the enjoyments and the luxuries of the gods to reach the deathless state, but then in the deathless state I don't even know if they party or have fun.

Astus wrote:

You should familiarise yourself with the story of the Buddha's half-brother Nanda, about whom it was said: "He's leading the holy life for the sake of nymphs. The Blessed One is his guarantor for getting 500 dove-footed nymphs." See in the <https://accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/kn/ud/ud.3.02.than.html>.

There is also the teaching from the Sakya school called <http://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/sachen-kunga-nyingpo/parting-four-attachments>:

"If you are attached to this life, you are not a true spiritual practitioner;
If you are attached to saṃsāra, you have no renunciation;
If you are attached to your own self-interest, you have no bodhicitta;
If there is grasping, you do not have the View."

For more on that see this <http://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/jetsun-drakpa-gyaltsen/parting-four-attachments> and/or this <http://hhsakyatrizin.net/wp-content/uploads/2018/02/Parting-from-the-4-Attachments.pdf>.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 8th, 2018 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: Caodong vs. Soto

Content:

falcon said:

differences between the China practice of Caodong and the Japanese practice of Soto?

Astus wrote:

Do you mean now or in the early 13th century? If now, then Chinese Buddhism is fairly uniform, and lineages have only nominal meaning. If in the 13th century, then there are some studies on the matter (by Steven Heine, William M. Bodiford, Carl Bielefeldt, etc.) of how Dogen transformed what was in China, and then there were further changes over the centuries within Soto.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 8th, 2018 at 4:18 PM

Title: Re: Caodong vs. Soto

Content:

falcon said:

The be all end all to practicing Soto Zen means to study what Dogen and Keizan taught right?

Astus wrote:

There is nearly 800 years of history between Dogen and today, so there is actually quite a lot one could study. Taking a practical approach is another matter, and it is more about participating in the temple (or Zen centre in the West) activities and following the guidance of a teacher.

falcon said:

The rest over the years from 13th century to now is almost irreverent no? Because not much has changed to the essential points?

Astus wrote:

The very idea that one should study the works of Dogen is from the 17th-18th century reformation of Soto, just like a good number of other things that today qualify this school.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 12th, 2018 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: Caodong vs. Soto

Content:

PeterC said:

If I remember correctly, it was only after studying in Japan that he started teaching, and before going to Japan he had already spent a lot of time in retreat after receiving yinke.

Astus wrote:

1961 - six years solitary retreat

1969 - six years in Japan, obtains PhD at Rissho University

1975 - goes to the US to teach

1976 - Dongchu gives Caodong transmission

1978 - Lingyuan gives Linji transmission

(<http://www.dharmadrum.org/content/about/about2.aspx?sn=44>, http://old.shengyen.org/e_content/content/about/about_01_2.aspx?PageID=2)

PeterC said:

innovations in his teaching

Astus wrote:

See: http://chinesebuddhiststudies.org/previous_issues/chbj2301Jimmy%20Yu%203-38.pdf

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 13th, 2018 at 6:01 AM

Title: Re: Signs from the Dakinis?

Content:

Void said:

What are possible so-called "signs from the dakinis", which seem to indicate significant training progress in Mahamudra (and most likely also in Dzogchen)?

Are there quotes in Mahamudra or Dzogchen literature which describe those?

Astus wrote:

'At this stage the meditator will acquire some power of supernormal cognition and will receive prophetic directions from his yidam and dakini. ... If the meditator has failed to acquire the spiritual power capable of producing both beneficial and harmful effects, has failed to gain supernormal cognition, and has also failed to receive any prophetic directions from the dakinis despite the fact that he has realized the great level of one flavor, then this condition might well be the consequence of his having violated the sacred bond or having been affected by a close associate who has abandoned his faith.' (Mahamudra: the Moonlight, p 397-398)

"Prophetic directions from the dakinis" refers to the protective role of the dakinis.

Regarded as the custodians of the secret Supreme Yoga, the dakinis have been looked upon by Buddhist mystics as the protectors from forces of destruction and unscrupulous profaning.'

(n 208, p 465)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 15th, 2018 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: Dalai Lama says 'Europe belongs to Europeans'

Content:

Astus wrote:

The current issue of the 'migrants' looks very much like the same old racist and antisemitic fear mongering. It is unfortunate if the Dalai Lama has little understanding of what slogans like 'X-land belongs to X-people' means to the majority.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 17th, 2018 at 2:10 PM

Title: Re: Travelling to heavens and pure realms

Content:

MatthewAngby said:

Is there any methods that allows one to travel to the heavens (Tusita's inner courts) or sukhavati without waiting for another 70-80 years before death?

Astus wrote:

Of course there are. Check out the http://www.bdkamerica.org/system/files/pdf/dBET_Pratyutpanna_Surangama_1998_0.pdf?file=1&type=node&id=463.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 17th, 2018 at 2:24 PM

Title: Re: Four Noble Truths as a list of landmarks.

Content:

Viach said:

the FNT is more like a list of successive landmarks(so that you do not get lost) than a set of two pairs of logical statements

Astus wrote:

The so called landmarks are the stages of realisation: stream-entrant, once returner, non-returner, and arhat. All four stages require the contemplation of all four truths.

Viach said:

Also other buddhist lists are the same lists of landmarks: the Four Seals, the Twelve Nidanas, the Noble Eightfold Path, 37 Factors of Enlightenment, etc.

Astus wrote:

Not really. Although Vasubandhu did relate the 37 factors to the 5 paths, that is not the general interpretation, and it looks somewhat forced and tentative.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 19th, 2018 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: Asanga's Mahayanasamgraha Full English Translation December 2018

Content:

Seeker12 said:

first complete English translation of Asanga's Mahayanasamgraha

Astus wrote:

That has been available in English for a while now. See the BDK edition for instance:
http://www.bdkamerica.org/system/files/pdf/dBET_Beta_T1593_SummaryoftheGreatVehicle_2003.pdf?file=1&type=node&id=475.

Seeker12 said:

the most important and comprehensive Indian Yogacara text

Astus wrote:

That would be the Yogacarabhumisastra, translated to English only partially.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 20th, 2018 at 2:47 PM

Title: Re: Travelling to heavens and pure realms

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Wanting to get there will never get you there.

Astus wrote:

Virya-paramita is quite essential.

"If one fails to practice vigor, then one will not succeed in bringing forth dhyāna absorption. If one does not bring forth dhyāna absorption, then one cannot even succeed in being reborn in the domain of a Brahma Heaven king. How much the less might one hope to gain realization of the path to buddhahood?"

(Nagarjuna: http://www.kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/N6P_excerpts/N6P_X-Bk4_X-10.pdf, p 6)

"If one exhorts oneself intensely and labors at it diligently,
He may burrow into the ground and be able to reach a spring.

The case with vigor is just the same as this.

There is nothing sought which will not then be gained.

If one is able to accord with Dharma in practicing the Path,

Whoever then is vigorous and thus refrains from indolence

Will definitely succeed in garnering innumerable fruits

And such rewards as these will then never be lost."

(Nagarjuna: The Perfection of Vigor, p 7-8)

Also look into the concept of <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sa%E1%B9%83vega>.

"As if struck by a sword, as if his head were on fire, a monk should live the wandering life — mindful — for the abandoning of sensual passion."

(That 1.39, tr Thanissaro)

"Just as one whose clothes or head had caught fire would put forth extraordinary desire, effort, zeal, enthusiasm, indefatigability, mindfulness, and clear comprehension to extinguish [the fire on] his clothes or head, so that bhikkhu should put forth extraordinary desire, effort, zeal, enthusiasm, indefatigability, mindfulness, and clear comprehension to abandon those bad unwholesome qualities."

(AN 6.20, tr Bodhi)

"Short is the life span of human beings,

The good man should disdain it.

One should live like one with head aflame:

There is no avoiding Death's arrival."

(SN 4.9, tr Bodhi)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 20th, 2018 at 9:58 PM

Title: Re: Travelling to heavens and pure realms

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I was thinking more of the principle of 'abandoning hope of fruition'.

Astus wrote:

But that is a hope one should not abandon until the fruition is right in one's hands.

Without intention there is no action, without action there is no result.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 21st, 2018 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: Travelling to heavens and pure realms

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I'm responding to the OP, not 'laying down a law'.

Astus wrote:

What should not be aspired to? Travelling to heavens/buddha-fields, talking to highly realised beings, or clarifying doubts? It is said that it worked for Asanga.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 21st, 2018 at 4:24 AM

Title: Re: Travelling to heavens and pure realms

Content:

Wayfarer said:

How could he visit 'Sukhavati heaven' in a reasonable time-frame - like, a few months, or a year maybe? Any tips?

Astus wrote:

I have already recommended one way to do that

<https://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=465589#p465589>.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 23rd, 2018 at 6:10 PM

Title: Re: The Decline and Fall of Chinese Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Buddhism in China, like practically everywhere else, has always been bound to the political sphere. Albert Welter himself has a nice work on the topic:

<http://www.oxfordscholarship.com/view/10.1093/acprof:oso/9780195175219.001.0001/acprof-9780195175219>.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 24th, 2018 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: Gil Fronsdaal - The Bodhisattva and the Arhat: Walking Together Hand-in-Hand

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Beyond the effect of arhathood, not a single atom or a single dharma of surplus remains — how much less could the truth of samyaksambodhi remain?"

(Arakan by Dogen, in SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 2, p 275)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 1st, 2018 at 4:57 AM

Title: Re: Yun Men Master, Guo Gu Roshi, a simple question:

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

saying this in a Western ... culture is completely different than saying it in a traditional Buddhist culture

Astus wrote:

That. At the same time, a large part of Chan literature lost its meaning in China after a hundred or so years, not to mention outside China, as it relies heavily on Chinese culture and language. So the interesting part is how the literature of the past was then turned into practice by Dahui. Consequently we can either play word association, or just project whatever is imagined to be the "true meaning".

bokki said:

Yun Men Master, Guo Gu Roshi, a simple question: a student of the way asked yunmen, "what is buddha?"

yunmen replied, "dried shitstick."

Astus wrote:

Here's one linguistic FYI from the introduction of The Letters of Chan Master Dahui Pujue (p24): dried turd (ganshijue 乾屎橛; literally, "dried shit in the shape of a short wooden peg," but sometimes misunderstood as "shitscraping spatula")

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 1st, 2018 at 5:48 PM

Title: Re: Yun Men Master, Guo Gu Roshi, a simple question:

Content:

bokki said:

the shit stick, or dry turd...what about that?

Astus wrote:

If you check Yunmen's sayings (Urs App's translation was reprinted this year by Shambhala), it appears that the text uses 'shit' for conceptualisation (§41, §53, §175, §271), while 'dried shit' (§71, §144, §226, §236) is for teaching.

Someone asked, "What is Shakyamuni's body?"
The Master said, "A dry piece of shit."
(Yunmen's sayings, §85; T47n1988p550b14-15)

This becomes quite tame then, as it practically repeats the age old saying that the (real) body of the Buddha is the Dharma.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 1st, 2018 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: Does Consciousness Continue After Cessation?

Content:

Malcolm said:

since these arhats will not arise from this samadhi of cessation without intervention, their samadhi is for all intents and purposes, permanent (but not eternal).

Astus wrote:

Proposing a permanent mind is the very opposite of the doctrine of impermanent composites. But if it is interrupted, it is not permanent, nor is it the type of arhat that does not switch to the bodhisattva path.

Malcolm said:

The nonabiding nirvana of a buddha means that the continuum of a buddha never ceases, all that ceases for them is the two obscurations.

Astus wrote:

What is the cause of body and mind if not ignorance?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 2nd, 2018 at 4:10 AM

Title: Re: Does Consciousness Continue After Cessation?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Ignorance is a cause of defiled body and mind. Aspirations and merit are the cause of a Buddhas body and mind. Those causes are limitless therefore the series never ceases.

Astus wrote:

Arhats eliminated ignorance, but lack aspirations and merit, hence no cause for continuation.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 2nd, 2018 at 4:55 AM

Title: Re: Does Consciousness Continue After Cessation?

Content:

Malcolm said:

They did not eliminate all traces and the knowledge obscuration, therefore they have not eliminated all causes. Ergo, they have causes which sustain their continuum's.

Astus wrote:

Are arhats still attached to their aggregates? Are they still in samsara? If not, what continuum is outside the three realms?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 4th, 2018 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: Does Consciousness Continue After Cessation?

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

on account of a latent ignorance, acquire and exist in a subtle mental body brought about by their former untainted karma.

Astus wrote:

Are arhats still attached to consciousness? If so, they are not free from samsara, and not really arhats. If not, then one has to propose a 'subtle mental body' apart from the five aggregates.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 4th, 2018 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: Does Consciousness Continue After Cessation?

Content:

Supramundane said:

could you elaborate

Astus wrote:

If the 'subtle mental body' refers to the mental aggregates, then an arhat must still be attached to the aggregates, hence that person cannot actually be called an arhat. But if it is something beyond the aggregates, then there are actually six aggregates. So, in either case, the idea that an arhat is stuck in a subtle mental body contradicts either the definition of arhatship or the doctrine of the five aggregates, unless there is somehow a third option.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 8th, 2018 at 3:13 AM

Title: Re: anti-"Hinayana" bias in Zen (and Mahayana in general)

Content:

JMGinPDX said:

puts me off when reading Zen texts in particular is the anti-Hinayana (e.g. Theravada) bias present in much of the literature.

Astus wrote:

Since Zen has never coexisted with Hinayana before the 20th century meeting in Western countries, this is all rather rhetorical. Plus Mahayana had almost no contact with Theravada in India, so equating Hinayana with Theravada is not completely correct, although calling it Sravakayana is accurate. In any case, having a Hinayana approach in Zen is not about actual schools, but about a certain mistaken interpretation of the teaching, where one clings to cessation and the idea of nirvana apart from samsara.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 9th, 2018 at 7:12 PM

Title: Re: Are Buddhas formless or form?

Content:

Astus wrote:

A monk asked Zen master Guizong, "What is Buddha?"

Guizong said, "When I tell you it becomes something else."

(Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 370)

"Those who have conceptions of the Buddha,
Who, beyond conception, is unbounded,
Are blinded by those very concepts;
They do not behold the Tathagata.
The nature of the Tathagata
Is the nature of this world of beings.
The Tathagata is without intrinsic being;
This world of beings is without intrinsic being."
(Nagarjuna: MMK 22.15-16, tr Padmakara)

"Jetsun Mila's position regarding primordial wisdom. He said this unfabricated awareness is beyond words and conceptual thoughts such as existence or non-existence, eternalism or nihilism, and so forth. It will not be contradicted whatever name is used to express it. Primordial wisdom is also like this. Those who would be expected to be scholars— even if they asked the Buddha himself—I don't think he would say one way or the other. Dharmakaya is beyond conception, unborn, free from elaborations."

(Gampopa: JOoL, p 286, tr Khenpo Konchog Gyaltsen Rinpoche)

"Space and the Dharma body are without any dissimilar characteristics (lit., "characteristics of differentiation"). The Buddhas and sentient beings are without any dissimilar characteristics, samsara and nirvana are without any dissimilar characteristics, and the afflictions and bodhi are without any dissimilar characteristics. To transcend all characteristics is to be a Buddha. Ordinary people grasp at [their sensory] realms, while religious persons grasp at the mind. For the mind and the realms to both be forgotten is the True Dharma. To forget the realms is relatively easy, but to forget the mind is extremely difficult. People do not dare to forget the mind, fearing that they will fall into the void (i.e., the emptiness of space) with nowhere to grab hold. They do not understand that the void is without void, that there is only one true Dharma body."

(Huangbo: Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 21)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 9th, 2018 at 11:37 PM

Title: Re: Are Buddhas formless or form?

Content:

MatthewAngby said:

Um, why would you want to even forget the sensory realms and mind? That sounds to me like escaping the outer and inner worlds dude, and again, does that mean they (buddhas) are without mind and sensory perceptions , which sounds to me personally like a person that is dead and unconscious.

Astus wrote:

Being buddha means freedom from identification. As long as there is something pointed at to be the buddha, that is just ordinary deluded perception, where one keeps grasping at appearances and generating dissatisfaction. Let me quote this entertaining and educational story from the Vimalakirti Sutra (ch 3, BDK ed, p 95-96):

The Buddha told Ānanda, "You go inquire about Vimalakīrti's illness."

Ānanda addressed the Buddha, "World-honored One, I dare not accept your instruction to go inquire about his illness. Why? I remember once in the past, the World-honored One had a slight illness requiring cow's milk [as medicine]. I took my bowl and proceeded to the gateway of a great brahman home.

"While I was standing there Vimalakīrti came and said to me, 'O Ānanda, why are you standing here with your bowl so early in the morning?'

"I said, 'O retired scholar, the World-honored One has a slight illness requiring cow's milk, and so I have come here.'

"Vimalakīrti said, 'Stop, stop, Ānanda! Do not speak thus. The Tathāgata's body is the essence of vajra. [In it] the evils are already eradicated and the host of goods universally assembled. What illness could it have, what vexation could there be?

"Go silently, Ānanda—do not revile the Tathāgata, and do not let anyone else hear such coarse talk. Do not allow the gods of awesome power and virtue and the bodhisattvas who have come from pure lands in other directions to hear these words.

"Ānanda, even a small degree of blessings (i.e., merit) allows the wheelturning sage king (cakravartin) to be without illness—how could the immeasurable blessings of the Tathāgata fail to exceed his in every regard?!

"Go, Ānanda—do not make us experience this shame. If brahmans in the heterodox paths hear this, they will think, "Who is this teacher, who is unable to save himself from illness but would save others of their ills?" Sir, go in secret haste and do not let anyone hear this.

"You should understand, Ānanda, the bodies of the Tathāgatas are bodies of the Dharma, not bodies of longing. The Buddha is the World-honored One, who has transcended the triple world. The Buddha's body is without flaws, the flaws having been extinguished. The Buddha's body is unconditioned and does not fit the [conventional] analytic categories. A body such as this—how could it be ill, how could it be vexed?'

“At the time, World-honored One, I was really ashamed that I might have mistakenly heard what the Buddha had said in spite of being so close.

“I then heard a voice from space saying, ‘Ānanda, it is as the retired scholar has said. It is just that the Buddha has appeared in this evil age of the five corruptions and manifests this Dharma to emancipate sentient beings. Go, Ānanda. Take the milk without shame.’

“World-honored One, the eloquence of Vimalakīrti’s wisdom is like this. Therefore, I cannot accept [your instruction] to go inquire about his illness.”

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 13th, 2018 at 6:42 PM

Title: Re: Did zen masters teach seated meditation?

Content:

Foxy said:

Hi, I was talking to a friend today and I was surprised to find out that zen masters like Huangbo and Yunmen, Wumen, Bodhidharma, never taught nor sat seated meditation to realize true nature. Is this true? I always assumed that zen and meditation were inseparable.

Astus wrote:

Although it is common to relate Zen and dhyana, that is merely an etymological connection. The central theme of Zen is to see the nature of mind and become buddha through that, not through various gradual techniques. It was Dogen, in 13th century Japan, who equated actual seated meditation with enlightenment, however, it's important to note that he did not posit zazen as a way toward a goal, but as the goal itself, plus he was against the idea of seeing nature (kensho) as something to be realised.

One day the Councilor Wang visited the master. When he met the master in front of the Monks’ Hall, he asked, “Do the monks of this monastery read the sutras?”

“No, they don’t read sutras,” said the master.

“Then do they learn meditation?” asked the councilor.

“No, they don’t learn meditation,” answered the master.

“If they neither read sutras nor learn meditation, what in the world are they doing?” asked the councilor.

“All I do is make them become buddhas and patriarchs,” said the master.

The councilor said, “Though gold dust is valuable, in the eyes it causes cataracts.”

“I always used to think you were just a common fellow,” said the master.

(Record of Linji, p 38, tr Sasaki)

Q: What is dhyana and what is contemplation?

A: The non-arising of a single thought is dhyana. The original nature is your increate Mind. Contemplation in samadhi happens when opposites and external objects do not cause a single thought to arise.

...

Q: Does he who practices stilling the mind do it only while sitting in meditation?

A: The practice of stilling the mind means not only doing it while sitting, but also while walking, standing or lying down and, uninterruptedly, during all other actions at all times. This is referred to as truly abiding in permanence.

(Treatise On Entering The Tao of Sudden Enlightenment, tr Lok To)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 14th, 2018 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: Did zen masters teach seated meditation?

Content:

Foxxxy said:

Is this true?

Meido said:

Almost certainly not. But Zen does not rely upon zazen or any other specific practice.

Astus wrote:

It should be perhaps added that meditation is one of the many standard practices in a monastery, just like chanting and studying sutras, various rituals, and upholding the precepts. Did the teachers of past follow the Vinaya? Did they recite scriptures and dharanis? Of course. But none of the common practices themselves make Zen, nor do they qualify it, and that's why they are not discussed, nor is there a Zen version of those.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 14th, 2018 at 4:07 PM

Title: Re: Did zen masters teach seated meditation?

Content:

Temicco said:

Ehu Dayi's Zuochan Ming ("Inscription on Sitting Meditation")

Foxin Bencai's Zuochan yi ("Guidelines for Sitting Meditation")

Changlu Zongze's Zuochan yi ("Guidelines for Sitting Meditation")

Astus wrote:

Those are works from the 12th and 14th centuries, plus they are rather short, more like reminders than manuals. The rest you mention are not teachings on seated meditation, but brief references to it, showing the marginal nature of the matter.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 15th, 2018 at 12:08 AM

Title: Re: Did zen masters teach seated meditation?

Content:

Temicco said:

but they show quite clearly that the idea that "zen masters like Huangbo and Yunmen, Wumen, Bodhidharma, never taught nor sat seated meditation to realize true nature" is not the case.

Astus wrote:

But what is lacking are the Tang era instructions by the ancestors of the so called five schools (note: there are some attributed to the putative Northern School). On the other hand, moving to Song times, there is kanhua chan as the favoured method, and it remained such down to this day.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 15th, 2018 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: Did zen masters teach seated meditation?

Content:

Temicco said:

Which instructions, specifically? Do you mean e.g. the Lengqie shizi ji?

Astus wrote:

I mean the works like the Ru dao an xin yao fangbian famen 入道安心要方便法門, Xiu xin yao lun 修心要論, Dasheng wu fangbian 大乘五方便, Yuan ming lun 圓明論, and Guanxin lun 觀心論.

Temicco said:

what about the Caodong?

Astus wrote:

It was a short lived project that eventually incorporated the same kanhua path. On the other hand, nianfo, and especially name recitation, has been a popular practice in Chan communities, and it still is, but often neglected by Westerners.

Temicco said:

I think the idea of zuochan being non-essential is appropriate, but the idea of it being marginal such that it merits complete de-emphasis goes a bit too far.

Astus wrote:

It depends on who you read. Those who emphasised sudden enlightenment had to relegate meditation to the gradual techniques.

"[The teaching that one can] cultivate the six perfections and the myriad practices in order to achieve Buddhahood—this is the progressive [approach to Buddhahood]. Since beginningless time, there has never been a Buddha [who achieved that state] progressively. Just be enlightened to the One Mind and there will not be the slightest dharma that can be attained—this is the true Buddha."

(Huangbo: Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 14)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 15th, 2018 at 5:10 AM

Title: Re: Did zen masters teach seated meditation?

Content:

Temicco said:

What was your point about them again?

Astus wrote:

That they discuss actual meditation methods.

Temicco said:

Starting when do you propose that Caodong incorporated the same kanhua path?

Astus wrote:

I have no information on that. But it seems that the Ming era revivers of Caodong, Zhanran Yuancheng and Wuming Huijing, were not the advocates of silent illumination but they seem to fit in doctrinally and practically with everyone else.

Temicco said:

He is not explicitly commenting on sitting meditation here.

Astus wrote:

The fifth paramita is mediation.

Temicco said:

Anyway, even if he had designated it as a gradual technique, I don't see how that would matter. It does not contradict my view whatsoever.

Astus wrote:

At the beginning of the Extensive Record of Baizhang a useful difference is made between the ignorant and the practitioner, or the beginner and the advanced disciple. And Chan is for the advanced practitioner.

"If you are speaking to a deaf worldling, you should just teach him to leave home, maintain discipline, practice meditation and develop wisdom. ... If one is speaking to an ascetic, the ascetic has already given his assent three times and his discipline is complete. ... To an ascetic one must explain the defilement in pure things - you should tell him to detach from all things, existence, non-existent, or whatever, to detach from all cultivation and experience, and even to detach from detachment.

While in the course of asceticism, one strips away influences of habit. If an ascetic cannot get rid of the diseases of greed and aversion, he too is called a deaf worldling; still he must be taught to practice meditation and cultivate wisdom."

(Sayings and Doings of Pai-Chang, p 29-30)

Later he also states (p 35): "If you fast and control yourself, practice meditation and cultivate wisdom, these are afflicted roots of goodness."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 15th, 2018 at 3:20 PM

Title: Re: Did zen masters teach seated meditation?

Content:

Temicco said:

Yes, I agree. So do the later texts that I mention.

Astus wrote:

Those later texts are hundreds of years apart from the early ones, so there is actually a big gap during the Tang era.

Temicco said:

Even Huango arguably does, too.

Astus wrote:

He does not. He merely mentions sitting peacefully. But throughout the text he denigrates all effort and all practice as deluded attempts of the gradual path.

"However, there is fast and slow in realizing this mind: there are those who attain no-mind in a single moment of thought after hearing the Dharma; those who attain no-mind after [passing through] the ten faiths, the ten abodes, the ten practices, and the ten conversions; and those who attain no-mind after [passing through] the ten stages [of the bodhisattva]."

(Huangbo in Zen Texts, BDK edition, p 16)

It's either the sudden or the gradual path. And sudden means enlightenment right at the moment of hearing the Dharma. What more would be needed?

"To become profoundly enlightened into [this truth]— right now, and that's it! Perfect and sufficient, nothing is lacking. One may cultivate energetically for three eons, passing through the various stages. Then in a single moment of realization one realizes only that originally one was oneself a Buddha, with not a single thing that could possibly be added."

(Huangbo, p 17)

Temicco said:

Yes, but the term dhyana was used in specific ways in the sutras, and can't necessarily be equated with the "chan" in "zuo chan" just because the words are the same. The perfection of dhyana always occurs in discussions of the 6 paramitas, but the term "zuo chan" is not used like this nor associated with the paramitas in any Chan literature I've ever read. So, I think it is a misreading to think that the meaning is the same.

Astus wrote:

That might be so. But then it should be also mentioned that not only chan has a different meaning, but so does zuo, hence it is not about any cultivation, nor any posture.

"Externally, for the mind to refrain from activating thoughts with regard to all the good and bad realms is called 'seated' (zuo). Internally, to see the motionlessness of the self-nature is called 'meditation' (chan)."

(Platform Sutra, ch 5, BDK ed, p 45)

Temicco said:

Yes, I don't doubt that. But really, this only supports my view -- meditation is not the essential point, but nevertheless it does not merit complete de-emphasis. It is an expedient with a long history, and is a favoured expedient in most Zen texts as far as I can see.

Astus wrote:

Sure thing, just as all the other elements of Mahayana, meditation is used.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 15th, 2018 at 4:16 PM

Title: Re: Did zen masters teach seated meditation?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

one has to put aside any sense of getting something or achieving some result from meditation.

Astus wrote:

There is the gradual practice model used by Zongmi, Yongming, and Jinul, where practice does have a meaningful purpose. Dogen is a different case, although there is not much of a detailed system for it. However, the idea of aimless action fits only the level of buddhas, and that cannot be used for those who are not yet on the stage of complete awakening, even though there is a difference between not anxiously craving for enlightenment and genuine aimlessness.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 15th, 2018 at 4:36 PM

Title: Re: Did zen masters teach seated meditation?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

To practice without a sense of personal gain, is not the same as practicing without any sense of purpose.

Astus wrote:

That still sounds like a high level aim, that would require insight into no-self. Why not go with bodhicitta?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 16th, 2018 at 5:31 PM

Title: Re: Did zen masters teach seated meditation?

Content:

Temicco said:

That is "Huineng"'s view, and Shenhui's, but neither Huangbo nor Linji nor Zhaozhou say that their own mention of "sitting" is not meant literally.

Astus wrote:

For Huangbo, here's <https://www.ymba.org/books/dharma-mind-transmission/chung-ling-record>: " Sitting properly and peacefully, not bound by the world - this alone is called liberation!"

For Linji, he mentions sitting twice in a positive context, and three times in negative. There is also a significant difference between them, as the positive statements regarding sitting do not really refer to meditation. One is about Linji himself sitting quietly (穩坐, p 11 in Sasaki), and interviewing visitors, and the other is about the enlightened monk sitting leisurely in the monastery hall (不如無事、向叢林中、床角頭交腳坐, p 21 in Sasaki). On the other hand, the three negative mentions are specifically about meditation practice. The first one (p 17) calls it heretical, and talks of the practice of stillness and illumination, the second one (p 24) talks of the motionless posture as mistaken for the patriarchal way, and the third one (p 29) talks of the dedicated solitary practitioner who sits for long periods of time as mere karma generation. So from this it is quite clear that Linji did not talk of sitting meditation as something related to Zen (in the sense of sudden enlightenment).

Temicco said:

Clearly Zen is not inescapably about sitting -- there are plenty of quotes dismissing such an idea, including the Platform sutra quote -- but I don't think that attitude should be brought as an interpretive lens to every mention of "sitting" in Zen texts.

Astus wrote:

Agreed. I merely brought it up with relation to how the word zen can be interpreted.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 16th, 2018 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: One hand clapping

Content:

shanyin said:

I'd like to know what it is. I want to do this koan because I want something to think about especially during meditation.

Astus wrote:

This looks like a common version: 両掌相打って音声あり、隻手に何の音声がある。

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 17th, 2018 at 3:59 PM

Title: Re: One hand clapping

Content:

shanyin said:

could you translate?

Astus wrote:

"There is the sound of both palms hit together, but what is the sound of one hand?"

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 17th, 2018 at 5:59 PM

Title: Re: Pedagogy: Teachings on How to Teach

Content:

Astus wrote:

The basics from the Buddha:

<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an04/an04.111.than.html> (AN 4.111) - like taming a horse

<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an05/an05.159.than.html> (AN 5.159) - how to teach

Summary from <https://www.buddhanet.net/e-learning/buddhism/to-teach.htm>.

Mahayana:

The <https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=22185#p22185>

<https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=21820#p21820> from the Bodhisatvacaryānirdeśa

Zen ideas from Linji:

"Whenever someone comes here seeking I immediately go out and look at him. He doesn't recognize me. Thereupon I don various kinds of robes. The student, assigning some meaning to this, straightway falls into words and phrases. What a pity that the blind shavepate, a man without the eye [to see], grasps at the robe I'm wearing and declares it to be blue or yellow, red or white! When I remove the robe and enter the state of purity, the student takes one look and is immediately filled with delight and longing. Then, when I cast off everything, the student is stunned and, running about in wild confusion, cries, 'You have no robe!' If I say, 'Do you know me, the man who wears these robes?' he'll abruptly turn his head around and recognize me through and through."
(tr Sasaki, p 26)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 17th, 2018 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: Pedagogy: Teachings on How to Teach

Content:

Astus wrote:

There's chapter 12 of the Mahayanasutralamkarabhasya discussing teaching.

"The Lord Buddha did not, in fact, teach the (ultimate) Dharma, since it is individually realized within. Still, the compassionate ones, like huge boa-constrictors, (first) attract people toward their own reality with their reasonable teachings, (which work) like the boa's paralyzing saliva, and (then) make them fall into the gaping mouth of their own peace, which is perfectly pure, universal, and inexhaustible."

(v 2, tr Thurman)

"The bodhisattvas' perfect teaching should be recognized as extensive, doubt-dispelling, acceptable, and twofold in its demonstration of reality.

The teaching of these best heroes is gentle, modest, tireless, clear, varied, reasonable, intelligible, non-exploitive, and universal.

The speech of the victor-children is powerful, gentle, eloquent, sensible, appropriate, non-exploitive, measured, and expansive.

(The bodhisattvas' syllables are perfect because they) teach, explain, are adapted to the vehicles, soothe, make sense, are appropriate, liberate, and favor."

(v 5-8)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 18th, 2018 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: Did zen masters teach seated meditation?

Content:

Meido said:

that path of practice in fact has quite a lot to do with the body.

Astus wrote:

Do you know sutras that discuss physical practice? Or is it discussed only in Rinzaï works?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 19th, 2018 at 2:45 PM

Title: Re: Did zen masters teach seated meditation?

Content:

passel said:

b) divergent evolution- a common body of probably early Indian textual sources that both are drawing from.

Temicco said:

Or, oral instructions.

Astus wrote:

Meditation texts were translated to Chinese very early:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dhy%C4%81na_sutras.

For Dogen's sources, see "Dogen's Manuals of Zen Meditation" by Carl Bielefeldt. The "manuals" themselves are mostly a copy-paste job from Zongze, and a little further Zen rework on them. But this small collection of Song era zazen instructions are not like the traditional Buddhist manuals, and it is telling that Zongze refers his readers to more extensive sources (see: The Baizhang Zen Monastic Regulations, BDK ed, p 257). In other words, it should be kept in mind that Zen was not a school closed off from the larger Buddhist tradition, and it should not be treated separately from Mahayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 20th, 2018 at 4:32 PM

Title: Re: Did zen masters teach seated meditation?

Content:

passel said:

detailed postural instruction in any of those texts, and if so, can you nail down any probable dates?

Astus wrote:

The Discourse on the Essential Secrets of Meditation (Chan Miyao Fa Jing 禪祕要法經, T15n613) is dated to the 2nd or 3rd century in origin by Ven. Dr. Yuanci, and it does have a description of posture at p243b24-27.

Here are Zongze's Zuochanyi and the Chan Miyao Fa Jing's relevant sections:

sit in the full cross-legged (lotus) position or in the half-lotus position. The left hand is placed on the right hand and the thumbs of both hands touch. The body is held straight in sitting, with [the ears balanced in line with the shoulders] and the nose and abdomen vertically aligned. The tongue rests on the upper palate, the lips and teeth are firmly closed, and the eyes remain slightly open so as to avoid falling asleep.

結跏趺坐。或半跏趺。以左掌安右掌上。兩大拇指相拄。正身端坐。令耳與肩對。鼻與臍對。舌拄上腭唇齒相著。目須微開。免致昏睡。

結跏趺坐，齊整衣服，正身端坐，偏袒右肩，左手著右手上，閉目以舌拄腭

Sit in the full cross-legged position, have the robe in order, the body is held straight in sitting, bare the right shoulder, the left hand rests on the right hand, eyes closed and tongue against the palate.

Note that those two texts are separated by around a thousand years, and still you find that a significant portion matches word by word.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 23rd, 2018 at 4:13 PM

Title: Re: Honen or Shinran?

Content:

Astus wrote:

As I take it, the difference can be summed up like this:

Honen: faith is within nenbutsu.

Shinran: nenbutsu is within faith.

Practically, Shinran can be seen as a faithful follower of Honen, even if he used different expressions.

"In the Tannisho, Shinran expressed his Faith, saying that 'Shinran ... entrusted himself to the teaching of the Venerable Master (Honen) ---- that we are saved by Amida merely through the utterance of the Nembutsu.' Does this not contradict the above explanation on Faith and Nembutsu?

The teaching of Honen or Shan-tao was characterised by the emphasis on the Nembutsu in contrast to other sundry practices as required in different schools. However, the Nembutsu in Shan-tao's and Honen's teachings is the utterance of Amida's Name based upon true Faith. It is not the Nembutsu of self-power but it represents Amida's characteristic method of salvation as proclaimed in the Vow. Shinran used this expression, too, especially when he referred to Shan-tao's or Honen's teaching."

(<http://www.nembutsu.info/standard/significance.htm>)

A benefit of studying Honen is that he speaks directly and clearly, while Shinran seems to me more poetical, possibly because Honen wanted to establish his take on the Pure Land path, while Shinran already had something to build on.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 26th, 2018 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: I believe the lower realms can be emptied in a day

Content:

Astus wrote:

'(To say that) "the Buddha appears in the world and saves sentient beings" are words of the nine-part teachings; they are words of the incomplete teaching. Anger and joy, sickness and medicine, are all oneself; there is no one else. Where is there a Buddha appearing in the world? Where are there sentient beings to be saved? As the Diamond Cutter Scripture says, "In reality, there are no sentient beings who attain extinction and deliverance."'

(Extensive Record of Baizhang, in Sayings and Doings of Pai-Chang, p 71)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 1st, 2018 at 5:30 AM

Title: Re: Nibbana Is Giving Up, Letting Go, and Being Free, Ajahn Chah

Content:

Astus wrote:

That's a bit misleading title. The text defines nibbana as "Nibbana means not grasping. Nibbana means not giving meaning to things. Nibbana means letting go." And continues: "Making offerings and doing meritorious deeds, observing moral precepts, and meditating on loving-kindness—all these are for getting rid of defilements and craving, for making the mind empty—empty of self-cherishing, empty of concepts of self and other—and for not wishing for anything, not wishing to be or become anything." The idea of "being free" seems somewhat out of place there. When it comes to freedom, there is the "mind is free of desire, free of defilement, free of craving", "freedom from selfishness", or "freedom from all these conditions and phenomena". But just being free, that's likely just another vague selfish concept.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 1st, 2018 at 3:20 PM

Title: Re: Nibbana Is Giving Up, Letting Go, and Being Free, Ajahn Chah

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

....It's Ajahn Chah dude, did you read it or try to get the gist of it?

Astus wrote:

It's the title of that article I called misleading. The same text in the <https://forestsangha.org/teachings/books/the-collected-teachings-of-ajahn-chah-single-volume?language=English> has the title "About Being Careful". As for what "being free" would look like, that is different from the usual meaning of the term where it stands for doing and experiencing whatever one pleases.

"We practise to be free of suffering, but to be free of suffering does not mean just to have everything as you would like it, have everyone behave as you would like them to, speaking only that which pleases you. Don't believe your own thinking on these matters."

(Collected Teachings of Ajahn Chah, p 211)

"This is freedom: not to cling to conventions. All things in this world have a conventional reality. Having established them we should not be fooled by them, because getting lost in them really leads to suffering."

(p 22)

"In this way we can dwell in a natural state, which is peace and tranquillity. If we are criticized, we remain undisturbed. If we are praised, we are undisturbed. Let things be in this way; don't be influenced by others. This is freedom."

(p 82)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 2nd, 2018 at 2:39 AM

Title: Re: Nibbana Is Giving Up, Letting Go, and Being Free, Ajahn Chah

Content:

kirtu said:

The title is the product of editing. But what are you objecting to?

Astus wrote:

The product of editing.

kirtu said:

I'd have to disagree with you. This is completely a standard Theravadin presentation. Why do you think this constitutes a "vague selfish concept"?

No, "doing and experiencing whatever one pleases" <> "being free". The former is a teen boy definition of freedom and is thus inadmissible (and in fact teen boys who use that definition seriously give themselves a bad name and a bad reputation). The latter refers to at least the momentary freedom from the three poisons.

Astus wrote:

We don't seem to disagree. It is freedom from the three poisons that is the goal, not a conventional concept of freedom.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 6th, 2018 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: What does emptiness mean and why does it matter?

Content:

nichiren-123 said:

what is wrong (if anything) with distinctions? If so then how is the negation of distinctions liberating?

Astus wrote:

I assume by distinction you mean vikalpa (分別).

Nagarjuna writes (MMK 18.5):

"Liberation is attained through the destruction of actions and defilements; actions and defilements arise because of falsifying conceptualizations;
those arise from hypostatization;
but hypostatization is extinguished in emptiness."
(tr Siderits)

"Release occurs when action and defilements cease.
Actions and defilements are derived from thoughts,
And these come from the mind's construction.
Emptiness is what arrests them."
(tr Padmakara)

Menzan Zuiho gives us this explanation (Jijuyu-Zanmai, in Heart of Zen, p 43-44):

"Mumyo (fundamental delusion) is called illusory mind. It is the source of the rounds of delusory life and death from the immeasurable past. It is our discriminating mind which obstinately clings to body, mind, the world, and all things, as being the way we have perceived and recognized them until now. For example, although something good is not always good, we hold stubbornly to what we think is good. Something evil is not always evil, yet we become attached to our own judgment and make it a preconception. Even if you think something is good, others may think it is evil. Even if you think something is evil, others may think it good. And, even if both you and others think something may be good or evil today, fundamentally such judgments merely accord with illusory mind which manifests itself in the form of one's own knowledge, views, and experiences. This is true not only of our judgments about good and evil, but also our views about being and non-being, hatred and love, etc. All these differentiations in regarding all existence arise from illusory mind."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 6th, 2018 at 4:31 AM

Title: Re: What does emptiness mean and why does it matter?

Content:

nichiren-123 said:

I understand the need to see myself as empty but what is the point of seeing, say, inanimate objects as empty? Why does seeing the coffee cup as empty help me - if at all?

Astus wrote:

The main idea of emptiness is the elimination of attachment. Slapping the label of emptiness on objects certainly makes little sense, and one should quickly move on from that level before it becomes problematic. Objects are called empty because they are not one's self, nor one's possession, so "I am the cup" and "This is my cup" are mere misconceptions generating suffering. The more abstract sounding doctrine of emptiness of phenomena (dharma-sunyata) is not about inanimate objects, but rather doctrinal categories (i.e. dharmas) called mere concepts, therefore without first learning about dharmas, there is not much use of worrying about that. So, you are right, a coffee cup is not an issue, but it becomes one the moment you take it to be meaningful, important, or in other words: personal.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 6th, 2018 at 5:49 AM

Title: Re: reading Dogen's Shobogenzo

Content:

DGA said:

I have PDFs of all four volumes of the RPK translation of the Shobogenzo. I've not opened them yet.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean the Nishijima-Cross translation published online by <https://www.bdkamerica.org/bdk-tripitaka-digital-downloads?>

DGA said:

I'd appreciate some suggestions on where to start

Astus wrote:

If it is the BDK edition, then in my opinion that translation is not the best first choice

(that would be Tanahashi's). Perhaps start from the back where more general Mahayana topics are "Dogenised".

DGA said:

any commentaries that may have been translated in English.

Astus wrote:

I have not heard of any such thing. You can try the Soto journal <https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/journal/index.html> for the probably best translations with annotation, and other related articles. And of course there are some more popular chapters discussed by various teachers (e.g.

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=LZXwAQAAAJ>,

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=VoREDwAAQBAJ>,

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=Ehk8DwAAQBAJ>).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 6th, 2018 at 6:29 PM

Title: Re: reading Dogen's Shobogenzo

Content:

DGA said:

Would you mind elaborating on why you prefer Tanahashi's translation to the BDK edition?

Astus wrote:

It simply felt like an easier read, although otherwise not necessarily the most accurate translation. But probably you should decide it for yourself.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 6th, 2018 at 10:05 PM

Title: Re: How is enlightenment achieved in madhamaka and tiantai?

Content:

nichiren-123 said:

My question is: did nagarjuna ever categorically offer a positive means or ANYTHING at all about what enlightenment is or how to get there?

Astus wrote:

Regarding the path, check Ratnavali, Suhrillekha, Yuktisastika, and Sunyatasaptati. Also look at Aryadeva's Catuhsataka. Madhyamaka in the early times differed from the Abhidharma approach in that it took a different view to vipasyana. Later Madhyamaka is another matter.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 7th, 2018 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: How is enlightenment achieved in madhamaka and tiantai?

Content:
Marc said:
Could you please elaborate a bit on this distinction?

Astus wrote:
The abhidharma approach is to break down conventional phenomena to ultimate constituents, i.e. dharmas, so there is no person, there are only the five aggregates, and those five are impermanent, etc. The madhyamaka approach is to break phenomena down to nothing. In the end the goal in both cases is to eliminate grasping at experiences.

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, November 8th, 2018 at 9:47 PM
Title: Re: How is enlightenment achieved in madhamaka and tiantai?
Content:
Marc said:
the distinction that you draw between early & late Madhyamaka as regard to Vipasyana & Abhidharma.

Astus wrote:
With the further development of Mahayana through the emergence of Yogacara things got more detailed regarding the bodhisattva path and practices, as you can see in the works of Candrakirti, Haribhadra, Santaraksita, Kamalasila, Santideva, Atisa, etc.

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, November 12th, 2018 at 3:14 AM
Title: Re: Pure land transcending the triple realm?
Content:
jhanapeacock said:
Where does in the mahayana suttas is mentioned this? Is there a proof of this?

Astus wrote:
It seems to be more of a matter of reasoning regarding buddha-lands. Two important reasons for positioning Sukhavati beyond samsara are that (1) it came into existence due to Dharmakara's vows and (2) beings born there are driven by a wish for liberation. It is neither a result of ignorance, nor for the perpetuation of it.

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, November 13th, 2018 at 10:49 PM
Title: Re: Lotus Vs wisdom Vs flower garland sutra worldview?
Content:
nichiren-123 said:
I thought abhidharma was practically demolished by nagarjuna?

Astus wrote:

Not at all. On the one hand, you can take Madhyamaka as a different layer of teachings. On the other hand, not all abhidharma interpretations fall within the problematic points that Nagarjuna argued against.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 13th, 2018 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Lotus Vs wisdom Vs flower garland sutra worldview?

Content:

nichiren-123 said:

How do these three teachings link together in a coherent way?

Astus wrote:

Question: "I am not going to ask you how to negate one level through another level. But how do you not negate one level, if not through another?"

Answer: "Yesterday I planted the eggplant, today the winter melon."

(Muzhou Daoming, T51n2076p291b21-23, tr from Original Teachings of Ch'an Buddhism, p 109)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 14th, 2018 at 3:42 PM

Title: Re: Lotus Vs wisdom Vs flower garland sutra worldview?

Content:

Admin_PC said:

The SAT Daizokyo says the phrase only occurs in 4 texts:

PeterC said:

what he's done is worse than selective selective quotation.

Astus wrote:

Quoting only the section 法界對法界起法界 is not Ziporyn's idea, but Zhili's (see: http://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T46n1928_p0706c11). Ziporyn discusses the passage in his <https://www.h-net.org/reviews/showpdf.php?id=51274> on p 20.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 14th, 2018 at 4:05 PM

Title: Re: Lotus Vs wisdom Vs flower garland sutra worldview?

Content:

PeterC said:

常坐 is the chapter title from 摩訶止觀?

Astus wrote:

Yes, the section about "constant sitting".

PeterC said:

Would you consider Ziporyn's discussion of that phrase in the review to be a fair representative of conventional reading of it?

Astus wrote:

I am not familiar enough with Tiantai to judge.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 15th, 2018 at 4:22 PM

Title: Re: Non conceptual thought

Content:

MatthewAngby said:

This sounds like the most blank and agitated situation ... like a state where you can no longer know what an object is, and you are always in a state of wondering what the object is, thus like a child who is always confused and never getting the answers.

Astus wrote:

You are right. A blank mind is not a mind free from concepts but a mind stuck in dark ignorance. As the Platform Sutra (ch 4, BDK ed, p 43) summarises it nicely: "Nonthought is to be without thought in the context of thoughts." The point is not to block or eliminate experiences, but to have no attachment to, or identification with them.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 16th, 2018 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: omniscient? infallible?

Content:

clyde said:

Do you believe the Buddha was omniscient? Do you believe the Buddha was infallible?

Astus wrote:

"take a certain teacher who claims to be all-knowing and all-seeing, to know and see everything without exception, thus: 'Knowledge and vision are constantly and continually present to me, while walking, standing, sleeping, and waking.' He enters an empty house; he gets no alms-food; a dog bites him; he encounters a wild elephant, a wild horse, and a wild cow; he asks the name and clan of a woman or man; he asks the name and path to a village or town. When asked, 'Why is this?' he answers: 'I had to enter an empty house, that's why I entered it. I had to get no alms-food, that's why I got none. I had to get bitten by a dog, that's why I was bitten. I had to encounter a wild elephant, a wild horse, and a wild cow, that's why I encountered them. I had to ask the name and clan of a woman or man, that's why I asked. I had to ask the name and path to a village or town, that's why I asked.' A sensible person reflects on this matter in this way: 'This teacher makes such a claim, but he answers in such a way. This spiritual life is unreliable.' Realizing this, they leave disappointed."
(<https://suttacentral.net/mn76/en/sujato>)

See more on the matter: <https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/buddha-omniscience.pdf>.

"However, I would like to point out that attaining Buddhahood and understanding the ultimate nature of things does not mean the enlightened person does not need to formally learn anything, such as French or about the philosophy of Kant. To realize the nature of reality and to understand things on the empirical level of everyday life are quite different. Of course, these two worlds are not in opposition, as mentioned in connection with the yoga of one taste. However, it is evident that one who has attained the ultimate truth will not automatically be well versed in all fields of knowledge."
(Traleg Kyabgon: The Essence of Buddhism, ch 17)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 16th, 2018 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: A request to explain Vajrayana to a common Mahayanika

Content:

Anders said:

What's the main talking points of vajrayana that distinguishes it from common Mahayana?

Astus wrote:

Like Mahayana developed a Buddhist pantheon of buddhas and bodhisattvas to be used instead of common deities, Vajrayana integrated/developed devotional, ceremonial, imaginative, magical, and physical practices. In that way it is a more coherent and versatile way. Compare it with the presence of dharanis, rituals, and occasional body related (yoga, mudra, prana, etc.) techniques in Theravada and East Asia.

Anders said:

What's the deal with deity yoga?

Astus wrote:

It's next level buddhanusmrti, where you identify with not just the mind but also the body of a buddha. Compare that with the approaches to buddha-remembrance in Theravada, in Pure Land Buddhism, and in Zen.

Anders said:

How do you get around the whole "we eat meat, drink alcohol, have sex and engage in the kleshas still call this wisdom" practice thing without just discarding the classical Buddhist view of these matters altogether?

Astus wrote:

I'd say that is quite in line with how the bodhisattva activities within samsara allows all that. It's just that here again it's visible how Vajrayana took the next step, and instead of keeping it rhetorical, made it a practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 16th, 2018 at 11:10 PM

Title: Re: A request to explain Vajrayana to a common Mahayanika

Content:

paël said:

What these yogas are?

Astus wrote:

E.g.: <http://chancenter.org/cmc/chan-practice/moving-meditation/>

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 18th, 2018 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: Difficulty in discussing Mahayana across traditions

Content:

DGA said:

What is an authoritative text or source across Mahayana?

Astus wrote:

There is actually a large collection of texts from India that are present in both the Chinese and the Tibetan canon, plus the Pali canon - or at least the Sutta Pitaka - is generally regarded as buddhavacana.

DGA said:

What's authoritative in this sub, and what is less authoritative or not at all authoritative?

Astus wrote:

Whatever scriptures and treatises both parties accept can be used for reference, otherwise there are two valid sources: reasoning and experience.

DGA said:

According to Mahayana Buddhism, the history of Mahayana Buddhist doctrine is a narrative and catalogue of decline.

Astus wrote:

Whose interpretation of Mahayana is that? The Prajnaparamita and Vaipulya sutras were taught to beings with purer mind than the sravakas, and Tantras are claimed to be taught to those who were even more superior.

DGA said:

Innovations in the teachings are not improvements; they are signs of degeneration

Astus wrote:

Calling them innovations makes sense only if Mahayana sutras are viewed as historically later works, and that is a very modern view, not the traditional one.

Furthermore, taking the historical perspective, later works are usually based on earlier ones, so they should actually be viewed as further extensions at least, not degeneration.

DGA said:

This suggests that the canon of Mahayana texts recorded in Sanskrit, prior to the decline of Buddhism in India, must be more authoritative for the purposes of pan-Mahayana discussion than, say, later Chinese, Tibetan, Japanese, or Korean doctrinal systems.

Astus wrote:

If it is OK to accept texts that are not the actual teachings of Shakyamuni, i.e. all the Mahayana scriptures, why look down on those composed beyond the Indian cultural sphere?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 19th, 2018 at 7:07 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land - Some Doubts and Weak Faith

Content:

Nosta said:

Its just my rational mind working a lot...

Astus wrote:

There is also a rational way to approach the Pure Land teachings, seeing how it is within the context of the whole of Buddhism. It requires first of all getting your mind around fundamental concepts, like rebirth, the various realms, karma, and dependent origination as the fundamentals. Then the specifics for the Mahayana path: the bodhisattva vows, buddha-lands, emptiness, and mind only. Based on those, it can become clear that it is actually possible to attain birth in a buddha-land through the establishment of faith, vow, and practice on the person's end, and the conditions defined by Amitabha's vows.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 20th, 2018 at 6:40 AM

Title: Re: the six consciousnesses (vijñanas)

Content:

clayde said:

I understand that light reflected from objects and making contact with the eye gives rise to eye consciousness, but how do thoughts which are sensed by the mind giving rise to mind consciousness arise?

Astus wrote:

The 18 dhatus is a simple and easy model (until you turn the page and delve into abhidharma). The eye sees (contacts) a visual object (not light, unless light itself is the object), and from the contact (seeing) emerges visual consciousness. Note that neither the organ nor the object is directly known, only the visual consciousness is the point where there is any awareness that there is something seen. Similarly with the other five.

Mind consciousness is no different, as it is generally believed that on the one hand there is mind and on the other there are thoughts, whereby it is when there is a thought in one's mind that there emerges a consciousness of an idea, in other word, one thinks of something.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 21st, 2018 at 11:09 PM

Title: Re: 5 wordly desires

Content:

seeker242 said:

So it's often said, by some, the human beings have 5 desires. Desire for food, sleep, sex, fame/reputation and wealth. Where does this come from? Some particular sutra?

Astus wrote:

It seems to be a later formation in Chinese Buddhism. I found a mention of three desires (三欲) - sleep, sex, food and drink - in Zhizhou's (678-733) http://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/X34n0636_p0037a16 that adds fame separately. But as five desires (五欲), it is listed in Yiru's (1352-1425)

http://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/P182n1615_p0151b06, saying that it originates from the Huayan tradition.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 22nd, 2018 at 2:50 AM

Title: Re: the six consciousnesses (vijñanas)

Content:

Grigoris said:

Not exactly. Light has to be present for eye sensation to happen. So it is not 100% correct to say that the eyes sees objects not light, because that would mean the eye could see them in the absence of light too.

Astus wrote:

It is in the context of the 18 dhatus that it can be said that light is not the object of seeing. As for other models, that is another story.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 25th, 2018 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: The Mahaparinirvana Sutra

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I have made this comment on the slide I have prepared for this sutra

Astus wrote:

The Nirvana Sutra is not controversial in Mahayana, and the ideas of permanence, bliss, self, and purity as characteristics of buddha-nature appear elsewhere too (e.g.

Srimaladevi Sutra, ch 12; <http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra52a.html>, ch 3), but more importantly the tathagatagarbha doctrine became the mainstream view.

Wayfarer said:

However the Buddhist conception can be differentiated because the 'true self' is, in fact, empty of self!

Astus wrote:

The buddha-nature teaching does not negate the doctrine of emptiness and no-self. What it adds is that the buddha-qualities are not developed through the bodhisattva path but it's what all beings are like when they have no more attachment. So, for instance, when one has relinquished anger, there is love automatically.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 26th, 2018 at 6:13 PM

Title: Re: Bhavanga citta & ālayavijñāna

Content:

mechashivaz said:

Are these two thought to be identical, and likewise, identical to tathāgatagarbha ?

Astus wrote:

Alayavijnana is like bhavangacitta (a concept found mainly in Theravada commentaries, not the canon), both function as a basis for the continuation of a being and carries karma. Saying that the tathagatagarbha is within/identical to alayavijnana is another development in Mahayana not taught by Asanga, Vasubandhu, or Xuanzang.

mechashivaz said:

What's the text of Asanga discussing this and is it available?

Astus wrote:

Chapter 1 of Mahayanasamgraha. However, Asanga most probably had no knowledge of the Theravada doctrine (if the concept of bhavangacitta had existed at that time at all), and even states that sravakas are not familiar with this idea.

mechashivaz said:

If they're thought to be identical to tathāgatagarbha how would karmic seeds carry to rebirth or is it that the karmic seeds its self contains tathāgatagarbha? Any clarifications are most welcome!

Astus wrote:

http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Translations/Awakening_of_faith.html explains in detail.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 29th, 2018 at 9:26 PM

Title: Re: "Alone, seated atop the Great Mountain"

Content:

shanehanner said:

Does anyone know the source of this quote? I'm pretty sure that's the quote, or it's something very similar.

Astus wrote:

A monk asked Baizhang, "What is extraordinary?" Baizhang said, "Sitting alone on the mountain." The monk bowed; Baizhang then hit him.

(Blue Cliff Record, case 26, BDK ed, p 148)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 1st, 2018 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: Mind consciousness, ignorance, and nature

Content:

LastLegend said:

How does Zen understand these things?

Astus wrote:

Since Zen lacks a doctrinal system, it cannot be said it has any specific interpretation. Individual teachers may have.

LastLegend said:

I've heard mind consciousness has to die once in order to pass through the gate of samsara.

Astus wrote:

It refers to the cessation of manas, the relinquishing of attachment to self. The term "great death" seems to have been used first by Yuanwu Keqin, and it might originate from a Zhaozhou story included in the Blue Cliff Record (case 41), where he comments:

"A man who has died the great death has no Buddhist doctrines and theories, no mysteries and marvels, no gain and loss, no right and wrong, no long and short. When he gets here, he just lets it rest this way. An Ancient said of this, "On the level ground the dead are countless; only one who can pass through the forest of thorns is a good hand." Yet one must pass beyond that Other Side too to begin to attain. Even so, for present day people even to get to this realm is already difficult to achieve."

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 1st, 2018 at 6:29 AM

Title: Re: Mind consciousness, ignorance, and nature

Content:

LastLegend said:

What's your take on that?

Astus wrote:

It is standard Mahayana (non-abiding nirvana) glazed with dramatic metaphors. Don't grasp things, don't grasp the absence of things, don't make a concept of not grasping anything - thus you have the three gates, or three deaths. In the end, the story is always the same since the four noble truths, craving and clinging perpetuates samsara.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 1st, 2018 at 4:34 PM

Title: Re: Mind consciousness, ignorance, and nature

Content:

LastLegend said:

What mind that knows not to grasp? What that mind looks like when it doesn't grasp?

Astus wrote:

A mind that has learnt the Dharma knows that grasping ends in suffering. The mind does not have any look in the first place, regardless of the presence or absence of grasping.

Even now there are things and beings one is attached to, and towards everything and everyone else there is no attachment (see:

<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn42/sn42.011.than.html>). One should not look for some special state of mind, rather address the cause of pain itself: ignorance. The way emphasised in various Zen texts is to stop grasping at concepts immediately, because it is based on ideas that attachment arises, and the path that ends clinging to thoughts is simply recognising them as unsubstantiated, unreliable, ungraspable.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 2nd, 2018 at 2:15 AM

Title: Re: Mind consciousness, ignorance, and nature

Content:

LastLegend said:

Ok through eyes, mind that sees?

Astus wrote:

Better not assume mind to be an actual agent. Rather follow the classic teaching: as a result of contact between the eye and visible object visual consciousness arises.

LastLegend said:

I don't think that is Zen. Stop grasping or grasping is still grasping to one end. Still discriminating mind.

Astus wrote:

You can continue that indefinitely, like not discriminating and discriminating is still grasping, etc.

"The essence of the Way is detachment. And the goal of those who practice is freedom from appearances."

(Bodhidharma, in Wake-up Sermon, tr Red Pine, p 47)

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, December 2nd, 2018 at 3:17 AM
Title: Re: Mind consciousness, ignorance, and nature
Content:
LastLegend said:
Okay. What is making this statement if not discriminating mind?

Astus wrote:
Discrimination is quite essential on the path. After all, it is only wisdom that can ultimately defeat ignorance.

"The childish are attached to forms;
The moderate attains detachment;
By knowing the nature of forms,
Those of supreme intellect are free."
(Nagarjuna: Yuktisastika, v 55, tr Thupten Jinpa)

"To use wisdom to contemplate all the dharmas without grasping or rejecting is to see the nature and accomplish the enlightenment of buddhahood."
(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 31)

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, December 2nd, 2018 at 5:23 AM
Title: Re: Mind consciousness, ignorance, and nature
Content:
LastLegend said:
Ok the discriminating consciousness is not clean, so it cannot be fully called wisdom as long as there is one end created by discriminating consciousness to lean on. It's actually ignorance or attachment of self.

Astus wrote:
Discrimination is part of the path, it is what takes one to the result. Exactly because one is not yet free from grasping one has to use correct discrimination.

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, December 2nd, 2018 at 6:10 AM
Title: Re: Does Consciousness Continue After Cessation?
Content:
Malcolm said:
The Śrī Mālādevi Sūtra points out that arhats and pratyekabuddhas, as well as bodhisattvas, have not in fact abandoned all afflictions.

Astus wrote:

That is the former case, where arhats are not free from clinging to the aggregates, so not really arhats.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 2nd, 2018 at 6:12 AM

Title: Re: Mind consciousness, ignorance, and nature

Content:

LastLegend said:

Sure, but it's the very thing that needs to be dissolved at the end. In its 'pure' state by itself is easy mistaken for realizing Buddha nature. This is often the case for practitioners.

Astus wrote:

If there is correct discrimination, there is no mistake, and necessarily eliminates even the clinging to discrimination.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 2nd, 2018 at 6:43 AM

Title: Re: Mind consciousness, ignorance, and nature

Content:

LastLegend said:

Yes, if that falls under wisdom. No, by discrimination, there is attachment which there is self.

Astus wrote:

If wisdom is already without attachment, then it cannot lead to freedom from attachment, only discrimination can. But if you deny that discrimination can lead to freedom, since we are left without any means, it is literally impossible to attain liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 2nd, 2018 at 7:45 AM

Title: Re: Mind consciousness, ignorance, and nature

Content:

LastLegend said:

Wisdom cannot be a thought (with intention) created by discriminating consciousness.

Astus wrote:

Where does wisdom come from?

LastLegend said:

I was told that consciousness changes constantly and because of that there is an open gap to enter great samadhi that's through meditation practice.

Astus wrote:

A gap between two moments of consciousness? In that case that gap is unconsciousness, hence no mental activity can happen.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 2nd, 2018 at 5:06 PM

Title: Re: Does Consciousness Continue After Cessation?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Not according to definition of "arhat" in the lower schools. But, they are still arhats from the POV of the Mahayana.

Astus wrote:

So the arhat of ekayana is not the arhat of triyana (that includes Mahayana as well), and since no ekayanist has a sravaka motivation, their arhat idea has never actually been aspired to by anyone, thus nobody to convince or argue with on the superiority of bodhisattvayana. In other words, the ekayana arhat is a straw man.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 2nd, 2018 at 5:21 PM

Title: Re: Mind consciousness, ignorance, and nature

Content:

LastLegend said:

At the state of 'pure' discriminating consciousness, you can stand witness to your unborn nature and that is non-discriminating knowing nature.

Astus wrote:

Discrimination is the ability to tell the difference between things, it is perception, recognition. Or there has to be a difference between discrimination and perception, where discrimination is perception distorted by false preconceptions, like the idea of self. If discrimination is defined that way, then for correct perception to happen one must eliminate the mistaken ideas, hence the need for study (sruta), reflection (cinta), and cultivation (bhavana) that establishes correct concepts and involves investigating appearances (dharmavicaya), in other words: insight (vipasyana).

LastLegend said:

Witnessing is not the same as realizing because of the very recognition and distinguishing that nature itself is a product of discriminating consciousness. But at that mixed state (of recognizing nature and still being fabricated by discriminating consciousness), if you are able to sustain without arising discriminating intention or mental creation, that is wisdom.

Astus wrote:

Here it seems no difference between discrimination and perception is made, but still seems that for some reason discrimination/perception eventually has to go away. But if that were to happen, consciousness could not actually function in any meaningful way. That likely means taking a blank mind as the ultimate.

LastLegend said:

I was told that the practice is consciousness knowing itself until it dissolves which means there is no subject and object remaining. The moment of great death.

Astus wrote:

The elimination of subject and object in Yogacara is the result of arriving at the correct view of consciousness only through conceptual effort. What does "consciousness knowing itself" mean in your interpretation? How one knows one's mind, with what method?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 4th, 2018 at 2:46 AM

Title: Re: Mind consciousness, ignorance, and nature

Content:

LastLegend said:

Discriminating consciousness has established itself as the mechanism that drives us. ... Consciousness within that mixed state still arises in form of discriminating intention. The perception or thinking cannot be discriminating intention.

Astus wrote:

Is discrimination then intention? Or is there intention and separately discriminating intention? If the latter, what is the discriminating part, what is its role? If the former, intention is a basic mental function, just like perception, so there can be no mind without it.

LastLegend said:

That meditation the very consciousness is taken as the object but it is the subject. The accurate way is it knows itself.

Astus wrote:

Consciousness is momentary. If a single moment of awareness is aware of itself, how is it not two minds? Or the mind knowing itself is a more complex matter, like thinking about how mind functions.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 4th, 2018 at 2:59 AM

Title: Re: Does Consciousness Continue After Cessation?

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, since the Lankavatara points out that arhats are roused from an equipoise of cessation and then set on the bodhisattva path, their motivation now redirected towards full buddhahood.

Astus wrote:

What I mean by a straw man arhat is that per definition an arhat is one no longer attached to the aggregates. If that meaning is changed, then it is not the same idea. The ekayana description rather fits a non-returner who resides in the pure abodes.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 4th, 2018 at 6:26 AM

Title: Re: Does Consciousness Continue After Cessation?

Content:

Malcolm said:

the Mahāyāna definition supersedes the Hinayāna definition since it is a higher tenet system.

Astus wrote:

But this is not a Mahayana-Hinayana difference, but an ekayana-triyanā one. Furthermore, ekayana doctrines also affirm that arhats realise that the aggregates are not self, therefore such a person is necessarily free from attachment to the body, the feelings, the concepts, and any state of mind, unless the pudgala-nairātmya for śrāvakas is a mere intellectual belief. But if it is genuine realisation, there can be no appearance or state that binds them, so there is no reason to be stuck in any equipoise either.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 4th, 2018 at 6:22 PM

Title: Re: Mind consciousness, ignorance, and nature

Content:

LastLegend said:

I was told that discrimination and intention are two but as soon as there is discrimination intention immediately arises.

Astus wrote:

What is discrimination then?

LastLegend said:

The gist is habits created by consciousness and sustained over many lifetimes lumped together as self, ignorance, etc.

Astus wrote:

Habits are not discrimination either. So, what is the role, function, act of discrimination?

LastLegend said:

I was told that we cannot fully understand until we pass the fence, so it's really beyond my understanding but you can recognize that discrimination immediately followed by intention in your mind.

Astus wrote:

If it cannot be known what discrimination is, how can anyone get over it? That's like going to an unknown place where one can never arrive, simply because it cannot be told when one is there.

LastLegend said:

Practice is utilizing discriminating consciousness but it helps to reduce habits towards samadhi and great samadhi.

Astus wrote:

If one does not know what discrimination is, how can it ever be utilised?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 4th, 2018 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: Mind consciousness, ignorance, and nature

Content:

LastLegend said:

It's what you are using right now at your mind.

Astus wrote:

To read and write a lot of mental functions are used. Which one is discrimination?

LastLegend said:

The role and function of discriminating consciousness is to perpetuate old habits and create new ones when it deludes you.

Astus wrote:

In that case telling the difference between things - i.e. discriminating - is not discrimination, since that does not necessarily involve habituation, while mindlessly repeating things counts as an act of discriminating consciousness.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 4th, 2018 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: Mind consciousness, ignorance, and nature

Content:

LastLegend said:

If you don't discriminate, how do you know what to write?

Astus wrote:

If it is not defined what discrimination is, how could its appearance be identified? I'm asking you, because it seems I have a different view about discrimination than you do, so it'd be better if you could specify what you mean by it.

LastLegend said:

If you are able to clearly discern all mental events, then that's wisdom. But you cannot do that 24/7 and do it without errors because old habits kick in, so discriminating consciousness deludes, opposite of clearly knowing.

Astus wrote:

As I take it, discernment is discrimination, so if we use my interpretation, discriminating consciousness can also be a source of clarity, because what matters is not the act of discrimination, but the concepts one applies when discriminating.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 5th, 2018 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: thoughts vs. emotions

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

For the Mahamudra/Semde instructions which involve looking at the color, shape, coming and going etc. of thoughts, does one practice with what we term "emotions" in the same way?

Astus wrote:

It could be said that when it comes to analysing appearances on the mental side, also called the moving mind, then generating strong emotions is the recommended way at the beginning.

Johnny Dangerous said:

There is no distinction made here between emotion and thought is there?

Astus wrote:

Only to the extent of their obvious nature, of how strong they appear. That's why first using anger and lust is easier.

Johnny Dangerous said:

So actually, I would ask for the same reason whether in this particular instruction, sense data can also count as "thoughts".

Astus wrote:

Check out the 9th Karmapa's instructions on meditating on appearances. Step one: appearances are mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 6th, 2018 at 2:48 AM

Title: Re: thoughts vs. emotions

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

seems like establishing that all appearances are mind is the standard direction

Astus wrote:

Yes, that it is. It should also be kept in mind that emotions fall under the category of samskara within the five aggregates, and under the mental concomitants (caitasika) within the abhidharma systems, often as primary and secondary afflictions (klesa & upaklesa). As for the basic feelings (vedana) of pleasant, painful, and neutral, they too exist as mental phenomena. But all that is basic Buddhism, not particularly Mahamudra, however, it serves as the fundamental perspective on what is what. I recommend this teaching on <http://www.purifymind.com/ObstaclesPath.htm> that gives a practical perspective.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 7th, 2018 at 3:55 AM

Title: Re: Mahabheriharakapariivarta sutra

Content:

White Lotus said:

Does anyone here know where i can get an English translation of the Great Drum Sutra.

Astus wrote:

<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra19.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 14th, 2018 at 6:25 PM

Title: Re: Question about Nagarjuna's Heart of Dependent Origination

Content:

Seeker12 said:

What is being referred to as extremely subtle entities that may be regarded with nihilism, lacking precise and thorough knowledge?

Astus wrote:

Entities is a general term here (vastu / 事), so it can be taken to refer to the aggregates, to name and form, to the basic constituents of a being. The first half of the sixth stanza is the continuation of the second half of the fifth discussing causal relation between lives, where there is nothing transferred nor anything annihilated.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 15th, 2018 at 5:04 PM

Title: Re: Question about Nagarjuna's Heart of Dependent Origination

Content:

Coëmgenu said:

Does the Chinese text have Ven Nāgārjuna, in the terminology of the translation, relate 事 to 理?

Astus wrote:

No. That is most likely a Chinese innovation.

Coëmgenu said:

Do you know where the text is in the Taishō Canon?

Astus wrote:

http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T32n1651_001

http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T32n1654_001

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 24th, 2018 at 3:26 AM

Title: Re: Does Zen Buddhism need Four Noble Truths? If so, why?

Content:

Viach said:

Does Zen Buddhism need Four Noble Truths? If so, why?

Astus wrote:

If you mean whether Zen can be taught without mentioning the term "four noble truths", then yes, it can be. If you mean whether Zen teaches something independent from the meaning of the four noble truths, then no.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 30th, 2018 at 4:55 PM

Title: Re: Beginner in Mahamudra

Content:

Zolbec said:

What is the most complete and best introduction for beginners in Mahamudra?

Astus wrote:

Essentials of Mahamudra by Khenchen Thrangu Rinpoche should be the one that is quite thorough but at the same time not too complicated.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 7th, 2019 at 4:12 PM

Title: Re: How does the Buddha eat?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Putting food on the altar is a practice of giving and reverence, thus one feeds the inner buddha. You can find nice stories in the Dazhidulun of Nagarjuna (in Dharmamitra's translation: Nagarjuna on the Six Perfections & Marvelous Stories from the Perfection of Wisdom).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 10th, 2019 at 4:05 PM

Title: Re: Does Mahayana lose its entire validity...

Content:

Thomas Amundsen said:

What about two-fold emptiness? I thought this is asserted as being absent from Hinayana and Pratyekabuddhayana.

Astus wrote:

The emptiness of dharmas is an interesting one, as the concept of "dharma" (in the sense of the ultimate constituents of the world) is not found even in the Abhidhamma (Pali canon), but only the commentaries. At the same time, the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Patisambhidamagga> (1.1.47; 2.20) is clear on the matter that the six senses and their objects are empty.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 10th, 2019 at 6:17 PM

Title: Re: Does Mahayana lose its entire validity...

Content:

PeterC said:

As Shantideva said:

Astus wrote:

What they (pre-modern Mahayana apologetics) do not and cannot address is the historical argument. Apparently the academic view is not contested regarding Mahayana scriptures being later works, consequently it is currently not debated that the Nikayas and Agamas represent the oldest strata of scriptures and everything else is later, i.e. nothing else could be connected directly to Siddhartha Gautama himself.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 10th, 2019 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: Does Mahayana lose its entire validity...

Content:

PeterC said:

we don't rely on placing words in the mouth of a putative historical Buddha

Astus wrote:

That is how a sutra is defined, that it was spoken by the Buddha. If there is no need for that, then what is the differentiating factor between Buddhavacana and other teachings?

PeterC said:

Being dated as the oldest texts doesn't make it certain that they corresponded to anything the historical Buddha said or did

Astus wrote:

Since the scriptures form the basis for all teachings, and of all the scriptures the Agamas are the primary, it still makes all other works later. Saying that even the Agamas cannot be confirmed as the Buddha's teachings does not change that all the texts following it depend on the Agamas - therefore they are like later commentaries and reflections, or you could say improvements.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 10th, 2019 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Does Mahayana lose its entire validity...

Content:

PeterC said:

Interdependent origination, emptiness, tathagatagarbha...not history.

Astus wrote:

Are those not Buddhist teachings exactly because they are attributed to the Buddha in the scriptures?

PeterC said:

You're reducing this all to chronology, and ultimately that's a very limiting view of the Dharma.

Astus wrote:

It is a historical issue whether Mahayana was taught by Shakyamuni or not. If the Dharma is separated from the source and viewed as an idea on its own, that is a different matter then, and in that case one has to argue based on logic (e.g. prove that tathagatagarbha is true).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 11th, 2019 at 3:34 PM

Title: Re: Does Mahayana lose its entire validity...

Content:

Malcolm said:

That very much depends on what one means by "history." All the history books available to me in Tibetan, for example, assert very strongly Mahāyāna was taught by the Buddha. The only history books that dispute this claim are by western academics, who have no real practical interest in Buddhadharma anyway. For them, it is an intellectual game.

Astus wrote:

Presenting past events with an ideological bias is certainly a more common approach, especially when it comes to nationalism and religion. One of the main goals of history as an academic discipline (similarly to other scientific studies) is to eliminate such distortions as much as possible. So far it seems that there is no person or group trying to defend traditional views. Or do you know Tibetans (or others) who attempt to refute the academic history of Buddhism?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 11th, 2019 at 3:38 PM

Title: Re: Does Mahayana lose its entire validity...

Content:

Wayfarer said:

The religious imagination of the Mahāyāna is of a completely different order to the earlier schools. Such ideas as the three bodies of the Buddha, the Infinite nature of the Cosmos, and other cardinal points of the Mahāyāna, are not stated explicitly in the earlier texts.

Astus wrote:

Most of such "Mahayana ideas" are present in non-Mahayana sources, like Dharmaguptaka, Mahasamghika, and Sarvastivadin teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 11th, 2019 at 3:42 PM

Title: Re: Does Mahayana lose its entire validity...

Content:

PeterC said:

The existence of a living practice tradition is infinitely more valuable than a speculative historiography.

Astus wrote:

When being a tradition is an important element of a teaching's validity, then it is an interpretation of history that becomes a validating element, thus historical research may invalidate such a teaching.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 11th, 2019 at 5:34 PM

Title: Re: Does Mahayana lose its entire validity...

Content:

PeterC said:

If you're reading a teaching given by, say, a Arya Bodhisattva to an entourage of non-human recipients, then there's a limit to what historical research can actually tell you.

Astus wrote:

One can start with checking the paper, the ink, the type of script, the language used, etc.

PeterC said:

I don't think it gets to assert precedence over the way history had been done in other periods on the basis of such a short track record.

Astus wrote:

That sounds like saying that truth depends on the ancestry of a field of study and not the methodology and other tools used.

PeterC said:

nor does it attempt to answer questions they particularly care about

Astus wrote:

If a teaching is valid because of the lineage and tradition, that is a historical view. If a teaching is valid because of other reasons, then past events do not matter.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 11th, 2019 at 6:34 PM

Title: Re: Does Mahayana lose its entire validity...

Content:

PeterC said:

I'm used to reading lineages that start with, say, Samantabhadra, and go through several non-human teachers. How am I to validate those through historical research?

Astus wrote:

Why should you? On the other hand, I assume when it comes to lineages of Lu Sheng-yen and such, then critical thinking and research is quite appropriate, wouldn't you agree?

PeterC said:

I am just cognizant of their many limitations.

Astus wrote:

Isn't that what proper scholarship requires?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 11th, 2019 at 7:03 PM

Title: Re: Does Mahayana lose its entire validity...

Content:

Wayfarer said:

so many layers of meaning in the apparently simple teachings of 'the first turning' which could then be interpreted and give rise to whole schools.

Astus wrote:

Between the Agamas/Nikayas and Mahayana there was a lot happening, particularly the so called https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Early_Buddhist_schools, like the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Lokottarav%C4%81da>. If viewed in that chronology, there is a quite organic continuity where distinguishing Hinayana from Mahayana is not that straightforward.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 11th, 2019 at 7:57 PM

Title: Re: Does Mahayana lose its entire validity...

Content:

PeterC said:

History is really an exercise in telling stories that make events of the past more readily comprehensible to people in the present. It's a branch of literature. I'm always going to be interested in research on the sources of Dharma texts. However I can't see a situation in which that research is going to change anything about how one practices.

Astus wrote:

Are people influenced by the various stories of the Buddha, his disciples, and later masters? If yes, then history matters. As for the influence of historical research on practice, it's often found in reform and revivalist movements. Some possible examples:

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/H%C5%8Dnen>, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Menzan_Zuih%C5%8D, <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Taixu>

& https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Yin_Shun,

<http://eng.cheontae.org/info/loader.php?hcode=jongjo/joongchangjo>, the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Agon_Shun, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Th%C3%ADch_Thanh_T%E1%BB%AB.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 11th, 2019 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: Does Mahayana lose its entire validity...

Content:

Malcolm said:

The question is whether history matters, rather whose history matters. And, Peter points out, history is not science.

Astus wrote:

It may not be a science, but there are still ways to evaluate various historical evidences. So it shouldn't be a matter of individual preference, or history should not be viewed any different from fiction.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 11th, 2019 at 9:58 PM

Title: Re: Does Mahayana lose its entire validity...

Content:

PeterC said:

These are people using the materials of the past to construct something new. It's not the same thing.

Astus wrote:

What would be the same thing?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 14th, 2019 at 7:49 PM

Title: Re: Does Mahayana lose its entire validity...

Content:

PeterC said:

The criteria for it being the Buddhadharma is consistency, not historicity.

Astus wrote:

Consistency with what?

Doctrinal consistency would require to have a basis, a consensus on what are definitely the teachings of the Buddha, then to that other teachings can be compared. For instance, there is what is called the four great references (cattaro mahapadesa), as found in AN 4.180 and DN 16, where it is stated: "If they're not included in the discourses and found in the texts on monastic training, you should draw the conclusion: 'Clearly this is not the word of the Blessed One, the perfected one, the fully awakened Buddha. It has been incorrectly memorized by that mendicant.' And so you should reject it."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 15th, 2019 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Interesting excerpt from the (Hindu) Mahanirvana Tantra

Content:

Grigoris said:

it differs only very slightly from Buddhist Tantra.

Astus wrote:

The quoted section is fairly standard Vedanta philosophy. Do you have any Buddhist tantra in mind that sounds very similar?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 17th, 2019 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: Interesting excerpt from the (Hindu) Mahanirvana Tantra

Content:

Grigoris said:

Maybe WE are the one's that are making the mistake in assigning concrete characteristics, when the text is actually allegorical/metaphorical?

Astus wrote:

Vedanta is quite clear on the matter, and there Brahman/Atman is the (only) absolutely real entity. If for some reason Tantra contradicts the Vedantin understanding of Atman, it is not stated anywhere in the quoted section.

Grigoris said:

But if the Hindu Tantric path is so mistaken then how is it that there are 4 Nath Siddhas (5 if you include the kapala siddha Kapalaka) included in the list of 84 Mahasiddhas?

Astus wrote:

Stories and doctrines do not necessarily match.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 23rd, 2019 at 5:38 PM

Title: Re: Ālayavijñāna, the storehouse consciousness, and the process of rebirth

Content:

Red Spinifex said:

The Ālayavijñāna, the storehouse consciousness, that induces rebirth and the manifestation of one's existence after rebirth, while the Ālayavijñāna itself is not the entity that is reborn. Is this a correct description or interpretation of the process?

Astus wrote:

There is only one consciousness with 8 functions that are called the eight consciousnesses. The function of the storehouse is similar to the common concept of memory, a storage for latent mental phenomena. The latent cannot be separated from the manifest part, so it is not correct to say that somehow the 8th consciousness is not born with the others. In fact, it's the 8th (and the 7th) that ensures the continuation throughout the realms.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 23rd, 2019 at 7:14 PM

Title: Re: Ālayavijñāna, the storehouse consciousness, and the process of rebirth

Content:

Wayfarer said:

So even though it is born with others, it must exist in the intermediate state so as to ensure continuation, musn't it?

Astus wrote:

Beings may exist in the intermediate state, and beings have consciousness. There is no consciousness separate from beings. When a being is born, the consciousness is there too.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 24th, 2019 at 3:48 PM

Title: Re: Ālayavijñāna, the storehouse consciousness, and the process of rebirth

Content:

Wayfarer said:

is plainly profoundly different to what we understand as existence, as it's not physical.

Astus wrote:

The majority of realms in Buddhism are not physical in the same sense, and there are also the formless states of existence. One still has a sort of fine material body in the intermediate state.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 26th, 2019 at 9:49 PM

Title: Re: Sutras on Sexual Misconduct

Content:

Miroku said:

what sutras are talking about sexual misconduct in general

Astus wrote:

Sutras where precepts are mentioned discuss it in general, but they don't go beyond what you find in the early scriptures. It's summed up in the Upasaka Precepts Sutra:

"If one has sex at an inappropriate time or place, with someone who is a virgin, not one's wife, or not a woman, one is guilty of the sin of sexual misconduct."

(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra33f.html>, tr Rulu;

http://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T24n1488_p1069a04)

Another way to put it, as in the Avatamsaka Sutra:

"This Bodhisattva is satisfied with his own wife and never pursues the wife of another. He does not even lust for his wife or concubines, or for women under his protection, betrothed to his relatives, or protected by the law, much less actually have sex [with them], much less in a perverted way."

(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra36b.html>, tr Rulu, http://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T10n0279_p0185a29)

The last two words, however, are interesting, as the "perverted way" (非道, i.e. amārga) is what is defined as non-vaginal intercourse by the various treatises. However, Theravada does not have that element of definition of sexual misconduct, as even the Atthasalini (vol 1, p 130, tr Tin) lists only the various forbidden women. The Abhidharmakosabhasyā includes it as "Intercourse with one's own wife through a forbidden way." (vol 2, p 652), but does not provide a definition for it, while Wangchuk Dorje (Jewels from the Treasury, p 348) does. The <https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225297.html> is quite clear on the matter, and it even gives a reason why other orifices should be avoided:

"If one has intercourse with one's own wife (kalatra) when she has taken a vow (samādānaśīla), is pregnant (garbhīṇī) or is nursing a child (pāyayanti) – or in a forbidden way (amārga) – that is the illicit practice of sexual activity."

(http://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T25n1509_p0156c08)

"By a forbidden manner (amārgasthāna) means anything that is not by way of the female organ (yoni). The mind of the woman loathes [such practices] and to force her to such improprieties merits the name of illicit sexual practice."

(http://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T25n1509_p0156c17)

The Siksasamuccaya (ch 4) lists non-vaginal sex (tr Bendall-Rouse (p 80): "So too of the man who uses his wife against kind."; " <http://www.dsbcproject.org/canon-text/content/269/112> "; http://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T32n1636_p0091a02) along with bestiality and rape as causes of falling into the deepest cold hell.

Miroku said:
maybe mentioning homosexuality/homosexual behaviour

Astus wrote:
There is a Pudgalavadin/Sammittiya abhidharmic work ("Tridharmaka Sastra" http://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T25n1506_p0022a18) where the "perverted way" (非道) - counted as the third form of sexual misconduct, the other two being those protected by secular and religious laws - includes intercourse with "lewd men" (婬男) and "incomplete men" (不成男), the latter being a likely reference to pandakas; however, apart from those two, the first perversion is not about the wrong orifice but sex with women who have recently given birth and unwed women.

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, January 27th, 2019 at 5:02 PM
Title: Re: Madhyamaka school practices
Content:
Javierfv1212 said:
practice just like classical Indian Madhyamikas practiced?

Astus wrote:
For the early ones look into the Mahaprajnaparamitopadesa (tr <https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra>), other treatises from the era (see <http://kalavinka.org/>), scriptures like the Pratyutpanna Samādhi Sutra, Śūraṅgama Samādhi Sutra, Sutra on the Concentration of Sitting Meditation, etc. (available from <https://www.bdkamerica.org/bdk-tripitaka-digital-downloads>). You should also familiarise with Sarvastivada methods (e.g. http://www.ahandfulofleaves.org/documents/Methods%20of%20spiritual%20praxis%20in%20the%20Sarvastivada_Suen_2009.pdf) and the so called https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dhy%C4%81na_sutras, as Madhyamaka mostly followed those.

For the later times, when Sarvastivada was changed to Yogacara, you can go by Haribhadra, Santaraksita, and especially Kamalasila and his Bhavanakrama. Might also add here most of what you can learn from the Tibetan traditions (e.g. Atisa and the Kadampas).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 28th, 2019 at 4:27 PM

Title: Re: Sutras on Sexual Misconduct

Content:

Miroku said:

even sutra writings discourage from a same sex behaviour.

Astus wrote:

Some mention it, but most of them do not. In any case, it is advisable to look at the reason behind the various precepts. In case of sexual misconduct, there are those against harm (the classical set of protected individuals), those against disrespecting the Dharma, and those against excessive behaviour. Sex with another man (note: texts assume male readership) is the third kind.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 28th, 2019 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Sutras on Sexual Misconduct

Content:

Miroku said:

Would you please elaborate on the third reason?

Astus wrote:

Excessive behaviour as overindulgence in lustful activities, at least that is a possible take on the matter, although it could as well be a mistaken interpretation, since prostitutes and concubines are accepted entertainment, and in that case what we see in the commentarial and Mahayana literature is a reflection of Indian social norms (compare that with the Japanese Buddhist take on male love - e.g. https://www.academia.edu/10034080/The_Red_Thread_Buddhist_Approaches_to_Sexuality by Bernard Faure).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 30th, 2019 at 5:21 PM

Title: Re: Madhyamaka school practices

Content:

Javierfv1212 said:

Am I missing any other classical sources?

Astus wrote:

The <https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra>, you shouldn't miss that. Ven. Dharmamitra also translated from that the discussion of the six paramitas as " http://kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/n6p_book_page.htm ", and there is the http://kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/mspw%20book%20page.htm as an educational extra.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 1st, 2019 at 6:15 PM

Title: Re: Sutras on Sexual Misconduct

Content:

pael said:

What if one's wife is a virgin?

Astus wrote:

It refers to girls under the protection of parents. When she becomes a wife, from then on she's under the protection of the husband.

pael said:

When women is considered as a wife?

Astus wrote:

Traditionally when the parents give the woman to the groom.

The same line is translated in a more succinct manner by Shih Heng-ching (BDK ed, p 173) as: "If at an improper time or place one has sexual contact with women other [than one's wife], one commits the offense of sexual misconduct."

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 3rd, 2019 at 4:42 PM

Title: Re: The Four Noble Truths are

Content:

Viach said:

Did Buddha practice Four Noble Truths or did he simply discover them as a result of his practice?

Astus wrote:

"And, monks, as long as this — my three-round, twelve-permutation knowledge & vision concerning these four noble truths as they have come to be — was not pure, I did not claim to have directly awakened to the right self-awakening unexcelled in the cosmos with its deities, Maras, & Brahmas, with its contemplatives & brahmans, its royalty & commonfolk. But as soon as this — my three-round, twelve-permutation knowledge & vision concerning these four noble truths as they have come to be — was truly pure, then I did claim to have directly awakened to the right self-awakening unexcelled in the cosmos with its deities, Maras & Brahmas, with its contemplatives & brahmans, its royalty & commonfolk. Knowledge & vision arose in me: 'Unprovoked is my release. This is the last birth. There is now no further becoming.'"

(<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn56/sn56.011.than.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 9th, 2019 at 6:32 PM

Title: Re: Piercing the empty sky

Content:

Astus wrote:

The meaning is summed up by Tony Duff (Gampopa Teaches Essence Mahamudra, p 59 n153) as: "You can hold up a spear or lance and whirl it around in the space above your head but nothing happens because the lance is being flourished within space. It is a metaphor for excellent practice in which the actual state of emptiness has been met."

A whole teaching using the simile: <https://www.lionsroar.com/the-eight-flashing-lances/>

"Because nothing is attained, the Bodhisattva, through reliance on prajna paramita, is unimpeded in his mind."

(<http://www.cttbusa.org/heartsutra/heartsutra.htm>)

"The bodies and minds of all sentient beings

Are altogether like an illusion.

The attribute of the body belongs to the four great elements;

The nature of the mind derives from the six types of sense objects.

Since in essence the four great elements are distinct from one another,

Who could constitute the one who holds them together?

If one gradually practices in this way,

Everything in its entirety will become pure,

Undisturbed, and pervade the dharmadhātu.

There will be no striving, going along with things, stopping, or extinguishing,

Nor will there be anyone who realizes it."

(Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment, ch 3, in Apocryphal Scriptures, BDK ed, p 69-70)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 12th, 2019 at 4:00 PM

Title: Re: How many times did the Buddha set forth 4BI in 46 years of preaching?

Content:

Sentient Light said:

The canon is very explicitly a selection. It is recorded that some teachings were not kept in the canon, and then different lineages began to curate and organize what they had in different ways. In all likelihood, the 4NT (despite what tradition claims) probably came later on, maybe in the middle of the Buddha's career rather than the beginning, and was developed as a mnemonic device to encapsulate the teachings.

Astus wrote:

What do you base those claims on?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 12th, 2019 at 11:44 PM

Title: Re: Zen and patriotism

Content:

Viach said:

Is Zen Buddhism compatible with patriotism: after all, in the Buddhism context, patriotism is only a kind of affection?

Astus wrote:

It depends on one's level of Buddhism. For ordinary people they are compatible, as long as one maintains the precepts. For those with bodhisattva motivation, it is something to be left behind for the sake of universal compassion and unbiased view.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 13th, 2019 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

LordByronX said:

It is a root, a base, ever present (unchanging) field within which (changing) content of consciousnesses can be perceived.

Although you could argue that this base awareness "arises" as co-dependent to its content (eye-consciousness, ear-consciousness, etc) and is therefore impermanent and changing, I respectfully see that as a conclusion based on a limited interpretation of observation of rising and falling phenomena of the mind (content of consciousness).

Astus wrote:

Consciousness is necessarily conscious of something. If there is nothing it is conscious of, it cannot still be called conscious, otherwise unconsciousness is consciousness. This is the same with all the other senses. Seeing is seeing something. If nothing is seen, that is not called seeing.

See: MN 38, SN 12.61, and MMK ch 3 & 9

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 13th, 2019 at 11:26 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Rick said:

Understanding_2 is nondualistic: Consciousness is like an always-present field in which apparent objects arise and fall.

Astus wrote:

That is a common, but illogical, belief in an independent subject, i.e. a self.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 13th, 2019 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Vasana said:

If you accept the 8 consciousness model and the alaya-vijnana then there will always be an underlying basis that is unborn and so it doesn't 'end' either. The unborn and unceasing continuity is experienced as either Jnana/ yeshe or vijnana / namshe .

Astus wrote:

Alayavijnana in Yogacara is very much momentary and empty.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 13th, 2019 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: Encountering Zen Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Hsing Yun: <http://hsingyun.org/books/core-teachings/>, and other

<http://www.fgsitc.org/booklets/>

Guo Ru: <ftp.budaedu.org/ebooks/pdf/EN375.pdf> (slow download)

Sheng Yen: <http://chancenter.org/en/publication/free-books>

Thich Thanh Tu:

<https://tienvnguyen.net/images/file/G5gYJdC51AgQAHUb/keystobuddhism.pdf>

http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/bbs/board.php?bo_table=3020

<https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/leaflet/index.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 13th, 2019 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Rick said:

What's the ill logic?

Astus wrote:

That there can be an independent consciousness.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 14th, 2019 at 3:08 AM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Rick said:

Doesn't the opening salvo of the MMK pretty much annihilate causality?

Astus wrote:

Chapter one discusses the reality of conditions, and, as one could expect, conditions are very much unreal and fabricated. But that's not an annihilation of conditions, or causality, but rather its clarification, where it is in dependent origination that there is no origination, and not that there is no origination at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 14th, 2019 at 4:09 PM

Title: Re: If all is mind then how is Zen not monistic?

Content:

Dgj said:

in Zen all is mind. The definition of "monism"

Astus wrote:

Should start with the definition of mind. See what Mazu said (Sun-Face Buddha, p 62):

"Those who seek the Dharma should not seek for anything.' Outside of mind there is no other Buddha, outside of Buddha there is no other mind. Not attaching to good and not rejecting evil, without reliance on either purity or defilement, one realizes that the nature of offence is empty: it cannot be found in each thought because it is without self-nature. Therefore, the three realms are mind-only and 'all phenomena in the universe are marked by a single Dharma.' Whenever we see form, it is just seeing the mind. The mind does not exist by itself; its existence is due to form. Whatever you are saying, it is just a phenomenon which is identical with the principle."

And Huangbo (Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 13):

"The Buddhas and all the sentient beings are only the One Mind—there are no other dharmas. Since beginningless time, this mind has never been generated and has never been extinguished, is neither blue nor yellow, is without shape and without characteristic, does not belong to being and nonbeing, does not consider new or old, is neither long nor short, and is neither large nor small. It transcends all limitations, names, traces, and correlations. It in itself—that's it! To activate thoughts is to go against it! It is like space, which is boundless and immeasurable."

The mind they talk of is the emptiness of the common consciousness of thoughts and feelings. All is mind means all is fabricated and empty.

"if you realize that the ten thousand dharmas never come into being, that mind is like a phantom, that not a speck of dust nor a single thing exists, that there is no place that is not clean and pure—this is Buddha."

(Record of Linji, tr Sasaki, p 12)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 14th, 2019 at 4:25 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Rick said:

Are you saying the MMK says that there IS arising/origination 'outside of' dependent origination?

Astus wrote:

It is in dependent origination there is no origination, but it does not negate dependent origination. Just as in birth there is no birth, that's why it's birth. In other words, that appearances are empty does not mean there are no appearances.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 14th, 2019 at 5:21 PM

Title: Re: If all is mind then how is Zen not monistic?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

That doesn't seem to put the case for why Zen is not monistic. Perhaps you might comment on that particular point?

Astus wrote:

If there is no singular entity upheld as the substrate of everything, then it cannot be monistic. So, not all is mind, because there is no mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 14th, 2019 at 6:48 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

LordByronX said:

Observational data equally supports one or the other.

Astus wrote:

An independent, permanent awareness cannot be observed or experienced in any way, because either it is always apparent or never, otherwise it is not permanent. Consequently the assumption that an unchanging awareness is observed is neither reasonable nor perceptual.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 14th, 2019 at 7:23 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

LordByronX said:

BUT dependent, impermanent awareness cannot be [directly] observed either. We can only observe impermanent phenomena that arises and fall and based on that make various premises

Astus wrote:

Awareness is an impermanent phenomenon that arises and falls, hence observable even by your definition.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 14th, 2019 at 8:57 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

LordByronX said:

These are not awareness itself.

Astus wrote:

There is no awareness itself, i.e. an independent awareness. An independent awareness could exist without being aware of anything, and that leads us to an unaware awareness.

LordByronX said:

1. How can you differentiate the two? What is awareness and what is an object of cognition?

Astus wrote:

The differentiation is nominal, because there is no awareness on its own, only consciousness of objects. There is awareness of acts of consciousness (the so called manovijnanadhatu), and that is how perception of mind is possible.

LordByronX said:

2. If awareness was permanent. How would your observation of arising and passing phenomena be different? How would you differentiate your observational experience from an experience where awareness would be (or is) impermanent?

Astus wrote:

A permanent awareness cannot have changing perceptions, otherwise it'd be a changing and impermanent awareness. So a permanent awareness is permanently aware of the same thing, and cannot be aware of change.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 14th, 2019 at 11:32 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Rick said:

The opening verse of the MMK doesn't refute arising, it refutes non-dependent/non-empty arising.

Right?

Astus wrote:

Yes, it refutes actual arising.

Liberation Bodhisattva asked the Buddha, "World-Honored One, when a sentient being perceives the birth of a dharma, what view should he discard? When he perceives the death of a dharma, what view should he discard?"

The Buddha answered, "Bodhisattva, when a sentient being perceives the birth of a dharma, you should have him discard the view of its nonexistence. When he perceives the death of a dharma, you should have him discard the view of its existence. If he discards these views, he will realize that dharmas are by nature absolutely empty and definitely have no birth."

(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra53a.html>, ch 2)

"A magician causes forms to appear,
Creating horses, elephants, chariots, and so on.
But though they appear they do not exist at all.
Know that all phenomena are like that.
In the dream of a young woman
She gives birth to a son and then sees him die.
She is happy when he's born and sad when he dies.
Know that all phenomena are like that.
In the night the reflection of the moon
Appears on clear, undisturbed water,
But it is empty of a moon and there is nothing to grasp.
Know that all phenomena are like that."

(<http://read.84000.co/translation/toh127.html>, 9.24-26)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 15th, 2019 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: If all is mind then how is Zen not monistic?

Content:

The Buddha said:

There is, monks, an unborn — unbecome — unmade — unfabricated.

Wayfarer said:

<https://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/kn/ud/ud.8.03.than.html>

Astus wrote:

Of course there is. In Theravada there is only one such dharma (nirvana), while in Yogacara there are up to eight asamskṛta dharmas. And how did the Buddha define it? Check out the <https://suttacentral.net/sn43>. It gives a straightforward definition (e.g. SN 43.1, tr Bodhi):

"And what, bhikkhus, is the unconditioned? The destruction of lust, the destruction of hatred, the destruction of delusion: this is called the unconditioned."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 15th, 2019 at 5:17 AM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Rick said:

So there is <dependent> arising on the conventional level, but on the ultimate level there is no arising. Right?

Astus wrote:

Right. But it should not be forgotten that conventional and ultimate are not two different realms, the two truths are only used for the sake of explanation, while eventually one has to comprehend that the conventional is mistaking the conventional for the ultimate, and the ultimate is seeing the conventional as simply conventional.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 15th, 2019 at 6:32 PM

Title: Re: If all is mind then how is Zen not monistic?

Content:

Sherab said:

Is there a holder for the lust, the hate and delusion?

Astus wrote:

See the <https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.048.than.html> that talks in brief of the difference between the five aggregates and the five clinging aggregates. It is clinging to the aggregates that is removed with liberation, not the aggregates themselves. The <https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn35/sn35.191.than.html> also states clearly how it is clinging that brings about suffering, not the senses and their objects. So, if you want to name a holder of afflictions, that is the aggregates and elements, but calling them holders is quite misleading, since afflictions themselves are mental phenomena, so they operate in that context, but they are not the only mental phenomena.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 15th, 2019 at 9:26 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

LordByronX said:

An independent awareness could exist being aware of everything including itself.

Astus wrote:

There can be no interaction between a permanent entity and changing entities, because perception of change means change in the perceiver, which cannot happen to an independent thing.

LordByronX said:

In my view consciousness is something abiding, a permanent field.

Astus wrote:

Such a view is neither logical nor provable.

LordByronX said:

A permanent awareness could be a field within which changing perceptions appear - arise and fall. This would not affect the field in any way.

Astus wrote:

If the field is not affected, then the field is insentient, dead, unconscious, therefore it is not aware of anything. Awareness of change is change in perception, hence not permanent.

LordByronX said:

In many instances of Buddhist text what I read is similarly called "original or pure mind."

Astus wrote:

That refers to emptiness, that there is no permanent mind. The impure and false mind is the one that attaches to the idea of self, that is, the idea of a permanent perceiver and doer.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 15th, 2019 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: What was the reason behind the development of new vehicles?

Content:

bridif1 said:

What was the need behind the development of new vehicles and teachings?

Astus wrote:

Check <http://santifm.org/santipada/2010/sects-sectarianism/> by Bhikkhu Sujato.

bridif1 said:

Were those developments necessary for the achievement of the ending of suffering?

Astus wrote:

Yes and no. Yes, because people have this need. No, because it's mostly repeating the same in different form.

bridif1 said:

Were the teachings of the Buddha not good or complete enough?

Astus wrote:

"From the Mahāsāṃghika school

Will seven schools separate,
And from the Sthaviravāda eleven.
These are the twenty schools.
These eighteen and the original two
All derive from the Mahayana.
Neither correct nor incorrect,
I say that these will arise in the future."
(The Sutra of Mañjuśrī's Questions, ch 15, BDK ed, p 99)

bridif1 said:
Why was it necessary to give more "turnings" to the Wheel of Dharma?

Astus wrote:
Different ears need different words.

bridif1 said:
Was the Buddha wrong in some of its teachings?

Astus wrote:
The Buddha can never be wrong.

bridif1 said:
What do you think of the idea found in the Pali Canon that the Buddha made no distinction between esoteric and exoteric doctrines, and that he taught everything that was required to uproot suffering and its causes?

Astus wrote:
Calling a teaching esoteric is a technique. It's not about actually hiding something, but rather about calling attention to it.

Author: Astus
Date: Friday, February 15th, 2019 at 10:58 PM
Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?
Content:

Rick said:
Awareness_2 (non-dual) is, by definition, permanent (more accurately: not of time) and non-experienceable. The only 'hard' evidence is the word of the sages recorded in the scriptures.

Astus wrote:
Since it is not experienced by anyone, the "word of the sages" is meaningless. As the Buddha said in the <https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.095x.than.html>:

"Suppose there were a row of blind men, each holding on to the one in front of him: the first one doesn't see, the middle one doesn't see, the last one doesn't see. In the same way, the statement of the brahmans turns out to be a row of blind men, as it were: the first one doesn't see, the middle one doesn't see, the last one doesn't see. So what do you think, Bharadvaja: this being the case, doesn't the conviction of the brahmans turn out to be groundless?"

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 15th, 2019 at 11:38 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Rick said:

Does any Buddhist school entertain the possibility that a person could have an accurate intuition <not based on experience, or evidence, or logical reasoning> of what's really goin' on here?

Astus wrote:

Such a person is called a faith follower (saddhānusārī), see e.g.

<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn25/sn25.001.than.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 16th, 2019 at 6:59 AM

Title: Re: If all is mind then how is Zen not monistic?

Content:

Sherab said:

But are the five aggregates unborn, unmade etc?

Astus wrote:

The aggregates are impermanent.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 16th, 2019 at 4:36 PM

Title: Re: If all is mind then how is Zen not monistic?

Content:

Sherab said:

The question then is why the need to label the destruction of lust etc as unconditioned?

Astus wrote:

There is the category of conditioned, and so there is the category of unconditioned, or in other words, there is samsara and there is nirvana. It is the unique teaching of the Buddha that instead of pointing to God, Soul, Essence, etc. as the ultimate, he taught liberation from birth and suffering as the final elimination of afflictions. And he also shown the many versions of mistaking the various mental states and realms as the ultimate. Similarly to other terms, like karma and brahmana, the Buddha gave a new meaning to what a person should strive for.

Sherab said:

I would argue that it would be inaccurate to say that it is unconditioned since it can be argued that nirvana is dependent on the destruction of lust etc. One could even argue that the Buddha by teaching dependent origination and emptiness, was actually teaching that there is no dharma that is unconditioned. Yet the Buddha did talk about the unconditioned. It seemed so unnecessary.

Astus wrote:

There are conditioned states where one finds no lust, but those are temporary. The final destruction of afflictions is called the unconditioned because there is no coming back to samsaric states.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 16th, 2019 at 6:49 PM

Title: Re: What was the reason behind the development of new vehicles?

Content:

haha said:

Another point is the attainment of complete Buddhahood that was not addressed in Pali cannon.

Astus wrote:

The numerous special attributes of the Buddha was quickly set up, mostly after his parinirvana, as a way of elevating the Teacher above common people. But when we come to the matter of actually attaining buddhahood, the goal becomes synonymous with the ultimate doctrine, emptiness in Prajnaparamita and the nature of mind in later teachings. As it's summed up in Zen, the Buddha is mind, and the mind is Buddha. So practically buddhahood is not different from the goal given in the Nikayas: freedom from attachment to the aggregates and sensory areas.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 16th, 2019 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Highly recommended:

<https://beingwithoutself.files.wordpress.com/2011/07/theunconditioned.pdf> - a Dharma talk by Jeff Shore.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 16th, 2019 at 7:58 PM

Title: Re: What was the reason behind the development of new vehicles?

Content:

haha said:

Just understanding the selflessness of person does not bring the understanding selflessness of phenomena. Have Sravakas understood the selflessness of the phenomena? If not, then how could the goal be same? How do you address this issue?

Astus wrote:

That distinction between the emptiness of personality and appearances is merely about a doctrinal disagreement. Practically it's not possible to say that the aggregates have the attributes of self but there is no self. One is either attached to the body and mind or not. Nobody disputes that arhats do not cling to the aggregates. Since there is nothing left to grasp at, it cannot be said that there is any defilement left.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 17th, 2019 at 2:16 AM

Title: Re: Zen and patriotism

Content:

Matylda said:

non-attachment as people understand it now leads to pure negativism and finally to nihilistic views.

it is for sure not mahayana teaching. neither zen mahayana.

Astus wrote:

What do you base that on?

"The essence of the Way is detachment. And the goal of those who practice is freedom from appearances. The sutras say, Detachment is enlightenment because it negates appearances."

(Bodhidharma: <https://terebess.hu/zen/bodhidharma-eng.html#wakeup>)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 17th, 2019 at 4:37 PM

Title: Re: The Four Noble Truths are

Content:

Viach said:

" arose in me " So 4NT is the result of practice. Only the result could arise.

Astus wrote:

All four truths have "three rounds": view, practice, result. In that order are they to be fully realised.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 17th, 2019 at 5:02 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Sherab said:

From the Udana 8.1 alone, it is possible to conclude that there are two types of consciousness.

Astus wrote:

There are thousands of suttas where it is taught again and again that consciousness is impermanent, unsatisfactory, impersonal, and empty, while there are a few stanzas - not even proper explanations - suggesting a different type. From this it should be clear that one should not base one's interpretation on a handful of poetic lines, but rather on what was clearly and often taught by the Buddha. Apart from scripture, an unconditioned consciousness is also contradictory and illogical that no Buddhist tradition held up as real, because such a concept is nothing else but a self view.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 18th, 2019 at 5:25 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Astus wrote:

the conventional is mistaking the conventional for the ultimate, and the ultimate is seeing the conventional as simply conventional.

Rick said:

Is the ultimate in red the same as the ultimate in green?

Astus wrote:

They don't have the same meaning. When the conventional is mistaken for the ultimate, it means that one assumes that there is a substance, that behind concepts there are real entities, and that is how ordinary, i.e. conventional, view looks like. On the other hand, what is called the ultimate truth is seeing that there is no substance, that concepts are just mere concepts without any reality, so that's how conventional is just conventional.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 18th, 2019 at 5:34 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Sherab said:

Is there a dimension which is atemporal?

In Einstein's Relativity,

Astus wrote:

Unlike Einstein's Relativity, Buddhism operates within the framework of the five aggregates and eighteen elements. Is there anything atemporal in Buddhism? Yes there is: nirvana. Is nirvana a type of consciousness? No, it is not.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 18th, 2019 at 6:13 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

stevie said:

Does that meant that Nirvana is NOT gnosis or gnoseological knowledge?

Astus wrote:

Please define "gnosis or gnoseological knowledge".

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 18th, 2019 at 7:08 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Supramundane said:

can you please elaborate? does it say in any sutra that nirvana is atemporal?

it is unconditioned and not subject to dependent origination, but does this mean it is atemporal?

Astus wrote:

Nirvana is agreed by all to be unconditioned, and unconditioned means that it is without arising, duration, and cessation, or in other words: unborn and undying, something that some Mahayana sutras even call permanent. So it is atemporal because it is unconditioned. One common synonym of nirvana is amṛta, what literally means deathless, but is also a word for the nectar of gods that makes them immortal.

“Venerable sir, it is said, ‘the removal of lust, the removal of hatred, the removal of delusion.’ Of what now, venerable sir, is this the designation?”

“This, bhikkhu, is a designation for the element of Nibbāna: the removal of lust, the removal of hatred, the removal of delusion. The destruction of the taints is spoken of in that way.”

When this was said, that bhikkhu said to the Blessed One: “Venerable sir, it is said, ‘the Deathless, the Deathless.’ What now, venerable sir, is the Deathless? What is the path leading to the Deathless?”

“The destruction of lust, the destruction of hatred, the destruction of delusion: this is called the Deathless. This Noble Eightfold Path is the path leading to the Deathless; that is, right view ... right concentration.”

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn45.7/en/bodhi>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 18th, 2019 at 8:05 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

stevie said:

but the crucial point of my question is that both terms refer to a (meaning) content, let it be any content whatsoever, a content of let's say 'mind'.

Astus wrote:

Nirvana may be categorised as an object of consciousness, just as space can be a visual object.

"A vision in space is a being, so they declare.

A vision like that of space, so should you consider that object!

Thus has the vision of Dharma been expounded by the Tathagata.

But it is not possible to report on that vision by definite statements [that differ from it]."
(Ratnagunasamcayagatha, 12.257, tr Conze)

"If you say definitively that space exists, then space is not the Dharma body. If you say definitively that the Dharma body exists, then the Dharma body is not space. Simply refrain from creating an interpretation [of the existence] of space, and space will be the Dharma body. Refrain from creating an interpretation [of the existence] of the Dharma body, and the Dharma body will be space."

(Huangbo: Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 21)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 18th, 2019 at 8:09 PM

Title: Re: What was the reason behind the development of new vehicles?

Content:

haha said:

If there are still some limitations, then there should or must be some defilement.

Astus wrote:

Abilities and limitations are the products of actions, not defilements. That's why a bodhisattva has to accumulate merit over uncountable aeons.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 18th, 2019 at 8:52 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

stevie said:

So your negation of Nirvana being 'a type of consciousness' was not meant to be a categorical negation because it can be an object of consciousness. However consideration that consciousness is impermanent but Nirvana is atemporal may entail further conceptual issues because they should be categorical different which is in contradiction to how consciousness has been defined before.

Perhaps the term 'consciousness' is merely not appropriate in the context of Nirvana considering its use in conventional buddhist teachings?

Astus wrote:

Nirvana is the complete cessation of defilements. Is it possible to experience cessation, like when one no longer feels attracted to an object? In a way, yes, one can know that.

On the other hand, such cessation is not actually an object to be observed. That's why it's similar to observing space, as space is not really a visual object, but rather an absence.

"However completely one explores the entire space,
Seeing will completely cease, for space is infinite.
Similarly, one explores inner and outer reality,
But one will not find any essence – not even a subatomic particle!
The mind thus explored is inconceivable;
Hence seeing nothing is seeing it indeed."
(Shavaripa, quoted in Mahamudra: The Moonlight, p 193)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 18th, 2019 at 10:54 PM

Title: Re: What was the reason behind the development of new vehicles?

Content:

haha said:

That liberation does not mean omniscience. There is still obscuration to omniscience. One can say there are two root causes of avidya or dukkha: Klesa Avarana and Jneya Avarana. Due to the fear of Samsara, one seeks Nirvana. Could the result be the same without being free from two Avaranas?

Astus wrote:

Since it is accepted that arhats no longer cling to any of the aggregates, where could jneyavarana remain when one is free from both physical and mental appearances?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 18th, 2019 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: What was the reason behind the development of new vehicles?

Content:

haha said:

One cannot figure out where the affliction of "unconscious beings of form realm" remains.

Astus wrote:

That's not the same, as the effects of past actions can occur because one is still attached to the aggregates. But for those who have no clinging at all, it is not possible to establish any obstruction to take effect at any point.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 19th, 2019 at 4:38 AM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

LordByronX said:

Why would a permanent mind (Consciousness) and Emptiness be excluding each other?

I find these two deepest realizations of Buddhism and Vedanta quite compatible. In a certain paradoxical way maybe, but why would the "final ground" not be paradoxical in a way that it is both this and that.

Astus wrote:

A permanent mind means an unchanging observer apart from everything else, and that is not only unreasonable from a Buddhist doctrinal point of view, but also impractical from an experiential perspective.

From the logical side a permanent mind cannot interact with appearances, hence must be either completely unaware or stuck in a fixed state of being conscious always of the same thing.

From the practical side, one has to completely disassociate oneself from all impressions and focus solely on remaining the watcher, while in Buddhism one lets go of everything completely, even being the one who is aware, and simultaneously not excluding or avoiding any experience.

Dakpo Tashi Namgyal writes (Mahamudra: The Moonlight, p 195-196):

"some untutored [meditators], having experienced the sensation of the even state of tranquility – the meditation known as “mind watching the mind” – asserted that they had achieved insight into the mind. ...

The term “seeing the mind” is a simple designation for understanding the mind’s unreality, which is detached from the beginning from all modes of existence or nonexistence. The nature of mind is such that there is nothing – not even the infinitesimal end of a hair – that is a conceivable or perceptible object or observer. The intrinsic nature of mind is undefinable and unimaginable, yet it is timeless and immutable. The Prajnaparamita-samchayagatha explains it thus:

Sentient beings speak of having seen the sky,
But one should examine how one has seen the sky!
In the same manner the Tathāgata has shown
The way of seeing reality.

Saraha says:

From the beginning the nature of mind is pure like space.
In the process of looking, seeing comes to an end.

Savari elaborates:

In the process of searching for all that manifests as mind and matter
There is neither anything to be found nor is there any seeker,
For to be unreal is to be unborn and unceasing
Throughout the three periods of time.
That which is immutable
Is the state of great bliss.

He further states:

In the act of self watching the self,

A solitary self remains;

In observing this self, one does not see it.

This is undefinable since there is neither observer nor observation.

Who can comprehend

That which is undefinable?

Naropa comments:

The mind has the nature of luminous clarity,

Wherein there is no substance,

Not even the infinitesimal end of a hair."

Or Baizhang (Sayings and Doings of Pai-Chang, p 33):

"To speak of the mirror awareness is still not really right; by way of the impure, discern the pure. If you say the immediate mirror awareness is correct, or that there is something else beyond the mirror awareness, this is a delusion. If you keep dwelling in the immediate mirror awareness, this too is the same as delusion; it is called the mistake of naturalism."

And Dogen (Bussho, tr <https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/dharma/pdf/25eF.pdf>):

"Many students, hearing the term "buddha nature," have falsely reckoned that it is like the "I" in the alien path of Śreṇika. This is because they have not met a person, they have not met themselves, they have not seen a teacher. They have foolishly thought that the mind, mentation, and consciousness moved by wind and fire are the knowing and comprehending of the buddha nature. Who said that the buddha nature has knowing and comprehending? While perceivers and knowers may be buddhas, the buddha nature is not knowing and comprehending. Much less does the perceiving and knowing with which one refers to the buddhas as perceivers and knowers represent the perceiving and knowing in the false understandings you talk on about, the preceiving and knowing of the motion and rest of wind and fire."

And Foyan (Instant Zen, p 38):

"Let me give you an illustration. People have eyes, by which they can see all sorts of forms, like long and short, square and round, and so on; then why do they not see themselves? Just perceiving forms, you cannot see your eyes even if you want to. Your mind is also like this; its light shines perceptively throughout the ten directions, encompassing all things, so why does it not know itself?

Do you want to understand? Just discern the things perceived; you cannot see the mind itself.

An ancient said, "The knife does not cut itself, the finger does not touch itself, the mind does not know itself, the eye does not see itself." This is true reality."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 19th, 2019 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Very happy to see this fundamental principle stated in such an unequivocal manner.

Astus wrote:

"As a sword cannot cut itself, or as a finger cannot touch its own tip, Mind cannot see itself."

(Lankavatara Sutra, Sagathakam, v 568, tr Suzuki)

"The Guardian of the World himself has said

That mind cannot be seen by mind.

In just the same way, he has said,

The sword's edge cannot cut the sword."

(Bodhicaryavatara 9.17-18, tr Padmakara)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 19th, 2019 at 4:32 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Sherab said:

Do you interpret the highlighted portion that there is no consciousness?

Astus wrote:

It says that consciousness has no essence. In other words, it is empty. Just like everything else.

Sherab said:

If your answer is no, there is still a consciousness, then you would have contradicted what you said in your reply to me here:

<https://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=39&t=30573&start=100#p483621>

Astus wrote:

Just because nirvana is not a type of consciousness, it doesn't mean there is no consciousness at all.

Sherab said:

why is there no consciousness in nirvana?

Astus wrote:

Nirvana is neither a place nor a being, but the cessation of defilements. When one stops feeling thirsty, that phenomenon of disappearance is not itself a consciousness, is it? Or you can think of all sorts of cessations, like clouds vanishing, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 19th, 2019 at 6:56 PM

Title: Re: Compendium of the Mahayana: Asanga's Mahayanasamgraha and Its Indian and Tibetan Commentaries By: Asanga and Karl Br

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Why put so much time and energy into studying the view of the Chittamatrīn school which is just an intermediate view rather than studying the Madhyamika Prasāngika school which is Buddha's ultimate intention and the views that lead to liberation and enlightenment?

Astus wrote:

It is an intermediate view for those who subscribe to a specific Madhyamaka interpretation. Prasāngika is a Gelug idea, so it is quite unrealistic to expect everyone to agree with Tsongkhapa. As for the reason of studying Yogācāra, it is the most comprehensive and extensive Indian Mahayana doctrine that there has ever been, so you cannot really go wrong with it. Furthermore, even Tsongkhapa studied Yogācāra teachings, so where is the issue here?

Tsongkhapafan said:

Chandrakīrti extensively refutes the Chittamatrīn view in Guide to the Middle Way

Astus wrote:

Kicking down straw men is not that difficult.

Tsongkhapafan said:

therefore isn't it better to study Nāgārjuna, Chandrakīrti, Āryadeva and Śāntideva and try to realise the meaning of these teachings?

Astus wrote:

Studying Madhyamaka does not mean one cannot study other things as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 20th, 2019 at 5:41 AM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Rick said:

Similarly the mind can see the mind, if a part of the mind separates from and observes the rest.

Astus wrote:

In that case there are at least 2 minds, what contradicts the idea that the mind is what perceives, and also that the mind is unitary.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 20th, 2019 at 5:44 AM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Grigoris said:

I dunno, in Mahamudra we spend half our time using our mind to observe our mind...

Astus wrote:

The common self-awareness is not necessarily the same as the theory that there is an unchanging unitary consciousness aware of itself.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 20th, 2019 at 5:53 AM

Title: Re: Compendium of the Mahayana: Asanga's Mahayanasamgraha and Its Indian and Tibetan Commentaries By: Asanga and Karl Br

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

I contest the idea that Prasangika is a Gelug idea.

Astus wrote:

The distinction between Prasangika and Svatantrika is a Tibetan innovation that was emphasised by Tsongkhapa and spread by the Gelugpas. But let me know if you find an Indian source for it.

Tsongkhapafan said:

Buddha Shakyamuni taught the Prasangika view when he delivered the Perfection of Wisdom Sutra at Rajagriha. This view was clarified and expounded by Nagarjuna and his spiritual sons.

Astus wrote:

Did they call it Prasangika Madhyamaka?

Tsongkhapafan said:

I don't expect everyone to agree with Tsongkhapa but I would expect them to agree with Buddha Shakyamuni, Nagarjuna and Chandrakirti.

Astus wrote:

Why Chandrakirti? He was a marginal teacher until Tsongkhapa.

Tsongkhapafan said:

You seem very dismissive of Chandrakirti's refutation - why?

Astus wrote:

Not that I don't like what he wrote, but I don't think he is a reliable source to represent Yogacara, hence he did not refute what Yogacarins taught.

Tsongkhapa said:

Sure, we can study anything, but it's the value of our study that matters. Life is short.

Astus wrote:

How can you differentiate between valuable and worthless without studying extensively?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 20th, 2019 at 5:58 AM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Grigoris said:

All I am saying is that in Mahamudra this idea that consciousness cannot observe consciousness seems to be debunked.

Astus wrote:

"If you operate under the assumption that the self-awareness spoken of in mahamudra, the self-awareness spoken of in valid cognition, and the self-awareness refuted in Madhyamaka are all the same, then you will definitely perceive a contradiction. However, the term self-awareness is used differently in each of these three contexts." (Pointing Out the Dharmakaya, p 103)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 22nd, 2019 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Psychology Science -v- Mindfulness / Awareness 'Methods'

Content:

Matman said:

The Science of Psychology seems to suggest that, spending time 'Thinking / Reasoning' over one's emotional problems (including deep reflection on, and discussion of, them) - is a vital part of learning to 'come to terms' with, accept - and resolve - our issues.

Astus wrote:

There are teachings and methods in Buddhism that are used in a similar way, to understand and counteract harmful thoughts and feelings.

Matman said:

Is this 'at odds' with the Zen Buddhist Zen 'Awareness Method', where the more favoured approach seems to be, simply 'become aware of / and watch' difficult thoughts and feelings, but do not 'engage' or try to 'interact' with them?

Astus wrote:

Zen is based on the view that the mind is originally pure, while all thoughts, feelings, and impressions are unestablished phenomena. The way of Zen is not about merely watching but about actualising the original mind that is naturally unafflicted and free.

Matman said:

Might the Buddhist 'simple awareness' approach, result in 'difficult' thoughts, feelings, emotions being filed-away unresolved (out of mind) once an Awareness Session ends (due to a need to 'move on' to practical necessities like chores etc). In which case, do those 'difficult' thoughts, feelings, emotions' tend 'later' to return, again and again because they have not been 'engaged' with?

Astus wrote:

That could be the case if one were to take passive observation as the proper method, however, it is not. Furthermore, Zen is not restricted to those short periods on a cushion.

Matman said:

Is it, perhaps, essential to use 'both' the Psychologist and Buddhist Methods, but at different times?

Astus wrote:

Psychology is a different system than Buddhism, so they should be handled separately. But it's also important to recognise that Buddhism is not just Zen, and Zen is not about maintaining an artificial mental state of simple awareness.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 23rd, 2019 at 5:57 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Astus wrote:

This concept of there being two minds is an attempt at establishing a self independent of the aggregates, one of the four possible ways people may imagine their true self. It's been refuted from the beginning under the topic of satkaya-drsti, and later in Mahayana as a matter of pudgala-nairatmya.

"Having determined that the five aggregates are not solid entities that make up the self, we might conclude that there is, however, a solid self or "me" that is distinct from these ever-changing five aggregates. But our experience is that all our perceptions and all our conceptualizations arise from these five perceptual aggregates, so we would have to propose a self that is a single uncompounded entity that is independent of our perceptual experience and therefore would be beyond thought. But all our experience of the world arises from these aggregates. A self, or a soul, beyond the compounded aggregates would necessarily have to be an existent entity that is uncompounded, non-experiential, and inconceivable. But if there were such a self that was solid and real, how would happiness and suffering in the ordinary world initially arise? A self beyond the aggregates would not experience changing events of the aggregates and, like uncompounded space, would be beyond contact, benefit, and harm. A self separate from the aggregates would never be able to function in the ordinary world where things arise and fall. We would never have experienced any of the compounded events that we experience. Thus, there is no self beyond the aggregates."

(Khenchen Thrangu Rinpoche: The Open Door to Emptiness, ch 2)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 23rd, 2019 at 7:13 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Coëmgenu said:

IMO like I said earlier this is a nice harmonization, but there is a reason why you don't find "these views" in Ven Sujāto's rendering. This is because there is no term in the Pāli that corresponds to the word "views". This is a commentarial addition.

Astus wrote:

There is also the Walshe translation:

"When, monks, a monk understands as they really are the arising and passing away of the six bases of contact, their attraction and peril, and the deliverance from them, he knows that which goes beyond all these views."

The Chinese version should not be forgotten either.

梵動經 (T1n1, vol 14, p94a3):

若比丘於六觸集、滅、味、過、出要，如實而知，則為最勝，出彼諸見。

Ichimura (Lengthy Discourses, BDK ed, vol 3, p 31):

"If a bhikṣu acquires insight into the causal concatenation of the six senses and contact with their objects (i.e., sensation, its cessation, its gratification, its danger, and the method of its transcendence), universally as they really are, this would be his highest achievement, [precisely] because this insight goes beyond the theories contained within the sixty-two variations."

Jianhua (A Critical Translation of Fan Dong Jing, p 88):

"When, (bhiksus), a bhikṣu understands as they really are the origin and passing away of the six bases of contact, their satisfaction, unsatisfactoriness, and escape from them, then he understands what transcends all these views."

Back to Sujato's translation from the Pali:

"When a mendicant truly understands the six fields of contacts' origin, ending, gratification, drawback, and escape, they understand what lies beyond all these things."

"these things" are clearly the 62 views, because that's what has been discussed, those are what emerge out of clinging to the six fields. The proposition that there is something beyond them would mean a 7th field, and a basis of attachment, something one would rightly call a self. However, as it's been repeated in the sutta again and again (Sujato translation):

"He understands this, and what goes beyond this. Yet since he does not misapprehend that understanding, he has realized extinguishment within himself. Having truly understood the origin, ending, gratification, drawback, and escape from feelings, the Realized One is freed through not grasping."

Not grasping is what goes beyond grasping, that's how the round of suffering ends.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 24th, 2019 at 6:00 AM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

So my interpretation of the Brahmajala is that it is a critique of any and all kinds of speculative views (all of which are ultimately based on self either existing or not existing) so as to 'go beyond'. Its subject is the attaining of genuine jñāna, not the speculative views of philosophers and others.

Astus wrote:

Since there is nothing that can be known beyond the six senses, assuming something beyond them is par excellence speculation. See also the <https://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=484351#p484351>.

"All you need do is not follow discriminations, because none of the three causes arises when the three conditions of the three continuities of the world, living beings, and karmic retribution are cut off. Then the madness of the Yajnadatta in your mind will cease of itself, and just that ceasing is Bodhi."

(<http://www.cttbusa.org/shurangama/shurangama15.asp>, 4.109-110)

It's often taught that this mind is buddha, and there is no buddha outside mind. It's not another mind one should look for, but only look into this common mind filled with emotions and ideas, and see that it's already unestablished and ungraspable as it is.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 24th, 2019 at 7:17 AM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

We are not realising the true nature.

Astus wrote:

It's the true nature of the six sensory areas and five aggregates that is to be realised, and not something apart from them. That's one of the main points of the oft recited Heart

Sutra, don't you agree?

Wayfarer said:

What is the translation of 'abhijna'?

Astus wrote:

The Princeton Dictionary of Buddhism: superknowledge, "specifically referring to a set of supranormal powers that are by-products of meditation"

PTS Pali-English Dictionary: special knowledge, psychic powers

Manual of Buddhist Terms and Doctrines: higher powers, supernormal knowledges

FaXiang - A Buddhist Practitioner's Encyclopedia: 神通 (shén tōng) - supernatural power

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 24th, 2019 at 7:40 AM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

The definition of abhijna is super-knowledge. 'Abhi' is 'higher' - the question is, 'higher' along what axis? 'Higher' compared to what? Why is it that 'abhijna' cannot be known to the empirical sciences?

Astus wrote:

What do you base that definition on?

Wayfarer said:

Isn't it because empiricism restricts knowledge to only what can be validated by sense-experience? So there's a higher dimension which empiricism can't comprehend, by definition. That is 'higher knowledge'.

Astus wrote:

There are six senses. If something is beyond them, it'd take a seventh sense to perceive it. Is there a seventh sense in your interpretation?

Wayfarer said:

I found this passage the other day said to be from the Mahayana Angulimala Sutra:

Astus wrote:

The aggregates are empty, but that doesn't mean there are no aggregates, rather that they're empty of substance. Your quote says nothing new, since the qualities of noble beings are well known.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 24th, 2019 at 6:39 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I'll go with the one you quoted the definition from the Princeton Dictionary of Buddhism.

Astus wrote:

That dictionary, like the others, refer to the six abhijñas, five of which are aptly called psychic powers (magical powers, clairvoyance, clairaudience, remembering past lives, telepathy), while the sixth is the "extinction of the contaminants (āsravakṣaya, P. āsavakkhāya)" that is unique to liberated beings.

Wayfarer said:

Jñāna is not simply the product of the senses, otherwise animals and the unenlightened would possess it.

Astus wrote:

Don't forget the sixth sense: mind. The mere operation of the senses does not define their quality, e.g. eagles have better sight than moles. There are vast differences even among humans with regard to their mental abilities and their proclivities.

As for what jñāna may stand for, the <https://www.accesstoinight.org/lib/authors/mahasi/progress.html> is one version, while the four wisdoms (catvāri jñānāni, 四智) taught in Yogacara is a speciality of buddhahood. There is also knowing and seeing according to reality (yathābhūtañānadassana) that means a complete understanding of the four noble truths and the various dharmas (four elements, five aggregates, six senses, etc.) - see https://store.pariyatti.org/Excursions-into-the-Thought-World-of-the-P257li-Discourses--PDF-eBook_p_4673.html, ch 16. There are also the four reality wisdoms (catvāri yathā-bhūta-parijñānāni, 四如實智) in Yogacara, that means the comprehension after investigation that "names, objects, essences, and differences" are mentally fabricated (see: Mahayanasamgraha 3.7; e.g. BDK ed, p 63-64). So, the point is, knowledge/wisdom should be specified in terms of what is known/understood.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 25th, 2019 at 6:25 AM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

So the psychic abilities and "knowledge of extinction of the contaminants" would be generally categorised as 'extra-sensory perception', would they not?

Astus wrote:

In ordinary Western parlance, yes. In Buddhism, no. For instance, clairvoyance, or divine eye, is still visual perception, just like common human seeing, but on a different level. But literal 'extra-sensory perception', experiencing something beyond the six senses, is impossible.

"The supernormal knowledges of supernormal power, divine hearing, and divine sight, make up the first application of mindfulness, that is, the body as an application of mindfulness, for they have rupa, color and shape, for their object. The supernormal knowledge of supernormal power has four external ayatanas, with the exception of sound, for its sphere. And divine hearing and divine sight have both sound and rupa for their domain."

(AKB 7.44d, vol 4, p 1162)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 25th, 2019 at 6:38 AM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

The latter reference links to the same source that Astus refers to above.

Astus wrote:

Thanissaro's explanation is not found in Mahasi Sayadaw's

<https://www.accesstoinight.org/lib/authors/mahasi/progress.html> that you linked.

Mahasi provides a short commentary on the matter of "viññanam anidassanam" in Manual of Insight, p 464-466. Bhikkhu Sujato discusses the idea in his post:

<https://sujato.wordpress.com/2011/05/13/vinna%E1%B9%87a-is-not-nibbana-really-it-just-isn%E2%80%99t/>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 25th, 2019 at 5:41 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I'm sorry but this makes no sense to me.

Astus wrote:

For the Buddhist context of how the operation of the senses is conceived see e.g.:

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ayatana> on Wikipedia

<https://web.archive.org/web/20180901114929/https://studybuddhism.com/en/advanced-studies/lam-rim/the-five-aggregates/the-5-aggregates-12-cognitive-stimulators-18-sources> by Dr. Alexander Berzin

<https://abhidharmakosa.files.wordpress.com/2010/07/chapter-1-dhatu.pdf> - a summary from the Abhidharmakosabhasyam

Wayfarer said:

Through clairvoyance, you're not seeing by virtue of light that is captured by the retina and images received by sensory means. It is super-sensory, by definition.

Astus wrote:

Yes, but not in the context of the six sensory areas.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 26th, 2019 at 5:08 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Sherab said:

If the above does not show that there is a consciousness beyond the all, then what is this consciousness that has NOT been experienced through the allness of the all?

Astus wrote:

Here's Piya Tan's take on it:

"In short, this stanza, "[t]he consciousness without attribute, without end, radiant all around" refers not to nirvana (as suggested by the Commentaries) but to the nature of the arhat's mind, that is, awakened consciousness, as commonly understood in the Suttas, that is, as one unfathomable: "of the one who is gone to his setting [one who has gone out], there is measuring" (atthaṃ gatassa na pamaṇam atthi) (Sn1076)." (<http://www.themindingcentre.org/dharmafarer/wp-content/uploads/2009/12/11.7-Brahma-Nimantanika-S-m49-piya.pdf>, p 95)

Sherab said:

To me, it is clear from the above that the consciousness mentioned is beyond the range of the all, and only a Buddha is qualified to make such a claim. No other being can make such a claim.

Astus wrote:

This is a question of hermeneutics, how one approaches the scriptures and makes interpretations. In this case, the idea of a special consciousness beyond consciousness is not supported by the Pali Canon in general, nor by the later Theravada tradition, and it is only a few poetic lines that one can single out and fabricate a new explanation.

An unestablished consciousness is in line with the other teachings found in the scriptures, therefore it is a more defensible angle to take than trying to prove an unprovable concept of unchanging awareness. Unestablished consciousness is simply where there is no more grasping at the aggregates, so it is what one finds in the four noble truths and all over the Canon. See the <https://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.053.than.html> for instance.

Furthermore, why bother with the sravaka teachings when it is so much easier to find ideas that resemble an ultimate self in Mahayana? Like the "four virtues" (四德) in the Nirvana Sutra: permanence, happiness, self, purity (常樂我淨).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 26th, 2019 at 6:54 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent?

Content:

Sherab said:

I never said that the consciousness beyond the all is unchanging/permanent, or changing/impermanent. This is because whatever is beyond the all is necessary beyond the range of words and concepts. Word and concepts arise from and within the all.

Astus wrote:

If it is beyond the six sensory areas, that means it cannot have the attributes of those, and that includes conceivability, perceptibility, dependency, and impermanence. More importantly, it is like the finest lady of the land who's never been seen.

“Suppose, Potṭhapāda, a man were to say: ‘Whoever the finest lady in the land is, it is her that I want, her that I desire!’ They’d say to him: ‘Mister, that finest lady in the land who you desire—do you know whether she’s an aristocrat, a brahmin, a merchant, or a worker?’ Asked this, he’d say, ‘No.’ They’d say to him: ‘Mister, that finest lady in the land who you desire—do you know her name or clan? Whether she’s tall or short or medium? Whether her skin is black, brown, or tawny? What village, town, or city she comes from?’ Asked this, he’d say, ‘No.’ They’d say to him: ‘Mister, do you desire someone who you’ve never even known or seen?’ Asked this, he’d say, ‘Yes.’

What do you think, Potṭhapāda? This being so, doesn’t that man’s statement turn out to have no demonstrable basis?” “Clearly that’s the case, sir.”

(<https://suttacentral.net/dn9/en/sujato>)

Sherab said:

The consciousness beyond the all can be said to be unestablished because it is not found or established by a dualistic mind, i.e a mind that grasps at a self and other, since the all necessarily involves subject-object differentiation and what is beyond the all is beyond subject-object differentiation.

Astus wrote:

When there is nothing to perceive, there is no perceiver either. As Vasubandhu wrote (Trimsika v 28, tr Kochumuttom, p 259):

"One does abide in the realization
Of mere [representation of] consciousness
When one does not perceive also a supporting consciousness,
For, the graspable objects being absent,
There cannot either be the grasping of that"

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 2nd, 2019 at 4:20 PM

Title: Re: Infinite Eons and Enlightenment

Content:

LoveFromColorado said:

This would mean that we have experienced every single state of awareness, from the lowest hell to the highest heaven as well as enlightenment.

Astus wrote:

Enlightenment is freedom from the 6 realms, the end of birth and death. So beings may go round and round without ever attaining liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 2nd, 2019 at 9:05 PM

Title: Re: Kwan Um School of Zen

Content:

KiwiNFLFan said:

standard Jogye teachings

Astus wrote:

I have not seen such a thing. Jogye is an institution, not a doctrine.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 3rd, 2019 at 5:46 PM

Title: Re: Is relative truth nullified in higher stages of Chan / Zen?

Content:

well wisher said:

Is relative truth nullified in higher stages of Chan / Zen?

Astus wrote:

Zen deals with the mind, and the mind is often described with two concepts: essence and function. In essence the mind is empty and pure. In function it is whatever occurs, all phenomena. Essence and function are not two different things, not two separate minds, but simply one common way to describe the mind. There is no essence without function, and there is no function without essence. But one can make the mistake of grasping only one of them, or dividing them.

Delusion is being fooled by function, where one is attached to one's thoughts, feelings, and sensory impressions.

Beginning practitioners are often fooled by essence, where they want only peace, motionlessness, transcendence, the absolute.

After some experience one recognises that dealing with function is inevitable, so there is a process of harmonisation, of balancing, of integration of the two sides.

Further on one can arrive at the point where essence and function are inseparable, where non-thought is in the midst of thought, and it becomes possible to cultivate genuine Zen.

The final stage is simply that there is no more cultivation done, no more effort needed, as essence has never been apart from function, nor function from the essence.

So, is the relative truth, the function, nullified? Yes and no. Yes, because there is no more mistake about what the function is. No, because the relative does not go anywhere.

well wisher said:

if you consider relative truths, where one person might consider some virtues are good whiles are might think its bad.

Astus wrote:

Buddhism - regardless of school - does not teach moral relativism. Karma is unavoidable.

well wisher said:

So does "absolute truth" even exist? If so, what is it ? Is it the total cessation of all unwanted conditioning and sufferings in one's own mind and existence, replace with total benevolence and harmonious calmness and pure freedom? Or what else?

Astus wrote:

The absolute truth is that there is ultimately no truth to hold on to, i.e. all concepts are fleeting and baseless. Liberation comes from seeing that the universe (nor the multiverse) has nothing reliable, nothing to attach to.

well wisher said:

Maybe some higher stages cannot be expressed by words and labels, but can only be experienced in one's own actual reality?

Astus wrote:

Dreaming of an unseen higher realm is aiming for the absolute. A good start, but not a place to get stuck at.

well wisher said:

So in the end, I guess 5 precepts are only a rough general guideline to go by, but perhaps should NOT be pursued to the point of extreme degree nor extreme obsession;

Astus wrote:

The five precepts are for lay people as a guidance. It is a sort of minimal requirement. Compare that to the 250 precepts of monks, the 10 major and 48 minor precepts for bodhisattvas, and the other innumerable vows.

well wisher said:

And that the CESSATION OF SUFFERING in the part of the 4 noble truths is actually a greater goal to aim for?

Astus wrote:

The precepts are means to an end, and that end can be different things, from this worldly benefits up to complete enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 3rd, 2019 at 6:22 PM

Title: Re: Consciousness - is it really ever 'switched-off'

Content:

Matman said:

Are we ever really in a mental state where consciousness is totally absent?

Astus wrote:

Consciousness is momentary, mental states rapidly occur and cease. To conceive the mind as continuous is one of the common basis of believing in an enduring existence.

Matman said:

This seems to indicate that consciousness is 'always' present, but gets turned-down / dampened at times, e.g. when we sleep.

Astus wrote:

That is an assumption, a projection of a substance beyond appearances.

Matman said:

Has this fact any direct relevance to the way Mahayana Buddhists understand 'consciousness'?

Astus wrote:

When there is a sound, there is ear-consciousness. When there is no sound, there can be no awareness of sound either.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 3rd, 2019 at 6:27 PM

Title: Re: Consciousness - is it really ever 'switched-off'

Content:

Grigoris said:

In the Abhidhamma there is the bhavanga citta which is like a baseline level of consciousness.

Astus wrote:

Bhavanga-citta is a Theravada doctrine, but it's not taught in the Abhidhamma Pitaka, only in later commentaries and treatises. Other schools have not developed such a concept, that's how introduction of the alayavijnana was not a straightforward matter for the Yogacarins.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 3rd, 2019 at 9:33 PM

Title: Re: Consciousness - is it really ever 'switched-off'

Content:

Grigoris said:

The Abhidhammattha Sangaha of Ācariya Anuruddha:

Astus wrote:

That is a text from the 11th-12th century. You can find the word bhavanga used in the Patthana, translated as life-continuum by U Narada, but not specifically defined. It is in Buddhaghosa's works (5th c.) where you can find the first definitions (e.g. Vism 14.114; Atth 270). In any case, just as in the case of the alayavijnana, at parinirvana there is no more continuity of consciousness.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 4th, 2019 at 4:05 PM

Title: Re: Consciousness - is it really ever 'switched-off'

Content:

Sherab said:

I never know what momentary really means.

Astus wrote:

That arising and cessation happens in the same moment.

Sherab said:

When a consciousness cease, does it cease into utter nothingness?

Astus wrote:

One cannot even step into the same river twice, so why would mind states persist?

Sherab said:

If it does, how come out of utter nothingness a new moment of consciousness can arise?

Astus wrote:

Various Abhidharma and Yogacara treatises have answers for that, if you really want to know, where they discuss causality. Apart from that, you can go with Madhyamaka (and Yogacara) where one recognises that ultimately it's all just a mirage, an illusion. It depends on how deep you want to go.

Sherab said:

If when a consciousness cease, it does not cease into utter nothingness, then what does it cease into?

Astus wrote:

Cessation does not mean going from one place to another. Cessation means the end of functioning, the end of existing, because the supporting conditions have changed and no longer support it.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 4th, 2019 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: Is there a Buddhist Word for this?

Content:

Matman said:

He calls it the Pain-Body, but it seems somewhat different to what I understand the Buddhist Term 'dukkha' to mean.

Astus wrote:

Suffering (duhkha) is the result of afflictions

(https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kleshas_%28Buddhism%29), and afflictions are what influence the mind in a harmful way as a consequence of past actions (karma).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 4th, 2019 at 8:14 PM

Title: Re: Consciousness - is it really ever 'switched-off'

Content:

Matman said:

wired-up to a brainwave monitor

Astus wrote:

Consciousness is understood to be non-material in Buddhism.

Matman said:

Is it the view, that Pure Awareness (Total Presence) is a facet of Consciousness, or do you see it as something else?

Astus wrote:

The other way around, ordinary consciousness is the manifestation of the originally pure mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 6th, 2019 at 8:47 PM

Title: Re: Infinite Eons and Enlightenment

Content:

Aemilius said:

I think this is refuted by Madhyamaka and the Perfection of Wisdom Sutras. Samsara has no reality, there is no real samsara. According to Chandrakirti, for example, Nirvana is that nothing arises or ceases (with an essence or essentially).

Astus wrote:

Madhyamaka is a Buddhist school, so it cannot and does not refute liberation. Nirvana is defined as unborn and undying by the Abhidharmikas, and it is contrasted with samsara where birth and death happens. What you find in Madhyamaka is that the nature of samsara is identical to nirvana, because both are empty, so samsara is a mistaken perception. This is not the same as denying the presence and efficiency of ignorance whence samsara originates. After all, the very purpose of Madhyamaka is to eliminate ignorance and thus liberate beings.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 7th, 2019 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: Infinite Eons and Enlightenment

Content:

Aemilius said:

It does refute liberation (as a possession of a self or a being) in the MMK, and so does the Diamond Sutra. 24. Totally pacifying all referents and totally pacifying fixations is peace. The Buddha nowhere taught any dharma to anyone.

Astus wrote:

No Buddhist school assumes a self, so nobody said that liberation was a possession of anyone, hence nothing new here. Madhyamaka has the explicit goal of bringing beings to peace (i.e. nirvana), just look at the homage/dedication right at the beginning of MMK that has the same term used as in 25.24: "prapañcopaśama", the stilling/quieting/stopping (upaśama) of hypostatization/fabrication/proliferation (prapañca). See 18.5 (tr Siderits) on how liberation and fabrication relate to each other:

karmakleśakṣayān mokṣaḥ karmakleśā vikalpataḥ |
te prapañcāt prapañcas tu śūnyatāyāṃ nirudhyate ||

Liberation is attained through the destruction of actions and defilements; actions and defilements arise because of falsifying conceptualizations; those arise from hypostatization; but hypostatization is extinguished in emptiness.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 7th, 2019 at 8:03 PM

Title: Re: Tobacco in Buddhism

Content:

haha said:

basis in sutra?

Astus wrote:

Tobacco was brought to India in the 17th century (no Buddhism in India by then), so if the story is about tobacco, it is quite modern.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 9th, 2019 at 4:46 PM

Title: Re: Term for 'Mind' in Awakening of Faith

Content:

Wayfarer said:

The principle is "the Mind of the sentient being." This Mind includes in itself all states of being of the phenomenal world and the transcendental world. On the basis of this Mind, the meanings of the Mahayana may be unfolded. Why? Because the absolute aspect of this Mind represents the essence (svabhāva) of the Mahayana; and the phenomenal aspect of this Mind indicates the essence, attributes (laksana) and influences (kriyā) of the Mahayana itself.

I am interested in what character or word that has been translated as "Mind" in this passage.

Astus wrote:

心

http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T32n1666_001#0575c20, c21-25:

所言法者，謂眾生心，是心則攝一切世間法、出世間法。依於此心顯示摩訶衍義。何以故？是心真如相，即示摩訶衍體故；是心生滅因緣相，能示摩訶衍自體相用故。

"The word "principle" means the mind of sentient beings. This mind embraces all dharmas in the mundane and supramundane worlds. On the basis of this mind the meaning of Mahayana is revealed. Why? Because the suchness aspect of this mind shows the essence of Mahayana, (while) the causal and conditional aspect of the arising and ceasing of this mind can show the attributes and operation of Mahayana's essence itself."

(tr Sung-Bae Park, in Wonhyo's Commentaries on the "Awakening of Faith in Mahayana.", PhD dissertation, 1979, p 166)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 9th, 2019 at 6:03 PM

Title: Re: Term for 'Mind' in Awakening of Faith

Content:

Simon E. said:

It seems to posit an agreed definition of 'mind' shared by all readers a priori.

Astus wrote:

What mind is is one of the main topics of the treatise.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 11th, 2019 at 6:08 PM

Title: Re: Beginner in Mahamudra

Content:

Simon E. said:

What said was that one can't actually practice Mahamudra without wangs.

Astus wrote:

Mahamudra does not require empowerment, only within the context of deity yoga, also called tantric Mahamudra and the path of means. But the Mahamudra that is also called sutra Mahamudra and the path of liberation, the speciality of the Dagpo Kagyu, has no such prerequisite.

"if one follows venerable Gampopa's system in elucidating Mahamudra alone, it is not necessary to bestow the empowerment upon devotees"
(Mahamudra: the Moonlight, p 124)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 12th, 2019 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: Beginner in Mahamudra

Content:

Simon E. said:

actual teachers of Vajrayana Dharma rather than scholars of an eclectic bent.

Astus wrote:

Could you be more specific there? Do you mean you hold Sakya Pandita's view as the definitive, and others' as "eclectic"?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 12th, 2019 at 7:46 PM

Title: Re: Infinite Eons and Enlightenment

Content:

Aemilius said:

Diamond Sutra Ch. 27...Similarly in The Heart Sutra

Astus wrote:

Things are already empty, so there is nothing to be free from, nor anyone to be liberated. However, unless emptiness is seen, one is stuck in delusion and samsara. That's why there are the teachings, like the Diamond and the Heart Sutra, to show the true nature of the world as unestablished and unobtainable. This goes back to the very basics of Buddhism: although there has never been a self, without recognising that there is no escape from suffering.

"To attain is not to attain; there is nothing to attain or to lose - this is called the attainment of the Realization of the Nonarising of Dharmas."

(How to Kill with the Sword of Wisdom, in A Treasury of Mahayana Sutras, p 62)

The Buddha asked Mañjuśrī, "When a Bodhisattva sits in a bodhimaṇḍa, does he attain anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi?"

Mañjuśrī replied, "When a Bodhisattva sits in a bodhimaṇḍa, he does not attain anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi. Why not? Because the appearance of bodhi is true suchness. Not finding a speck of dharma to capture is called anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi. Because bodhi has no appearance, who can sit and who can rise? For this reason, I see neither a Bodhisattva sitting in a bodhimaṇḍa nor anyone realizing anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi."

...

"Those who know that in bodhi there is no attainment of Buddhahood will quickly attain anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi."

(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra13.html>)

"If you understand this doctrine, you should also understand that there is nothing whatsoever to be attained. Knowing that there is nothing to be gained or attained is the realization of the Dharmakaya of Buddhadharma. If one harbors any thought whatsoever of gaining or attaining, he holds the wrong view and, being a person of overweening pride, is labeled heterodox."

(<https://ymba.org/books/entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment/treatise-entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment>)

"The realization that "nothing is attained" breaks through phenomenal and principle hindrances, and the understanding that the Dharma cannot be fully explained in words breaks through the hindrance of language. In this way, "non-attainment" is the only true attainment, and is what allows us to return to our intrinsic nature, which is inherently pure."

(<http://hsingyun.org/cultivation-without-attainment/>)

"Non-wisdom is the true wisdom, non-attainment is the true attainment."

(<https://www.buddhanet.net/e-learning/heartv11.htm>)

"'No attainment' is true attainment. So I already told you about the Heart Sutra. It says, 'There is no attainment, with nothing to attain.' You must attain 'no attainment.'"

(Wanting Enlightenment is a Big Mistake: Teachings of Zen Master Seung Sahn, p 2)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 16th, 2019 at 11:27 PM

Title: Re: another sutra classification beside tiantai

Content:

mansurhirbi87 said:

Do you know if there is another kind of sutra classification beside that one of Zhiyi or Tiantai school ?

Astus wrote:

The word for it is panjiao (<https://zh.wikipedia.org/wiki/%E6%95%99%E5%88%A4>), i.e. doctrinal classification, and different schools and teachers have set up such schema.

Apart from the

<http://www.buddhistdoor.com/OldWeb/bdoor/archive/nutshell/teach70.htm#t701>, there are the

<http://www.buddhistdoor.com/OldWeb/bdoor/archive/nutshell/teach59.htm#t594>,

<http://www.buddhistdoor.com/OldWeb/bdoor/archive/nutshell/teach61.htm#t614>,

<http://www.buddhistdoor.com/OldWeb/bdoor/archive/nutshell/teach66.htm#t661>, and others like what you find in Shingon by Kukai. There is a study on this topic by Bruno Petzold: <https://books.google.hu/books?id=iZH29oilulkC>; and another by Chanju Mun:

https://books.google.hu/books/about/The_History_of_Doctrinal_Classification.html?id=dpPYtAEACAAJ.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 18th, 2019 at 6:33 PM

Title: Re: question on distinguishing mind from it's nature

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Could be a Mahamudra question too:

Once a person begins to have some confidence in distinguishing mind from it's nature, is there any particular point in working with conventional thoughts and appearances in meditation anymore, rather than simply resting in the nature of mind? Is it now time to examine the relationship between the nature of mind and the minds contents?

Astus wrote:

After View and Meditation comes Conduct, may also be called Enhancement. It is integrating what one has learnt into life.

"although various authoritative scriptures and oral instructions have taught different types of conduct as means to enhance one's practice, the essential key points are as follows: Cut your worldly attachments completely and live companionless in secluded mountain retreats; that is the conduct of a wounded deer. Be free from fear or anxiety in the face of difficulties; that is the conduct of a lion sporting in the mountains. Be free from attachment or clinging to sense pleasures; that is the conduct of the wind in the sky. Do not become involved in the fetters of accepting or rejecting the eight worldly concerns; that is the conduct of a madman. Sustain simply and unrestrictedly the natural flow of your mind while unbound by the ties of dualistic fixation; that is the conduct of a spear stabbing in space."

(Lamp of Mahamudra, p 58)

How to work with various appearances:

<http://www.purifymind.com/ObstaclesPath.htm>

A shorter summary of the same:

<https://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/khenpo-gangshar/removing-hindrances-sustaining-realization>

A famous song of Milarepa:

<http://unfetteredmind.org/milarepas-song-to-lady-paldarboom/>

<http://levekunst.com/milarepas-song-to-the-girl-paldarbum/>

http://www.abuddhistlibrary.com/Buddhism/A%20-

%20Tibetan%20Buddhism/Authors/Thrangu%20Rinpoche/Commentaries%20on%20The%20Songs%20of%20Milarepa/The%20Story%20of%20Nyama%20Paldarbum,%20Song%20of%20Milarepa.htm

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 18th, 2019 at 8:56 PM

Title: Re: question on distinguishing mind from it's nature

Content:

Astus wrote:

It should also be noted, that when it comes to actually dealing with defilements, one uses whatever works. There is no point in giving too much importance to the idea of being a practitioner of this or that method only, in other words, clinging to a special identity.

"Bhikkhus, there are taints that should be abandoned by seeing. There are taints that should be abandoned by restraining. There are taints that should be abandoned by using. There are taints that should be abandoned by enduring. There are taints that should be abandoned by avoiding. There are taints that should be abandoned by removing. There are taints that should be abandoned by developing."

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn2/en/bodhi>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 18th, 2019 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

smcj said:

Since this is in the Kagyu forum it is appropriate to reference Kagyu authorities.

Astus wrote:

See chapter 20 of Jewel Ornament of Liberation. Primordial wisdom (or "pristine awareness" in Holmes' translation) is twofold in nature: ultimate and conventional. The ultimate is non-conceptual, free from elaboration, so it is very much pointless to try to categorise it as something. The conventional is how all appearances are seen as illusory.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 19th, 2019 at 5:45 AM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

smcj said:

Kongtrul obviously was making the point he wasn't talking about a being's mind—either sentient or enlightened.

Astus wrote:

The ground, primordial purity, is exactly the nature of mind. It's not an abstraction, or a separate entity.

smcj said:

Gompopa was writing before Dolpopa.

Astus wrote:

Gampopa's description is not different from Kongtrul's:

"Intrinsic awareness is devoid of substantiality and therefore indivisible from emptiness. Based on this indivisibility, the character comprises two pristine wisdoms: the pristine wisdom of the primordially pure nature, which is free of mentation, and the pristine wisdom of the spontaneous character, which is the original radiance glowing deep within."

(Myriad Worlds, p 207)

smcj said:

I am putting forward the idea of a transcendent or primordial (depending on how you want to talk about it) substratum.

Astus wrote:

Buddha-mind is not a substratum, only if it's incorrectly conceived as such, like grasping the wrong end of a snake.

"If you apprehend this basis of emptiness that is empty of both existence and nonexistence as something that is established by its essence separately [from everything else], no matter how you label it—such as an inconceivable self, Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Īśvara, or wisdom—except for the mere name, the meaning is the same." (Mipham quoted by Brunnhölzl in 'In Praise of Dharmadhatu', p 105)

"Bhikkhus, you may well cling to that doctrine of self that would not arouse sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief, and despair in one who clings to it. But do you see any such doctrine of self, bhikkhus?"—"No, venerable sir."—"Good, bhikkhus. I too do not see any doctrine of self that would not arouse sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief, and despair in one who clings to it."

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn22/en/bodhi>)

A recommended teaching on the topic is <https://books.google.hu/books?id=azieVNVB6aYC> by Khenchen Thrangu Rinpoche.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 19th, 2019 at 4:03 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

The Buddha Nature teachings are very different from what is found in the Pali agamas

Astus wrote:

Not that much actually. The main twist is that the manifestation of the buddha qualities is not a product of merit accumulation but of wisdom, and that is in contrast to the earlier view of Mahayana as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 20th, 2019 at 4:30 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

dudette said:

Guys do not misunderstand me but these views on Shentong which you are discussing here really remind me of mystical christianity, mystical islam, hinduism and all other theistic religions.

Astus wrote:

Shentong, just like other systems using the tathagatagarbha doctrine (which is the majority of Mahayana actually), can be mistaken for substantialist ideas, just as other elements of Buddhism can be mistaken for annihilationist views. Both are instances of wrongly conceiving the Dharma and falling into extreme views.

dudette said:

How come this type of view managed to get into buddhism in the first place?

Astus wrote:

It did not. Eternalism is not accepted by any Buddhist school. The difficulty in understanding Buddha-mind teachings is the same as with understanding emptiness: one jumps to extreme conclusions without thoroughly comprehending the teachings.

dudette said:

I mean there has to be some logical explanation why Shentong view is taught as the fundamentals for buddhism in DW.

Astus wrote:

First of all, this is a diverse forum, and Shentong does not have a special position. As for the popularity of Shentong among Kagyu and Nyingma teachers, there can be various explanations, but a short one is that it fits well with Vajrayana ideas.

Secondly, this is not so different from standard Theravada, and even less from the more philosophically lax teachings like the Thai Forest tradition. What is translated as "primordial wisdom" and "pristine awareness" is the Tibetan yeshe that is the equivalent of Sanskrit jñāna, what in Pali is ñāṇa, i.e. knowledge. It is the ultimate in a similar sense that in the Abhidhamma system there are lokuttara citta, and the phala citta have nibbana - the unconditioned - as their objects. So, just as the Abhidhamma can be misread as a dry theoretical and atomistic philosophy, so can various Mahayana teachings can be mistaken for eternalist ideologies. But as long as one remembers that the whole point of every Buddhist doctrine is to give a path to liberation through removing all attachments, one can avoid extreme views.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 20th, 2019 at 10:04 PM

Title: Re: Buddha Nature in Zen

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

I know that in East Asian Buddhism, Buddha Nature is emphasized. Is there any special emphasis or perspective on this idea in Zen which differentiates it?

Astus wrote:

Do you ask if there is a special "Zen theory" of buddha-nature? If so, then the answer is no. First of all, because there is no such systematic doctrine that can be called "Zen". Secondly, because teachings that are conventionally labelled Zen simply rely on established Mahayana doctrine.

Apart from the above two points, a common and quite central concept in most Zen teachings is that the "mind is buddha", that is, that the nature of mind is identical to the nature of buddha. This forms the basis of the sudden awakening style, that one simply has to recognise one's own mind to be originally empty and thereby attain liberation from all defilements and ignorance.

So, if you really want to know the authentic Zen perspective, then just see right now that your current chain of thoughts is without any basis, that there is nothing to rely on anywhere, and there has never been anything that could be gained or lost.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 20th, 2019 at 11:15 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

smcj said:

There seem to be three different objections to my postings on Shentong here.

Astus wrote:

'Some of the assertions made by the Shentong masters seem to disagree with the Madhyamaka view and agree with the statements of non-Buddhists, particularly those of Vedanta. There have been many misunderstandings and refutations of this philosophy in Tibet. In order to clear up these misunderstandings, I will quote some points extracted from the teachings of Taranatha, which Jamgon Kongtrul quotes in the Treasury of Knowledge. Taranatha says:

'Some scholars cite the Lankavatara Sutra, which says: If buddha nature has all the marks and signs, then isn't it the same as the atman of the non-Buddhists? In reply, the Buddha said, "It is not the same because it is emptiness."'

(Ringu Tulku: The Ri-me Philosophy of Jamgon Kongtrul the Great, p 224)

'both Shentong and Rangtong are free of the fault of not being Madhyamaka. They accord in espousing a view free of all fabricated extremes. Not only that, but in most schools of Tibetan Buddhism there were masters who were lineage holders of both systems, and nobody looked upon them as having wrong views.'

(Ringu Tulku, p 232)

'Most people think that, in terms of its Madhyamaka alignment, the Kagyü school is a monolithic bloc of staunch supporters of Shentong-Madhyamaka ("other-empty Madhyamaka"). However, as should be clear by now, there are quite a number of masters in this school who do not follow what is known as Shentong. Even Milarepa sometimes adopts a typical Rangtong ("self-empty") approach in his enlightened songs.¹⁰³² Still, the reader may be wondering why a book on Madhyamaka in the Kagyü lineage has thus far barely mentioned the term "Shentong," much less presented the system it refers to. The answer is simple and may be shocking to some: There is no Shentong-Madhyamaka nor any need to make one up. The subdivision of Madhyamaka into "self empty" and "other-empty" is obsolete.

Before I am excommunicated from the Kagyü lineage for making this statement, let me say that I am just going by what the Eighth Karmapa and Pawo Rinpoche say in The Chariot of the Tagbo Siddhas and The Commentary on The Entrance to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life. I also want to make it clear from the outset that the reason for such a statement is not at all to deprecate the contents or the value of the teachings that came to bear the name Shentong in Tibet. Rather, the reason is quite the contrary, since what is called Shentong is nothing other than the Yogacara (Yoga Practice) system of Maitreya, Asanga, and Vasubandhu, also called "the lineage of vast activity." Just like Centrism, in its rich entirety, this system is a distinct, well-established, and—at least in India—unequivocally renowned system of presenting the teachings of the Buddha.' (Karl Brunnhölzl: The Center of the Sunlit Sky, p 445)

'Question: I do not know if Rinpoche is familiar with Vedanta in the sense of Brahma's being ultimate reality and everybody's true nature being of the true nature of pure consciousness. Could he explain perhaps the difference between these two views? Rinpoche: The difference between the Hindu view and this view is that the Hindu view asserts the existence of a self, atman. The Buddhist presentation of the buddha nature also talks about the genuine self, but the genuine self is a name that is given in Buddhism to the transcendence of the self posited by the Hindus and the nonself posited by the shravakas. That is the difference. And it is a big difference.' (Khenpo Tsultrim Gyamtso Rinpoche, in Shenpen Ösel, issue 14 (vol 6, no 1-2) p 139)

'There is a great difference between "true self" as taught in the Hindu traditions and as taught in the Mahayana system. In the first sense the term "true self" denotes a self that is eternal, unique, and independent. "True self" as taught in the Uttara Tantra Shastra is equivalent to the state of peace in terms of complete freedom from any conceptual elaboration. This state of peace has only been given the name of "true self." There is a mere similarity in terms. The Mahayana system does not hold the view of an eternal, unique, and independent self. Between light and darkness, for instance, there is only a similarity inasmuch as they are both things (Skt. bhava, Tib. dngos po) fulfilling a function. Apart from that they contradict each other; there is not the slightest similarity.' (Khenpo Tsultrim Gyamtso Rinpoche, in Buddha Nature: The Mahayana Uttaratantra Shastra with Commentary, p 344-345)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 20th, 2019 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: Buddha Nature in Zen

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

history and doctrines of East Asian Buddhism and Zen.

Astus wrote:

Start with http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Translations/Awakening_of_faith.html (full book version including some commentary:

https://www.bdkamerica.org/system/files/pdf/dBET_Beta_T1666_AwakeningofFaith_2005.pdf?file=1&type=node&id=483), as it is likely the most influential treatise on the topic in East Asian Buddhism.

'Question: If such is the meaning of the principle of Mahayana, how is it possible for men to conform themselves to and enter into it?

Answer: If they understand that, concerning all things, though they are spoken of, there is neither that which speaks, nor that which can be spoken of, and though they are thought of, there is neither that which thinks, nor that which can be thought of, then they are said to have conformed to it. And when they are freed from their thoughts, they are said to have entered into it'

(AFM)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 20th, 2019 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

You know I hate to say it but a "mere" similarity is a similarity.

Astus wrote:

Don't leave out where he states: 'Apart from that'

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 21st, 2019 at 1:40 AM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

smcj said:

Shentong posits an ultimate that is completely real.

Astus wrote:

The various Abhidharmika systems posit real ultimates as well, and Yogacara (i.e. Shentong) has up to 8 unconditioned dharmas (see: Abhidharmasamuccaya, p 23). The more important question is what one calls the ultimate.

'What is taught in the Shentong tradition? The first major teaching of the Shentong is that all phenomena are mind. This view holds that all things are created by the mind. There is nothing that exists separate from the mind. Because all appearances are the mind, nothing has an existence of its own. Not only do objects have no true existence, but the perceiver of objects has no existence either. Since both subject and object have no true existence, both phenomena and the mind itself have no true existence either. When we accept this view, we see that the true nature of phenomena is emptiness. In summary, the teachings of the Shentong tradition hold that there is no reality to outer phenomena and no reality to the mind.' ...

'The Shentong tradition holds that there is the "element" (Skt. dhatu) or Buddha-nature (Skt. tathagata-garbha), also known as the dharmadhatu, and this element contains all the qualities of Buddhahood and its nature is emptiness. Buddha-nature is present within all beings at all times. It is realized at the attainment of enlightenment. But Buddha-nature is not the same as a permanent or eternal self (Skt. atman) posited by many Hindu religions. It is not the self, because the self is thought of as a real entity, whereas the Buddha-nature does not exist as an entity. Rather, Buddha-nature is devoid of its own nature. It is empty. Therefore, it is not the same as a self. By removing the obscurations and by realizing the Buddha-nature, living beings will achieve Buddhahood.'

(Two Views of Emptiness: Shentong and Rangtong by Khenchen Thrangu Rinpoche, p 114-116)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 21st, 2019 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

smcj said:

the idea that both Shentong and Hinduism assert that the relative is completely unreal and the ultimate completely real.

Astus wrote:

What do completely, real, and unreal signify?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 21st, 2019 at 5:20 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

smcj said:

I can't find my copy of KTGR's "Progressive Stages". I think it is on p.66, 2nd paragraph. If somebody else wants to post it be my guest.

Astus wrote:

'The perfectly existent nature truly exists because it exists in a non-conceptual way. In the Cittamatra the perfectly existent nature is said to be mere emptiness, in the sense of freedom from the conceptual process of distinguishing outer perceived objects as different in substance to the inner perceiving mind. In the Shen-tong it is said to be the non-conceptual Wisdom Mind itself. It is indeed empty of the conceptual process of distinguishing outer perceived objects as different in substance to the inner perceiving minds. It is also empty of the conceptualizing process that creates the appearance of a divided consciousness (vijñāna) i.e. a stream of discrete moments of consciousness with perceiving and perceived aspects. It is completely free from any conceptualizing process and knows in a way that is completely foreign to the conceptual mind. It is completely unimaginable in fact. That is why it can be said to truly exist.'

(Progressive Stages of Meditation on Emptiness, Longchen Foundation, 1994, p 84)

See also what Vasubandhu says on the matter:

'The imagined nature is said
To be defined both as existent and as nonexistent,
For on the one hand it is grasped as existent,
While, on the other,
It is totally non-existent.

The other-dependent nature is said
To be defined both as existent and as nonexistent,
For, it exists as an illusion,
It does not exist, though, in the form in which it appears.

The absolutely accomplished nature is said
To be defined both as existent and as non-existent,
For, it exists as a state of non-duality,
It is also the non-existence of duality.'
(Trisvabhavanirdeśa, v 11-13, tr Kochumuttom)

As it is summed up by Thrangu Rinpoche:

'The nature of the thoroughly established does not exist, but that very non-establishment, just as it is, is true.'
(Distinguishing the Middle from the Extremes, p 48)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 22nd, 2019 at 6:31 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

tobes said:

Practically speaking, I think the decisive difference pertains far more to conventional reality rather than ultimate.

Astus wrote:

Both sides of the two truths show significant differences, and the unity of the two is very much an exclusively Buddhist view. Buddha-nature is not simply some ultimate awareness, but it refers to the buddha qualities, the buddha bodies, and the buddha knowledges/wisdoms. For the Advaitins liberation means the end of all transitory appearances, similarly to the Samkhya teaching where Prakrti completely stops, and only the ultimate remains that practically does nothing apart from being absorbed in itself. So, the Buddhist view is that the ultimate is essentially empty and functionally active, while the Hindu one is that the ultimate is essentially substantial and functionally inactive.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 22nd, 2019 at 9:12 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

Rick said:

For Advaitins enlightenment is knowing that the person = atman = brahman.

Appearances don't end, don't even change in terms of their appearance.

Astus wrote:

That is the temporary situation of a jivanmukta who is still affected by prarabdha-karma, and after videhamukti (death) there is the total isolation in Brahman, i.e. kaivalya, where "not even an appearance of duality remains" (Vedantasara 6.226).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 22nd, 2019 at 10:54 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

Rick said:

Sometime, rarely, a living jivanmukta attains nirvikalpa samadhi, in which apparent objects are absent.

Astus wrote:

It is another good example of difference between the two systems. In Buddhism nirvikalpa-jnana (non-conceptual wisdom) does not eliminate phenomena.

'Question: When one directly realizes the ultimate, does that mean that conventional phenomena just become non-existent or go away?

Rinpoche: As for appearances of conventionalities or conventional appearances, for beginners indeed when in this state of meditative equipoise in which the mind is set evenly, fully and in a balanced manner upon the ultimate, such conventional appearances do disappear. However, when the dharmata has become fully and completely manifest, they do not. Finally, just while things are empty they appear and right when they appear, just when they appear, they are at that time empty. If it were not that way, then it would be the case that emptiness on the one hand and appearance on the other were contrary. Are those two contrary? No, they are not. It is not thus necessary that the dawning of one entails the disappearance of the other. Temporarily as one is moving along the path that is the state, but in the end no: they dawn together.' (Thrangu Rinpoche, in Distinguishing Dharma and Dharmata, p 77)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 22nd, 2019 at 11:56 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

Rick said:

How about after the death of a Buddhist enlightened being? Is it similar to a Vedantic paramukta?

Astus wrote:

No. Just consider all the functions and activities of a buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 23rd, 2019 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

Rick said:

I get that bodhisattvas agree to keep being reborn over and over and over to help nudge suffering beings towards liberation. But don't any enlightened beings get to retire and like ... melt into the universe in utter bliss when they shuffle off the mortal coil?

Astus wrote:

'Buddha activity is spontaneous because through their knowledge of variety, they do not need to think, "For whom am I doing this?" or "What way should I do this?" because they automatically know for whom and by what means they are going to act. Through the knowledge of how-it-is they understand that everything is nonexistent, unborn, and has no actual reality. So when they are acting, they do not hesitate wondering if everything is real. Knowing true emptiness, they know precisely how to act. In this way buddha activity is spontaneous and devoid of any thought and at the same time corresponds exactly to the needs of the beings they are helping.'

'Buddha activity has an unceasing character because from the very beginning, the Buddhas committed themselves to the goal of achieving Buddhahood for the sake of other beings. Secondly, the Buddhas saw the similarity between themselves and other beings and understood that if they managed to achieve Buddhahood, then everyone else could also become a Buddha. A third reason for this ceaselessness is that the number of beings is infinite and the Buddhas will never stop acting to help them until samsara is finished. So as long as there are beings in samsara, buddha activity will continue.'

(Thrangu Rinpoche, in The Uttara Tantra: A Treatise on Buddha Nature, p 166-167, 169)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 23rd, 2019 at 6:44 AM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

stevie said:

The failure here is in the initial question: there is no ultimate to be realized but all fabrications can dissolve. And when fabrications dissolve everything and nothing dissolve. It's simply cessation of consciousness due to cessation of ignorance.

Astus wrote:

Non-fabrication does not mean either a sudden disappearance of everything, nor the total cessation of mental functions. Non-fabrication means not taking appearances to be substantial, to be personal, and that way not forming attachments to them. There are actually a lot more things and beings one has no emotional relationship with than things and beings with what one has. That way one can recognise a bit of how freedom from attachment looks like.

stevie said:

But the Rinpoche just keeps on fabricating. Why does he? I don't know, maybe because he takes some of his concepts to be true, e.g. his concept 'dharmata'.

Astus wrote:

Please review what buddhahood entails: <https://studybuddhism.com/en/advanced-studies/lam-rim/refuge/the-qualities-of-buddha-s-omniscient-mind>.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 24th, 2019 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

smcj said:

I have refined my position to say that I think Shentong is panentheistic.

Astus wrote:

"Panentheism considers God and the world to be inter-related with the world being in God and God being in the world."

(<https://plato.stanford.edu/entries/panentheism/>)

What is God in Shentong?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 24th, 2019 at 4:28 AM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

smcj said:

Ultimately established Wisdom Mind.

Astus wrote:

Wisdom Mind is jnana, knowledge, and in particular the knowledge of suchness, the absence of apprehender and apprehended. It is not like God, because it is not an entity, nor is it the basis of entities, as the whole world emerges from ignorance, not knowledge, and continues to exist because of ignorance. Although beyond the impure mind there is the pure mind, saying that knowledge causes ignorance would be quite problematic.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 24th, 2019 at 6:31 AM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

smcj said:

You're hip to the fact that we're not talking about a given individuals mind, right? Think Dharmadhatu.

Astus wrote:

Dharmadhatu as the ultimate nature of everything is emptiness, only as the ultimate nature of sentient beings is there emptiness with awareness. In other words, insentient entities are neither conscious nor capable of developing or possessing any level of wisdom. Furthermore, minds are not shared on any level.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 24th, 2019 at 7:01 AM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

smcj said:

That's Nagarjuna's view.

Astus wrote:

The enlightenment of the insentient is a concept you can find in East Asian Buddhism, but not in Tibetan Buddhism. However, please provide a source for this idea taught in Shentong that the insentient have wisdom. In the meantime:

The Expanse of the Basic Element of Being

When used in terms of ultimate reality, the Sanskrit words dharmadhātu or just dhātu are understood in two main ways, which are reflected by two different Tibetan words that translate the latter term. In its most general way, dhātu in dharmadhātu refers to the ultimate nature of all phenomena—being equivalent to emptiness—which is usually translated into Tibetan as dbyings (“expanse,” “space” or “vastness”). If dhātu signifies specifically the nature of the mind of sentient beings in the sense of buddha nature as the most basic element of their entire being, it is typically rendered as khams (lit. “element”). To be sure, these two meanings and their Tibetan renderings are not necessarily regarded or employed in a mutually exclusive way. Still, generally speaking, they represent the understanding of (dharma)dhātu in Madhyamaka texts and the texts on buddha nature, respectively. Obviously, in the Dharmadhātustava and its commentaries, the term is clearly used in the latter way.
(Brunnhölzl, In Praise of Dharmadhātu, p 63-64)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 24th, 2019 at 7:06 AM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dharmadhatu as the ultimate nature of everything is emptiness, only as the ultimate nature of sentient beings is there emptiness with awareness.

Wayfarer said:

So, empty of relative phenomena, but not empty of own-being, a facet of which is awareness (cit).

Astus wrote:

Only buddha-nature is called other-empty, but it does not have any 'cit', only 'jnana'.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 25th, 2019 at 8:38 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Syllabus

Content:

Astus wrote:

For a general overview:

<https://books.google.com/books?id=fjU6AwAAQBAJ> by Johannes Bronkhorst

<https://books.google.com/books?id=Z3FuzkBnOxAC> by Paul Williams

<https://books.google.com/books?id=4p717ciuTFMC> by Peter N. Gregory

<https://books.google.com/books?id=cy980CH84mEC> by John Powers

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 28th, 2019 at 8:50 PM

Title: Re: Laymen who attain arhantship must enter the Order or attain parinirvana

Content:

prsvrnc said:

when a layman attains arhantship he must either enter the Order or pass away? How do liberated arhats living in this conventional world get by and survive (if not a trust fund)?

Astus wrote:

The answer is found in your quote: 'The fault does not lie with arahantship but with the state of a layman'. Similarly, <https://suttacentral.net/kv4.1/en/aung-rhysdavids> states: 'Now for the Arahant the lay-fetters are put away, cut off at the root, made as the stump of a palm tree, incapable of renewed life or of coming again to birth. Can you say that of a layman?' It should be clear that lay life is not simply the absence of ordination, but the whole system of living as a householder where one is bound by and engaged in various worldly duties and obligations.

Note: the above is the Theravada position on arhatship.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 1st, 2019 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Buddha Nature in Zen

Content:

SunWuKong said:

Tathāgatagarbha in Zen more than likely involves a debate between (1) and (2), negation vs. luminosity.

Astus wrote:

Those are Tibetan issues. Better go with East Asian doctrines when discussing Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 3rd, 2019 at 3:06 PM

Title: Re: Upcoming translation of Moonbeams of Mahamudra (2019)

Content:

Astus wrote:

Henrik Havlat's translation "Mahamudra: The Ocean of True Meaning" is available. So it's more like one specific translation is restricted, but neither the Tibetan, nor another translation. In any case, Thrangu Rinpoche's commentaries are very beneficial and to the point.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 4th, 2019 at 5:48 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

tobes said:

hinges much more on how language is understood than it does metaphysics

Astus wrote:

There are crucial ontological differences between Vedanta and any Buddhist (including Shentong) views. Vedanta holds consciousness an absolute, and rejects everything else. Mahamudra takes consciousness to be empty, and at the same time inclusive of all appearances. This shows well in how the two systems approaches meditation, where in Vedanta one removes impermanent phenomena and stays in the pure consciousness, while in Mahamudra one removes only attachment but does not reject appearances.

tobes said:

Vedanta means most precisely: "accepting the (epistemic) authority of the Vedas"

Astus wrote:

No. It means end (anta) of "lore" (veda), and refers to the Upanisads, as Vedantins mainly base their teachings on those texts.

tobes said:

The acceptance of the Vedas is predicated on realist notions of language, which the Indian grammarians

Astus wrote:

Vedanta teaches only one ultimate, everything else (including language) is a product of ignorance and is unreal.

tobes said:

ultimate truth is non-conceptual and non-linguistic. Finger at the moon et al.

Astus wrote:

That is not a uniquely Buddhist concept. Vedanta also aims to go beyond all mental products, but in a somewhat different manner than Buddhists, and that's where one should pay attention to.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 4th, 2019 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

Simon E. said:

Genuine Vajrayana is posited first and last on the authority of its lineage holders.

Astus wrote:

'Many religious traditions abound, hailed as oral and single-recipient transmissions.
They are acceptable if they agree with the tantras,
but otherwise they are compilations of falsifications.
There is also no harm in accepting the transmission of teachings in dreams, visions of gods, and the like, so long as these accord with sutras and tantras.
But if they do not accord with all the sutras and tantras, they should be known as demons' blessings.
A master, too, should be perceived as a master
if he is in harmony with the sutras and tantras.
But, master or no, be indifferent toward him if he does not teach in accord with the Buddha's teaching.'
(A Clear Differentiation of the Three Codes, v 532-535, p 166)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 4th, 2019 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

Simon E. said:

Are you saying that the Vajrayana is NOT posited on the authority of its lineage holders?

Astus wrote:

It is primarily the collection of tantras that defines what Vajrayana is.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 5th, 2019 at 3:53 AM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

conebeckham said:

Vajrayana Buddhism relies on the oral transmission of explanations of the tantras, themselves.

...

The text do not stand alone. At all.

Astus wrote:

I am not contradicting that at all. I called the tantras the primary definitive source because they are used as the basic reference by the teachers.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 5th, 2019 at 4:27 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

tobes said:

Where do you think that leaves the question of Brahman though?

Astus wrote:

The central point of Vedanta is the oneness of Atman and Brahman, as those are only seemingly separate but actually they are the singular pure consciousness (see e.g.: Vedantasara 1.27). The qualities that apparently distinguish the person (jiva) from the lord (isvara) come from ignorance (Vedantasara 2.35), and they are unreal, just like the rest of creation.

tobes said:

But the definition I gave is widely accepted as a central feature of what it means in relation to other Indian philosophical-Dharmic streams.

Astus wrote:

Vedanta takes knowledge as the only path to liberation, and rejects rituals as effective for that purpose.

tobes said:

How could one accept the authority of the Vedas (including the last ones/Unpanishads) whilst rejecting language as unreal? Given that, the Vedas are basically rituals to order the cosmos framed around sound?

Astus wrote:

Everything is unreal except pure consciousness, that's what advaita means, but it's not the same as denying the Vedas' authority.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 5th, 2019 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

Rick said:

My understanding is that the ultimate fruit of each is realization of nonduality. If this is true, how could there be any difference between the two? There ARE no two!

Astus wrote:

Nonduality does not have the same meaning in Buddhism and Vedanta. In Buddhism it refers to the lack of extremes, while in Vedanta it is affirming one and negating everything else.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 5th, 2019 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

Rick said:

But both distill down to: There is no essential difference between <apparent> X and <apparent> Y. No?

Astus wrote:

Please elaborate. What are X and Y?

Rick said:

That which is affirmed in Advaita Vedanta (brahman) is not an object, not a subject, can neither be said to exist nor not to exist (Shankara).

Astus wrote:

Atman/Brahman is the sole existent according to Advaita.

"The Real is: Existence-Consciousness-Bliss, Brahman, one without a second" (Vedantasara 2.33)

"whose own nature is Being, Consciousness, Bliss -- this is the Self."
(Tattvabodha)

"Brahman is Existence-Knowledge-Absolute, extremely pure, Supreme, Self-existing, Eternal, Indivisible-Bliss, not essentially different from the inmost Self , and absolutely without parts. It is ever victorious. This Absolute Oneness alone is Real since there is nothing other than the Self. Truly, there is no other independent entity in the state of full realization of the supreme Truth."

(Vivekacudamani 225-226)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 5th, 2019 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

Rick said:

It's the ultimate mystery, the unknown, sans attributes, beyond (direct) experience, no words/thoughts apply. (And even that is just another description of the ineffable.)

Astus wrote:

Then that is another difference between Buddhism and Vedanta, because what can neither be experienced nor inferred is truly unknowable and as such it is like being in love with a woman one has never known (as in the <https://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.09.0.than.html>), a meaningless idea.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 6th, 2019 at 4:30 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

It's timely to recall here the differentiation of 'experience' from 'realisation'.

Astus wrote:

There are two generally recognised sources of knowledge (pramana): perception (pratyaksa) and inference (anumana). When it comes to scriptural sources (sabda), it can be used only where there is agreement between the debaters on what constitutes accepted works, therefore in arguments between very distinct systems (like Vedanta and Buddhism) it is practically useless. As for ascertaining the ultimate truth, it is called yogic perception (yogapratyaksa), attained on the path of seeing (darsanamarga), and for Kagyupas it is the introduction to the nature of mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 7th, 2019 at 3:07 AM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I think that is what corresponds with jñāna, is it not? Or, more specifically to the Buddhist context, Prajñāpāramitā.

Astus wrote:

Yes, it is the direct experience of emptiness.

Wayfarer said:

In any case, with respect to the distinction between realisation and experience, I understand that gnosis of any kind pertains to the realm of realisation rather than experience.

Astus wrote:

"If there is no fixation involved in the process, positive spiritual experiences (nyam in Tibetan) will start to lead you to having spiritual realizations (togpa in Tibetan)."
(Mind at Ease, p 46)

Realisation is not just any kind of knowledge, it is the knowledge of emptiness that means the absence of attachment. Experiences and realisation together is the ideal path (see: Mahamudra the Moonlight, p 312-315).

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 7th, 2019 at 4:44 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

tobes said:

What's at stake in this discussion though is this: that we Buddhists charge Vedantins with clinging to existence, in lieu of how Brahman is metaphysically described. I think if that is the assertion, one needs to genuinely enter into the metaphysical debates and make that case sufficiently. Particularly because some great scholars actually think that key texts in that tradition - eg Gaudapadiya Karika - were composed by Mahayana Buddhists.

Astus wrote:

Gaudapada, Sankara, and their followers are explicit in their rejection of Buddhism, so both parties actually agree that their systems are not the same, hence this is not a debated point. See e.g. <https://www.wisdomlib.org/hinduism/book/mandukya-upanishad-karika-bhashya/d/doc143804.html>. It is rather the avoiding of definitive statements regarding the views of Buddhists and Vedantins that results in confusion, while actually both sides put in immense efforts to elaborate and specify their doctrines.

tobes said:

how tenable is that charge really, in yogic practice?

Astus wrote:

Very much. Compare the methods of pancaskandha and pancakosa. One results in the skandhas without self, the other results in the affirmation of self and the negation of the kosas.

tobes said:

Someone mentioned a Swami who watches a lot of tv during the day because of the notion of maya/illusion. I think this is a profound point of distinction, because the Buddhist will be much more careful about causation.

Astus wrote:

This is how differently they view the two truths.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 7th, 2019 at 11:30 PM

Title: Madhyamaka and Right View

Content:

stevie said:

Keeping in mind that views as such are confusion, 'views' as understood acc. to Nagarjuna.

Astus wrote:

Correct view is a basic factor of the path, even in Madhyamaka. After all, that is one of the main reasons for the teachings.

"If higher birth and freedom is your quest,
You must become accustomed to right views.
Those who practice good with inverse views
Will yet experience terrible results.
Know this truth: that men are ever sad,
Impermanent, devoid of self, impure.
Those who do not have close mindfulness,
Their view four times inverted, head for ruin."
(Letter to a Friend, v 47-48)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 8th, 2019 at 2:52 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

tobes said:

how conventional reality is understood (and practiced), than it does how the ultimate is defined

Astus wrote:

It is important to remember that the two truths in Mahayana are not opposites, nor parallels, but complementary. There is no ultimate apart from the conventional, no emptiness apart from appearances. On the other hand, in Vedanta only one is affirmed as real and everything else is negated as unreal.

tobes said:

In this case, a great deal hinges on the difference between 'like an illusion' and 'is an illusion'. If one takes the latter route, one is sailing mighty close the Vendantic sea.

Astus wrote:

Buddhism doesn't get to the point where phenomena are utterly negated. Appearances can be likened to an illusion or called an illusion, what matters is the intended meaning of those terms. Things are/like illusions because they are not substantial, i.e. empty, but being empty is not denying things, it's negating the misunderstanding about things that causes attachment.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 8th, 2019 at 3:31 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

stevie said:

And as far as Madhyamaka is concerned, if you refer to Madhyamaka as a philosophy then since philosophy is a worldly phenomenon and thus is based on views you are generally right but referring to Madhyamaka as a practice you are not generally right since e.g. in the context of practicing non-abiding Madhyamaka (Apratishthānavāda) one does not abide on/in anything and thus a view is impossible. But of course if the practice is not yet finally completed and one slips out of practice due to weakening mindfulness then one will again abide on/in views and thus the dichotomy 'appropriate vs. inappropriate views' is relevant again.

Astus wrote:

Madhyamaka is a set of teachings. When one is without elaboration, one abides in non-conceptual wisdom, then there is no point calling it Madhyamaka, only if one wants to specify what non-conceptuality means within Madhyamaka, but then one is within the realm of views. So even the correct understanding and practice of non-conceptuality is a key factor, because Vedantins and Buddhists understand not the same meaning for nirvikalpa. For Vedantins it's the elimination, the total absence of concepts, while for Buddhists it is not being attached to concepts.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 8th, 2019 at 4:49 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

tobes said:

Samvrti is still explicitly defined by Tsong Khapa as 'concealing' - and he is one of the most robust defenders of the notion of two truths being complementary.

Astus wrote:

Sure, it is concealing, since it primarily signifies the mistaken conceptions of ordinary beings. It is a later step where the two truths are realised as undivided. First one aims from samsara to nirvana.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 8th, 2019 at 5:06 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

muni said:

How can "one" be real, and "everything else" not, which is then "things" are "negated"..... by what? What sees this, what thinks this, what believes this? What experiences this? How can there be a real lasting self on its own? It would vanish when it is on its own!!! How is there "any kind of reality or self on its' own", without there "being an other" perceiving or thinking there is such?

Astus wrote:

The Atman/Brahman doesn't actually do anything in Advaita (apart from just being conscious), so when it comes to the matter of what can understand, it is the intellect (buddhi). You can find the arguments for an ultimate self in Sankara's and others' works, if you really want to dig into it.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 8th, 2019 at 5:51 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

tobes said:

Again, this sounds a lot more like Samkhya where there is hard division between mind and matter. Surely Brahman being a synonym for reality, encompasses all that is done and all that is not done. i.e. the entire play of seeming plurality-phenomena-causation-time etc is Brahman.

Maybe a modern synonym for Brahman would just be: the universe. It's definitely doing stuff!

Astus wrote:

According to, for instance, Visistadvaitins, that may be so, but for those following Gaudapada and Sankara creation is the product of ignorance and it is unreal (e.g. <https://www.wisdomlib.org/hinduism/book/mandukya-upanishad-karika-bhashya/d/doc143767.html>).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 8th, 2019 at 6:48 PM

Title: Re: Brahman and Atman in Kagyu?

Content:

muni said:

If that intellect is the same as the consciousness, then it could be like clarity emptiness but other words? Inseparable?

Astus wrote:

No, atman and buddhi are separate.

muni said:

by it is impossible to be there a one Self on itself neglecting other, whether this is then seen as a wrong one or a right one. It just has no ground to stay.

Astus wrote:

The self is believed to be the ultimate unchanging knower, and never the known. It is not uncommon that a meditator finds the perceiver/watcher/witness as independent of all the perceived phenomena, and thus assumes it to be the true mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 8th, 2019 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: Madhyamaka and Right View

Content:

stevie said:

Would it be acceptable for you if I said: 'to apply Madhyamaka reasoning to be able to drop all views and thus attain non-abiding on any view whatsoever'?

Astus wrote:

That is the usual process, and it is the process, the method, that is called Madhyamaka.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 11th, 2019 at 5:37 PM

Title: Re: "Avoid conceptualizations"

Content:

138Velo said:

quotes the Buddha from the Dhammapada

Astus wrote:

Actually, it is a quote from the Tibetan version of the

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Udanavarga>

(<https://www2.hf.uio.no/polyglotta/index.php?page=record&vid=71&level=2&cid=110538>, <https://web.archive.org/web/20170209062353/padmasambhava.ru/dharma-theory/library/udanavarga/>), that is not the same as the Dhammapada, nor does that stanza have any parallels in it.

138Velo said:

I just want to make sure I understand the word "conceptualizations" in this context.

Astus wrote:

If you follow Chodron's explanation about the four

<https://dhammawiki.com/index.php/Vipallasa>, that is fine.

138Velo said:

The only reason I ask is that I'm a little confused as to why it doesn't say "wrong conceptions" in the first line and the 3rd line if they are the same, so perhaps my interpretation is incorrect. I have to assume the original language must use different words for this? Or is it just a different way of saying the same thing, and I'm getting into the weeds on a trifle.

Astus wrote:

Lines 1 and 3 use the same word. Sanskrit: saṃkalpa; Tibetan: kun rtog (which is the same as rnam rtog, i.e. vikalpana, according to Rockhill, in Udanavarga, p 9). The word 'wrong' is added by Sparham, that's why it's in brackets. In any case, it most likely refers to the basic mistakes (i.e. ignorance about the true characteristics of things) that can be overcome by wisdom.

"Completely overcome by [wrong] conception
People develop irresistible attachments
And see [objects] as clean; the objects of Attachment increase and their bonds ensnare them.
Those who enjoy calming wrong conception,
Always mindful to meditate
On ugliness, loosen their bonds
By completely giving up their craving."
(Udanavarga 3.1-2, tr Sparham)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 16th, 2019 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: Guidance for Lay People

Content:

Astus wrote:

John R. McRae's translation:

'How are householders able to cultivate this meditation? Through the fruits of their karma of faith they can reject all material wealth, take refuge in the Three Treasures, and accept the five precepts. Neither evading, breaking, defiling, or being remiss in the precepts, they can accept the ten wholesome paths (i.e., not violate the ten precepts) and bring about the generation of the various types of wholesomeness. Cultivating chaste behavior, they will destroy the five desires. Without generating jealousy, they will have no affection for wives and children but will always take pleasure in leaving home and accepting the eight precepts. Whenever they go to the monasteries they will have feelings of shame. They will always feel reverence toward those who have left home. Never keeping secret the Dharma, they will always take pleasure in teaching others. They will think with affection and reverence of the preceptors, teachers, and those who preach the Dharma. They will think of their parents and spiritual compatriots as if thinking of the Buddha. They will reside with their parents and spiritual compatriots, helping them live in peace. This is how householders can cultivate this dharma of meditation.'

(The Sutra of Mañjuśrī's Questions, BDK ed, p 131)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 16th, 2019 at 2:30 AM

Title: Re: Guidance for Lay People

Content:

Grigoris said:

So basically to cultivate this samadhi a lay person should become a monk or nun?

Astus wrote:

Not at all. The sutra describes the expected behaviour of a devout householder.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 16th, 2019 at 5:29 AM

Title: Re: Guidance for Lay People

Content:

Queequeg said:

Applied to marriage as elective choice, the lack of affection comes across as cold, but also raises the question, why would one bother with marriage and children if one is only going to emotionally abandon them?

Astus wrote:

'Affection' (McRae), or 'passionately attached' (Swanson), are translations for 'ài' (愛), the word that in Buddhist texts are usually for craving (tṛṣṇā, rāga), but can also mean attachment, while in non-Buddhist contexts it means love. So literally the scripture says 'do not love your wife and children' (不愛妻子). It only makes sense that a householder should recognise the dangers and drawbacks of the emotional bonds for family. Of course, if one has no family and prefers renunciation over marriage, then such a person should definitely not marry (or engage in any form of sensual relation). But when one is already a family person, then seeing how the earthly love for one's family perpetuates suffering is certainly a higher level of wisdom.

The Siksasamuccaya (tr Goodman, p 81-82) has some quotes on the matter as well:

'The Inquiry of Ugra also says:

He should abstain from sexual misconduct, satisfied with his own wife, not longing for the wives of others, looking around with an eye free from attraction and a disenchanted mind. He should frequently attend to and reflect on the thought, "Sensual desires are perpetual suffering."lxvi When thoughts of sensual desire arise in him towards his own wife, and he comes under the influence of reactive emotions, then, seeing the foulness of his wife and with a frightened mind, he should not be bound by attachment to engaging in sensual pleasures, and should always reflect on impermanence, nonself, and impurity. And he should direct his mind as follows: "I should not engage in sensual pleasures even in my thoughts. How much less should I engage in erotic love or the contact of sexual organs?"

The same text says:

A bodhisattva should think about his wife in three ways. What are the three? She is my companion in pleasure and play; she is not my companion in the next world. She is my companion in eating and drinking; she is not my companion in experiencing the evolution of actions. She is my companion in happiness; she is not my companion in suffering. And another three: he should conceive of her as an obstacle to moral discipline, as an obstacle to meditative stability, and as an obstacle to wisdom. And another three: he should conceive of her as a thief, as a prisonguard, and as one of the guards of Hell.'

Nevertheless, while abstaining from any and all sensual activity is preferable, upholding moral behaviour is sufficient for householders. It is not much different from the idea of chastity.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 16th, 2019 at 3:36 PM

Title: Re: Guidance for Lay People

Content:

Queequeg said:

This whole line of practice is, frankly, shitty.

Astus wrote:

Asubha practice is usually not taught to the laity, partly because they rarely aim for renouncing lust.

Queequeg said:

That object happens to be another human being.

Astus wrote:

The object is one's conception of an external stimulus.

Queequeg said:

condemned as Hinayana

Astus wrote:

The https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ugrapari%E1%B9%9Bcch%C4%81_S%C5%ABtra is a Mahayana sutra quoted in a Mahayana treatise (<https://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Shikshasamucchaya>) by a Mahayana teacher (<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Shantideva>). Mahayana works rarely accept family life as a viable alternative to renunciation.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 16th, 2019 at 4:55 PM

Title: Re: Guidance for Lay People

Content:

如傑優婆塞 said:

It's interesting when compared and contrasted to this list...

"In five ways, young householder, should a wife as the West be ministered to by a husband:

Astus wrote:

From The Sutra on Upasaka Precepts, ch 14 (BDK ed, p 71-72):

'The west represents one's wife. If anyone can provide his wife with garments, food, bedding, medicine, and adornments such as necklaces set with precious stones, he is making offerings to the west. The wife responds in fourteen ways: (1) in whatever she does, she does her best; (2) she is constantly at work and never gets lazy, (3) she completes whatever she does; (4) she does things promptly without losing time; (5) she often entertains guests; (6) she cleans the house and bedding; (7) she is loving and speaks gently; (8) she instructs servants gently; (9) she keeps property well; (10) she rises early and goes to bed late; (11) she cooks well; (12) she is patient in receiving teaching; (13) she covers up [her husband's] faults; and (14) she takes care of her husband when he is sick.'

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 16th, 2019 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: Guidance for Lay People

Content:

Queequeg said:

It's cultivation of aversion, whether it's the being or one's idea of the being that is denigrated.

Astus wrote:

It is revulsion/disgust/turning away (nirveda), as contemplation of foulness (asubha) is the primary antidote for greed (raga).

Queequeg said:

Fortunately we have higher teachings that don't require such cultivation of basically wrong view as a cure for one's fault.

Astus wrote:

Meditation on impurities is a technique meant to overcome the misperception of impure things as pure that forms the basis of desire. If someone is not much affected by desire, then it is possible to skip to more subtle techniques to remove the root of lust. But there is no teaching where one can remain enjoying samsara and at the same time be free from it.

Nagarjuna wrote:

'The three poisons are not destroyed by themselves, and there is no other way to destroy them than to contemplate the inner and outer physical characteristics

(ādhyaṭmika bāhyakāyanimitta) to which one is attached [but that are repulsive]. The three poisons are destroyed only after this contemplation. That is why the bodhisattva who wants to destroy the poison of lust (rāgaviṣa) contemplates the nine notions [so as to teach them to beings].'

(<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225636.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 17th, 2019 at 3:27 PM

Title: Re: Recommend an English Translation of Kamalashila's (c. 9th century CE)

Bhāvanākrama

Content:

SunWuKong said:

Trying to find method for the Indo-Tibetan practice of vipaśyanā.

Astus wrote:

'Meditation and The Concept of Insight in Kamalasila's Bhavanakramas', a thesis by Martin Adams, contains a good translation of the three treatises.

SunWuKong said:

Any other ancient texts on vipaśyanā given consideration.

Astus wrote:

There are quite a lot if you call ancient everything before the 18th century, unless by "Indo-Tibetan" you mean works written by those few Indians who went to Tibet, in which case apart from Santaraksita and Kamalasila you should check out Atisa (e.g. <https://books.google.co.uk/books?id=F9aEDwAAQBAJ>).

For early sources see e.g. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dhy%C4%81na_sutras, especially the references section where you find some translations and studies.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 17th, 2019 at 4:19 PM

Title: Re: Theravadan critique - absolving karma through Bodhisattvas (other power?) clashes with the concept of individual kar

Content:

Brunelleschi said:

absolving karma through hearing the name of a bodhisattva clashes with the concept of karma as something strictly individual.

Astus wrote:

Karma is strictly individual in Mahayana as well.

'The third point is [ownership — the fact] that actions determine your personal lot. The consequences of the actions that someone has done will be experienced by that person alone: they come to maturity in the aggregates of their doer and in no one else.'

(Gampopa: Ornament of Precious Liberation, IV.6, tr Holmes)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 17th, 2019 at 5:34 PM

Title: Re: Theravadan critique - absolving karma through Bodhisattvas (other power?) clashes with the concept of individual kar

Content:

Wayfarer said:

How is that reconciled with the Pure Land principle that the recitation of the Nembutsu is all that is required for rebirth in Sukhavati regardless of one's acts?

Astus wrote:

Not even recitation is required according to some, only faith and vows. However, faith and vows are the individual's action (karma) to attain birth. What Amitabha made possible through his vows were the conditions sufficient for attaining birth. So it's like a school that accepts all applicants, but it does not mean non-applicants enter. As it's expressed in Honen's famed stanza (<http://web.mit.edu/stclair/www/honenpoems.html>):

'There is no place where the moonlight
Casts not its cheering ray;
With him who has the seeing eye
Alone that light will stay.'

On the other hand, if one being could actually change the 'karma' of another, then buddhas would have already saved everyone.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 17th, 2019 at 9:37 PM

Title: Re: Theravadan critique - absolving karma through Bodhisattvas (other power?)
clases with the concept of individual karm

Content:

Brunelleschi said:

Transformation of the seed of karma is not a thing in Theravadan Buddhism?

Astus wrote:

Not so. See e.g.: <https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an03/an03.099.than.html>

There is no real difference between Buddhist schools regarding karma, only about how the functioning of karma is explained.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 18th, 2019 at 4:02 PM

Title: Re: Theravadan critique - absolving karma through Bodhisattvas (other power?) clashes with the concept of individual kar

Content:

smcj said:

“Blessings” are what alters karma.

Astus wrote:

Blessing is a consequence of faith, it is not an external magical power changing people's karma, but a product of one's own devotion.

'The compassion and blessings of the Three Jewels are inconceivable, but nevertheless their ability to reach into us depends entirely on our faith and devotion. If you have immense faith and devotion, the compassion and blessings you receive from your teacher and the Three Jewels will be equally immense. If your faith and devotion are just moderate, the compassion and blessings that reach you will also be moderate. If you have only a little faith and devotion, only a little compassion and blessings will reach you. If you have no faith and devotion at all, you will get absolutely nothing. Without faith, even meeting the Buddha himself and being accepted as his disciple would be quite useless'

(Patrul Rinpoche: Words of My Perfect Teacher, p 173)

'Whether those blessings enter your being depends not on the object of your devotion but on your own mind. We've all heard the story about the old lady who had incredible faith and devotion toward a dog's tooth, thinking that it was the BUddha's tooth. Though it was just a dog's tooth, she received the Buddha's blessings and attained enlightenment, which was due not to the thooth but entirely to her strong faith and devotion.

The enlightened mind of the buddhas is free of partiality, so whether you receive their blessings or not depends on the strength of your devotion and your dedication to your practice.'

(Penor Rinpoche, in An Ocean of Blessings, p 9)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 18th, 2019 at 4:21 PM

Title: Re: Theravadan critique - absolving karma through Bodhisattvas (other power?)
clases with the concept of individual karm

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Extinction of Karma is the point of practice in Theravada.

Astus wrote:

Extinction of greed, anger, and ignorance is the point of any Buddhist path. Removing all past karma, that is a sort of Jain idea, and not a Buddhist one.

Johnny Dangerous said:

AFAIK in Theravada, you cannot have something like Vajrasattva-style purification, where karmic fruits ripen in a less severe way due to a practice, much less a blessing... you can just eliminate causes.

Astus wrote:

The impact of the result of past actions depends on the present state of mind. Please read the <https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an03/an03.099.than.html>. At the same time, there is no removal of past karma in Mahayana either, as one cannot just dive into the storehouse consciousness and root out seeds, rather through enlightenment the eight consciousnesses are transformed into the four wisdoms.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 18th, 2019 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: Theravadan critique - absolving karma through Bodhisattvas (other power?) clashes with the concept of individual kar

Content:

smcj said:

I think it's pertinent to this thread.

Astus wrote:

How so? It is a practice. Furthermore, it is a practice about realising that the actual nature of one's mind is pure. It is not a new idea either. See for instance:

'In meditating on one's mind, there is no mind one can seize, except the mind that comes from one's perverted thought. The mind, present in such a form rises from one's false imagination. Like the wind in the sky, which has no foothold. Such a form of the law neither appears, nor disappears. What is sin? What is blessedness? As one's own mind is void of itself, sin and blessedness have no existence. In like manner all the laws are neither fixed nor going towards destruction. If one repents like this, meditating on his mind, there is no mind he can seize the law also does not dwell in the law. All the laws are emancipation, the truth of extinction, and quiescence. Such an aspect is called the great repentance, the greatly adorned repentance, the repentance of the non-sin aspect, and the destruction of discrimination. He who practices this repentance has the purity of body and mind in the law but free as the flowing water.'

(The Sutra of Meditation on the Bodhisattva Universal Virtue, tr Bunno Kato, p 223)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 19th, 2019 at 5:22 AM

Title: Re: Theravadan critique - absolving karma through Bodhisattvas (other power?) clashes with the concept of individual karm

Content:

Matt J said:

lack of any sort of alayavijnana that can carry karmic seeds. Rather, the mind was simply a series of states of consciousness.

Astus wrote:

The idea of seeds (bija) is a Sautrantika one, while the alayavijnana (not identical to bhavanga-citta) is a Yogacara concept. Other schools had other explanations.

Pa-Auk Tawya Sayadaw (The Workings of Kamma, p 15, n 56) refers to this passage in the Visuddhimagga (XX.96, ATI ed, p 658):

'There is no heap or store of unarisen mentality-materiality [existing] prior to its arising. When it arises, it does not come from any heap or store; and when it ceases, it does not go in any direction. There is nowhere any depository in the way of a heap or store or hoard of what has ceased. But just as there is no store, prior to its arising, of the sound that arises when a lute is played, nor does it come from any store when it arises, nor does it go in any direction when it ceases, nor does it persist as a store when it has ceased (cf. S IV 197), but on the contrary, not having been, it is brought into being owing to the lute, the lute's neck, and the man's appropriate effort, and having been, it vanishes—so too all material and immaterial states, not having been, are brought into being, and having been, they vanish.'

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 19th, 2019 at 3:31 PM

Title: Re: Theravadan critique - absolving karma through Bodhisattvas (other power?) clashes with the concept of individual kar

Content:

smcj said:

Both citations are fully supportive of receiving blessings.

Astus wrote:

Sure, receiving blessings is one of the primary methods in Vajrayana. The point is, however, that blessings do not come from an external source.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 19th, 2019 at 3:36 PM

Title: Re: Theravadan critique - absolving karma through Bodhisattvas (other power?) clashes with the concept of individual kar

Content:

Wayfarer said:

the same conditions will always give rise to the same effects.

Astus wrote:

However, conditions change, hence effects change. Furthermore, the lute simile is used for the entire set of nama-rupa, and there is nothing beyond nama-rupa. This absence of a substratum beyond nama-rupa is one of the key points of the referenced section, and in relation to karma it's meant to demonstrate the lack of any karma carrier.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 19th, 2019 at 8:15 PM

Title: Re: Theravadan critique - absolving karma through Bodhisattvas (other power?) clashes with the concept of individual kar

Content:

smcj said:

My point being that the DW dismissiveness of religious faith and external divinity in Vajrayana should not go unchallenged.

Astus wrote:

This is not about having issues with faith and various beings.

One can receive blessings because of one's faith and devotion, that is why the level of purity of the object one believes in does not matter. So it is irrelevant whether the teacher is enlightened or not, and it is irrelevant whether the relic is real or fake, one receives blessings even from a fake/ordinary object as long as there is devotion, and does not receive blessings even from a real/supreme object if there is no devotion.

On the other hand, various buddha-lands have various conditions, so it does matter where one aims to gain birth, because the requirements differ. That is why mindfulness of Amitabha is called the easy way, because the requirements are easy to meet, while gaining birth in other buddha-lands is usually not possible for ordinary beings.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 19th, 2019 at 9:33 PM

Title: Re: Are there esoteric schools of Mahayana in Chinese tradition?

Content:

Astus wrote:

https://www.academia.edu/25175930/Is_there_really_Esoteric_Buddhism?fbclid=IwAR3Wa5nmvYgXZ9-DejSr-qdsF7jj7qJSn70uYCvBUc0rfsaoCBhhAljyzQ by Richard D McBride

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 19th, 2019 at 10:54 PM

Title: Re: Theravadan critique - absolving karma through Bodhisattvas (other power?) clashes with the concept of individual kar

Content:

Queequeg said:

different rates of (perceptible) change.

Astus wrote:

Somewhat relevant:

<https://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.061.than.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 20th, 2019 at 6:09 AM

Title: Re: Theravadan critique - absolving karma through Bodhisattvas (other power?) clashes with the concept of individual kar

Content:

Queequeg said:

Isn't focusing on what is unchanging what one does in practicing faith?

Astus wrote:

One puts faith in the Triple Jewel, however, those are not permanent. There are unconditioned dhammas (the number depends on the system), but having faith in them might be a bit strange (e.g. faith in space). So, one should rely on, i.e. have faith in, what is conducive to liberation, and that's how faith itself is a factor on the path to enlightenment.

BTW, the difference between the duration of material and mental moments is mentioned in Comprehensive Manual of Abhidhamma, p 154, 156-157.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 20th, 2019 at 5:08 PM

Title: Re: Theravadan critique - absolving karma through Bodhisattvas (other power?) clashes with the concept of individual kar

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I have to confess I am rather uncomfortable with that claim.

Astus wrote:

What part? Faith in the Triple Jewel, or that they're not eternal? And why?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 20th, 2019 at 7:06 PM

Title: Re: Theravadan critique - absolving karma through Bodhisattvas (other power?) clashes with the concept of individual kar

Content:

Wayfarer said:

That they're not eternal.

Astus wrote:

Faith in the Triple Jewel is quite specific. The standard script for their recollection (anussati) and praise (vandana) (SN 55.1, tr Bodhi; cf

<https://suttacentral.net/sf137/san/sander> as what's used in

<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc82362.html> by Nagarjuna):

"Here, bhikkhus, the noble disciple possesses confirmed confidence in the Buddha thus: 'The Blessed One is an arahant, perfectly enlightened, accomplished in true knowledge and conduct, fortunate, knower of the world, unsurpassed leader of persons to be tamed, teacher of devas and humans, the Enlightened One, the Blessed One.'

He possesses confirmed confidence in the Dhamma thus: 'The Dhamma is well expounded by the Blessed One, directly visible, immediate, inviting one to come and see, applicable, to be personally experienced by the wise.'

He possesses confirmed confidence in the Sangha thus: 'The Sangha of the Blessed One's disciples is practising the good way, practising the straight way, practising the true way, practising the proper way; that is, the four pairs of persons, the eight types of individuals—this Sangha of the Blessed One's disciples is worthy of gifts, worthy of hospitality, worthy of offerings, worthy of reverential salutation, the unsurpassed field of merit for the world.'"

Wayfarer said:

The reason being that the critique of impermanence (or more broadly 'the three marks') applies to the skandhas/aggregates which I parse as 'the phenomenal domain'. But the principles of Buddhism - dependent origination and karma - always obtain. They don't only apply some of the time but not other times; which is why they are realised and taught by all the Buddhas of the 'three times'. Isn't that so?

Astus wrote:

Principle and phenomena cannot be separated, there is no impermanence apart from impermanent things, no emptiness apart from the five aggregates. So although it could be said that things are always impermanent, there is no such thing as impermanence that is eternal.

'The conventional is taught to be emptiness;

The emptiness itself is the conventional;

One does not occur without the other,

Just as [being] produced and impermanent.'

(<http://www.tibetanclassics.org/html-assets/Awakening%20Mind%20Commentary.pdf>, v 68)

Although the truth of how things are is always valid, so pratyekabuddhas can attain liberation (MMK 18.11-12), they do so without the presence of a teacher, of a teaching, and of a community - i.e. the Three Jewels.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 20th, 2019 at 10:32 PM

Title: Re: Theravadan critique - absolving karma through Bodhisattvas (other power?) clashes with the concept of individual kar

Content:

SunWuKong said:

The karma from "your" past and "your" present affects more than just you, it affects everyone.

Astus wrote:

That would mean if one commits something evil, another will suffer the consequences of that act, in which case it's impossible to be free from suffering, since one is not responsible to what is experienced.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 21st, 2019 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: Theravadan critique - absolving karma through Bodhisattvas (other power?) clashes with the concept of individual kar

Content:

SunWuKong said:

People do commit evils and others do suffer as a result, correct? Freedom from suffering means one might receive the result, but they are already gone beyond...

Astus wrote:

Blaming others for one's problems, like waiting for others to fix one's problems, results in passivity and negates the point of practising the path. Furthermore, it means that people are incapable of defining what happens to them. That is why the Buddhist doctrine of karma means that the effects of actions fall on the one who did them. See the quote from Gampopa posted in this thread

<https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=490237#p490237>. And here is a commentary to it by Khenchen Thrangu Rinpoche:

'The third section describes how karma is always experienced by its creator. A loose translation would be a boomerang that always returns to the person who throws it. If we consider our actions and we ask, "Who will experience the results?" It is said that the earth will not experience the results., neither will stones or somebody else. The result will inevitably return to oneself, to the same body considered the self. If you have done something then the result will not be experienced by your children or by your neighbor, which is totally impossible. Whatever you do will necessarily come back to you; you and nobody else will have to experience the result. And there is no possible mistake; everything will return to you just because you were the one who did it.' (The Jewel Ornament of Liberation, p 87)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 22nd, 2019 at 1:13 AM

Title: Re: Theravadan critique - absolving karma through Bodhisattvas (other power?) clashes with the concept of individual kar

Content:

SunWuKong said:

I was speaking about harmfulness and harming, which you seem to deny, even though it's one of the 5 precepts.

Astus wrote:

The subject is action and effect. The Buddhist view is that everybody experiences the effects of one's own actions. You seem to claim that one can experience the fruits of others' deeds, a view that is incompatible with the Buddha's teachings.

"Student, beings are owners of karmas, heirs of karmas, they have karmas as their progenitor, karmas as their kin, karmas as their homing-place. It is karmas that differentiate beings according to inferiority and superiority."
(<https://accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.135.nymo.html>)

'When suffering, a practitioner of the Way should reflect: "For innumerable kalpas, I have pursued the trivial instead of the essential, drifted through all spheres of existence, created much animosity and hatred, maligned and harmed others endlessly. Even though now I have done no wrong, I am reaping the karmic consequences of past transgressions. It is something that neither the heavens nor other people can impose upon me. Therefore I should accept it willingly, without any resentment or objection.'" (http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enUS/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=146&Itemid=57)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 22nd, 2019 at 2:00 AM

Title: Re: Theravadan critique - absolving karma through Bodhisattvas (other power?) clashes with the concept of individual kar

Content:

SunWuKong said:

But that's not to say others have not been harmed in the process.

Astus wrote:

Whatever pain or pleasure one experiences, they are the products of one's actions. That includes those inflicted on oneself by others.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 23rd, 2019 at 6:02 PM

Title: Re: Karma and the Definition of Time

Content:

Astus wrote:

'The whole world is cause and effect; excluding this, there is no sentient being.

From factors (which are) only empty, empty factors originate.'

(Nagarjuna: The Stanzas of The Heart of Interdependent Origination, in ' http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/nagarjuna.pdf ', p 58)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 24th, 2019 at 4:08 AM

Title: Re: Becoming a Buddhist Scholar

Content:

mani said:

How does one becomes a Buddhist scholar? How to get started? Where to study? How to do it if one doesn't have any money?

Astus wrote:

If by scholar you mean an academic person, some answers have been provided, but there is no need to focus on US universities, there are several options in Europe and Asia as well.

But if you mean scholar in a more general or traditional sense, you should get started by reading, and keep doing that, until you've become well read in Buddhism. Then it's up to you how deep you want to go in what subject.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 27th, 2019 at 5:13 PM

Title: Re: 18 dhatu and samjna and vedana

Content:

Si-va-kon said:

I want to understand which of the 18 dhatus are samjna, vedana and samskara.

Astus wrote:

The dharmadhatu.

'These three skandhas, with avijnapti and unconditioned things, are the dharmayatana, the dharmadhatu.'

(AKB 1.15b-d, vol 1, p 73, tr Pruden)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 29th, 2019 at 3:24 PM

Title: Re: Emotions = suffering?

Content:

mariel.hespanhol said:

In the Four Seals, it is said that all emotions are suffering.

Astus wrote:

It is generally a good approach to look for the original term instead of an English translation.

The Tibetan has that seal as all <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Asava> (zag bcas) are duḥkha (sdug bsngal ba). At the same time, in the Dharmasamgraha (<https://www.ancient-buddhist-texts.net/Texts-and-Translations/Dharma-Sangraha/Dharmas-041-060.htm#toc14>) it is all compounded (saṃskāra) are suffering, while the <http://www.fodian.net/world/0599.html> (http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T15n0599_001) has all beings (一切皆) suffer (苦).

mariel.hespanhol said:

Am I wrong to interpret that this sentence simply means that duality is suffering?

Astus wrote:

It depends on what you understand by duality. It is probably better to say that all actions with (i.e. tainted by) clinging are related to suffering.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 29th, 2019 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: Liberate all living beings

Content:

Norden said:

Bodhisattva vows not to attain nibbana before save all living beings.

Astus wrote:

A bodhisattva vows not to attain the nirvana of the sravakas (aka nirupadisesa-nirvana) but the mahaparinirvana of the buddhas (i.e. apratisthita-nirvana), in other words, a bodhisattva aims for buddhahood and not arhatship.

Norden said:

Samsara will always exist. Even the Buddha couldn't save all living beings, how is it possible for a Bodhisattva to save all living beings?

Astus wrote:

Buddhas do not stop liberating beings.

'Without conceptual thoughts or efforts, Buddhas manifest benefit for sentient beings spontaneously and unceasingly.'

(Gampopa: Jewel Ornament of Liberation, p 297)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 1st, 2019 at 3:26 PM

Title: Re: Are there such phrases in the canon?

Content:

Viach said:

is there any evidence of such interpretations in the canon?

Astus wrote:

The very first speech of the Buddha, the <https://suttacentral.net/sn56.11/en/bodhi>, has it: 'This noble truth of the way leading to the cessation of suffering is to be developed' ('Taṃ kho panidaṃ dukkhanirodhagāminī paṭipadā ariyasaccaṃ bhāvetabban'ti). The Four Noble Truths itself tells exactly that the eightfold path is the path leading to the cessation of suffering. You may also look into the <https://suttacentral.net/sn45> for basic teachings on the N8P.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 2nd, 2019 at 3:15 PM

Title: Re: Insect karma

Content:

ydnan321 said:
I've heard that from a sutra

Astus wrote:
Any concrete title?

ydnan321 said:
the Buddha pointed at an ant and said that it had taken rebirth continuously as an ant in the same place where the past 6 Buddhas had resided. That is infinitely long... I've heard stories where animals obtained human or even heaven rebirth upon hearing the Buddha's preaching or come in contact with Buddha's holy objects...

Astus wrote:
There are implicit (neyartha) and explicit (nitārtha) teachings. Stories, especially those that involve animals, are likely to be like the fables of Aesop, not doctrinal statements.

ydnan321 said:
Why has this ant that had been residing in the same place with the past 7 Buddhas was then not able to escape its ant rebirth?

Astus wrote:
It'd be good to first know the whole story before one starts weaving further thoughts around it.

Author: Astus
Date: Friday, May 3rd, 2019 at 6:03 PM
Title: Re: Are there such phrases in the canon?
Content:

Viach said:
The Path as a result of the practice can be developed, it can arise, it can be born. The Path as a set of practices can't be developed, it can't arise, it can't be born. The Path as a set of practices can only be practiced.

Astus wrote:
The path is what one practices. There are no practices to get to the path. And the goal of the path, liberation, is what is the result of practice, not the practice itself is the result.

As it's said of the Noble Eightfold Path: "This is the only path; there is none other for the purification of insight. Tread this path, and you will bewilder Mara."
(<https://accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/kn/dhp/dhp.20.budd.html.274>)

Viach said:
the Buddha did not use phrases like 'practice of Path' or 'to practice the Path'.

Astus wrote:
It is right there as the fourth noble truth. But if you mean the Buddha did not use the English word "practice", you are right. What you find, however, is the word 'bhāveti', and it means 'to cultivate' and 'to develop'.

Katame aṭṭha dhammā bhāvetabbā? Ariyo aṭṭhaṅgiko maggo seyyathidaṃ—sammādiṭṭhi, sammāsaṅkappo, sammāvācā, sammākammanto, sammāājīvo, sammāvāyāmo, sammāsatī, sammāsamādhī.

What eight things should be developed? The noble eightfold path, that is: right view, right thought, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, and right immersion.

(<https://suttacentral.net/dn34/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 3rd, 2019 at 10:15 PM

Title: Re: Are there such phrases in the canon?

Content:

Viach said:

Does anyone know if Pali/Sanskrit has a word identical to the English word "practice"? And if so, why did the Buddha not use it, but use the word 'bhāveti'?

Astus wrote:

To <https://en.oxforddictionaries.com/definition/practise>:

1. Perform (an activity) or exercise (a skill) repeatedly or regularly in order to acquire, improve or maintain proficiency in it.
2. Carry out or perform (a particular activity, method, or custom) habitually or regularly.

Bhāveti does have a meaning similar to practising something. One of its derivatives is bhāvanā, that is commonly translated as meditation. Another word for practising is paṭipajjati, related to paṭipadā ('means of reaching a goal or destination, path, way, means, method, mode of progress') - see

<https://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=491432#p491432>: 'dukkhanirodhagāminī paṭipadā' (the way leading to the cessation of suffering) -, and it means 'to enter upon (a path), to go along, follow out (a way or plan), to go by; fig. to take a line of action, to follow a method, to be intent on, to regulate one's life'

'What is the Truth of the Path (mārgasatya)? It is the means by which one understands suffering (duḥkhaṃ parijānīte), abandons the origin [of suffering] (samudayaṃ prajāhāti), attains the cessation [of suffering] (nirodhaṃ sāṅgātkaroti) and cultivates the path (mārgaṃ bhāvayati). This, in brief, is called the characteristic of the Truth of the Path.' (Abhidharmasamuccaya, p 140-141)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 4th, 2019 at 3:48 AM

Title: Re: Are there such phrases in the canon?

Content:

Viach said:

Obviously, if the Path were a set of practices, the Buddha would use the word paṭipajjati, related to paṭipadā. But, he used the word bhāveti, associated with the word bhāvanā, i.e. Path is a description of the eight qualities of a meditative state already achieved. (Path is stable stay (in time and in circumstances) in this meditative state). Q.E.D.

Astus wrote:

Meditation is not something that just is, it is cultivation, it is training, it is practice. A path is something that leads from one place from another, it is not where one stays around. Also, you're neglecting the Four Noble Truths.

good practice - kalyāṇa vatta

'But there is this kind of good practice that has been instituted by me now, which leads to complete disenchantment, to dispassion, to cessation, to peace, to direct knowledge, to enlightenment, to Nibbana. And what is that good practice? It is this Noble Eightfold Path; that is, right view, right intention, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, and right concentration. This is the good practice instituted by me now, which leads to complete disenchantment, to dispassion, to cessation, to peace, to direct knowledge, to enlightenment, to Nibbana.'

(MN 83.21)

in these things you should all train - tattha sabbeheva ... sikkhitabbaṃ

'So, bhikkhus, these things that I have taught you after directly knowing them—that is, the four foundations of mindfulness, the four right kinds of striving, the four bases for spiritual power, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven enlightenment factors, the Noble Eightfold Path—in these things you should all train in concord, with mutual appreciation, without disputing.'

(MN 103.3)

comes to fulfilment by development - bhāvanāpāripūriṃ gacchati

'The view of a person such as this is right view. His intention is right intention, his effort is right effort, his mindfulness is right mindfulness, his concentration is right concentration. But his bodily action, his verbal action, and his livelihood have already been well purified earlier. Thus this Noble Eightfold Path comes to fulfilment in him by development. When he develops this Noble Eightfold Path, the four foundations of mindfulness also come to fulfilment in him by development; the four right kinds of striving also come to fulfilment in him by development; the four bases for spiritual power also come to fulfilment in him by development; the five faculties also come to fulfilment in him by development; the five powers also come to fulfilment in him by development; the seven enlightenment factors also come to fulfilment in him by development.'

(MN 149.10)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 5th, 2019 at 4:17 PM

Title: Re: Are there such phrases in the canon?

Content:

Viach said:

Yes, Arians are staying in one place. This place is called reality (the way it is). This is the "practice"(bhāveti) of vipashyana. They walk the path (the path of seeing (darshanamarga) and the path of intense contemplation (bhavana marga)) from the first bhumi (one place) to the tenth (another place).

Astus wrote:

You are missing the first two parts of the path, the way how one arrives at the third, the path of seeing.

'the path is fivefold: [1] path of preparation (sambhāramārga), [2] path of application (prayogamārga), [3] path of vision (darśanamārga), [4] path of cultivation (bhāvanāmārga), and [5] path of conclusion (niṣṭhāmārga).'

(Abhidharmasamuccaya, p 141)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 5th, 2019 at 4:55 PM

Title: Re: Are there such phrases in the canon?

Content:

Viach said:

On the first two paths ones do not practice 8NP.

Astus wrote:

All eight paths and three trainings are used during the first two paths. Just look at what those paths are made up of in Patrul Rinpoche's summary. At the same time, recognise that what Patrul Rinpoche describes follows the Yogacara interpretation of those paths where they fit the 37 bodhipaksadharma into a path system.

Or do you believe that there are different practices of morality, meditation, and wisdom when it's on one path or another? The application of mindfulness is the application of mindfulness, whether it's on the first or the fourth path.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 5th, 2019 at 5:46 PM

Title: Re: Are there such phrases in the canon?

Content:

Viach said:

They are fundamentally different: the first are based on the dualistic mind, the second on the non-dual prajna.

Astus wrote:

Even for a noble being there are afflictions, and afflictions can exist only based on a dualistic mind, hence the need for practising.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 5th, 2019 at 6:09 PM

Title: Re: Are there such phrases in the canon?

Content:

Viach said:

Afflictions are based on a dualistic mind, but not practice(of the fourth path). These are different things.

Astus wrote:

Since noble beings have afflictions, their practice is not based purely on non-dualistic prajna either. So, where is the difference between the application of mindfulness on the different paths?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 6th, 2019 at 1:50 AM

Title: Re: Are there such phrases in the canon?

Content:

Viach said:

Practitioners on the first two paths have no the wisdom that was realized on the path of seeing. They have nothing to get used to. The difference is here.

Astus wrote:

There are stages. First one learns (śruta), then one understands (cintā), and after that one cultivates (bhāvanā) the teaching. All three are different https://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Three_wisdom_tools.

'Firm in his cultivation, endowed with teaching and reflection, he will be capable of giving himself up to meditation.'
(AKB VI.5ab; vol 3, p 911)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 6th, 2019 at 3:37 PM

Title: Re: Are there such phrases in the canon?

Content:

Sherab said:

There is a path to cessation/liberation and there is a 'path' to buddhahood.

Astus wrote:

Only if you do not accept the ekayana doctrine is there three paths.

Sherab said:

The former path is a path in the relative. The latter path is a 'path' in the absolute. The former path is causal; the latter path is not.

Astus wrote:

Do you deny the necessity of accumulating merit and wisdom? If not, then it is very much a relative and causal path to buddhahood. If yes, then you deny the whole possibility of attaining buddhahood.

Sherab said:

Logically speaking, there is no path that can take a practitioner from the conditioned to the unconditioned. This is because what is conditioned and what is unconditioned are mutually exclusive.

Astus wrote:

There is no such thing called the unconditioned. It is the cessation of ignorance, the elimination of the two types of obscurations, that brings about enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 6th, 2019 at 6:39 PM

Title: Re: Are there such phrases in the canon?

Content:

Sherab said:

Accumulation of merit and wisdom is not denied.

Astus wrote:

then it is very much a relative and causal path to buddhahood

Without the unconditioned there is no liberation from the conditioned. Udana 8.3

'Good son, the term 'unconditioned' is also a word provisionally invented by the First Teacher. Now, if the First Teacher provisionally invented this word, then it is a verbal expression apprehended by imagination. And, if it is a verbal expression apprehended by imagination, then, in the final analysis, such an imagined description does not validate a real thing. Therefore, the unconditioned does not exist.'

(Samdhinirmocana Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 12)

Admittedly, a straightforward read of Udana 8.3 is impossible for those who believe that the relative is all there is.

Because it is relative, how could it be assumed to actually exist? Hence appearances are empty, and there is no emptiness apart from appearances.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 7th, 2019 at 4:21 PM

Title: Re: Are there such phrases in the canon?

Content:

Sherab said:

As I mentioned before, logically speaking, there is no path that can take a practitioner from the conditioned to the unconditioned. This is because what is conditioned and what is unconditioned are mutually exclusive.

Astus wrote:

That is an erroneous logic that fails to take account of what conditioned and what unconditioned mean, of what the conventional and what the ultimate truth are. From the same chapter 2 of the Samdhinirmocana Sutra (BDK ed):

'if the descriptive marks of ultimate meaning were entirely different from the marks of conditioned states of being, then those who have already gained insight into truth would not have expunged images of conditioned states of being. And if they had not expunged images of conditioned states of being, then they would not have attained liberation from bondage to those images. Not being liberated from those images, they would not be freed from bondage to their gross weaknesses. Not being freed from bondage to gross weaknesses, those who have gained insight into truth would have been unable to attain the quiescent cessation of supreme skill or full, perfect awakening. ...

Suviśuddhimati, neither is it the case that those who have gained insight into truth have not been able to expunge all the images of conditioned states of being, for they have indeed been able to expunge them. It is not the case that those who have gained insight into truth have been incapable of liberation from bondage to the images of conditioned states of being, for they have indeed been capable of such liberation. It is not the case that those who have gained insight into truth have been incapable of liberation from bondage to gross weaknesses, for they have indeed been capable of such liberation. It is precisely because they have been capable of liberation from these two obstacles that they have been able to attain the quiescent cessation of supreme skill and to realize full, perfect wisdom. Therefore, the opinion that the descriptive marks of the truth of ultimate meaning are entirely different from the descriptive marks of conditioned states of being is not reasonable. If some say that the marks of the truth of ultimate meaning are entirely different from the marks of conditioned states of being, from the above argument you should understand that this opinion is neither intelligent nor truly reasonable.'

(p 18-19)

'On the other hand, if the descriptive mark of the truth of ultimate meaning were entirely different from conditioned states of being, then it would not be true that all conditioned states of being are manifestations only of the absence of self, of the absence of essence. The marks of ultimate truth would then simultaneously be held to be characterized in two different manners, one of defilement and one of purity. But, Suviśuddhimati, these marks of conditioned things are indeed different. Those who practice meditation do search for ultimate meaning in the conditioned states of being they have seen, heard, understood, and known. Also, all conditioned states of being are indeed manifestations only of the absence of self, the absence of essence, and they are rightly termed marks of ultimate truth. It is not true that it is simultaneously characterized in two manners, one of defilement and one of purity.'

(p 20)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 8th, 2019 at 4:45 PM

Title: Re: Are there such phrases in the canon?

Content:

Sherab said:

Yes, but why should this imply that the relative is all there is?

Astus wrote:

No such implication was made. The point is that there is no unconditioned apart from the conditioned, furthermore, that there is a path to liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 9th, 2019 at 5:57 PM

Title: Re: Are there such phrases in the canon?

Content:

Sherab said:

there is a path to temporary liberation and a path to permanent liberation.

Astus wrote:

So, there is agreement on the matter of there being a path one needs to follow in order to become liberated.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 10th, 2019 at 5:59 PM

Title: Re: Are there such phrases in the canon?

Content:

Sherab said:

The path to permanent liberation is non-causal.

Astus wrote:

Among the three unconditioned dharmas (AKB I.5-6, vol 1, p 59-61) there are two types of cessation: with and without analysis, of which the former means nirvana, and the latter just ordinary cessation of things. So liberation has not only a cause in general, but it must be specific, hence the requirement for a path that leads one to freedom from afflictions. As Wangchuk Dorje explained:

'Cessation that is analytic is cessation attained by the power of analyzing suffering and the other noble truths with full knowing. Its essence is a cessation that is a removal of defiled dharmas.'

(Jewels from the Treasury, p 104)

Also, a path means a way that takes one from point A to point B. It is per definition causal, hence a "non-causal path" cannot exist.

'you absolutely must not maintain your mind in a state of waiting for awakening. If you maintain your mind in a state of waiting for awakening, then the eye of the Way will be blocked by the waiting state of your mind.'

(Letters of Dahui, p 311)

'People in many ages from the ancient past to the present have thought that the words "when the time has come. . ." are about waiting for a time in the future when the buddha-nature might be manifest before us. [They think that,] continuing their practice with this attitude, they will naturally meet the time when the buddha-nature is manifest before them. They say that, because the time has not come, even if they visit a teacher and ask for Dharma, and even if they pursue the truth and make effort, [the buddhanature] is not manifest before them. Taking such a view they vainly return to the world of crimson dust and vacantly stare at the Milky Way. People like this may be a variety of naturalistic non-Buddhists.'

(Dogen: Bussho, in SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 2, p 7)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 11th, 2019 at 3:50 PM

Title: Re: Are there such phrases in the canon?

Content:

Sherab said:

The cessation achieved by arhats is from following a causal path. That is why the Buddha has to awaken them subsequently from their temporary cessation and lead them to buddhahood.

Astus wrote:

Analytical cessation applies to both sravakas and bodhisattvas.

'Pratisamkhyanirodha is of two kinds: a. obtained by the destruction of bonds, that is to say, obtained when one has cut off the klesas that cause rebirth; b. obtained by the destruction of barriers, that is to say, realized when all remaining barriers have been cleared away.'

(Cheng Weishi Lun, p 765, tr Wei Tat)

Sherab said:

The non-causal path cannot involve any effort. To maintain the mind in a state of waiting for awakening is an effort.

Astus wrote:

Where liberation is without cause one can do nothing to become liberated, and that's why such an incorrect view can be called waiting for awakening.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 12th, 2019 at 3:30 PM

Title: Re: Are there such phrases in the canon?

Content:

Sherab said:

If analytical cessation is all that is needed, then the Buddha need not awaken arhats so as to lead them to buddhahood.

Astus wrote:

It is a type of cessation, and as such can apply to both the complete elimination of klesavarana and jneyavarana, as the provided quote from the Cheng Weishi Lun states. It does not mean that the nirvana of arhats and buddhas are identical. What it means is that the elimination of hindrances requires wisdom, it doesn't happen on its own (i.e. without cause and effort).

Sherab said:

One of the gates of liberation is wishlessness or without intent. Intent or wish is an action, an effort. To wait has the aspect of expecting something. That is an action, an effort.

Astus wrote:

Wishlessness is a type of samadhi, it doesn't mean a practitioner should be without aspiration and effort. To put it another way, there is relative and there is absolute bodhicitta, and one needs both of them. Similarly, one needs both method and wisdom, where method includes the viryaparamita.

'All of you Bhikshus! You should always single-mindedly and diligently seek the way out of all the moving and unmoving dharmas of the world, for they are all decaying, unfixed appearances.'

(http://www.cttbusa.org/bequeathed_teaching/sutra.htm)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 13th, 2019 at 4:19 PM

Title: Re: Are there such phrases in the canon?

Content:

Sherab said:

You have not explained why arhats need to be awakened by the Buddha.

Astus wrote:

I have not even touched that topic, so what explanation do you want?

Sherab said:

There are the other two gates of liberation: signlessness and emptiness. They do not mean that the practitioner should be without discrimination of signs and without discrimination of emptiness? (warning: double negatives)

Astus wrote:

The problem is not with the phenomena that occur, it is with the identification with and grasping at them. Aiming for blankness is the wrong approach.

Sherab said:

I don't understand this part of the quotation: "... unmoving dharmas of the world ...

decaying, unfixed appearances". What do you think are the unmoving dharmas of the world that are decaying, unfixed appearances?

Astus wrote:

Moving dharmas refer to the kamadhatu, unmoving dharmas refer to the rupadhatu and arupadhatu (as they're the dhyana realms), so together they mean the three realms, the whole of samsara. (<http://ddc.shengyen.org/mobile/text/07-13-2/86.php>)

Sherab said:

If the relative is all there is

Astus wrote:

See my <https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=492136#p492136>. Also note that the doctrine of the two truths is fairly universally accepted among Buddhists.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 14th, 2019 at 5:57 PM

Title: Re: Are there such phrases in the canon?

Content:

Sherab said:

subsequently to follow a non-causal path to attain permanent liberation.

Astus wrote:

What non-causal path would that be? Sravakas change to the bodhisattva path that consists of accumulating wisdom and merit through the cultivation of the paramitas, i.e. a causal path.

Sherab said:

It is not a non-causal path.

Astus wrote:

What is a non-causal path?

Sherab said:

Then the quote that you provided previously does not imply that there is no non-causal path.

Astus wrote:

Since both sravakas and bodhisattvas attain liberation through analytical cessation, and analytical cessation involves intention, effort, etc., it is not without cause. Apart from those two what could you call a non-causal path?

Sherab said:

was intended to show that there is a non-causal path.

Astus wrote:

That sutta says nothing about a path. It simply states that there is nirvana, the unborn and undying, the cessation of suffering. Therefore, it is relevant for the 3rd noble truth, the goal, but not the path (i.e. the 4th noble truth).

Sherab said:

In fact, it is more indicative of the relative is NOT all there is.

Astus wrote:

Agreed, and that was not a contended point. What does that have to do with what sort of non-causal path?

Sherab said:

If the relative is all there is

Astus wrote:

That is not anyone's position, consequently problems of a non-existent position are not actual problems.

Sherab said:

If the relative is all there is, the cessation of consciousness results in annihilation.

Astus wrote:

Since there has never been a self, what/who is annihilated? Also, consciousness is impermanent, rises and ceases every moment, so you might as well say that there is annihilation all the time, however, because there is also birth every moment, it is not really annihilation.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 15th, 2019 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: Do Bodhisattvas and non-historical Buddhas "exist"?

Content:

KiwiNFLFan said:

do Bodhisattvas, Dharma Protectors, non-historical Buddhas like Amitabha and the Medicine Buddha actually "exist"?

Astus wrote:

Yes, although calling them "non-historical" is questionable.

KiwiNFLFan said:

What I mean is, is there an actual being called Avalokiteshvara out there somewhere, presumably in a non-corporeal form, who listens to the cries of the world and helps those who call upon Him/Her?

Astus wrote:

Yes, but only beings in the formless realms have no body.

KiwiNFLFan said:

Also, does this vary across schools of Mahayana Buddhism? Are some schools more likely to say that Buddhas and Bodhisattvas are real, while others are not?

Astus wrote:

People accustomed to a materialist view have trouble dealing with some basic parts of Buddhism. Nevertheless, even if somebody cannot yet accept a different view and needs think of them as symbols, just by appreciating the symbolism there is a connection.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 15th, 2019 at 10:51 PM

Title: Re: Are yidams and Tibetan Buddhist "deities" actually real?

Content:

Astus wrote:

'The dharma protectors serve entirely to increase all favorable conditions for our dharma practice and to help us remove the various obstacles which can arise in our dharma practice. It is very important that we really believe that they are really there and that we have confidence in their power to help. If we do not have this complete confidence, we will receive little benefit from them.'

(Thrangu Rinpoche, in The Three Vehicles of Buddhist Practice)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 16th, 2019 at 2:07 AM

Title: Re: Are yidams and Tibetan Buddhist "deities" actually real?

Content:

Astus wrote:

'The question of the degree of existence of the yidams is often asked. Yidams really exist, but in a way different from ours, because they are not conditioned by karma.

Avalokita, for example, is an emanation of the compassion of all the Buddhas, appearing with the intention of helping all beings. It is a totally pure manifestation from its origin, and is in no way the result of karmic causes supplying the white color of its body, the lotus in the left hand, the rosary in the right hand, and the other characteristics. The different traits and attributes of Avalokita are only the formal expression of compassion.

Likewise, its two eyes mean that it possesses perfect knowledge and compassion. With the first eye, it completely knows the totality of phenomena of the cycle of existence and liberation. Having the eye (Tibetan, chen) of compassion, unceasingly (Tibetan, re) it watches (Tibetan, zig) beings with love. Consequently, its name in Tibetan is Chenrezig. The silks and jewels are worn to indicate that it is endowed with all the qualities of Awakening.'

(Kalu Rinpoche: Secret Buddhism, p 22-23)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 16th, 2019 at 3:04 PM

Title: Re: Do Bodhisattvas and non-historical Buddhas "exist"?

Content:

KiwiNFLFan said:

So if only beings in the formless realms have no body, then do Avalokiteshvara, Manjushri, Ksitigarbha etc have some form of body, even if it isn't the flesh and blood body of a human being?

Astus wrote:

Bodhisattvas, similarly to other beings, are reborn in the three realms. The difference between the rebirth of noble (awakened) and ordinary beings is that the former is not driven by afflictions but by compassion and vows.

KiwiNFLFan said:

Also, is it okay for Mahayana Buddhists to pray to Buddhas/Bodhisattvas for help with day-to-day problems, the way Christians or Hindus pray to their God(s)?

Astus wrote:

Of course.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 16th, 2019 at 5:21 PM

Title: Re: Do Bodhisattvas and non-historical Buddhas "exist"?

Content:

£$&^@ said:

is a literalist interpretation and is not taught by all Vajrayana teachers.

Astus wrote:

What part is not taught? That bodhisattvas are born in samsara, that the birth of arya bodhisattvas is different from ordinary beings, or that it is OK to pray to them?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 27th, 2019 at 8:03 PM

Title: Re: anti-"Hinayana" bias in Zen (and Mahayana in general)

Content:

DharmaChakra said:

Traditions are separated by cultural differences only

Astus wrote:

Differentiating the three families (gotra) of sravaka, pratyekabuddha, and buddha is an Indian Buddhist doctrine that is accepted by all surviving Buddhist schools, regardless of location.

'The nirvedhabhagiyas are of three types by reason of the distinction of the three gotras or families. The ascetic belongs to the family of the Sravakas, Pratyekabuddhas or Buddhas; and Heat, the Summits, etc., are of the family of the ascetic who cultivates them.'

(Abhidharmakosabhasyam, vol 3, p 940, tr Pruden)

DharmaChakra said:
the essence of the practices is one

Astus wrote:
What essence?

DharmaChakra said:
Intellectuals study concepts ... Yogis study states of being

Astus wrote:
States of being are concepts as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 31st, 2019 at 4:08 PM

Title: Re: anti-"Hinayana" bias in Zen (and Mahayana in general)

Content:

Astus wrote:

It doesn't really make sense to unify schools. Mahayana includes and accepts the Agamas and Abhidharma works, while if a Theravadin were to accept Mahayana scriptures and treatises that would simply make that person a Mahayana follower, unless they come up with a new explanation of how the Mahayana is a subsidiary of the Theravada doctrines, thus not unifying the schools but actually creating a new one.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 2nd, 2019 at 6:40 PM

Title: Re: anti-"Hinayana" bias in Zen (and Mahayana in general)

Content:

Grigoris said:

The current form of Theravada is a 19th century reformation movement.

Astus wrote:

That is a serious simplification, that could as well be applied to the various Mahayana schools as well. For instance, just because the Rime movement appeared in the 19th century, and Humanistic Buddhism in the 20th, it does not render the whole of Mahayana a new thing.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 2nd, 2019 at 9:15 PM

Title: Re: anti-"Hinayana" bias in Zen (and Mahayana in general)

Content:

Grigoris said:

Theravada is not a Yana, it is a sub-category of the Shravakayana.

Astus wrote:

Theravada is a school all right, but it's neither limited to the sravaka path, and more importantly, nor is it a unified tradition. Even in the same country there are different teachers with diverse methods. Theravada is a living tradition, and the fundamental teachings and practices go way back before the 19th century. E.g. Buddhaghosa, Theravada's probably most influential teacher, lived in the 5th century.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 2nd, 2019 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: anti-"Hinayana" bias in Zen (and Mahayana in general)

Content:

Grigoris said:

plenty of in-fighting regarding the validity of Buddhaghosa and his Visudhimagga?

Astus wrote:

It doesn't change his importance. Furthermore, the modern changes in Theravada does not negate the tradition's roots and continuity. For instance, there were significant reforms in the Soto and Rinzai schools in the last couple of centuries, but those do not make them disconnected from their past history.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 3rd, 2019 at 2:34 AM

Title: Re: anti-"Hinayana" bias in Zen (and Mahayana in general)

Content:

Grigoris said:

But I do not believe that they are the same thing that existed in the Buddha's time...

Astus wrote:

Nothing remains the same, right? Nevertheless, the Buddhadharma is still present and alive today, so it's not yet lost either, consequently one can learn it now just as much as one could at the time of the Buddha. The main point is that current Theravada is not a product of a 19th century reform, nor was there any one reform in the 19th century that affected the entirety of Theravada. Also, reformations of Buddhist communities is not a new phenomenon, as it's occurred several times where people intended to return to or keep the correct teaching (e.g. in Sri Lankan Buddhism: the writing down of the Tipitaka, the revival and reform during the Polonnaruwa era (11-13th c.), the revival and reform of the monastic community by the rulers of Kandy during the 16th and 18th centuries).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 3rd, 2019 at 5:42 PM

Title: Re: anti-"Hinayana" bias in Zen (and Mahayana in general)

Content:

Astus wrote:

Taking the topic back on Zen, here are some quotes:

'Because of their inferior capacity, the Tathagata preached to the Hinayanists only the doctrine of the nonexistence of atman and did not preach his doctrines in their entirety; as a result the Hinayanists have come to believe that the five components, the constituents of samsaric existence, are real; being terrified at the thought of being subject to birth and death, they erroneously attach themselves to nirvana.'

(Asvaghosa: The Awakening of Faith, BDK ed, p 57-58)

'To awaken to the incomplete truth of voidness of self and then practice is inferior-vehicle dhyana.'

(Chan Prolegomenon, in Zongmi on Chan, p 103)

'One just cultivates the discerning wisdom of non-self (the truth of the path) in order to cut off passion, etc., stop all karma, and realize the thusness of voidness of self. He obtains the fruit of stream enterer, [the fruit of once returner to this world, and the fruit of non-returner to this world,] up to and including extinguishing all evil bonds and obtaining the fruit of arhat (the truth of extinction). Having burned up body and extinguished knowledge, he is eternally free of all suffering.'

(Chan Prolegomenon, in Zongmi on Chan, p 126-127)

'If he activates the various ascriptive views for a single moment, he will fall into the way of heresy. If he perceives there to be generation [of the elements of reality] and moves toward [a state of] extinction, he will fall into the way of the sravakas. If he does not perceive there to be generation but only perceives extinction, he will fall into the way of the solitary enlightened ones (pratyekabuddhas).'

(Huangbo Xiyun: Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 24)

'The party of perverse teachers teaches members of the scholar- official class "to unify mind, to do stillness- sitting, to pay no attention to any matter [mundane or supramundane], and to go on stopping- to- rest." Isn't this nothing other than using [false] mind to put [false] mind to rest, using [false] mind to put a stop to [false] mind, using [false] mind to exert [false] mind? If you practice in this way, how could you not fall into an outside Way or into the extremist annihilationism of "Chan peace and quiet" found in the Hinayāna-hearer and private-buddha vehicles?'

(Dahui Zonggao, in The Letters of Chan Master Dahui Pujue, p 126)

(Moreover, as the Dharma Master Wonhyo said:)

'Furthermore, in Lesser [Vehicle] sages's assumptions about the mind, because initially the nature is produced, through progressively subtle mental states (viz., lesser sages gain access [to higher states of meditative absorption] through the three expedients of gradual subtlety, gradual refinement, and refined refinement), [those sages] attain mental extinction; [however, since this state] is devoid of wisdom or its radiance, it is no different from empty space. In Great Beings' [S. Mahāsattva] understanding of the mind, because originally the nature is unproduced, [those bodhisattvas] do not aspire to extinction by leaving behind subtle thoughts; rather, through the presence of authentic, radiant wisdom, they realize the dharmadhātu.'

(Bojo Jinul: Encouragement to Practice: The Compact of the Samādhi and Prajñā Society, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 2, p 131)

'Some people do not realize that the nature of merit and demerit is empty; they sit rigidly without moving and suppress both body and mind, like a rock crushing grass. To regard this as cultivation of the mind is a great delusion.

For this reason it is said, "Śrāvakas eradicate their delusions thought after thought, but the thought to perform this eradication is a brigand."

(Bojo Jinul: Moguja's Secrets on Cultivating the Mind, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 2, p 228)

'In the zazen of patch-robed monks, first you should sit correctly with upright posture. Then regulate your breath and settle your mind. In the lesser vehicle originally there were two gateways, which were counting breaths and contemplating impurity. In the lesser vehicle, people used counting to regulate their breath. However, the buddha ancestors' engaging of the way always differed from the lesser vehicle.

A buddha ancestor said, "Even if you arouse the mind of a leprous wild fox, never practice the self-regulation of the two vehicles."

(Dogen: Eihei Koroku, p 348)

'Those of the two vehicles are distressed and fall into empty voidness; ordinary people are attached and tangled up in discriminations.'

(Dogen: Eihei Koroku, p 375)

'The ancestral teacher Nagarjuna said, "Zazen is exactly the Dharma of all buddhas, and yet, those outside the way also have zazen. However, those outside the way make the error of attaching to its taste and to the thorns of false views. Therefore it is not the same as the zazen of buddhas and bodhisattvas. The two vehicles of Śrāvakas [and pratyekabuddhas] also have zazen. However, those two vehicles [seek to] control their own minds, and have the tendency of seeking after nirvana. Therefore, this is different from the zazen of buddhas and bodhisattvas."

The teacher Dogen said: The ancestral teacher Nagarjuna spoke like this. We should know that although the name of zazen (sitting meditation) is used by those of the two vehicles and those outside the way, it is not the same as the sitting transmitted by buddha ancestors.'

(Dogen: Eihei Koroku, p 459)

'A questioner asked: "If one were truly able to attain an empty mind, would he return directly to the void, never to be born again?"

Bassui responded: "That is the view of nonexistence held by heretics and those of the two vehicles. Of what value could this be to one who has obtained the Way? Actually, holders of this view are inferior to dogs and wild foxes."

(Mud and Water: The Collected Teachings of Zen Master Bassui, p 176)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 4th, 2019 at 3:28 PM

Title: Re: anti-"Hinayana" bias in Zen (and Mahayana in general)

Content:

Varis said:

Grigoris is correct, it's really not an oversimplification at all. There was a concerted effort to remove what was regarded by the Dhammayuttika Nikaya as superstitious and non-Buddhist practices from Theravada monasteries. In effect, it was a protestantization of Theravada Buddhism.

Astus wrote:

First of all, that is only Thailand, not the whole of Theravada. Secondly, even in Thailand the Dhammayuttika Nikaya is still a small minority (around 10% of all monks) after over a century of strong state support.

So stating that the current form of Theravada is the product of a 19th century reform still looks very much like an oversimplification. It is actually similar to how 20th century "reformed" Japanese Zen was projected on the whole of East Asian Buddhism, while it was just the idealised image of a few people (like DT Suzuki).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 4th, 2019 at 6:42 PM

Title: Re: Stumbled across Thich Thanh Tu's Truc Lam Thien materials in English...

Content:

Astus wrote:

See also previous topic: <https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?t=11662>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 4th, 2019 at 7:50 PM

Title: Re: Stumbled across Thich Thanh Tu's Truc Lam Thien materials in English...

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are two other parts I'd highlight.

On meditation and study

(http://www.tvvu.thienvienvouu.com/media/NOI%20QUY%202018%20-%20Ban%20In%20Lan%20_VO%20UU.pdf, p 53-55):

Since Vietnamese Buddhism inherits the treasure of Meditation Tradition but fails to faithfully preserve it so this tradition has been deviated. Henceforth, meditation monasteries advocate Dual Practice of Meditation and Study, that is the practice of meditation and study of sutras and discourses on the Dharma. Moreover, at the present time, many Vietnamese monastics practice meditation but few truly practice Orthodox Meditation Tradition, they may be easily misled; consequently, they may become physically ill or mentally disturbed. So, if meditation monasteries do not introduce the study of sutras and discourses taught by the Buddha and Patriarchs to provide strong support to Meditation Tradition, many monastics would not be able to avoid uncertainty and nervousness. That is the fundamental reason monastics in meditation monasteries must study sutras and discourses.

On sitting meditation

(http://www.tvvu.thienvienvouu.com/media/NGHI%20THUC%20THIEN%20MON%202018_Ban%20In%20Lan%20_VO%20UU.pdf, p 127-131):

There are three methods for beginning practitioners:

a. Counting The Breath Method: “Sổ” means to count, “tức” means breath, “counting the breath method” signifies observing the in-and-out breaths, counting silently from one to ten. There are two ways to count the breaths: fast and slow.

Fast counting: Inhale completely, count “one”, exhale totally, count “two”..., continue to “ten”. Then restart from “one”. [Keep counting in this manner during the entire sitting meditation session.]

Slow counting: Inhale completely and exhale totally, count “one”; inhale completely and exhale totally, count “two”, continue to “ten”. Then restart from “one”. Keep counting in this manner during the entire sitting meditation session. While counting from “one” to “ten”, halfway if forgetting or suspecting that the numbers are mixed up, restart the counting from “one”.

Having practiced for some time, practitioners count correctly without making mistakes, then they can proceed to the Observing The Breath Method.

b. Observing The Breath Method:

“Tùy” means observe, “tức” means breath. “Observing the breath method” signifies following and observing the breath. As we inhale, we know where the breath is, as we exhale we also follow and observe the breath, we are fully aware of it. While observing the breath, the practitioners also realize that life exists in the breathing. Exhaling without inhaling, life stops existing. The breath is impermanent, life is also unstable, unreal and temporary.

When the breath observation is skillfully practiced, the practitioners can proceed to the next stage:

Recognizing The True Mind.

c. Recognizing The True Mind:

This is the essential part of the Zen meditation practice in Zen meditation centers.

From the practice of observing the breath,

- The practitioners progress to the stage of stopping the observation, the mind is peaceful and concentrated.

- At this moment, the practitioners consistently remind themselves “Mind-consciousness fully aware of its mental objects is True Mind”.

- Reminding in this manner until the True Mind is recognized, then we only need to acknowledge that “True Mind is present”.

Pay attention to the practice at this stage, it should not be too tense, be awake and clear-minded, gently preserve the practice. Once fully adept with recognition of the presence of the True Mind’s awareness, then proceed on to the stage of living with the True Mind’s nature.

The practitioners recognize that True Mind signifies “know perpetually and clearly without thoughts”.

- Perform this practice until completely skillful, only keep in mind the two words “no thoughts”.
- Abandon the two words “no thoughts”, thus, the mind is limitless and everlasting. If feeling dreamy or drowsy, open eyes wide, reorganize the practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 4th, 2019 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: anti-"Hinayana" bias in Zen (and Mahayana in general)

Content:

Grigoris said:

the Thai context

Astus wrote:

The vast majority of current Thai monks do not belong to the reform movement started in the 19th century. That does not mean nothing has changed, but at least there wasn't any controlled change either.

Grigoris said:

I find it very difficult to believe that Lankan Theravada would not have been influenced by this long-standing spiritual and academic tradition.

Astus wrote:

It was in the 12th century that Parākramabāhu I "purified" the monastic community, and practically abolished non-Theravada communities, that resulted in the gradual disappearance of other schools.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 5th, 2019 at 4:04 AM

Title: Re: Stumbled across Thich Thanh Tu's Truc Lam Thien materials in English...

Content:

Sentient Light said:

I think what he's doing is pointing out that the whole Vipassana-only kind of meditation isn't traditional, isn't founded in the scriptures we have from the Buddha (even the Nikayas/Agamas), and doesn't have an ancient lineage of meditation instruction connected to it.

Astus wrote:

Aren't there monasteries that maintain Mahayana and Thien practices? On the other hand, Thich Thanh Tu revived/reinvented the Truc Lam school that died out centuries ago, so wouldn't his criticism about the lack of 'Orthodox' tradition apply more generally than just those who took up Vipassana?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 5th, 2019 at 6:44 PM

Title: Re: anti-"Hinayana" bias in Zen (and Mahayana in general)

Content:

Varis said:

Their ideas on meditation were modern, based on their westernized interpretations of the suttas and the vishuddhimagga.

Astus wrote:

What is a westernised interpretation?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 6th, 2019 at 2:54 AM

Title: Re: Zen Practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

Basically there are two types of Zen practices: kanhua/kanna 話頭 and mozhao/mokusho 默照. For a short summary see:

<http://chancenter.org/download/free-books/In-the-Spirit-of-Chan.pdf>. On kanhua practice see: http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/bbs/board.php?bo_table=3020; and on the mozhao practice: https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/leaflet/heartofzen/pdf/Heart_of_Zen.pdf. Also, as a counterbalance to oversimplification, you might want to read:

<http://chancenter.org/download/free-books/ChanPracticeandFaith.pdf>.

But there are many variations on them, so Zen practice can actually mean quite a few things.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 6th, 2019 at 10:22 PM

Title: Re: Choosing between Chan, Zen, Jìngtǔzōng, and Jōdo Shinshū

Content:

Astus wrote:

Chan and Pure Land should not really be thought of as separate schools, they're rather Mahayana methods that can be used either together or apart.

For a clearer picture, see these for instance:

http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/pureland.pdf

<https://archive.org/details/PureLandPureMind/page/n3>

https://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/yin_kuang.pdf

<https://www.ymba.org/books/buddhism-wisdom-faith-pure-land-principles-and-practice>

<https://www.ymba.org/books/mind-seal-buddhas>

<https://www.ymba.org/books/taming-monkey-mind-guide-pure-land-practice>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 7th, 2019 at 4:17 PM

Title: Re: anti-"Hinayana" bias in Zen (and Mahayana in general)

Content:

Varis said:

A Buddhism devoid of so-called "superstition", divorced from popular Theravada at that time.

Astus wrote:

If I get you right, the westernised interpretation means relying on canonical scriptures and rejecting practices that cannot be derived from them. If so, that is not necessarily a western idea, as that view is found at other times and other places in Buddhism. On the other hand, even if it's considered an external influence, as it simply means emphasising canonical authority, it is not introducing something new or foreign. Also, have those popular practices disappeared, or is it more like being less accepted among certain monastics?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 7th, 2019 at 6:49 PM

Title: Re: anti-"Hinayana" bias in Zen (and Mahayana in general)

Content:

Grigoris said:

Who gets to decide what is canonical?

Astus wrote:

E.g. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sixth_Buddhist_council

Grigoris said:

Who gets to assess derivation?

Astus wrote:

That's probably up to each individual/organisation.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 9th, 2019 at 4:06 PM

Title: Re: Shouting, Hitting, etc.

Content:

Astus wrote:

First of all, gongans are literary works and not historical accounts. As religious anecdotes they have their place and function, but their use depends on the users, i.e. how one reads them. Although it was Dahui who spread the kanhua method that became the dominant technique in Chan, the use of stories as a way to establish a Chan identity can be traced back as far as the Record of the Transmission of the Dharma Jewel (Chuan Fabao Ji 傳法寶紀) and the Record of Teachers and Disciples of Lanka (Lengjia Shizi Ji 楞伽師資記), both being early 8th century texts found in the caves of Dunhuang.

So, if you're looking for masters who teach like those in the stories, that is understandable, but not realistic. Although there are rituals that replicate gongan-like events (e.g. Dharma combat ceremony - called hossen shiki 法戰式 in Soto), and there can be individual situations where a shout or a hit is used, but unfortunately there is no simple and easy way to awakening. Hanshan

<https://terebess.hu/zen/mesterek/HanshanDeqing.html#c>: "If it was actually so easy to become awakened to the Way as [claimed by] people of the present, then considering the integrity of practice of ancients such as Chang Ching who wore out seven sitting cushions and Chao Jou who for thirty years permitted no unfocused use of mind, those ancients had to have been of the very dullest of faculties. They wouldn't even be fit to serve you moderns by holding your straw sandals!" And Xuyun said

(https://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Master_Hsu-

Yun_Discourses_and_Dharma_Words.pdf): "When the ancient masters received their students, either they used their staffs (to beat them) or they shouted (to wake them up) and there were not so many complications. However, the present cannot be compared with the past, and it is, therefore, imperative to point a finger at the moon."

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 9th, 2019 at 4:20 PM

Title: Re: "Never an Institutionally Separate Chan School..."

Content:

Dgj said:

What does this mean? That people in, for example, the Tang dynasty, wouldn't even know what the Chan school was? Wouldn't know a single person denoted as a Chan Master? Are all Chan labels and persons only known as such in retrospection?

Astus wrote:

'the entire lineage prior to the Song is best understood as a mythical construct, a sacred history that served to legitimize the Song Chan school and its claim to possess a special transmission. Even in the Song, the Chan lineage was subject to constant manipulation and reinterpretation in order to legitimize the lineages of certain masters and their descendants or to bolster polemical and religious claims.

In any case, the only clearly defining characteristic of a Song Chan master was that he or she was recognized as holding a transmission in the Chan lineage. Only such a person was a member of the "Chan school." As T. Griffith Foulk has pointed out, there was no special category of "Chan monastics" in the Song, because there was no special Chan ordination. In China, unlike in Japan, all monastics were, and still are, ordained into the general Buddhist order and not into a particular sect. The vast majority of monks and nuns did not aspire to membership in the Chan transmission family or any of the other transmission families that appeared in the Song. Those who did, however, typically underwent decades-long training in special public monasteries, and only then would they receive the transmission and become members of their master's lineage. However, among the Song secular elite, just like in modern popular understanding, Chan was considered distinctive not so much for its lineage as for its unique literature and its depictions of iconoclastic Chan masters.'

(How Zen Became Zen by Morten Schlütter, p 15)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 10th, 2019 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: Shouting, Hitting, etc.

Content:

Dgj said:

what of Shen Hui's Zen? ... Since all schools trace their roots to Shen Hui, shouldn't all, or at least a few teach this Zen?

Astus wrote:

The only notable person who claimed to be a descendant of the Heze School was Guifeng Zongmi, and he actually included seated meditation as an important practice, furthermore, he was the one advocating the format of "sudden enlightenment, gradual practice" based on Shenhui's teachings. After Zongmi there is no outstanding teacher of the Heze line, although his ideas lived on in the teachings of Yongming Yanshou and Bojo Jinul. By the Song era all schools traced their lineage through Huineng's two putative disciples: Qingyuan Xingsi and Nanyue Huairang; while Shenhui was put aside as a second rate student who stuck to the concept of awareness/knowing (zhi 知).

If you're looking for teachers who did away with the various methods, Bankei Yotaku was one such individual, and more recently Daehaeng Kun Sunim.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 10th, 2019 at 2:02 AM

Title: Re: "Never an Institutionally Separate Chan School..."

Content:

Dgj said:

It sounds like this author fleshed out what Mcrae probably hoped to say by implication: Chan was never an institutionally separate school at any time in Chinese Buddhist history before the Song.

Astus wrote:

Chan was never an institutionally separate school, full stop. What developed during the Song was the system of Chan lineages to legitimise the superiority of a small group of elite monastics that made them seemingly more qualified to lead monasteries than other candidates. But just because the abbot belonged to a Chan lineage, that did not have to affect the lives of the monks themselves, and it did not change the ordination process, nor the financial matters of the monastery.

Dgj said:

Could the pre Song Chan masters just as easily be claimed by another school, or seen as independent, and unrelated to Chan?

Astus wrote:

There isn't that much information about most of the Tang era masters, apart from what was written centuries later about them or in their names. Guifeng Zongmi, for instance, is regarded not only as a Chan teacher but also as the fifth patriarch of Huayan.

Dgj said:

What about all the famous Tang masters? Were they all part of some type of group that worked and taught in the same system at least? Or were they totally unconnected, and were teachers of different schools, re labeled as teachers all in one lineage only post humously?

Astus wrote:

Chan was not and is still not a unified organisation.

Dgj said:

How and why did this happen? Someone out of nowhere, said: Let's make up a school, call it Chan, and say that all these Buddhist monks from history were members of this school? Surely it cannot be that simple and guileful?

Astus wrote:

You should definitely read Schlütter's book, plus others like:

The Northern School and the Formation of Early Ch'an Buddhism by John R. McRae

The Power of Patriarchs: Qisong and Lineage in Chinese Buddhism by Elizabeth A. Morrison

Enlightenment in Dispute: The Reinvention of Chan Buddhism in Seventeenth-Century China by Jiang Wu

Readings of the Platform Sutra by Morten Schlütter, Stephen F. Teiser

Monks, Rulers, and Literati : The Political Ascendancy of Chan Buddhism by Albert Welter

The Linji Lu and the Creation of Chan Orthodoxy: The Development of Chan's Records of Sayings Literature by Albert Welter

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 10th, 2019 at 5:55 PM

Title: Re: "Never an Institutionally Separate Chan School..."

Content:

Dgj said:

What about simply what these people were called? Were Linji and Chou Chou known as Chan teachers/practitioners in their time? Or were they probably known as members of some other school until the word "Chan" started to be applied to them after the fact?

Astus wrote:

'Chan does not define itself as being one among a number of Buddhist schools based on a particular scripture (such as the Tiantai [Tendai] school with its emphasis on the Lotus Sutra, for example). Instead, Chan texts present the school as Buddhism itself, or as the central teaching of Buddhism, which has been transmitted from the seven Buddhas of the past to the twenty-eight Indian patriarchs, the six Chinese patriarchs, and all the generations of Chinese and Japanese Chan and Zen masters that follow. (Bodhidharma occupies a pivotal position as both the twenty-eighth Indian and first Chinese patriarch.) It took several centuries for this entire schema to be developed; the earliest building blocks appeared at the very end of the seventh century, and the complete system was published perhaps as early as 801 but certainly by the year 952.' (Seeing Through Zen by John McRae, p 4)

What a Chan teacher is is defined by what we mean by Chan, and Chan in general is defined by lineage. McRae's, like many of those of other scholars who studied Chan history, discusses the development of the idea of lineage, so for clearer details you might want to look into them.

As for what these people were called, as monks they were venerable teachers, respected abbots, and many of them quite influential. On the other hand, what appears in later works as radical Chan rhetoric and behaviour, that is mostly the work of Song era writers, while what they possibly said and did were fairly standard Mahayana.

Dgj said:

Perhaps a better question is: when did people start to be known as Chan masters and Chan students with the word Chan meaning a specific subset of Buddhism as opposed to simply it's literal meaning: meditation (Chan=Dhyana=meditation)?

Astus wrote:

'In a sense, a Chan sayings record created its Chan master, rather than the other way around.'

(J. L. Broughton, in Zongmi on Chan, p 40)

It's the 'sayings record' (yulu) genre of the Song era that created the image of the Chan master that we still have today.

Dgj said:

For example, as you said above, in the Song they did use Chan to delineate certain people in said lineage. One could become a Chan lineage holder and lead monasteries. What about pre Song: was there any such delineation?

Astus wrote:

The first lineages (descending from Bodhidharma) appeared in the early 8th century, but those were meant to emphasise the superiority of a single line of transmission rather than a whole school. In the 9th century works of Guifeng Zongmi there is the idea of a more complex Chan school with several lineages.

Dgj said:

If not, how were the pre Song Chan masters picked and labeled as such and when and why did this suddenly become a thing? Who first invented Chan and who decided to posthumously name unrelated teachers as Chan lineage holders?

Astus wrote:

It was an organic development over several centuries. But in terms of firsts, it's Faru's epitaph that is the first record of a lineage from Bodhidharma to Faru himself as an heir of Hongren.

Dgj said:

Is it something like if someone today said:

Astus wrote:

Establishing a specific lineage can happen in several ways. What makes Chan a single school is how the various lineages agree on a single source, in this case the Indian patriarchs and the first six Chinese patriarchs. Such a single source itself took time to develop. And then it was also a process how the works delineating the various Chan lineages appeared (see e.g. Lineage and Context in the Patriarch's Hall Collection and the Transmission of the Lamp by Albert Welter in Zen Canon, p 137-179).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 11th, 2019 at 3:53 AM

Title: Re: "Never an Institutionally Separate Chan School..."

Content:

Dgj said:

Thanks. So, for example, Hongren in his time wouldn't have been known as a part of something called Chan as a unique meaning for the word signifying, at least, a lineage from Bodhidharma? He would have been called a member of the East Mountain teaching, or just a Buddhist master? He would have likely seen himself as an heir to Bodhidharma, but had no such label as Chan in mind? But then after Faru the label Chan was starting to be used as such?

Astus wrote:

Faru's epitaph is the first to connect Bodhidharma and Huike to Hongren, and it is Shenxiu who claimed to be a representative of the East Mountain teaching. So likely Hongren had no such idea of being a member of some exalted lineage, but his disciples elevated their stature through being heirs of something extraordinary (cf. Seeing Through Zen, p 48).

Dgj said:

So Shenxia, Huineng and Shenhui would have, in their day, been known as Chan masters and heirs to Bodhidharma?

Astus wrote:

The term "meditation teacher" (chanshi 禪師) was a general one for anyone with a focus on meditation. In the Gaoseng Zhuan (高僧傳) from around 520 there are 32 monks (6.4%) mentioned as meditation specialists out of 499, then the Xu Gaoseng Zhuan (續高僧傳), from 667, lists 134 (19%) of 705 monks, while the Song Gaoseng Zhuan (宋高僧傳), from 988, gives 132 (20%) meditation specialists out of 656 eminent monks (see: Monks, Rulers, and Literati, p 42-43), showing a clear trend of the rising position of the meditating monk (for more on these three collections see: The Eminent Monk: Buddhist Ideals in Medieval Chinese Hagiography by John Kieschnick), and in the third collection a large number of them are monks of the Chan school (from Hongren to Caoshan Benji, 103 Chan masters in all plus 29 appended). So, while the idea of a Chan school (禪宗) - and here the word 'zong' (that is usually translated as school here) should be recognised to carry the meaning of lineage - certainly existed in the 9th century, it was identified generally with the descendants of Bodhidharma in the Song era.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 11th, 2019 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: "Never an Institutionally Separate Chan School..."

Content:

Dan74 said:

I don't believe the Chan tradition is a fraud.

Astus wrote:

What do you understand the Chan tradition to be? Is it an unbroken lineage of mind-to-mind transmission directly from teacher to disciple? Or is it something else? If it is something else, something sublime beyond historical events, then it has little to do with historical scholarship.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 11th, 2019 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: The Historicity of the Gong An Cases

Content:

Dgj said:

What is the scholarly consensus on the historicity of the gong an cases of the Blue Cliff Record, Gateless Gate, etc.?

Astus wrote:

First of all, consider Yuanwu's words found in the commentary to the first case in the Blue Cliff Record:

'According to tradition, Master Zhi died in the year 514, while Bodhidharma came to Liang in 520; since there is a discrepancy of several years, why is it said that the two met? This must be a mistake in the tradition. But I will not discuss the matter of what is recorded in tradition now; all that is important is to understand the gist of the matter.' (The Blue Cliff Record, BDK ed, p 15)

So, historicity is not really an issue, especially not in the case of a gongan collection. Apart from that, gongan collections took their stories from other works, primarily the transmission of lamp records. About them Heine notes:

'The anecdotes about momentous interactions in addition to sayings and doings of Tang Chan ancestors were collected and incorporated into a wide variety of voluminous Song writings in which the narratives were significantly enhanced or altered in order to serve as an adroit means for evoking an indirect pathway to the attainment of awakening.

Chan literary activity of the eleventh and twelfth centuries was marked by a veritable explosion of texts produced with strong government backing, as well as supervision and oversight with regard to the process of editing and publication. This sometimes greatly affected or skewed the results by leading to a distinctive sectarian outlook or stylistic emphasis based on divisions among the Five Houses of Chan according to their local variations.'

(Chan Rhetoric of Uncertainty in the Blue Cliff Record by Seven Heine, p 49)

Finally, in order to see the difficulty of tracing to such stories, read <https://terebess.hu/zen/Records-of-Yunmen.pdf>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 11th, 2019 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: "Never an Institutionally Separate Chan School..."

Content:

Dgj said:

Faru is the first to be known as a "Chan master" where "Chan" denotes a certain subset of Buddhism that denotes a lineage to Bodhidharma.

Astus wrote:

Not exactly. It is Faru's epitaph that is the first known instance where the connection between Bodhidharma and Hongren is claimed to exist.

Dgj said:

If not, when did "Chan" stop meaning simply "Dhyana" and first take on the meaning: A subset of Buddhism that denotes a lineage to Bodhidharma?

Astus wrote:

Chan still means dhyana in Chinese, that's not changed. When and who was the first to use the term chanzong (禪宗) to indicate what we now understand as the Chan school, I don't have a clear answer for that, but Zongmi (780–841) did use the term as such.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 11th, 2019 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: Shouting, Hitting, etc.

Content:

Dgj said:

Are there any other teachers who taught Zen with no practices and with instant enlightenment as Shen Hui spoke of?

Astus wrote:

First of all, Shenhui instructed people to abide by the precepts, to read and recite Mahayana sutras, and to recognise the nature of their mind in meditation. Secondly, the teaching of no-thought of Shenhui is well known and accepted all over the Chan school, since it is present in the Platform Sutra and the teachings of other masters. In a way, Hongzhou teachers like Mazu and Huangbo were more radical than Shenhui, plus there were the teachings of Wuzhu. This direct path of no-thought, that is based on the prajnaparamita teachings, is fine with likely every Mahayana teacher, but the problem usually is that just learning about the fact that all appearances are empty and no thought has ever arisen not only does not trigger awakening in people, it hardly makes any sense at the beginning either.

'When people of highest intelligence and knowledge hear the preaching of prajnaparamita, they are able to understand (what they hear), take it to heart, preach it and put it into practice; those of average intelligence, though not capable to grasp (the meaning), might yet succeed when they take pains to find a teacher (who can help them); those of the lowest intelligence, let them only believe and not relapse, might in the future also be able to embrace the ten points of the Mahayana creed (and in consequence get understanding).'

(The Sermon of Shen-Hui, tr W. Liebenthal)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 12th, 2019 at 12:09 AM

Title: Re: The Historicity of the Gong An Cases

Content:

Dgj said:

whatever history may be in them is nearly impossible to discern because of the enhancing and alteration. Correct?

Astus wrote:

It depends on available sources to compare them with.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 12th, 2019 at 12:13 AM

Title: Re: "Never an Institutionally Separate Chan School..."

Content:

Dgj said:

Was chanzong used in the Song, once Chan started to become more known as such?

Astus wrote:

Very much.

Dgj said:

Also, if there was no specific delineation of a Chan school, what was Shen Hui preaching about when he spoke of Northern and Southern schools?

Astus wrote:

Shenhui made the claim that Huineng was the sixth patriarch and not Shenxiu.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 12th, 2019 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: The Historicity of the Gong An Cases

Content:

Dgj said:

And what have scholars found when they make these comparisons? Do they find the Gong Ans accurate, or highly fabricated?

Astus wrote:

One can only compare one written source with another. There is fairly little from the Tang era to use, and much less of what can be compared with the stories used in Song era collections. In any case, it is hardly controversial to say that most of the accounts are fictional. Here are two opinions on Zen stories:

'It has been noted that Zen was essentially associated with the literati and the means of dissemination of Zen, such as Recorded Sayings, history of lamp transmission, collections of koan stories, and so on, was highly literary and textual. Zen is basically a literary tradition and a high level of literacy is necessary for understanding the meaning of Zen.'

(Leaving for the Rising Sun by Jiang Wu, p 34)

'Unfortunately, the majority of the exchanges or anecdotes composed in the encounter dialogue format are not very good stories, in any meaningful sense. In fact, a huge number of Chan stories or exchanges, included in texts such as Jingde chuan deng lu and Bi yan lu, can be viewed as little more than nonessential ramblings, a peculiar type of religious gibberish. Basically, we are confronted with countless examples of mass-produced textual materials that tend to be highly formulaic, numbingly repetitive, and ostensibly pointless. One of the things that keeps amazing me is how otherwise intelligent or sincere people can take this sort of stuff seriously, although the history of religion is filled with blind spots of that sort.'

(The Records of Mazu and the Making of Classical Chan Literature by Mario Poceski, p 170-171)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 12th, 2019 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: "Never an Institutionally Separate Chan School..."

Content:

Dgj said:

The sixth patriarch of what, though? If there was no delineated Chan school, then what was he talking about?

Astus wrote:

Shenxiu posited himself as a transmitter of Hongren's teachings, and Shenxiu's disciples claimed that he was the true sixth patriarch counting from Bodhidharma. It was Shenxiu, and especially his disciples, who began the establishment of a special lineage. Shenhui simply took the idea of lineage from Bodhidharma and exchanged

Shenxiu for Huineng.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 12th, 2019 at 4:07 AM

Title: Re: The Historicity of the Gong An Cases

Content:

Dgj said:

Do you happen to know of a book where it is flatly stated that most of the accounts are fictional? Or something along those lines?

Astus wrote:

That is a bit simplistic approach. Consider family stories, how they can become quite colourful, expanded, reduced, changed, or even overwritten by time, and by intentional editing if they were to become novels or films. The stories of teachers can be similar, but it needs to be looked into one by one. I recommend you read some of the studies regarding the various recorded sayings.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 12th, 2019 at 6:23 PM

Title: Re: True existence and substantial existence

Content:

Astus wrote:

Existence is insubstantial (nihsvabhava), as there is no substance (svabhava) to be found in anything. At the same time, whenever we say that something is/exists, that is conceiving a substance right there. And if we say something does not exist, that is still thinking of a substance. The reason being is that to be a thing, an object of conception, it has to be conceived on its own, as a stand alone, independent entity. The deciding factor is whether one recognises substantiality as a conceptual product, or as the attribute of the conceived object. Now here to wonder about the level of existence of made up objects is like debating the hidden motives of fictional characters in a novel.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 12th, 2019 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: The Historicity of the Gong An Cases

Content:

Dgj said:

Do you know of a book where the author explains that most of the accounts are fictitious?

Astus wrote:

<https://books.google.co.uk/books?id=x2ZxQk2AfYsC>

<https://books.google.co.uk/books?id=nisoDQAAQBAJ>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 13th, 2019 at 12:09 AM

Title: Re: True existence and substantial existence

Content:

jnanavinaya said:

"Conceptual product" and "conceived object" occur at one time, and both as an illusion, so I didn't quite get your point why then it is a deciding factor.

Astus wrote:

If substantiality is understood to be a conceptual product then it is no longer a substance, an independent entity, but a mere name, while if substantiality is attributed to the object, that is, the object exists on its own, then it is mistaken to be something graspable.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 13th, 2019 at 2:03 AM

Title: Re: True existence and substantial existence

Content:

jnanavinaya said:

Then, a thought, for instance is not a substance.

Astus wrote:

Nothing is a substance. Things seem substantial because of ignorance, substantiality is an incorrect assumption.

jnanavinaya said:

But it is still a dualistic phenomenon, isn't it?

Astus wrote:

The dualism of self and other is another way to say substantiality.

jnanavinaya said:

But the sentence is implying that "insubstantiality" and "emptiness" are synonyms.

Astus wrote:

Emptiness is the absence of substance, i.e. insubstantiality.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 14th, 2019 at 3:16 AM

Title: Re: The first five patriarchs on meditation

Content:

Dgj said:

Does anyone know the exact sources and quotes?

Astus wrote:

For what?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 14th, 2019 at 4:52 AM

Title: Re: The first five patriarchs on meditation

Content:

Dgj said:

The sources and quotes that say Bodhidharma taught meditation.

Astus wrote:

See McRae's The Northern School and the Formation of Early Ch'an Buddhism, p 16-19. He quotes there the Xu Gaoseng Zhuan:

'Feeling compassion [as a result of the decline of the True Teaching in this] obscure corner [of the world (i.e., China), Bodhidharma sought to] lead [the people here to enlightenment] by means of the Dharma. He first reached Nan-yueh within the boundaries of the Sung and later crossed north again to the Wei. Wherever he went he gave instruction in the teaching of meditation (ch'an-chiao). At the time the practice of lecturing [on the Buddhist scriptures] had spread across the entire country, so that [people] often slandered [Bodhidharma] upon hearing the Dharma of samadhi (ting-fa).'

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 19th, 2019 at 8:20 PM

Title: Re: Question about awareness as enabler

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is no single "awareness". When there is contact between a sense object and a sense faculty, sense consciousness arises, and through the contact between the three feeling arises, perception arises, formations arise. More detailed analysis can be found in Abhidharma works on citta and caitasika/cetasika.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 22nd, 2019 at 4:53 PM

Title: Re: Question about awareness as enabler

Content:

Rick said:

So what would you call that 'state' of potential awareness? Background awareness, monitoring awareness, as-needed awareness? Or just: awareness.

Astus wrote:

They're the sense faculties (indriya) or sense bases (āyatana). See this

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ayatana>, and this

<https://abhidharmakosa.files.wordpress.com/2010/07/chapter-1-dhatu.pdf>.

Rick said:

1. Awareness is required to perceive/experience any phenomenon. No awareness, no perception/experience.

Astus wrote:

Consciousness (vijñāna) is necessary for there to be perception (saṃjñā).

Rick said:

2. If there is no phenomenon being perceived/experienced, there is no awareness. In other words, awareness rises and falls on as 'as-needed' basis with perceived/experienced phenomena.

Astus wrote:

Consciousness depends on name and form (nāmarūpa), i.e. physical and mental appearances, and name and form depend on consciousness (e.g. <https://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.067.than.html>).

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 23rd, 2019 at 11:09 PM

Title: Re: Question about awareness as enabler

Content:

Queequeg said:

That is one of the interesting formulations of the 12 Nidana.

Astus wrote:

The same connection is stated in the

<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.15.0.than.html>: 'From consciousness as a requisite condition comes name-and-form.' ... 'From name-and-form as a requisite condition comes consciousness.' Also in the <https://suttacentral.net/dn14/en/sujato>: 'Name and form are conditions for consciousness. Consciousness is a condition for name and form.'

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 23rd, 2019 at 11:37 PM

Title: Re: Death and enlightenment/emptiness

Content:

Jon N said:

what is the difference between death and sunyata?

Astus wrote:

Death is the cessation of a life. Emptiness (sunyata) is the absence of an independent, permanent essence.

Jon N said:

or between being enlightened and being dead?

Astus wrote:

Enlightenment is the complete abandonment of attachment. There is no such state as being dead, as Buddhism teaches rebirth.

Jon N said:

As far as I understand, being enlightened one is "flowing" with sunyata, or within sunyata, transcending both life and death.

Astus wrote:

Realising that things are empty results in the elimination of attachment, hence transcending the misconceptions of permanence (one is forever the same person) and annihilation (one's person ceases to exist at a point).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 24th, 2019 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: Death and enlightenment/emptiness

Content:

Jon N said:

This makes me think, however: can one be a Buddhist without having a belief in rebirth?

Astus wrote:

Of course one can, it's just that denying the existence of afterlife constitutes wrong view.

Jon N said:

If we take rebirth off the equation, does still the Mahayana doctrine make sense?

Astus wrote:

It does not, since without rebirth there is not only no reason for liberation, there is also no possibility of the full bodhisattva path that takes innumerable lifetimes to complete.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 24th, 2019 at 10:00 PM

Title: Re: Question about awareness as enabler

Content:

Queequeg said:

consciousness is posited as the more basic phenomenon.

Astus wrote:

What strain of Buddhism would that be?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 24th, 2019 at 10:56 PM

Title: Re: Question about awareness as enabler

Content:
Queequeg said:
Yogacara... In contrast to Madhyamika...

Astus wrote:
As far as the teachings of Asanga and Vasubandhu are concerned, object and subject are mutually dependent, and realising objects to be fabrications also removes the subject perceiving that.

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, June 25th, 2019 at 1:16 AM
Title: Re: Question about awareness as enabler
Content:
LastLegend said:
Hmmm. Simple as that?

Astus wrote:
Maitreya/Asanga says in the Madhyantavibhaga (1.3):

'Appearing as objects, sentient beings, the self
And awareness, consciousness arises.
Its objects do not exist.
Therefore, it does not exist either.'

Mipham comments:

'Appearing as objects, such as form, as sentient beings, i.e., the five faculties in one's own and others' stream of being, as the self, the defiled mental cognition associated with the delusion of self and so on, and as awareness, the six consciousnesses, consciousness arises. Its objects, the appearances of objects and sentient beings, do not exist. Therefore, since the appearances of self and awareness are mistaken appearances, it, the apprehender, does not exist either.'
(stanza and commentary from Middle Beyond Extremes, p 28)

Rongtönpa comments:

'Because outer apprehended objects do not exist, the consciousness that apprehends them does not exist either. This is because the apprehender depends on the apprehended.'
(Adorning Maitreya's Intent: Arriving at the View of Nonduality, p 34)

Vasubandhu writes in stanza 28 of the Trimsatika:

'If, in perceiving the sphere of objects,
Wisdom (jnana) no longer conceives any idea of the object,
Then that wisdom is in the state of Vijnaptimatratā,

Because both the object to be apprehended and the act of apprehending by consciousness are absent.'

And commentary from Xuanzang:

'[In this stage of unimpeded penetrating understanding], the Bodhisattva attains, with reference to an object, the non-discriminating transcendental wisdom called Nirvikalpakajnana, which does not cling to the objective world, and accepts no kind of sophistry about its seeming appearance (prapancanimitta) . He is now said really to abide in the genuine and transcendent nature of Vijnaptimatratā, that is to say, he experiences the Bhutatathata (Absolute Reality). His wisdom and the Bhutatathata are on the same plane, both being .equally divorced from the aspects of subject and object (grahaka and grahya). Both aspects constitute discrimination, being the sophistic manifestations of that mind which clings to something as its object.'

(stanza and commentary from Wei Tat's translation of the Cheng Weishi Lun, p 687)

A summary by Brunnhölzl from his introduction to the Dharmadharmatavibhanga:

'The fourfold correct yogic practice to attain nonconceptual wisdom consists of the four prayogas of observing all phenomena as being nothing other than mere mind, thus not observing any phenomena as external objects, consequently not observing any observer of external objects either, and finally observing the suchness that is the unobservability of the duality of apprehender and apprehended. These four make up the levels of heat, peak, poised readiness, and the supreme dharma of the path of preparation. This is the progressive way in which nonconceptual wisdom is generated in the mind stream because it is easy to realize that external referents lack a nature of their own, while it is more difficult to realize that the apprehender is unobservable too.'

(Mining for Wisdom within Delusion, p 134)

And here's Mipham's explanation regarding the misconception of a real consciousness in Yogacara from his commentary to chapter 7 of the Mahayanasutralamkara:

'Now, the Cittamātra approach speaks of all phenomena being nothing other than simply the appearances of the mind, and it asserts that only the clear and aware consciousness of the dependent reality, the basis of perception, exists substantially. If the Cittamātrins' final standpoint is the assertion that this consciousness is only a substantially existent entity inasmuch as it is the cause for all conventional phenomena appearing, and that apart from this assertion they are not claiming that it exists substantially as a truly existing entity in ultimate truth, then they are not at all in contradiction with the Mādhyamika tradition. On the other hand, if they were to assert that it is truly existent in ultimate truth, they would be contradicting the Mādhyamika approach. It seems, therefore, that it is just this particular point that needs to be examined as a source of contention (or otherwise) for the Mādhyamikas.

In the cycle of teachings of Maitreya and the writings of the great charioteer Asaṅga, whose thinking is one and the same, it is taught that individuals on the level of earnest aspiration first understand that all phenomena are simply the mind. Subsequently they have the experience that there is no object to be apprehended in the mind. Then, at the stage of the supreme mundane level on the path of joining, they realize that because there is no object, neither is there a subject, and immediately after that, they attain the first level with the direct realization of the truth of ultimate reality devoid of the duality of subject and object. As for things being only the mind, the source of the dualistic perception of things appearing as environment, sense objects, and a body is the consciousness of the ground of all, which is accepted as existing substantially on the conventional level but is taught as being like a magical illusion and so on since it appears in a variety of ways while not existing dualistically. For this reason, because this tradition realizes, perfectly correctly, that the nondual consciousness is devoid of any truly existing entities and of characteristics, the ultimate intentions of the charioteers of Madhyamaka and Cittamātra should be considered as being in agreement.

Why, then, do the Mādhyamika masters refute the Cittamātra tenet system? Because self-styled proponents of the Cittamātra tenets, when speaking of mind-only, say that there are no external objects but that the mind exists substantially—like a rope that is devoid of snakeness, but not devoid of ropeness. Having failed to understand that such statements are asserted from the conventional point of view, they believe the nondual consciousness to be truly existent on the ultimate level. It is this tenet that the Mādhyamikas repudiate. But, they say, we do not refute the thinking of Ārya Asaṅga, who correctly realized the mind-only path taught by the Buddha.'

(A Feast of the Nectar of the Supreme Vehicle: An Explanation of the Ornament of the Mahayana Sutras, p 235-236)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 25th, 2019 at 2:36 AM

Title: Re: Question about awareness as enabler; Moved from Open Dharma

Content:

Rick said:

Do you happen to remember where in the <long!> book these moments are described?

Astus wrote:

Go to IV.86 (p 153-159). There is also a nice summary on the <https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/conditions/d/doc2918.html> by Nina van Gorkom.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 28th, 2019 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: Death and enlightenment/emptiness

Content:

Queequeg said:

Some insist Bodhi is beyond just release of attachments.

Astus wrote:

When the emotional and conceptual hindrances are released, the buddha-nature can manifest. What more one would need?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 28th, 2019 at 3:03 AM

Title: Re: Death and enlightenment/emptiness

Content:

Queequeg said:

Basically, its why in some Mahayana the sravaka and pratyekabuddha paths are considered incomplete.

Astus wrote:

There are two versions. The first one is where the main difference lies in the accumulation of merit from what the buddha qualities and the buddha land is generated. The second one explains the difference with the inability of the two vehicles to get rid of the attachment to concepts, as all the buddha qualities are inherent in buddha-nature. The first version necessitates the path to take incalculably long in order to gather merit, the second version allows the possibility of buddhahood in one lifetime. The schools where complete enlightenment can happen in this life (e.g. Tiantai, Chan, Mantra) accepts the second version.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 28th, 2019 at 3:44 AM

Title: Re: Death and enlightenment/emptiness

Content:

Queequeg said:

Some accept three distinct fruits, with Buddhahood possible in this life. Some consider the fruits of the sravakayana and pratyekabuddhayana as upaya, and to the extent the bodhisattva thinks there are these distinctions, their path is upaya, also.

Astus wrote:

As far as I know, currently only Theravada and the followers of the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/East_Asian_Yog%C4%81c%C4%81ra school maintain that there are three vehicles, the others uphold the one vehicle view where eventually everyone attains buddhahood.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 3rd, 2019 at 4:12 PM

Title: Re: The desire to stop suffering

Content:

Arjan Dirkse said:

Desire is the root of all suffering, but is it bad to have a desire to stop samsara?

Astus wrote:

Brahman Unnabha put the same issue to Ananda in the <https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn51/sn51.015.than.html>: "it's impossible that one could abandon desire (chanda) by means of desire (chanda)". But then, of course, Ananda explains why that is not so.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 5th, 2019 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: About the Lieu Quan School of Thien

Content:

jek37 said:

Can someone explain what this means in simpler terms ?

Astus wrote:

<https://tnhaudio.org/2009/12/22/the-lineage-of-thich-nhat-hanh/>

The great way of Reality,
Is our true nature's pure ocean.
The source of Mind penetrates everywhere.

The nature of mind is the nature of everything.

From the roots of virtue springs the practice of compassion.

The nature of mind manifests in compassionate action.

Precepts, concentration and insight –
The nature and function of all three are one.

In the nature of mind all three practices are realised.

The fruit of transcendent wisdom,
Can be realized by being wonderfully together.

The nature of mind is realised through learning.

Maintain and transmit the wonderful principle,
In order to reveal the true teaching!

Once realised, it has to be taught to others.

For the realization of True Emptiness to be possible,
Wisdom and Action must go together.

Learning and teaching keep the lineage alive.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 7th, 2019 at 3:49 PM

Title: Re: Is it bad if I, as a youngster Buddhist, go to parties and drink alcohol or smoke weed?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Intoxication itself is morally neutral. What can easily become unwholesome are actions performed while intoxicated.

'The fifth precept is abstaining from alcohol and other intoxicants. Again, alcohol itself is not to blame; but some people who drink alcohol become influenced by it in a way that is destructive both to themselves and others. We know how much of a problem our societies have with drunk drivers, and cases such as people killing their loved ones while in an alcoholic stupor. Alcohol can impair our judgment and cause us to lose consciousness, so that we cannot remember what we did while we were drunk. In the Vinaya—the text explaining the rules of life for monks and nuns—when the Buddha talked about abstaining from alcohol and other forms of intoxicants, he told a kind of parable. A monk was out begging for food one day when he came across a woman selling alcohol. She offered him three choices. The first one was to drink alcohol, the second to kill a goat, and the third to have sex with her. He said, “No, I can’t kill the goat; a Buddhist monk would never do such a thing. I can’t have sex—I’m a monk; I’m celibate. So I’ll take the alcohol.” He drank the beer, and once he got drunk, he killed the goat and had sex with the woman. The Buddha said that’s why alcohol is something we should abstain from, precisely because it can have strange effects on some people.'

(The Essence of Buddhism, ch 2, by Traleg Kyabgon)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 8th, 2019 at 5:11 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism, and theistic religions.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Some relevant materials available online:

<http://chancenter.org/download/free-books/ChanPracticeandFaith.pdf> by Chan Master Sheng Yen http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/ancientsgrfx.pdf by Kuan Ming

In book:

<https://books.google.co.uk/books?id=VPJUPwAACAAJ> by John Blofeld

<https://books.google.co.uk/books?id=7Dy1THXuOdkC> by Sandy Boucher

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 17th, 2019 at 10:45 PM

Title: Re: Tathagatagarbha and oppression/social action

Content:

Jon N said:

If everything is already enlightened, why there should be practice?

Astus wrote:

Because of adventitious defilements.

Jon N said:

For this reason, if I remember well, some traditions of Tibetan Buddhism regard the tathagatagarbha as the mind in its unenlightened state, so that practice is needed to reach a pure mind (I cannot find the quote in the text so i'm not being very technical here).

Astus wrote:

"But if the mind gives rise to irrelevant thoughts and further predicates the world of objects, it will continue to lack these qualities. All these numberless excellent qualities of the pure principle are none other than those of One Mind, and there is nothing to be sought after anew by thought. Thus, that which is fully endowed with them is called the Dharmakaya when manifested and the Tathagata-garbha when latent."

(http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Translations/Awakening_of_faith.html)

Jon N said:

how is it possible to combine the tatagatagarbha theory with social action? or at least how is it possible to argue that everything is enlightened without reinforcing the inequalities of the status quo?

Astus wrote:

It actually fits quite well with social action.

"There are five mistakes: faint-heartedness, contempt for those of lesser ability,
to believe in the false,
to speak about the true nature badly
and to cherish oneself above all else.
So that those in whom these above were there might rid themselves of them, therefore was it declared."
(Uttaratantra Shastra, v 157, in The Changeless Nature, p 70)

See also chapter 20 of the Lotus Sutra.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 18th, 2019 at 4:12 PM

Title: Re: Tathagatagarbha and oppresion/social action

Content:

Jon N said:

If reaching enlightenment the Bodhisattva discovers that all beings are enlightened, isn't suffering then enlightened too?

Astus wrote:

Although originally there has never been a self, beings have to realise that in order to be free from attachment. Similarly, although the mind is originally pure, one has to realise it in order to be free from defilements. Afflictions themselves are empty, but unless emptiness is realised, there is suffering.

"And when these immeasurable, countless, infinite number of sentient beings have been liberated, in actuality, no sentient being has attained liberation. Why is this so? Subhūti, If a bodhisattva abides in the signs of self, person, sentient being, or life-span, she or he is not a bodhisattva."

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html, ch 3)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 21st, 2019 at 6:11 PM

Title: Re: The Atthakavagga...

Content:

Astus wrote:

The <https://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.024.than.html> is the source of the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Visuddhimagga#Seven_Stages_of_Purification used in Theravada, however, the discourse itself points to the conclusion that all "is simply for the sake of total Unbinding through lack of clinging. And it's for the sake of total Unbinding through lack of clinging that the holy life is lived under the Blessed One."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 24th, 2019 at 5:34 PM

Title: Re: Dream initiations, etc.

Content:

FiveSkandhas said:

Does anyone think it is a valid form of transmission, etc. in the modern world?

Astus wrote:

The source is less important than the content. As Mipham wrote:

"No matter what kind of person a teacher is, he cannot purify or liberate you. If the teaching he gives is truly meaningful, it is proper to adhere to it. But if it is not meaningful, it is improper to adhere to it. Thus, one should not rely on the person but on the teaching."

(Gateway to Knowledge, vol 4, p 123)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 28th, 2019 at 3:31 PM

Title: Re: Eclectic Buddhism

Content:

Matt J said:

The problem is that many of these practices work against each other. The practices and traditions have their own logic and style, and this logic or style may not gel with other systems.

Astus wrote:

Most of the traditions/schools are intended to encompass the whole of the Buddhadharma, and one works with methods that fit one's inclinations and situations. No matter where one goes, the enemies to be defeated are the same: greed, anger, and delusion.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 29th, 2019 at 3:18 AM

Title: Re: Eclectic Buddhism

Content:

javier.espinoza.t said:

and there is at least one buddhist path where greed, anger, and delusion are not considered enemies and are not even transformed into something else.

My point here is that if one mixed the point of view of different buddhist paths one couldn't apply correctly. so eclectic things, new age thing, "i like my idea" things, are in general a waste of time.

Astus wrote:

Self-arising and self-liberation happens when there is no attachment/fixation/identification. All the other Buddhist traditions say the same, and you can trace it back to the second and third noble truths.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 30th, 2019 at 1:34 AM

Title: Re: Cheng weishi lun, Demonstration of Consciousness

Content:

Queequeg said:

IIRC, when Yogacarins refer to Sravakayana or Hinayana, they are referring to Sarvastivadins - one of the "Hinayana" schools that I don't think exist anymore and are mostly known because they were whipping boys for Yogacarins.

Astus wrote:

The doctrine of the storehouse-consciousness is a theory based on the Sautrantika interpretation of karma that is deposited as seeds, hence the idea of seeds stored in a unique aspect of consciousness. The Sarvastivadin explanation of karma is somewhat different, as they (or rather some of them) have the concept of non-informative forms (avijnapti rupa), what is rejected by Yogacarins by saying that everything is "informative" (vijñapti), but more importantly it is the idea of dharmas existing in the three times that ensures the emergence of later fruits of past deeds.

Queequeg said:

On one hand, its explained as a thing, where "seeds" are deposited and "perfumed." But that doesn't make sense because that would suggest it is something substantial.

Astus wrote:

Note that the whole teaching of the eight consciousnesses are within the scope of conventional reality that has only a conceptual basis. Furthermore, it's mainly a theoretical explanation of karmic consequences over various births.

Queequeg said:

devices by which mind continuity are explained.

Astus wrote:

Indeed.

Queequeg said:

this would seem to be directed at cultivating quietude necessary to reveal the underlying currents below the gross level of consciousness...

Astus wrote:

The storehouse-consciousness cannot be seen or sensed in any way, at least within the Yogacara teachings.

Queequeg said:

In the Cheng weishi lun, Xuanzang suggests that sravaka eliminate the alaya consciousness.

Astus wrote:

So do bodhisattvas eventually. After all, it is the basis of samsara.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 30th, 2019 at 4:15 AM

Title: Re: Cheng weishi lun, Demonstration of Consciousness

Content:

Queequeg said:

Who proposes the dharmas existing in three times? Not the Yogacarins... please clarify - that last part is ambiguous.

Astus wrote:

The Sarvastivadins. That is where they got their name from: sarva (everything) asti (exists).

Queequeg said:

assert things that as an outsider looking in sounds rather arbitrary and dogmatic... like the reality of icchantikas and the different paths of sravaka and bodhisattvas.

Astus wrote:

You could say that about any Buddhist teaching, that they look arbitrary and dogmatic. Yogacara "developed" on the abhidharma teachings and formed a Mahayana version.

Queequeg said:

Its fascinating stuff and seems important to know because it informs so much Buddhist practice in Mahayana and Vajrayana... but seems to me a conceptual dead end...

Astus wrote:

Lots of generally accepted Mahayana doctrines were first explained by Yogacarins, including the bodhisattva stages and the three buddha bodies. Today the most known representatives of their teachings are called Shentongpas, the pre-eminent doctrine among Kagyupas, Nyingmapas, and Jonangpas, but it is also popular among current Chan teachers as well.

Queequeg said:

Well, isn't that the nature of all notions of consciousness?

Astus wrote:

The six consciousnesses are readily perceivable, aren't they?

Queequeg said:

The device for explaining continuity... In some ways, makes one wonder if needing to establish a particular conclusion... continuity, particularly between births... is a hobgoblin... That's a fraught line of questioning.

Astus wrote:

It is not just about explaining continuity in general, but more about special cases, where conscious activity ceases (i.e. nirodhasamapatti & the asamjnisattva).

Queequeg said:

samsara is nirvana... That kind of blows all that up.

Astus wrote:

Not really. There are ordinary beings, and there are buddhas. Why the difference? Because of the afflictions. And latent afflictions reside in the storehouse consciousness.

Queequeg said:

Tathagatagarbha teachings address some of the issues better, IMHO.

Astus wrote:

What part?

Queequeg said:

I'm probably basically Madhyamikan in view...

Astus wrote:

Yogacara emerged after Madhyamaka, and there isn't really a contradiction between them, although that depends on how one reads one or the other.

Queequeg said:

So much of this seems labored, to address problems that aren't really problems... But that might be my Madhyamikan bias... I'm trying to be open and really understand this stuff.

Astus wrote:

Yogacara actually simplified the Abhidharma teachings, and they even made Madhyamaka simpler. Why it can seem overly complicated is perhaps because of not comparing it with the entirety of preceding schools.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 30th, 2019 at 3:04 PM

Title: Re: Cheng weishi lun, Demonstration of Consciousness

Content:

Queequeg said:

Alaya is several orders of magnitude removed from basic observations. I'm pretty sure I can explain emptiness to someone and get them to buy in more readily than to alaya consciousness.

Astus wrote:

Aren't memories, and knowledge in general, believed to be stored in one's mind? There, it is readily explained and understood in conventional terms, and no need to say 'subconscious'. Also, it is a common view in Buddhism that there are latent tendencies (anusaya), but it's not that easy to place them anywhere when mind is singular and momentary.

Queequeg said:

the abhidhamma analysis, eye consciousness, for instance, doesn't actually register as anything in itself.

Astus wrote:

That is the Theravadin version of perception. There are others. But I intended only a very basic sense that one directly knows of the appearance of the six types of consciousness.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 31st, 2019 at 3:07 AM

Title: Re: Cheng weishi lun, Demonstration of Consciousness

Content:

Matt J said:

As for the alaya, you can experience that also.

Queequeg said:

Maybe in some non-yogacara teachings, but I don't think this is an option in pure yogacara.

Astus wrote:

That sort of experience is called the alayavijnana by some Tibetan teachers, usually to differentiate it from alaya, a term used in Dzogchen for the nature of mind.

From the Yogacara POV alayavijnana exists for those bound by karma, while for buddhas the 8 consciousnesses become the 4 wisdoms (jnana). The manas takes alayavijnana as its object, while the alayavijnana takes the bijas, and they serve as the basis of the 6 vijnanas that we can be actually aware of, hence nobody can actually perceive the 8th and 7th consciousnesses, because all perceived objects are their products.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 31st, 2019 at 5:07 AM

Title: Re: Cheng weishi lun, Demonstration of Consciousness

Content:

Queequeg said:

And I'm basically arguing that the 6 consciousnesses can't directly be perceived either... just their effects.

Astus wrote:

Consciousness is what can experience things, and it's split to six kinds based on the different categories of objects. So where it's about self-reflection, that's the sixth consciousness, while awareness of rupa is by the other five. To say that one is not aware of those six types of objects makes the whole setup meaningless. Also, to say that the six consciousnesses are not experienced, one needs to posit another consciousness apart from them.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 31st, 2019 at 3:39 PM

Title: Re: Cheng weishi lun, Demonstration of Consciousness

Content:

Queequeg said:

The Mind (sixth consciousness) is not just about self-reflection, though. It takes as its object the the other five sense consciousnesses, as well as mind consciousness.

Astus wrote:

No disagreement, that's what I meant by self-reflection, that the 6th has consciousness (all 6 kinds) as objects.

Queequeg said:

And if Mind consciousness subsides before becoming something one is aware of, it subsides without further effect

Astus wrote:

Consciousness is what is aware, so if there is no awareness, there is no consciousness to speak of. The division of mind moments to javanas is a special Theravadin abhidhammic analysis.

Queequeg said:

There is always abstraction. Its built into the subject-object dynamic that is found in all states of consciousness. Objects are always abstractions.

Astus wrote:

Both objects and subjects are nominal entities in Yogacara, neither apparent things nor minds are real. But the important element is that it's all tainted by the assumption of independent, non-fabricated entities.

Queequeg said:

is any of those moments of consciousness what we think it is? Isn't that one of the main points of yogacara? Everything you think is true is delusion of one sort or another so long as one is not awakened... how can an unenlightened person perceive a visual consciousness that is not some delusion?

Astus wrote:

The central message of Yogacara is to recognise that the objects of attachment are mental fabrications. That's why the explanation of the 8 consciousnesses is relevant, in that it tells how delusion works. The question is not whether common people can make valid observations about the world, that is an epistemological concern without interest in liberation. The question is how one is stuck in samsara and how to become free.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 1st, 2019 at 3:48 AM

Title: Re: Cheng weishi lun, Demonstration of Consciousness

Content:

Queequeg said:

This is a very different model, but doesn't affect my argument about all consciousnesses only being inferred.

Astus wrote:

Direct perception through all six gates is accepted by 'Northern' abhidharma schools, and so it is by Dignaga. What you find regarding perception in Theravada is their own unique interpretation. Yogacara actually had to argue that there is nothing perceived out there, to the extent that Ratnakirti disproved the direct perception of other minds. However, Theravada still assumes an external world that impacts the mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 1st, 2019 at 4:58 AM

Title: Re: Cheng weishi lun, Demonstration of Consciousness

Content:

Queequeg said:

Can you explain what is meant by direct perception?

Astus wrote:

That it is experienced by one of the six senses. So, seeing smoke is direct perception, while knowing that there must be fire is inference. Here, if analysed a bit further, the seeing of colour and form is direct, while understanding it to be form is processing sensory input, but that does not change the source of knowledge of smoke is direct perception, while the knowledge of fire is inferred.

Queequeg said:

Yogacara doesn't actually deny an external world, does it?

Astus wrote:

It depends on what you mean by that. An objectively existing world independent of one's mind is very much denied. But even in other schools it is accepted that the whole universe arises from karma, so there is never a world that exists on its own by any Buddhist view.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 3rd, 2019 at 3:36 AM

Title: Re: Cheng weishi lun, Demonstration of Consciousness

Content:

Queequeg said:

The issue I'm seeing is Xuanzang's apparent suggestion that the pure Buddha lands are distinct from the world of form realm beings, while in the Lotus and Vimalakirti Sutras, the Buddha explains that this Sahalokha is pure, but this purity is not perceived because of the karmic limitations of sentient beings.

Astus wrote:

Experiences of an external world are defined by one's karma. Saying that the world is ultimately pure, that ordinary beings are fundamentally buddhas, that samsara is nirvana, etc. makes no difference for what is actually experienced.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 3rd, 2019 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: Cheng weishi lun, Demonstration of Consciousness

Content:

Queequeg said:

Except that Xuanzang is making an explicit claim about the relationship between the form world and the minds of beings.

Astus wrote:

The world is a product of karma according to Xuanzang and practically everyone else. I don't see the problem. Could you please elaborate?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 3rd, 2019 at 5:13 AM

Title: Re: Cheng weishi lun, Demonstration of Consciousness

Content:

Queequeg said:

The Sutras are most definitely saying that Sahalokha is a pure realm except that it is not experienced as such by ordinary beings because of their own karma.

Astus wrote:

The sutras do not say that there is a world behind the world. The point is that the world is the product of the mind, hence the oft quoted passage from the Vimalakirti Sutra that the pure land is the pure mind. Purity means not afflicted, without attachment, free from the obscurations. Are ordinary beings pure? No, they are not, and that's what makes them ordinary. Can we say that ultimately all beings are pure? Yes, in the sense that defilements are not inherent, furthermore, that beings are actually empty and not beings at all. But it does not change that beings experience an afflicted world because of their afflicted mind. So, talking of ultimate purity is a fine encouragement, but does not address what actually happens.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 3rd, 2019 at 4:16 PM

Title: Re: Cheng weishi lun, Demonstration of Consciousness

Content:

Queequeg said:

Vimalakirti does not suggest that beings produce a material world apart from the pure land which XZ seems to be suggesting.

Astus wrote:

The Vimalakirti Sutra talks of how the purity and defilement of the world depends on the purity and defilement of the mind. There is no world apart from the mind.

Queequeg said:

In XZ's telling, beings each project a form world that is not participated in by Buddhas or even formless beings. It's not just that the samsara colored glasses prevent beings from seeing the world.

Astus wrote:

Just like the Vimalakirti Sutra, Xuanzang states that the seemingly external world is a mental product. Neither say that there is a world independent of beings.

Queequeg said:

XZ is saying that beings construct a material cell for themselves... That isn't even really shared... But overlap somehow. That can exist even without them in it. That's the part that blows it up and makes what you're saying inapplicable.

Astus wrote:

A world exist as a mental product. The part on the issue of a world without inhabitants is about the process of the collapse and emergence of the various realms, but even there it's all produced by karma.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 6th, 2019 at 1:57 PM

Title: Re: Trekcho Dzogchen = Soto Zen?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Soto is a whole tradition, trekcho is a method. To compare things we should start with defining what are to be compared.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 6th, 2019 at 8:51 PM

Title: Re: Trekcho Dzogchen = Soto Zen?

Content:

Viach said:

It would be more correct: Semde Dzogchen = Soto Zen.

Astus wrote:

Semde is a category of teachings, not a complete tradition. A valid comparison would be more like Nyingma and Soto. As traditions, they include lots of teachings, practices, methods, doctrines, rituals, and they are quite diverse within themselves where one can find various differences in terms of history, monastery, and individual teachers. So, what do you actually want to compare?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 6th, 2019 at 10:41 PM

Title: Re: Trekcho Dzogchen = Soto Zen?

Content:

Viach said:

In this case, I compare doctrines and methods: in my opinion they are almost the same.

Astus wrote:

OK, but then it's still too much. Should pick a specific doctrine or a specific method from both sides and see how they compare. Or at least bring up a short text. For instance, the <https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/practice/sutra/pdf/03/c02.pdf> is meant to be a brief summary of Soto Zen teachings, while the <https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/practice/sutra/pdf/03/c01.pdf> is a summary for meditation. Do you have something to compare those with in Dzogchen?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 7th, 2019 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: Trekcho Dzogchen = Soto Zen?

Content:

Viach said:

The method is the same - non-meditation.

Astus wrote:

How does one non-meditate in Dzogchen? How is it done in Soto?

Dogen writes in Fukanzazengi:

'Consider the Buddha: although he was wise at birth, the traces of his six years of upright sitting can yet be seen. As for Bodhidharma, although he had received the mind-seal, his nine years of facing a wall is celebrated still. If even the ancient sages were like this, how can we today dispense with wholehearted practice?'

Is that non-meditation? Or is it 'to take the backward step that turns the light and shines it inward'? Or is thinking of not thinking it?

How about what Dogen writes in Gakudo-Yojinshu (https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/leaflet/heartofzen/pdf/Heart_of_Zen.pdf)?

'Although people vary in their abilities, some base their practice on faith and others base their practice on dharma. Some realize instantaneously and others practice gradually. All of them enter realization through practice.'

Viach said:

Doctrines: nature of mind (Semde) = Buddha consciousness (Soto).

Astus wrote:

Dogen writes in Bussho (SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 2):

'to look at mountains and rivers is to look at the buddha-nature. And to look at the buddha-nature is to look at a donkey's jaw or a horse's nose.' (p 8)

'In sum, "that without constancy" of grass, trees, and forests is just the buddha-nature. And "that without constancy" of the body-and-mind of a human being is the buddha-nature itself. National lands and mountains and rivers are "that without constancy" because they are the buddha-nature. The truth of anuttara samyaksambodhi, because it is the buddha-nature, is "that without constancy."' (p 14)

'Those without mind may also be "living beings," for "living beings" are just mind.⁹⁸ So minds all are "living beings," and "living beings" all "have the buddha-nature." Grass, trees, and national lands are mind itself; because they are mind, they are "living beings," and because they are "living beings" they "have the buddha-nature." The sun, the moon, and the stars are mind itself; because they are mind, they are "living beings," and because they are “living beings” they “have the buddha-nature.”’ (p 21)

How do they compare to Dzogchen?

Viach said:

It is hard not to notice the similarity when reading teachers Soto and Semde.

Astus wrote:

Do you have anything more specific?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 7th, 2019 at 3:36 PM

Title: Re: What is Mount Meru?

Content:

Astus wrote:

A monk asked Yunmen, "When not producing a single thought, is there any fault or not?"

Yumen said, "Mount Sumeru."

(Book of Serenity, case 19)

So, what is Mount Meru?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 8th, 2019 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: Cheng weishi lun, Demonstration of Consciousness

Content:

Queequeg said:

I don't think this is so.

Astus wrote:

'From beginningless time, this consciousness has evolved like a stream. At what point is it utterly abandoned? IT IS ABANDONED IN THE STATE OF ARHATSHIP. Arhats are saints at the time when they terminate the obstacle of the passions (klesa-avarana) utterly.

They are said to ABANDON [alaya consciousness] because at that time, the coarse and heavy class of passions is forever removed. The ARHAT refers to those of all three vehicles who have progressed beyond the stage of learning (saiksa)'

(CWSL, BDK ed, p 78)

Queequeg said:

See BDK translation pp. 70-73.

Astus wrote:

In what I have there is a discussion of caitasikas on those pages.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 8th, 2019 at 4:54 PM

Title: Re: Cheng weishi lun, Demonstration of Consciousness

Content:

Queequeg said:

Further on from where you quote:

Astus wrote:

That is an argument for the inclusion of avaivartikas, who are not yet asaiksa on the bodhisattva path. Furthermore, the avaivartika bodhisattva is included because he has abandoned klesavarana just like asaiksa sravakas. But before that it is stated explicitly that all three types of asaiksa aryas have fully abandoned the alayavijnana. However, alayavijnana is a function of the mind, so its abandonment does not mean total cessation even for arhats until nirupadhisenanirvana.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 9th, 2019 at 1:11 AM

Title: Re: Cheng weishi lun, Demonstration of Consciousness

Content:

Queequeg said:

the passage I quoted quite clearly says it's a matter of semantics.

Astus wrote:

Not just semantics but function. Alayavijnana is a function of the mind, and when that function has ceased, that is the cessation of the storehouse consciousness. That is why arhats, pratyekabuddhas, non-regressing bodhisattvas, and buddhas are said to be without alayavijnana.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 9th, 2019 at 5:16 AM

Title: Re: Are Zen priests considered Bhikkhu / Bhikṣu?

Content:

ryan_oliveira said:

Are non-celibate Zen priests considered Bhikkhu / Bhikṣu?

Astus wrote:

Within the Japanese context, yes. Beyond that, no.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 9th, 2019 at 5:43 PM

Title: Re: Does zen have anything similar to dream yoga?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Seongcheol, a former head of the Jogye Order, had the view that hwadu practice should continue during sleep. See this https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Seongcheol#In_deep_sleep,_one_mind. You can also read about it in his talk <http://www.buddhism.org/?p=157>.

The same idea is found in Jogye's handbook for Ganhwaseon in the chapter:

http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/bbs/board.php?bo_table=3020&wr_id=12

However, it is not a practice like dream yoga, but rather a sign of progress. The point is still to focus totally on the hwadu, as <http://www.buddhism.org/?p=1194>:

'When practicing hwadu, do not waste even one second. Continuously, as a hen sits on her eggs, as water flows, without rest, focus on your hwadu without any interruption. Then, your effort will be fruitful, your mind and body will become light and contented. Take your hwadu even into your dreams, and you will attain wisdom, a mind clear and full of intelligence.'

On the topic of sleep, also check the <https://suttacentral.net/sn4.7/en/sujato>.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 9th, 2019 at 7:13 PM

Title: Re: Does zen have anything similar to dream yoga?

Content:

Grigoris said:

That is a truly horrible translation. It actually makes no sense.

Astus wrote:

How about <https://suttacentral.net/sn4.7/en/bodhi>?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 10th, 2019 at 4:25 PM

Title: Re: What is Mount Meru?

Content:

Astus wrote:

What has not yet been discussed is: who says what Mount Meru is? The Pali Canon mentions it <https://dhammadownload.com/viewtopic.php?p=408190&sid=9352bffc0e0877c1e1ed3a50c8d7edc5#p408190> (mainly: SN <https://suttacentral.net/sn13.11/en/sujato>;

<https://suttacentral.net/sn22.99/en/sujato>; <https://suttacentral.net/sn56.49/en/sujato>;

<https://suttacentral.net/sn56.50/en/sujato>; AN

<https://suttacentral.net/an3.80/en/sujato>; <https://suttacentral.net/an7.66/en/sujato>;

<https://suttacentral.net/an10.29/en/sujato>). Most of the cosmological explanations are found in commentaries, and not even the Abhidhamma elaborates on it. However, the commentators, including here Vasubandhu's AKB, do not take these matters as metaphors but rather as the accurate description of the world (see: https://what-buddha-said.net/library/pdfs/Buddhist_Cosmology_Punnadhammo.pdf by Punnadhammo, section 4:7 on p 697-700).

Punnadhammo, section 4:7 on p 697-700).

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 10th, 2019 at 5:11 PM

Title: Re: What is Mount Meru?

Content:

tatpuruṣa said:

These are descriptions of the way how to visualize it for certain meditative practices.

Astus wrote:

That does not negate the cosmological view. Just because there is meditation on the six realms, it does not mean those realms do not actually exist. Quite the opposite, one meditates on them because they are real.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 10th, 2019 at 5:50 PM

Title: Re: What is Mount Meru?

Content:

tatpuruṣa said:

I never said these realms do not exist; of course they do.

But those descriptions are schematic (not necessarily "real") representations full of symbolism meant as instructions for visualization, just like mandalas.

Astus wrote:

There is nothing symbolic in describing the so called receptacle world (bhājanaloka), since it is meant to be an object of perception common to all beings in that place, and it is generally made of insentient matter. Or would you say the descriptions found in various texts from Asaṅga's Abhidharmasamuccaya (p 82) to Mipham's Gateway to Knowledge (vol 2, ch 8) are somehow meditation instructions?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 10th, 2019 at 7:40 PM

Title: Re: What is Mount Meru?

Content:

tatpuruṣa said:

In order to connect to, visualize, imagine or understand other realms and other beings we need symbols.

Astus wrote:

There are four major and eight intermediate continents around Sumeru, all populated by humans, so easily perceptible to us. The southern one, where all of us is supposed to be, is described just as India is known with its rivers and mountains. What is symbolic about that? Also, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/File:1710_First_Japanese_Buddhist_Map_of_the_World_Showing_Europe,_America,_and_Africa_-_Geographicus_-_NansenBushu-hotan-1710.jpg from 1710 does not look like an allegory to me, even though it contains locations like Lake Anavatapta whence the four great rivers flow.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 10th, 2019 at 8:07 PM

Title: Re: What is Mount Meru?

Content:

tatpurusa said:

What is the point you are trying to make?

Astus wrote:

That the descriptions of the world written by various authors were intended as they were written, how they imagined the world to be.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 10th, 2019 at 9:08 PM

Title: Re: What is Mount Meru?

Content:

tatpurusa said:

The clue is imagined. In order to imagine something unpercievable to us we need symbols.

Astus wrote:

Beyond the room I'm sitting in the rest of the world I can only imagine. And even where I now sit is processed by the mind. But it doesn't mean the idea of a street outside refers to something imperceptible. Similarly, they did know and could perceive those rivers and mountains, while the rest beyond the known lands was assumed to be similarly real and perceptible, if one can go there. Hence there are stories of people physically visiting various realms.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 10th, 2019 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: What is Mount Meru?

Content:

tatpurusa said:

You are just talking about distant things from our own realm.

Astus wrote:

Exactly. And Mount Meru is within our realm too according to the descriptions. That's where the four great rivers, like the Ganges, come from. One just needs to follow them back to their source.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 11th, 2019 at 2:11 AM

Title: Re: What is Mount Meru?

Content:
tatpurusa said:
And that is the center of the universe?

Astus wrote:
According to some, yes. See: <https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Anavatapta>.

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, August 11th, 2019 at 4:55 AM
Title: Re: What is Mount Meru?
Content:
tatpurusa said:
I mean according to you.

Astus wrote:
I am a kilometre from the Danube, the second largest river in Europe and has about the same length as the Ganges, however, it comes from the Black Forest and not the Himalayas. The <https://www.welt-atlas.de/datenbank/karten/karte-0-9000.gif> usually have some part of West Africa in the middle, however, since often here "the world" can easily mean simply Europe, it is apparently a https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Geographical_midpoint_of_Europe where its midpoint lies, therefore I might as well be biased and say it's either Munich or <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/T%C3%A1llya#Trivia>.

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, August 11th, 2019 at 6:26 AM
Title: Re: What is Mount Meru?
Content:
tatpurusa said:
No, I mean the centre of the universe, with all realms, not just of the Earth. This is what it is supposed to be.

Astus wrote:
The Buddhist universe in the sense of lokadhatu? Because then it is taught to be the Sumeru. But if you mean how it should be in light of the current view of the world, then there is no centre.

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, August 11th, 2019 at 6:50 PM
Title: Re: Reality
Content:
Astus wrote:
As the Svatantrika-Prasangika distinction is a Tibetan idea, primarily of the Gelugpas, here are some recommended works on that:

Academic:

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=tlw1BgAAQBAJ>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=rHHlCmCr85EC>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=u7ZtE1bhtRYC>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=VS4tDQAAQBAJ>
https://books.google.hu/books?id=1KXrUeGsT_QC

Nyingmapa:

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=SaHSVuMnxNIC>

Kagyupa:

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=8zeh8VAFcVAC>

Sakyapa:

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=Xzc6AwAAQBAJ>

Gelugpa:

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=iRKQ2GbDcA8C>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=3KqnpqRajPEC>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=bzb-Gih7k1EC>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 12th, 2019 at 1:58 AM

Title: Re: Reality

Content:

Astus wrote:

Those four you listed are fine, if that's what you're after.

Instead of Garfield's MMK I might recommend Siderits' work:

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=1Y8vdpqzOg8C>. Or if it's a matter of translation, try <https://books.google.hu/books?id=cmFADAAAQBAJ>, and if with commentary you can go with <https://books.google.hu/books?id=QpO5ykqRHJEC>.

If you want somewhat more accessible works:

On MMK:

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=9DXqAwAAQBAJ>

Madhyamaka:

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=dIMMmwEACAAJ>
https://books.google.hu/books?id=GqW7Lm0GT_gC
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=oMNymKu-5c8C>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=tVGBDwAAQBAJ>
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=QWg7BQAAQBAJ>

Meditation:

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=y6HzxLUC7rQC>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=qylyQHR3AacC>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=MC4tDQAAQBAJ>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=vJVDCUcwirgC>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 12th, 2019 at 4:40 PM

Title: Re: Do Buddhas have any true multiplicity, or are they all emanations of the dharmakāya?

Content:

Lokottara said:

I don't understand what the "point" of separate Samyaksambuddhas is if, via the Śūraṅgama Samādhi, even one Buddha can manifest an infinite amount of emanations (among other things).

Astus wrote:

There are two perspectives. From the perspective of one's own cultivation, one aims to complete the bodhisattva path and attain buddhahood. From the perspective of one's perception of those who accomplished buddhahood, there are various examples. So, there are different buddhas for two reasons: the manifoldness of practitioners, and the plurality of personal traits that require connection to different buddhas. While actually these ideas about buddhas are 100% conceptual fabrications, they're still meaningful and beneficial.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 13th, 2019 at 7:38 PM

Title: Re: Calming the mind

Content:

dolphin_color said:

In your experience, what actually helps calm the mind before a meditation session?

Astus wrote:

There are numerous practices, especially those performed regularly in ceremonies, that are meant to help taming the mind. In particular repentance is a powerful one, so are devotional practices. Depending on your preferred tradition, you can find those that fit your situation. Furthermore, what object you choose to tame the mind can also matter a lot.

“If beings of dull capacity in the final age desire in their hearts to pursue the Way but cannot succeed in realizing it due to karmic obstructions from the past, they should ardently repent and always keep up their hope. They must first cut off likes and dislikes, envy, and deceitfulness and pursue the superior mind. They may practice any one of these three kinds of pure contemplation. If that contemplation does not succeed, they should then practice another contemplation. They should not become disheartened but should [continue to] pursue realization gradually.”

(Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment, ch 11, BDK ed, p 106)

"The fifth method is a practice [designed] to cure people equally [troubled with multiple problems]. [This method is also intended for] people who have committed grave transgressions and who seek for [help from] the Buddha.
[The master] should teach such people the single-minded concentration on calling the Buddha to mind. There are three types of people who practice the concentration on calling the Buddha to mind: elementary, intermediate, and advanced."
(The Sutra on the Concentration of Sitting Meditation, BDK ed, p 33)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 14th, 2019 at 10:18 PM

Title: Re: What is Dharma?

Content:

Astus wrote:

'And the Blessed One spoke, saying: "In whatsoever Dhamma and Discipline, Subhadda, there is not found the Noble Eightfold Path, neither is there found a true ascetic of the first, second, third, or fourth degree of saintliness. But in whatsoever Dhamma and Discipline there is found the Noble Eightfold Path, there is found a true ascetic of the first, second, third, and fourth degrees of saintliness.'

(<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.16.1-6.vaji.html>)

"Bhikkhus, only here is there a recluse, only here a second recluse, only here a third recluse, only here a fourth recluse. The doctrines of others are devoid of recluses: that is how you should rightly roar your lion's roar."

(<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.011.ntbb.html>)

"the Tathagata isn't concerned with whether all the cosmos or half of it or a third of it will be led to release by means of that [Dhamma]. But he does know this: 'All those who have been led, are being led, or will be led [to release] from the cosmos have done so, are doing so, or will do so after having abandoned the five hindrances — those defilements of awareness that weaken discernment — having well-established their minds in the four frames of reference, and having developed, as they have come to be, the seven factors for Awakening."

(<https://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an10/an10.095.than.html>)

'this teaching is well explained and well propounded to us by the Blessed One, emancipating, leading to peace, proclaimed by someone who is a fully awakened Buddha. You should all recite this in concert, without disputing, so that this spiritual path may last for a long time.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/dn33/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 15th, 2019 at 5:39 PM

Title: Re: Cheng weishi lun, Demonstration of Consciousness

Content:

Sentient Light said:

But the remainder of the outflows remain as a subtle mind-made body, which is subject to birth and death in a 'transformative' way, rather than a 'discontinuous' way.

Astus wrote:

The Faxiang school accepts that there is remainderless extinction for hearers of the fixed class (of the five gotras), hence no continuation. See: CWSL, ch 12, BDK ed, p 341-345.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 15th, 2019 at 8:50 PM

Title: Re: The feeling of Me, or you.

Content:

Astus wrote:

That is the common mistake of taking consciousness/awareness to be stable and one's true self. But if properly investigated, it turns out that there is nothing constant about it.

"That which is wrongly believed to be the self, or the person, and the doer and so forth, which has been imputed as the performer of actions and the experiencer of joy and sorrow is nothing but the false belief in self based on the five aggregates.

When examined by means of discriminating knowledge the essence of a personal self is not perceived because it is not established as being identical with the aggregates, nor is it established as being different from them."

(Gateway to Knowledge, vol 4, p 35)

"It would be better for the uninstructed run-of-the-mill person to hold to the body composed of the four great elements, rather than the mind, as the self. Why is that? Because this body composed of the four great elements is seen standing for a year, two years, three, four, five, ten, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, a hundred years or more. But what's called 'mind,' 'intellect,' or 'consciousness' by day and by night arises as one thing and ceases as another. Just as a monkey, swinging through a forest wilderness, grabs a branch. Letting go of it, it grabs another branch. Letting go of that, it grabs another one. Letting go of that, it grabs another one. In the same way, what's called 'mind,' 'intellect,' or 'consciousness' by day and by night arises as one thing and ceases as another."
(<https://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.061.than.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 16th, 2019 at 3:24 AM

Title: Re: What is Dharma?

Content:

Aemilius said:

That is not as simple as it may seem. Words have no absolute existence, meaning of the Dharma is often very elusive. Thus it is impossible to say that "here is Dharma", and

"there is no Dharma" with absolute certainty.

Astus wrote:

If that were so, then the Buddha would not have taught the Dharma well, then he would have failed in his role as a teacher. Furthermore, right view is very basic for any endeavour in Buddhism, therefore, if one cannot ascertain the correct teaching, then one cannot go any further either.

"When a person has wrong view, wrong resolve, wrong speech, wrong action, wrong livelihood, wrong effort, wrong mindfulness, wrong concentration, wrong knowledge, & wrong release, whatever bodily deeds he undertakes in line with that view, whatever verbal deeds... whatever mental deeds he undertakes in line with that view, whatever intentions, whatever determinations, whatever vows, whatever fabrications, all lead to what is disagreeable, unpleasing, unappealing, unprofitable, & stressful. Why is that? Because the view is evil."

(<https://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an10/an10.104.than.html>)

"Of those, right view is the forerunner. And how is right view the forerunner? In one of right view, right resolve comes into being. In one of right resolve, right speech comes into being. In one of right speech, right action... In one of right action, right livelihood... In one of right livelihood, right effort... In one of right effort, right mindfulness... In one of right mindfulness, right concentration... In one of right concentration, right knowledge... In one of right knowledge, right release comes into being. Thus the learner is endowed with eight factors, and the arahant with ten."

(<https://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.117.than.html>)

Aemilius said:

Dharma exists in communication, in experience. As is pointed to by the Gotami sutra.

Astus wrote:

The Gotami Sutta lists specific qualities that define right and wrong. If you want a more general statement, see the <https://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an03/an03.078.than.html>, however, even then it is quite well defined in Buddhism what skilful (kusala) and unskilful (akusala) are, plus knowing the difference is part of right view (see:

<https://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.009.ntbb.html>).

Aemilius said:

In the Lotus of the True Law, Chapter on Avalokiteshvara, it is said that he (Avalokiteshvara) will appear in numerous different guises and forms to guide those who need guidance, like in the forms of a yaksha, a pratyeka-buddha, in the forms of various hindu deities, etc..

Astus wrote:

Being pointed toward the Dharma does not mean that it is Dharma. Impermanence is ubiquitous and contemplation on it is liberating, but that does not make it Dharma per se.

Aemilius said:

Whether a path or teaching is authentic can be discerned from the fruits it produces.

Astus wrote:

You still need to define authentic fruits. And then, as a simple matter of causality, there are a limited number of causes that can bring about the desired effect.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 16th, 2019 at 3:22 PM

Title: Re: What is Dharma?

Content:

Aemilius said:

You also need to define all the words and concepts used in all the teachings, see...Like for example what is "view", what is "right view", ... what is "liberation", what is "right liberation", etc...

Astus wrote:

That's already been done by the Buddha and numerous disciples in the sutras, treatises, and the commentaries.

Aemilius said:

the responsibility rests also on the hearer or the one who understands.

Astus wrote:

The responsibility to actually study, contemplate, and cultivate, yes.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 16th, 2019 at 5:15 PM

Title: Re: Why did the Buddha rarely get specific with meditation instructions?

Content:

Astus wrote:

What level of specificity do you mean?

As for what can be gathered from the early texts:

http://www.ahandfulofleaves.org/documents/Articles/On%20the%20Practice%20of%20Buddhist%20Meditation%20According%20to%20the%20Pali%20Nikayas%20and%20Exegetical%20Sources_Gethin_Hamburg_2004.pdf by Rupert Gethin

https://www.academia.edu/21124676/Early_Buddhist_Meditation by Johannes Bronkhorst

<https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/ebms.pdf> by Analayo

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 17th, 2019 at 3:59 AM

Title: Re: Why did the Buddha rarely get specific with meditation instructions?

Content:

Lokottara said:

The specificity that more modern meditation manuals have.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean like when the <https://suttacentral.net/mn118/en/bodhi> says "having folded his legs crosswise, set his body erect" there should be a more extensive explanation, like the http://www.rinpoche.com/kml/study_materials/Meditation%20Posture%20.pdf? If so, then one possible reason for that is how the teachings may talk about things that were important to mention/emphasise/preserve, like the stages of absorption, but not the object of absorption. You can find this bias in later and even current teachings as well.

Lokottara said:

For example, even some of the terms are rather undefined. For example, the term "parimukham".

Astus wrote:

That is more of a linguistic matter that establishing mindfulness in front of oneself may not sound clear.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 17th, 2019 at 6:03 AM

Title: Re: Why did the Buddha rarely get specific with meditation instructions?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Also, more on how much one can actually find in the suttas:

https://store.pariyatti.org/Buddhas-Path-to-Deliverance-The--PDF-eBook_p_2561.html
- Nyanatiloka Thera used mostly suttas to cover the topics of the Visuddhimagga.

<https://web.archive.org/web/20150324233218/http://measurelessmind.ca/> - the full path described mainly with suttas

http://www.ahandfulofleaves.org/documents/Buddhist%20Meditation%20An%20anthology%20from%20the%20Pali%20canon_Sarah%20Shaw.pdf

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 17th, 2019 at 4:50 PM

Title: Re: Relationship between Huayan's fourfold dharmadhatu and Dongshen's/Zens Five Ranks.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Ross Bolleter in https://books.google.hu/books?id=_XBNAgAAQBAJ makes several connections between the five ranks and the four dharmadhatu. The topic is also briefly touched upon in <https://books.google.hu/books?id=RLH9CAAAQBAJ>, and in the introduction to part 2 in <https://books.google.hu/books?id=TrYKAAAYAAJ>. In <https://books.google.hu/books?id=ikPxIBFOz-sC> there is an essay by Jana Benicka titled '(Huayan-like) Notions of Inseparability (or Unity) of Essence and Its Function (or Principle and Phenomena) in Some Commentaries on "Five Positions" of Chan Master Dongshan Liangjie'.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 21st, 2019 at 5:43 PM

Title: Re: cessation of suffering or cessation of suffering cause

Content:

Viach said:

Is the Third Truth of the Noble about the cessation of suffering or the cessation of suffering cause?

Astus wrote:

'Now this, bhikkhus, is the noble truth of the cessation of suffering: it is the remainderless fading away and cessation of that same craving, the giving up and relinquishing of it, freedom from it, nonreliance on it.'
(<https://suttacentral.net/sn56.11/en/bodhi>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 21st, 2019 at 7:54 PM

Title: Re: cessation of suffering or cessation of suffering cause

Content:

Viach said:

Isn't the point of 2TN to demonstrate the suffering cause ? (Which should be eliminated)

Astus wrote:

And that's what it is:

'Now this, bhikkhus, is the noble truth of the origin of suffering: it is this craving which leads to renewed existence, accompanied by delight and lust, seeking delight here and there; that is, craving for sensual pleasures, craving for existence, craving for extermination.'

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 21st, 2019 at 8:01 PM

Title: Re: cessation of suffering or cessation of suffering cause

Content:

Viach said:

Is this the answer to my question?

Astus wrote:

The 2nd noble truth is about the cause of suffering, just as it is stated in the quote from the sutta. The 3rd noble truth is about the cessation of suffering that comes about due to the cessation of the cause of suffering, as stated in the quote from the sutta. If there is something else you're asking, please clarify.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 21st, 2019 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: cessation of suffering or cessation of suffering cause

Content:

Viach said:

Why is 3TN called a “cessation of suffering”, although it is explained as a cessation of, namely, the cause of suffering? And why is 4TN called the "path leading to the cessation of suffering" and not to the cessation of the cause of suffering (which would be more logical)?

Astus wrote:

My guess is simply because of convenience, just as all four are reduced to the words dukkha, samudaya, nirodha, magga.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 22nd, 2019 at 4:11 AM

Title: Re: Does meditating on emptiness directly lead to compassion?

Content:

Lokottara said:

Have any of you found that contemplating on the emptiness of sentient beings makes you more compassionate?

Astus wrote:

Emptiness of being means recognising how attachment is a mistake that generates immense suffering, and with the diminishing of self-centredness there is the arising of patience for and recognition of the emotions driving everyone to more and more pain. That's how compassion can emerge from contemplation of emptiness.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 23rd, 2019 at 4:09 PM

Title: Re: Saṃskārāḥ & Bijāni

Content:

Astus wrote:

Samskara at the second limb is about intentions based on ignorance. Seeds in the storehouse consciousness are hidden causes of future experiences. One can actually be aware of arising intentions, while seeds are per definition unknown. You could even say that seeds cause samskaras.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 23rd, 2019 at 5:39 PM

Title: Re: Conceptual vs. Non Conceptual meditation discussion

Content:

Astus wrote:

The basic ignorance is conceptual, hence the remedy is conceptual. As Kamalashila put it (Stages of Meditation, p 134, 135):

'Those who do not meditate with wisdom by analyzing the entity of things specifically, but merely meditate on the elimination of mental activity, cannot avert conceptual thoughts and also cannot realize identitylessness because they lack the light of wisdom. If the fire of consciousness knowing phenomena as they are is produced from individual analysis of suchness, then like the fire produced by rubbing wood it will burn the wood of conceptual thought. The Buddha has spoken in this way. ... It has been explained very clearly that through mere elimination of mental activity, Without examining the identity of things with wisdom, it is not possible to engage in non-conceptual meditation. Thus, concentration is done after the actual identity of things like physical form and so forth has been perfectly analyzed with wisdom, and not by concentrating on physical form and so forth.'

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 23rd, 2019 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: Conceptual vs. Non Conceptual meditation discussion

Content:

Rick said:

It would follow that if the illness is the psyche, the remedy is psyche-logical. Treat like with like ... to transcend attachment to self, use self. Yes?

Astus wrote:

The error of taking things to be existent or non-existent is a conceptual one, and that error can be addressed on the conceptual level, removing the unfounded belief in substantial entities.

'Once a teacher from Kham asked Dromtönpa about the meaning of the two selflessnesses.

Dromtönpa replied, "If you were to probe with your mind and search from the top of your crown aperture to the bottom of the soles of your feet, not a single entity is to be found that is called the 'self.' That nonfinding is the selflessness of persons. Recognizing that the searching mind, too, is devoid of intrinsic existence is the selflessness of phenomena."

(The Book of Kadam, p 573)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 24th, 2019 at 5:10 AM

Title: Re: Conceptual vs. Non Conceptual meditation discussion

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

It is not necessary to cease conceptual thought, only to have an experience it's nature ' i.e. to "see the identity of things with wisdom".

Astus wrote:

Seeing with wisdom means seeing with discernment based on the teachings.

Johnny Dangerous said:

whether Vipasyana is more properly conceptual or non conceptual, I assume the real answer is both.

Astus wrote:

Both, in the way that there is a sequence, where one first has to analyse experiences, and that is conceptual, and with the conclusion of analysis there is no need to do anything further but remain in non-conceptual equipoise.

Johnny Dangerous said:

this is not the only response to the question and if we read Dzogchen and Mahamudra teachers of various lineages

Astus wrote:

Dakpo Tashi Namgyal on vipasyana in mahamudra:

'In this context, by relying on the major and minor texts, as well as shorter esoteric instructions, transmitted from the Great Brahman [Saraha], the glorious Śavaripa, and the lord of yogins Tilopa, we focus on just the mind to determine [the nature of] all percepts and perceivers—which is the instruction for taking direct perception as the path. This is the way to give rise to the view of the emptiness of nature. It has many distinctive profundities in that it involves little hardship and brings great benefit. It is, for the most part, identical with the key points of the Sūtra-oriented texts on the stages of meditation, the Instructions on Prajñāpāramitā, Kamalaśīla's three Stages of Meditation, and the Exalted [Lord Atīśa's] Instructions on Madhyamaka. It is most wonderful.' (Moonbeams of Mahamudra, 9.B.3)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 26th, 2019 at 12:34 AM

Title: Re: cessation of suffering or cessation of suffering cause

Content:

Astus wrote:

The 4NT are the basics of correct view for liberation without what there is no correct path. The 4NT were also taught to lay people in his <https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Anupubbikath%C4%81>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 27th, 2019 at 9:15 PM

Title: Re: cessation of suffering or cessation of suffering cause

Content:

Viach said:

1. The Path we have already discussed here:

<https://dharma wheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=41&t=31103#p491639>

Astus wrote:

That is a denial of the possibility of understanding the teachings and following the instructions, hence a rejection of the Three Jewels.

Viach said:

2. I had in mind the average man with average abilities.

Astus wrote:

What is the measurement of abilities?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 28th, 2019 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: cessation of suffering or cessation of suffering cause

Content:

Viach said:

1. 4TN are not an instruction for practice, they are the answer at the end of the exercises book.

Astus wrote:

The four noble truths is one of the first things one learns about Buddhism, and it serves as the summary of the whole of Buddhadharma. It is also the basis of right view, what one has to come to understand, and eventually realise directly.

Viach said:

You can't practice the answer, you can only be guided by it.

Astus wrote:

Being a guide, it is what one follows through until complete attainment.

Viach said:

without a solution (practice of Buddhist yoga), the answer itself (4TN) has no practical value.

Astus wrote:

Contemplation of the four truths is one of the topics of dharmanupasyana, not to mention all the studies one has to do.

Viach said:

2. As a rule, the measure is a reconciliation of the yogic experience you have already achieved with a description of the reference experience (for example, 4TN, 10 bhumis, etc.).

Astus wrote:

The four noble truths are not the stages of attainment. Also, having attained any of the arya stages is a measure of attainment, not abilities.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 28th, 2019 at 5:19 PM

Title: Re: Mind versus Nature

Content:

Astus wrote:

The nature of a thing cannot be apart from the thing itself. The nature of water is wetness, but its wetness is not apart from it, but a defining description of the object. The nature of mind is a description of what the mind is like in general, therefore the mind's universal characteristic (samanya-laksana) is that it's empty, impermanent, etc., while its individual, unique characteristic (sva-laksana) is that it is aware, conscious.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 28th, 2019 at 6:49 PM

Title: Re: Cessation in the Shravakayana/Pali Canon

Content:

Astus wrote:

Nirvana is the cessation of greed, hatred, and ignorance (see the whole of <https://suttacentral.net/sn43>). The reason that the Buddha did not teach annihilation is that there is nobody to cease to exist (see e.g. <https://suttacentral.net/sn22.85/en/bodhi> & <https://suttacentral.net/sn22.86/en/bodhi>). Furthermore, inquiries into the existence and non-existence of nirvana is not understanding what nirvana is (see e.g. <https://suttacentral.net/an4.173/en/sujato> & <https://suttacentral.net/mn72/en/horner>).

Ven. Ñāṇananda has a great series of talks on the subject of nibbana:

<https://seeingthroughthenet.net/books/>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 28th, 2019 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: Cessation in the Shravakayana/Pali Canon

Content:

smcj said:

And just to be clear, we are discussing the post mortem stays of an Arhat, not a Buddha.

Astus wrote:

In Abhidharma schools (not Mahayana) there is no difference.

smcj said:

Once I get home I'll look for Gompopa's Mahayana view of Arhats, which does see a post mortem continuation.

Astus wrote:

That's Gampopa's view, that agrees with the late Mahayana doctrine of Ekayana, not Abhidharma.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 29th, 2019 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: Cessation in the Shravakayana/Pali Canon

Content:

smcj said:

So he includes his understanding of what the Hinayana teaches.

Astus wrote:

No Sravaka Sutra Pitaka nor Abhidharma Pitaka were translated to Tibetan, and Gampopa had only to very little, like the Abhidharmakosabhasyam. If you want to know what the Sarvastivadins taught, you can find that mostly in Chinese, some parts in Sanskrit, and what is available in English.

smcj said:

I use Hinayana here specifically to refer to the extinct Northern Indian school(s) that the Tibetans got the transmission from. Not necessarily the Theravadans.

Astus wrote:

I know of no Tibetan who were a representative of any Abhidharma school. Only the bhikshu ordination got transmitted to Tibet, but not much of the teachings.

Recommended for this topic:

http://theosnet.net/dzyan/stanzas/sarvastivada_conception_of_nirvana.pdf.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 29th, 2019 at 2:58 AM

Title: Re: Mind versus Nature

Content:

Simon E. said:

We are still no nearer a consensus on what 'mind' signifies.

Astus wrote:

Mind is not a specific technical word. As for some definitions:

"And why, bhikkhus, do you call it consciousness? 'It cognizes,' bhikkhus, therefore it is called consciousness. And what does it cognize? It cognizes sour, it cognizes bitter, it cognizes pungent, it cognizes sweet, it cognizes sharp, it cognizes mild, it cognizes salty, it cognizes bland. 'It cognizes,' bhikkhus, therefore it is called consciousness."
(<https://suttacentral.net/sn22.79/en/bodhi>)

'What is the aggregate of consciousness (vijñānaskandha)? Consciousness distinguishes (pratijānīte) the dharmas as blue (nīla), yellow (pīta), red (lohita), white (avadāta), etc.

This consciousness is sixfold: visual consciousness (cakṣurvijñāna), auditory consciousness (śrotravijñāna), olfactory (ghrāṇa-), gustatory (jihvā-), tactile (kāya-) and mental (manoivijñāna).

What is the visual consciousness? Being based on the visual sense-faculty (cakṣurindriya), it cognizes visibles – this is the visual consciousness. Similarly for the auditory olfactory, gustatory tactile mental (consciousnesses) – being based on the mental mental sense-faculty, it cognizes the dharmas – this is the mental consciousness.

Such is the aggregate of consciousness.'
(Amrtarasa, V.I.5, tr Chodron)

'Consciousness is the impression relative to each object.

It is the mental organ.

It is seven dhatus.

The six consciousnesses and the manas.'
(Abhidharmakosa I.16, tr Pruden)

'What is the characteristic of consciousness? Knowing is the characteristic of consciousness. It is consciousness by means of which one knows (visible) form, sound, odor, taste, the tangible, mental objects and various realms.'
(Abhidharmasamuccaya, p 4, tr Boin-Webb)

'What is consciousness? It is awareness of an object. It is also [referred to as] thought and mind, because it is diverse and because mind serves as its support.'
(Pancaskandhaprakarana, in Inner Science of Buddhist Practice, p 239)

'Consciousness means "perception." Here, in the Treatise, the word "consciousness" also includes mental activities, because they are without doubt associated with the former.'
(Cheng Weishi Lun, BDK ed, p 9-10)

'The aggregate of consciousness is that which individually cognizes the object-identity of all phenomena.'
(Gateway to Knowledge, 1.135, tr Kunsang)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 29th, 2019 at 7:12 PM

Title: Re: Cessation in the Shravakayana/Pali Canon

Content:

Caoimhghín said:

"without remainder" is anupādisesā from anupādisesā ca nibbānadhātu or "the Nibbāna-element with no residue left" in <https://suttacentral.net/iti44/en/ireland>.

Astus wrote:

Ven. Ñāṇananda comments on the Nibbānadhātu Sutta in https://seeingthroughthenet.net/wp-content/uploads/2015/09/Nibbana_Vol_4.pdf

(Sermon 18):

'At this point, we have to admit that the term diṭṭhadhammika is associated with sa-upādisesā Nibbānadhātu while the term samparāyika is taken over to refer to anupādisesā Nibbānadhātu. However, the fact that Nibbāna is explicitly defined elsewhere as the cessation of existence, bhavanirodho Nibbānaṃ, must not be forgotten. If Nibbāna is the cessation of existence, there is nothing left for the arahant to experience hereafter.

Nibbāna is solely the realization of the cessation of existence or the end of the process of becoming. So there is absolutely no question of a hereafter for the arahant.'

(p 398)

'The popular interpretation of the term anupādisesā Nibbānadhātu leaves room for some absolutist conceptions of an asaṅkhata dhātu, unprepared element, as the destiny of the arahant. After his parinibbāna, he is supposed to enter this particular Nibbānadhātu. But here, in this discourse, it is explained in just one sentence: Tassa idheva, bhikkhave, sabbavedayitāni anabhinanditāni sītibhavissanti, "in the case of him" (that is the arahant) ", O! monks, all what is felt, not having been delighted in, will cool off here itself."

This cooling off happens just before death, without igniting another spark of life.'

(p 400-401)

And a summary from Sermon 19:

'Towards the end of our last sermon, we started commenting on the two terms sa-upādisesā Nibbānadhātu and anupādisesā Nibbānadhātu. Our discussion was based on a discourse, which we quoted from the Itivuttaka. We also drew attention to a certain analogy found in the discourses, which shows that the two Nibbāna elements actually represent two stages of the extinguishment implicit in the term Nibbāna.

When no more firewood is added to a blazing fire, flames would subside and the logs of wood already burning go on smouldering as embers. After some time, they too get extinguished and become ashes. With regard to the arahant, too, we have to think in terms of this analogy. It can be taken as an illustration of the two Nibbāna elements. To the extent the living arahant is free from fresh graspings, lust, hate and delusions do not flare up. But so long as he has to bear the burden of this organic combination, this physical frame, the arahant has to experience certain afflictions and be receptive to likes and dislikes, pleasures and pains.

In spite of all that, mentally he has access to the experience of the extinguishment he has already won. It is in that sense that the arahant is said to be in the Nibbāna element with residual clinging in his everyday life, while taking in the objects of the five senses. At the last moment of the arahant's life, even this organic body that had been grasped as upādiṇṇa has to be abandoned. It is at that moment, when he is going to detach his mind from the body, that anupādisesā parinibbānadhātu comes in.'

(p 403)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 30th, 2019 at 5:17 PM

Title: Re: Thich Thien An on buddhanusmrti as zen meditation

Content:

Sentient Light said:

No longer is the Buddha the object and the meditator the subject, but the meditator becomes one with the Buddha. When this happens, this is the state of "One Mind Samadhi," and here there is no longer any distinction between Zen and Pure Land, self-power or other-power, wisdom or compassion, for all has become merged into the brightness of the Infinite Light.

[...] Like the Buddha, we should extend our love and compassion outward to all alike, to everyone everywhere, without making any distinctions. Again, if we choose to meditate on the Buddha's wisdom, we imagine the light of wisdom radiating from the figure of the Buddha and growing larger and larger and brighter and brighter until it merges with our own inner light. At this point we and the Buddha become one. When this stage is reached, then this world will become transformed into the Pure Land, this Samsara become Nirvana, and all the bliss and purity of the Western paradise become realized in the here and now of everyday life. Here the Zen and Pure Land schools meet in that common center from which they both emanate, the One Mind of Buddha, which is our own true and permanent Essence of Mind.

Astus wrote:

That is (mis)taking zen to be a mind absorbed in a single object, however, such concentration practices are found in many systems even outside Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 30th, 2019 at 10:41 PM

Title: Re: Thich Thien An on buddhanusmrti as zen meditation

Content:

Bodhisattva509 said:

Are you claiming that his teachings deviated from traditional Thien teachings?

Astus wrote:

I'm questioning if single-pointed concentration can be qualified as zen meditation.

'The master addressed the assembly, "In this teaching of seated meditation, one fundamentally does not concentrate on mind, nor does one concentrate on purity, nor is it motionlessness."

(Platform Sutra, ch 5, BDK ed, p 45)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 31st, 2019 at 4:32 AM

Title: Re: Thich Thien An on buddhanusmrti as zen meditation

Content:

Sentient Light said:

There is a uniqueness to the buddhanusmrti samadhi in that it is the Buddha that is the object.

Astus wrote:

What difference does the object of awareness makes, when the only goal is to achieve one-pointed concentration? While the object can initially help, when one-pointedness is achieved, the object becomes irrelevant.

Sentient Light said:

When samadhi is attained through Buddha-mindfulness, it is not simply quiescence that is achieved. When the adept is absorbed into the mind-made Buddha, this is precisely the direct recognition of one's own Buddhanature--it is kien tinh.

Astus wrote:

Why would that be? With concentration one can eventually attain various levels of dhyana. To turn concentration into wisdom, one must contemplate emptiness. To be absorbed in one's thought of a buddha, that in itself lacks insight and is not free from clinging.

'Whatever I think, that I see. The mind creates the Buddha. The mind itself sees him. The mind is the Buddha. The mind is the Tathāgata. The mind is my body, the mind sees the Buddha. The mind does not itself know the mind, the mind does not itself see the mind. A mind with conceptions is stupidity, a mind without conceptions is nirvana. There is nothing in these dharmas that can be enjoyed; they are all made by thinking. If thinking is nothing but empty, then anything that is thought is also utterly nonexistent.'

(Pratyutpannasamadhi Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 26)

'To be enlightened to this Dharma is to be without thought. To be without recollection, without attachment, to not activate the false and deceptive—this is to allow one's self[-suchness]-nature to function. To use wisdom to contemplate all the dharmas without grasping or rejecting is to see the nature and accomplish the enlightenment of buddhahood.'

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 31)

Sentient Light said:

Are you trying to suggest that samadhi is not a core component of zen praxis? Or just that samadhi does not necessarily mean seeing one's true nature?

Astus wrote:

It depends on what you take samadhi to be. If it is a one-pointed mind, then it can help in achieving tranquillity, but is insufficient for wisdom. As for the core components of zen praxis, they are no-thought (vô niệm 無念), no-character (vô tướng 無相), and no-abiding (vô trú 無住).

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 31st, 2019 at 4:41 AM

Title: Re: Thich Thien An on buddhanusmrti as zen meditation

Content:

Bodhisattva509 said:

What are your qualifications as a teacher, if you don't mind me asking?

Astus wrote:

I can quote some scriptures and treatises.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 2nd, 2019 at 4:55 PM

Title: Re: Cessation in the Shravakayana/Pali Canon

Content:

smcj said:

This conundrum is addressed in the Mahayana by positing additional consciousnesses that are absent in the Pali. Specifically the 8th consciousness which goes between lifetime to lifetime.

Astus wrote:

All 8 consciousnesses in Yogacara are included within the consciousness aggregate.

'What is the definition of the aggregate of consciousness (vijñānaskandhavyavasthāna)? It is the mind (citta), the mental organ (manas) and also consciousness (Vijñāna).' (Abhidharmasamuccaya, p 21, tr Boin-Webb; see also Vasubandhu in Inner Science of Buddhist Practice, p 239-240)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 9th, 2019 at 3:10 PM

Title: Re: Discrimination is self

Content:

LastLegend said:

Some quoted scriptures consciousness is aware, but this awareness still has a division/discrimination of subject and object hence self still operates; though clearly differentiating is practice.

Astus wrote:

Ignorance is not a basic quality of consciousness, or any other aggregates, but it is the clinging to the aggregates that makes one assume a self. Only fully liberated beings have no more identification with the skandhas.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 9th, 2019 at 8:30 PM

Title: Re: Discrimination is self

Content:

LastLegend said:

If a division arises or created, there is subject and object, that's self or discrimination of consciousness.

Astus wrote:

What sort of division, what sort of discrimination? A buddha should very well be able to tell the left from the right, but has no self-view nor self-clinging.

LastLegend said:

Someone can enter samadhi by severing suffering responses to sensations/feelings and severing linking perceptions, and this person has exited samsara.

Astus wrote:

The temporary absence of manifest afflictions does not mean liberation, otherwise babies should be considered buddhas.

LastLegend said:

But this person has not surpassed consciousness-still clinging to its division (subject and object).

Astus wrote:

Various meditative experiences are well within the realm of samsara.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 9th, 2019 at 10:41 PM

Title: Re: Discrimination is self

Content:

LastLegend said:

So a division for us is not a simple division a table versus a chair, or you and me. For us means a link of chained responses of aggregates that involves suffering and delusion.

Astus wrote:

Therefore it is not simple discrimination that is the problem, but rather a specific form of mistake that assumes a permanent substance. So it can actually be said that suffering comes from lack of correct discrimination.

LastLegend said:

I was talking about Arahant's samadhi.

Astus wrote:

Those who posit a special realm for the arhats describe it practically as a comatose state with no mental activities, quite similar to the asamjnisattvas.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 12th, 2019 at 3:24 PM

Title: Re: Cicada

Content:

LastLegend said:

When it's quiet, cicada can be heard.

Astus wrote:

It can't be heard even in a storm, how much less in silence!

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 12th, 2019 at 3:30 PM

Title: Re: The Boss! Zen!

Content:

Astus wrote:

"If you say the immediate mirror awareness is correct, or that there is something else beyond the mirror awareness, this is a delusion. If you keep dwelling in the immediate mirror awareness, this too is the same as delusion; it is called the mistake of naturalism. To say the present mirror awareness is one's own Buddha is words of measurement, words of calculation - it is like the crying of a jackal. This is still being stuck as in glue at the gate. Originally you did not acknowledge that innate knowing and awareness are your own Buddha, and went running elsewhere to seek Buddha. So you needed a teacher to tell you about innate knowing and awareness as a medicine to cure this disease of hastily seeking outside. Once you no longer seek outwardly, the disease is cured and it is necessary to remove the medicine. If you cling fixedly to innate knowing awareness, this is a disease of meditation. Such is a thoroughgoing disciple; like water turned to ice, all the ice is water, but it can hardly be expected to quench thirst."
(Extensive Record of Baizhang, tr Cleary, p 33-34)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 12th, 2019 at 10:45 PM

Title: Re: The Boss! Zen!

Content:

LastLegend said:

The question is what the boss looks like?

Astus wrote:

What boss?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 22nd, 2019 at 6:10 PM

Title: Re: Desire/Suffering Is a Water Faucet That Can't be Turned Off

Content:

hkvanx said:

We are programmed to constantly crave and seek food, sex, etc.

Buddha identified suffering is due to desire....which is ingrained in our very human nature.

Astus wrote:

Humans, under normal conditions, have the freedom to choose whether to act or not, whether to pursue an impulse or not, therefore it is not valid to say that they are forced by anything to submit to craving.

Buddhism is based on the understanding that both the Buddha and many of his disciples have successfully attained liberation from suffering, and the same attainment is available today as well to whoever is willing.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 22nd, 2019 at 7:08 PM

Title: Re: Death Is Nirvana?

Content:

hkvanx said:

Death should not be looked upon negatively as it is currently feared by many of us.

Astus wrote:

One can't help but fear death as long as it is understood as the annihilation of oneself.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2019 at 6:47 PM

Title: Re: Agamas and Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

ryan_oliveira said:

The āgamas are part of the Tibetan Buddhist canon?

Astus wrote:

You can find the "Śrāvakayāna works" in the <http://read.84000.co/section/O1JC114941JC14668.html> from Toh 287 to 359. But the agamas are generally what are found in the Chinese Canon, as there are whole collections (Dirgha-agama, Madhyama-agama, etc.).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2019 at 5:14 PM

Title: Re: Agamas and Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Fortyeightvows said:

That link doesn't have agama sutra

Astus wrote:

Some examples:

Toh 287 - Mindfulness of the True Dharma (dam chos dran pa nyer bzhag / saddharmasmṛtyupasthāna)

Toh 316 - The Sūtra on the Four Truths (bden pa bzhi'i mdo / catuḥsatyasūtra)

Toh 326 - Chapters of Utterances on Specific Topics (ched du brjod pa'i tshoms / udānavarga)

Toh 331 - The Sūtra of the Moon (zla ba'i mdo / candrasūtra)

Toh 334 - The Sūtra of Nandika (dga' ba can gyi mdo / nandikasūtra)

Toh 337 - The Sūtra of the Wheel of Dharma (chos kyi 'khor lo'i mdo / Dharmacakrasūtra)

Toh 338 - Classification of Acts (las rnam 'byed / karmavibhaṅga)

Toh 339 - The Dharma Scripture on the Classification of Acts (las rnam par 'gyur ba chos kyi gzhung / karmavibhaṅgadharmagrantha)

Toh 352 - The Sūtra of Brahmā's Net (tshangs pa'i dra ba'i mdo / brahmajālasūtra)

See also:

<https://legacy.suttacentral.net/dq>

<https://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?t=986>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2019 at 5:47 PM

Title: Re: Origination and dissolution phenomena in the body

Content:

Aemilius said:

This passage of the phenomena of origination and dissolution in the body is taken from the Satipatthana sutta, (translation of Thanissaro bhikkhu). What this passage really means is all the processes included in metabolism of the body, like the catabolic and anabolic processes, etc...

Astus wrote:

What passage? Both <https://www.dhammatalks.org/suttas/MN/MN10.html> and <https://www.dhammatalks.org/suttas/DN/DN22.html> has simply:

"And further... just as a dexterous butcher or his apprentice, having killed a cow, would sit at a crossroads cutting it up into pieces, the monk reflects on this very body—however it stands, however it is disposed—in terms of properties: 'In this body there is the earth property, the liquid property, the fire property, & the wind property.'

In this way he remains focused internally on the body in & of itself, or externally on the body in & of itself, or both internally & externally on the body in & of itself. Or he remains focused on the phenomenon of origination with regard to the body, on the phenomenon of passing away with regard to the body, or on the phenomenon of origination & passing away with regard to the body. Or his mindfulness that 'There is a body' is maintained to the extent of knowledge & remembrance. And he remains independent, unsustained by [not clinging to] anything in the world. This is how a monk remains focused on the body in & of itself."

As e.g. <https://www.dhammatalks.org/suttas/MN/MN28.html> and <https://www.dhammatalks.org/suttas/MN/MN140.html> explain, those four elements are basic qualities as hardness, liquidity, heat, and movement. Where is the metabolism part?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2019 at 8:27 PM

Title: Re: Origination and dissolution phenomena in the body

Content:

Aemilius said:

Metabolism is implicit, is what I am saying. It hasn't been made clear and explicit in the passage above or in the passage about the four elements. How else could the body depend on the elements, be composed of the elements, or dissolve into the elements, than through metabolism?

Astus wrote:

It's an instruction on analysing the bodily elements, all the parts of the body conceived in terms of the four main qualities of solidity, liquidity, heat, and movement. Since it is a practice in observation, and metabolism happens on a cellular level, it could not be observed. Instead, those four elements mean readily perceptible qualities.

"Contemplation of the body's earthy and watery qualities can be undertaken by observing the physical sensations of the solid and liquid parts of the body. Awareness of its fiery quality can be developed through noting variations in bodily temperature, and to some extent also by turning awareness to the processes of digestion and ageing. Air, representing the quality of motion, can be covered by directing awareness to the different movements that take place within the organism, such as the circulation of the blood or the cycle of the breaths.¹⁴⁰The same elementary qualities can be combined in a single contemplation, by being aware of these four qualities as characteristics of each part or particle of the body."

(<https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/direct-path.pdf> by Bhikkhu Analayo, p 164)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2019 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: Origination and dissolution phenomena in the body

Content:

Aemilius said:

This is a clear case of esoteric teachings in the Tipitaka.

Astus wrote:

There are no esoteric teachings in the Tipitaka.

"I have set forth the Dhamma without making any distinction of esoteric and exoteric doctrine; there is nothing, Ananda, with regard to the teachings that the Tathagata holds to the last with the closed fist of a teacher who keeps some things back."

(<https://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.16.1-6.vaji.html>)

"Three things shine in the open, not under cover. What three? The moon shines in the open, not under cover. The sun shines in the open, not under cover. The teaching and training proclaimed by a Realized One shine in the open, not under cover."

(<https://suttacentral.net/an3.131/en/sujato>)

Aemilius said:

There is also the Anathapindika sutta, where it is said that the meditation of the elements is esoteric, i.e. secret. It was given to Anathapindika on his deathbed.

Astus wrote:

There is no meditation on the elements listed there, unless you count the instruction not to cling to them. There is no statement on some secret method either. What was said: "This sort of talk on the Dhamma, householder, is not given to lay people clad in white. This sort of talk on the Dhamma is given to those gone forth."

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2019 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: Origination and dissolution phenomena in the body

Content:

Queequeg said:

Mmmeh...

Astus wrote:

It does not mean there were hidden teachings.

See note 1306 on page 1358 of The Middle Length Discourses of the Buddha by Bhikkhu Bodhi: "This statement does not imply that there is any inherent exclusiveness or arbitrary discrimination in the Buddha's way of presenting his teaching. But as those who remain in lay life must look after their families, possessions, and occupations, such talk leading to complete detachment would not have been appropriate for them."

And Piya Tan also states (<http://www.themindingcentre.org/dharmafarer/wp-content/uploads/2009/12/23.9-Anathapindikovada-S-m143-piya.pdf>): "This episode may sound as if there were a strict two-tiered teaching scheme, the higher level for the renunciants only and the simpler level for the laity. No such division ever existed in the Buddha's teaching"

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2019 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Origination and dissolution phenomena in the body

Content:

Queequeg said:

I have not seen it in practice.

Astus wrote:

While teachings given to large crowds may not usually touch on more difficult issues, nor get into technical details, all levels of the teachings are openly (and generally freely) available in Theravada and East Asian Mahayana temples.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2019 at 2:04 AM

Title: Re: Origination and dissolution phenomena in the body

Content:

Queequeg said:

Not everyone will respond well to the 4NT. Sometimes people just need to be consoled.

Astus wrote:

And that's all well and good. It does not turn the four noble truths into an esoteric teaching.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2019 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: Origination and dissolution phenomena in the body

Content:

Queequeg said:

I never said it was an esoteric teaching in principle... in practice, there are teachings withheld from some. It was apparently true in the Buddha's time, and its true now.

Astus wrote:

OK, I just wanted to make sure we're on the same page here. If you don't mind the hairsplitting, I wouldn't say withheld, more like the appropriate teachings are given/applied at the appropriate times. It follows how the Buddha taught gradually and revealed the four noble truths to his listeners when he knew their "mind was ready, pliable, rid of hindrances, joyful, and confident" (e.g. <https://suttacentral.net/dn3/en/sujato>).

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2019 at 5:32 AM

Title: Re: Origination and dissolution phenomena in the body

Content:

Queequeg said:

They weren't just ordinary lay persons.

Astus wrote:

The Buddha also gave the gradual teaching to "a leper named Suppabuddha, a poor, miserable wretch of a person" (see <https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/kn/ud/ud.5.03.than.html>). And there were many lay disciples who achieved various levels of liberation. So, apart from being extraordinary for meeting and following the Buddha, there were all sorts of people in the householder community.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2019 at 4:41 PM

Title: Re: Origination and dissolution phenomena in the body

Content:

Queequeg said:

What's your point?

Astus wrote:

That just because some disciples were brahmins, it doesn't mean they were more fit for higher teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2019 at 7:10 PM

Title: Re: what is Original Mind?

Content:

Astus wrote:

What is called original mind is just the suchness of mind where there is no attachment, no self.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2019 at 8:20 PM

Title: Re: Origination and dissolution phenomena in the body

Content:

Queequeg said:

Anyway my point is, by default, in practice, not everyone is taught everything.

Astus wrote:

We are in agreement on that. What I intended to prove is that such a limit is not on the side of the teacher or the teaching, but the listener's temporary situation, hence no esoteric aspects to talk of.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 29th, 2019 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: Origination and dissolution phenomena in the body

Content:

Aemilius said:

How about the "forest of simsapa leaves"?

Astus wrote:

There are lots of things one can know about from the intricacies of 6th century Sasanian politics to digital signal processing, it's just that they have nothing to do with nor do they lead to liberation.

"And why haven't I taught them? Because they are not connected with the goal, do not relate to the rudiments of the holy life, and do not lead to disenchantment, to dispassion, to cessation, to calm, to direct knowledge, to self-awakening, to Unbinding. That is why I have not taught them."

(<https://accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn56/sn56.031.than.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 30th, 2019 at 5:59 PM

Title: Re: Letting go

Content:

Mirror said:

what does it mean to let go? How to let go?

Astus wrote:

To let go means to be without craving and attachment. Craving and attachment arises because of the misconception that the perceived object is desirable. You may also say that to take things personally is the root of clinging. Recognising that there is nothing desirable in an object, that there is nothing personal present, is when the cause of craving and attachment is removed. For example, to realise that what looks beautiful does so only because of the added conception that it is beautiful, then there is nothing in the object itself that is beautiful, while the thought of beauty is itself fictional, then there is nothing left to be attracted to. Practically speaking, one has to cultivate mindfulness of the six sense doors to see first hand how feelings can mislead the mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 1st, 2019 at 3:46 PM

Title: Re: Cittamatra, Yogacara and Vijnanavada the same thing?

Content:

Stephen18 said:

Are Cittamatra, Yogacara and Vijnanavada exactly the same thing?

Astus wrote:

It depends on who you read. These and other terms can refer to the same thing, but some (as far as I can tell, mostly modern Tibetan Buddhists) differentiate between Cittamatra (a supposed group of unspecified people who believe that there is an ultimate mind, but practically it is mostly just the object of Madhyamaka criticism) and Yogacara (the teachings of Asanga (Maitreya) and Vasubandhu). So it's better to be specific regarding what treatise and what author one refers to then just use ambiguous terms.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 1st, 2019 at 7:13 PM

Title: Re: Letting go

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

It's more a self-help slogan than a specifically Buddhist one

Astus wrote:

Check out this Pali term: <https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/encyclopedia-entries/vossagga.pdf>.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 2nd, 2019 at 3:31 AM

Title: Re: Letting go

Content:

Simon E. said:

the idea of asking the guy at the top of a hundred foot pole sheds very little light on the issue.

Astus wrote:

An excerpt from Guo Gu's commentary on that koan:

'Practice is necessary and must be genuine. In this process, delusion must be relinquished. This means that when you get to the top of the pole, you have to jump off. When this is done, you become perfectly normal and ordinary. You realize that all along you've been a human. To be fully human is to be a buddha —someone who is selfless. Is this the end? No. It is the beginning of the fulfillment of wisdom and of compassion. Chan or Zen teachers are not advocating that people commit suicide by jumping off the top of the pole. It is only a metaphor, but it points to the mind-set of one who is able to do this. Without this mind-set, this commitment to the path, you will just be a pole dancer. You may be able to do all kinds of fancy moves on the pole, going up and down, down and up, but none of that is awakening. That is essentially what some practitioners are doing. You must have the courage to relinquish what you cherish the most: the "I."

...

"At the top of the hundred-foot pole you must step forward" means putting down all the games and tricks you can do on the pole. In terms of meditation practice, it means reaching a point where there is no longer past or future, only the present, only concentrating on the method, becoming one with the method. At this stage you have forgotten about yourself. Duality is transcended. Is that enough? No. Many practitioners, teachers included, make a big deal about nonduality. People in sports have this experience where, say, they are one with the basketball or one with the act of running. Accomplishing that is not so hard. Don't stop there. You have to take one more step forward. Put down the oneness.

Don't be a pole dancer! Get up that pole and take one more step. Whatever you cannot let go of is your obstruction. Whenever you cannot let go of something, it means a self-attachment is there. Even if you let go of everything—let go of that, too! If you do this, you will be able to “expose the full body of reality throughout the worlds in the ten directions,” which means that just as you are—as a human, through and through—is reality! Selfless, free: this is to manifest wisdom and compassion fully. You've come full circle. You discover that you didn't die after taking that forward step. On the contrary, the whole world has come alive, and you have truly come alive, for the first time, as a human.'

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 2nd, 2019 at 5:57 PM

Title: Re: Cittamatra, Yogacara and Vijnanavada the same thing?

Content:

Bristollad said:

In Chinese Buddhism, a distinction is made - read Chinese Buddhism sources to understand.

Astus wrote:

Fazang argued against Xuanzang where he claimed to represent weixin 唯心 and the other weishi 唯識 (see: Buddhist Phenomenology, p 386-387). See more on Fazang's case against Yogacara in http://imrehamar.elte.hu/downloads/ReflectingMirrors_11_207-232_Hamarl.pdf.

Bristollad said:

In Tibetan Buddhism, no real difference is seen.

Astus wrote:

Mostly, but not exactly. See e.g.: The Ri-me Philosophy of Jamgon Kongtrul the Great, p 230-232.

The critical difference (between Cittamatra and Yogacara, or Cittamatra and Shentong, etc., the terms can vary) to be considered according to Mipham is whether one takes the mind as ultimately real or not.

"If the Cittamātrins' final standpoint is the assertion that this consciousness is only a substantially existent entity inasmuch as it is the cause for all conventional phenomena appearing, and that apart from this assertion they are not claiming that it exists substantially as a truly existing entity in ultimate truth, then they are not at all in contradiction with the Mādhyamika tradition. On the other hand, if they were to assert that it is truly existent in ultimate truth, they would be contradicting the Mādhyamika approach. It seems, therefore, that it is just this particular point that needs to be examined as a source of contention (or otherwise) for the Mādhyamikas."

(A Feast of the Nectar of the Supreme Vehicle, ch 7)

It should also be noted that in China and Tibet there were different schools of thought debating each other: Huayan vs. Weishi, and Rime vs. Gelug.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 2nd, 2019 at 9:38 PM

Title: Re: Why did Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche have long hair?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche had a wife (<https://theyoginiproject.org/wisdom-dakinis/khandro-lhamo>) and several children.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 3rd, 2019 at 2:17 AM

Title: Re: Cittamatra, Yogacara and Vijnanavada the same thing?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Instead of looking for ontology and epistemology - interpretations that I doubt any of the authors had in mind - all of them should rather be seen in terms of soteriology, i.e. how they guide one to liberation. As for the mind and its nature, McLeod makes this important point:

'Despite the prevalence of interpretations to the contrary, "appearances are mind" does not mean that everything that happens in the world somehow takes place in your mind, that everything that appears exists in your head or brain, or that what arises in your experience is "only" mental or psychological. All views that substantiate appearances even as mental objects are inaccurate. Equally, to say "appearances are mind" does not mean that what does arise in experience does not really exist, is not real, or is just a hallucination. Views that try to deny the validity of experience are also inaccurate. Perhaps the confusion begins with the word mind. In English, it usually denotes the intellect or related phenomena. In Buddhism, mind means "what experiences." Kalu Rinpoche used to say that mind means experiencing. When you are given the pointing-out instruction "What is mind?" you are actually being asked, "What is experience?"' (Wake Up to Your Life, p 370-371)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 3rd, 2019 at 3:10 AM

Title: Re: Why did Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche have long hair?

Content:

Queequeg said:

Have wife and children, therefore have long hair?

Astus wrote:

The question was, as I took it:

Nirveda said:

I'm just curious why he didn't shave it and why this wasn't a problem under monastic rules.

Astus wrote:

Since he wasn't a monk, there was no conflict with the monastic rules.

As for the long hair specifically, Lobsang Chojor answered that: he was a <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ngagpa>. See also:

<https://journals.openedition.org/ateliers/10562>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 3rd, 2019 at 2:14 PM

Title: Re: Cittamatra, Yogacara and Vijñānavāda the same thing?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

The correct translation of which is "being".

Astus wrote:

The correct translation of what? Also, what sense of being, as a noun or as a verb, as existence, essence, or entity?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 3rd, 2019 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: Cittamatra, Yogacara and Vijñānavāda the same thing?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Whatever is being translated as both or either 'mind' or 'experience' in the context of the passage I quoted.

Astus wrote:

It's not a translation.

Wayfarer said:

'Being' as in 'human being'. It is a declension of the verb 'to be', so, a verb, although also acts as a noun.

Astus wrote:

If so, should entity be fine as well? And why use it in exchange of mind or experience?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 4th, 2019 at 1:29 AM

Title: Re: Cittamatra, Yogacara and Vijñānavāda the same thing?

Content:

Queequeg said:

From what I'm gathering, the Mind-Only as opposed to Consciousness-Only difference is not really addressed by this.

Astus wrote:

That approach should rather draw both positions on the same page of application on the path to liberation. One main difference in this context between Mind Only and Consciousness Only is whether there is one final liberation or two, as the former included terminology that apparently was more fitting to prevalent ideas in China about human nature, plus there were not any "sravakas" to deal with unlike in India where it has remained the mainstream form of Buddhism. So, as I take it, one can take a historical approach and try to understand what various doctrines existed and what they meant to people then, or one can take a practical approach of recognising the utility of each teaching with the assumption that each author had the right intention of eliminating defilements. If it's the historical one taken here, then it should be first of all recognised that Fazang's Mind Only is called so to oppose Xuanzang, but after the rapid decline of the popularity of the teachings transmitted from India by Xuanzang there was little sense of upholding a distinction apart from occasional biased arguments on paper only to highlight one's own teachings.

Queequeg said:

The above appears to still fall under what would be called Consciousness Only in the EA view, because its talking about experience, which suggests its localized. May not be. Maybe a little more discussion would draw this out.

Astus wrote:

What do you mean by being localised? Experience, in the quote from McLeod, simply refers to what appears as the living actuality of everything sensed directly. Would you say that Mind Only, or perhaps it's better to call it inherent enlightenment, is about an abstract universal essence?

Queequeg said:

From what I gather, that body of Vairocana is what is emphasized as the Mind in Mind-Only, where Consciousness in Consciousness-Only is the particular experience of that body.

Astus wrote:

The final position of Huayan is the interpenetration of phenomena and phenomena, where there is no point in even mentioning emptiness at all, as whatever occurs is suchness as it is. The way I take it, this is simply another formulation of the middle way no different from what you find in the works of Asanga and Nagarjuna, and that is what makes it a genuine facet of the Dharma.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 4th, 2019 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: Cittamatra, Yogacara and Vijnanavada the same thing?

Content:

Queequeg said:

That would be wrong view. I think some interpret it that way, though.

Astus wrote:

What else is there that is apart from the realm of experiences that would not be a mere abstract concept?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 4th, 2019 at 5:41 AM

Title: Re: 他力/"Other-power" in 淨土十疑論/"Ten Doubts"

Content:

Caoimhghín said:

Does this text really say there are no women in the Western Paradise?

Queequeg said:

I believe the Pure Land Sutras say there are no women in Sukhavati. Women can't awaken... according to the Patriarchs...

Astus wrote:

The so called three PL sutras do not say such a thing. See this topic on the issue: <https://dharma wheel.net/viewtopic.php?t=4583>.

On the other hand, there are older versions of the Larger Sutra where the 2nd vow does exclude women, e.g. T12n362p301a27:

'The Second Vow: If, when I attain Buddhahood, may there be no women existing in my country. Women who desire to be born in my country will forthwith transform their bodies into those of men. All of the human beings and the species that flit and wriggle in the countless heavens who are reborn in my country will be transformed on a lotus flower in the pond of seven treasures, and they will become numberless bodhisattvas or arhats when they mature. Only if this vow is fulfilled, will I attain Buddhahood. If this vow is not fulfilled, may I never attain Buddhahood.'

(https://mu.repo.nii.ac.jp/?action=repository_action_common_download&item_id=347&item_no=1&attribute_id=22&file_no=1)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 4th, 2019 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: 他力/"Other-power" in 淨土十疑論/"Ten Doubts"

Content:

Queequeg said:

Its also standard Mahayana convention that women are not present in the pure lands.

Astus wrote:

Abhirati, the land of Akshobhya, has women and men.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 7th, 2019 at 12:24 AM

Title: Re: Mind transcends death

Content:

Astus wrote:

Ultimately everything is by nature unborn, it does not mean that there is anything enduring from one moment to the next. The mind is quite obviously impermanent, thoughts and emotions changing all the time. The mind "transcends" death, the demise of the body, because it is not caused nor sustained by the body.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 7th, 2019 at 3:59 AM

Title: Re: Mind transcends death

Content:

Rick said:

Conventionally, what does cause/sustain mind?

Astus wrote:

Greed, anger, and ignorance.

Rick said:

Ultimately?

Astus wrote:

There is nothing to sustain.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 7th, 2019 at 6:44 AM

Title: Re: Mind transcends death

Content:

steveb1 said:

how does a Buddhist or anyone else who holds this view defend it against materialist-reductionist neuroscientists and philosophers?

Astus wrote:

"'The soul is the same as the body'—I have left undeclared. 'The soul is one thing and the body another'—I have left undeclared."

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn63/en/bodhi>, cf. <https://suttacentral.net/mn72/en/sujato>)

The problem with materialism, called the Lokayata or Carvaka view in Indian texts, is that it is annihilationism, assuming a self that will be destroyed at the time of death. The other version, separate soul and body, means the various views of eternalism, hence not acceptable either. The Buddha described life in terms of the five aggregates, eighteen elements, and dependent origination, and that's how one avoids both extreme views.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 7th, 2019 at 3:44 PM

Title: Re: Mind transcends death

Content:

Rick said:

Do these play well together?

Astus wrote:

Because phenomena are dependently originated, there is no essence that is born, endures, or ceases. To say that mind, what is simply a category of numerous phenomena, endures because it is unborn, makes sense only when it refers to its apparent continuity, that is, mind functions because it has no fixed substance.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 10th, 2019 at 10:45 PM

Title: Re: Zen 6th Patriarch Statement regarding nature

Content:

LastLegend said:

Yet the knowing quality is present and infused with consciousness.

Astus wrote:

He did not add that. The term knowing/awareness (zhi 知) was what Heze Shenhui and Guifeng Zongmi propagated, while others ridiculed. So the Platform Sutra (ch 8, BDK ed, p 78) says this of Shenhui: "I told you it was without name or title, but you have called it the fundamental source, the buddha-nature. You've just covered your head with thatch. You've become a follower with only discriminative understanding."

Hyujeong wrote (Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 3, p 239-240):

'Knowing (知) and understanding (解) are the great faults of the Buddhadharma. Heze, who was an illegitimate heir of Caoqi, used them. The Vimalakīrti(nirdeśa) sūtra says, "Remove what it has." The Lotus Sutra says, "Remove the shit and take the wages." These are all states of knowing and understanding. For this reason knowing and understanding are obstacles to correct views, like rancid rice offered to starving ghosts, like bad water being used to pollute the field of the mind, which is not as good as looking at Zhaozhou's character mu.'

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 11th, 2019 at 12:17 AM

Title: Re: Zen 6th Patriarch Statement regarding nature

Content:

LastLegend said:

anything arises in mind all we have to do is be clear!

Astus wrote:

Do you mean the method of nonthought (vô niệm 無念)?

'If in seeing all the dharmas, the mind is not defiled or attached, this is nonthought. [The mind's] functioning pervades all locations, yet it is not attached to all the locations. Just purify the fundamental mind, causing the six consciousnesses to emerge from the six [sensory] gates, [causing one to be] without defilement or heterogeneity within the six types of sensory data (literally, the "six dusts"), autonomous in the coming and going [of mental phenomena], one's penetrating function without stagnation. This is the samādhi of prajñā, the autonomous emancipation. This is called the practice of nonthought.'
(Platform Sutra, ch 2, p 33-34)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 11th, 2019 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: Zen 6th Patriarch Statement regarding nature

Content:

LastLegend said:

If you can translate Mr. Astus.

Astus wrote:

Sorry, I don't know Vietnamese. However, the concept of inconceivable as referenced in that article is not about anything absolute but literally what cannot be conceived, as stated in the <https://suttacentral.net/an4.77/en/sujato>.

As for the inconceivable as emptiness, calling the very absence of anything graspable an absolute is surely a convoluted way to speak, but not unheard of.

'[That which] has transcended the duality of being and non-being without, however, having transcended anything at all; that which is not knowledge or knowable^ not existent nor nonexistent, not one nor many, not both nor neither; [that which is] without foundation, unmanifest, inconceivable, incomparable; that which arises not, disappears not, is not to be annihilated and is not permanent, that is [Reality] which is like space [and] not within the range of words [or] knowledge. The fact of dependent co-origination is exactly what You maintain to be emptiness. Of that kind is the true principle and the Tathagata is like that.'

(<http://lirs.ru/do/sutra/Nagarjuna.Acintyastava.C.Lindtner.pdf>, 37-40, tr Lindtner)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 11th, 2019 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: Zen 6th Patriarch Statement regarding nature

Content:

LastLegend said:

it's not a thing yet it knows or any object concept imaginable. We are it! But we also always try get it with thinking concept or a location. No! We can't even see with eyes yet through eyes everything is super clear HD if you will. It's characteristicless but still knows the unborn knowing!. STILL KNOWS that's all. That's why it's not conceivable! We are it!

Astus wrote:

Consciousness, i.e. what knows, is conventionally not without characteristics, as it arises with its object, and performs several functions of perceiving, interpreting, relating, etc. quite quickly. Of course, it is good practice to take the position of the observer, to distance oneself mentally from both external and internal phenomena, however, it's still just a temporary technique that eventually has to be let go of. To do that, it should eventually become clear that even the most distilled, pure, peaceful, and seemingly independent watcher/awareness/knowing/witness/mind is an unsustainable and painful identity.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 11th, 2019 at 5:10 AM

Title: Re: Zen 6th Patriarch Statement regarding nature

Content:

LastLegend said:

Denial itself is still a view because that's the work of skandhas. What we want to do is surpass skandhas.

Astus wrote:

So it is, taking negation as a position is no better than taking affirmation. The question is what can help us move on from any object of clinging.

'The buddhas said "I am."

They taught as well that self does not exist.

They also said that self

And no-self are completely nonexistent.'

(MMK 18.6, tr Padmakara)

In the end, to let go of the aggregates, to eliminate attachment, one has to recognise that they are empty. It is not really surpassing, but the end of clinging, as there is nowhere else to be beyond the aggregates.

'When you've left the three realms where would you go?'

(Record of Linji, p 23, tr Sasaki)

LastLegend said:

If thought is simply known as thought or view simply as view, then no issue but usually skandhas don't keep it that simple.

Astus wrote:

Well, better not make an issue of whatever comes up, then how could one be fooled?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 11th, 2019 at 3:25 PM

Title: Re: Zen 6th Patriarch Statement regarding nature

Content:

LastLegend said:

It doesn't have to be followed by other skandhas if followed then that would be grasping.

Astus wrote:

There might be some terminological confusion here. The functioning of the aggregates is not a problem, furthermore, you don't (and generally can't) remove or stop the aggregates. Also, the universal mental factors (cetasika/caitasika) like feeling (vedana), perception (sanna/samjna), and volition (cetana) are always present, and they directly correspond to the first three mental aggregates.

LastLegend said:

When consciousness isn't followed by intention and other skandhas, it's in the state of clarity or pure consciousness state. That's where we want to be because it's closest to "seeing" nature there. We can start training there at consciousness simply recognizes and let it not lead by other skandhas. If consciousness could clearly discern other skandhas that would be good.

Astus wrote:

The usual way to contemplate the aggregates is to recognise their individual and general characteristics, where the individual refers to the functions of the aggregate (e.g. good/bad/neutral feeling), and the general that it's impermanent, suffering, and not self. This can be done by all five of the aggregates, and that means that consciousness has no special position but it has to be recognised as just as empty and dependent as the others. Or to point to the traditional method, the cultivation of the four bases of mindfulness (satipatthana/smrtyupasthana) is the way.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 12th, 2019 at 12:21 AM

Title: Re: Zen 6th Patriarch Statement regarding nature

Content:

LastLegend said:

recognize in us the part that knows that's not relying on aggregates.

Astus wrote:

Recognising what knows is fine, but it's not something outside the aggregates, but rather the aggregate called consciousness, and as such it is impermanent and dependently originated. To assume cognisance beyond the aggregates is another form of assuming a self. Rather, to recognise what knows must include recognising it as fabricated and unreliable.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 12th, 2019 at 4:07 PM

Title: Re: Anyone Come Close to Enlightenment Yet?

Content:

hkvanx said:

I am just curious if anyone has come close or reached enlightenment yet.

Astus wrote:

There are several stages of enlightenment. First, for people who begin to learn about the Dharma, an important step - that divides ordinary beings from noble ones - is the experiential confirmation of the validity of the teachings.

'the initial realization of the nature of the mind is the first breakthrough. It's a very important point in all Buddhist schools. At that moment, you cease to be an ordinary person. You become in Buddhist parlance an arya, a noble one. It doesn't mean you are finished. It doesn't mean you are a high level bodhisattva. We can fall back from this. But still, this is a big breakthrough. We now understand what is true and what is not true. We don't have to take it all on faith any more. It is a direct nondual experience. The point is that it is very easy. It's not difficult, and it's not something that can only be attained after years and years of practice.'

(Reflections on a Mountain Lake by Tenzin Palmo, p 191)

The one who attained the initial breakthrough is also called a stream-enterer (<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sot%C4%81panna>).

“Subhūti, what do you think? Does a practitioner who has attained the level of srota-āpanna think: ‘I have attained the realization of the srota-āpanna?’”

Subhūti said, “No, World-honored One. And why not? Because the name srota-āpanna means ‘stream-enterer,’ and there is in fact no stream to be entered. One does not enter form, sound, odor, taste, touch, or concepts. Therefore one is called a srota-āpanna.”
(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html, ch 9)

hkvanx said:

How long did it take to do so?

What is your meditation/study routine?

What does it feel like?

How do you know when you get there?

Did you have to live a certain lifestyle (monastery, vegetarian, etc)?

Astus wrote:

For all those topics and more you should look into teachings on the path. How the path is delineated, however, varies between traditions, because it is often modified according to the techniques used. Nevertheless, the basics are the same, as it's always about the elimination of https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kleshas_%28Buddhism%29. So instead of focusing on mystical and supernatural experiences, look at how greed, anger, and delusion diminish and disappear, while generosity, compassion, and wisdom grow and blossom.

"When — by following a life of precept & practice, a life, a holy life that is followed as of essential worth — one's unskillful mental qualities increase while one's skillful mental qualities decline: that sort of precept & practice, life, holy life that is followed as of essential worth is fruitless. But when — by following a life of precept & practice, a life, a holy life that is followed as of essential worth — one's unskillful mental qualities decline while one's skillful mental qualities increase: that sort of precept & practice, life, holy life that is followed as of essential worth is fruitful."

(<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an03/an03.078.than.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 12th, 2019 at 6:24 PM

Title: Re: Anyone Come Close to Enlightenment Yet?

Content:

Mantrik said:

Do you have a source?

Astus wrote:

In the Buddha's very first discourse:

“So long, bhikkhus, as my knowledge and vision of these Four Noble Truths as they really are in their three phases and twelve aspects was not thoroughly purified in this way, I did not claim to have awakened to the unsurpassed perfect enlightenment in this world with its devas, Mara, and Brahma, in this generation with its ascetics and brahmins, its devas and humans. But when my knowledge and vision of these Four Noble Truths as they really are in their three phases and twelve aspects was thoroughly purified in this way, then I claimed to have awakened to the unsurpassed perfect enlightenment in this world with its devas, Mara, and Brahma, in this generation with its ascetics and brahmins, its devas and humans. The knowledge and vision arose in me: ‘Unshakable is the liberation of my mind. This is my last birth. Now there is no more renewed existence.’”

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn56.11/en/bodhi>; see also the <https://suttacentral.net/sn56.12/en/bodhi>)

Another good example: <https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.012.ntbb.html>.

See also: <https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.027.than.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 18th, 2019 at 4:52 AM

Title: Re: Zen 6th Patriarch Statement regarding nature

Content:

ItsRaining said:

Later Chan teachers seemed to have a mistaken idea of what 知 meant, they took it to mean 知解 or conceptual understanding whereas Zongmi and Shenhui both made it clear that this 知 had a closer meaning to 智 or wisdom.

Astus wrote:

Do you have an example for that? To me it rather seems that conceiving such an ultimate awareness/knowing is itself a conceptual understanding, and it's not that people mistook what Shenhui and Zongmi meant.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 21st, 2019 at 3:33 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Hell seems a bit much

Content:

truthb said:

Looking at the Hell realms, and it seems incomprehensible to me that someone could do enough bad things in one lifetime to warrant 1 billion years of torture.... and that is the shortest term in a hell realm, some are MUCH longer.

Astus wrote:

'There is the case where a trifling evil deed done by a certain individual takes him to hell. There is the case where the very same sort of trifling deed done by another individual is experienced in the here & now, and for the most part barely appears for a moment. Now, a trifling evil deed done by what sort of individual takes him to hell? There is the case where a certain individual is undeveloped in [contemplating] the body, undeveloped in virtue, undeveloped in mind, undeveloped in discernment: restricted, small-hearted, dwelling with suffering. A trifling evil deed done by this sort of individual takes him to hell.'

(<https://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an03/an03.099.than.html>)

'This fifth category means the maturation of a big result from a small karma For example, regarding nonvirtuous deeds, it is said that one will experience a kalpa in the hell realm for each instant of negative thought Engaging in the Conduct of Bodhisattvas says:

"The Buddha has said that whoever bears an evil thought

Against a benefactor such as that bodhisattva

Will remain in hell for as many aeons

As there were evil thoughts"

(Jewel Ornament of Liberation, p 120)

'Therefore, solidify the certainty that even the subtlest of virtuous and nonvirtuous actions follow you like shadows and produce both great happiness and great suffering. Then, strive to cultivate even the subtlest of virtues and to eliminate even the subtlest of sins and infractions.'

(The Great Treatise on the Stages of the Path to Enlightenment, vol 1, p 212)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 1st, 2019 at 2:58 AM

Title: Re: How to Read Sutras? Split from "is the tathagatagarbha true?"

Content:

Matt J said:

Many sutras, with a few exceptions, seem to me to very long, dense, and theoretical

Astus wrote:

When a Dharma teaching, in a sutra or anywhere else, seems theoretical, then there is a meaning and purpose to discover. Especially those texts already translated to English somehow remained particularly important for the tradition, so they are meaningful to some groups. To learn why specific texts are more important than others one just has to look at the school transmitting it. For instance, the Samadhiraja Sutra is important for the Kagyupas because Gampopa used it as a reference work, and while the sutra has some nicely worded stanzas, it does not reveal any novel teaching one wouldn't find elsewhere. Otherwise, as with mostly all Buddhist teachings, one has to familiarise oneself with the technical terminology in order to recognise the message a particular text carries.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 13th, 2019 at 5:38 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in a lifetime ---how?

Content:

Supramundane said:

Do you believe this is possible?

Astus wrote:

Very much. Those schools who talk of buddhahood in this life base this on the understanding that 'this mind is buddha', so practically buddhahood means the ending of all attachments, the goal of all Buddhists. If the elimination of clinging were not possible in this life, then it would never be possible.

Supramundane said:

if you put all that you know about the Dharma into practice, can you achieve it?

Astus wrote:

With right view comes right cultivation, and with right cultivation comes right enlightenment.

Supramundane said:

A side question --- can you achieve Buddhahood even though your Master has not?

Astus wrote:

The teacher must be able to impart the right view. Cultivation is up to each individual.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 13th, 2019 at 4:46 PM

Title: Re: Thoughts versus Nature.

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is no nature apart from thoughts, it's the nature of thoughts - i.e. their impermanent, impersonal, empty nature - that one has to recognise in order to relinquish clinging to concepts.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 13th, 2019 at 7:25 PM

Title: Re: in practice chan do I need teacher !

Content:

Taikor.Taikun said:

Is that correct?

Astus wrote:

Doesn't sound like that. The various beliefs about spirits are usually local folklore and not strictly Buddhist ideas.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 13th, 2019 at 10:31 PM

Title: Re: Thoughts versus Nature.

Content:

LastLegend said:

You see nature in thoughts or of thoughts?

Astus wrote:

Nature means what things are like, so it is not some separate thing, but a description/quality of things.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 15th, 2019 at 1:50 AM

Title: Re: Topic: Zen 6th Patriarch Statement regarding nature

Content:

White Lotus said:

when there is an absence of personal self seen within-without who or what possesses consciousness? how can we say there is anything to be impermanent or dependent upon anything?

Astus wrote:

There is no owner, never has been, as it is merely a false concept, therefore consciousness does not require the idea of an owner to function.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 15th, 2019 at 4:29 AM

Title: Re: Topic: Zen 6th Patriarch Statement regarding nature

Content:

LastLegend said:

What is enough learning without being too much or too little? Too much then we will keep remembering what memorized. Too little not enough understanding for the job.

Astus wrote:

There cannot be too much learning, only the obstacle of staying with mere conceptual knowledge without in depth understanding and meticulous application in practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 20th, 2019 at 5:35 PM

Title: Re: Introductory books on basic or general Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna (Tibetan Buddhism)

Content:

Stephen18 said:

I know Theravāda very, very well, but need to know far more Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna than I do now.

Astus wrote:

Since you know Theravada, I recommend you start with the Vimalakirti Sutra (https://www.bdkamerica.org/book/sutra-queen-%C5%9Br%C4%ABm%C4%81l%C4%81-lions-roar-and-vimalak%C4%ABrti-sutra;http://84000.co/doc/vimalakirti/Vimalakirti%20Book_E_screen-170724.pdf).

Other notable introductory works:

The Lotus Sutra (<https://www.bdkamerica.org/book/lotus-sutra-revised-second-edition>)

The Awakening of Faith in the Mahayana

(<https://www.bdkamerica.org/book/awakening-faith>)

The Summary of the Great Vehicle (<https://www.bdkamerica.org/book/summary-great-vehicle-revised-second-edition>)

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bodhisattvacary%C4%81vat%C4%81ra>

The Platform Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch(<https://www.bdkamerica.org/book/platform-sutra-sixth-patriarch>)

Buddhism of Wisdom & Faith: Pure Land Principles and Practice

(<https://www.ymba.org/books/buddhism-wisdom-faith-pure-land-principles-and-practice>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 26th, 2019 at 4:48 AM

Title: Re: Express your Zen in 10 words.

Content:

Astus wrote:

The cat cut in two plays with an ox tail.

Also:

"One, two, three, four, five,
Six, seven, eight, nine, ten."
(Zen Sand, 10.30, p 373)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 26th, 2019 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: liberating "emotion" vs. "thought"

Content:

Astus wrote:

'This task is to see through a particular train of thought and its related associations in order to discern the underlying mental current. For mindful recognition of our present mental state, the requirement is above all a clear recognition without getting involved in the details of whatever train of thought and related associations are taking place. Since it is often precisely these details that get us hooked and caught up in a particular chain of thoughts, achieving such recognition is more easily said than done. Recognizing the feeling tone of our current experience offers help for this task. It grounds awareness in the affective reality of the present moment and thereby draws attention to our subjective involvement in whatever is happening. In this way we learn to attend to the baseline condition of the mind rather than to the details of particular thoughts. This is of considerable importance, since human beings are quite able to remain immersed in their thoughts while at the same time completely ignoring the baseline emotional condition of the corresponding state of mind. History abounds with examples of incredibly cruel actions that have had their basis in the fascination exerted by a particular political or religious ideal, leading to a thorough dissociation from basic qualities like kindness and compassion (at times in combination with relegating to some higher authority the responsibility for the harm inflicted on others). Other examples of no less atrocious events show the opposite side of the same coin, when wallowing in emotions takes place in complete dissociation from the rational capacities of the mind. The present practice works against the grain of the tendency of dissociation, based on the groundwork preparation of embodied awareness and clear recognition of the feeling tone of experience.

This in turn brings out the significance of the three satipaṭṭhānas explored so far and the importance of practising them in conjunction rather than in isolation from each other. It is precisely through the preparatory work done so far in the somatic and affective domain that the present satipaṭṭhāna acquires its full potential. Mindfulness cultivated in this way can be visualized as opening up the communication channels between these different domains. It offers a point of integration of the rational and emotional dimensions of ourselves. This takes place by giving each an equal hearing in such a way that both can make their contribution to a complete assessment of a particular situation and to finding the appropriate response to it. In this way, intuition and reasoning come to a point of balance, based on the support provided by mindfulness. This results from the dynamics of practice underlying the first three satipaṭṭhānas.' (Satipaṭṭhāna Meditation: A Practice Guide by Bhikkhu Anālayo, ch 7)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 26th, 2019 at 5:03 PM

Title: Re: Looking for a good book that goes through the teachings of Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Snowbeast said:

Mahayana especially focusing on East Asian Buddhism.

Astus wrote:

<https://hsingyun.org/books/core-teachings/>

'Conceived as a starting point for those coming to Buddhism for the first time, The Core Teachings is a guided tour of the most essential aspects of Buddhist wisdom and how they can be applied in our own lives and practice. Honed by Venerable Master Hsing Yun's decades of teaching and commitment to sharing Buddhism in a straightforward, accessible way, The Core Teachings gives new life to Buddhist basics like the Four Noble Truths, karma, and the five precepts.'

http://www.108wisdom.org/html/OTH_03.pdf

'As a long-time monk, scholar, and founder of monasteries in Asia and North America, Master Sheng Yen is uniquely qualified to explain the correct — therefore “orthodox” — beliefs that have guided Chinese Buddhism for over 1,500 years. Written while the author was on solitary retreat, OCB was Master Sheng Yen's response to many questions he received about Chinese Buddhism. Using a question-and-answer format, the book explores a wide range of subjects, from what it means to be a Buddhist to sudden enlightenment. This English translation is therefore a welcome addition to the Western literature of Buddhism, and includes new annotations, appendixes, and a glossary designed for the Western reader.'

<https://archive.org/details/BuddhismInEveryStepBooklets/page/n3>

(<https://www.fgsitc.org/booklets/>)

'The following is a large collection of booklets (all in PDF format) on Buddhism and various topics from a Buddhist perspective written by Master Hsing Yun, the founder of the Fo Guang Shan (Buddha's Light Mountain) Buddhist order and the Buddha's Light International Association.'

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 27th, 2019 at 4:53 PM

Title: Re: English translation of 般若摄颂

Content:

Empty Cloud said:

Is there an English translation of this condensed prajnaparamita text used by Serte

Larung Khenpos like Khenpo Sardarge in his teachings?

Astus wrote:

<https://baike.baidu.com/item/%E8%88%AC%E8%8B%A5%E6%91%84%E9%A2%82> =
<http://ntireader.org/taisho/t0229.html> = <http://www.dsbcproject.org/canon-text/book/72> = <http://www.buddhistische-gesellschaft-berlin.de/downloads/ratnagunasamcayagatha.pdf>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 28th, 2019 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: The Four Noble Truths are

Content:

Astus wrote:

“Bhikkhus, this is the forerunner and precursor of the rising of the sun, that is, the dawn. So too, bhikkhus, for a bhikkhu this is the forerunner and precursor of the breakthrough to the Four Noble Truths as they really are, that is, right view. It is to be expected that a bhikkhu with right view will understand as it really is: ‘This is suffering.’... ‘This is the way leading to the cessation of suffering.’

“Therefore, bhikkhus, an exertion should be made to understand: ‘This is suffering.’... An exertion should be made to understand: ‘This is the way leading to the cessation of suffering.’”

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn56.37/en/bodhi>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 29th, 2019 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: Are there any schools of Mahayana or Vajrayana Buddhism that do not ascribe to the view that all is one mind?

Content:

Dgj said:

As far as I know, they all do, but I am largely uneducated in this area.

Astus wrote:

It really depends on whether Huangbo is understood correctly or incorrectly. If one reads that sentence as a statement about a single universal consciousness, that is not accepted by any Buddhist school, nor was that meant by Huangbo. If one understands it as that all appearances are suchness, then nobody has a problem with it in Mahayana or Vajrayana.

Also, just to make it clearer, besides the quoted translation by Blofeld, here are others:

"All the buddhas and sentient beings are only the one mind; there is no other dharma."
(Buswell)

"All Buddhas and all sentient beings are no different from the One Mind." (Lok To)

"The Buddhas and all the sentient beings are only the One Mind—there are no other dharmas." (McRae)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 29th, 2019 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: Are there any schools of Mahayana or Vajrayana Buddhism that do not ascribe to the view that all is one mind?

Content:

Simon E. said:

Dzogchen would and does demur.

Astus wrote:

So according to dzogchen there are dharmas that are not such? Do you have some examples for those things?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 29th, 2019 at 3:11 AM

Title: Re: Are there any schools of Mahayana or Vajrayana Buddhism that do not ascribe to the view that all is one mind?

Content:

Dgj said:

Is it really possible that all these teachers stated "All is the One Mind..." Or similar, but none of them meant what the sentence literally means at face value?

Astus wrote:

Huangbo was not a Yogacara teacher, and what he calls One Mind is a term not for the eight consciousnesses but for buddha-mind, for suchness, for emptiness. See what he said:

"The Buddhas and all the sentient beings are only the One Mind—there are no other dharmas. Since beginningless time, this mind has never been generated and has never been extinguished, is neither blue nor yellow, is without shape and without characteristic, does not belong to being and nonbeing, does not consider new or old, is neither long nor short, and is neither large nor small. It transcends all limitations, names, traces, and correlations. It in itself—that's it! To activate thoughts is to go against it! It is like space, which is boundless and immeasurable."

(Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 13)

Also note that in the very next chapter Huangbo calls it not One Mind but No Mind, and they mean the same thing actually, the ultimate realisation, that is, no conceptualisation, no attachment.

Dgj said:

That said, there are scholarly views that at least mention early Madhyamika thinkers countering this Yogacara view, which seems to imply they didn't immediately see it as meaning other than it sounds at face value.

Astus wrote:

If you ask whether there are schools that do not follow the doctrine of consciousness only, that needs further clarification, because there are various interpretations of that term, so what is seemingly refuted by one is not actually the view of the other.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 29th, 2019 at 6:28 PM

Title: Re: Are there any schools of Mahayana or Vajrayana Buddhism that do not ascribe to the view that all is one mind?

Content:

Dgj said:

these statements are nearly identical to Hindu statements. For example: "All is consciousness" is a really common Hindu teaching. "All is Mind" lacks any discernable difference without a great deal of explanation and redefining of terms or using them in unusual ways.

Astus wrote:

It is not possible to read practically anything without necessary contextual knowledge. Words gain more and more precise meaning through context. It should also be clear that reading things in translation require even more awareness of the complexity of transferring the intended meaning. So, just because there is the word 'mind' in a text, it doesn't really limit the possibilities of meanings of the word, unless one actually studies the whole text. So, if one reads Huangbo, there should be some awareness that it is a Chan text, not a systematic explanation of the Dharma, but a more practical oriented set of instructions.

Dgj said:

"All the Buddhas and all sentient beings are nothing but the One Mind, beside which nothing exists."

So, from this, at face value, mind is something that exists, nothing else does, and this mind is singular. To make it mean that "One Mind" isn't denoting some self existing, all encompassing entity requires jumping through some hoops.

Astus wrote:

Not at all. Even at face value, if one cares to read on from the first sentence, it becomes clear that no such doctrine of a singular mind was intended. It is not a matter of code or secret messages.

Dgj said:

there must be schools of Mahayana or Vajrayana Buddhism or at least individuals within said groups that found this wording and teaching problematic.

Astus wrote:

Not really. I don't think there is any Tibetan translation of Huangbo, while in East Asian Buddhism the two texts on Huangbo's teachings are canonical works of the Chan school. It should also be noted that the term "one mind" did not really gain currency in Chan, it is not an expression regularly used, in fact, the term "no mind" is far more ubiquitous.

Dgj said:

Someone must have noticed it being dangerously close to, or rather completely identical to (at face value), Hindu teachings, which could confuse or mislead people, and refuted it, or at least explained it carefully as correct but suggested using different wording?

Astus wrote:

Chan is not an Indian school, so there were not many Hindus to worry about. Also, the meaning you read from that one sentence is not really its meaning, hence the confusion is in modern English, not in ancient Chinese.

Dgj said:

could you be more specific as to how I could do so?

Astus wrote:

First of all, what do you mean by "consciousness only" or "mind only" or "one mind only"? If it refers to the view of an ultimately existing entity, that is readily refuted even by Yogacara. If it refers to how our experiences are defined by conceptuality, that is easily accepted by any Mahayanika. If it refers to something else, then please specify.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 1st, 2019 at 5:50 PM

Title: Re: There is no Vajrayana without renunciation

Content:

Astus wrote:

When attractive objects are seen as empty, there is no cause for the emergence of sensual craving. Renunciation may be forced or natural, and the natural form of it is when there is no more craving and clinging, when the wisdom of emptiness is present, there is no effort in renouncing. However, the result of forcing oneself not to be indulgent and being already without craving is the same in not engaging with sensuality. Similarly, no matter how defilements are conquered, the point is to become free from them.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 2nd, 2019 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: There is no Vajrayana without renunciation

Content:

futerko said:

Ah, so if one distinguishes between a preference for a pleasant experience and an attachment to it, then one must also distinguish between a goal of having no sensation or experience whatsoever and a state where sensation is merely seen for what it is.

Astus wrote:

If there is preference for pleasant experience, there is already craving and attachment. The non-existence of an experience, however, is not the same as seeing an experience for what it is.

futerko said:

The dependent nature in this case is sensation and emptiness non-dual. It is pointless to first designate "attractive objects" (or any putative objects), and then designate them as empty - that is merely an indication of the push and pull of striving against experience itself.

Astus wrote:

The presence or absence of craving for a pleasant feeling is where attachment and suffering may or may not arise. When there is no craving, no attachment, there is no need to do anything about experiences, and that is where self-liberation can happen. But when there is craving and attachment, using the concept of emptiness as a patch can be of some help, even if it is only a temporary measure.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 2nd, 2019 at 4:12 PM

Title: Re: There is no Vajrayana without renunciation

Content:

SonamTashi said:

The renunciation I was referring to was the Shravakayana practices of viewing the body as impure and things like that specifically--this is where the Vajrayana transforms instead.

Astus wrote:

But regardless of the method, the goal and the result is the same: elimination of the defilements. Since in all cases one should arrive at the point that is free from sensual craving, it still leaves the issue of family life vis-a-vis enlightenment unanswered.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 2nd, 2019 at 4:24 PM

Title: Re: How do the different national traditions of Zen (Chan, Seon and Thien) differ? What about Zen in the West?

Content:

KiwiNFLFan said:

what are the main differences between the different national traditions of Zen?

Astus wrote:

Zen is not a centralised set of beliefs, individuals have free hand in selecting what methods and doctrines they follow, therefore trying to define Zen as if there were something generally valid all over hundreds of communities is meaningless, as the characteristics that one can find in an entire country are usually those that are there not only in Zen groups but the entirety of "national" Buddhism. For instance, one could say that the Surangama Sutra is a somewhat unique element of Chinese Chan, however, it is also used by Chinese Pure Land teachers as well, furthermore, putting groups and teachers into seemingly distinct categories like Chan, Pure Land, Tiantai, etc. in Chinese Buddhism is often the wrong approach.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 7th, 2019 at 5:20 PM

Title: Re: What's 'dependent' in dependent arising?

Content:

Rick said:

Given this, what does the 'dependent' in dependent arising refer to?

Astus wrote:

'The answer is that we speak in a way that does not destroy the world's conventions that are accepted on the level of no analysis. As we have previously explained, things do not arise causelessly, from their own entities. Nor do things arise, in either of the two truths, from Īshvara, time, particles, inherent natures, persons, Narayana, or other such causes. Rather, results such as sprouts excellently arise in dependence upon all the causes and conditions, such as seeds, that are necessary for the result to appear.' (Wangchuk Dorje, in The Feast for the Fortunate, p 323-324)

Being dependent refers to the common understanding that appearances depend on causes and conditions in order to appear, in other words, that things arise and cease based on specific causes and conditions. But when that causality is analysed, there is nothing that can be found to substantiate its reality. That is the very first topic of the Mulamadhyamakakarika. Also, exactly because all things necessarily arise dependently, there are neither things nor dependence that could be established. Hence everything is unborn because born.

'In order to avoid eliminating worldly conventions concerning what is unanalyzed and commonly renowned, one should rely on the understanding that results arise perfectly in dependence upon causes and conditions that are mere appearances, as is the case with sprouts arising from seeds and so forth.'

(Mikyo Dorje, in The Moon of Wisdom, p 327)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2019 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: What's 'dependent' in dependent arising?

Content:

Rick said:

Still perplexed by the term 'dependent' in Chandrakirti's: "Dependent arising is the complete antithesis and negation of production by any of the four ways."

Astus wrote:

What you quote is from Mipham's commentary for the stanza by Candrakirti:

'Since things do not arise causelessly,
Nor through the causes of Īshvara and so on,
Nor from self, other, or both,
Therefore they excellently arise in dependence.'
(Madhyamakavatara 6.114, in Feast for the Fortunate, p 323)

Rick said:
Let's say that the four ways could produce.

Astus wrote:
Impossible. See the reasons summarised in <https://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/mipham/four-great-logical-arguments>.

Rick said:
My confusion might be just a matter of semantics. It might be that 'dependent' DOES apply to the situation I described ... but the doctrine of 'dependent arising' does not. I.e. it might make no sense to equate 'dependent arising' with the lay definition of 'dependent.'
?

Astus wrote:
It is actually not complicated at all. Dependency, dependent origination, it all means what normally one assumes: things arise and cease because of causes and conditions. That is a conventionally valid truth, that is how things work in life. That it is not possible to ultimately establish (find a logical, reasonable basis for) conventional truth, that is why it is merely conventional.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2019 at 5:52 PM

Title: Re: Agamas/Nikayas and Mahayana

Content:

ryan_oliveira said:

Are Agamas and Nikayas studied in Mahayana Buddhism today? What is the Mahayana view of these texts?

Astus wrote:
20th century scholarship brought back their study.
https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Yin_Shun made extensive research, and there is even a new Japanese school called the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Agon_Shu.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2019 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: The Four Noble Truths are

Content:

Viach said:

the correct yogic (non-intellectual) view immediately precedes the emergence of the yogic understanding of 4TN and becoming the Ariya.

Astus wrote:

What is that statement based on? Where do you find in the sutras or the abhidharma such explanation?

Vasubandhu in AKB (vol 3, p 897, tr Pruden):

'Because, in the period preparatory to the Path proper, that is, the period of examination, the ascetic first creates an idea of that to which he is attached, of that by which he is tormented, of that from which he seeks to be delivered, namely, suffering. Then he asks what is its cause, and he creates an idea of its origin. Then he asks what does extinction consist of, and he creates an idea of extinction. Then he asks what is the Path to extinction, and he creates an idea of the path. ...

What is the meaning of the word abhisamaya (comprehension)? This word signifies abhisambodha, "understanding, comprehension." The root i signifies "to understand"

Also, even when one actually attains one of the fruits, there are several stages preceding it, and "non-conceptual" does not really feature among them. But if you have some sources, please present them.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2019 at 9:48 PM

Title: Re: Looking for some Zen (Chan) lectures

Content:

TheWhiteLotus said:

I am interested studying Zen. I am looking for some lectures. I prefer a course structure or a text (sutra) that is being explained. Any recommendations?

Astus wrote:

Please be aware that Chan/Zen is not a specific set of doctrines, nor a unified school, therefore methods and styles can vary from teacher to teacher, and from community to community. Below is a list of possible introductory materials from different sources and with a varying degree of expansiveness.

http://www.shengyen.org/freebook/pdf/In_the_Spirit_of_Chan.pdf

<https://terebess.hu/zen/mesterek/HanshanDeqing.html#c>

<https://www.emptycloud.net/articles-2/chan-meditation-%E7%A6%85/prerequisites-of-the-chan-training/>

<https://www.emptycloud.net/articles-2/chan-meditation-%E7%A6%85/the-chan-training/>

<https://tienvnguyen.net/images/file/G5gYJdC51AgQAHUb/keystobuddhism.pdf>

<https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/leaflet/heartofzen/index.html>

http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/bbs/board.php?bo_table=3020

<https://www.bdkamerica.org/book/zen-texts>
<https://www.bdkamerica.org/book/platform-sutra-sixth-patriarch>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 13th, 2019 at 5:31 PM

Title: Re: Early Madhyamaka

Content:

Dgj said:

Despite lacking any essence, he argues, phenomena nonetheless exist conventionally... Where is this type of thing ever stated or explained by the early Madhyamaka thinkers like Nagarjuna, Bhāviveka, Buddhapālita and Candrakīrti?

Astus wrote:

The doctrine of two truths is accepted by the abhidharmika and madhyamika equally, the difference is in how it is divided. In terms of the conventional, the line drawn by abhidharmikas is between worldly parlance and dharmas, where dharmas are ultimate truths, while madhyamikas say that not only worldly ideas are conceptual but so are the dharmas, and ultimate truth is purely emptiness. So, to say that phenomena exist conventionally is fine for madhyamikas, but on the one hand every constructed is included in conventionality (note: in the various abhidharma systems most of the dharmas are constructed and impermanent, while at the same time put in the category of ultimate truth), and on the other hand conventionality means a mere conceptual existence without real referents. So the key element in Madhyamaka that divides ordinary and noble beings is in recognising the fictional nature of phenomena.

'Those who assert the conditioned things
As being established in terms of ultimate reality,
Why wouldn't the faults of permanence and so on
Not arise within their minds?

Those who accept the conditioned things
As being neither true nor false,
Just like the moon in the water,
They are not carried away by dogmatic views.'
(Yuktisastika-karika, v 44-45, tr Thupten Jinpa)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 13th, 2019 at 8:02 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment and compassion

Content:

Evdot said:

If enlightenment is void of feeling, then how can enlightened people feel compassion?

Astus wrote:

Enlightenment is about the freedom from the delusion of self and thus the end of all attachment. Feeling is not the problem, it is the clinging to and identification with a feeling that causes suffering. Compassion is very much present all along the path and at the culmination as well.

'Mahamudra is nondual awareness that transcends intellect; it is nonconceptual, lucid, like all-pervading space. Though manifesting boundless compassion, it is devoid of self-nature. It is like the reflection of the moon on the lake's surface.'
(Maitripa, quoted in Mahamudra the Moonlight, p 94)

'The spirit of enlightenment [bodhichitta] is defined as the union of compassion and emptiness, which is the quintessence of the path, the luster of unceasing compassion that cannot bear the suffering of sentient beings, and the nondual awareness that cognizes compassion as being empty of any essence or self-nature. This is the essence of Mahayana Buddhism. The Hevajra tantra comments:

The union of emptiness and compassion
Is described as the spirit of enlightenment.
The Vajrapanara explains:
The meditation on the union
Of emptiness and compassion
Is indeed the teaching
Of the Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha.

The Samputa says:
The nondiscriminatory simplicity [of mind]
Is described as wisdom;
That which fulfills the wishes of sentient beings [without exception],
The way a wish-granting gem does, [is described] as compassion.

Saraha states:
He who seeks emptiness without compassion
Will not realize the supreme path;
Yet he who meditates mainly on compassion
Will not realize liberation.
He who unifies the two
Will neither remain in samsara nor in nirvana,

Savari declares:
He who has attained nonevaluating awareness,
Who is unable to bear the misery of confused sentient beings,
And who sheds tears of compassion
While working for their benefit,
Turns concern for himself
Into concern for others.'
(Mahamudra the Moonlight, p 350)

'Je Gomchung comments:

Postabsorption at the one-pointed stage is solid;
Postabsorption at the nondiscriminatory stage is a perceived illusion;
Postabsorption at the one-flavor stage is the awareness of emptiness;
Postabsorption at the nonmeditation stage is dynamic compassion.

...

Line four shows that because absorption and postabsorption are blended, no distinct postabsorption as such exists. Yet, nondiscriminatory compassion emerges representing a dynamic attainment. Hence the term “dynamic compassion” for the postabsorptive perception.'

(Mahamudra the Moonlight, p 369)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2019 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: Infinities

Content:

dolphin_color said:

1. Is the cosmos (our observable universe plus whatever could be beyond it) infinitely large?
2. Are there phenomena (dharmas) that have the quality of being infinite (in size, or in some other property)?

Astus wrote:

“If there is the view ‘the world is finite,’...‘the world is infinite,’... the holy life cannot be lived.”

(Culamalunkya Sutta, MN 63.6)

“How is it, Master Gotama, does Master Gotama hold the view: ‘The world is finite: only this is true, anything else is wrong’?”

“Vaccha, I do not hold the view: ‘The world is finite: only this is true, anything else is wrong.’”

“How then, does Master Gotama hold the view: ‘The world is infinite: only this is true, anything else is wrong’?”

“Vaccha, I do not hold the view: ‘The world is infinite: only this is true, anything else is wrong.’”

(Aggivacchagotta Sutta, MN 72.5-6)

“Vaccha, wanderers of other sects regard the eye ... the mind thus: ‘This is mine, this I am, this is my self.’ Therefore, when the wanderers of other sects are asked such questions, they give such answers as: ‘The world is eternal’ ... or ‘The Tathagata neither exists nor does not exist after death.’ But, Vaccha, the Tathagata, the Arahant, the Perfectly Enlightened One, regards the eye ... the mind thus: ‘This is not mine, this I am not, this is not my self.’ Therefore, when the Tathagata is asked such questions, he does not give such answers.”

(Moggallana Sutta, SN 44.7)

<https://studybuddhism.com/en/advanced-studies/abhidharma-tenet-systems/time-> the-universe/the-fourteen-questions-to-which-buddha-remained-silent

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 15th, 2019 at 7:09 PM

Title: Re: The Four Noble Truths are

Content:

Viach said:

This means that 4TN is the answer at the end of the problem book. ... For others, knowing the answer in no way will not help.

Astus wrote:

There are stages before gaining the insight into the four noble truths, and there are also three stages of wisdom one must go through, the first of which is learning the Dharma, including the learning of the four noble truths. So it is actually very meaningful and necessary to learn and understand the four truths before one engages in cultivation and eventually gains insight.

'Whoever desires to see the Truths should first of all keep the Precepts. Then he reads the teaching upon which his Seeing of the Truths depends, or he hears their meaning. Having heard, he correctly reflects. Having reflected, he gives himself up to the cultivation of meditation. With the wisdom (prajna) arisen from the teaching (srutamayi) for its support, there arises the wisdom arisen from reflection (cintamayi) with this for its support, there arises the wisdom arisen from meditation (bhavanamayi).'

(AKB, vol 3, p 911-912, tr Pruden)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 15th, 2019 at 8:10 PM

Title: Re: Looking for some Zen (Chan) lectures

Content:

TheWhiteLotus said:

My main reason for wanting to study Zen, is that I wanted learn directly from sutra of the Buddha.

Astus wrote:

If you want to study Mahayana sutras:

<https://www.bdkamerica.org/catalog-tripitaka>

<http://sutrasmantras.info/sutra0.html>

<https://web.archive.org/web/20180704171259/http://www.fodian.net:80/world/>

<https://ymba.org/free-books>

<http://www.cttbusa.org/sutratexts.asp>

<https://lapislazulitexts.com/tripitaka>

<https://www2.hf.uio.no/polyglotta/index.php?page=library&bid=2>

<http://www.huzheng.org/en/mtlee/>

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 15th, 2019 at 8:44 PM

Title: Re: The Four Noble Truths are

Content:

Viach said:

You can practice Satipatthana without even knowing about the existence of 4TN.

Astus wrote:

How does that even address the generally accepted order of the three stages of wisdom that begins with learning? Also, skipping between Sarvastivada and Theravada can cause some mistakes, as they are somewhat different systems.

Viach said:

Thus, 4TN are not for everyone, but only for those who have already solved the problem or are one or two steps before solving it.

Astus wrote:

Not in Theravada, nor in Sarvastivada.

'This superior right view leading to liberation is the understanding of the Four Noble Truths. It is this right view that figures as the first factor of the Noble Eightfold Path in the proper sense: as the noble right view. Thus the Buddha defines the path factor of right view expressly in terms of the four truths: "What now is right view? It is understanding of suffering (dukkha), understanding of the origin of suffering, understanding of the cessation of suffering, understanding of the way leading to the cessation to suffering." The Eightfold Path starts with a conceptual understanding of the Four Noble Truths apprehended only obscurely through the media of thought and reflection. It reaches its climax in a direct intuition of those same truths, penetrated with a clarity tantamount to enlightenment. Thus it can be said that the right view of the Four Noble Truths forms both the beginning and the culmination of the way to the end of suffering.'
(http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/noble8path6.pdf by Bhikkhu Bodhi, p 22)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 16th, 2019 at 5:08 PM

Title: Re: Express your Zen in 10 words.

Content:

Astus wrote:

no truth to find
stop seeking mind
that's all

'No need to seek the real;
Just extinguish your views.'
(Sengcan)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 16th, 2019 at 8:27 PM

Title: Re: Express your Zen in 10 words.

Content:

Astus wrote:

veracity and falsity

measurements in conditionality thoughts come, thoughts go

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 17th, 2019 at 4:53 AM

Title: Re: How did Nagarjuna not teach extreme nihilism?

Content:

Dgj said:

However he also proved that nothing whatsoever exists: extreme nihilism.

Astus wrote:

You are not wrong there. Nagarjuna did prove in various ways that conventionally everything is dependently originated, therefore ultimately nothing exists. When there is talk of denying the extremes of existence and non-existence, that means that there is nothing that continues (permanence), nor anything that discontinues (annihilation).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 17th, 2019 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: Is there a rational, simple, logical way to explain Nagarjuna's seemingly paradoxical teachings?

Content:

Dgj said:

So simply stating that nothing exists is a wrong view doesn't fix the issue that he made it abundantly clear that nothing exists.

Astus wrote:

Where is the paradox in that?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 17th, 2019 at 5:13 AM

Title: Re: Could someone provide confirmation of Brunholzl?

Content:

Dgj said:

Conventionally, Madhyamaka holds that beings do perceive concrete objects which they are aware of empirically.

-Brunholzl, Karl, Center of the Sunlit Sky

So if someone could provide texts that confirm the Brunholzl quote above I'll study those instead of bothering the fine people on here further. The quote is completely counter to my incorrect understanding and therefore, once I can read texts confirming this quote as accurate it will both disprove my incorrect understanding and explain why it is incorrect.

Astus wrote:

You might start with Brunnhölzl's wonderful book where the quote is from. Other than that, Nagarjuna simply states what you find in the sutras, that dependent origination has ignorance at its root, so all things arise from that, while emptiness remedies that ignorance.

'The childish are attached to forms;
The moderate attains detachment;
By knowing the nature of forms,
Those of supreme intellect are free.'

(<https://www.tibetanclassics.org/html-assets/SixtyStanzas.pdf>, v 55)

Apart from practically any work of Nagarjuna, you can look into his short treatise called <https://www.lotsawahouse.org/indian-masters/nagarjuna/heart-dependent-origination>, with commentary in part two of http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/nagarjuna.pdf.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 19th, 2019 at 4:10 AM

Title: Re: Schrodinger's Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

It is asserted in the Mahayana schools, one way or another, that all beings possess Buddha Nature.

Astus wrote:

That is meant to encourage beings. It is not a claim of some magical essence hidden inside.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Regardless of how it is expressed, there is a general understanding that all beings have the potential to realize full awakening.

Astus wrote:

If one has legs, there is the potential to walk all over the Earth. If one has hands, there is the potential to sculpt something amazing. A potential is simply fabricating predictions, not some entity.

PadmaVonSamba said:

At the same time, it can be argued that a Buddha, by definition, is regarded as unimpeded, meaning that all obscurations have been overcome.

If this is the case, then no shell can restrain the chick, no cloud can obscure the Sun. In other words, one can argue that Buddha nature (Tathagatagarbha) cannot exist in an unrealized state just as a flame cannot exist in an unburning state.

Astus wrote:

Since the teaching on the covered buddha statue is merely a metaphor, it is the wrong path to assume a little buddha hidden inside one's mind.

PadmaVonSamba said:

we can assert that there is no fixed point separating unrealized-state from realized-state.

Astus wrote:

There really is no self, but beings falsely imagine a self. If investigated, even ignorance is empty, but before correctly analysing it, there is ignorance.

PadmaVonSamba said:

If a Buddha is a fully awakened being, and sentient beings possess Buddha nature but are unawakened, then isn't this a bit like Schrodinger's Cat, simultaneously alive and dead?

Astus wrote:

Rather it's like assuming one has money in one's pocket, but only when actually reaching into it to pay one realises to be penniless. Or the other way around, that one is in fact rich. In any case, there are simply ignorance and wisdom.

PadmaVonSamba said:

"full realization" by definition, cannot be confined within the limits of "potential".

Astus wrote:

And nobody said it was.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 19th, 2019 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: Could someone provide confirmation of Brunholzl?

Content:

Dgj said:

I looked at both of those works. I couldn't find anything where it is stated directly anything that confirms the Brunholzl quote.

Astus wrote:

Actually, it is not a quote from Brunnhölzl, but rather the interpretation of the author of the Wikipedia article. On the referred to page 73 Brunnhölzl quotes Candrakirti (Madhyamakavatara 6.23), so I give the latter's summary of conventional truth:

'Since all things can be seen genuinely or falsely,
Every thing bears two natures.

The Buddha taught that the object of genuine seeing is suchness
And that false seeing is the relative truth.
False seeing is also said to have two aspects:
That with clear faculties and that with faulty faculties.
In dependence upon consciousnesses endowed with good faculties,
Consciousnesses endowed with faulty faculties are asserted to be wrong.
What is apprehended by the undamaged six faculties
Is known by the world
And is true for the world.
Everything else is held by the world to be false.'
(Madhyamakavatara 6.23-25, Feast for the Fortunate, p 204-208)

Here's also Aryadeva:

'Since those things that appear in an erroneous cognition are not real, they are not as they appear in that cognition. That cognition is of the same nature as those things — i.e., an appearance without reality.
Whosoever with a subtle mind conceives all things as merely dependent, that intelligent one easily abandons desires and other attachments, just as the one who knows that there is no snake but only a rope abandons the fear of the snake.
In pondering worldly things, one should act as worldly people do. One who desires to abandon the mental afflictions (hatred, greed, and desire) must investigate things from the ultimate point of view.'
(The Hand Treatise, v 4-6, in Indian Madhyamaka Buddhism after Nagarjuna, vol 1, p 4-5)

Bhavaviveka:

"‘Conventional truth,’ as it is called, is also known to be of two types: ‘authentic conventional truths’ and ‘inauthentic conventional truths.’ Something that has the capacity to produce results is called an ‘authentic conventional truth,’ and what appears conventionally but is without such a power is called an ‘inauthentic conventional truth.’"
(Summary on the Meaning of the Middle Way, v 9-10, in Indian Madhyamaka Buddhism after Nagarjuna, vol 1, p 145)

Dgj said:

Anything that states that conventional reality is not denied would do. However, quotes that state that conventional reality is imaginary, or nonexistent would not help dispel my wrong understanding of Nagarjuna, as these could easily be misunderstood as nihilistic, and are the exact opposite of the Brunholz quote above.

Astus wrote:

Conventional truths are not denied but seen as conventional and as the product of ignorance. It could be said that dependent origination is the conventional and emptiness is the ultimate truth, and these two form the basic teaching of Madhyamaka. Furthermore, dependent origination is possible only when things are empty, and emptiness is not something apart from dependent origination. So, yes, all conventional phenomena are imaginary and false, there is no ultimate substance provided for them, however, it is not the case either that there is a mere denial of dependently originated false concepts that ordinary beings mistake for reality. It should not be forgotten either that the very purpose of the teaching is the elimination of attachment through the removal of the misconception of established, substantial things; and such things are already assumed, we are already ignorantly stuck in samsara deluded by our truths that are merely conventional, conceptual, nominal, and dependent but mistaken as ultimate, factual, real, and independent. So it is actually a given that there is the conventional truth, and through understanding the nature of conventionality one can realise the ultimate, and by that realisation attain liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 20th, 2019 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: Schrodinger's Tathagatagharbha?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

The argument I'm raising is simply that a buddha is free of hinderances,
All beings are, ultimately, Buddhas Yet all beings experience hinderances.

Astus wrote:

From a false premise no good result can come. Buddha-nature is not some sort of shiny soul hidden inside a dirty soul, hence the misapplied objections proposed:

Thus, one's buddha-nature can't go unrecognized, or else it isn't really buddha-nature.

You can't be a buddha and not know it,

Because a buddha knows everything. It's like the hypothetical "universal solvent" that no container can hold, because it would dissolve that container.

If there's nothing a buddha can't see through, Nothing can hinder realization of one's buddha nature, Yet hinderances obscure that realization all the time for beings.

Those are invalid arguments, because the assumption that there is a little buddha in everyone is not true.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 21st, 2019 at 1:17 AM

Title: Re: Schrodinger's Tathagatagharbha?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Would you say then, that Buddha-nature is actually a term describing Buddha-potential, rather than Buddha-realization?

Astus wrote:

Buddha-nature means the qualities of a buddha are already present and not developed, therefore one only needs to remove the two types of obscuration. As qualities, they are like one's eyes: one has to open them in order to see. So, as long as one is deluded about the self, buddha-nature is merely a potential in the way that one has the possibility to discover it, to see with the buddha-eye. Once there is no more ignorance the eye is opened, and the qualities of a buddha become active. Now, as for what those qualities, they are the three bodies, and they are present as the emptiness (dharmakaya), awareness (sambhogakaya), and appearances (nirmanakaya) of the mind. Regardless if one is deluded or awakened, the mind is empty, aware, and functional. The difference lies in taking the mind to be a self or not, in the presence or absence of grasping.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 21st, 2019 at 4:00 AM

Title: Re: Schrodinger's Tathagatagharbha?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

My question is whether the concept of what basically amounts to “unrealized perfect realization” is by definition an untenable contradiction.

Astus wrote:

It is not “unrealized perfect realization”. Buddha-nature refers to qualities, not the realisation of qualities. Realisation is enlightenment to those qualities.

PadmaVonSamba said:

So...undeveloped dharmakaya, sambhogakaya, and nirmanakaya?

Astus wrote:

There is nothing to develop on the three bodies.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 2nd, 2020 at 5:03 PM

Title: Re: Learning more about the tenet systems

Content:

Stephen18 said:

Where can I learn more about the Mahāyāna tenet systems?

Astus wrote:

It is important to keep in mind that it does matter who presents the various systems, because there is naturally and intentionally a bias against all tenets that are not upheld as the best/highest.

Academic:

https://books.google.hu/books/about/Buddhist_Teaching_in_India.html?id=fjU6AwAAQBAJ by Johannes Bronkhorst

https://books.google.hu/books/about/Buddhist_Thought.html?id=v0Rpyvcf1t0C by Paul Williams, Alexander Wynne, Anthony Tribe https://books.google.hu/books/about/Madhyamika_and_Yogacara.html?id=1-cHxL1ews0C by Gadjin M. Nagao

General East Asian:

<http://www.buddhistdoor.com/OldWeb/bdoor/archive/nutshell/index.htm>

<https://www.bdkamerica.org/book/essentials-eight-traditions-and-candle-latter-dharma>

Chan:

Treatise on the Origin of Humanity in <https://www.bdkamerica.org/book/three-short-treatises-vasubandhu-sengzhao-and-zongmi>

Tiantai:

A Guide to the Tiantai Fourfold Teachings in <https://www.bdkamerica.org/book/tiantai-lotus-texts>

Kagyüpa (Rime):

<https://www.shambhala.com/treasury-of-knowledge-book-6-part-3.html>

Gelugpa:

<https://www.shambhala.com/buddhist-philosophy-2187.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 4th, 2020 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: History of tantra

Content:

dolphin_color said:

When was Tantra introduced into Buddhism?

Astus wrote:

"It is only in the second half of the seventh century that the definitive esoteric system emerges, and we have several verifications of this dating."

(Indian Esoteric Buddhism: A Social History of the Tantric Movement by Ronald M Davidson, p 117)

dolphin_color said:

What were the social or historical factors that encouraged its introduction?

Astus wrote:

See Davidson's book.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 6th, 2020 at 4:25 PM

Title: Re: Paramartha and Xuanzang translations

Content:

Jion said:

I am trying to track down a document which has Vasubandhu's romanized Sanskrit of the Abhidharmakosabhasya alongside the Paramartha and Hsuan Tsang translations.

Astus wrote:

<https://www2.hf.uio.no/polyglotta/index.php?page=volume&vid=511>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 6th, 2020 at 4:58 PM

Title: Re: Japanese priesthood and Japanese monkhood

Content:

khemindas said:

Who are priests (don't have Pabbajja(Parivrajya) or Upasampada), who are monks(Have Pabbajja or Upasampada)? May be you can recommend any book on this topic?

Astus wrote:

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Saich%C5%8D> in the early 9th century successfully established an ordination platform based solely on his interpretation of the bodhisattva precepts. In a century or so all other schools in Japan dropped the pratimoksha, and ever since (except for the occasional revival movements) there has been no higher ordination in Japan. The Meiji Restoration in the 19th century merely decriminalised for the clergy the breaking of the precepts regarding celibacy, vegetarianism, etc., but did not ban them.

See also this older topic: <https://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?t=15462>

As for a book, <https://uhpress.hawaii.edu/product/going-forth-visions-of-buddhist-vinaya/>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 6th, 2020 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: History of tantra

Content:

Aemilius said:

Buddhism continued as an oral tradition for half a millennium.

Astus wrote:

And if you look at the various sutras, there is a notable difference between those that are apparently from an oral tradition and those that have been written down from the beginning. For instance, the often seen recommendation to copy and revere a Mahayana sutra is in reference to its physical nature as a scripture.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 6th, 2020 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: Japanese priesthood and Japanese monkhood

Content:

Caoimhghín said:

Actually, I think you might be mistaken on this on by characterizing it as a mere decriminalization, but I have to reread some materials.
In the meantime, the name of that historical movement, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Haibutsu_kishaku, lit. "abolish Buddha(dharma), destroy Śākyamuni."

Astus wrote:

'One crucial law, promulgated in 1872, decriminalized a variety of clerical practices that had been illegal according to Bakufu regulations for much of the Edo period. The regulation, commonly referred to during the Meiji period as the nikujiki saitai 肉食妻帯 law, ended all penalties for clerics who violated state and clerical standards of deportment by eating meat, marrying, letting their hair grow, or abandoning clerical dress.'

(<https://nirc.nanzan-u.ac.jp/nfile/2645> by Richard Jaffe)

See also the topic: <https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?t=6774>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 7th, 2020 at 10:24 PM

Title: Re: History of tantra

Content:

Aemilius said:

That is true of course, and for example in the White Lotus sutra, in the Devadatta chapter, there is the story of Shakyamuni in one of his previous births when he is serving an ascetic for many years who possesses the teaching of the Lotus sutra. Here you definitely get the impression that the Sutra that the ascetic possesses is not a material book, but is something that he holds in his mind.

Astus wrote:

Since the Lotus Sutra itself talks of the importance of reading and copying the Lotus Sutra, it is hard to see how that can refer to an oral tradition, unless such statements are later modifications of the text. But in that case it means that the Lotus Sutra is not the Lotus Sutra talked about in the Lotus Sutra.

Also, the Innumerable Meanings Sutra has a list of ten types of merit obtainable from it, and half of those talk of reading and copying the sutra, so again, it refers to its scriptural nature. In the very first chapter of the Lotus Sutra it is said that the Buddha was teaching the Innumerable Meanings Sutra. So, either the Innumerable Meanings Sutra is not the Innumerable Meanings Sutra, or it is one scripture writing of another scripture.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 8th, 2020 at 4:22 AM

Title: Re: History of tantra

Content:

Caoimhghín said:

There are many divergent recensions of the Lotus Sūtra. I wonder if the Gilgit Lotus mentions the Anantanirdeśasūtra. I suspect it doesn't, to be quite honest, since I suspect that it is Chinese apocrypha myself (no hard proof), but I am open to being quite wrong.

Astus wrote:

That the Buddha taught the "Mahānirdeśa" sutra, what Kumarajiva translates as "無量義"; is translated as "大頌" by Dharmarakṣa who renders the samadhi "anantanirdeśa" as "無量頌". Both Dharmarakṣa and Kumarajiva precede the Gilgit manuscript. It is also mentioned in the reviewed version of the Lotus Sutra (T264) as "無量義教菩薩法佛所護念" and also in the Tibetan as "nges par bstan pa chen po". Still, the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Innumerable_Meanings_Sutra is assumed to be a Chinese apocrypha.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 8th, 2020 at 5:11 AM

Title: Re: History of tantra

Content:

Sentient Light said:

David Drewes has a very compelling argument

Astus wrote:

I have not found such an argument in that text. Could you please provide a quote or page number?

In the mean time, here is James B. Apple's essay

<https://www.thefreelibrary.com/The+phrase+dharmaparyayo+hastagato+in+mahayana+buddhist+literature%3A...-a0371001219>.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 8th, 2020 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: History of tantra

Content:

Sentient Light said:

Here's the correct one.

https://www.academia.edu/11322753/Oral_Texts_in_Indian_Mahayana_IJJ_2015_

Astus wrote:

That paper discusses different verbs, not those about reading and copying. Also, his main argument is that Mahayana sutras were memorised and written at the same time. At the end he also states: 'Generally speaking, as several scholars have already argued, the categories of "written" and "oral" traditions have little or no utility when applied to India.' He does not deny that the sutras existed as books, but rather attempts to highlight the presence of an oral tradition in parallel with the written works. To that it could be mentioned that for a while in China novices were required to memorise sutras before they could be ordained, even though the scriptures were preserved and transmitted in written form.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 9th, 2020 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: History of tantra

Content:

Aemilius said:

I don't remember that Lotus sutra says "copying" anywhere? Where does it talk about copying in your opinion ?

Astus wrote:

It is already mentioned in chapter 3 ("the people who recite, copy, and preserve it." BDK ed p 73; T262p15b26-27), but it's repeated several times in chapter 10, e.g. "If there is anyone who preserves, recites, explains, or copies even a single verse of the Lotus Sutra" (BDK ed p 157; T262p30c17-19), and "Among the many people, either among the laity or the ordained, who practice the bodhisattva path, if they are unable to see, hear, recite, copy, preserve, and pay homage to this Lotus Sutra, know that they are people who are not yet properly practicing the bodhisattva path." (BDK ed p 161; T262p31c3-5). In chapter 11: "But it will certainly be difficult to copy / And preserve this sutra / And cause others to copy it / After my nirvana." (BDK ed p 175; T262p34a24-25), and in chapter 13: "we will produce the power of great patience and recite, preserve, teach, and copy this sutra" (BDK ed p 187; T262p36a4-5), and in chapter 14: "teach it after reciting it, copy it after teaching it, and enable others to copy, respect, honor, praise, and pay homage to the [Lotus] Sutra." (BDK ed p 200; T262p38b18-20). And so on.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2020 at 4:08 PM

Title: Re: Non-Attachment vs. Dettachment

Content:

hkvanx said:

Buddhism is telling the Olympic athlete to be non-attached to the outcome (gold medal).

Astus wrote:

Buddhism teaches the ending of craving and clinging as the goal, and to that end there is the path of moral discipline, mental cultivation, and wisdom. The initial steps are not about suddenly letting go of all one's goals and motivations, but rather directing all that into an ethical track that is conducive to pacifying one's mind.

hkvanx said:

How does one continue to be engaged in a long strenuous training regime but try to be non-attached to the desired outcome?

Astus wrote:

That doesn't really work. One ordinarily does things either because of the pleasure gained from the act or because of a desirable outcome. In order to be free from the suffering one needs to eliminate the root cause of ignorance, however, until that happens there are still many steps one can take to ameliorate the pain of samsara. For instance, if one is disturbed by worries about achieving whatever goals, one can learn ways to calm down the mind to be less agitated, and then learn to recognise the pattern how worrisome thoughts bring about anxiety.

hkvanx said:

When I try to practice non-attachment in my daily life, it feels like I am becoming an emotional zombie or emotionally numb.

Astus wrote:

Non-attachment is not a special state of mind, so one cannot just switch to it. Although through wilful grasping at a blank state may look like freedom from clinging, it is rather another form of attachment that can work only as a temporary solution. It is advisable to learn to be mindful of the basic qualities of the various states of mind (vedanupassana) in terms of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 22nd, 2020 at 3:50 PM

Title: Re: Madhyamaka < quantum mechanics?

Content:

smcj said:

It occurs to me that one major premise of buddhist dialectics is that an absurd conclusion is unacceptable. If an idea results in an absurd conclusion it is dismissed as wrong.

Astus wrote:

Madhyamaka accepts whatever is upheld by intelligent ordinary beings as valid relative truth. It is for the ultimate truth that correct analysis is applied to. So unless you propose that physics is ultimate truth, there is no contradiction between it and Madhyamaka.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 22nd, 2020 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: Madhyamaka < quantum mechanics?

Content:

smcj said:

So if the system of logic used to establish "correct analysis" is itself shown to be flawed, then the conclusions that come from it are incorrect. Right?

Astus wrote:

What is called correct analysis is what is defined as such in Madhyamaka. How are you going to prove that wrong? Also, even analysis is merely relative truth, so of course ultimately it does not hold up to scrutiny. But neither does any other theory.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 23rd, 2020 at 5:38 AM

Title: Re: Madhyamaka < quantum mechanics?

Content:

smcj said:

If the axioms are false then the logic is flawed. If the logic is flawed there is no correct analysis.

The axiom that absurd conclusions can be deemed incorrect is false. Hence all the arguments are nonsense.

Astus wrote:

Is that an argument? If so, it is nonsense by its own definition, hence cannot be an argument.

Also, to prove that absurd conclusions can be correct, you need to do that in a logical way, not by quoting stories.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 5th, 2020 at 3:40 PM

Title: Re: Where is 'Mind'?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Is it asserted that, using the same analytical approach, likewise, consciousness ('mind') cannot be found to exist inside or outside the body?

Astus wrote:

Right, through both reasoning and direct insight one can search for the mind's location, or abiding, and eventually conclude that it cannot be found anywhere. It might also be of interest regarding this topic the analysis of the relationship between body and mind as presented for instance in chapter 9 of Pointing Out the Dharmakaya by Thrangu Rinpoche.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Does consciousness ('Mind') arise only as sensation?

Astus wrote:

Consciousness arises as awareness, as being aware of things, a.k.a. clarity.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 5th, 2020 at 4:31 PM

Title: Re: Where is 'Mind'?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

So in the case of 'the mind' - the mind is not an object at all. This is an empirical statement, a statement of fact. Search high and low using all the powers of the six sense gates (including their modern scientific enhancements like electron microscopes or brain scanners), you will never find an object that corresponds to the term 'mind'. How baffling!

Astus wrote:

'A hidden thing is something that you cannot know directly, like a fire that you cannot physically see, so you must determine its existence by the presence of smoke, which can be seen. In the case of something that is hidden, you need inferential valid cognition to determine its existence or absence. But in the case of the opposite type of thing, called an evident thing, you have no need to apply inference, since you can use direct valid cognition or direct experience. For example, I do not need to infer the presence of a bell on the table in front of me, since I can see it. I do not need to speculate about what possible evidence the bell might have left of its presence since it is right in front of me. I do not need to use reasoning at all. Now, with regard to meditation on the mind's nature, the mind is not a hidden thing; it is an evident thing. It is your mind. Therefore, you can know it directly and experience its nature directly, and for that reason it is not necessary to use inferential valid cognition in determining the mind's nature.'

(Pointing Out the Dharmakaya by Thrangu Rinpoche, p 64; highlight added)

'Not finding anything, you initially think that you have somehow failed. Either you misunderstood how to look, or you just haven't looked enough. But in fact this is not true. The reason you didn't find anything is that the nature of your mind is utter insubstantiality, which is why, according to the Buddha, it is empty. To thoroughly comprehend this emptiness, we need to experience this directly in meditation.'

(An Introduction to Mahamudra Meditation by Thrangu Rinpoche, p 33)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 5th, 2020 at 7:05 PM

Title: Re: Where is 'Mind'?

Content:

smcj said:

Is it just me, or are those two Thrangu R. quotes incompatible?

Astus wrote:

How so? Both state that knowing the mind directly is very much possible.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2020 at 6:24 PM

Title: Re: Where is 'Mind'?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

It's still not an object of cognition, but 'that which cognises'. We know the mind because it is that which knows, not because it appears to us as an object of knowledge.

Astus wrote:

Mind is not a single object, nor a single subject, but the conditional instances of consciousness. Imagining static subjects and objects is the standard convention that is steeped in substantialism, and it is in that context where self-awareness is refuted.

Regarding what self-awareness is in Mahamudra:

'In the mahamudra context, when we say that the mind can be aware of its own nature, we mean that the mind is aware of its own nature, which is emptiness. Of course, all things are empty, but among all things, mind is manifestly empty. When you look at your mind in the mahamudra practice you observe that there is no shape, no color, no substantial characteristic of any kind, that the mind has no true origination, abiding, or cessation. If the mind had substantial existence, it would possess these characteristics, it would come into being, it would abide, and it would cease. What the mind sees when the mind looks at its own nature is its own absence of true existence. What is refuted in the Middle Way school is the mind seeing its own presence of true existence, since it does not have any. Therefore, in the mahamudra context, the use of self-awareness is quite different from the way it is used in the Madhyamaka context.'

(Pointing Out the Dharmakaya, p 103-104)

'The term "seeing the mind" is a simple designation for understanding the mind's unreality, which is detached from the beginning from all modes of existence or nonexistence. The nature of mind is such that there is nothing – not even the infinitesimal end of a hair – that is a conceivable or perceptible object or observer.'

(Mahamudra the Moonlight, p 195)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2020 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: Where is 'Mind'?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Likewise, Mind is basically just an experience, Isn't it?

Astus wrote:

Rather, it's just a concept. There is no experience one could identify as "the mind".

PadmaVonSamba said:

specifically arises with a physical body (which is in itself merely a collection of emptinesses) is difficult to comprehend.

Astus wrote:

Distinguishing physical and mental phenomena is a conventional set of categories, splitting up the entirety of experience to two parts. As long as there is this idea that on the one hand there is the body (sarira) and on the other the mind (jiva) one will have serious difficulties with consolidating them. Instead of such a substantialist dichotomy the Buddha taught about the five aggregates and the six sensory areas.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2020 at 4:19 AM

Title: Re: Where is 'Mind'?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Can there be a concept without a mind?

Astus wrote:

Do thoughts need a thinker? On the one hand they do, as that is how it is conceived conventionally that actions need agents. On the other hand there is no thinker, there are merely instances of experiences of various types, and even talking of instances is quite fabricated.

Malcolm said:

Typically, mind (citta) is one thing, mental factors (caitta), another. They arise together, but they are not the same. The latter coordinate the experience of the six senses for the former.

Astus wrote:

And that can be a useful distinction to some extent. However, as there is no such thing as a stand alone mind, nor can there be unconscious experiences, it is for conventions sake to posit a mind with the sole function of awareness.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2020 at 6:21 AM

Title: Re: Where is 'Mind'?

Content:

Malcolm said:

a concept (thought) without a thinker is not imaginable, conventionally speaking.

Astus wrote:

It is actually imaginable in terms of phenomena being experiences in themselves, of empirical nature without the need to separate it to observed-observer, contained-container, and other such dichotomies. The basis of conventional reality can be reduced to a stream of experiences that naturally has the quality of being experienced without the need for something external to experience it.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2020 at 5:00 PM

Title: Re: Help with Nagarjuna's "Seventy Stanzas on Emptiness"

Content:

Astus wrote:

1. dngos dang dngos med cig car min

2. dngos med med na dngos po med
3. rtag to dngos po ang dngos med gyur
4. dngos med med par dngos mi srid

Tola-Dragonetti:

1. A thing existing and not existing at the same time is not (possible)
2. without the not existing thing, the existing thing is not (possible);
3. the existing thing and the not existing thing would be eternal;
4. without the existing thing, the not existing thing does not arise.

Lindtner:

1. Being and non-being are not simultaneous.
2. Without non-being, no being.
3. Being and non-being would always be.
4. There is no being independent of nonbeing.

Some relevant stanzas from MMK (tr Siderits):

5.6

When the existent is not real, with respect to what will there come to be nonexistence?
And existent and nonexistent are contradictory properties; who cognizes something, whether existent or nonexistent?

7.30-31

On the one hand it does not hold that an entity that exists is undergoing cessation, for one thing cannot be both existent and nonexistent.

On the other hand it does not hold that an entity that does not exist is undergoing cessation,
just as there is no cutting off of a second head.

15.5

If the existent is unestablished, then the nonexistent too is not established.
For people proclaim the nonexistent to be the alteration of the existent.

15.11

For whatever exists by its intrinsic nature does not become nonexistent; eternalism then follows.

“It does not exist now [but] it existed previously”—from this, annihilation follows.

21.14

For one who acknowledges the existent, there would follow either eternalism or annihilationism, for an existent would be either permanent or impermanent.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2020 at 5:43 PM

Title: Re: Where is ‘Mind’?

Content:

Malcolm said:

So experiences experience themselves, huh?

Astus wrote:

When an experience occurs, it is already as a conscious event. To say that the experience is a product of a contact between faculty, object, and consciousness, is an interpretation after the event. As there is no case where one experiences just one of the three constituents, their existence is an assumption based on ordinary/naive concepts of perception that is object oriented (operating with the idea of independent external entities) instead of experiential/phenomenological (taking appearances as they occur). So it is not the case that experiences experience themselves, as that already is an objectification and separation of what does not actually show those properties.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2020 at 7:02 PM

Title: Re: Help with Nagarjuna's "Seventy Stanzas on Emptiness"

Content:

Manjushri said:

existent objects and non-existent objects, in what he calls the "conventional world", totally depend on each other for their own definition as such, since an existent object can be called so, only by comparing it with another object devoid of an existential status.

Astus wrote:

We don't call a bottle a bottle because of knowing about a situation where there is no bottle, so it's not a matter of comparing existent and non-existent entities. Without non-existence there is no existence, because everything is born and dies, hence the third line about permanence. It is important to note that being is very much connected to becoming, just as non-being to ceasing. So with the refutation of existence and non-existence, there is also the refutation of birth and death, and the other way around.

Manjushri said:

Hence why he mentions "permanence", since without the non-existing status as counterpoint, a functional object would lack this potential status and be perpetual. At the same time, for a non-existent object to arise, there must exist this possibility, for otherwise there would be no arising nor enduring nor ceasing, as Buddha taught.

Astus wrote:

There is no such thing as an object that could have sometimes the attribute of existence and sometimes the attribute of non-existence, even though that is how normally we speak. This very concept of there being an object, a substance, an entity that appears and disappears is what is refuted as the misconception of self, or "inherent existence".

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2020 at 10:20 PM

Title: Re: Where is 'Mind'?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Conscious in what sense? Is it a conscious event inherently? Is it a conscious event in absence of contact? In absence of an object? In absence of a mind? How can one even speak of appearances at all in the absence of subject/object bifurcation?

Astus wrote:

What I say is simply the reverse of the usual presentation, taking the result of the contact - that is, the actual experience - as the source instead as the product. There, in the experience, or instance of consciousness, there is no dividing line between perceiver and perceived, between where mind ends and where mental factors begin, etc.

Malcolm said:

It is elementary to understand there are a subject, object, and contact, given, as you admit above, there can be no experience in absence of that triad.

Astus wrote:

Operating with that model can be convenient in general, but problematic when one attempts to take it as more than a simple tool, ending up with looking for an actual subject and/or object and how the two can make contact. But if it's all put within the framework of phenomenological experience, then the divisions are no longer problematic.

Malcolm said:

Further, in the case of a dream, it is clear there is an absence of this triad. Therefore, with respect to dreams you have to account for the experience of them based on some other theory of cognition.

Astus wrote:

Dreams still have the triad of mind faculty, mental object, and mental consciousness.

Malcolm said:

Also, given that direct perceptions are nonconceptual by nature, even your invocation of "experience" is merely an inference, and thus it is in no better place than the inference of subject/object bifurcation, which is standard in Buddhist models of cognition, and in many ways, inferior to it.

Astus wrote:

It sure is an inference and does not intend to be other than that. Establishing first a unit of experience before the division into elements simply seems more practical to me to avoid the difficulties presented by taking subject and object as separate entities.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2020 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: Help with Nagarjuna's "Seventy Stanzas on Emptiness"

Content:

Manjushri said:

isn't Nagarjuna is also expounding an idea, while using conventional language, as the Buddha has done too, in order to portray an idea that in fact is inadequately expressed through words given its intrinsic limitations?

Astus wrote:

There isn't any secret or hidden message behind all the words that Nagarjuna was somehow unable to express. The difficulty with reading in topics one is not yet familiar with is a common one in any area of study, hence the use of introductory works and asking teachers is the easy way in. It should also be noted that Nagarjuna often argues against the teachings of other Buddhists, as for instance in verse six against the famous doctrine of the Sarvastivadins that dharmas exist in the three times. But unless one is a Sarvastivadin already, it is unlikely that one has ever seriously thought of the possibility that dharmas also exist in the past and the future.

Manjushri said:

If so, would it be fair to consider this as an example of the "subtle means" mentioned in the Lotus Sutra to transmit a more truthful and comprehensive understanding of reality, by establishing a bridge (or a phantom city, for that matter) to reach enlightenment?

Astus wrote:

The goal is liberation through the realisation of appearances being empty of anything that can be grasped or identified with. That's why Nagarjuna means to prove that all concepts are unreal.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 8th, 2020 at 6:31 PM

Title: Re: Where is 'Mind'?

Content:

Malcolm said:

But, inferentially speaking, subject and object makes infinitely more sense: contact --> sensation --> etc. Cannot have contact without a pair.

Astus wrote:

It makes more sense as long as the world is conceived from an etic perspective, but if we move to the subjective side of how phenomena appear as the basis, then there is no need for the abstraction of unseen elements as producers of appearances. Even if the standard description is followed, the moment of awareness is after contact happened, so it could also be said that talking of experience as the basis is simply moving the focus, if one wants to maintain the established explanation. Also, taking the instance of consciousness as the basis of epistemological theory is the common approach already, furthermore, it can be said to be simply an argument for the topic of appearances are mind. To quote Thrangu Rinpoche again:

"Normally when we think about things we regard that which appears to us externally as composed of particles, and therefore as made up of matter, and we regard our cognition or our mind as a mere cognitive clarity or awareness and therefore as fundamentally different in nature from what we experience or what appears to us. But if we analyze carefully how we experience, we will see that what appears to us are actually fixated images created by our minds through taking many things together and designating them as units with certain designated characteristics. If you analyze the objective bases in physical reality for these designated images — and it is the designated images which we experience, not the objective bases — then you determine that the objective bases themselves, while apparently composed of particles, are actually composed of particles that when analyzed [in greater and greater detail] to the end, eventually disappear under analysis, and end up being composed of nothing. Nevertheless, appearances do appear to us. This of course is about reasoning and not about meditation; this is not an exercise for meditation."
(Pointing Out the Dharmakaya, p 114)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 8th, 2020 at 6:52 PM

Title: Re: Where is 'Mind'?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

This is what is called 'panpsychism'.

Astus wrote:

Not so. What I mean by no need for a mind as phenomena themselves can be understood as experiences is not about attributing independent objects with a mind of their own, nor saying that there are entities saturated by a single mind.

Wayfarer said:

'the eye can't see itself, hand can't grasp itself' etc.

Astus wrote:

One classic source of argument against self-perception:

'The Guardian of the World himself has said

That mind cannot be seen by mind.

In just the same way, he has said,

The sword's edge cannot cut the sword.'

(Bodhicaryavatara 9.17-18, tr Padmakara)

Mipham's commentary (tr Padmakara):

'But if the mind itself is the perceived illusory object, what object is seen by what subject? Since the two are identical, there can be no seeing. How so? As Lord Buddha, the guardian of the three worlds, has said, the mind cannot see the mind. A sword's edge cannot cut itself; a fingertip cannot touch itself; an acrobat cannot climb onto his own shoulders. In just the same way, the mind cannot see the mind. It is also written in the Ratnacūḍaparipṛcchā-sūtra: "So it is. The sword's edge cannot cut the sword's edge and the fingertip cannot touch the fingertip. Likewise, the mind cannot see itself." The crucial point of this passage is that, as long as the mind is established as truly existent, it is partless and one; and this undermines the notion that it can be established as twofold: a seen object and a seeing subject. Accordingly, if it appears as an object, it cannot be a subject. And if it does not appear as an object, it cannot be apprehended. Therefore to claim, in ultimate terms, that the mind is selfknowing is mere verbiage; it has no truth value.'

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2020 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Where is 'Mind'?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The point being, without contact there is no sensation. There is no way one can get around this.

Astus wrote:

Contact requires the preceding existence of entities, but neither the preceding entities, nor the contact itself is ever experienced. The assumption of both the preceding entities and their contact is based on how interaction between physical objects is commonly imagined, hence calling it the etic or observational perspective. But if we begin from the subjective point of view as experience occurs, then both preceding entities and their contact is derived or abstracted from experience, and not that experience is produced by contact.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2020 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: Where is 'Mind'?

Content:

Virgo said:

did you learn this from a Buddhist teacher? If so, which one?

Astus wrote:

Not specifically.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2020 at 6:00 PM

Title: Re: Where is 'Mind'?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Relatively speaking, your assertion is fallacious because it proposes that events arise from themselves. For example, if you take a stick and jab it into your eye, no inference or abstraction at all is required to understand that the stick making contact with your eye caused your experience of pain.

Astus wrote:

Seeing the relationship between events is inference, so to learn the connection between them requires abstraction, and it is not visible directly in the events themselves. The causes and conditions for events are known by inference, not by experience, that's why taking experience as the basis is preferable. Furthermore, the veracity of inference is validated by experience, plus inference itself is a form of experience. So, unless there is a way to know things before they are known (apart from extrapolation), there are only experienced events and whatever sense we try to make of them.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2020 at 6:30 PM

Title: Re: Where is 'Mind'?

Content:

Astus wrote:

'The main point for us is to learn from all this, and the best presentation that is given is by Milarepa. Milarepa defines the cognition of a Buddha in a very simple way. He says that the pure jnana, the cognition of a Buddha is not something very far off or foreign, but it is the mind in its immediacy. It is the mind before it has been altered in any way, before it has been manipulated or changed. As said previously, when the mind is in its own nature it is not agitated by thoughts, our own fabricated thoughts do not modify the mind. Once the mind is agitated and modified, it loses control over itself and becomes over-powered and determined by negative factors. Normally and presently, we do not see the true form and state of our mind and that is why we cannot let it be as it is; we cannot allow it to be in control of itself and to be its own master. However, there is no need to improve the mind or to make it better and there is no need to remove anything from it; we just need to let it be what it is, this original form of mind, cognition or awareness. In fact, there is little need to say anything about it because whatever description we give is irrelevant because mind is nothing that can be labeled. Whatever we say will be a misassumption of the mind, it will be going into extremes either in terms of existence or in terms of non-existence. Really, the true state of the mind is beyond the sphere of thoughts and the intellect. But we use language to communicate and designate it, calling it "mind" or "jnana." In fact, this mind can only be understood through directly seeing its own nature, what it is in itself.'

(Je Gampopa's The Jewel Ornament of Liberation: The Wish-fulfilling Gem of the Noble Teachings - Commentary by The Venerable Khabje Khenchen Thrangu Rinpoche, p 312-313)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2020 at 4:22 PM

Title: Re: Where is 'Mind'?

Content:

Malcolm said:

according your reasoning, experiences are also merely inferred, since they are not directly perceived.

Astus wrote:

Experience is what appears presently, while interpreting, categorising, processing, and other cognitive workings have as their object various levels of abstractions (starting with direct connection), but even those fabrications are experiences themselves.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2020 at 4:47 PM

Title: Re: Madhyamaka view distillation

Content:

Rick said:

All phenomena are empty.

Astus wrote:

The first difficulty comes from understanding "all", what that all actually signifies. Then one can attempt to define what is a phenomenon. Or the other way around, first clarify what a phenomenon is, then what all of them are. Next there should be a definition of being empty, and finally what is the relationship between a phenomenon and it being empty.

Basing oneself on those four words there are so many ways to go astray.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2020 at 6:18 PM

Title: Re: Huayen practice

Content:

dolphin_color said:

Are there examples of specific meditation or recitation instructions in the tradition?

Astus wrote:

Entry Into the Inconceivable: An Introduction to Hua-yen Buddhism by Thomas Cleary contains a couple of meditation manuals.

The Buddhist Teaching of Totality: The Philosophy of Hwa Yen Buddhism by Garma C C Chang also has a translation of Dushun's manual.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2020 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Where is 'Mind'?

Content:

Malcolm said:

You seem to be using "experience" in place of "direct perception".

Astus wrote:

The point of using the word

<https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=518930#p518930> was to signify the fundamental frame where everything appears without separation to subject and object, thus putting away the concept of a knower mind and known entity and replacing them with a single unit that already has awareness and appearance inseparably. If the term direct perception sounds to me too specific, but that's a terminological matter.

Malcolm said:

For example, a taste of sweet is not an experience of sweet until it is categorized as such. Example, if you first place a bit of an herb called gymnema on your tongue, it blocks the sense receptors for tasting sweet, so even you place sugar on the tongue, you will not experience a sweet taste.

Astus wrote:

Before one recognises a taste as sweet, what do you call that? Not being able to categorise a taste (e.g. a new spice) and not tasting anything at all seem two different cases.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2020 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: Where is 'Mind'?

Content:

Malcolm said:

What is the difference between this and yogacāra?

Astus wrote:

Not much really, I just didn't want to complicate things with that, instead keeping it to the "appearances are mind" theme from Mahamudra.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 11th, 2020 at 3:06 AM

Title: Re: Where is 'Mind'?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Of course appearances are mind, but not apparent objects.

Astus wrote:

If by apparent objects you mean when one conceives things in terms of perceiver and perceived, then there is no disagreement.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 11th, 2020 at 5:11 AM

Title: Re: Where is 'Mind'?

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, apparent objects do not exist merely because we conceive them; for example, your car does not disappear when you walk into your house. It is still there in the morning when you want to drive to work.

Astus wrote:

What matters is the subjective experience, as that is where all the defilements and sufferings occur.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 11th, 2020 at 5:16 AM

Title: Re: Where is 'Mind'?

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, that is false, since external phenomena are also afflicted or conducive to generating affliction, and they also are suffering, for example, the third kind of suffering, the suffering of the compounded, which has nothing to do with sensation or experience.

Astus wrote:

How can a car that nobody even thinks of, much less sees or touches, be afflicted or generating affliction?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 11th, 2020 at 5:31 AM

Title: Re: On being fearful of Shikantaza

Content:

Zafutales said:

Hongzhi and Dogen =just sit no analysis required, anything other than this is chasing your own shadow

Tsongkhapa and Nargajuna =a stone can just sit and not think....we must use our conceptual minds to great use

Astus wrote:

Just sitting is a matter of not grasping at thoughts, and that itself is based on the understanding that clinging to concepts is the basis of samsara.

Analysis is used to assist one letting go of thoughts and thus free one from clinging to concepts.

They are not so different, merely various approaches to match the needs of various beings.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 11th, 2020 at 9:15 PM

Title: Re: Where is 'Mind'?

Content:

heart said:

There are no proof that Mahayana is an "historical development" any longer since the discovery of the Gandhara texts. Prajnaparamita and Mahaparanirvana sutras are among the oldest Buddhist text we have.

Astus wrote:

'The fact that Mahāyāna texts taught the emptiness of dharmas may not therefore signify that this is a typically or exclusively Mahāyāna position, but it does emphasise the dependence of much of Mahāyāna literature on developments that had begun in a small corner of north-western India.'

...

'The special point to be emphasised is that the 'Perfection of Wisdom', which is the subject matter of the Aṣṭasāhasrikā Prajñāpāramitā in its surviving Sanskrit version, only makes sense against the background of the overhaul of Buddhist scholasticism that had taken place in Greater Gandhāra during the last centuries preceding the Common Era. It was in Greater Gandhāra, during this period, that Buddhist scholasticism developed an ontology centred on the lists of dharmas that had been preserved.'

(https://serval.unil.ch/resource/serval:BIB_ADB8A4E3744C.P001/REF.pdf by J. Bronkhorst)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 11th, 2020 at 11:27 PM

Title: Re: Where is 'Mind'?

Content:

Gampopa said:

Geshe believes that the nature of the body of the actual perfect, complete Buddha is Dharmakaya. Dharmakaya is the exhaustion of all mistakes, or just a return to the inherent nature. But these are just labels. In reality, Dharmakaya is unborn, free from elaboration. The Ornament of Mahayana Sutra says:

Liberation is just the exhaustion of confusion.

(Jewel Ornament of Liberation, p 285)

Traleq Kyabgon said:

Dharmakaya as a state is not an entity; it is not a thing. It is unconditional, and it is permanent. This is why it is said that dharmakaya is not a product of causes and conditions. Nevertheless, when the dharmakaya is described as permanent, this does not mean that there is an entity that endures forever. The dharmakaya is not an entity; it is nothing and cannot be said to be permanent in this way. It is permanent in the same sense as the sky can be said to be permanent. The sky is permanent because it is unconditional; it has never arisen and therefore cannot cease to exist.

(The Essence of Buddhism, p 125-126)

Nagarjuna said:

But one who has taken up a mass of beliefs, such as that the Tathāgata exists, so conceptualizing, that person will also imagine that [the Tathāgata] does not exist when extinguished.

And the thought does not hold, with reference to this (Tathāgata) who is intrinsically empty, that the Buddha either exists or does not exist after cessation.

Those who hypostatize the Buddha, who is beyond hypostatization and unwavering, they all, deceived by hypostatization, fail to see the Tathāgata.

(Mulamadhyamakakarika 22.13-15, tr Siderits)

Mahāsi Sayādaw said:

In nibbāna there are no such things as mind or mental concomitants, which can be met with in the sense-sphere or form-sphere. It naturally follows that mind and matter that belong to the thirty-one planes of existence are totally absent in nibbāna. However, some would like to propose that after the parinibbāna of the Buddha and the Arahants, they acquire a special kind of mind and matter in nibbāna. Such an extraordinary way of thinking may appeal to those who cannot do away with self or ego.

With regard to this proposition a learned Sayādaw reasoned that if there is a special kind of mind and matter in nibbāna, there must also be a special kind of rebirth which gives rise to a special kind of old age, disease, and death, which in turn bring about a special kind of sorrow, lamentation, suffering, distress, and despair. When the teachings explicitly say cessation, it will be improper to go beyond it and formulate an idea of a special kind of existence. Extinction points to nothing other than Nothingness. Nibbāna, which is not involved in mind and matter, cannot be made to get involved either in this world or in other worlds.

(<http://www.aimwell.org/On%20the%20Nature%20of%20Nibbana.pdf>)

Ajahn Payutto said:

An inevitable question that arises in the discussion of Nibbāna is: ‘What happens to an arahant after death?’ or: ‘Does a person who has realized Nibbāna exist after death or not?’ In truth, this question is centred around self-view: the devotion to self is acting as a catalyst in posing the question. This attachment to self or to the label of self (attavādupādāna) is firmly embedded in the hearts of unenlightened people, supported by the thirst for being (bhava-taṇhā) and based on ignorance (avijjā). The Buddha did not encourage debating this question if one has not eliminated ignorance and craving. He encouraged knowledge through application rather than conjecture.

No matter how one responds to these inquiries, the latent root attachment to self inevitably leads to a biased understanding. The questioner will incline towards a wrong view of Nibbāna as either an enduring self or an eradication of self. It is easy for annihilationists to view Nibbāna as extinction, because Buddhism emphasizes disentangling from the widespread belief in eternalism. As for eternalists, when their idea of self is invalidated, they search for a substitute to compensate for the sense of void or to restore the idea of a stable self. When they encounter a teaching that advocates uprooting the fixed belief in self, it can seem to them that the self vanishes. They may then seize Nibbāna as a haven for the self or equate Nibbāna as eternal life or the Promised Land. Many esteemed and wise individuals who are free from almost all forms of attachment get caught in these views. The escape from this net leads to complete liberation. The Buddhist teachings admit that such freedom is extremely difficult to achieve and refer to this subtle attachment to views as 'the Brahma-ensnaring web' (brahma-jāla): an entanglement for the virtuous and wise.

Nibbāna and the practice for Nibbāna have nothing to do with destroying the self because there is no self to destroy. It is the attachment to the concepts of self that must be destroyed. One must remove the attachment to self-assertions, self-views and self-perceptions. Nibbāna is the end of these misunderstandings and the end of the suffering caused by attachment. When the yearning for self ceases, all theories of self automatically lose their significance. When the attachment to self is uprooted, things will be seen as they truly are; there is no need for further speculation about self. When the desire which gives rise to self ceases, the matter of self vanishes of its own accord. Nibbāna is the cessation of suffering, not the cessation of self, since there is no self that will cease. Reflect on the Buddha's words: 'I teach only suffering and the end of suffering.' In order to shift the emphasis from the preoccupation with Nibbāna and philosophical debate, the Buddha usually referred to Nibbāna in the context of practical application or the related benefits for everyday life, as demonstrated in passages of the Tipiṭaka.

(<https://www.buddhistteachings.org/nibbana-points-of-controversy>)

Bhikkhu K. Ñāṇananda said:

Because Nibbāna is said to be something realizable, some are of the opinion that nothing should be predicated about it. What is the reason for this special emphasis on its realizability? It is to bring into sharp relief the point of divergence, since the Buddha taught a way of realizing here and now something that in other religions was considered impossible.

What was it that they regarded impossible to be realized? The cessation of existence, or bhavanirodha. How can one be certain here and now that this existence has ceased? This might sometimes appear as a big puzzle. But all the same, the arahant experiences the cessation of existence as a realization. That is why he even gives expression to it as: Bhavanirodho Nibbānaṃ, (AN 10.7) "cessation of existence is Nibbāna".

It comes about by this extinction of influxes. The very existence of 'existence' is especially due to the flowing in of influxes of existence. What is called 'existence' is not the apparent process of existing visible to others. It is something that pertains to one's own mental continuum.

(https://seeingthroughthenet.net/wp-content/uploads/2018/03/Mind-Stilled_HTML.htm#Mindstilled05)

Nibbāna has been defined as the cessation of existence. (e.g. SN 12.68) The Buddha says that when he is preaching about the cessation of existence, some people, particularly the brahmins who cling to a soul theory, bring up the charge of nihilism against him. (MN 22) Not only those brahmins and heretics believing in a soul theory, but even some Buddhist scholars are scared of the term bhavanirodha, fearing that it leads to a nihilistic interpretation of Nibbāna. That is why they try to mystify Nibbāna in various ways. What is the secret behind this attitude? It is simply the lack of a clear understanding of the unique philosophy made known by the Buddha.

(<https://seeingthroughthenet.net/wp-content/uploads/2018/03/Mind-> Stilled_HTML.htm#Mindstilled08)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 12th, 2020 at 5:58 AM

Title: Re: Where is 'Mind'?

Content:

smcj said:

The Mahayana references the Shravakayana as foundational.

Astus wrote:

Because shravakas learn from buddhas, the mahayana is actually called foundational, as that's how buddhas arise.

smcj said:

The Shravakayana references the Mahayana as heretical.

Astus wrote:

Does it? There probably are some, but not counting some modern Theravadins, where are those references?

smcj said:

This is NOT a chicken and egg question.

Astus wrote:

Of course, <https://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=519618#p519618>, those early Gandhara texts themselves show how the Prajnaparamita sutras required a unique development in (likely) Sarvastivadin abhidharma in order to formulate their own doctrine of emptiness.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2020 at 4:54 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land mysticism

Content:

Hammerheart said:

Perhaps my Zen background also plays some role in all of that, but I am most certain that what I am looking for is some sort of mystical union with Infinite Light and I don't really feel that there is much emphasis on that aspect in Jodo Shu and Shinshu.

Astus wrote:

You might consider schools beyond Jodoshu and Shinshu. It is the exclusive other-power aspect of those schools that makes them stand out, while practically everyone else has practices of the path of sages where realisation in this life is aimed at.

Some materials you might want to check out:

http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/pureland.pdf
<https://archive.org/details/PureLandPureMind/page/n3/mode/2up>
<http://ftp.budaedu.org/ebooks/pdf/EN101.pdf>
http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/monkeym.pdf
<http://ftp.budaedu.org/ebooks/pdf/EN084.pdf>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 17th, 2020 at 4:21 PM

Title: Re: newcomer question

Content:

laymedowntosleep17 said:

Does that sound like Zen practice might be a good fit for me?

Astus wrote:

Zen is not a single method or doctrine, although all that can be called Zen operates within the framework of Mahayana Buddhism.

You might like the teachings of Daehaeng who emphasised entrusting everything to one's foundation she called Juigong.

Here's a short talk: <https://tricycle.org/magazine/thinking-big/>.

More: <http://www.hanmaum.org/eng/>

And especially: <https://wakeupandlaugh.com/>

"The essence of practicing kwan is to entrust everything to Juigong with the firm belief that only Juigong can solve one's problems, including those that one faces in everyday life, and can awaken one from the delusions that originate within. Also, practicing kwan means taming one's mind, which is being dragged outwardly, by directing it inwardly. Directing one's mind inwardly means being one with Juigong and, at the same time, killing one's sense of ego. The most important matter is that one's mind should not be dragged outwardly. No matter what kind of problem one faces, only when one brings the problem into one's mind and looks at it through the foundation of Mind, can one perceive the problem clearly without any bias. To drag one's mind outwardly separates one from others; to direct one's mind inwardly is the way to become one with everything. Even while worshipping Buddha, one has to venerate Buddha within one's mind, and one has to bow to that place where Buddha and I are not separate."
(from <https://www.scribd.com/document/142055126/Teachings-of-Daehaeng-Sunim>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2020 at 6:31 PM

Title: Re: The Platform Sutra on Pure Land practices.

Content:

mairuwen said:

1. The relation between Pure Land and Chan.

Astus wrote:

Very harmonious, to the extent that it seems pointless to call them separate schools. It depends very much on the individual, how much one works on results in this life, but in the end everyone aims to be born in Sukhavati. One exception here might be those following the teachings of Yinshun and Shengyan, as they emphasise the traditional bodhisattva path and say that the Pure Land puts a delay on one's path. But there seems to be no teacher for the last couple of centuries who actually believed buddhahood in this life was a possibility, hence the only sensible choice is Amitabha.

mairuwen said:

2. The extent to which supernatural elements can be seen as a kind of skillful means.

Astus wrote:

Or it is a skillful means to talk of buddhas and bodhisattvas as representations of ideas. What to watch out for is conceit about one's view and thinking that those who think differently are not so smart.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 22nd, 2020 at 2:10 AM

Title: Re: Progress of Insight in Zen Traditions

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huineng distinguished only between enlightened and unenlightened:

'With a preceding moment of deluded thought, one was an ordinary person, but with a succeeding moment of enlightened thought, one is a buddha. To be attached to one's sensory realms in a preceding moment of thought is affliction, but to transcend the realms in a succeeding moment of thought is bodhi.'

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 30)

Baizhang Huaihai spoke of three stages:

'If one no longer loves or grasps, and yet abides in not loving or grasping and considers it correct, this is the elementary good; this is abiding in the subdued mind. This is a disciple; he is one who is fond of the raft and will not give it up. This is the way of the two vehicles. This is a result of meditation.

Once you do not grasp any more, and yet do not dwell in nonattachment either, this is the intermediate good. This is the half-word teaching. This is still the formless realm; though you avoid falling into the way of the two vehicles, and avoid falling into the ways of demons, this is still a meditation sickness. This is the bondage of bodhisattvas.

Once you no longer dwell in nonattachment, and do not even make an understanding of not dwelling either, this is the final good; this is the full-word teaching. You avoid falling into the formless realm, avoid falling into meditation sickness, avoid falling into the way of bodhisattvas, and avoid falling into the state of the king of demons.'

(Sayings and Doings of Pai-Chang, p 30-31)

Dogen did not differentiate stages:

'The view that practice and realization are not one is skewed outside of the Way. In the Buddha Dharma practice and realization are one and the same. This is the practise of realization, and so from the beginning practice is the whole body of original Awakening.'
(<https://wwwzc.org/sites/default/files/Bendowa-book.pdf>, p 13)

Shengyan taught about three stages:

Stage 1:

To balance the development of body and mind in order to attain mental and physical health. Various methods of physical exercise for walking, standing, sitting, and reclining are used.

Stage 2:

From the sense of the small "I" to the large "I." When you practice the method of cultivation taught by your teacher, for example, huatou or silent illumination, you will enlarge the sphere of the outlook of the small "I" until it coincides with time and space. The small "I" merges into the entire universe, forming a unity.

Stage 3:

From the large "I" to no "I." Chan is inconceivable. It is neither a concept nor a feeling. Because Chan is a world where there is no self, if there is still any attachment at all in your mind, there is no way you can harmonize with Chan.
(https://www.dharmadrum.org/content/chan_garden/chan_garden3.aspx?sn=48; see more <https://www.westernchanfellowship.org/dharma/dharma-library/dharma-article/1977/what-is-chan/>)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 23rd, 2020 at 5:30 AM

Title: Re: Progress of Insight in Zen Traditions

Content:

Könchok Thrinley said:

However, aren't in zen koans used to "check" progress during talks with the teacher?

Astus wrote:

The Japanese Rinzai school has various levels in koan training, yes.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 24th, 2020 at 1:20 AM

Title: Re: Progress of Insight in Zen Traditions

Content:

SteRo said:

there arises the necessity that those teacher say something to students

Astus wrote:

'The roots of delusion are deep. They're difficult to cut off and uproot. So [the Buddha] established expedient means to grab your attention. These are like showing yellow leaves to a crying child, who imagines they're gold and thus stops crying. You act as though you're in a shop where someone sells a hundred goods made from gold and jade, but you're trying to weigh each item. So you say that Shitou has a real gold shop? Well in my shop there's a wide range of goods! If someone comes looking for mouse turds then I give him some. If someone comes looking for real gold then I give it to him.'
(Yangshan Huiji, in Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 187)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 25th, 2020 at 4:19 PM

Title: Re: Which Nalanda pandit?

Content:

dolphin_color said:

I'm looking for a starting point that is relatively accessible.

Astus wrote:

Nāgārjuna's Suhṛllekha (Letter to/from a Friend) is a good start, and translations are available from both Chinese and Tibetan. Next you may look into his longer work Ratnāvalī (Precious Garland / Strand of Dharma Jewels). Aryadeva's 400 verses, Chandrakirti's commentary on it (Four Illusions), and Shantideva's Bodhicaryavatara are also quite readable and nice introductory materials.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 26th, 2020 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: Which Nalanda pandit?

Content:

Manjushri said:

If I may ask, is this work comprised of advice and counseling to a King? Or is it an altogether different work?

Astus wrote:

Yes, it is addressed to https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Gautamiputra_Satakarni.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 27th, 2020 at 11:56 PM

Title: Re: Nalanda

Content:

Astus wrote:

Xuanzang's records, translated by Li Rongxi in 1996, are available at BDK:
<https://www.bdkamerica.org/book/great-tang-dynasty-record-western-regions>

Yijing (635–713) visited Nalanda, and his records are also available:
<https://www.bdkamerica.org/book/buddhist-monastic-traditions-southern-asia>.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 1st, 2020 at 5:07 AM

Title: Re: Turning the Light Around?

Content:

Injrabodi said:

concentrating the mind leads to liberation are Theravada Buddhism

Astus wrote:

Not so. Vipassana is necessary for liberation.

Injrabodi said:

So how exactly does one turn the light around?

Astus wrote:

It (回光返照) is simply an expression for self-reflection, or introspection. It means not chasing a sensory object but reflecting on what is happening in one's mind, with the main focus on the universal characteristics of e.g. impermanence, and emptiness. As for any detailed method, look at the various techniques of insight meditation.

Injrabodi said:

Is the key here to sit in nonmeditation, keeping the mind free of all external entangling objects, until a moment of satori strikes?

Astus wrote:

Insight is not a miracle that happens out of nowhere but something one has to work on. To sit mindlessly results in simply a mindless state, not liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 2nd, 2020 at 6:08 AM

Title: Re: Turning the Light Around?

Content:

Injrabodi said:

Samatha and Vipassana are two wings of the meditative bird and both are required in order to obtain high states of absorption, correct?

Astus wrote:

The various levels of absorption (jhana) are attained through samatha. Vipassana is the insight that no matter what is attained, it's always unstable and temporary.

Injrabodi said:

How could the presence or absence of thoughts ever obscure the essential nature?

Astus wrote:

There is no essential nature to be obscured or remain unobscured.

Injabodi said:

I wasn't talking about sitting mindlessly, I was talking about sitting filled with awareness yet not focusing it on any one point. Like the shikantaza of Zen.

Astus wrote:

Of one is aware of things, there is attention focused on things, even if for only a short while. Shikantaza is not about maintaining any specific state, but about freedom from identification with any state.

Injabodi said:

one still does have to climb the ladder through the other realms by means of vipassana and shamatha to discover it if I recall correctly.

Astus wrote:

The levels of absorption and the realms of samsara are not ladders. Some level of tranquillity (samatha) is required, but otherwise it is through insight (vipassana) that one eventually relinquishes clinging through realising that there is no reliable thing anywhere.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 2nd, 2020 at 5:18 PM

Title: Re: Buddha teaches Shentong view in a Sravakayana sutra

Content:

Aemilius said:

....highest surpassing purity of emptiness and make it a habitat,

smcj said:

The idea that emptiness is not just how phenomena abide, but that there's something beyond appearances is suggestive of Shentong.

Astus wrote:

That is a nice mistranslation of 'parisuddham paramānuttaram suññatam upasampajja viharanti'.

Nanamoli & Bodhi:

'enter upon and abide in pure, supreme, unsurpassed voidness'

Sujato:

'enter and remain in the pure, ultimate, supreme emptiness'

Emptiness is practically a synonym for no-self, so that abiding in emptiness means not conceiving anything as 'I am that' or 'that is mine'.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 2nd, 2020 at 6:11 PM

Title: Re: Abhidharma

Content:

dolphin_color said:

Is Abhidharma in conflict with Madhyamaka? Does it assume that phenomena exist inherently?

Astus wrote:

Abhidharma is not a single doctrine. What needs to be looked at is whether what you call "Abhidharma" upholds the same definition of inherent existence that is refuted by Nagarjuna.

For the Sarvastivadin version, see Sarvāstivāda Abhidharma by Venerable Professor K.L. Dhammajoti, chapter 3.5.

For the Theravadin version, see https://www.bps.lk/olib/wh/wh412_Karunadasa_Dhamma-Theory--Philosophical-Cornerstone-of-Abhidhamma.pdf by Y. Karunadasa

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 2nd, 2020 at 6:12 PM

Title: Re: Buddha teaches Shentong view in a Sravakayana sutra

Content:

LastLegend said:

How do you reconcile addressing yourself 'I' to other people?

Astus wrote:

Please elaborate. What is there to reconcile?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 2nd, 2020 at 6:22 PM

Title: Re: Buddha teaches Shentong view in a Sravakayana sutra

Content:

LastLegend said:

Like how do you call 'I' to others without attachment?

Astus wrote:

It's merely a word. When one believes that the word signifies a real entity, that is the mistaken belief in a self.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 2nd, 2020 at 11:57 PM

Title: Re: Abhidharma

Content:

dolphin_color said:

Is it doctrine-less, or a bundle of doctrines?

Astus wrote:

There are several texts within the Abhidharma-pitaka, and there are more than one such collections.

dolphin_color said:

Can this be answered with respect to the Abhidharmakośakārikā, and commentaries on it?

Astus wrote:

That depends on how one interprets the Kosha about svabhava (I.18) and paramartha (VI.4), and of course what one understands by Nagarjuna's refutation of svabhava and that only emptiness is paramartha. For instance, apart from the three unconditioned ones, all dharmas are understood to be impermanent, therefore they cannot be qualified by saying that svabhava is necessarily permanent.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 8th, 2020 at 5:09 PM

Title: Re: On the role of "Buddhist philosophy" in Buddhism. Packaging and product.

Content:

Viach said:

Buddhism is a purely practical teaching.

Astus wrote:

That itself is already a philosophical stance, a basis you attempt to argue for, again, a very philosophical approach. You might want a short review of https://www.philosophybasics.com/general_what_is.html

Viach said:

Philosophy cannot be practical (as an instrument for achieving enlightenment), only yoga (a set of specific practices) can be practical.

Astus wrote:

Practice has to be based on right view, and practice itself brings one to confirming in experience the validity of right view, hence one begins from wisdom to end at wisdom.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 12th, 2020 at 5:50 PM

Title: Re: How many hours of meditation do Monks do per day?

Content:

2ndchance said:

How many hours of meditation do Monks do per day?

Which hours during the day and night do they usually meditate?

Astus wrote:

Daily pattern of monastic activities:

(A Treatise on Letting Zen Flourish, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 170)

The Time of Lighting at twilight, when monks gather at the Buddha hall to offer incense and worship;

The Time of Being in Calmness [9:00–11:00 P.M.], for dhyana practice;

The Third Watch [11:00 P.M.–1:00 A.M.], for sleep;

The Fourth Watch [1:00–3:00 A.M.], for sleep;

The Fifth Watch [3:00–5:00 A.M.], for dhyana practice;

The Time of the Hare [5:00–7:00 A.M.], same as twilight;

Daybreak, for taking gruel;

The Time of the Dragon [7:00–9:00 A.M.], for reading scriptures, studying, and listening to lectures by elder monks;

The Time of Yu (Gu) [9:00–11:00 A.M.], for dhyana practice;

The Time of the Horse [12:00 P.M.], for taking a meal;

The Time of the Sheep [1:00–3:00 P.M.], for bathing and [attending to other personal matters];

The Time of the Monkey [3:00–5:00 P.M.], for dhyana practice;

The Time of the Rooster [5:00–7:00 P.M.], for relaxation, released from work.

Thiền Viện Diệu Nhân daily schedule

(<https://dieunhan.weebly.com/english.html>)

3:45 AM Wake Up

4:00-6:00 Sitting Meditation

6:30 Exercise

7:15 Breakfast

8:30-10:30 Chores

11:30 Lunch

1:00 PM Afternoon Rest

2:00 Wake Up

2:30-3:40 Dharma Study

4:30 Refreshment

5:45 Chanting

6:30-8:00 Sitting Meditation

9:30 Lights Out

Here is what a typical day in Plum Village might look like

(<https://plumvillage.org/retreats/visiting-us/sample-schedule/>)

5:00am: Wake Up Bell

6:00am: Sitting Meditation

(followed by Sutra Reading / Touching the Earth / Slow Walking Meditation)

7:30am: Breakfast

9am: Dharma Talk / Class / Presentation / Working Meditation

11:30am: Walking meditation (outdoors)
12:30pm: Lunch
1:30pm: Rest / Optional Guided Relaxation
3pm: Service Meditation
6pm: Light dinner
8pm: Dharma Discussion, Personal study time, Sitting Meditation or other collective practice
9.30pm: Noble Silence begins
10pm: Lights out

Regular Working Days in Antaiji
(<https://antaiji.org/en/schedule/>)

4am to 6:10am Zazen
6:10am Breakfast
6:40am Cleaning
After cleaning Help in the kitchen
7:30am to noon Samu (work)
12:00 noon Lunch
after lunch Samu (work), shower, help in the kitchen
5:00pm Dinner
5:20pm Dish washing
5:30pm Tea meeting
6pm to 8pm Zazen
After 8pm Free time (be quiet after 9pm)

Zen River Temple - Regular Daily Schedule
(<https://www.zenrivertemple.org/programme/>)

Saturday–Wednesday:

04:55 Wake up
05:30 Zazen
07:30 Morning Service
08:00 Breakfast (oryoki)
09:30 Samu
12:50 Noon service
13:00 Lunch
14:00 Rest
16:30-17:30 Sat, Sutra Reading Class; Sun, Zazen; Mon, Study period; Tue, Right Speech Class; Wed: Zazen
18:00 Supper
19:30 Zazen
21:15 Four Vows
21:45 Lights out

Sunday: 11:30 Study class / 19:00 Public Service

Monday: 19:30 River of Zen continuation class
Tuesday: 16:30 Right Speech class / 19:30 Introductory class
Wednesday: 19:30 Zazen; Teisho

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2020 at 2:36 PM

Title: Re: Alan Watts

Content:

JoaoRodrigues said:

I'd like, if you'd like to spend that time, to have more examples. I didn't come here for an Alan's public judgment, even so, I accept it, I came here for an insight on what he believes / wrote about compared with the traditional or new views of zen-buddhism.

Astus wrote:

I agree, character judgement is not the way to go.

'The most important thing in recognizing masters is to be able to judge whether they have a correct view of Buddhadharma. If their views of the Dharma are correct, then even if their behavior reveals some weaknesses, they should not be considered false masters. On the other hand, if teachers do not have a correct view of the Dharma, they cannot be considered authentic or virtuous masters.

Of course, this presupposes that the person making the judgment has some understanding of correct Dharma. Without an understanding of the Dharma, there is no way a practitioner can tell if a teacher is genuine or false.'

(Ven. Sheng-yen, in Zen Wisdom, ch 1. q 3)

You should probably try to cite or present Watts' own views on specific topics, and then have a discussion on that.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2020 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: Mind and its objects

Content:

Grigoris said:

"A person born in the realm of desire can with the mental organ of that realm also know undefiled things (anasravadbarmas) and those pertaining to each of the three realms (trairatnika)."

Asanga, Abhidarmasamuccaya, p26

Is this saying that this very defiled mind can know liberation?

Astus wrote:

It is saying that one can gain the divine eye and attain all the levels of absorption while at the same time being a human. The undefiled things are those that belong to the path of liberation, and they are also accessible as humans.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 1st, 2020 at 2:38 PM

Title: Re: Mind and it's objects

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I'm always baffled by the use of 'things' or 'objects' in this context. I wouldn't have thought that 'purity' or 'pure awareness' was 'an object' except for in the metaphorical sense. I mean, I can understand an object as an object - tools, utensils, foodstuffs, furniture, even mountains and planets. But I can't understand 'the objects of higher knowledge' as objects. Perhaps someone can help me understand if I have misunderstood something.

Astus wrote:

Mind (knower) always must have an object (known), and there is no knower without a known, nor known without a knower, as they mutually depend on each other.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 1st, 2020 at 2:49 PM

Title: Re: Mind and it's objects

Content:

SteRo said:

The 'undefiled' is also called 'pure'. What is purity?

The_Large_Sutra_On_Perfect_Wisdom said:

The Lord: And the Unproduced, the Unmanifested, the Uneffected—that is purity.

Astus wrote:

That would be what Yogacara calls the pure element (anasravadhātu). The distinction between defiled (sāsva) and undefiled (anāsava) dharmas is a bit different.

4. The dharmas are impure, "in a relationship with the defilements," or pure, "with no relationship to the defilements." Conditioned dharmas, with the exception of the Path, are impure. They are impure because the defilements adhere to them.

5a-b. The undefiled truth of the Path and the three unconditioned things are pure.
(AKB I.4-5a-b, tr Pruden, vol 1, p 58-59)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 1st, 2020 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: Mind and it's objects

Content:

SteRo said:

In Prajnaparamita 'pure' is applied for the aggregates, sense fields, constituents, dependently originated phenomena, emptinesses, paths of seeing, paths of meditation, paths of no-more-learning.

Astus wrote:

When you say "In Prajnaparamita", what exactly do you mean, what sutra or shastra? Also, if all of those are pure, that would mean all dharmas are pure, and there is nothing to call impure, so that way the whole distinction loses its meaning.

SteRo said:

Why are these objects called 'pure'? Because these are antidotes which upon application can remove ignorance, at least partially, and thus entail 'purification' of the subject, i.e. the subject being purified of defilements which then entails seeing the purity of the objects.

Astus wrote:

There is no subject, or anything, to be named apart from all the dharmas (skandhas, ayatanas, dhatus, asamskrtas), so your explanation above and what follows it makes no sense to me.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 7th, 2020 at 4:33 PM

Title: Re: Zazen for a few

Content:

mansurhirbi87 said:

What would you answer to the opinion that zazen is not to everyone, just for a few ? With it could be said that it is almost elitist

Astus wrote:

'If you can comfortably sit upright and remain insouciant, without being bound by anything — only that is called liberation. Make every effort! Make every effort! Of the thousands or tens of thousands of people in this school, only three or five of them have gotten it.'

(Huangbo Xiyun in The Wanling Record, in A Bird in Flight Leaves No Trace, 2.44)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 8th, 2020 at 2:16 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana Sutra references to 4 stages of Hinayana

Content:

DharmaSean said:

Can you prove any link to the Arthaviniscaya sutra?

Astus wrote:

<https://www.ancient-buddhist-texts.net/Texts-and-Translations/Arthaviniscaya/index.htm>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 8th, 2020 at 6:58 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana Sutra references to 4 stages of Hinayana

Content:

DharmaSean said:

I am trying to understand why the Mahayana says that arhatship is not the end of the path.

Astus wrote:

Mahayana schools practically reinterpreted the meaning of what it is to be an arhat, reduced it to being stuck in a samadhi of nothingness, and that's why they are not finished yet, but will continue on the path to buddhahood once somehow they're awakened from their dreamless slumber by the buddhas. That's also how the sravaka path turned into basically a misroute on the path to enlightenment, that it is seen as an attachment to a mistaken view of emptiness, an extreme view of annihilation. So actually the arhatship in the Ekayana view (i.e. that there is only one final liberation of buddhahood) is not the same as in the Triyana view what the Yogacara system of Xuanzang and Theravada believes in.

There is another element as well, that with buddha-nature one needs merely to remove obscurations and it's not necessary to accumulate merit to develop the buddha qualities, so in order to avoid the charge that it is no different from the sravakayana, arhats are redefined as annihilationists.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 9th, 2020 at 1:35 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana Sutra references to 4 stages of Hinayana

Content:

DharmaSean said:

So Master Xuanzang believed in a view of arhats akin to the Theravada?

Astus wrote:

In the sense that arhats reach nirvana, finish rebirth and the path permanently, yes.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 9th, 2020 at 2:41 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana Sutra references to 4 stages of Hinayana

Content:

DharmaSean said:

Are there any mind only works discussing this in depth?

Astus wrote:

I don't know what counts as "in depth" for you, but you can look into the Cheng Weishi Lun, either the translation by Wei Tat or Francis Cook (see References on the <https://www.bdkamerica.org/book/three-texts-consciousness-only> page, and also on <https://www.bdkamerica.org/book/three-texts-consciousness-only>).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 10th, 2020 at 2:41 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana Sutra references to 4 stages of Hinayana

Content:

Aemilius said:

The question is "why don't you stay in it?"

Astus wrote:

If there is a state one stays in, that is a temporary thing. Nirvana is not a state, nor a temporary thing.

Aemilius said:

There is a teaching that we have all attained enlightenment millions of years ago.

Astus wrote:

Where is there such a teaching?

Aemilius said:

This esoteric aspect is rarely revealed, the theme is mentioned in the Sarvastivada Abhidharma.

Astus wrote:

The Sarvastivadins, and only them, distinguished arhats circumstantially liberated (samaya-vimukta) who started as faith-followers (śraddhānusārin) and those non-circumstantially liberated (asamaya-vimukta) who began as Dharma-followers (dharmānusārin). Of the two only the former may retrogress. See: Sarvāstivāda Abhidharma by Bhikkhu KL Dhammajoti, 4th ed, p 463-464.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 10th, 2020 at 3:12 PM

Title: Re: What does Madhyamaka say about birth and death?

Content:

nichiren-123 said:

How does it explain the apparent appearance and disappearance of each human life?

Astus wrote:

As noted by Malcolm at the beginning, all appearances (and disappearances) are understood as dependently arisen (and ceased). Dependent origination includes both the general causal nature of phenomena and the individual karmic nature of existence.

nichiren-123 said:

Now, how does one understand each human lifespan, or each wave's lifespan as empty? How do you understand the true nature of a human life or the life of a wave?

Astus wrote:

That there is a wave that is a conceptual label, a mental fabrication that when viewed as a real presentation, or a representative of something real, serves as an apparently substantial object of grasping. When the thought of a wave is clung to, from that comes all sorts of other concepts, like birth and death. When the thought is recognised as a mere concept without anything in it or beyond it, there is no longer any thing that can be said to be born or can die.

'Those who imputes arising and disintegration
With relation to conditioned things,
They do not understand well the movement
Of the wheel of dependent origination.

That which has originated due to “this” and “that,”
That has not done so as its own being;
And that which has not arisen as its own being,
How can it be called “arisen”?

The tranquility derived from extinction of cause,
This is understood to be a cessation;
That which is not extinguished through its intrinsic nature,
How can that be called an “extinguishment”?

Since there is nothing that arises,
There is nothing that disintegrates;
Yet the paths of arising and disintegration
Were taught [by the Buddha] for a purpose.

By understanding arising, disintegration is understood;
By understanding disintegration, impermanence is understood;
By understanding how to engage with impermanence,
The sublime dharma is understood as well.

Those who understand the dependent origination
To be utterly devoid of arising and disintegration,
Those who have such knowledge will cross
The ocean of samsara of dogmatic views.'
(<https://www.tibetanclassics.org/html-assets/SixtyStanzas.pdf>, 18-23)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 10th, 2020 at 7:36 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana Sutra references to 4 stages of Hinayana

Content:

LastLegend said:

But when hanging on to the distinction of Nirvana versus samsara, and abide in Nirvana.
The issue here is Buddha nature I don't think Sravakayana believe in Buddha nature that's empty.

Astus wrote:

The doctrine of buddha-nature is about the view that when all attachments are gone the buddha qualities manifest on their own instead of developing those qualities through accumulating merit. That way it becomes possible to attain buddhahood without going through the bodhisattva path over immeasurable aeons, hence the sudden enlightenment teaching in East Asian Mahayana and buddhahood in this body teaching in Vajrayana. At the same time, being an arhat means complete freedom from attachments, therefore with buddha-nature arhats are necessarily buddhas.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 10th, 2020 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: What does Madhyamaka say about birth and death?

Content:

nichiren-123 said:

Yes, but in order to understand the Dharma we must employ conceptual labels and mental fabrications.

Astus wrote:

It's not about not having concepts, but about seeing them for what they are.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 11th, 2020 at 5:54 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana Sutra references to 4 stages of Hinayana

Content:

Aemilius said:

It was mentioned in a public teaching in Copenhagen in 1990's.

Astus wrote:

So it is not a teaching of the Buddha, nor a teaching in a canonical scripture, nor a teaching in a commentary or a treatise, at least as far as you are aware of its source. At the same time, it contradicts the very meaning of awakening if it's merely a temporary thing.

Aemilius said:

If there is nothing attained, no attainment nor non-attainment etc... what is there to speak about?

Astus wrote:

Craving, the very root of suffering, is based on the assumption that there is something to gain or lose. Through the study, understanding, and application of the Dharma one eventually arrives at the realisation that there is truly nothing to attain, thus severing craving. Until then, there is a lot to speak about.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 11th, 2020 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana Sutra references to 4 stages of Hinayana

Content:

LastLegend said:

If you are hungry and want to eat oatmeal instead of a banana, is that craving?

Astus wrote:

It is a form of sensual craving.

Here is some help to decide for yourself:

"Craving (taṇhā) is focused on feeling (vedanā) and desires objects in order to experience feeling, or desires objects for personal gratification. Craving is generated and sustained by ignorance; it is linked to personal issues - it centres around a sense of 'self'. It leads to seeking Wholesome desire (chanda) is focused on wellbeing, on what is truly beneficial and on the quality of life; it desires truth, goodness, and virtue; it desires fulfilment and wholeness. Chanda is generated from wise reflection; it is objective - it is not bound up with a sense of 'self'; and it leads to energy, effort, and action."

(Buddhadhamma: The Laws of Nature and Their Benefits to Life by Bhikkhu P. A. Payutto, p 773-774)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 12th, 2020 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana Sutra references to 4 stages of Hinayana

Content:

LastLegend said:

Hmm then we have to question every choice we make? Ever gone grocery shopping?

Astus wrote:

Zhiyi writes (The Essentials of Buddhist Meditation, p 117-119):

'At times when one is involved in walking, one should bring forth this thought: "For what purpose do I now wish to walk?" If it is on account of being directed by afflictions or by unwholesome or neutral matters, then one should not proceed with walking. If it is not an instance of being directed by the afflictions and if it is for the sake of a matter which produces wholesome benefits and which is in accord with the Dharma, then one should go ahead and proceed with walking.'

He repeats similar instructions for standing, sitting, lying down, engaging in actions, and speaking.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 12th, 2020 at 5:22 AM

Title: Re: Order of teachings, five periods and the superiority of the Lotus - discussion

Content:

nichiren-123 said:

So, in order to grasp the value of the Lotus I'd like to discuss how the earlier teachings prepare us for the Lotus.

Astus wrote:

What is its value outside Tiantai and Nichiren schools? It is used as a common reference for the concepts of skilful means and the one vehicle, but even those ideas are not limited to the Lotus Sutra. I guess the Lotus Sutra's most widespread element is its presentation of Avalokitesvara.

nichiren-123 said:

a better way of classing the sutra's then let's consider that

Astus wrote:

If it's a question of historical order, then one has to consider the generally accepted modern scholarly view that whatever was actually taught by Gautama is found in the Nikayas and Agamas, and everything else is later, especially the Mahayana sutras that already presuppose a more complex state of Buddhism.

Apart from history, various schools have their own version of doctrinal classification (kyouhan/jiaopan 教判), like the Huayan, Shingon, Pure Land, and Chan schools, that naturally do not agree with the Tiantai version, a sort of rival school. For instance, Kukai put the Mahayana teachings in the following order: Yogacara, Madhyamaka, Tiantai, Huayan, and then Mantra, i.e. Shingon.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 12th, 2020 at 7:19 PM

Title: Re: The Eye Does Not See Itself - Source?

Content:

Manjushri said:

Are you aware of other modern editions of this particular sutra?

Astus wrote:

http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/surangama.pdf

http://www.buddhisttexts.org/uploads/6/3/3/1/6331706/surangama_new_translation.pdf

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 12th, 2020 at 11:44 PM

Title: Re: What does Madhyamaka say about birth and death?

Content:

Astus wrote:

On the subject of dharmas, a highly recommended article:
http://www.abhidhamma.com/Dhamma_Theory_clear.pdf

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 13th, 2020 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: What does Madhyamaka say about birth and death?

Content:

Malcolm said:

This article is kind of irrelevant to Mahāyāna Buddhism, which is grounded in the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharma.

Astus wrote:

It touches on some differences between Sarvastivada and Theravada (mostly pages 8 & 15).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 13th, 2020 at 1:48 AM

Title: Re: What does Madhyamaka say about birth and death?

Content:

Queequeg said:

Its probably too big a question for this thread, but what would be the consequence of developing an understanding derived by haphazardly mixing Theravada and Mahayana? Are there any significant areas where confusion might arise and lead to wrong view?

Astus wrote:

Mahayana is very broad, as you are well aware, like the differences between Tibetan and East Asian schools. Theravada is theoretically more unified, but in terms of practices it is quite diverse. So, the subjects mixed matters. For instance, as Malcolm pointed out, Madhyamaka does not work so well against Theravada Abhidhamma. On the other hand, if it's about reading suttas, then probably everything you find there generally fits well with Mahayana ideas.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2020 at 2:51 PM

Title: Re: Zazen and Creativity(question)

Content:

Joanna54544 said:

If the goal of Zazen is to remove attachments in order to free yourself, and the goal of Zen is to practice Zazen throughout the day throughout daily activities, how do we progress with the creative process.

Astus wrote:

It depends on what you mean by zazen. The ideal practice is just sitting where body and mind are dropped, that is, there is no fixation on physical sensations, feelings, or ideas, because they are realised as ungraspable. But because that is not so easy to comprehend right at the beginning, people may initially focus on the posture and/or the breathing. So, when one watches the body/breath, everything else is irrelevant. No matter what important looking thoughts occur, the job is to return to the object of meditation, because it is through putting the attention on a single object that the mind is anchored and not moved by the bodily and mental impressions. Then this same skill of being calm and undistracted can be used at other times as well, outside of the meditation session. That's how gradually one can train and tame the mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 20th, 2020 at 8:26 PM

Title: Tenth Vow of Amitabha

Content:

Astus wrote:

In the tenth vow of Amitabha it is stated that beings in Sukhavati will not arouse any clinging/desire (parigraha/貪), not even to their own bodies. It is generally believed that even ordinary beings (prthagjana) may be born there. However, how could an unenlightened one be free from clinging suddenly?

The Tenth Vow of Amitabha

sacenme bhagavaṃstasmin buddhakṣetre ye sattvāḥ pratyājāyeran, teṣāṃ kācitparigrahasaṃjñotpadyeta, antaśaḥ svaśarīre'pi, mā tāvadahamanuttarāṃ samyaksaṃbodhimabhisambudhyeyam
(<http://www.dsbcproject.org/canon-text/content/59/528>)

"O Bhagavat, if in that Buddha country of mine the beings who are born there should form any idea of property, even with regard to their own body, then may I not obtain the highest perfect knowledge."

(Müller, <https://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/sbe49/sbe4924.htm>)

設我得佛。國中入天。若起想念貪計身者。不取正覺。

(Saṅghavarman, T360p268a9-10; http://21dzk.l.u-tokyo.ac.jp/SAT2015/T0360_12.0268a09:0268a10.cit)

"If, when I attain buddhahood, humans and devas in my land should give rise to thoughts of self-attachment, may I not attain perfect enlightenment."

(Inagaki, BDK ed, p 13; http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/sutra_of_immeasurable_life.html)

"After I become a Buddha, if gods in my land should imagine that they have embodied selves, I would not attain the perfect enlightenment."

(Rulu, <http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra25.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 20th, 2020 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: Tenth Vow of Amitabha

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

How does a sleeping person suddenly awaken from a dream?

Astus wrote:

Unless you're suggesting that Sukhavati is Nirvana, the simile does not apply. But if Sukhavati were Nirvana, then it raises even bigger issues, since it'd mean a buddha can turn beings into liberated ones without having them cultivate the path.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 20th, 2020 at 9:11 PM

Title: Re: Tenth Vow of Amitabha

Content:

Könchok Thrinley said:

I think it would probably depend on "what sort of body" beings in sukhavati have.

Astus wrote:

They have bodies, however, the vow is not limited to clinging to one's body, but it's used as an example to the extent of clinging.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 21st, 2020 at 5:15 PM

Title: Re: Tenth Vow of Amitabha

Content:

Wayfarer said:

As I understand it, in Japanese Pure Land, there is no thought of 'cultivation' whatever. Any attempt to 'cultivate' is a self-power idea. You are reborn in Sukhavati solely by faith in other-power, that being the power of Amida's vow.

Astus wrote:

Still, even if in this life there is no progress, the Pure Land itself is where one completes the bodhisattva path.

From the <http://www.jsri.jp/English/Honen/TEACHINGS/senchaku/process.html>:

"The fourth and the last stage is perhaps best thought of as the stage after death, when one has succeeded in being born in the Pure Land in the West. At this fourth stage, all of the practices of the Holy Path aimed towards gaining final enlightenment that were rejected as being too difficult for people living in the age of the final Dharma are readmitted on their own terms. Since they now dwell amid the wonders of the Pure Land, people are continuously in the presence of the Buddha and hear his teachings without the distortions caused by the many disturbing passions of the present world. Now they can indeed obtain the bodhicitta, reach the stage of non-retrogression, and be assured of eventual enlightenment. Therefore, the practices of the Holy Path which were rejected as too difficult are now all reinstated and practiced in their full essence."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 24th, 2020 at 3:15 PM

Title: Re: Can Shikantaza be done "wrong", or is an attempt at it automatically successful?

Content:

Dgj said:

To dial it back seems to create some problems and once we're there we may as well go back to the Theravada understanding where enlightenment must be reached through practice precisely because it is not innate.

Astus wrote:

The idea of buddha-nature doesn't necessarily change anything in terms of practice, and one can still see the twofold accumulation through immeasurable aeons as the way to perfect enlightenment.

Dgj said:

In Zen, enlightenment is instantaneous and innate.

Astus wrote:

When there is talk of enlightenment it is important to look at the word used. For instance wu 悟 can simply mean understanding and puti 菩提 the initial awakening. They are the first steps on the bodhisattva path, and not buddhahood. So when there is a peculiar line from the teacher and the student suddenly understands, that is basically when something clicks and becomes clear. It's not that they're buddhas right there, or even arya bodhisattvas.

Dgj said:

Per Shen Hui practice doesn't even make any sense

Astus wrote:

Not really. Guifeng Zongmi claimed to be an heir of Heze and he clearly taught the path of sudden enlightenment, gradual practice. Later Yongming Yanshou and Bojo Jinul followed the same interpretation. You may want to look into Buswell's introduction in <https://uhpress.hawaii.edu/title/numinous-awareness-is-never-dark-the-korean-buddhist-master-chinuls-excerpts-on-zen-practice/> where he summarises the matter nicely. Also, if you want to find a more detailed explanation of Zen in more standard writing - and not just short koan-style anecdotes and phrases - you should look into this part of Zen that took a different route than the Hongzhou school what became popular in the Song era and was followed by the majority of Linji and Caodong teachers.

Dgj said:

It seemed to me that Dogen had answered this paradox of practicing to reach something you already have by delineating a Zazen that is not a practice at all. And if it's not a practice, but rather is simply our innate enlightenment, how can it be done wrong?

Astus wrote:

As I take it, Dogen was more a subitist than those who advocated kanhua practice, as he followed more closely the view what one finds in the Platform Sutra where a moment of no-thought is a moment of buddhahood (see also: <https://journals.ub.uni-heidelberg.de/index.php/jiabs/article/view/8591/2498>). Or we could say he was more optimist, believing that people can simply enter no-thought (or non-thinking). Then it is only a matter of familiarisation with dropping body and mind, or as <https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/practice/zazen/howto/index.html>: "The essential thing in doing zazen is to awaken (https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/key_terms/pdf/key_terms24.pdf) from distraction and dullness, and return to the right posture moment by moment."

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 25th, 2020 at 4:57 AM

Title: Re: Are there Chan (Zen) texts that were actually composed during the Tang dynasty?

Content:

Dgj said:

Are there any Tang Chan (Zen) texts that were written during that dynasty?

Astus wrote:

Some, but with varying degrees of editing. The Platform Sutra has already been mentioned, there are also works attributed to Bodhidharma that are early (but not as early as Bodhidharma), and there are the works of the so called Northern School, about them you can read in McRae's classic The Northern School and the Formation of Early Ch'an Buddhism. Some other notable texts:

Works from Dunhuang:

Chuan Fabao ji (傳法寶紀, c. 713)

Lengqie shizi ji (楞伽師資記, c. 712-716)

Shenhui Tanyu (神會壇語, c. 720)

Lidai Fabao Ji (歷代法寶記, c. 774-780)

Guishan Jingce (潯山警策, before 936)

Texts representative of Tang era Chan:

works of Guifeng Zongmi (780-841)

Baizhang Guanglu (百丈廣錄, early Song recompilation but assumed faithful to earlier version)

Chuanxin Fayao & Wanling Lu (傳心法要 & 宛陵錄, dated by Peixiu to 857, editing in Song but assumed faithful)

Dunwu Yaomen (頓悟要門, published in 1374 but assumed faithful to 8th c.)

For a reconstruction of the Mazu Yulu (馬祖語錄) see: The Hongzhou School of Chan Buddhism by Jinhua Jia.

In general about Tang works see:

Fathering Your Father: The Zen of Fabrication in Tang Buddhism by Alan Cole

The Zen Canon: Understanding the Classic Texts ed. by Steven Heine & Dale S. Wright

Focused on specific works:

The Mystique of Transmission: On an Early Chan History and Its Contexts by Wendi Leigh Adamek

Readings of the Platform Sutra by Morten Schlütter & Stephen F. Teiser

The Records of Mazu and the Making of Classical Chan Literature by Mario Poceski

The Linji Lu and the Creation of Chan Orthodoxy: The Development of Chan's Records of Sayings Literature by Albert Welter

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 2nd, 2020 at 1:27 AM

Title: Re: Zen is zazen Is this true?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Good friends, the deluded speak with their mouths, but the wise practice with their minds. Furthermore, there are deluded people who empty their minds and sit in quietude without thinking of anything whatsoever, claiming that this is great. You can't even speak to these people, because of their false views!

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 29)

The master addressed the assembly, "Good friends, what is seated meditation (zuochan)? In this teaching, there is no impediment and no hindrance. Externally, for the mind to refrain from activating thoughts with regard to all the good and bad realms is called 'seated' (zuo). Internally, to see the motionlessness of the self-nature is called 'meditation' (chan)."

(ch 4, p 45)

You can sit [in meditation] without lying down from the day you're born,

But when you die you will lie down and not sit up.

One always has this putrid skeleton,

Why should one set such a task?

(ch 8, p 73)

Xie Jian said, "The virtuous Chan monks of the capital all say, 'If you wish to understand the Way, you must sit in meditation and cultivate samādhi. It has never happened that anyone attained emancipation without relying on meditation.' I wonder, what is the Dharma that you teach?"

The master said, "One is enlightened to the Way through the mind. How could it depend on sitting? A sutra says, 'To say that the Tathāgata sits or lies down is to practice a false path. Why? Because he is without coming and without going.' To be without birth and without extinction is the pure meditation of the Tathāgata. For the dharmas to be quiescent is the Tathāgata's pure sitting. Ultimately there is no realization, so how could it possibly [depend on] sitting?"

(ch 9, p 79)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 7th, 2020 at 2:38 PM

Title: Re: What possible reason could there be to study or practice Buddhism if arising and ceasing do not occur?

Content:

Dgj said:

If no arising nor ceasing occur then the twelve links are meaningless, reduced to nonsense.

Astus wrote:

It should always be kept in mind that many of the Mahayana ideas developed from or against Sarvastivada doctrine. In this case, the Sarvastivada abhidharma teachings say that production/birth (jati), duration/staying (sthitī), deterioration/death (jara), and impermanence (anityata) are characteristics (lakṣaṇa) that are dharmas themselves, and dharmas are what have self-existence (svabhava), and it is the Sarvastivadin interpretation - or what its opponents, the Mahayanikas understood the Sarvastivadin teaching to be - that for instance Nagarjuna argues against when saying that arising, duration, etc., do not exist, i.e. not really, not on their own as unique entities.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 7th, 2020 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Jhanas and Vipassana...its all in the eyes?

Content:

Justmeagain said:

Is this still the process in Soto Zen Zazen? If so how do things like Nimitta occur if the eyes are open....or maybe it does?

Astus wrote:

Zen in general is a "unified" or rather simultaneous practice of samatha/samadhi and vipasyana/prajna, so it's not one after another. Practising with nimitta, that's a uniquely theravadin method.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 8th, 2020 at 3:13 PM

Title: Re: Essential & Useful Reading on Abhidharma and Prajnaparamita/Madhyamaka

Content:

Astus wrote:

Abhidharma handbooks:

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=jhJANfwlr3oC>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=KEQ5PwAACAAJ>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=AXQS3UsZVmQC>

Abhidharma background:

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=eK4PSQAACAAJ>

<https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/dawn-abhidharma.pdf>

Abhidharma & Madhyamaka:

<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 8th, 2020 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: What possible reason could there be to study or practice Buddhism if arising and ceasing do not occur?

Content:

Dgj said:

Arising, duration and cessation of ultimate entities as incorrectly posited by the Sarvastivadins does not occur.

Astus wrote:

"Just as cessation is imputed

On the disintegration of an arisen entity;

So too the sublime ones accept

Cessation that is illusion-like."

(<https://www.tibetanclassics.org/html-assets/SixtyStanzas.pdf>, v 7)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 11th, 2020 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: What possible reason could there be to study or practice Buddhism if arising and ceasing do not occur?

Content:

Dgj said:

Typically things are either illusions, or not. Illusion-like would usually be applied to something that seems like an illusion, but isn't. If it were an illusion, it would just be called an illusion.

Astus wrote:

"All phenomena arise in dependence. There is no phenomenon that can remain constantly. All phenomena arise from circumstances. There is no phenomenon that arises without circumstances. Any phenomenon that arises in dependence is unborn. Therefore all phenomena are unborn. To realize that all phenomena are unborn is to know how to practice the bodhisattva's path. In this way, one attains the basis for benefiting all beings and can proceed with a compassionate outlook. With such conviction, one comes to understand that all phenomena are illusory. All phenomena are magically manifest because they are imputed. Those imputations are also utterly empty. The realization that all phenomena are empty is the attainment of the illusory absorption."

(<https://read.84000.co/translation/toh130.html#UT22084-055-004-25>)

The eight similes of illusion:

"As in a dream, all the external objects perceived with the five senses are not there, but appear through delusion.

As in a magic show, things are made to appear by a temporary conjunction of causes, circumstances and connections.

As in a visual aberration, things appear to be there, yet there is nothing.

As in a mirage, things appear but are not real.

As in an echo, things can be perceived but there is nothing there, either outside or inside.

As in a city of gandharvas, there is neither a dwelling nor anyone to dwell.

As in a reflection, things appear but have no reality of their own.

As in a city created by magic, there are all sorts of appearances but they are not really there."

(The Words of My Perfect Teacher, 2.6.3, p 252)

Dgj said:

So the sublime ones accept cessation that actually is, but is like an illusion?

Astus wrote:

Not actually, but apparently. It seems that things come and go, rise and fall. But if one looks into it, one investigates it, there are no things, nor change.

Dgj said:

Further, the very phrase is stating that entities do disintegrate. So it seems fair to say that Nagarjuna held that entities disintegrate, at the very least? From there, that he held that this disintegration can be called "illusion-like" cessation?

Astus wrote:

"Those who impute arising and disintegration

With relation to conditioned things,

They do not understand well the movement

Of the wheel of dependent origination."

(<https://www.tibetanclassics.org/html-assets/SixtyStanzas.pdf>, v 18)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 11th, 2020 at 3:17 PM

Title: Re: What possible reason could there be to study or practice Buddhism if arising and ceasing do not occur?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

This 'looking into' is not a simple nor a casual matter.

Astus wrote:

That is what wisdom is for that is developed through learning, reflection, and cultivation.

"Having ascertained through scripture
And through reasoning that phenomena
Are not produced nor inherently existent,
Meditate without conceptuality."
(Illuminating the Path to Enlightenment, v 58, p 158)

Wayfarer said:

I think it means, 'seeing beyond the apparent flux and change', but that 'seeing beyond' is itself the fulfillment of the path, isn't it?

Astus wrote:

It is not a matter of seeing beyond, but rather seeing things as they are.

"The absence of an [inherently-existent] nature owing to [being reducible to mere] causes and conditions is itself their true character."
(http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/EBM_excerpts/EBM_X-16_X-06.pdf, ch 6)

Also, it's not the end of the path, but rather the beginning of cultivation with an ascertained correct view.

"Having thus meditated on suchness,
Eventually, after reaching "heat" and so forth,
The "very joyful" and the others are attained
And, before long, the enlightened state of buddhahood."
(Illuminating the Path to Enlightenment, v 59, p 158)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 15th, 2020 at 3:48 PM

Title: Re: Best books on general Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

joshua said:

I am interested in some books about the history of Mahayana Buddhism and a general overview of it's schools, lineages, and practices. I realize much of this information is available via the web, however I would ask for book recommendations as I quite prefer a physical book.

Astus wrote:

<https://books.google.co.in/books?id=fv5cDwAAQBAJ>
<https://books.google.co.in/books?id=fjU6AwAAQBAJ>
https://books.google.co.in/books?id=oyJjCx_tEiMC
<https://books.google.co.in/books?id=cy980CH84mEC>
<https://books.google.co.in/books?id=8PI-WPJd4aIC>
<https://books.google.co.in/books?id=9ygVT2FA0h4C>

https://books.google.co.in/books?id=s9KGFP_rzQC
<https://books.google.co.in/books?id=DTWZLMGFFgkC>

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 17th, 2020 at 6:52 PM

Title: Re: Susho Itto

Content:

Astus wrote:

As you might already know of it, zazen is what they call the suññatā-samādhī and animitta-samādhī in Theravada (e.g. <https://suttacentral.net/mn121/en/sujato>), and also where the Buddha taught "In what is seen there must be only what is seen", etc. (e.g. <https://suttacentral.net/ud1.10/en/anandajoti>). It is without proliferation (nippapañca), without conceptualisation (nibbikappa/nirvikalpa), therefore without attachment and without a concept of self.

You might also want to look into what Keizan in the <http://antaiji.org/en/classics/english-zazen-yojinki/> and Menzan in the https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/leaflet/heartofzen/pdf/Heart_of_Zen.pdf taught to further clarify things.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 20th, 2020 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: Nihilistic view

Content:

White Sakura said:

Which masters taught at what time in history of Buddhism about the nihilistic point of view?

Astus wrote:

First of all, it should be clarified what is meant by "nihilism". It is normally understood as a denial of moral values, something that is clearly a wrong view according to any Buddhist. If we understand it as a denial of taking ordinary perception as ultimately real, that is a given in Buddhism, but so it is many philosophies and religions, so it is usually not something nihilism means. What is often mistranslated as nihilism is actually annihilationism (ucchedavada), the belief that beings completely perish at death, and that is again clearly a wrong view according to any Buddhist.

White Sakura said:

In a way that the explanations of other masters were called nihilistic?

Astus wrote:

Non-Buddhists, primarily materialists, are those who believe in the ultimate annihilation of beings at the demise of their body.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 20th, 2020 at 5:01 PM

Title: Re: Nihilistic view

Content:

White Sakura said:

Then the person who asked says: "but who feels: Now I am free..I have freed myself by means of the path. Who feels that"

Astus wrote:

'Who feels?' is the wrong question. Dependent origination is the middle view because it shows cause and effect without an agent or subject. Please consider the following teachings:

Who acts? <https://suttacentral.net/sn12.17/en/bodhi>;

<https://suttacentral.net/sn12.18/en/bodhi>

Who gets old? <https://suttacentral.net/sn12.35/en/bodhi>

Who experiences? <https://suttacentral.net/sn12.46/en/bodhi>

All exists or nothing exists? <https://suttacentral.net/sn12.47/en/sujato>

Dependent origination is correct investigation:

<https://suttacentral.net/sn12.51/en/bodhi>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 21st, 2020 at 10:52 PM

Title: Re: Nihilistic view

Content:

White Sakura said:

The opposite of eternalism is here annihilationism.

Astus wrote:

That specific discourse is about the origin of suffering, whether the agent (who creates the cause of suffering) is identical to the subject (who experiences the effect: suffering) or different from it. You can take it either as referring to different births, or different moments. Saying that they are identical is eternalism, as it assumes an enduring self. Saying that they are different is annihilationism, because it assumes that the previous self has disappeared and now there is a new self. What cuts through these extremes is dependent origination, that there is no self of any sort, but rather a chain of causes and effects.

White Sakura said:

how do you define the difference between the terms "nihilism" and "annihilationism"?

Astus wrote:

It depends on one's definition of nihilism. If one equates nihilism with "nothing exists", that is likely a view not accepted by anyone, so there's usually a qualification, for instance "nothing really/ultimately exists" at least, but then it still accepts some sort of existence, and that is either a meaningful or a meaningless distinction. The Buddha was clear about what is called a self (identification with the five aggregates), and that such a self is not just delusional but also painful.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2020 at 4:29 AM

Title: Re: Nihilistic view

Content:

White Sakura said:

So one can apply that for the self as well. To say: "There is no self" is nihilistic view. "There is no ultimately existing self" is what Buddha taught.

Astus wrote:

The assumption of any form of self is a mistake. If there were some sort of reality to it, it wouldn't be wrong to believe in it.

"Monks, you would do well to cling to that clinging to a doctrine of self, clinging to which there would not arise sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief, & despair. But do you see a clinging to a doctrine of self, clinging to which there would not arise sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief, & despair?"

"No, lord."

"Very good, monks. I, too, do not envision a clinging to a doctrine of self, clinging to which there would not arise sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief, & despair."

(<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.022.than.html>)

White Sakura said:

But what is if I turn it other way round and say: "There is a self depending on body and mind."

Astus wrote:

"Monks, whatever contemplatives or brahmans who assume in various ways when assuming a self, all assume the five clinging-aggregates, or a certain one of them."

(<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.047.than.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2020 at 4:08 PM

Title: Re: Nihilistic view

Content:

Wayfarer said:

What's your interpretation of

<https://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an06/an06.038.niza.html#fn-5> where the Buddha asks: How, indeed, could one — moving forward by himself, moving back by himself — say 'There is no self-doer, there is no other-doer'?

Astus wrote:

Right view has two parts: the right view of karma, and the right view of the noble truths.

When it comes to karma, one has to recognise that actions have consequences, and in ordinary terms those actions and consequences apply to the individual. In that context one talks of one's responsibility and such, so there is an agent who acts of his own volition, and then suffers the outcome of those acts.

Wayfarer said:

In the very short text

<https://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn44/sn44.010.than.html>, the Buddha is asked straight out by Vachagotta the Wanderer, whether the self exists or does not exist. Both questions are met with silence.

Astus wrote:

It is explained by the Buddha why he did not answer in either way, as the questioner would have taken both versions incorrectly. These two types of mistakes of eternalism and annihilationism are mentioned regularly in the following format:

"To an uninstructed run-of-the-mill person, touched by experience born of the contact of ignorance, there occur (the thoughts): 'I am,' 'I am thus,' 'I shall be,' 'I shall not be,' 'I shall be possessed of form,' 'I shall be formless,' 'I shall be percipient (conscious),' 'I shall be non-percipient,' or 'I shall be neither percipient nor non-percipient.'"

(<https://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.047.than.html>)

But it doesn't mean there is any ambiguity or mystery regarding the Buddha's position about the concept of self.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2020 at 5:36 PM

Title: Re: Nihilistic view

Content:

Wayfarer said:

'That context' is existence, life and the living of it.

Astus wrote:

That "existence, life and the living of it" is a conceptual construct of how things are.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2020 at 8:37 PM

Title: Re: Nihilistic view

Content:

Grigoris said:

Hold on to your horses partner:

Astus wrote:

"You may well accept, monks, the assumption of a self-theory from the acceptance of which there would not arise sorrow and lamentation, pain, grief, and despair. (But) do you see, monks, any such assumption of a self-theory?" — "No, Lord." — "Well, monks, I, too, do not see any such assumption of a self-theory from the acceptance of which there would not arise sorrow and lamentation, pain, grief and despair."

(<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.022.nypo.html>)

Grigoris said:

1. Reality. What does this term even mean?

Astus wrote:

Something that is verifiable experientially or inferentially. We might also go with whether something has causal efficacy. Or both.

Grigoris said:

2. If there is an idea of a self, wouldn't that make it a type of reality?

Astus wrote:

If an idea does not refer to anything, then that idea is just an idea.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2020 at 9:29 PM

Title: Re: Nihilistic view

Content:

Grigoris said:

A mental action is still an action and thus has a "causal efficacy", even if it is just mental. Don't forget that there are entire realms that are merely mental. Are they not "real"?

Astus wrote:

As a thought, yes. But when one talks of a self, it is generally not understood to be merely a thought, but that it has a real referent. So when it is said that there is no self, it does not mean there is no idea of a self, but that what is assumed to be the referent of the idea of a self does not exist. And that is why assuming a self is delusional. The delusion is certainly there, but it is a delusion exactly because the belief in a self is misguided.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2020 at 10:03 PM

Title: Re: What are the most minimalist or simplest forms or schools of Buddhism?

Content:

Dgj said:

What are the most minimalist or simplest forms or schools of Buddhism?

Astus wrote:

The four noble truths are said to be both the summary
(<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn56/sn56.031.than.html>) and the all encompassing (<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.028.than.html>) teaching of the Buddha.

What is highlighted in Mahayana as the essential teaching is prajnaparamita (e.g. Heart Sutra), and then that is transformed into teachings like Zen (e.g. Platform Sutra, ch 2) and Mahamudra (e.g. Jewel Ornament of Liberation, ch 17).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2020 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: Nihilistic view

Content:

Grigoris said:

So you believe that in the immaterial realms there is no sense of self?

Astus wrote:

I did not specify the nature of a possible referent for the idea of a self. Furthermore, four of the five aggregates are not material, so it is quite normal if one identifies with something other than the body.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2020 at 10:20 PM

Title: Re: Nihilistic view

Content:

Bundokji said:

By reducing what is real to the presence of an unchanging essence would be missing the point of what is it that makes things "real" in the first place except an underlying value.

Astus wrote:

Please note <https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=532751#p532751>. There is no need for an unchanging essence to define reality.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2020 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: Nihilistic view

Content:

Bundokji said:

How can you define reality without reference to unchanging essence? what makes things identical (or recognizable) through time except reference to an unchanging essence that endures change?

Astus wrote:

This was the intended section of <https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=532751#p532751> vis-a-vis defining reality without positing an unchanging essence:

"Something that is verifiable experientially or inferentially. We might also go with whether something has causal efficacy."

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 23rd, 2020 at 4:57 AM

Title: Re: Nihilistic view

Content:

Bundokji said:

Don't you think the process of verification necessitates an unchanging essence?

Astus wrote:

Both sensory perception and reasoning require causal interaction, so no. Anything unchanging is a conceptual generalisation, not an experience.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 23rd, 2020 at 4:59 AM

Title: Re: What are the most minimalist or simplest forms or schools of Buddhism?

Content:

Dgj said:

The fourth noble truth includes the eightfold path, technically, no?

Astus wrote:

The fourth is the path, so yes, of course.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 24th, 2020 at 6:22 PM

Title: Re: Momentariness

Content:

Artziebetter1 said:

Does momentariness imply things coming out of nothing?if the cause ceases completely before the effect even begins to arise,how do effects arise?
there must be things beginning the arise as soon as its cause begins to dissapear,but then why call it momentary?

Astus wrote:

Let's say one kicks a ball. The cause is the kick, the effect is the ball moving. The moment the kick happens is distinct from the ball moving, as at the moment of kicking the ball is stationary. When the ball begins to move the kick has already happened. Without the kick the ball does not move. Before the kick the ball does not move. When the ball is kicked, it still does not move. Only following the kick does the ball move. The moment the foot contacts the ball, the ball is motionless. When the next moment the ball moves there is no longer the kick. So there is no problem with effect following the cause in distinct moments, nor is there an assumption of things coming out of nothing.

If the ball had already moved when the kick happened, one's foot would not even touch the ball as it would be already moving away, therefore cause and effect would be impossible.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 26th, 2020 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: Zen's stand regarding 'The Absolute'

Content:

npr said:

If you can see the original Chinese text of Huang Po, and see what the original term that was translated to Absolute, was, that can be nice

Astus wrote:

What translation? Could you please give some refernces?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 27th, 2020 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: Zen's stand regarding 'The Absolute'

Content:

npr said:

Here <https://archive.org/details/in.ernet.dli.2015.105228/>

<https://terebess.hu/zen/Huangpo.pdf>

Astus wrote:

Absolute = tathatā 如如

'The substance of the Absolute is inwardly like wood or stone, in that it is motionless, and outwardly like the void, in that it is without bounds or obstructions.'

(Blofeld, p 31-32)

「如如之體。內如木石不動不搖。外如虛空不塞不礙。」

(CBETA 2020.Q1, T48, no. 2012A, p. 380a17-19)

'The essence of suchness is unmoving like wood or stone within and unhindered like space without.'

(McRae, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 15)

'The essence of suchness is internally like wood or stone, which does not move or sway; externally, it is like empty space, which has no boundaries or obstructions.'

(Buswell, in A Bird in Flight Leaves No Trace, PDF p 37)

Absolute = dharmadhātu 法界

'He would just be himself oblivious of conceptual thought and one with the Absolute.'

(Blofeld, p 46)

「但自忘心。同於法界。便得自在。」
(CBETA 2020.Q1, T48, no. 2012A, p. 381c11-12)

'Simply forget your mind and identify yourself with the dharmadhatu, and you will attain autonomy.'
(McRae, p 25)

'If you just forget the mind and become the same as the dharma body, you will gain complete autonomy.'
(Buswell, p 69)

Absolute = tathatā 真如

'In the Absolute, there is nothing at all of this kind.'
(Blofeld, p 56)

「真如之中都無此事。」
(CBETA 2020.Q1, T48, no. 2012A, p. 382c21)

'There is no such [mode of attainment] within true suchness.'
(McRae, p 33)

'In true suchness, none of this is relevant.'
(Buswell, p 89)

Absolute = tathatā 真如

'Even Enlightenment, the Absolute, Reality, Sudden Attainment, the Dharmakaya and all the others down to the Ten Stages of Progress, the Four Rewards of virtuous and wise living and the State of Holiness and Wisdom are - every one of them - mere concepts for helping us through samsara; they have nothing to do with the real Buddha-Mind.'
(Blofeld, p 69)

「設使菩提真如實際解脫法身。直至十地四果聖位。盡是度門。非關佛心。」
(CBETA 2020.Q1, T48, no. 2012B, p. 384b17-18)

'Even though [you may attain] bodhi, suchness, the characteristic of reality, liberation, or the dharma body and directly reach the sanctified ranks of the ten stages or the four fruitions, all these involve the [expedient] gate of salvation. They have nothing to do with the buddha mind.'
(Buswell, p 124)

'[One can] suppose bodhi, thusness, ultimate reality, liberation, and the Dharmakaya, up to and including the ten stages [of the bodhisttva], the four fruits, and the rank of sagehood. All of these are [but] gates to crossing over [to Nirvana]. They do not concern the Buddha-mind.'
(The Wanling Record of Chan Master Huangbo Duanji: A History and Translation of a Tang Dynasty Text (university thesis) by Jeffrey M. Leahy, p 20)

Absolute = anutpattika-dharma-kṣānti 無生法忍

'It is all-pervading, spotless beauty; it is the self-existent and uncreated Absolute.'
(Blofeld, p 93)

「一道清流是自性。無生法忍」
(CBETA 2020.Q1, T48, no. 2012B, p. 387a7-8)

'A clear stream flowing in one direction is the selfnature's acquiescence to the nonproduction of dharmas.'
(Buswell, p 194)

'The monk of the One Path is by his own nature accepting of this non-arising of dharmas.'
(Leahy, p 52)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 27th, 2020 at 5:26 AM

Title: Re: Zen's stand regarding 'The Absolute'

Content:

Queequeg said:

Zen and Zen-speak, or what I take to be Zen-speak from what I see in forums like this.

Astus wrote:

There are many things at play here that produces "Zen-speak". On the one hand, Zen is straightforward and to the point. On the other, it's a highly evolved and sophisticated literary genre. Then you mix the two sides and put in front of people who are not familiar with any of that, so it becomes gibberish when they start talking about it.

See how Guifeng Zongmi understood "Zen-speak" as actually the simple and easy one:

'The teachings are the sutras and treatises left behind by the buddhas and bodhisattvas. Chan is the lines of verse related by the various good friends [on the path]. The buddha sutras open outward, catching the thousands of the beings of the eight classes, while Chan verses scoop up an abridgment, being oriented to one type of disposition found in this land [of China].¹ [The teachings,] which catch [the thousands of] beings [of the eight classes], are broad and vast, and hence it is difficult to rely upon them. [Chan,] which is oriented to dispositions, points to the bull's-eye and hence is easy to use.'
(Zongmi on Chan, p 105)

And then consider this:

'There is a profound difference ... between the rhetoric of Zen that plays with language in a clever and calculated way to induce insight, and language that is merely confused and nonsensical. Unfortunately, because readers of Chan and Zen texts are accustomed to sage remarks that appear to be non sequiturs, when they are confronted by the garden variety of nonsense — e.g. the gibberish that results when mechanical translation is employed or quotation marks go missing — they are all too likely to chalk that up as normal for the language of Zen, which (they imagine) is not supposed to be comprehensible in the first place. Such a mode of reading ... is a serious mistake.'

(T. Griffith Foulk: https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/denkoroku/pdf/ABOUT_THE_TRANSLATION,_CONVENTIONS,_ABBREVIATIONS.pdf, in "Record of the Transmission of Illumination by the Great Ancestor, Zen Master Keizan", p xi-xii)

But at the same time:

'Unfortunately, the majority of the exchanges or anecdotes composed in the encounter dialogue format are not very good stories, in any meaningful sense. In fact, a huge number of Chan stories or exchanges, included in texts such as Jingde chuan deng lu and Bi yan lu, can be viewed as little more than nonessential ramblings, a peculiar type of religious gibberish. Basically, we are confronted with countless examples of mass-produced textual materials that tend to be highly formulaic, numbingly repetitive, and ostensibly pointless. One of the things that keeps amazing me is how otherwise intelligent or sincere people can take this sort of stuff seriously, although the history of religion is filled with blind spots of that sort.'

(Mario Pocesi: The Records of Mazu and the Making of Classical Chan Literature, p 170-171)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 27th, 2020 at 6:32 PM

Title: Re: Zen's stand regarding 'The Absolute'

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Those few who took the trouble to visit Japan and begin the practice of Zen under a recognized Zen master or who joined the monastic Order soon discovered that it was a very different matter from what the popularizing literature had led them to believe. ... Altogether Zen demands an ability to participate in a communal life as regimented and lacking in privacy as the army.

I lack the self-discipline to practice this kind of discipline with any degree of rigour.

Astus wrote:

In Buddhism there are monastics and there are "householders". The quote restricts Zen to monastic practice. So, we can ask for instance: was Peixiu - an educated nobleman working in several high government positions - a genuine Chan practitioner, or not really? Guifeng Zongmi http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/Bcitta_excerpts/Bcitta_X-01_X-05.pdf this about him: 'I had become aware that he had entered the Buddha's gateway and arrived at the mind state of the Buddha. ... he is an emissary of the Buddha engaged in carrying on the Buddha's work.' Was he an exception?

I'm not saying you shouldn't go for Shinshu, don't get me wrong please. It's just that I don't see Zen as an exclusively monastic teaching (and then there are also differences between what monastic life is like, but that's another topic).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 28th, 2020 at 11:25 PM

Title: Re: Four Great Vows

Content:

jake said:

Any suggestions?

Astus wrote:

As for the kanji part, although it's Chinese, the four great vows can be found in for instance the "Guide to the Tiantai Fourfold Teachings" (Tiantai Sijiao Yi 天台四教儀) by Ch'egwan (諦觀):

眾生無邊誓願度
煩惱無盡誓願斷 法門無量誓願學
佛道無上誓願成

(CBETA 2020.Q1, T46, no. 1931, p. 777b2-7)

Beings are numberless; I vow to save them all.

Defilements are inexhaustible; I vow to end them all.

The teachings are innumerable; I vow to master them all.

The path to buddhahood is unsurpassed; I vow to attain it.

(<https://www.bdkamerica.org/book/tiantai-lotus-texts>, p 183)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 29th, 2020 at 3:15 AM

Title: Re: Four Great Vows

Content:

jake said:

I see the four vows are linked to the four noble truths in Tiantai. I assume this also the case in the Tendai and Zen traditions?

Astus wrote:

Linking the four vows and the four truths is also found in Zhanran's (湛然) Great Meaning of the Cessation and Contemplation (Zhiguan Dayi 止觀大意; T46n1914p459b23-26), so I assume that it's accepted in Tendai as well. As for Zen, I don't know if there is such a connection emphasised. Anyhow, here's a Zen take on the four vows from Huineng:

「自心眾生無邊誓願度，自心煩惱無邊誓願斷，自性法門無盡誓願學，自性無上佛道誓願成。」

(CBETA 2020.Q1, T48, no. 2008, p. 354a11-13)

'the sentient beings of our own minds are limitless, and we vow to save them all. The afflictions of our own minds are limitless, and we vow to eradicate them all. The teachings of our own minds are inexhaustible, and we vow to learn them all. The enlightenment of buddhahood of our own minds is unsurpassable, and we vow to achieve it.'

(<https://www.bdkamerica.org/book/platform-sutra-sixth-patriarch>, ch 6, p 48)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 30th, 2020 at 3:21 PM

Title: Re: Zen's stand regarding 'The Absolute'

Content:

Astus wrote:

Wondering about a concept that exists only in an English translation is unlikely to be fruitful. It was <https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=533367#p533367> to render terms like tathata and dharmadhatu as absolute. Here's his explanation from the introduction (p 16-17):

"Zen followers (who have much in common with mystics of other faiths) do not use the term 'God', being wary of its dualistic and anthropomorphic implications. They prefer to talk of 'the Absolute' or 'the One Mind', for which they employ many synonyms according to the aspect to be emphasized in relation to something finite. Thus, the word 'Buddha' is used as a synonym for the Absolute as well as in the sense of Gautama, the Enlightened One, for it is held that the two are identical. A Buddha's Enlightenment denotes an intuitive realization of his unity with the Absolute from which, after the death of his-body, nothing remains to divide him even in appearance. Of the Absolute nothing whatever can be postulated; to say that it exists excludes non-existence; to say that it does not exist excludes existence. Furthermore, Zen followers hold that the Absolute, or union with the Absolute, is not something to be attained; one does not enter Nirvana, for entrance to a place one has never left is impossible. The experience commonly called 'entering Nirvana' is, in fact, an intuitive realization of that Self-nature which is the true Nature of all things. The Absolute, or Reality, is regarded as having for sentient beings two aspects. The only aspect perceptible to the unenlightened is the one in which individual phenomena have a separate though purely transitory existence within the limits of space-time. The other aspect is spaceless and timeless; moreover all opposites, all distinctions and 'entities' of every kind, are here seen to be One. Yet neither is this second aspect, alone, the highest fruit of Enlightenment, as many contemplatives suppose; it is only when both aspects are perceived and reconciled that the beholder may be regarded as truly Enlightened. Yet, from that moment, he ceases to be the beholder, for he is conscious of no division between beholding and beheld. This leads to further paradoxes, unless the use of words is abandoned altogether. It is incorrect to employ such mystical terminology as 'I well in the Absolute', 'The Absolute dwells in me', or 'I am penetrated by the Absolute', etc.; for, when space is transcended, the concepts of whole and part are no longer valid; the part is the whole - I AM the Absolute, except that I am no longer 'I'. What I behold then is my real Self, which is the true nature of all things; see-er and seen are one and the same, yet there is no seeing, just as the eye cannot behold itself."

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 30th, 2020 at 4:51 PM

Title: Re: Zen's stand regarding 'The Absolute'

Content:

Wayfarer said:

the word 'absolute' is just a placeholder.

Astus wrote:

A placeholder for what? It seems that it requires specification, otherwise one habitually understands it according to whatever vague concept one associates with it, thus going to derail oneself right at the beginning and misinterpret the whole Dharma. Like for instance looking for some ultimate state to become, or trying to obtain some special insight from encounters.

But Huangbo taught quite directly what one can learn from almost any introductory book:

"Students of the Way should be sure that the four elements composing the body do not constitute the 'self, that the 'self' is not an entity; and that it can be deduced from this that the body is neither 'self' nor entity. Moreover, the five aggregates composing the mind (in the common sense) do not constitute either a 'self or an entity ; hence, it can be deduced that the (so-called individual) mind is neither 'self nor entity. The six sense organs (including the brain) which, together with their six types of perception and the six kinds of objects of perception, constitute the sensory world, must be understood in the same way. Those eighteen aspects of sense are separately and together void. There is only Mind-Source, limitless in extent and of absolute purity.

Thus, there is sensual eating and wise eating. When the body composed of the four elements suffers the pangs of hunger and accordingly you provide it with food, but without greed, that is called wise eating. On the other hand, if you gluttonously delight in purity and flavour, you are permitting the distinctions which arise from wrong thinking. Merely seeking to gratify the organ of taste without realizing when you have taken enough is called sensual eating."

(Blofeld, p 38-39)

In Buswell's translation (PDF p 53-55):

"Practitioners of the Way, have no doubt that the four great elements constitute the body, that these four great elements have no self, and that the self has no master. Know that this body has no self and no master. The five aggregates are mind, but the five aggregates have no self and no master. Know therefore that this mind has no self and no master. The six sense bases, six sense objects, and six sense consciousnesses come into contact with each other and become subject to production and cessation, so this is also the case with them as well. Since these eighteen elements of cognition are empty, everything is empty. There is only the original mind, which is serene and pure.

There is the nutriment of consciousness and the nutriment of wisdom. The body consisting of the four great elements is tormented by hunger and disease. Nurturing this body with only what it needs, without generating greed and craving, is called the nutriment of wisdom. Self-indulgently clinging to what is tasty, mistakenly giving rise to discrimination, seeking out only what pleases your taste buds, and without generating any sense of loathing — this is called the nutriment of consciousness."

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 30th, 2020 at 6:13 PM

Title: Re: Zen's stand regarding 'The Absolute'

Content:

npr said:

What do you think about that? Regardless if the correct translation is companionship (what's to companionship and to Brahma anyway??) or uonion with

Astus wrote:

Brahma is a type of gods in Buddhism, and through the practice of the

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Brahmavihara> one can gain

<https://www.accesstoinight.org/ptf/dhamma/sagga/loka.html>. It is not the ultimate goal of Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 30th, 2020 at 8:05 PM

Title: Re: Zen's stand regarding 'The Absolute'

Content:

Wayfarer said:

within the domain of discourse of comparative religion, 'the absolute' has a meaning, but that doesn't make it easy to define.

Astus wrote:

The question at hand is about "Zen's stand regarding 'The Absolute'", and as the term itself was taken from Blofeld's translation, it turned out that Huangbo's records did not actually name anything "The Absolute", but it's rather the translator's choice to render various common Buddhist terms as such. So it's not just that there is no absolute, nobody has even mentioned it before Blofeld.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 30th, 2020 at 9:22 PM

Title: Re: Zen's stand regarding 'The Absolute'

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I think 'the absolute' is not a bad candidate for translation of 'the unconditioned' (as used in, for instance, the translations in Sutta Central.) After all, nothing can be 'partially unconditioned'.

Astus wrote:

Where exactly is asaṅkhata translated as the absolute there? Also, translating it as unconditioned (as done by <https://suttacentral.net/an3.47/en/bodhi> and <https://suttacentral.net/an3.47/en/sujato>) seems quite reasonable, as it's the opposite of conditioned.

Blofeld does not translate it (無為) as the absolute.

"From thought-instant to thought-instant, no form; from thought-instant to thought-instant, no activity (無為) - that is to be a Buddha!"

(p 40)

"Its strength once spent, the arrow falls to earth.

You build up lives which won't fulfil your hopes.

How far below the Transcendental (無為) Gate

From which one leap will gain the Buddha's realm!"

(p 62)

"it is without any such distinctions as long and short, it is beyond attachment and activity (無為), ignorance and Enlightenment."

(p 63-64)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 30th, 2020 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: Zen's stand regarding 'The Absolute'

Content:

npr said:

That's not quite what what Gotama Buddha says in DN13. He refers to The Path

Astus wrote:

The attainment of the practice with the brahmaviharas is given in that sutta: "It's possible that that mendicant will, when the body breaks up, after death, be reborn in the company of Brahmā." That is not liberation. You can see in the <https://suttacentral.net/mn97/en/sujato> how the Buddha reprimanded Sariputta for only leading someone to birth in the "inferior Brahmā realm".

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 2nd, 2020 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Astus wrote:

What made the Soto church change its approach? Was it to purge it from "foreign elements" and return to Dogen's ideals? Apparently Dogen was <https://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=107&t=20655>.

Also, what could be lacking from the simple form of just sitting to require all the other elements added?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 3rd, 2020 at 1:31 AM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Astus wrote:

If just sitting is dropping body and mind, and dropping body and mind is great realisation, what need for anything else? Or is that not so?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 3rd, 2020 at 2:19 AM

Title: Re: The attainment in chan according to ten bhumis standard

Content:

Astus wrote:

Different people have different views on what level matches seeing the nature of mind, i.e. sudden realisation. It can be anything from the level of faith, through 1st and 8th stage, to buddhahood. But there's not much to any of that unless one can recognise for oneself that there is nothing to attain.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 3rd, 2020 at 5:10 AM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Matylda said:

Well, do people really think that they are Dogen's? It was his experience not others..

Astus wrote:

It's what Dogen taught, not just experienced. But if Dogen's teachings cannot be followed, then there can be no heirs to talk of, so what is Soto then?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 3rd, 2020 at 3:23 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Matylda said:

Soto has nothing special or different to offer, than any other zen school - it is satori, daigo and liberation. For this one has to work hard.

Astus wrote:

If practice is not realisation, but rather practice brings about realisation, then it is really nothing different. But then, why not just follow the established teachings of the Mahayana as taught in the sutras and shastras? That is a fairly well defined gradual path with identifiable goals and stages.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 4th, 2020 at 2:21 AM

Title: Re: What is the application of practicing nagarjuna middle way in real life?

Content:

confusedlayman said:

If someone reads and want to apply nagarjuna middle way discourse in real life, how would he do?

Astus wrote:

Apart from the mentioned

https://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Four_Hundred_Verses (see also <https://books.google.hu/books?id=9pyqUV89ZQcC>) and the

<https://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Bodhicharyavatara>, there are the https://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Precious_Garland and the https://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Letter_to_a_Friend by Nagarjuna, and the <https://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Shikshasamucchaya> by Santideva.

confusedlayman said:

will he know that all things have no position and simple dont have clinging or no intentional action? what is the real application in terms of experience ?

Astus wrote:

It's cultivating the six paramitas. See this great summary:

http://www.kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/n6p_book_page.htm.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 5th, 2020 at 2:18 PM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Nicholas2727 said:

why would one choose Mahayana (The much slower school) versus Vajrayana (The much quicker school?)

Astus wrote:

That's a somewhat false dichotomy. Mahayana is the largest group of teachings after Buddhism. There are Chinese Mahayana (the primary canonical language being Chinese) and Tibetan Mahayana (the primary canon being in Tibetan), and they have different histories. Both forms have various teachings and traditions, including the concept of buddhahood in this life/body.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 5th, 2020 at 8:47 PM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Dan74 said:

Who actually practices Sutrayana, as understood by the Tibetan Buddhists?

Könchok Thrinley said:

Those who do not follow tantric teachings and methods. Zennies, theravadins, purelanders, etc.

Astus wrote:

Sutrayana, as understood in Tibetan Buddhism, exists only in Tibetan Buddhism, and as such, only Tibetan Buddhists could be sutrayana followers, as it is their view of Mahayana. Those who do not subscribe to the Tibetan interpretation of sutrayana naturally cannot follow it either.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 5th, 2020 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Könchok Thrinley said:

These systematic things are actually quite frustrating to apply, but nice for overview of what dharma has to offer.

Astus wrote:

Every school/tradition sets up its own system, their interpretation and organisation of the various teachings they recognise as valid. Therefore such systems are meant to highlight what that specific school believes to be the final view, and not to give a general ("objective") overview of Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 8th, 2020 at 3:33 AM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Malcolm said:

That definition is an Indian Buddhist definition, not Tibetan.

Astus wrote:

Originally might be so, but even there postulated only by Tantrikas, however, currently it exists only in Tibetan Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 9th, 2020 at 7:07 PM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

jmlee369 said:

Hasn't the exoteric/esoteric (顯/密) division been used in East Asia since the Tang dynasty?

Astus wrote:

On what was called secret/esoteric, see:

https://www.academia.edu/25175930/Is_there_really_Esoteric_Buddhism

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 10th, 2020 at 4:33 AM

Title: Re: Host & Guest - Explanation?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Host is emptiness, the essence, the nature of mind, while guest means phenomena. It's from the http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/surangama.pdf (p 49-50, 51):

'(foreign dust) is like a guest who stops at an inn where he passes the night or eats something and then packs and continues his journey because he cannot stay longer. As to the host of the inn, he has nowhere to go. My deduction is that one who does not stay is a guest and one who stays is a host. Consequently, a thing is "foreign" when it does not stay. Again, when the sun rises in a clear sky and its light enters (the house) through an opening, the dust is seen to dance in the ray of light whereas the empty space does not move. I deduce that that which is still is the void and that which moves is the dust. Consequently, a thing is "dust" when it moves.

...

The Buddha then declared to the assembly: "So every worldly man knows that what moves is dust. and that he who does not stay is a guest. You have seen Ananda whose head moved of itself whereas his seeing was unmoved. You have also seen my fist which opened and closed of itself whereas his seeing neither expanded nor contracted. Why do you still regard the moving as your body and surroundings, and so, from beginning to end, allow your thoughts to rise and fall without interruption, thereby losing (sight of) your true nature and indulging in backward actions? By missing the (True) Mind of your nature and by mistaking (illusory) objects for your Selves, you allow yourselves to be caught in the wheel (of samsara) thereby forcing yourselves to pass through transmigrations."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 10th, 2020 at 5:48 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment and compassion

Content:

White Sakura said:

just a question to this quote, since I do not know that text you quoted, but I am so fascinated to this analogy with the moon. I suppose, the title of that script refers to the analogy? And is it in Mahamudra understood in the same way as it is explained in the Prajnaparamita Sutras, and later the Mahayana texts?

Astus wrote:

Here "moonlight" refers to mahamudra itself.

"I will present an eloquent explanation of this moonlight [Mahamudra].

In its full phase it will contain the meanings of the sūtras and tantras

And reveal the true nature of reality

As clearly as the outline of "the rabbit" [in the moon].

Let there be peace in those who wander in the darkness of delusion!"

(Mahamudra the Moonlight, p 5)

White Sakura said:

So are there different ways the moon-reflection-in-water-analogy is used to explain different teachings?

Astus wrote:

The analogy of "water moon" is a different one.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 10th, 2020 at 7:00 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment and compassion

Content:

White Sakura said:

can you quote it and explain? The text seems to be not secret, since you quote it often?

Astus wrote:

I don't know what you want quoted, it is a common analogy for the illusory nature of phenomena. It is not elaborated upon by Tashi Namgyal.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 10th, 2020 at 8:14 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment and compassion

Content:

White Sakura said:

I understood you wanted to say that in Mahamudra the moonlight the moonlight is used for another analogy? If not, I am just happy because I like the analogy very much in the common way explaining it. So that would mean the title of the book refers to that traditional analogy.

Astus wrote:

The word moonlight in the title refers to the enlightened state of mahamudra, to the clarity of the mind. The analogy of the water moon is not related to it.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 11th, 2020 at 2:50 PM

Title: Re: Host & Guest - Explanation?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Xuyun provided a bit of an explanation on host and guest (from <https://www.emptycloud.net/articles-2/chan-meditation-%E7%A6%85/the-chan-training/?cn-reloaded=1>):

"How should one start the (Ch'an) training? In the Surangama assembly, Arya Ajnatakaundinya talked about the two words 'Foreign Dust' and this is just where we should begin our training. He said: 'For instance, a traveler stops at an inn where he passes the night or takes his meal, and as soon as he has done so, he packs and continues his journey, because he has no time to stay longer. As for the host (of the inn), he has nowhere to go. My deduction is that the one who does not stay is the guest and the one who does stay is the host. Therefore, a thing is foreign when it does not stay. Again in a clear sky, when the sun rises and sunlight enters (the house) through an opening, the dust is seen moving in the ray of light whereas the empty space is unmoving. Therefore, that which is still is voidness and that which moves is dust.'

Foreign dust illustrates false thinking, and voidness illustrates self-nature, that is the permanent host who does not follow the guest in the latter's coming and going. This serves to illustrate the eternal (unmoving) self-nature which does not follow false thinking in its sudden rise and fall. Therefore, it is said: 'if one is unmindful of all things, one will meet with no inconvenience when surrounded by all things.' By dust which moves of itself and does not inconvenience voidness which is clearly still, one means that false thinking rises and falls by itself and does not hinder the self-nature which is immutable in its Bhutatathata (suchness, thatness) condition. This is the meaning of the saying: 'If the mind does not arise, all things are blameless.'

(The meaning of) the above word 'foreign' is coarse and (that of) 'dust' is fine. Beginners should clearly understand (the difference between) 'host' and 'guest' and will thus not be 'drifted about' by false thinking. By advancing further, they will be clear about 'voidness' and 'dust' and thus will experience no inconvenience from false thinking. It is said: 'when (false thinking) is known, there will be no harm.' If you inquire carefully into and understand all this, over half of what the training means will become quite clear to you."

There is also a somewhat unrelated use of the terms that's called Linji's four guests and hosts (see Record of Linji, tr Sasaki, p 23-24). Here's Hyujeong's summary (from Seongagwigam in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 3, p 178):

"The guest in the guest (means) the student (who is) without a clue but who has (meaningless) questions and answers. The host in the guest is the student with a clue, who has a host and a dharma. The guest in the host is the master without a clue, who has only the questions (of the student but no answers). The host in the host is the master with a clue, which is very special."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 18th, 2020 at 5:06 AM

Title: Re: Zen/Attain True Self

Content:

shanyin said:

Can someone explain what one's true self is?

Astus wrote:

"Mahayana Buddhism is based on the philosophy of emptiness (ku in Japanese, shunyata in Sanskrit) of both subject and object. In order to explain emptiness which cannot be grasped by concepts, Buddhist philosophers use various terms such as tathata, 'true-self', 'one-mind', 'original-face', 'Dharma-body of the Buddha', 'buddhamind', etc. We must be careful not to grasp these terms as a kind of substantial existence."

(<https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/leaflet/heartofzen/index.html>, p89n122)

shanyin said:

To attain your true self what do you need to do besides being awake here and now?

Astus wrote:

'Kensho: (J., "seeing nature") A Zen term referring to an enlightenment experience in which one perceives one's own true self-nature as "empty," devoid of fixed reality. Kensho is synonymous with the Japanese Zen term satori, but the latter is considered to be a deeper and more significant experience of emptiness than kensho. See also Shunyata.'

(The Method of No-method, p 142)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 22nd, 2020 at 3:34 PM

Title: Re: I am struggling. Was consciousness the most important aggregate according to the Buddha?

Content:

Tom2892 said:

Is consciousness the same as awareness? Is the consciousness that is described as an aggregate the same as Rigpa? If this consciousness really was unconditioned, why don't the Pali Suttas mention to focus on "the one who knows" at all? (at least in my poor knowledge).

Astus wrote:

Consciousness (vijnana), the aggregate, is not apart from the other mental aggregates (<https://accesstosight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.054.than.html>), nor does it exist apart from something to be conscious of

(<https://www.accesstosight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.067.than.html>), and there is no sense in talking of "one who knows" (<https://suttacentral.net/sn12.12/en/bodhi>)

when consciousness is understood to be a dependent phenomenon not apart from other appearances. Knowing, cognizance, the function/ability to be aware of or conscious of things is the role and distinct quality of the consciousness aggregate, but it's not the sole mental function there is. Also, it is usually the formations (samskara) aggregate that people identify with mainly, although among those who practice some form of meditation the position of being the "knower", "bare awareness", "watcher", etc. is a popular concept of self.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2020 at 3:40 PM

Title: Re: Im getting close to understanding anatman but still have some objections

Content:

Artziebetter1 said:

prakasha gives rise to vimarsha.what if prakasha is inactive but vimarsha is what changes?

Astus wrote:

If something can be a cause, then it changes (active), and what changes is impermanent.

Artziebetter1 said:

Objection:what if the Tirthika states that only Brahman exists ,and that other objects are merely brahman aswell? the one inherently existant entity is merely interacting with itself.

Astus wrote:

Atman is necessarily singular. Many objects mean multiplicity. So atman/brahman interacting with itself is not possible.

Artziebetter1 said:

the one brahman Hypostasis multiplies itself into many hypostasises thru concealment (thru its omnipotent power to do the impossible it conceals and cloaks the one Consciousness into many conscious entities)

Astus wrote:

If brahman can do all that, then it is not only active (so impermanent), but also self-deluding and falling apart.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2020 at 11:44 PM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

The key distinction is many methods involving the body to generate bliss and make clear the wisdom. Sutras have only samatha-vipassanma. That's just the way it is.

Astus wrote:

Bliss (sukha) is present in the first three dhyanas, but eventually the yogi lets go of that too in the fourth. As for the "many methods", could you specifically name some others not related to the one method of candali? Also, generation and completion stage practices fit under the categories of samatha and vipasyana.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2020 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Astus: this is grouping of creation and completion stages under the rubric of śamatha and vipaśyanā is a kind of Lam rim politics.

Astus wrote:

Might be so, but such a summary of the so called sutrayana could be called a rough generalisation as well, and quite often the two are practised as one.

Malcolm said:

There are many methods related to mantra recitation, maṇḍala offerings, guru yoga, samaya, mudras, homavidhi and so on, nāḍis, vāyus, bindus, cakras, postural yogas, prāṇāyāma, abhiṣeka as introduction to the path, rather than sign of attaining the result, and so on. You will find none of these methods mentioned in sūtra, apart from the term "mantra," maṇḍala, and abhiṣeka in very limited contexts.

Astus wrote:

Are they all methods to generate bliss? As for the presence of manifold methods in vajrayana, no doubt about that. At the same time, even to prepare for samatha there are various methods in sutrayana too, not to mention all the others. For instance, in <https://ymba.org/books/taming-monkey-mind-guide-pure-land-practice> there are 48 methods just for buddha-recollection.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2020 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Malcolm said:

In other words, common Mahāyāna has many methods. However, in addition to those methods are many unshared or uncommon methods which are not found in sūtra. So by definition, Secret Mantra has more methods.

Astus wrote:

Of course.

Malcolm said:

And no, they are not just methods for generating bliss.

Astus wrote:

A that's why I asked if there are many methods to generate bliss, or simply many methods among which some may use bliss.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2020 at 4:03 PM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Varis said:

It often feels like these arguments about Ch'an v. Vajrayana originate in the fact that Ch'an offers many of the same benefits Vajrayana claims to offer exclusively. Namely, Buddhahood in a single lifetime, the integration of daily life and the sense pleasures, etc. Although I'll admit that Vajrayana has many more methods, particularly when it comes to the intermediate state.

Malcolm said:

Where does Chan promise Buddhahood in one lifetime?

Astus wrote:

The most famous is the Platform Sutra that advocates for "sudden enlightenment" that is a hallmark of Chan teachings. Just look at how Huineng begins:

'The Great Master told the assembly, "Good friends, bodhi is fundamentally pure in its self-nature. You must simply use this mind [that you already have], and you will achieve buddhahood directly and completely. Good friends, listen well! This is the story of how I practiced and attained the Dharma."

(Platform Sutra, ch 1, BDK ed, p 17)

Then throughout the scripture he explains the sudden teaching.

'To use wisdom to contemplate all the dharmas without grasping or rejecting is to see the nature and accomplish the enlightenment of buddhahood.'

(ch 2, p 31)

'Transcending delusion and transcending enlightenment, one should always generate prajñā. Eradicating the true and eradicating the false, one sees the buddha-nature. This is to accomplish the enlightenment of buddhahood upon hearing these words.'

(ch 6, p 49)

The central method of Chan, translated here as nonthought, is itself equated with buddhahood:

'Good friends, to be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is for the myriad dharmas to be completely penetrated. To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to see the realms of [all] the buddhas. To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to arrive at the stage of buddhahood.'

(ch 2, p 34)

And to be clear, it talks not only of sudden enlightenment, but also sudden cultivation:

'The self-nature is without error, without stupidity, and without disruption. In moment after moment of thought, prajñā illuminates, constantly transcending the characteristics of dharmas. Independent and autonomous, he apprehends everything—how could there be any positing? The self-nature becomes enlightened itself, sudden enlightenment and sudden cultivation. There is no gradual progression. Therefore, one does not posit all the dharmas. The dharmas are quiescent—how could there be a progression?'

(ch 8, p 75)

On that point, here's Buswell's summary from the introduction of Bird in Flight Leaves no Trace:

'The answer of both Subul Sunim and Huangbo is deceptively simple: just stop thinking there is something we need to practice. Then the enlightenment inherent to the mind manifests itself naturally, and we spontaneously receive the transmission of the mind-dharma. In this way, religious practice is perfected through, and simultaneously with, enlightenment itself. This is the quintessential “sudden awakening accompanied by sudden cultivation” (Chinese dunwu dunxiu, Korean dono donsū 頓悟頓修) approach that has inspired Seon practice throughout much of its history.'

A bit more from Buswell (and Lopez) on the topic of sudden enlightenment:

<https://tricycle.org/trikedaily/slow-motion-satori/>.

In Huangbo's words:

'Trainees who wish to achieve Buddhahood [should understand that] it is completely useless to study any of the Buddhist teachings — just study nonseeking and nonattachment. Nonseeking is for the mind (i.e., moments of thought) not to be generated, and nonattachment is for the mind not to be extinguished. Neither generating nor extinguishing—this is Buddhahood. The eighty-four thousand teachings are directed at the eighty-four thousand afflictions and are only ways to convert and entice [sentient beings into true religious practice]. Fundamentally all the teachings are nonexistent; transcendence is the Dharma, and those who understand transcendence are Buddhas. By simply transcending all the afflictions, there is no dharma that can be attained.'

(Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, ch 4, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 20)

Further on the path of sudden enlightenment, this one from Huangbo's teacher Baizhang Huaihai:

'Question: What is the essential method for sudden enlightenment in the great vehicle?

The master said,

You all should first put an end to all involvements and lay to rest all concerns; do not remember or recollect anything at all, whether good or bad, mundane or transcendental - do not engage in thoughts. Let go of body and mind, set them free.

With mind like wood or stone, not explaining anything with the mouth, mind not going anywhere, then the mind ground becomes like space, wherein the sun of wisdom naturally appears. It is as though the clouds had opened and the sun emerged.

Just put an end to all fettering connections, and feelings of greed, hatred, craving, defilement and purity all come to an end. Unmoved in the face of the five desires and eight influences, not choked up by seeing, hearing, discerning or knowing, not confused by anything, naturally endowed with all virtues and the inconceivable use of all paranormal powers, this is someone who is free.

In the presence of all things in the environment, to have a mind neither still nor disturbed, neither concentrated nor distracted, passing through all sound and form without lingering or obstruction, is called being a wayfarer.

Not setting in motion good, evil, right or wrong, not clinging to a single thing, not rejecting a single thing, is called being a member of the great vehicle.

Not bound by any good or evil, emptiness or existence, defilement or purity, doing or nondoing, mundane or transcendental, virtue or knowledge, is called enlightened wisdom. Once affirmation and negation, like and dislike, approval and disapproval, all various opinions and feelings come to an end and cannot bind you, then you are free wherever you may be; this is called a bodhisattva at the moment of inspiration immediately ascending to the stage of Buddhahood.'

(Sayings and Doings of Pai-Chang, p 78)

And from Baizhang's Dharma-brother Dazhu Huihai:

'Sudden Enlightenment means liberation during this lifetime. Just as a lion-cub, from the moment it is born, is a real lion, likewise anyone who practices the Sudden-Enlightenment method has, from the moment he begins his practice, already entered the Buddha-Stage. Just as the bamboo-shoots growing in springtime are not different from the parent bamboo-shoots, because they are also empty inside, likewise anyone who practices the Sudden-Enlightenment method to rid himself suddenly of false thought abandons, like the Buddhas, the sense of an ego and a personality forever. Being absolutely deep, still and void, he is, then, without an iota of difference, equal to the Buddhas.'

(<https://www.ymba.org/books/entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment/treatise-entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment>)

See more from two modern Chan teachers:

<https://chancenter.org/chanctr/ddp/channews/02-1996.html> by Sheng-yen

<http://middleland.org/teachings/gradual-cultivation-and-sudden-enlightenment/> by Wei Chueh

Malcolm said:

Zen exhibits rhetorical borrowing from Shingon and Tendai Esoteric Buddhism.

Astus wrote:

Tendai got mixed with mantra in Japan, it's a work of Saicho.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2020 at 6:03 PM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

These are not sutras from Buddha. They are pith instructions from lineage masters. We can talk about where Bodhidharma got those.

Astus wrote:

The question was "Where does Chan promise Buddhahood in one lifetime?", and the quotes are from generally accepted Chan classics.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2020 at 9:15 PM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Malcolm said:

These quotes are not promises.

Astus wrote:

They described the method of sudden enlightenment that is equal to buddhahood. But if you want something in the format of a promise:

'Those who cultivate in this fashion will definitely accomplish the enlightenment of buddhahood, transforming the three poisons into morality, meditation, and wisdom.'
(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 30)

'If you recognize your own mind and see the nature, you will definitely accomplish the enlightenment of buddhahood.'
(ch 2, p 32)

'If you recognize the self-nature, with a single [experience of] enlightenment you will attain the stage of buddhahood.'
(ch 2, p 33)

'Good friends, those who attain my Dharma in later generations will see and practice according to this sudden teaching exactly as I have explained. Because they will generate the vow [to attain buddhahood] and maintain it just as if they are serving the Buddha, they will not regress during their entire lives and will definitely enter the stage of sagehood.'
(ch 2, p 34)

'If people of later times understand the point of this verse, they will see their own fundamental minds and achieve the enlightenment of buddhahood.'
(ch 10. p 90)

Malcolm said:

Yes, they all speak of the possibility of buddhahood in a single life, but have no method of ensuring the same.

Astus wrote:

The method to see the nature of mind is explained again and again, and when the nature is seen, that is attaining enlightenment.

'To practice in every moment of thought is called the true nature. To be enlightened to this Dharma is the Dharma of prajñā, to cultivate this practice is the practice of prajñā. To not cultivate this is to be an ordinary [unenlightened] person. To cultivate this in a single moment of thought is to be equivalent to the Buddha in one's own body.'
(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 30)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2020 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

I still do not see a method. Cultivate what? Prajna? So how is that done?

Malcolm said:

Again, what is the practice method?

Astus wrote:

'What is nonthought? If in seeing all the dharmas, the mind is not defiled or attached, this is nonthought. [The mind's] functioning pervades all locations, yet it is not attached to all the locations. Just purify the fundamental mind, causing the six consciousnesses to emerge from the six [sensory] gates, [causing one to be] without defilement or heterogeneity within the six types of sensory data (literally, the "six dusts"), autonomous in the coming and going [of mental phenomena], one's penetrating function without stagnation. This is the samādhi of prajñā, the autonomous emancipation. This is called the practice of nonthought.'
(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 33-34)

'Within continuing moments of thought one should not think of the previous [mental] realm. If one thinks of the previous thought, the present thought, and the later thought, one's thoughts will be continuous without cease. This is called 'fettered.' If one's thoughts do not abide in the dharmas, this is to be 'unfettered.' Thus it is that nonabiding is taken as the fundamental.'
(ch 4, p 43)

Some contemporary explanations:

<https://www.lionsroar.com/does-no-thought-mean-no-thought/>

<https://www2.kenyon.edu/Depts/Religion/Fac/Adler/Reln360/Shengyan-zuochan.htm>

<https://www.buddhistinquiry.org/article/silent-illumination/>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2020 at 11:23 PM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Malcolm said:

What distinguishes this from prajñāpāramitā?

Astus wrote:

It is prajnaparamita.

'Good friends, 'mahāprajñāpāramitā' is the most honored, the supreme, the primary. It is without abiding [in the present], without going [into the past], and without coming [from the future]. It is from this that all the buddhas of the three periods of time emerge. One should use this great wisdom to destroy the enervating defilements of the afflictions of the five skandhas. Those who cultivate in this fashion will definitely accomplish the enlightenment of buddhahood, transforming the three poisons into morality, meditation, and wisdom.'

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 30)

Malcolm said:

Again, the point is that Chan is a sūtric tradition. It proposes no methods not found in a hundred Mahāyāna sūtras.

Astus wrote:

I did not debate that.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2020 at 1:11 AM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Malcolm said:

So, your method is simply to rest in the direct perception of the six senses? How is this different than the direct perception of a harrier or a rabbit?

Astus wrote:

'yet it is not attached to all the locations', 'without defilement or heterogeneity', 'penetrating function without stagnation' is/are the difference.

Or in <https://ymba.org/books/entering-tao-sudden-enlightenment/treatise-entering-> tao-sudden-enlightenment:

'Q: What does "not dwelling anywhere or on anything" mean?

A: Not to dwell anywhere or on anything means not to dwell on good or evil, existence or non-existence, within or without or on the middle, nor on concentration nor dispersion, and neither to dwell on the void nor on the non-void. This is the meaning of "not dwelling anywhere or on anything". Just this alone is real abiding. This stage of achievement is also the non-abiding Mind, and the non-abiding Mind is the Buddha Mind.'

...

'In summary, if no thought about these three time periods arises, then the three time periods do not exist. If a thought of moving arises, do not follow it; and the thought of moving will vanish. If a thought of dwelling arises, do not follow it; and the thought of dwelling will vanish. However, grasping at the thought of non-dwelling is abiding in non-dwelling. On the other hand, if you understand clearly that your mind does not abide anywhere whatsoever that is abiding, then you are neither abiding nor not abiding anywhere. If you understand clearly that your mind does not abide anywhere at all, then you are clearly seeing your Original Mind, which is also referred to as "clearly seeing the nature of seeing." Just this Mind, that abides nowhere at all, is the Mind of Buddha and the Mind of liberation, the Mind of Bodhi and the Mind of the Uncreate.'

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2020 at 1:15 AM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Malcolm said:

So we are agreed then. Chan is a sutric tradition.

Astus wrote:

As Hyujeong summarised:

'The transmission of the mind by the World Honored One at three sites is the gist of Seon; what was spoken by him over his lifetime is the gate of Doctrine. Therefore it is said, "Seon is the Buddha mind; Doctrine is the Buddha word."'

(Seonga gwigam, §5, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 3, p 58)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2020 at 2:01 AM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Still a sutric tradition.

Astus wrote:

Indeed. The Buddha's mind and the Buddha's words cannot be in disharmony.

Malcolm said:
Still just prajñāpāramitā.

Astus wrote:
Sure it is. There is no claim to the contrary.

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2020 at 2:05 AM
Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?
Content:

White Sakura said:
Do you see an essential difference here to what is taught in Vajrayana? I mean, not in the Tantric teachings with visualization of course...

Astus wrote:
It's all Buddhadharma, there can be no essential difference, but there can be practical differences.

'When one is endowed with the meaning of emptiness, there is not a single thing which is not included in this path'
(Jewel Ornament of Liberation, p 252)

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2020 at 2:16 AM
Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?
Content:

Malcolm said:
Then, people should just give it a rest when Tibetan Buddhists assign Chan to sūtra.

Astus wrote:
I think it's less about whether it is sutra based or not, and more about how tantra is posited as superior.

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2020 at 5:38 AM
Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?
Content:

Malcolm said:
Chan, like all other sūtra traditions, lacks direct introduction.

Astus wrote:
Do you mean that there are no empowerments in sutra? Still, since the nature of mind is directly perceived in the sutrayana, the goal of the empowerments is achieved there too, so, as you noted before, it is the method that is different. But if we talk of Chan, the very meaning of sudden awakening is not going through stages using various skilful means to eventually attain realisation, but obtaining it directly. Then what methods can be talked about? Of course, in Chan there were various methods used and devised, 'Still, to even speak about practice is really like the last alternative. For example, in the use of weapons, they are really not auspicious objects! But they are used as the last alternative [in battles].', as noted by

<http://www.chancenter.org/chancctr/ddp/talks/beginners-m.html>. Among such methods, when needed, mantra is very much accepted as an option, as Hanshan also stated: 'If your practice of huatou is not taking effect, or that you're unable to contemplate and illuminate your mind, or you're simply incapable of applying yourself to the practice, then you should practice prostrations, read the sutras, and engage yourself in repentance. You may also recite mantras to receive the secret seal of the Buddhas; it will alleviate your hindrances.'

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2020 at 5:36 PM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Malcolm said:

What I am claiming is that there is no direct introduction in sūtra. In sūtra, the nature of the mind, to use your term, is the result of the path, whether gradual or not, not the basis. In sūtra, one does not start at the nature of the mind because it is never directly introduced and no methods are provided for such an introduction. ... The principle difference is that in the case of the former, the interested student is first introduced to their own state by the teacher; in the case of the latter, the teacher confirms for the student they indeed have had a proper intuition of the nature of the mind.

Astus wrote:

Could you be more specific about what you mean here by direct introduction? If it's <https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=306715#p306715>, then that is not a method, and according to the story, did not happen at the beginning. If you mean here something more systematic, like as it is in mahamudra where one first has to actually ascertain for oneself the real state of one's nature, and then it is also pointed out by the master, then the order of things is rather "sutra style", but to that you might say is because it's sutra mahamudra. And that's why I asked if what you meant were the empowerments, as that is actually a requirement to engage in the various vajrayana methods.

I assume you don't mean that non-vajrayana teachers cannot tell how to do insight meditation in order to see directly the nature of mind and all phenomena. And since that is already covered in the sutras themselves, direct introduction must be something else, where a disciple does not have to follow specific instructions to attain realisation, but will have realisation without actually looking into their mind. So for instance a case like this cannot be called direct introduction:

"Huiming bowed to me and said, 'I wish that you would preach the Dharma for me.' I said, 'You say you've come for the Dharma. [If so], you must eliminate the various conditions and not generate a single thought. [If you do], I will preach the Dharma for you.' Huiming was quiet for a time. I said, 'Do not think of good, and do not think of evil. At just such a time, what is Elder Huiming's original face?' At these words, Huiming [experienced] a great enlightenment."

(Platform Sutra, ch 1, BDK ed, p 25)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 26th, 2020 at 4:34 AM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Astus wrote:

On Zen and Esoteric connections, from Esoteric Buddhism and the Tantras in East Asia:

Evidence of some Zhenyan influence, mostly of some Northern Chan teachers, more so of Baotang Chan followers, but only tentatively any Hongzhou Chan masters.
(Sorensen, p 298–302)

Esoteric elements in Seon since 15th century. Heoung Pou (-1566), a prominent Seon master (was royal advisor), was also an Esoteric teacher, in his works mainly dharanis and mantras show up, wrote some ritual texts, and there is a work where he merges Seon doctrine with Esoteric practices. Cheongheo Hyujeong (1520-1604) was another outstanding Seon master adept in Esoteric Buddhism as well.
(Sorensen, p 634–42)

Keizan introduced esoteric practices to Soto, but at the same time criticised Eisai's Rinzai Zen for being polluted by it. Esoteric methods' presence in Zen is primarily in the form dharanis and rituals. Menzan Zuiho (1683-1769) received Shingon initiations (plus studied Sanskrit and mudras) in order to reform the ambrosia gate ritual performed during the Ghost Festival to relieve the suffering of the dead. As a result of Menzan's overall reforms old initiation documents from Soto are now public and they show a presence of tantric and explicit Shingon elements.
(Bodiford, 925-935)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 26th, 2020 at 4:44 AM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Meido said:

A lot was lost in China. That is why someone like Xuyun had to "revive" some Chan lineages that went extinct, and his descendant Sheng-yen needed to reformulate and revive practices like silent illumination.

Astus wrote:

What do you mean lost? Buddhism (both monastic and lay communities) has been continuous in China for about two thousand years. The "revival" of the three discontinued lineages is rather nominal, just as the lineages of Linji and Caodong are mostly nominal without any practical relevance.

Meido said:

Whatever one thinks about Japanese Buddhism, they at least were able to preserve Tang and Song lineages for us.

Astus wrote:

Soto lineage transmission (among other elements) was reformed in the 18th century, and similarly all Rinzai lineages go back to the 18th century reforms of Hakuin.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 26th, 2020 at 7:47 PM

Title: Re: Non-conceptual

Content:

avatamsaka3 said:

What does it mean to have a "direct, non-conceptual view of emptiness"? How can this non-conceptual characteristic be described? And which classical sources describe this view as the goal?

Astus wrote:

One first learns about insubstantiality, then understands the concept, and then confirms its validity in experience through cultivation, that indeed there is no substance, no independent experience, state, or being to rely on. What divides the conceptual comprehension from ascertainment in experience is whether one has actually investigated in one's present experience or merely thought about it. Calling it a "non-conceptual view" might be a misleading term, as the whole point is to realise that all views are fabricated, conceptual, and such concepts are actually baseless and insignificant. The point is not to gain a special perception or state of mind, but by seeing all of them as inessential not holding on to them, not identifying with them, and thus attaining freedom.

Ultimate truth is free of all conceptual projection. It is of two types: the ultimate truth that can be expressed, and the ultimate truth that cannot be expressed. ... What is empty of all conceptual projection, clear and subtle, is known as the "ultimate truth that cannot be expressed in words." The ultimate truth is approximately this: totally empty of the two extremes of "being" and "nonbeing" (i.e., neither eternal nor totally nonexistent).

(Summary on the Meaning of the Middle Way by Bhavaviveka, v 4, 7-8, in Indian Madhyamaka Buddhist Philosophy after Nagarjuna by Richard H. Jones, vol 1)

What is the absence of discrimination (nirvikalpata)? In brief, it is threefold: [1] non-discrimination in contentment (samtustinirvikalpata), [2] non-discrimination in the absence of perverse views (aviparyasanirvikalpata), and [3] nondiscrimination in the absence of idle speculations (nisprapancanirvikalpata). One should consider these three kinds as pertaining respectively to the ordinary man (prthagjana), the disciple (sravaka) and the bodhisattva. Non-discrimination in the absence of idle speculation should not be understood as nonthought (amanasikara), or as going beyond thought (manasikarasamatikrama) or as appeasement (vyupasama), or as [own-]nature (svabhava), or as a mental construction concerning an object (alambane abhisamskara), but as a mental non-construction concerning an object (alambane anabhisamskara).

(Abhidharmasamuccaya, tr Boin-Webb, p 240)

The ultimate is one only. Others maintain that it is twofold. How can the nature of reality (chos nyid), which cannot be established as anything, be two, three, and so on? [The ultimate] is defined as nonarising, noncessation, and so forth according to the formula [given] by treatises. Because of the way in which different ultimates do not exist, there is neither a subject (chos can) nor its property (chos nyid) [for inferential reasoning]. There is not any differentiation in emptiness. When cognized in a nonconceptual manner, it is conventionally designated that “emptiness is seen.” It is said in the very profound sūtras that the state of nonseeing is seeing [ultimate reality]. In that (ultimate reality), there is neither seeing nor seer, but peace without beginning or end. [Reality is] devoid of entity and nonentity, free from conceptions, free from objects, without support, without basis, without coming or going, unexemplified, ineffable, invisible, unchanging, and unconditioned. If a yogi realizes that, the afflictive and cognitive obstructions are eliminated.

(Entry to the Two Realities by Atisa, v 4-9, in Jewels of the Middle Way by James B. Apple)

In this way, when the person does not firmly apprehend the entity of a thing as ultimately existing; having investigated it with wisdom, the practitioner engages in non-conceptual single-pointed concentration. And thus the identitylessness of all phenomena is realized.

(Kamalashila, in Stages of Meditation by The Dalai Lama, p 133)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 26th, 2020 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Back to the reason to choose Vajrayana: done well there is not much to study. You just do yoga.

Astus wrote:

If the absence of studying is a reason, I don't know anything less intellectually challenging and at the same time 100% liberating path than buddha-recollection:

"Reciting the nembutsu does not come from studying and understanding its meaning. There is no other reason or cause by which we can utterly believe in attaining birth in the Pure Land than the nembutsu itself. ... Even if those who believe in the nembutsu study the teaching which Shakyamuni taught his whole life, they should not put on any airs and should sincerely practice the nembutsu, just as an illiterate fool, a nun or one who is ignorant of Buddhism."

(<http://www.jodo.org/teachings/teachings02.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 27th, 2020 at 5:23 AM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Buddha recollection will not result in Buddhahood in one life. Yoga does.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean anybody who did yoga - whatever that means - once for ten minutes attains buddhahood in this life? Or if one does yoga very well for thirty years, buddhahood is guaranteed to happen then? Because those who faithfully recite the name of Amitabha even just ten times are guaranteed to be born in Sukhavati, and once there, buddhahood is guaranteed as well, no fall back possible. So although one may practise yoga throughout one's life, unless buddhahood was actually attained, one should still aim to be born in Sukhavati.

As Thrangu Rinpoche says in chapter 12 of Luminous Clarity:

'To be reborn in most of the great pure realms, one needs an immeasurable store of merit. There is an exception to this, however, which is the pure realm of Sukhavati. Although it is hard to get in to an authentic pure realm, it is easy to be born into the realm of Sukhavati because of the aspiration of the Buddha Amitabha. So Karma Chagme advises us to make the intense aspiration to achieve rebirth in Sukhavati because if we are not born in a pure realm, then we might be reborn in one of the higher realms within samsara, which is still samsara. So we wish to achieve awakening through the practice of the generation and completion stages and the practice of Mahamudra and Dzogchen. But if this does not happen, we can ensure that we are reborn in a pure realm. We are therefore advised to aspire for a rebirth in Sukhavati.'

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 27th, 2020 at 8:18 PM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The easiest way to get into the pure lands is to receive complete Dzogchen teachings, understand them, and then fail to practice them. No prayers necessary.

Astus wrote:

Why would it be easier to learn and understand complete (what counts as complete?) Dzogchen teachings, instead of reciting Amitabha's name right now? Also, how can Dzogchen studies result in birth in Sukhavati, what is the cause for that?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 27th, 2020 at 8:24 PM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Malcolm said:

All of our beginningless past-life samsaric experience is actually stored in our present physical form, which is the expression of traces of karma and affliction.

Astus wrote:

Actually stored as physical elements, or some version of avijnapti-rupa, or is it more like there is a correlation between the alayavijnana and the body?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 27th, 2020 at 8:30 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

Dan74 said:

everyone who deserved the name 'Zen teacher'

Astus wrote:

Zen teacher, as in anyone who somebody called a Zen teacher, or anyone who received such a title from an organisation, or what version do you mean?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 27th, 2020 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Pure lands are said to be 500 super long times or so. I mean the yoga of two stages, yoga of rushen, etc. It is done as a teacher explains.

Malcolm said:

Yes, when taking birth in the pure lands, there is no guarantee one will take rebirth in an open lotus. And even then, it takes thousands upon thousands of human years (I figured it out once and reported the length of time somewhere in this board) to attain awakening. By contrast, Dzogchen teachings promise that if one takes birth in the pure lands as a result of having encountered and understood Dzogchen teachings, full awakening, buddhahood, will happen there in as little as 500 human years.

Astus wrote:

There are some calculations and explanations given on how and why birth in Sukhavati is the fastest way <https://purelanders.com/2011/12/10/the-fastest-way-to-buddhahood-is-via-birth-in-pure-land/>. To that it might be added that all teachings are available there, and the realm is ideal to perfect them.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 28th, 2020 at 5:14 AM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

clayde said:

they have had some direct realization.

Astus wrote:

Direct realisation of what? BTW, I think most people who stick with the Dharma do so because they find it beneficial. Whether that benefit is of mundane or transcendent nature is another issue.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 28th, 2020 at 3:33 PM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Who wants to sit on a Lotus for 500 years? Lets just get the job done.

Astus wrote:

Those who are "stuck" in a lotus for a longer period are the ones born of the two lowest grades according to the Contemplation Sutra. Such people would have otherwise fallen to the hells. As for getting the job done, that's the main problem that birth in Sukhavati resolves, that most people cannot get it done in one life, they do not reach any of the noble stages but remain ordinary beings, and as such are easily driven to lower births, and are certainly not free from the vicissitudes of samsara.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 28th, 2020 at 4:12 PM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yeah, it is really is not a quick path to full buddhahood unless you are born as someone of grade 1, according to the scheme you present. And this 500 human year period applies even to those who have committed the five misdeeds of immediate retribution, etc. By contrast, according to your scheme as presented, buddhahood in Sukhavati for such people takes 12 mahākālpas (720 minor kalpas), or twelve billion ninety-six million human years. So yeah, Sukhavati is a slow path according to Sūtrayāna norms and a human perspective.

Astus wrote:

From an ordinary human perspective it might seem slow, but from the individual's perspective even those of the worst character spend only 12 days enclosed in a lotus (and even there there is no suffering). Furthermore, if we accept that there are teachings that can liberate in this human life, it is so much easier to accomplish the same in Sukhavati.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 28th, 2020 at 4:18 PM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Shinran was wrong. His assertion cannot be defended either thorough citation or through reasoning.

Astus wrote:

Not wrong, if it is understood that the various grades of the practitioners is valid from the human perspective but not in Sukhavati.

'In the Pure Recompensed Land produced by the great vow, there is no distinction of grades and stages. In an instantaneous thought-moment one quickly realizes highest, perfect, true enlightenment. Hence, we say "crosswise transcendence.'
(<http://web.mit.edu/stclair/www/horai/kgss-c.htm>, BDK ed: p 123)

'Those who wish to be born in the Pure Land are originally divided into nine classes, but [after they have been born there] there are no differences, just as the waters of the Tzu River and the Sheng River become of one taste [upon entering the sea]. How can we conceive of this?'
(<http://web.mit.edu/stclair/www/horai/kgss-e.htm>, BDK ed: p 172)

'If the single thought of joy and gratitude is awakened in us,
We shall realize nirvana without severing our blind passions.
When ordinary people and sages as well as those who commit the [five] grave offenses and abusers of the [Right] Dharma are taken into the Vow,
They become one in spiritual attainment, just as many rivers become of one taste upon entering the sea.'
(<http://web.mit.edu/stclair/www/horai/kgss-b.htm>, BDK ed: p 76)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 28th, 2020 at 5:43 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

clyde said:

"seeing one's true nature"

Astus wrote:

The problem starts at the very definition of such a term. Most seem to skip that problem by delegating the definition to the realm of the mystical and relying on a mythical lineage of transmission of the ineffable, thus all authority on deciding whether one has "seen the nature" lies with whoever is nominated as a representative of that lineage. This is actually what seem to be the common solution to avoid doctrinal debates and instead get bogged down in arguments over lineage. So even in this thread what one can see are laments over the sorry state of the transmission (although that sentiment itself is over a thousand years old - see e.g. Fayan's Ten Guidelines for Zen Schools). But it is not true that Zen (Chan, Seon, Thien) has no clear position on what the true nature is, it's just that dramatic stories and hidden transmissions are easier to comprehend. And since as long as one does not know what the Buddha taught, it is not possible to decide whether what a teacher says is true or not.

'Without an understanding of the Dharma, there is no way a practitioner can tell if a teacher is genuine or false.'

(Sheng-yen, in <http://ddc.shengyen.org/cgi-bin/ccdd/show.py?s=09-06p0027>)

So, do all Zen teachers have realised the nature of mind? There is no guarantee for that. The only thing one can do is to see if what they teach matches the Buddha's words or not.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 28th, 2020 at 6:28 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here's a definition from the Historical Dictionary of Chan Buddhism by Youru Wang (p 138):

JIANXING. A Chan term and an important notion in Chan teachings. Literally, it means "seeing (one's authentic) nature." This teaching was a Chinese appropriation of Indian Mahayana tathagatagarbha (Buddha-nature) thought. The tathagatagarbha tradition teaches that every human being has Buddha-nature within. This Buddha-nature is the inner cause and condition of enlightenment. Some texts of this tradition also teach that this Buddha-nature is the foundation of the world.

In Chinese Chan tradition, for example, in the Platform Sutra Buddha-nature is equivalent to the self-nature (zixing) in the sense that Buddha-nature cannot be objectified and realized outside each person. Seeing or realizing the Buddha-nature is the existential transformation of personhood, being able to understand and appreciate what constitutes a person - elements of impermanence and non-abiding - and then acting accordingly. Jianxing is therefore another term for enlightenment. The English translation of xing here as "nature" is somewhat misleading. The Buddha-nature or self-nature in the above-mentioned Chan soteriological context is not a changeless essence deeply rooted in the human mind for one to discover; rather, it refers to the changeability, transformation, and growth of personhood. Jianxing thus requires the accomplishment of action, the practical-behavioral carrying out of non-attachment.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 28th, 2020 at 10:45 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

Matt J said:

I am not sure that is the whole of it.

Astus wrote:

The body is made of the four elements, the mind of the six consciousness and the four mental aggregates. Seeing the nature of the mind (and body) is to recognise that it is empty, without a self. When body and mind are recognised as insubstantial, there is no grasping, and that is freedom.

'You trainees should have no doubts. It is the four elements that make up your bodies, but the four elements are without a self and the self is without a master. Therefore you should understand that this [human] body is without self and without master. It is the five skandhas that make up the mind, but the five skandhas are without a self and without a master. Therefore you should understand that the mind is without self and without master.'

(Huangbo Xiyun in Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 19)

'If the mind grasps at dharmas, then it gets involved in external causes and conditions, which is the meaning of birth and death. If the mind does not grasp at dharmas, that is suchness.'

(Mazu Daoyi, in Sun-Face Buddha, p 67)

Zhihuang said, "What does the Sixth Patriarch take as meditation?"

Xuance said, "What our master preaches is the wondrously peaceful and perfectly quiescent: the essence and functions are suchlike, suchlike. The five skandhas are fundamentally empty, the six [types of] sensory data are nonexistent. One does not enter and come out of [samādhi], one is neither concentrated nor disturbed. Meditation is in its nature nonabiding, and the serenity of meditation transcends abiding.

Meditation in its nature is birthless, and the thoughts of meditation transcend birth. The mind is like space, but it is without any thinking of space."

(Platform Sutra, ch 8, BDK ed, p 69)

And from a modern teacher:

'True practice means "staying with forms without attachment." It is not to avoid or deny the existence of forms, but to reduce attachment by understanding the Buddha's teaching that everything comes and goes with certain causes and conditions. In other words, with the insight that "penetrates the emptiness of the five aggregates in the profound practice of perfect wisdom," we put aside attachment and see our existence as empty, the objects of our sense organs as empty, and whatever happens as empty. That is "staying with forms without attachment." What a free and happy life it is!'

(<http://ftp.budaedu.org/ebooks/pdf/EN375.pdf> by Guo Ru, p 65-66)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 29th, 2020 at 2:32 AM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

clyde said:

How synchronistic that “definitions” should arise here as I recently began reading The Zen Teaching of Bodhidharma, translated by Red Pine and read this last night: Hence buddhas of the past and future teach mind to mind without bothering about definitions.

Astus wrote:

Actually, that passage reads: 'Future buddhas and past buddhas transmit the mind by mind not relying on written words.' (「前佛後佛以心傳心。不立文字。」 (CBETA 2020.Q1, T48, no. 2009, p. 373b13-14)). And then of course the text (written word) goes on to talk of (define) what mind is.

clyde said:

If I understand Sheng-yen correctly, one doesn't need to awakened nor be an expert in the teachings to know who is or isn't a genuine teacher, but have “some understanding”.

Astus wrote:

The point is that the teaching must conform to what the Buddha taught, that is what makes it valid.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 29th, 2020 at 5:18 AM

Title: Words, characters, syllables & liberation

Content:

Astus wrote:

[mod note: topic split from here

<https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=541014#p541014>]

Vimalakirtinirdesa (Kumarajiva's translation) said:

"Letters all have the mark of liberation. Why is that? Liberation is not inside, not outside, nor in between the two. Letters are also not inside, not outside, nor in between the two. For that reason, Sariputra, liberation is taught without leaving behind letters. Why is that? Because all dharmas have the mark of liberation." (trans. Takagi + Dreitlein, 2011 pp81)

Astus wrote:

Tricky translation. From the context it is clear that the goddess refers to Sariputra's silence, not writing. Kumarajiva translates as 言說文字 what is akṣaram udāharati (Tib.: yi ger brjod pa), that is "spoken characters".

McRae (BDK ed, p 128):

'Speech and words are entirely the characteristics of emancipation. Why? Emancipation is neither internal, nor external, nor intermediate. Words are also neither internal, nor external, nor intermediate. Therefore, Śāriputra, the explanation of emancipation does not transcend words. Why? All dharmas have the characteristic of emancipation.'

Watson (Motilal Banarsidass ed., p 88):

'Words, writing, all are marks of emancipation. Why? Because emancipation is not internal, not external, and not in between. And words likewise are not internal, not external, and not in between. Therefore, Shariputra, you can speak of emancipation without putting words aside. Why? Because all things that exist are marks of emancipation.'

<https://read.84000.co/translation/toh176.html#UT22084-060-005-16>:

'All the syllables pronounced by the elder have the nature of liberation. Why? Liberation is neither internal nor external, nor can it be apprehended apart from them. Likewise, syllables are neither internal nor external, nor can they be apprehended anywhere else. Therefore, reverend Śāriputra, do not point to liberation by abandoning speech! Why? The holy liberation is the equality of all things!'

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 29th, 2020 at 4:18 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

attainment/realisation is not something objectively verifiable. Insight is something that has to be attained or realised by the aspirant. There's no really objective measure, like the replication of an experimental setup that produces a result that anyone can then see. That's why the authentication has to be carried out intuitively by a designated lineage holder.

Astus wrote:

If there is no measure of attainment, how could it still be measured (intuitively or otherwise) by anyone? That is a contradiction.

Wayfarer said:

All such hierarchies (and their associated hierophanies) are vigorously rejected by liberal capitalism.

Astus wrote:

Monastic hierarchies (according to the Vinaya) do not depend on any realisation, but rather on ordination age and vote by the community. In practice, heads of monasteries have often been appointed (or influenced to be appointed) by various political entities, and for instance in the PRC (likely) that is still the norm.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 29th, 2020 at 4:51 PM

Title: Re: How awakened are bodhisattva stream-entrants?

Content:

Caoimhghín said:

How does the śrāvaka stream-entrant differ in his realization from the bodhisattva stream-entrant other than the former theoretically missing the foundations of bodhicitta?

Astus wrote:

It depends on whom you ask, as there are various views about sravakas (and bodhisattvas) in different Mahayana works. What separates the four noble persons on the sravaka path is not in their attainment of insight into the four noble truths, but how much of the fetters they have removed permanently.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 29th, 2020 at 7:55 PM

Title: Re: How awakened are bodhisattva stream-entrants?

Content:

Caoimhghín said:

This brings up another issue: why are only bodhisattvas of a certain bhūmi or higher mahāsattvas (and this bhūmi is not usually given as the first)?

Astus wrote:

'A Bodhisattva is called 'a great being' in the sense that he will cause a great mass and collection of beings to achieve the highest.' (PP8K, I.4, tr Conze) Mahasattva can simply refer to their great (maha) intention (sattva) to liberate all beings. See e.g.

<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc82328.html>. Also, according to the Yogacarabhūmi-shāstra's (Bodhisattva Path to Unsurpassed Enlightenment) commentary (quoted in note 1218) it's because bodhisattvas possess seven forms of greatness listed at I.18.24. An explanation from Haribhadra (quoted in Heart Sutra Explained, p 44):

'Bodhisattvas are those whose sattva. or intentions, are directed toward the fulfillment of their own welfare, namely, the enlightenment which is non-attachment to all phenomena. It may be argued that even Sravakas can be so. Thus, the word mahasattva is added. Those whose minds are directed towards the fulfillment of the great welfare of others are called Mahasattvas. An objection might be raised that such a Maha sattva can be found elsewhere, as in the case of a good non-Buddhist. Thus, the word bodhisattva is added.'

Caoimhghín said:

Similarly, take the Heart Sutra for example, which depicts Avalokiteśvara gaining insight into emptiness.

Astus wrote:

The sutra says Avalokitesvara was practising/contemplating prajnaparamita, not that it was his/her first insight.

Caoimhghín said:

And there is no furthering of wisdom or insight accompanied by the loosening of these fetters?

Astus wrote:

See this nice sutta about how contemplation of the impermanence of the five aggregates is practised from the beginning to even beyond liberation:

<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.122.than.html>. And here is another to explain how one can have full knowledge without being liberated:

<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.089.than.html>. Here's a simile from the <https://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.068.than.html>: 'It's as if there were a well along a road in a desert, with neither rope nor water bucket. A man would come along overcome by heat, oppressed by the heat, exhausted, dehydrated, & thirsty. He would look into the well and would have knowledge of 'water,' but he would not dwell touching it with his body.'

Caoimhghín said:

the bodhisattva path is described as the bodhisattva progresses.

Astus wrote:

The bodhisattva too gains full comprehension of emptiness on the path of seeing, the first bhumi, and then cultivates it to perfection until buddhahood.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 29th, 2020 at 10:20 PM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Malcolm said:

But arguing that sūtrayāna practices such as Pure Land practice, etc., are quick paths to buddhahood is erroneous and cannot be supported on the basis of their own fundamental texts.

Astus wrote:

One could rather argue that for the practice of buddha-recollection in order to overwrite one's habitual inclinations has to be strongly imprinted on the mind, therefore the requirement is actually not that low. But once one is there, one can personally meet buddhas and bodhisattvas, so one can learn and master whatever Dharma teaching there is without difficulty. Therefore necessarily one can attain buddhahood as quickly as possible anywhere.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 29th, 2020 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Minobu said:

ok so the emptiness is not about sunyata , it's a Dzogchen realization

Astus wrote:

Read again (highlight added):

Malcolm said:

Realizing emptiness in Dzogchen means realizing the original purity of all phenomena, in common with the perfection of wisdom sūtras, etc.

Astus wrote:

There is really just one emptiness, even if it is explained in many ways.

Malcolm said:

Dzogchen seems to be a completely different approach to Buddhahood...

Astus wrote:

Malcolm may step in of course, but let me add this as a quick reply here. While dzogchen (any others) has a unique presentation and methods, it does not essentially diverge in its understanding from what is there to be done, that is, the elimination of defilements and obscurations, the realisation of the twofold emptiness, and so on.

Malcolm said:

What I don't get is you don't really explain how karma seems to be overridden...or discharged ...

Astus wrote:

Again, while dzogchen has its own take on common Buddhist doctrines, it matches the basic teachings regarding dependent origination, how from ignorance comes suffering, and when ignorance is eliminated, there is no more samsara.

Malcolm said:

Lord Sakyamuni endured samsaric existence for like an eternity to rid His Karma...

Astus wrote:

That version describes how merit needs to be accumulated over a long period of time. Such a view is "obsolete" in light of the view of buddha-nature.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 29th, 2020 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Not really-- hence the various metaphors about paupers using rocks that hide wishfulfilling jewels as pillows, who die without recognizing they have been in possession of such a jewel the entire time.

Astus wrote:

'In the expository, causal vehicle of the paramitas, the sugatagarbha or buddha-nature is considered to be present in the minds of beings only as a seed. When this is fully developed through circumstantial conditions— in other words, the two accumulations (of merit and wisdom) — buddhahood is attained. And since the cause comes first and its result after, one speaks in this case of a causal vehicle. By contrast, the Mantrayana, the vehicle of mantra, proclaims that all beings are by nature endowed with the sugatagarbha, wherein all enlightened qualities are spontaneously present.'
(Treasury of Precious Qualities, vol 2, p 86)

Unlike the above description of sutrayana, in Chan, Tiantai, and Huayan buddha-nature is understood to be already complete with the buddha qualities, as already noted in http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Translations/Awakening_of_faith.html:

'Next, Suchness has two aspects if predicated in words. One is that it is truly empty (sunya), for this aspect can, in the final sense, reveal what is real. The other is that it is truly nonempty (a-sunya), for its essence itself is endowed with undefiled and excellent qualities.'

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 30th, 2020 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Likewise, unless those buddha qualities are discovered by you in a direct perception, or pointed out to you, even if you have them, they are of no use to you.

Astus wrote:

<https://www.nichirenlibrary.org/en/dic/Content/D/92> is one of the main Zen slogans. It can result in buddhahood exactly because there is no need to gather anything more.

'You should simply eliminate the ratiocination of the ordinary [mind] and the [enlightened] realm of the sage—there is not any separate Buddha outside of the mind. The patriarch [Bodhidharma] came from the west to point out directly that all persons are in their entireties the Buddha. You fail to recognize this now but grasp onto the ordinary and the sagely, racing after the external and in turn being deluded as to your own mind. Therefore, I say to you: this mind is the Buddha.

To generate a single moment of ratiocination is to fall into a different realm. Since beginningless time, [this truth] has been no different from how it is today; there is no other Dharma. Therefore this is called the attainment of [the stages of] equivalent and correct enlightenment.'

(Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 34-35)

And a contemporary teacher:

'if we look directly at the false thoughts, they will disperse like clouds or smoke. This is "directly pointing at the mind," not relying on any means. If we all practiced in this manner, no one would be unwise enough to run after their thoughts, trying to destroy illusions. We only need to know that thoughts are false and not follow them. This is the essence of Bodhidharma's pacification of mind.'

(<https://tienvnguyen.net/images/file/G5gYJdC51AgQAHUb/keystobuddhism.pdf> by Thich Thanh Tu, p 52)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 30th, 2020 at 3:45 PM

Title: Re: Why choose Mahayana over Vajrayana?

Content:

Malcolm said:

It could, but it usually doesn't, 99.999 percent of the time.

Astus wrote:

That's a slightly more pessimistic than usual.

'Of the thousands or tens of thousands of people in this school, only three or five of them have gotten it.'

(Huangbo, in Birds in Flight Leaves No Trace, ch 44)

有禪無淨土。十人九錯路。無禪有淨土。萬修萬人去。有禪有淨土。猶如戴角虎也。

'With Chan but without Pure Land nine out of ten miss the road. Without Chan but with Pure Land ten thousand practitioners out of ten thousand pass. With Chan and with Pure Land it is like a horned tiger.'

(Yongming Yanshou quoted in Wuliangshoujing huiyi 無量壽經會譯, X1n5p70b14-16)

Malcolm said:

In any case, buddhahood cannot be realized with slogans.

Astus wrote:

But I quite like Chekawa's collection...

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 1st, 2020 at 1:25 AM

Title: Re: Words, characters, syllables & liberation

Content:

Malcolm said:

Just to add a note, a syllable is different than a "character."

Astus wrote:

It was meant as an approximation of the Chinese translation.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 1st, 2020 at 4:54 AM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

Malcolm said:

You gave the Sanskrit and the Tibetan. There are no "characters" in either language.

Astus wrote:

It was intended as further reference to clarify what was translated as "letters" in <https://dharmaheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=541014#p541014>. The Vimalakirti Sutra has 言說文字 that consists of "spoken" (yanshou 言說) and "character" (wenzi 文字), and the latter is "literature/writing" (wen 文) plus "letter/character/word" (zi 字). This was simply translated as "letter" in the quote. Furthermore, in the quote from Kukai's work "letter" is a translation for zi 字, what Giebel renders as "sign" (in <https://www.bdkamerica.org/book/shingon-texts>, p 85). But clearly there is a difference here, as the Vimalakirti Sutra actually talks of speech, while Kukai really means writing.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 1st, 2020 at 9:05 PM

Title: Re: Why is Siddhi only possible after 4th Jhana?

Content:

NateLeo said:

what is it about the subtleties of the mind in 4th Jhana that allow siddhis to manifest?

Astus wrote:

Siddhis don't merely manifest, one has to make it happen, and in order to do so, the mind must have sufficient "power", i.e. undistracted and focused. It is the fourth absorption where the mind has reached the optimum level of concentration no longer moved by effort (1st dhyana) or by feelings (2nd and 3rd dhyana). As it is said (e.g. <https://accessinsight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.02.0.than.html>), 'With his mind thus concentrated, purified, and bright, unblemished, free from defects, pliant, malleable, steady, and attained to imperturbability, he directs and inclines it to the modes of supranormal powers.'

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 1st, 2020 at 10:54 PM

Title: Re: Why is Siddhi only possible after 4th Jhana?

Content:

LastLegend said:

Are those liberation?

Astus wrote:

Absorptions may be called liberation, but only in a temporary and relative sense, that the five hindrances are not present in them. Of the higher knowledges, the sixth is actual liberation, the first five are mundane powers.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 2nd, 2020 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: Why is Siddhi only possible after 4th Jhana?

Content:

LastLegend said:

I think the 6th is knowing before a thought forms? Anyway personally I don't think siddhi are Wisdom. Little emphasis should be put on it in my opinion.

Astus wrote:

The sixth higher knowledge (abhiññā/abhijñā) is the destruction of influxes/effluents (āsavakkhaya/āsravakṣaya), i.e. when defilements are completely eliminated.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 2nd, 2020 at 1:49 AM

Title: Re: Why is Siddhi only possible after 4th Jhana?

Content:

NateLeo said:

Ah, so basically they dont manifest "automatically", you first clear the mind and "intend" for them to manifest through mind-power?

Astus wrote:

Yes, there needs to be intention and effort to develop them. Note that one also needs the four <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Iddhipada> (iddhipāda/ṛddhipāda).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 2nd, 2020 at 4:05 PM

Title: Re: Meditation techniques in each tradition

Content:

Nicholas2727 said:

The same style was taught to me instead one would note this experience as saying "feeling" "feeling" or "thinking" "thinking". Do I understand this correctly or am I far off?

Astus wrote:

Labelling experiences is the first stage, using simple words to help one recognise what actually happens. Eventually such labels are let go of in vipassana, and dhammas are perceived without them. That stage, where there is no longer any labelling, conceptualisation (paññatti), is where one can see things as they are, and that is where the vipassana knowledges can happen.

You can see in Mahayana that one has to get to the same non-conceptualising mindfulness where impressions are not clung to, nor suppressed, and that is the ideal attitude.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 2nd, 2020 at 5:33 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism Supernatural feats and abilities

Content:

nothingkungfu said:

Does it happen to someone just a 5-6 years Buddhism or junior practitioner ? Why such a things happening according to Buddhism? I just want to be a normal people and i dont require such abilities at the moment because my "good deed" is not good enough, perhaps i will use this for gambling or stock market or into devil's direction.

Astus wrote:

Do you have control over your abilities, or do they just appear without you knowing about how it works? If the former, then you should keep in mind the ten good and the ten bad forms of action, and work only with good intentions. If it's the latter, then you're going to have to learn to regulate your mental activities, otherwise they remain disturbing factors.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 2nd, 2020 at 8:55 PM

Title: Re: Why is Siddhi only possible after 4th Jhana?

Content:

NateLeo said:

Now considering jhana is a temporary state, that tells me obscurations can temporarily be overcome?

Astus wrote:

There is a difference between latent habits or inclinations (anusaya) that are a condition for the emergence of hindrances (nivarana). So, as shown in the <https://suttacentral.net/mn64/en/bodhi>, even though a baby doesn't have the fetters like doubt and identity-view, the tendency is there. Also, one is not always overcome by craving or aversion, but when the conditions are present, one can be swept away by strong emotions.

NateLeo said:

I thought obscurations were something that had to be permanently overcome, THEN you'd see certain fruits of practice. I thought obscurations were things that were "stuck" to you until real awakening, but im guessing now thats wrong?

Astus wrote:

If by obscurations you mean the obscuration of defilements (klesavarana) and the obscuration to knowledge (jneyavarana), those are like latent tendencies (anusaya) and dispositions (vasana).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 2nd, 2020 at 10:21 PM

Title: Re: Meditation techniques in each tradition

Content:

LastLegend said:

I am confused I don't know which is which anymore. It seems like it's all the same?

Astus wrote:

One evening, after a Dharma talk at the Boston Dharmadhatu, a student said to Seung Sahn Soen-sa, "At a recent seminar on Zen and Tantra, Chogyam Trungpa Rinpoche compared Zen to black and white and tantra to color. What do you think of this?"

...

Soen-sa said, ... "When you are thinking, your mind and my mind are different. When you are not thinking, your mind and my mind are the same. Now tell me - when you are not thinking, is there color? Is there black and white? Not thinking, your mind is empty mind. Empty minds means cutting off all speech and words. Is there color then?"

(Dropping Ashes on the Buddha, p 79)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 3rd, 2020 at 4:12 AM

Title: Re: Meditation techniques in each tradition

Content:

Malcolm said:

This is not a very good answer. This kind of idea, the cessation of thinking, just results in more samsara.

Astus wrote:

That is right, aiming for and grasping at a thoughtless state at best takes one to a heavenly birth. But that was not the intended message, at least from my side. Rather that while there are methodical differences, when it comes to not conceptualising what is experienced, there are no distinctions that can be made.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 3rd, 2020 at 5:23 AM

Title: Re: Meditation techniques in each tradition

Content:

Malcolm said:

That is not what the citation says.

Astus wrote:

Right, it's not a full story, I just thought it fitting on the issue of comparison. Here's an extension on empty mind.

'True emptiness is before thinking. Before thinking is just like this. So life is only life; death is only death. You must not be attached to names and forms. It is like a clear mirror. In a clear mirror, all is nothing; there is only the clear mirror. Red comes, the mirror is red. Yellow comes, there is yellow. A woman comes, there is a woman. A man comes, there is a man. Death comes, there is death. Life comes, there is life. But all of these do not exist. The mirror does not hold on to anything. There is only the coming and the going. This is before thinking: all things are just as they are. The name for this mind is original pure mind.'

(Dropping Ashes on the Buddha, p 90)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 3rd, 2020 at 2:47 PM

Title: Re: Meditation techniques in each tradition

Content:

Malcolm said:

This is still just referring to a mind devoid of concepts. So, it still does not escape the criticism.

Astus wrote:

Not really the same. There are things, but there is no attachment to them. It's possible to match it with there being no longer the concept of self that puts concepts into a samsaric frame. A little more on "just as they are":

"At 360° all things are just as they are; the truth is just like this. 'Like this' means that there is no attachment to anything. This point is exactly the same as the zero point: we arrive where we began, where we have always been. The difference is that 0° is attachment thinking, while 360° is no-attachment thinking."

(Dropping Ashes on the Buddha, p 7)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 3rd, 2020 at 3:49 PM

Title: Re: Meditation techniques in each tradition

Content:

Nicholas2727 said:

the practices is to let go of concepts so that makes sense to me, although the practice of how to get there is what I am confused about.

Astus wrote:

The practice is to let go of concepts, full stop. Well, actually, that is taken in Zen as the essential practice, but not the only one. However, the very understanding of 'concepts' here can cause some serious confusions. Practically the key element is to recognise how one attaches to an idea and perpetuates it, turning a single thought into a chain of thoughts. But even that can sound (rightly) ambiguous, so think of right effort (samma vayama), how skilful and unskilful needs to be differentiated (note: this is part of the samadhi section), and think of dependent origination, how from contact/impression arises feeling, and from feeling craving, then grasping, etc. Although with this added explanation it doesn't look very Zennish, but then you can see how they point to the same mental function.

As for the various techniques used to help people to see into their own mental operations, the method of kanhua (看話 - "phrase contemplation") is the most popular everywhere, with the sole exception of Soto Zen. There are also two versions of kanhua practice, one following the older type of contemplating the huatou (話頭 - "phrase head"), and there is the practice with a koan curriculum in Rinzai Zen. So basically the Japanese Zen schools are a bit different from the others (China, Korea, Vietnam).

Nicholas2727 said:

I understand that when we see red, just see it, although can this be done simply by just following the breath?

Astus wrote:

If you watch the breath, then it's the breath that comes and goes. The attitude should be the same, not grasping, not rejecting, not identifying, not disidentifying, but being simply aware without assuming oneself to be the doer (breather), the observer (I feel breath), the owner (it is my breath), or any other version of positioning oneself somewhere (or in a "nowhere").

Nicholas2727 said:

How do either of these differ from some of the meditation styles in Theravada (Specifically following the breath, Metta, and Mahasi Sayadaw style of vipassana)?

Astus wrote:

To see that better, one always needs to be familiar with the specific methods. Even just for "following the breath" there are many versions in Theravada and Mahayana. To compare them, one needs to know them. What you can do for a start is to read a bit about the actual methods themselves first. Then you might like one or another, and try it, then you may have questions and doubts, so you will find someone (a good friend, a teacher, an experienced person) to help further. One big difficulty of comparing these methods in such broad strokes here is that there are just too many details to cover in a post. So you can also try more specific questions.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 3rd, 2020 at 5:17 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

PeterC said:

You need to be trained

Astus wrote:

In order to be a Zen teacher there are no fixed training requirements, only that someone already possessing the title assigns to you the same rank. That is the basic idea of the whole lineage and Dharma transmission system.

PeterC said:

So either a lot of Western students are, absent a training of a duration or intensity that would be normal in Japan, achieving much better results and being recognized as such by qualified teachers; or the bar has gone down. I think it's for all of us to draw our own conclusions on which.

Astus wrote:

How could the bar go up or down? The very nature of the lineage transmission must guarantee that any appointed successor is of the same quality as the one who transmits it. Otherwise, what is being transmitted? And if nothing is transmitted, what makes a Zen teacher, since the only criteria is exactly transmission.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 3rd, 2020 at 6:26 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

PeterC said:

Receipt of transmission doesn't mean you should be teaching.

Astus wrote:

As for what happens after, that is another matter.

PeterC said:

For example - the Taiwanese monk, Sheng Yan, didn't teach for many years after receiving transmission and authorization to do so, because he didn't feel ready.

Astus wrote:

If you mean <http://www.shengyen.org/eng/>, founder of the Dharma Drum Lineage, it was actually the other way around. He did a retreat, he started to teach, and then received Dharma transmission.

'However when my head-shaving preceptor, Master Dongchu came to visit me in the United States in 1976 and saw me teaching Chan meditation in the Temple of Great Enlightenment in New York, he said to me, "You still have not received transmission!" He had received transmission through the Jiaoshan sect of the Caodong School. On that day he gave me transmission and ordered me to continue his Dharma lineage, but there was no ceremony.'

(<https://chancenter.org/cmc/wp-content/uploads/2017/11/Summer-2017.pdf>)

PeterC said:

Do you feel that the people teaching Zen in Western countries have the same capacity/capability to teach as the Japanese teachers who first gave Dharma transmission in the West?

Astus wrote:

I sure couldn't tell, as you say, one would need an extensive sample to decide that, and even then the measurements used is hard to define. In theory, however, if we accept the doctrine of the lineage, there can be no difference, as those Japanese teachers appointed their own successors of their own volition and choice, like Shunryu Suzuki appointed Richard Baker.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 3rd, 2020 at 7:26 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

PeterC said:

That is exactly the matter we're discussing here, though

Astus wrote:

I do not see a fixed rule regarding what to happen after. It also questions the meaning of transmission. From the editor's note in Getting the Buddha Mind (p 30):

"'Generation' refers to the transmission of the Dharma within a lineage from a master to a disciple. This transmission thereby ensures the continuity not only of the Dharma itself, but also the teaching and the practice of the lineage. Furthermore, it confers upon the recipient a recognition by the master that the disciple is now qualified to transmit the Dharma, i.e., has become a master."

PeterC said:

He had more than one teacher. I heard this comment about waiting from him directly.

Astus wrote:

Dongchu was the first to give him transmission, then two years later, in 1978, was also given by Lingyuan. Or do you know of someone else?

PeterC said:

if we accept the doctrine of the lineage, there can be no difference.

Astus wrote:

What other options are there apart from accepting and not accepting?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 3rd, 2020 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

PeterC said:

You don't consider centuries of precedent to be dispositive?

Astus wrote:

I don't see where such precedents exist in the first place. Here are some interesting examples from the first half of the 20th century, as it is described in The Practice of Chinese Buddhism 1900–1950 by Holmes Welch:

'Transmission of the dharma as a seal of office was the practice at most Chinese monasteries, unless the dharma and the abbotship were connected in other ways'
(p 158)

Of the Kiangsu System

'Whereas elsewhere one master transmitted to one disciple at a time, in Kiangsu several masters transmitted collectively to several disciples. All the masters served successively as abbot at a certain monastery and then all the disciples would serve as abbot there too. What had been transmitted was thought of as the dharma of that monastery. Receiving it gave a right and also an obligation to serve as abbot.'
(p 158)

'In actuality this kind of "dharma transmission" has become a formality in the Ch'an sect. It is a million miles away from the dharma transmission by the direct imprint of mind on mind. This kind of dharma transmission is simply a traditional formality of genealogical succession.'
(p 165)

Of the System in Kuei-yuan Ssu

'The Kuei-yuan Ssu in Hanyang, Hupeh, was rare among Chinese monasteries in that it dispensed altogether with consultation and left the choice of abbot directly and entirely to the bodhisattva Wei-t'o. It was unique (so far as I know) in that every monk ordained there was offered its dharma. An ordination was held each winter and immediately afterwards many of the hundreds of ordainees became dharma disciples, each receiving a dharma scroll and having his name entered in a dharma register (chieh-fa pu). When an abbot's three year term was up, all the names in this register would be copied onto slips and placed in a tube before Wei-t'o's image. The abbot himself did the drawing. The first name to be drawn three times in a row became his successor. If this individual had gone elsewhere (as he usually had), he would be traced and brought back. Even if he were young or incompetent, he still served.'
(p 169)

We might note that at the end of the same chapter there is mention of reformers who rejected such practices, and a longer quote of <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tanxu> 's criticism of the practice of transmitting the Dharma with the abbotship.

But if it is assumed or hoped for that such are the corruptions of late Chinese Buddhism, here are T. Griffith Foulk's words:

'The controversies that simmered in the Sung over the status of the Ch'an lineage as a "separate transmission,"...were more about securing prestige, patronage, and special privileges within the Buddhist order than about practical matters of monkish training or spiritual cultivation. The "separate transmission" slogan was used successfully by proponents of Ch'an to argue that members of their lineage, having inherited the enlightenment of the Buddha in a direct line of “mind-to-mind transmission,” were the monks most qualified for positions of leadership within the existing Buddhist monastic institution.'

("Sung Controversies Concerning the 'Separate Transmission' of Ch'an" in Buddhism in the Sung, p 221)

PeterC said:

So you chose the example of Suzuki and Baker to show that you fully accept?

Astus wrote:

'Statements of lineage identity and “history” were polemical tools of self-assertion, not critical evaluations of chronological fact according to some modern concept of historical accuracy. To the extent that any lineage assertion is significant, it is also a misrepresentation; lineage assertions that can be shown to be historically accurate are also inevitably inconsequential as statements of religious identity.'

(McRae's Second Rule of Zen Studies, in Seeing Through Zen by John R. McRae, p xix)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 3rd, 2020 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

PeterC said:

If you want to look for precedent in China, you should read the 高僧傳 and 續高僧傳, which collectively have biographies of hundreds of monks from the early Liang to The Zhen Guan emperor in the Tang. They're very important works for giving us an idea of monastic practices in the early Tang golden age of Chan/Zen. In those days Dharma transmission was definitely not a formality, and the training that monks went through was not lightweight.

Astus wrote:

Except that those are not Chan works, nor do they talk of any lineage, unlike for instance the Chuan fabao ji 傳法寶紀, the Lengqia shizi ji 楞伽師資記. and the Lidai fabao ji 歷代法寶記. Furthermore, the question was regarding practice post-transmission, something that wouldn't fit the role of Dharma-transmission that is meant to enable one to serve as an abbot, and (theoretically) signified awakening. But if you say that there is evidence for such practice, then please present it.

PeterC said:

the quotation you cite is about the relationship between that school and other schools.

Astus wrote:

The quotation serves to show that the very meaning of Dharma transmission has not really changed in China since Song times down to the 20th century. In other words, there has never been such a thing as a golden age, nor has things somehow deteriorated later in this regard.

PeterC said:

I don't think that's quite sufficient to dodge my question.

Astus wrote:

It wasn't meant to dodge it, but rather show that I see no basis to accept such a transmission throughout the centuries.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 3rd, 2020 at 10:51 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

PeterC said:

if you reject the lineage view of a continuous transmission, you've also discarded the premise that transmission implies qualification as a teacher, surely?

Astus wrote:

Don't miss the problem <https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=541665#p541665>: if nothing is transmitted, what makes a Zen teacher, since the only criteria is exactly transmission?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 3rd, 2020 at 10:54 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, Astus rejects utterly the notion of transmission, he always has. He thinks Dharma can be learned from books.

Astus wrote:

Dharma transmission in Zen is not about one person teaching another, but one person authorising another after that other has already mastered everything that had to be mastered.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 3rd, 2020 at 11:09 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

Matylda said:

it is the case all over East Asia. over 90% of Chinese monks received dharma transmission. It became a custom, without real meaning. The same is in soto zen in Japan, it is still different in rinzai, but situation is not good, since it is possible to receive dharma transmission without genuine insight in rinzai...

Astus wrote:

And that is how it is slightly different in the West, because most have the view that such a transmission should be meaningful, that it should be for at least some level of insight, or at least proficiency.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 3rd, 2020 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

PeterC said:

Do you think that 印可 is a recognition that something has been transmitted; or it is simply a recognition of achievement, so in theory the student could have realized it unaided and the teacher just confirms that the student has recognized it?

Astus wrote:

Only the one who drinks it can tell whether it's cold or warm, isn't that so? That doesn't mean it was unaided or it was aided, as circumstances and events vary, as it can be seen from the many accounts of awakening throughout the history of Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 4th, 2020 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: Meditation techniques in each tradition

Content:

Nicholas2727 said:

Is this a practice that is used alongside other meditation techniques or do most chan/zen centers focus entirely on a huatuo practice?

Astus wrote:

It can be with or without other practices. It depends on the individual needs and the community.

Here are some introductory materials:

<http://www.chancenter.org/chancetr/ddp/talks/beginners-m.html> by Hanshan Deqing

<https://www.emptycloud.net/articles-2/chan-meditation-%E7%A6%85/prerequisites-of-the-cha-training/> by Xuyun

More extensive works:

<http://ftp.budaedu.org/ebooks/pdf/EN375.pdf> by Guo Ru

http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/bbs/board.php?bo_table=3020

Nicholas2727 said:

Not saying one is right or one is wrong, but would chan/zen schools not recommend this style of practice since it notes the experiences or does noting fit into the practice since it does not mean one is considering them the observer?

Astus wrote:

If by noting you mean verbal labelling, then not really. However, Chan is not a very fixed method or doctrine, and a lot depends on the individual and the teacher.

Nicholas2727 said:

Do you have any suggestions for readings that go over the different versions of meditation?

Astus wrote:

I have not yet seen such a comprehensive work, especially not focused on meditation only. At the same time, you should be aware that there are teachings in Mahayana as well about samatha and vipasyana. Here are some sources you might enjoy:

<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225580.html> by Nagarjuna

<https://ia800808.us.archive.org/15/items/FourApplMindfulnessMahayana/SgiksnasamuccayaOn4ApplicationsUpdatedJuly2017.pdf> by Śāntideva

http://www.kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/ebm_book_page.htm by Shramana Zhiyi http://www.kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/sgs_book_page.htm by Shramana Zhiyi

http://www.kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/n6p_book_page.htm

<https://www.bdkamerica.org/book/sutra-concentration-sitting-meditation>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 4th, 2020 at 3:26 AM

Title: Re: Meditation techniques in each tradition

Content:

Malcolm said:

So according to the definition above, this zero attachment thinking is not true emptiness, since it is thinking.

Astus wrote:

I think Seung Sahn followed a different type of terminology, where emptiness has a more limited or extreme meaning, like what you can find in Tiantai.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 5th, 2020 at 5:15 PM

Title: Re: Chakrasamvara Sadhana - Utter Illumination of the Innermost Essence

Content:

BobbyBe said:

Hi everyone, this is my first post. I'm looking for a Chakrasamvara Sadhana called "Utter Illumination of the Innermost Essence"

Astus wrote:

It is available online: <https://garchen.net/library-sadhanas-and-sacred-texts/>

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 5th, 2020 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: Are all phenomena equally empty in Madhyamaka?

Content:

akuppa said:

My problem is that it seems from a Madhyamaka point of view belief that a Self exists is equally wrong as belief that the consciousness aggregate arises and ceases based on causes and conditions (the dhamma theory).

Astus wrote:

There is a difference made between correct and incorrect conventional truth, so an impermanent consciousness is correct convention, while a permanent self is an incorrect convention.

akuppa said:

So the early Buddhist schools are just as misguided as non-Buddhists?

Astus wrote:

Not all abhidharma systems are the same. What you find criticised by Madhyamaka are mainly Sarvastivadin interpretations, or at least what they viewed as the Sarvastivadin doctrine.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 5th, 2020 at 10:46 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Aryjna said:

As has been discussed several times, the Pali sources and the schools associated with them, have not been established to be earlier than Mahayana schools and non-Pali sources. If anything, the oldest existing texts apparently are Gandharan Mahayana texts.

Astus wrote:

Mahayana relies on for instance ideas present in abhidharmika texts, and the abhidharmas necessarily succeed the agamas/nikayas. That is regardless of what specific text has the oldest manuscript.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 5th, 2020 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

seeker242 said:

"everything that had to be mastered" in order to do what though? Teach beings how to practice appropriately? Point them in the right direction, etc, etc? Which is what a teacher's job is. Does one really need to have attained anuttara samyak sambodhi in order to do that teacher job properly?

Astus wrote:

In theory Zen transmits the buddha-mind, so any member of the transmission lineage must have the mind of a buddha, in other words, be a buddha. In practice, it is whatever a lineage member seems fit. So either the very meaning of the lineage is incorrect, or the practice, or both, or one might believe that both are actually correct and valid. In order to accept both as valid the common choice has been to say that one specific line is true (or truer), but the others are corrupt, considering the regular criticism of everyone else (e.g. northerners vs southerners, heze chan vs hongzhou chan, kanhua chan vs mozhao chan).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 6th, 2020 at 12:38 AM

Title: Re: Are all phenomena equally empty in Madhyamaka?

Content:

akuppa said:

Thanks, where can I read about this in Madhyamaka sources?

Astus wrote:

In the various discussions of the two truths.

'The conventional has two aspects: one that is mistaken and one that is correct. The former is twofold: the moon [reflected on] water and the conceptions of bad doctrines. Something that is pleasing only as long as it is not examined, which arises and ceases to exist'

(Entry into the Two Realities by Atisa, in Jewels of the Middle Way, p 119)

There's also a nice collection of essays: <https://books.google.hu/books?id=4-MdDAAAQBAJ>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 6th, 2020 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Aryjna said:

Is there concrete evidence that conclusively proves this succession?

Astus wrote:

The agamas/nikayas do not contain the various abhidharma ideas. In the abhidharmas there is a distinction between sutra and abhidharma teachings. Mahayana sutras talk of dharmas as the ultimate constituents of reality (and how they are empty), and that is a theory not explicit even in the Abhidhamma Pitaka itself but only in the commentaries. Here is an essay on the matter:

https://serval.unil.ch/resource/serval:BIB_ADB8A4E3744C.P001/REF.pdf.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 6th, 2020 at 7:52 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

seeker242 said:

It could be that the initial theory proposed above is just a wrong idea to begin with and zen transmission does not actually mean "this person is now a fully completed Buddha"

Astus wrote:

What do you propose instead?

If there is no transmission, no lineage, then there is no Zen school to talk of, as it is one of, if not the only core element of it.

'The first ancestor, Bodhidharma, came from the west, and did not engage in various activities or give lectures on sutras or commentaries, but simply faced the wall in zazen for nine years at Shaolin. Sitting is exactly the true Dharma eye treasury of the wondrous mind of nirvana. Generation after generation give face-to-face transmission, intimately receiving the secret seal, actually transmitting the bones and marrow between teachers and disciples. Just this is the single genuine matter; other things are not like this.'
(Eihei Koroku, IV.304, p 283; cf https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/key_terms/pdf/key_terms17.pdf)

'From Śākyamuni Buddha to Sōkei there are thirty-four patriarchs. Each of the transmissions between these Buddhist patriarchs is like Kāśyapa³ meeting the Tathāgata and like the Tathāgata getting Kāśyapa. Just as Śākyamuni Buddha learns in practice under Kāśyapa Buddha, each teacher and disciple exists in the present. Therefore, the right Dharma-eye treasury has been personally transmitted from rightful successor to rightful successor, and the true life of the Buddha-Dharma is nothing other than this authentic transmission.'
(Butsудо, in Shobogenzo, BDK ed, vol 3, p 88)

'When viewed in terms of the clerical elite, in other words, Zen clearly constitutes the most successful form of Buddhism in East Asia. Why has it been so successful? In 1987, John Jorgensen suggested one answer. It is basically the same explanation that Dogen gave. To wit: "The authentic life of the Buddha dharma exists only in this authentic transmission." In other words, Zen is the predominant form of Buddhism because of dharma transmission.'
(Dharma Transmission in Theory and Practice by William M. Bodiford, in Zen Ritual: Studies of Zen Buddhist Theory in Practice, p 264)

'Where the doctrinal schools (jiao) locate authoritative tradition in the transmission of the Buddhist scriptures, the Chan school looks to a "mind-to-mind" transmission of the living vision of enlightenment itself. Known variously as the "transmission of the lamp or flame" or the "transmission of the treasury of the true eye of the Dharma," Chan claims to be heir to a generation-to-generation transmission of the Buddha's enlightened mind that runs parallel to his spoken word-Dharma.

...

Institutionally speaking, a Chan master is someone who has awakened to the Buddha Mind through Chan training and whose enlightenment has been tested and sanctioned (C. yinke; J. inka) by an existing Chan master. Using the flame and lamp analogy, one could say that transmission of Chan Dharma requires that three things be simultaneously present: the enlightened insight of a previously sanctioned Chan master, the enlightened insight of the disciple, and the living reality of the Buddhadharma or Buddha Mind in which both are grounded. If any one of these is missing, enlightenment and transmission cannot be considered genuine, at least by Chan standards. By the same token, the formal granting of sanction is especially key to this, since the very basis of Chan practice and the integrity of Chan as an institution hinges on the idea that the historical transmission preserves intact the "Mind Dharma" of Buddha Sakyamuni. It is this certified wisdom that Chan practitioners seek to "ignite" and verify in their own minds; and, as the embodiment of that light, it is to the Chan master that he or she looks for guidance.'

(Hoofprint of the Ox by Sheng-yen, p 112, 113)

Some more on the nature of dharma transmission according to various sources:

'Dharma Transmission is what happens when your sight clears enough that you can see what your teacher and the Buddha have already seen: things as they are.'

(Hardcore Zen, p 73)

'Back when Gautama Buddha was alive there was an incident in which he stepped up to give a talk. As was customary in India, flowers had been strewn at his feet before he began to teach. Instead of speaking, Gautama just picked up one of those flowers and held it silently aloft - and a guy named Mahakashyapa, one of his longtime students, smiled. Then the Buddha winked at him, called it a day's teaching, and walked away. This little scene is viewed by Zen Buddhists as the moment when the Buddha recognized that one of his followers had attained the same level of understanding as he had himself. The Buddha's silent wink was taken to be the start of the formal acknowledgement known today as Dharma Transmission.'

(Hardcore Zen, p 137)

'Dharma transmission is actually the acknowledgement by a master that a disciple has attained an experience of enlightenment equal to his or her own.'

(The Illustrated Encyclopedia of Zen Buddhism, p 71)

yinke. (J. inka; K. in'ga 印可). In Chinese, lit. "seal of/in approval," "certification" and often seen in Western sources in its Japanese pronunciation inka; a seal of approval, certification, or transmission, which is given by masters in the various CHAN traditions across East Asia to practitioners who, in their estimation, have attained a satisfactory level of awakening or maturity of understanding to serve as public exponents of their lineage. Because these lineages are presumed to trace back to BODHIDHARMA, the founder of the Chan school, and ultimately to the person of the Buddha himself, the person who receives such certification is considered to be qualified to speak for the current generation of Chan adepts on behalf of the Chan patriarchs, masters, and even the Buddha, to accept and train students, and to give them certification in turn once their training is complete.

(The Princeton Dictionary of Buddhism, p 1029)

'In an attempt to distinguish itself from the other Buddhist traditions that sought the teachings of the Buddha in sūtras and commentaries, the burgeoning Chan tradition of the eighth and ninth centuries emphasized the nonverbal transmission of the Buddha's teachings. The notion of mind-to-mind transmission has thus served as an important trope in the self-fashioning of the Chan tradition.'

(on 'yixin chuanxin' in The Princeton Dictionary of Buddhism, p 1032)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 6th, 2020 at 9:01 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

seeker242 said:

A satisfactory level awakening.

Astus wrote:

What is that level?

seeker242 said:

I don't see anything in any of the above that dictates that only 100% full, complete, perfection is the only thing that is satisfactory.

Astus wrote:

Then let me highlight some passages and words from the above quotes.

'the Buddha recognized that one of his followers had attained the same level of understanding as he had himself'

'acknowledgement by a master that a disciple has attained an experience of enlightenment equal to his or her own '

'Because these lineages are presumed to trace back to BODHIDHARMA, the founder of the Chan school, and ultimately to the person of the Buddha himself, the person who receives such certification is considered to be qualified to speak for the current generation of Chan adepts on behalf of the Chan patriarchs, masters, and even the Buddha '

""mind-to-mind" transmission of the living vision of enlightenment itself '

'a generation-to-generation transmission of the Buddha's enlightened mind '

'a Chan master is someone who has awakened to the Buddha Mind '

'the historical transmission preserves intact the "Mind Dharma" of Buddha Sakyamuni' Dogen identifies what is transmitted as "the true Dharma eye treasury of the wondrous mind of nirvana", just as it is in the so called Flower Sermon, and that expression itself is meant as not just the essence of the Dharma, but also what encompasses all the teachings. Being enlightened to that means knowing and embodying the entirety of the Dharma, exactly like the Buddha. As the transmission itself means a confirmation that the successor is on equal stance with the transmitter, since it is the Buddha himself who initiated it, all successors are on the same level as the Buddha. How could it be anything less than that? Do you assume that being enlightened to, or possessing/being the mind of the Buddha, is something less than buddhahood, that there is something more to attain?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2020 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

seeker242 said:

to claim that a person who has reached the 8th or 9th Bhumi, or the equivalent or whatever other scale that is used, to claim that that person would not be worthy of being called a zen master, or to claim that this would still somehow still be unsatisfactory, I just don't see how that is reasonable.

Astus wrote:

There is no such claim. The claim is that Zen transmits the very mind of the Buddha, that members of the lineage are on the same level of awakening as the Buddha himself. If the claim was something other, that for instance they transmitted the realisation of a bodhisattva, or an arhat, or something else, then it wouldn't be the transmission of the buddha-mind. This is practically in order to be able to say that it can stand apart from the very teachings of the Buddha that one can find in the sutras, that a member of the lineage can be on an equal level as a source of truth as the sutras.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2020 at 4:18 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

seeker242 said:

Yes there is such a claim. If the original claim is "that members of the lineage are on the same level of awakening as the Buddha himself" that is no different than saying "9th bhumi still just isn't good enough" since 9th bhumi, is by definition, not the same as Buddha himself.

Astus wrote:

If the transmission were of something less than the buddha-mind, then it'd be a gradual path, something that Zen teachers distanced themselves from right at the start, and only kept strengthening that position over the centuries.

Baizhang Huaihai explained it this way:

'Once you do not grasp any more, and yet do not dwell in nonattachment either, this is the intermediate good. This is the half-word teaching. This is still the formless realm; though you avoid falling into the way of the two vehicles, and avoid falling into the ways of demons, this is still a meditation sickness. This is the bondage of bodhisattvas.'

(Sayings and Doings of Pai-Chang, p 31)

'Only a Buddha alone is a great teacher, because there is no second person; the rest are all called outsiders, also called demons talking.'
(p 37)

'From the first to the tenth stage of bodhisattvahood they are still disciples - right now as long as they have any seeking mind at all, they're all called immoral monks, nominal saints; they're all called jackals. Clearly they can't digest the offerings of others.'
(p 57)

'Even people in the tenth stage of bodhisattvahood cannot get rid of this completely, and flow into the river of birth and death.'
(p 58)

'The first, second, third, and fourth stages have the affliction of clear understanding; the fifth, sixth, and seventh stages have the affliction of various kinds of knowledge, the eighth, ninth, and tenth stages have the afflictions of bodhisattvas simultaneously illuminating both realities, on up to the affliction of cultivating the fruit of Buddhahood and its innumerable practices - you only care for knowledge and understanding of meanings and expressions, and don't realize that instead these are binding afflictions.'
(p 68)

And Huangbo:

'Even if you attain the three [stages of] sagehood and the four fruits [of the Hinayana] and complete the ten stages [of the bodhisattva], you will still remain within [the domain of] ordinary and sagely.'
(Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 38)

Linji went even further:

'Followers of the Way, if you take my viewpoint you'll cut off the heads of the saṃbhogakāya and nirmāṇakāya buddhas; a bodhisattva who has attained the completed mind of the tenth stage will be like a mere hireling; a bodhisattva of equivalent enlightenment or a bodhisattva of marvelous enlightenment will be like pilloried prisoners; an arhat and a pratyekabuddha will be like privy fi lth; bodhi and nirvana will be like hitching posts for asses. Why is this so? Followers of the Way, it is only because you haven't yet realized the emptiness of the three asaṃkhyeya kalpas that you have such obstacles.'
(Record of Linji, p 10, tr Sasaki)

'Followers of the Way, don't take the Buddha to be the ultimate. As I see it, he is just like a privy hole. Both bodhisattvahood and arhatship are cangues and chains that bind one. Th is is why Mañjuśrī tried to kill Gautama with his sword, and why Aṅgulimāla attempted to slay Śākyamuni with his dagger.'

(p 31)

But that's all Hongzhou school interpretation. For something closer to the gradual perspective there are the teachings of Zongmi, Yanshou, and Jinul, although they still insist on first gaining sudden awakening to buddha-mind.

seeker242 said:

There is nothing there that dictates that 8th/9th bhumi, etc, etc. would not have that necessary knowledge to do all of the above.

Astus wrote:

As you can see above, there actually is a view that even a bodhisattva on the highest stage is not good enough.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2020 at 5:33 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

Dan74 said:

I think there are texts and there is reality on the ground.

Astus wrote:

Texts are not apart from the reality on the ground, but one aspect of it. Such texts, teachings, views, etc. influence and define what and how people think of Zen and Zen teachers, and that in turn conditions expectations and behaviours. For instance, right when looking up from whom to learn Zen, one of the first things one is advised to check are lineage credentials, so on almost every website and every book of a Zen teacher/community has a section dedicated to lineage as proof of authenticity. There is no special consideration given to the specific views of the teacher, nor to what ordination was received, or any other aspects.

Dan74 said:

The reality on the ground is that one has to look long and hard to find a fully-awakened master in any school. And whether Zen, Vajrayana or any other lineage, there are many sincere and dedicated teachers who are able to assist the students with their practice to some extent.

Astus wrote:

However, unlike in Zen, teachers elsewhere are not required or presumed to be awakened (except tulkus). For a Zen teacher to say that s/he is an ordinary being who simply passes on whatever s/he learnt from others, that goes against the very definition of transmitting the mind and not the scriptures.

Dan74 said:

One thing is clear to me though, we can wring our hands about the absence of enlightened teachers, degeneration of the Dharma, etc, or we can practice and realise that that is indeed the best and only way to address these concerns.

Astus wrote:

Does that practice require an enlightened teacher or not? If it does, then it is a problem not to find such a teacher.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2020 at 7:18 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

Dan74 said:

Texts also bemoan the scarcity of realised teachers, at times. And lineage is surely an indication at least, if not a guarantee. Do you have a better system in mind?

Astus wrote:

The lineage system is not a commonly used way in education, not even in Buddhism. Just consider how both mundane (engineers, scientists, scholars, craftsmen, etc.) and religious (theologians, priests, monks, cantors, etc.) experts are trained within institutional environments, and what quality assurance (supervision) means in various professions.

Dan74 said:

I have not yet met a Zen teacher who claimed to be fully enlightened, free of all obscurations. I think the claim that a teacher needs to be fully enlightened in order to transmit is false.

Astus wrote:

Do you have a specific view regarding the traditional lineage history that goes back to Shakyamuni? Is it not a transmission where the mind of the student and the mind of the teacher agree (see a definition here: https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/glossary/individual.html?key=seal_of_the_buddha_mind)?

Dan74 said:

Enlightened or not enlightened? Is that the only dichotomy in your mind?

Astus wrote:

The question of the topic is about whether Zen teachers are awakened. According to the usual definition of what makes a Zen teacher (https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/glossary/individual.html?key=dharma_transmission), and what transmission refers to (https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/glossary/individual.html?key=dharma_lamp), they necessarily are. Do you know of a different criteria?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2020 at 7:29 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Malcolm said:

Mahayana arose at the same time as Hinayana.

Astus wrote:

That is a bit ambiguous. For instance, the term hinayana is used by mahayana in order to distinguish itself, and since these terms depend on each other, like low and high, they cannot exist separately.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2020 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

Dan74 said:

If one completes a doctorate, then the supervisor is a significant factor. In maths when one talks about young researchers, one hears a lot of things like 'he was a student of....'. So there is a lineage

Astus wrote:

There are a number of crucial differences between saying that one has studied under this and that teacher, and that there is a unique lineage of special transmission independent of scriptures. Naturally, every Buddhist is a descendent of the Buddha in a way. It is still the norm that monastics in China and Vietnam receive Shi/Thích 釋 (i.e. Shakyas) as their family name. But in Zen only select people are called descendants, and it was meant to distinguish that person from all the other Buddhists (until practically everyone got to be a Chan descendant, like in China).

So it's rather like as if among all the maths PhD's some started to claim a unique expertise in mathematics because they studied under someone who studied from a disciple of an allegedly super talented, but generally unknown and already deceased professor, and because of that they now teach maths independent of numbers and logic, therefore it is not something one could learn anywhere else. And if you think this is an exaggeration, look at what Sheng-yen had to say about the matter (Hoofprint of the Ox by Sheng-yen, p 112):

"Where the doctrinal schools (jiao) locate authoritative tradition in the transmission of the Buddhist scriptures, the Chan school looks to a "mind-to-mind" transmission of the living vision of enlightenment itself. Known variously as the "transmission of the lamp or flame" or the "transmission of the treasury of the true eye of the Dharma," Chan claims to be heir to a generation-to-generation transmission of the Buddha's enlightened mind that runs parallel to his spoken word-Dharma."

Dan74 said:

The point is that Zen training is predicated on a personal relationship.

Astus wrote:

As you noted, even mathematics and arts are so, therefore it is nothing new or unique about Zen, especially if you keep in mind that Zen existed primarily within a monastic environment. However, whether one actually receives a doctorate is not the decision of one person, and it is not actually received from a single individual but an institution. Furthermore, the validity of one's calculations does not depend on whether one is a student of a specific teacher.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2020 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

seeker242 said:

And sudden awakening to buddha-mind is something different from actually becoming a 100% perfect Buddha.

Astus wrote:

There is such an interpretation by those who talk of "sudden awakening, gradual practice".

seeker242 said:

None of the quotes you quoted above actually say that a very learned person cannot relay the Buddha's teaching in a satisfactory manner.

Astus wrote:

That would be a teaching according to the usual manner, relying on the scriptures, following a gradual path. That is what Zen teachers wanted to distinguish themselves from.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2020 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

Dan74 said:

In Zen it's whether one truly received the transmission.

Astus wrote:

But what is the nature of transmission? Usually it is understood as a certification of the attainment of a disciple. It does not mean the whole process of receiving teachings.

Dan74 said:

It sounds to me that you are putting in doubt the entire teacher-to-disciple transmission.

Astus wrote:

What is called Dharma transmission is not teaching someone how to meditation or how to follow the precepts, but the acknowledgement that one has attained the same level of awakening as the one who gives the transmission (see definitions give <https://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=542121#p542121>).

Dan74 said:

Can it happen outside the teacher to disciple relationship?

Astus wrote:

In various ways. If we take the aspect of historical lineage, then the answer is remote succession (yaosi 遙嗣), where one person claims inheritance from someone who is already dead. A modern example for that is how Xuyun transmitted the lineages of the three lost schools of Chan and thus Xuanhua became the ninth ancestor of the Guiyang line. If we take the awakening aspect, then anyone ever awakened could be said to have received the mind seal of the buddhas.

Dan74 said:

wasn't Chinul like that? And Huineng as well, the first breakthrough?

Astus wrote:

If what you refer to is whether someone can awaken without extended training under a single teacher, then yes, there are many examples from that starting with the agamas/nikayas where a monk asked for a brief instruction from the Buddha, then went away, meditated, and attained liberation. Jinul is an example of a super influential teacher within Zen who is not a lineage member. Hanshan Deqing is another such person. Two recent reformers, Hakuin in Japan and Gyeongheo in Korea, are also like that, as they have never received certification by anyone, but they are currently the sole sources of all Rinzai and Imje lineages in their respective countries. However, those latter two were quickly put in a lineage by their disciples.

Dan74 said:

If you are out to say that the entire teacher-student relationship is hyped up, well, come out and say so.

Astus wrote:

Dharma transmission generally means certification. It does not mean the whole process of learning. I do not say that studying under a teacher is unimportant, nor is that the topic.

Dan74 said:

Perhaps Secular Buddhism is more your thing.

Astus wrote:

Unlikely.

Dan74 said:

For my part I've really appreciated teachers' inputs and will continue to seek it when appropriate.

Astus wrote:

And so have I.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2020 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

seeker242 said:

I don't agree. If one understands what "Buddha mind" is well enough, one would not need to rely on scriptures, as not needing to rely on scriptures is what "well enough" would mean to begin with.

Astus wrote:

The sutras cover the whole path up to buddhahood. A bodhisattva is someone who is dedicated to master all teachings, and attain omniscience, but has not yet done so. Without omniscience why wouldn't one need to rely on the buddhas' teachings?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 8th, 2020 at 3:59 AM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

seeker242 said:

Because they understand it well enough without having to continue reading books about it

Astus wrote:

Do you mean that everything there is to know to attain buddhahood is found in buddha-mind, and a Zen teacher knows buddha-mind "well enough" to no longer need to study the Buddha's teachings?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 8th, 2020 at 5:22 AM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

seeker242 said:

What I mean is that a person can know Buddha mind well that they don't need to utilize books in order to guide people to it.

Astus wrote:

That is not what relying on the scriptures means. It means that the source of one's knowledge originates from them. If Dharma transmission in Zen does not mean that the mind of Kashyapa matched the mind of the Buddha, i.e. that Kashyapa was of equal awakening to Shakyamuni, then it is a partial realisation that is passed on, it is incomplete, therefore not enough to attain buddhahood. And then in order to fulfil the goal of Mahayana, one necessarily needs to learn the rest of the teachings from the only other source available: the scriptures. Those Zen teachers who favoured the teaching of "sudden enlightenment, gradual practice" taught the harmony of Zen and doctrine, mainly Huayan. Here's what Yanshou wrote:

'QUESTION If you want to clarify the implicit truth of Buddhism [zong], you need only promote the message of the patriarchs. What use is there in combining it with citations from the oral teachings of the Buddhas and bodhisattvas, taking these as a guide? The reason why members of Chan lineages [zongmen] claim "By availing oneself of the eyes of a snake, one will not distinguish things for oneself" is that one only becomes a sage of words and letters [by following the scriptures], but does not enter the ranks of the patriarchs.

ANSWER The above claim is not intended to prohibit reading the scriptures. I worry that people will not know well the words of the Buddha. People develop understanding through texts. When people forget about the Buddha's message, one safeguards the minds of beginners on the basis of [texts]. Whoever understands the teaching through the corpus of Buddhist writings will not create a mind and realm of objects in opposition to each other, but will realize the mind of the Buddha directly. What error is there in this?'

(Yongming Yanshou's Conception of Chan in the Zongjing lu: a special transmission within the scriptures by Albert Welter, p 248-249)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 8th, 2020 at 4:23 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Grigoris said:

This assumes that (all) the nikayas/agamas are the earliest Dharma texts.

Is there any historical evidence for this?

Astus wrote:

There is a summary regarding the Early Buddhist Texts on https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Early_Buddhist_texts. For a more extensive summary with references you can read <https://ocbs.org/wp-content/uploads/2015/09/authenticity.pdf>.

And if you have some extra time, you can look at this essay, to give some thought to style:

http://www.ahandfulofleaves.org/documents/Articles/The%20Oral%20Composition%20and%20Transmission%20of%20Early%20Buddhist%20Texts_Allon_Spalding%20Symposium_1989-94.pdf.

Once what EBT are like is settled, then we can see how even works like the Jatakas are considered later. Then one can take a look at how various concepts changed and developed, as it's done for instance by Guang Xing in <https://books.google.co.in/books?id=DTWZLMGFFgkC>. But there are several other possible ideas that are taken for granted in Mahayana but appeared first in abhidharma or commentarial works, for instance the concept of two truths, or that there is an assurance of attainment of buddhahood at some point during a bodhisattva's career.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 8th, 2020 at 6:25 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Bristollad said:

how do you choose the features that identify an "early" text. Material arranged in such a way as to be easy to recite and memorise does not make it an early text, it only makes it material arranged to be easy to recite and memorise.

Astus wrote:

That is not the only criteria, however, it is accepted by all that the teachings were recorded in writing only later, so it is one of the signals, but, again, not the only one.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 8th, 2020 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Malcolm said:

It really doesn't prove anything.

Astus wrote:

When sravakas are depicted as people holding views that are found in texts clearly later than the agamas, then on what basis is it reasonable to assume that such a work is earlier than those that contain the views mentioned?

Would you take, for instance, that such stanzas like these were uttered as true prophecies?

'From the Mahāsāṃghika school
Will seven schools separate,
And from the Sthaviravāda eleven.
These are the twenty schools.
These eighteen and the original two
All derive from the Mahayana.
Neither correct nor incorrect,
I say that these will arise in the future'
(The Sutra of Mañjuśrī's Questions, BDK ed, p 99)

Or that there was talk of Vaibhasikas before the existence of the Mahavibhasa?

'Then instruct upon the Vaibhasya doctrine and after that the Sutranta doctrine. Then instruct upon the Yogacara doctrine followed by the Madhyamaka doctrine. After teaching all the practices of mantra, then commence with the instruction on the Hevajra practice.'

(The Concealed Essence of the Hevajra Tantra, p 273)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 8th, 2020 at 11:10 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Malcolm said:

How is this exercise in conjecture about the date of these texts useful to a mahayani or a Vajrayani? This is only of interest to non-practitioners.

Astus wrote:

Aren't practitioners invested in the matter of studying authentic Dharma? The authenticity of a teaching is commonly decided based on its provenance, and only secondarily by its content. In fact, it cannot be measured by content unless one has already identified some teachings as valid, and that could have happened only by its origin. Still, this is not saying that origin is the ultimate measure, only that it is a regularly used one, because it is often the easiest to go by, at least superficially. So, although ideally historical matters are irrelevant, but just as gossiping and similar human/person/self-centred thinking is normal behaviour, approaching the question of validity happens within a historical framework, otherwise there would be no need to mention whether something was or wasn't taught by the Buddha (or some other accepted source).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2020 at 12:47 AM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Malcolm said:

The authenticity of a teaching is decided on the basis of its content, not its supposed provenance, determined by some historiographical criteria, which is at best arbitrary and a product of the perceptions of common people.

Astus wrote:

How do you tell if the content is the Buddha's teaching or not? You compare it with other teachings that are accepted as his. So what defines the basic teaching that the others are compared to?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2020 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Grigoris said:

And who gets to decide what is authentic Dharma? Historians?

Astus wrote:

"Without approval and without scorn, but carefully studying the sentences word by word, one should trace them in the Discourses and verify them by the Discipline. If they are neither traceable in the Discourses nor verifiable by the Discipline, one must conclude thus: 'Certainly, this is not the Blessed One's utterance; this has been misunderstood by that bhikkhu — or by that community, or by those elders, or by that elder.' In that way, bhikkhus, you should reject it. But if the sentences concerned are traceable in the Discourses and verifiable by the Discipline, then one must conclude thus: 'Certainly, this is the Blessed One's utterance; this has been well understood by that bhikkhu — or by that community, or by those elders, or by that elder.'"

(<https://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.16.1-6.vaji.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2020 at 4:07 AM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Grigoris said:

Anybody can make up "an utterance" and credit it to the/a Buddha.

Astus wrote:

So how can you tell if it's valid or not? Whether it is in harmony with the accepted teachings, as noted above, but also see:

<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an08/an08.053.than.html>,

<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an07/an07.079.than.html>.

PS. <https://fakebuddhaquotes.com/>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2020 at 4:09 AM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Grigoris said:

Accepted by who, or more to the point: by which authority/orthodoxy?

Astus wrote:

By both parties questioning the authenticity of a teaching.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2020 at 4:03 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Grigoris said:

Accepted by who? That is the problem.

Tantra (for example) are accepted as Buddhavacana by Vajrayani, but rejected by Sravakayani as "not in harmony" with THEIR accepted teachings.

Astus wrote:

There is already a basic set of teachings accepted by both sides. Furthermore, all Buddhists aim for the same in taming and overcoming habituated emotional reactions and cultivating skilful qualities like mindfulness, compassion, and wisdom.

Grigoris said:

And that is where the problems begin: Sectarian notions of orthodoxy.

Astus wrote:

There can be such an attitude if one fails to keep in check one of the basic defilements: conceit. Otherwise, if one cares to look deeper into the various methods and teachings of Buddhism, there is a big overlap among them.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2020 at 4:42 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Malcolm said:

This is valid only if one supposes that the shravaka canons are the standard by one judges what constitutes buddhavacana.

Astus wrote:

Not necessarily. For instance, if one accepts a Vaipulya Pitaka and a Dharani Pitaka as parts of the Buddha's words, then they serve as a basis of measuring anything questionable.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2020 at 5:51 PM

Title: Re: Are Zen teachers awakened?

Content:

Matylda said:

Generally zen teachers, whether in the East or the West carry extremely heavy burden of responsibility, and if they take things lightly or without self criticism then only they will be responsible for this that something was missing in their teachings and training.

Astus wrote:

'If sentient beings encounter someone with errant views in their quest for a good friend, they will never attain true enlightenment — that is a case of what is referred to as heterodox nature. The errors of the false teacher are not the fault of sentient beings.'
(The Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment, ch 5, BDK ed, p 77)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2020 at 5:59 PM

Title: Re: Are all phenomena equally empty in Madhyamaka?

Content:

akuppa said:

Yes, I guess my question is how a Madhyamaka would decide which descriptions of relative truth are better (more useful?), and whether this is touched on in Madhyamaka reasoning.

Astus wrote:

Conventional phenomena, the relative truth, is what is dependently originated. So what can be considered conventionally valid are what has function in terms of causal relations. For instance, one cannot drink from a mirage, but can drink from a lake. Similarly, a permanent consciousness cannot function as consciousness, only one that is dependently originated.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2020 at 6:27 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Grigoris said:

Some of the skillful qualities cultivated in tantric system are directly at odds with basic tenets in the Sravakayana.

Astus wrote:

Skillful qualities (kusala dharma) are those that are free from craving, anger, and delusion (see: <https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.009.ntbb.html#kusala>). What is it that Vajrayana considers skillful that is rooted in the three poisons?

'To realize the perfect view is to be totally free from the five poisons, the emotions which keep us enslaved in samsara. As the five poisons disappear, the five corresponding wisdoms are revealed.'

(The Heart Treasure of the Enlightened Ones, p 125)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2020 at 7:13 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Caoimhghín said:

the vaipulyapiṭaka and dhāraṇīpiṭaka of the Mahāsāṅghikas are not extant baskets of scripture.

Astus wrote:

It was merely an example. The point is that if one takes the whole Taisho Tripitaka as a basis, then the given method of comparing teachings to the scriptures found in the Taisho is still operational.

Caoimhghín said:

(I actually know the language of bodhisattvapiṭaka, where did you vaipulyapiṭaka from?)

Astus wrote:

I've seen somewhere before. But bodhisattvapitaka works as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2020 at 9:36 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Malcolm said:

And if one accepts the Vidyādhara piṭaka???

Astus wrote:

Nope, there must be limits.

Malcolm said:

the Buddha's higher teachings regularly conflict with the Buddha's lower teachings, and this is determined by content alone, and not provenance.

Astus wrote:

I don't really see those conflicts, but I guess that is already another conflict.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2020 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Malcolm said:

The distinction generally drawn is between renunciation (three lower vehicles) and transformation (kriya tantra to anuyoga). In Vajrayāna, through skillful means:

"That by which fools are bound, by that same thing the wise are liberated."

--Saraha.

Astus wrote:

Even if such distinctions were accepted, the end result would still be the same liberation. Appearances are selfless, empty, buddhas, or self-liberated - it's either one is lost in clinging or not.

'It is said that all the learned and accomplished masters of India and Tibet had the same realization and there is not a single master who claims that the realization of the main part of practice is anything other than nonfixation.'

(Naturally Liberating Whatever You Meet: Instructions to Guide You on the Profound Path by Khenpo Gangshar, in Vivid Awareness, p 227)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 10th, 2020 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Malcolm said:

For example, Śrāvaka bhikṣus cannot handle gold, but may eat meat. Mahāyāna bhikṣus may handle gold, but may not eat meat. Vajrayāna bhikṣu may both handle gold and eat meat.

Astus wrote:

The state of being a bhikṣu is a matter of ordination, and it is regulated by the pratimokṣa. Being a sravaka/mahayanika/vajrayanika is a matter of view and practice. How does one influence the other?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 10th, 2020 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Malcolm said:

There are two ways be free of grasping: regarding all things as impure and rejecting them as such (Hinayāna and common Mahāyāna), and regarding all things as pure and accepting them as such. The latter method more rapid, but requires special methods, so that it is not merely an intellectual posture.

Astus wrote:

I don't think any path promotes accepting or rejecting as the way to go. Rather, to be free of grasping, one needs to see things as they actually are.

'It's when a mendicant meditates by observing an aspect of the body—keen, aware, and mindful, rid of desire and aversion for the world.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/dn22/en/sujato>)

'The perfect Way is not difficult;

It only avoids discrimination.

If only there is no love or hate,

Completely clean and clear is it.'

(The Faith-Mind Maxim, in Three Chan Classics, BDK ed, p 123)

At the same time:

'On the basis of strong renunciation, any kind of Dharma practice, even a very simple one, can be a cause to attain enlightenment. On the other hand, without such renunciation, even very high tantra or any other profound Dharma practice will not lead us to freedom from samsara.'

(A Complete Guide to the Buddhist Path by Khenchen Konchog Gyaltsen, p 141)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 10th, 2020 at 5:29 AM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Grigoris said:

One fire burns and destroys, the other fire warms and nurtures. What is the essential difference between the two types of flames?

Astus wrote:

The essential difference is in how they are qualified/described.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 10th, 2020 at 6:24 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Malcolm said:

But in Vajrayāna, we do not give up the basis, that is, the five objects of desire.

Astus wrote:

They are objects of desire because one desires them, not because sights, sounds, etc. are desirable in and of themselves. This is understood even in the agamas/nikayas.

'The eye is not the fetter of forms, nor are forms the fetter of the eye. Whatever desire & passion arises in dependence on the two of them: That is the fetter there.'

(<https://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn35/sn35.191.than.html>)

Similarly, it is one's view of things that is changed, not the things themselves.

'One is not freed by existence;

One does not transcend samsara through non-existence;

It's through understanding existence and non-existence

That the great beings are liberated.

Those who do not see ultimate reality

Grasp at samsara and nirvana;

But those who see ultimate reality possess

No pretensions of world and its' transcendence.'

(<https://www.tibetanclassics.org/html-assets/SixtyStanzas.pdf>, v 4-5)

So, as in your quotes from Loppön Sonam Tsemo, the solution lies in 'having given up the intrinsic cause of bondage [i.e. deceived concepts,] the objects which [earlier] became the condition of that [bondage] [now] become the condition of liberation'; 'the ordinary ceases, everything will be given up'; 'non-conceptual samadhi removes conceptuality, all bonds will be respectively released'; and as a summary of the same: 'if the intrinsic nature of that cause is dispelled by the two methods [above], since the aspect of the objects has changed, again one can depend on objects since they have been transformed into assisting antidotes'. And you as well kindly summarised the main point:

The problem of liberation is not to be quickly resolved by renunciation of the five objects of desire, rather, it is to be quickly resolved by relinquishing the ordinary conceptuality about the five objects of desire that is the root of all attachment and aversion.

The same is taught under the topic of transformation of emotions in The Heart Treasure of the Enlightened Ones, for example regarding anger (p 126):

'If you recognize the nature of anger as void, it loses all its power to harm and becomes mirrorlike wisdom; but if you fail to recognize its nature and give it free rein, it will be no less than the very source of the scorching and freezing torments of hell.'

And by others as well, like Thrangu Rinpoche's summary about <http://www.purifymind.com/ObstaclesPath.htm>.

The reason I repeated and expanded on what I think you said about Vajrayana's unique approach is to try to ensure we are on the same page here. But then, I don't see the sutras teaching anything else. Seeing things as they are is to see that appearances are insubstantial, that they are actually ungraspable and inconceivable. When that is clear, there is no basis for clinging. How are then the sutras saying anything different?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 10th, 2020 at 7:01 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Grigoris said:

This is not essential, it is relative. Ask a pyromaniac, for example, then ask somebody that is cold.

Astus wrote:

You asked about the "essential difference" between them. Difference is relative. But then, why not you tell it?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 10th, 2020 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Malcolm said:

The question that must be posed then is: how does sutra transform ordinary conceptuality? Seeing appearances as insubstantial does not transform them into pure phenomena that maybe be readily enjoyed by the practitioner.

Astus wrote:

If by seeing them as insubstantial you mean a conceptual label, sure, that doesn't help that much. But that is a known mistake. However, if it is actually seeing their emptiness, in other words, not falling into extreme concepts about them, then that is no different from what is taught in Vajrayana about how to take appearances as/on the path. On the fourth Dharma of Gampopa, where both the Sutrayana and Vajrayana approaches are mentioned, Ringu Tulku comments:

'When you compare the Vajrayana approach with the Sutrayana approach, you see there is no real difference between them. The Sutrayana way is to look at the deluded mind and see it as relative rather than real; the mind is like a dream or an illusion. Then, this understanding is applied to all phenomena so that everything is recognized as illusory. The Vajrayana approach is to see that the deluded mind has the nature of wisdom.'

(Confusion Arises as Wisdom, p 48)

There are some differences mentioned between Sutrayana (analytic, indirect, slow) and Vajrayana (non-analytic, direct, quick) (also by Thrangu Rinpoche, as in <http://www.rinpoche.com/teachings/3vehicles.pdf>, p 90, 92 & Creation and Completion, p 121-122), however, such characterisation of sutric methods is a limited interpretation, as directly looking at the nature of experience (instead of making theoretical deductions about it) is very much the way insight meditation is practised from Tiantai to Theravada.

'One turns back the attention and contemplates the mind which engages in actions. One then fails to perceive any characteristic appearance. One should then realize that the agent of actions as well as all of the dharmas involved in engaging in actions are ultimately empty and still. It is this which constitutes the cultivation of [insight] contemplation.'

(http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/EBM_excerpts/EBM_X-16_X-06.pdf, p 14)

'Mindfulness is nonconceptual awareness. Another English term for Sati is 'bare attention'. It is not thinking. It does not get involved with thought or concepts. It does not get hung up on ideas or opinions or memories. It just looks. Mindfulness registers experiences, but it does not compare them. It does not label them or categorize them. It just observes everything as if it was occurring for the first time. It is not analysis which is based on reflection and memory. It is, rather, the direct and immediate experiencing of whatever is happening, without the medium of thought. It comes before thought in the perceptual process.'

(https://www.vipassana.com/meditation/mindfulness_in_plain_english_15.php)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 10th, 2020 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

How can one distinguish a conceptual emptiness from the actual luminosity with these sentences?

Astus wrote:

That was not the subject of the post, so it shouldn't be something to look for there.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 11th, 2020 at 5:50 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Malcolm said:

The difference is not view nor the goal, Buddhahood, the difference is in method, the intelligence of the trainee, and so on.

Astus wrote:

And that difference in method is the question. You have kindly provided <https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=542802#p542802> of Vajrayana methods, where it was made clear that the difference proposed was how it's not the five objects of desires that are given up but 'the ordinary conceptuality about the five objects of desire that is the root of all attachment and aversion'. To that I <https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=542869#p542869> that it is no different from what is done in Sutrayana. Then the efficacy of seeing the emptiness of appearances was <https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=542875#p542875>, and <https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=542901#p542901> by showing that there is no difference in freedom from proliferation. So, how is there a difference in method, when the method of Vajrayana is to eliminate ordinary concepts instead of objects, and so it is with Sutrayana too? But if the absence of proliferation is not a method, then Vajrayana doesn't have it either. Or it could be said that the difference lies in the method of attaining nonconceptual wisdom, but then the problem is in proposing wisdom that can be used in Vajrayana as a method where the five objects of desire are not eliminated.

Malcolm said:

Secret Mantra is superior because the wisdom which arises in the mind at the time of the descent of gnosis, or third empowerment and so forth, is freedom from proliferation realized directly.

Astus wrote:

That is an answer then to have wisdom available from the start, although the third empowerment is said to be only an example, and the fourth is the actual realisation that is the level of Dzogchen (Treasury of Precious Qualities, vol 2, p 130-132) and Mahamudra (e.g. The Treasury of Knowledge, vol 6, p 231-233; further elaborated in Mahamudra and Related Instructions, p 485-490). The verbal instruction to directly see the nature of mind is found in both the Vajrayana and the Sutrayana (Mahamudra the Moonlight, p 181), so if there is a methodical difference, it is related to the example wisdom, but not the real one.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 11th, 2020 at 7:20 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

The wisdom is the same in sutra and tantra. But the methods are quite different.

Astus wrote:

It is through removing the two obscurations with wisdom that one arrives at buddhahood (Uttaratantra Shastra, 7.390-391), as buddha-nature itself is already complete with perfect qualities.

As Gampopa stated:

'When one is endowed with the meaning of emptiness, there is not a single thing which is not included in this path'

(Jewel Ornament of Liberation, p 252)

One can also obtain wisdom through a

<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225467.html>, by a <https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225468.html>, or <https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225469.html>.

Again, from Gampopa:

'In that case, if all these are included in meditating on only the essence or the mind-as-such, why do there appear teachings on so many graduated methods? It is for the purpose of leading all those sentient beings of little fortune, who are ignorant in the ultimate nature.'

(Jewel Ornament of Liberation, p 254-255)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 12th, 2020 at 3:51 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Malcolm said:

Then you've misunderstood what "ordinary conceptuality" means. What does it mean? It means to conceive the five buddhas, the five mothers, the male and female bodhisattvas as skandhas, elements, sense organs and sense objects.

Astus wrote:

Then instead of me <https://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=542869#p542869> it, let's be more specific. For instance, what is perceiving Vairocana in/as the sound of a doorbell? How is it something other than the standard 'form is emptiness, emptiness is form'?

Malcolm said:

The sūtras do not teach that the five skandhas, five elements, sense organs, sense objects and so on, are, their real nature, the mandala of the five buddhas, five mothers, etc.

Astus wrote:

The sutras teach the indivisibility of the two truths, and its realisation. Vajrayana may put that into a practice of visualising buddhas, but the point is still to get rid of grasping at phenomena.

Malcolm said:

Incorrect. The methodical difference is related to both kinds of gnosis, not merely the first, since in ordinary persons, the second arises from the first.

Astus wrote:

Real wisdom is the defining attainment of noble beings, and it is realised through vipasyana, wouldn't you agree?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 12th, 2020 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Wrong. It is completion stage where subtle obscuration is removed. The Dalai Lama is good at explaining it. Visualization of buddhas is not going to do that.

Astus wrote:

And in completion stage what does it mean to see the five skandhas as the five buddhas?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 12th, 2020 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Well Gampopa taught fivefold path mahamudra to practitioners and sutra mahamudra to laypersons.

Astus wrote:

The Fivefold Mahamudra is a teaching of the Drikungpas coming from Jigten Sumgon. Gampopa taught to a few close disciples candali, to everyone else (monastic or not) he taught what is now called Sutra Mahamudra, and regarding the reason behind that distinction between the two approaches:

'The Mahāmudrā of bliss and emptiness on the path of means
Is the actual practice of secret mantra,
But those who practise it are few and far between.
The Mahāmudrā of the innate on the path of liberation
Is an easier practice offering great reward at little risk,
And is of benefit to all, regardless of capacity.'
(<https://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/jamgon-kongtrul/mahamudra-swift-lord-of-realization>)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 12th, 2020 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Malcolm said:

also found extensively taught and practiced in Drukpa Kagyu as well.

Astus wrote:

Thanks, that's good to know.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 12th, 2020 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Malcolm said:

In sūtra there is no antidotal method of conceiving the appearance of things as pure which are typically conceived by ordinary sentient being as impure. Emptiness, in sutra, is provided as cure for this, in terms of nature, but not in terms of appearance. Vajrayāna address both nature and appearance; sūtra only addresses nature, not appearance.

Astus wrote:

One sees a tasty looking apple pie. How not to fall into craving? For instance, the Vitakkasanthana Sutta gives five (progressive) methods: pay attention to something else (that is conducive to good thoughts), consider the drawbacks of craving, forget and pay no attention to it, relax the mental fabrications/concoctions about it, subdue the thoughts by force. Or one can think of it as something disgusting, something undesirable; or as something insubstantial, meaningless, and worthless. How would Vajrayana address this situation? If one thinks one is a buddha one can just give in to any impulse?

Malcolm said:

The distinction between the the common and uncommon Mahāyāna is principally the difference between method, the latter being more efficacious and more rapid. One does not merely regard oneself as buddhanatured, causally, one regards oneself as a buddha from the outset of entering the path. One does not regard one's teacher as being "like a buddha," one regards one's master as an actual buddha right from the outset and so on, based on the special methods of abhiṣeka, sadhana, and so forth.

Astus wrote:

How does it make it more efficacious to think of oneself being a buddha, instead of not to think of oneself as anything at all?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 13th, 2020 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Based in a to achieve buddhahood to benefit all beings eat the apple pie and enjoy it. You are a bodhisattva now. No need to rush.

Astus wrote:

That does not seem to agree with the teachings.

'Take food as medicine, in the right amount,
Without attachment, without hatefulness:
Don't eat for vanity, for pride or ego's sake,
Eat only for your body's sustenance.'
(Letter to a Friend by Nagarjuna, v 38, tr Padmakara Translation Group)

'Buddhas told those with desire
That food, clothes and dwellings are all
To be avoided and to remain
Close to their spiritual guides.'
(Four Hundred Stanzas by Aryadeva, v 138, tr Ruth Sonam)

'Most sentient beings are greedy for tastes; for the sake of food, they commit vile actions and are born in the hells. But those who {know the Dharma} are contented, not greedy, free from longing; they do not bow down to the sense of taste, but are contented and can be nourished even with very low-quality food.'
(Multitude of Jewels Sutra (Ratnarāśisūtra) quoted in The Training Anthology of Santideva, p 127, tr Charles Goodman)

See also: <https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225714.html>

Crazywisdom said:

Vajrayana is based on this attitude. There is the deity yoga you mentioned. At this stage one conceptually views the pie as the consort.

Astus wrote:

How does that help in not feeding one of the root causes of samsara?

Crazywisdom said:

At the completion stage one has directed one's essential elements into the central channel so one is fully dedicated to bliss. Seeing the empty nature of bliss becomes very clear and unborn enlightenment itself, one eats the pie or does whatever is being offered or presented as a spontaneous benefit.

Astus wrote:

If one knows that the object of desire is unreal, there is no more basis for desire to arise, just as one may crave, vie, and even kill for money, but not for fake bills. If the method given is to see that whatever enjoyment may come is empty, how is that any different from what is taught in the sutras?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 13th, 2020 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

jake said:

Please return to the topic. Thanks!

Astus wrote:

It might be split from around

<https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=542722#p542722> or

<https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=542738#p542738>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 14th, 2020 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

White Sakura said:

Is it correct to say to my son: "There are three vehicles, Sutra, Tantra and Mahamudra"- without mentioning Dzogchen?

Astus wrote:

There are Sutrayana and Vajrayana, and within Vajrayana there are the Path of Means (thabs lam) and the Path of Liberation (grol lam). It is the path of liberation where you find sutra and essence Mahamudra, while the path of means includes tantra Mahamudra. At the same time, Hinayana includes the Sravakayana and Pratyekabuddhayana, while Mahayana has the common and uncommon paths; of those Hinayana and common Mahayana is Sutrayana, and the uncommon Mahayana is Vajrayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 14th, 2020 at 1:50 AM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

So now you accept Drikung Kagyu? Essence Mahamudra is not a yana, it is based on Mahamudra Tilaka Tantra and others. It is tantric.

Astus wrote:

If we take Gampopa's word on it, Mahamudra per se is neither sutra nor tantra, but beyond them.

'In his texts, Gampopa distinguishes three main paths. (1) The paramitayana is called "the path of renunciation" and "the path of accumulation," which relies on inferential analysis and is for those who have faith and are of dull faculties. (2) The path of mantra is labeled "the path of transformation" and "the path of means," which relies on direct perception and is for those who are afflicted and of medium faculties. (3) The path of Mahamudra is "the path of prajna" and "the path of suchness," which relies on blessing and is for those who are intelligent and of sharp faculties. He also describes these three paths as follows:

(1) As for taking inference as the path, after having scrutinized all phenomena through arguments [such as] being beyond singularity and multiplicity, one says that there is no [other] possibility [for phenomena to be] than these [possibilities that one has examined] and then posits that everything is empty. [This is the path of] inference.

(2) [The practice of] nadls, vayus, and tilakas, 782 the repeated recitation of mantras, and so on, which are based on the generation stage of the deity's body, make up the path of blessing.

(3) As for taking direct perceptions as the path, a genuine guru says that connate mind as such is the luminous dharmakaya. Through having been taught an unmistakable instruction of definitive meaning like that, one then takes native mind as the path, without separating the triad of view, conduct, and meditation in terms of this connate mind about which one has gained certainty within oneself.

Elsewhere, Gampopa explicitly states that Mahamudra is the highest path that actually transcends both sutra and tantra. All of this clearly suggests that Gampopa considered Mahamudra per se as a path that does not belong to either sutra or tantra but lies beyond both. In practice, most of Gampopa's preserved teachings consist primarily of sutra-based instructions and then conclude with Mahâmudrâ, either not teaching the path of mantra at all or mentioning it only in passing.'

(When the Clouds Part, p 192-193)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 14th, 2020 at 4:36 AM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

Malcolm said:

It still requires an empowerment. The so-called "descent of the gnosis vajra empowerment" discussed by Indrabhūti in the Jñānasiddhi.

Astus wrote:

That is like Sakya Pandita's criticism of the Kagyupas, something that they rejected/refuted.

'Now the Venerable Mid-la did not teach the upaya-marga and the Mahamudra separately, but sGam-po-pa used to preach the hidden precepts of the upaya-marga to those only whom he considered fit to receive Tantric initiations. (On the other hand) he used to bestow the hidden precepts of the Mahamudra on those who were fit to receive the paramitas, though they did not get any (Tantric) initiation.'
(The Blue Annals, p 459)

'Regarding the manner of imparting the profound path [of Mahamudra], the venerable Gampopa considered it to be an independent path of tantra. So he did not make the esoteric empowerment a prerequisite for receiving the Mahamudra teachings. He spoke about the method of directly guiding the disciple toward the intrinsic reality of the mind.'
(Mahamudra the Moonlight, p 123)

'Now, in the cultivation of the path of method, three things are necessary: the empowerments which ripen, the reading transmissions which provide support, and the instructions which bring liberation. For the practice of the path of liberation, however, there is no particular empowerment that is required, because the practice itself consists of the two practices of tranquility and insight alone.'
(The Ninth Karmapa's Ocean of Definitive Meaning by Thrangu Rinpoche, p 57)

Malcolm said:

The main practice of course here is guru yoga, this is the "blessings" part.

Astus wrote:

If by this you mean that guru yoga is sufficient, then that agrees with Situ Tenpai (Oral Transmission of the Supreme Siddhas in Mahamudra and Related Instructions, p 204-205).

Malcolm said:

In this respect, Gampopa is cribbing his early training as a practitioner of Nyingma tantras, and the Mind Series (sems sde) in particular.

Astus wrote:

Based on Gampopa's teachings it's more likely from the Kadampas, if anyone.

'In line with the texts by Monlarn Tsiiltrim, these instructions are further evidence that Mahamudra style teachings existed in the Kadampa School, that this was the case even before Gampopa, and that Gampopa received such instructions.'
(When the Clouds Part, p 198)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 14th, 2020 at 4:41 AM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

What you cannot seem to accept is this is taught through the Dohas which are the pith instruction lineage. And you cannot practice this without a guru. There is no chance to do this by reading a book.

Astus wrote:

What do you base that assumption on? The requirement of receiving the teachings of Mahamudra/Vajrayana from a guru, and being devoted to him/her is repeated practically everywhere. What would be the point of me denying that?

'Devotion is the head of meditation, it is taught.

The lama opens the door to the profound oral teachings

To the meditator who always turns to him,

Grant your blessing that uncontrived devotion be born within.'

(<http://www.rinpoche.com/dchng.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 14th, 2020 at 4:50 AM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

What you are missing is this avoidance attitude is for monks. Further, it is for monks who are not working on completion stage.

Astus wrote:

Not just for monks.

'When thoughts of sensual desire arise in him towards his own wife, and he comes under the influence of reactive emotions, then, seeing the foulness of his wife and with a frightened mind, he should not be bound by attachment to engaging in sensual pleasures, and should always reflect on impermanence, nonself, and impurity.'

(Inquiry of Ugra Sutra (Ugradattaparipṛcchāsūtra) quoted in The Training Anthology of Santideva, p 81, tr Charles Goodman)

Crazywisdom said:

One is not at all greedy at the point of completion stage.

Astus wrote:

How has greed disappeared by then? Also, if it's gone, there is no intention at all to simply enjoy sense pleasures.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 14th, 2020 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Malcolm said:

to transform ordinary daily conduct and bring it into the path by replacing impure conceptuality with pure conceptuality.

Astus wrote:

Why would it produce a different mental habit regarding clinging to sense pleasures if one eats the pie as a dessert or as an offering, since actually one eats it because of its taste? Of course, it adds something good to it, but it how would it change the basic intention?

Malcolm said:

When one is on an island composed entirely of gold, one will have attachment to no specific part of it, one will have no discrimination towards anything on it, and thereby, one is freed of clinging.

Astus wrote:

On an island of gold one does not hoard gold, one does not want gold at all. So seeing an apple pie then is no different from seeing an empty plate, and one normally does not think much about empty plates. But still, it does not answer what makes the Vajrayana method more efficient.

Malcolm said:

We already think of ourselves, this is a given. In other words, in just the same way as fire is used to put out fire, or water is used to draw water out of the ear, the creation stage uses conceptuality to overcome conceptuality. Hence it is more profound than methods which try to suppress or eliminate conceptuality, such as those you mention above.

Astus wrote:

I can see how changing one's view about oneself can be helpful, if one has sufficient faith of course, and then it still takes practice, like for instance to remind oneself of being a buddha and not a glutton. At the same time, one could also remind oneself of all sorts of other teachings to help alleviating harmful impulses. So while for some it might be easier to believe in one's own buddha state, for others to contemplate the drawbacks of indulgence, for others to simply recognise the intention as baseless, and so on.

Malcolm said:

These above teachings are consistent with the path of renunciation. However, they are contradicted by the higher teachings of Vajrayāna, the path of transformation, and the citations illustrating this point have already been provided above, so there is no need to repeat them here.

Astus wrote:

It's been stated that Vajrayana takes appearances on the path, but as for how that is different from not grasping them through recognition of their emptiness (as taught for instance in <https://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=542869#p542869>), has so far not been demonstrated. Yes, skandhas are buddhas, and buddhas are pure beings, and thinking of oneself as a pure being is a unique method of Vajrayana. But even if one can reimagine oneself, that in itself does not liberate one from the three poisons, does it?

Malcolm said:

As also mentioned above, the Buddha's teachings of sūtra are for those with a) less affliction, and b) less capability. But contrast, Vajrayāna teachings are designed for those with a) greater affliction, and b) greater capabilities.

Therefore, can either accept the Buddha's teachings in the tantras, in which case, one has no choice but to become a Vajrayāna practitioner; but failing that, if one cannot generate faith in these teachings, then leave them aside, but do not criticize them, because there in lies the fault of criticizing the Dharma.

Astus wrote:

I said nothing against Vajrayana, not that it is not efficient, not that it is less efficient, not that it is for less capable or dull people. On the other hand, claims like that have been said against every non-Vajrayana teaching. So I'm asking about some clear reasons for such an opinion.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 14th, 2020 at 5:28 AM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Grigoris said:

None. But Vajrayana also does not believe in the efficacy of renunciation (or more to the point: it does not consider it the most efficient manner to achieve liberation). That puts it directly at odds with the Sravakayana.

Astus wrote:

If it does not renounce the three poisons, does it simply deny their existence? Because if it accepts that beings are driven by them, then either one can go by obeying the impulses, or not. Not obeying is renunciation.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 14th, 2020 at 6:43 PM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

I base this assumption on the fact you obviously do not know how gurus transmit this, Kagyu gurus. I spent years w one and he introduced me to many other kagyus, Karma Kagyu, Taklung Kagyu *(a holiness), MANY.... no one ever said mahamudra without guru yoga. No guru yoga in kagyu ever was without deity yoga. So i am calling you out as a liar buddy

Astus wrote:

You attribute to me things I did not even write. Furthermore, I have clearly given the sources of specific statements. If you say the sources are wrong, that might be so. If you have better ones, why not present them?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 14th, 2020 at 7:15 PM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

PeterC said:

Go Lotsawa was writing about four hundred years after Gampopa, if I remember the dates correctly. In Gampopa's own writings he repeatedly states the importance of empowerment. See the two texts Tony Duff translated of his.

Astus wrote:

Is Jamgon Kongtrul wrong then?

'Dakpo Rinpoché induced the realization of mahamudra even in beginners who had not received empowerment. Therefore this is the tradition of the perfections. These are instructions arising primarily from the Kadampa tradition.'

(Treasury of Knowledge, vol 9, p 212)

And Dzogchen Ponlop Rinpoche?

'The Sutrayana approach to Mahamudra is seen as a very profound method because it does not require any of the sophisticated and complex tantric rituals, deity yoga visualization practices, or samayas. It is a simple sutra approach, yet it conveys the direct transmission of the tantric essence of awakening. This particular approach is also known as a secret passage.

...

The Sutra Mahamudra approach is seen as a specialty of the Kagyu tradition and was the central emphasis of Gampopa's teachings. Therefore, although it originated in India and was also taught by Marpa and Milarepa, Gampopa is regarded as the main figure responsible for bringing this teaching to its full development and manifestation.'

(Wild Awakening, p 32, 33)

PeterC said:

There are Kagyupas who say things like that, and there are Kagyupas who would not. Of those who would say that, some would qualify it by saying that the pointing out instruction, which is central to the practice of Kagyu Mahamudra, could also be interpreted as a form of the fourth empowerment. Those who would not say that typically give an empowerment whenever they do a teaching on Mahamudra.

Astus wrote:

Jamgon Kongtrul also notes (ToK, v9, p 213): 'It has been the practice of most of Dakpo's heart disciples to present the mahamudra instructions after having first bestowed the empowerment.'

The same practice of mixing is also noted by Tashi Namgyal:

'In the present age, Mahamudra and Mantrayana [tantric mysticism] are being blended and meditated upon in order to enhance realization. Many tantric elements are also incorporated into the preparatory practices. For those who wish to practice these, the empowerment for actualizing the inner potentiality is certainly essential.'
(Mahamudra the Moonlight, p 125)

PeterC said:

So it's a distinction without a difference.

Astus wrote:

It's a distinction made by Thrangu Rinpoche.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 14th, 2020 at 7:28 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Grigoris said:

I already answered that, using the fire metaphor.

Astus wrote:

Is <https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=542794#p542774> the metaphor you refer to? That was more like a riddle, furthermore, if it's a metaphor, please provide what it was a metaphor of. Also, how can you crave without craving?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 14th, 2020 at 8:17 PM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

Malcolm said:

Doesn't it occur to you that this is Kongtrul basically acceding to Sapan's objections?

Astus wrote:

From a few sentences before, on the same page:

'Concerning this, the dharma lord Sakya Panchen asserted:

"Mahamudra is not designated in the tradition of the perfections. The pristine awareness of mahamudra only arises from empowerment."

Adhering to this position, the bigshots broadcast much meaningless chatter, but as the master Jnanakirti stated in Entry into Suchness:

"The other term for the Mother Perfection of Wisdom is mahamudra, because it is the very essence of nondual pristine awareness."

What is emphasised as a difference between standard paramitayana and mahamudra is the special instructions, i.e. pointing out the nature of mind, that is, instead of starting with the emptiness of objects, it points to the emptiness of the subject.

'In the sutra systems it is taught that without first resolving the object grasped upon, the subject—the fixated mind—cannot be resolved. ... In our case, we believe that proceeding in that way leads to a lot of difficulty in resolving the fixating mind. Therefore we first resolve the fixating mind, whereby the object of grasping becomes resolved by being self-liberated.'

(The Royal Seal of Mahamudra, vol 1, p 266, 267)

Also, a remark from Situ Tenpai Nyinje:

'These principal instructions for gaining certainty, such as looking for the mind, have been made the subject of ridicule by some Tibetans, but that's the same as all the superficial things I've ever heard. ... [Nagarjuna's] Commentary on Bodhicitta and other texts give this same teaching in a brief form. It seems therefore that those [Tibetans who mock the instructions] haven't read these texts. Kamalasila explains in detail how to search for the mind in his Stages of Meditation, where he provides quotations from the Heap of jewels (Ratnakuta) Sutra.'

(Oral Transmission of the Supreme Siddhas by Situ Tenpai Nyinje, in Mahamudra and Related Instructions, p 248-249)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 14th, 2020 at 8:29 PM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

PeterC said:

I don't think he would mean that you could practice this without receiving some instruction equivalent to the fourth empowerment.

Astus wrote:

If pointing out instructions are equivalent to the fourth empowerment, then no. Otherwise, yes, he does say that no empowerment is needed.

PeterC said:

Is he saying that recognition of nature of mind does not require any form of empowerment? That the pointing out is just words?

Astus wrote:

Here's more from Thrangu Rinpoche, on pointing out instructions:

'There is also the tradition of pointing out the nature of mind, in which there's some sort of vigorous manner of causing the students to recognize it on the spot without their going through this kind of gradual investigation. This is very impressive, and often people have an experience of recognition, but soon thereafter it vanishes. The superiority of the gradual approach is that, while less dramatic initially, when you develop on your own a recognition through experience and through hard work, then you don't lose it, you know; it's because you developed it, and you get to work with it. Initially, the recognition starts to occur and is not that stable, then it's stabilized, then you gradually develop confidence in the recognition, and on the basis of confidence, you learn, through practice, through time and effort, how to rest in it.'

(Pointing Out the Dharmakaya, p 136-137)

'In short, I think it is of far more importance that people receive this kind of complete and systematic instruction so that they can gradually develop experience on their own, than that some kind of dramatic pointing-out procedure be done. Of course, it is possible to give dramatic pointing-out instruction, and when you do so, some people do recognize their mind's nature. But, if I may say so, I question the stability and, therefore, ultimately the value of that. It certainly is a dramatic experience for those people who achieve it, but I see no evidence of their kleshas diminishing as a result. And furthermore, they then carry away with them the arrogance of the thought, "I have seen my mind's nature." I think it is of far greater importance actually to practice meditation slowly and surely and make all possible use of the resources which this book in particular gives you. It is after all a big book and contains within it much instruction, much guidance, and a lot of questions that can help you to question and therefore refine your own experience.'

(Ocean of Definitive Meaning, p 127-128)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 14th, 2020 at 8:37 PM

Title: Re: Age of Mahayana Schools

Content:

Grigoris said:

What if I crave for liberation?

What if I desire realisation?

Astus wrote:

Craving liberation is not the same as reaching it. But when reached, there's no more craving. See: <https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn51/sn51.015.than.html>.

Grigoris said:

If I hate the afflictions?

Astus wrote:

"Having slain anger, one sleeps soundly;

Having slain anger, one does not sorrow;

The killing of anger, O devatā,

With its poisoned root and honeyed tip:

This is the killing the noble ones praise,

For having slain that, one does not sorrow.”
(<https://suttacentral.net/sn1.71/en/bodhi>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 14th, 2020 at 11:06 PM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

Malcolm said:

Too bad you did not read Jñānakīrti's whole text. You are merely dancing on books you cannot even read in the original. Just cherry picking citations because they suit your biases. Sorry, but this is the case.

Astus wrote:

It was Jamgon Kongtrul who quoted that passage from Jnanakirti in order to prove his point. Others have also referred to him to show the same.

'Jamyang Sakya Pandita says in Distinguishing the Three Vows:

Our Mahāmudrā

Is the gnosis arising from initiation.

Relying on that passage, some say there is no term for Mahāmudrā in the sutra system. I think it is unacceptable to say this, for it has been explained by many pandits, adepts, and scholars that superior, middling, and lesser perfection-vehicle students, abiding with a stable mind in tranquil abiding and superior insight, meditate on the nonduality of method and wisdom, which is Mahāmudrā. Jñānakīrti's Distinguishing Clearly the Entire Sum of the Buddha's Words says:

Those with superior faculties who are especially diligent in the perfection vehicle, meditate on tranquil abiding and superior insight, and right from the time they are ordinary individuals, they have a perfect realization arising from Mahāmudrā; because of that, they obtain the signs of irreversibility.

Jñānakīrti also states in the same text:

These superior students also meditate first on tranquil abiding and superior insight in order to enter the meditation preparatory to the nondual Mahāmudrā.

Not only that; the term Mahāmudrā is used for emptiness. The King of Concentration Sutra says, "The intrinsic nature of all dharmas is Mahāmudrā." This point is taught in this and other passages.'

(The Crystal Mirror of Philosophical Systems, p 149-150)

'The finger of mahamudra points to the momentary awareness, which does not come down on either of the [two] sides, appearance or emptiness. Thus say those versed in the pith instructions. Even though this tradition belongs to the Paramitayana, it is labeled mahamudra. Thus it is explained in the Tattvadasakatika by Sahajavajra. It is also explained in the Tattvavatara by Jnanakirti in the root text and its commentary.'
(A Direct Path to the Buddha Within, p 188-189)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 15th, 2020 at 4:25 AM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

Malcolm said:

Therefore, we can understand the term "mahāmudra" exists exclusively the tantras.

Astus wrote:

Even if that were so, apparently Kagyupas, starting with Gampopa, taught what is now called sutra Mahamudra, and it is a unique teaching of this tradition, and there's an offshoot Mahamudra among the Gelugpas, where they also teach it as a separate one from tantra Mahamudra.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 15th, 2020 at 5:19 AM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

Malcolm said:

Likewise, you can call Prajñāpāramitā "mahāmudra" if your goal is to inspire unfortunate yogis, as Jñānakīrti maintains, but it is still just calling something a name for which it lacks proper attributes; for example, calling a dog "Lion," or a small hill a "mountain," or a tiny pond a "lake" or a huge man "little."

Astus wrote:

So would you say then that Kagyupas are quite mistaken, that what has been called one of the main http://namobuddhapub.org/files/teachings/ThranguR-Mahamudra_and_the_Kagyu_Lineage.pdf over the centuries is fictitious?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 15th, 2020 at 3:30 PM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

Malcolm said:

I was refuting your citations, showing how they do not match the claims put forward for them. If others make errors, why should the one who points them out be held at fault?

Astus wrote:

What do you then make of Maitripa's teachings, who is often named as the Indian source of equating Mahamudra with Madhyamaka?

'This teaching tradition of Maitripa's Middle Way lineage was given the name "Mahāmudrā," the same name that is renowned in the anuttara class of secret mantra as the wisdom of bliss and emptiness. Various terms have been created to give a name to the state in which the view of this form of the Middle Way has taken birth in one's mindstream. They include "making manifest the ordinary mind" and "making manifest the dharmakāya.” Also, when apparent phenomena (chöchen/chos can)—sprouts, thoughts, and so on—are realized not to exist apart from their own true nature (chönyi/chos nyid), this realization has been called “thoughts dawning as the dharmakāya.”

The lineage for this teaching system is the same as the lineage described above from Gampopa onward, starting with lord Düsüm Khyenpa.'

(The Karmapa's Middle Way: Feast for the Fortunate, p 85-86)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 15th, 2020 at 3:37 PM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

The point against is it is misleading.

Astus wrote:

Why not then correct it?

Crazywisdom said:

Some want to validate nonlineage book based enlightenment to prop themselves up as a web guru with cut and paste instructions.

Astus wrote:

That would be counterproductive. If books were enough, there would be no point to prop oneself up as a guru of any sort. One should rather emphasise one's own credentials as a reliable source in order to highlight a personal authority.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 15th, 2020 at 8:44 PM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

PeterC said:

You won't find any statement of gampopa himself saying you don't need any sort of empowerment, whether elaborate or unelaborate. You present a few quotations that might suggest this, but they run counter to the experience of the vast majority of living and dead kagyü masters.

Astus wrote:

Why not look for where Gampopa states one needs any sort of empowerment for Mahamudra? The quotations so far clearly differentiated the "tantra" from the "sutra" version, and for the tantric it's unambiguous about the need for empowerment. At the same time, Kagyüpas have been under attack since the time of Sakya Pandita that they teach Mahamudra outside the standard HYT system, and various teachers defended their position regarding the validity of Gampopa's Mahamudra. Were they all arguing about nothing? If "unelaborate empowerment" is the pointing out instruction, that is, the very method that Mahamudra is taught, then likely those who debate the absence of empowerment mean the complete four empowerments and they do not accept the possibility that direct introduction equals the fourth empowerment and is sufficient on its own.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 16th, 2020 at 4:28 PM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

Malcolm said:

Perhaps he did equate Madyamaka with Mahāmudra (textual citation please), but how is this different than equating the gnosis of Prajñāpāramitā with Mahāmudra?

Astus wrote:

Maitripa's teachings on amanasikara is mentioned as such, because of Madhyamaka and Vajrayana bringing one equally to it, so that is no different from equating the gnosis of both.

Malcolm said:

But in this text, Maitripa is clearly claiming that Mantrayāna is superior in method. I mean, what else is there to say?

Astus wrote:

Gampopa and others have said the same of course. Still one question is left. Even after empowerments and generation stage practices what is used to introduce Mahamudra, the nature of mind, is not necessarily candali but often samatha and vipasyana, where vipasyana means same or similar pointers as what is in the sutras and treatises. So when it comes to meeting face to face with reality, not only the reality seen, but also the immediately preceding directions to it can be the same. Therefore the methodical difference between Paramitayana and Vajrayana primarily in how one arrives at the point to be capable of genuine vipasyana, where the former has studies and samatha, the latter has abhiseka, deity yoga, candali, etc., but most importantly guru yoga for the same purposes. Is that an acceptable distinction according to you?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 16th, 2020 at 8:56 PM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

Malcolm said:

Without empowerment, a guru is just a common Mahāyāna guru, there is no guru yoga in common Mahāyāna.. Guru Yoga is method which strictly belongs to Highest Yoga Tantra. So no, it is not an acceptable distinction. Guru Yoga is also connected with the so-called subtle body, and is not merely a practice of devotion, as is commonly misunderstood.

Astus wrote:

I did not mean the guru yoga as part of sutra but as part of Vajrayana. The distinction I asked about was regarding the difference of methods getting to the point of being capable of performing vipasyana.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 16th, 2020 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

You have somehow totally missed the point of energy, the heart chakra, the bindus, and rainbow light.

Astus wrote:

I studied and heard mainly some sutra-style Mahamudra teachings, so I'm not particularly familiar with other parts of Vajrayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 16th, 2020 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

Malcolm said:

These two methods, the two stages and guru yoga, are more effective for giving rise to vipaśyanā because there is no intellectual analysis involved. It is based on a direct perception, no matter how fleeting, not inferred through reasoning and analysis.

Astus wrote:

What do you call then instructions like these?

'Establishing the appearance of the mind is like a thief in an empty house.

It is beyond color, form, shape, and characteristics.

There is no searcher and no object of a search.

This is my heart's advice.

Mind and conceptual thought are like water and ice.

They have always been inseparable, yet cannot be said to be one thing or two.

This is my heart's advice.

The inseparability of appearance and mind is like last night's dream.

It possesses the four characteristics and is the union of appearance and emptiness.

It cannot be said to be one thing or two.

This is my heart's advice.'

(The Jewel Treasury of Advice, p 35)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 17th, 2020 at 5:07 AM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

White Sakura said:

Definition of that term again please.

Astus wrote:

You can see a summary definition by Dzogchen Ponlop

<https://www.lionsroar.com/pointing-out-ordinary-mind/>. It is where the practice is with calm abiding and special insight, as for instance what you find taught in Daring Steps Toward Fearlessness in the last section where the Short Vajradhara Lineage Prayer is commented upon.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 17th, 2020 at 5:28 AM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

Malcolm said:

Words and concepts.

Astus wrote:

That's very Zen of you to say so.

But, I still feel that the question is not yet clarified. You wrote:

Vipaśyanā, in Vajrayāna is not a result of intellectual analysis, it is rather a product of integrating the experience of the example gnosis or the genuine gnosis induced during empowerment, depending on the practitioner.

But you also said that pointing out instructions are equal to the fourth empowerment. What was quoted were examples of such pointers, and they are used in vipasyana, but there are others as well, like <https://studybuddhism.com/en/tibetan-buddhism/original-texts/tantra-texts/mahamudra-eliminating-the-darkness-of-ignorance/mahamudra-vipashyana-meditation>. As for no intellectual analysis, well, right, but that doesn't make it different from how insight is taught in the sutras, in fact, sutras are also used next to dohas and tantras to explain Mahamudra vipasyana, hence my question, whether the dividing line is in how one eventually gets to be able to do vipasyana in order to gain gnosis.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 17th, 2020 at 4:02 PM

Title: Re: Existence-Time

Content:

Ted Biringer said:

In Zen time and existence are not two different things; time is always existence-and-time, existence is always existence-and-time.

Astus wrote:

Taking a common phrase and turning it into a "Zen expression" is Dogen's usual play, but those expressions were rarely if ever used in such a fashion before, and only used so after because of Dogen. Nevertheless, when one conceives such an expression, all such terms in the three times are seen from this point, changing/gaining/revealing/losing meaning. This itself shows how existence-time operates. Otherwise, there is nothing new here, conditioned things have always been understood as impermanent, and whatever is impermanent is empty, and emptiness is liberation, hence buddha-nature is walls, tiles, pebbles.

Ted Biringer said:

In short, each and every particular thing, being, and event (i.e. dharma) is an intrinsic and essential element of total time, and each and every moment or duration of time is an intrinsic and essential element of total existence – hence each and every particular dharma is a manifestation of the whole universe, and the whole universe is manifest in and as each and every particular dharma.

Astus wrote:

"Everything is connected", and other such nice sounding but fairly useless ideas only make things unnecessarily complicated. To see existence-time for oneself, all it takes is to reflect on one's being as change without assumptions of an entity that is inside or outside change.

'If we leave it utterly up to existence, even though [the moments] before and after manifest heedless blundering, they abide in their place as existence-time. Abiding in our place in the Dharma in the state of vigorous activity is just existence-time. We should not disturb it [by interpreting it] as "being without," and we should not enforceably call it "existence."'

(Uji, in SBGZ, vol 1, BDK ed, p 146)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 17th, 2020 at 5:10 PM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

PeterC said:

if you want to understand what the meaning is of Mahamudra and how it is accomplished, you have to receive and practice it from a teacher and understand it in those terms. You cannot understand it based on books.

Astus wrote:

<https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=543776#p543776> put forth is fairly abstract and theoretical. It is stated by various authors that the vipasyana used in Mahamudra matches with what is taught in Sutrayana works (e.g. Situ Tenpai Nyinje in Mahamudra and Related Instructions, p 249; Dakpo Tashi Namgyal in Mahamudra the Moonlight, p 181; Ngawang Kunga Tenzin in The Royal Seal of Mahamudra, p 264-267). Since that is so, the question is if the difference in method between Paramitayana and Vajrayana can be identified in how one gets to the point of being able to engage in vipasyana.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 17th, 2020 at 5:27 PM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

PeterC said:

The fact that people write books about it doesn't mean they think that you can understand it by only reading books.

Astus wrote:

Sure. But that was neither stated nor even implied.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 17th, 2020 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

PeterC said:

You would need to identify exactly which instructions you're talking about to compare the instructions found in sutra on vipasyana and those found in Kagyu mahamudra.

Astus wrote:

Here are examples from Mahamudra the Moonlight. If required I can copy here the various quotes.

'Which of the scriptures deal with this subject? One may wonder which of the scriptures deal with meditation on the vision of reality, which arises from insight and which is capable of resolving doubts and assumptions. Such a vision is attained after having determined that all things are only mind created, and that even the mind's intrinsic nature is devoid of true essence.'

(p 185)

Then quotes from Sutralamkara, Bodhicittavivarana, Bhavanakrama.

'The actual stages of this meditation. During the earlier meditation on tranquil absorption, the settling of mind in a nondiscriminating absorption was predominant. Here, in this meditation on insight, the analyses of mind through discerning wisdom should be the predominant factor. By settling the mind in undistracted tranquility, one enhances the quality of the mind's lucidity and then examines this state. Here the method of determining the mind's innate essence is similar to those of the sutra tradition for determining selflessness of personality.'

(p 186)

Quote from Bhavanakrama.

'How this meditation compares with the original exposition. The followers of this meditation order describe the aforesaid meditation as discovering the mind.'
(p 188)

Quotes from Ratnakuta, Ratnakutapariṣccha-sūtra, Trayastriṃsat-parivarta, Bhavanakrama.

'The sūtras and the tantras are replete with many such words of wisdom. In summary, it has been stated that examination of the mind has to be so exhaustive as to embrace all the external and internal phenomena with special reference to color, shape, dwelling place, support, identity, and mode of mind. Only after a thorough examination will one understand that the nature of mind is formless, undemonstrable, without basis externally or internally, and is detached from discriminating thoughts. Thus, the intrinsic nature of mind is identical with space.'
(p 191)

Quotes from Bodhicittavivaraṇa, Śikṣasamuccaya.

'How to determine the nature of the mind. One now endeavors systematically to determine the mind through meditative methods such as those already described.'
(p 192)

Quotes from Mahākāraṇanīrdeśa-sūtra, Maitreya-pariṣccha-sūtra, Kāśyapa-pariṣccha-sūtra, Saṃdhinirmocana, Saṃdhivya-karaṇa-sūtra.

'The term "seeing the mind" is a simple designation for understanding the mind's unreality, which is detached from the beginning from all modes of existence or nonexistence.'
(p 195)

Quote from Prajñāpāramitā-saṃcayagāthā.

'The showing of all appearances to be the products of mind.'
(p 196)

Quotes from Lankavatāra-sūtra, Bodhicittavivaraṇa.

'The realization of mind, which will bring about an insight into all appearances.'
(p 198)

Quotes from Śatasahasrikā-prajñāpāramitā-sūtra, 'Aryadeva' (actually found in works by Bodhibhadra and Haribhadra), Catuḥśataka, Śatyadvaya of Atiśa, Saṃadhirāja-sūtra, Bodhicittavivaraṇa,

'The actual stage of this meditation. At this stage, the determination of thoughts and appearances is similar to the determination of the selflessness of things according to the sutra system.'

(p 200)

No quotes from any source.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 17th, 2020 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: Existence-Time

Content:

Queequeg said:

Actually, its useful to develop as a foundation for an ethical life.

Astus wrote:

That might be so, although for the same purpose there are teachings on karma and rebirth.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 17th, 2020 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

PeterC said:

yes that would be the point. I think what you're quoting here is the text, not the quotations in the text?

Mahamudra the Moonlight, p 185-186 said:

One may wonder which of the scriptures deal with meditation on the vision of reality, which arises from insight and which is capable of resolving doubts and assumptions. Such a vision is attained after having determined that all things are only mind-created, and that even the mind's intrinsic nature is devoid of true essence. The Sutralamkara illustrates this:

Understand that nothing exists apart from the mind.

Know that the mind itself is unreal.

An intelligent person, comprehending the unreality of the two,

Settles in the expanse of the nondual reality.

The Bodhichittavivarana expounds:

Having once established pure idealism,

Blessed seekers reject the reality of mind itself.

For the exponents of the Consciousness Only school

All the diverse appearances are the manifestation of mind.

What then is the self-nature of consciousness?

This is to be elucidated here.
“All things are but a product of the mind,”
The Supreme Sage expounded
To protect seekers with childish minds who might otherwise be terrified,
Even though this statement was not truly so.
All the conceptually designated, dependent conditionality
And established reality are but empty.¹⁰²
This is the singular essence of the abiding reality,
And should be determined in terms of one’s own mind.
For those who delight in the Great Vehicle,
Reality is perfectly even, without a self-essence,
Because the mind is nonarising right from the beginning.
Thus it was summarized by Buddha.

The first Bhavanakrama elaborates:

Thus, one contemplates that the three planes of phenomenal existence are the product of the mind only, and then one realizes that everything conceptually designated is simply of mental origin. If one examines every aspect of the mind, one is analyzing the intrinsic nature of all phenomena. In so examining one may further examine in the following manner. The mind as such cannot be real from the stand point of ultimate truth. How can the mind be real when it clings to images of what are essentially false sensory forms, etc., manifesting themselves externally in diverse appearances? Just as sensory forms, etc. are false, so the mind is also false since it is not any different from the former. The senses – emerging in diverse forms – are devoid of either one or many essences. The reality of the mind is not different from the senses; it is also devoid of either one or many essences. For these reasons the mind by nature is indeed like a magical scene. Like the mind, all phenomena in their intrinsic nature are also like a magical scene.

Similar elucidations are found in other treatises on the stages of meditation.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 17th, 2020 at 11:26 PM

Title: Re: Existence-Time

Content:

Queequeg said:

One advantage of interdependence is that it doesn’t require confidence in rebirth so may be better suited to those who may either not believe or have an agnostic perspective.

Astus wrote:

The benefit of the doctrine of karma, even for those who are agnostics or materialists, is to recognise that actions originate in the mind and has impacts on the mind. So from the interpersonal aspect of ethics it points towards looking at the inner workings of the mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 17th, 2020 at 11:32 PM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

Malcolm said:

the intellectual view of sūtra and tantra is the same.

Astus wrote:

Does that include the part where for instance one needs to establish for oneself, not just through reasoning but also directly, that the mind is not established in the three times?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 17th, 2020 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: Existence-Time

Content:

Queequeg said:

Like I said, complimentary.

Astus wrote:

I did not question that part.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2020 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

PeterC said:

Apologies for the pedantry, but you're making my point for me here.

Astus wrote:

They're sutrayana teachings. And directly from sutras:

Mahamudra the Moonlight, p 189-190 said:

Many similar passages are found in the scriptures. Searching for the mind through a contemplative analysis – even though [the mind] is not composed of any substance – serves the purpose of realizing that the mind is empty of an innate essence. The Bhavanakrama quotes the Phakpa Könchoktrin (Aryaratnamegha):

If those who meditate on the void analyze every discursive thought and every joyous contemplative state, they will realize that everything is void [free from an essence]. If they examine what the mind is, they will realize that it is void. If they search for the essence of the investigating mind, they will realize that it is also void. By realizing this, they will elevate themselves to inmost purity, detached from the mark [of duality].

Concerning the search for or examination of the mind, the Dharmadhatuprakrtyasambhedanirdeśa of the Ratnakuta states:

[The incarnate monk said:] O venerable ones, examine your mind in order to determine if it is identical with what has been designated as blue, yellow, red, white, maroon, or a crystal shade, or if it is pure, impure, eternal, impermanent, material, or immaterial.

They [the multitude of monks] replied: O venerable one, the mind is formless, undemonstrable, without appearance, intangible, groundless, and invisible.

Thereupon the incarnate monk spoke: O venerable ones, concerning the mind which is formless, undemonstrable, without appearance, intangible, groundless, and invisible, can it be conceived as dwelling inside, outside, or in between?

The monks replied: No sir, this is not so.

The incarnate monk asked: Venerable ones, if the mind is formless, undemonstrable, without appearance, intangible, groundless, and in - visible, then there is nothing to observe inside, outside, or in-between. Do you suppose that it has not evolved as a perfect reality?

They replied: No sir, this is not so.

The Ratnakuta says:

The search for the mind should be conducted thus: What is a lustful mind, a hateful mind, or an ignorant mind? Has the mind emerged in the past, does it do so in the present, or will it do so in the future? Very well, you should contemplate the fact that the past mind has ceased to exist, that the future mind has yet to arise, and that the present mind does not endure. O, Osung (Kasyapa), the mind cannot be perceived as dwelling inside, outside, or even in-between. O, Osung, concerning the nature of mind, there is nothing to investigate, nothing to demonstrate, nothing to support, nothing to make it appear, and nothing of visible form.

Again, the Buddha explains in the Ratnakuta:

O, Osung, one does not find the mind through a complete search. Whatever is undiscoverable cannot be conceived. Whatever is inconceivable did not arise in the past, nor will it in the future, nor does it arise at the present time. That which is neither past, nor future, nor present indeed transcends the three periods of time. That which so transcends the three periods of time cannot be construed as either existing or nonexistent.

The Ratnakuta-sutra states:

He who searches for the mind cannot find it inside or outside of himself, or collectively both outside and inside. He can neither find it in his psycho physical aggregates, in the elemental realms, nor in the sense faculties. Then, because he cannot find the mind, he explores inwardly the stream of his mind with the assumption that a thought arises from a perceptive image. He contemplates whether a perceptive image and mind exist distinctly from one another or whether they are identical. If the image is separate from the mind, then there are two kinds of mind. If the image is the mind itself, then how can the mind "see" the mind, because the mind cannot "see" the mind itself.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2020 at 1:56 AM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

Malcolm said:

What do you mean by "the mind is not established in the three times?"

Astus wrote:

'In this way, when the identity of the mind is specifically examined by wisdom, in the ultimate sense it is perceived neither within nor without. It is also not perceived in the absence of both. Neither the mind of the past, nor that of the future, nor that of the present, is perceived. When the mind is born, it comes from nowhere, and when it ceases it goes nowhere because it is inapprehensible, undemonstrable, and non-physical. If you ask, "What is the entity of that which is inapprehensible, undemonstrable; and non-physical?" the Heap of jewels states: "O Kashyapa, when the mind is thoroughly sought, it cannot be found. What is not found Cannot be perceived. And what is not perceived is neither past nor future nor present." Through such analysis, the beginning of the mind is ultimately not seen, the end of the mind is ultimately not seen, and the middle of the mind is ultimately not seen.'

(Stages of Meditation, p 131-132)

'If you wish to recognize clearly the non-dwelling mind, then during your meditation just be aware that your mind does not think about any object or hold on to any dualities, such as good and evil, etc. Since past things are already past, you should not think about them anymore; and, thus, any thought about the past vanishes. This is known as being without the past. Furthermore, since future things have not yet arrived, you should neither seek nor wish for them; and, thus, any thought of the future vanishes. This is known as being without the future. Finally, since present things are already present, you should not grasp them nor allow a thought of love or hate to arise; and, thus, any thought about the present vanishes. This is known as being without the present. In summary, if no thought about these three time periods arises, then the three time periods do not exist. If a thought of moving arises, do not follow it; and the thought of moving will vanish. If a thought of dwelling arises, do not follow it; and the thought of dwelling will vanish.'

(<https://ymba.org/books/entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment/treatise-entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment>)

'Rest in a state of clarity and naturalness. Rest relaxed, without tightness. Do not examine or analyze good and bad. Do not have doubts about what is or isn't. When thoughts appear, do not follow after their numerous appearances. Rest completely, like a sheaf of hay that has had its string cut. Rest. relaxed, in natural consciousness. Past thoughts have ceased, the future ones have not arisen. In this relaxed in-between state of the present, it's taught:

That mind is no mind ; the mind's nature is luminosity.
Just this mind alone, which is completely empty, clear, aware, and lucid, is what is called the perfection of wisdom, luminosity, mahamudra, dzokchen, and dharmakaya.' (Thr Unrivalled Instructions of Shang Rinpoche, in Mahamudra and Related Instructions, p 77)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2020 at 2:00 AM

Title: Re: Existence-Time

Content:

Malcolm said:

To really understand what Dogen meant, I would want to see some native Japanese commentary on the issue.

Astus wrote:

https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/key_terms/pdf/key_terms14.pdf

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2020 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

Malcolm said:

The introduction is not in the analysis.

...

The introduction is not in the verbal instruction.

Astus wrote:

Right, but the question is if the analysis/instruction used to get to the introduction/insight can also match between Sutrayana and Vajrayana, not just the wisdom/gnosis arrived at? For that I gave the example of looking at the mind/thoughts in terms of the three times, as that is a frame of reference used in both systems.

'The past mind has ceased, is destroyed ; the future mind is not born, has not arisen; the present mind cannot be identified. When you analyze in that way, you will see that all phenomena are like that. Nothing has reality; everything is just a creation of the mind. Therefore, you will understand that arising. remaining. and ceasing have no reality at all.' (A Record of Mahamudra Instructions by Pema Karpo, in Mahamudra and Related Instructions, p 146-147)

'The past is already past—

Don't try to regain it.

The present does not stay—

Don't try to touch it from moment to moment.

The future is not come—

Don't think about it beforehand.

With the three times non-existent,
Mind is the same as Buddha-mind.'
(Layman Pang, in "A Man of Zen", p 85)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2020 at 5:37 AM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

Malcolm said:

I understand the point you are trying to make, which is the same point you have been trying to make for years: one can learn Dharma from books without a master.

Astus wrote:

It isn't, as <https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=543943#p543943>, and <https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=543371#p543371>. It is something others keep bringing up.

Malcolm said:

The difference here between sūtra and tantra is again, in the former case it is purely an intellectual analysis, in the later case, based on empowerment.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean the latter is intellectual analysis based on empowerment?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2020 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

White Sakura said:

Astus, they think you have no contact to a master, because you do not come up with names.

Astus wrote:

You're very right that most Karma Kagyü groups are affiliated with Trinley Thaye Dorje in Europe. Actually, of the three groups (one being Diamond Way, obviously) in Hungary, all are. But that's not the reason I don't really visit them (like for instance last September Nydahl gave Mahamudra teachings in Budapest, and while I was a little tempted to go, eventually didn't, because, well, it's him). Although I am quite fond of Thrangu Rinpoche, it was only once, and even that just online, that I heard him teach. The Kagyupa teachers I had met and received teachings from were from the Taklung (Phakchok Rinpoche), the Drikung (Chetsang Rinpoche, Garchen Rinpoche, Chokyi Nyima Rinpoche, Drupon Konchok Jigmet), and from the Drukpa (a disciple of Adeu Rinpoche) lineages. But all this, in my opinion, is totally irrelevant for the topic.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 19th, 2020 at 12:04 AM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

Malcolm said:

Astute freely admitted above he has not received any Vajrayana teaching, nor direct introduction.

Astus wrote:

I <https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=50&t=34185&p=543801#p543801> that I mainly studied and heard sutra-style Mahamudra teachings, as that is what I like the most in Vajrayana. But since I was fortunate enough to receive the Fivefold Mahamudra teaching, I cannot say other parts are totally unknown to me.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 19th, 2020 at 1:15 AM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

Malcolm said:

Did you practice this?

Astus wrote:

As much as I could.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 19th, 2020 at 2:00 AM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

LastLegend said:

Are you still Chan or no ?

Astus wrote:

If you mean whether I accept and apply the teachings of Bodhidharma and his heirs, then yes.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 19th, 2020 at 4:34 AM

Title: Re: Soto Zen

Content:

shanyin said:

Is a difference between Soto and Rinzai that one teaches gradual and the other sudden enlightenment?

Astus wrote:

No. All Zen schools teach sudden enlightenment.

shanyin said:

Sitting makes me think that all this Dharma and Buddhism is all supposed to be subjective so I am attracted to the idea that there is nothing one can do to attain enlightenment. Is that what Soto teaches?

Astus wrote:

Soto teaches the https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/key_terms/pdf/key_terms07.pdf, so actually you can only do everything to attain enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 19th, 2020 at 3:59 PM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

PeterC said:

But surely the implication does follow, unless one believes that “sutra mahamudra” is an exceedingly slow path

Astus wrote:

It does not follow, because it's all a matter of skilful means, people using whatever is fitting for them.

'The Dharma is vast and it has many forms,
But the teachings that bring Buddhahood in a single lifetime
Are the two ultimate systems of Mahāmudrā and Dzogchen.
The Mahāmudrā of bliss and emptiness on the path of means
Is the actual practice of secret mantra,
But those who practise it are few and far between.
The Mahāmudrā of the innate on the path of liberation
Is an easier practice offering great reward at little risk,
And is of benefit to all, regardless of capacity.'
(<https://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/jamgon-kongtrul/mahamudra-swift-lord-of-realization>)

Gampopa Teaches Essence Mahamudra, p 194-195 said:

Well then, he asked, "In terms of practising to gain experience, which is the most profound oral Instruction?" The reply came, "The tradition of Jowo Je's lineage says:

For the thinking mind to become certain of Death and impermanence then karmic cause and effect and Loving kindness and compassion is profound.

I have heard one group say, 'If the view, emptiness, is not realized, there is no benefit.' I have heard some say, 'Meditation on the yidam deity is the profound practice.' I heard guru Mila say, 'The meditation on the pranayama of Fierce Heat is the profound meditation.'

The dharma for which any given person develops certainty is the profound one for that person. Still, to take this further, if you devote yourself to the guru, meditate by pairing Fierce Heat With Mahamudra, and train your mind in enlightenment mind, because both your own and others' aims will be fulfilled at the same time this is the profound one."

"Well then", Phagmo Drupa asked, "Do you prefer to lead people through Fierce Heat to start with or through Mahamudra?" The reply came, "Which one will depend on the person's type. Younger people with good physical elements and channels who are instructed in and meditate on Fierce Heat itself will quickly produce the signs of progress. If I then give them Mahamudra, experience and realization will quickly dawn. For older people who are in the category of not being able to adjust the winds, I prefer to give Mahamudra or Co-emergent Unification, though there is the possibility that, if Mahamudra is given to them first but then not aroused within their mindstreams, they might fall into bad activities and develop a very jaded and problematic character."

Thrangu Rinpoche, in Luminous Clarity, ch 5 said:

Mahamudra is also necessary practice even if you do other practices as well. For example, there are profound methods of practice such as the Six Dharmas of Naropa or the Six Dharmas of Niguma or the Leapover (Tib. tögal) practice of Dzogchen. If you do these practices without Mahamudra practice, they are not so effective. For example, you can practice Inner Heat (Tib. tummo) or Dream Yoga, but if you do these practices conjoined with Mahamudra practice, they are much more powerful and effective. If you don't combine them with Mahamudra, they are not really that useful. They are not useless, because no Dharma practice is useless, but these advanced practices don't fulfill their proper function unless Mahamudra practice is integrated with them. The same thing is true of the Tögal practice of Dzogchen. It includes powerful methods, such as the white instruction, the red instruction, the yellow instruction, darkness teaching, and so on, but if these techniques are practiced in the absence of Mahamudra experience, not that much benefit will accrue from them. However, if these Dzogchen practices are practiced with Trekchö, a practice similar to Mahamudra experience, they are tremendously powerful. On the other hand, you can practice just Mahamudra or Trekchö without these other methods, and it will still be tremendously beneficial even by itself.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 19th, 2020 at 4:19 PM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

PeterC said:

I have always struggled to see the connection between mahamudra as taught by the Kagyus and the samadhirajasutra. Beyond the identification of Gampopa as Youthful Moonlight, the practical connection seems highly attenuated. But I'd defer to someone who has studied the sutra more than I have.

Astus wrote:

"The king of all samadhis, or meditations, is the meditation of Mahamudra. So the meditation that Gampopa spread throughout Tibet was the Mahamudra that the Buddha taught in the Samadhiraja Sutra."

(http://namobuddhapub.org/files/teachings/ThranguR-Mahamudra_and_the_Kagyu_Lineage.pdf)

"The King of Samadhi Sutra is a teaching that forms the background for Mahamudra practice. If we only examine the superficial meaning it does not seem to be about Mahamudra at all. In a tremendously detailed way, it describes the Buddha's actions in his former lives and it extols the qualities of enlightenment and the virtues of practicing the general state of samadhi. We will not find the word 'Mahamudra' anywhere. Nowhere does it say we should make mandala offerings or engage in guru yoga. We might conclude that this text is not really about Mahamudra because even the teachings on shamatha and vipashyana are not as dearly defined here as they are in other Mahamudra texts. Yet, apart from this, if we examine the depth of its meaning, we will find that the sutra clearly emphasizes devotion to the buddhas or to the teacher who gives the teachings, as well as trust in the teachings themselves; and the importance of gathering an immense amount of merit. Therefore, we can easily apply the real intention of the sutra to our practice of, for example, cultivating devotion through guru yoga. From this standpoint, it is more beneficial to explain the actual intent of the sutra rather than just to interpret its literal meaning."

(King of Samadhi by Thrangu Rinpoche, p 19)

"The basic intent in the King of Samadhi Sutra and the Mahamudra pointing-out instruction is to point out the real condition so that we can recognize it. In neither case is intent to give instructions in some type of mind-made meditation state. This type of conceptual meditation is a very tangible experience that can appear to be 'profound' in the sense that we think what we are keeping in mind is the emptiness of all things. For example, when looking at this table, we think, "What is this table actually? It doesn't possess any self-nature. That is emptiness and I can understand that. This is how it really is! It is emptiness!" Then we keep this conceptual idea in mind. That type of concentration is, when compared to the state of mind of ordinary beings, quite profound and important. But regarding the state of samadhi explained in the King of Samadhi Sutra, as well as with what is pointed out in the oral instructions of Mahamudra, such conceptual concentration is a hindrance. In both Mahamudra and the King of Samadhi Sutra, what is to be trained in as the samadhi of the view is not a conceptual construct that we have concocted and kept in mind. It is more a matter of looking into the nature of mind and seeing it as it is, then simply letting it naturally be. We rest naturally in that instead of making up some artificial stare through our thinking and keeping that in mind. Viewed in this way, any intellectual construct is an obstacle for the wisdom of omniscience."

(p 32-33)

"According to this sutra, the meaning of samadhi and the meditation state which we train in through the instructions of Mahamudra are exactly the same, but there is a semantic difference. ... The difference lies in how the instructions are imparted, but the identity of samadhi is exactly the same."

(p 37)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 19th, 2020 at 4:30 PM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

White Sakura said:

What does he mean by "Mahamudra" here? If Mantra-Mahamudra is THE one and only higher mahamudra, it is given by tummo. What is then to practise in addition??

Astus wrote:

'The actual path can be followed in two ways: through the path of method and through the path of liberation. In the Kagyü tradition, the path of liberation is mahamudra practice, and the path of method is the six yogas of Naropa. To pursue the path of method, we begin by accumulating merit and wisdom and then purifying our obscurations. This is done through the preliminary practices, which consist of going for refuge and generating bodhicitta while doing prostrations, then meditating on Vajrasattva, making mandala offerings, and practicing guru yoga. After completing guru yoga and receiving the blessing of our teacher and lineage, we engage in the practice of a meditational deity (Tib. yidam). Through the generation and completion stages of this practice, we achieve realization. That is the path of means or method.

The path of liberation is the practice of mahamudra. It begins with the stabilization of our wavering mind through the practice of tranquility meditation. Then through insight meditation, which looks into the nature of mind, mahamudra is accomplished. To facilitate and enhance the practices of tranquility and insight, we must still engage in gathering the two accumulations even while pursuing the path of liberation. The accumulations serve to greatly enhance the practices of tranquility and insight. When our practice of tranquility is unstable, it can be grounded through these practices. When we lack insight, it can be generated by these practices. Therefore, the path in either format conforms to what was said by the Third Karmapa, Rangjung Dorje, in his Aspiration Prayer of Mahamudra: "The supreme path is that of the two accumulations, beyond the extremes of exaggeration and denial." The principal path is facilitated through gathering the accumulation of merit. Though the path of means and the path of liberation may appear distinct, the nature of the paths and what is to be realized by them is the same.'

(Song for the King : Saraha on Mahamudra Meditation by Thrangu Rinpoche, p 36-38)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 19th, 2020 at 5:10 PM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

White Sakura said:

Two accumulations, I understand that as practicing emptiness and compassion. It is important not to think: "Everything is empty, everything is illusion so there is no karma and I do not need to pay attention to good actions, ethical conduct."

Astus wrote:

It's all the six paramitas, the relative and ultimate bodhicitta.

White Sakura said:

Second: If somebody practices "only" sutra mahamudra, what exactly is the minimum of other practises to practice from the Varjayana teachings? I cannot imagine it can be practised without at least a short formal guru yoga.

Astus wrote:

'This Dharma teaching can be given to anyone.

To have genuine Dharma practice, first meditate on impermanence. Otherwise, your Dharma practice might become merely an aid to your ambitions for this life.

Why should we meditate on impermanence? To turn our minds away from this life.

Meditating on impermanence makes us realize that all the phenomena of appearance and existence, of samsara and nirvana, are impermanent. As a result, the mind does not get caught up in this life. This is the purpose of meditation on impermanence. If your mind hasn't turned away from this life, then your meditation on impermanence has been without purpose.

First, turn your mind away from this life by meditating on impermanence. Then meditate on the faults of samsara. The purpose of meditation on the faults of samsara is to turn the mind away from the entirety of samsara.

When your mind has turned away from samsara, meditate on bodhicitta. First there is meditation on relative bodhicitta - wishing, from the depths of your heart, that all beings will have happiness, freedom from suffering, and complete buddhahood. Then view everything you do as being for the welfare of all beings. Have no concern for your own desires but develop an aspiration with the Mahayana perspective of benefiting others as your goal. That is how you meditate on relative bodhicitta.

Meditation on ultimate bodhicitta is simply remaining in the mind as it naturally is, a state in which all thoughts of perceiver and perceived, self and other, are intrinsically devoid of reality. Practicing in that way during each of the two kinds of behavior"" is what is called meditation on ultimate bodhicitta. Practicing in that way brings the realization and attainment of ultimate: bodhicitta.

There is no Dharma other than this.'

(Gampopa, in Mahamudra and Related Instructions, p 31-32)

'Regarding the manner of imparting the profound path [of Mahamudra], the venerable Gampopa considered it to be an independent path of tantra. So he did not make the esoteric empowerment a prerequisite for receiving the Mahamudra teachings. He spoke about the method of directly guiding the disciple toward the intrinsic reality of the mind. This [simple] method consists of seeking refuge in the guru and the Three Jewels, offering to them the symbolic cosmos [mandala], accounting for all one's harmful deeds, and invoking them with intense faith and veneration. This practice includes meditation on love, compassion, and an enlightened attitude [bodhicitta]. In this respect, the prodigious intellects inclined toward the instantaneous path should be engaged at the outset in the process of discovering the vision of inherent reality, and then in settling the mind in tranquil absorption, similar to the contemporary training of the Mahamudra of Four Syllables. The inferior intellect, inclined toward the gradual path, should be put through the practice of tranquility leading to the meditation of insight. This is similar to the contemporary training through what is known as “harmonizing with the coemergent awareness.” 50 One understands that the reason for these [two ways] is to be found in his [the venerable Gampopa’s] written commentaries, the oral testament, the answers, and his oral testament recorded by Pal Phagmo Drubpa and Je Düsum Khyenpa in their respective collected works.’

(Mahamudra the Moonlight, p 123-124)

‘Revulsion is the foot of meditation, as is taught.
To this meditator who is not attached to food and wealth,
Who cuts the ties to this life,
Grant your blessings so that I have no desire for honour and gain.

Awareness is the body of meditation, as is taught.
Whatever arises is fresh – the essence of realization.
To this meditator who rests simply without altering it
Grant your blessings so that my meditation is free from conception.

Devotion is the head of meditation, as is taught.
The Guru opens the gate to the treasury of oral instructions.
To this meditator who continually supplicates him
Grant your blessings so that genuine devotion is born in me.’
(http://www.dharmadownload.net/pages/english/Natsok/0010_Teaching_English/Teaching_English_0036.htm)

‘Although plenty of Dharma preliminaries are taught,
They are all summed up in revulsion and renunciation.
Devotion to the guru too is particularly important
For traversing the paths and stages in months or years.
Much is said about what's key to the main practice,
But there's no teaching more profound
Than emptiness with compassion at its very core.
In your own mind—empty, clear, unceasing—
The three kāyas are, by nature, complete.
Recognise them, and then be watchfully aware.
There's no need to look for śūnyatā elsewhere!
Cultivate compassion for all your old mothers,
Who, not realising the natural state, are now deluded.
A great deal could be said about concluding practices,
But confess any misdeeds right away,
And dedicate whatever virtues you have performed
Towards the enlightenment of all sentient beings.
And be sure to recite Mahāyāna prayers of aspiration.’
(<https://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/jamgon-kongtrul/mahamudra-> preliminaries-main-part-conclusion)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 19th, 2020 at 6:15 PM

Title: Re: Sutra, Tantra, Mahamudra

Content:

White Sakura said:

the visualizations are for some practitioners in fact futile.

Astus wrote:

Different people, different methods. That's why there are so many of them. It is also why having a teacher capable of evaluating and guiding a student is of immense benefit. At the same time, one needs to be persistent and see what works and what does not for oneself. As <https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=544274#p544274>: 'After all, oneself is the ultimate authority in all matters of religion, and no one else.'

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 20th, 2020 at 5:14 PM

Title: Re: Emptiness and the Diamond Sutra

Content:

Ted Biringer said:

Numerous subsequent Zen records make frequent use of the Diamond Sutra's methodology to present the wisdom of emptiness, that is, insight into the nondual nature of reality. The gist of the Diamond Sutra's methodology can be expressed by the formula A is not-A, therefore A is A; not-A is A, therefore not-A is not-A. In other words, form is emptiness (i.e. not-form), therefore form is form; emptiness is form (i.e. not-emptiness), therefore emptiness is emptiness.

Astus wrote:

In what Zen record can one find such an explanation about A's and not-A's?

Ted Biringer said:

The basic reasoning of this can be understood by envisioning 'A' as a particular dharma, and 'not-A' as everything else in the universe.

Astus wrote:

That would be a reification of A, thus a denial of emptiness. A is itself not-A, because there is never A in itself. If it meant simply that A is not anything else, that's just A=A, very much the common view of ordinary beings.

Ted Biringer said:

In sum, the Diamond Sutra presents (makes present) the dynamic interdependence of form and emptiness by demonstrating that 'form' is essential to, therefore inclusive of 'emptiness' (and vice versa).

Astus wrote:

There can be no interdependence of emptiness and form, unless one mistakenly reifies those concepts. Form is empty, because no form exists on its own, and that absence of an identifiable essence is what is called emptiness.

As for interpenetration, better check Huayan teachings on the four dharmadhatu. However, that has little to do with Huineng, the Diamond Sutra, or Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 20th, 2020 at 6:41 PM

Title: Re: What are the (spiritual) physics behind dedicating merit?

Content:

NateLeo said:

I believe understanding the more technical aspects could help me do this better so i can help more beings in places that i cant easily reach physically.

Astus wrote:

Merit is the positive imprint of a beneficial action in one's mental continuum. Sharing the merit of a good deed means that another being rejoices in the same action, thus it leaves a positive imprint there as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 20th, 2020 at 10:54 PM

Title: Re: Emptiness and the Diamond Sutra

Content:

LastLegend said:

That's good, but the question in Chan is what knows that?

Astus wrote:

'None of what the Tathāgata calls 'thoughts' are actually thoughts. Therefore they are called thoughts. Why? Because the past thought is unobtainable, the present thought is unobtainable, and the future thought is unobtainable.'

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html#div-19)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 21st, 2020 at 1:18 AM

Title: Re: Emptiness and the Diamond Sutra

Content:

LastLegend said:

If thought alone is the problem? I don't find knowledge can penetrate the great emptiness. It only serves its purpose to get closer to it.

Astus wrote:

'Within continuing moments of thought one should not think of the previous [mental] realm. If one thinks of the previous thought, the present thought, and the later thought, one's thoughts will be continuous without cease. This is called 'fettered.' If one's thoughts do not abide in the dharmas, this is to be 'unfettered.' Thus it is that nonabiding is taken as the fundamental.'

(Platform Sutra, ch 4, BDK ed, p 43)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 21st, 2020 at 1:34 AM

Title: Re: What are the (spiritual) physics behind dedicating merit?

Content:

Matt J said:

The question is: how can you NOT share merit? Everyone is connected interdependently. If we take emptiness seriously, there are no lines or boundaries that separate anything from everything.

Astus wrote:

Karma is always individual.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 21st, 2020 at 3:17 AM

Title: Re: Emptiness and the Diamond Sutra

Content:

LastLegend said:

Mahaprajna itself is not in the ken of conceptual practice. Not in the ken of second vehicle.

Astus wrote:

What is conceptual in nonabiding?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 21st, 2020 at 3:45 AM

Title: Re: What are the (spiritual) physics behind dedicating merit?

Content:

LastLegend said:

Why?

Astus wrote:

Because that is what it means, how one's intentional action leaves an imprint in one's mind, and as a consequence how that imprint influences one's experiences. As intention is the key factor, those who did not intend something, could not have committed a karma, and without a cause there can be no effect.

'This third category, ascription of karma, means that you experience the results of the karma you create. Results will ripen in the skandhas related to the actor, and not to others. The Collection of the Abhidharma says:

What does the ascription of karma mean? One experiences the maturation of the karma one has created. It is uncommon to others and, so, is called ascription.

If that were not the case, the karma that was created could be wasted or there could be the danger of facing a result that one had not created.

Therefore, in the sutra it says:

That karma that is created by Devadatta will not mature in the earth, water, and so forth

But that karma will ripen in the skandhas and ayatana of that particular individual

To whom else would this karma result?'

(Jewel Ornament of Liberation, p 119-120)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 21st, 2020 at 3:47 AM

Title: Re: Emptiness and the Diamond Sutra

Content:

LastLegend said:

Mahaprajna by default itself already non-abiding.

Astus wrote:

Is what you call Mahaprajna conceptual or not? If not, then nonabiding cannot be conceptual either.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 21st, 2020 at 3:07 PM

Title: Re: What are the (spiritual) physics behind dedicating merit?

Content:

Matt J said:

I think this misses the forest for the trees. To say that karma is truly individual is to say that it is independent. That is not the case. No matter how you parse it, you can say that karma affects the individual (whatever that means), but of course, this maturation will inevitably affect others.

Astus wrote:

Karma is about how mental habits are formed, how they distort one's experience, and how they generate (re)actions. It does not mean all sorts of causes and conditions, but a fairly specific type of it.

Matt J said:

For example, if you insult me, and due to past intentions and actions I have a seed of anger that is set off, let's imagine I am overcome with anger and I hit you in the face, this certainly impacts you. If you go home and your family sees your black eye, this affects them also. If it puts you in a foul mood due to your karmic seeds, then you may go around town spreading that bad mood everywhere.

Contrarily, if, due to past actions I have a seed of a good mood, and you come over, and we have a nice cup of coffee and a great chat, this certainly affects you as well, and you affect others, etc.

Astus wrote:

You hitting me is your action coming based on your habits. My reaction to being hit is my action/perception based on my habits. My family's reaction to seeing my black eye comes their habits. And so on. Karma being individual does not deny the wider causal interactions, just as one feels the effects of the weather, etc. The reason karma is highlighted as one's habit forming intentional action is because that is what one should work on, where skilful/wholesome/beneficial and unskilful/unwholesome/harmful thoughts, words, and deeds emerge and impact one's reality.

Bringing this back to the original question, merit is the positive imprint of a good deed. Since one cannot just distribute one's habits, it is not the case that sharing merit occurs like sharing food. Also, one has no power over whether another being may or may not rejoice in a good (or a bad) deed, regardless of one's intentions of sharing or keeping the merit generated by it. However, sharing merit is bringing others' attention to the opportunity of rejoicing in something good, so it is a beneficial action.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 21st, 2020 at 3:44 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent? (2)

Content:

Artziebetter1 said:

How can Buddhas even act or interact without any type of awareness at all?

Astus wrote:

The problem begins at one's ideas about what buddhahood and what awareness means. Those are already complicated topics. One option is to go by the Yogacara explanation of the eight consciousnesses transformed to the four wisdoms. Another option is to take buddhahood as the nature of the mind. Further options are also available, depending on one's need for more conceptualisation or its minimisation.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 21st, 2020 at 9:36 PM

Title: Re: What are the (spiritual) physics behind dedicating merit?

Content:

LastLegend said:

The reason why your view should not be accepted is because it's not a Mahayana view.

Astus wrote:

What do you call a Mahayana view?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 21st, 2020 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: Why is consciousness seen as something impermanent? (2)

Content:

LastLegend said:

Let's flesh out today what is nature of mind? Using one's own experience to describe it.

Astus wrote:

But first: what do you call mind?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 21st, 2020 at 10:26 PM

Title: Re: What are the (spiritual) physics behind dedicating merit?

Content:

LastLegend said:

What do you call emptiness?

Astus wrote:

That appearances are empty of (i.e. without) any independent essence or characteristic.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 21st, 2020 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: What are the (spiritual) physics behind dedicating merit?

Content:

LastLegend said:

Let's take some example: in quietness state, without interpretations you hear a bird chirping what is nature of mind?

Astus wrote:

What species of bird is chirping?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 26th, 2020 at 5:14 AM

Title: Re: How does Buddhism explain individual experience?

Content:

nichiren-123 said:

Why do individuals experience different things when everything is interconnected?

What is it that makes us have a unique experience?

Astus wrote:

What makes you assume that 'everything is interconnected'? Unique experience is a given already. Why posit a theory that does not reflect actuality and then turn it into a problem?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 26th, 2020 at 2:33 PM

Title: Re: How does Buddhism explain individual experience?

Content:

nichiren-123 said:

Isn't that what dependent origination tells us?

Astus wrote:

Dependent origination in general stands for the universal law of causality and conditionality, and in particular - as the twelve nidanas - applies to individual beings on both a larger (over many lives) and smaller (over mental moments) scale.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 26th, 2020 at 8:50 PM

Title: Re: Questions on consistency and validity of mahayana sutra's

Content:

nichiren-123 said:

Historically, we know that the Mahayana sutra's are later creations attributed to the Buddha. I'd assume that even Buddhists in ancient times knew this since the Mahayana sutra's are full of fantastical tales - They must have known they were allegorical.

Astus wrote:

'Fantastical tales' are not Mahayana novelties, some you can find already in the Nikayas/Agamas (e.g. <https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/buddhafireshmiracle.pdf>, <https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/levitation.pdf>, <https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/miraculenuns.pdf>), and then a great number in later texts (e.g. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Jataka_tales, <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Avad%C4%81na>, <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Buddhava%E1%B9%83sa>, <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Cariy%C4%81pi%E1%B9%ADaka>).

nichiren-123 said:

What I'm interested in though is whether the Mahayana Sutras develop on the earlier sutra's; Whether they are consistent with the early sutra's and if not, in which ways do they differ.

Astus wrote:

Such a comparison would require first identifying specific texts that are compared. See e.g. <https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/mahayana.pdf>.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 29th, 2020 at 3:02 PM

Title: Re: Existence-Time

Content:

Lillian said:

time flows in all directions and pours into each moment.

Astus wrote:

Is time conceived as a separate thing to have its own movements? If so, what is it? If not, then it is simply a concept used to refer to change. Change/time is observed as a mental construct, naming some thoughts as past, some as present, and some as future. How one conceives and interprets events is itself changing, thus in the present one finds all three times manipulated every time one thinks about it. This is a readily observable mechanism of existence one can easily confirm for oneself, and see that being/existence is pure change/time that is interpreted and reinterpreted in the process of changing existence.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2020 at 1:15 AM

Title: Re: Is the argument out of date?

Content:

Viach said:

Theravada concept of the atom

Astus wrote:

It's the Sarvastivadins that Yogacarins argued against.

<http://www.themindingcentre.org/dharmafarer/wp-content/uploads/2009/12/26.2-Buddhist-atomism-piya.pdf> is a much later development, and it's somewhat different.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2020 at 5:16 AM

Title: Re: I don't want parinirvana,should I follow a different path?

Content:

Artziebetter1 said:

I do want sentience for ever,and I rather be alive and suffering somewhat in the 3 realms then to be nonsentient and not suffering.

Astus wrote:

Buddhism teaches freedom from suffering as a living person, not "some time in the future", and not "only when sentience ceases".

Artziebetter1 said:

a Buddha has no vijñāna and no awareness,and some argue that a buddha still has some awareness as a living buddha,but a buddha that goes into parinirvana

Astus wrote:

Parinirvana is not a place to go, nor a state to become, but it's been (mis)interpreted as some sort of euphemism for death and annihilation.

Artziebetter1 said:

I do not want nirvana, so what is the point of following buddhism?

Astus wrote:

True. But nirvana is the end of suffering, it is freedom from fear and anxiety, it is peace, and not the end of everything.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 31st, 2020 at 6:06 PM

Title: Re: Is Vajracchedika Prajna Paramita authentic

Content:

Norden said:

As the title says, does it come directly from the Buddha himself or from Tripitaka?

Astus wrote:

The Diamond Sutra is a conversation between Shakyamuni and Subhuti, and it is very much in the Tripitaka, for instance Kumarajiva's translation is number 235 in volume 8 of the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Taish%C5%8D_Tripitaka.

Norden said:

AFAIK, it is composed later on by Buddhist monk, maybe influenced by other teaching / faith or religion. Does anyone have any thought?

Astus wrote:

Quite the other way around. It is from the Diamond Sutra that all buddhas come, as it says so in http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html#div-9:

'Subhūti, all of the buddhas and all of their teachings of peerless perfect enlightenment spring forth from this sūtra.'

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 5th, 2020 at 3:29 PM

Title: Re: Can a lazy person awaken?

Content:

clayde said:

can a lazy person (like me), one who doesn't read sutras, doesn't invoke buddhas, doesn't study long and hard, doesn't practice morning and night, lies down, and doesn't acquire knowledge, awaken to "see their nature"?

Astus wrote:

There are stupid lazy and smart lazy. Stupid lazy is not actually lazy, it's simply following the ingrained habitual inclinations without giving it a single thought, being lost in samsara and suffering. Smart lazy is what Zen is, being free from hope and worry.

'as to buddhadharma, no effort is necessary. You have only to be ordinary, with nothing to do—defecating, urinating, wearing clothes, eating food, and lying down when tired.'

(Record of Linji, tr Sasaki, p 11-12)

'I neither desire heavenly realms,
Nor want blessings in this world.
When hungry, eat;
Tired, sleep.
Fools laugh at me,
But the wise know its wisdom.
It's not being stupid –
It's what we originally are.'

(<https://beingwithoutself.files.wordpress.com/2011/07/enjoyingtheway.pdf> by Nanyue Mingzan, aka Lazy Zan)

'You get up in the morning, dress, wash your face, and so on; you call these miscellaneous thoughts, but all that is necessary is that there be no perceiver or perceived when you perceive—no hearer or heard when you hear, no thinker or thought when you think. Buddhism is very easy and very economical; it spares effort, but you yourself waste energy and make your own hardships.'
(Foyan Qingyuan, in Instant Zen, p 70)

'An ancient sage said, "Every phenomenon is the original reality." Fine. Yunmen held up his cane and said, "This is not the original reality." After a pause, he said, "If so, then the three poisons, four perversions, five clusters, six senses, twelve media, eighteen elements, and twenty-five realms of being are not the original reality." Why not understand in this way—you'd save quite a bit of effort.

Buddhism is a most economical affair, conserving the most energy—it has always been present, but you do not understand.

I tell you, moreover, that there is nothing that is true and nothing that is not true. How can there be truth and untruth in one thing? Just because of seeking unceasingly, everywhere is seeking; pondering principles is seeking, contemplating the model cases of the ancients is also seeking, reading Zen books is also seeking; even if you sit quietly, continuously from moment to moment, this too is seeking.

Do you want to understand? Then that seeking of yours is actually not seeking. This is extremely difficult to believe and to penetrate, hard to work on. Those of you who are not comfortable are that way, generally speaking, because you are either oblivious or excited. That is why you say you do not understand.

Right now, how can you avoid being oblivious or excited? When that very thought of yours arises, it is the flowing whirl of birth and death: do you consider it habit-activated consciousness, or do you consider it immutable? Contemplate in this way over and over again, and you will have a bit of guiding principle.'

(Foyan Qingyuan, in Instant Zen, p 80-81)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 8th, 2020 at 5:10 AM

Title: Re: Can a lazy person awaken?

Content:

SilenceMonkey said:

You know, I don't think "idle" means lazy... There is a phrase that has been sitting in my thoughts for years. Master Sheng Yen used to say that to practice zen is to be like a 無事 賢道人 wushi xian daoren. Wu shi means having nothing to do... much like the tibetan refrain of "let go of your worldly activities."

The Record of Linji by Ruth Fuller Sasaki, p 159 said:

One who has nothing to do 無事人 is a term used to describe the fully enlightened person. Linji says, "Buddhas and patriarchs are people with nothing to do". The expression may have originated with Baizhang Huaihai, who states:

Just he for whom at present, as regards each and every external circumstance, there is no delusion, no disturbance, no anger, and no joy; and, as regards the gates of his own six sense organs, has wiped and settled them so that they are clean, this is the one who is without anything to do. (X 68: 12c)

This expression was used by both Guishan Lingyou and Huangbo Xiyun, the two great disciples of Baizhang. Guishan says:

One who is like the clear stillness of autumn water, pure, motionless, tranquil, and unobstructed—such a one is called a person of the Way, also a person who has nothing to do. (T 47: 577b–c)

Huangbo writes:

One whose outer and inner feelings are completely extinguished and who clings to nothing, such is the one who has nothing to do. (T 48: 382c)

[Huangbo] said, 'The hundred-odd kinds of knowledge do not compare with nonseeking. This is the ultimate. The person of the Way is the one who has nothing to do, who has no mind at all and no doctrine to preach. Having nothing to do, such a person lives at ease. (T 48: 383b)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 9th, 2020 at 5:01 AM

Title: Re: infinite Regress and the Yogacara container model

Content:

Artziebetter1 said:

The Yogacara container universe model posits that shared reality is due to similar karmic traces or samskaras of sentient beings.

Astus wrote:

It is the common Buddhist model that the realms appear as a result of beings' karma. Yogacara posits that what ordinary beings assume themselves and the world to be is merely a conceptual fabrication based on attributing independent reality to those ideas. As for 'container universe' and 'shared reality', where do you get those concepts from?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 9th, 2020 at 5:07 AM

Title: Re: Satipathana in Mahayana

Content:
Viach said:
After the split on Mahayana and Theravada

Astus wrote:
There has been no such split.

Viach said:
has the practice of satipatthana (supplemented by the practice of bodhichitta origination) remained unchanged and basic yogic practice in Mahayana?

Astus wrote:
You might want to take a look at this: http://santifm.org/santipada/wp-content/uploads/2012/08/A_History_of_Mindfulness_Bhikkhu_Sujato.pdf.

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, August 9th, 2020 at 3:23 PM
Title: Re: Satipathana in Mahayana
Content:
avatamsaka3 said:
?

Astus wrote:
Mahayana developed in Northern India, and it had little contact with Theravada (for a quick overview see the map in: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Early_Buddhist_schools).

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, August 9th, 2020 at 3:34 PM
Title: Re: infinite Regress and the Yogacara container model
Content:

Artziebetter1 said:
I have heard from andrei on buddhism stack exchange that this is the case, that in yogacara samskaras create appearances and vice versa and he basically admitted this was an infinite regress to me. I have also heard from krodha on buddhism subreddit that Dzogchen posits a yogachara container universe model to explain why individual beings' mindstreams perceive a shared reality(my addition: despite not being part of one mind).

Astus wrote:
So it is not from any Yogacara work that you based the assumed problem on, and likely that's why it had become an issue. Naturally, if the premises are wrong, then the conclusion will be wrong as well.

Artziebetter1 said:
even if we could infinitely regress literally this causal chain, this wouldn't answer how interaction is functionally possible even with similar samskaras.

Astus wrote:

Except that there is no such thing as "interacting samskaras". Samskaras are mental fabrications like faith, attachment, pride, harmfulness, etc. Saying that one's envy interacts with another's shamelessness is very much a poetic/figurative speech.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 9th, 2020 at 11:21 PM

Title: Re: Sources substantiating claims about "Hindus" not achieving liberation

Content:

fckw said:

Does anyone know of any authoritative, that is: commonly accepted among their own scholars, be it "Hindu" or Buddhist scriptures that substantiate these claims?

Astus wrote:

The teaching unique to the Buddha is anatma, as you can find this stated in the Culasihanada Sutta. Without realising the absence of a self there are craving, grasping, becoming, birth, and suffering.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 10th, 2020 at 1:47 AM

Title: Re: Sources substantiating claims about "Hindus" not achieving liberation

Content:

fckw said:

That is not the same claim as saying that "absorption states don't lead to liberation". The two are different.

Astus wrote:

In Buddhism no state of absorption is sufficient for liberation, wisdom is a requirement. See the Brahmajala Sutta how meditative experiences and wrong views are related.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 11th, 2020 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: Sources substantiating claims about "Hindus" not achieving liberation

Content:

fckw said:

the difference in view must therefore be on other aspects of Hindu teachings, but not in a subject-object-dualism.

Astus wrote:

The view of absolute monism (there is only self/god) is not the same as the non-existence of self and other.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2020 at 5:01 PM

Title: Re: Sources substantiating claims about "Hindus" not achieving liberation

Content:

fckw said:

Did I forget any further arguments?

Astus wrote:

While position 4 can cover "everything else", it is worth mentioning that the very concept of liberation is different, as in Buddhism there is no final form of existence to reach/become.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 14th, 2020 at 4:43 AM

Title: Re: Good beginner's overview

Content:

Astus wrote:

'This book offers a selection from a broad range of Buddhist texts. You will find here passages that may inspire, guide and challenge you. Overall, they give a picture of this great tradition as it has been lived down the centuries.'

'This book is divided into three main parts: i) the life and nature of the Buddha ii) the Dhamma/Dharma, or Buddhist teachings, and iii) the Sangha or spiritual community. Each chapter except the first is divided into three sections, containing selected passages from the texts of the three main Buddhist traditions: Theravāda, Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna.'

'Through this, its objectives are to increase awareness among Buddhists of their own rich heritage of religious and ethical thinking as well as to increase understanding among non-Buddhists of the fundamental values and principles of Buddhism. It seeks to strike a balance between what is common to the Buddhist traditions and the diversity of perspectives among them. The book consists of selected translations from Pāli, Sanskrit, Chinese and Tibetan, using a common terminology in English of key Buddhist terms, and maintaining strict scholarly standards.'

http://www.icdv.net/pdf/cbt_final_dec29%202015.pdf

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 14th, 2020 at 2:33 PM

Title: Re: Good beginner's overview

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

This looks very good but it's not the one I was talking about before.

This one is a lot longer, more detailed, broader in its approach to the different traditions.

Astus wrote:

I guess above you meant <https://bdkamerica.org/find-your-edition/> that is the short version of <https://bdkamerica.org/product/buddha-dharma-the-way-to-enlightenment-2e-hardcover/> - both available for free as PDF - that itself was written as a summary of the Tripitaka.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2020 at 3:56 PM

Title: Re: Question about Vipassana

Content:

Brahma said:

Do you believe that the physical manifestation of pain and distress within the body will dissipear in all cases if one practices vipassana meditation perfectly? If so, how? If not, how is the pain of suffering removed fully through vipassana, if someone can still physically feel the pain?

Astus wrote:

'There are two kinds of suffering: i) bodily suffering (kāyika duḥkha), ii) mental suffering (caitasika duḥkha). By the power of their wisdom (prajñābala), the holy individuals (āryapudgala) have no further mental suffering like sadness (daurmanasya), jealousy (īrṣyā), malice (vyāpāda), etc. On the other hand, because they have received a body composed of the four great elements (mahābhūtamaya) as a result of actions in their previous existences (pūrvajanmakarman), they still have bodily sufferings such as old age (jarā) and sickness (vyādhi), hunger and thirst (kṣutpipāsa), cold and heat (śītoṣṇa), etc., but these bodily sufferings are slight and quite rare.'

(<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225706.html>; see also

<https://accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn36/sn36.006.than.html>,

<https://accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn52/sn52.010.than.html>,

<https://accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn01/sn01.038.than.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2020 at 4:46 PM

Title: Re: Non-attachment in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

'The happiness aspired to by most people is future happiness; it is a state of happiness wished for in the future. Moreover, it is dependent on other things. Yet when people develop a wise discernment into the truth, an innate and constant form of happiness arises—a happiness existing at all times, which is accessible in every moment. It lies at the heart of our being, pervading our entire life.

Here, one need not pursue any other kind of happiness. If other forms of happiness or pleasure present themselves, they are seen as a bonus, and one has the option to partake of them or not, without anxiety, in whatever way one pleases. There are no complications. And when these supplementary forms of happiness are absent, it has no effect on one's wellbeing. One already abides in a state of constant happiness.' (<https://www.watnyanaves.net/uploads/File/books/pdf/675-Perfect-Happiness-English.pdf> by Phrayudh Payutto, p 23)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 21st, 2020 at 10:26 PM

Title: Re: Question about Vipassana

Content:

Brahma said:

If I want to practice Vipassana, can I still call my individuality a soul?

Astus wrote:

Words matter less than what one means by them.

Brahma said:

If there is an understanding that we are emptiness, void, why cannot that a Loving Eternal voidness be our soul?

Astus wrote:

Emptiness means the absence of an enduring, independent substance. Emptiness is a negation, not an assertion of any essence/entity.

Brahma said:

That is, since we are beginningless, there is some constant Eternal principle there.

Astus wrote:

No constant principle, that's what impermanence means. Every experience changes. Thinking that there is something constant, that itself is a mere thought that passes quickly.

Brahma said:

Yes, consciousness keeps going, life after life, but there is still an individuality, something we carry with us, we are not simply a product of our aggregates.

Astus wrote:

The five aggregates are the entirety of what a being is, it covers the complete spectrum of experiences, that is, the whole of existence and life. Whatever one assumes to be one's possession or one's self is always in relation to the aggregates. As long as one takes the aggregates to be constant, reliable, enjoyable, controllable, independent, for that long there is disappointment and dissatisfaction, as they always keep changing and falling apart.

Brahma said:

What I am trying to say is that with holding no-self as being the basis of meditation, can one call their consciousness soul?

Astus wrote:

This should answer it:

<https://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.061.than.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 22nd, 2020 at 5:04 AM

Title: Re: Question about Vipassana

Content:

avatamsaka3 said:

If there is no "constant principle", how do you explain rebirth?

Astus wrote:

Dependent origination.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 22nd, 2020 at 5:10 PM

Title: Re: Question about Vipassana

Content:

avatamsaka3 said:

Meaning what exactly? What is reborn?

Astus wrote:

"What is rebirth, sir, and who does it belong to?"

"That's not a fitting question," said the Buddha. "You might say, 'What is rebirth, and who does it belong to?' Or you might say, 'Rebirth is one thing, who it belongs to is another.' But both of these mean the same thing, only the phrasing differs. Mendicant, if you have the view that the soul and the body are the same thing, there is no living of the spiritual life. If you have the view that the soul and the body are different things, there is no living of the spiritual life. Avoiding these two extremes, the Realized One teaches by the middle way: 'Continued existence is a condition for rebirth.'"

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn12.35/en/sujato>)

There are several teachings available on dependent origination. Some examples:

<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.15.0.than.html>

<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/index.html#sn12>

<https://read.84000.co/translation/toh210.html>

<https://read.84000.co/translation/toh211.html>

<https://read.84000.co/translation/toh212.html>

<https://fpmt.org/mandala/online-features/personalizing-the-twelve-links-of-dependent-origination/>

<https://studybuddhism.com/en/advanced-studies/lam-rim/samsara-nirvana/the-> twelve-links-an-in-depth-analysis

https://www.bps.lk/olib/wh/wh015_Piyadassi_Dependent-Origination.html

<http://www.aimwell.org/dependentorigination.html>

<https://www.accesstoinight.org/lib/authors/nyanatiloka/wheel394.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2020 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: Question about Vipassana

Content:

avatamsaka3 said:

Continued existence is "a constant principle".

Astus wrote:

Not at all, it is one of the twelve links (Pali/Sanskrit: bhava) that can also be translated as <https://suttacentral.net/sn12.35/en/bodhi> and <https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.035.than.html>, and it depends on grasping.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2020 at 3:57 PM

Title: Re: Question about Vipassana

Content:

Brahma said:

This article claims that Buddha didn't teach "no-self" but taught "non-self"

Astus wrote:

Whatever can be called a self or belonging to a self are the five aggregates

(<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.047.than.html>) that are all 'empty, void, without substance'

(<https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.095.than.html>), in other words, not self (<https://suttacentral.net/sn22.11/en/sujato>). The teaching on the aggregates is well summarised in the <https://accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.109.than.html> where it is asked, 'Then what self will be touched by the actions done by what is not-self?', and the Buddha's answer is a step by step instruction on seeing that there is nothing that could be called a self or belonging to a self.

Brahma said:

avoided questions on whether there was a self or not, brushing them aside (possibly to point to a higher level of Awakening).

Astus wrote:

Not so. There is nothing to take as self or belonging to a self apart from the five aggregates, as noted above.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2020 at 4:21 AM

Title: Re: How do those in a state of Mahaparinirvana interact with the Saha world?

Content:

Brahma said:

Also, while the Saha world is characterized by impermanence, would Nirvana and Mahaparinirvana be characterized as a state of permanence? If so, how? If not--also, how so?

Astus wrote:

There is nobody in nirvana, as it is not a place or state of a being to exist in, therefore interaction from it makes no sense. If you want a Mahayana explanation of buddha activities, see for instance the seventh vajra point of the Uttaratantra, and chapter 21 of the Jewel Ornament of Liberation.

'An All-Embracing One always has spontaneous access to the disciples' temperaments, the means of training, the [various] trainings that suit their temperaments, and to seeking them wherever they are, at the right time.

Having multitudes of supremely precious qualities and the waters of the ocean of primordial wisdom, possessing the sunlight of merit and wisdom, it is the definitive accomplishment of all vehicles without exception. [Enlightenment] is vast, without middle or end, and thus all-pervasive like space.

Fully seeing that buddhahood, the treasure of the unpolluted qualities, is [present] within all sentient beings without the slightest distinction, the wind of the Buddhas' sublime compassion totally dispels the clouds of afflictions and hindrances to knowledge, which have spun their net about it.'

(Buddha Nature: The Mahayana Uttaratantra Shastra, p 239-240)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 8th, 2020 at 3:20 PM

Title: Re: Buddha, the Original Zen Master

Content:

clyde said:

When he sat down under the tree, he did something very new, not based on a method or manual – something more spontaneous, more natural. By trial and error, he gradually learned how to sit in a stable way by paying attention to how he felt in the sitting posture. He learned how to be with the body and mind, without doing anything artificial or intentional. He gave up and surrendered, and that's the origin of our zazen. The Buddha was the first to practice zazen.

Astus wrote:

And how does zazen relate to awakening when seeing the morning star? According to the https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/denkoroku/pdf/Lead_Chapter.pdf, Sakyamuni sat for six years not moving, to the extent that 'spiderwebs formed between his eyebrows, a magpie's nest rested atop his head, and reeds sprouted up through his seat' before one day attaining enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 8th, 2020 at 10:24 PM

Title: Re: This simply doesn't make any sense.....

Content:

Justmeagain said:

"Because it is the practice of enlightenment" Or just pretending to be?

Astus wrote:

It is 'enlightenment' that one has to practise, that is, not grasping at body and mind.
How so?

'Our zazen is letting go of thought. As Dogen said in Fukanzazengi it is the negation of everything arising from human mind. And zazen is also embracing everything, including delusions and distorted thoughts. But because we let go of delusion, it cannot harm us. When we see delusion as delusion, we are not deceived by delusion.'
(https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/leaflet/sotozen/pdf/soto_zen.pdf, p 22-23)

'Just leave thoughts alone, allowing them to come up and go away freely.'
(<https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/practice/zazen/howto/index.html>)

The various afflictions (klesa/bonno), like anxieties and concerns, originate from clinging to ideas, in particular clinging to ideas involving one's self, taking them as 'this is me' or 'this is mine'. But if one does not pursue the first thought, then there will be no continuation into a second, and a third, and so on, to develop into something overwhelming and unmanageable.

"If one thinks of the previous thought, the present thought, and the later thought, one's thoughts will be continuous without cease. This is called 'fettered.' If one's thoughts do not abide in the dharma, this is to be 'unfettered.'"
(Platform Sutra, ch 4, BDK ed, p 43)

'Mumyo (fundamental delusion) is called illusory mind. It is the source of the rounds of delusory life and death from the immeasurable past. It is our discriminating mind which obstinately clings to body, mind, the world, and all things, as being the way we have perceived and recognized them until now. For example, although something good is not always good, we hold stubbornly to what we think is good. Something evil is not always evil, yet we become attached to our own judgment and make it a preconception. Even if you think something is good, others may think it is evil. Even if you think something is evil, others may think it good. And, even if both you and others think something may be good or evil today, fundamentally such judgments merely accord with illusory mind which manifests itself in the form of one's own knowledge, views, and experiences. This is true not only of our judgments about good and evil, but also our views about being and non-being, hatred and love, etc. All these differentiations in regarding all existence arise from illusory mind.'

(https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/leaflet/heartofzen/pdf/Heart_of_Zen.pdf, p 45-46)

So, practising enlightenment is seeing through our very thoughts, emotions, feelings, etc., not by disregarding, suppressing, or analysing them, but simply with being aware of how they arise and pass. When there is awareness without complications, that is the enlightened outlook free from the entanglements of the fabrications of ignorance.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 9th, 2020 at 4:29 AM

Title: Re: Buddha, the Original Zen Master

Content:

clayde said:

Whatever the precipitating cause

Astus wrote:

If there was a cause, then how can it be maintained that zazen itself is enlightenment?

clayde said:

Śākyamuni Buddha himself formed no thought of attaining the way.
which is a description of zazen.

Astus wrote:

Only after six years of sitting was he able to awaken when seeing the morning star.
Whether he then formed a thought about it or not is irrelevant.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 9th, 2020 at 3:16 PM

Title: Re: Buddha, the Original Zen Master

Content:

clayde said:

Words! Perhaps "cause" was too much. Seeing the Morning Star didn't cause the Buddha's awakening, but, as Zen Masters have often described, an external occurrence (e.g. - the sound of a stone hitting bamboo) is sometimes a "simultaneous event".
Better?

Astus wrote:

Not better at all, because then seeing the star is simply an irrelevant event that's not even worth mentioning, just as numerous other circumstances are not mentioned, like seeing trees and grass, hearing birds and bugs, smelling earth and flowers, etc. And, more importantly, it still leaves the question unanswered why he awakened only after six years of motionless sitting.

clayde said:

And Keizan doesn't say the Buddha "formed no thought of attaining the way" after his awakening.

Astus wrote:

What would have been the point of forming such a thought before, or even at the same time? It should also be noted that the knowledge of the destructions of defilements and the knowledge of no longer having any births left is part of the standard definition of liberation (see e.g. <https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225076.html>), and a similar <https://dhammawiki.com/index.php/Paccavekkhana-nana> is taught in Theravada.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2020 at 3:42 PM

Title: Re: Buddha, the Original Zen Master

Content:

clyde said:

Are you suggesting that seeing the Morning Star caused the Buddha's awakening?

Astus wrote:

The only other role the star can have in the story is to mark the time of awakening as around dawn, but then, seeing or not seeing it has no relevance. It also fits the usual Zen stories of suddenly seeing or hearing something that triggers awakening, and that is important, as this version of the Buddha's awakening is a Zen narrative, not something from the sutras.

clyde said:

The Buddha was clear, "Unprovoked is my release."

Astus wrote:

That is a translation that can be misinterpreted as 'uncaused', while the word in SN 56.11 is 'unshakeable' (akuppa; see also the translations by Bodhi and Sujato). At the same time, if the account of the Buddha's awakening in the Nikayas is relevant, then it is quite different from Keizan's presentation, and on that note Dr. Bhikkhu Analayo's work is highly recommended: 'A Meditator's Life of the Buddha, Based on the Early Discourses'.

clyde said:

Before, at the same time, or after - what is your point? Keizan said, Śākyamuni Buddha himself formed no thought of attaining the way.

How do you understand this? I understood Keizan as referencing zazen.

Astus wrote:

Not forming a thought of it would have had no meaning before he had attained, as it would have been a simple delusion. As for not forming a thought after, see http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html#div-10 of the Diamond Sutra. Regarding referencing zazen, Keizan is quite clear on Shakyamuni sitting still for six years. This you can also tell that in the <https://global.sotozen->

net.or.jp/eng/library/denkoroku/pdf/Lead_Chapter.pdf he writes 六年端坐 ('for six [more] years he sat erect') and in the <https://antaiji.org/ja/classics/english-zazen-yojinki/> 如来の端坐、少林の面壁 (<http://antaiji.org/archives/eng/zzyk.shtml>: 'The Buddha sat straight, Bodhidharma faced the wall'), both using the same term tanza 端坐 for sitting erect/straight.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 13th, 2020 at 4:06 AM

Title: Re: Buddha, the Original Zen Master

Content:

clyde said:

it was “suddenly seeing or hearing something that triggers awakening”.

Astus wrote:

And the problem the story indicates is that it contradicts the idea that zazen is practice-enlightenment, therefore no awakening should be needed beyond that.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 13th, 2020 at 3:24 PM

Title: Re: Buddha, the Original Zen Master

Content:

clyde said:

You're making a problem where there is none and I believe you know it.

Astus wrote:

It doesn't have to be a problem, but it's still a contradiction.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2020 at 2:19 PM

Title: Re: Subtle body

Content:

avatamsaka3 said:

1. Does the subtle body exist conventionally?

Astus wrote:

Does it exist at all? In Buddhism it is a theory found only in Vajrayana, while outside it, within other Indian systems, it has been present in various forms even before the Buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2020 at 5:10 PM

Title: Re: Subtle body

Content:

Aemilius said:

It is implied in many ways in the Sutras

Astus wrote:

However, there would have been no reason to merely imply anything, since the idea of a subtle body was not unknown in India, so both the Buddha and then later masters could have discussed it, if they wanted to, like in the context of topics you listed as possible implications. Do you perhaps know of Vajrayana teachings where such connections are made between the Abhidharma system and Tantra?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2020 at 9:29 PM

Title: Re: Avatamsaka Translation Question

Content:

Seeker12 said:

In Thomas Cleary's translation on page 526 in chapter 24, it says, “Carrying out pure ways,

Fulfilling virtues,
One can concentrate unremittingly
On omniscience.”

Can anyone tell me exactly what word was translated as ‘omniscience’ here by any chance? Thank you for any feedback.

Astus wrote:

omniscience: 一切智

'Accomplishing pristine, pure Dharmas,
Perfecting all merit and virtue,
One has total concentration
And never lets one's mind forsake All-Wisdom.'
(http://www.cttbusa.org/avatamsaka/avatamsaka24_1.asp)

T10, no. 279, p. 123b24-25:

成就白淨法，
具足諸功德，
彼於一切智，
專念心不捨。

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2020 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: Avatamsaka Translation Question

Content:

Seeker12 said:

Do you know what that would be in Sanskrit?

Astus wrote:

Definition: sarva-jñā, sarva-jñātā, sarvajñā-jñāna; sarvajñā-tattva, sarva-jñatva, sarvajñā-dharmatā, sarvajñā-bala, sarva-jñāna, sarvatra-jñāna, sarva-buddhi, sarva-vid.

Source: 佛教漢梵大辭典, 平川彰 Buddhist Chinese-Sanskrit Dictionary, Akira Hirakawa

See more

<https://www.buddhistdoor.net/dictionary/details/%E4%B8%80%E5%88%87%E6%99%BA>.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 27th, 2020 at 5:04 AM

Title: Readable Library of Tibetan Classics

Content:

Astus wrote:

How can one make the files readable on the <http://tibetanclassics.org/en/media-resources/text/lotc-tibetan-texts?>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 28th, 2020 at 7:36 PM

Title: Re: Readable Library of Tibetan Classics

Content:

ratna said:

You'll need to install the <http://www.aerifal.cx/~dalias/bodyig/fonts/> fonts and restart your PDF viewer.

Astus wrote:

Thank you!

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2020 at 8:44 PM

Title: Re: Subtle body

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

What we think of as our physical body is actually just a creation of our mind based on sense experiences. So looking for some tangible "subtle body" is perhaps missing the point.

Astus wrote:

So from a practical perspective working with the channels et al. would be about manipulating the felt body to influence one's state of mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 1st, 2020 at 2:59 PM

Title: Re: chan/seon/rinzai/soto differences

Content:

Julio Robles said:

Astus, you said "Like other Japanese schools, they lack full monastic ordination", that is not accurate, the Japanese Obaku Zen School (3rd largest Japanese Zen School, for the readers that doesn't know, I'm sure you do) follows the Vinaya of the Dharmagupta.

Astus wrote:

That is a very interesting news. Any sources on the matter you could point to?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 2nd, 2020 at 5:15 AM

Title: Re: Hypothetical debate team! Arguing against the self!

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are already many arguments readily available. Here's an example (Aryadeva's Four Hundred Stanzas on the Middle Way, ch 10, v 229-237):

From one rebirth to another
The person changes like the body.
It is illogical for yours to be Separate from the body and permanent.

Intangible things do not Produce so-called motility.
Thus the life force is not
Agent of the body's movements.

Why [teach] non-violence and wonder about Conditions for a permanent self?
A diamond never has to be Protected against woodworm.

If your self is permanent
Because of remembering other lives,
How can your body be impermanent
When you see a scar previously formed?

If the self when possessing that
Which has mind is a knower,
By that [same argument] that which has mind would be Mindless and the person permanent.

A life force which has pleasure and so forth
Appears as various as pleasure and so forth.
Thus like pleasure it is not Suitable as something permanent.

If consciousness is permanent
An agent is superfluous.
if fire is permanent
Fuel is unnecessary.

A substantial entity, unlike an action,
Does not alter until it disintegrates.
Thus it is improper to claim
The person exists but consciousness does not.

At times one sees potential consciousness,
At others consciousness itself.
Because of being like molten iron
The person undergoes change.

Author: Astus
Date: Friday, October 2nd, 2020 at 9:02 PM
Title: Re: Subtle body
Content:
Malcolm said:
No, it's a purely physical action. See the Kosha.

Astus wrote:
Sarvastivadins take speech as a dharma not associated with mind, Sautrantikas as rupa because it's sound (AKB II.47, vol 1, p 250-253), and Yogacarins as the Sarvastivadins (Abhidharmasamuccaya, p 20, cf.
<http://www.acmuller.net/yogacara/outlines/100dharma.html> /
<http://www.cttbusa.org/100shastra/100dharma8.asp>).

Also note:

'First you place the mind and keep it connected, then you break into speech. That's why placing the mind and keeping it connected are verbal processes.'
(<https://suttacentral.net/mn44/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, October 6th, 2020 at 3:23 PM
Title: Re: Monism? A [possibly not so brief] question and discussion on Buddhist metaphysics

Content:

Mr. Cole said:

I was wondering if anyone could elucidate what Buddhist metaphysics and spirituality has to say on this topic.

Astus wrote:

Buddhist metaphysics might be called conditional pluralism, as it posits multiple factors (dharma) that exist dependent on other factors. For a summary of some of the main forms of Buddhist philosophy:

<https://plato.stanford.edu/entries/abhidharma/>
<https://plato.stanford.edu/entries/madhyamaka/>
<https://plato.stanford.edu/entries/twotruths-india/>
<https://plato.stanford.edu/entries/vasubandhu/>
<https://plato.stanford.edu/entries/buddhism-tiantai/>
<https://plato.stanford.edu/entries/buddhism-huayan/>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2020 at 11:15 PM

Title: Re: What is meant by "there are no strivings, no comings, and no goings" in the Laṅkāvatāra Sūtra?

Content:

Brahma said:

So again, what does the Buddha mean when He says that the notions of "birth, abiding, and disappearance must be discarded" and that "there are no strivings, no comings, and no goings" in the Laṅkāvatāra Sūtra?

Astus wrote:

Since things are mere concepts without any existence of their own, there is nothing born, enduring, or dying (the three characteristics of impermanent phenomena). There are no strivings, etc., as there is nobody to strive (or rather move - nirīha, Red Pine translates it as 'motionless'), in other words, nobody to be born and die, no real birth and death, i.e. samsara.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 8th, 2020 at 4:00 AM

Title: Re: What is meant by "there are no strivings, no comings, and no goings" in the Laṅkāvatāra Sūtra?

Content:

Brahma said:

Can you explain how there is "nobody to strive or move"?

Astus wrote:

It is so because of what the sutra itself states: 'it is devoid of selfness and its belongings' (ātmātmīyarahita), that there is no entity transmigrating, because what are assumed as a being/self is merely a concept, an imagined thing, and does not really exist. This is actually the basic Buddhist doctrine of no-self.

Brahma said:

And is this motionlessness unsuspended? Because this concept keeps me thinking of the souls of all things, not unchanging but also with qualities that are indestructible, with a sameness to them despite constant impermanence in the Saha world. Is this a deeper Buddhist philosophical way of describing anatta in a correct way?

Astus wrote:

Not at all. It is like a play of shadows where one may believe that a shadow is a being moving around out of its own volition, while actually it's just a natural phenomenon produced by various causes and conditions. Buddhism teaches one to learn to recognise this mistaken superimposition on appearances, and not to add another layer of a 'deeper philosophy', as that would be merely making further mistakes out of the already incorrect concept of a real being.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 8th, 2020 at 2:52 PM

Title: Re: What is meant by "there are no strivings, no comings, and no goings" in the Laṅkāvatāra Sūtra?

Content:

Brahma said:

But the substance in life is Metta, no?

Astus wrote:

Metta is a specific attitude that one can cultivate. There are three other attitudes normally grouped together with it: karuna, mudita, upekkha; they together form the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Brahmavihara>. Those four do not serve as substance or universal basis in Buddhism, but rather they are to be practised.

Brahma said:

Love being the soul Buddhism asks us to cultivate by discarding the false views of self, and even of soul, until one extinguishes their material desires, attains Nirvana, and becomes a Buddha and feels only the Highest Metta and finds the Truth there.

Astus wrote:

Love (metta) is insufficient in itself to reach liberation, it is not an ultimate truth (paramartha-sacca), and it is compounded (sankhata).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 8th, 2020 at 3:48 PM

Title: Re: Hypothetical debate team number 2! Arguing against "All is consciousness!"

Content:

Astus wrote:

All is consciousness is an exaggerated mistake, as even ordinary people recognise various objects. Here's a bit of analysis by Shantarakshita (Madhyamakalamkara, v 46-54, tr Padmakara):

If consciousness is ultimately real,
It must be manifold, or else its aspects are all one.
Failing this, the mind and object are at variance
And there's no doubt that they diverge.

If the aspects are not different,
Moving and unmoving parts and so forth—all are one.
All must be in motion or at rest!
It's hard to give an answer to this consequence.

And even in the case of outer things,
Since these are not devoid of aspects,
All such features are contained in one:
A consequence that no one can gainsay.

If you say cognitions are as many
As the mental aspects,
They can be examined like the partless particle,
And it is hard to circumvent such scrutiny.

If various aspects form a single entity,
Is not this the teaching of the sky-clad yogis?
Variety is not a truly single entity
But is like various gems and other things.

If various items form one thing inherently existent,
How do they appear to us as various?
For some are hidden, some are not.
Now how can they be so distinct?

Since, they say, in consciousness itself
There are no mental aspects,
The mind, which in reality is aspectless,
Appears with aspects only through delusion.

But if these aspects are without existence,
How do we experience them so clearly?
Indeed there is no consciousness
That from the aspects stands apart.

Therefore, where there's nothing present,
Absent also is cognizing consciousness.
Likewise misery cannot be known as bliss,

Nor white cognized as something that's not white.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 8th, 2020 at 5:12 PM

Title: Re: Looking for Buddhist logical statements that disprove the idea that "All is one"

Content:

Faith in Mind: A Guide to Ch'an Practice by Master Sheng-Yen said:

One is everything, Everything is one.

True suchness is identical to all phenomena and all phenomena are never separated from true suchness. It must be understood in this sense, and not in the sense that all phenomena reduce to one. There is no distinction between unification and non-unification in true suchness. Otherwise, taking these two lines literally would imply that if one person becomes a Buddha, everyone else has to become a Buddha. Or, all sentient beings must attain Buddhahood before there can be even one Buddha, since all sentient beings are one. This would not hold on a common sense level, yet it can be understood on the deeper level just explained.

(<http://enlight.lib.ntu.edu.tw/FULLTEXT/JR-MISC/misc38333.pdf>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 9th, 2020 at 4:03 PM

Title: Re: Poll: Is consciousness/mind/related terms (vinnana/citta/manas/nama/etc.)...

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yogacāra asserts the mind is impermanent, momentary, and dependent.

Dgj said:

Depends on who you ask:

Astus wrote:

Not really. Asanga and Vasubandhu are very clear on the nature of the eight consciousnesses. If you propose that somebody else taught of an independent, eternal consciousness within Buddhism, you need to give the exact source.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 12th, 2020 at 5:11 AM

Title: Re: Is there a possibility in the near future for creating a subforum for the Huayan/Kegon school?

Content:

nomono said:

I am very interested in the Huayan/Kegon school and its interpretations, doctrines, commentaries, beliefs, patriarchs, liturgy, canon of scriptures and so on, but there is not very much in the internet about it.

Astus wrote:

There's not much about it in English in general. At least in Korean Buddhism Hwaeom is upheld as the main form of the doctrinal teachings, so volumes 4 and 5 in http://www.acmuller.net/kor-bud/collected_works.html contain some original translations. However, note that there is no separate Hwaeom school.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 12th, 2020 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: With regards to impermanence - what is permanent? Is Buddha or Buddhahood permanent?

Content:

Astus wrote:

All conditioned things are impermanent, only what is unconditioned is permanent.

And for the Mahayana point of view, the Samdhinirmocana Sutra puts it nicely (ch 2, BDK ed, p 12):

"Good son, the term 'unconditioned' is also a word provisionally invented by the First Teacher. Now, if the First Teacher provisionally invented this word, then it is a verbal expression apprehended by imagination. And, if it is a verbal expression apprehended by imagination, then, in the final analysis, such an imagined description does not validate a real thing. Therefore, the unconditioned does not exist. Good son, the term 'conditioned' is also invented from language [and it validates nothing real]."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 14th, 2020 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: What is zen to you?

Content:

Astus wrote:

A monk asked Mazu, "Please indicate the meaning of Chan directly, apart from all permutations of assertion and denial."

Mazu said, "I'm tired today and can't explain for you. Go ask Zhizang."

When the monk asked Zhizang, Zhizang said, "Why not ask the teacher?"

The monk said, "He told me to ask you."

Zhizang said, "I have a headache today and can't explain for you. Go ask Baizhang."

When the monk asked Baizhang, Baizhang said, "At this point, after all, I don't understand."

When the monk related this to Mazu, Mazu said, "Zhizang's head is white; Baizhang's head is black."

(Blue Cliff Record, case 73, BDK ed, p 324-325)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 14th, 2020 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: What is zen to you?

Content:

FlareStar said:
What does that mean?

Astus wrote:
It is 'apart from all permutations of assertion and denial'.

A monk asked Zhaozhou, “The supreme Way has no difficulties— just avoid discrimination.’ As soon as there are words spoken, this is discrimination. So how do you help people?”

Zhaozhou said, “Why don’t you quote this saying in full?”

The monk said, “I only remember up to here.”

Zhaozhou said, “It’s just this: ‘The supreme Way has no difficulties—just avoid discrimination.’”

(Blue Cliff Record, case 59, BDK ed, p 277)

Also:

'Actually, it is not hard to reach enlightenment if you do not grasp or reject. The poem encourages us to practice without attachment. As soon as you become attached to something, you lose the direction of the method.'

(Faith in Mind: A Guide to Ch'an Practice by Sheng Yen, p 99)

Furthermore:

'Negations of being and nonbeing are not expressions of a belief in a substantial, eternal being and in an annihilationist, nihilistic nonbeing. To take being as being leads one to take nonbeing as nonbeing. But to perceive dharmas without attachment to nonbeing is to discern the reality-mark of dharmas: in this manner, though one perceives being, one does so without grasping to marks. Since the dharma-marks thus perceived are markless marks, the mind of the sage is established in that which has no location.'

(Essays of Sengzhao, ch 1, in Three Short Treatises, BDK ed, p 63)

And:

'The faults of mental afflictions that torment
Due to false knowledge do not arise
To those who understand the meaning
Of conceptualizations of real and unreal entities.
If one possesses a locus,
One becomes attached or detached;
But the great beings who're devoid of locus,
They have neither attachment nor detachment.'

(<https://www.tibetanclassics.org/html-assets/SixtyStanzas.pdf>, v 57-58)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 15th, 2020 at 9:27 PM

Title: Re: What is zen to you?

Content:

FlareStar said:

How does that relate to black and white? Where is the connection? I see a headache and a lack of understanding being asserted in the case. How would you reconcile that with "apart from assertion and denial"?

Astus wrote:

Where is assertion and denial in black and white? Is black a yes and white a no, or the other way around? No matter what, things are as they are, so no need to complicate them. To put it in simpler terms,

'Where your mind stops for a moment, this is called the bodhi tree, [the site of enlightenment]. Your mind being unable to stop is called the tree of ignorance. There is nowhere that ignorance abides; it has no beginning and no end. If from moment to moment your mind cannot stop [its deluded stream of consciousness], then you climb the tree of ignorance. Then you enter among the various kinds of beings in the six planes of existence to wear fur on your body and horns on your head. If you can manage to stop, this is the body and realm of purity. If you are unborn for a moment, then you climb the tree of enlightenment.'

(The Recorded Sayings of Linji, in Three Chan Classics, BDK ed, p 34-35)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 19th, 2020 at 4:43 PM

Title: Re: Recommended commentary on the Shurangama Sutra that's not by Ven.

Hsuan Hua?

Content:

nomono said:

Are there not other Masters/teachers that have written about this sutra?

Astus wrote:

The only other translation with some commentary in English that I know of is by Charles Luk http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/surangama.pdf.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 20th, 2020 at 4:19 AM

Title: Re: Recommended commentary on the Shurangama Sutra that's not by Ven.

Hsuan Hua?

Content:

nomono said:

Do you know if there are similar sutras like the Shurangama sutra that teach about the same concepts like True vs. False Mind etc.?

Astus wrote:

You might like the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sutra_of_Perfect_Enlightenment that is available in several translations (http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/sutra_of_perfect_enlightenment.html, <https://bdkamerica.org/product/apocryphal-scriptures/>, <http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra49.html>, <http://www.buddhistische-gesellschaft-berlin.de/downloads/sutraofcompleteenlightenment.pdf>) and there are two commentaries as well (<https://books.google.com/books?id=GVeLJ16emHUC>, <https://books.google.com/books?id=qYHFAQAAQBAJ>). There's also the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Vajrasamadhi-sutra> available online (by <http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra53a.html>), and there's a commentary too (by <https://books.google.com/books?id=LY4BEAAAQBAJ>). While not a sutra, you should take a look at the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Awakening_of_Faith_in_the_Mahayana#:~:text=Awakening%20of%20Faith%20in%20the%20Mah%C4%81y%C4%81na%20%28reconstructed%20Sanskrit%20title%3A%20Mah%C4%81y%C4%81na,a%20text%20of%20Mahayana%20Buddhism., also available online (<https://bdkamerica.org/product/the-awakening-of-faith/>, http://www.acmuller.net/download/LaiWhalen_Awakening-of-Faith.pdf, <https://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/taf/index.htm>, <https://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/aof/index.htm>), plus a very new translation (<https://books.google.hu/books?id=EjGoDwAAQBAJ>) and there are some commentaries (<https://books.google.hu/books?id=h6RNAQAAMAAJ>, <https://books.google.hu/books?id=JvYKAAAAYAAJ>).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 20th, 2020 at 3:14 PM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

FiveSkandhas said:

What I find somewhat challenging is the question of "apocryphal" texts and certain texts that could pose challenges to other texts. There is also the postmodern scholar's tendency to view doctrine as the child of economics or power politics. Too much Foucault gets tossed around.

Astus wrote:

Although there has been a significant growth of studies during the last few decades that showed how most of the important elements of Chan/Zen self-presentation as a "special transmission" is fabricated (and worse, fabricated with ill intentions), I have not seen anyone trying to answer that challenge, but rather things seem to continue as if such academic works did not exist at all. Although it might be that some in Japanese/Korean/Chinese academics try to work out a response. Not that it's anything new, after all, attacking the validity of the lineage was the tactics of both Tiantai and the various Chan factions.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 20th, 2020 at 3:48 PM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Malcolm said:

All Buddhist sūtras and tantras are apocryphal, all of them, including the Pali Canon, etc., from a western scholastic point of view.

Astus wrote:

If the scriptures are viewed in a historical perspective, then there is still the matter of earlier and later materials. Furthermore, what are often called the Early Buddhist Texts necessarily form the fundamental doctrines, therefore anything of a later date is measured against those to see where they accord or diverge from them. It should also be recognised that the early texts do show a mostly coherent set of views and practices, so it's not like that just because there is no direct record of the Buddha talking then anything goes. While valid reasoning and direct perception should be the first points of reference, it is the harmony with the early texts that any later work can be called buddhavacana, as advised by <https://suttacentral.net/dn16/en/sujato#dn16:4.4.7>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 20th, 2020 at 7:49 PM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Malcolm said:

Western, settler-colonialist, historical perspective... I prefer the indigenous perspectives, which are many, varied, and don't necessarily accept this idea of "earlier" and "later" texts.

Astus wrote:

Wouldn't that result in an unnecessary isolation from the reasoning and arguments of modern scholarship in favour of other arguments that also claim to be based on reason? Just as it's been the practice of past teachers to address and respond to the views and doctrines of their own times, shouldn't that be followed today as well, especially in the field of Buddhist studies? Of course, this is not to say that everyone should occupy themselves with such matters, but at least some level of recognition of the need to be able to communicate Buddhism on the highest levels of human intellectual culture of our times would be beneficial.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 20th, 2020 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Malcolm said:

What do the reasoning and arguments of buddhologists have to with buddhahood or the accounts of our own tradition? Why is it necessary to adopt a settler-colonialist perspective, which is foreign to Buddhadharma as a whole, as the measure by which we take stock of our own schools?

Astus wrote:

There is a shared field in the accounts of past events, where the traditional story says one thing, and historical documents say another, like in the case of <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Moheyan>. Furthermore, the very concept that one relies on a tradition - i.e. something transmitted to the present through past generations - invokes the assumption of validation through history. Only when authenticity is independent of the reliability of one's perception of history could it be said that verification of past events is irrelevant. Such freedom from historical constraints is said to be the quality of the Dharma, that it is readily visible (saṃdṛṣṭika) and timeless (akālika). The words of the Buddha are necessarily from the past transmitted to the present, therefore not free from historical circumstances, but the meaning delivered through them is immaterial, so while it is the meaning that matters more, it cannot be wholly removed from the words themselves.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 21st, 2020 at 3:16 AM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Genjo Conan said:

What would an "answer to that challenge" look like, for you?

Astus wrote:

Looking at the history of Chan, there were times of growth and times of decline. For instance, the current state of Soto Zen is a result of reforms that happened in the 18th (as a summary: <https://nirc.nanzan-u.ac.jp/nfile/2548>) and 19th (Meiji reforms) centuries. What might be a way to avoid the issue of lineage histories being fictional is a return to a more open view of Zen that is not apart from the sutras and other texts but rather co-existent with them.

Genjo Conan said:

I have a graduate degree in history, so it's not like I'm against the practice, but I don't believe that scholarship ought to dictate faith. They're separate spheres.

Astus wrote:

You might like this one: http://www.acmuller.net/articles/zen_and_scholarship-bulgyohak.html

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 21st, 2020 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

You can just look at the world of textual criticism of this sort ("Early Buddhism" is one of the best examples) to see that it quickly becomes a treasure hunt of sorts, and rarely brings people to actually practicing. To me, that is evidence enough that this approach is one that is only peripherally valuable to Dharma practice. Peripheral value like that has its place, but once it becomes central it ceases to be Dharma practice.

Astus wrote:

I find <https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/en/personen/analayo.html> a great example of being both a scholar and practitioner, and actually using both areas to support the other.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 21st, 2020 at 2:51 PM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Malcolm said:

Who says they are fictional? On what basis are these claims for the fictionality of Chan lineages made? What assumptions drive such claims of inauthenticity?

Astus wrote:

It is based on documents available from various eras, many of them from the Dunhuang caves, that show how the list of Indian patriarchs developed to its current form through a century of changes, and there are also the developments of the first six patriarchs of China, and how eventually Huineng was accepted as the sixth. Just that is already enough to show how the very basis of an unbroken lineage from the Buddha is fictional. Is there some conspiracy or bad intention to discredit the lineage claims? I don't see where or how, since they are not made by competing communities, unlike what happened when the position of the sixth patriarch was still debated, or when Chan groups had to establish themselves as legitimate, or when one Chan lineage claim was put against the other.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 21st, 2020 at 2:58 PM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

You don't need to be a complete literalist either, but believing that the spiritual significance of your scriptures is basically bunk can't be good for one's practice.

Astus wrote:

I don't think that the value of the scriptures depend on believing in their attribution to the historical person of Shakyamuni, therefore it cannot cause problems whether they were actually stated by him or not. At the same time, to see a historical evolution of the scriptures and Buddhism in general can serve as an organising principle that does not downgrade one group and elevate another, thus providing a more open view of the whole of the received traditions than any interpretation limited to one specific school.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 21st, 2020 at 3:08 PM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Genjo Conan said:

Dogen wrote favorably about the Lotus Sutra.

Astus wrote:

That Soto Zen takes Dogen as the standard source is itself a result of Menzan Zuiho's efforts, who based his reformation on the works of Dogen, that is, what is now understood as correct transmission is established on written sources, and not what was passed down as the "living tradition". Such a recognition of textual materials is what is missing.

Genjo Conan said:

Words and letters themselves can't ultimately convey the buddhadharma, but that doesn't mean that Zen denies the utility of words and letters; rather, they're necessary but not sufficient.

Astus wrote:

If by ultimate conveyance you mean the need of personal realisation, of course, that is how it's always been. However, if you mean that the sutras are not representative of the complete teachings of the Buddha, and there must be another source of the teachings - in other words, a special transmission of an unbroken lineage of ancestors - then there are problems.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 21st, 2020 at 3:56 PM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Malcolm said:

Who says they are fictional? On what basis are these claims for the fictionality of Chan lineages made? What assumptions drive such claims of inauthenticity?

Astus wrote:

From <https://beingwithoutself.org/jeff/>, a Rinzai Zen teacher and a professor at Hanazono University:

'Why, and from where, did the lineage-transmission legend arise? As Zen begins to take root in the West many Zennists naturally are attracted to this myth; some even naively believe it is literally true. They think that obtaining accouterment associated with lineage transmission somehow proves their Zen is authentic. Perhaps it just reflects a fundamental lack of awakening. A brief review of the historical development of the lineage-transmission legend will dispel some of the preposterous misconceptions surrounding it.

In the early Tang dynasty, a good 1,300 years ago, not just Zen, but other Buddhist schools were under pressure to at least prove their legitimacy, at best gain position and prestige from the vying political powers. The Chinese T'ien-t'ai [Jp.: Tendai] school was active in this before the nascent "Ch'an" or Zen school was. In spite of the "Separate transmission apart from scripture, Not depending on words and letters" rhetoric, as already mentioned, the "Zen school" had relied on sutras — The Lankavatara Sutra in the transmission from Bodhidharma to the second patriarch, and later The Diamond Sutra. But by the eighth century attempts were made to trace back directly to Shakamuni through a spiritual lineage-transmission.

In short, various "Zen groups" then created a number of conflicting lineage transmission charts to try and gain legitimacy. These lineage charts were based on imperial cult lineage and modified Confucian ancestor worship. A "Buddha-family Line" was created to try and show that the present possessor was a direct spiritual descendent of Shakamuni. By tracing oneself back directly to Shakamuni rather than just to statements in a sutra, one could come out superior to the other Buddhist schools, and to other "illegitimate" lineages within the Zen school. Just as the emperor was the ruler over this world, the Zen patriarch was to be considered the ruler over the spiritual realm. What we now naively view as "genuine" transmission-lineages in Zen Buddhism are largely dependent on vagaries of history and social-political plays for power. The pivotal figure is Katakū Jinne [Ho-tsê Shên-hui 670-762]. In an attempt to make himself the seventh patriarch, Jinne mounted an attack on the so-called "northern school" of Zen and argued forcefully for the legitimacy of his "southern school." Using the obscurity of his teacher, now universally known as "the sixth patriarch," to advantage, he based his attack on a strict patriarchal succession that he created, based on imperial cult lineage. Although the actual teachings of the two schools were virtually the same, Jinne denounced the teachings of the northern school. One of the reasons for his success was that he raised a huge amount of money — for military purposes — by selling a great number of ordination certificates in state-sponsored ceremonies.'

(<https://beingwithoutself.files.wordpress.com/2011/07/sourceofzenwhotransmitswhat.pdf>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 21st, 2020 at 4:20 PM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Zhen Li said:

When need to see, for instance, and come to terms with the fact that much of what is considered Theravāda is extremely late and is full of statements such as how the Buddha is non-human, and the earliest collections of manuscripts that we know of include Mahāyāna texts alongside Śrāvakayāna texts.

Astus wrote:

The various historical layers within the Pali Canon is readily recognised, not to mention post-canonical works. So there is a clear difference between current Theravada (Mahavihara) orthodoxy and what can be known of the so called pre-sectarian literature.

Zhen Li said:

History shouldn't guide our practice, not just because that's not how religiosity works for most people (as Johnny Dangerous put quite well), but because, as with all fields of science, it's always changing and is a matter of interpretation. The Dharma needs to be something we know to be true, whereas history is something we can suppose to be true.

Astus wrote:

Historical concerns are not foreign to the various traditions, as each have stated a version of its past. Simply dismissing research into Buddhist history is an option of course, but that seems to be driven by fear of losing something. Scriptures serve as a guide, but the Dharma is realised in one's own experience. Even if it is accepted that none of the Abhidharma works, and none of the Mahayana sutras can be attributed to Shakyamuni, it does not mean that they are wrong. As Vasubandhu noted (The Universal Vehicle Discourse Literature, p 8), 'even if the universal vehicle was taught by some enlightened being other (than Sākyamuni Buddha), that also proves it to be buddha-word, since a buddha is anyone who becomes perfectly enlightened and then teaches such (a vehicle).'

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 22nd, 2020 at 4:15 AM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Malcolm said:

The notion of lineages was carried from India to Tibet, China, and Central Asia by subcontinental Buddhists, principally by Vajrayana practitioners such as Amoghavajra, but also monastic abbots.

Astus wrote:

Śubhakarasiṃha arrived in Chang'an in 716 (Esoteric Buddhism and the Tantras in East Asia, p 340), a couple of years after the first known record of a Chan lineage (epitaph of Faru 法如, 638-689, see Northern School and the Formation of Early Ch'an Buddhism, p 43-44, 85-86). However, the 'first lineage claim in Chinese Buddhism, made at some point between 607 and 632, predates the emergence of the Chan school; it appears in an early seventh-century work by Guanding 灌頂 (561–632), a disciple of the great Zhiyi 智顗 (538–597), revered by the Tiantai tradition as its founder.' (The Power of Patriarchs, p 33)

Malcolm said:

Holding up western historiography as the pinnacle of human intellectual culture is basically racist. Thus kind of historiography erases indigenous traditions and sensibilities because it is predicated on dominance, as I mentioned before. So it is to be resisted because it is harmful to our tradition, since this kind of historiography insists that only one set of facts can be accepted.

Astus wrote:

Japan has been the leader in (East Asian) Buddhist studies throughout the 20th century, so I don't know why call it 'Western', plus it was not called the pinnacle of human intellectual culture. By the 'highest levels' in my <https://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=555923#p555923> I merely referred to what is currently accepted in general as the source of reliable knowledge, not only in Western countries, but globally. But if you consider academic research a threat, then it might be needed to come up with a viable defence.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 22nd, 2020 at 4:22 AM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Zhen Li said:

He too cannot really be hemmed in by history. If we think of everything in positivist terms, then religiosity has no meaning beyond surface levels and we turn our practice into a glorified Stephen Bachelor-esque secular Buddhism. The world that we are perceiving is a result of our karma, and it is illusion. If we take it's material too seriously then we certainly will interfere with our practice and faith.

Astus wrote:

That seems to imply to me that Buddhism can exist only apart from what is seen by most as the real world, that is, the realm of conventional truths. However, I think that it poses no problem if Shakyamuni is viewed as a historical person, and Buddhism as a tradition maintained by actual human beings over the centuries, because it does not diminish the validity of the transmitted and realised Dharma. On the other hand, setting it into an unreachable dimension may hurt the possibility of it being accepted as a truth for humans.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 22nd, 2020 at 4:32 AM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Genjo Conan said:

Could you rephrase this, please? I can't tell if you're asserting that Soto Zen does or does not recognize textual materials.

Astus wrote:

What I mean is to see the scriptures and texts as valid and 'sufficient' sources, for instance because that is what actually happened within the Soto tradition that was itself defined based on centuries old written materials.

Genjo Conan said:

Maybe you could set forth what you think the transmission is and what it signifies in Zen, because I'm not sure we're on the same page.

Astus wrote:

Transmission in Zen can mean several things, from pure bureaucratic paperwork to pure transcendental wisdom and anything in between. The main point is, however, that the teachings are transmitted in words, and the Buddha's words are what one can find in the sutras, just as what one can know about the teachings of Dogen are in his writings and the records of his speeches. Realisation, on the other hand, is not something handed over but individually attained.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 22nd, 2020 at 5:46 PM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Malcolm said:

Monastic lineage lists certainly predate even these, that as my point.

Astus wrote:

There are two early sources that served as the inspiration for the creation of special lineages: Huiyuan's (334–416) preface to the Dharmatrata-dhyana Sutra (Damoduoluo chan jing 達摩多羅禪經, https://web.archive.org/web/20160304103638/http://ibc.ac.th/faqing/files/English_Translation_ofBuddhabhadra_Meditation_Sutra.pdf) and the Fu fazang yinyuan zhuan 付法藏因緣傳 ("History of the Transmission of the Dharma-Storehouse," a lineage history of the Indian Buddhist patriarchs, purportedly translated in 472 by Kiṅkara (d.u.) and Tanyao (fl. 450–490) of the Northern Wei dynasty, but now known to be an indigenous Chinese composition, in six rolls.' - The Princeton Dictionary of Buddhism, p 307), as summarised by Morrison in The Power of Patriarchs, p 23-27.

However, it should be clear that what was created in China as special lineages are qualitatively different from the common understanding that monastics are heirs of the Buddha, and it was meant to set apart a unique group of people who wield more authority than ordinary monks, eventually resulting in the system of public monasteries bound to lineage members and under the direct control of the imperial court (see: How Zen Became Zen, p 39).

Malcolm said:

The Japanese have annihilated their own indigenous Buddhist tradition by falling the notion that there can only be a single set of facts, and those are known through textual analysis.

Astus wrote:

Reforms in Zen based on textual sources happened in the 18th century in Japan, and in the 17th century in China, without any modern influence of historiography.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 22nd, 2020 at 5:47 PM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Malcolm said:

You seem to miss the point of what such empiricism erases, how it salts the soil of tradition, out of which nothing will grow.

Astus wrote:

Please elaborate then.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 22nd, 2020 at 11:23 PM

Title: Re: Saving all beings, ultimate or conventional goal?

Content:

seeker242 said:

If no one can purify another, then how can you even save anyone?

Astus wrote:

"Good friends, now that we have done the repentances, I will express for you the four great vows. You should all listen closely: the sentient beings of our own minds are limitless, and we vow to save them all. ...

Good friends, why don't we all say [simply] 'sentient beings are limitless, and we vow to save them all'? How should we say it? Certainly it's not me who's doing the saving!

Good friends, the 'sentient beings of our own minds' are the mental states of delusion, confusion, immorality, jealousy, and evil. All these are sentient beings, and we must all [undergo] automatic salvation of the self-nature. This is called true salvation.

What is 'automatic salvation of the self-nature'? It is to use correct views to save the sentient beings of false views, afflictions, and stupidity within our own minds. Having correct views, we may use the wisdom of prajñā to destroy the sentient beings of stupidity and delusion, automatically saving each and every one of them. When the false occurs, it is saved by the correct. When delusion occurs, it is saved by enlightenment. When stupidity occurs, it is saved by wisdom. When evil occurs, it is saved by good.

Salvation such as this is called true salvation."

(Platform Sutra, ch 6, BDK ed, p 48-49)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 23rd, 2020 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Malcolm said:

The notion of lineage is found in all Buddhist schools in India, and was carried to Tibet, China, etc., from there. Inconsistencies in the record do not indicate that such lineages are fictions, the central point of your contention.

Astus wrote:

If so, could you point to some sources specifying lineages of Dharma?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 23rd, 2020 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Malcolm said:

Well, If you read Tibetan, you could read Lama Dampa's Sonam Gyaltzen's record of lineages for Vinaya, Abhidharma, Pramana, Bodhisattva vows, etc., and so on, as well as lineages Vajrayāna lineages, you name it,

Astus wrote:

Anything about a thousand years before him, just to see how the concept of Dharma lineages already existed in various Indian schools?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 23rd, 2020 at 5:57 PM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Malcolm said:

As you know, there has been massive destruction of texts in India and China. But the Theravada chronicle of ordinations is illustrative.

Astus wrote:

There are a few examples of a lineage, although in two different senses. The Theravada account is about how the Dharma was faithfully transmitted, while in North India there were the five (or more) Dharmacaryas (Mahākaśyapa, Ānanda, Maḍhyāntika, Śāṇakavāsin, Upagupta) as preserved for instance in the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ashokavadana> (one of its Chinese translations: <https://bdkamerica.org/product/the-biographical-scripture-of-king-asoka/>), and that list is reflected (with some changes) in the final version of the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Zen_lineage_charts#The_Indian_Lineage_From_Shakyamuni_to_Bodhidharma, although, as noted before, it was copied from a different source.

The fictional nature of the lineage already shows in the above, since those teachers revered among Sarvastivadins and others had practically nothing to do with Mahayana, much less Zen. The Indian ancestors in Zen were gradually "zennified" and got transmission verses and Zen-style dialogues attributed to them (e.g. https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/denkoroku/pdf/CHAPTER_FOUR.pdf). Also, the significance of the lineage in Zen is quite specific. What is transmitted in Zen is not something in the scriptures, not anything verbal, but the very buddha-mind itself - in a figurative sense, as a reference to the recognition of enlightenment of the disciple - making every recipient an equal of Shakyamuni himself. In McRae's words (Seeing Through Zen, p 4):

'Chan does not define itself as being one among a number of Buddhist schools based on a particular scripture (such as the Tiantai [Tendai] school with its emphasis on the Lotus Sutra, for example). Instead, Chan texts present the school as Buddhism itself, or as the central teaching of Buddhism, which has been transmitted from the seven Buddhas of the past to the twenty-eight Indian patriarchs, the six Chinese patriarchs, and all the generations of Chinese and Japanese Chan and Zen masters that follow. (Bodhidharma occupies a pivotal position as both the twenty-eighth Indian and first Chinese patriarch.) It took several centuries for this entire schema to be developed; the earliest building blocks appeared at the very end of the seventh century, and the complete system was published perhaps as early as 801 but certainly by the year 952.'

Beyond the Indian ancestors the events surrounding the identity of the sixth (and the seventh) patriarch is something about what there are multiple historical sources, showing the disagreement among factions wanting to claim the ultimate authority to themselves.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 23rd, 2020 at 6:04 PM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Sure, let me find my Official Vajrayana Lineage chart (tm), authorized and signed by Vajradhara.

Astus wrote:

There are actually such official lineage certificates in Zen. Here's one place you can order the template for it: <https://www.tera-mura.co.jp/ketimyaku.htm>

You can also watch a grand Dharma transmission ceremony

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=QpWjRRTwERk> where "Venerable Master Hsing Yun transmitted the symbols of Dharma lineage: chanting beads, a Dharma scroll, and a kasaya to 72 disciples of the 49th generation Linji School" (<http://fgsihb.org/dictionary-info.asp?id=7357>).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 23rd, 2020 at 10:31 PM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Malcolm said:

These three qualities are inherent in Vajrayana, for example, and also in Vinaya.

Astus wrote:

Since Vajrayana couldn't have been much of a source for Zen, it is the Vinaya part that should be looked into. The Vinaya prescribes novice training, but after the first five years a monk is independent. Dharma transmission is not like that, it is not a training, but a confirmation of enlightenment. The Zen lineage represents a series of awakened patriarchs who embody the totality of the Dharma. From this it should be clear that it is not like Vajrayana either.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 24th, 2020 at 5:13 AM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Malcolm said:

Your guru represents the totality of the Dharma, as it is said, "the guru is the Buddha...the Dharma...and the Sangha.

Astus wrote:

How does that relate to Dharma transmission in Zen? It's not taught that one should cultivate that sort of devotion as in Vajrayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 24th, 2020 at 4:49 PM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

the need of a teacher to directly transmit a particular state to one "mind to mind" is.

Astus wrote:

There is nothing actually transmitted, it is rather the confirmation, the certification of what one has already attained. A classic example of this is the story of https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Yongjia_Xuanjue 永嘉玄覺 in chapter 7 of the Platform Sutra, where he is also named "one night Jue" (一宿覺), as he spent only one night at the Sixth Patriarch's place. He was already enlightened after reading the Vimalakirti Sutra, but when he met Xuance 玄策, he was told that he must visit the patriarch in order for his enlightenment to be verified (zheng 證, also the first word of his famous poem Zhengdaoge 證道歌), and so he did and spent there a single night.

Johnny Dangerous said:

It lines with Vajrayana in that (for instance) introduction to the state of Shikantaza isn't something you can just get through concepts and reading alone (much less the academic study of some version of history), but requires some form of direct transmission. Thus, lineage is still a living thing rather than a historical artifact.

Astus wrote:

If there were something passed down, Zen would be like any other school preserving the teachings of the Buddha.

Pei Xiu asked, "If they transmit the mind to each other, then why do you say that the mind is nonexistent?"

The master answered, "Not attaining a single dharma is what is called 'transmitting the mind.' If you understand this mind, then there is no mind and no dharma."

Pei Xiu asked, "If there is no mind and no dharma, then why do you call it ‘transmission’?”

The master replied, “The moment you hear me say, ‘transmit the mind,’ you presume there is something to be attained. This is why a patriarch said,

The moment you recognize the nature of the mind,
you can say only that it is inconceivable.

Perfectly clear, there is nothing to be attained.

Once you get it, you won’t say you have any such understanding.

If I tried to teach you this, how would you ever be able to handle it?”

(Essentials of Transmitting the Mind-Dharma, ch 11, tr Buswell & Kim, in A Bird in Flight Leaves No Trace)

The Sixth Patriarch told the assembly, “I have a single thing that is nameless and unlettered. Do you know it?” Chan master Shenhui came forth and said, “It is the original source of the buddhas and is my Buddha-nature.”⁶⁰ This is the reason he was regarded as an illegitimate son of the Sixth Patriarch. Chan master Huairang came from Mt. Song, and the Sixth Patriarch asked him, “What thing came like this?” Huairang was at a loss. After eight years had passed he then approved himself, saying, “If I say a thing then I miss the mark.” This is why he is considered the legitimate son of the Sixth Patriarch.

(Seonga gwigam, ch 1, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 3, p 51-52)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 24th, 2020 at 5:15 PM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Malcolm said:

You asserted, “ The Zen lineage represents a series of awakened patriarchs who embody the totality of the Dharma.”

How is the above different from your assertion? The guru also embodies the lineage.

Astus wrote:

Right, in that sense, no difference.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 24th, 2020 at 5:18 PM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Ok, that’s quite semantic in this context, you can call it a transmission or simply a revealing or pointing out...doesn’t much matter in the context in which we are discussing it - the method of said revealing is part of the living lineage.

Astus wrote:

But it's not a revelation, not a pointing out, but the certification of what is already realised. As you could see from Xuanjue's example, he was already awakened without meeting a single Zen teacher.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 24th, 2020 at 5:22 PM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Genjo Conan said:

I don't know why we would assume this to be true: the Zhenyan school was extremely influential in China during the Tang dynasty, and was transmitted to Japan as the Shingon school in the early 9th Century, where it also became influential. Different Ch'an and Zen lineages adopted various esoteric practices as a result, some of which are still practiced. For example, the <https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/practice/sutra/scriptures.html> contains several dharani. Unless by Vajrayana you mean specifically Tibetan traditions.

Astus wrote:

See <https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=540377#p540377> based on the collection Esoteric Buddhism and the Tantras in East Asia.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 25th, 2020 at 4:19 PM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Nonetheless, it still requires some sort of transport mechanism for the teachings, and it comes through people, not reading of texts, though of course those are utilized.

Astus wrote:

The transport mechanism of the teachings is what the Buddhist community is for in general, keeping alive by upholding and passing on the Dharma and the Vinaya. That's not what Zen is about, it is not the Zen lineage, hence it is called a 'special transmission outside the teachings' (jiao-wai bie-chuan 教外別傳; see Welter's analysis of this slogan <https://terebess.hu/zen/mesterek/Koan-Welter.pdf>). It's mentioned in the 'https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Flower_Sermon', as it appears in Wumen's 無門 collection:

In ancient times, at an assembly on Spirit Mountain, the World Honored One [the Buddha] held up a flower and showed it to those gathered there.

Everyone in the assembly was silent at that moment. Only the Venerable Kasyapa cracked a slight smile.

The World Honored One said, "I have the treasury of the Eye of the Correct Dharma, the wondrous mind of nirvana, the real formless subtle gate to Reality, the special transmission outside the scriptural teachings that does not establish texts [as sacred], I entrust it to Mahakasyapa."

(Wumen's Gate, case 6, in Three Chan Classics, BDK ed, p 76;

https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T48n2005_p0293c12)

To illustrate further:

For a long time Yaoshan did not enter the hall to speak.

The temple director said to him, "The monks have been waiting for a long time for the master to give them some instruction."

Yaoshan said, "Ring the bell!"

The monks assembled in the hall.

Yaoshan then got down from the Dharma seat and went back to the abbot's quarters.

The temple director followed him and said, "Master, since you consented to speak to the monks, why didn't you say anything?"

Yaoshan said, "Sutras have sutra teachers. Shastras have shastra teachers. Why are you unhappy with me?"

(Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 124-125)

Because the Master was conducting a memorial feast for Yün-yen, a monk asked, "What teaching did you receive while you were at Yün-yen's place?"

The Master said, "Although I was there, I didn't receive any teaching."

"Since you didn't actually receive any teaching, why are you conducting this memorial?" asked the monk.

"Why should I turn my back on him?" replied the Master.

"If you began by meeting Nan-ch'üan, why do you now conduct a memorial feast for Yün-yen?" asked the monk.

"It is not my former master's virtue or Buddha Dharma that I esteem, only that he did not make exhaustive explanations for me," replied the Master.

(Record of Dongshan, p 28, tr Powell)

Johnny Dangerous said:

so far what you are presenting is not unique, and I don't understand what point you are trying to make.

Astus wrote:

The point is that where the Zen lineage is fictional is not related to the ordinary Sangha activities and the regulations of the Vinaya, but to a concept of transmission going back to Shakyamuni that is claimed to be historically valid by the tradition but shown on many levels by modern scholarship to be written and rewritten by various people in China over many centuries, thus it is one of the conflicts between the religious and the academic perspectives.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 25th, 2020 at 4:24 PM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Genjo Conan said:

In any event, again, lineage is central to many if not all Buddhist schools, so I'm unclear as to why Zen's insistence on its importance would hang on what Vajrayana schools do one way or the other.

Astus wrote:

The Zen lineages (i.e. the system of Dharma transmission) have apparently nothing to do with Vajrayana. See also the <https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=556342#p556342> on how lineage in Zen is something other than what is understood by others.

This article by Bodiford is also recommended:

<https://terebess.hu/zen/mesterek/Bodiford-transmission-ZenRitual.pdf>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 26th, 2020 at 6:22 AM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Genjo Conan said:

I understand you to be asserting that there is something unique about Zen's approach to lineage and transmission, but I'm not clear about where you think the uniqueness lies.

Astus wrote:

Do you know other schools where lineage means not the transmission of a method or doctrine, but those confirmed as awakened (it is the nature of this confirmation that can have a variety of meanings)?

'If we did not rely on a teacher's certification, there would be those who, not having experienced realization, would nevertheless claim they had, and those who, not having this certification, would claim they possessed it. If these people then delude others who seek the Dharma, they end up destroying the Right Law. With this certification former buddhas could foresee future buddhas, former teachers could recognize future enlightened students. People are not certified at random. People who come to inquire about the teaching are thoroughly scrutinized, and only people with understanding that is in agreement with the Right Law receive certification. This is what is called transmission.'

(Mud and Water: A Collection of Talks by the Zen Master Bassui, p 70)

'Only a real master—someone who has received confirmation from a qualified teacher—can determine whether someone has clarified the true Dharma. If we trace the line of qualified teachers back through each generation to the time of Shakyamuni himself, we see that this very continuity can rightly be called “the life of Zen Buddhism.”' (Zen: The Authentic Gate by Koun Yamada, ch 7)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 26th, 2020 at 5:40 PM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Malcolm said:

The tulku tradition, and also the notion of "lineage holders" in Tibetan Buddhism.

Astus wrote:

Tulkus are nominated mostly when they're children, and then they receive their education. As for lineage holders, is there actually a process of making that a qualification? Isn't it rather an expression meaning someone who knows the teachings of a lineage? So, neither of them seem to be like what goes on in Zen. For instance, to make it like Zen, Milarepa should have at one point told Gampopa that their attainment were the same, and not advise him to keep practising.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 27th, 2020 at 12:11 AM

Title: Re: Academic critiques and slandering the dharma

Content:

Malcolm said:

In many instances, students are told by their Masters they have attained what their master attained. It is quite common, actually.

Astus wrote:

Does that result in a lineage traced back through many generations? Does it authorise the student to pass on the lineage?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 28th, 2020 at 3:56 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan and Mahayana and kshangabhanga of cittas and a self

Content:

Artziebetter1 said:

As far as I know in madhyamika there is no arising or cessation besides nirvana so kshanabhavavada is rejected. however Cittas are moments of consciousness with no permanent atman behind it.

Astus wrote:

Arising and cessation are illusory, it does not matter whether we talk of mind or something else. Chapter 7 of the Mulamadhyamakakarika discusses the topic of arising, abiding, and ceasing, concluding it with:

'Arising and abiding and decay are not established.

Thus compounded things do not exist.

And since compounded things are not established,

How could the uncompounded be established?

Like a dream and like a mirage,

Like a city of gandharvas,

So arising and abiding

And cessation have been taught.'
(MMK 7.33-34, tr Padmakara)

And in the Yuktisastika (v 18-23, tr Thupten Jinpa):

'Those who imputes arising and disintegration
With relation to conditioned things,
They do not understand well the movement
Of the wheel of dependent origination.

That which has originated due to “this” and “that,”
That has not done so as its own being;
And that which has not arisen as its own being,
How can it be called “arisen”?

The tranquility derived from extinction of cause,
This is understood to be a cessation;
That which is not extinguished through its intrinsic nature,
How can that be called an “extinguishment”?

Since there is nothing that arises,
There is nothing that disintegrates;
Yet the paths of arising and disintegration
Were taught [by the Buddha] for a purpose.

By understanding arising, disintegration is understood;
By understanding disintegration, impermanence is understood;
By understanding how to engage with impermanence,
The sublime dharma is understood as well.

Those who understand the dependent origination
To be utterly devoid of arising and disintegration,
Those who have such knowledge will cross
The ocean of samsara of dogmatic views.'

As for momentariness specifically, the Bodhicaryavatara says (9.6-8, tr Padmakara):

'Forms and so forth, which we all perceive,
Exist by general acclaim but not by valid reasoning.
They're false just like, for instance, unclean things
Regarded in the common view as pure.

But that he might instruct the worldly,
Our Protector spoke of “things.”
But these in truth lack even momentariness.
Now if you say it's wrong to claim the momentary as relative,

There is no fault. For momentariness
Is relative for yogis, but for worldly beings, ultimate.
Were it otherwise, the common view
Could fault the yogic insight into corporal impurity.'

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 29th, 2020 at 4:12 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan and Mahayana and kshangabhanga of cittas and a self

Content:

Artziebetter1 said:

This proves that-atleast if you reject theravadan kshanabhangavada

Astus wrote:

Let's not call it a Theravadin doctrine, as their version of momentariness (see e.g. Kathavatthu 22.8, Visuddhimagga XX.24; for more see chapter 17 of The Theravada Abhidharma by Y. Karunadasa, and section I.B of The Buddhist Doctrine of Momentariness by Alexander von Rospatt) is not exactly like those taught by other Abhidharmikas and in the various Mahayana schools.

Artziebetter1 said:

a permanent Citta exists though.a permanent atman is the logical conclusion of this.

Astus wrote:

A permanent consciousness is a rejected and refuted idea in Buddhism. Look at what the Buddha told Sāti when he presented his idea of an eternal mind:

“Silly man, who on earth have you ever known me to teach in that way? Haven’t I said in many ways that consciousness is dependently originated, since consciousness does not arise without a cause? But still you misrepresent me by your wrong grasp, harm yourself, and make much bad karma. This will be for your lasting harm and suffering.”
(<https://suttacentral.net/mn38/en/sujato>)

Artziebetter1 said:

If Kshanabhanga is not true ultimately,then Cittas do not cease or arise,and then there is one enduring Citta or atman.this is a logical conclusion to make.

Astus wrote:

Momentariness is an extension of the teaching of impermanence. What is refuted in Madhyamaka is that momentariness is more than a relative concept, not that it is completely invalid. Just the teaching of impermanence on its own removes any room for an eternal consciousness, then momentariness and emptiness only further clarifies how there is not even the smallest anything to hang on to as real. From this it is not a logical conclusion at all to posit any permanent mind.

Artziebetter1 said:

but we can say that we experience our minds and that it does exist in a concrete sence.

Astus wrote:

Mind is never experienced on its own, there are only instances of being conscious of something. In the above quoted sutta the Buddha states very clearly: 'Consciousness is reckoned according to the specific conditions dependent upon which it arises.', so there are eye-, ear-, nose-, tongue-, body-, and mind-consciousness. No experience stays permanently, this is personally verifiable, so it cannot be claimed that there is an eternal mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 29th, 2020 at 6:07 PM

Title: Re: Dogen refutes view that Zen stories are "beyond logic" or "irrational."

Content:

Astus wrote:

Perhaps using the dichotomy of "rational" and "irrational" (in English) is too much and it can lead to unwanted paths. Better go with in/comprehensible for mu/rie 無/理會 (as in https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/pdf/dharma-eye/hogen09/hogen09_07.htm), as the point is that merely not thinking is not a solution, and that mistake is what is being criticised. As for a modern example of treating Zen teachings, Okumura writes in his commentary to the Mountains and Waters Sutra:

'if we can follow the thread of the teachings from Buddha through Mahāyāna Buddhism and Zen until Dōgen, we can discover the meaning of this wondrous writing for ourselves. We will completely miss the point if we simply read Dōgen and create a fixed philosophy based on our understanding of his writings. If we do that, we create another system of views — another problem. Instead, when we read Dōgen we have to apply his words in our lives, studying the relationship between our self and the myriad things.'

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 30th, 2020 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan and Mahayana and kshangabhangā of cittaś and a self

Content:

Artziebetter1 said:

if the Cittaś are not permanent how can it accumulate karma, vasanas and samskaras etc The mental impressions cannot exist without a permanent receptacle or abode.

Astus wrote:

What is permanent cannot change, therefore it cannot serve as a support for any living being (as living necessarily means change), nor as a basis for accumulating karma, because that too involves change. For the Madhyamaka explanation of how karma is an effective force, Nagarjuna states (MMK 17.31-33, tr Padmakara):

'Just as an illusory form, which Our Teacher emanated
Through the perfection of miraculous power,
Gave rise to yet another magical appearance,

And this in turn produced another,

Likewise, agent and the deed performed
Resemble magical appearances.
They're like illusory forms produced
By what is also an illusion bodied forth.

Defilements, actions, and embodied beings;
Agents and the fruits of action
Are like cities of gandharvas.
They're like mirages and dreams.'

Mabja Jangchub comments in the Ornament of Reason:

'Indeed, we have refuted that any of this possesses a nature, but we have not proved that it is nonexistent in a conventional sense. Neither is it the case that if something lacks nature, it cannot reasonably function at the level of convention. Let us use an example that is accepted by the treatises. The Teacher, the Buddha, the Transcendent Conqueror, creates emanations. These emanations are created in a perfect miracle where one emanation gives rise to a second, the second creates a third, and so forth. Likewise, although the agent has no nature, it is still able to act in terms of convention. Thus, the agent resembles an emanation. Although the act has no nature, it can still be carried out conventionally, just as when one emanation gives rise to another. The same point can be made by means of an example that is in line with worldly consensus. Afflictions such as desire; the virtuous, nonvirtuous, or immovable actions that are motivated by affliction; their resulting physical support (that is, the body); the ineffable self that is the agent of the karmic act; and the ripened, ruled, and concordant effects that are the results of affliction and action—none of this has any nature, and yet conventionally it originates in dependence. It all appears in the same way as a city of scent-eaters, like an illusion and like a dream.'

To further clarify, Wangchuk Dorje wrote (The Karmapa's Middle Way, p 232):

'Followers of the Middle Way do not posit anything connected to the relative truth after analysis, because they do not accept that any phenomenon can withstand analysis. When one analyzes, there is no origination of results from either a cause that has disintegrated or a cause that has not disintegrated. If a result were to originate after its cause had disintegrated, any result could arise from any cause. If results were to originate from a cause that had not disintegrated, no results would depend on conditions.

If you assume that a result arises following the postdisintegration state of its cause, that view entails nihilism: the continuity of the subsequent phenomena would be severed. If you assume that a result arises following its cause which had not disintegrated, that view entails eternalism: all things would have to exist simultaneously. Thus postdisintegration is not a suitable cause for phenomena, nor is nondisintegration. When one analyzes, one cannot posit the connection between causes and results, their support, and so on in any way, including conventionally. Understanding this is the supreme way of this teaching system.'

Artziebetter1 said:

the four great arguments of the middle way are madhyamika arguments and when applied to Citta, posit that a permanent atman exists.

Astus wrote:

If by the four great arguments you mean <https://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/mipham/four-great-logical-arguments>, then you can see that especially the fourth, dependent origination, is what shows how no permanent consciousness is possible. As Aryadeva explained (Catuhsataka 9.202-203, tr Ruth Sonam)

'There is not anywhere anything
That ever exists without depending.
Thus never is there anywhere
Anything that is permanent.

There is no functional thing without a cause,
Nor anything permanent which has a cause.
Thus the one who knows suchness said what has
Come about causelessly does not exist.'

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 2nd, 2020 at 6:32 PM

Title: Re: Difficulty understanding Vijnana/Consciousness

Content:

SleepingTurtle said:

What exactly IS Vijnana/Consciousness?

Astus wrote:

In the Nikayas (Pali suttas) there is no strict terminology for consciousness, so it can mean various aspects, depending on the context. But it should be kept in mind that consciousness does not mean a singular experience, it always occurs with various https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Mental_factors_%28Buddhism%29 (e.g. feeling, perception, intention, contact, attention).

SleepingTurtle said:

From what I understand, it is content associated with what is perceived (psychological trigger), which has has unfulfilled desire/complex in its background?

Astus wrote:

How perception happens is described with the 12 sense-bases and the 18 elements (see a nice summary <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/%C4%80yatana>). So first there are for instance the eye organ and a visual object, from them emerge a visual consciousness, their contact results in a feeling, and this is where there are two options, either there is a dis/liking of the feeling, or not. So, in this model consciousness is not something triggered by previous conditions, but by the meeting of the organ and the object. Although there is a different approach too, described in the twelve links, that shows how consciousness depends on <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sa%E1%B9%85kh%C4%81ra>, and therefore it defines how one eventually reacts to things. It's better not to confuse these two perspectives, even if they are related.

SleepingTurtle said:

If there was nothing in us to be associated with external object, eye-consciousness wouldn't arise and we would be unaffected by what we are seeing.

Astus wrote:

Consciousness does not necessarily involve complications, at least not at first contact, but through the sequential processing of sensory data. However, consciousness is required in order to be basically aware of something occurring, so all three, the object, the organ, and the consciousness are required for there to be any awareness of something.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 2nd, 2020 at 7:05 PM

Title: Re: Which Bhumi is synomous with the Theravad Arahant?

Content:

sapo7 said:

Do we know for sure which Bhumi corresponds to the Theravadin version of Arahantood?

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bh%C5%ABmi_%28Buddhism%29

Astus wrote:

An arahant in Theravada is free from all attachments. In Mahayana only a buddha has that level of freedom.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 3rd, 2020 at 12:05 AM

Title: Re: Which Bhumi is synomous with the Theravad Arahant?

Content:

Malcolm said:

False. The obscuration of affliction is abandoned on the seventh bhumi. Bodhisattvas on the pure stages are also free of attachments.

In the shravaka schools, the difference between an arhat and is Buddha is that the former has nonafflictive ignorance and the latter does not.

Astus wrote:

That's a distinction coming from Sarvastivada that was then used by Mahayana. No such difference exists in Theravada.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 3rd, 2020 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: Which Bhumi is synomous with the Theravad Arahant?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, the Buddha clearly makes this distinction in various suttas found in the Pali canon. So while Theravadins argue there is no difference in bodhi, they do not claim that arhats are party to the same knowledge as a buddha: example, Mogallana had to ask the Buddha where his mother had taken rebirth. Hence, the distinction is recognized in Theravada as well.

Astus wrote:

There can be many differences even among the arahants, depending on what qualities they possess. In what there is no difference between an arahant and a buddha is complete freedom from all attachments. The various special qualities of a buddha are not the result of liberation, but the accumulated merits/paramis, at least in Theravada.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 3rd, 2020 at 5:10 AM

Title: Re: Difficulty understanding Vijnana/Consciousness

Content:

SleepingTurtle said:

When we cognize something, does that cognition/consciousness also serve as trigger for some craving/desire/thirst related to it to arise?

Astus wrote:

Once one is aware of something, one also has a basic feeling (pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral) about it, and then how one acts on that cognition and feeling is where one can form an emotional response, what are categorised as formations in Buddhism, and in that way from consciousness one can arrive at craving towards pleasant things, anger towards unpleasant ones, and carelessness towards things that feel neutral. See this summarised in this speech: <https://suttacentral.net/sn36.3/en/sujato>; and some explanation in <https://www.buddhistinquiry.org/article/the-underlying-tendencies/>.

SleepingTurtle said:

Its because I've read that Buddha taught how our thirst/needs/desires/what we crave actually keep us attached to specific things. Our attention is tied to those desires, be them placed in past or future. What Im saying is, if there is nothing to be associated with Vijnana/Consciousness, then there is no craving/desire to be recalled by it either.

Astus wrote:

So it is. When there are no conceptual and emotional complications of an impression/cognition, that is, when something is not turned into a personal issue, then there is nothing to be hung up on, one is free from pain, stress, and dissatisfaction.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 3rd, 2020 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Difficulty understanding Vijnana/Consciousness

Content:

SleepingTurtle said:

people form fetters by clinging/avoiding things, based on emotional response that arises from contact?

Astus wrote:

The emotional response is what comes from the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Fetter_%28Buddhism%29, or they are the fetters themselves.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2020 at 6:24 AM

Title: Re: Which Bhumi is synonymous with the Theravad Arahant?

Content:

Malcolm said:

This was your assertion, "An arahant in Theravada is free from all attachments. In Mahayana only a buddha has that level of freedom."

This assertion is mistaken.

Astus wrote:

Only buddhas are free from the two obscurations, meaning that even on the 10th bhumi there is some clinging to concepts. Arahants, in Theravada at least, are free from attachment to both physical and mental phenomena, so there is no room for any obscuration.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2020 at 5:28 PM

Title: Re: Which Bhumi is synonymous with the Theravad Arahant?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, there is.

That is why Mogallana had to ask the Buddha where his mother was. That's an obscuration.

Astus wrote:

That is a story in the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Yulanpen_Sutra, the closest event mentioned in the Pali Canon (<https://suttacentral.net/pv14/en/kiribathgoda>) is where Sariputta successfully helps his mother without the assistance of the Buddha. On the other hand, in the <https://suttacentral.net/sn54.9/en/sujato> the Buddha asked Ananda about why 'the mendicant Saṅgha seem so diminished'.

In any case, how do you define an obscuration that can be present without grasping at anything?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2020 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: Which Bhumi is synomous with the Theravad Arahant?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Non-afflictive ignorance satisfies that definition.

Astus wrote:

Since that means grasping at concepts like apprehender-apprehended, and agent-action-object, how would it be free from clinging?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2020 at 8:32 PM

Title: Re: Which Bhumi is synomous with the Theravad Arahant?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Why would clinging be entailed?

Astus wrote:

Because the nonafflictive ignorance of cognitive obscuration is attachment to dharmas (dharmagraha) that is removed by realising their emptiness.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 8th, 2020 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: "think" as buddha-nature

Content:

Viach said:

To recognize buddha-nature one has to "think" as buddha-nature.

Astus wrote:

How does one do that?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 10th, 2020 at 3:21 PM

Title: Re: alaya vs. alaya vijnana

Content:

Malcolm said:

Well, you can read the bodhisattvabhumi for starters, where this distinction is made.

Astus wrote:

Do you have a more specific location of that distinction? A quick search in the translation brought no results to me. Abiding in suchness is what is usually taught in Yogacara.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 15th, 2020 at 6:11 PM

Title: Re: Is there a systematized course of study in Zen Buddhism (Soto)?

Content:

ElenaTheo said:

Is there a systematized course of study that one can follow in Zen Buddhism (Soto)?

Astus wrote:

Not to my knowledge, apart from what they teach at Komazawa University. What you might do is to learn about East Asian Buddhism in general, and then about Soto Zen Buddhism.

For a general introduction to East Asian Buddhism:

<https://hsingyun.org/books/core-teachings/> by Hsing Yun

<https://bdkamerica.org/product/the-sutra-of-queen-srimala-of-the-lions-roar-and-the-vimalakirti-sutra/>

http://www.kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/n6p_book_page.htm

<https://bdkamerica.org/product/three-short-treatises-by-vasubandhu-sengzhao-and-zongmi/>

<https://bdkamerica.org/product/the-awakening-of-faith/> by Āśvaghoṣa

<https://bdkamerica.org/product/the-platform-sutra-of-the-sixth-patriarch/>

For introduction to Soto Zen:

<https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/leaflet/sotozen/index.html>

<https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/leaflet/heartofzen/index.html>

<http://antaiji.org/en/classics/english-zazen-yojinki/>

<https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/leaflet/Zuimonki/index.html>

<https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/denkoroku/index.html>

In book:

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=vNSRQkSACb4C> by Kosho Uchiyama

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=dQDm5oNbKdgC> by Shohaku Okumura

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=dyzRAgAAQBAJ>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=tRfrlTX0ojoC> by Shohaku Okumura

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 22nd, 2020 at 8:00 PM

Title: Re: Samsarically Satisfied?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Is this just a case of, “Dharma ain’t for everybody” ?

Astus wrote:

I think it is rather a matter of presentation. Everyone loves to make a new friend, and nobody loves to lose one (see: <https://suttacentral.net/sn42.11/en/sujato>. Eradicating desires sounds like turning everything dull, making oneself insensate (cf. <https://suttacentral.net/sn35.232/en/sujato>). But if one's told that one can have friends without the pains of craving for them, of fearing for them, then it surely seems like the best possible outcome (see: <https://suttacentral.net/mn25/en/sujato>).

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 22nd, 2020 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: What is the source for the story of the sixth patriarch Huineng destroying sutras?

Content:

Dgj said:

What is the source for the story of the sixth patriarch Huineng destroying sutras?

Astus wrote:

It seems to be the artistic creativity of Liang Kai.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 23rd, 2020 at 6:40 AM

Title: Re: How is shentong different from tirthika doctrine

Content:

Astus wrote:

'There is no Shentong-Madhyamaka nor any need to make one up. The subdivision of Madhyamaka into “self-empty” and “other-empty” is obsolete. ... what is called Shentong is nothing other than the Yogacara (Yoga Practice) system of Maitreya, Asanga, and Vasubandhu, also called “the lineage of vast activity.”'
(Karl Brunnhölzl, in Center of the Sunlit Sky, p 445)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 23rd, 2020 at 4:41 PM

Title: Re: How is shentong different from tirthika doctrine

Content:

Schrödinger’s Yidam said:

But it’s safe to say that what HHK meant—whatever that is—is more authoritative than Brunnhölzl.

Astus wrote:

The more pertinent question is if Shentongpas take the works of Maitreya, Asanga, and Vasubandhu as their primary treatises or something else, because if yes, then they are rightly called Yogacarins.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 23rd, 2020 at 5:04 PM

Title: Re: What is the source for the story of the sixth patriarch Huineng destroying sutras?

Content:

Dgj said:

So he just made it up for no reason?

Astus wrote:

Not no reason but a great expression of not relying on words. And it is a good choice exactly because there is no such story about Huineng.

Dgj said:

What are some other masters destroying sutras or other religious texts like Dahui Zonggao for example?

Astus wrote:

I can recall only incidents where non-canonical writings were destroyed, mostly one's own works. I guess it'd be too much even for Zen anecdotes to talk of such sacreligious acts as destroying scriptures.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 24th, 2020 at 5:29 AM

Title: Re: What is the source for the story of the sixth patriarch Huineng destroying sutras?

Content:

Dgj said:

What are the incidents with non canonical writings you reference?

Astus wrote:

Deshan burned his sutra commentary (Wumenguan case 28), Danxia burned his notes (Original Teachings of Ch'an Buddhism, p 220), Yangshan burned the secret notebook of symbols (Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 186), and as you mentioned, Dahui burned the Blue Cliff Record (Blue Cliff Record, BDK ed, p 6).

'the Three Vehicles' twelve divisions of teachings, are just so much waste paper to wipe off privy filth'

(Record of Linji, p 19, tr Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 25th, 2020 at 6:20 AM

Title: Re: What is the source for the story of the sixth patriarch Huineng destroying sutras?

Content:

Tao said:

Who did burn a buddha statue? I vaguely recall something like this...

Astus wrote:

Danxia Tianran.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 27th, 2020 at 7:58 PM

Title: Re: Study in Zen

Content:

Genjo Conan said:

Taking Dogen as just one example

Astus wrote:

At the end of each volume of the <https://bdkamerica.org/product/shobogenzo-the-true-dharma-eye-treasury-volume-iv/> there is a bibliography of the main Chinese sources quoted by Dogen.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 28th, 2020 at 5:48 PM

Title: Re: Vipassanā

Content:

yeshedronmay said:

Is there a difference between Theravada Vipassana meditation and Kagyu or Tibetan Vipassana meditation practice ?

Astus wrote:

Vipassana is not a single method but a term for any technique that has the aim of gaining insight. In order to be able make a comparison, one would need to be specific about what it is exactly one means. Generally speaking, Theravada and Vajrayana are very far from each other in terms of historical development, so relying simply on terminology used by them can be easily misleading. For instance, there was mention of how 'emptiness of dharmas' is a Mahayana teaching, which is true, but at the same time, it is meant as a rejection of the Vaibhashika interpretation of dharmas, not the Theravada one where dharmas are viewed differently.

Here are two examples you may look into:

<https://mahasivipassana.com/docs/practical-insight-meditation-basic-practice/> by Mahasi Sayadaw

<https://www.lionsroar.com/directly-experience-the-nature-of-mind/> by Khenchen Thrangu Rinpoche

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2020 at 6:38 PM

Title: Re: Zen on sleeping

Content:

Astus wrote:

'While sleeping, lie on your right side, not [on your back] facing straight upward, because this is called the dead man's sleep. Sleeping [with your face down] is called indulgent sleep because it creates bad dreams.'

(The Baizhang Zen Monastic Regulations, BDK ed, p 280)

'When sleeping, the monk should lie on his right-hand side with his head on his right palm and with his left hand placed on his left hip as though carrying a knife.'

(Chanyuan qinggui, in The Origins of Buddhist Monastic Codes in China by Yifa, p 139)

'Definitely sleep lying on your right side and not on your left side. When you lie down your head should be towards buddha. Now [in the monks' hall] our heads are toward the joen, so our heads are toward Manjushri. Do not sleep lying on your front. Do not raise both knees and lie on your back. Do not sleep on your back with your legs crossed. Do not stretch out your legs together.'

(Dogen's Pure Standards for the Zen Community, p 65)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 30th, 2020 at 6:14 PM

Title: Re: The 37 Factors of Enlightenment and Asanga

Content:

Astus wrote:

If it's about a Yogacara explanation of smrtyupasthana, check Mahayanasutralamkara 18/19.43-45 and Madhyantavibhaga 4.1.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 1st, 2020 at 3:47 PM

Title: Re: Vipassanā

Content:

SilenceMonkey said:

From the tibetan point of view, Theravada holds one of the two "lower" tenet systems which believe in material reality as an ultimate truth. ie. The material world can be broken down into atoms, but at some point these "atoms" can no longer be broken down. Therefore, these are seen to be what constitute reality.

Astus wrote:

The shravaka systems in Tibetan Buddhism are what they take to be the views of Vaibhashika and Sautrantika based mainly on the Abhidharmakosha-bhashyam.

Theravada is a separate school, not known/considered in Tibetan doxography, that also disagreed with some doctrines of the Sarvastivadins. As for the Theravada view of material dhammas, the smallest unit according to post-canonical teachings are called https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kalapa_%28atomism%29, they are considered composite, and used in some vipassana meditations: 'To know that our very body is tiny kalapas all in a state of change is to know the true nature of change or decay.'

(<https://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/authors/khin/wheel231.html>).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 2nd, 2020 at 6:21 PM

Title: Re: Vipassanā

Content:

Malcolm said:

Not that different than paramanus, actually.

Astus wrote:

The atomist ideas of Sarvastivada, Sautrantika, and Theravada are analysed by Karunadasa in chapter 15 of https://www.google.co.in/books/edition/The_Theravada_Abhidhamma/a1GBDwAAQBAJ and chapter 8 of https://www.google.co.in/books/edition/The_Buddhist_Analysis_of_Matter/eifADwAAQBAJ. From the former book:

'For the Sarvāstivāda, the atom is the smallest unit of a single unitary material dharma, so small that it has no spatial dimensions. For the Theravāda, the atom is an aggregate of a number of unitary material dhammas. This is why it is described not only as “atom” (paramāṇu) but also as “cluster of material dhammas” (rūpa-kalāpa). It thus corresponds not to the atom of the Sarvāstivāda Abhidharma but to what it calls the “octuple aggregate.” The Theravāda term that corresponds to the “atom” of the Sarvāstivāda is kalāpaṅga — that is, the constituent of a kalāpa.

...

The Pāli commentators observe that although it is possible, for the sake of defining the individuating characteristics (lakkhaṇa), to speak of color, taste, smell, and so on as separate dhammas, yet positionally they are not separable from one another. Color, taste, and so on, so runs the argument, cannot be dissected and separated like particles of sand. The color of the mango, for instance, cannot be separated from its hardness (earth element) or from its taste. This situation is equally true of the constituents of a rūpa-kalāpa as well. Hence there is no necessity, other than logical, to postulate the constituent (kalāpaṅga) as the smallest of all (sabba-pariyantima).'

But I think a more interesting part is that kalapas are meant to be experienced during vipassana practice.

'You observe this structure that initially appears to be so solid, the entire physical structure at the level of sensation. Observing, observing you will reach the stage when you experience that the entire physical structure is nothing but subatomic particles: throughout the body, nothing but kalapas (subatomic particles). And even these tiniest subatomic particles are not solid. They are mere vibration, just wavelets.'

(<https://pariyatti.org/Free-Resources/Articles-and-Excerpts/Buddhas-Path-is-to-Experience-Reality>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 4th, 2020 at 3:51 PM

Title: Re: Zen Mantras

Content:

Astus wrote:

You can find several mantras and dharanis in liturgical texts, like the <https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/practice/sutra/scriptures.html>. A popular set in Chinese Buddhism is the ten small mantras (十小咒):

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?t=235>

<https://thebuddhistmantra.blogspot.com/2018/09/ten-small-mantras-se-siau-cou-or-dasa.html>

Another useful collection of <http://www.sutrasmantras.info/mantra0.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 7th, 2020 at 5:28 PM

Title: Re: Picking and choosing

Content:

CosmosFF said:

If picking and choosing leads to suffering, where is the limit to what is considered picking and choosing?

Astus wrote:

'The Supreme Way is difficult

Only for those who pick and choose.

Simply let go of love and hate;

The Way will fully reveal itself.'

(<http://sunnyvale.ctzen.org/wp-content/uploads/2019/07/trust-in-mind-v1.7.12-20131216.pdf>)

Then the poem continues on explaining that pursuing the <https://suttacentral.net/an8.6/en/sujato> is the wrong path to take, and in that sense one should be free from discrimination. Then it goes on, addressing the root of discrimination, not recognising suchness.

'Gain and loss, fame and disgrace, praise and blame, and pleasure and pain.

These qualities among people are impermanent, transient, and perishable.

A clever and mindful person knows these things, seeing that they're perishable.
Desirable things don't disturb their mind,
nor are they repelled by the undesirable.

Both favoring and opposing are cleared and ended, they are no more.
Knowing the stainless, sorrowless state,
they understand rightly, going beyond rebirth.'
(<https://suttacentral.net/an8.6/en/sujato>)

'The subject disappears with its object,
The object vanishes without its subject.
Objects are objects because of subjects,
Subjects are subjects because of objects.

Know that these two
Are essentially of one emptiness.
The one emptiness unites opposites,
Equally pervading all phenomena.

Not differentiating what is fine or coarse,
How can there be any preferences?'
(<http://sunnyvale.ctzen.org/wp-content/uploads/2019/07/trust-in-mind-v1.7.12-20131216.pdf>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2020 at 8:41 PM

Title: Re: Picking and choosing

Content:

CosmosFF said:

Not neglecting or denying pain or pleasure, not denying that one's mind has thoughts and emotions, but feel no difference when faced with pain. The body can feel pain but with realization of the emptiness it is not seen as "I am hurt" but as "pain is funny". Is this the way? Or am i stupid?

Astus wrote:

'There are two kinds of suffering: i) bodily suffering (kāyika [230a] duḥkha), ii) mental suffering (caitasika duḥkha). By the power of their wisdom (prajñābala), the holy individuals (āryapudgala) have no further mental suffering like sadness (daurmanasya), jealousy (īrṣyā), malice (vyāpāda), etc. On the other hand, because they have received a body composed of the four great elements (mahābhūtamaya) as a result of actions in their previous existences (pūrvajanmakarman), they still have bodily sufferings such as old age (jarā) and sickness (vyādhi), hunger and thirst (kṣutpipāsa), cold and heat (śītoṣṇa), etc., but these bodily sufferings are slight and quite rare.'

(<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-> sastra/d/doc225706.html)

'No mind means that the eight winds cannot move [mind]. Suppose habit energy is not yet exhausted and a thought of anger happens to arise; at that moment have no mind to strike or abuse the other. If a thought of greed happens to arise, at that moment have no mind that prays for acquiring [the coveted object]. Should one see another prosper and become famous, at that moment, have no mind that envies him or seeks to outdo him. At all times in oneself have no mind that is sorrowful or hungry or cold; have no mind that fears being despised by others, up to and including all these sorts of things. We can even call it "lacking all mind." This is called cultivating the path. If you have obtained [the state wherein] toward agreeable and disagreeable sense objects you have no passion or hatred or desire or dislike at all, this is called obtaining the path. Do a reverse illumination on each of these. If you have a disease, apply an antidote. If you have no disease, there is no [need for] a prescription.'

(Chan Prolegomenon, in Zongmi on Chan, p 174)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2020 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: How exactly is there a momentariness of consciousness ?

Content:

Artziebetter1 said:

If one chitta perishes and the next arises, from what does this next chitta arise? in a chain of chittas you would either have to have a chitta perishing and it's subsequent chitta arising from nothingness

Astus wrote:

Arising out of nothing could occur only if there were a gap between moments. Since no such gap is proposed, there is no place for any sort of nothingness to arise from.

You might also check out <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ratnak%C4%ABrti> 's arguments, and https://ahandfulofleaves.files.wordpress.com/2011/12/the-buddhist-doctrine-of-momentariness_vonrospatt.pdf 's book.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2020 at 5:00 AM

Title: Re: How exactly is there a momentariness of consciousness ?

Content:

Artziebetter1 said:

Okay, so do you believe that this new citta is not the same citta/vijnana/alaya as the former? because this type of arising is still arising from other which actually doesn't exist and is still ex nihilo creation?

Astus wrote:

Causality means that from a cause comes an effect. Madhyamaka, by saying that things do not arise from themselves, from others, from both, or from neither, means that causality is merely a conceptual fabrication. So there are conventional truths (dependent origination) and the ultimate truth (no birth), and these two truths are not opposites but inseparable.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2020 at 4:25 PM

Title: Re: How exactly is there a momentariness of consciousness ?

Content:

Artziebetter1 said:

How can there be dependent origination if origination is not at all established? what is dependent co-arising in your view ?

Astus wrote:

That is the only way there can be dependent origination. If there were anything established about it, it would be contrary to dependent origination itself.

'Those who understand the dependent origination
To be utterly devoid of arising and disintegration,
Those who have such knowledge will cross
The ocean of samsara of dogmatic views.'
(Yuktisastika, v 23, tr Thupten Jinpa)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2020 at 4:39 PM

Title: Re: Core of Mahayana

Content:

kirtu said:

we cannot attain true enlightenment or even just true personal peace of mind without any concern about others. So because all beings are intimately interdependent, we have to practice not just for our own enlightenment but for the complete enlightenment for all beings. We also have to concern ourselves not just with the alleviation of our own suffering but the alleviation of suffering of all beings.

Astus wrote:

It is not mandatory at all to have any concern about others, otherwise one denies the possibility of liberation, and affirms the true existence of others. Also, if great compassion were to arise out of the need to liberate oneself, it wouldn't be much of a compassion.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2020 at 8:25 PM

Title: Re: Core of Mahayana

Content:

kirtu said:

Kapleau was explain the five types of Zen and was specifically explain the deficiencies of shōjo Zen.

Astus wrote:

Better read what Guifeng Zongmi (whom Kapleau calls by his Japanese name: Keiho) actually wrote, it's found in the Treatise on the Origin of Humanity, available in the BDK edition <https://bdkamerica.org/product/three-short-treatises-by-vasubandhu-sengzhao-and-zongmi/>, p 153-164.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 10th, 2020 at 4:27 PM

Title: Re: How exactly is there a momentariness of consciousness ?

Content:

Astus wrote:

'What is mind? The mind is impermanent because it arises from causes and conditions, and because, arising and ceasing, it does not abide; [merely] similar [but discrete moments of mind are] arising [in succession]. Only due to perverted [views] does one think that the [mind] is a single [entity]. What did not exist before now exists, and having existed, it will not exist anymore. Therefore, [the mind] is impermanent. One observes the mind as empty. Why? From causes and conditions the eye and a visible object arise. Eye consciousness arises when [the eye and its object] are combined with mindfulness, the wish to see, and other [conditions]. It is just like a lens. When the sun and a lens exist, together with various conditions such as dry grass and cow dung, fire arises. When one examines each [of the relevant elements], fire is not perceivable. [It is just that] when [these] conditions meet, fire arises. Examining [these conditions] one by one, no fire is perceivable. Eye consciousness is also the same. It abides neither in the eye, nor in visible objects, nor somewhere between them. It has no abode, nor is it nonexistent. Therefore the Buddha says: "[Everything] is like an illusion or emanation." If [one] observes the present mind and the past mind, they are either painful, pleasant, or neutral. Manifold minds cease in their respective ways. One should observe the internal mind, the external mind, and both the internal and external minds in a similar way. Thus far is [the explanation of] the application of mindfulness to mind.'

(The Sutra on the Concentration of Sitting Meditation, BDK ed, p 50-51)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 11th, 2020 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: If Nagarjuna had a mirror

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

If Nagarjuna had a mirror, would he say the mirror is a different mirror each time something different is reflected in it, or is it the same mirror?

Astus wrote:

He knew of mirrors.

'Through the examples of: oral instruction, a lamp, a mirror, a seal, a sun-crystal, a seed, sourness and sound, the wise should understand the non-transmigration as well as the re-emergence of the aggregates.'

(The Heart of Interdependent Origination, v 5, in http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/nagarjuna.pdf, p 58)

'A woman sees her beautified face

On the surface of a mirror or a bowl of oil.

The fool feels passion for it

And runs in search for the desired.

The face was not transferred there.

The face will never be found in the reflection,

And yet fools have desire for it.

Know that all phenomena are like that.'

(<https://read.84000.co/translation/toh127.html>, 9.17-18)

As for the nature of a mirror, from the perspective of the reflective quality, it can be analysed according to how there can be no reflector nor reflected according to for instance MMK ch 2, exchanging motion for reflection.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 11th, 2020 at 8:03 PM

Title: Re: If Nagarjuna had a mirror

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

What I mean is, strictly based on the idea that the reflection in the mirror is constantly changing, does that itself mean that the mirror is constantly changing?

Astus wrote:

A mirror is what reflects (mirrors) an image (mirrored). What does not reflect/mirror is not called a mirror, otherwise earth and stones would be mirrors too; so there is no mirror apart from mirroring. If the image could change without the mirroring changing, there should be reflections without anything to reflect them.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 11th, 2020 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: If Nagarjuna had a mirror

Content:

kirtu said:

The mirror doesn't change on the gross level at all but only on a subtle level, which is irrelevant to the phenomena of mirroring

Astus wrote:

The very idea that there is such a thing on its own as a mirror is imagining it to be apart from the function of mirroring/reflecting. But what is a mirror without the act of reflecting, and if mirroring is not required for it, how can one tell what is or is not a mirror?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 11th, 2020 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: If Nagarjuna had a mirror

Content:

Malcolm said:

Apart from what has been mirrored and not been mirrored, there is no [present] mirroring. A mirroring mirror is redundant, just like moving movers.

Astus wrote:

Indeed, MMK ch 2.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 13th, 2020 at 6:29 AM

Title: Re: How exactly is there a momentariness of consciousness ?

Content:

Malcolm said:

People inspired by Buddhism, who practice ethics and meditation for this life are not Dharma practitioners, no matter how nice, kind, or good they may be, whether they consider themselves Buddhists or not.

Astus wrote:

How about what is called "the least capacity" or "lesser scope"?

'Know that those who by whatever means

Seek for themselves no more

Than the pleasures of cyclic existence

Are persons of the least capacity.'

(Lamp for the Path, v 3, in Illuminating the Path to Enlightenment, p 69)

'Given the distinction between virtue and nonvirtue as laid down in the teachings, it is important to rely on virtue. The ten virtues tending to happiness will produce happy destinies, while negative action will precipitate a fall into the states of loss. To understand this distinction correctly, according to the karmic law of cause and effect, and to adopt positive rather than negative behavior is the so-called path of beings of lesser scope.'

(Treasury of Precious Qualities, vol 1, p 151)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 14th, 2020 at 3:16 PM

Title: Re: Abrahamic religions and Buddhism

Content:

coldbeer said:

Can one be a Christian, Muslim or Jew and still practice Buddhism?

Astus wrote:

It depends on what one's practice is.

coldbeer said:

I'm asking this as I'm currently in a relationship with a woman in one of these religions and the only way I can get married to her is to convert to her religion.

Astus wrote:

Starting a family based on lies can and likely will be a source of a series of major and minor problems.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 15th, 2020 at 4:00 AM

Title: Re: Teach me Madhyamaka

Content:

karmanyipgo said:

This is crystal clear to me and accords with what I understand hopefully others can confirm (or not!) this explanation thank you for posting

Astus wrote:

It is a fine summary. Thanks Anders!

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 21st, 2020 at 3:25 PM

Title: Re: Philosophical differences between Soto and Rinzai?

Content:

Nicholas2727 said:

The more I have studied Vajrayana Buddhism, I have realized that there are a few philosophical differences between each school and I was wondering if this is the same for Japanese Zen schools?

Astus wrote:

There would have to be a philosophical view in the first place to then allow comparison. Although one can find some unique perspectives in the works of Dogen and Hakuin, but they did not propose anything systematic. It is rather the hallmark of Zen (Japanese or otherwise) that the main bonding factor is lineage, and not doctrine or method.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 22nd, 2020 at 4:52 PM

Title: Re: Philosophical differences between Soto and Rinzai?

Content:

kirtu said:

They both assert that one's very own fathom-long body is the Buddha.

Astus wrote:

The idea of buddha-nature has been well regarded in China even before Bodhidharma, and it has been accepted by influential schools like the Sanlun, the Tiantai, and the Huayan. To say that Soto and Rinzai have their own philosophies about buddha-nature, they should present some definition and explanation, but if you look at for instance Dogen's Bussho, there isn't that much of a philosophical view to take away from it, although it can serve as a starting point to invent one.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 22nd, 2020 at 4:53 PM

Title: Re: Philosophical differences between Soto and Rinzai?

Content:

narhwal90 said:

There are many very specific instructions and views in Shobogenzo, but perhaps I am misunderstanding?

Astus wrote:

Are there? Any examples maybe?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 22nd, 2020 at 8:19 PM

Title: Re: In Buddhism, what is "form", and how does it come about?

Content:

Astus wrote:

'Matter or material form is (1-5) the five sense-faculties, (6-10) the five object-referents [or object-fields of the five sense-faculties], and (11) the non-informative.'
(AKB I.9ab, tr Sangpo, p 214)

'What is form?

It is all form whatsoever that is included in the four great elements and that is derived from the four great elements.

What are the four great elements?

The earth constituent, the water constituent, the fire constituent, and the air constituent.

...

What is derivative form?

The eye faculty, the ear faculty, the nose faculty, the tongue faculty, the body faculty, [visible] form, sound, smell, taste, a portion of tangible objects, and noninformative [form].'

(Pancaskandhaprakarana, in Inner Science of Buddhist Practice, p 229-230)

'What is the characteristic (laksana) of matter? Change is the characteristic of matter. It has two forms: change in contact and change in localization. What is change in contact?

It is the alteration caused by contact by a hand, a foot, a stone, a weapon, a stick, cold, heat, hunger, thirst, a mosquito, a gadfly, a snake, a scorpion, etc. What is change in localization? It is the imagination of form, through determined or undetermined mental conception, as such and such or some such other form.'

(Abhidharmasamuccaya, tr Boin-Webb, p 3)

'Formation (vivarta) occurs after the void state following destruction by fire, first from the commencement of the formation of the wind maṇḍaḷa as the lower basis of the first absorption, up to the existence of one sentient being in the hell of Avīci. Formation of the physical cosmos takes one eon, and the formation of sentient beings takes nineteen eons, making twenty eons.'

(Ornament of Abhidharma, 3.90 commentary)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 22nd, 2020 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: Philosophical differences between Soto and Rinzai?

Content:

narhwal90 said:

Instructions on how to lay out the facilities, instructions on bathroom conduct, instructions on how to make the robes and what materials that should be used and why.

Astus wrote:

Maybe it could be put under the category of ethics to argue against the use of toothbrush, as Dogen does in Senmen, but that's not much of a philosophical standpoint, nor an instruction one would follow outside of a very traditional style monastic setting.

narhwal90 said:

Extensive discussion on correct and incorrect views...

Astus wrote:

Could you give an example or two of Dogen's specific views on topics like the four wisdoms, five hindrances, six perfections, etc.? At the same time, even if Dogen did have some specific interpretations of the Dharma, it's another matter whether the past and present Soto school is defined by them.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 23rd, 2020 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Philosophical differences between Soto and Rinzai?

Content:

narhwal90 said:

A cursory glance at the former shows detailed instruction on how to sit, how to compose the mind, and the latter shows instruction on view.

Astus wrote:

Let's consider Zazengi a bit then, because I would not call this one page writing a 'detailed instruction' on anything really. It has a shorter paragraph as a sort of preliminary considerations, and then a longer one on everything he has to mention on doing zazen. What are his instructions on what to be done with the mind once one has the posture? 'Sitting in balance in the mountain-still state, think the concrete state of not thinking. How can the state of not thinking be thought? It is non-thinking.' (SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 3, p 226) As for what 'non-thinking' means, it is not clarified anywhere, and it is only through some further research (e.g. Dogen's Manuals of Zen Meditation by Carl Bielefeldt) that one can see how Dogen gradually rewrote Zhanglu Zongze's manual (The Baizhang Zen Monastic Regulations, BDK ed, p 253-255) to be more fitting to his Zen literary style. But likely because Dogen's very short instruction is so cryptic, modern instructions of both <https://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/practice/zazen/howto/index.html> and <http://zen.rinnou.net/zazen/sitting.html> follow the slightly more explicit form of Zongze.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 28th, 2020 at 4:04 AM

Title: Re: How exactly is there a momentariness of consciousness ?

Content:

Astus wrote:

A pertinent educational animation by Dharma Drum Mountain TV:

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=AQ_0NhJ6JYI

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 4th, 2021 at 5:09 PM

Title: Re: Can someone explain Yogacara to me?

Content:

Dharmalight889 said:

explain Yogacara philosophy to me and how it compares with Madhyamaka philosophy?

Astus wrote:

There is no singular Yogacara philosophy but rather various texts considered by various people to be called Yogacara. Here are two introductory articles/essays:

<https://www.lionsroar.com/dharma-dictionary-yogacara/> by Charles Muller

<http://www.acmuller.net/yogacara/articles/intro.html> by Dan Lusthaus

Wikipedia also gives a general overview: <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Yogachara>.

Dharmalight889 said:

From some of the information I have looked up, Yogacara seems to be a Buddhist psychology school studying consciousness.

Astus wrote:

Better view it as a Mahayana reformation of Abhidharma teachings.

Dharmalight889 said:

I have not found any information about the philosophical beliefs associated with Yogacara.

Astus wrote:

Their most famous ones are the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Eight_Consciousnesses and the https://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Three_natures.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 5th, 2021 at 5:34 AM

Title: Re: Can someone explain Yogacara to me?

Content:

Dharmalight889 said:

Where do East Asian schools stand on this issue? Do some schools follow Yogacara philosophy, or are they like the Tibetans and consider themselves mostly to be Madhyamaka?

Astus wrote:

There are eight or ten schools distinguished traditionally in Chinese Buddhism (Satyasiddhi 成實宗; Abhidharmakosa 俱舍宗; Vinaya 律宗; Sanlun 三論宗; Faxiang 法相宗; Tiantai 天台宗; Huayan 華嚴宗; Zhenyan 真言宗; Chan 禪宗; Jingtu 淨土宗), and in Japanese Buddhism there are the so called six schools of Nara (Jojitsu 成實宗; Kusha 俱舍宗; Ritsu 律宗; Sanron 三論宗; Hossō 法相宗; Kegon 華嚴宗). Of those Sanlun/Sanron correspond to Madhyamaka and Faxiang/Hossō to Yogacara. In China both disappeared quite early, while in Japan the Hossō school still exists, and one of its priests actually has a book translated to English: <https://books.google.hu/books?id=1C4qAwAAQBAJ>. Apart from that, there are people who study Yogacara in East Asia, but no school dedicated to it.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 6th, 2021 at 9:11 PM

Title: Re: Definition: "Outflows" ?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

In various texts, the term "outflows" is used, such as the Buddha or his disciples being free from outflows.

Astus wrote:

Āsrava is a wonderful word, signifying how one mentally/emotionally is moved toward various objects, and how such things (in particular: sensuality/kāma, becoming/bhava, ignorance/avidyā, and views/dṛṣṭi) in-fluence one's mind (see e.g. AKB 5.35-36).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2021 at 7:48 PM

Title: Re: Can someone explain Yogacara to me?

Content:

Manjushri said:

what would be the essential texts pertaining to Yogachara, available in English translation today?

Astus wrote:

Mahayanasamgraha, Mahayanasutralamkara, Madhyantavibhanga, Vimsatika, Trimsika, Trisvabhavanirdesa, Cheng Weishi Lun.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 8th, 2021 at 3:49 PM

Title: Re: Can someone explain Yogacara to me?

Content:

Manjushri said:

where would I find those translations of the works by Vasubandhu?

Astus wrote:

There are the translations by Kochumuttom in A Buddhist Doctrine of Experience and by Thomas E. Wood in Mind Only. Online the Vimsatika and Trimsika are included in the BDK volume <https://bdkamerica.org/product/three-texts-on-consciousness-only/>, and the Trisvabhavanirdesa translated by Garfield is available https://info-buddhism.com/Vasubandhu-Three_Natures-Garfield.html.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 8th, 2021 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

ryunin said:

What was Kodo Sawaki's opinion of satori?

Astus wrote:

From Homeless Kodo:

'A Zen tenma, or heavenly demon, is an ordinary person practicing to gain satori, to become great.

Buddhadharma is not something for making an ordinary person great.'

(Halfway Zazen chapter)

'Zazen is the way we tune in to the whole universe. Samadhi is practicing each and every thing with the entire universe moment by moment.

Satori is not going to a special place that is difficult to reach, but simply being natural.'

(No Other chapter)

'Satori is like a burglar breaking into an empty house. Although he had difficulty getting in, there's nothing to steal. He doesn't need to run. Nobody's after him. The whole thing is a flop.'

Uchiyama commentary: 'Satori is simply settling down here and now, where things are unsatisfactory.'

(A Burglar Breaks into an Empty House chapter)

From <https://antaiji.org/archives/eng/kodo-sawaki-to-you.shtml>:

'You want to become a buddha? There's no need to become a buddha! Now is simply now. You are simply you. And tell me, since you want to leave the place where you are, where is it exactly you want to go?

Zazen means just sitting without even thinking of becoming buddha.

We don't achieve satori through practice: practice is satori. Each and every step is the goal.'

(To you who do everything you can to get satori)

'No illusion is as hard to cure as satori.

Don't take pride in your practice. It's clear that any satori you take pride in is a lie.

You've got it backwards if you talk about stages of practice. Practice is satori.

Satori is like a thief breaking into an empty house. He breaks in but there's nothing to steal. No reason to flee. No one who chases him. So there's nothing which could satisfy him either.'

(To you who is showing off your satori)

'You suffer because you don't want to accept what has to be accepted.

Quietly accepting what has to be is what's meant by satori. Great satori means seeing necessity as necessity, for necessity is an integral part of the universe.

You're worried about death? Don't worry – you'll die for sure.'

(To you who are tumbling down the career ladder)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2021 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: is Buddha "just a man" in any tradition?

Content:

megaman chiquito said:

is there any accepted tradition of buddha being just a normal human

Astus wrote:

'Followers of the Way, if you say that the Buddha is the ultimate, how is it that after eighty years of life the Buddha lay down on his side between the twin śāla trees at Kuśinagara and died? Where is the Buddha now? We clearly know that his birth and death were not different from ours.'

(Record of Linji, p 19, tr Sasaki)

'The Buddha was a living human being. Just like the rest of us, he had parents, a family, and he lived a life. It was through this human life that he showed his great loving-kindness and compassion, his moral character, and his wisdom.'
(<https://www.fgsitc.org/wp-content/uploads/2019/01/A1-The-Fundamentals-of-Humanistic-2019.pdf>?, p 2)

megaman chiquito said:
who achieved nirvana through his own diligent efforts?

Astus wrote:
There are several suttas where the Buddha talks of his own efforts, e.g.:
<https://accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.026.than.html>,
<https://accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.019.than.html>,
<https://accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.036.than.html>.

Author: Astus
Date: Wednesday, January 13th, 2021 at 11:02 PM
Title: Re: History: Why does Southern Buddhism seem to disappear from history at certain periods?
Content:
Padmist said:
Do you know why the history of Buddhism in Southern Asia seem to be spotty at different periods? Active at times, disappearing or blank on others?
http://www.buddhanet.net/e-learning/history/thera_timeline.htm or is it a failure of history records/lost records?

Astus wrote:
Isn't it like that everywhere else with destructive wars and invasions? E.g. the demise of https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Anuradhapura_period#Demise and https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kingdom_of_Polonnaruwa#Demise, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Burmese%E2%80%93Siamese_War_%281765%E2%80%931767%29#Sack_of_the_city. But you can find similar blank spots, and ups and downs in the histories of China, Korea, and Japan.

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, January 14th, 2021 at 6:39 AM
Title: Re: Is the Mahayana or vajrayana canon closed?
Content:
Dgj said:
For example the Chinese Tripitaka; is it a closed canon?

Astus wrote:
There are several <https://lic.dila.edu.tw/en/node/13121>, for example:
https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Taish%C5%8D_Tripitaka and the supplement Xuzangjing (Zokuzokyo) 卍續藏 that are modern, 20th century editions, and older ones, like the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Zhaocheng_Jin_Tripitaka (12th century), https://culture.teldap.tw/culture/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=1550:catalogue-of-the-qianlong-tripitaka-qianlong-zang-&catid=148:a-slice-of-wonder&Itemid=209 (18th century), https://culture.teldap.tw/culture/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=1549:catalogue-of-the-yongle-north-tripitaka-yongle-bei-zang-&catid=148&Itemid=209 and Southern Yongle 永樂 (15th century), the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tripitaka_Koreana, and so on.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 14th, 2021 at 3:42 PM

Title: Re: Is the Mahayana or vajrayana canon closed?

Content:

Varis said:

As for Mahayana sutras, we know there will be new ones because Maitreya Buddha will arrive in the future and teach the dharma and therefore we can assume there will be new sutras.

Astus wrote:

There are also old sutras and other texts discovered, as in the case of the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dunhuang_manuscripts, for which https://icabs.repo.nii.ac.jp/index.php?action=pages_view_main&active_action=repository_view_main_item_snippet&index_id=85&pn=1&count=20&order=17&lang=english&page_id=15&block_id=18 with the Taisho Canon.

Also about the Taisho Canon, one of its editors noted (The Essentials of Buddhist Philosophy by https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Takakusu_Junjiro, 1st Indian Edition, 1956, p 2):

'In Japan, the Tripitaka Literature has been published at least four times, each edition adding new volumes. Recently it became my responsibility to complete its latest publication, which contains the Chinese and Korean compilations as well as texts newly discovered in Central Asia and Japan—a work of thirteen years—comprising 13,520 chüans or parts in 100 bound volumes of about 1,000 pages each.'

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2021 at 4:44 AM

Title: Re: Is the Mahayana or vajrayana canon closed?

Content:

Dgj said:

Are these individual canons closed?

Astus wrote:

Basically, yes. Their titles often designate the imperial era of publication (e.g. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Yongle_Emperor, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Qianlong_Emperor, <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Taish%C5%8D>), so to modify them would mean a new version published at a different time.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2021 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana Sutras Lack Oral Transmission?

Content:

Bodhiquest said:

There's nothing much that would allow us to conclusively say that certain ideas and teachings were never given by the Buddha and were simply developed later by "philosophers" and the like.

Astus wrote:

That's not necessarily so. For instance, the concept of alayavijnana is a later development as we can see in the Mahayanasamgraha how Asanga has to explain himself for proposing its existence, and what scriptural sources he can present (abhidharma works and the Samdhinirmocana Sutra), while 5 centuries later Jinamitra quotes from several Mahayana sutras (see 'The Ālaya-Consciousness in Yogācāra Treatises' in the Introduction of 'A Compendium of the Mahayana' by Brunnholzl, vol 1). Similarly, where one finds the mention of ideas that are not found in the Agamas but only in abhidharma texts, unless we attribute such abhidharma treatises to the Buddha, the sutras using such concepts are necessarily later than the Agamas.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 22nd, 2021 at 4:51 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Matylda said:

The problem itself is not in shikan taza or koan practice. The problem is in complete denial of kensho/satori realization. The fact that one is practicing shikan taza does not mean by itself that kind of denial. In fact whether shikan taza or koan the experience should be exactly the same.

Astus wrote:

Practising with koans is in order to gain realisation, shikantaza is practice-realisation, so there is a difference. If there were stages to be reached in shikantaza, then realisation were apart from practice.

This is the difference between directly practising no-thought or using huatou to reach no-thought, as Hanshan Deqing wrote:

'If you can thus engage in contemplation, then whenever a thought arises, you should find its source. Never haphazardly allow it to pass you by [without seeing through it]. Do not be deceived by it! If this is how you work, then you will be doing some genuine practice. Do not try to gather up some abstract and intellectual view on it or try to fabricate some clever understanding about it. Still, to even speak about practice is really like the last alternative. For example, in the use of weapons, they are really not auspicious objects! But they are used as the last alternative [in battles]. The ancient ones spoke about investigating Chan and bringing forth the huatou. These, too are last alternatives. Even though there are innumerable gong ans, only by using the huatou, “Who is reciting the Buddha’s name?” can you derive power from it easily enough amidst vexing situations. Even though you can easily derive power from it, [this huatou] is merely a [broken] tile for knocking down doors. Eventually you will have to throw it away. Still, you must use it for now.'

(<https://terebess.hu/zen/mesterek/HanshanDeqing.html#c>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 22nd, 2021 at 7:38 PM

Title: Re: What is cittavijanana?

Content:

bhadanta1 said:

can someone explain what cittavijnana in buddhist belief means? It is a concept specific to the yogacara school?

Astus wrote:

Where have you seen such a term? In Yogacara there is talk of citta, manas, and vijnana as three distinct aspects/functions:

'When the Buddha speaks of citta, manas and vijñāna (cf. Dīgha, I, p. 21; Saṃyutta, II, p. 95), it is not a question of three synonyms as the Visuddhimagga has it, p. 452 (viññāṇaṃ cittaṃ mano ti atthato ekaṃ) and the Kośa, II, p. 176 (cittaṃ mano 'tha vijñānaṃ ekārtham), but rather of three distinct things (cf. H: citta, manas and vijñāna are three). Citta is the store-consciousness; manas is the twofold manas; vijñāna is the six active consciousnesses (pravṛttivijñāna).'

(Mahayanasamgraha I.6 commentary by Lamotte, tr Migme Chodron)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 23rd, 2021 at 4:32 AM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Matylda said:

The whole topic which I picked up concerns exclusively Japanese zen.

Astus wrote:

The main point still stands: Practising with koans is in order to gain realisation, shikantaza is practice-realisation, so there is a difference. If there were stages to be reached in shikantaza, then realisation were apart from practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 24th, 2021 at 4:39 AM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Matylda said:

Indeed, shikan taza has no stages, but the final result of koan practice or shikan taza is exactly or must be exactly the same - complete enlightenment and liberation.

Astus wrote:

How can there be a final result of shikantaza if it has no stages?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 24th, 2021 at 5:43 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Matylda said:

ask a teacher not me, you know some, isnt it? like sogenji roshi and others, they are right addressee to put this question.

Astus wrote:

Still, you propose such a set of contradicting views, hence asking you how can that be so.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 25th, 2021 at 4:51 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Malcolm said:

The consequence of this is that one is only realized during shikantaza. How does this escape the equipoise/post-equipoise division? And if there is a division between equipoise/post-equipoise, this means that there are stages.

Astus wrote:

The main point is that if shikantaza is practice-realisation, then there is no point of working towards a realisation apart from it, there is no satori later. A comparison of the two approaches from Shohaku Okumura:

'Uchiyama Roshi emphasizes that the zazen practice transmitted from Dogen Zenji to Sawaki Roshi differs from D. T. Suzuki's Zen. For example, Dogen Zenji described the oneness of a practitioner and other people and objects, using the example of a cook and his work with colleagues, ingredients, firewood, and water, as well as those who eat the food. In "Tenzokyokun," or "Instructions for the Cook," in Dogen's Pure Standards for the Zen Community, he wrote, "All day and all night, things come to mind and the mind attends to them; at one with them all, diligently carry on the Way." Here there's no mysterious satori, or becoming conscious of the Unconscious. There's only sincere, wholehearted practice in ordinary activities.'

(Zazen Is the Stability of One's Whole Life, in Homeless Kodo)

And from Kodo Sawaki:

'Nine hundred years ago there was a Zen system in which there were gradations of satori—three hundred and some tens of cases. Finally completing them all you would perfect a great satori. That system was contrasted with what was referred to as mokusho Zen [silent illumination]. It was also labeled eko and hensho. The other teaching [which uses koans] was called kanna Zen.

Dogen Zenji's is a religion of practice. Dogen goes so far as to say there is no benefit in recitation with the mouth. In the Bendowa, Dogen wrote: "Continuously uttering sounds is like a frog crying in the night in a spring rice paddy and is ultimately worthless."

In the Butsuyuikyogyo, too, [the Buddha] warns against useless talk... Satori is not something that is uncovered by the mind. Practice is enlightenment.

Again in the Bendowa, "A beginner's wholehearted practice of the Way is the totality of the original enlightenment." And in Zanmai O Zanmai [The King of Samadhi], "The posture for shikantaza is the most important meaning in Buddhist teaching."

(From a talk titled "Dogen's Zen," delivered in August 1952 in Kumamoto, in Discovering the True Self)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 26th, 2021 at 4:07 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Malcolm said:

This all very much depends on what one means by "enlightenment."

Astus wrote:

'Students of the Way should desire to be obstructed by the Way. To be obstructed by the Way means to forget any trace of enlightenment. Practitioners of the Way must first of all have faith in the Way. Those who have faith in the buddha-way must believe that one (the self) is within the Way from the beginning; that you are free from delusive desires, upside-down ways of seeing things, excesses or deficiencies, and mistakes. Arousing this kind of faith, clarifying the Way and practicing the Way comprise the foundation of learning the Way. We do this by sitting and cutting off the root of the discriminating mind; by turning away from the path of intellectual understanding. This is a skillful way to lead beginners. Next, drop off body and mind, and throw away both delusion and enlightenment. This is the second stage. Truly it is most difficult to find a person who believes that his self is within the buddha-way. Only if you believe that you are really inside the Way, will you naturally clarify the scenery of the Great Way and understand the origin of delusion and enlightenment. Try to sit cutting off the root of discriminating mind. Eight or nine out of ten will be able to immediately see the Way.'

(Gakudo Yojinshu by Dogen, in https://www.sotozen.com/eng/library/leaflet/heartofzen/pdf/Heart_of_Zen.pdf, p 32-33)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 26th, 2021 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Matylda said:

Whatever modern days soto zen claims about Dogen and satori he has never denied it.

Astus wrote:

It is not denying satori, but rather stating that it is not something that happens after practice. Here are some quotes from long deceased teachers:

Dogen:

'Just sit and get the state that is free of body and mind. If a human being, even for a single moment, manifests the Buddha's posture in the three forms of conduct, while [that person] sits up straight in samādhi, the entire world of Dharma assumes the Buddha's posture and the whole of space becomes the state of realization. [The practice] thus increases the Dharma joy that is the original state of the buddha-tathāgatas, and renews the splendor of their realization of the truth.'

...

'The practice is not confined to the sitting itself; it strikes space and resonates, [like] ringing that continues before and after a bell. How could [the practice] be limited to this place?'

...

'The thought that practice and experience are not one thing is just the idea of non-Buddhists. In the Buddha-Dharma practice and experience are completely the same. [Practice] now is also practice in the state of experience; therefore, a beginner's pursuit of the truth is just the whole body of the original state of experience. This is why [the Buddhist patriarchs] teach, in the practical cautions they have handed down to us, not to expect any experience outside of practice. And the reason may be that [practice itself] is the directly accessible original state of experience. Because practice is just experience, the experience is endless; and because experience is practice, the practice has no beginning.'

(Bendowa, in Shobogenzo, BDK ed, vol 1)

Keizan:

'Although we speak of realization, this realization does not hold to itself as being "realization". This is practice of the supreme samadhi which is the knowing of unborn, unobstructed, and spontaneously arising awareness. It is the door of luminosity which opens out onto the realization of the Buddha, born through the practice of the great ease. This goes beyond the patterns of holy and profane, goes beyond confusion and wisdom. This is the realization of unsurpassed enlightenment as our own nature.'

(<http://antaiji.org/en/classics/english-zazen-yojinki/>)

Menzan:

'Those teachers in medieval times (Song dynasty China) thought that we are all deluded and that if we practice zazen, we could gain enlightenment as a result of the power accumulated by zazen practice. They also thought that, after gaining enlightenment, there would be no further need to practice zazen. They compared it to a boat which is no longer necessary once the other shore is reached.

People in the present day often practice zazen in this manner. This is the attitude of ordinary people, Hinayana practitioners, and bodhisattvas within the provisional Mahayana practice of zazen. They aspire to rid themselves of delusions and to gain enlightenment; to eliminate illusory thoughts and to obtain the truth. This is nothing but creating the karma of acceptance and rejection. Such an attitude is just another form of dualism, in that one escapes from one thing and chases after another. If we think this kind of practice is the same as that transmitted by the buddhas and ancestors, as the Tathagata's zanmai-o-zanmai, or as Bodhidharma's sitting facing the wall for nine years, these also become mere methods to rid oneself of delusions and to obtain enlightenment. What a pitiful view!

In the last several hundred years, a great many have adhered to this attitude, both in China and Japan. All mistake a broken piece of tile for gold, or a fish eye for a jewel, because they do not yet clearly understand the essence of the great Dharma.

The true zazen which has been transmitted by the buddhas and ancestors is the Tathagata's jijuyu-zanmai. It is the state in which the body and mind of perfect nirvana always abide peacefully. In the Lotus Sutra, the Tathagata's zazen is called muryo-gisho-zanmai ('the samadhi of infinite meaning'). In the Mahaprajnya-sutra it is called toji-o-zanmai ('the king of samadhis'). It is referred to as zanmai-o--zanmai in the Daihon-Hannya-kyo, and Zen master Tozan Ryokai named it hokyo-zanmai (the samadhi of the precious mirror). Obviously, zazen is not a practice for getting rid of delusions and gaining enlightenment.'

(Jijuyu Zanmai, in https://www.sotozen.com/eng/library/leaflet/heartofzen/pdf/Heart_of_Zen.pdf, p 42-43)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 26th, 2021 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Matylda said:

Well it is not only Gasans case but all generations of soto masters untill the begining of the 20th cxentury, when it was decided that satori is wrong. one should not strive and should not attain it, otherwise it is against Dogen. Such nonsense is easily repeated in the West and largely in Japan but in different context, it is why satori - indispensable characteristic of zen became a serious problem in soto.

Astus wrote:

There is no denial of the need for realisation, for awakening, but rather that it is not found outside the very practice of zazen (and even the meaning of zazen is not restricted to the seated posture).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 27th, 2021 at 5:44 AM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Matylda said:

Of course that there is denial, very great denial when it comes to any serious talk about it. If there was no denial, then what happened to dokusan in soto? what happened to koans in soto?

Astus wrote:

It seems the concept of the unity of practice and realisation is what makes a difference here, as such elements of method are not required when zazen is both the means and the goal.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 27th, 2021 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Malcolm said:

Looks like stages to me, in direct contradiction to your claim.

Astus wrote:

Yes, seems so, but not. The first stage mentioned is of faith, the second is acting upon that faith, and it's the second what comprises shikantaza.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 27th, 2021 at 3:58 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Matylda said:

the real problem with unity of practice/enlightenment is that it is widely interpreted by people without realization, then many are simply misled by the wrong views.

Astus wrote:

What do you take to be the right view about https://www.sotozen.com/eng/library/key_terms/pdf/key_terms07.pdf?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 27th, 2021 at 4:09 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Malcolm said:

So, shikantaza is kind of like nembutsu or nam myoho renge kyo.

Astus wrote:

There are similarities.

'Dogen taught his religion through the language and lore of Chinese Ch'an; yet in many ways the structure of his religion reflects familiar patterns in the soteriological strategies of Japanese writers like Shinran and Nichiren. This is hardly surprising, since many of the same issues that determined the rules of Ch'an discourse in China - the theory of the supreme, Buddha vehicle and the perfect, sudden practice appropriate to it - had long been at work in the dominant Tendai system in Japan, the system that initially educated Dogen, Shinran, Nichiren, and other leaders of the reformation. Despite their obvious differences, in very broad terms, the ideologies of all three of these famous religious thinkers can be seen as an attempt to define the true practice of the Tendai Buddha vehicle - a sudden practice to be based solely on the absolute truth of Buddhahood itself, not on the upaya of the relative teachings and gradual practices.' (Dogen's Manuals of Zen Meditation, p 165)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 27th, 2021 at 4:55 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Matylda said:

this is only philosophical work for philosophers and academics, has nothing to do with actual zen practice.. just typical modern soto view, devoided of zazen and experience.

Astus wrote:

I put the link there as a reference for one possible interpretation as provided by the official Soto website. But the question is if you could give your view to show why you call the majority of Japanese and Western teachers wrong, and what you consider correct.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 27th, 2021 at 7:30 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Matylda said:

I see.. well official soto is the very problem.. those people deny everything when they hear satori etc. and start talking, that everything is satori etc. and that practice with aim of satori is almost a sin.. and of course they have myriad excuses and nice theories.

Astus wrote:

Why expect Soto to follow ideas that are prevalent in Rinzai (koan practice, dokusan, emphasis on kensho, etc.)? Even if once the two branches were quite similar, after the 18th century reforms in both, they have intentionally distanced themselves from each other, unlike in China where lineage association has practically no bearing on one's views and methods.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 27th, 2021 at 8:57 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Matyllda said:

Where is it said that koan dokusan satori etc. belongs only to rinzai??? it is not true.

Astus wrote:

I meant commonly found in and associated with Rinzai, not that it was their property or that others were excluded. If you say it's not the consequence of reformations that Sotoshu is what it is today, then what do you say is the reason behind it? Also, do you find current Rinzai more according to your standards of Zen, and would that be because they practise with koans?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 27th, 2021 at 9:27 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Malcolm said:

I think what she is saying is the picture of Soto zen you paint is abstracted from books by western scholars, rather than a deep knowledge of the tradition based on fluency in Japanese, etc.

Astus wrote:

It seems to me more like criticism of Soto both in Japan and in Western countries. Of course, if it turns out to be otherwise, and all she meant so far was a problem with the academic representation of Soto while at the same time what actually happens in temples and centres are fine with her, then I have misread things.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 1st, 2021 at 5:19 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

clyde said:

I agree that "practice as enlightenment" is open to misunderstandings and it is the duty of teachers to help their students by pointing to a correct understanding. But it also incumbent on the student to do the work of seeing through their delusions to a realization.

jimmi said:

If, as per Matyllda's critique, Soto teachers are for the most part lacking in the correct understanding of "practice as enlightenment" well, it's clear where that will go. How can students be expected to do the work and arrive at authentic Shikantaza if those tasked with transmitting the necessary understanding have themselves fallen short? It makes the adage that Zen cannot be practiced without a teacher somewhat problematic.

Malcolm said:
Cue Astus.

Astus wrote:
That's the difficult consequence of the dharma-transmission lineage concept: either every lineage member is a buddha, or the whole concept falls apart. But such an idealist view of the lineage can function only on paper.

'This [practice] relies on the mystical and authentic transmission of the subtle method from master to disciple, and the [disciple's] reception and maintenance of the true essence of the teachings.'
(Bendowa, in SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 1, p 5; T2582_.82.0015c24-26)

And that subtle method (妙術) transmitted correctly (正傳) is zazen (坐禪):

'Great Master Śākyamuni exactly transmitted, as the authentic tradition, this subtle method of grasping the state of truth, and the tathāgatas of the three times all attained the truth through zazen. Thus the fact that [zazen] is the authentic gate has been transmitted and received. Furthermore, the patriarchs of the Western Heavens and the Eastern Lands all attained the truth through zazen. Therefore I am now preaching [zazen] to human beings and gods as the authentic gate.' (p 7-8; T2582_.82.0016c11-17)

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, February 1st, 2021 at 5:49 PM
Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori
Content:

clyde said:
So which Soto teachers say that satori isn't important? This shouldn't be a secret if these teachers have taught that to their students.

Astus wrote:
Where awakening is equated with practice (see <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=567151#p567151> and <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=566984#p566984> post), as in the teachings of Dogen, Keizan, Menzan, and Kodo Sawaki, Kosho Uchiyama, and Shohaku Okumura.

'The idea of transforming delusion to attain enlightenment is easy to understand in terms of our ordinary way of thinking, yet it is not in accord with the buddha-dharma. In Buddhism, the dichotomy of delusion and enlightenment is transcended from the very beginning. We have to practice and actualize right now, right here the buddha-dharma (reality of life) that transcends both delusion and enlightenment. This is Great Enlightenment (daigo).

Therefore, from the first, we are neither deluded nor enlightened. Reality itself exists before we divide and name delusion and enlightenment. We are practicing this reality right here and right now. This is called attaining or actualizing enlightenment (kaigo). We practice with enlightenment as our base. Practice and enlightenment are simply one (shucho ichinyo).

Consequently, a confused attitude such as that I am deluded, or enlightened, or I was deluded and now I am enlightened, is not jijuyu zanmai. Since we are the self that is only the self, surpassing the dichotomy of delusion and enlightenment, we sit in the self that is only the self. This is jijuyu zanmai. This is the true meaning of "actualizing enlightenment."

(The Wholehearted Way by Kosho Uchiyama, p 81-82)

'A student preparing for an entrance examination wants to pass; no one wants to fail. Yet the world in which there is no success or failure is the best. We cannot expect such a world in Japan today. It is possible only in the world of zazen. However, there is a group of people who try to put pass and fail into the world of zazen through satori. If you attain satori you succeed, if not you fail. This attitude has nothing to do with the buddha-dharma; it is samsara.

We only have to sit with the self that is only the self, without comparing it to others. It is not necessary at all to visit a Zen master to ask if one is enlightened or not. That is really a stupid question. First of all, to practice the buddha-dharma is to live out the self that is only the self. The truth is that one always has to live out the self that is only the self in any situation, so it is impossible to bring up the question of whether one succeeds or fails.'

(p 118)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 1st, 2021 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Malcolm said:

This basically consists only of teaching the śamathayāna. So, we can understand that zazen is śamatha. In śamatha, insight can occur naturally.

Astus wrote:

'Good friends, our teaching takes meditation and wisdom as its fundamental. Everyone, do not say in your delusion that meditation and wisdom are different.

Meditation and wisdom are of one essence, not different. Meditation is the essence of wisdom, and wisdom is the function of meditation. At times of wisdom, meditation exists in that wisdom; at times of meditation, wisdom exists in that meditation. If you understand this doctrine, this is the equivalent study of meditation and wisdom. All you who study the Way, do not say that they are different, with meditation prior to and generating wisdom or with wisdom prior to and generating meditation. If your view of them is like this, then the Dharma would have two characteristics. This would be to say something good with your mouth but to have that which is not good in your minds. It is to make meditation and wisdom falsely existent to consider them as not equivalent.'

(Platform Sutra, ch 4, BDK ed, p 41-42)

'Discipline is usually understood as ceasing wrong action and eliminating evil. In zazen the whole thing is known to be non-dual. Cast off the numberless concerns and rest free from entangling yourself in the "Buddhist way" or the "worldly way." Leave behind feelings about the path as well as your usual sentiments. When you leave behind all opposites, what can obstruct you? This is the formless discipline of the ground of mind. Practice usually means unbroken concentration. Zazen is dropping the bodymind, leaving behind confusion and understanding. Unshakeable, without activity, it is not deluded but still like an idiot, a fool. Like a mountain, like the ocean. Without any trace of motion or stillness. This practice is no-practice because it has no object to practice and so is called great practice.

Wisdom is usually understood to be clear discernment. In zazen, all knowledge vanishes of itself. Mind and discrimination are forgotten forever. The wisdom-eye of this body has no discrimination but is clear seeing of the essence of awakening. From the beginning it is free of confusion, cuts off concept, and open and clear luminosity pervades everywhere. This wisdom is no-wisdom; because it is traceless wisdom, it is called great wisdom.

The teaching that the buddhas have presented all throughout their lifetimes are just this discipline, practice, and wisdom. In zazen there is no discipline that is not maintained, no practice that is uncultivated, no wisdom that is unrealized. Conquering the demons of confusion, attaining the way, turning the wheel of the Dharma and returning to tracelessness all arise from the power of this. Supernormal powers and inconceivable activities, emanating light and expounding the teaching- all of these are present in this zazen. Penetrating Zen is zazen.'

(<http://antaiji.org/en/classics/english-zazen-yojinki/>)

'It is said in the Mahaprajnyaparamita-sutra that even though you practice the five paramitas (i.e. generosity, observing the precepts, patience, diligence, and meditation), all your practices remain within the realm of the defiled causation of human or heavenly being unless you practice prajnya-paramita. Such a practice is not that of annuttara-sammyak-sambodhi (ultimate awakening).

To practice prajnya-paramita means that the light of the wisdom of jijuyu-zanmai illuminates and dispels the darkness of the ignorance of delusory thoughts. If the light of the Self is clear, even a small good deed is the practice of incomparable awakening, since the deed is performed prior to the arising of illusory mind. Therefore, you should not be concerned with anything but leaving behind illusory mind, cutting the root of delusions, emitting the light of jijuyu--zanmai, and opening the eye of prajnya. This is the Buddha's wisdom and also the true path of practicing the buddha-way.'

...

'The true taste properly transmitted through the buddhas and ancestors is Buddha's wisdom; this is also called shinjin-datsuraku (dropping off body and mind), that is, understanding thoroughly that body, mind, and world (time and space) cannot be grasped with the discriminating mind, that reality is outside of illusory mind, and then releasing the light of the Self.'

(Jijuyu Zanmai, in Heart of Zen, p 47, 48)

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, February 2nd, 2021 at 5:59 AM
Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori
Content:
Malcolm said:
Still śamathayāna.

Astus wrote:
Why do you call it such?

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, February 2nd, 2021 at 6:02 AM
Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori
Content:
Matt J said:
The question is, without kensho, if everyone is already a Buddha and all practice is an expression of Buddhanature, then what's the point?

Astus wrote:
Practice being awakening means that one practises awakening, and without practice there is no awakening to talk about.

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, February 2nd, 2021 at 7:06 PM
Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori
Content:
Malcolm said:
You should read article by Lance cousins. But in a short, shamathayana is the quick path.

Astus wrote:
But where do you see samatha taught in Zen to be succeeded by insight? It's been quite a central point almost from the beginning that samadhi and prajna are not separated (hence the Platform Sutra quote), and then in the teachings of Dogen and his heirs the unity of practice and realisation is affirmed regularly. Also, as Dogen put it in his first work after returning from China: 'Zazen is not the practice of dhyana it is just the dharma gate of ease and joy. It is the practice and verification of ultimate bodhi.'
(https://web.stanford.edu/~funn/zazen_instructions/Fukanzazengi.pdf; T2580_.82.0001b01-3)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 2nd, 2021 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Malcolm said:

You didn't really read Cousins article, did you?

Astus wrote:

I actually did. That's why I asked where you found the samatha part to be followed by vipasyana, because that is the one version of the four that is named samathayana.

Malcolm said:

BTW "ease and joy" are two mental factors accompanying the first dhyana.

Astus wrote:

Translated as 'ease and joy' is the term anraku 安樂, a translation for sukha and often used as a short for Sukhavati, and here (see note 13 on page 116 of Dogen's Manuals of Zen Meditation) a reference to chapter 14 (Anrakugyo 安樂行) of the Lotus Sutra, where it is written (BDK ed, p 194; T0262_.09.0037b10) that ' He should always take pleasure in meditation [zazen 坐禪] and, in a quiet place, practice to control his mind. '.

Malcolm said:

Practice and verification implies having a view and applying it in equipoise.

Astus wrote:

Practice and verification is the translation here of shusho 修證, the first half of the term https://www.sotozen.com/eng/library/key_terms/pdf/key_terms07.pdf, the unity of practice and realisation/awakening.

Malcolm said:

Rhetoric is one thing, reality is another.

Astus wrote:

There are teachers who first instruct people to count breath, to focus on the posture, etc., so there it would be valid to say they begin with calming the mind. But when it comes to practising zazen according to the teachings of Dogen, it is to go directly to suchness.

Malcolm said:

As we know, shikantaza is just "samatha/vipashyana" in Japanese.

Astus wrote:

Shikan as samatha-vipasyana is 止觀, while shikan as 'just/simply/intently/etc.' is 只管, so shikantaza 只管打坐 is 'just sitting'.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 2nd, 2021 at 11:05 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Malcolm said:

Otherwise, are we expected to believe the magical theory that merely sitting in a Soto Zendo somehow is sitting in the state of Buddhahood? Or that merely sitting in a posture is Buddhahood? Clearly you can see the ridiculous consequences emerging from such a stance. Obviously Dogen didn't believe this.

Astus wrote:

I have not seen Dogen, or later teachers, turn away from the Zen rhetoric and follow gradual Mahayana teachings. On the other hand, sitting in any state is not the idea. Furthermore, Dogen has been quite adamant about never stopping to practise.

'There are also those who are not concerned with what their teacher thinks or whether the shuso or other fellow practitioners are watching or not. They always bear in mind that practicing the Buddha-Way is not for the sake of others but only for themselves; such people desire to become buddhas or patriarchs with both body and mind. So they truly practice diligently. They really seem to be people of the Way compared with the people mentioned above. However, since they still practice trying to improve themselves, they have not become free from their ego. They want to be admired by buddhas and bodhisattvas, and desire to attain buddhahood, and complete awareness. This is because they still cannot throw away their selfish desire for fame and profit.

...

Just cast body and mind into the buddha-dharma, and practice without desire either to realize the Way or to attain the dharma. Then you can be called an undefiled practitioner. This is what is meant by not staying where buddha exists; and running quickly from where no-buddha exists.'

(Shobogenzo Zuimonki, 5.20)

'The most vital concern in learning the Way is to practice zazen. In China, many people attained the Way entirely through the power of zazen. If one concentrates on practicing zazen continuously, even an ignorant person, who does not understand a single question, can be superior to an intelligent person who has been studying for a long time. Therefore, practitioners must practice shikantaza wholeheartedly without bothering to concern themselves with other things. The Way of the buddhas and patriarchs is nothing but zazen. Do not pursue anything else.

At the time, Ejo asked, "In learning both sitting and reading, when I read the collections of the old masters' sayings or koans, I can understand one thing out of a hundred or a thousand words, though I have never had such an experience in zazen. Should we still prefer to practice zazen?"

Dogen replied, "Even if you may seem to have some understanding while reading koans, such studies will lead you astray from the Way of the buddhas and patriarchs. To spend your time sitting upright with nothing to be gained and nothing to be realized is the Way of the patriarchs. Although the ancient masters encouraged both reading and shikan zazen, they promoted sitting wholeheartedly. Although there are some who have gained enlightenment hearing stories (of the masters), the attainment of enlightenment is due to the merit of sitting. True merit depends on sitting.”

(Shobogenzo Zuimonki, 5.23)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 3rd, 2021 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Malcolm said:

Even marmots know how to sit. I've got your marmot Buddha right here:

Astus wrote:

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sengai> has this nice <http://idemitsu-museum.or.jp/collection/sengai/sengai/02.php>. The text reads: if by zazen one becomes a buddha...

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 3rd, 2021 at 6:14 AM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Malcolm said:

Clearly, Dogen perceives stages in zazen, for exmple, on page 859 of Tanahashi translation.

Astus wrote:

Could you specify the chapter title?

Malcolm said:

On 440 he talks of "The understanding at the moment of thorough realization should be authentic..." etc. He speaks of how this practice accumulates over months and years, and over lifetimes.

Astus wrote:

The topic of that chapter is 'expressing the truth'

(https://www.sotozen.com/eng/library/key_terms/pdf/key_terms15.pdf), and it does not really describe a gradual improvement, but rather continuously expressing the truth with one's practice.

'It is simply that where there is the Buddhist patriarchs' pursuit of the ultimate there is the Buddhist patriarchs' expression of the truth. In the past they have trained inside that very state of expressing the truth and have experienced it to the end, and now they are still making effort, and pursuing the truth, inside that state. When Buddhist patriarchs, through making effort to be Buddhist patriarchs, intuit and affirm a Buddhist patriarch's expression of the truth, this expression of the truth naturally becomes three years, eight years, thirty years, or forty years of effort, in which it expresses the truth with all its energy.'

(Dotoku, in SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 2, p 333)

'Having accumulated long months and long years of holding onto this effort, we then get free of the past years and months of effort. While we are endeavoring to get free, the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow are all equally intuiting and affirming freedom. National lands, mountains, and rivers are all intuiting and affirming freedom together. At this time, while we continue aiming to arrive at freedom, as the ultimate treasure-object, this intention to arrive is itself real manifestation—and so, right in the moment of getting free there is expression of the truth, which is realized without expectation.'

(p 334)

'So when we are “ten years or five years in a monastery,” passing through the frosts and flowers again and again, and when we consider the effort in pursuit of the truth that is “a lifetime not leaving the monastery”; the “sitting in stillness,” which has cut [all interference] by sitting, has been innumerable instances of expressing the truth.'

(p 335)

'Sitting in stillness without speaking for ten years or for five years is expression of the truth for ten years or for five years; it is a lifetime without leaving nonexpression of the truth; and it is being unable to say anything for ten years or for five years. It is sitting away hundred thousands of buddhas, and it is hundred thousands of buddhas sitting away “you.” In summary, the Buddhist patriarchs’ state of expressing the truth is a lifetime without leaving the monastery.'

(p 335)

'When there is learning in practice of knowing the self, there is the reality of expressing the truth.'

(p 337)

Malcolm said:

Dogen clearly embraces gradualism too.

Astus wrote:

'In the Buddha-Dharma practice and experience are completely the same. [Practice] now is also practice in the state of experience; therefore, a beginner’s pursuit of the truth is just the whole body of the original state of experience. This is why [the Buddhist patriarchs] teach, in the practical cautions they have handed down to us, not to expect any experience outside of practice. And the reason may be that [practice itself] is the directly accessible original state of experience. Because practice is just experience, the experience is endless; and because experience is practice, the practice has no beginning.'

(Bendowa, in SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 1, p 12)

In Tanahashi's version:

'Because practice within realization occurs at the moment of practice, the practice of beginner's mind is itself the entire original realization. When giving instruction for zazen practice, we say that you should not have any expectation for realization outside of practice, since this is the immediate original realization. Because this is the realization of practice, there is no boundary in realization. Because this is the practice of realization, there is no beginning in practice.'

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 3rd, 2021 at 8:02 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Malcolm said:

I disagree.

Astus wrote:

As you like. Just some extra:

'Not accompanied by the ten thousand things, what stages could there be? What do you use this for?'

(Eihei Koroku 4.301, p 281)

'These [family instructions] are simply the sitting cushions and Zen boards of the seven buddhas, and the source of the life root of the ancestors. Therefore, this is not in the realm of the four dhyanas or eight samadhis. How could it be measured in terms of the three wise or ten sacred stages? Every day just sit, dropping off body and mind. Do not be worried with a scene of laughable confusion about [comparisons between] barbarians or the civilized. Do not vainly waste a moment, but always cherish time.'
(8.1.12, p 487)

'Such examples as [Jinhua] Juzhi's one finger, Huangbo's sixty hits, Baizhang's whisk, Linji's shout, Dongshan [Shouchu]'s three pounds of sesame, and Yunmen's dried shitstick are not caught up in the stages from living beings to Buddha, and they already transcend the boundaries of delusion and enlightenment.'
(8.2.11, p 519)

'This practice is the effort of zazen. It is customary that such practice is not abandoned, even after reaching buddhahood, so that it is [still] practiced by a buddha. Teaching and verification should be examined in the same way. This zazen was transmitted from Buddha to Buddha, directly pointed out by ancestors, and only [transmitted] by legitimate successors. Even when others hear of its name, it is not the same as the zazen of buddha ancestors. This is because the principle of zazen in other schools is to wait for enlightenment. For example, [their practice] is like having crossed over a great ocean on a raft, thinking that upon crossing the ocean one should discard the raft. The zazen of our buddha ancestors is not like this, but is simply Buddha's practice. We could say that the situation of Buddha's house is the oneness in which the essence, practice, and expounding are one and the same. The essence is verification of enlightenment; expounding is the teaching; and practice is cultivation. Even up to now, these have been studied together.

We should know that practice is the practice of essence and expounding; expounding is to expound the essence and practice; and the essence is the verification of expounding and practice. If practice is not the practice of expounding and is not the practice of verification of enlightenment, how can we say it is the practice of Buddha Dharma? If expounding is not the expounding of practice and is not the expounding of verification, it is difficult to call it the expounding of Buddha Dharma. If verification is not the verification of practice and is not the verification of expounding, how can we name it the verification of the Buddha Dharma? Just know that Buddha Dharma is one in the beginning, middle, and end. It is good in the beginning, middle, and end; it is nothing in the beginning, middle, and end; and it is empty in the beginning, middle, and end. This single matter never comes from the forceful activity of people, but from the beginning is the expression and activity of Dharma.'

(p 521)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 3rd, 2021 at 10:20 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Malcolm said:

You quote below is a recognition that the Buddha continued to practice shamatha, which is true.

Astus wrote:

If zazen meant only samatha, then why would it ever turn into insight? Then it should be rightfully called the 'teaching for humans and gods' (人天教) that can bring about birth in those realms but not any liberation, as Guifeng Zongmi wrote (Treatise on the Origin of Humanity, in Three Short Treatises, BDK ed, p 153; T45n1886p708c20-21) 'if a person practices the four kinds of meditation and the eight kinds of concentration, he or she will be reborn in the heavens of form and formlessness.'

Malcolm said:

Clearly, in the passage I provided before, Dogen acknowledged that there is a liminal point of understanding.

Astus wrote:

If there were such a point, then he would be contradicting himself not just vis-a-vis his other works, but even in the same chapter
(<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=568052#p568052>).

Malcolm said:

One certainly can't expect that a beginner is going to have this understanding immediately merely because they sit in a stiff posture.

Astus wrote:

It is not the posture that matters much, but the mind.

From <https://antaiji.org/en/dharma/okumura-mind-and-zazen/>:

'If you are able to sit in a cross-legged position during zazen that is fine, but if it that is too painful for you it is alright, too; sitting cross-legged is not strictly necessary for meditation.'

...

'Dogen Zenji said we should give up even the aspiration to become Buddha in our zazen. And this is the meaning of just sitting. When we practice in this way, just aiming at and letting go even of the aspiration to be enlightened, then Buddhahood is there. When we are actually doing that letting go, then Buddha nature is truly revealed. When we give up our gaining mind, then our true life force arises and is actualized.'

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 3rd, 2021 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Malcolm said:

The Buddha has no further need of insight, since in a buddha śamatha and vipaśyāna are in union. This is not the case for others.

Astus wrote:

The Buddha has also regularly abided in emptiness (suññatāvihāra) and recommended others to do the same: "This field of perception is empty of the perception of the defilements of sensuality, desire to be reborn, and ignorance. There is only this that is not emptiness, namely that associated with the six sense fields dependent on this body and conditioned by life." That's how emptiness is born in them—genuine, undistorted, and pure. Whatever ascetics and brahmins enter and remain in the pure, ultimate, supreme emptiness—whether in the past, future, or present—all of them enter and remain in this same pure, ultimate, supreme emptiness.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn121/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 4th, 2021 at 12:04 AM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

LastLegend said:

Flesh it out! How is emptiness abided? What you mean born!? Or how is born born ?

Astus wrote:

For an extensive treatment of the topic see chapters 4-7 of <https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/compassionemptiness.pdf>, and for a shorter one chapter 21 of <https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/meditatorslifebuddha.pdf> by Bhikkhu Analayo.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 4th, 2021 at 5:32 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Malcolm said:

Sure, but at this point, it is not really insight since there is nothing left for a buddha to do.

Astus wrote:

Just as there is nothing left to be done in zazen, or as it is sometimes put:

<http://www.sanshinji.org/sanshin-style-blog/why-zazen-is-good-for-nothing-1>

(mushotoku 無所得 - anupalabdha).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 4th, 2021 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Malcolm said:

And yet Dogen talks about gaining thorough understanding, what maddening inconsistencies.

Astus wrote:

The thorough understanding of what?

'What is sudden awakening (tongo 頓悟)? Answer: Sudden is to suddenly remove false thoughts (muunen 妄念). Awakening is to awaken to nothing to gain (mushotoku 無所得).'

(<https://ymba.org/books/entering-cao-sudden-enlightenment/treatise-entering-cao-sudden-enlightenment;X63n1223p18a10>)

'Additionally, if a person retaining the concept of there being anything to be gained (ushotoku 有所得) generates the bodhi resolve and then proceeds to cultivate kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy, equanimity, giving, moral virtue, patience, vigor, dhyāna absorption, and wisdom, doing so for an incalculable number of asaṃkhyeyas of kalpas, one should realize that, on account of retaining the concept of something to be gained, such a person will not succeed in leaving behind birth and death and will not succeed in progressing towards bodhi.'

(http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/V-Bcitta_excerpts/VBcitta_X-21_X-10.pdf;T32n1659p515c12-15)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 5th, 2021 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Matt J said:

By working with Buddhist practices, we actually come to see that what we thought was solid is not solid, what we thought was graspable is not graspable, and what we thought was fulfilling is not fulfilling. In this way, a natural type of letting go occurs.

Astus wrote:

How about going directly to letting go of thoughts

(https://www.sotozen.com/eng/library/key_terms/pdf/key_terms08.pdf)?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 5th, 2021 at 4:49 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Malcolm said:

Looks like we didn't need any of this Zen stuff to begin with: Nagarjuna writes, "Nothing here to establish, nothing to remove, when reality is truly seen, liberation."

Astus wrote:

From Nagarjuna this fits nicely:

'Then again, if the bodhisattva refrains from taking up the practice of any particular dharma, because he does not apprehend (futoku 不得) any dharma whatsoever, he may thereby succeed in realizing prajñāpāramitā!... 'If one is able to practice the dharma of "no practice" in this manner, in every case, nothing whatsoever is gained (mushotoku 無所得). Inverted views, falseness, and afflictions are finally not produced at all. Because one remains as pure as empty space, one succeeds then in realizing the true character of dharmas. One takes having nothing whatsoever which is gained (mushotoku 無所得) as that which is gained.'

(http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/N6P_excerpts/N6P_X-Bk4_X-15.pdf; T25n1509p197a12-13, 24-26)

Malcolm said:

"Let go of letting go." Jetsun Drakpa Gyaltsen

Astus wrote:

That's a proliferation of ideas about letting go, nevertheless, Baizhang Huaihai taught a version of it with three stages:

'If one no longer loves or grasps, and yet abides in not loving or grasping and considers it correct, this is the elementary good; this is abiding in the subdued mind. This is a disciple; he is one who is fond of the raft and will not give it up. This is the way of the two vehicles. This is a result of meditation. Once you do not grasp any more, and yet do not dwell in nonattachment either, this is the intermediate good. This is the half-word teaching. This is still the formless realm; though you avoid falling into the way of the two vehicles, and avoid falling into the ways of demons, this is still a meditation sickness. This is the bondage of bodhisattvas. Once you no longer dwell in nonattachment, and do not even make an understanding of not dwelling either, this is the final good; this is the full-word teaching. You avoid falling into the formless realm, avoid falling into meditation sickness, avoid falling into the way of bodhisattvas, and avoid falling into the state of the king of demons.'

(Sayings and Doings of Pai-Chang, p 30-31)

But something more pertinent from him:

'Question: What is the essential method for sudden enlightenment in the great vehicle? The master said, You all should first put an end to all involvements and lay to rest all concerns; do not remember or recollect anything at all, whether good or bad, mundane or transcendental - do not engage in thoughts. Let go of body and mind, set them free. With mind like wood or stone, not explaining anything with the mouth, mind not going anywhere, then the mind ground becomes like space, wherein the sun of wisdom naturally appears. It is as though the clouds had opened and the sun emerged.'

(p 77-78)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 5th, 2021 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Malcolm said:

More words = more proliferation.

Astus wrote:

Okumura roshi on Dogen:

'Although he advised his students not to waste time arguing or criticizing, and he himself tried not to argue, he was not able to follow his own advice. I rather like his inconsistency on this point. I feel like he was an actual human being.'

(The Mountains and Waters Sūtra: A Practitioner's Guide to Dōgen's "Sansuikyo", 2-2)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 6th, 2021 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Matt J said:

I don't think it is possible, unless one is of the highest capacity.

Astus wrote:

Apparently Dogen believed zazen to be applicable to everyone.

'Ejo asked, "If so, what thing or what practice should we choose to devote ourselves to among the various ways of practice of the buddha-dharma?"

Dogen replied, "It depends upon one's character or capability, however, up to now, it is zazen which has been handed down and concentrated on in the communities of the patriarchs. This practice is suitable for all people and can be practiced by those of superior, mediocre, or inferior capabilities.'

(Shobogenzo Zuimonki 1.14)

'If one concentrates on practicing zazen continuously, even an ignorant person, who does not understand a single question, can be superior to an intelligent person who has been studying for a long time.'

(5.23)

'The sages in the past did not necessarily have golden bones. Ancient practitioners did not all have superior capabilities. Not such a long time has passed since the Buddha's death. Even in the age of the Buddha not everyone was sharp witted. Some were good and others were not. Among the monks, there were some who did incredibly evil things, and others who had a very low intellect. None of them, however, demeaned themselves or failed to arouse bodhi-mind; none failed to study the Way on the grounds of not being a vessel of the dharma.'

(6.2)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 6th, 2021 at 12:19 AM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Malcolm said:

Have you ever tried to hold onto a thought? I think you will find it slips right through your fingers.

Astus wrote:

Isn't it truly unattainable (mushotoku 無所得) then?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 6th, 2021 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: Soto zen and problem of satori

Content:

Malcolm said:

Just like the limpid quality of water when it is undisturbed, remain relaxed without mental contrivances.

Just as a bird in the sky leaves no tracks, consciousness remains without support.

Just like the sun not concealed by clouds, remain in one's own unobstructed state relaxing into the objects of the six sense organs.

Just like water always falling, remain undistracted at all times and in all activities.

Dombhi Heruka

Astus wrote:

The bird leaving no tracks is a good old metaphor for coursing in emptiness (Thag 1.92;

Dhp 7.92-93), and at least the bird and the fish come up in the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Zazen_shin, where a poem of https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Hongzhi_Zhengjue is quoted, commented upon, and then replied to in verse by Dogen. Here are the last two stanzas from each:

Hongzhi (SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 2, p 124; T2582_.82.0119c18-21):

'There has been no discriminating thought:
The sensing, without any duality, is singular.
There has been not the slightest dawning:
The illumination, without any grasping, is complete.
The water is clean right to the bottom,
Fishes are swimming, slowly, slowly.
The sky is wide beyond limit,
And birds are flying, far, far away.'

Dogen (p127-128; T2582_.82.0120c25-28):

'There has been no tainting of the immediacy:
That immediacy is without reliance yet it gets free.
There has been no rightness or divergence in the experience*:
That state of experience is without design yet it makes effort.
The water is clean, right down to the ground,
Fishes are swimming like fishes.
The sky is wide, clear through to the heavens,
And birds are flying like birds.'

*shou 證: realisation, verification

Malcolm said:

Other robes and bone ornaments, do you really see any difference between this and Dogen?

Astus wrote:

I'd say all three poems convey the same intention but with different emphasis. Dombipa gives awareness-emptiness, Hongzhi appearance-emptiness (or https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Huayan#Li_and_Shi 理事), and Dogen dependence-emptiness (or <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Essence-Function> 體用).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 9th, 2021 at 4:35 PM

Title: Re: What is and isn't Yogacara?

Content:

mabw said:

I suppose step 1 is to ask What exactly is "visaya"?

Astus wrote:

When one sees a bar of chocolate and intends to eat it commonly it is assumed that there is real (not just imagined/conceived/thought) chocolate to eat, and that one wants to eat it because chocolate is tasty. Yogacara points out that the bar of chocolate exists only as a mental image (the object/visaya), in other words, it is because one has the idea of a tasty bar of chocolate that one can have any intentions (artha) towards it. Even in common parlance it is quite well known that what is tasty for one person is disgusting for another, in other words, the aesthetic quality of an object is subjective (that is: imagined/conceived/thought). Yogacara goes a little further by saying that what is assumed to be out there (outside mind, not as a mere concept) is actually nothing more than an idea, a conceptual image of a thing, and not a "real" thing.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 11th, 2021 at 6:12 PM

Title: Re: "there is nothing to teach here" said the master

Content:

master of puppets said:

What does it mean?

Astus wrote:

It is standard Mahayana that samsara comes from conceptual attachment, that the teachings are only of relative value, and that a bodhisattva should not conceive anything as existing or not existing, thus relinquishing all grasping at ideas.

The Buddha said to Subhūti, "What do you think? When the tathāgata studied under Dīpaṃkara Buddha, did he gain any attainment in the dharma?"

"World-honored One, when the Tathāgata studied under Dīpaṃkara Buddha, there was, in reality, nothing that he attained in the dharma."

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html#div-11, tr C. Muller)

'And, Mahamati, the Tathagatas do not teach the doctrine that is dependent upon letters. As to letters, their being or non-being is not attainable; it is otherwise with the thought that is never dependent on letters. Again, Mahamati, anyone that discourses on a truth that is dependent on letters is a mere prattler because truth is beyond letters. For this reason, Mahamati, it is declared in the canonical text by myself and other Buddhas and Bodhisattvas that not a letter is uttered or answered by the Tathagatas. For what reason? Because truths are not dependent on letters. It is not that they never declare what is in conformity with meaning; when they declare anything, it is according to the discrimination [of all beings]. If, Mahamati, the truth is not declared¹ [in words] the scriptures containing all truths will disappear, and when the scriptures disappear there will be no Buddhas, Sravakas, Pratyekabuddhas, and Bodhisattvas; and when there is no one [to teach], what is to be taught and to whom? For this reason, then, Mahamati, the Bodhisattva-Mahasattva is not to become attached to the words of the canonical texts. Mahamati, owing to the functioning of the minds of sentient beings, the canonical texts sometimes deviate from their straightforward course; religious discourses are given by myself and other Tathagatas, Arhats, Fully-Enlightened Ones in response to varieties of faiths on the part of beings, in order to remove them from [the bondage of] the Citta, Manas and Manovijnana, and not for the attainment and establishment of self-realisation which issues from noble wisdom. When there is the recognition of the fact that all things are characterised with imagelessness and that there is nothing in the world but what is seen of the Mind itself, there is the discarding of the dualistic discrimination.'

(Lankavatara Sutra, 3.76, tr D.T. Suzuki)

'This halting of cognizing everything, the halting of hypostatizing, is blissful.

No Dharma whatsoever was ever taught by the Buddha to anyone.'

(Mulamadhyamakakarika 25.24, tr M. Siderits & S. Katsura)

One day the Councilor Wang visited the master. When he met the master in front of the Monks' Hall, he asked,

"Do the monks of this monastery read the sutras?"

"No, they don't read sutras," said the master.

"Then do they learn meditation?" asked the councilor.

"No, they don't learn meditation," answered the master.

"If they neither read sutras nor learn meditation, what in the world are they doing?" asked the councilor.

"All I do is make them become buddhas and patriarchs," said the master.

The councilor said, "Though gold dust is valuable, in the eyes it causes cataracts."

"I always used to think you were just a common fellow," said the master.

(Record of Linji, p 38, tr R. F. Sasaki)

'I have no choice; if I tell you that right now nothing is the matter, I have already buried you. However much you want to make progress and seek intellectual understanding by looking for words and chasing after phrases and setting up questions and inquiries by means of a thousand differences and myriad distinctions: it just brings you a glib tongue and leads you further and further from the Way. Where is there an end to this?'

(Record of Yunmen, 1.22, tr U. App)

'There is not much to Buddhism; it only requires you to make a statement plainly and simply, that is all. But what is a plain and simple statement? If someone asked me, I'd say, "It's already become two statements." Understand?

An ancient said, "The Buddhas and Zen masters have given a clear and detailed explanation of what is beyond words, but most of those who get here are confused, muddled, and uncomprehending."

If you don't see this, you are asleep on your feet. You are always in the light, and yet do not know it, even with your eyes open. How do you expect me to do anything for you?'

(Foyan Qingyuan, in Instant Zen, p 28, tr T. Cleary)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 13th, 2021 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: 4 principles

Content:

Astus wrote:

Looks like a weird rendition of the https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Four_Dharmadh%C4%81tu.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 26th, 2021 at 6:29 AM

Title: Re: Are there any realist schools (mind independent reality exists conventionally) in Mahayana or Vajrayana?

Content:

Dgj said:

Defining "realist" at a minimum, as: There exists, at least conventionally, mind independent reality.

Astus wrote:

As far as I'm aware, all schools accept the basic doctrines of the five aggregates and six sensory areas, meaning that there is a rupaskandha apart from the mental aggregates, and there are the five physical senses and sense objects separately from the mental one. But that is already a Dharmic analysis (ultimate reality in abhidharma) of the conventional reality where it is clear to everyone that the body is not the mind, and that all outer objects are neither one's body nor one's mind. As Asanga put it: 'The imagined pattern is the appearance of nonexistent objects, which are only conscious constructs, as real.' (Mahayanasamgraha 2.1.3, BDK ed, p 38)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 27th, 2021 at 6:25 AM

Title: Re: Chant Namu Amida Butsu or Nam Myoho Renge Kyo?

Content:

coldbeer said:

Which of these two can bring a person faster towards buddhahood? I will like to hear arguments from both sides.

Astus wrote:

Buddhahood is attained through the practice of the six paramitas. Chanting can be used as part of one's practice, but it's insufficient on its own to bring about realisation, much less complete awakening.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 28th, 2021 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: Are there any realist schools (mind independent reality exists conventionally) in Mahayana or Vajrayana?

Content:

Dgj said:

Could you please provide some quotes demonstrating conventional mind independent reality, or where rupa is explained as mind independent conventionally, or anything like this?

Astus wrote:

Any scientific periodical or book that discusses objective physical reality.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 28th, 2021 at 4:35 AM

Title: Re: Are there any realist schools (mind independent reality exists conventionally) in Mahayana or Vajrayana?

Content:

Dgj said:

Sorry, I meant from Buddhists, my fault for not being clear. Like someone modern, or someone ancient like Chandrakirti or Tsongkhapa.

Astus wrote:

I reckon it is scientific knowledge currently that represents the commonly accepted truths of intelligent people, so it is what defines the content of valid worldly conventional truth.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 1st, 2021 at 4:05 PM

Title: Re: Are there any realist schools (mind independent reality exists conventionally) in Mahayana or Vajrayana?

Content:

Dgj said:

Like someone modern, or someone ancient like Chandrakirti or Tsongkhapa.

Astus wrote:

It could rather be turned around and considered if there is actually anyone who says that conventionally there are no external objects. It seems to be a common mistake to read 'mind only' as if it meant some sort of divine force where people can literally create objects by their magical mental power.

Anyway, it is emphasised by Gelugpas that (their version of) Prasangika asserts outer objects. See <https://studybuddhism.com/en/advanced-studies/abhidharma-tenet-systems/the-indian-tenet-systems/the-four-buddhist-tenet-systems-regarding-the-two-truths/svatantrika-and-prasangika-the-two-truths> and <https://studybuddhism.com/en/advanced-studies/abhidharma-tenet-systems/the-tibetan-traditions/special-features-of-the-gelug-tradition>.

Longchenpa is also known for a similar position, see e.g.

<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/the-great-chariot/d/doc212949.html>: 'but those who grasp the exaggerated conception that objects that appear are mind are exponents of a truly serious illogic.'

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 17th, 2021 at 5:49 PM

Title: Re: Has anyone read On Realizing There is Only the Virtual Nature of Consciousness

Content:

Manjushri said:

By the way, are there other translations of this text from, say, Shambhala, Wisdom, or some other Buddhist publishers?

Astus wrote:

There's a good translation by Wei Tat, and one by Francis Cook published by BDK.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 20th, 2021 at 7:41 PM

Title: Re: Does Zen teach that true nature has an independent self-existence?

Content:

Russian said:

From the Zen point of view, does true nature have an independent existence, or is it still dependent, has causality?

Astus wrote:

There is no Zen point of view. There were/are teachers who emphasise(d) emptiness/nonbeing (wu 無), while others emphasise(d) existence/being (you 有). From this you get in Zen:

A monk asked Zhaozhou: 'Does a dog have (you 有) buddha-nature or not (wu 無)?'

Zhou said: 'No' (wu 無).

If you are interested in some Mahayana background on the matter, start with the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Awakening_of_Faith_in_the_Mahayana:

'suchness has two aspects if predicated in words. One is that it is truly empty (sunya), for [this aspect] can, in the final sense, reveal what is real. The other is that it is truly nonempty (asunya), for its essence itself is endowed with undefiled and excellent qualities.'

(<https://bdkamerica.org/product/the-awakening-of-faith/>, p 14)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 20th, 2021 at 9:00 PM

Title: Re: Does Zen teach that true nature has an independent self-existence?

Content:

Russian said:

In general, the question is: this suchness, which on the one hand is empty, and on the other hand is not empty, because it has qualities, it is conditioned, does this suchness have a cause, or is it not conditioned, has no cause? Is it causal, or causeless?

Astus wrote:

You might want to look into the second chapter of the Samdhinirmocana Sutra:

"Good son, the term 'conditioned' is a provisional word invented by the First Teacher. Now, if it is a provisional word invented by the First Teacher, then it is a verbal expression apprehended by imagination. And if it is a verbal expression apprehended by imagination, then, in the final analysis, such an imagined description does not validate a real thing. Therefore, the conditioned does not exist. Good son, the term 'unconditioned' is also invented from language [and it also validates nothing real]." (<https://bdkamerica.org/product/the-scripture-on-the-explication-of-underlying-meaning/>, p 11)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 21st, 2021 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: Does Zen teach that true nature has an independent self-existence?

Content:

Astus wrote:

From the Record of Mazu (Sun-Face Buddha, p 78):

A monk asked, "Why does the Venerable say that mind is Buddha?"

The Patriarch said, "To stop small children's crying."

The monk asked, "What do you say when they have stopped crying?"

The Patriarch said, "It is neither mind nor Buddha."

The monk asked, "And when you have someone who does not belong to either of these two, how do you instruct him?"

The Patriarch said, "I tell him that it is not a thing."

The monk asked, "And how about when you suddenly meet someone who is there?"

The Patriarch said, "I teach him to directly realize the Great Way."

From the Record of Yunmen (section 193):

Once the Master said, "As long as the light has not yet broken through, there are two kinds of disease: (1) The first consists in seeing oneself facing objects and being left in the dark about everything; (2) The second consists in having been able to pierce through to the emptiness of all separate entities (dharmas)—yet there still is something that in a hidden way is like an object.

"[Views about] the body of the teaching also exhibit two kinds of disease; (1) Having been able to reach the body of the Buddhist teaching, one still has subjective views and is at the margin of that teaching because one has not gotten rid of one's attachment to it; (2) Even though one has managed to penetrate through to the body of the Buddhist teaching, one is still unable to let go of it. But if one examines this [teaching] thoroughly, it's stone-dead. That's also a disease!"

Case 30 of the Book of Serenity:

A monk asked Dasui, "When the fire at the end of an aeon rages through and the whole universe is destroyed, is this destroyed or not?"

Dasui said, "Destroyed."

The monk said, "Then it goes along with that?"

Dasui said, "It goes along with that."

A monk asked Longji, "When the fire ending the aeon rages through and the whole universe is destroyed, is this destroyed or not?"

Longji said, "Not destroyed."

The monk said, "Why is it not destroyed?"

Longji said, "Because it is the same as the universe."

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 21st, 2021 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: Does Zen teach that true nature has an independent self-existence?

Content:

karmanyipgo said:

doesn't Zen have more Cittamatra or Yogacara influence? So might this influence description of ultimate reality in a way that focuses more on is-ness?

Astus wrote:

If anything, it was influenced more by Madhyamaka

(https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/East_Asian_M%C4%81dhyamaka) in its early phase.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 21st, 2021 at 5:25 PM

Title: Re: Able to awaken to our innate Buddha-nature through our actual practice?

Content:

Astus wrote:

How does one actually awaken to buddha-nature according to Nichiren's teachings?

Does one realise the emptiness of self and dharmas? If so, how? If not, how are defilements eliminated?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 21st, 2021 at 6:58 PM

Title: Re: Does Zen teach that true nature has an independent self-existence?

Content:

Russian said:

Question: According to Zen, the state of the Buddha is causal, or is it rather the image of the sun hiding behind the clouds?

Astus wrote:

Zen, like other East Asian schools (Tiantai, Huayan, Jingtu), accepts the tathagatagarbha doctrine. Where one gets easily mistaken is taking buddha-nature as a distinct object (or subject), some sort of soul or atman. The practical relevance of the idea of tathagatagarbha is that once the defilements are gone the buddha qualities are present, therefore one does not develop them but rather lets them appear. That's how prajnaparamita can be sufficient on its own, and that's why sudden awakening to buddhahood becomes an option. But it does not mean buddha-nature should be conceived as a thing, or a special state of mind. Quite the opposite actually, with totally abandoning attachments there is nothing left to affirm or deny.

'Followers of the Way, make no mistake! All the dharmas of this world and of the worlds beyond are without self-nature. Also, they are without produced nature. They are just empty names, and these names are also empty. All you are doing is taking these worthless names to be real. That's all wrong! Even if they do exist, they are nothing but states of dependent transformation, such as the dependent transformations of bodhi, nirvana, emancipation, the threefold body, the [objective] surroundings and the [subjective] mind, bodhisattvahood, and buddhahood. What are you looking for in these lands of dependent transformations! All of these, up to and including the Three Vehicles' twelve divisions of teachings, are just so much waste paper to wipe off privy filth. The Buddha is just a phantom body, the patriarchs just old monks.'

(Record of Linji, p 19, tr Sasaki)

Note that in the Treatise on Awakening of Faith itself it is explicitly stated so:

'All explanations by words are provisional and without validity, for they are merely used in accordance with illusions and are incapable [of denoting suchness]. The term suchness likewise has no attributes [which can be verbally specified]. The term suchness is, so to speak, the limit of verbalization wherein a word is used to put an end to words. But the essence of suchness itself cannot be put an end to, for all things [in their absolute aspect] are real; nor is there anything which needs to be pointed out as real, for all things are equally in the state of suchness. It should be understood that all things are incapable of being verbally explained or thought of; hence, the name suchness.'

'If they understand that, concerning all things, though they are spoken of, there is neither that which speaks, nor that which can be spoken of, and though they are thought of, there is neither that which thinks, nor that which can be thought of, then they are said to have conformed to it. And when they are freed from their thoughts, they are said to have entered into it.'

(BDK ed, p 13, 14)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 21st, 2021 at 8:23 PM

Title: Re: Able to awaken to our innate Buddha-nature through our actual practice?

Content:

tkp67 said:

Chanting Nam Myoho Renge Kyo

Astus wrote:

How does that remove craving, hatred, and delusion?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 21st, 2021 at 8:36 PM

Title: Re: Able to awaken to our innate Buddha-nature through our actual practice?

Content:

narhwal90 said:

what the practice may do is remove fear and uncertainty, remove grasping, promote confidence, courage, empathy. Perhaps something akin to the Upaddha sutra's "holy life" - I'm not in a position to distinguish.

Astus wrote:

If practice means recitation, how does it do all those removals? Generally there are methods to alleviate defilements, like contemplation of the four immeasurables to counter things like anger and jealousy, and ultimately it is through insight that one can gain wisdom to remove ignorance. The Upaddha Sutta presents the good friend as the source of one's mastery of the eightfold path, but it is the practice of the eightfold path that eliminates the defilements. If one were to just recite the eightfold path, I don't see how that could be equal to actually putting it into practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 22nd, 2021 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: Able to awaken to our innate Buddha-nature through our actual practice?

Content:

tkp67 said:

When one chants Nam(u) Myoho Renge Kyo one actually evokes Shakyamuni's supreme, complete and perfect enlightenment within their own life for that moment.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean like the practice of mindfulness of the Buddha

(<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Buddh%C4%81nusm%E1%B9%9Bti>)?

tkp67 said:

The more one chants with deep faith in this teaching one can eradicate every illness the buddha was capable of healing.

Astus wrote:

How can mindfulness of the Buddha (or recitation of the title of the Lotus Sutra) generate insight into emptiness? It can serve as a method to calm the mind, but where is the wisdom coming from? Where does the contemplation on the three thousand realms in one thought come up?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 22nd, 2021 at 6:43 PM

Title: Re: Able to awaken to our innate Buddha-nature through our actual practice?

Content:

Minobu said:

How does one incite Emptiness ? what does that even mean.

Astus wrote:

Methods to gain insight is given in the works of Zhiyi for instance.

Minobu said:

thats a TenDai thing i believe.

We don't actually contemplate the three thousand realms we are just made aware of them.

Astus wrote:

Yes, it is the first of the <https://www.nichirenlibrary.org/en/dic/Content/T/59> in the Mohezhi Guan of Zhiyi. So, you say then that it is used as a purely theoretical background and not for actual meditation? If so, how is wisdom developed?

Minobu said:

you are now looking at the whole matter from a provisional methodology

Astus wrote:

According to Zhiyi (http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/EBM_excerpts/EBM_X-16_X-00.pdf): 'Insight (vipaśyanā) is the primary essential through which one is able to cut off the delusions.' If that is not how Nichiren understood it, then what can remove ignorance according to him?

Although <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=573819#p573819> quoted <https://www.nichirenlibrary.org/en/wnd-1/Content/1> that points to polishing the mirror of the mind with recitation, but then the text also mentions looking into the mind to see the meaning of myō, so that seems like an act of contemplation to gain insight. Or is that not how it is interpreted?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 22nd, 2021 at 7:52 PM

Title: Re: What is self-nature (self-essence) in the Altar Sutra of the sixth Patriarch?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is a fine definition of self-nature (zixing 自性 - also used as a translation of svabhāva, but its Chan usage should not be confused with those found in other schools) in the https://books.google.co.in/books/about/Historical_Dictionary_of_Chan_Buddhism.html?id=uicnDwAAQBAJ:

'A Chan soteriological term referring to a person's Buddha-nature. It does not denote any self-existence or any changeless essence existent in and by itself. No such metaphysical meaning is involved in the original use of this term. A notable case of the traditional Chan usage of this term is in the Platform Sūtra, where Buddha-nature is equivalent to self-nature (zixing) in the sense that Buddha-nature cannot be objectified and realized outside each person. Seeing or realizing the Buddha-nature is the existential transformation of the human mind and entire personhood, being able to understand and appreciate what constitutes a person—elements of impermanence and non-abiding—and then accordingly. The realization of self-nature thus requires the accomplishment of action the practical-behavioral carrying out of non-attachment, rather than identifying a metaphysical object or discovering subjectivity through knowledge. The usage also indicates the Chan appropriation of positive or kataphatic language in its teachings without abandoning the use of negative or apophatic language: the Chan walk on two roads.'

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 22nd, 2021 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: Able to awaken to our innate Buddha-nature through our actual practice?

Content:

tkp67 said:

The Teacher of the Law chapter of the Lotus Sutra explains the benefits of those who chant daimoku.

Astus wrote:

The quoted section talks of what a teacher should do or have as prerequisites (similarly to chapter 14), not what the benefits of expounding are (as given in chapter 19 for instance). So it seems like a valid question to me to ask how one can actually have the mentioned qualities of compassion, gentleness, forbearing, and the wisdom of emptiness in order to be able to then expound the sutra.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 22nd, 2021 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: Able to awaken to our innate Buddha-nature through our actual practice?

Content:

Minobu said:

We see the emptiness of anger and know it is just but one factor in the whole 3000 world thing..So we get to sit back and view it as such and don't act on it.

I actually meditate on higher worlds whilst chanting ODaimoku after one of these episodes of anger or hunger nature etc..and it allows me to move on..

So we use the knowledge to adjust our daily living. Also it shows me my life condition and we then must acknowledge our passing into the lower worlds and we must work on it.

Astus wrote:

Are there teachings and techniques taught for such alleviation of impulses by Nichiren, or is it something you learnt on your own or from somewhere else?

Minobu said:

in our school people develop better lives and learn to work on their lives which are marred by negative Karma.

Astus wrote:

I think it's what everyone tries to do. The question is about how that is achieved and to what extent, like actually awakening to buddha-nature.

Minobu said:

when you say how is wisdom developed.

The approach is much different.

It's like thisyou chant to call forth the ultimate Reality inside you ..and you promise to keep this practice for your entire life and pray to meet up again in future rebirths... so your life becomes one of being,student , and a son or daughter, and a subject of Sovereign Lord Sakyamuni Buddha..

Astus wrote:

Would you say then that the goal is not much about accomplishing the bodhisattva path by becoming a buddha, but more earthly ones?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 23rd, 2021 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: Able to awaken to our innate Buddha-nature through our actual practice?

Content:

Minobu said:

Then if I say something about every day life it becomes "OH you want to answer your earthly desires and not consummate Buddhahood in your life."

how do you separate everyday life from Buddhahood...

Astus wrote:

There can be different goals and accordingly there are different means to reach them. Accumulating merit is an important and widespread practice in Buddhism, and it can give one all sorts of benefits in this life, in the next life, in the human and the heavenly realms, and can help not only oneself but others too. It is no small thing at all. It can also assist in attaining liberation, however, the one thing it cannot generate is liberation itself, because that requires wisdom. I have no doubts about reciting the title of the Lotus Sutra has immeasurable merits. What I fail to see is how one can also accumulate wisdom with it.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 23rd, 2021 at 4:31 PM

Title: Re: Able to awaken to our innate Buddha-nature through our actual practice?

Content:

tkp67 said:

Thus for that brief period a person chants daimoku they actually hold the whole of this experience within their mind stream. There is no practice that takes all of the requirements to fulfill the lotus sutra so one might gain the benefits therein.

Astus wrote:

Just to see if I understand you correctly. Is it the case that chanting the daimoku means that purely because of those words the Buddha's complete awakening is present in one's mind, rendering the mind of the chanter equal to that of a buddha, therefore nothing else is needed since just by chanting one has perfected everything there is to attain? Or is it that the chanting connects somehow one to the Buddha's awakening and it gradually purifies the mind over time simply by the force of that connection?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 23rd, 2021 at 4:53 PM

Title: Re: Able to awaken to our innate Buddha-nature through our actual practice?

Content:

Minobu said:

This quest for wisdom noble as it may feel to you , has nothing to do with the actual ability to awaken our innate Buddha nature, with this practice in Mappo.

Astus wrote:

The root cause of samsara is ignorance, to achieve permanent liberation one needs to eliminate ignorance, and wisdom is the antidote for that. If you say that wisdom is not needed for awakening, then do you also say ignorance is not the root cause? If ignorance is not the cause of samsara, what is? But if ignorance is the ultimate source, how could anything but wisdom overcome it?

Minobu said:

case in point no one you know or will ever know experiences the realizations you and Malcolm claim to be the gold standard in Buddhism

Astus wrote:

Does that mean that Nichiren did not aim for liberation and buddhahood, because those were impossible to achieve in his opinion?

Minobu said:

A mere uneducated illiterate peasant can awaken their innate Buddha Nature...Why... Because their teacher is The Eternal Buddha ...what you see as some calming effect in chanting is like one fleck of ice crystal on the iceberg...

Astus wrote:

If buddhahood is the goal and the result of practice, then all practitioners should show the qualities of a buddha (see e.g.:

<https://www.nichirenlibrary.org/en/dic/Content/E/22>), shouldn't they?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 23rd, 2021 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: Is the concept of amalavijnana characteristic of Zen, or not?

Content:

Russian said:

Question: Does Zen Buddhism adhere to the concept of the ninth consciousness-amalavijnana, or does it not? Does Zen recognize the concept of amalavijnana?

Astus wrote:

It is not much of a Zen idea. A quick search for

<https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/search/?q=%E9%98%BF%E6%91%A9%E7%BE%85%E8%AD%98&lang=en> showed that only 1 author

(https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Yongming_Yanshou) used it in two of his works

(Zongjinglu 宗鏡錄 and Wanshan tonggui ji 萬善同歸集) from all the Zen texts

(Chanzong bulei 禪宗部類), while there are 29 texts by 10 authors in the Yogacara category (Yujia bulei 瑜伽部類) and 13 texts by 3 authors in the Huayan category

(Huayan bulei 華嚴部類).

The idea of amalavijnana has been raised before on DW

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?t=1367> and

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=39&t=7126>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 23rd, 2021 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: Able to awaken to our innate Buddha-nature through our actual practice?

Content:

Minobu said:

And most important you are like receiving direct everything you need from Lord Sakyamuni Buddha.

Astus wrote:

Receiving what from Shakyamuni? If the Dharma, then what about what we have at hand from him, that is, the sutras themselves?

Minobu said:

It's spelled out clearly in The Lotus sutra and verified and put to the test by such Masters as Zhiyi and Venerable Mai Lo and Venerable Dengyo the Great and Finally from the life of Bodhisattva Jogyo in the body of Nichiren DaiShonin.

Astus wrote:

As far as I know, the masters Zhiyi, Zhanran (Miaole), and Saicho (Dengyo) taught mainly the practices of calming and insight, like the contemplation on the three thousand worlds in a single thought. If theirs are valid teachings, how do those relate to chanting the title of the Lotus Sutra?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 24th, 2021 at 8:30 PM

Title: Re: Please give a comment on the Xūyún (虛雲) gath

Content:

Astus wrote:

The poem is actually by Guling Shenzan of Fuzhou

(<https://authority.dila.edu.tw/person/search.php?aid=A019867>), an heir of Baizhang Huaihai (百丈懷海), and the verse itself, what was quoted by Xuyun, is found in fascicle 9 of the Jingde Chuandeng Lu (T51n2076_p0268a21-23):

靈光獨耀迥脫根塵。
體露真常不拘文字。
心性無染本自圓成。
但離妄緣即如如佛。

<https://www.emptycloud.net/articles-2/chan-meditation-%E7%A6%85/daily-lectures-at-two-cha-weeks-week-2/7/>:

Spiritual light shines on in solitude
Disentangling the sense organs from sense data.
Experience of true eternity
Depends not just on books.
Mind-nature being taintless
Fundamentally is perfect.
Freedom from falsehood-producing causes
Is the same as absolute Buddhahood.

Garma C. C. Chang translation (The Practice of Zen, p 20):

Singularly radiating is the wondrous Light;
Free is it from the bondage of matter and the senses.
Not binding by words and letters,
The Essence is nakedly exposed in its pure eternity.
Never defiled is the Mind-nature;
It exists in perfection from the very beginning.
By merely casting away your delusions
The Suchness of Buddhahood is realized.

Translation from <https://www.globaljiki.org/en/sub.do?menukey=4301&no=45>:

Spiritual light shines by itself and has transcended the world of consciousness.
Essence is exposed and not confined by words.
The mind is not tainted and is complete in itself.
Thus, if it can free itself from false conditions, it will be the true Buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 24th, 2021 at 10:26 PM

Title: Re: Please give a comment on the Xūyún (虛雲) gath

Content:

Astus wrote:

The poem gives a standard Zen teaching that by not grasping at the six sensory inputs with mistaken concepts (being/nonbeing, self/other, etc.), there is complete awakening.

靈光獨耀 Divine light shines alone - this refers back to the discourse between Jiexian and Shenzan about the Dharma hall, and at the same time introduces the topic as the liberated mind of the buddhas

迥脫根塵 Free from all sensory dust - it is free from the appearances in the six senses; dust (塵) referring both to sensory objects and to defilements

體露真常 The essence shows true permanence - it is buddha-mind that shows the ultimate reality

不拘文字 Not bound to letters - the nature of mind is not discovered with concepts, not learnt from books, also a reference to Jiexian's reading habits

心性無染 Mind's nature is untainted - there are no defilements in the nature of mind

本自圓成 Originally perfect and complete - no qualities need to be developed or added to it

但離妄緣 Just leave false conditions - one only has to let go of fictional concepts that condition the mind

即如如佛 That is buddha as such - it is suchness and buddhahood

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 25th, 2021 at 8:59 PM

Title: Re: The Four Foundations of Mindfulness

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is the practice of <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Satipatthana>. You can find plenty of materials on it from Theravada and Mahayana sources.

Some examples:

The Four Foundations of Mindfulness in Plain English by Bhante Henepola Gunaratana

Satipatthana: The Heart of Buddhist Meditation by Nyanaponika Thera

The Progress of Insight: A Treatise on Satipatthana Meditation by Mahasi Sayadaw

Transformation and Healing: Sutra on the Four Establishments of Mindfulness by Thich Nhat Hanh

Minding Closely: The Four Applications of Mindfulness by B. Alan Wallace

For a comparison of the Abhidharma and Mahayana approaches, see the Mahaprajnaparamita Shastra:

<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225570.html>

<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225580.html>

And for an in depth study of the Satipatthana Sutta, there are three works of Bhikkhu

Analayo (all available <https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/personen/analayo.html>):
Satipaṭṭhāna, the Direct Path to Realization
Perspectives on Satipaṭṭhāna
Satipaṭṭhāna Meditation: A Practice Guide

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, March 29th, 2021 at 9:34 PM
Title: Re: Does the Tathagata reside in Dhyana?
Content:
Owlsd said:
Does the Tathagata abide in Dhyana?

Astus wrote:
Dhyana usually signifies the eight levels of absorption, and in that sense it is not true that a buddha always abides in them. If by Dhyana you actually mean Chan/Zen as it is understood in the Chan school (and has practically nothing to do with dhyana as absorption/concentration/meditation), then it rather stands for buddha-nature, and of course a buddha is one who always abides in the buddha-nature.

Owlsd said:
My understanding stems from reading the bloodstream sermon:

Astus wrote:
Your quote is from the beginning of Red Pine's translation of the Wuxinglun 悟性論 he rendered as 'Wake-Up Sermon'.

Owlsd said:
Since the Tathagata essentially has no divisions and makes no distinctions, and since it essentially doesn't move or change when it goes from one state to another, doesn't that mean that anger/wisdom greed(desire)/morality and delusion/meditation(Dhyana) are essentially the same thing? If I see them as separate things isn't that delusion?

Astus wrote:
The three poisons (greed, anger, delusion) do not differ from the three trainings (morality, meditation, wisdom) in the sense that their nature are buddha-nature (佛性), that is: no-nature ('no nature of their own' 無實性); in other words, they are empty.

Owlsd said:
So Samsara is Nirvana, and the mind's Dhyana is the very delusions that constitute Samsara?

Astus wrote:
Nagarjuna wrote:

'Samsara does not differ

Even slightly from nirvana.
Nirvana does not differ
Even slightly from samsara.
The ultimate nature of nirvana
Is the ultimate nature of samsara;
And between these two, the slightest difference,
Even the most subtle, is not found.'
(MMK 25.19-20, tr Padmakara)

I do not know what you mean by the 'mind's Dhyana', but certainly it is delusion that is the source of samsara, and the nature of delusion is nirvana. Liberation is then to see the nature of one's delusion.

Again from Nagarjuna:

'One is not freed by existence;
One does not transcend samsara through non-existence;
It's through understanding existence and non-existence
That the great beings are liberated.'
(Yuktisastika, v 4, tr Thupten Jinpa)

And Bodhidharma:

'Whoever realizes that the six senses aren't real, that the five aggregates are fictions, that no such things can be located anywhere in the body, understands the language of Buddhas. The sutras say, "The cave of five aggregates is the hall of Zen. The opening of the inner eye is the door of the Great Vehicle." What could be clearer?
Not thinking about anything is Zen. Once you know this, walking, standing, sitting, or lying down, everything you do is Zen. To know that the mind is empty is to see the Buddha. The Buddhas of the ten directions have no mind. To see no mind is to see the buddha.'
(Wake-Up Sermon)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 29th, 2021 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Does the Tathagata reside in Dhyana?

Content:

Owlsd said:

Dhyana as I understand it, can be, (usually is) translated as meditation, but I think a more accurate term is probably clearly seeing, clear sight, something like that.

Astus wrote:

From the Princeton Dictionary of Buddhism:

dhyāna. (P. jhāna; T. bsam gtan; C. chan/chanding; J. zen/ zenjō; K. sŏn/sŏnjŏng 禪/禪定). In Sanskrit, “meditative absorption,” specific meditative practices during which the mind temporarily withdraws from external sensory awareness and remains completely absorbed in an ideational object of meditation. The term can refer both to the practice that leads to full absorption and to the state of full absorption itself.

For more on the general concept of dhyana, you can look into the Mahaprajnaparamita Shastra's relevant chapter: <https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/mahaprajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc82350.html>

Owlsd said:

I also understand Dhyana to be the origin of the word Chan and therefore Zen. ...
Buddha nature is Dhyana, which is Chan, Zen, etc.

Astus wrote:

Better not project the idea of Chan/Zen back to what is taught as dhyana in Buddhism in general based simply on etymology.

Owlsd said:

Is it true that Zen Masters don't talk about relative affairs, or teach on the basis of relative affairs?

Astus wrote:

Not true at all. Chan/Zen monasteries even had/have a whole extra set of rules, see e.g. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Chanyuan_Qinggui. Many of the famous Chan teachers were also abbots charged with leading and organising monasteries. It was their duty not only to regulate monastic affairs, but also to cooperate with the laity.

Owlsd said:

To my understanding Zen Masters taught on the basis of pointing to the mind, not positing right and wrong action and further deluding being in samsaric affairs.

Astus wrote:

That's a sort of idealised picture of a fictional 'Zen Master' based on a limited reading.

Owlsd said:

Truly the only desire I have is clarifying this issue. I want to understand the Buddhadharma to the best of my ability and to stop being misled by people clinging to beliefs.

Astus wrote:

Besides reading Zen works you should take a broader view of Buddhism, like reading about its history, and the teachings found in the sutras and treatises. Practically all Zen teachers were very knowledgeable about the whole of the Buddhist tradition. You can look at modern examples, like <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sheng-yen> and https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sh%C5%8Dhaku_Okumura.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 30th, 2021 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Does the Tathagata reside in Dhyana?

Content:

Owlsd said:

Still I'm talking about how they taught when people made serious inquiry into the Buddhadharma. When Emperor Wu questioned Bodhidharma he was told "No Merit." This isn't a teaching on the basis of right and wrong.

Astus wrote:

Koan is a specific genre of literature. If you want to see what teachers taught it's better to look at their recorded teachings and writings. One example would be Yongming Yanshou's Wanshan tonggui ji, in English see The Meaning of Myriad Good Deeds by Albert Welter, that discusses the importance of meritorious action. There are also some chapter in Dogen's Shobogenzo on the topic of karma, like Shinjininga and Sanjinogo.

Owlsd said:

Does the Buddhadharma and discussion of it, include relative affairs?

If I speak of sex, right and wrong, money, karma, reincarnation, Buddha's and devils, anything at all in the realm of relative affairs, am I still expressing the true Buddhadharma?

Astus wrote:

The teachings of karma and rebirth are central in all Buddhist schools, while the training in moral discipline is essential for any progress on the path. So yes, those topics are expressing the true Buddhadharma.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 30th, 2021 at 3:06 PM

Title: Re: Does the Tathagata reside in Dhyana?

Content:

Owlsd said:

Koans are castle studies of real interactions Zen Masters engaged in. Why would you dismiss what they say?

Astus wrote:

Koans are not records of historical events but religious literary products. They can be used in various ways and with various approaches. But they are definitely not the whole picture of what went on in various communities over the centuries.

Owlsd said:

I'm well aware they are part of Buddhist doctrine. I didn't ask about Buddhist doctrine, I asked about the Buddhadharma.

Let me rephrase as another question. Do you think the Buddhadharma is found in the teachings?

Astus wrote:

The Buddhadharma is what the Buddha taught, and what the Buddha taught are found in the sutras. Without the sutras even the word Buddhadharma is meaningless. That does not mean it is enough to just know the sutras, and that is something the sutras themselves agree on.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 30th, 2021 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: Do I understand correctly that Zen teaches not to check?

Content:

Russian said:

For Zen, to distinguish is the Hinayana method.

Astus wrote:

Wisdom is the goal of all Buddhists, because that is what brings liberation. It is of no use to merely suspend one's cognitive faculties, that would be just a temporary state that solves nothing, like shutting one's eyes but still being hit by the train. Not discriminating in Zen means freedom from grasping at the extremes of being and nonbeing, freedom from taking things personally as I and my. Actually it is very much in line with what you find in other schools, to eliminate ignorance and realise emptiness. The method and style is somewhat different, however.

Russian said:

according to Zen, karma does not accumulate, does not arise if there is no checking mind, that is, if the mind does not create anything?

Astus wrote:

It is when there is no attachment that the chain of dependent origination is severed, so it is in that way that there is no karma accumulated. But it's certainly not some sort of blank mind with no comprehension of what is going on, quite the opposite actually.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 31st, 2021 at 7:57 PM

Title: Re: We need sources that say that discriminating is the hinayana method

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Limiting Zen to a particular method or approach is IMO ... completely missing the point.

Astus wrote:

Zen is such a generic term that there are even those who limit it to a single method, like zazen or ganhwa.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 1st, 2021 at 5:02 PM

Title: Re: What's the source of this lines?

Content:

JoaoRodrigues said:

I was wondering what's the source, the text, from which this was taken.

Astus wrote:

What the monk says at the beginning (<https://blog.daum.net/ibakdal/17372311>):

무시무종(無始無終)에
본래무일물(本來無一物)이라.
시작도 끝도 없잖아.
나지도 죽지도 않은 이 한 물건.

The first two lines are the original Chinese, presumably reading from that book. The second two lines are the same but in modern Korean.

無始無終 (무시무종 / mu sim mu jong) - no beginning, no end; very common expression, found in numerous sutras and treatises

本來無一物 (본래무일물 / bon rae mu il mul) - originally not a thing; most well known source is Huineng's poem in the Platform Sutra

The two phrases do not seem to occur together in the canonical texts.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 2nd, 2021 at 3:30 PM

Title: Re: An intersubjective experience in Yogacara

Content:

Arnold3000 said:

According to Yogacara, all the objects that I see exist only in my mind.

Astus wrote:

That objects exist in one's mind means that things are defined by concepts, particularly defined in terms of self/essence/substance. Just consider how people perceived as one's family are quite different from how the same people appear to those who perceive them as colleagues, friends, enemies, or strangers. Same applies to insentient things.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 2nd, 2021 at 4:11 PM

Title: Re: An intersubjective experience in Yogacara

Content:

Arnold3000 said:

that is, it's just a matter of perception? for example, everyone perceives the same person differently?

Astus wrote:

Indeed, a matter of perception, like one can be the daughter for her parents, the wife for her husband, and the mother for her children.

Arnold3000 said:

does this sound like epistemology idealism?

Astus wrote:

It is not about defining whether what one perceives is real or imagined, but about showing how one's own thoughts can generate attachment and suffering, and then how to be free from the defilements.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 2nd, 2021 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: An intersubjective experience in Yogacara

Content:

Arnold3000 said:

but what about the fact that there are no external objects, karma is collective, and consciousness is intersubjective?

Astus wrote:

There is the habit of projecting one's concepts as if they were independent, real entities on their own. This is easily observable in how one assumes of another person various attributes as definitive of their being, like 'my brother is lazy', and 'the teacher is too strict'.

Karma is collective in the sense of a shared culture, language, and view, not in the sense of individual intentional actions.

Intersubjectivity is our social existence. Just consider the significant influence parents have on their children, or friends on each other.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 2nd, 2021 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: An intersubjective experience in Yogacara

Content:

Queequeg said:

Seems a bad idea to even entertain the concept of "collective karma."

Astus wrote:

Generally yes, I agree.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 5th, 2021 at 8:53 PM

Title: Buddhist Rock & Metal

Content:

Astus wrote:

Let's share Buddhist metal, rock, and other modern music.

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Qi8HnW-SHf4> - A one of a kind song by the Chinese band Yaksa (夜叉), the lyrics is based on the dharani (Niepan xiangmo zhou 涅槃降魔咒) recited by Manjusri to save Ananda from 64000 billion maras in the last chapter of the Mahaparinirvana Sutra (T374p602/T375p850).

Dharma (達摩樂隊) - Buddhist death metal from Taiwan, they growl mantras

Videos available at <https://www.youtube.com/channel/UCi1eseuCuPlozZK6tTcqCzg>

Sample song: <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=LC6Tc3y1icM>

Shamon (沙門) - Futuristic Buddhist Pop (進化系仏教ポップ), a band of Buddhist priests from Japan, they also have some songs in English

<https://www.youtube.com/channel/UCCZm7X9tqCJCeoOIZN0psCQ>

Sample English song: <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=oZ-cAgsKQkl>

Nam Jazz Experiment (南無ジャズ・エクスペリメント) - Sutra chanting combined with Jazz from Japan

Videos available at https://www.youtube.com/channel/UCAGbl6vuWZg3_FbEMAc7DeA

(<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=ijiyBbi8jnQ&list=PLEl752UqQLKWLRpBCGwuL4T-ivPhzXrW>)

Sample song: <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=ijiyBbi8jnQ>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 6th, 2021 at 3:27 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Rock & Metal

Content:

Malcolm said:

Let's not and say we did.

Astus wrote:

You don't like the genre? Maybe some original Tibetan by Alan Dawa Dolma:

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=LStBLUEUOrM>? Or the

https://www.facebook.com/watch/live/?v=1062571790823049&ref=watch_permalink

(the https://www.ancient-buddhist-texts.net/Texts-and-Translations/Safeguard/05- Upagantho-12.htm) as sung in the movie Yasodhara (බිම්බා දේවී නෙවන් යශෝධරා)?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 7th, 2021 at 2:55 PM

Title: Re: Are there any precedents that allow for 'developments' of Buddhism after the Buddha?

Content:

Padmist said:

Are there any precedents from the Buddha himself from canon (preferably the Pali Canon) that show the Buddha expected his later followers to 'develop' various teachings beyond the ones he explicitly taught as recorded in the canon?
I mean, are there statements or teachings of the Buddha that show he welcomes or expects later developments, discoveries, additions, reformulations, of his teachings?

Astus wrote:

Rather the opposite, expecting disciples to preserve it correctly. See e.g.
<https://suttacentral.net/sn20.7/en/sujato>, <https://suttacentral.net/dn33/en/sujato>.

'you should remember what I have not declared as undeclared, and what I have declared as declared.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn63/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 7th, 2021 at 10:03 PM

Title: Re: Are there any precedents that allow for 'developments' of Buddhism after the Buddha?

Content:

Queequeg said:

That's well and good, but if you take that too strictly, commentary is technically barred, and all you can have is the Pali texts. Not even sure you could have Abhidhamma. You might find yourself going down the originalist rabbit hole. The question is, what is elaboration and explanation and what is just fabricated. How much latitude is permitted in commentary?

Astus wrote:

It depends on the type of commentary, how far it diverges from what are found in the discourses. Presumably a commentator's intent is not to add something to the Buddha's teaching but rather to make it clearer to the readers. And that's what all Buddhist teachings are supposed to be, just relaying what the Buddha himself taught. It is another thing that during the process it can change in many ways, like in the Āṇisutta eventually nothing remains of the drum. Look at this passage from Dogen:

'In the lesser vehicle, people used counting to regulate their breath. However, the buddha ancestors' engaging of the way always differed from the lesser vehicle. A buddha ancestor said, "Even if you arouse the mind of a leprous wild fox, never practice the self-regulation of the two vehicles." The two vehicles refer to such as the school of the four-part vinaya, and the [Abhidharma] Kosa school, which have spread in the world these days. In the Mahayana there is also a method for regulating breath, which is knowing that one breath is long, another breath is short. The breath reaches the tanden and comes up from the tanden. Although exhale and inhale differ, both of them occur depending on the tanden. Impermanence is easy to clarify, and regulating the mind is easy to accomplish.'

(Eihei Koroku 5.390, p 348-349)

The interesting thing is of course that the method of counting (following, fixing, etc.) is not a method taught in the discourses, but what is taught as the 16 steps breath mindfulness in teachings like the Anapanasati Sutta is what Dogen suggests. It's also possible to find other cases where while Mahayana rejects teachings found in Abhidharma and commentarial works what is proposed instead is more in line with the early scriptures.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 8th, 2021 at 2:29 AM

Title: Re: Are there any precedents that allow for 'developments' of Buddhism after the Buddha?

Content:

avatamsaka3 said:

That's interesting. Examples?

Astus wrote:

The general refutation of svabhava is one. Related to that, the practice of prajnaparamita as non-abiding is another.

'All conditioned phenomena

Are like a dream, an illusion, a bubble, a shadow

Like the dew, or like lightning

You should discern them like this'

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html#div-33)

'Form is like a lump of foam,

Feeling like a water bubble;

Perception is like a mirage,

Volitions like a plantain trunk,

And consciousness like an illusion,

So explained the Kinsman of the Sun.

However one may ponder it

And carefully investigate it,

It appears but hollow and void

When one views it carefully.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn22.95/en/bodhi>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 8th, 2021 at 2:20 PM

Title: Re: Brunnhölzl on Buddha Nature as a radical teaching.

Content:

Könchok Chödrak said:

Can anyone go into detail here how Buddha-Nature is not an Atman?

Astus wrote:

The Atman is a stand alone pure consciousness, never an agent. Buddha-nature is a reference to innumerable buddha-qualities that manifest when the obscurations are completely removed through the full realisation of twofold emptiness.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 8th, 2021 at 4:04 PM

Title: Re: Are there any precedents that allow for 'developments' of Buddhism after the Buddha?

Content:

Queequeg said:

Isn't this tension interesting? In a sense, this uncertainty, and vacillation between source and commentary, meandering back, etc. could be seen, as a whole, as the process by which the tradition keeps to the Buddha's teaching - keeping the teaching vital as a living discourse. I'm wary when I see attempts to limit the teaching too strictly and literally. The discussion and argument itself is both a practice and a means of establishing authority.

Astus wrote:

A sutra can and should be read with the other sutras. Commentaries and treatises can help with understanding. However, what makes the teachings alive is going through all three stages of learning (sruti), understanding (cinta), and applying (bhavana), or sometimes they talk of it in Zen as using live words instead of (or after) dead ones. As Jinul wrote:

'In the Sōn school, all these true teachings deriving from the faith and understanding of the complete and sudden school, which are as numerous as the sands of the Ganges, are called dead words (sagu 死句) because they induce people to generate the obstacle of understanding. But they also may help neophytes who are not yet able to investigate the live word (hwalgu 活句) of the shortcut approach by instructing them in complete descriptions that accord with the nature in order to ensure that their faith and understanding will not retrogress.'

(Treatise on Resolving Doubts about Observing the Keyword, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 2, p 319)

Queequeg said:

That's probably not quite acceptable if one demands absolute certainty.

Astus wrote:

One arrives at certainty at the stage of insight, where there is direct seeing into the validity of the Dharma. Until then one can have faith and understanding, but that's still not an unshakeable ground.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 8th, 2021 at 7:53 PM

Title: Re: Are there any precedents that allow for 'developments' of Buddhism after the Buddha?

Content:

Queequeg said:

I wonder if the term translated here as "faith and understanding" is 信解.

Astus wrote:

Yes.

Queequeg said:

I'm not quite sure that passage lines up with the process I'm talking about. This passage seems to be comparing methods, not quite an active dialogue between sutras and commentary and the tension that results.

Astus wrote:

True, it's about living the Dharma, having direct insight of the meaning gained from learning. The way I take it is that commentaries and treatises are meant to express the understanding of the sutras in order to allow an easier comprehension of them. But in a few decades and centuries those explanations can sound as foreign as the sutras themselves, so there appear sub-commentaries. And the process goes on (e.g. for Theravada: sutta -> abhidhamma (dhammasanga -> vibhanga -> dhatukatha) -> atthakatha -> tika), then summaries are produced, then commentaries on the summaries. Or there is another route, at some point returning to the sutras, or some treatise, and writing new commentaries/treatises (or even new sutras), especially if one wants to diverge from the accepted interpretations.

Queequeg said:

Being honest, I have to admit I don't understand Zen discourse. Its tropes, ideas, and terminology just present a wall that resists my penetration.

Astus wrote:

This points quite well to the matter at hand. Zongmi wrote:

'The teachings are the sutras and treatises left behind by the buddhas and bodhisattvas. Chan is the lines of verse related by the various good friends [on the path]. The buddha sutras open outward, catching the thousands of the beings of the eight classes, while Chan verses scoop up an abridgment, being oriented to one type of disposition found in this land [of China]. [The teachings,] which catch [the thousands of] beings [of the eight classes], are broad and vast, and hence it is difficult to rely upon them. [Chan,] which is oriented to dispositions, points to the bull's-eye and hence is easy to use.'
(Chan Prolegomenon, in Zongmi on Chan, p 105)

For Zongmi - who was a well respected "scholar-practitioner" monk in 9th century China - Chan teachings meant the simple, direct, easy to understand presentation of the Dharma. Naturally Chan over the centuries developed into something quite complex (e.g. Blue Cliff Record), and at the same time what was once ordinary talk for us now is an obscure ancient dialect filled with references that take dozens of footnotes to explain.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 8th, 2021 at 8:04 PM

Title: Re: Brunnhölzl on Buddha Nature as a radical teaching.

Content:

Könchok Chödrak said:

We say “we all have Buddha Nature”.

Astus wrote:

Such is the nature of skilful means, intended to make people maintain a hopeful outlook towards a great realisation, only to find out in the end that there has never been anything to realise.

Könchok Chödrak said:

What is this “we”? After we erase the “I” are we going to erase the “we”?

Astus wrote:

'These mere appearances are not a real unity, because they possess many parts. Each of these parts can in turn be broken down into many subparts. Since this process can be infinitely repeated, there is not a single smallest particle that is a really existent and indivisible unity. Without even one real building block, how could you put together many so as to create a really existent thing? Consequently, there can be nothing that is a real multiplicity, because there is no real unity to begin with that could build up such a multiplicity. To be sure, this reasoning does not negate the mere conventionality that one thing has many parts. The point here is that neither the thing in question nor its parts really exist by themselves. Thus, what is denied is not the mere appearance of unity and multiplicity on the level of seeming reality but the existence of any unity or multiplicity that is really established and findable as such.'

(Center of the Sunlit Sky, p 237)

Könchok Chödrak said:

Eventually it must be understood that there are Real Transcendental activities for the individual after liberation, and that there still is an individual, even after many lifetimes of self-negation.

Astus wrote:

“Are the dharmakāyas of the buddha bhagavāns said to be different or said not to be different?” They are said not to be different since their support, intention, and enlightened activity are not different. [However,] they are said to be different since innumerable bodies [of bodhisattvas] become fully and perfectly awakened. Just as the dharmakāya, the sambhogakāyas [of buddhas] are not different because their intention and enlightened activity are not different. However, since their supports are different, it is not that they are without difference because they arise with innumerable supports. The nirmāṇakāyas are to be regarded in the same way as the sambhogakāyas.'

(Mahayanasamgraha X.8, tr Brunnhölzl)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 9th, 2021 at 3:18 AM

Title: Re: Brunnhölzl on Buddha Nature as a radical teaching.

Content:

Könchok Chödrak said:

Can we respect constructs as form, then form as Emptiness, then Emptiness as the basis for who we are, without saying we don't exist just because we are infinite?

Astus wrote:

Emptiness is not a basis of anything, it rather means baselessness, that there is no ultimate substratum behind phenomena. We are certainly not infinite, but finite and dependent entities.

Könchok Chödrak said:

Isn't what really doesn't exist the material aspect of this world, the non-Nirvanic, non-Buddhic dream of craving, but all the while, all the while Love and Compassion are real—?

Astus wrote:

Neither the material, nor the mental appearances are real in the sense of existing in and of themselves, but real in the sense of conditioned conditions. Emotions like love and compassion are very much temporary composite phenomena.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 9th, 2021 at 4:52 AM

Title: Re: Brunnhölzl on Buddha Nature as a radical teaching.

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, not even that.

Astus wrote:

No, because there are no appearances, or because they are not dependent, or maybe both?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 9th, 2021 at 5:30 AM

Title: Re: Brunnhölzl on Buddha Nature as a radical teaching.

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, because conditions also cannot be found upon analysis, exactly like material and mental appearances, the former are no more real than the latter. They have the same amount of reality, they are unable to bear ultimate analysis.

Astus wrote:

Do say that conventionally things exist independently?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 9th, 2021 at 1:47 PM

Title: Re: Brunnhölzl on Buddha Nature as a radical teaching.

Content:

Malcolm said:

That question is incoherent, it assumes that conditions can bear analysis. They can't. They are just relative appearances upon which designations are made.

Astus wrote:

If so, how can any valid statements be made? No difference between ordinary true and false?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 9th, 2021 at 7:38 PM

Title: Re: Modern Chinese Chan Buddhism and Modern Psychology

Content:

Arnold3000 said:

https://www.researchgate.net/publication/233645610_Psychological_attachment_no-self_and_Chan_Buddhist_mind_therapy

Astus wrote:

That's only an abstract, but the paper is from 2008. Any follow up studies?

Arnold3000 said:

Chan Buddhism is most popular school in Modern Chinese Buddhism.

Astus wrote:

How do we know that? Also, it's probably not true.

Arnold3000 said:

Modern psychology believes that the masters and monks of Chan Buddhism can better treat people from mental illness because they know better how other people's minds work?

Astus wrote:

Unlikely.

Arnold3000 said:

Are there monks with special psychic abilities who can read the minds of others?

Astus wrote:

It would be wonderful if they could read their own minds.

Arnold3000 said:

It would be useful for psychology to be able to read the minds of other people.

Astus wrote:

Parapsychology is supposed to deal with telepathy. Psychology not so much.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 9th, 2021 at 7:40 PM

Title: Re: Brunnhölzl on Buddha Nature as a radical teaching.

Content:

Malcolm said:

Conventional truths are derived from observing functional appearances. Falsehoods are derived from observing nonfunctional appearances. Example, lake vs. mirage.

Astus wrote:

And by functional do you mean causally effective? If so, what's wrong with saying that phenomena are conditional?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 9th, 2021 at 8:55 PM

Title: Re: Brunnhölzl on Buddha Nature as a radical teaching.

Content:

Malcolm said:

You used the word "real".

Astus wrote:

Yes, but "real in the sense of " functional, conditioned, causally relevant, and not as "real in the sense of existing in and of themselves".

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 9th, 2021 at 9:18 PM

Title: Re: Modern Chinese Chan Buddhism and Modern Psychology

Content:

Arnold3000 said:

"It would be wonderful if they could read their own minds."
what does it mean?

Astus wrote:

Chan Buddhism is about seeing into the mind we use all the time, that is the primary goal. Worrying about the minds of others can only come later.

Arnold3000 said:

Does Chan Buddhism have telepathy?

How is the psychology of Chan Buddhism different from modern psychology?

Astus wrote:

You can read these two booklets by Ven. Hsing Yun:

<https://www.fgsitc.org/the-buddhist-perspective-on-the-supernatural/>

<https://www.fgsitc.org/buddhism-and-psychology/>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 9th, 2021 at 10:34 PM

Title: Re: Brunnhölzl on Buddha Nature as a radical teaching.

Content:

Malcolm said:

To say something is real, in English, means to have objective, independent existence. Thus, one cannot say conditions are real.

Astus wrote:

I see. I try to keep that in mind. Still, if I look at the definition from

<https://www.lexico.com/definition/real> as 'Actually existing as a thing or occurring in fact; not imagined or supposed.'; or from

<https://dictionary.cambridge.org/dictionary/english/real> as 'existing in fact and not imaginary', then it doesn't have to have such a connotation, but rather something's factual nature is what makes it real, that it can be perceived as occurring or happening, that it is a factor. Anyhow, do you have perhaps some better words to use then?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 9th, 2021 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: Modern Chinese Chan Buddhism and Modern Psychology

Content:

Arnold3000 said:

Does this mean that the practitioner first brings his mind to enlightenment and then helps other minds to come to enlightenment?

Is it like when a psychologist first studies at the university and then helps patients deal with their stress and anxiety?

Astus wrote:

Sure. How else could it be?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 10th, 2021 at 2:56 AM

Title: Re: Modern Chinese Chan Buddhism and Modern Psychology

Content:

Arnold3000 said:

That is, monks and Chan Buddhism masters can help people cope with their mental disorders, anxiety and stresses?

Astus wrote:

Buddhism and psychology may be somewhat related, but as Chan is not a training to cure mental disorders it follows that those proficient in Chan may not be fit to be considered therapists, just as a psychologist is not automatically a Dharma teacher.

Arnold3000 said:

And the customary believers of Chan Buddhism who have enlightened their minds can help the minds of other people to come to enlightenment or is it only a master or a monk can?

Astus wrote:

One can receive beneficial teachings from anyone, but it's up to each person to put them into practice and thus gain the results.

As for the Chan way of fixing one's mind:

Bodhidharma sat facing a wall. Huike [who would be his successor] stood in the snow and cut off his arm, saying, "My mind is not at peace. Please, Teacher, pacify my mind." Bodhidharma said, "Bring out your mind and I will pacify it for you." Huike said, "When I search for my mind, ultimately it cannot be found. " Bodhidharma said, "I have already pacified your mind for you. " (Wumen's Gate, case 41, in Three Chan Classics, BDK ed, p 102)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 10th, 2021 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: Brunnhölzl on Buddha Nature as a radical teaching.

Content:

Matt J said:

It sounds to me like Astus is following the Gelug view of stating that things exist conventionally.

Astus wrote:

I'd rather put it as: whatever can be called existent is just a convention, a conceptual fabrication. Not because it is ontologically meaningful, but because taking one's ideas to be real is the root of suffering.

'Since external appearances are confusion, know them to be unreal.

Since the internal mind itself is without a self, know it to be empty.

Since the thoughts in between arise conditionally, know them to be adventitious.'

(Precious Garland by Gampopa, ch 6, p 167-168)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 10th, 2021 at 5:02 AM

Title: Re: Brunnhölzl on Buddha Nature as a radical teaching.

Content:
Malcolm said:
So which comes first, appearance or convention?

Astus wrote:
First for what?

Author: Astus
Date: Saturday, April 10th, 2021 at 6:16 PM
Title: Re: Brunnhölzl on Buddha Nature as a radical teaching.
Content:
Malcolm said:
Do appearances arise from conventional designations, or are conventional designations made on the basis of appearances?

Astus wrote:
Without further specifications they are practically synonyms, so one preceding the other is not an option.

Author: Astus
Date: Saturday, April 10th, 2021 at 9:10 PM
Title: Re: Brunnhölzl on Buddha Nature as a radical teaching.
Content:
Malcolm said:
Wrong answer.

Astus wrote:
Which appearance isn't a convention? Which convention isn't an appearance?

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, April 11th, 2021 at 3:51 AM
Title: Re: Brunnhölzl on Buddha Nature as a radical teaching.
Content:
Malcolm said:
In brief, conventions do not generate appearances, for example, calling the appearance of sand “water” does not change that appearance into water. First there an appearance, then there is a conventional designation.

Astus wrote:
How is that not like the Abhidharma view that takes dharmas as paramartha, and how is it consolidated with statements like this one:

'Since the Buddhas have stated
That the world is conditioned by ignorance,

So why is it not reasonable [to assert]
That this world is [a result of] conceptualization?
(Yuktisastika 37, tr Geshe Thupten Jinpa; cf. Yuktisastika 33-34; Acintyastava 6, 35, 44; Lokatitastava 19)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 11th, 2021 at 5:01 AM

Title: Re: Brunnhölzl on Buddha Nature as a radical teaching.

Content:

Malcolm said:

Satyadvayavibhaṅgavṛtti states:

“Mundane conventional designations are engagements of the mundane, that is to say, having the characteristics of cognitions and objects of cognition, but do not have the characteristic of verbalizations because of being described subsequent to those [cognitions].”

Gorampa adds:

Therefore all those objects and everything defined on those from the perspective of appearing to a mundane mind is said to be the meaning of defining the relative through the perspective of convention.

Astus wrote:

How does that support the claim that first there are appearances and only then conventions? Appearances are conventional according to Jnanakirti, he simply makes a distinction there between cognition and verbalisation.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 11th, 2021 at 6:24 PM

Title: Re: Brunnhölzl on Buddha Nature as a radical teaching.

Content:

Malcolm said:

because of being described subsequent to those [cognitions]. The argument takes aim at the Geluk idea that appearances are derived from conventions themselves.

Astus wrote:

Both Jnanagarbha and Gorampa state that conventional truth include not just words or labels but the whole cognitive process of perception. I did not equate conventions with just words.

What the Satyadvayavibhaṅgavṛtti says:

'This is why the sutra says:

What is relative truth? All ordinary designations, syllables, utterances, and words.

Ultimate truth cannot even be known, let alone conveyed in syllables.

An ordinary designation (loka-prajñapti) is an ordinary activity that is cognitive in nature (jñāna-jñeya-lakṣaṇa) rather than verbal in nature (abhidhāna-lakṣaṇa), since [syllables] are mentioned later [in the quotation]. The word "all" is meant to be inclusive. This means that items cognized by perceptions (pratyakṣa) that are nonconceptual (nirvikalpa), such as perceptions of form (rūpa) or pleasure (sukha), are only relative truth. [The word "all"] is also to be taken with the subsequent [terms in the sentence]. Thus it applies to [the phrase "ordinary designations"], which has just been quoted from the sūtra, and to syllables, utterances, and words.'

(Jñānagarbha on the Two Truths, p 74)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 14th, 2021 at 3:03 PM

Title: Re: How difference between Chan and Zen.

Content:

RonBucker said:

Are these two schools very similar? For example, Chan Buddhists can teach Zen Buddhists, and Zen Buddhists may teach the practice of Chan Buddhists.

Or do Chan Buddhists think Zen Buddhists have a slightly different mindset about practice?

Astus wrote:

The sole unique identifying element of all Chan/Zen groups is their ancestral https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Lineage_%28Buddhism%29#Chan_and_Zen_lineages where the last common ancestor is https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Huineng_\(638-713\)).

The two main groups in Japan are <https://www.sotozen.com/eng/>, that is quite centralised, and <http://zen.rinnou.net/index.html>, that is more of an association of several organisations.

I cannot speak for Mainland China, but as for the Republic three of the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Four_Great_Mountains_%28Taiwan%29 were founded by members of a Chan lineage: <https://www.fgs.org.tw/en/>, <https://www.dharmadrum.org/>, <https://www.ctworld.org.tw/english-96/html/>.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 14th, 2021 at 6:46 PM

Title: Re: How difference between Chan and Zen.

Content:

RonBucker said:

What is the most popular school of Buddhism in China and Japan?

Astus wrote:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Pure_Land_Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 14th, 2021 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: How difference between Chan and Zen.

Content:

RonBucker said:

So the most popular Buddhism in China, Japan and Korea is Pure Land Buddhism and Chan / Zen?

Astus wrote:

The most popular form of Buddhism in East Asia is Pure Land. It is only in Japan where distinct organisations exist for Pure Land practice, and there they (mainly

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/J%C5%8Ddo-sh%C5%AB> and https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/J%C5%8Ddo_Shinsh%C5%AB) are the biggest Buddhist churches. Similarly, it is in Japan where you find individual churches for Zen. There is no such organisational separation based on school affiliation in other countries. Also, when there is talk of 'Chan school', 'Pure Land school', or 'Tiantai school', that's not an either/or situation, but more of a set of ideas and methods that can be studied and applied easily by the same person.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 15th, 2021 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: How difference between Chan and Zen.

Content:

RonBucker said:

This means that there will be no disagreement between Chinese, Japanese and Korean Buddhists if they all come to the same church.

Astus wrote:

It depends on what sort of disagreement you mean.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 15th, 2021 at 3:01 AM

Title: Re: How difference between Chan and Zen.

Content:

RonBucker said:

Can Chinese Buddhists teach Japanese Buddhists how to meditate or will Chinese people think that the Japanese will disagree with their teachings?

Astus wrote:

It depends on who teaches whom, not their nationality.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 15th, 2021 at 2:20 PM

Title: Re: How difference between Chan and Zen.

Content:

Astus wrote:

On the practice of huatou/hwadu, that has become the main form of Chan practice since the 12th century, there are some good introductory texts:

<https://terebess.hu/zen/mesterek/HanshanDeqing.html#c> by Hanshan Deqing.

<https://www.emptycloud.net/articles-2/chan-meditation-%E7%A6%85/the-cha-training/> by Xuyun.

<http://ftp.budaedu.org/ebooks/pdf/EN375.pdf> by Guo Ru.

http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/bbs/board.php?bo_table=3020

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 15th, 2021 at 4:41 PM

Title: Re: How difference between Chan and Zen.

Content:

LastLegend said:

What if one doesn't have doubt?

Astus wrote:

It has to be generated.

https://books.google.com/books/about/Great_Doubt.html?id=172yDAAAQBAJ by Boshan Yuanlai

Talks by Jeff Shore on Boshan's text:

<https://beingwithoutself.files.wordpress.com/2013/02/exhortations-for-those-who-do-part-1.pdf>, <https://beingwithoutself.files.wordpress.com/2013/02/exhortations-for-those-who-do-part-2and3.pdf>

<https://www.google.com/books/edition/%E7%A6%AA%E9%97%9C%E7%AD%96%E9%80%B2/y2LDBAAQBAJ> by Yunqi Zhuhong

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 19th, 2021 at 7:25 PM

Title: Re: An intersubjective experience in Yogacara

Content:

Astus wrote:

Any Buddhist teaching can be put in the frame of the four noble truths and see where it belongs to. So for instance the doctrine of consciousness only is a part of the fourth, the noble truth of the path, as it is meant to be a teaching (sruti/prajna) or view (drsti/darsana) to be applied (bhavana) in meditation (samadhi), and with that attain non-conceptual wisdom (nirvikalpajnana) and reach the first bhumi. This should help with not mistaking the Dharma as some sort of mundane philosophy/science.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 6th, 2021 at 2:43 PM

Title: Re: Lack of Mahayana monasteries in the US?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Some that are listed under

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Category:Buddhist_monasteries_in_the_United_States:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Chuang_Yen_Monastery https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dai_Bosatsu_Zendo_Kongo-ji https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Gyobutsuji_Zen_Monastery

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/New_York_Mahayana_Temple

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Shasta_Abbey

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tassajara_Zen_Mountain_Center

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Zen_Mountain_Monastery

Lists of monasteries/temples:

<http://www.sfzen.org/all-other-usa-american-chinese-buddhist-temples>

<http://middleland.org/chung-tai-branches/>

<http://truclamminhchanh.org/en/links.aspx>

<https://whiteplum.org/membership-list-public/>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 6th, 2021 at 10:37 PM

Title: Re: How difference between Chan and Zen.

Content:

Malcolm said:

It emphasized the fact that in many respects, in Zen temples in Japan, there was a lot of less meditation than one might expect, and that a large portion of temple activities were oriented towards ministering to the needs of the lay population with various kinds of rituals.

Astus wrote:

'In Japan today, seated meditation is only practiced in a few large monasteries. In most Zen temples, as in the temples of other sects, priests spend most of their time carrying out funeral rituals for their parishioners. With the spread of Zen Buddhism throughout Europe and the United States, there has been a trend towards ignoring the more religious and ritualistic aspects of Zen and focusing instead on its technical aspects, thereby subjecting zazen to the same treatment as Indian yoga.'

(Unmasking Buddhism by B. Faure, p 78)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 7th, 2021 at 2:26 AM

Title: Re: Indian Buddhist music

Content:

Astus wrote:

Should check Sinhalese music.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 7th, 2021 at 2:19 PM

Title: Re: Indian Buddhist music

Content:

mabw said:

Hmm, I have on occasions tried looking for classical Sinhalese music on Youtube. Not very successful though, not at least when I type in English. A lot of material in Sri Lanka seems locked in Sinhalese.

Astus wrote:

You can try <https://www.shraddha.lk/english/> and its

<https://www.youtube.com/user/shraddhatv>, they have

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=ARd_hSTb5b0&list=PLalyA_suCnHxm6qpbU-N7zyiTtTpuoNQQt.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 9th, 2021 at 8:14 PM

Title: Re: Origin of the Four Seals?

Content:

manjusri said:

Does anyone know when these were first formulated and by whom? I am also curious if they can be found in the Theravada? I believe I was introduced to them through a teaching given by HHDL. Thanks, everybody.

Astus wrote:

They are mentioned in the Ekottaragama, scroll 18, chapter 26.1, in sutras numbered 8 and 9 (T125, p639a2-12, p640b5-18), as the four fundamental dharmas (四法本末: all compounded are (all) impermanent (一切諸行(皆悉)無常), all compounded are suffering (一切諸行苦), all compounded are without self (一切諸行無我), nirvana is rest/eternally tranquil (涅槃休息/為永寂)). Suttacentral gives AN 4.185 and SN 47.13 as parallels, but they do not contain those four.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 10th, 2021 at 3:03 PM

Title: Re: Origin of the Four Seals?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The formula, "all compounded phenomena...nirvana is peace" is found in Sthiramati's commentary on the Mahāyānasūtrālaṃkāra, which was translated in either the 11th century by an obscure translator named Che Tashi (Lce bkra shi) with an Indian.

Astus wrote:

The Mahāyānasūtrālaṃkāra was translated to Chinese in the early 7th century by Prabhākaramitra, and it uses the term four Dharma seals (四法印; T31n1604_p0646a15). The same term is also found in the Vimalakirti sutra commentary (T38n1776_p0442a25) by Huiyuan 慧遠 (523~592, a disciple of Kumarajiva), and that seems to be the earliest occurrence of 四法印 based on a simple CBETA search, but probably there are texts preceding it.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 11th, 2021 at 6:38 PM

Title: Re: Zen beliefs.

Content:

Zenny said:

Why the need for non experiential beliefs in an otherwise perfect religion?

Astus wrote:

Buddhist teachings are experience based and to be experienced for oneself. It is a matter of one's level of progress how much one can learn, comprehend, and eventually verify personally.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 11th, 2021 at 10:54 PM

Title: Re: Zen beliefs.

Content:

Zenny said:

My problem with this is that this means that certain beliefs are upheld as something to "discover" rather than being innate and natural. And that is the way that many religions try to get people to accept beliefs that are not felt/natural. Thus one can never criticise a "belief" as the reply would be "you haven't progressed enough". Which smacks of complacency and authority.

Astus wrote:

In Zen what one has to believe in foremost is one's own ability to realise buddha-nature, simply because otherwise one would lack the motivation to continue with the practice. It does not matter if you believe that there is or isn't something or anything. The main point is to work towards awakening. Don't get bogged down by ideas of there is or there isn't. Those are just passing thoughts anyway.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 12th, 2021 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: So are Sutras really from the Buddha, or just fiction

Content:

Astus wrote:

Yixuan has a solution:

"Followers of the Way, make no mistake! All the dharmas of this world and of the worlds beyond are without self-nature. Also, they are without produced nature. They are just empty names, and these names are also empty. All you are doing is taking these worthless names to be real. That's all wrong! Even if they do exist, they are nothing but states of dependent transformation, such as the dependent transformations of bodhi, nirvana, emancipation, the threefold body, the [objective] surroundings and the [subjective] mind, bodhisattvahood, and buddhahood. What are you looking for in these lands of dependent transformations! All of these, up to and including the Three Vehicles' twelve divisions of teachings, are just so much waste paper to wipe off privy filth. The Buddha is just a phantom body, the patriarchs just old monks. But you, weren't you born of a mother? If you seek the Buddha, you'll be held in the grip of Buddha-Māra. If you seek the patriarchs, you'll be bound by the ropes of Patriarch-Māra. If you engage in any seeking, it will all be pain. Much better to do nothing. There are a bunch of shavepate monks who say to students, 'The Buddha is the Ultimate; he attained buddhahood only after he came to the fruition of practices carried on through three great asaṃkhyeya kalpas.' Followers of the Way, if you say that the Buddha is the ultimate, how is it that after eighty years of life the Buddha lay down on his side between the twin śāla trees at Kuśinagara and died? Where is the Buddha now? We clearly know that his birth and death were not different from ours." (Record of Linji, p 19, tr Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 24th, 2021 at 5:21 PM

Title: Re: "Chain of Causation" Question

Content:

Subcontrary said:

Kamalasila can't possibly believe in "the permanence of the 'Chain'"; he describes it as liable to be snapped -- I am having trouble following this metaphor. Much of this chapter is devoted to the momentariness of reality, how a thing ceases to exist after a moment, and gives rise to another thing; and yet the 'chain' seems to persist from moment to moment -- indeed, it seems that it is merely what links each moment together. How is it 'liable to snap'? What is the most literal explanation of Kamalasila's reasoning here?

Astus wrote:

Here (Tattvasaṃgraha, vol 1, p 313) he means that cause and effect works with the mind-continuum that consists of momentary mind-moments. It is stated against Uddyotakara's claim that if mind is a "fleeting entity" there can be no karma ("affected (impressed) by Actions"). The chain (mind-continuum) is labelled permanent only because it is continuous.

Subcontrary said:

Is Kamalasila describing the same 'Chain' in this passage as above? It seems not, since in the first passage he says the 'Chain' isn't the substratum of the impression leading to the result of an action, and in the second passage he says that impressions resulting from acts (of charity etc) appear "in a mutually interinvolved 'Chain' or 'Series'." I imagine that even if Kamalasila is referring only to one sort of chain the passages are reconcilable, but I am having trouble reconciling them on my own. It is possible, for example, though I don't know what it means exactly, for the impressions to 'appear' in the chain, without the chain being the substratum of the impressions.

Astus wrote:

He talks (p 314) of those who recognised no-self can and do act morally because they also see how causality/karma works. The 'Chain' refers to the mind-continuum as before. It is actually argued that the chain is not snapped, hence it is a valid "substratum of the 'impression' leading to such a result".

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 26th, 2021 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: Hello From An Amateur Madhyamaka Scholar!

Content:

Astus wrote:

A course in Madhyamaka with Thomas Doctor has started this month:

<https://dharmafun.org/courses/middleway/>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 27th, 2021 at 2:53 PM

Title: Re: "Chain of Causation" Question

Content:

Subcontrary said:

Is Kamalasila indicating then, in the paragraph on p313, that this is all Uddyotakara's incorrect interpretation of the Buddhist view? That is to say, is he paraphrasing Uddyotakara here: "that 'Chain' which is liable to be snapped cannot serve as the 'Cause,'"? That would make more sense.

Astus wrote:

It is meant to establish causality between momentary phenomena, and to prove that impermanence is not contrary to karma. See also text 530 on page 309 about causal chain.

Subcontrary said:

That the chain of cause and effect continues between moments is difficult to reconcile with momentariness; it would seem that by existing from moment to moment it does adopt some character of permanence, and if we relegate this permanence to being merely a "conventional" but not ultimate truth (it's not literally a chain at all), I have trouble determining how the ultimate truth of karma can be reliant on it: if the link between an action in one moment and a result in the next doesn't ultimately exist, that seems to imply that the result of an action is ultimately random, but I am quite sure this can't be the case...!

Astus wrote:

Causality, momentariness, karma - these are not ultimate realities in Madhyamaka. The argument that causality and momentariness work together is discussed in the same chapter. There is no randomness in causality.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 28th, 2021 at 2:55 PM

Title: Re: How does mantra purify past negative karma?

Content:

Padmist said:

How does mantra purify past negative karma?

Astus wrote:

Since prayers and wishes are of no use (SN 42.6, AN 5.43), and one does not know what actually to purify (MN 101), nor can what has already happened be changed (SN 42.8), it is changing the present mind that really matters (AN 3.99). In other words, it is in changing the present course of thoughts where mantras can make a difference.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 30th, 2021 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: Reading suggestions to learn about Soto

Content:

Nicholas2727 said:

Does anyone have any reading suggestions that go into detail about the Soto tradition, it's views, practices, etc?

Astus wrote:

You can start with the <https://www.sotozen.com/eng/>. It has a fair amount of introductory materials.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 30th, 2021 at 8:45 PM

Title: Re: "Which has primacy, Buddha or Dharma"?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Even the Buddha revered the Dharma as his teacher (SN 6.2). The Uttaratantra Shastra (3.21) calls the Buddha the ultimate refuge, it also practically combines all three into one, as Dzongsar JK Rinpoche commented: 'But ultimately, Buddha is not other than the Dharma and the Sangha, because the ultimate Dharma is the absence of attachment. And that's what Buddha has achieved. And since Buddha is the result of end point of all the bhūmis, the Buddha is also the essence, the quintessence of the Sangha.'

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 31st, 2021 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: "Which has primacy, Buddha or Dharma"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

One, your reference to SN 6.2 is far too narrow, since in the Pali canon the Buddha has also declared in various places he had no teacher at all, and that he had teachers in past lives.

Astus wrote:

Apart from the Jataka, Buddhavamsa, and Cariyapitaka, there aren't many discourses dealing with the idea of the past lives of the Buddha. On the other hand, the instruction to take the Dharma as one's refuge is repeated several times: DN 16, DN 26, SN 22.43, SN 47.9, SN 47.13-14.

Malcolm said:

Second, no, the UT really doesn't "practically combine all three refuges into one." It points out that the Dharma and the Sangha are compounded and impermanent. This is the context in which Maitreya declares the Buddha to be the true refuge, Dzongsar's apologetics notwithstanding.

Astus wrote:

The Buddha is called the ultimate refuge for its permanence, thus actually meaning the dharma kaya. In a similar fashion is Dharma itself described in the Pali Canon, that it is true and present regardless of a buddha arising or not arising (SN 12.20, AN 3.136; cf. MMK 18.12).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 31st, 2021 at 6:41 PM

Title: Re: "Which has primacy, Buddha or Dharma"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Thus, what we are going for refuge in is the actual realization of a buddha, who has benefited themselves and is capable of benefitting us, and not some abstract doctrine we ourselves have not realized.

Astus wrote:

Being uncompounded, it cannot even be comprehended, unlike an abstract doctrine. Being effortless ("naturally perfected"), nobody has anything to do with it, unlike with a teaching. Being personally realised, one has to realise it for oneself and others cannot help, unlike with a teaching. The path that is demonstrated, that is the teaching, and it is through the path that afflictions are abandoned. So, taking refuge in the true buddha, the dharmakaya, means taking the ultimate truth (wisdom, dharma as reality) as shown in the teaching demonstrating reality (compassion, dharma as doctrine) and applying it, since there is actually nothing else to take refuge in.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 31st, 2021 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: Shinjin as the Third Noble Truth

Content:
Zhen Li said:
I came across this gem in the Nirvāṇa Sūtra today:

Astus wrote:
How does that relate to shinjin? Shinjin itself does not eliminate one's defilements. Also:
'Good man, it is like an intoxicated man trying to walk down a road that he can barely see in his blurred vision. Bodhisattvas at the ten stages who have discerned only a small part of the tathāgata-nature are in a state like this.' (Nirvana Sutra, BDK ed, vol 1, p 249)

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, June 1st, 2021 at 3:26 PM
Title: Re: Shinjin as the Third Noble Truth
Content:
Zhen Li said:
Tathāgatagarbha is Shinjin,

Astus wrote:
Metaphorically speaking. If literally 'who attains shinjin ... / Is ... equal to the Tathagatas.'
(<http://shinranworks.com/hymns-in-japanese/hymns-of-the-pure-land/hymns-to-amida-based-on-various-sutras/>, 94), then shinjin itself becomes meaningless, as a buddha doesn't need birth in anyone's land but rather establishes his own. Recognising that we are totally foolish beings is part of shinjin, as Shinran quotes (KGSS 3.15):
'Second [of the three minds] is deep mind, which is true and real shinjin. One truly knows oneself to be a foolish being full of blind passions, with scant roots of good, transmigrating in the three realms and unable to emerge from this burning house.'

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, June 1st, 2021 at 4:46 PM
Title: Re: Shinjin as the Third Noble Truth
Content:
Zhen Li said:
I'm not claiming in anyway that buddhahood is attained in this life. Shinjin is attained without severing blind passions, but after we die we are born in the Pure Land which is nirvana. It's like fire and wood. Although the wood is on fire, it is not the same as the fire, and yet the fire turns the wood into fire.

Astus wrote:
And that's why shinjin rather belongs the fourth noble truth, not the third.

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, June 1st, 2021 at 5:17 PM
Title: Re: Shinjin as the Third Noble Truth
Content:

Zhen Li said:

Shinjin is not a means to an end because it is the Buddha's mind.

Astus wrote:

Buddhahood is not attained in this life, but shinjin is attained. It is shinjin that leads one to be born in the Pure Land where awakening is attained. How is it not a means to an end then?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 1st, 2021 at 5:59 PM

Title: Re: Shinjin as the Third Noble Truth

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Because it's bestowed by the Buddha's power, it involves no effort, working, or calculation on our part. Shinjin doesn't so much lead as ensure with no turning back.

Astus wrote:

It is still not the goal, but what leads one to the goal. Like in the example of the boat, the boat is not the other shore, even if we're not the ones rowing.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 18th, 2021 at 3:16 PM

Title: Re: If its just a story...

Content:

Astus wrote:

One of the wonderful qualities of the Dharma is that it is readily visible (sāṃdr̥ṣṭiko/sandiṭṭhiko), just as one can discern the presence or absence of greed in oneself (SN 35.70, AN 6.47-48), and how from greed come evil actions (AN 3.53-54). Seeing it now is better than looking for pleasant results in the future, as it's been explained to both a deva (SN 1.20) and a mara (SN 4.21), and it's even better than ruling the four continents (SN 55.1). The Dharma can be readily perceived on various levels through absorption (AN 9.46), and it is best taught with the understanding that the Dharma itself is excellent and out of compassion (SN 16.3).

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 19th, 2021 at 1:25 AM

Title: Re: If its just a story...

Content:

Astus wrote:

"the Tathāgata always teaches: 'Monks, understand my correct teachings to be like a raft.' If even my correct teachings are to be abandoned, how much more incorrect teachings?"

http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html#div-7

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 28th, 2021 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: Nirvana: posited or indicated

Content:

Supramundane said:

Early Pali sutras in the Nikaya discourage speculation about Nirvana;

Astus wrote:

Not exactly. The Buddha pointed out that making fabricated ideas about nirvana is a misunderstanding of its meaning (AN 4.174), just making assumptions about the state of a liberated person is mistaken (MN 72; SN 22.85).

Supramundane said:

when asked directly about Nirvana, the Buddha simply smiles or says: 'go find it'.

Astus wrote:

Said where? Rather, the Buddha taught a single path (AN 10.095) consisting of the realisation of the four noble truths (SN 56.44). The Buddha described the path on many occasions from the beginning (SN 56.11) to the end (DN 16), providing various methods (MN 52; AN 7.46). He also explained nirvana as freedom from the three unskillful roots (SN 43) and as bliss (AN 9.34).

Supramundane said:

There could be a very simple explanation for this, namely, that Nirvana is posited as a logical consequence of samsara.

Astus wrote:

There is no such logical consequence. At the same time, both the Buddha and many of his disciples experienced liberation first hand.

Supramundane said:

Therefore, if we can break this dynamic, whereby this interplay does not occur, we will experience Nirvana. It follows that Nirvana does not appear or disappear, but it is right now all around us --- it is empty but not emptiness. It is a very specific element. When the aggregates do not appear, this 'something else' appears.

Astus wrote:

Nirvana is the cessation of the cause of suffering, not the absence of appearances.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 28th, 2021 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: Nirvana: posited or indicated

Content:

KathyLauren said:

When the aggregates do not appear, what is left is Nirvana. It doesn't have to appear, since it is the true nature of reality. Consciousness does not attach to Nirvana. Nirvana is non-attachment. So when consciousness does not attach to the three elements, what is left is Nirvana.

Astus wrote:

There is no consciousness apart from the aggregates (SN 22.53). It's not appearances but clinging that causes suffering (SN 35.191), and when there is no clinging, nirvana is attained in this life (SN 35.118).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 29th, 2021 at 4:25 AM

Title: Re: Tendai and Zen comparison

Content:

Astus wrote:

I presume this might be more on the Japanese schools, still, as a side note it is worth mentioning that the methods and teachings of both traditions can work well together, as exemplified by Ting Chen in <https://ymba.org/books/fundamentals-meditation-practice> and Thích Thanh Từ in <https://thientruclam.info/ht-thich-thanh-tu/keys-to-buddhism-%28chia-khoa-hoc-phat%29>. Ven. Sheng Yen also talks of Tiantai in http://www.108wisdom.org/html/OTH_03.pdf.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 29th, 2021 at 3:11 PM

Title: Re: Nirvana: posited or indicated

Content:

Supramundane said:

We are referring in our discussion to Abhidharma where it is stipulated in this manner.

Astus wrote:

What abhidharma teaches such an idea that nirvana means the absence of the aggregates? Do you have a reference?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 29th, 2021 at 3:59 PM

Title: Re: Nirvana: posited or indicated

Content:

Supramundane said:

I read MN52 to start, and i note that liberation, Nirvana, enlightenment and deliverance are all used interchangeably.

Do you equate them? Or are they different in meaning?

Astus wrote:

The terms used in MN 52 are equivalents: ending of defilements (āsavakkhaya; cf. SN 56.25; Iti 102), complete extinction (parinibbāyati; see https://dsal.uchicago.edu/cgi-bin/app/pali_query.py?qs=parinibb%C4%81yin&searchhws=yes 2.a), liberated mind (cittaṃ vimuccati; cf. vimoceti in AN 4.194), supreme security from bondage (anuttara yogakkhema; cf. SN 16.2), deathless (amata).

You can find a long list of synonyms collected by Phra Payutto <https://buddhistteachings.org/the-state-of-nibbana/>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 29th, 2021 at 8:39 PM

Title: Re: Nirvana: posited or indicated

Content:

Supramundane said:

Yes, Abhidharma introduces the idea of the four dharmas. Nirvana is the fourth and is used interchangeably with the term nirodha, 'cessation'. The first three elements are the aggregates. When consciousness no longer clings to them, what remains is Nirvana.

Astus wrote:

Consciousness is one of the five aggregates. If the aggregates would have to disappear for nirvana to appear, then there could be no consciousness of nirvana. Furthermore, it would have to mean that there could be no nirvana in this life, since a living being is the aggregates.

Supramundane said:

<http://www.en.dhammadana.org/dhamma/nibbana.htm>

Astus wrote:

That's not a quote from the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Abhidhamma_Pi%E1%B9%ADaka, not even from a commentary, a treatise, or a well known teacher. If you didn't like the previous reference to Phra Payutto, try maybe this work by Mahasi Sayadaw:

<http://www.aimwell.org/natureofnibbana.html>, or this shorter one from Buddhadasa Bhikkhu: <https://www.suanmokkh.org/books/84>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 29th, 2021 at 10:26 PM

Title: Re: Nirvana: posited or indicated

Content:

Supramundane said:

The interesting thing about Abhidharma is that consciousness is placed on its own as opposed to the other three elements which constitute the aggregates and Nirvana, thus allowing for the theory of cessation.

Astus wrote:

Theravada abhidharma distinguishes 4 primary dharmas: citta, cetasika, rupa, nibbana.

Consciousness (vinnana) is citta, not a 5th "element".

A commonly used introductory handbook for abhidhamma studies in Theravada, with Bhikkhu Bodhi's commentaries is https://store.pariyatti.org/Comprehensive-Manual-of-Abhidhamma-A--eBook-Mobi-ePub-PDF_p_4628.html (https://download.pariyatti.org/_xUn1HgkZ/Comprehensive%20Manual%20of%20Abhidhamma.pdf). Nina van Gorkom's <https://www.budsas.org/ebud/nina-abhidhamma/nina-abhi-00.htm> (<http://www.abhidhamma.org/development/wp-content/uploads/2020/03/abhidhamma-in-daily-life.pdf>) is also recommended.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 29th, 2021 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: Nirvana: posited or indicated

Content:

Supramundane said:

Try here, Astus:

SN 12:64.

Astus wrote:

The suttas are quite clear on the matter that consciousness is one of the aggregates and it is very much impermanent. SN 12:64 itself states that "for the nutriment consciousness, if there is no delight, if there is no craving, consciousness does not become established there and come to growth." (Bhikkhu Bodhi translation), that is, there is no consciousness to talk about without nutriment. On the concept of unestablished consciousness mentioned there, see e.g. <https://journals.equinoxpub.com/BSR/article/view/7139/4835> by Bhikkhu Brahmāli, p 47ff.

Also, regarding consciousness, see chapter 4 of Theravada Abhidharma by Y. Karunadasa:

"Early Buddhism recognizes three basic psychological principles. The first is the dependent arising of consciousness, expressed in the well-known saying: "Apart from conditions, there is no arising of consciousness." (M. I, 256: Aññatra paccayā natthi viññāṇassa sambhavo.) Consciousness is not some kind of potentiality residing in the heart and becoming actualized on different occasions. Nor is it a static entity that runs along and wanders without undergoing any change, a kind of permanent soul entity that transmigrates from birth to birth. (M. I, 256)"

And chapter 5:

"In the Abhidhamma psychology, bare consciousness, that which constitutes the knowing or awareness of an object, is called citta. It can never arise in its true separate condition. It always arises in immediate conjunction with mental factors, the factors that perform more specialized tasks in the act of cognition. In the books of the Abhidhamma Piṭaka the individual nature of consciousness is often sought to be described by positioning it in relation to other basic factors (dhamma) into which individual existence is analyzed.

...

As a basic factor of actuality (dhamma), consciousness is the mere occurrence due to conditions. (VsmṬ. 462: Yathāpaccayaṃ hi pavattimattam etaṃ sabhāvadhammo. See also Abhv. 116; VsmS. V, 132.) It is not an entity but an activity, an activity without an actor behind it. The point being emphasized is that there is no conscious subject behind consciousness."

For Karunadasa on the subject of nirvana see chapter 10 of https://www.bps.lk/olib/bp/bp438s_Karunadasa_Early-Buddhist-Teachings.pdf.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 2nd, 2021 at 2:35 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana Tripitaka

Content:

Astus wrote:

Apart from the wonderful 84000.co there are other great resources for Mahayana sutras:

<https://bdkamerica.org/tripitaka-list/>

<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra0.html>

<http://www.cttbusa.org/sutratexts.asp.html> or

<https://www.buddhisttexts.org/collections/free-english-ebooks>

<http://www.fodian.net/world/>

<http://www.huzheng.org/en/mtlee/>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 3rd, 2021 at 6:58 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana Tripitaka

Content:

thebuddhajourney said:

What about Abhidharma resources? Of the Tripitaka, the Abhidharma section seems to be the only one that's mostly nonexistent in English. Even the individual analyses and commentaries are often hard to find, or at least a good translation.

Astus wrote:

All seven books of the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Abhidhamma_Pi%E1%B9%ADaka have been translated to English at least once, and even some commentaries. The main abhidharma texts used in Mahayana (Abhidharmakosabhasya & Abhidharmasamuccaya) are also available in translation. Beyond that, unless one counts Madhyamaka and Yogacara works as Abhidharma, there are a couple of handbooks in English, in particular: Abhidharmavatara (Entrance Into the Supreme Doctrine) by Skandhila, Abhidharmahrdaya (The Essence of Scholasticism) by Dharmasri, Amrtarasa (La saveur de l'immortel / The Taste of the Deathless) by Ghosaka. Also the book Sarvastivada Abhidharma by K.L. Dhammajoti is highly recommended.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 12th, 2021 at 2:22 PM

Title: Re: Daily Routine for the Laity in Sutras, Tantras or Texts

Content:

Astus wrote:

Chapter 11 (https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T0279_014 / Cleary: Purifying Practice / <http://www.cttbusa.org/avatamsaka/avatamsaka11.asp.html>) of the 80 volume Avatamsaka Sutra (T279) has a collection of verses for various situations on daily bodhisattva practice. You can find something similar in the teachings of Thich Nhat Hanh, e.g. <https://mindfulnessacademy.org/en/mindfulness-essentials/79-teachings/52-verses-gathas-for-mindfulness-practices>.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 23rd, 2021 at 6:50 PM

Title: Re: Tendai and Zen comparison

Content:

Seishin said:

The Six Gates are a theme that regularly appears in Mahayana texts, such as those by Vasubhandhu (Abhidharmakośakārikā) and Asaṅga, in Pali texts (Digha Nikaya ii.291 and Majjhima Nikaya i.425) as well as the Dhyāna Sutras (Agamas from the Sarvāstivāda school) the latter of which list counting (ganana), following (anugamah), stabilizing (sthapana), contemplation (upalaksana), turning away (vivarta), and purification (parisuddhi), which is the same list used in this text. Zhiyi states that the Six Gates as outlined in his text is the same practice the Buddha used to achieve nirvana under the Bodhi Tree.

Astus wrote:

Side note about the six gates occurring in the Nikayas and Agamas: they do not. It is found only in the later (commentarial) tradition.

See:

https://www.researchgate.net/publication/343212498_The_Doctrine_of_the_Six-stage_Mindfulness_of_Breathing

<https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/howmindfulnessbreathing.pdf>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 28th, 2021 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: Vipassanā in Zen Buddhism

Content:

Ivan A said:

Is there a practice of analytical meditation in Zen Buddhism? Do they practice vipassanā?

Astus wrote:

The methods of calming (zhi 止) and insight (guan 觀) are not unknown, but mainly from sutras like <https://bdkamerica.org/product/the-sutra-on-the-concentration-of-sitting-meditation/>, treatises like <https://bdkamerica.org/product/the-awakening-of-faith/>, and the manuals of the Tiantai and the Huayan schools. But as the Platform Sutra (ch 4, BDK ed, p 41-42) puts it:

'Good friends, our teaching takes meditation (ding 定 - concentration) and wisdom (hui 慧) as its fundamental. Everyone, do not say in your delusion that meditation and wisdom are different.

Meditation and wisdom are of one essence, not different. Meditation is the essence of wisdom, and wisdom is the function of meditation. At times of wisdom, meditation exists in that wisdom; at times of meditation, wisdom exists in that meditation. If you understand this doctrine, this is the equivalent study of meditation and wisdom. All you who study the Way, do not say that they are different, with meditation prior to and generating wisdom or with wisdom prior to and generating meditation. If your view of them is like this, then the Dharma would have two characteristics. This would be to say something good with your mouth but to have that which is not good in your minds. It is to make meditation and wisdom falsely existent to consider them as not equivalent.'

As for Dogen, in Bendowa he is asked about Tendai practice (SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 1, p 16):

[Someone] asks, "Is there nothing to prevent a person who practices this zazen from also performing mantra (shingon 眞言) and quiet-reflection (shikan 止觀) practices?"

I say: When I was in China, I heard the true essence of the teachings from a true master; he said that he had never heard that any of the patriarchs who received the authentic transmission of the Buddha-seal ever performed such practices additionally, in the Western Heavens or in the Eastern Lands, in the past or in the present. Certainly, unless we devote ourselves to one thing, we will not attain complete wisdom.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 30th, 2021 at 2:05 PM

Title: Re: Help me understand Anatta

Content:

Seitaka said:

If the skandhas are the totality of a sentient being and no metaphysical entity or otherwise transcends them and nirvana is simply the elimination of future rebirth, how is this not nihilism or annihilationism? Since by definition there is nothing "outside" the skandhas and they are by nature suffering and impermanent, their final end cannot be anything but absolute negation correct?

Astus wrote:

The extreme view of non-existence or annihilationism means that there is somebody/something that ceases to exist, and that there are actions without consequences.

As Nagarjuna summarises (MMK 15.10-11; cf. SN 12.15):

'To say that things exist means grasping at their permanence;
To say they don't exist implies the notion of annihilation.
Thus the wise should not remain
In "this exists" or "this does not exist."
Something that exists by its intrinsic being,
Since it cannot not exist, is permanent.
To say that what once was is now no more
Entails annihilation.'

Annihilation does not apply to what happens to a liberated person after death, because there has never been any entity to cease in the first place.

Nagarjuna's summary (MMK 22.12-14; cf. MN 27, SN 22.85-86)

'Permanence, impermanence—all the four alternatives:
Where are they in the Peaceful One?
Finite, infinite—all the four alternatives:
Where are they in the Peaceful One?
Those who crudely think:
"The Tathagata does exist,"
Will think, regarding his nirvana,
"He does not exist."
Regarding Buddha, who is empty of intrinsic being,
It's untenable to think
That, having gained nirvana,
He exists or else does not exist.'

Here's also Gampopa's explanation for refuting grasping at non-existence (Jewel Ornament of Liberation, p 242-243):

'Since the two selves do not exist in any form of existent things, it might be said that they are therefore nonexistent. However, they are not nonexistent either. How is this? Because the two selves or mind could only be said to be nonexistent if they had previously existed and then later ceased to exist. Yet, since phenomena, which are called the "two selves" or "mind," have from the very beginning had no inherent existence, they are beyond the extremes of existence and nonexistence.'

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 30th, 2021 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Help me understand Anatta

Content:

Seitaka said:

The result is still the same, with the annihilation I described in my initial post there is absolute negation after extinguishing karmic conditions for future rebirth whereas in your scenario there is absolute negation simply from the start and we just don't know it.

Astus wrote:

Both the Buddha and his numerous completely liberated disciples continued to live as other human beings, except they were without the suffering part. The assumption that when skandhas no longer regenerate is annihilation is an incorrect one that identifies the skandhas as self. The skandhas are of course often mistaken for a self, but if looked at correctly, they are seen as very much impermanent even now. To point to a specific event (death) as the end is the idea that until death there is someone/something that suddenly ceases to exist.

Seitaka said:

That also makes one wonder, who or what realizes or knows there has never been a person? If there is no metaphysical entity that transcends the casually conditioned and impermanent person, how can this be known? Is this not a self-negation paradox?

Astus wrote:

Realisation and knowing can happen only within a consciousness that changes, not within a permanent entity that cannot change.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 31st, 2021 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: Vipassanā in Zen Buddhism

Content:

Nicholas2727 said:

Don't want to take this too far from the original post but are Kumarajiva works studied and practiced still in East Asian Buddhism?

Astus wrote:

There sure are some who study them.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 31st, 2021 at 12:17 AM

Title: Re: Help me understand Anatta

Content:

Seitaka said:

Let's put it a different way, what is the ultimate difference between saying someone/something never existed to begin with and a someone/something is annihilated at death? The latter involves something that was and is lost and becomes nothing, the former simply states that there was nothing to begin with. In both cases the ultimate truth or end is nothing, namely nihilism.

Astus wrote:

There are the five aggregates: form, feeling, perception, intention, consciousness. That covers the entire spectrum of human experience. The lack of self means that there is no experience anywhere that can rightly be called a self. But as long as one assumes any experience as one's own or as oneself, for that long there are craving and hatred, and from craving and hatred come the perpetuation of suffering. Recognising that there is no entity behind experience, no ultimate doer or experiencer, does not change reality, but changes how experience operates: not based on ignorance, craving, and hatred, but based on wisdom, generosity, and kindness. Seeing only the concept of self and claiming that it's nihilism is disregarding the entirety of reality and worrying about a fictional concept.

Seitaka said:

What exactly about that view corresponds to some of these words used in the Pali to describe Nirvana:

Astus wrote:

That when there is no longer all the worry and anxiety about oneself, there is peace.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 31st, 2021 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: Help me understand Anatta

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Buddhism argues that awareness isn't a self, it is simply awareness, and that if you examine awareness, that ultimately you cannot find anything in that awareness that constitutes self, atman, some kind of specific entity that is even reborn.

Astus wrote:

Buddhism also shows that awareness is a conditioned, momentary phenomenon.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 3rd, 2021 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: Highest form of meditation?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The answer is simple, and not sectarian at all, since it is mentioned in every sūtra and tantra that discusses Buddha's awakening.

The highest meditation is Vajropama Samadhi, since only it has the ability to obliterate all traces of the two obscurations in their entirety.

Seitaka said:

But what is the specific methodology or meditative practice by which such a samadhi can be attained? Obviously following the Buddhist path as a whole, but any particular practice which was seen as especially effective in attaining such?

Astus wrote:

There is a very nice sutra on that topic: <http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra53a.html>, or in another translation: <http://www.buddhism.org/Sutras/2/Sutras9.htm>.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 4th, 2021 at 3:59 AM

Title: Re: Highest form of meditation?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Vajropama-samādhi is the nirvikalpa samādhi of an ārya, someone who has realized emptiness already. Ordinary nirvikalpa samādhi merely leads to birth in the realm of unconscious devas.

Astus wrote:

Would you perhaps have some sources in mind for the above connection between nirvikalpa and vajropama samadhi? I couldn't find much on nirvikalpa samādhi by a search of various possible translations (無分別三昧/三摩地/定), unless you meant nirvikalpa jñāna (無分別智). As for the samadhi leading to the heaven of unconsciousness (無想天), that's usually called asaṃjñi samāpatti (無想定).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 9th, 2021 at 3:55 PM

Title: Re: An Interpretation of: 'To Turn Around'

Content:

Astus wrote:

Let's step back and turn one's attention around to the origins of the idea of turning around, which I take to be the method known as the mindfulness of breath in six aspects coming from the Sarvastivada tradition (more on that: https://ahandfulofleaves.files.wordpress.com/2012/02/mindfulness-of-breathing-in-the-dhayana-sutra_florin-deleanu_1992.pdf). An easy reference for it is the Abhidharmakosabhasyam VI.12, where the fifth aspect is given (Poussin-Sangpo tr, vol 3, p 1905 (Pruden, vol 3, p 923)):

'Modifying (vivartana). - The practitioners modify the cognition which had the wind for its cognitive object and apply the cognition onto more and more superior wholesome roots up to and including the supreme mundane factors.'

It means that the object changes from the breath to higher qualities/dharmas, taking one to the doorstep of attainment that is the sixth aspect. Here's its description in The Sutra on the Concentration of Sitting Meditation (BDK ed, p 29-30):

'One dispenses with abiding at the gates of wind (i.e., the nostrils) and gives up the method of coarse contemplation. When one gives up the method of coarse contemplation, one knows the impermanence of the breath. This is called the "shifting" contemplation. One contemplates the impermanence of the five aggregates and also reflects on the impermanence of inhalation and exhalation. One sees that the initial breath does not come from anywhere and observes that the subsequent breath also leaves no trace. They come into being because [their] causes and conditions meet, and they cease to exist because [their] causes and conditions disperse. This is called the method of “shifting” contemplation, which removes the five obstacles [of meditation] and various defilements.'

Then we can come to Zhiyi's description that can be presumed to be the antecedent of its Chan version (The Six Dharma Gates to the Sublime, ch 2):

'As for the cultivation of turning, once one has realized that contemplation itself arises from the mind and once one has also understood that, if one continues to follow along with analysis of the objective sphere, this does not by itself directly bring about convergence with the original source, one should then turn back the direction of one's contemplation so that one now contemplates that very mind that is engaged in contemplation.

As for this mind which engages in contemplation, from what does it arise? Is it generated by contemplative thought or is it generated by something other than contemplative thought? If it is the case that it is generated by contemplative thought, then it should also be the case that there was a pre-existing contemplation process already underway. But in the present situation, this is certainly not the case. Why not? Because there was not yet anything in the midst of the three [immediately preceding] dharmas of “counting,” “following,” “stabilization,” and so forth that was identifiable with this [process of] “contemplation.”

If it is the case that [contemplative thought] arose from a mind not involved in contemplation, is it the case that the mind not involved in contemplation generated it when [that non-contemplating thought] had already ceased or instead produced it when [that non-contemplating thought] had not yet ceased? If it is the case that it produced it when [that non-contemplating thought] had not ceased, then this would be a case of two thoughts existing simultaneously.

If [one were to posit that] it was generated by a dharma which had already ceased to exist, [one should realize that], once an extinct dharma has already disappeared, it is no longer able to generate any contemplative [thought process].

If one were to claim that it was generated from that which had ceased and yet not ceased, or if one were to go so far as to claim that it was generated from that which had neither ceased nor not ceased, in all such cases, those [antecedent causes] cannot ultimately be apprehended. One should therefore realize that the contemplative mind itself was originally unproduced. Because it was unproduced, it does not exist. Because it does not exist, it is just “empty” [of any inherent existence]. Because it is empty [of any inherent existence], there is no mind engaged in the process of contemplation.

If there is no contemplative mind, how could there be an objective sphere which serves as the object of contemplation? This perishing of both the objective sphere and the faculty of knowing is the essential factor in turning back to the source. This is the characteristic feature of the cultivation of turning.

As for the characteristic feature of the realization of turning, the wisdom of the mind opens forth and develops in a way no longer requiring one to bring to bear additional skillful effort. It carries on in a way allowing one to naturally be able to invoke analyses, turn back towards the origin, and return to the source. This is what is meant by the realization of turning.

The practitioner should realize that, if he desires to retreat into [a circumstance involving] an absence of both objective sphere and knowing faculty utterly apart from an objective sphere and a knowing faculty, he would thereby fail to leave behind being tethered to [the duality inherent in] an objective sphere and a knowing faculty. This is because, in such a case, one would still simply be coursing along in the sphere of duality-based extremes. At just such a time, one should then relinquish the gateway of turning and establish the mind in the path of purification.'

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 10th, 2021 at 3:31 PM

Title: Re: An Interpretation of: 'To Turn Around'

Content:

JimTempleman said:

The question (for me) then becomes: Does 'the shifting of awareness from the guests to the host' trigger the "perishing of both the objective sphere and the faculty of knowing"? Based on my own limited experience, I'd say that this happens when a samadhi opens to (help) 'clear things up.'

Astus wrote:

The position of the host is where there is no subject and object, where there is no abiding. The host does not mean the owner of the inn watching guests going around, rather it is the realm of the whole inn.

Also, on the matter of the meaning of turning the light and reflecting back (回光返照) or simply reverse-illumination/tracing back the radiance (返照), two important authors should be looked into: Dahui Zonggao and Bojo Jinul. They explain it quite well, plus check Prof. Buswell's explanations found in the introductions to his translations.

'You yourself say that your faculties are "dull"; so try this sort of reverse-illumination: the one who has the ability to know dullness — is he, after all, dull-witted? If you don't turn the light backwards and do a reverse-illumination, and you merely perpetuate the dull-wittedness, your production of more worry and distress is piling illusion on top of illusion, adding more [unreal] flowers in the sky on top of the [unreal] flowers in the sky. Just listen to me: the one who has the ability to know that his disposition is dull is most definitely not dull. Although you must not perpetuate this "dull-wittedness," you also must not discard this "dull-wittedness practice" [i.e., doing a reverse-illumination on dullness]. Seizing and discarding, sharpness and dullness, lie in people, not in [the true] mind. This [true] mind, and the buddhas of the three times, are of a single substance: they are non- dual. If they were to be dual, then dharma wouldn't be the same everywhere. Receiving the teaching and transmitting mind are both unreal [i.e., students can't receive this true mind from teachers, and teachers can't transmit it to students]. You are seeking the true and real, but going ever more amiss. If you merely come to know that the [true] mind of the single substance and of nonduality definitely does not lie in [discriminations such as] sharp and dull, seizing and discarding, then you will see the moon and forget the finger [pointing at the moon], decisively severing [all discriminations] at the single stroke of the sword. If you further hesitate, thinking about “before” and calculating upon “after,” then it’s calculating that something “really” exists in the empty fist;³⁸⁵ vainly “adoring the odd and playing with strangeness” in the midst of the sense organs, sense objects, and dharmas; and falsely imprisoning oneself in the midst of the five aggregates and eighteen elements [which produce sensory experience]. You’ll never put an end to it!

(Letters of Dahui, 14.3, p 121-122)

The viability of all approaches to meditation, in Chinul’s view, ultimately derives from the process of tracing the radiance emanating from the mind back to its source (hoegwang panjo 迴光返照), or simply “tracing back the radiance” (panjo 返照). This concept is an essential element of the processes especially in the Hwaŏm-oriented approach of faith and understanding according to the complete and sudden teaching. Chinul employs a variety of complementary designations for this aspect of contemplation: “trace the radiance back to one’s own mind” (panjo chasim 返照自心); “trace the radiance back to one’s own nature” (panjo chasŏng 返照自性); “in one thought-moment, trace the light back and see one’s own original nature” (illyŏm hoegwang kyŏn chabonsŏng 一念迴光見自本性); “trace back and observe the qualities and functions of your own mind” (pan’gwan chasim chi tŏgyong 返觀自心之德用); “to observe and reflect on your own mind” (kwanjo chasim 觀照自心); “reflect on and view your own mind” (chogyŏn chasim 照見自心); “mirror your own mind” (kyŏng chasim 鏡自心); or simply “trace back the radiance” (panjo 返照), “contemplative reflection” (kwanjo 觀照), or even “introspection” (naejo 內照).⁹⁸ Although the term hoegwang panjo can be interpreted as “reflection,” “introspection,” “counterillumination,” or even “meditation,” the more dynamic renderings I adopt here better convey, I believe, a sense of the actual gnoseological process involved.

Chinul’s Chosŏn-dynasty commentator, Yŏndam Yuil 蓮潭有一 (1720-1799), gives a succinct and precise definition of the term: “ ‘To trace back the radiance’ means to trace the radiance back to the numinous awareness (yŏngji 靈智) of one’s own mind; for this reason, it is called ‘trace back the radiance.’ It is like seeing the radiance of the sun’s rays and following it back until you see the orb of the sun itself.”
(Introduction: Chinul’s Life, Thought, and Writings, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 2, p 62-64)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 10th, 2021 at 9:33 PM

Title: Re: How to figure out the solution to a koan

Content:

Astus wrote:

'Lu Geng first asked Nanquan, "I've raised a goose in a bottle, and it gradually grew too big to get out; now, without damaging the bottle or injuring the goose, how would you get it out?"

Nanquan called to him, "Sir!"

Lu Geng responded, "Yes?"

Nanquan said, "It's out."
Lu Geng was awakened at this.'
(Book of Serenity, commentary to case 91)

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, August 10th, 2021 at 9:58 PM
Title: Re: How to figure out the solution to a koan
Content:
Matylda said:
it is very very wrong to write about koan practice one is doing

Astus wrote:
What is wrong in it?

Maybe you already know this one, or its Japanese original:
https://www.google.com/books/edition/The_Sound_of_the_One_Hand/2Yc-DwAAQBAJ

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, August 10th, 2021 at 11:15 PM
Title: Re: How to figure out the solution to a koan
Content:
KathyLauren said:
Writing about a koan, and especially asking for help with one, encourages the OP to try intellectual solutions, or else to repeat someone else's rehearsed non-intellectual solution. The whole point of a koan is to avoid doing either of those things.

Astus wrote:
One goes through all sorts of ways one can come up with before all efforts are exhausted and one gets stuck with pure doubt, if one is actually persistent enough. In the meantime, to learn a thing or two about Zen and the specific koan one works with is no obstacle, especially if the teacher does not approve whatever clever looking solution one comes up with. As long as one puts one's faith in a teacher's judgement, no solution can be found on one's own or from others.

Hyujeong warns:

'There are ten kinds of faults for the points of stories (hwadu): to ponder it with the faculty of intention (manas); to estimate (subtle movements of the mind such as) where you raise eyebrows and blink eyes; to seek your livelihood on the path of language; to draw evidence from writings; to try to be enlightened only where it is raised up; to toss it away into a casket of no concerns; to make understanding (of it in terms) of (it as) existence or non-existence; to make an understanding of (it as) the truly non-existent; to make an understanding of it as reason; and to hold onto delusion and wait to be enlightened. Those who are divorced from these ten kinds of faults, when they simply raise the story, they remove the spirit (of troubles) and just doubt, "What is this?"'

(Seonga gwigam, section 16, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 3, p 80)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 11th, 2021 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: How to figure out the solution to a koan

Content:

yinyangkoi said:

Is it a good idea to read this? Or will it hinder my practice? Will it just delude me more and move me further from the answer?

Astus wrote:

If you want to learn how some people a century ago approached koan practice, then it is a useful source. But it is probably not that relevant for anyone just starting to learn Buddhism. As for getting the answer to the original question, you already have it, as the point is to recognise how one's thoughts and feelings react. KeithA gave good advice.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 11th, 2021 at 3:31 AM

Title: Re: How to figure out the solution to a koan

Content:

rejun said:

it happens in private, and is intended to be confidential.

Astus wrote:

Sure, it is private and confidential, and it's up to each person whether they want to discuss their private matters. For instance, the modern classic Three Pillars of Zen by Kapleau contains several private interviews and accounts of enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 11th, 2021 at 3:38 AM

Title: Re: An Interpretation of: 'To Turn Around'

Content:

JimTempleman said:

I think your referring to a book by Robert Buswell that gives these two translations, but I don't know the title of the book?

Astus wrote:

The second quote is from his introduction, you can download the whole book from http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/bbs/board.php?bo_table=5040&wr_id=46&sca=Collected+Works+of+Korean+Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 11th, 2021 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: How to figure out the solution to a koan

Content:

Matylda said:

The breach of this iron rule ends in extirpation of one who made this violation. One could get drunk or do some other stupid thing and it may be still forgiven, but never disclosing dokusan/private interview secret. and there are many many reasons for this.

Astus wrote:

Is there any particular source or basis of that rule, like in specific temple rules, or perhaps in Baizhang's or Dogen's pure rules?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 12th, 2021 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: Questions on Amitabha Buddha, and Faith/Other Power

Content:

carvahlo19 said:

1) On the Amitabha Buddha: could he be identified with Dharmakaya/Buddha-nature? Is he a literal material being or could he just be a thought-form that exists in way similar to the Platonic notion of ideas? I'm not asking or insinuating the Amitabha Buddha is NOT real, but rather if his reality is material or immaterial.

Astus wrote:

A buddha has <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Trikaya>: Dharma-body, enjoyment-body, and manifestation-body. There are various doctrines assigning/emphasising one of those three as being Amitabha. From a Pure Land perspective it is more common to say Amitabha is an enjoyment or a manifestation body, because the Dharma-body often seems too abstract, and practically meaningful only when one engages in insight meditation.

carvahlo19 said:

2) On Faith/Other Power: Seeing that Buddhism adheres to the notion of no-self and is non-dualistic, could other power just be understood to be an expedient form of self power by "moving" it to an external agency. In other words, could other power be a mental power to reorient one's will in a way that self power might not be able to due to people living in mappo?

Astus wrote:

What makes it 'other' is that it is the vow of Dharmakara fulfilled in the buddhahood of Amitabha that allows even ordinary beings to be born in Sukhavati. It's not that Amitabha, or any buddha, can just pluck beings out of samsara, otherwise we'd all be liberated already. There are still the three minds one needs to attain birth, or to put it another way: faith, vows, and practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 12th, 2021 at 7:50 PM

Title: Re: How to figure out the solution to a koan

Content:

reiun said:

If these streams you refer to do not condemn discussing confidential student/teacher sanzen, and specifically koan work, and they are Zen/Chan/Seon, is it their position to encourage it?

Astus wrote:

Perhaps start with establishing what confidentiality means. There are a number of easily findable guides from various Zen centres (e.g. <https://mzg.org.au/group-meditation/dokusan/>, <https://austinzencenter.org/practice-discussion/>, <https://www.redcedarzen.org/resources/Documents/practice/PracticeDiscussion.pdf>, <https://www.mountaincloud.org/about/guidelines-for-members-and-students/>, <https://throssel.org.uk/obc-policy-on-confidentiality/>) that stipulate that dokusan is confidential within certain limits. The confidential nature of such private discussions are meant that a student can safely and openly discuss personal matters. There is no rule mentioned that a student cannot talk to others about what was talked about. At <https://zenways.org/attend-sanzen-in-person-or-remotely/>, however, there is such a rule.

Apart from contemporary examples, it would be good to find traditional rules concerning such restrictions, but so far none has been brought forth.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 12th, 2021 at 10:22 PM

Title: Re: How to figure out the solution to a koan

Content:

Meido said:

This is something like saying, "It has been asserted that soup should be served in bowls, not on plates. But so far no such rules have been brought forth." If one understands the general mechanism of wato/koan practice - in Chan, Son, and Zen - one realizes why the private nature of teacher-student encounter is maintained. Looking for instances in which someone like Daito Kokushi needed to say "Hey, sanzen is private" is just not going to bear fruit. It was not something necessary to say. And the living traditions today that maintain these practices may be relied upon.

Astus wrote:

If keeping communication on one's koan practice is an important rule, and as once mentioned by Matylda its disregard could even result in expulsion from the temple, it seems logical to me that it is noted as such at least within the temple rules where all sorts of behavioural matters are regulated.

Meido said:

We might more fruitfully ask what compelling reason there could be to ignore such traditional prohibitions, that is, by what valid need those prohibitions are here outweighed.

Astus wrote:

I'm not saying it is not prohibited at some places, I just so far fail to see if there is actually a tradition of such a restriction or if it is more a modern phenomenon. As for whether one should keep to oneself one's experiences, that I see as a personal choice, although certainly there are many factors one may consider, especially the social context. For instance, a good number of koans are supposed to be conversations between teacher and student.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 13th, 2021 at 6:59 PM

Title: Re: How to figure out the solution to a koan

Content:

Meido said:

at this point I've expressed as much as seems useful as well.

Astus wrote:

Thank you for doing so.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 13th, 2021 at 7:37 PM

Title: Re: How to figure out the solution to a koan

Content:

Malcolm said:

Astus does not believe this, and thinks that reading things in books is sufficient.

Astus wrote:

Danyuan greatly esteemed Yangshan, and said to him, "Previously the National Teacher Huizhong received the transmission of a total of ninety-seven symbolic circles from the Sixth Ancestor. He in turn passed these to me, saying, 'Thirty years after I've died, a novice monk will come from the South who will greatly revive this teaching. When that time comes, pass the teaching on to him and don't let it end.' Today I transmit them to you. You must uphold and preserve them."

When he had finished speaking he passed the secret text to Yangshan. After receiving and examining the text, Yangshan burned it.

One day Danyuan said to Yangshan, "The symbols that I gave you are extremely rare, esoteric, and precious."

Yangshan said, "After I examined them I burned them."

Danyuan said, "This Dharma gate of ours can't be understood by most people. Only the Buddha, the ancestors, and all the holy ones can fully understand it. How could you burn it?"

Yangshan said, "After examining it, I fully comprehended its meaning. Then there was no use keeping the text."

Danyuan said, "Even so, when transmitting this to disciples, people of future times won't believe it."

Yangshan said, "If you would like another copy that won't be a problem. I'll make another copy and give it to you. Then it won't be lost."

Danyuan said, "Please do."

(Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 186)

Many centuries later in Japan:

The Zen master Mu-nan had only one successor. His name was Shojū. After Shojū had completed his study of Zen, Mu-nan called him into his room.

"I am getting old," he said, "and as far as I know, Shojū, you are the only one who will carry on this teaching. Here is a book. It has been passed down from master to master for seven generations. I also have added many points according to my understanding. The book is very valuable, and I am giving it to you to represent your successorship."

"If the book is such an important thing, you had better keep it," Shojū replied. "I received your Zen without writing and am satisfied with it as it is."

"I know that," said Mu-nan.

"Even so, this work has been carried from master to master for seven generations, so you may keep it as a symbol of having received the teaching. Here."

The two happened to be talking before a brazier. The instant Shojū felt the book in his hands he thrust it into the flaming coals. He had no lust for possessions.

Mu-nan, who never had been angry before, yelled: "What are you doing!"

Shojū shouted back: "What are you saying!"

(Zen Flesh, Zen Bones, p 80-81)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 14th, 2021 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: How to figure out the solution to a koan

Content:

Malcolm said:

I don't see how these charming anecdotes relate to your previously stated position about the self sufficiency of autodidact Dharma.

Astus wrote:

Those stories illustrate the importance given to books, and to secret ones in particular (see Meido's explanation <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=593638#p593638> about shitsunai).

Both stories are about important ancestors: Yangshan was one of the founders of the Guiyang school known for its use of symbols; Shojū was the one whom Hakuin named as his primary teacher. Both stories allow the emergence of new traditions, where Yangshan and Hakuin are not required to possess old papers but are allowed (and even mandated for Yangshan) to present new ones.

As for an example of the sufficiency of autodidact Dharma that is relevant to this topic: Jinul introduced hwadu/koan practice to Korea based only on reading the works of Dahui.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 16th, 2021 at 3:33 PM

Title: Re: How to figure out the solution to a koan

Content:

Matylda said:

Moreover talking about koans-dokusan, even talking about one's own practice is considered to be a serious breach of Jukai vows.

Astus wrote:

Which precept is it against?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 16th, 2021 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: How to figure out the solution to a koan

Content:

Malcolm said:

It's clearly just against the rules in Japanese Zen, according to Matylda and Meido, etc. It is probably considered idle speech.

Astus wrote:

In Japan they use the bodhisattva precepts of the Brahmajala Sutra. No idle speech included there.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 17th, 2021 at 8:02 PM

Title: Re: How to figure out the solution to a koan

Content:

Matylda said:

第七不自讚毀他戒 no 7th

Astus wrote:

How praising oneself and disparaging others is sharing what happened during a sanzen/dokusan? Where is oneself praised in that? Where is someone else disparaged?

The Brahma's Net Sutra (BDK ed, p 46) teaches:

'My disciples, if with your own mouth you praise yourself and disparage others, or if you encourage people to praise themselves and disparage others, then you have the causes of disparagement of others, the conditions of disparagement of others, the method of disparagement of others, and the act of disparagement of others. On behalf of sentient beings, bodhisattvas should receive their blame and reflect on their own wrongdoings, and attribute good works to others. If you proclaim your own merits and cover up other people's good works, causing them to be disparaged, this constitutes a bodhisattva pārājika offense.'

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 26th, 2021 at 2:08 AM

Title: Re: What is not delusion

Content:

yinyangkoi said:

What is not delusion? Is there anything? Are the phenomena that happen every moment delusion? The sounds and smells and so on.

Astus wrote:

"The mind can be spoken of [in terms of its two aspects]: birth and death, and suchness. The mind as suchness is like a clear mirror which can reflect images. The mirror symbolizes the mind; the images symbolize the dharmas. If the mind grasps at dharmas, then it gets involved in external causes and conditions, which is the meaning of birth and death. If the mind does not grasp at dharmas, that is suchness."

(The Record of Ma-tsu, in Sun-Face Buddha, p 67)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 28th, 2021 at 8:08 PM

Title: Re: A Master in Zen

Content:

Ivan A said:

the practice of Buddhism as such is impossible without a teacher?

Astus wrote:

Not at all. If you have the intention to awakening (bodhicitta), that already puts you on the path to buddhahood, and the cultivation of the six paramitas is what any Mahayana follower does, no matter the tradition. Even if you eventually want to study under a Zen teacher, there is a lot you can do before, and it will also greatly benefit your Zen practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 29th, 2021 at 5:37 AM

Title: Re: The attainment in chan according to ten bhumis standard

Content:

KeithA said:

There are no levels in Zen. Just delusion/enlightenment.

Astus wrote:

There are various levels used by various groups/teachers, including the standard 52 levels, and also levels used exclusively in Chan, like Dongshan's five ranks, or Seung Sahn's Zen circle.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 29th, 2021 at 5:47 AM

Title: Re: The attainment in chan according to ten bhumis standard

Content:

Genjo Conan said:

The bhumis are not a framework that is recognized within Chan/Zen.

Astus wrote:

First of all, since it is taught in the sutras it is necessarily recognised and accepted. Furthermore, where gradual cultivation follows sudden awakening, the stages of cultivation are those of the 52 levels of bodhisattvas.

'Clearly remember: in the Buddhist patriarchs' learning of the truth, to awaken the bodhi-mind is inevitably seen as foremost. This is the eternal rule of the Buddhist patriarchs. "To awaken" means to be clear in; it does not refer to the great realization of the truth itself. Even those who have suddenly experienced the ten states are still bodhisattvas. The twenty-eight patriarchs of India, the six patriarchs of China, and all the other great ancestral masters are bodhisattvas: they are not buddhas; and they are not śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas, or the like. Among practitioners of this age there is not one person who clearly knows that [these patriarchs] are bodhisattvas, not śrāvakas. [Practitioners of this age] just randomly call themselves patchrobed monks and patch-robed disciples without knowing the reality of the matter, and so they have created confusion. It is pitiful that in a decadent age the truth of the patriarchs has degenerated.' (Hotsu-bodaishin, in SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 3, p 354-355)

'As for "gradual cultivation," although he has awakened to the fact that his original nature is no different from that of the buddhas, the beginningless proclivities of habit (vāsanā) are extremely difficult to remove suddenly. Therefore he must continue to cultivate while relying on this awakening so that this efficacy of gradual suffusion is perfected; he constantly nurtures the embryo of sanctity, and after a long, long time he becomes a sage. Hence it is called gradual cultivation. It is like the maturation of an infant: from the day of its birth, [an infant] is endowed with all its faculties, just like any other [human being], but its physical capacities are not yet fully developed; it is only after the passage of many months and years that it will finally mature into an adult.' (Moguja's Secrets on Cultivating the Mind, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 2, p 216-217)

'In Chinese Chan Buddhism, a sudden awakening means a sudden apprehension of a Buddha's perception of reality. ... Entering into a Buddha's perception of reality occurs when one reaches the level of a noble bodhisattva of the first ground or above, for only such a bodhisattva is able truly to eliminate ignorance bit by bit and attain enlightenment bit by bit. ...

We see that sudden awakening is just the beginning of the awareness regarding the underlying, essential principle of all dharmas, or buddhanature, and is not the same as becoming a Buddha. Gradual practice is the cultivation of merit through concrete actions. Only through accumulating merit through gradual practice can one actually become a Buddha: so "sudden awakening to principle but gradual practice with regard to actions” is another way to clarify sudden and gradual. This explanation shows us what sudden awakening in Chan Buddhism means.

The interpretation above is based on interpretation of doctrine. Some Chan practitioners may disagree, and claim that the sudden awakening they speak of is simply sudden awakening, and is basically unrelated to any stages or gradual practice. In this conception, when a practitioner is suddenly awakened, she sees the fundamental, real nature of Suchness right then and there. To do this, however, is beyond the capability of most people.'
(Orthodox Chinese Buddhism, p 126)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 29th, 2021 at 4:36 PM

Title: Re: The attainment in chan according to ten bhumis standard

Content:

Genjo Conan said:

Wonderful. What stage was Linji on? Or Huangbo? Could Dogen manifest simultaneously in one million Buddha realms, or just ten thousand? Do you have a citation for that?

Astus wrote:

For Linji such terms are empty names to use according to circumstances, for Huangbo gradual and sudden equally ends in buddhahood, and Dogen saw all realms in a blink of an eye.

'Followers of the Way, if you take my viewpoint you'll cut off the heads of the saṃbhogakāya and nirmāṇakāya buddhas; a bodhisattva who has attained the completed mind of the tenth stage will be like a mere hireling; a bodhisattva of equivalent enlightenment or a bodhisattva of marvelous enlightenment will be like pilloried prisoners; an arhat and a pratyekabuddha will be like privy filth; bodhi and nirvana will be like hitching posts for asses. Why is this so? Followers of the Way, it is only because you haven't yet realized the emptiness of the three asaṃkhyeya kalpas that you have such obstacles.'

(Record of Linji, p 10, tr Sasaki)

'If someone comes and asks about seeking buddha, I immediately appear in conformity with the state of purity; if someone asks about bodhisattvahood, I immediately appear in conformity with the state of compassion; if someone asks me about bodhi, I immediately appear in conformity with the state of pure mystery; if someone asks me about nirvana, I immediately appear in conformity with the state of serene stillness. Though there be ten thousand different states, the person does not differ.'

(p 16)

'Followers of the Way, make no mistake! All the dharmas of this world and of the worlds beyond are without self-nature. Also, they are without produced nature. They are just empty names, and these names are also empty. All you are doing is taking these worthless names to be real. That's all wrong! Even if they do exist, they are nothing but states of dependent transformation, such as the dependent transformations of bodhi, nirvana, emancipation, the threefold body, the [objective] surroundings and the [subjective] mind, bodhisattvahood, and buddhahood. What are you looking for in these lands of dependent transformations! All of these, up to and including the Three Vehicles' twelve divisions of teachings, are just so much waste paper to wipe off privy filth. The Buddha is just a phantom body, the patriarchs just old monks.'

(p 19)

'There are those who, on hearing the dharma, attain no-mind in a single moment of thought. But there are also those who attain no-mind after progressing through [the extended bodhisattva path, that is] the ten faiths, ten abodes, ten practices, and ten dedications; there are even those others who attain no-mind only after arriving at the ten stages (bhūmi) [the culmination of the bodhisattva path]. Whether long or short, if you achieve no-mind, then it will be right there; there is nothing more you need to practice or realize. In reality, there is nothing to attain — this is true, not false. Whether you attain it in a single moment of thought or only after mastering the ten stages, both approaches are equally effective. There is no distinction in their depth or shallowness; [prolonging practice] merely entails sequential kalpas of needless bitterness and hardship.'

(Bird in Flight Leaves No Trace, ch 2)

"“Buddha lands” means the inside of the eyes. If, when we see and hear the words “illuminating the East,” we assume and learn that it is as if a line of white silk were extending to the East, that is not learning of the truth. The whole universe in ten directions is nothing other than “the East.” “The East” is called “the whole universe in ten directions.” On this basis the whole universe in ten directions exists. And the words by which it proclaims itself as the whole universe in ten directions, we hear as the sound of “the eighteen thousand buddha lands.”"

(Komyo, in SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 2, p 295)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 30th, 2021 at 8:20 PM

Title: Re: The attainment in chan according to ten bhumis standard

Content:

KeithA said:

Yes, expedient teachings and all.

Astus wrote:

All teachings are expedients with the primary goal of liberating beings.

Zen master Yangshan entered the hall and addressed the monks, saying: “Each and every one of you, turn the light inward! Don’t try to remember what I’m saying! For a beginningless eon you have faced away from the light and been shrouded in darkness. The roots of delusion are deep. They’re difficult to cut off and uproot. So [the Buddha] established expedient means to grab your attention. These are like showing yellow leaves to a crying child, who imagines they’re gold and thus stops crying. You act as though you're in a shop where someone sells a hundred goods made from gold and jade, but you're trying to weigh each item. So you say that Shitou has a real gold shop? Well in my shop there's a wide range of goods! If someone comes looking for mouse turds then I give him some. If someone comes looking for real gold then I give it to him.”

(Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 187)

KeithA said:

I don't feel it's an essential part of Zen practice, though.

Astus wrote:

It depends on the practitioner whether it's important or not. Eventually, even practice is non-essential.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 6th, 2021 at 2:52 PM

Title: Re: What are texts in the Agamas that are not in the Nikayas?

Content:

Padmist said:

And are there books in the Nikayas that are not in the Agamas?

Astus wrote:

You can look into the literature dealing with comparative studies, like Ven. Analayo's work on the <https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/compstudyvol1.pdf>, or just browse <https://suttacentral.net/>.

Padmist said:

What do other Buddhists today (Tibetans/Theravadins) think of the books that are in the Agamas but aren't in their Canon?

Astus wrote:

Tibetans never had anything more than a dozen or so agama sutras available in their canon, and I guess they don't really miss the rest because of believing that the Abhidharmakosabhasya is representative of everything there is to know of Hinayana. Theravadins would generally say they have the complete and authentic canon, and those few people working with other sources, i.e. mainly Chinese, can have varying opinions. It is rather in East Asia (as the agamas are found in Chinese) that you can find people studying the agamas, like Ven. Yinshun.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 6th, 2021 at 4:20 PM

Title: Re: The Noble Truths as Skillful Means

Content:

Astus wrote:

Trying to figure things out straight from old Chan texts is a particularly difficult task that requires a lot, simply because those works were mainly written in a milieu that was already knowledgeable not just about Buddhist teachings but also Chinese literary culture. Learning from the writings of modern teachers like Ven. Shengyan is an easier approach, but then it should be noted that he relied not just on Chan texts but also the larger corpus of Buddhist scriptures, treatises, plus his own experience (important note: he was a monk who spent years in retreat and studied under various teachers).

Although there is said to be the direct way to realisation, but that simply does not work for most people, mainly because of all the attachment to ideas and emotions. So the initial steps are gradually building a correct understanding and a stable, calm mind. As long as one does not settle in some delusion about one's own correctness but continues to cultivate the factors of awakening there will be good results (diminishing of the unskilful qualities, growth of skilful qualities).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 17th, 2021 at 3:39 AM

Title: Re: words in Lotus sutra

Content:

Riju said:

There are a certain words in English translation of Lotus sutra by Burton Watson.

Discussion on them will help me a lot.

1. Tranquil extinction.
2. Voice hearers and Buddhas both end their journey at Nirvan.
- 3 One vehicle , not two nor three.

Astus wrote:

They look to me fine as translations. The second I could not find as a sentence.

tranquil extinction - 寂滅, another term for nirvana

Watson:

Or there are bodhisattvas
who expound the Law of tranquil extinction, giving different types of instruction to numberless living beings.

BTTS:

There are Bodhisattvas who speak of still extinction's Dharma with various instructions teaching living beings without number.

Bunno Kato:

Moreover, there are bodhisattvas
Who preach the Law of tranquillity,

Teaching in various ways
The numberless living beings.

BDK:
There are also bodhisattvas
Who are teaching innumerable sentient beings
The Dharma of tranquility
In various ways.

或有菩薩，說寂滅法，種種教詔，無數眾生。

Watson:
All phenomena from the very first have of themselves constantly borne the marks of tranquil extinction.

BDK:
Every existing thing from the very beginning
Has always had the mark of quiescence.

諸法從本來，常自寂滅相。

Law of the one vehicle, there are not two, there are not three - 一乘法，無二亦無三, a basic theme of the Lotus Sutra

Watson:
In the Buddha lands of the ten directions
there is only the Law of the one vehicle, there are not two, there are not three,
except when the Buddha preaches so as an expedient means,

BDK:
In the buddha worlds of the ten directions
There is only the Dharma of the single vehicle.
Apart from the skillful means of the buddhas,
There is neither a second nor a third [vehicle].

十方佛土中，唯有一乘法，無二亦無三。除佛方便說。

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 18th, 2021 at 2:13 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Rock & Metal

Content:

Astus wrote:

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=ifcFGuLek-M> - Japanese Buddhist rock song by The Namuzu / THE 南無ズ, a "Buddhist entertainment group" consisting of a monk, a funeral director, a Buddhist komuso, and a kimono girl. The theme is comedy, music, and Buddhism.

The band's <https://www.youtube.com/channel/UCKgoRPEs0r01H3d7bwd19gg> and <https://namuzu.net/>.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 24th, 2021 at 2:02 PM

Title: Re: Reflections and conclusions

Content:

Astus wrote:

Zen is not about reducing everything to silent sitting, that would be fairly meaningless, but rather all Zen schools and lineages are based on the whole of Buddhism and accept the Tripitaka as the true words of the perfectly awakened Buddha. From a Soto perspective look at this short text that is used as a summary of the teachings made up mainly of quotes from Dogen:

<https://www.sotozen.com/eng/practice/sutra/pdf/03/c02.pdf>.

On the topic of taking refuge in the Three Jewels there is a complete chapter in the Shobogenzo titled Kie-sanbo in vol. 4 of BDK ed. p. 235ff.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 4th, 2021 at 6:09 PM

Title: Dependent Origination in One Sentence

Content:

Astus wrote:

When a mind (vijñāna) conditioned (saṃskāra) by ignorance (avidyā) conceives (nāmarūpa) an impression (sparśa) through the six senses (ṣaḍāyatana) that feels (vedanā) pleasant/unpleasant, then it craves (tṛṣṇā) for its continuation/discontinuation, attempts to keep (upādāna) and identify (bhava) with it, but with its birth (jāti) comes its decay and demise (jarāmaraṇa).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 7th, 2021 at 2:17 PM

Title: Re: Dependent Origination in One Sentence

Content:

Gregory Wonderwheel said:

I'd put it as "When consciousness (vijñana) is conditioned...." Mind (citta) is unconditioned, does not increase or decrease, is not born or annihilated, etc.

Astus wrote:

Changing the English word for vijñana is no problem as long as the meaning is clear. Just as the mind is unconditioned, so are everything else, as everything are ultimately unborn, i.e. insubstantial. But if you mean there is a special mind apart from other phenomena that is uniquely unconditioned, that would be a soul/self theory that contradicts the general doctrine of conditionality.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 7th, 2021 at 10:41 PM

Title: Re: Dependent Origination in One Sentence

Content:

Queequeg said:

I suspect you guys are comparing different descriptive formulations that use common vocabulary with different meanings.

Malcolm said:

We are talking about aggregates here. The Manovijnana includes all minds, citta, etc.

But at base I am right, as a quick perusal of the dhatu chapter of the Kosha will show.

Astus wrote:

Vasubandhu wrote:

'What is consciousness? It is awareness of an object. It is also [referred to as] thought and mind, because it is diverse and because mind serves as its support.' (Inner Science of Buddhist Practice, p 239)

vijñānaṃ katamat | ālambanaṃbijñaptiḥ | cittamanasī vijñānaparyāyau sanirvacano
taccitaṃ mano'pi citrikāratā manoniśrayatāṃ ca upādāya |

(<http://www.dsbcproject.org/canon-text/content/334/1380>)

Xuanzang: 「云何識蘊？謂於所緣境了別為性。亦名心意，由採集故、意所攝故。」

(T31n1612p849c27-28)

Divākara: 「云何識蘊？謂於所緣了別為性。亦名心，能採集故。亦名意，意所攝故。」

(T31n1613p854b28-29)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 13th, 2021 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

Hazel said:

I'm trying to make sense of how they fit into the Buddhist view of the mind.

Astus wrote:

I can't recall even meditation manuals discussing mental activities in such a format. I guess it could fall into general <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Auddhatya>. When it comes to categorising mental factors the basic distinction that should be kept in mind are skilful (kuśala) and unskilful (akuśala), then the rest can be taken care of (e.g. MN 19, MN 117).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 13th, 2021 at 4:12 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

Rick said:

Wouldn't a study of the skandhas, particularly sankhara and vijnana, address the mental objects Hazel is describing?

Astus wrote:

If by study you mean abhidharma literature, based on the dharmas enumerated in them I doubt it.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 15th, 2021 at 3:29 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

Aemilius said:

Anguttara Nikaya, Ekaka-nipata, XVI Ekadhammapali, 3.Tatiyavagga:

320. Bhikkhus, just as a little bit of excreta smells and should be got rid of, I do not specify thinking even for the fraction of a second.

Astus wrote:

'I do not specify thinking' is at least a misleading translation of AN 1.328 by <http://www.metta.lk/tipitaka/2Sutta-Pitaka/4Anguttara-Nikaya/Anguttara1/1-ekaniyata/016-Ekadhammapali-e.html>.

Bodhi (p 121): 'I do not praise even a trifling amount of existence'

<https://suttacentral.net/an1.316-332/en/sujato>: 'I don't approve of even a tiny bit of continued existence'

https://www.dhammadata.org/suttas/AN/AN1_329.html: 'I don't praise even a tiny amount of becoming'

https://obo.genaud.net/dhamma-vinaya/bd/an/01_ones/an01.296-

393.olds.bd.htm#p328: 'I do not recommend living, even if for only so short a time'

https://obo.genaud.net/dhamma-vinaya/bd/an/01_ones/an01.296-

393.olds.bd.htm#p328: 'so likewise do I not favour becoming even for a trifling time'

See also discussions on that passage <https://bswa.org/forum/forum/discussion/sutta-vinaya-and-pali/1352-translation-of-a-passage-in-an-1-18> and <https://www.dhammadownload.com/viewtopic.php?t=19997>.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 15th, 2021 at 7:47 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

Aemilius said:

How can you get beyond becoming? Please tell me. What is left when you are beyond becoming, or beyond living? Death?

Astus wrote:

The ending of becoming (bhavanirodha) is exactly the goal of Buddhism.

'When a noble disciple has thus understood being, the origin of being, the cessation of being, and the way leading to the cessation of being...he here and now makes an end of suffering. In that way too a noble disciple is one of right view...and has arrived at this true Dhamma.'

(MN 9.31 (p 137))

The cessation of becoming should not be confused with non-existence (vibhava), that is, the belief that an existing self becomes non-existent (see Iti 49), still, that is called the best outsider view (AN 10.29). What bhavanirodha means is nirvana in this life (AN 10.7), and even if one has doubts one should choose that as the right view:

'Now as to the recluses and brahmins who hold the doctrine and view "there definitely is no cessation of being," if their word is true then it is certainly still possible that I might reappear [after death] among the gods of the immaterial realms who consist of perception. But as to the recluses and brahmins who hold the doctrine and view "there definitely is a cessation of being," if their word is true then it is possible that I might here and now attain final Nibbāna. The view of those good recluses and brahmins who hold the doctrine and view "there definitely is no cessation of being" is close to lust, close to bondage, close to delighting, close to holding, close to clinging; but the view of those good recluses and brahmins who hold the doctrine and view "there definitely is cessation of being" is close to non-lust, close to non-bondage, close to nondelighting, close to non-holding, close to non-clinging.' After reflecting thus, he practises the way to disenchantment with being, to the fading away and cessation of being.'

(MN 60.34 (p 517))

What should be recognised is that a being (satta) exists as craving and clinging (SN 23.2), and becoming is about deluded identification that is an outflow/defilement (āśava).

'How can one be certain here and now that this existence has ceased? This might sometimes appear as a big puzzle. But all the same, the arahant experiences the cessation of existence as a realization. That is why he even gives expression to it as: Bhavanirodho Nibbānaṃ, "cessation of existence is Nibbāna".

It comes about by this extinction of influxes. The very existence of 'existence' is especially due to the flowing in of influxes of existence. What is called 'existence' is not the apparent process of existing visible to others. It is something that pertains to one's own mental continuum.

For instance, when it is said that some person is in the world of sense desires, one might sometimes imagine it as living surrounded by objects of sense pleasure. But that is not always the case. It is the existence in a world of sense desires, built up by sensuous thoughts. It is the same with the realms of form and formless realms. Even those realms can be experienced and attained while living in this world itself.

Similarly, it is possible for one to realize the complete cessation of this existence while living in this very world. It is accomplished by winning to the realization that the influxes of sense desires, existence, and ignorance, no longer influence one's mind.'
(https://seeingthroughthenet.net/wp-content/uploads/2018/03/Mind-Stilled_HTML.htm#Mindstilled05, by Bhikkhu K. Ñāṇananda)

Aemilius said:

Beyond thinking there are the higher dhyanas. And they are accessible for at least some people.

Astus wrote:

However, bhava does not mean thinking.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 17th, 2021 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin Looking to Learn

Content:

friarzero said:

I just want a primer or intro to better understand these ideas and where they fit into Mahayana.

Astus wrote:

This series of articles is a great source:

<http://www.buddhistdoor.com/OldWeb/bdoor/archive/nutshell/index.htm>

Ven. Sheng-yen's http://www.108wisdom.org/html/OTH_03.pdf covers many topics by answering common questions. There are also <https://www.shengyen.org/eng/free-book-for-download.html> available online.

Ven. Hsing Yun's

<https://archive.org/details/TheCoreTeachingsBuddhismMasterHsingYun/page/n9/mode/2up> is another good summary. And there are <https://www.fgsitc.org/booklets/> covering a wide variety of topics.

Thich Nhat Hanh's <https://plumvillage.org/books/the-heart-of-the-buddhas-teaching/> is a wonderful introduction too.

The <https://www.namsebangdzo.com/Three-Vehicles-of-Buddhist-Practice-p/5920.htm> by Thrangu Rinpoche is a short and practical overview.

<https://www.shambhala.com/daring-steps-2199.html> by Ringu Tulku is also recommended.

<https://www.routledge.com/Buddhist-Thought-A-Complete-Introduction-to-the-Indian-Tradition/Williams-Tribe-Wynne/p/book/9780415571791> by Paul Williams, Anthony Tribe, and Alexander Wynne has some fine chapters on Mahayana.

And for a philosophical approach see

<https://oxford.universitypressscholarship.com/view/10.1093/oso/9780198732662.001.0001/oso-9780198732662> by Jan Westerhoff.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 19th, 2021 at 9:56 PM

Title: Re: "Bodhisattva Gaia" and "Vairocana Sun"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Apparently "Bodhisattva Gaia" in Chinese is Qīngliángdì púsà 清涼地菩薩 (see

https://plumvillage.org/zh-

hant/%E6%96%87%E7%AB%A0%E8%AE%9A%E9%A0%8C%E5%A4%A7%E5%9C%B0%E6%AF%8D%E8%A6%AA/). Qīngliángdì púsà 清涼地菩薩 (means something like

https://plumvillage.org/zh-

hant/%E6%96%87%E7%AB%A0%E8%AE%9A%E9%A0%8C%E5%A4%A7%E5%9C%B0%E6%AF%8D%E8%A6%AA/). Qīngliángdì púsà 清涼地菩薩 (means something like

"Cool Earth Bodhisattva") occurs in some common ceremonial texts (e.g. "Pure and Cool Land Bodhisattva-Mahasattva" on p 67 https://www.houstonbuddhism.org/wp-content/uploads/2020/05/20200524-

https://www.houstonbuddhism.org/wp-content/uploads/2020/05/20200524-

https://www.houstonbuddhism.org/wp-content/uploads/2020/05/20200524-

https://www.houstonbuddhism.org/wp-content/uploads/2020/05/20200524-

https://www.houstonbuddhism.org/wp-content/uploads/2020/05/20200524-

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 20th, 2021 at 3:49 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

Aemilius said:

"The ending of bhava or becoming" creates a misleading image.

Astus wrote:

What is that misleading image? The ending of the whole cycle of birth and death is liberation. With the cessation of becoming, or any other of the other eleven elements of the twelvefold chain, there is freedom (see e.g. MMK 26.12). When the five aggregates are realised to be empty, that is, without self and what belongs to a self, then there is no longer any becoming of a self. Then it can be rightly stated that "There is no decay and death, no extinction of decay and death".

Aemilius said:

If you consider that all teachings (sutras etc) are precepts or practice instructions, then the instruction of "casting away bhava" must refer to something that one actually experiences. The only plausible explanation is the thoughts and volitions about the present and future. This kind of instruction is found in the Mahamudra, where it is said that one should cease thinking or even cut off thoughts of past, present and future.

Astus wrote:

There is no such instruction to "cast away bhava". Becoming comes to an end through proper cultivation, and correct practice depends on correct knowledge of the teachings. Thinking of the three times may be suspended for a short while, but only when their insubstantiality is seen can they cease to be an issue (see e.g. Mahamudra: the Moonlight, 2.5.3.1, p 244).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 20th, 2021 at 7:23 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

Aemilius said:

Nagarjuna (or some other liberated person) who says this perceivably exists. That is why it is misleading.

Nagarjuna, Shakyamuni, Bodhidharma and others became old, therefore the becoming de facto continued.

In a sutra Shakyamuni says, in the last part of his life, that his body is old and worn out like an old and many times repaired chariot. Did becoming really end?

Astus wrote:

To assume existence is the ignorance about the nature of things that perpetuates becoming. With awakening there is no one to label as existent or non-existent, and that is the end of life and death. See e.g.: MN 72, SN 22.85-86, MMK 22.

‘Reverend Ānanda, the tathāgatas have the body of the Dharma—not a body that is sustained by material food. The tathāgatas have a transcendental body that has transcended all mundane qualities. There is no injury to the body of a tathāgata, as it is rid of all defilements. The body of a tathāgata is uncompounded and free of all formative activity. Reverend Ānanda, to believe there can be illness in such a body is irrational and unseemly!’

(<https://read.84000.co/translation/toh176.html#UT22084-060-005-149>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 21st, 2021 at 3:24 AM

Title: Re: Is there a bodhisattva that particularly helps animals?

Content:

Meido said:

Bato Kannon [馬頭觀音]

Astus wrote:

Side note, <https://www.onmarkproductions.com/html/kannon.shtml#batou> is identified with https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Hayagriva_%28Buddhism%29, and of the <https://www.onmarkproductions.com/html/kannon.shtml#sixkannon> originally in the Mohezhiguan it is a different incarnation.

'The Fearless Lion-like Avalokiteśvara 師子無畏觀世音 destroys the three obstacles in the destiny of beasts. The king of beasts is majestic and fierce [and can thus face the untamed ferociousness of beasts] - therefore it is appropriate to apply fearlessness.' (Clear Serenity, Quiet Insight, vol 1, p 341; T46n1911p15b4-5)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 21st, 2021 at 5:11 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

Aemilius said:

The world of becoming also exists from moment to moment. Shakyamuni and other enlightened persons were, and are, part of it.

Astus wrote:

The becoming of what/who? Do you take Shakyamuni to be the rupaskandha, or the owner of the rupaskandha? If so, isn't that exactly the assumption of a self? If not, then what is becoming?

Aemilius said:

Later in his life Shakyamuni walked from place to place, for example on his last teaching tour, consumed food and drink, used beds, and used medicine (at least a couple of times, if I right remember, and had for example indigestion).

Astus wrote:

"Subhūti, if someone says that the Tathāgata ('Thus-come One') comes, goes, sits, or lies down, this person does not understand the point of my teaching. Why? The Thus-come One has no place from whence he comes, and no place to go. Therefore he is called 'Thus-come.'"

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html#div-30)

Aemilius said:

Shakyamuni and Devadatta could both be found and pointed out, like "this is Shakyamuni" and "that is Devadatta". This means they had distinct identities.

Astus wrote:

"Someone who has given up conceit has no ties, the ties of conceit are all cleared away. Though that clever person has transcended identity, they'd still say, 'I speak', and also 'they speak to me'. Skillful, understanding the world's conventions, they'd use these terms as no more than expressions.”

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn1.25/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 21st, 2021 at 7:42 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

LastLegend said:

Then you have no thought? Because a thought is a becoming.

Astus wrote:

A thought is a becoming when it is taken as "my thought" or "I am thinking this thought".
The Buddha stated of himself:

'He thinks what is to be thought, but does not identify with what is thought, does not identify with what is not thought, does not identify with what is to be thought, and does not identify with a thinker. '

(<https://suttacentral.net/an4.24/en/sujato>, cf. MN 1)

And as presented in Chan:

'What is nonthought? If in seeing all the dharma's, the mind is not defiled or attached, this is nonthought. [The mind's] functioning pervades all locations, yet it is not attached to all the locations. Just purify the fundamental mind, causing the six consciousnesses to emerge from the six [sensory] gates, [causing one to be] without defilement or heterogeneity within the six types of sensory data (literally, the "six dusts"), autonomous in the coming and going [of mental phenomena], one's penetrating function without stagnation.'

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 33)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 21st, 2021 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

LastLegend said:

I don't see how having the view not identifying with thoughts take care of karma unless you are always meditating.

Astus wrote:

Liberation is not limited to meditation. Of course, if one is not liberated, then there is also becoming.

LastLegend said:

Also when not identifying, how do you know that's not becoming if you agree becoming is another the word for movement or arising?

Astus wrote:

Becoming is not the same as movement. See

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=603720#p603720>.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 21st, 2021 at 10:54 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

LastLegend said:

So then you say it's not cessation of the five aggregates rather not identifying with self?

Cessation or not identifying with thoughts. Which one? If whatever slightest arises is still self because you know that...which means identifying then that's not true cessation.

Astus wrote:

It's not phenomena themselves that cause suffering, it's grasping at them and identifying with them. Cessation of becoming means ending attachment, ending concocting a self.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 22nd, 2021 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

LastLegend said:

How can we go beyond dual of grasping and identifying versus not grasping and identifying?

Astus wrote:

As long as there is the assumption of a being who can grasp or not grasp, there is duality of self and other. To recognise that all assumptions are conditioned thoughts is one way to go beyond.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 22nd, 2021 at 2:33 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

LastLegend said:

It's still going in circle...even when at calmest and empty, there is still a sense of being.

Even you sense there is no being, that's still being.

Astus wrote:

No matter what one senses or what it's perceived as, just as they arise according to conditions so do they pass quite rapidly. But unless one pays close attention, feelings can seem constant and personal.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 22nd, 2021 at 7:01 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

Aemilius said:

Why was Shakyamuni upset when some of his followers had flocked to the congregation of Devadatta, if "Devadatta" is a mere expression without basis?

Astus wrote:

Why do you say the Buddha was upset? Do you think he failed in patience, was driven by the eight worldly concerns, and has not removed completely the three poisons?

'Subhūti, in a former lifetime my body was cut into pieces by the Rājah Kalinga. At that time, I was not abiding in the notions of self, person, sentient being, or life span. And why not? If, at the time my body was cut into pieces, I had been holding to the notions of self, person, sentient being, or life span, I would have felt ill-will [toward Kalinga]. Subhūti, I also remember some five hundred lifetimes ago having practiced forbearance as a renunciant sage. At that time I was also free from the notions of self, person, sentient being, and life. Therefore, Subhūti, the bodhisattvas should free themselves from all notions and arouse the aspiration for peerless perfect enlightenment. They should not arouse this aspiration while abiding in form, and they should not arouse this aspiration while abiding in sound, odor, taste, touch, or conceptualization. They should give rise to the aspiration that has no abode. If the mind abides, then this is not abiding.' (http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html#div-15)

Aemilius said:

It does not really change anything, banks are still banks and money is still money, even if they are mere words and worldly conventions. Economists know that "money" is a convention or a contract, and yet everything functions as if money was a real existent. That is the nature of things.

Astus wrote:

"Even if we know that all is like illusion,
How," you ask, "will this dispel afflictive passion?
Magicians may indeed themselves desire
The mirage-women they themselves create."
The reason is they have not rid themselves
Of habits of desiring objects of perception;
And when they gaze upon such things,
Their aptitude for emptiness is weak indeed.
By training in this aptitude for emptiness,
The habit to perceive real things will be relinquished.
By training in the thought "There isn't anything,"
This view itself will also be abandoned.'
(Bodhicaryavatara 9.30-32, tr Padmakara)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 22nd, 2021 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

LastLegend said:

Lankavatara Sutra said non-arising means everything extinguished in Samadhi. Non-arising = Samadhi. Even the 'seeing' is extinguished. Then when not in Samadhi, everything functions just as it is. The reason why it needs to be extinguished is because karma will continue to cloud our mind.

Astus wrote:

Karma and suffering does not come from phenomena but from ignorant craving and clinging. If it were things themselves that caused suffering, then no liberation would be possible.

'Reverend Kōṭṭhita, the eye is not the fetter of sights, nor are sights the fetter of the eye. The fetter there is the desire and greed that arises from the pair of them. The ear ... nose ... tongue ... body ... mind is not the fetter of thoughts, nor are thoughts the fetter of the mind. The fetter there is the desire and greed that arises from the pair of them.'
(<https://suttacentral.net/sn35.232/en/sujato>)

'Q: What does "to perceive without perceiving any object whatsoever" mean?

A: Perceiving all sorts of things without grasping -- that is, not being clouded by the arising of any thought of love or hate, etc. -- is perceiving without any objects. If one can see without seeing any object whatsoever, that is using the Buddha-Eye, which is like no other eye. On the other hand, if one sees all sorts of things that cause thoughts of love and hate, etc., to arise, that is known as "perceiving objects" with ordinary eyes, and sentient beings have no other kind of eyes. This is true, likewise, with all of the other sense organs.'

(<https://www.ymba.org/books/entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment/treatise-entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment>)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 23rd, 2021 at 3:53 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

LastLegend said:

Non-arising is unborn mind. Non-arising of mental appearance, and mental appearance is what we can ('see', feel, sense, etc) specifically because appearance is what appears what comes to being, including the 'seeing' is appearance of being. That's what born. Mahaprajnaparamita Sutras say Buddha nature is non-appearance (which refers to the non-characteristics, specifically of mental appearance including all aggregates their functions).

Astus wrote:

Eliminating appearances is not the correct way.

“Master Gotama, it’s when the eye sees no sight and the ear hears no sound. That’s how Pārāsariya teaches his disciples the development of the faculties.”

“In that case, Uttara, a blind person and a deaf person will have developed faculties according to what Pārāsariya says. For a blind person sees no sight with the eye and a deaf person hears no sound with the ear.”

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn152/en/sujato>)

'there are deluded people who empty their minds and sit in quietude without thinking of anything whatsoever, claiming that this is great.'

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 29)

Rather, as Huineng taught:

'Nonthought is to be without thought in the context of thoughts.'

(Platform Sutra, ch 4, BDK ed, p 43)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 23rd, 2021 at 3:43 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

LastLegend said:

...in direct traditions you recognize spontaneous nature and that’s the king.

Astus wrote:

All things are conditioned. What do you call spontaneous?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 24th, 2021 at 3:03 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

Aemilius said:

You are confusing real and basic needs with endless desires. Therefore banks are still banks and money is still money. On the gut level: do you use money, pay the rent and buy goods yourself? Or are they just "empty" for you?

Astus wrote:

Emptiness is not a negation or denial of conventional reality, rather the understanding that they are merely conventional designations.

'The Inquiry of Ugra also says, “By correctly giving wealth to sons, wives, male and female servants, employees, and hired laborers.” In this way, whether you have renounced possessions or not, they will not create obstacles to the study and other practices that are conducive to the Awakening of yourself and others. And if renouncing, or not renouncing, would create obstacles to the achievement of an equal or greater good by a bodhisattva of greater power to help sentient beings, or equal power, you should not do it.'

(The Training Anthology of Santideva, ch 7, p 139)

'Renunciation is born when you know that there is ultimately no satisfaction in samsaric life. Since ordinary joys are short-lived dreams, there is no reason to long for success or to fear failure. If you happen to grow rich, there is no reason to feel attached or proud; simply use your wealth positively and meaningfully. Whatever power you gain, use it to serve the Three Jewels and the great teachers, and whatever land you own, make it available for the benefit of the sangha; in short, whatever you acquire, use it to preserve the Dharma and to benefit others. Used in this way, your dreamlike wealth and influence will bring you more and more dreamlike merit, which in turn will bring you closer and closer to the threshold of dreamlike enlightenment.'

(The Heart Treasure of the Enlightened Ones, p 102)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 24th, 2021 at 3:10 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

LastLegend said:

If you examine your mind, you would need to what are thoughts, and what arises before thoughts, and what spontaneous knows before all of that happen.

Astus wrote:

Mind is what is aware of something. If there is nothing to be aware of, there is no mind to talk of either.

'If the hearing consciousness is permanent,
It follows that it's hearing all the time.
And if there is no object, what does it cognize?
On what grounds do you call it consciousness?
If something that's unconscious knows,
It follows that a stick has knowledge also.
Therefore in the absence of a thing to know,
It's clear that consciousness will not arise.'
(Bodhicaryavatara 9.60-61, tr Padmakara)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 24th, 2021 at 5:19 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

LastLegend said:

Then when consciousness arises, does it have any appearance characteristics?

Astus wrote:

'Then the Buddha said to the mendicants, "Mendicants, do you understand my teachings as Sāti does, when he misrepresents me by his wrong grasp, harms himself, and makes much bad karma?"

"No, sir. For in many ways the Buddha has told us that consciousness is dependently originated, since without a cause, consciousness does not come to be."

"Good, good, mendicants! It's good that you understand my teaching like this. For in many ways I have told you that consciousness is dependently originated, since without a cause, consciousness does not come to be. But still this Sāti misrepresents me by his wrong grasp, harms himself, and makes much bad karma. This will be for his lasting harm and suffering.

Consciousness is reckoned according to the specific conditions dependent upon which it arises. Consciousness that arises dependent on the eye and sights is reckoned as eye consciousness. Consciousness that arises dependent on the ear and sounds is reckoned as ear consciousness. Consciousness that arises dependent on the nose and smells is reckoned as nose consciousness. Consciousness that arises dependent on the tongue and tastes is reckoned as tongue consciousness. Consciousness that arises dependent on the body and touches is reckoned as body consciousness. Consciousness that arises dependent on the mind and thoughts is reckoned as mind consciousness.

It's like fire, which is reckoned according to the specific conditions dependent upon which it burns. A fire that burns dependent on logs is reckoned as a log fire. A fire that burns dependent on twigs is reckoned as a twig fire. A fire that burns dependent on grass is reckoned as a grass fire. A fire that burns dependent on cow-dung is reckoned as a cow-dung fire. A fire that burns dependent on husks is reckoned as a husk fire. A fire that burns dependent on rubbish is reckoned as a rubbish fire.

In the same way, consciousness is reckoned according to the specific conditions dependent upon which it arises."

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn38/en/sujato>)

LastLegend said:

Before consciousness arise, what is there?

Astus wrote:

'consciousness exists dependent on a duality. And what is that duality? Eye consciousness arises dependent on the eye and sights. ... Ear consciousness ... Nose consciousness ... Tongue consciousness ... Body consciousness ... Mind consciousness arises dependent on the mind and thoughts.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn35.93/en/sujato>)

See also from a commentary to MMK ch 9:

'The one who sees form cannot exist before - that is, independent of - the experience of seeing the form, for if she did, it would absurdly follow that she would always see that form. The reason for this is that if an individual is called a "seer of form," it is obviously because she actually sees some form, and thus if the seer of form existed independent of the experience of seeing it, the self who was called the seer of form would always see the form in order to earn that name. The same would be true with the other objects of the senses and the ones who experience them-if the experiencer existed before the experience itself, it would follow that the experiencer would always have that experience.'

(The Sun of Wisdom, p 60)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 24th, 2021 at 2:46 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

LastLegend said:

Would you say Buddha nature is only the object of consciousness?

Astus wrote:

Buddha nature is a concept, and whatever is not an object of consciousness is unknown. Assuming something beyond awareness is itself a conjecture formed in the mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 24th, 2021 at 7:15 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

LastLegend said:

What is grasping?

Astus wrote:

'There are these four kinds of grasping. Grasping at sensual pleasures, views, precepts and observances, and theories of a self. Grasping originates from craving. Grasping ceases when craving ceases. The practice that leads to the cessation of grasping is simply this noble eightfold path'

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn9/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 24th, 2021 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Buddha nature itself is a quality that all beings have the potential to realize. It was there even before anyone had any concept of it.

Astus wrote:

What is that quality? Is it a quality of the aggregates or not? If it is of the aggregates, it is just as impermanent and empty as they are. If it is not a quality of the aggregates, what would it have to do with beings?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 25th, 2021 at 4:12 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

LastLegend said:

Since you said Buddha nature is a concept, so then what is grasping itself? Or how does it work in mind?

Astus wrote:

If you're looking for more in depth explanations, you can start with the Abhidharmakosabhasya for instance.

'Craving ("thirst") (tṛṣṇā) is the state [of the five aggregates] of those who desire enjoyments and sexual union. Grasping (upādāna) is to be distinguished [from craving]: it is the state [of the five aggregates] of those who run around in search of the enjoyments.'

(AKB 3.23, tr Gelong Lodrö Sangpo, for more see 5.38-40)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 25th, 2021 at 4:23 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

It's a potential.

The potential to become fully awakened.

A potential isn't made or not made of aggregates.

Astus wrote:

A potential is not a quality but a hypothesised event, and although beings have a higher likelihood of becoming hell-dwellers than buddhas, I don't see much talk of our hellish nature. Also, imagining a future possibility is very much conceptual.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 25th, 2021 at 2:15 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

When conditions are such that the allergic person eats strawberries, and has a reaction, yes, that is an event, as is one's moment of realization.

Astus wrote:

If so, then what has the potential to react in a certain way to specific conditions? If it's not the aggregates nor something other, then what sort of conditions could exist in such an unspecified realm?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 26th, 2021 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Tathagatagarba is always there, just as the Sun is always giving off heat and light.

Astus wrote:

Always where exactly? In the body, the mind, or both?

PadmaVonSamba said:

“Buddha” is already the mind’s original state, it’s original nature.

Astus wrote:

If by mind you mean its conventional version that is equivalent to the soul/self, then it being a mere concept without any actual referent, looking for the original nature of something fictional seems futile. Or if by mind you mean the six consciousnesses or the four mental aggregates, then they are quite temporary and it sounds difficult to put the idea of 'original nature' on them. The third version might be is how the two truths are used, in which case mind is the conventional idea of a continuous entity and its original nature is the ultimate reality of it being momentary and impersonal.

PadmaVonSamba said:

But it is our habitual grasping and other negative actions of body, speech, and mind which make us unable to realize the Buddha-mind.

Astus wrote:

Seems to fit the third version.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Buddha-mind isn’t conditional; our realization of it is conditional.

Astus wrote:

Although there can be various unconditioned dharmas depending on the system one prefers, they all agree in calling only 'non-things' as unconditioned, like various forms of cessation.

PadmaVonSamba said:

My understanding is that the way to resolve it is to examine the true nature of the obscurations. We have to determine if all those clouds have any substance to them or not. And that’s where understanding emptiness comes in.

So, we observe thoughts that arise during meditation, and we see they have no substance. We examine conflicting thoughts and emotions such as anger or impatience when they arise during the day (“off the cushion”) and determine that they are in fact, nothing. They have no substance.

Gradually, we stop giving rise to the obscuring clouds altogether. Then the mind’s true nature and the potential for full realization become clear.

Astus wrote:

That is the standard method in Buddhism, with or without the concept of buddha-nature. One has to purify the mind, so to say. But whether one believes that it is already pure but still needs some cleaning, or that it simply needs some cleaning, if approached properly, makes no difference in the end. Still, believing that one is already a buddha can help sometimes.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 26th, 2021 at 4:07 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

LastLegend said:

One’s mind would need to be very quiet to recognize Buddha nature...

Astus wrote:

What sort of buddha dislikes noise?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 26th, 2021 at 6:52 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

All beings possess the potential to eventually realize the mind’s true nature.

Astus wrote:

All beings also have the potential for many other things.

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=604998#p604998> you stated that buddha nature was a quality that beings can realise. If it is not an already existent quality but rather just the possibility to become a buddha sometime in the future, then it is currently nothing more than a concept of future buddhahood, just as a burning paper remains an idea until it is actually set afire.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Mind isn’t a continuous entity.

It’s a continual process.

Astus wrote:

A continuity is a conventional view nevertheless.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 26th, 2021 at 7:02 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

LastLegend said:

When someone refers to Buddha nature as a concept, there are two possible situations:

1) they don't believe in Buddha nature and haven't recognized it 2) If Buddha nature is a concept, what isn't a concept? Everything else is a concept. Are aggregates concepts too? Because they still have a name. Now if you want to blow everything out of the pool why leave anything in it? If everything isn't real so is grasping, then the question is if everything is blown out of the pool how is mind at this point? Is it not empty.

Astus wrote:

Can you specify what buddha nature is in beings (five aggregates)? If not, what else is it but a mere fabrication, a simple expression?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 27th, 2021 at 3:35 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

You are regarding an inherent quality and something to be realized as two mutually exclusive things.

Astus wrote:

Not at all. Impermanence is a quality of the aggregates that is not realised by common beings. But when I asked you to tell what quality buddha nature was in beings, you <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=605059#p605059> it's a potential and as such it couldn't be defined in relation to the five aggregates.

PadmaVonSamba said:

The point is, all beings have the potential to realize the inherent quality (Buddha-mind) that they already possess, but don't yet realize. That's why realization is something you attain, and not obtain.

Astus wrote:

What is that inherent quality in beings that they can potentially attain? For instance, is it emptiness?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 27th, 2021 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

LastLegend said:

When you finely see that which sees or knows, and realize it's not anything either. Yet it's functions it knows, quite clearly it knows that means you are touching pure consciousness.

Astus wrote:

There is no knower/seer (i.e. self) to be found, but to say that what cannot be found (i.e. does not exist) can nevertheless function is like saying that the daughter of a barren woman is a good singer. Consciousness of any type is a conditioned phenomenon, as <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=604890#p604890>.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 27th, 2021 at 5:09 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

Malcolm said:

Well, actually the I-making habit, the basic knowledge obscuration, has no real existence as a self, but it functions as an agent of karma and a recipient of karma, so there is that, even though the "I" it imputes does not exist at all.

Astus wrote:

While in some contexts calling self-view the subject of karma may go well, but it is not an imagined self that causes or experiences anything, rather the mistaken view is what defines intention and action and experiences are generated by them.

As this nice stanza from the Visuddhimagga (XIX.20) says it:

'There is no doer of a deed
Or one who reaps the deed's result;
Phenomena alone flow on—
No other view than this is right.'

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 27th, 2021 at 6:57 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Buddha nature, the mind's original unborn state free of craving, is inherent in all beings. All beings possess the potential to eventually realize it. Another word for potential is possibility.

Astus wrote:

So, if I understand you correctly, it is 'the mind's original unborn state free of craving' that you call buddha nature, in other words that the mind is empty and pure.

PadmaVonSamba said:

What is that inherent quality?

If you ask a Theravadin, it's the possibility of attaining nibbana. If you ask a Mahayana Buddhist, it's the possibility of becoming a Bodhisattva and/or attaining the omniscient state of buddhahood. A Pure-Land Buddhist will tell you it's the possibility to be reborn in Sukhavati. It all basically boils down to one way or another becoming free from the cycle of samsara.

Astus wrote:

But here you say that the inherent quality that can be potentially realised is the possibility of realisation. That seems to disagree with the statement above on original purity, and at the same time makes the strange claim that one can realise that one can realise something, like saying that the qualities of a Dharma teacher is the possibility to know the possibility that one can become a Dharma teacher. That is not saying what a Dharma teacher is like.

Is buddha nature then original purity of the mind that can be realised, or is it a possibility that can be realised? Or do you mean perhaps that the mind is not originally pure, only potentially it can become pure?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 27th, 2021 at 7:00 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

LastLegend said:

To say you don't function is to say you are not sentient basically like a rock.

Astus wrote:

However, it matters whether you attribute function to some sort of unconditioned self/mind, or conditional phenomena, because what is unconditioned cannot function.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 27th, 2021 at 8:08 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, it is an imagined, nonexistent self that causes and experiences everything, for example, when a car is in accident, it is the imagined car for which one pays the damages, not the wrong view of the imagined car. But perhaps this is a special point of Candrakīrti's Madhyamaka, unlikely to be found the Visuddhimagga.

Astus wrote:

In one manner of speaking it can be said so that it's the self/car that acts or is damaged, but at the same time, any type of self-view is imputed in dependence on the aggregates (according to Candrakīrti too: MA 6.150 and 6.162-164), just as a car is imputed in dependence on its parts. And just as if the windshield is broken then saying 'the car is damaged' is talking in general terms, similarly, whatever actions and results occur are the causal events of the aggregates, even if commonly it can be said to be that of a self or being.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 28th, 2021 at 3:04 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Buddha-nature is what all beings possess.

They also possess the potential to realize that Buddha nature.

Astus wrote:

Labelling the emptiness of the aggregates buddha nature can be inspirational (as it's supposed to be according to <https://www2.hf.uio.no/polyglotta/index.php?page=record&vid=1125&mid=1944007>), but other than that it literally does not stand for anything, so how could it be more than a concept?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 28th, 2021 at 5:13 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

I don't know who labels the emptiness of the aggregates Buddha-nature. Maybe you are mixing a bunch of different stuff together.

Astus wrote:

Didn't you agree <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=605487#p605487> that "it is 'the mind's original unborn state free of craving' that you call buddha nature, in other words that the mind is empty and pure"?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 28th, 2021 at 5:17 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

LastLegend said:

The reason why Buddha nature is concealed it's because of aggregates.

Astus wrote:

Do you have any source for that? Also, if the aggregates conceal buddha nature, that means buddha nature is not just without a body, it is also without consciousness and all mental functions. What good is buddha nature for that is practically less useful than a piece of rock?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 28th, 2021 at 7:02 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

But what I'm saying is that Buddha-nature, or unborn mind, tathagatagarbha, Buddha mind, etc. Are all terms that refer to mind's original state. That original state itself isn't a concept. Yes, you can have concepts about it, labels for it, but the mind's original state is just that.

Astus wrote:

The mind is the four mental aggregates, so the mind's nature is the nature of the mental aggregates, in other words, what they are like in general, what their characteristics are. Unborn is a synonym for the characteristic of emptiness, therefore buddha nature refers to the aggregates being empty, i.e. insubstantial, not self. To name the absence of self-nature as buddha nature is a skilful means, but just as emptiness is not a thing, not even in conventional terms, buddha nature, being a sort of rebranding of emptiness, is merely a concept without any actual referent.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 28th, 2021 at 8:45 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

LastLegend said:

Buddha nature is referred to as aware nature in Bodhidharma's blood stream sermon. Aware nature is not aggregates.

Astus wrote:

Looking for something outside this body and mind is a mistake.

'Our mortal nature is our buddhanature. Beyond this nature there's no buddha.'
(Bloodstream Sermon, p 17, tr Red Pine; X63n1218p2c20-21)

The only difference to consider is whether there is or is not any attachment.

'Your mind is basically empty. All appearances are illusions. Don't hold on to appearances. ... If you seek direct understanding, don't hold on to any appearance whatsoever, and you'll succeed. I have no other advice. The sutras say, "All appearances are illusions." They have no fixed existence, no constant form. They're impermanent. Don't cling to appearances and you'll be of one mind with the Buddha.'
(p 27; p3c10-14)

See also the final paragraphs from 'But this mind isn't somewhere outside the material body of four elements.' until 'But once you know that the nature of anger and joy is empty and you let them go, you free yourself from karma.' (p 43-45; p5a8-a22)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 28th, 2021 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

That inherent ability is synonymous with original mind. Inherent means that beings don't have to acquire it from anywhere.

Astus wrote:

If you call buddha nature the ability to realise buddha nature that would mean the ability to realise the ability, which seems as senseless as saying that seeing means seeing the seeing, or that eating means eating the eating. If you were to say that buddha nature is both emptiness and the ability to realise emptiness, maybe better, but then there's still the question of what that ability consists of, and why it's a special point to consider.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Without tathagatagarba, if the mind's original nature wasn't already buddha-mind, there would be no way to return to that, no way to liberation. Beings would simply wallow in appearances (and most do) with no basis for doing otherwise.

Astus wrote:

The doctrine of buddha mind is not universal among all Buddhist schools, and its interpretation also varies, so it's hard to say why it's necessary to posit it when others can do just fine without it.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 29th, 2021 at 3:37 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

Astus wrote:

'Our mortal nature is our buddhanature. Beyond this nature there's no buddha.'
(Bloodstream Sermon, p 17, tr Red Pine; X63n1218p2c20-21)

PadmaVonSamba said:

What Bodhidharma is saying (that's a really great book, btw!) is that realization can be had, here and now, in this body.

Astus wrote:

What do you base that interpretation on? It's a recurring topic in that text and in Chan in general that 'this mind is buddha' (即心是佛 / 心即是佛).

'The mind is the buddha, and the buddha is the mind. Beyond the mind there's no buddha, and beyond the buddha there's no mind.'
(Bloodstream Sermon, tr Red Pine, p 11; X63n1218p2b11-12)

Sikong Benjing:

"The master replied, 'If there is a wish to seek for Buddha, then "Heart is Buddha". If there is a wish to understand Dao, then the "Empty Heart is Dao".'
'What is meant by saying "Heart is Buddha",' asked the Envoy.
'Buddha awakens by means of the heart,' replied the master, 'and the heart manifests through Buddha. When the empty heart is awakened then even Buddha does not exist.'
Guangting asked further, 'What is meant by saying that the empty heart is Dao?'
'Dao is originally the empty heart and the name for empty heart is Dao,' replied the master. 'When the empty heart is understood then the empty heart is Dao.'
(Records of the Transmission of the Lamp, vol 2, 5.86; T51n2076p242b27-c2)

Mazu: 'All of you, each one should have the faith that your own heart is Buddha, that this heart is the Buddha-heart. ... Apart from heart there is no other Buddha and apart from Buddha there is no heart.'
(Records of the Transmission of the Lamp, vol 2, 6.91; T51n2076p246a4-5, a10)

Huangbo: 'This mind is the Buddha; the Buddha is the sentient being.'
(Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 13; T48n2012Ap379c26)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 29th, 2021 at 3:43 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

It's the same that sunlight is what brightens the sky and thus enables us to see sunlight. Actually, when you are seeing, you do see that you are seeing.

Astus wrote:

Sunlight is not lit by sunlight, sunlight is already light.

'The Guardian of the World himself has said
That mind cannot be seen by mind.
In just the same way, he has said,
The sword's edge cannot cut the sword.
"But," you say, "it's like the flame
That perfectly illuminates itself."
The flame, in fact, can never light itself.
And why? Because the darkness never dims it!' (Bodhicaryavatara 9.17-19, tr Padmakara)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 29th, 2021 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

LastLegend said:

When Buddha nature is not recognized, and call it just a concept is really doing a disservice to Buddhas and Patriarchs.

Astus wrote:

As long as it's not recognised, how could it be anything else but a concept? And after it is recognised, do you assume it is it?

Since you brought up the patriarchs, do you think Linji was wrong?

'All phenomena worldly and world-transcending are without a real fixed identity of their own, they have no inherent nature. There are just empty names, and names are empty too.'

(The Recorded Sayings of Linji, in Three Chan Classics, BDk ed, p 29; T47n1985p499c15-16)

And was Shenhui right after all?

'One day the master announced to the assembly, "I have a thing without head or tail, without name or title, without front or back. Do you know what it is?"

Shenhui came forth and said, "It is the fundamental source of the buddhas. It is my buddha-nature."

The master said, "I told you it was without name or title, but you have called it the fundamental source, the buddha-nature. You've just covered your head with thatch. You've become a follower with only discriminative understanding."

(Platform Sutra, ch 8, BDK ed, p 78)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 30th, 2021 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

Malcolm said:

The imputation itself is the agent and recipient of action, that's the point.

Astus wrote:

That is more likely the view of Gorampa.

'In the Madhyamaka system, it is not feasible for the skandhas to be the agent of actions and the experiencer of results, because neither the self nor the skandhas exist when analyzed, and the self appears as the agent and the experiencer at the conventional level, not the skandhas.'

(Distinguishing the Views, p 75)

As for Candrakīrti's own explanation of 6.162 and other commentators I checked (Mikyö Dorje (p 417), Wangchuk Dorje (p 393), Tsongkhapa (p 466), Mipham (p 303), Jamyang Khyentse (p 285)), they simply explain it in the context of the relationship between the self and the aggregates as appropriator and appropriated. This is in line with the teachings on the 20 types of identity view (e.g. SN 22.47, AKB 5.7), where the self is simply a wrong view that assumes identity with or ownership of an aggregate. That agrees with the conventional mind where self is always a shorthand for 'I am this' and 'this is mine'. In other words, just as a car is imaginable only with its parts present, a self is always conceived of as an aggregate, therefore saying that the appropriator self is the doer and enjoyer of actions, as if it could be something apart from the aggregates, sounds like assuming an appropriator without the appropriated.

By the way, if the self were to be used as the agent and experiencer by Candrakīrti (despite teachings like SN 12.12), then it would have been a simple way to explain karma, but he did not do so at for instance MA 6.39.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 30th, 2021 at 5:10 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, it is the view of Candrakīrti, but perhaps it's too subtle for some people to grasp.

Astus wrote:

Do you know perhaps others who picked up that interpretation? On the other hand, wouldn't it be quite close to what Gorampa criticised in Tsongkhapa interpreting conventional phenomena as purely designations?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 31st, 2021 at 5:16 AM

Title: Re: Why did Buddhism take a drastic focus into emptiness at the turn of the new era? (1st century CE)

Content:

Astus wrote:

'It is noteworthy that in the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Vijnanakaya>, the Sarvāstivādins never call themselves as such. When arguing against the Vibhāṣyavādins, they refer to themselves as the Yukta-vādins (應理論者); against the Pudgalavādins, as the Śūnyatā-vādins (性空論者). It was perhaps later, in the course of doctrinal confrontation with rival schools and being hard pressed to articulate their position, that the term "Sarvāstivāda" came distinctly to be insisted upon.'

(Sarvāstivāda Abhidharma by Bhikkhu KL Dhammajoti, 4th edition, p 59)

Then later we have Prajnaparamita sutras and Madhyamaka arguing against the Sarvastivadin idea of svabhava.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 31st, 2021 at 5:31 AM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

LastLegend said:

How do you drop your own statement because a statement cannot be established to exist, yet you still have mind phenomena arise as pure and unpure?

Astus wrote:

Do you mean that if one believed there was a tiger in the room but when looking into it no tiger was found, how is it possible that one no longer believed in one's previous idea?

'Conceptions will occur if things are held to exist,
But how things do not exist has been thoroughly analyzed.
When things are seen not to exist, conceptions about their existence will not arise,
Just as fire will not burn without fuel.
Ordinary beings are bound by conception,
And yogins, free from conception, are liberated.
The wise ones teach that the reversal of conception
Is the result of analysis.'
(Madhyamakavatara 6.116-117, tr T. Dewar)

'Those who do not meditate with wisdom by analyzing the entity of things specifically, but merely meditate on the elimination of mental activity, cannot avert conceptual thoughts and also cannot realize identitylessness because they lack the light of wisdom. If the fire of consciousness knowing phenomena as they are is produced from individual analysis of suchness, then like the fire produced by rubbing wood it will burn the wood of conceptual thought. The Buddha has spoken in this way.'
(Bhavanakrama in Stages of Meditation, p 134)

LastLegend said:

Do you want to say pure and unpure cannot be established either?

Astus wrote:

Established as ultimate entities? No. All phenomena are dependently arisen, don't you agree?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 31st, 2021 at 2:09 PM

Title: Re: Making sense of types of thought

Content:

LastLegend said:

I meant to say that you can't establish even a view or a statement to be true. Like the view, "everything lacks self-existence," do you hold this to be absolutely true? At which point this view is also dropped or you have to think about it constantly? You can't retain a view to be true to be grasped.

Astus wrote:

It depends on the criteria of truth. Also, what's the line between absolute and relative truths? These can be relevant questions, but usually one just works with one's already existing assumptions in order to eliminate all identifications and attachments. The point is not really to claim some idea as the best, but to be free from suffering.

LastLegend said:

Would you say that conception can be pure? Or conception is always with grasping?

Astus wrote:

Conceptions here is about sticking to assumptions and ideas as truth. There are good conceptions in the sense of leading to good births, but there's always grasping and identifying with it.

LastLegend said:

This depends on how one takes the analysis: or they observe it directly in their mind? Or they playing philosophy.

Astus wrote:

Analysis means applying the teachings to observe phenomena.

LastLegend said:

Has the view of dependently arisen taken care of grasping, since pure and unpure are still distinguished? When unpure arises, how is it dealt with?

Astus wrote:

Based on understanding one can observe dependent arising, and with that remove the root of attachment, the taints of taking things to be self or belonging to self. That's because one can then confirm that things are not reliable, pleasurable, or controllable to be taken as one's identity or possession.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 2nd, 2021 at 5:01 PM

Title: Re: I'm confused about Buddhist arguments against a creator God and what that entails for buddha activity?

Content:

Artziebetter1 said:

if the Dharmakaya is unconditioned and this is the ultimate mind of all buddhas (I understand its individual and somewhat unreal) then how can they project emanations, purelands, intentions and actions? if it is unconditioned wouldn't it be inert?

Astus wrote:

The dharmakaya is unconditioned because it's not a thing, rather it refers to the complete absence of obscurations, or from another perspective it's emptiness just like the emptiness of everything else (i.e. dharmadhatu). The form bodies have the dharmakaya as their essence, so to speak, but it's not like that the dharmakaya is some sort of creator. Not unlike all other phenomena, a buddha is without substance/self and appears because of various conditions. For a short summary you can look up the last two chapters of The Jewel Ornament of Liberation by Gampopa.

Artziebetter1 said:

if one can say that a being can be eternal but not permanent, then what is the objection to the theist that can claim his God is eternal but not unchanging

Astus wrote:

The problem starts with the idea of a 'being'. To say there is one and the same being who continues to exist from one moment to the next, that is basically the view of a permanent self/soul/being/entity/substance.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 2nd, 2021 at 5:19 PM

Title: Re: I'm confused about Buddhist arguments against a creator God and what that entails for buddha activity?

Content:

yagmort said:

imho it is of direct import to the OP's question because i got the impression that the whole idea of creator God of Christianity has been misunderstood. when people say "god", "creator" we immediately drowning in the ocean of semantic problems. i got no idea why people assume every one got the same meaning about these 2 words. as i pointed out in the example above, christians do not think of God as some sort of highest, supreme, separate creator entity which governs this universe. just saying.

Kim O'Hara said:

"christians do not think of God as some sort of highest, supreme, separate creator entity which governs this universe" is way too broad - so broad it's far more wrong than right.

A few (very few) christians do not think of God as some sort of highest, supreme, separate creator entity which governs this universe.

Most (nearly all) christians do think of God as some sort of highest, supreme, separate creator entity which governs this universe.

Astus wrote:

It's probably easier to just look up commonly provided definitions:

'What idea of the essence and essential attributes of God may be derived from divine revelation?

That God is a Spirit, eternal, all-good, omniscient, all-just, almighty, omnipresent, unchangeable, all-sufficing to himself, all-blessed.'

(http://www.pravoslavieto.com/docs/eng/Orthodox_Catechism_of_Philaret.htm)

'What can we learn from Scriptures? We can learn some of the attributes of God. We will point out how Scripture tells us that God is Spirit, Eternal, Good, Omniscient, All-Righteous, Omnipresent, Unchangeable and Unity.'

(<https://www.stgeorgegreenville.org/our-faith/catechism/who-is-god/>)

'We believe in one God, the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible.'

(<http://ww1.antiochian.org/content/nicene-creed>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 2nd, 2021 at 5:24 PM

Title: Re: Nirguṇa Ultimates

Content:

Caoimhghín said:

What, to you, is the meaningful key distinction between dharmatā and nirguṇabrahman?

Astus wrote:

Dharmata refers to the general characteristics of all things that can be summed up as emptiness. Nirgunabrahman is the mistaken idea that there is one ultimately existing consciousness that is happy on its own.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 3rd, 2021 at 6:47 AM

Title: Re: Nirguṇa Ultimates

Content:

Matt J said:

Sounds saguna to me.

Astus wrote:

It isn't. I was simply paraphrasing saccidananda that is considered the essence (svarupa), for instance in the first stanza of Nirguna Manasa Puja, or in stanzas 36, 56, and 64 in Atmabodha.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 5th, 2021 at 12:04 AM

Title: Re: Nirguṇa Ultimates

Content:

Matt J said:

Sat chit ananda is literally saguna Brahman. This is basic Vedanta.

Astus wrote:

Do you know any texts that state so?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 5th, 2021 at 5:26 AM

Title: Re: Nirguṇa Ultimates

Content:

Matt J said:

Will I spend an hour combing through sources to find such a citation to a statement universally accepted by Vedanta teachers (at least IME) and will not likely be accepted? Yes.

Check out Shankara's Bhyasa on Kena Upanishad, verse 9.

Astus wrote:

It begins at verse 3 that the known is rejected, then verse 4 discusses the problem with words, with verses 5-8 pointing to the knower as Brahman, then in verse 9 again the inadequacy of mere words is discussed (like in Brhadaranyaka 2.3.6 commentary (Madhavananda, 3rd ed, p 344-345)). Then for verses 11-12 it is explained that Brahman can be known as the ultimate consciousness. Also on consciousness and bliss being its nature and not characteristic see Brhadaranyaka 3.9.28.7 (p 566-567) where Shankara wrote: "Hence the text, 'Knowledge, Bliss,' etc., must be interpreted as setting forth the nature of Brahman, and not signifying that the bliss of the Self is cognised."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 5th, 2021 at 4:51 PM

Title: Re: Nirguṇa Ultimates

Content:

Matt J said:

Saguna means literally with gunas, or more generically with characteristics. Here, Shankara is saying that the descriptions of Brahman apply only the experience of limited human beings. In fact, some refer to the experience of Brahman as Brahman-vritti. Neither of these is actually Brahman, since Brahman is nirguna, literally without gunas or generically without characteristics. Shankara essentially is trying to reconcile the two descriptions of Brahman as given in the Upanishads.

Astus wrote:

That's not all there is to it. As he says in the same section:

'According to its essence it will be concluded in the subsequent portion of this Upanishad that it is unknown to those who know, and known to those who do not know.'

And then a little later:

'In the case of those who find the Atman in the conditioned organs of sense, mind and intelligence, the false notion 'I know Brahman' is quite possible, because they cannot discriminate between Brahman and these conditions and because the conditions of intelligence, etc., are known to them. It is to show that such knowledge of the Brahman is fallacious that the latter half of the text is introduced. Or, the latter half 'Avijnatam, etc..' may be construed as furnishing a reason for the view propounded in the former.' (<https://www.wisdomlib.org/hinduism/book/kena-upanishad-shankara-bhashya/d/doc145050.html>)

Clarified in the next part:

'To say that It is unknown to those who know is also a contradiction, how then could that Brahman be well-known? This is explained in this text, 'Pratibodhaviditam' means 'known in respect of every state of consciousness.' By the word 'bodha' is meant 'mental perception.' That by which all states of consciousness are perceived like objects is the Atman. He knows and sees all states of consciousness, being by nature nothing but intelligence and is indicated by these states of consciousness, as blended with every one of them. There is no other way by which the inner Atman could be known. Therefore when the Brahman is known as the witness of all states of consciousness, then it is known well. Being the witness of all states of consciousness, it will be clear that it is intelligence in its essence, subject to neither birth nor death, eternal, pure, unconditioned, and one in all things, because there is no difference in its essence, just as in the essence of the Akasa, in a vessel or mountain cave, etc.'

(<https://www.wisdomlib.org/hinduism/book/kena-upanishad-shankara-bhashya/d/doc145051.html>)

From this it can be seen that it's not the case that Brahman is not consciousness, but that as long as one interprets those words as referring to objects one remains mistaken.

For the Brhadaranyaka commentaries:

'How through these two terms 'Not this, not this' is it sought to describe the Truth of truth? By the elimination of all differences due to limiting adjuncts, the words refer to something that has no distinguishing mark such as name, or form, or action, or heterogeneity, or species, or qualities. Words denote things through one or other of these. But Brahman has none of these distinguishing marks. Hence It cannot be described as, 'It is such and such,' as we can describe a cow by saying, 'There moves a white cow with horns.' Brahman is described by means of name, form and action superimposed on It, in such terms as, 'Knowledge, Bliss, Brahman' (III. ix. 28), and 'Pure Intelligence' (II. iv. 12), 'Brahman,' and 'Atman.' When, however, we wish to describe Its true nature, free from all differences due to limiting adjuncts, then it is an utter impossibility. Then there is only one way left, viz. to describe It as 'Not this, not this,' by eliminating all possible specifications of It that one may know of.'

(<https://www.wisdomlib.org/hinduism/book/the-brihadaranyaka-upanishad/d/doc117948.html>)

'Moreover, if Brahman ever knows Its own bliss, it is superfluous to distinguish between awareness and unawareness. If It is constantly aware of this bliss, then that is Its nature; hence there is no sense in maintaining that It cognises Its own bliss. Such a view would be tenable if ever there was the possibility of Its not knowing that bliss, as for instance a man knows himself and another (by an act of will). There is certainly no sense in distinguishing between a state of awareness and one of unawareness in the case of a man whose mind is uninterruptedly absorbed in an arrow, for instance. If, on the other hand, Brahman or the Self is supposed to be knowing Its bliss interruptedly, then in the intervals when It does not cognise Itself, It must know something else; and the Self would become changeful, which would make It non-permanent. Hence the text, 'Knowledge, Bliss,' etc., must be interpreted as setting forth the nature of Brahman, and not signifying that the bliss of the Self is cognised.'

(<https://www.wisdomlib.org/hinduism/book/the-brihadaranyaka-upanishad/d/doc118360.html>)

This is from a couple of centuries after Shankara, but is from a generally well regarded text:

'Reality is Brahman which is without a second and is Existence, Consciousness and Bliss. Unreality is Nescience and all other material objects.'
(<https://www.swamij.com/Vedantasara-Sadananda.htm>; for some footnotes:
<https://estudentdavedanta.net/Vedantasara-Nikhilananda.pdf>, p 21)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 5th, 2021 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: Nirguṇa Ultimates

Content:

Matt J said:

The point isn't that Brahman is never described as having qualities. The point is that when Brahman is described with qualities, it is saguna Brahman. It is a tortured reading to read "nirguna" as meaning with characteristics and a basic error.

Astus wrote:

But existence, consciousness, and bliss are not characteristics but the substance of Brahman. Otherwise if even being were a characteristic there simply wouldn't be a Brahman at all, thus nirguna would mean sunya and would be quite preferable to us Buddhists.

'Who has ever denied that the Bliss (Ānanda) which in its nature admits of no difference whatever is the "same as Brahman? Bliss is verily the essential nature of the Supreme Self (Paramātmān). But that bliss which manifests itself as love and so on cannot be identical with the Supreme Brahman. We call that Bliss Brahman, in which such distinctions as love and so on have no place, and which is quite beyond the reach of manas.'

...

'As the object of genuine love, the Self is in his essential nature the true Bliss itself; and as dwelling in each body separately, the Bliss-Ātman becomes divided as it were. As the genuine Bliss, the Bliss-Ātman is the original, whose reflections enter into tranquil states of the mind when thinking of agreeable objects such as wealth, sons, etc. These reflections are as false as the images reflected in water or in a mirror; and though the bliss which has become separated by the upādhis is real, still, it has the fault of limitation. Consequently, neither the reflected image of Bliss nor its detached bits can constitute the genuine Bliss. On the contrary, that Bliss is real which constitutes the essential nature of Brahman, and which is not subject to any kind of limitation.'

(<https://www.wisdomlib.org/hinduism/book/the-taittiriya-upanishad/d/doc79821.html>)

Later there's a section on the issue of defining Brahman that is concluded with the following:

'Though birth, &c., inhere elsewhere, Brahman may be defined indirectly as the cause of the birth, etc., this causality being falsely ascribed to Brahman. We say, for instance, "(what appeared to be) the serpent is this garland." So it is possible to define Brahman through what is ascribed to Him, thus: Brahman is that which is the cause of the universe. Just as it is not incompatible that one single person, Devadatta, should be spoken of as father, son, brother, son-in-law, etc., though these words have quite distinct meanings, so also the words "Real, Consciousness" etc., which, as understood in their ordinary sense, convey distinct meanings and refer to distinct things, may point to the indivisible non-dual Brahman and thus constitute the direct definition (svarūpa-lakṣaṇa as opposed to taṭastha-lakṣaṇa) of Brahman.'

(<https://www.wisdomlib.org/hinduism/book/the-taittiriya-upanishad/d/doc79852.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 5th, 2021 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: Nirguṇa Ultimates

Content:

Malcolm said:

And thus, Śantarakṣita mocks Advaitans who assert an ajativāda without also accepting the teaching of the Tathāgata, and likewise, the reason that Śankarācārya is mocked by later Vedantins for being a crypto-buddhist.

Astus wrote:

I think Shankara was aware of some Buddhist teachings, and has differentiated his view from them intentionally. Already Gaudapada did so in his closing words:

'The knowledge of the wise one, who is all-light, is ever untouched by objects. All the entities as well as knowledge (which are non-different) are also ever-untouched by any object. This is not the view of the Buddha.'

(<https://www.wisdomlib.org/hinduism/book/mandukya-upanishad-karika-bhashya/d/doc143804.html>)

And to elaborate further the same point, what I think points to the basic difference:

'The Vedantins refute them by saying that there can be no illusion without a substratum which is not an illusion. The existence of the Atman must be admitted. Even the void has a witness; if not, it would be impossible to say, 'There is a void''

(https://www.shankaracharya.org/panchadasi_trans_6.php)

Also this:

'O you ignorant one ! Why do you assert the blissful, ever-existent Atman, which resides in your own body and is (evidently) different from it, which is known as Purusha and is established (by the Shruti as identical with Brahman), to be absolutely non-existent ? O you ignorant one ! Try to know, with the help of Shruti and reasoning, your own Self, Purusha, which is different from the body, (not a void but) the very form of existence, and very difficult for persons like you to realize.'

(<https://www.shankaracharya.org/aparokshanubhuti.php>)

And this:

'The disciple questioned: After these five sheaths have been eliminated as unreal, I find nothing, O Master, in this universe but a Void, the absence of everything. What entity is there left forsooth with which the wise knower of the Self should realise his identity. The Guru answered: Thou has rightly said, O learned man ! Thou art clever indeed in discrimination. That by which all those modifications such as egoism as well as their subsequent absence (during deep sleep) are perceived, but which Itself is not perceived, know thou that Atman - the Knower - through the sharpest intellect.

That which is perceived by something else has for its witness the latter. When there is no agent to perceive a thing, we cannot speak of it as having been perceived at all.

This Atman is a self-cognised entity because It is cognised by Itself. Hence the individual soul is itself and directly the Supreme Brahman, and nothing else.

That which clearly manifests Itself in the states of wakefulness, dream and profound sleep; which is inwardly perceived in the mind in various forms as an unbroken series of egoistic impressions; which witnesses the egoism, the Buddhi, etc., which are of diverse forms and modifications; and which makes Itself felt as the Existence-Knowledge-Bliss Absolute; know thou this Atman, thy own Self, within thy heart.'

(<http://www.shankaracharya.org/vivekachudamani3.php>)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 6th, 2021 at 4:01 AM

Title: Re: Nirguṇa Ultimates

Content:

Rick said:

In fact, nothing can be said about nirguna brahman, even though Advaita teachers do, because how else are you going to clue your students in on the fact that there is something 'beyond' vyavahara?

Astus wrote:

First stating that nothing can be said about something, and then giving all sorts of definitions and explanations about it makes the first statement a pointless excuse for failing to put together a coherent argument. Or one can be like Sañjaya Belaṭṭhiputta and practise equivocation (amarāvikkhepavāda, cf. DN 1). Neither of them really work.

Also, I don't see this type of evasion in the works of Shankara and his followers trying to avoid being explicit that they believe in a self that is the sole existing consciousness.

Rick said:

“Only an entity which is an object of sense-knowledge can become an object of affirmative predication of the form ‘it is’ or an object of negative predication of the form ‘it is not’. Reason also proves that Brahman cannot be expressed by words denoting existence (sat) or non-existence (asat).” — Shankara

Astus wrote:

That quote well points to the usual negation of objects, but at the same time indicates the adherence to the idea of a really existing subject. If only they'd drop the whole absolute consciousness business, then they could be Buddhists.

Rick said:

something that is taught and then later un-taught.

Astus wrote:

And then what? If you think Vedanta teaches letting go of self, why do they argue for it to be the one true being and call Buddhists nihilist?

'Likewise, the Self and the non-Self would both be non-existent if they were similarly superimposed on each other through Ignorance. But that is not desirable as it is the position of the Nihilists.'

(https://shankaracharya.org/upadesa_sahasri.php; in Mayeda tr: II.2.55, p 236)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 6th, 2021 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: Nirguṇa Ultimates

Content:

Malcolm said:

So what?

Astus wrote:

So he advocated a view that was not in harmony with the Dharma, and was quite open about it too.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 6th, 2021 at 6:26 AM

Title: Re: Nirguṇa Ultimates

Content:

Rick said:

And the final straw for me was learning that the only definitive 'proof' of the reality of brahman is the word of Ishvara in the scriptures. It's tough for a recovering Catholic to feel comfortable with that!

Astus wrote:

Well, at least Catholics try to put in some logic as proof. If, as you say, there's only the scriptures as proof, then it's like in the <https://suttacentral.net/mn95/en/sujato>:

“Master Gotama, regarding that which by the lineage of testament and by canonical authority is the ancient hymnal of the brahmins, the brahmins come to the definite conclusion: ‘This is the only truth, other ideas are silly.’ What do you say about this?”

“Well, Bhāradvāja, is there even a single one of the brahmins who says this: ‘I know this, I see this: this is the only truth, other ideas are silly’?”

“No, Master Gotama.”

“Well, is there even a single teacher of the brahmins, or a teacher’s teacher, or anyone back to the seventh generation of teachers, who says this: ‘I know this, I see this: this is the only truth, other ideas are silly’?”

“No, Master Gotama.”

“Well, what of the ancient hermits of the brahmins, namely Aṭṭhaka, Vāmaka, Vāmadeva, Vessāmitta, Yamadaggi, Aṅgīrasa, Bhāradvāja, Vāsetṭha, Kassapa, and Bhagu? They were the authors and propagators of the hymns. Their hymnal was sung and propagated and compiled in ancient times; and these days, brahmins continue to sing and chant it, chanting what was chanted and teaching what was taught. Did even they say: ‘We know this, we see this: this is the only truth, other ideas are silly’?”

“No, Master Gotama.”

“So, Bhāradvāja, it seems that there is not a single one of the brahmins, not even anyone back to the seventh generation of teachers, nor even the ancient hermits of the brahmins who say: ‘We know this, we see this: this is the only truth, other ideas are silly.’ Suppose there was a queue of blind men, each holding the one in front: the first one does not see, the middle one does not see, and the last one does not see. In the same way, it seems to me that the brahmins’ statement turns out to be like a queue of blind men: the first one does not see, the middle one does not see, and the last one does not see. What do you think, Bhāradvāja? This being so, doesn’t the brahmins’ faith turn out to be baseless?”

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 6th, 2021 at 3:55 PM

Title: Re: Nirguṇa Ultimates

Content:

Rick said:

As I said, the Vedantin 'answer' to this is that The Truth was communicated directly by Ishvara, who unlike humans is not blind.

Astus wrote:

If it's a truth only because the source that is unknown is believed to be correct, and nobody has actually seen that truth personally, it is still baseless. Also, what would be the value in communicating something that nobody can comprehend?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 6th, 2021 at 8:28 PM

Title: Re: Were/are Zen monastery time schedules liberal with regard to meal and dharma talk timing?

Content:

czf said:

I have also heard from other sangha members that some Zen monasteries have a dinner in the early evening (16-17) which would contrast with the Theravada and Tibetan approaches of not having any meals after noon.

Astus wrote:

evening meal (yakuseki kittō 藥石喫湯, yakuseki 藥石)

Literally "medicine" (yakuseki 藥石) and "drinking decoctions" (kittō 喫湯). According to the Indian Vinaya, Buddhist monks were not permitted to take solid food after midday, but drinking liquids was allowed. For monks who were ill, however, solid food was permitted at any time of day for medicinal purposes. In the Chinese Buddhist monasteries of the Song and Yuan dynasties that served as the model for Japanese Zen monasteries, an evening meal was routinely served to all the monks in residence, but it was euphemistically called "medicine."

(https://www.sotozen.com/eng/library/glossary/individual.html?key=evening_meal)

'The Chinese maintained, however, that because the work of the monastery continued into the evening, monks could not do without an evening meal. Supper was eaten in most Chinese monasteries, although there were usually a few monks who preferred to follow the rule strictly and eat nothing solid later than 12:00. They were free to do so, but according to one informant they were still expected to come to the refectory along with everyone else unless their age or status excused them.'

(The Practice of Chinese Buddhism by Holmes Welch, p 111)

czf said:

Are those aspects of the time schedule considered traditional in Zen monastic life? Is there more material on the subject of the practical everyday aspects of Zen monastic conduct that I could read?

Astus wrote:

What I could quickly come up with:

The Practice of Chinese Buddhism by Holmes Welch

Buddhist Monasticism in East Asia ed. by James A. Benn, Lori Meeks, and James Robson

The Origins of Buddhist Monastic Codes in China by Yifa

Japanese Temple Buddhism by Stephen G. Covell

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 6th, 2021 at 8:34 PM

Title: Re: Nirguṇa Ultimates

Content:

Rick said:

The Vedas say something like: You cannot know brahman, but you can know that you are brahman. That's Advaitin enlightenment in a nutshell.

I know what you're thinking: "To know that you are <the unknowable> doesn't make sense!" When I asked my teacher how this knowing happens, he said it is an event in the mind that comes from the practice of shravana (listening), manana (clarifying doubts), and nididhyasana (contemplating, meditating, assimilating).

Astus wrote:

If it is accepted that atman is brahman, then knowing one's self is knowing brahman. Despite playing around the words that the self cannot know itself as an object, it is still the main soteriological theory of Vedanta that it's possible to arrive at consciousness that is the self.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 7th, 2021 at 6:18 AM

Title: Re: Nirguṇa Ultimates

Content:

Rick said:

Does the mysterious or unfathomable or unknowable play a role in Buddhist dharma? Because it sure does in the Vedas!

Astus wrote:

Being readily visible (sāṃdr̥ṣṭiko/sandiṭṭhiko) is one of the main qualities of the Dharma.

'Those who explained to me previously,
before I encountered Gotama's teaching,
said 'thus it was' or 'so it shall be'.
All that was just the testament of hearsay;
all that just fostered speculation.

Alone, the dispeler of darkness is splendid, a beacon:
Gotama, vast in wisdom,
Gotama, vast in intelligence.

He is the one who taught me Dhamma, visible in this very life, immediately effective,
the untroubled, the end of craving,
to which there is no compare.'
(<https://suttacentral.net/snp5.19/en/sujato>)

How so? See e.g.: <https://suttacentral.net/sn1.20/en/sujato>,
<https://suttacentral.net/sn35.70/en/sujato>, <https://suttacentral.net/an3.53/en/sujato>,

<https://suttacentral.net/an6.47/en/sujato>.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 7th, 2021 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: Nirguṇa Ultimates

Content:

LastLegend said:

Mañjuśrī replied, “The conceivable samādhi has an appearance that can be captured while the inconceivable samādhi has no appearance to be captured. All sentient beings have attained the inconceivable samādhi. Why? Because all mental appearances are not the [true] mind. Therefore, the [mental] appearances of all sentient beings and the appearance of the inconceivable samādhi are the same, not different.”

Rick said:

Could someone please use nice simple language to explain what this means. Thanks!

Astus wrote:

Conceivable (思議) means there is a characteristic, a quality, a mark (相) that can be identified. When there is nothing to grasp as a signifying quality of something, then there is no conception of that object, hence inconceivable (不可思議). What are imagined to be the characteristics of mind are not actually the mind, as the mind is assumed to be a continuous knower but there's no such thing, as Manjusri stated right before this ('Not seeing a mind that can conceive', cf. http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html#div-19). This is a way to express emptiness, that characteristics - marks grasped as defining qualities, thus making the appearance of a real entity - are made up: 'All things that have characteristics are false and ephemeral. If you see all characteristics to be non-characteristics, then you see the Tathāgata.' (http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html#div-6).

In the first fascicle of the sutra there is a section that might help understand it better:

'Śāriputra, the appearance of the dharma realm is bodhi. Why? Because in the dharma realm sentient beings have no appearances, as all dharmas are empty. The emptiness of all dharmas is bodhi, which is non-dual and free from differentiation. Śāriputra, without differentiation, there is no knower. Without a knower, there are no words. Without words, there is neither existence nor nonexistence, neither knowing nor not knowing. This is true for all dharmas. Why? Because dharmas cannot be identified by places, which imply a definite nature.'

Go backwards. Things cannot be found here or there, if one analyses them properly and tries to identify them directly in one's experience there is nothing to obtain. That means all things are mere words and ideas that are made up, they have no actual basis or object. As the object conceived does not exist, there is no basis for one who conceives them in any way. It's like the metaphor of the snake and the rope: when there is no snake there is no longer fear. Being free from both subject and object, that is liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 8th, 2021 at 4:36 AM

Title: Re: Nirguṇa Ultimates

Content:

Rick said:

If your goal was to communicate its essence in one sentence using common (non-jargon) and simple words, what would you say?

Astus wrote:

Whatever one conceives is a thought, and if instead of further thinking about it one looks directly to see what a thought is, there is nothing to hold on to.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 8th, 2021 at 6:24 AM

Title: Re: Nirguṇa Ultimates

Content:

LastLegend said:

There are five skandhas why only thought being mentioned here?

Astus wrote:

Thought was mentioned because of the section from the sutra that was asked about. Also, thought did not stand for a specific skandha.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 8th, 2021 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: Nirguṇa Ultimates

Content:

LastLegend said:

In the mental process, do you agree that there is an imagined part (mental image), there is a part that actively causes that imagined to arise, and there is a part that knows those two parts. Do you agree? Just like a car operates because of parts and each part has its function.

Astus wrote:

Normally in an instance of thought all four aggregates are present: there is a basic feeling (vedana), there is a recognition (saṃjñā), there is an intention, a relating (saṃskāra), and there is an awareness or consciousness (vijñāna). As a fifth contact (sparsa), or in other words impression can be mentioned, that the four are caused by and relate to.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 9th, 2021 at 10:03 PM

Title: True Mind is No Mind

Content:

Astus wrote:

'What is called no-mind is nothing other than a mind free from deluded thought.'

(<https://terebess.hu/zen/bodhidharma-eng.html#app>, 17; T85, no. 2831, p. 1270a15)

'We have to come to a clear understanding as to the true nature and Absolute Existence of Dharma. This truth is that “as all phenomena are strictly dependent, conditioned, and relative, they are therefore impermanent.” This is the Absolute Existence of Dharma. If we have such a penetrative understanding of the nature of phenomena, of the notion of emptiness, we will enter the gateway of Chan, or align ourselves with the Tao. This is what Bodhidharma’s first formula, “facing a wall is the way to pacify the Mind”, teaches us.'

(http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/gates_of_chen.pdf

(<http://fo.sina.com.cn/zt/jhrczm/index.shtml>), p 33)

Absolute Existence is the translation of 实相 (實相 tattvasya-lakṣaṇam), defined in MMK 18.9:

"To know for oneself, not following others,

Calm extinction, without sophistries,

No differences and no distinctions;

This is termed the 'true character'."

(T30, no. 1564, p. 24a7-8; tr Bocking)

The quote (“缘生无自性、无自性故空”) is from the commentary to MMK 7.17:

'dharma arising from causal conditions have no self-nature, and having no self-nature are empty'

(T30, no. 1564, p. 10c20-21, tr Bocking)

'But what is this “nature”? If we are to use words and concepts, we can call it the buddha-nature, which is our original nature. This is the nature of awakening, the nature of emptiness or selflessness. Emptiness means relationships, connectedness.

Because all things are connected, nothing is fixed, and everything is free.'

(The Essence of Chan by Guo Gu, 1.2)

"But how could one [even] gain the ability to know that it is no-mind [that sees, hears, feels, and knows]?"

"Just try to find out in every detail: What appearance does mind have? And if it can be apprehended: is [what is apprehended] mind or not? Is [mind] inside or outside, or somewhere in between? As long as one looks for mind in these three locations, one's search will end in failure. Indeed, searching it anywhere will end in failure. That's exactly why it is known as no-mind."

(Treatise on No-Mind, 6; T85, no. 2831, p. 1269b9-13)

'it is possible to directly comprehend a thing's nature and its Absolute Existence, that is, we can know this teacup as the combination of all its necessary conditions. After stripping all those conditions away one by one, we may ask: “Where then is the teacup?”

It has no self-identity; it is simply a combination of causative conditions. In this way we can see through to the absolute nature of the thing. Such insight is wisdom. What we observe when looking with such an insight is “suchness” itself, the true actuality, the ultimate truth and Absolute Existence.'

(Gates of Chan, p 146)

'Emptiness is relationships, which means that there is no separation between self and other. Instead of seeing ourselves in the center of everything, we see the connectedness of everything. Selflessness is one of the core teachings that free us from attachments and suffering. It is the realization that all things— including us—are related, that they have no permanent, separate, independent self. This does not mean that we have no personality; we always have one, even after enlightenment. It is not that we do not know our name, or do not recognize anyone, or that our mind is blank— enlightenment is not that at all. What is absent in the enlightenment of selflessness is the fundamental assumption of a permanent, separate, independent self within us and within all things. What we consider as separate, independent, permanent, and solid is actually the coming together of everything else.'

(The Essence of Chan by Guo Gu, 2.4)

'Question. – It is quite possible that the saṃskṛtadharma, coming from the complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagrī), are without intrinsic nature (niḥsvabhāva) and therefore empty (śūnya). But the asaṃskṛtadharma, which are themselves not dharmas coming from causes and conditions, are indestructible (akṣaya), inalterable (abheda), eternal (nitya) and like space (ākāśasama). How would they be empty?

Answer. – As I have just said, outside of the saṃskṛtas, there are no asaṃskṛtas, and the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of the saṃskṛtas is exactly asaṃskṛta. The saṃskṛtas being empty, etc., the asaṃskṛtas themselves also are empty, for the two things are not different.

Besides, some people, hearing about the defects of the saṃskṛtadharma, become attached (abhiniveśante) to the asaṃskṛtadharma and, as a result of this attachment, develop fetters.'

(<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc226205.html>; T25, no. 1509, p. 289b5-11)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 9th, 2021 at 11:55 PM

Title: Re: True Mind is No Mind

Content:

LastLegend said:

Nagarjuna won't allow us to say conditioned because if it lacks self-existence it is not a thing in itself

Astus wrote:

What is conditioned is exactly not a thing in itself, because if a thing were in itself, it wouldn't be conditioned.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 10th, 2021 at 1:07 AM

Title: Re: I'm confused about Buddhist arguments against a creator God and what that entails for buddha activity?

Content:

Schrödinger's Yidam said:

As presented by Khenpo Tsultrim, Shentong absolutely accepts Prasangika Madhyamaka as valid. However it does not apply to Wisdom Mind/Buddha Nature. From his "Progressive Stages" book:

Khenpo Tsultrim said:

This non-conceptual Wisdom Mind is not the object of the conceptualizing process and so is not negated by Madhyamaka reasoning. Therefore, it can be said to be the only thing that has absolute and true existence.

Astus wrote:

From Karmapa Wangchuk Dorje:

'Though there is no contradiction in applying terms such as "subtle" to buddha nature, it is not tenable to posit it in the context of analysis as the self or to say that it exists in a certain way even when analyzed. If it were tenable to do so, it would absurdly follow that the self can withstand analysis. What could be worse than pretending to first refute the selves of persons and phenomena and then positing them in the end? Furthermore, who would place any trust in the statement, "Under thorough analysis, there is no establishment of a true self: this is the system of the Middle Way as asserted by Chandrakirti"?

We do posit the causal, coemergent buddha nature as the person from the unanalyzed perspective. However, we also accept that buddha nature is not established as the person or the self in either of the two truths. You, on the other hand, say that buddha nature is established as the self in the relative truth. Therefore you hold a view of self. When the noble beings of the Vajrayāna engage in the unanalyzed, worldly, relative truth, they use the terms of "person" and "self" in reference to buddha nature. Using terms in this way can only be done by those who have realized the objects of knowledge of the Vajrayāna—the uncommon presentation of the worldly relative truth, which consists of cause, path, and result. Using terms in this way is not to be attempted by those who have not comprehended these points.'

(The Karmapa's Middle Way: Feast for the Fortunate, p 398)

'The Jonangpas say that the self of ultimate truth exists and is permanent, whereas the relative imputation of the self is, like the horns of a rabbit, utterly nonexistent. In this way they refute even on the conventional level the mere self of no analysis renowned in the relative truth. They also affirm through analysis something that is, actually, utterly nonexistent: a self of the ultimate truth. They commit superimpositions and denigrations in relation to both of the two truths.'

(p 400)

'If an ultimate self existed, sentient beings would either have no chance whatever of gaining liberation from saṃsāra or would gain liberation without any effort at all. One of those two situations would absurdly follow. For, firstly, due to the ultimate existence of the self, some beings would be bound in saṃsāra while others would be liberated in nirvāṇa—desire to change this would be impossible. And, secondly, the ultimate self is perceived, according to you, by the perception of a correct consciousness, unlike the self of the relative. Your assertion resembles that of Īshvara!'
(p 402)

And from Karmapa Dūdül Dorje:

'[To say on the one hand that] the qualities of a Buddha are inconceivable for minds on this shore
And that, without analysis, these qualities are described by following his words,
While saying [on the other hand] that wisdom exists and that it is the perfect [nature], is not contradictory.
However, I understand that if such is held at the end of analyzing
For the ultimate through reasonings, the ultimate has become an object for the mind,
Thus being [in itself nothing but] a portion of the cognitive obscurations.
Hence, the following words by the lord of dharma from Tagpo are the remedy for this.
He says: "Throw the views of [intellectual] understanding behind you
And destroy the foundation of meditative experiences!"

...

Secondly, [the system of] Asanga and his brother who follow the final wheel [of dharma]
Is known as "False Aspectarian Mere Mentalism" in the land of the noble ones
And as "Centrism of other-emptiness" in Tibet.
The meaning of these two names is the same.
This is the completely pure system that,
Through mainly teaching the luminous aspect of the mind,
Holds that the result—kayas and wisdoms—exist on their own accord.
As for its necessity, it is asserted that it is taught in order to Relinquish any arising of fear of emptiness and to awaken those with indefinite disposition.

When commenting on its meaning, honorable Rangjung [Dorje] says
That it is one with the system of Candrakīrti.

Others assert that the ultimate is existent and really established
And that emptiness is really established.

As for the great vehicle's sutra portion, both the middle and the final wheel [of dharma]
Have the purport of the Sugata-Heart, the unity of emptiness and luminosity.

The middle [wheel] explains this by mainly teaching emptiness,
While the final [wheel] elucidates it by mainly teaching luminosity.
I understand that, in actuality, these are not contradictory.

...

Therefore, except for the difference in terms of which topic is mainly taught
And the superiority in means, the essence [of the mantra vehicle]
Is always in accord with the view of Centrism.

As it is said in [Nagarjuna's] Collection of Reasonings:

"For whom emptiness is possible,
Everything is possible.
For whom emptiness is not possible,
Nothing is possible."

(A Song on the View [Arising from] Understanding and Experience in Songs & Instructions of the Karmapas, p 34-35, p 36-37, p 38)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 11th, 2021 at 3:24 PM

Title: Re: Is impermanence the same or different than emptiness?

Content:

Astus wrote:

'Those who imputes arising and disintegration
With relation to conditioned things,
They do not understand well the movement
Of the wheel of dependent origination.
That which has originated due to "this" and "that,"
That has not done so as its own being;
And that which has not arisen as its own being,
How can it be called "arisen"?
The tranquility derived from extinction of cause,
This is understood to be a cessation;
That which is not extinguished through its intrinsic nature,
How can that be called an "extinguishment"?
Since there is nothing that arises,
There is nothing that disintegrates;
Yet the paths of arising and disintegration
Were taught [by the Buddha] for a purpose.
By understanding arising, disintegration is understood;
By understanding disintegration, impermanence is understood;
By understanding how to engage with impermanence,
The sublime dharma is understood as well.
Those who understand the dependent origination
To be utterly devoid of arising and disintegration,
Those who have such knowledge will cross
The ocean of samsara of dogmatic views.'
(Sixty Stanzas of Reasoning, v 18-23, tr Thupten Jinpa)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 11th, 2021 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: Is impermanence the same or different than emptiness?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Space is something that has neither existence or non-existence, because it isn't phenomenal.

It's simply the context in which everything else occurs.

Astus wrote:

There are two types of space (ākāśa) in Sarvastivada abhidharma: as one of the three unconditioned dharmas (AKB 1.5) and as a conditioned element (AKB 1.28).

It is as an unconditioned dharma that it has the function of not hindering (anāvṛti) all the other material dharmas. As a conditioned element it refers to gap or cavity (chidra) between matter and interpreted as a category of colour because it can be light or dark.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 12th, 2021 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: Question about awareness

Content:

Rick said:

Some schools of Buddhism teach that awareness is “what we truly are” and that being fully aware of the awareness ‘behind’ what we sense, feel, do is enlightenment.

Astus wrote:

What schools specifically? Any sources maybe?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 12th, 2021 at 4:40 AM

Title: Re: Is impermanence the same or different than emptiness?

Content:

Queequeg said:

How far can this inquiry go before the Dharma is exhausted? And isn't this line of inquiry actually a necessary part of the path at advancing levels?

Astus wrote:

“In the same way, reverend, purification of ethics is only for the sake of purification of mind. Purification of mind is only for the sake of purification of view. Purification of view is only for the sake of purification through overcoming doubt. Purification through overcoming doubt is only for the sake of purification of knowledge and vision of the variety of paths. Purification of knowledge and vision of the variety of paths is only for the sake of purification of knowledge and vision of the practice. Purification of knowledge and vision of the practice is only for the sake of purification of knowledge and vision. Purification of knowledge and vision is only for the sake of extinguishment by not grasping. The spiritual life is lived under the Buddha for the sake of extinguishment by not grasping.”

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn24/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 12th, 2021 at 5:39 AM

Title: Re: Question about awareness

Content:

Rick said:

I'm referring to the approach to meditation that Mingyur Rinpoche teaches and his father taught before him.

Astus wrote:

In that case awareness is not about being behind or front, but about the absence of fixation through the recognition of emptiness. That's where the difference between buddhas and sentient beings lie.

'This is what we actually are: empty in essence, cognizant by nature, able to perceive, with no barrier between these two aspects. This empty quality is called dharmakaya. But we are not only empty unlike space, we possess a knowing quality. This is what is described as cognizant nature, sambhogakaya. The capacity is the unity of these two, suffused with awareness. 'Capacity' here means being empty or being cognizant cannot be separated; they are an original unity. And 'suffused with awareness' refers to rigpa. The minds of all sentient beings are the unity of empty cognizance, but because they are not suffused with awareness, they don't know this. Although their minds are the unity of empty cognizance as a unity, they are suffused with unawareness, with unknowing. The very moment we recognize our nature as empty cognizance, it becomes empty cognizance suffused with awareness, with knowing.

The difference between buddhas and sentient beings is the difference between knowing and not knowing. 'Knowing' means knowing one's own nature, one's natural face. This present wakefulness that is uncorrected or uncontrived is the true Samantabhadra which has never been apart from you. While recognizing, rest naturally. When this present wakefulness recognizes itself, there is nothing whatsoever to see. That is the empty essence that is dharmakaya. However, along with the realization that there is nothing to see, is some knowing or seeing that this is so. That is the cognizant nature, sambhogakaya. This empty essence and cognizant nature are forever indivisible. That is the unity, nirmanakaya.'

(As It Is, vol 1, p 58-59)

'Dharmakaya is in ourselves, but since we have not stabilized the recognition of it, we get caught up in thoughts. Yet the essence of thoughts, when acknowledged, is dharmakaya. A thought is simply the extroverted expression of knowing, of awareness. In the moment of recognizing the nature of what thinks, there is no way for this expression, the thought, to remain. Your naked essence is then an actuality. In this experience, there is no way for a thought to remain, just as a drop of water cannot remain in mid-air. Once you are familiar with this way of dealing with a thought, you do not need to suppress thinking. You do not need to correct it. You do not need any hope of gaining or fear of losing the awakened state. That is why it is said that 'the confidence of the view is free of hope and fear'. You do not have to hope for freedom or fear having thoughts, because in the moment of seeing the essence, the thought has dissolved. Do you understand this? Is it clear?

Don't ever expect that anything spectacular will be experienced. Honestly, there is nothing more amazing than this recognition of rigpa in which no thought can remain.

The five poisons and habitual tendencies lose their power to rigpa. If we do not know this, we become caught up in thought. Most sentient beings do not know how to recognize; they are carried away by thoughts. In the moment you remind yourself to recognize mind nature, you have already seen the essence. "Seeing no thing is the sublime sight." This is so close that it is hard to believe. It is not an act of imagining. It's because it's so easy that it is hard to trust in! There is not even as much as a hair-tip to cultivate by meditating. But we need to grow used to it; we need to grow used to recognizing this nature of empty cognizance.'

(As It Is, vol 2, p 149-150)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 12th, 2021 at 3:32 PM

Title: Re: Maha Prajnaparamita Sastra

Content:

Leo Rivers said:

Just found this.... I think it's the whole thing.

Astus wrote:

It's the whole of what Lamotte translated, but as it says on the first page: 'This edition represents only the first part containing the translation of 34 of 100 fascicles of the original work.'

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 12th, 2021 at 6:01 PM

Title: Re: If there's no self, why does karma matter?

Content:

Nalanda said:

Without the self/person, why does karma matter? Upon rebirth, how does this karma connect or transfer to that new person? Isn't that unfair? How does it even connect the previous person's karma to the reborn person?

Astus wrote:

Karma is the person, i.e. we are what we do. If there was somebody else apart from what we did, an independent self, then actions wouldn't matter. But because there is no independent, separate self, it matters. Also, it makes little sense to talk of a yesterday's self as if it were disconnected from today's self. What we did yesterday defines what we have today. Same applies to larger periods of time.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 13th, 2021 at 4:34 AM

Title: Re: I'm confused about Buddhist arguments against a creator God and what that entails for buddha activity?

Content:

Astus wrote:

'In Chan, we practice sitting meditation so we can maintain a level of focus and centeredness associated with samadhi. But you have to practice in order to maintain this stability of mind. If you stop meditating, it disappears.

This is not the case with wisdom. When you have wisdom, it is always there. Once you see something, you see it. And wisdom constantly deepens and clarifies.

Before Buddha became awakened, he was able to reach the highest or eighth level of samadhi where there is neither perception nor nonperception. And yet the Buddha was not liberated. When he came out of this state of samadhi, he still felt vexed. Buddha did not become awakened or liberated because of samadhi but because of wisdom.

So why do we practice meditation if Chan is about wisdom? Because without a certain foundation—samadhi—the mind will be scattered. If we light a candle in a room where the doors and windows are open and the wind blows through, the candle will flicker. It will not shine. The room will be dark.

Samadhi is the stillness of a sealed room—a state of peace and calm without disturbances that allows the light of wisdom to glow. It doesn't flicker. Slowly and steadily it becomes shining bright.

Wisdom is experiential. In Chan, we say it comes from returning again and again to the present moment. It comes from the experience of always returning. It comes from living this, from experiencing it for yourself.

Wisdom in Chan, and in Buddhism generally, is often divided into four stages. The first stage is wisdom from acquisition. This occurs through listening or reading. Then there is the wisdom of knowledge—to reflect on and digest what has been acquired. Practicing or putting into action the wisdom you have acquired is the wisdom of practice or cultivation. When you are able to fully experience what was been taught, this is called the wisdom of attainment.'

(Essential Chan Buddhism by Guo Jun, ch 9)

'People on the mundane level meditate on tranquil absorption, such as the four kinds of concentration, but tranquility by itself cannot destroy clinging to a self, which is the root of cyclic existence. The power of self-delusion causes the root and attendant defilements to arise, which, in turn, lead one to commit harmful deeds and consequently to wander in the lower realms. The analogy for this is to be found in the meditation of such ascetics as Udraka, who believed in an external creator. On the other hand, the determination of nonselfhood [in one's psychophysical aggregates] through discerning intellect, followed by meditation, will result in attaining permanent peace. No other means can completely eliminate misery and defilement.'

(Mahamudra: the Moonlight, p 178)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 13th, 2021 at 8:30 PM

Title: Re: Is Sunyata beyond or the same as "neither positive nor negative"

Content:

Heimdall said:

In the Theravada system, there are three "realms" of existence - the Desire Realm, the Form Realm, and the Formless Realm.

Astus wrote:

The <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Trailokya> are found in all Buddhist schools.

Heimdall said:

In the Theravada system, the last one - the "infinity of neither being nor non-being" - is the closest realm to Nirvana and the least connected to Samsara, and beings who incarnate in that realm have achieved some significant level of Enlightenment and are guaranteed Nirvana in the near future. Nirvana in the Theravada system is identical with Arhantship and being "blown out", ceasing to reincarnate.

Astus wrote:

There is no realm closest to nirvana, because nirvana is not a realm to be close to. Non-returners are born in the five heavens of the Pure Abodes (Suddhāvāsā) that are the highest heavens of the form realm, and that's where they attain complete liberation.

Heimdall said:

the Heart Sutra which seem to suggest that emptiness is the highest possible thing, and emptiness is identical with being "neither positive nor negative"

Astus wrote:

One way to understand emptiness is freedom from conceptual grasping. If one were to identify emptiness with "positive", "negative", "positive and negative", or "neither positive nor negative", then that would be conceptual grasping.

Heimdall said:

I also wonder how one reconciles this with Mahayana goal of Buddhahood or the Bodhisattva path and the differing schools of thought for the Mahayana pathway on this issue, including becoming a Buddha or even the perpetual Bodhisattva path altogether.

Astus wrote:

Reconcile what?

Heimdall said:

Is Buddha-nature beyond even the dichotomy of "neither positive nor negative"?

Astus wrote:

Buddha nature refers to the wisdom of the buddhas that is free from grasping and full of compassion. So it could be said that on the one hand it's like emptiness, beyond categories, and on the other hand it's 100% positive.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 16th, 2021 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: Commentaries on the Canonical Sutras?

Content:

Nalanda said:

Is there something like that I could check whenever I read the agamas?

Astus wrote:

According to <https://sites.google.com/site/frankkpublic/agama-commentaries-parallel-to-pali-commentaries> there are fragments in Sanskrit and almost none in Chinese except a brief one (5 fascicles) on parts of the Ekottarikagama (51 fascicles) called <https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T25n1507> of what there's a study and synopsis in English by Antonello Palumbo (<http://www.indologica.de/drupal/?q=node/3032>). Otherwise you can search abhidharma works and treatises like the Dazhidulun and Yogacarabhumisastra for some references.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 16th, 2021 at 6:31 AM

Title: Re: Repentance practices

Content:

Astus wrote:

Repentance (chanhui <http://www.buddhism-dict.net/ddb/pcache/61id%28b61fa-6094%29.html>) is quite central all over in East Asian Buddhism, including Chan.

'What is it that is called 'repentance' (chan)? What is it that is called 'remorse' (hui)? Repentance is to repent past licentiousness. One should repent completely for all one's evil actions from the past, one's transgressions of stupidity, pride and deception, jealousy, and so on, so that they will never arise again. This is called 'repentance.' Remorse is to have remorse for future errors, those from now on. Since you have become enlightened [to them] now, all one's evil actions from the past, one's transgressions of stupidity, deceitfulness, jealousy, and so on, are eradicated forever, never to be committed again. This is called 'remorse.' Therefore, it is called 'repentance and remorse' (chanhui).

Ordinary people are stupid and only know they should repent for their past licentiousness—they do not know they should feel remorse for future errors. Because they do not have such remorse, their previous licentiousness is not extinguished and future errors continue to be generated. With previous licentiousness not extinguished and future errors continuing to be generated, how can this be called repentance?' (Platform Sutra, ch 6, BDK ed, p 48)

'If subsequent sentient beings of the degenerate age of dull faculties desire in their hearts to attain the Way, but somehow always fall short of their goal, it is because of karmic hindrances from the past. They must strive for penance and confession and continuously re-arise their hopes. They must first sever love and hatred, jealousy, envy, flattery and calumny and strive for the unsurpassed state of mind. Since the three types of meditation are all the investigation of the same single matter, if one meditation doesn't work, try again with one of the others. Don't let your mind dissipate, and gradually strive for actualization.'

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/sutra_of_perfect_enlightenment.html#div-11)

'The function of repentance is to initiate a relentless process of self-reflection and self-discipline, to develop vigilance based on selfawareness, and to purify one's mind with self-respect, so as to prevent the occurrence of the same mistake. As long as one has the determination to start afresh, and realizes that the past is gone and there is no point in dwelling on it, one's mind will be relieved from the feeling of guilt and will regain serenity. This is the function of repentance. The wrongdoing has to be honestly revealed (to the community, or to several persons, or to one person, or to one's own conscience, in accordance with the category and degree of wrongdoing, followed by genuine regret and a resolution not to repeat it).^{26*} Otherwise the shadow of the misdeed will be hidden permanently in the mind, and will develop into karmic seeds that invite retribution later. Repentance immediately dissolves from one's consciousness the seeds produced by the misdeed.

However, the purpose of repentance is to cleanse one's mind to prevent reoccurrence of wrongdoing. If one repeatedly misbehaves, repents, and then misbehaves again, then the efficacy of repentance will be lost. Moreover, the repentance of Buddhists is quite different from that of Christians, who pray to God for absolution. Buddhists do not believe any god has the power to absolve sin. To Buddhists, the real meaning of repentance is to cleanse the contaminated mind in order to restore its purity.'

(Orthodox Chinese Buddhism, p 46)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 20th, 2021 at 12:50 AM

Title: Re: An Important Reminder

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sharing secret teachings has been around for over a thousand years:

<https://earlytibet.com/2008/04/09/why-should-the-secret-mantra-be-secret/>

Calling something secret only makes it more interesting. It is a skilful means that worked well.

'Indeed, the overwhelming success of the Secret Path has propelled it into a position where it has become perhaps the least secret of all the Buddhist meditative systems.'
(Indian Esoteric Buddhism by Ronald M. Davidson, p 339)

Just as fake news and pseudo-science is not defeated by no news and no science, false Dharma should be answered by correct Dharma, not trying to hide it. After all, 'The teaching and training proclaimed by a Realized One shine in the open, not under cover.'
(<https://suttacentral.net/an3.131/en/sujato>).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 26th, 2021 at 7:10 PM

Title: Re: Question about dependent origination

Content:

Astus wrote:

'Since things devoid of intrinsic nature are not existent,
"This existing, that comes to be" can never hold.'

(MMK 1.10, tr Siderits)

Intrinsic nature (svabhāva) is the key term that should be further clarified first, and how central it is to Sarvastivādin Abhidharma.

'A dharma is defined as that which holds its intrinsic characteristic (svalakṣaṇa-dhāraṇād dharmah — § 1.2). The intrinsic characteristic of rūpa, for example, is the susceptibility of being molested (rūpyate), obstructability and visibility; that of vedanā is sensation, etc. And for a dharma to be a dharma, its characteristic must be sustainable throughout time: A rūpa remains as a rūpa irrespective of its various modalities. It can never be transformed into another different dharma (such as vedanā). Thus, a uniquely characterizable entity is a uniquely real (in the absolute sense) entity, having a unique intrinsic nature (svabhāva): "To be existent as an absolute entity is to be existent as an intrinsic characteristic (paramārthena sat svalakṣaṇena sad ityarthah)" (Sarvastivāda Abhidharma by Bhikkhu K.L. Dhammajoti, 2.3.1, 3rd ed, p 23)

'The most notable and representative view of the Sarvastivāda is that what is real is what abides uniquely in its intrinsic nature: What is real is what has a svabhāva. Among the various synonyms of svabhāva is the term avayava, 'part'. A 'part' here refers to the smallest possible unit which cannot be further analyzed; it is the ultimate real. Whatever can be further analyzed either physically or mentally — a composite (e.g., a person) — is 'having a part' (sāvayava); it is a relative real, superimposed on the ultimate reals (e.g., the five skandha-s). This also means that what is real or what exists truly is what exists from the highest or ultimate standpoint (paramārtha-sat), as opposed to what exists relatively/conventionally (saṃvṛti-sat).' (Sarvastivāda Abhidharma by Bhikkhu K.L. Dhammajoti, 3.5.1, 3rd ed, p 77)

So what is refuted is what is held to be verifiable in Abhidharma, the unique characteristics of those things that exist ultimately, i.e. the dharmas. Mundane things like tables and people are understood as purely conventional, nominal, conceptual even in Abhidharma teachings. Here's a commentary on Nagarjuna's argument presented above:

'As explained earlier, to an opponent for whom the absence of nature is not established, this absence will be proven by presenting dependent origination as evidence. Indeed, when nature as such has been invalidated by this evidence, the idea that being produced by ruling conditions is the nature of things will have been invalidated as well. However, just as one may negate the presence of an aśoka tree by referring to the absence of any tree, using the absence of nature as evidence to refute this convention does not pose a problem.

The unproblematic character of the argument is clarified further by considering how, in this particular context, this functions to disprove the argument advanced by the opposition. Our opponents may say that because the characteristics of ruling conditions do exist, things arise from something other than themselves. In reply, we may say that, for those of us who assert that things have no nature, such characteristics are not established.'

(Ornament of Reason by Mabja Jangchub Tsondru, comm. to MMK 1.10)

In other words, dependent origination refutes the possibility of an own nature because everything depends on others, i.e. cannot be established on their own, and because there is no own nature, there is nothing that can be called existent or even non-existent. So even dharmas are like everyday things, mere conceptual fabrications.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 28th, 2021 at 4:51 AM

Title: Re: Realization and realized masters

Content:

LucasGP said:

can one achieve realization in Zen even if one cannot find any realized teacher?

Astus wrote:

It's not the teacher who makes the disciple realised, but by practising the six paramitas with bodhicitta one attains liberation. So the question is if a teacher imparts correct knowledge and whether the disciple learns and applies the correct path.

'In all cases, whether alone or with a group, whether as a householder or home-leaver, it is better to practice under a qualified master. Practice without the guidance of a master will probably not be too fruitful. Practicing with a master can save you time. A master's understanding and experience can help you firmly grasp the essentials of practice and cultivate a correct view of Buddhadharma. This enables you to more quickly free yourself from the vexations of body and mind. With a master, time otherwise spent studying sutras and worrying about following the right path, can be devoted single-mindedly to practice.'

(<http://old.ddc.shengyen.org/mobile/text/09-06/18.php>)

'The most important thing in recognizing masters is to be able to judge whether they have a correct view of Buddhadharma. If their views of the Dharma are correct, then even if their behavior reveals some weaknesses, they should not be considered false masters. On the other hand, if teachers do not have a correct view of the Dharma, they cannot be considered authentic or virtuous masters.

Of course, this presupposes that the person making the judgment has some understanding of correct Dharma. Without an understanding of the Dharma, there is no way a practitioner can tell if a teacher is genuine or false.'

(<http://old.ddc.shengyen.org/mobile/text/09-06/27.php>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 29th, 2021 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Thrangu R. on prayer and deities, etc.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Blessings are the inspiration gained by devotion to progress on the path.

'Sometimes people think that blessings are something that will make them shake, tremble, and even levitate. But that is not what blessings are. Blessings are the power of the Dharma. When we encounter the power of the Dharma, we start to feel faith, and then we become diligent. We feel love and compassion, and we develop tranquility and insight. This is what blessings are. They are the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion. If we can entirely rid ourselves of those three things right away, that is wonderful, but even if not, we can decrease and suppress them. That is blessings.'
(Vivid Awareness by Thrangu Rinpoche, p 41)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 30th, 2021 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: Realization and realized masters

Content:

Astus wrote:

Pratyekabuddhas don't matter much, as their realisation is a limited one.

From Huangbo:

'Those who for the most part attain awakening by hearing the teachings are called "śrāvakas." Those who attain awakening by contemplating causes and conditions are called "pratyekabuddhas." Even though you reach the attainment of buddhahood, if that does not derive from awakening to your own mind, you would also be called a "śrāvaka buddha." Many of you practitioners of the Way awaken to the doctrinal teachings but have not awakened to the mind dharma. Even if you practice in this way for successive kalpas, this will never be the original buddha.'

...

'Śrāvakas see the production of ignorance and the extinction of ignorance.

Pratyekabuddhas see only the extinction of ignorance but not the production of ignorance, so they realize tranquil extinction thought after thought. All the buddhas see sentient beings produced all day long without ever being produced and extinguished all day long without ever being extinguished. To be free from both production and extinction is the fruition of the Mahāyāna.'

(A Bird in Flight Leaves No Trace, 1.7; 2.43)

Regarding Huineng's awakening, both before and after meeting Hongren it was the Diamond Sutra that brought him realisation. As the story is told in the first chapter of the Platform Sutra:

"At one time, a customer bought some firewood and had me deliver it to his shop, where he took it and paid me. On my way out of the gate I saw someone³⁸ reciting a sutra, and as soon as I heard the words of the sutra my mind opened forth in enlightenment. I then asked the person what sutra he was reciting, and he said, 'The Diamond Sutra.'"

...

"The patriarch kept his robe (kaṣāya) hidden and would not let anyone see it. He preached the Diamond Sutra for me. When he reached the words 'responding to the nonabiding, yet generating the mind'⁵⁶ I experienced a great enlightenment, [realizing that] all the myriad dharmas do not transcend their self-natures."

(BDK ed, p 17 & 23)

The story of https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Yongjia_Xuanjue, who attained awakening by reading the Vimalakīrti Sutra, is a good example of the general view on the role of teacher in most Chan literature. It's not really about transmitting but rather verifying awakening.

Chan Master Yongjia Xuanjue was from the Zai family of Wenzhou (Yongjia Xian, Zhejiang). When he was young, he studied the sutras and śāstras and trained in the teaching of cessation and contemplation (i.e., concentration and insight meditation) of Tiantai. Through reading the Vimalakīrti Sutra he illuminated his mind-ground. Coincidentally, he visited and discussed [the Dharma] with the master's student Xuance. Everything he said was in implicit accord with the [teachings of the] patriarchs. Xuance said, "From whom did you attain the Dharma?"

[Xuanjue] said, "I heard that there is a succession of teachers for the Mahayana sutras and śāstras. Later I became enlightened to the central doctrine of the mind of the Buddha [by reading] the Vimalakīrti Sutra. As yet, no one has verified [my realization]." Xuance said, "Attained prior to King Sounds of Dignity; becoming enlightened oneself without a teacher after King Sounds of Dignity.' In both cases, this was the heretical path of naturalism."

[Xuanjue] said, "May I request that you verify [my realization]?"

Xuance said, "My words carry no weight, but in Caoqi there is the Sixth Patriarch, Great Master [Huineng]. [Students] assemble there from the four directions like clouds. You would certainly receive his Dharma, and if you would go there I will accompany you."
(Platform Sutra, ch 7, BDK ed, p 67-68)

On the expression yixin yixin 以心印心 (lit. 'stamp (yin) mind with mind') the Historical Dictionary of Chan Buddhism has this:

'The crucial element in this expression is the word yin. As a verb, yin involves the meanings "to accord or to harmonize with each other," "to verify each other," and so forth. For Huangbo Xiyun, the transmission from mind to mind must be understood as the mutual realization or verification of enlightenment. The mind of the master and the mind of the disciple are brought into harmony or accord by each one's enlightenment. This is the true meaning of transmission. The verification (yin) of enlightenment cannot be understood as merely interior. It must be characterized as neither interior nor exterior, since it can never be cut off from, or confined to, one side or the other. It is the existential-practical transformation of the entire personhood through everyday activities.'

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 30th, 2021 at 4:31 PM

Title: Re: Realization and realized masters

Content:

clyde said:

According to Huangpo those who “attain awakening by hearing the teachings are called ‘śrāvakas.’”

Astus wrote:

That's more like a play with words: sound/voice of the teaching (sheng jiao 聲教) and sound/voice hearer (sheng wen 聲聞), the latter being a term for sravaka. It's also about emphasising awakening by insight into one's own mind. Huangbo also says, 'There are those who, on hearing the dharma, attain no-mind in a single moment of thought.' And more interestingly, 'The dharma he preaches is neither preached nor revealed, and those who hear that dharma neither hear nor attain anything. It is as if a magician preaches the dharma to people he has conjured. How can I say that I comprehended or awakened to this dharma upon hearing the words of a spiritual mentor (kalyāṇamitra)?'

clyde said:

Does this mean that Huineng was a śrāvaka?

Astus wrote:

No.

'Good friends, if you wish to enter into the profound dharmadhātu and the samādhi of prajñā, you must cultivate the practice of prajñā and recite the Diamond Sutra. Thus will you attain seeing the nature.'

...

'If a person of the Mahayana or a person of the Supreme Vehicle hears this explanation of the Diamond Sutra, his mind will open forth in enlightened understanding.'

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 31)

The main point is that one should put the words of the teachings into action, i.e. actively look into one's own nature as the teachings instruct everyone.

'To recite it orally without practicing it in the mind is [as unreal] as a phantasm or hallucination, [and as evanescent] as dew or lightning. To recite it orally and practice it mentally is for mind and mouth to correspond. The fundamental nature is buddha.

There is no other buddha apart from this nature.'

(ch 2, p 28)

Also, Huineng said about one of his poems (but can be applied to the whole scripture):

'Good friends, you should all recite this. If you practice according to it, you will see the nature through hearing these words. Although you may be a thousand li away from me, it will be as if you are constantly by my side. If you do not become enlightened through these words, then why have you gone to the trouble of coming a thousand li to see me?'

(ch 6, p 53)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 3rd, 2021 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: Looking for formal "How things exist" analyses

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thrangu Rinpoche: Opening the Door to Emptiness

<https://web.archive.org/web/20200219095155/http://www.rinpoche.com/teachings/Open%20Door%20to%20Emptiness/opendoor1.htm>,

<https://web.archive.org/web/20200219095735/http://www.rinpoche.com/teachings/Open%20Door%20to%20Emptiness/opendoor2.htm>,

<https://web.archive.org/web/20200219095317/http://www.rinpoche.com/teachings/Open%20Door%20to%20Emptiness/opendoor3.htm>,

<https://web.archive.org/web/20200217212027/http://www.rinpoche.com/teachings/Open%20Door%20to%20Emptiness/opendoor4.htm>

Some good and short ones on Lotsawa House in the categories of

<https://www.lotsawahouse.org/topics/middle-way/> and

<https://www.lotsawahouse.org/topics/buddhist-philosophy/>, like

<https://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/mipham/four-great-logical-arguments>,

<https://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/patrul-rinpoche/two-truths-view-mahayana>, and <https://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/mipham/wheel-of-analytical-meditation>

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 5th, 2021 at 5:04 PM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

rybackbob said:

1. Do all Mahayana schools / sects accept two truths?

Astus wrote:

In some form, yes.

rybackbob said:

2. Why is conventional / relative truth still called temporary?

https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Two_truths_doctrine#:~:text=The%20Buddha%27s%20teaching%20of%20the,understand%20the%20Buddha%27s%20profound%20truth.&text=The%20world%20Densconced%20truth%20and,which%20is%20the%20highest%20sense.

Is the conventional truth being abolished over time?

Astus wrote:

I don't see 'temporary' stated there.

rybackbob said:

3. Does absolute truth deny and cancel conventional truth? As far as I know, two truths are true and valid at the same time?

Astus wrote:

If conventional truth is interpreted as the veiled, mistaken perception, it is abandoned.
If understood as conventional, then no.

rybackbob said:

4. On this website:

<https://www.google.com/amp/s/www.lionsroar.com/what-are-the-two-truths/amp/>

It is pointed out that two truths is a temporary doctrine and in fact there is only one final truth. What happens to all conventional phenomena after two truths come together?

Astus wrote:

Would you specify what statement you refer to regarding the conventional being temporary?

rybackbob said:

5. Do Buddhas and enlightened Buddhists also believe in conventional truth?

Astus wrote:

What is conventional should be seen as just that, conventional. If mistaken as absolute, then there is a problem.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 5th, 2021 at 5:07 PM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

zerwe said:

When the Buddha taught the 4NT's, each of the Tenet schools developed as a result of a difference in interpretation of the meaning of the statement that "one should understand suffering even though 'there is no suffering'." This eventually would lead to differing presentations or concepts regarding the "Two Truths" as held by the Vaibhasika, Sautrantika, Cittamatra, and Madhyamaka schools, as well as, their respective sub-schools.

Astus wrote:

The two truths doctrine is a commentarial development, not found in the agamas or even in the abhidharma texts. The idea that "even though 'there is no suffering'" is from the Prajnaparamita sutras.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 5th, 2021 at 9:08 PM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Aemilius said:

The basic terms of Madhyamaka exist already in the Sravakayana sutras

Astus wrote:

Except that neyārtha and nīrārtha are not equivalents of conventional and ultimate truths, only that the later tradition (i.e. Buddhaghosa) interpreted neyārtha teachings as those that talk about self and beings, while nīrārtha as those that talk of no self and emptiness. See also Ven. Analayo's entry on <https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/encyclopedia-entries/vohara.pdf> (on p 723-724 / PDF p 1-2) that states how the two truths doctrine are projected on the sole sūtra containing those terms retroactively.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 6th, 2021 at 5:49 AM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Aemilius said:

Nyanatiloka's Buddhist Dictionary has a longish entry about Paramārtha satya in the Pali texts. He says that conventional and ultimate truths are implied in many places by the Tathagata, when he says that he uses the ordinary language of common people, but he knows what the words really mean.

Astus wrote:

It can't be implied, only retrospectively interpreted so, since the very idea of two truths are not just later than the Buddha, but later than the Tipitaka, as https://www.budsas.org/ebud/bud-dict/dic3_p.htm in that very same entry: 'The two truths - ultimate and conventional - appear in that form only in the commentaries'.

Aemilius said:

Vasubandhu discusses the absolute truth (paramārtha-satya) and conventional truth (samvṛiti-satya) in AKB p. 910.. 911, and 1108. Vasubandhu mentions Paramārtha-shūnya sūtra that is included Samyukta Agama.

Astus wrote:

The AKB is a relatively late summary work. The 'Paramārtha-shūnya sūtra' says nothing about the two truths. See its English translation <https://suttacentral.net/sa335/en/choong>.

Aemilius said:

Two truths are mentioned in Saṃdhi-nirmocana sūtra, Lankavatara and other mahayana sūtras, which are regarded a teaching of Buddha by the Mahayana.

Astus wrote:

And the two truths doctrine is generally used in Mahayana, no doubt about it.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 6th, 2021 at 3:05 PM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, it is certainly found in the Kośabhaṣya.

Astus wrote:

Right, I meant Abhidharma as the 7 canonical texts.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 6th, 2021 at 4:51 PM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Aemilius said:

You misrepresent grossly the intention and meaning of Nyanatiloka

Astus wrote:

How so? He presents the current Theravada view there, and that's not been questioned. He also agrees that the teaching of the two truths is factually post-canonical.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 7th, 2021 at 8:10 PM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Aemilius said:

"The two truths—.... are implied in a sutta-distinction of 'explicit (or direct) meaning' (nītattha, q.v.) and 'implicit meaning (to be inferred)' (neyyattha)."

Astus wrote:

Not implied by the sutta (since to imply something one would need that thing to be known by the one who implies it) but interpreted as an implication by Buddhaghosa about a thousand years after the Buddha. It's like reading the <https://suttacentral.net/sn22.22/en/sujato> as if it were implying the existence of a pudgala.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 8th, 2021 at 4:12 AM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Aemilius said:

In this way the idea of a conventional language/expression/truth is quite clearly expressed and implied by the Buddha himself.

Astus wrote:

The terms sammuti, vohāra, paramattha, and sacca do appear in the suttas, but not in the combination to state a doctrine of two truths, nor one half of the two.

'Applied to the theme of vohāra, the early Buddhist attitude towards language need not be interpreted in the light of the theory of two truths. That is, truth would not depend on the type of language used to express it.'

(<https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/encyclopedia-entries/vohara.pdf>)

'The conception of two truths, the conventional and the ultimate were appearing on the scene during the period represented by the Middle and Late Upaniṣads as well as in Jainism and Ājīvika doctrines some of which were contemporary with the Buddha. In spite of the total absence of such a dichotomy in the early discourses, the interpreters of the early doctrine who relied heavily on the commentaries of Buddhaghosa have continued to attribute two truths to the Buddha himself.'

(The Buddha's Philosophy of Language by David J. Kalupahana, p 81-82)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 8th, 2021 at 6:09 AM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, it is found in Mahāyāna Sūtras. After all, the thread is called "The Two Truths in Mahāyāna Buddhism."

Astus wrote:

It is found in Mahayana Sutras

(<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=610404#p610404>), and the statement regarding its presence in the commentaries was about what <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=610356#p610356> as a development from the Buddha's teachings in the four schools. In other words, the Sarvastivadins and the Sautrantikas (and Theravada) did not have the idea of two truths from their sutras, nor from their (7 canonised) abhidharma texts, but it is found in commentaries and later treatises.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 8th, 2021 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Aemilius said:

The principle of two truths is present in the early sutras

Astus wrote:

Where? There's only one short sutta talking of neyyattha and nitattha, and the way they're interpreted by later authors is a retrospective projection of the two truths idea found nowhere in the suttas themselves. The mere presence of reference to conventional ways of talking is not equivalent of talking of two truths, nor is it called conventional truth.

'Considering what we have said so far regarding language and truth in early Buddhism, it would be possible to give a totally different explanation of the two terms nitattha and neyyattha without introducing two levels of truth. The past participle nita (from the root ni, nayati, 'to lead') means that to which one "has been led" and the term neyya (a potential participial form of the same verb) implies that to which one "ought to lead." When these two terms are prefixed to the term attha or meaning, we have a meaning that has been led to, that is, a meaning (temporarily) completed, and a meaning that ought to lead, that is, a meaning stretched into the future. This is not the least different from the distinction that we have noticed so far between 'the dependently arisen' and 'dependent arising' or 'the become' and 'becoming.' One is a conception of truth formulated on the basis of information available so far and the other is a conception of truth grounded on the information available and extended into the unknown future. As such, these two types of discourses have nothing to do with conventional and ultimate truths.'

(The Buddha's Philosophy of Language by David J. Kalupahana, p 82-83)

Aemilius said:

it acts as a basis for the development and arising of the Abhidharma

Astus wrote:

Not even the seven Abhidhamma texts talk of two truths. They also contain nothing on neyyattha and nitattha.

Aemilius said:

Abhidharma is regarded a higher Dharma or highest Dharma, because it is higher than the Dharma that uses only conventional expressions and conventional language.

Astus wrote:

Not in Theravada where the two truths are not seen as higher and lower, unlike in Sarvastivada.

Aemilius said:

Two truths appear in the sutta commentaries according to K. N. Jayatilleke, which makes it a lot earlier than the time of Buddhaghosa.

Astus wrote:

The basic commentary (atthakatha) to the Anguttara Nikaya is attributed to Buddhaghosa.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 8th, 2021 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm said:

This is not true. For example. Śamathadeva's commentary on the Kośa preserves in its entirety an agamic text called the don dam stong pa nyid kyi mdo. There is another text which provides a canonical source for the term kun rdzob.

Astus wrote:

That sutra was mentioned by Aemilius, and so I linked its English translation. See <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=610404#p610404>. On terminology <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=610610#p610610>.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 9th, 2021 at 1:35 AM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Matt J said:

Do you mean to say that things appear consistent with the way things are in the Suttas, and/or that language is non-deceiving?

Astus wrote:

No, simply that the doctrine of the two truths is not found in the agamas/nikayas but in post-canonical works.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 9th, 2021 at 1:40 AM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm said:

They most certainly did derive or have their idea of the two truths from their sūtras. Those passages prove it.

Astus wrote:

How so? Neither the idea of there being two truths, nor the definition of those truths are found there.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 9th, 2021 at 2:00 AM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Caoimhghín said:

The two truths in Abhidharma is there, but different, and necessarily a Śrāvaka presentation of them.

Astus wrote:

If by Abhidharma you mean the various treatises like the Sangaha and the Kosa, then yes. If you mean the basic canonical works like the Vibhanga and the Jnanaprasthana, then no.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 9th, 2021 at 5:41 AM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm said:

Arguing that the Sarvastivadins did not have a concept of two truths derived from sūtras, is, frankly just dumb.

Astus wrote:

The reason it practically cannot be derived from the sutras is that the definition of the two truths requires the ideas that come from the Abhidharma, that is, the distinction between truly existing dharmas and nominally existing worldly conventions. Such linguistic separation is not found in the sutras, rather speech is measured by veracity (difference between noble (ariyavohāra) and ignoble expressions (anariyavohāra): DN 33, AN 4.250-253, AN 8.67-68), and a liberated one would not misapprehend it by clinging (MN 74, MN 112, SN 1.25, SN 5.10).

Malcolm said:

the fact is that it is discussed by Vasubandhu, and earlier, etc.

Astus wrote:

It is discussed in fascicle 77 of the Mahavibhasa (T27n1545, p399b-400b; see its summary in Sarvastivada Abhidharma, p 65-67), and that might be the earliest example.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 9th, 2021 at 8:00 PM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm said:

The Buddha is very clear in a passage that appears in Śamathadeva's commentary [mngon, ju 47a (Toh. 4094)] that one is not to have attachment to the etymologies (nirukti) of the people (jānapada), one is not to hasten to mundane names. It is because they are false.

Prior to this, [mngon, ju 40b (Toh. 4094)], the Buddha is quoted as "Bhikṣus, the supreme (mchog) falsity is the phenomena that are false and deceptive. Bhikṣus, the supreme truths are like this, this is how they are. Therefore, the bhikṣus who posses that possess, the supreme blessings of truth." Moreover, there is a whole section later, where he discusses that which is empty as being false, deceptive, etc.

Astus wrote:

Are there any specific sutras named/known as the sources for those quotes?

Malcolm said:

So you really just have not looked well enough, because of a literal mindedness you have been infected with through reading too much text critical literature. To insist that the two truths are not in the agamas because the term "satyadvaya" does not explicitly occur is very myopic. But the two truths are there, you just have to know to see them. Maybe you should get your eyes checked again.

Astus wrote:

To identify two truths there have to be two ways of perception and expression specified, for instance to say that 'self' is conventional (as in the Vajirāsutta) but then also to say that expressions like aggregates and no-self are ultimately real. The second part is absent from the sutras. Compare that to the pairing of conditioned-unconditioned, that's fairly straightforward.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 9th, 2021 at 8:15 PM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Aemilius said:

The word "Abhidharma" means 'highest dharma'. Therefore the idea of a higher dharma, that is above the dharma of ordinary language, is present in the very conception of Abhidharma.

Astus wrote:

'we need to understand the significance of the commentarial statement that the Buddha sometimes teaches the Dhamma according to conventional truth, sometimes according to ultimate truth, and sometimes through a combination of both. As one Pāli commentary says, it is like a teacher choosing different dialects to teach his pupils who speak different dialects. There is absolutely no implication here that one dialect is either higher or lower than another.'

(Theravada Abhidhamma by Y. Karunadasa, introduction)

'This does not mean, as some are inclined to think, that the teachings in the Abhidhamma Piṭaka represent a higher set of doctrines. The distinction drawn should be understood in the same way as that between the two kinds of truth. Understood in that way, it does not in any way refer to two kinds of doctrines of which one kind is higher than the other. All that it does is to bring into focus two different ways of presenting the same set of doctrines. In the Sutta Piṭaka more use is made of conventional and transactional terms in ordinary parlance, whereas in the Abhidhamma Piṭaka more use is made of specific, technical terms that directly refer to the ultimate categories of empirical existence. It is a question pertaining to methodology and not a question pertaining to content.'

(Theravada Abhidhamma by Y. Karunadasa, ch 3)

Aemilius said:

There certainly were commentaries before Buddhaghosha, he didn't invent the genre.

Astus wrote:

It still leaves them to be post-canonical.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 9th, 2021 at 8:19 PM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm said:

Two truths are specified, seeing correctly and seeing falsely. That's enough.

Astus wrote:

However, that's not how the two truths are understood in Theravada. At least we'd need some identifiable agamas to say that conventional language is false.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 9th, 2021 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Define canon, and for whom it was canonical.

Astus wrote:

As they're Theravadin commentaries, it's their canon, in particular a set of discourses they took as buddhavacana.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 10th, 2021 at 12:19 AM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Matt J said:

It must be, otherwise you'd have absurd consequences, such as the Buddha teaching a self because he uses the word "atta."

Astus wrote:

If the mere fact of being a worldly expression rendered something false, then there could be no correct speech in the world and the Buddha would have been lying. But the Buddha did teach correct speech and also taught noble expressions (AN 8.68). Saying that the usage of personal pronouns is the way a sentence is normally formed is not saying it's false but rather not misapprehending, not grasping at it as if it signified something more than it does. How noble expressions are not misapprehended/grasped (aparāmasana/anupādā) is clarified in MN 74 and MN 112.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 10th, 2021 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm said:

Who cares what what Theravada thinks? Their tradition has no observable influence on this topic.

Astus wrote:

Assuming that Sarvastivadins worked from generally the same sutras, since their version of the two truths is somewhat different, if the origin of the two truths doctrine is the sutras, there should be some sutras not found in the Theravada canon to explain the discrepancy.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 10th, 2021 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Caoimhghín said:

I understand that it might be Karunadasa's view, but can you cite anywhere that he demonstrates this instead of just asserting it?

Astus wrote:

From the chapter on two truths:

'As F. Edgerton observes, in Buddhist hybrid Sanskrit literature, "a nītārtha text ... is recommended as a guide in preference to one that is neyārtha." As he further observes, "In Pāli neither is ipso facto preferred to the other; one errs only in interpreting one as if it were the other.'" source: Edgerton, Buddhist Hybrid Sanskrit Grammar and Dictionary, see nītārtha.

'Statements referring to convention-based things (saṅketa) are valid because they are based on common agreement; statements referring to ultimate categories (paramattha) are valid because they are based on the true nature of the real existents.'

source: AA. I, 54; KvuA. 34; DA. 251; SA. II, 77; SS. v. 3.

'As pointed out by K. N. Jayatilleke in his Early Buddhist Theory of Knowledge, one misconception about the Theravāda version of double truth is that paramattha-sacca is superior to sammuti-sacca and that "what is true in the one sense, is false in the other." This observation that the distinction in question is not based on a theory of degrees of truth will become clear from the following free translation of the relevant passages contained in three Pāli commentaries:

Herein references to living beings, gods, Brahma, and so on, are sammuti-kathā, whereas references to impermanence, suffering, egolessness, the aggregates of the empiric individuality, the bases and elements of sense perception and mind cognition, bases of mindfulness, right effort, and so on, are paramattha-kathā. One who is capable of understanding and penetrating to the truth and hoisting the flag of arahantship when the teaching is set out in terms of generally accepted conventions, to him the Buddha preaches the doctrine based on sammuti-kathā. One who is capable of understanding and penetrating to the truth and hoisting the flag of arahantship when the teaching is set out in terms of ultimate categories, to him the Buddha preaches the doctrine based on paramattha-kathā. To one who is capable of awakening to the truth through sammuti-kathā, the teaching is not presented on the basis of paramattha-kathā, and, conversely, to one who is capable of awakening to the truth through paramattha-kathā, the teaching is not presented on the basis of sammuti-kathā.

There is this simile: Just as a teacher of the three Vedas who is capable of explaining their meaning in different dialects might teach his pupils by adopting the particular dialect which each pupil understands, even so the Buddha preaches the doctrine adopting, according to the suitability of the occasion, either the sammuti- or the paramattha-kathā. It is by taking into consideration the ability of each individual to understand the four noble truths that the Buddha presents his teaching either by way of sammuti or by way of paramattha or by way of both (vomissakavasena). Whatever the method adopted, the purpose is the same: to show the way to immortality through the analysis of mental and physical phenomena.'

source1: Jayatilleke, Early Buddhist Theory of Knowledge, 364.

source2: AA. I, 54–55; DA. I, 251–52; SA. II, 77.

'What is more, as the commentary to the Aṅguttaranikāya states specifically, whether the Buddhas preach the doctrine according to sammuti or paramattha, they teach only what is true, only what accords with actuality, without involving themselves in what is not true (amusā'va).'

source: DA. I, 251; see also SA. II, 72.

'Convention requires the use of such terms, but as long as one does not imagine substantial entities corresponding to them, such statements are valid. On the other hand, as the commentators observe, if for the sake of conforming to the ultimate truth one would say, "The five aggregates eat" (khandhā bhuñjanti), "The five aggregates walk" (khandhā gacchanti), instead of saying, "A person eats," "A person walks," such a situation would result in what is called vohārabheda — that is, a breach of convention resulting in a breakdown in meaningful communication.'

source: SA. I, 51.

'Hence in presenting the teaching, the Buddha does not exceed linguistic conventions (na hi Bhagavā samaññaṃ atidhāvati) 287 but uses such terms as "person" without being led astray by their superficial implications (aparāmasaṃ voharati).288 Because the Buddha is able to employ such linguistic designations as "person" and "individual" without assuming corresponding substantial entities, he is called "skilled in expression" (vohāra-kusala).289 The use of such terms does not in any way involve falsehood (musāvādo na jāyati).290 As one commentary says: "Whether the buddhas speak according to conventional truth or whether the buddhas speak according to absolute truth, they speak only what is true and only what is actual."291 Skillfulness in the use of words is the ability to conform to conventions (sammuti), usages (vohāra), designations (paññatti), and turns of speech (nirutti) in common use in the world without being led astray by them.²⁹² Hence in understanding the teaching of the Buddha, one is advised not to adhere dogmatically to the mere superficial meanings of words (na vacanabhedamattam ālambitabbam).²⁹³

287 KvuA. 103.

288 VsmṬ. 346; KvuA. 103: Atthi puggalo ti vacana-mattato abhiniveso na kātabbo. Cf. AA. I, 54–55: Lokasammutiñ ca

Buddhā Bhagavanto nappajahanti, lokasamaññāya lokaniruttiyā lokābhilāpe ʔhitā yeva dhammaṃ desenti.

289 SA. I, 51.

290 Cf. MA. I, 125: Tasmā vohāra-kusalassa lokanāthassa satthuno, / sammutiṃ voharantassa musāvādo na jāyati.

291 DA. I, 251–52.

292 DA. I, 351.

293 Abhv. 88: Na ca daḥham mūlhagāhinā bhavitabbam.

In summary for the above references:

'The foregoing observations should show that according to the Theravāda version of double truth, one kind of truth is not held to be superior or inferior to the other. In this connection, one important question arises. If no preferential evaluation is made in respect to the two truths, what is the justification for calling one the absolute or ultimate truth and the other the conventional truth? Here what should not be overlooked is that if one truth is called absolute or ultimate it is because this particular kind of truth has for its vocabulary the technical terms used to express what is ultimate — that is, the dhammas into which the world of experience is ultimately resolved. Strictly speaking, the expression paramattha (absolute/ultimate) does not refer to the truth as such, but to the technical terms through which it is expressed. Thus paramattha-sacca really means the truth expressed by using the technical terms expressive of the ultimate factors of existence. In like manner, sammuti-sacca or conventional truth means the truth expressed by using conventional or transactional terms in common parlance.'

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 10th, 2021 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Caoimhghín said:

In the Mūlamadhyamakakārikā, that all empty compounded phenomena are known by designatory labels is identified with "the middle way," not with "the conventional."

Arguably, as when Bhikṣuṇī Vajrā scolds Māra, "a sentient being" is not a merely designatory label in the way that he uses it. It's not necessarily a convention that designatory labels are used. Sometimes it's a misapprehension that designatory labels are used, like when the rūpa of a rope is mistaken for the rūpa of a snake. Māra is using the convention of "a being" as more than a designatory label. Do you agree?

Astus wrote:

Not sure what to agree with there. The Agama/Nikaya sutras talk of worldly conventions (and there aren't that many sutras like that anyway) as normal manner of speaking, not as some special truth to be analysed or considered. Beyond that, conventional truth is merely conceptual (prajñapti).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 10th, 2021 at 4:54 AM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm said:

You are speculating. It's very clear the two truths are the Buddha's teaching, as Nagarjuna proclaims. If there was any disagreement at all, it would be evident in polemics against his assertion, but none can be found anywhere. All there there is pushback against his, and one presumes, his teachers formulation of ultimate truth, and none against his formulation of mundane convention, which also is found in sutra.

Astus wrote:

Why would anyone disagree when the doctrine of two truths is accepted by practically everyone? But it doesn't mean it's accepted because of what's in the sutras. Nagarjuna argues against ideas that are rather Abhidharma based, like the whole dharma-theory.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 10th, 2021 at 4:59 AM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm said:

As something to NOT follow.

Astus wrote:

Not follow?

'Of that which the wise in the world agree upon as not existing, I too say that it does not exist. And of that which the wise in the world agree upon as existing, I too say that it exists.' (SN 22.94, tr Bodhi)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 10th, 2021 at 5:04 AM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm said:

What Astus is looking for is the term "satyavidhaṃdvaya" in a sūtra in the same way we find "catursatya" in order to confirm the Buddha taught two truths. What I am pointing out is that term needn't be there for the intention to be there. And the intention is clearly there.

Astus wrote:

If taken very liberally it's possible to come to find some basis for the eventual development of the two truths, just as there is basis for the development for the Abhidharma, and practically the whole of Buddhism. But that's not the same as saying that the Buddha of the Agamas/Nikayas can be shown to have two distinct levels of truths in mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 10th, 2021 at 5:14 AM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Caoimhghín said:

Is Māra just using a worldly convention, or is his usage of "sentient being" different from the Buddha's usage of "sentient being?" That was what I was getting at.

Astus wrote:

It's usage according to convention. As for the Buddha's usage, that's not necessarily a fixed thing, although it can very much mean a 'fixed thing'. See SN 35.65-66 where Mara and a being are defined the same way, and compare SN 23.2 and SN 22.63 for another connection between Mara and a being.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 10th, 2021 at 6:26 AM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Caoimhghín said:

So do you not think it reasonable that Māra, when he suggested that "There is a being" or "There are beings" (有衆生), that he was taking the sattva as the ātma? Ven Vajrā responds to this by deconstructing the being into the five aggregates, where there is no being.

Astus wrote:

Mara asked about the origin and end of her, to that was the answer that there is nobody actually coming and going in line with e.g. SN 12.20 (SA 296). But at the same time the term 'being' is not useless or false, but rather it refers not to a constant entity.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 10th, 2021 at 9:15 PM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm said:

It must be accepted because of what's in the sūtras, hence the notion of "Sautrantikas," and so on. If the two truths had no basis in the agamic sūtras, for what reason then did the Sautrantikas accept it without question?

Astus wrote:

Sautrantikas accepted momentariness and had their karmic seed theory, but neither of them are found in the sutras.

Malcolm said:

If as you imply, Nāgārjuna was a species of Sautrantika, why would he accept and promote the two truths? After all, the term "two truths" does not occur in the PP in 8000 lines either, assuming this is one of the earliest and it was before Nāgārjuna. But it discusses dharmas as being mere conventions and names. It also mentioned pāramārtha five times only.

Astus wrote:

Nagarjuna lived after the creation of the Mahavibhasa, so the two truths doctrine was already an established one among the Sarvastivadins. As for his sources for the two truths teaching, he does not actually specify, does he?

Malcolm said:

Are you suggesting that the idea of two truths in Mahāyāna also comes from Abhidharma commentaries, which we have no evidence of?

Astus wrote:

The svabhava of dharmas is an Abhidharma theory of the Sarvastivadins, not a sutra teaching. What's the problem with saying what's written, that is, that the two truths doctrine is found only in treatises like the Mahavibhasa?

Malcolm said:

Its unclear which sūtras Nāgārjuna has before him, other than a PP sūtra and probably the Kāśyapaparivarta, but given that he and Lokāṣema were contemporaries, it is reasonable to assume at least he had these sūtras in front him.

Astus wrote:

Nagarjuna was familiar with various abhidharma works, as discussed in chapter 7 of Nagarjuna in Context.

Malcolm said:

Now if your position is that the two truths are not found in either seven-text Abhidharma collections, and only appears in commentaries substantially dated after Nāgārjuna, then you have to accept, by your own reasoning, that the "two truths" as a term occurs only in Mahāyāna, and that its presence in śrāvaka sources after Nāgārjuna are polemical response against emptiness as ultimate truth.

Astus wrote:

The Mahavibhasa precedes Nagarjuna. Beyond that, it would take some further research to identify early occurrences of the two truths doctrine.

Malcolm said:

If on the other hand one accepts that the notion of two truths is discernible in agamic sūtras, no such admission is required, and the two truths doctrine can be seen to develop along different lines in Abhidharma and Mahāyāna, since it is certainly the case that Nāgārjuna cites it as a basic fact which no one would question at all. And there is the possibility, quite distinct and equally remote, that a text like the Pitāputrasamāgamana was "converted" into a Mahāyāna text.

Astus wrote:

The idea that there are just two truths is not that fixed, as the Pudgalavadins had a threefold division (Pudgalavada Buddhism, p 105), Yogacara also has a threefold version, and the Mahāvibhāṣa notes the existence of twofold, threefold, and fivefold divisions according to different interpreters (Sarvastivada Abhidharma, p 77-78). So, if the two truths doctrine were such a clear case in the sutras, there would be no reason for differences.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 11th, 2021 at 5:57 AM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm said:

You are certain of this?

Astus wrote:

'There can be no doubt that the theory of momentariness cannot be traced back to the beginnings of Buddhism or even the Buddha himself. It does not fit the practically orientated teachings of early Buddhism and clearly bears the mark of later doctrinal elaboration. Thus in the Nikayas/Agamas there are many passages which attribute duration to material and even mental entities, whereas there is, at least to my knowledge, no passage which testifies to the stance that all conditioned entities are momentary.'

(The Buddhist Doctrine of Momentariness, p 15)

Malcolm said:

Again, this is uncertain. Walser claims that Ratnavali was written between 175-225. But it could easily have been written 50 years earlier. The Mahāvibhāṣa was supposedly compiled during the Reign of Kanishka (127-151 CE) in Bactria. This is 24 year period is a pretty narrow window to compose such a monumental text and then distribute it across India to Andhra Pradesh, to be received and studied by Nāgārjuna.

Astus wrote:

Can be uncertain, sure. However, the Mahāvibhāṣa is a compendium, and the information contained therein most likely predates it, so it still allows Sarvastivadin ideas of the two truths to be general knowledge in Nagarjuna's time. Also, it looks like when it comes to tracing the origins of the two truths so far, it's been the same Mahāvibhāṣa section brought up by Yinshun (An Investigation into Emptiness) and Buescher (Echoes from an Empty Sky).

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 11th, 2021 at 6:27 AM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

On the issue of two truths and Nagarjuna: <https://fh.pku.edu.cn/docs/2018-11/20181119234424438102.pdf>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 11th, 2021 at 4:08 PM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm said:

Again, uncertain. Face it Astus, you just don't have very strong evidence to be making the confident statements you've been making on this subject.

Astus wrote:

Let's put it this way then: there is no evidence so far of the existence of the two truths doctrine in the sutras or the main 7 abhidharma texts, only in somewhat later works like the Mahavibhasa. To maintain that nevertheless there is would need finding such references.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 12th, 2021 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: Any good Zen Mindfulness in everyday situations when you are not sitting meditating?

Content:

2ndchance said:

Any good Zen Mindfulness in everyday situations when you are not sitting meditating?

Astus wrote:

Zen mindfulness is principally no mindfulness (wunian 無念). If that is still too obscure then one can always watch a phrase (kanhua 看話), i.e. a word head (huatou 話頭). In case that proves to be difficult for the moment, it is best to be mindful of the Buddha (nianfo 念佛) as much as possible. That can lead to asking 'Who is mindful of the Buddha?' (nianfo shi shei 念佛是誰), and with that may come the realisation of no mind (wuxin 無心).

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 12th, 2021 at 5:12 AM

Title: Re: Two truths in Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm said:

Often in Vasubandhu and earlier Abhidharma texts references are made to doctrines belonging to sutras not found in one or another canon, like the bardo, for example, or in sutras that did not survive at all. The best you can say is that YOU personally don't see such evidence; others, such as myself, disagree. The difference, I suspect, is how much credibility one wants to lend buddhologists as being the final arbiters of Buddhism.

Astus wrote:

I see it more like a matter of either being able to provide a clear source or not, like with quotes around the internet attributed to the Buddha.

'Pārśva, one of the authors of the Sarvāstivāda School's Mahāvibhāṣā, replied to a criticism made by the Sautrāntikas (whose name means "those who rely on sūtra as final"). They said that certain abhidharma doctrines had no justification in the sūtras. To meet this criticism, Pārśva made the extraordinary claim that the reason these matters could not be found in the sūtras must be because they had been in sūtras that the Buddha had preached, but that had been subsequently lost.'
(Echoes from an Empty Sky, p 28)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 20th, 2021 at 3:29 PM

Title: Re: Are there English translations of extant Sarvastivadin and Dharmaguptaka texts?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are some translated abhidharma texts: Abhidharmakosa by Vasubandhu, Abhidharmavatara (Entrance Into the Supreme Doctrine) by Skandhila, Abhidharmahrdaya (The Essence of Scholasticism) by Dharmasri, Amrtarasa (La saveur de l'immortel / The Taste of the Deathless) by Ghosaka. Also the book Sarvastivada Abhidharma by K.L. Dhammajoti is highly recommended.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 30th, 2021 at 6:14 AM

Title: Re: Posture

Content:

yinyangkoi said:

How important is posture?

Astus wrote:

It is important to the extent it allows you the desired state of mind.

yinyangkoi said:

However I read that for dōgen zazen was all about assuming the correct posture and keeping it.

Astus wrote:

Have you read it about Dogen or from Dogen? Quite a difference.

yinyangkoi said:

So should I focus more on posture?

Astus wrote:

Since you are already in a sangha, why not seek advice from more experienced members and/or the teacher? Anyhow, if you keep to your meditation and you pay attention to your body, your mind, and how they interact, you should eventually feel how to do it.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 31st, 2021 at 4:35 AM

Title: Re: Where did the Buddha go after death? Where is the Buddha now? Where do Buddhas go after death?

Content:

Nalanda said:

How is it explained in our tradition?

Astus wrote:

'How can "It is eternal," "It is noneternal," and the rest of this tetralemma apply [to the Tathāgata], who is free of intrinsic nature?

And how can "It has an end," "It does not have an end," and the rest of this tetralemma apply [to the Tathāgata], who is free of intrinsic nature?

But one who has taken up a mass of beliefs, such as that the Tathāgata exists, so conceptualizing, that person will also imagine that [the Tathāgata] does not exist when extinguished.

And the thought does not hold, with reference to this (Tathāgata) who is intrinsically empty, that the Buddha either exists or does not exist after cessation.

Those who hypostatize the Buddha, who is beyond hypostatization and unwavering, they all, deceived by hypostatization, fail to see the Tathāgata.'

(MMK 22.12-15, tr Siderits; cf. <https://suttacentral.net/sn22.85/en/sujato> & <https://suttacentral.net/sn22.86/en/sujato>; <https://suttacentral.net/mn72/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 3rd, 2022 at 5:06 AM

Title: Re: Lidai fabao ji by Wuzhu

Content:

fckw said:

Does anyone know the text "Lidai Fabao Ji" and can provide a summary of its philosophical view?

Astus wrote:

"All beings are fundamentally pure and fundamentally complete. From the Buddhas at the upper end down to sentient beings, all are of the same pure nature. However, with a single thought [produced by] the deluded mind of beings, the Three Worlds are dyed. It is because beings have thought that one provisionally teaches no-thought, but if there is no presence of thought, then no-thought itself is not. No-thought is thus no-birth, no-thought is thus no-extinction. No-thought is thus no-love, no-thought is thus no-hate. No-thought is thus no-grasping, no-thought is thus no-abandoning. No-thought is thus no-high, no-thought is thus no-low. No-thought is thus no-male, no-thought is thus no-female. No-thought is thus no-true, no-thought is thus no-false. At the time of true no-thought, no-thought itself is not. 'When the mind is produced then the various dharmas are produced, when the mind is extinguished then the various dharmas are extinguished.' 'As one's mind is, so also are the stains of wrongdoing, so also are all dharmas.' At the time of true no-thought, 'all dharmas are the Buddha-Dharma,' there is not a single dharma separate from bodhi."

(Lidai Fabao Ji, section 21, in The Mystique of Transmission, p 364-365)

"If there is but one thing in your mind, you will not depart from the Three Worlds. 'The existence of dharmas is conventional truth, and no-nature is the cardinal meaning.' 'Transcending all characteristics is called the Buddhas.' No-thought is thus no-characteristics, presence of thought is thus empty delusion. No-thought departs the Three Worlds, thought remains in the Three Worlds. No-thought is thus no-true, no-thought is thus no-false. No-thought is thus no-self, no-thought is thus no-other. If you transcend both self and other you achieve Buddha-awakening.⁵⁴² At the time of true no-thought, no-thought itself is not."

(Lidai Fabao Ji, section 25, in The Mystique of Transmission, p 374)

"'The Most Honored Greatly Enlightened One expounded the Dharma of producing no-thought. [Regarding] the mind of no-thought and non-production, the mind is constantly producing and never extinguished.' At all times self-present, do not retreat and do not turn. Not sinking and not floating, not flowing and not fixed, not moving and not shaking, not coming and not going, lively like a fish jumping! 'Walking and sitting, everything is meditation.'"

(Lidai Fabao Ji, section 27, in The Mystique of Transmission, p 376)

"The [Vajracchedikā] sūtra says, 'Transcendence of all characteristics is precisely called the Buddha.' 'Someone who sees 'I' through form and seeks 'I' through sounds is taking a false path, and is unable to see the Tathāgata.' The words of this scripture are none other than this mind. Seeing the nature is the Way of becoming a Buddha. No-thought is thus seeing the nature, no-thought is no-defilements. Nothought is thus no-self, no-thought is thus no-other. No-thought is thus no-Buddha, no-thought is no-beings. At the time of true no-thought, no-thought itself is not."

(Lidai Fabao Ji, section 41, in The Mystique of Transmission, p 400)

fckw said:

Did Wuzhu's thoughts and views ever have show any substantial influence over other forms of Chan and Buddhist practice?

Astus wrote:

'The Lidai fabao ji modified received genres or introduced new stylistic features in ways that would shape the standard genres of Song Chan literature—chuandeng lu, yulu, and zhenzan. Furthermore, the Lidai fabao ji version of the Indian line of patriarchs was the source for the version that became official. Many anecdotes that have their origins in the Lidai fabao ji found their way into the official annals of Chan, yet the Lidai fabao ji itself was repudiated and all but forgotten.'

(The Mytique of Transmission, p 293)

'Bao Tang antinomianism was lost in the mainstream of Chan. Repudiated, it nevertheless imparted a subtle pervasive flavor, and perhaps a warning about the necessary limits of the ultimate teaching. Wuzhu and his robe would seem to be not-recollected, only to reappear in surprising guises.'

(The Mytique of Transmission, p 296)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 4th, 2022 at 5:01 AM

Title: Re: Lidai fabao ji by Wuzhu

Content:

fckw said:

How does he mean "no-thought" in this context? I guess not simply absence of thoughts, right?

Astus wrote:

That might be up for debate. Zongmi criticised Wuzhu for teaching pure extinguishing of thought, but his opinion could have been a misrepresentation. Although no-thought was the central teaching of Wuzhu, it's other things (i.e. disregard of many common Buddhist customs) the Baotang school was viewed as controversial. Wuzhu might have also just meant no-thought in the same sense as Shenhui and thus no different from Zongmi. The below passages suggest to me that it's the latter case.

The Venerable replied, "This seeing, hearing, perceiving, and knowing [that you are getting at] is worldly seeing, hearing, perceiving, and knowing. The Vimalakīrti-sūtra says, 'If you go about seeing, hearing, perceiving, and knowing, then this is seeing, hearing, perceiving, and knowing. The Dharma transcends seeing, hearing, perceiving, and knowing.' No-thought is thus no-seeing, no-thought is thus no-knowing. It is because beings have thought that one provisionally teaches no-thought, but at the time of true no-thought, no-thought itself is not." He went on to quote the Vajrasamādhi-sūtra, " 'The Most Honored Greatly Enlightened One expounded the Dharma of producing no-thought. [Regarding] the mind of no-thought and non-production, the mind is constantly producing and never extinguished.' Further, the Vimalakīrti-sūtra says, 'Not-practicing is bodhi, because it is without recollection.' 'Always seek no-thought, the wisdom characterized by actuality.' The Lankā-sūtra says, 'The Holy One's inner reference point is to constantly abide in no-thought.' The Śūraṅgama-sūtra says, 'Ānanda, if you initiate the mind [even] for a short time, the suffering due to defilements will have [already] arisen first.’ Further, it says, ‘So long as sight is separate from seeing, then seeing cannot be attained.’ The Viśeṣacinta-sūtra says, ‘How is it that all dharmas are true, and how is it that all dharmas are wrong? If one makes distinctions with the mind, then all dharmas are wrong. If one does not make distinctions with the mind, all dharmas are true. In the midst of no-mind dharmas, once one gives rise to distinctions of mind everything is wrong.’ The Lankā-sūtra says, ‘Seeing the Buddha and hearing the Dharma is your own mind making distinctions. One for whom ‘seeing’ does not arise—this is called seeing the Buddha.’ ”

(Lidai Fabao Ji, section 20, in The Mystique of Transmission, p 361-362)

The Venerable said, “Tell me about your own stage of practice.” Master Zhiyi revealed the teachings of his original master and said, “Viewing purity.”

The Venerable then expounded the Dharma for him: “The Dharma has neither stain nor purity, how does one ‘view purity’? Right here purity was never established, why would there be stains? Viewing purity is in fact stains, viewing stains is in fact purity. Delusive thinking is stains, no-delusive thinking is purity. Grasping ‘I’ is stain, not grasping ‘I’ is purity. No-thought is thus no-stain, no-thought is thus no-purity. [No-thought is thus no-true,] no-thought is thus no-false. No-thought is thus no-self, no-thought is thus no-other. If you transcend both self and other you achieve Buddha-awakening. At the time of true self, self itself is not.”

(Lidai Fabao Ji, section 26, in The Mystique of Transmission, p 374-375)

The Venerable said, “ ‘The existence of dharmas is conventional truth, and no-nature is the cardinal meaning.’ Verbal explication is thus attachment, and mental brilliance is a demonic device. No-thought is thus no-attachment, no-thought is thus no-bondage. No-thought is nirvāṇa, thinking is birth and death; no-thought is mental brilliance, thinking is dullness. No-thought is thus no ‘that,’ no-thought is thus no ‘this.’ No-thought is thus no Buddha, no-thought is no beings. In the great compassionate wisdom of prajñā, there are no Buddhas and no beings. ‘There is neither nirvāṇa-Buddha nor Buddha-nirvāṇa.’ Those who understand this explication are the true explicators. If you do not explicate like this, then you are just a common fellow attached to characteristics.”

(Lidai Fabao Ji, section 28, in The Mystique of Transmission, p 377)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 5th, 2022 at 4:03 AM

Title: Re: Nichiren Shonin's teachings

Content:

Minobu said:

If one understand the Gohonzon one sees that every aspect of Buddhism is right there , in front of you and inside you. It's the make up of the Buddhist world in Samsara. Total and complete.

Astus wrote:

Are there some treatises explaining how specific practices (śamatha-vipaśyanā, ānāpānasmṛti, smṛtyupasthāna, dānapāramitā etc.) are incorporated in the Gohonzon and/or the Odaimoku?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 5th, 2022 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: Nichiren Shonin's teachings

Content:

illaraza said:

Singlemindedness, awareness of the breath, calmness and tranquility, insight, and danaparamita are incorporated into the Gohonzon because Gohonzon is the Eternal Buddha at the Ceremony in the Air. The Lotus Sutra Chapter 17, Distinction of Benefits, teaches that one moment of joyful faith signifies having performed all the meditations and other paramitas (save for the paramita of wisdom) for quintillions of lifetimes or one would be unable to encounter the Gohonzon and Namu Myoho renge kyo.

Astus wrote:

That section (BDK ed, p 237) talks of the mundane merit collected by various methods does not equal accepting the great length of the Buddha's lifespan, which seems logical to me, since without prajnaparamita all meritorious actions are worldly and limited. Later (p 241) the same chapter says that preserving the sutra and practising all six paramitas is the highest form of merit. I wonder if the presence/fulfilment of all six paramitas in the Odaimoku is addressed by Nichiren or later teachers?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 6th, 2022 at 12:00 AM

Title: Re: True Mind is No Mind

Content:

LastLegend said:

You meant to use Nagarjuna to end grasping, why leaves one statement to grasp to? Lankavatara Sutra (affiliated with Bodhidharma too) says everything lacks self-existence is non-arising? So how do you understand that?

Astus wrote:

Your quote from the Lankavatara Sutra (2.27) answered the question: 'What lacks self-existence is momentary and in continuous flux and manifests different states of existence but without possessing any existence of its own.' Or in Suzuki's translation: 'That all things are devoid of self-nature means that there is a constant and uninterrupted becoming, a momentary change from one state of existence to another; seeing this, Mahamati, all things are destitute of self-nature.'

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 6th, 2022 at 4:39 AM

Title: Re: Nichiren Shonin's teachings

Content:

Queequeg said:

He speaks of the benefits of all teachings and practices being included in the Lotus Sutra, and more specifically, in the title, which embodies the entire text.

...

The four "transcendent" powers of the tathagata in this passage is considered by Zhiyi to be the most important in the whole text. Nichiren bases his teachings on the benefits of the Daimoku on this passage.

Astus wrote:

By the four powers are you referring to this sentence?

'To sum up, in this sutra I have clearly revealed and taught all the teachings of the Tathāgata, all the transcendent powers of the Tathāgata, all the treasure houses of the hidden essence of the Tathāgata, and all the profound aspects of the Tathāgata.'

Does perhaps Zhiyi explain in detail how the specific teachings, powers, treasure houses, and aspects can be found in the Lotus Sutra?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 6th, 2022 at 6:16 AM

Title: Re: Nichiren Shonin's teachings

Content:

Queequeg said:

I am sure that at least some comments on this can be found in Miao-fa Wenju, Words and Phrases of the Lotus Sutra, his commentary on the text. I've never tried to read the Chinese, only bits and pieces that were translated into English; I think someone is working on a translation of this text, as well as a complete translation of the Xuan-i.

Astus wrote:

Thank you for the information. Maybe something will turn up eventually.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 7th, 2022 at 4:48 PM

Title: Re: True Mind is No Mind

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

Great collection of quotes, Astus - thanks - but I particularly liked the bit I have bolded, since it seems to make explicit a connection between Taoism and Chan/Zen which I have always felt must exist, but haven't seen in print anywhere.

Astus wrote:

The term used there is rudao 入道, literally 'enter the path', and usually it is an expression for becoming a monk, as a short version of chujia rudao 出家入道, i.e. 'to leave home and enter the path'. But in the next paragraph it is explained what was actually meant.

In The Gates of Chan: "Facing a wall", means to connect with the Tao, it is only the starting point.

In 入禪之門: 那叫入道, 仅仅是个起点而已。 - It's called entering the path, it's just the beginning and nothing more.

In this context it should also be noted that the title of Bodhidharma's treatise contains the same term (rudao 入道) with the meaning of entering the path of Mahayana, and the text begins with (in Guo Gu's translation from The Essence of Chan) 'There are many ways to enter the Path. In summary, there are two'.

So, there's no reason to assume any connection here with Taoism.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 7th, 2022 at 7:20 PM

Title: Re: Nichiren Shonin's teachings

Content:

illaraza said:

My question is why would you find it necessary for "Zhiyi (to) explain in detail how the specific teachings, powers, treasure houses, and aspects can be found in the Lotus Sutra?" when the Lotus Sutra itself has already delineated that it has?

Astus wrote:

Because while there is a statement that it contains all the teachings, since the sutra does not literally contain them - otherwise instead of 7 volumes it should be many hundreds of volumes bigger - it should be explained how and in what way could it still encompass all the teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 8th, 2022 at 4:50 PM

Title: Re: Nichiren Shonin's teachings

Content:

Minobu said:

Obviously because The Sutra IN and of Itself is Buddha .

Astus wrote:

In what sense? The sutra, like other sutras, was taught by Shakyamuni Buddha, and before him by other buddhas, so in a way it's a representation of buddhas. But how is it itself a buddha?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 9th, 2022 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: Nichiren Shonin's teachings

Content:

Minobu said:

So I believe if you view this Sutra which appeared in our history as being authentic and directly from the Buddha, then it is Buddha . Even though more than likely by proxy.

Astus wrote:

Almost all the sutras were taught by the Buddha, and for that all could be called a buddha, but only in the sense of representing his words. Otherwise, it'd be somewhat confusing to say that the Buddha taught the Buddha. And to return to the original question of how the Lotus Sutra contains all the teachings, if that's because it was taught by the Buddha, then all the others also contain all the teachings. But it still does not explain how would one video include many other videos simply because they were made by the same person.

Minobu said:

Hence a living Buddha , in the form of Sutra, emerged in this way . It's the nature of this Eternal Buddha.

Astus wrote:

That seems quite metaphorical.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 9th, 2022 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: Nichiren Shonin's teachings

Content:

illaraza said:

Examples are: Four Noble Truths and Twelve Linked Chain of Causation in Chapter 7, Parable of the Phantom City; non-substantiality or the Law of Emptiness found in the Specific Teachings, such as the Wisdom Sutras, is found in almost every chapter of the Lotus Sutra; likewise the Buddha's powers are illucidated in almost every chapter of the Lotus Sutra;

Astus wrote:

One common summary of the teachings is the 'thirty-seven helpful ways to attain the Dharma' (LS ch 27, BDK ed, p 307), but although it's mentioned once like that, its contents are not provided. There are also common Mahayana doctrines too, like the two truths, 10 bhumis, and alayavijnana that are not mentioned.

illaraza said:

by treasure houses and aspects, I assume you mean the Three Jewels which, of course, are also illucidated throughout the Lotus Sutra.

Astus wrote:

I was simply referring to the four things mentioned in ch 21 (BDK ed p 272): 'To sum up, in this sutra I have clearly revealed and taught all the teachings of the Tathāgata, all the transcendent powers of the Tathāgata, all the treasure houses of the hidden essence of the Tathāgata, and all the profound aspects of the Tathāgata.'

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 10th, 2022 at 4:07 AM

Title: Re: Books/papers on the spread of Vajrayana from India to Far East

Content:

Astus wrote:

Lehnert, Martin: Tantric Threads between India and China. In: Heirman, Ann; Bumbacher, Stephan Peter (eds.) : The Spread of Buddhism. Leiden: Brill. pp. 247-276

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 10th, 2022 at 5:09 PM

Title: Re: Nichiren Shonin's teachings

Content:

Minobu said:

When one chants Om Mani Padme Hum they are generating certain qualities.

Same with Buddha Manjushri mantra , or Vajrayogini mantra.

We chant the title of the Lotus sutra in much the same way. It's a Buddha.

Astus wrote:

Different buddhas highlight different qualities of buddhahood. What are the emphasised qualities of the Lotus Sutra?

Minobu said:

Historically what other Sutra is ever presented and practiced in The Way The Lotus Sutra has.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean the same way it is used by the followers of Nichiren? Probably none, as it is only Nichiren's tradition where the focus is on a single scripture that has survived until now.

Minobu said:

It enabled the common folk to meld with Buddha. Fantastic !

Astus wrote:

I don't have exact numbers, but apparently the Pure Land teachings had and still have a much larger impact than Nichiren's teachings. But that doesn't mean it isn't fantastic.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 10th, 2022 at 5:13 PM

Title: Re: Nichiren Shonin's teachings

Content:

Queequeg said:

Have you read the lotus? It's more or less the story explaining this.

Astus wrote:

I have, but I don't think I see your point here. How is it explaining it?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 10th, 2022 at 7:00 PM

Title: Re: Is there a 'true self'?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Although there are teachings about 'true self' and other self-like expressions, if one knows that whatever quality or meaning one may come up for anything that can be called a self falls within the categories of the five aggregates that are impermanent and empty, then it can be understood in the right context.

'It's the self that is connected with the universe. It's "the four seasons come around" and "in spring, flowers. In summer, cuckoos. And in fall, maple leaves." This self is not the I that is jealous of others' happiness and glad at their sadness, thinking, "Thankfully that didn't happen to me." Rather, our true self rejoices over others' happiness from the bottom of our hearts and truly shares their sorrows.'

(Kosho Uchiyama, in Homeless Kodo, ch 65)

'Our zazen practice is essentially a matter of awakening to the true Self. This true Self cannot be perceived. It is vast and without limit. To awaken to this true Self is also expressed as awakening to "No-Self," or "No-Mind," or "Emptiness," or "to forget the ego-self."

All things, including people, are never fixed in the same condition from moment to moment. In the midst of this constant change, there is no central thing, nothing we can perceive as the ego-self. The teaching of Buddhism is the matter of awakening to the fact that originally there is no self. "No-Self" means to awaken to a self that is so vast and limitless that it cannot be seen. Something that can be seen has a limit - it is small.'

(Sekkei Harada, in The Essence of Zen, p 80)

'The essential teaching of Mahayana is, as the Heart Sutra says, "The five aggregates are empty." This means that I and its objects are productions of the five aggregates: form (in our case, body), sensation, perception, formation, and consciousness (that is, the functions of our mind). Therefore I does not exist independently. Not only I but also objects (things) are empty, meaning without fixed identity.

Because of negative-sounding expressions such as emptiness, Buddhism is sometimes considered a pessimistic or nihilistic religion. But this is only a partial understanding. Emptiness, or the lack of fixed entities existing independently of others, means we're connected with everything in the universe. This interconnectedness is called true self, so in fact no self and true self are the same.'

(Shohaku Okumura, in Homeless Kodo, ch 61)

'It's a mistake for a common person to try to become a buddha. If an ordinary person tries to become a buddha by means of practice, trying to awaken to the true self, then a great mistake arises. What I want to say is that an ordinary person should truly be an ordinary person, completely giving up seeking mind and practice, and then just to be truly ordinary. That is enough. That is why we say, 'Don't be fooled by others.' If you are too impressed and inspired by the great teachings of Buddha or in worshipping wonderful images of Buddha, you will lose your self. And that is no good. To be really ordinary is to be a buddha. That is 'the awakened self'. This is the teaching of Zen.' (Sekkei Harada, from <https://buddhismnow.com/2013/05/21/the-awakened-self-harada-sekkei-roshi/>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 10th, 2022 at 8:37 PM

Title: Re: Nichiren Shonin's teachings

Content:

Queequeg said:

The Lotus is an overview teaching, not minutiae.

Astus wrote:

That I can see. When it comes to the topics of upaya and ekayana the Lotus Sutra is a good source.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 10th, 2022 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: Is there a 'true self'?

Content:

KeithA said:

even injecting the word "self" into the mix is a hindrance.

Astus wrote:

Agreed, it makes things unnecessarily confusing. From The Illustrated Encyclopedia of Zen Buddhism:

'According to the Buddhist understanding of Anatman, the true self can be understood as the ever-changing configuration of five elements, known as the five skandhas. Rather than possessing an eternal and unchanging soul, the individual is actually an on-going process of transformation.'

(p 7)

'The five skandhas are characterized by impermanence and suffering. Although there is no permanent self or soul that exists outside or beyond the ongoing physical and mental processes referred to as the five skandhas, human beings create the notion of such a self. The fundamental attachment to a false sense of self is the basic cause of suffering. The true self is nothing other than a convenient label for the process of changing configurations.'

(p 94)

Another problematic sounding one is self-nature (zixing/jisho 自性). From the Historical Dictionary of Chan Buddhism:

'A Chan soteriological term referring to a person's Buddha-nature. It does not denote any self-existence or any changeless essence existent in and by itself. No such metaphysical meaning is involved in the original use of this term. A notable case of the traditional Chan usage of this term is in the Platform Sutra, where Buddha-nature is equivalent to self-nature (zixing) in the sense that Buddha-nature cannot be objectified and realized outside each person. Seeing or realizing the Buddha-nature is the existential transformation of the human mind and entire personhood, being able to understand and appreciate what constitutes a person — elements of impermanence and non-abiding — and then accordingly. The realization of self-nature thus requires the accomplishment of action, the practical-behavioral carrying out of non-attachment, rather than identifying a metaphysical object or discovering subjectivity through knowledge. The usage also indicates the Chan appropriation of positive or kataphatic language in its teachings without abandoning the use of negative or apophatic language: the Chan walk on two roads.'

(p 201)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 10th, 2022 at 11:44 PM

Title: Re: True Mind is No Mind

Content:

SilenceMonkey said:

How knowledgeable were the Chan patriarchs of Indian Buddhism?

Astus wrote:

If by Indian Buddhism you mean scriptures from India available in Chinese, then normally quite knowledgeable.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 12th, 2022 at 4:36 AM

Title: Re: How does general Mahayana see Vajrayana claims of being X?

Content:

Nalanda said:

I would like to hear the perception of general Mahayana (historically and in the present) to Vajrayana's view of itself as X...

Astus wrote:

The idea of 'general Mahayana' is an abstract one, just as the idea of 'general Hinayana', or even 'general Vajrayana'. Dogen had this to say on the matter:

'Remember, among Buddhists we do not argue about superiority and inferiority of philosophies, or choose between shallowness and profundity in the Dharma; we need only know whether the practice is genuine or artificial. Some have entered into the stream of the Buddha's truth at the invitation of grass, flowers, mountains, and rivers. Some have received and maintained the stamp of Buddha by grasping soil, stones, sand, and pebbles. Furthermore, the vast and great word is even more abundant than the myriad phenomena. And the turning of the great Dharma wheel is contained in every molecule. This being so, the words "Mind here and now is buddha" are only the moon in water, and the idea "Just to sit is to become buddha" is also a reflection in a mirror. We should not be caught by the skillfulness of the words.

...

Disciples of the Buddha should just learn the Buddha-Dharma. Furthermore, we should remember that from the beginning we have never lacked the supreme state of bodhi, and we will receive it and use it forever. At the same time, because we cannot perceive it directly, we are prone to beget random intellectual ideas, and because we chase after these as if they were real things, we vainly pass by the great state of truth. From these intellectual ideas emerge all sorts of flowers in space: we think about the twelvefold cycle and the twenty-five spheres of existence; and ideas of the three vehicles and the five vehicles or of having buddha[-nature] and not having buddha[-nature] are endless. We should not think that the learning of these intellectual ideas is the right path of Buddhist practice.'

(Bendowa, in SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 1, p 9-10)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 12th, 2022 at 6:34 AM

Title: Re: How does general Mahayana see Vajrayana claims of being X?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Clearly, Dogen never encountered any Tibetan Buddhists during his sojourn in China. I think the "no true Scotsman" fallacy might apply to this statement.

Astus wrote:

Surely he was aware of the various classifications of the teachings that are found in any Mahayana school, so his response was quite intentionally like that.

'Further, Mahamati, if a man becomes attached to the [literal] meaning or words and holds fast to their agreement in regard to the original state of Nirvana which is unborn and undying, the Triple vehicle, the one vehicle, the five [Dharmas], mentation, the [three] Svabhavas, etc., he will come to cherish views either affirmative or negative. As varieties of objects are seen in Maya and are discriminated [as real], statements are erroneously made, discriminations erroneously go on.'

(Lankavatara Sutra 3.65, tr D.T. Suzuki)

As for a modern take on the matter, here's what Yinshun wrote:

'All the Buddhist scriptures from India transmitted in each period, whether from Early Buddhism, Early and Late Mahayana Buddhism, or from Esoteric Mahayana Buddhism, declare themselves to be the most profound, complete and the ultimate teaching. For example, the Saddharma-puṇḍarīka Sūtra (Lotus Sūtra) proclaims itself to be the king of all sutras; likewise the Suvarṇa-prabhāsa Sūtra (Golden Radiance Sūtra) makes the same claim. Some Esoteric Mahayana scriptures are titled the Great Tantra King, the Great Ritual King (translated in Chinese as the Great Doctrine King). Some scriptures use the metaphor of the five grades of cow milk products, lauding their doctrines with a comparison to the ghee being the best. The Mahā-parinirvāṇa Sūtra compares itself to the ghee, and in the Mahayana Doctrinal Objectives of Six Paramitas Sūtra, the Dhāraṇī Piṭaka is compared to the ghee. To sum up, the scriptures from each period proclaim themselves to be the most profound, the most perfect. But which of the scriptures is indeed the most profound? That depends on the differences in understanding of each believer.'

(Human-Centered Buddhism, p 13-14)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 12th, 2022 at 9:15 PM

Title: Re: How does general Mahayana see Vajrayana claims of being X?

Content:

Nalanda said:

Does Zen have Rinzai 1, Rinzai 2 Rinzai 3, etc.

Astus wrote:

The Lankavatara Sutra (2.37 / T16n671p533a2 / T16n672p602a10) talks of four types of dhyāna (sìzhōng chán 四種禪). Then there are various divisions and schemes that were taught, like the five grades by Zongmi that's based on the view that 'those training in the three vehicles [of the hearer, private buddha, and bodhisattva] who wish to seek the path of the noble ones must practice dhyana. Apart from dhyana there is no gate, in the absence of dhyana no road.' (Zongmi on Chan, p 103 / T48n2015p399b9-10). Both of these two sources refer to dhyana/chan in a general sense, and then the tradition of Bodhidharma is naturally identified with the highest form of dhyana. When it comes to the internal categorisation of various branches of Zen (chánzōng 禪宗) itself, there can be many categories, like wild fox Chan (yěhú chán 野狐禪), literary Chan (wénzì chán 文字禪), Tathagata Chan (rúlái chán 如來禪), and patriarchal/ancestral Chan (zùshī chán 祖師禪).

One simple way the Chan school distinguished itself from other Buddhists was the distinction between doctrine (jiào 教) and chan (禪), that is, others who relied on scriptures and the separate transmission outside scriptures (jiàowài biéchuan 教外別傳). But then of course there were some debates and controversies about what it actually means to be separate from scriptures. Here's one modern take on the question:

'Among the eight Mahāyāna schools in China, the approach of the Consciousness-only school resembles science, and that of the Three Treatise school resembles philosophy. The Huayan and Tiantai schools' approaches resemble literature, and the approaches of the Mantra [Esoteric] and Pure Land schools resemble aesthetics. The Chan school embodies the core teaching of Buddhism. Master Taixu once said, “The defining characteristic of Chinese Buddhism lies in [its emphasis on] chan [meditation].” The essence of any of the other schools can be reduced to the spirit of Chan.’

(Orthodox Chinese Buddhism by Ven. Sheng-yen, p 128)

And here's a classical one:

Someone asked, “What is that which is transmitted separately from the teachings of the three vehicles?”

The Master said, “If you don’t ask me I won’t answer. But if you do, I go to India in the morning and return to China in the evening!”

The questioner said, “Please, Master, point it out to me!”

The Master replied, “Hopeless case!”

(Record of Yunmen, section 112, tr Urs App)

And to explain that:

‘Followers of the Way, don’t seek within words, for when the mind is stirred you become wearied, and there’s no benefit in gulping icy air. It’s better, by the single thought that causal relations are [fundamentally] birthless, to surpass the bodhisattvas who depend upon the provisional teaching of the Three Vehicles.’

(Record of Linji, p 32, tr Sasaki)

To combine all sides:

‘To use no words to reach the wordless is Seon; to use words to reach the wordless is Doctrine. So then the mind is the Seon dharma (method) and language is the Doctrine dharma. Although the Dharma is of only one taste, the views and interpretations are as far apart as heaven and earth.’

(Seonga Gwigam by Hyujeong, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 3, p 59)

Further elaborated:

‘But when the buddhas preach the sutras they first discriminate the dharmas and then preach the ultimate emptiness, whereas when the patriarchal teachers indicate via sentences, if they eliminate the traces from the ground of thought, they reveal the principle in the source of the mind.’

(Seonga Gwigam by Hyujeong, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 3, p 67)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 14th, 2022 at 4:29 AM

Title: Re: Can you conceive of a scenario where it turns out Nagarjuna was wrong (ex: not all things are empty, or otherwise)?

Content:

Dgj said:

Can you conceive of, or agree that someone else could conceive of a hypothetical scenario where dependent origination, emptiness, etc. are entirely false and disproven?

Astus wrote:

It is false for every ordinary being who assume a self.

Dgj said:

Or, do you feel that Nagarjuna's teaching, and the teaching in general that everything is empty, impermanent, etc. is irrefutable, and incontrovertibly true?

Astus wrote:

It is not grasped as true by noble beings.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 18th, 2022 at 4:56 PM

Title: Re: So Many Mahayana Sutras - Do They All Agree - Why So Many?

Content:

Nalanda said:

I learned that there are over 6,000 Mahaya Sutras. Can this be boiled down to 100, 50, 25, 10, 5, 1. For the purpose of managing / prioritizing what to study? I'm guessing Prajnaparamita at the top. But what would be the top 5 or 10 to study in sequence ideally?

Astus wrote:

If it's one sutra, make it the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sutra_of_Perfect_Enlightenment, it's a nice summary. For two, you can add the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Vajrasamadhi-sutra>. To make it five, add the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Heart_Sutra, the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Diamond_Sutra, and the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Vimalakirti_Sutra Sutra.

Also, it's good to keep in mind the following case:

Zhaozhou asked a monk, "How many sutras do you read in one day?"

The monk said, "Sometimes seven or eight. Sometimes ten."

Zhaozhou said, "Oh, then you can't read scriptures."

The monk said, "Master, how many do you read in a day?"

Zhaozhou said, "In one day I read one word."

(Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 159)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 18th, 2022 at 6:54 PM

Title: Re: So Many Mahayana Sutras - Do They All Agree - Why So Many?

Content:

Nalanda said:

These are Chinese and Korean sutras? 6th and 8th century CE?

Astus wrote:

According to scholars, yes, quite clearly they are. Otherwise, no.

Nalanda said:

Do these have Indian origin?

Astus wrote:

If you mean whether there is a known Sanskrit version, then no. There are many sutras like that.

Nalanda said:

Which translation is best?

Astus wrote:

Pick whichever you like, especially at first reading it's all OK. If you want to get deeper, there are commentaries in English.

http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/sutra_of_perfect_enlightenment.html

<https://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra49.html>

<http://www.buddhism.org/Sutras/2/Sutras31.htm>

The Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment translated by Peter N. Gregory in https://www.bdk.or.jp/document/dgtl-dl/dBET_ApocryphalScriptures_2005.pdf, p 43ff.

<https://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra53a.html>

<http://www.buddhism.org/Sutras/2/Sutras9.htm> (mostly Buswell's translation)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 19th, 2022 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: So Many Mahayana Sutras - Do They All Agree - Why So Many?

Content:

Nalanda said:

Are these two Sutras universally accepted valid within Mahayana?

Astus wrote:

The Vajrasamadhi Sutra also exists in Tibetan and is quoted sometimes, like in Gampopa's Jewel Ornament of Liberation. As for the Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment, I don't know.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 19th, 2022 at 6:29 AM

Title: Re: So Many Mahayana Sutras - Do They All Agree - Why So Many?

Content:

Nalanda said:

Oh ok then. I just like his take on Early Buddhist Schools. That's all

Malcolm said:

There is no reason to criticize early Buddhist schools.

Astus wrote:

'There will be twenty schools that will keep the Dharma in existence for my future disciples. Members of all those twenty schools will attain the four realizations, and their tripitakas will be equal, without being inferior, intermediate, or superior. It is like the water of the ocean that is undifferentiated in taste. It is as if a man had twenty sons. This is truly what the Tathāgata has preached! Mañjuśrī, the two original schools derive from the Mahayana and from the perfection of wisdom. Mañjuśrī, just as earth, water, fire, wind, and space are that upon which all sentient beings reside, so is the perfection of wisdom. The Mahayana is the place from which all the śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas, and buddhas derive.'

(The Sutra of Mañjuśrī's Questions, ch 15, BDK ed, p 97)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 21st, 2022 at 8:41 PM

Title: Re: Every school/tradition's most effective method/practice to reach enlightenment...

Content:

Nalanda said:

I wonder what others really has as their tradition's most effective tool to gain enlightenment...

Astus wrote:

It's everywhere the same triple training: morality, meditation, wisdom. The apparent differences are merely a matter of style and branding.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 23rd, 2022 at 5:34 AM

Title: Re: Did Buddha really teach the Middle Way?

Content:

Realmwalker said:

Did Buddha really teach the Middle Way?

Astus wrote:

It was among the first things he taught.

'Mendicants, these two extremes should not be cultivated by one who has gone forth. What two? Indulgence in sensual pleasures, which is low, crude, ordinary, ignoble, and pointless. And indulgence in self-mortification, which is painful, ignoble, and pointless. Avoiding these two extremes, the Realized One woke up by understanding the middle way of practice, which gives vision and knowledge, and leads to peace, direct knowledge, awakening, and extinguishment. And what is that middle way of practice? It is simply this noble eightfold path, that is: right view, right thought, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, and right immersion.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn56.11/en/sujato>)

Realmwalker said:

Celibacy and total detachment seem to be an extreme.

Astus wrote:

The common life story of the Buddha illustrates the extremes of indulgence and self-mortification. One of the basic sources of the Buddha's life (<https://suttacentral.net/mn26/en/sujato>) is very explicit how lay life is the ignoble way, while renunciate life is the noble one. The distinction between the extreme ways and the middle way is more about what various renunciates do. There is for instance <https://suttacentral.net/an3.156-162/en/sujato> on what the extreme ways are and what the middle way is. In <https://suttacentral.net/mn45/en/sujato> on different paths the Buddha categorises the paths where people indulge in sensual pleasures as the one that is pleasurable now but painful later, while self-mortification as painful both now and in the future. And before it's assumed that these don't apply to Mahayana, see chapter 4 of the Siksasamuccaya for instance, where it's explained in detail how sensual indulgence should be avoided.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 23rd, 2022 at 7:59 PM

Title: Re: Did Buddha really teach the Middle Way?

Content:

Realmwalker said:

I find it interesting that Buddha's Middle Way, if I understand your explanations correctly, is actually not about bringing a balance between two opposite extremes.

Astus wrote:

How so? The extremes - as identified by the Buddha on various levels - are both faulty, wrong, and harmful. What sort of balance should there be? That's why they should equally be avoided and left behind.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 23rd, 2022 at 8:05 PM

Title: Re: What exactly is it that leads to Enlightenment? (arhat and buddhahood)

Content:

Nalanda said:

What I meant to say is what is it 'technically' that generates the enlightenment.

Astus wrote:

It is the elimination of clinging by the realisation of emptiness.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 24th, 2022 at 5:43 AM

Title: Re: Sotapannas and killing

Content:

Astus wrote:

It might also be noted that a bodhisattva from the second bhumi does not commit any of the ten bad actions, as stated in <https://read.84000.co/translation/toh44-31.html#UT22084-036-002-459> chapter.

'The bodhisattva abiding on this ground naturally abstains from engaging in bad actions. Because he deeply delights in good dharmas, he naturally practices the courses of good karmic action.'
(Nāgārjuna's Treatise on the Ten Bodhisattva Grounds, ch 28, p 490)

'Since they have the abundant qualities of discipline, They refrain from faulty discipline even in their dreams. Because the movements of their body, speech, and mind are pure, They accumulate the actions of the genuine ones' tenfold path.'
(Madhyamakavatara 2.1, in The Karmapa's Middle Way, p 610)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 26th, 2022 at 8:07 PM

Title: Re: Will all eventually become Buddhas?

Content:

Astus wrote:

In the Saccasaṃyutta there are a series of suttas (SN 56.61-131) on the rarity of the <https://www.shambhala.com/precious-human-birth/>, like how few are born as humans (SN 56.61; see also the blind turtle simile: SN 56.47-48), not in a borderland (SN 56.62), and with wisdom (SN 56.63), and among those passing away as humans many are reborn in the lower realms and few in the heavens (SN 56.102-107). On the other hand, attaining insight is supremely difficult (SN 56.45) but without it there is no liberation (SN 56.44). At the same time, speculating about various matters of the world is not beneficial for the path, rather one should get busy with understanding the Dharma (SN 56.41).

The Buddha was asked (AN 10.95): 'when Master Gotama teaches in this way, is the whole world saved, or half, or a third?'

And Ananda explained: 'it's not the Realized One's concern whether the whole world is saved by this, or half, or a third. But the Realized One knows that whoever is saved from the world—whether in the past, the future, or the present—all have given up the five hindrances, corruptions of the heart that weaken wisdom. They have firmly established their mind in the four kinds of mindfulness meditation. And they have truly developed the seven awakening factors. That's how they're saved from the world, in the past, future, or present.'

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 27th, 2022 at 3:41 PM

Title: Re: Thereavada vs Mahayana Buddhist Goal

Content:

Zhen Li said:

The successive rise and fall of the aggregates constitutes suffering itself, so ending them is of prime importance.

Astus wrote:

It's not the aggregates on their own but the aggregates grasped at what constitutes suffering.

Zhen Li said:

Neither Theravāda nor Mahāyāna suggests that nirvāṇa is a "blank," which would be the extreme of annihilationism (which assumes that with the aggregates, there is personhood and self-hood, which there isn't in the first place), but that its description defies attempts to pin it down. The Nirvāṇa sūtra indicates that nirvāṇa is Buddha-nature, which, when manifest in the world appears as a compassionate activity to relieve the suffering of others. So, nirvāṇa, by its nature, helps others—and ultimately impersonal and not-self.

Astus wrote:

Nirvana is not a thing or entity but the final extinction of ignorance and craving, so to say nirvana has any activity is at best metaphorical.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 27th, 2022 at 5:23 PM

Title: Re: Will all eventually become Buddhas?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Imagining that there are sentient beings and buddhas out there somewhere, how is that not delusion? Huineng said it clearly:

"Good friends, the 'sentient beings of our own minds' are the mental states of delusion, confusion, immorality, jealousy, and evil. All these are sentient beings, and we must all [undergo] automatic salvation of the self-nature. This is called true salvation.

What is 'automatic salvation of the self-nature'? It is to use correct views to save the sentient beings of false views, afflictions, and stupidity within our own minds. Having correct views, we may use the wisdom of prajñā to destroy the sentient beings of stupidity and delusion, automatically saving each and every one of them. When the false occurs, it is saved by the correct. When delusion occurs, it is saved by enlightenment. When stupidity occurs, it is saved by wisdom. When evil occurs, it is saved by good. Salvation such as this is called true salvation."

(Platform Sutra, ch 6, BDK ed, p 48-49)

In summary:

Someone asked, “If one kills one’s father and mother, one can repent in front of the Buddha. Where does one repent if one kills the Buddha and the patriarchs?”

The Master said, “Exposed!”

(Record of Yunmen, no. 48)

To clarify:

“If you say ‘this very mind is buddha,’ you provisionally accept the slave as master and life-and-death (samsara) as nirvana. This is precisely like cutting off one’s head in pursuit of life. Talking about buddhas and founders and their respective intentions is just like snatching away your own eyeballs while looking for soap berries.”

(Record of Yunmen, no. 148)

In more words:

‘It is like the warrior who was deluded regarding the pearl within his forehead and who searched for it elsewhere. He traveled about all the ten directions but was ultimately unable to recover it, whereupon a wise person pointed it out and he [then] saw for himself that the pearl [was on his forehead] as it had always been. Thus it is that students of the Way are deluded as to their own fundamental mind, not recognizing it as Buddha. They search for it outside [of their own minds], generating effortful practices and depending on graduated increases in realization. They pass through eons of diligent seeking but never achieve enlightenment. This is not equal to right now achieving no-mind.’

(Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, ch 3, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 18-19)

Returning to Huineng:

‘Good friends, ordinary people are buddhas, and the afflictions are bodhi. With a preceding moment of deluded thought, one was an ordinary person, but with a succeeding moment of enlightened thought, one is a buddha. To be attached to one’s sensory realms in a preceding moment of thought is affliction, but to transcend the realms in a succeeding moment of thought is bodhi.’

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 30)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 27th, 2022 at 8:01 PM

Title: Re: Will all eventually become Buddhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

No more deluded than imagining that there are Buddhas and sentient beings “in here somewhere”

Astus wrote:

Such an assumption was meant to be avoided by the subsequent quotes. Another one on that specifically:

When the snow was gone, the three monks bade farewell and started to depart.

Dizang accompanied them to the gate and asked, "I've heard you say several times that 'the three realms are only mind and the myriad dharmas are only consciousness.'"

Dizang then pointed to a rock lying on the ground by the gate and said, "So do you say that this rock is inside or outside of mind?"

Fayan said, "Inside."

Dizang said, "How can a pilgrim carry such a rock in his mind while on pilgrimage?"

Dumbfounded, Fayan couldn't answer. He put his luggage down at Dizang's feet and asked him to clarify the truth. Each day for the next month or so Fayan spoke about the Way with Dizang and demonstrated his understanding.

Dizang would always say, "The Buddhadharma isn't like that."

Finally, Fayan said, "I've run out of words and ideas."

Dizang said, "If you want to talk about Buddhadharma, everything you see embodies it."

At these words Fayan experienced great enlightenment.

(Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 342-343)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 27th, 2022 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Thereavada vs Mahayana Buddhist Goal

Content:

Aemilius said:

That gives a wrong idea of the nature of the Buddha. Buddha's nature is active like the nine similes of the Buddha activity in Mahayana Uttara Tantra Shastra tell us.

Astus wrote:

The unique qualities of a buddha is a different matter, like the difference between the essence of a buddha (dharmakaya) and the way it manifests to beings (rupakaya).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 28th, 2022 at 3:24 PM

Title: Re: Thereavada vs Mahayana Buddhist Goal

Content:

Astus wrote:

All feelings are suffering because they are impermanent (SN 36.11), if there was no pleasure there would be no craving either (AN 3.105), but because there are both pleasure and pain there are reasons for liberation too (SN 22.60).

To say that the cessation of the aggregates is somehow annihilationism, that's taking them to be a sort of self, in which case there is a reason to assume annihilation.

However, as it's been clarified regarding the death of a liberated being (e.g. SN 22.85-86), it is a misunderstanding to claim either that there is continuation or discontinuation

(see also MMK ch 22).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 28th, 2022 at 5:12 PM

Title: Re: Will all eventually become Buddhas?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The condition for buddhahood is the twofold accumulation that must be completed by each being. On the causes to begin accumulating merit and wisdom on the Great Vehicle Gampopa says:

'This family can awaken through freedom from unfavorable contributory causes and through the support of favorable conditions. If the opposites occur, then they cannot awaken.

There are four unfavorable conditions: being born in unfavorable circumstances, having no habitual tendency toward enlightenment, entering into wrong conditions, and being heavily shrouded by the obscurations. There are two favorable conditions: the outer condition of a teacher, and the inner condition of a mind with the proper desire for the precious Dharma and so forth.'

(Jewel Ornament of Liberation, p 54)

Since there is no guarantee that all beings necessarily obtain the favourable causes, there is no assurance of all attaining buddhahood.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 28th, 2022 at 5:24 PM

Title: Re: Thereavada vs Mahayana Buddhist Goal

Content:

Schrödinger's Yidam said:

The analogy used in teaching Shravakayana view is that it like a candle going out. Nothing happens next.

Astus wrote:

The candle going out happens in this life (see e.g. AN 9.47), not after or by dying.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 28th, 2022 at 7:36 PM

Title: Re: Will all eventually become Buddhas?

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Because of the nature of eternity and infinite arrangements, every being will come to have the arrangement of conditions that you speak about, Astus.

Astus wrote:

Samsara has no beginning (SN 15), therefore the infinite arrangements is already covered by that. In other words, just because something could happen does not mean it eventually happens.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 28th, 2022 at 7:46 PM

Title: Re: Thereavada vs Mahayana Buddhist Goal

Content:

Aemilius said:

Amrita/amata is a synonym for nirvana/nibbana in Dhammapada.

Astus wrote:

Amata is one of the many synonyms for nibbana, the unconditioned, as listed in the Asankhatasamyutta (SN 43.12-43), and is defined as 'The ending of greed, hate, and delusion.' It's not a thing outside/beyond the aggregates.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 28th, 2022 at 7:49 PM

Title: Re: Thereavada vs Mahayana Buddhist Goal

Content:

Schrödinger's Yidam said:

Mahayana adds to the 5 and posits an 8th consciousness that goes from life to life.

Astus wrote:

All eight consciousnesses are included in the consciousness aggregate. See for instance the Pañcaskandhaprakaraṇa by Vasubandhu.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 28th, 2022 at 8:38 PM

Title: Re: Thereavada vs Mahayana Buddhist Goal

Content:

Schrödinger's Yidam said:

Vasabandhu is a Mahayana author.

Astus wrote:

It is in Mahayana where one can find the doctrine of eight consciousnesses. But the eighth is not something posited on top of the five aggregates.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 28th, 2022 at 10:37 PM

Title: Re: Will all eventually become Buddhas?

Content:

Zhen Li said:

The idea that all beings will eventually become Buddhas is a Mahāyāna teaching not covered by the Śrāvakayāna texts.

Astus wrote:

But why would all eventually become a buddha? The reasoning that "if it can happen, it will happen" does not stand. That all beings have buddha-nature is not a sufficient condition either.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 28th, 2022 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Thereavada vs Mahayana Buddhist Goal

Content:

Schrödinger's Yidam said:

I don't know what you mean by "on top of".

Astus wrote:

This:

Schrödinger's Yidam said:

Mahayana adds to the 5 and posits an 8th consciousness

No Shrivakayani would accept the idea of an 8th consciousness that goes from one life to another.

Astus wrote:

Nor would any Buddhist accept that (MN 38, SN 12.61). The eighth consciousness is just as momentary as all the other conditioned phenomena. At the same time, Theravada has the concept of <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bhavanga>, what is not exactly the same as the alayavijnana, but similar in being a basic continuum.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 28th, 2022 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: Will all eventually become Buddhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Some people conceive of tathagatagarbha as a kind of uncompounded agent that propels one inevitably to buddhahood.

Astus wrote:

Even so, it is not in and of itself the cause of liberation, hence cannot guarantee it either.

'The causes of freedom from these two veils are the two jnanas, considered as being the non-conceptual jnana and the ensuing jnana.'

(Uttaratantrasastra 5.174, tr Holmes)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 29th, 2022 at 5:22 AM

Title: Re: Thereavada vs Mahayana Buddhist Goal

Content:

Caoimhghín said:

The pratisaṃdhivijñāna, specifically in the case of the modern Theravāda sect (which rejects the "in-between" state between births), is compared to lighting an unlit candle with a lit candle. If there is no unlit candle to inherit the flame, then the flame goes out and dies (i.e. it becomes "extinguished"/nirvṛti). I believe that this is what Schrödinger's Yidam was referring to.

Astus wrote:

It might be so, although it could as well be what's taught in the <https://suttacentral.net/mn72/en/sujato> as an illustration of the Buddha not being identifiable as anything already in his life, hence the baseless conjecture about birth after death:

“Suppose that fire burning in front of you was extinguished. Would you know: ‘This fire in front of me is extinguished’?”

“Yes, I would, Master Gotama.”

“But Vaccha, suppose they were to ask you: ‘This fire in front of you that is extinguished: in what direction did it go—east, south, west, or north?’ How would you answer?”

“It doesn’t apply, Master Gotama. The fire depended on grass and logs as fuel. When that runs out, and no more fuel is added, the fire is reckoned to have become extinguished due to lack of fuel.”

“In the same way, Vaccha, any form by which a Realized One might be described has been cut off at the root, made like a palm stump, obliterated, and unable to arise in the future. A Realized One is freed from reckoning in terms of form. They’re deep, immeasurable, and hard to fathom, like the ocean. ‘They’re reborn’, ‘they’re not reborn’, ‘they’re both reborn and not reborn’, ‘they’re neither reborn nor not reborn’—none of these apply.”

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 29th, 2022 at 5:38 AM

Title: Re: Will all eventually become Buddhas?

Content:

Queequeg said:

I think the catalyst you are looking for are the hosts of buddhas and bodhisattvas that actively endeavor to respond to the needs and capacities of all living beings. Its those vows that turn the balance toward buddhahood.

Astus wrote:

Even just hearing about the Dharma depends on each being's karma, not simply on the effort of others. To the same extent one could mention the hosts of maras and the basic inclinations of beings (MN 64). Also, more apparent than the activities of buddhas and bodhisattvas are the divine messengers (MN 130) of birth, old age, sickness, punishment, and death. But who listens? Therefore 'the sentient beings who die as humans and are reborn as humans are few, while those who die as humans and are reborn in hell are many' (SN 56.102).

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 29th, 2022 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: Will all eventually become Buddhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

I didn't say they were right.

Astus wrote:

That's clear.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 29th, 2022 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Thereavada vs Mahayana Buddhist Goal

Content:

Aemilius said:

If the aggregates are conditioned, and nirvana or amata/amrita is unconditioned, then they are outside the conditioned, outside the aggregates.

Astus wrote:

Since the unconditioned is merely the cessation of defilements, it is not a thing or being to be somewhere.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 30th, 2022 at 6:07 AM

Title: Re: Thereavada vs Mahayana Buddhist Goal

Content:

Aemilius said:

It exists in a very positive sense, as is taught by the Blessed one himself:

Ud 8:3:

" There is, monks, an unborn, unbecome, unmade, unfabricated. If there were not that unborn, unbecome, unmade, unfabricated, no leaving behind of the born, become, made, fabricated would be discerned. But because there is indeed an unborn, unbecome, unmade, unfabricated, a leaving behind of the born, become, made, fabricated is discerned."

Similarly, you can't cross the flood of samsaric existence if there is no other shore.

Astus wrote:

Un born (ajāta), un become (abhūta), un made (akata), un fabricated (asaṅkhata).

Which one is positive? They are actually synonyms (cf. AN 3.47), and they are defined, as quoted above, as 'The ending of greed, hate, and delusion.' (rāgakkhayo dosakkhayo mohakkhayo), in other words, the third noble truth, the cessation of suffering. 'And what is the cessation of suffering? When craving ceases, suffering ceases.' (AN 6.63), or in other words: 'When relishing ceases, suffering ceases' (SN 35.64).

'Not abandoned, not acquired, not annihilated, not eternal,
not ceased, not arisen, thus is nirvāṇa said to be.
Nirvāṇa is not, on the one hand, an existent; if it were, its having the characteristics of old age and death would follow, for there is no existent devoid of old age and death.
And if nirvāṇa were an existent, nirvāṇa would be conditioned, for never is there found any existent that is not conditioned.
And if nirvāṇa were an existent, how could one say that nirvāṇa is nondependent?
For never is there found any existent that is nondependent.

...

It is not to be asserted that the Buddha exists beyond cessation,
nor "does not exist" nor "both exists and does not exist," nor "neither exists nor does not exist"—none of these is to be asserted.
Indeed it is not to be asserted that "The Buddha exists while remaining [in this world]," nor "does not exist" nor "both exists and does not exist," nor "neither exists nor does not exist"—none of these is to be asserted'
(MMK 25.3-6 & 17-18, tr Siderits)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 30th, 2022 at 8:01 PM

Title: Re: Thereavada vs Mahayana Buddhist Goal

Content:

Aemilius said:

"There is" is a positive statement, indicating the existence of the unconditioned. "Were there not" says that if the unconditioned didn't exist neither would the path exist.

Astus wrote:

What existence there it refers to is the existence of the escape (nissaraṇa) from the cycle of pleasure and pain. That escape is the removal of craving (SN 22.26, SN 35.13), it is because of that escape that there is liberation (SN 22.28, SN 35.17), that is cessation (Iti 72), the most peaceful deathless element (Iti 73).

Aemilius said:

"Freedom from barrenness and bondage" it has been described and "freedom from debt or imprisonment" . These are powerful metaphors, which indicate freedom to act and freedom to live. I wonder why it doesn't seem like that? If you are free from prison, you don't become "extinct", the very opposite should be the case. The fact that we have to discuss this matter indicates there is something wrong, seriously wrong, in the system.

Astus wrote:

It is not about anyone's extinction, such thinking is solely based on the assumption of a self. With the removal of ignorance it's just the misconception of self that disappears (SN 22.47), and with it greed and anger (SN 36.6). Then one acts not out of ignorant inclinations but wisdom (SN 36.3).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 1st, 2022 at 6:59 PM

Title: Re: Is first dhyāna necessary for the first bhūmi?

Content:

Caoimhghín said:

The title says it all. Related: Is first dhyāna necessary for any particular significant degree of Bodhi?

Astus wrote:

While in various treatises there are all sorts of minute details to debate about, neither the sutras nor those focused on meditative practices do that. It is agreed that concentration and wisdom go together, even if initially they look separate. The concept of dhyana, when elevated to a high level, seems nearly impossible to reach (e.g. Vism XII.8, p 371), so it is not surprising that the usage of that classification has mostly been abandoned, and instead there's more generic terminology, like samatha, samadhi, and one-pointedness.

As for not developing absorption to any significant degree (whatever that means), that is a possibility, as there are all sorts of cases where somebody gained entrance without much preparation or none at all. Still, at the moment of realisation, how could it be without the absence of mental disturbance?

'The initial concentration of someone practising insight may be 'temporary' (khaṇika-samādhī). But at the point of attaining path and fruit (magga-phala), concentration is firmly established ('attainment concentration' – appanā-samādhī), reaching at least the first jhāna.'

(<https://buddhadhamma.github.io/calm-and-insight.html#introduction>, p 817)

'Light a lamp (dīpa); bright as it is, you cannot use it if you leave it in the full wind; put it in a sheltered place, it will be very useful to you. It is the same for wisdom in a distracted mind (vikṣiptacitta): if the shelter of dhyāna is absent, the wisdom will exist, but its usefulness will be very restricted. It is necessary to have dhyāna so that the true wisdom is produced.

...

Moreover, when one is pursuing worldly business (laukikārtha) but does not apply one's whole mind to it, the business does not succeed; then how [would one reach] very profound (gambhīra) Buddhist wisdom if one neglects meditation?'

(<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225394.html>; second part also quoted by Jinul in 'Encouragement to Practice: The Compact of the Samādhī and Prajñā Society' in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 2, p 138-139)

'Dhyāna is the basis of Prajñāpāramitā; the latter arises spontaneously when the virtue of dhyāna is relied upon. A sūtra says: "The one-pointed (ekacitta) and concentrated (samāhita) bhikṣu is able to contemplate the true nature of dharmas.'" (<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225467.html>)

"Good friends, our teaching takes meditation and wisdom as its fundamental. Everyone, do not say in your delusion that meditation and wisdom are different.

Meditation and wisdom are of one essence, not different. Meditation is the essence of wisdom, and wisdom is the function of meditation. At times of wisdom, meditation exists in that wisdom; at times of meditation, wisdom exists in that meditation. If you understand this doctrine, this is the equivalent study of meditation and wisdom. All you who study the Way, do not say that they are different, with meditation prior to and generating wisdom or with wisdom prior to and generating meditation. If your view of them is like this, then the Dharma would have two characteristics. This would be to say something good with your mouth but to have that which is not good in your minds. It is to make meditation and wisdom falsely existent to consider them as not equivalent.

"If there is good in both mouth and mind and if internal and external are identical, then meditation and wisdom will be equivalent. One should understand oneself that spiritual cultivation does not exist in argumentation. If you argue about which is prior and which secondary, then you are just like [all the other] deluded people. Not to desist from competition is to increase the illusion of selfhood. One will not transcend the four characteristics [this way]!

"Good friends, how is it that meditation and wisdom are equivalent? It is like the light of a lamp. When the lamp exists, there is light; when there is no lamp, there is darkness. The lamp is the essence of the light, and the light is the function of the lamp. Although the names are different, in essence they are fundamentally identical. The Dharma of meditation and wisdom is just like this."

(Platform Sutra, ch 4, BDK ed, p 41-42)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 2nd, 2022 at 5:02 AM

Title: Re: We Are All This Luminous Mind

Content:

Astus wrote:

'Nowadays, deluded and ignorant people wrongly assume that one moment of awakening manifests in turn incalculable sublime functions, as well as magic and miracles. This is the sort of understanding to which I was referring when I said that you did not know the proper sequence of practice and did not distinguish the root from the branches. To seek the path to buddhahood while not knowing the proper sequence [of practice or distinguishing] the root and the branches is like trying to insert a square peg into a round hole. How is this not a grave mistake? Since they do not know of any expedients, they consequently [hesitate], presuming they have reached a sheer precipice, and allow themselves to cower and back away in discouragement. Alas, many are those who have thus broken their ties with the spiritual lineage of the buddhas. Since they neither understand for themselves nor believe that others have had any experience of the understanding-awakening, when they see someone without superpowers they act insolently, ridiculing the saints and insulting the sages. This is really quite pitiful!

(Moguja's Secrets on Cultivating the Mind, in Collected Works on Korean Buddhism, vol 2, p 214-215)

'when it is realized that these six — color, sound, odor, taste, touch, and dharmas — are all empty forms, they cannot bind the man of the Way, dependent upon nothing. Constituted though he is of the seepage of the five skandhas, he has the supernatural power of walking upon the earth.'

(Record of Linji, p 20, tr Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 3rd, 2022 at 5:50 PM

Title: Re: We Are All This Luminous Mind

Content:

Astus wrote:

When the meaning of seeing the nature is viewed in its context then there's not much difference between the systems. In Japanese Rinzai it currently stands for an experience that needs to be followed up by continuous practice. In Soto the practice is itself the experience of the nature and has to be continuous. Both fits the standard of obtaining the correct view (darśana, 見) and then habituating (bhāvanā, 修習) it.

The difficulty with matching Chan and Doctrine lies in Chan's focus on the individual point of view where terms like buddhahood change their meaning to something immediately accessible, hence seeing the nature is attaining buddhahood, just as forgetting it is becoming an ordinary being.

'To use wisdom to contemplate all the dharmas without grasping or rejecting is to see the nature and accomplish the enlightenment of buddhahood.'

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 31; T2008p350c8-9)

'If you presume you attain realization by practicing for three incalculable kalpas, you will have no success even after kalpas as numerous as the sands of the Ganges. But if in a single kṣaṇa [instant] you obtain the dharma body and directly see the nature, this is the culminating discourse of the three-vehicle teachings. Why is this so? Seeing the dharma body as something that can be obtained is a view associated with the provisional (neyartha) teachings.'

(A Bird in Flight Leaves No Trace, II.39; X1315p22a23-b2)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 4th, 2022 at 5:22 AM

Title: Re: the Zen promise is empty

Content:

clay said:

And I believed the Zen promise that Buddhahood was attainable "in this lifetime".

Astus wrote:

Complete awakening "in this lifetime", or "in this body" - that's what Vajrayana goes with, Zen not so much. In Zen it is buddhahood in this moment, right now.

Q: What is Sudden Enlightenment?

A: "Sudden" means instantly stopping false thought. "Enlightenment" means [awareness] that one attains nothing.

(<https://ymba.org/books/entering-cao-sudden-enlightenment/treatise-entering-cao-sudden-enlightenment>)

'I am offering you the quick method. Take all of your thoughts – good, bad, indifferent – and drop them. If you can do this, you will be enlightened instantly. If you can reach the state of mind where there is no self, no other, no discrimination, no sentient beings, no Buddha, then you will realize the true reality of things. Take the sword of practice and cut open the mind of discrimination. When enlightenment cuts through the discriminating mind, it leaves nothing behind, because from the beginning there has never been any real self to divide.'

(<http://old.ddc.shengyen.org/mobile/text/09-04/45.php> by Sheng-yen)

And also note:

'If there are those who say that they see bodhi and have attained it, we should know that they are the ones with exceeding arrogance.'

(<https://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra13.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 4th, 2022 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: We Are All This Luminous Mind

Content:

Pablo said:

Just to be clear (I ask because I truly do not know, I'm not really interested in polemics), what Malcolm and Johnny are saying is that the language used in the Zen tradition re Buddhahood (see for instance Astus's messages in this thread) is rhetorical, and that the awakening spoken of in Zen does not correspond with awakening as understood in the general Mahayana tradition. Is this correct?

Astus wrote:

There is such an interpretation, especially when one takes the side of Doctrine (jiao 教 - a Zen term for the rest of Buddhism that's based on scriptures and treatises). On the other hand, it can also be said that it's the 'general Mahayana' that is rhetorical, while Zen is seeing how things are. And there's also a third option, that it's all a matter of skilful means and one works with whatever one can work for the single goal of liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 5th, 2022 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: We Are All This Luminous Mind

Content:

master of puppets said:

Is liberation the last stop. or some where in between?

Astus wrote:

Briefly put: it is the end of greed, hatred, and delusion.

master of puppets said:

i would happy to choose the second.

Astus wrote:

Who gains, who loses?

Once the great Fayen of Qingliang was with some monks in front of his studio. When Fayen pointed to a curtain, two of the monks went to roll it up.

Fayen said, "One gains, one loses."

(Women's Gate, case 26, in Three Chan Classics, BDK ed, p 91)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 5th, 2022 at 12:23 AM

Title: Re: We Are All This Luminous Mind

Content:

Pablo said:

Yes, but here again there would be some disagreement over what "liberation" is, wouldn't it?

Astus wrote:

If there is disagreement then there is discrimination, if there is discrimination there is suffering.

'If one possesses a locus,

One becomes attached or detached;

But the great beings who're devoid of locus,

They have neither attachment nor detachment.'

(Sixty Stanzas of Reasoning, v 58, tr Geshe Thupten Jinpa)

"Nonabiding is to consider in one's fundamental nature that all worldly [things] are empty, with no consideration of retaliation—whether good or evil, pleasant or ugly, and enemy or friend, etc., during times of words, fights, and disputation.

Within continuing moments of thought one should not think of the previous [mental] realm. If one thinks of the previous thought, the present thought, and the later thought, one's thoughts will be continuous without cease. This is called 'fettered.' If one's thoughts do not abide in the dharmas, this is to be 'unfettered.' Thus it is that nonabiding is taken as the fundamental"

(Platform Sutra, ch 4, BDK ed, p 43)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 5th, 2022 at 5:12 AM

Title: Re: We Are All This Luminous Mind

Content:

Malcolm said:

So when the Buddha disagreed with someone, he was suffering?

Astus wrote:

If he had disagreed by taking one view and opposing with another, then it would have been so, as shown in the <https://suttacentral.net/snp4.8/en/sujato>. As for instance the <https://suttacentral.net/mn22/en/sujato> explains, the various grounds of views arise from misconceiving a self.

“Sir, my teaching is such that one does not conflict with anyone in this world with its gods, Māras, and Brahmās, this population with its ascetics and brahmins, its gods and humans. And it is such that perceptions do not underlie the brahmin who lives detached from sensual pleasures, without doubting, stripped of worry, and rid of craving for rebirth in this or that state. That’s what I teach, and that’s what I explain.”
(<https://suttacentral.net/mn18/en/sujato>)

'For a bhikkhu wholly dispassionate
And freed by the destruction of craving,
Searches have been relinquished
And uprooted the standpoint of views.'
(<https://suttacentral.net/iti55/en/ireland>, also
<https://suttacentral.net/an4.38/en/sujato>)

And here's MMK 18.5 and 25.24 expressed the Zen way:

'All are clampering after the worthless contrivances of the men of old. As for myself, I haven't a single dharma to give to people. All I can do is to cure illnesses and untie bonds.'
(Record of Linji, p 22, tr Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 5th, 2022 at 6:20 AM

Title: Re: We Are All This Luminous Mind

Content:

Malcolm said:

FFS, Astus, get a sense of humor. We know very well you are an excellent book dancer, ready with your handy kindle library.

Astus wrote:
It seemed like a legit question.

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, February 7th, 2022 at 11:56 PM
Title: Re: the Zen promise is empty
Content:
Malcolm said:
There is also no reason to believe there is. Awakening is not a falsifiable phenomena.

Astus wrote:
'There is a method—apart from faith, preference, oral tradition, reasoned contemplation, or acceptance of a view after consideration—that a mendicant can rely on to declare their enlightenment.'
(<https://suttacentral.net/sn35.153/en/sujato>)

'Great king, as a layman enjoying sensual pleasures, living at home with your children, using sandalwood imported from Kāsi, wearing garlands, perfumes, and makeup, and accepting gold and money, it's hard for you to know who is perfected or on the path to perfection.
You can get to know a person's ethics by living with them. ... You can get to know a person's purity by dealing with them. ... You can get to know a person's resilience in times of trouble. ... You can get to know a person's wisdom by discussion. But only after a long time, not casually; only when paying attention, not when inattentive; and only by the wise, not the witless.'
(<https://suttacentral.net/sn3.11/en/sujato>; also AN 4.192 & Ud 6.2)

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, February 8th, 2022 at 4:38 AM
Title: Re: the Zen promise is empty
Content:
Malcolm said:
It's still subjective, since who knows whether the "mendicant" is deluded. There is no way to book dance your way around it.

Astus wrote:
Yes, subjective, but not necessarily based on faith. The Okkantasaṃyutta (SN 25) distinguishes between the faith follower who is confident because of trust and will attain stream entry, the Dhamma follower who is confident because of discernment and will attain stream entry, and the one who understand and sees is the one who has entered the stream.
However, all that is about knowing the Dharma, just like in the discourse you quoted (and another one with Sariputta should also be mentioned, where he declares his confidence in the unsurpassed awakening of the Buddha: <https://suttacentral.net/sn47.12/en/sujato>). Related to your quote too are a series of other discourses (SN 48.12-17) on the five faculties where the level of one's attainment is defined by the strength of those faculties, and while the weakest one is the faith follower, those completely without them are ordinary people (SN 48.18).

Malcolm said:

And hanging out with someone for a long while is also no guarantee, as the case of Sunakshatra shows.

Astus wrote:

Not a guarantee, but that's what may give one the full picture.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 8th, 2022 at 6:25 AM

Title: Re: the Zen promise is empty

Content:

Malcolm said:

Necessarily. You have to have faith in these texts as authorities.

Astus wrote:

What do you mean by that? One first needs to have faith in the texts initially, or there is nothing beyond faith? If the former, then why necessarily?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 8th, 2022 at 4:43 PM

Title: Re: the Zen promise is empty

Content:

Malcolm said:

You have to believe the narrative. But there is nothing about the narrative that can be proven to anyone. So, yes, there is in the end nothing but faith, unless someone is claiming direct personal knowledge, and you know how sketchy that is.

Astus wrote:

If by faith you mean cannot be proven to others, then it's all just faith. Personal knowledge of what? That the narrative is historically true, or that the teachings communicated in the texts is true? The latter is meant to be verifiable, for oneself at least (e.g. <https://suttacentral.net/an10.51/en/sujato>). For instance, can we see for ourselves that the entirety of our experiences can be categorised according to the five aggregates? If so, then can we tell if those aggregates are permanent or impermanent, satisfactory or unsatisfactory, personal or impersonal, substantial or insubstantial, independent or dependent, etc.? Similarly, can we confirm whether by calming the mind there is more peace? Can we decide if there is contentment by not clinging? And so on. It is another step that through the proper application of the teachings how much of the harmful, unskillful inclinations and obsessions are diminished or even eradicated.

Malcolm said:

Anyone want to stand up here and proclaim they are awakened? No? I thought as much.

Astus wrote:

Maybe narrow it down. Awakened to what? For instance the declarations <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=39&t=38956> that there is no doubt about the validity of the Nagarjuna's teachings, how is that not some stage of awakening? In fact, the <https://www.nichirenlibrary.org/en/dic/Content/T/75>.

Here's Jinul's take on the matter of faith:

'If you have sufficient faith and your doubts suddenly vanish, you will display the will of a great man and generate authentic vision and understanding; if you know its taste for yourself, arrive at the stage of selfaffirmation [and thus gain understanding of your true nature], then this is the experience of the understanding-awakening achieved by those who have cultivated the mind. Since no further steps or sequences are involved, it is called "sudden." Therefore it is said, "When in the cause of faith one meshes without the slightest degree of error with all the qualities of the fruition of buddhahood, faith is achieved."'

(Moguja's Secrets on Cultivating the Mind, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 2, p 224)

'we should know that there is no need to worry about either the [thirty-two] major or [eighty] minor marks [of sanctity] or the superpowers. We must first trace back the radiance of our own minds to ensure that our faith and understanding are genuine; then, we will not fall into either eternalism (śāsvatadrsti) or annihilationism (ucchedadrsti), and, by relying on the two approaches of samādhi and prajñā, we will be able to remedy the maculations of mind. This is the proper way. On the other hand, if our faith and understanding are not yet genuine, the contemplation practice that we cultivate will be subject to impermanence and will in the end result only in backsliding. This is called the contemplation practice of the foolish; how could it be the practice of the wise?'

(Encouragement to Practice: The Compact of the Samādhi and Prajñā Society, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 2, p 129-130)

'Cultivators nowadays belong to the Buddha's spiritual family. They rely upon the direct-pointing (chikchi 直指) approach of the Sudden school, and, having developed firm faith and understanding, they straightaway comprehend that their own minds are perpetually calm and ever alert. Since they initiate their cultivation on such a foundation, even though they cultivate the manifold practices [of the bodhisattva], they only regard no-thought (munyom 無念) as their core and nonconstruction (mujak 無作, akrtaka) as their basis. Because of this no-thought and nonconstruction, their practice is free from any temporal (sigop 時劫) or soteriological (chiwi 地位) sequences and also devoid of any sign of discrimination between dharmas and their aspects (dharmārtha). Since their cultivation is complete, approaches to dharma as numerous as dust motes and the meritorious qualities developed on all the bhūmis are also complete in the essence of their sublime minds, which is accordingly the same as a wish-fulfilling gem (cintāmani).'

(ibid., p 148-149)

'Sentient beings of great aspiration who rely on the supreme-vehicle approach to dharma have firm faith and understanding that the four great elements (mahābhūta) are like a bubble or a mirage, that the six sense-objects are like flowers in the sky, that their own minds are the buddha-mind, and that their own natures are the dharma-nature. Since time immemorial, they have themselves left behind the nature of the afflictions. Their alertness is instantly alert; their clarity is instantly clear. Although people who cultivate while relying on this understanding may still have beginningless proclivities of habit (vāsanā), if they control them with the unabiding wisdom, they instead become the foundational wisdom and need neither be suppressed nor removed.'

(ibid., p 167-168)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 9th, 2022 at 3:08 AM

Title: Re: Discerning conceptual thought about the body from non conceptual sense experience in Vipassana

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is a central topic in Burmese Vipassana teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 10th, 2022 at 6:29 AM

Title: Re: Discerning conceptual thought about the body from non conceptual sense experience in Vipassana

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Is that book more of a historical/textual thing, or actual instruction?

Astus wrote:

For practical by Ven. Analayo try these:

<https://www.windhorsepublications.com/product/satipatthana-meditation-practice-guide-paperback/>

<https://www.windhorsepublications.com/product/mindfulness-of-breathing-a-practice-guide-and-translations-paperback/>

And this one by Ajahn Sucitto is quite keen on the body as something felt:

<https://forestsangha.org/teachings/books/meditation-a-way-of-awakening?language=English>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 10th, 2022 at 8:19 PM

Title: Re: Is kensho stream entry?

Content:

clyde said:

I don't recall reading any Zen text that compared or equated kensho and stream entry

Astus wrote:

Stream entry is on the shravaka path, hence it is something to be avoided by Mahayana followers.

clyde said:

It seems to me that kensho is the direct experience of emptiness or impermanence and so does result in stream entry

Astus wrote:

Kensho is defined in different ways according to who says it. If we are to rely on the Platform Sutra for instance, it is realising buddha-nature and attaining buddhahood, thus the saying 'kensho jobutsu' (see nature and become buddha). Stream entry would fall very short of that.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 10th, 2022 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: Is kensho stream entry?

Content:

Dan74 said:

It would be worth comparing the descriptions of each.

Astus wrote:

Definitions for stream-entry are fairly standard. Here's a modern summary of the <https://buddhadhamma.github.io/awakened-beings.html#active-qualities> and the <https://buddhadhamma.github.io/awakened-beings.html#abandoned-qualities> qualities.

The bigger problem is that there is no generally accepted interpretation for kensho. Here's a definition from the Historical Dictionary of Chan Buddhism by Youru Wang (p 138):

JIANXING. A Chan term and an important notion in Chan teachings. Literally, it means "seeing (one's authentic) nature." This teaching was a Chinese appropriation of Indian Mahayana tathagatagarbha (Buddha-nature) thought. The tathagatagarbha tradition teaches that every human being has Buddha-nature within. This Buddha-nature is the inner cause and condition of enlightenment. Some texts of this tradition also teach that this Buddha-nature is the foundation of the world.

In Chinese Chan tradition, for example, in the Platform Sutra Buddha-nature is equivalent to the self-nature (zixing) in the sense that Buddha-nature cannot be objectified and realized outside each person. Seeing or realizing the Buddha-nature is the existential transformation of personhood, being able to understand and appreciate what constitutes a person - elements of impermanence and non-abiding - and then acting accordingly. Jianxing is therefore another term for enlightenment. The English translation of xing here as "nature" is somewhat misleading. The Buddha-nature or self-nature in the above-mentioned Chan soteriological context is not a changeless essence deeply rooted in the human mind for one to discover; rather, it refers to the changeability, transformation, and growth of personhood. Jianxing thus requires the accomplishment of action, the practical-behavioral carrying out of non-attachment.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 11th, 2022 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: Is kensho stream entry?

Content:

Dan74 said:

One of the things I am not clear about is whether according to the Theravada, stream-enterers can regress and lose some of these qualities.

Astus wrote:

They cannot. That's why it's called change of lineage
(<https://www.dhammadownload.com/index.php/Gotrabhu>).

Dan74 said:

The Chan definition you quoted above doesn't appear to distinguish between (insight into the Original Nature) kensho and full awakening (satori), but most contemporary teachers do. Hakuin did too, with many kenshos, didn't he?

Astus wrote:

The definition above is based on the Platform Sutra. As you note, there are other usages of the term. Hence the difficulty with comparing kensho with various attainments, since one first needs to define kensho itself.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 11th, 2022 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: Is kensho stream entry?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Mahāyāna also has stream entry. It's called the path of seeing. Mahāyāna has once-returners, 7th stage bodhisattvas, never-returners, eighth on up, and arhats, aka samyaksambuddhas.

Astus wrote:

Do you know if anyone actually called them so? I have not found such a definition for stream entry (入流, 預流, 須陀洹) in the <https://www2.buddhistdoor.net/dictionary/>.

Malcolm said:

Which are the same fetters abandoned on the Mahayana path of seeing.

Astus wrote:

But, as you noted in another thread, a first stage bodhisattva can still break even basic precepts, unlike a stream enterer.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 11th, 2022 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: Is kensho stream entry?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The four kinds of āryas are defined on the basis of the fetters they have dropped. To say one is stream entrant in a Mahāyāna context is to claim to be a first stage bodhisattva.

Astus wrote:

In light of the fetters here's a classic story:

"there was a fourteen year old novice called Daoxin (Faith in the Way) who came to pay his respects to the Third Patriarch, saying, 'Would that the Venerable Monk's compassion allow me to beg for the Dharma gate of Liberation.'

The master replied, 'Who binds you?'

'No one,' responded Daoxin.

'Why seek liberation then?' asked Sengcan.

On hearing this [Dao] Xin had a great awakening."

(Records of the Transmission of the Lamp, vol 1, 3.40)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 12th, 2022 at 4:22 AM

Title: Re: What is the "Jin'ganding Jing?"

Content:

Caoimhghín said:

What is the Jin'gandingjing? Anyone know?

Astus wrote:

My guess is 金剛頂經, i.e. Vajraśekhara Sūtra, a version of which is translated as <https://bdkamerica.org/product/two-esoteric-sutras/>.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 13th, 2022 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Awakening 101

Content:

Ted Biringer said:

When the Zen masters use the term “mind” in the sense that “mind is Buddha” they mean mind as it is in itself, that is, our core-subjectivity, or awareness itself. In short, they do not mean thoughts, feelings, sensations, perceptions, etc. – all of these are objects of mind or contents of awareness. Objects of mind come and go in an endless stream, contents of awareness arise and cease – mind or awareness is the unchanging realm in which objects come and go, the immutable dimension wherein the contents of awareness arise and cease.

Astus wrote:

If that had been the case they would have been simply mistaking consciousness for a self. For direct insight it is exactly that kind of grasping and identifying that should be immediately put an end to. How? By recognising that all five aggregates are empty, and there is no mind to be found anywhere.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 14th, 2022 at 8:29 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Awakening 101

Content:

Ted Biringer said:

Nevertheless, I don't see how you could confuse my explanation (quoted in your post) as suggesting it might amount to "mistaking consciousness for a self." In fact, my explanation was meant to clarify that consciousness (that is, our fundamental consciousness, or awareness itself) is the Buddha.

Astus wrote:

It is because you specified mind as 'our core-subjectivity, or awareness itself. In short, they do not mean thoughts, feelings, sensations, perceptions, etc. – all of these are objects of mind or contents of awareness. ... mind or awareness is the unchanging realm in which objects come and go, the immutable dimension wherein the contents of awareness arise and cease.'

The meaning of emptiness is that there is no core, no substance, no self. Mind is a common term for a complex system of processes that arise dependent on various conditions.

'Whenever we see form, it is just seeing the mind. The mind does not exist by itself; its existence is due to form.'

(Sun-Face Buddha, p 62)

To say that only an awareness apart from everything else is the buddha contradicts what you quoted from Mazu, that 'All dharmas are Buddhadharmas and all dharmas are liberation. Liberation is identical with suchness: all dhannas never leave suchness. Whether walking, standing, sitting or reclining, everything is always inconceivable function.'

You also quoted Bodhidharma's answer to the question about mind, and it also illustrates this very well: 'You ask. That's your mind. I answer. That's my mind. If I had no mind, how could I answer? If you had no mind, how could you ask? That which asks is your mind. Through endless kalpas without beginning, whatever you do, wherever you are, that's your real mind, that's your real buddha.'

Asking, answering, those are all mental functions, not some subject/awareness merely watching in the background. An awareness apart from thoughts and feelings is without function and actually does not exist. To say that this mind is the buddha, and not something special, there is no need to exclude anything. The only issue to solve is the matter of attachment.

'If the mind grasps at dharmas, then it gets involved in external causes and conditions, which is the meaning of birth and death. If the mind does not grasp at dharmas, that is suchness.'

(Sun-Face Buddha, p 67)

And as you quoted: 'If you really want to find the Way, don't hold on to anything.'

Huangbo warned (Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 21): 'Ordinary people grasp at [their sensory] realms, while religious persons grasp at the mind. For the mind and the realms to both be forgotten is the True Dharma. To forget the realms is relatively easy, but to forget the mind is extremely difficult. People do not dare to forget the mind, fearing that they will fall into the void (i.e., the emptiness of space) with nowhere to grab hold. They do not understand that the void is without void, that there is only one true Dharma body.'

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 15th, 2022 at 4:04 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Awakening 101

Content:

Ted Biringer said:

In my op I clearly pointed out what I meant by "mind" in the context of "mind is Buddha." This was to distinguish its usage from the many other possible meanings that "mind" can have depending on the context, for instance as distinct from the meaning you apply above as "a common term for a complex system of processes that arise dependent on various conditions." Not what I meant at all, as a reading of the op makes clear.

Astus wrote:

That's very much my contention here as well. In general mind in Buddhism refers to the six (or eight) types of consciousness and the four mental aggregates. That's a complex system of processes dependent on other factors, especially as presented most commonly that consciousness arises dependent on the sense faculty and the sense object.

The op makes clear that you assume there to be a constant, independent awareness, and you named that the nature of mind to be awakened to. How is that not mistaking consciousness for a self, taking what is impermanent as permanent?

Ted Biringer said:

Further, it is fine to say it "does not exist" as long as you mean "does not exist independently."

Astus wrote:

If the nature of mind is not independent, then how could it be unchanging? But then you state:

To recognize that objects of mind (phenomena, forms, dharmas) arise and cease endlessly, while mind itself neither arises nor ceases is not to deny the reality (Buddha-nature) of such objects – just the opposite in fact. It is, in truth, the very coming and going of all transient forms that allows us to awaken to that which is ever and always free from coming and going.

That looks very much like a duality of a permanent awareness and impermanent objects. Then how is such an awareness not independent?

Ted Biringer said:

see that while things (objects of mind) appear to come and go the essence of mind is intrinsically free from change.

Astus wrote:

An unchanging subject, isn't that what is called a self?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 16th, 2022 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: Sudden Awakening 101

Content:

Ted Biringer said:

While I, in harmony with the classic Zen records, did and do describe “mind” (in the context of “mind is Buddha”) as synonymous with essential nature, fundamental awareness, etc., and do recognize it as constant, immutable, unchanging, etc.

Astus wrote:

So, according to you, the mind that is Buddha is: 'constant, immutable, unchanging'

Ted Biringer said:

And I never said or implied that it was an “independent” existent. Just the opposite. All the thoughts and things (dharmas) that do appear as coming and going, arising and ceasing, “independently” are in fact not thoughts and things but mind itself, Buddha-nature, etc. To see dharmas as somehow independent of mind is to be caught up in conceptualization – for there is only the one mind, the essential nature of our own mind here and now:

Astus wrote:

At the same time, according to you, the mind that is Buddha is dependent. Although then you go on to say not that the mind is dependent, but that everything else depends on the buddha-mind. Still, going to the next section.

If the nature of mind is not independent, then how could it be unchanging?

Ted Biringer said:

That is the million dollar question! Yes!

In any case, the fact that this awareness or mind is unchanging or immutable and at the same time not independent is asserted by the masters.

Astus wrote:

If something is unchanging and dependent, then it necessarily depends on something unchanging, otherwise it would be changing as well. What other unchanging and dependent things are there?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 19th, 2022 at 9:17 PM

Title: Re: On the Unchanging Nature of the One Mind

Content:

Ted Biringer said:

On the Unchanging Nature of the One Mind

Zen study is basically to reach the fundamental and clarify the essence of mind. If you don't reach the fundamental, you live and die in vain, misunderstanding yourself and others. As for what this fundamental essence is, your features may differ as you die and are born over and over again, but at all times there is an inherent awareness.

Keizan, Transmission of Light, Thomas Cleary, p. 136 (Emphasis added)

Astus wrote:

A https://www.sotozen.com/eng/library/denkoroku/pdf/CHAPTER_THIRTY_TWO.pdf:

'To inquire into Zen and study the way is, at root, for the purpose of penetrating through to what is fundamental, and greatly clarifying the mind-nature. If you do not reach the fundamental, you will have lived uselessly and will die uselessly, deluding self and deluding others. When we speak of so-called original nature, it means that all of you people - although you change shape through death after death, birth after birth, and face after face - are, from hour to hour and moment to moment, never unendowed with perfectly complete wisdom.'

Ted Biringer said:

Mind is like the void in which there is no confusion or evil, as when the sun wheels through it shining upon the four corners of the world. For, when the sun rises and illuminates the whole earth, the void gains not in brilliance; and, when the sun sets, the void does not darken. The phenomena of light and dark alternate with each other, but the nature of the void remains unchanged. So it is with the Mind of the Buddha and of sentient beings. If you look upon the Buddha as presenting a pure, bright or Enlightened appearance, or upon sentient beings as presenting a foul, dark or mortal-seeming appearance, these conceptions resulting from attachment to form will keep you from supreme knowledge, even after the passing of as many aeons as there are sands in the Ganges. There is only the One Mind and not a particle of anything else on which to lay hold, for this Mind is the Buddha. If you students of the Way do not awake to this Mind substance, you will overlay Mind with conceptual thought, you will seek the Buddha outside yourselves, and you will remain attached to forms, pious practices and so on, all of which are harmful and not at all the way to supreme knowledge.

The Zen Teaching of Huang-Po, John Blofeld, p.31 (Emphasis added)

Astus wrote:

A newer version (Bird in Flight Leaves no Trace, ch 1):

'Like empty space, that mind is free from admixture or deterioration. It is like the great orb of the sun that shines over all four quarters of the world. When the sun rises, its light shines over the entire world, but empty space has never been illuminated. When the sun sets, darkness pervades the entire world, but empty space has never been darkened. The realms of light and dark alternate, but the nature of empty space is expansive and invariable. The minds of both buddhas and sentient beings are also like this. Say one observes buddhas as having the characteristics of purity, radiance, and liberation or observes sentient beings as having the characteristics of foulness, darkness, and birth and death. One who generates such an understanding will not be able to attain bodhi [enlightenment] even after kalpas [eons] as numerous as the sands of the Ganges, because one is attached to characteristics. There is only this one mind; there is not another dharma, even as small as a mote of dust, to be attained. The mind is the buddha. Those who train in the Way these days do not awaken to the essence of this mind. They then give rise to mental states overlaying this mind, seek the buddha externally, and practice while being attached to characteristics. All these are harmful techniques, not the path to bodhi.'

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 20th, 2022 at 4:28 AM

Title: Re: On the Unchanging Nature of the One Mind

Content:

Ted Biringer said:

All dharmas are like a dream: this is what all the saints have taught. Consequently, deluded thoughts are originally calm and the sense-spheres are originally void. This void and calm mind is numinous, aware, and never dark. This void and calm mind is precisely the pure-mind which was transmitted by our predecessor, Bodhidharma. Whether deluded or awakened, the mind is fundamentally self-aware. It does not come into existence through dependence on conditions; it does not arise because of sense-objects. When deluded it is subject to the defilements, but this awareness is actually not those defilements. When awakened it can manifest magic and miracles, but this awareness is actually not that magic or those miracles.

This one word "awareness" is the source of all wonders." Because of delusion concerning this awareness, the marks of self arise.

Zen Master Tsung-mi (Zongmi), as quoted by Zen Master Chinul in the Collected Works of Chinul, translated by Robert Buswell, p.265 (Emphasis added)

Astus wrote:

Alternative translation:

'All dharmas are like a dream. All the noble ones have said the same thing. Therefore, thought of the unreal from the outset is calmed, and sense objects from the outset are void. The mind of voidness and calm is a spiritual Knowing that never darkens. This calm Knowing of voidness and calm is precisely the mind of voidness and calm that Bodhidharma formerly transmitted. Whether you are deluded or awakened, mind from the outset is spontaneously Knowing. [Knowing] is not produced by conditions, nor does it arise in dependence on sense objects. Even during delusion the depravities are Knowing, but [Knowing] is not the depravities. Even during awakening the divine transformations are Knowing, but Knowing is not the divine transformations. Thus, the one word "Knowing" is the source of all excellence.'

(Zongmi on Chan, p 88; X63, no. 1225, pp. 33c20-34a1)

Ted Biringer said:

Question: According to the explanations of the noumenal nature given in all the Mahayana satras, in the teachings of all the schools of Son both past and present, and even in Ho-tse's school, there is neither arising nor ceasing, creation nor sign, ordinary man nor saint, right nor wrong: truth is inexpressible and unattestable. Why not simply accept this standpoint? What need is there to discuss numinous awareness?

Answer: These are all examples of apophatic discourse;" they are not intended to expose the essence of the mind. If I did not point out that the clear, constant awareness which is present now, never interrupted and never obscured, is your own mind, what could I refer to as being uncreated and signless and so forth? For this reason, you must realize that all the various teachings explain only that it is this awareness which is neither arising nor ceasing and so forth. Consequently, Ho-tse pointed to the knowledge and vision which exist within the void and signless state so that men would recognize it; then they could comprehend that even though their minds pass from one life to another, the mind is eternally uninterrupted until the achievement of Buddhahood. Furthermore, Ho-tse gathered together various terms like uncreated, nonabiding, even inexpressible, and simply referred to them all as being the void and calm awareness which assimilates everything. Voidness means that it is devoid of all signs; it is still an apophatic term. Calm is the immutable, immovable aspect of the real nature; it is not the same as empty nothingness. Awareness refers to the manifestation of this very essence; it is not the same as discrimination. These three components alone comprise the fundamental essence of the true mind. Therefore, from the initial activation of the bodhicitta until the attainment of Buddhahood, there is only calmness and only awareness, unchanging and uninterrupted.

Zen Master Tsung-mi (Zongmi), as quoted by Zen Master Chinul in the Collected Works of Chinul, translated by Robert Buswell, p.274 (Emphasis added)

Astus wrote:

Alternative translation:

'[Pei Xiu] asks: According to the Mahayana sutras and the Chan gates of all the lineages from the past to the present, up to and including what Heze says, the nature of principle is always the same. [They all] say: "There is neither arising nor disappearing; there is neither the conditioned nor characteristics; there is neither the noble one nor the common person; there is neither right nor wrong; [it is] not to be proven; [it is] not to be spoken of." If in the present we just rely on this, it will be correct. What need is there to speak of spiritual Knowing?

[Zongmi] answers: These are but negative expressions, which have yet openly to show the mind substance. If it is not pointed out that right now the complete and constant Knowing that never darkens is one's own mind, then what are we speaking of as "neither the conditioned nor characteristics," etc.? Thus, we know that the teachings just say that this Knowing neither arises nor disappears, etc. Therefore, the Heze, at the locus of voidness and the absence of characteristics, points out Knowing-seeing. This enables people to attain recognition, that is, awaken to their own mind, passing over the rebirth process and transcending the world, eternally without interruption, up to and including becoming buddhas. Heze also takes care of various expressions such as "unconditioned," "non-abiding," up to and including "inexpressible," etc., just by speaking of "the Knowing of voidness and calm." Everything is subsumed. "Voidness" means to empty out all characteristics; it is still a negative term. Just "calm" is the immutable principle of the real nature; it is not the same as voidness and nonexistence. Knowing is the principle of revealing the thing-in-itself;⁶⁸ it is not the same as discrimination. Just this is the original substance of the true mind. Therefore, from the first time one produces the thought [of awakening] up to and including becoming a buddha [it is] just calm, just Knowing, immutable and uninterrupted.¹ (Zongmi on Chan, p 93-94; X63, no. 1225, pp. 34c13-35a1)

Ted Biringer said:

"Who would have thought," I said to the patriarch, "that the essence of mind is intrinsically pure! Who would have thought that the essence of mind is intrinsically free from becoming or annihilation! Who would have thought that the essence of mind is intrinsically self-sufficient! Who would have thought that the essence of mind is intrinsically free from change! Who would have thought that all things are the manifestation of the essence of mind!"

The Sutra of Hui-Neng, A. F. Price & Wong Mou-lam, p.73 (Emphasis added)

Astus wrote:

Better translations:

"I experienced a great enlightenment, [realizing that] all the myriad dharmas do not transcend their self-natures. I thereupon informed the patriarch of this, saying, 'No matter when, the self-natures are fundamentally and naturally pure. No matter when, the self-natures are fundamentally neither generated nor extinguished. No matter when, the self-natures are fundamentally and naturally sufficient unto themselves. No matter when, the self-natures are fundamentally without movement. No matter when, the self-natures are able to generate the myriad dharmas.'"

(Platform Sutra, ch 1, BDK ed, p 23)

'Hui Neng experienced the great enlightenment and he knew that all the ten thousand dharmas are not separate from the self-nature. He said to the Patriarch:

How unexpected! The self-nature is originally pure in itself.
How unexpected! The self-nature is originally neither produced nor destroyed.
How unexpected! The self-nature is originally complete in itself.
How unexpected! The self-nature is originally without movement.
How unexpected! The self-nature can produce the ten thousand dharmas.'
(<http://www.cttbusa.org/6patriarch/6patriarch3.asp.html>)

Ted Biringer said:

A. The Greatness of the Essence of Suchness

The essence of Suchness knows no increase or decrease in ordinary men, the Hinayanists, the Bodhisattvas, or the Buddhas. It was not brought into existence in the beginning nor will it cease to be at the end of time; it is eternal through and through.

B. The Greatness of the Attributes of Suchness

From the beginning, Suchness in its nature is fully provided with all excellent qualities; namely, it is endowed with the light of great wisdom, the qualities of illuminating the entire universe, of true cognition and mind pure in its self-nature; of eternity, bliss, Self, and purity; of refreshing coolness, immutability, and freedom. It is endowed with these excellent qualities which outnumber the sands of the Ganges, which are not independent of, disjointed from, or different from the essence of Suchness, and which are suprarational attributes of Buddhahood. Since it is endowed completely with all these, and is not lacking anything, it is called the Tathagata-garbha when latent and also the Dharmakaya of the Tathagata.

Question: It was explained before that the essence of Suchness is undifferentiated and devoid of all characteristics. Why is it, then, that you have described its essence as having these various excellent qualities?

Answer: Though it has, in reality, all these excellent qualities, it does not have any characteristics of differentiation; it retains its identity and is of one flavor; Suchness is solely one.

The Awakening of Faith, Yoshito Hakeda, p.64-65 (Emphasis added)

Astus wrote:

A better translation:

"Moreover, suchness' own intrinsic reality and characteristics neither increase nor decrease for any ordinary people, hearers (śrāvaka), solitary realizers (pratyekabuddha), bodhisattvas, or buddhas. It is neither that suchness arose in a former time, nor that it will cease at some future time. It is absolutely constant. It has always been inherently replete with all qualities. It means this because of the idea that [suchness'] own intrinsic reality is imbued with the light of great wisdom; that it pervasively illuminates the dharma realm; that it is the recognition of reality; that it is the intrinsically pristine mind; that it is eternal, blissful, Self, and pure; and that it is cool, unchanging, and sovereign [that is, nirvana]. And it is because [suchness' own intrinsic reality] is replete with inconceivable buddha dharmas more numerous than the sands of the Ganges, which are not separate, not cut off from, and not different from it, to the extent that it is perfect and lacks nothing. It is called the tathāgatagarbha; it is also called the dharma body of tathāgatas.

Question: Earlier, you stated that the intrinsic reality of suchness is uniform and free from all characteristics. How, then, can you also state that this intrinsic reality has such various kinds of qualities?

Answer: Although suchness truly has these qualities, it has no characteristics of differentiation. It is homogeneous and of one taste: there is only one suchness. Why? Since it is without any discriminating [function], and so free from the characteristics of discrimination, it is therefore non-dual."

(Treatise on Awakening Mahāyāna Faith, 1.2.7)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 20th, 2022 at 5:55 AM

Title: Re: On the Unchanging Nature of the One Mind

Content:

clayde said:

Regardless of name or translation, how can the ineffable be "without movement" (function) and give rise to "the ten thousand dharmas"?

Astus wrote:

Because 'the ineffable' is not a thing. The nature of mind, like the nature of everything, is without movement (see Sengzhao's treatises), and it is the mind that thinks and names everything. But since it's all just ideas and names, including the mind, there's nothing actually arising or ceasing. Furthermore, even this comprehension of there being nothing to grasp needs letting go of (see discussion with Zhichang in chapter 7 of the Platform Sutra), how much more so the idea that there is really an ultimate?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 20th, 2022 at 2:59 PM

Title: Re: On the Unchanging Nature of the One Mind

Content:

clayde said:

Astus, If I had meant "the mind that thinks and names everything" I would not have used the term "ineffable".

Astus wrote:

How many minds are there?

clayde said:

Nevertheless, I did search for Sengzhao's treatise, but only found a scholarly review of it. (See: <https://philarchive.org/archive/HOTNO-3>.) Based on that review, Sengzhao's reasoning is that nothing moves through time. Additionally, Sengzhao holds that motion and rest are nondual.

Astus wrote:

They are available here: <https://bdkamerica.org/product/three-short-treatises-by-vasubandhu-sengzhao-and-zongmi/>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 21st, 2022 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: On the Unchanging Nature of the One Mind

Content:

cllyde said:

Then why are you calling it “the mind that thinks and names everything”?

Astus wrote:

That's what the mind does, among other things. To assume that there is a separate, special mind, can only mean there are two minds, and it begs the question: what is that other mind and what does it do? Saying that it cannot be explained, then why call it mind, or anything at all?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 21st, 2022 at 6:01 AM

Title: Re: On the Unchanging Nature of the One Mind

Content:

cllyde said:

Astus, Do you think that Huang Po meant “the mind that thinks and names everything” when he taught about Mind?

Astus wrote:

Could you be more specific what section of Huangbo's teachings you refer to?

'The five aggregates are mind, but the five aggregates have no self and no master.'
(A Bird in Flight Leaves No Trace, ch 4)

'mind means no-mind and attainment means there is nothing to attain.'
(ch 7)

'How can you recognize your own mind? That which right now is speaking is precisely your mind.'
(ch 16)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 21st, 2022 at 4:13 PM

Title: Re: On the Unchanging Nature of the One Mind

Content:

cllyde said:

Malcolm, Regarding capitalization of Mind, I was following the usage of Blofeld, the translator of Huang Po's teachings used in the OP.

Astus, See the OP.

P.S: I'm not fond of using "Mind" because of the confusion it may cause and prefer other terms such as Dharmakaya, but there are many others. See the quote of Chinul in the OP. I found "stringless lute" to be an amusing term, but he also uses "true mind" (the translator doesn't capitalize the terms).

Astus wrote:

In the OP there's a short quote from the beginning about one mind without much definition. To clarify, see this one for instance:

'It is like the nature of honey: if honey is sweet by nature, then all honey is sweet — you cannot say that a specific honey is sweet while the rest is bitter. Where would such a thing be possible? Therefore, it is said, 'Empty space has neither inside nor outside'; so too is it with the dharma nature. Empty space has no middle; so too is it with the dharma nature. Therefore sentient beings are buddhas and buddhas are sentient beings. Sentient beings and buddhas are intrinsically one in their essence. Saṃsāra and nirvāṇa, conditioned and unconditioned, are intrinsically one in their essence. Mundane and supramundane, the six rebirth destinies and the four modes of birth, the mountains, streams, and lands, and the nature and its lack are also the same one essence. By calling them the 'same,' we mean that their designations are empty, their existence is empty, and their nonexistence is empty. Worlds as numerous as the sands of the Ganges are inherently this one emptiness.'
(A Bird in Flight Leaves No Trace, 2.29)

In other words, what makes 'one' in 'one mind' is the essence, that is emptiness. Another term for it is self-nature (zixing 自性).

clyde said:

Now that we've discussed capitalization, terminology, and my motives for raising a question, let me rephrase my question.

Astus linked this,

Astus wrote:

How unexpected! The self-nature is originally without movement.

How unexpected! The self-nature can produce the ten thousand dharmas.'

(<http://www.cttbusa.org/6patriarch/6patriarch3.asp.html>)

clyde said:

How does the self-nature produce the ten thousand dharmas without movement?

Malcolm said:

What is a "self-nature"?

Astus wrote:

Huangbo:

'The self-nature is empty and pervasive, that's all.'
(A Bird in Flight Leaves No Trace, 1.7)

'This immaculate self-nature is originally neither deluded nor awakened. The realm of empty space that entirely pervades the ten directions is intrinsically our one-mind essence. Even though you engage in dynamic functioning and productive activity, how are these separate from empty space? Empty space is originally neither large nor small, neither contaminated nor conditioned, neither deluded nor awakened. If you look clearly, you'll find not a single thing, no persons and no buddhas. Bringing an end to even a hair's breadth of conceptualization means not relying on or being attached to anything. A clear stream flowing in one direction is the selfnature's acquiescence to the nonproduction of dharmas.'
(A Bird in Flight Leaves No Trace, 2.16)

Huineng:

"The ratiocination of the mind is vast, like space, which is boundless. ... The wondrous natures of people of this world are empty, without a single dharma that can be perceived. The emptiness of the self-natures is also like this.

...

The emptiness of the natures of the people of this world is also like this. Good friends, that the self-natures can embody the myriad dharmas is 'great.' The myriad dharmas are within people's natures. If one perceives the goodness and badness of people without ever grasping or rejecting [their goodness and badness], one will not become tainted or attached. For the mind to be like space is called 'great.'
(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 28, 29)

"There is in the self-nature fundamentally not a single dharma that can be perceived. To think that there were any would be a false explanation, a disaster, a false view of enervating defilements. Therefore, this teaching takes nonthought as its central doctrine. ... Good friends, thoughts are activated from the self-nature of suchness. Although the six sensory faculties possess perceptual cognition, they do not defile the myriad realms. And yet the true nature is always autonomous. Therefore, the sutra says, 'When one is able to discriminate well the characteristics of the dharmas, this is to be unmoving within the cardinal meaning.'
(Platform Sutra, ch 4, BDK ed, p 44)

SELF-NATURE (Ch. zixing 自性)

"A Chan soteriological term referring to a person's Buddha-nature. It does not denote any self-existence or any changeless essence existent in and by itself. No such metaphysical meaning is involved in the original use of this term. A notable case of the traditional Chan usage of this term is in the Platform Sutra, where Buddha-nature is equicalent to self-nature (zixing) in the sense that Buddha-nature cannot be objectified and realized outside each person. Seeing or realizing the Buddha-nature is the existential transformation of the human mind and entire personhood, being able to understand and appreciate what constitutes a person - elements of impermanence and non-abiding - and then acting accordingly. The realization of self-nature thus requires the accomplishment of action, the practical-behavioral carrying out of non-attachment, rather than identifying a metaphysical object or discovering subjectivity through knowledge. The usage also indicates the Chan appropriation of positive or kataphatic language in its teachings without abandoning the use of negative or apophatic language: the Chan walk on two roads."

(Historical Dictionary of Chan Buddhism by Youru Wang)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 21st, 2022 at 6:35 PM

Title: Re: On the Unchanging Nature of the One Mind

Content:

master of puppets said:

The Origin of Heaven and Earth

Has no Name.

The Mother of the Myriad Things

Has a Name.

Astus wrote:

The Taoist idea of a single source/substrate is rejected by Zongmi in the Treatise on the Origin of Humanity found in the same volume as Sengzhao's treatises <https://bdkamerica.org/product/three-short-treatises-by-vasubandhu-sengzhao-and-zongmi/>.

An exemple from Zongmi to show some problems with imagining a singular source for all things:

'Again, it has been said that the myriad things are produced and transformed by Nature and do not arise due to causes and conditions. If this is the case, then birth and transformation would take place everywhere free from causes and conditions. This means that a stone might give birth to grass, grass might give birth to a man, and men might give birth to animals, etc. Furthermore, it would also mean that all birth would be without the distinction of prior and subsequent, that the time of rising from bed [after sleep] would be no different whether in the morning or evening, that immortality does not depend on alchemy and herbs, that peace does not depend on virtuous talents, and that humaneness and justice are not dependent on education and cultivation. If this is so, how could the doctrines established by Laozi, Zhuangzi, the Duke of Zhou, and Confucius have become the norm?'

(Treatise on the Origin of Humanity, in Three Short Treatises, BDK ed, p 149-150)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 11th, 2022 at 7:42 PM

Title: Re: Some Available Chan Meditation Scriptures in context

Content:

Astus wrote:

Why "chan meditation scriptures"? There are the so called https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dhy%C4%81na_sutras, but they're more like a background for what became the Chan school. The major work of Zhiyi should also be mentioned in that context:

https://www.google.com/books/edition/Clear_Serenity_Quiet_Insight/ZIGVswEACAAJ?hl=en.

As for sutras more closely associated with Chanzong:

https://www.google.com/books/edition/The_Sutra_of_Perfect_Enlightenment/xROTQH4RQwC?hl=en;

https://www.google.com/books/edition/Cultivating_Original_Enlightenment/LY4BEAAAQBAJ?hl=en;

https://www.google.com/books/edition/The_Surangama_Sutra/I59_BAAAQBAJ?hl=en.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 16th, 2022 at 6:22 AM

Title: Re: Why do Zen teachers write books?

Content:

clde said:

but why do Zen teachers write books?

Astus wrote:

For the same reason they talk: to teach. After all, a teacher who does not teach is not a teacher. What is beyond words and letters cannot be something taught or transmitted.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 16th, 2022 at 6:28 PM

Title: Re: Why do Zen teachers write books?

Content:

clde said:

Yes, I agree that talking and writing books is a method of teaching - but if "What is beyond words and letters cannot be something taught or transmitted," what is it that Zen teachers teach in their books?

Astus wrote:

What is it that Zen teachers teach? Generally it should be the same message that the Buddha and the ancestors repeated over and over throughout the centuries. It shouldn't matter if it's a formal speech, an informal discussion, a blog post, an essay, or a book.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 17th, 2022 at 6:27 AM

Title: Re: Why do Zen teachers write books?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kosho Uchiyama:

'What I want for you, the reader, is that you understand with your own intellect that Zen concerns the true depth of life that is beyond the reach of that intellect. This “life” is not Eastern or Western, it extends through all humanity. I hope that as you read you will look at your own life with a completely fresh mind and apply what I have written to your everyday life. That is the only place where the real world of Zen is.'

(Opening the Hand of Thought, p xxx)

Koun Yamada:

'It is my hope that this book will be a true aid to people around the world who are earnestly seeking a way to spiritual peace, and that it will inspire many to set out on the path of Zen practice. It is my particular wish that the book will provide sound information on matters concerning Zen and Buddhism that heretofore may have been given incomplete treatment in other books.'

(Zen: The Authentic Gate, p xv)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 21st, 2022 at 3:04 PM

Title: Re: Are these points against a Ishwara creator valid from a buddhist point of view?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Arguments may work within a rational context, but the fear of God is based on irrational ideas. Emotions like anxiety and doubt are easier to overcome by addressing them directly instead of the roundabout way of reasoning. Similarly, whatever one may imagine to be the supreme being, that is nothing more than fantasy that not only cannot be proven to exist in any experiential or logical way, but is rather harmful in hindering one in actually eliminating the causes of suffering. And it being an obstacle to liberation is the main argument in Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 29th, 2022 at 10:30 PM

Title: Re: “special transmission”?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The master said: The mind is transmitted with the mind.

[The questioner] said: If the mind is transmitted, how can you say that the mind is also nonexistent?

The master said: To not attain a single dharma is called the transmission of the mind. If you comprehend this mind, then there is no mind and no dharma.

[The questioner] said: If there is no mind and no dharma, why do you call it a transmission?

The master said: You have heard me say “transmission of the mind” and have taken it that there is something that can be attained. It is for this reason that the patriarch said, “When one recognizes the mind-nature, it should be called inconceivable. Clearly and distinctly without anything that is attained, when one attains it one does not speak of it as understanding.” If I taught this to you how would you be able to understand it?

(Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 36)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 31st, 2022 at 3:36 AM

Title: Re: Sōtō Zen, the Nembutsu & Jōdo Shū?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Pure Land and Chan have been practised together for many centuries in China, Korea, and Vietnam. Here are some readily available works that can introduce you to how it's done (you might start with the third one's (Dialogs with Ancient Masters) first chapter to clarify some doubts):

<https://ymba.org/books/buddhism-wisdom-faith-pure-land-principles-and-practice> (a modern summary)

<https://ymba.org/books/pure-land-patriarchs> (teachings by a Chan master)

http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/pureland.pdf (teachings by Tiantai founder Zhiyi and a Chan master)

https://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/yin_kuang.pdf (letters by a modern Pure Land master)

<http://ftp.budaedu.org/ebooks/pdf/EN060.pdf> (teachings by Chan masters)

<https://ymba.org/books/taming-monkey-mind-guide-pure-land-practice> (various methods of buddha-remembrance)

<https://ymba.org/books/mind-seal-buddhas> (Amitabha Sutra commentary)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 1st, 2022 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: Who?

Content:

clyde said:

What did the Buddha mean when he taught this? Who is sure to become old, ill and die? Who will be separated and parted? Who is the owner and heir? Who is it that does good or evil?

Astus wrote:

The <https://read.84000.co/translation/UT22084-062-010.html> is a good summary on the matter:

"How is the conditional relation in inner dependent arising to be seen? As due to the coming together of six elements. As due to the coming together of what six elements? Namely, the conditional relation in inner dependent arising is to be seen as due to the coming together of the elements of earth, water, fire, wind, space, and consciousness.

...

In this process, the earth element does not think, 'I provide the solidity of the body by assembling.' Nor does the water element think, 'I provide cohesion for the body.' Nor does the fire element think, 'I digest whatever the body eats, drinks, chews, or tastes.'

[F.119.b] Nor does the wind element think, 'I perform the function of the body's inhalation and exhalation.' Nor does the space element think, 'I create hollow spaces inside the body.' Nor does the element of consciousness think, 'I produce the name and form of the body.' Nor does the body think, 'I am produced by these conditions.' Yet, when these conditions are present, the body is born.

The earth element is not a self, not a being, not a life force, not a creature, not a human, not a person, not female, not male, not neuter, not me, not mine, and not anybody else's. Similarly, the water element, the fire element, the wind element, the space element, and the consciousness element are also not a self, not a being, not a life force, not a creature, not a human, not a person, not female, not male, not neuter, not me, not mine, and not anybody else's."

In Mazu Daoyi's words (Sun-Face Buddha, p 63):

"Since limitless kalpas, all worldly false thinking, [such as] flattery, dishonesty, self-esteem, and arrogance have formed one body. That is why the sutra says, 'It is only through the grouping of many dharmas that this body is formed. When it arises, it is only dharmas arising; when it ceases, it is only dharmas ceasing. When the dharmas arise, they do not say I arise; when they cease, they do not say I cease.'"

The sutra reference is from the

https://read.84000.co/translation/toh176.html#UT22084-060-005-202:

"The body is the issue of the four main elements, and in these elements there is no owner and no agent. There is no self in this body, and, except for arbitrary insistence on self, ultimately no 'I' which can be said to be sick can be apprehended. Therefore, thinking, '“I” should not adhere to any self, and “I” should rest in the knowledge of the root of illness,' he should abandon the conception of himself as a personality and produce the conception of himself as a thing, thinking, 'This body is an aggregate of many things. When it is born, only things are born; when it ceases, only things cease. These things have no awareness or feeling of each other. When they are born, they do not think, “I am born”; when they cease, they do not think, “I cease.”' Furthermore, he should understand thoroughly the conception of himself as a thing by cultivating the following consideration: 'Just as in the case of the conception of “self,” so the conception of “thing” is also a misunderstanding, and this misunderstanding is also a grave sickness; I should free myself from this sickness and should strive to abandon it.' What is the elimination of this sickness? It is the elimination of egoism and possessiveness. What is the elimination of egoism and possessiveness? It is the freedom from dualism. What is freedom from dualism? It is the absence of involvement with either the external or the internal. What is absence of involvement with either external or internal? It is non-deviation, non-fluctuation, and non-distraction from sameness. What is sameness? It is the sameness of everything from self to liberation. Why? Because both self and liberation are void. How can both be void? As verbal designations, they both are void, and neither is established in reality. Therefore, one who sees such sameness makes no difference between sickness and voidness; his sickness is itself voidness, and that sickness as voidness is itself void."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 6th, 2022 at 7:02 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Shikantaza

Content:

ajhayes said:

Is it fair to state that Mahamudra (TB in general, perhaps) approaches the real world in a mystical way while Zen approaches the mystical side realistically?

Astus wrote:

To be fair would require some definitions of those terms. Otherwise, they look like exaggerated generalisations based on little information about either of the traditions.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 8th, 2022 at 5:29 AM

Title: Re: Agamas in Mahayana

Content:

Tennyson said:

I received some interesting responses, and I was wondering if I could ask the question of you folks since I'm interested in hearing more about the use and relevance of the Agamas or other early texts in Mahayana Buddhism.

Astus wrote:

There is only a mere handful of agama sutras in the Tibetan canon, while in Chinese there are four almost complete collections and some other individual texts. They have been preserved but were very much irrelevant to virtually everyone until the 20th century.

Tennyson said:

I'm very fascinated by the history and development of different Buddhist schools/sects and how each sect's unique beliefs relate to what one could call the "basics" of Buddhist teaching: Four Noble Truths, Not-Self, etc.

Astus wrote:

Basic Buddhist concepts are not the same as the prevalence of the use of agama scriptures, since those concepts are also found in Mahayana sutras and treatises.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 8th, 2022 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: Agamas in Mahayana

Content:

DNS said:

The Chinese Agamas are very similar to the Pali Nikayas so I believe are relied on heavily within the Chan tradition.

Astus wrote:

Chan is a Mahayana school, and as such its primary scriptural references are Mahayana sutras. As it's famously said by Bodhidharma to Huike:

"I have the Laṅkāvatāra Sutra in four chapters which is also to be transmitted to you; this is the essential gate to the Tathāgata's teachings on the Heart-ground and makes it possible for all beings to enter awakening."

(Records of the Transmission of the Lamp, vol 1, 3.35)

And as once Huineng was told:

"Great Master [Hongren] always exhorts both monks and laymen to simply maintain the Diamond Sutra, so that one can see the [self]-nature by oneself and achieve buddhahood directly and completely."

(Platform Sutra, ch 1, BDK ed, p 18)

Also Huineng himself said:

"Good friends, if you wish to enter into the profound dharmadhātu and the samādhi of prajñā, you must cultivate the practice of prajñā and recite the Diamond Sutra. Thus will you attain seeing the nature. You should realize that the merits of this sutra are immeasurable and unlimited. They are clearly praised within the sutra; I cannot explain them fully here. This teaching is the Supreme Vehicle: it is preached for those of great wisdom, it is preached for those of superior capacities."

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 31)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 8th, 2022 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: Bodhisattva's austerities in the Agamas; going naked, letting his grow etc.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Looks like the standard account of the hardships Gautama went through that proved to be completely futile and meaningless: <https://suttacentral.net/mn36/en/sujato>.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 9th, 2022 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: Bodhisattva's austerities in the Agamas; going naked, letting his grow etc.

Content:

Aemilius said:

If you eat a vegetarian meal once a day, it is usually called fasting in the modern dietary teachings that you can read in various colorful magazines. There are several different varieties in this.

Astus wrote:

Eating only once or twice a day until noon is the Pratimoksha regulation, and it's also observed on certain days by devout lay people.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 10th, 2022 at 4:49 PM

Title: Re: "Radical" Ekayāna and the liberation of non-Buddhists?

Content:

FiveSkandhas said:

Can we then conclude, for example, that a virtuous practitioner of Christianity, Islam, Judaism, or Hinduism could in fact achieve Buddhist liberation through their faith? And based on the Ksitigarbha-related Sutra, could we conceive of, say, Shakyamuni Buddha taking on the form of Christ and saving (or at least "helping") a Christian worshipping what he believes to be Christ?

Astus wrote:

It's merely subsuming other religions under a Buddhist umbrella, it doesn't mean other paths on their own lead to liberation, but like shravakayana turns into bodhisattvayana, so good tirthikas eventually become Buddhists.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 10th, 2022 at 7:02 PM

Title: Re: "Radical" Ekayāna and the liberation of non-Buddhists?

Content:

FiveSkandhas said:

However the quotes above don't seem to explicitly deny the possibility of a faster path to liberation.

Astus wrote:

The very meaning of ekayana is that there is a single path, not many, so faster and slower ways do not exist, only people on different stages with various capacities.

FiveSkandhas said:

Worshipping a relevant Kami was said to be an expedient path for Japan's people to reach whichever Buddha or Bodhisattva the kami in question was considered a "projection" of... perhaps even a faster and more suitable way than directly addressing the Buddhist figure in question (although that went on too of course).

Astus wrote:

Neither recalling deities (devatānusmṛti) nor recalling buddhas (buddhānusmṛti) are sufficient methods for liberation on their own, but they can lead to concentration, concentration to wisdom, and wisdom to awakening.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 11th, 2022 at 3:53 AM

Title: Re: "Radical" Ekayāna and the liberation of non-Buddhists?

Content:

FiveSkandhas said:

Well, as I noted above, the old 神仏習合 Shinto-Buddhist Combinatory religion is generally considered heterodox by today's Buddhists inside and outside Japan, and in fact it was outlawed by the government in the Mid-1800s. Interestingly, tiny remnants remain here and there in the country, and there is a recent trend to revive certain aspects of the tradition.

Astus wrote:

In general there's nothing against worshipping all sorts of samsaric deities, as long as one does not expect liberation through such an act and it does not involve committing evil deeds.

It is a proper use of wealth to make offerings to gods:

'Furthermore, with his legitimate wealth he makes five spirit-offerings (pañcabali): to relatives, guests, ancestors, king, and deities (devatābali).'
(AN 4.61 & AN 5.41)

And in return gods should protect their worshippers:

'So pay heed, all you beings,
have love for humankind,
who day and night bring offerings (bali);
please protect them diligently.'
(Snp 2.1)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 13th, 2022 at 3:13 PM

Title: Re: "Radical" Ekayāna and the liberation of non-Buddhists?

Content:

FiveSkandhas said:

I have tended to believe that all valid Mahayana and Vajrayana paths lead to the same final desirable outcome, whatever term we use for it.

Astus wrote:

Let me highlight the difference that was stated:

Malcolm said:

From the point of view of secret mantra, common Mahāyāna does not teach the path of attaining buddhahood in a single lifetime, soup to nuts.

FiveSkandhas said:

cavalierly and universally dismiss nearly 2000 years of profound East Asian doctrine and practice as somehow universally "inferior" to what goes on in the Himalayas.

Astus wrote:

Neither a teaching's history, nor its popularity is an attribute to qualify its content as this or that, otherwise Gautama should have just accepted the Vedas.

FiveSkandhas said:

It just feels kind of like that sort of thing is more rooted in hustling for prestige and power and not purely a matter of selfless Dharmic exploration.

Astus wrote:

Not necessarily so. Also, every Buddhist tradition subscribes to generally the same basis expressed most succinctly in the four noble truths. When it comes to one method or doctrine being superior to another, one should look at the criteria used and the context applied to. The fundamental outline of the path is the same anyhow: the three trainings, calm and insight, and elimination of attachment. Again, it's not anything debated. One can perhaps argue that visualising oneself as Tara is a quicker way to achieve samadhi than reciting Amitufo, but it's more likely up to the individual's inclinations.

'There are no sudden and gradual in the Dharma,
It is delusion and enlightenment that are slow or fast.
It is only this teaching of seeing the nature
Which stupid people cannot comprehend.'
(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 34)

'To sum up what is essential: the view conceiving the existence of the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha as well as the view conceiving the existence of nirvāṇa—views such as these which conceive the existence of something to be gained are just strains of thought rooted in attachment. As for “attachment,” this is what is referred to as “wrong view.” Why? Persons with wrong views are those who circulate about within the three realms remaining eternally separated from the essential means of escape. This person who indulges in attachments is of just this very sort. He remains eternally separated from the essential means of escape and thus, even to the very end, remains unable to realize anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi.'
(Vasubandhu's Treatise on the Bodhisattva Vow, ch 10)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 13th, 2022 at 4:58 PM

Title: Re: Bodhisattva's austerities in the Agamas; going naked, letting his grow etc.

Content:

Aemilius said:

Also, fasting etc are not completely without results.

Astus wrote:

It is stated explicitly both in your above quote of EA 31.8:

'During those six years of diligent hardship pursuing awakening, I hadn't won anything.'

and in MN 36:

'But I have not achieved any superhuman distinction in knowledge and vision worthy of the noble ones by this severe, grueling work.'

Aemilius said:

As the Bhagavan Shakyamuni himself says, he developed or manifested equanimity/nonhatred towards unpleasant circumstances through these ascetic practices.

Astus wrote:

It's merely stated that his mind was not moved by the pleasant and painful feelings, not that it was by developed because of asceticism.

As the Buddha told Mara:

'I realized that it's pointless; all that mortification in search of immortality is as futile as oars and rudder on dry land. Ethics, immersion, and wisdom: by developing this path to awakening I attained ultimate purity.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn4.1/en/sujato>)

And from <https://suttacentral.net/ea19.2/en/huyenvi-boinwebb-pasadika>

(https://canon.dharmapearls.net/01_agama/ekottarika/19/EA_19_02.html):

'There are two modes of behaviour which a person in quest of the highest truth should avoid. Which are the two? Desiring, craving for objects of sensual pleasure which by its nature is low, vulgar and unprofitable. On the other hand, all sorts of mortification, many acts of harming and endless tormenting thoughts. These are the two modes of behaviour which a person in quest of the highest truth should avoid. Having given up these two modes of behaviour, on my own I gained the highest truth and became fully enlightened.'

More on the subject of self-mortification see e.g.

<https://suttacentral.net/dn25/en/sujato>

As for what the Buddha regularly taught regarding eating, it was moderation (e.g.

<https://suttacentral.net/an3.16/en/sujato>):

'And how does a mendicant eat in moderation? It's when a mendicant reflects properly on the food that they eat: 'Not for fun, indulgence, adornment, or decoration, but only to sustain this body, to avoid harm, and to support spiritual practice. In this way, I shall put an end to old discomfort and not give rise to new discomfort, and I will live blamelessly and at ease.' That's how a mendicant eats in moderation.'

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 13th, 2022 at 10:20 PM

Title: Re: Bodhisattva's austerities in the Agamas; going naked, letting his grow etc.

Content:

Sādhaka said:

Indeed; there are many benefits of achieving metabolic flexibility through intermittent fasting and occasional prolonged fasting routines.

Astus wrote:

Similar practices are told about some contemporaries of the Buddha that are 'not the legitimate development of physical endurance in the noble one's training'

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn36/en/sujato>):

“But Aggivessana, what have you heard about the development of physical endurance?”

“Take, for example, Nanda Vaccha, Kisa Saṅkicca, and Makkhali Gosāla. They go naked, ignoring conventions. They lick their hands, and don't come or wait when called. They don't consent to food brought to them, or food prepared on purpose for them, or an invitation for a meal. They don't receive anything from a pot or bowl; or from someone who keeps sheep, or who has a weapon or a shovel in their home; or where a couple is eating; or where there is a woman who is pregnant, breastfeeding, or who has a man in her home; or where there's a dog waiting or flies buzzing. They accept no fish or meat or liquor or wine, and drink no beer. They go to just one house for alms, taking just one mouthful, or two houses and two mouthfuls, up to seven houses and seven mouthfuls. They feed on one saucer a day, two saucers a day, up to seven saucers a day. They eat once a day, once every second day, up to once a week, and so on, even up to once a fortnight. They live committed to the practice of eating food at set intervals.”

“But Aggivessana, do they get by on so little?”

“No, Master Gotama. Sometimes they eat a variety of luxury foods and drink a variety of luxury beverages. They gather their body's strength, build it up, and get fat.”

“What they earlier gave up, they later got back. That is how there is the increase and decrease of this body. But Aggivessana, what have you heard about development of the mind?” When Saccaka was questioned by the Buddha about development of the mind, he was stumped.

So the Buddha said to Saccaka, “The development of physical endurance that you have described is not the legitimate development of physical endurance in the noble one's training. And since you don't even understand the development of physical endurance, how can you possibly understand the development of the mind?”

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 14th, 2022 at 4:45 AM

Title: Re: Bodhisattva's austerities in the Agamas; going naked, letting his grow etc.

Content:

Sādhaka said:

for the moment we can at least say that Buddhist & Bönpo monks (in all traditions as far as I'm aware) are usually doing intermittent-fasting for about 17-20 hours a day on average, and not usually eating anything after solar noon.

Astus wrote:

It is not called fasting but it is one of the precepts for monastics.

“Mendicants, I eat my food in one sitting per day. Doing so, I find that I'm healthy and well, nimble, strong, and living comfortably. You too should eat your food in one sitting per day. Doing so, you'll find that you're healthy and well, nimble, strong, and living comfortably.”

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn65/en/sujato>)

It's a precept also observed by lay people during uposatha/sabbath:

‘As long as they live, the perfected ones eat in one part of the day, abstaining from eating at night and from food at the wrong time. I, too, for this day and night will eat in one part of the day, abstaining from eating at night and food at the wrong time. I will observe the sabbath by doing as the perfected ones do in this respect.’

(<https://suttacentral.net/an3.70/en/sujato>, <https://suttacentral.net/an8.41/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 14th, 2022 at 2:55 PM

Title: Re: Bodhisattva's austerities in the Agamas; going naked, letting his grow etc.

Content:

Malcolm said:

Much prefer the witches sabbath, getting naked in the moonlight, dancing around fires, broomsticks...

Astus wrote:

Uposatha and ganacakra are not exclusive, are they? (reminds me of <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=rYJQGSapz-A>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 14th, 2022 at 8:32 PM

Title: Re: Bodhisattva's austerities in the Agamas; going naked, letting his grow etc.

Content:

Aemilius said:

Because the world knew and had heard about the ascetic Gautama, they expected that he might attain something one day. If he had just left the palace and walked to the Bodhi-tree in his silken garments, wearing his golden ornaments, fresh like a flower from a warm bath, do you think he would have attained anything?

Astus wrote:

The Buddha wasn't famous because he practised for a short period self-mortification and got an emaciated body, and he himself said it was of no use for his subsequent attainment of liberation. Some people also knew him because he was a son of a ruler, but it doesn't mean we should all live a luxurious life.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 16th, 2022 at 3:58 AM

Title: Re: "Radical" Ekayāna and the liberation of non-Buddhists?

Content:

Anders said:

For the quickest finish, there's shravakayana.

Astus wrote:

In the triyana version yes, but not if there's only one vehicle. As for the possibility of buddhahood in this life, it depends on whether one accepts buddha-nature as complete with all buddha qualities or not.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 17th, 2022 at 3:33 PM

Title: Re: another question about rebirth

Content:

Astus wrote:

A mind, even one's own, is an inference, a mere linguistic construct. So it is with others' too.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 19th, 2022 at 2:27 PM

Title: Re: another question about rebirth

Content:

reiun said:

In Zen mind is Buddha.

Astus wrote:

Because the mind is imaginary, essentially empty.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 19th, 2022 at 7:47 PM

Title: Re: another question about rebirth

Content:

reiun said:

And the essence of that emptiness is Buddhanature, which is nondual.

Astus wrote:

Emptiness means lack of essence. Because some might mistake emptiness for a thing, it's also stated that even emptiness is empty of any essence. And as you say, emptiness is non-dual, and can be also called buddha nature.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 20th, 2022 at 4:29 PM

Title: Re: another question about rebirth

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here are some straightforward words from the great master Jinul on the matters of mind and rebirth.

First one should be able to distinguish body and mind:

'From morning to evening, throughout the twelve periods of the day, during all your actions and activities—whether you are hearing or seeing, laughing or talking, angry or happy, engaging in propriety or impropriety —speak! Ultimately who is it that is able to perform all these actions? If you say that it is the physical body that is acting, then at the moment when a person's life comes to an end, even though the body has not yet decayed, how is it that the eyes cannot see, the ears cannot hear, the nose cannot smell, the tongue cannot talk, the body cannot move, the hands cannot grasp, and the feet cannot run? You should know that what is capable of seeing, hearing, moving, and acting is perforce your original mind; it is not your physical body.'

(Moguja's Secrets on Cultivating the Mind, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 2, p 220)

Then see how the mind, when driven by passions, is trapped in the beginningless cycle of rebirth:

'If you are not stabilized in the tranquil thought of dhyāna, your activating consciousness (ōpsik 業識) will drift, with no foundation upon which to ground itself. At the moment of your death, wind and fire will oppress you, the four material elements (mahābhūta) will separate and scatter, and the mind will go mad, feeling stifled and cramped, and become subject to the inversions (viparyāsa) and distorted views. As you have no stratagem for soaring into the heavens above nor any plan through which to enter the earth below, you will cower in fright, bereft of everything on which you used to rely. Your physical body will be left behind as if it were a cicada's cast-off shell.

Confused about the road stretching before you, your lonely spirit will have to go on alone. Although you may have owned precious jewelry and priceless riches, you can take none of it with you. Although you may have relatives from prestigious households, ultimately not one of them can follow along behind to rescue you. This is what is meant by the statement, "What one makes oneself, one receives oneself; there is no one to take one's place."

(Encouragement to Practice: The Compact of the Samādhi and Prajñā Society, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 2, p 141)

And the situation of the awakened ones:

'Now, those who penetrate to the true mind tally with the enlightened nature, which is not subject to arising and ceasing, and give rise to the sublime functioning, which is also not subject to arising and ceasing. Their sublime essence is real, eternal, and originally free of arising and ceasing, but their sublime functioning adapts to the environment and seems to display arising and ceasing. Nevertheless, since the function arises from the essence, function and essence are identical; thus how can there be any arising and ceasing? Because accomplished men have realized that true essence, could arising and ceasing intrude in any way? It is like water: moisture is its essence and waves are its function. Since the moist nature of water is forever unchanging, how can the moist nature within the waves change? But as waves cannot exist apart from that moist nature, they too are unchanging. For this reason the ancients said, "The whole earth is the one proper eye of this śramaṇa. The whole earth is a Saṃgharāma [monastery] - a sanctuary for the man who has awakened to the noumenon."

Once a person has penetrated to the true mind, the four kinds of birth and the six destinies instantly disappear. The mountains, the rivers, and the great earth are all discovered to be the true mind. Hence it is impossible that there could be any other refuge apart from this true mind. Since there are then no more false causes within the triple world, there can be no false results of rebirth in its six destinies. And if there are no false results, what refuge can be spoken of? There is no separate "this" or "that"; and since there is no "this" or "that," how can there be right and wrong? All the worlds in the ten directions are only this one true mind; the whole body is their reward - there is no refuge distinct from it.

In the teaching about the Buddhas' and bodhisattvas' exhibition of special skills and powers, it is explained that we may take rebirth at will without obstacles or hindrances. As it is stated in the Transmission of the Lamp: The presiding minister Wen-ts'ao asked Master Kuei-feng, "After men who have awakened to the noumenon complete this life, where is their refuge?"

Kuei-feng answered, "There are no sentient beings who are not invested with the numinous and bright enlightened nature which is not different from that of all the Buddhas. If you can awaken to the fact that this nature is the dharmakāya and realize that originally you are unborn, then what need is there for a refuge? The numinous brightness is not obscured; it is clear and constantly aware. There is no place from which it came, and no place to which it will go. Only the void calmness can be considered to be your own essence; do not suppose that your essence is your physical body. The numinous awareness is your own mind; do not suppose that your mind is the deluded thoughts. If deluded thoughts arise, never follow them - then, when you are about to die, karma cannot bind you. Although you enter the intermediate state between rebirths, the direction you take is entirely up to you. Whether you go to the realm of gods or the realm of humans, you are free to take any refuge you want." This is the destination of the true mind after the dissolution of the body.'

(Straight Talk on the True Mind, in The Collected Works of Chinul, p 183-184)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 22nd, 2022 at 4:04 AM

Title: Re: Zen question

Content:

master of puppets said:

what is it that simple?

Astus wrote:

'When a mendicant has heard that nothing is worth insisting on, they directly know all things. Directly knowing all things, they completely understand all things.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn35.80/en/sujato>; also AN 7.61, MN 37)

'The essence of the Way is detachment.'

(Wake-up Sermon, in The Zen Teaching of Bodhidharma, p 47; X63, no. 1219, p. 5c9)

'To be attached to one's sensory realms in a preceding moment of thought is affliction, but to transcend the realms in a succeeding moment of thought is bodhi.'

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 30; T48, no. 2008, p. 350b29)

"Sāriputta, I can teach the Dhamma briefly; I can teach the Dhamma in detail; I can teach the Dhamma both briefly and in detail. It is those who can understand that are rare."

(<https://suttacentral.net/an3.33/en/bodhi>)

'What is the essence of the Buddha-dharma?' asked Bai.

'To refrain from all evil and do all that is good,' answered the master.

'A three-year-old child already knows these words,' said Bai.

'Although a three-year-old can say them, an old man of eighty can't put them into practice!' countered the master.

(Chan Master Hangzhou Niaoke Daolin, in Records of the Transmission of the Lamp, vol 2, 4.54; T51, no. 2076, p. 230b24-27)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 25th, 2022 at 2:12 PM

Title: Re: another question about rebirth

Content:

clyde said:

I've experienced many of the teachings of the Buddha directly, but I haven't experienced the ālāyavijñāna, so I can't say anything directly about it, even if it exists.

Astus wrote:

It's not to be experienced, because it cannot be experienced.

clyde said:

But if it exists, it's a dharma, and all dharmas are impermanent, arising with causes and conditions and ceasing, and empty of self. It's not the case that processes have a self, it's that we impute a self to them by seeing them as personal. So, when asked if there is a "separate, personal ālāyavijñāna", if one answers "Yes", then that imputes a self.

Astus wrote:

Compounded things are impermanent, but not all dharmas are compounded. The storehouse consciousness is not a dharma. The body is individual, but it does not become a self because of that.

clyde said:

Of course we see our lives as continuous from day to day, year after year.

Astus wrote:

And that's because of not recognising impermanence on a subtler level. The six consciousnesses do not cease merely at death, but practically every moment. So if it's problematic what connects one life to the next, it's also problematic what connects one conscious moment with another. That is a good topic to investigate experientially.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 27th, 2022 at 5:29 PM

Title: Re: "Radical" Ekayāna and the liberation of non-Buddhists?

Content:

Astus wrote:

For the one vehicle perspective to culminate in buddhahood the two vehicles' attainment has to be temporary, and that is explained by some attachments still remaining for them. Furthermore, in order to exist a path to buddhahood that is shorter than the minimum three incalculable aeons, the innumerable buddha qualities that otherwise would have to be accumulated over time must be present as buddha nature and revealed with the elimination of all clinging. Therefore the entirety of attachments is removed solely by wisdom.

'O Lord, the wisdom of the tathāgatagarbha is the Tathāgata's wisdom of emptiness (śūnyatā). O Lord, the tathāgatagarbha has not been seen nor attained originally by all the arhats, pratyekabuddhas, and powerful bodhisattvas.'

(Sūtra of Queen Śrīmālā of the Lion's Roar, ch 9, BDK ed, p 37)

'There is nothing to be removed from this

And not the slightest to be added.

Actual reality is to be seen as it really is—

Whoever sees actual reality is liberated.

The basic element is empty of what is adventitious,

Which has the characteristic of being separable.

It is not empty of the unsurpassable attributes,

Which have the characteristic of being inseparable.'

(Uttaratantra I.154-155, tr Brunnhölzl; v 154 is from <https://www.lotsawahouse.org/indian-masters/nagarjuna/heart-dependent-origination>)

'Since generosity just leads to wealth,
Discipline [just leads to] heaven, and meditation [just] relinquishes the afflictions,
While prajñā eliminates all afflictive and cognitive [obscurations],
It is supreme, and its cause is to study this [dharma].

...

Conceptions in terms of the three spheres
Are asserted as the cognitive obscurations.
Antagonistic factors such as envy
Are held to be the afflictive obscurations.
Without prajñā, the other [paramitas] do not represent
The causes for relinquishing these [obscurations].
Therefore, prajñā is the highest one, and its root
Is study, so study is supreme [too].'
(Uttaratantra V.6, 14-15 / v 382, 390-391, tr Brunnhölzl)

'In the expository, causal vehicle of the paramitas, the sugatagarbha or buddha-nature is considered to be present in the minds of beings only as a seed. When this is fully developed through circumstantial conditions— in other words, the two accumulations (of merit and wisdom)— buddhahood is attained. And since the cause comes first and its result after, one speaks in this case of a causal vehicle.

By contrast, the Mantrayana, the vehicle of mantra, proclaims that all beings are by nature endowed with the sugatagarbha, wherein all enlightened qualities are spontaneously present. The buddha-nature is the ground or basis of purification. It is compared with the sun; and like the sun concealed by clouds, the sugatagarbha is veiled by compounded or conditioned states of mind, which are adventitious to it.'
(Treasury of Precious Qualities, vol 2, p 86)

'If the meaning of emptiness does not dwell within the mind, we cannot attain liberation by means of the other virtues. ... When one is endowed with the meaning of emptiness, there is not a single thing which is not included in this path.'
(Jewel Ornament of Liberation, p 251, 252)

'With mind like wood or stone, not explaining anything with the mouth, mind not going anywhere, then the mind ground becomes like space, wherein the sun of wisdom naturally appears. It is as though the clouds had opened and the sun emerged. Just put an end to all fettering connections, and feelings of greed, hatred, craving, defilement and purity all come to an end. Unmoved in the face of the five desires and eight influences, not choked up by seeing, hearing, discerning or knowing, not confused by anything, naturally endowed with all virtues and the inconceivable use of all paranormal powers, this is someone who is free.'
(Sayings and Doings of Pai-Chang, p 78)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 28th, 2022 at 5:18 AM

Title: Re: "special transmission"?

Content:

oryoki said:

There is an interesting free PDF article on the subject of “transmission” by Zen Teacher Jeff Shore entitled “THE SOURCE OF ZEN: WHO TRANSMITS WHAT?”

It can be found and downloaded here (in English):

<https://terebess.hu/zen/mesterek/JeffShore.html>

Astus wrote:

There's more from him on his website: <https://beingwithoutself.org/dharma-talks/transcribed-talks-pdf/>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 11th, 2022 at 4:31 AM

Title: Re: Is there a way to tell if one achieved direct realization?

Content:

bartolomay said:

Is there any unmistakable signs of realization?

Astus wrote:

For a stream enterer there is the mirror of the teaching, see e.g.

<https://suttacentral.net/sn55.8/en/sujato>, and also the other discourses in SN 55.

For an arhat see e.g. <https://suttacentral.net/sn35.153/en/sujato>.

For bodhisattvas see e.g. <https://read.84000.co/translation/toh44-31.html>, and commentaries like http://kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/SZPPS-EO_book_page.htm.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 11th, 2022 at 3:44 PM

Title: Re: "Unsystematic Attention" in Tathagatagarba thought

Content:

Astus wrote:

And if they ask: ‘What is the cause, what is the reason why delusion arises, and once arisen it increases and grows?’

You should say: ‘Improper attention. When you attend improperly, delusion arises, and once arisen it increases and grows. This is the cause, this is the reason why delusion arises, and once arisen it increases and grows.’

(<https://suttacentral.net/an3.68/en/sujato>)

ignorance < five hindrances < three kinds of misconduct < lack of sense restraint < lack of mindfulness and situational awareness < improper attention (ayonisomanasikāra) < lack of faith < listening to an untrue teaching < associating with bad people
(<https://suttacentral.net/an10.61/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 11th, 2022 at 4:17 PM

Title: Re: Is there a way to tell if one achieved direct realization?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Yongming Yanshou wrote ten questions to measure one's comprehension,
<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=153592#p153592>.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 12th, 2022 at 3:40 PM

Title: Re: Is there a way to tell if one achieved direct realization?

Content:

Tao said:

Very nice.

Thank you a lot for your translation.

Astus wrote:

It's <https://eas.arizona.edu/people/awelter> 's translation from the book
<https://books.google.hu/books?id=2Kc-zsuweBoC>.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 13th, 2022 at 7:02 PM

Title: Re: Bodhisattva's austerities in the Agamas; going naked, letting his grow etc.

Content:

Aemilius said:

Some books on the life of Gautama tell concerning the ascetism of Siddhartha: "For six long years he continued to undergo fasts and penances, until his body was so wasted that no one seeing him would have recognized the noble Prince Siddhatha. But his fame as a saintly man spread abroad like a sound of a great bell hung in the sky, as the old stories tell us."

Found in The Story of the Buddha, Edith Holland, London 1923, reprint Delhi 2003.

Also mentioned in Who is the Buddha?, Sangharakshita, Windhorse 1994.

Astus wrote:

A similar statement is found in the Chinese version of the Buddhacarita, that is a likely source of the above.

From <https://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/sbe19/sbe1914.htm> published in 1883:

'His spirit free, his body light and refined, his name spreading far and wide, as 'highly gifted,' even as the moon when first produced, or as the Kumuda flower spreading out its sweetness; Everywhere thro' the country his excellent fame extended; the daughters of the lord of the place both coming to see him'

And from Charles Willemen's translation (XII.80, BDK ed, p 89):

'His spirit was empty and his body was shrunken, but his famous virtue became widely renowned. It was like the opening up of a kumuda flower when the moon has just risen.

His excellent fame spread all over the land. Men and women rivaled to come and see him.'

However, there's nothing like that in the Sanskrit version, as translated by E.B. Cowell in 1894. See the same section in chapter 12 from verse 89 <https://www.ancient-buddhist-texts.net/Texts-and-Translations/Buddhacarita/12-Book-XII.htm>.

And the opposite image is given in the Lalitavistara:

'Those who passed by the Bodhisattva, such as village boys or girls, ox herders, cow herders, grass collectors, wood collectors, and those looking for dung, all thought he was a demon made of dust. They made fun of him and sprinkled him with dust.'
(<https://read.84000.co/translation/toh95.html#UT22084-046-001-1239>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 13th, 2022 at 8:51 PM

Title: Re: Reference from a quote of W. Rahula

Content:

SaaZ said:

Is this quote present in the Pali canon? What is Paramatthajotika I? Does someone know if the same concept is present in some sutras of the pali canon (or even from Mahayana texts)?

Astus wrote:

It is found in the commentary to <https://suttacentral.net/kp4/en/sujato> (the <https://tipitaka.org/romn/cscd/s0501a.att4.xml>), to the first question, as a saying attributed to the Buddha. But as Rahula himself notes in his book, there is no sign of such a saying in the canon itself. It is also unlikely to be found, since the idea of momentariness is post-canonical.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 14th, 2022 at 4:14 AM

Title: Re: Reference from a quote of W. Rahula

Content:

SaaZ said:

When you say that the idea of momentariness is post-canonical, you mean that It start to appear consistently only in later text?

Astus wrote:

'The cursory examination of the still-extant Abhidharmapitakas undertaken in this chapter suggests that in them, as in the Nikayas/Agamas, the theory of momentariness is not postulated as a canonical doctrine and is only attested, if at all, as a sectarian stance to be refuted. This implies that the theory developed after the schism of the sects within certain schools and is in that sense a post-canonical development which, judging from the little evidence reviewed here, may date back as far as the first century

A.D. and possibly even beyond.'

(The Buddhist Doctrine of Momentariness by Alexander von Rospatt, p 28)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 16th, 2022 at 5:12 PM

Title: Re: Giant vehicle

Content:

yinyangkoi said:

Mahayana means great vehicle. How would you call an even bigger vehicle? A giant vehicle? In Sanskrit

Astus wrote:

The term for the highest/supreme vehicle is agrayāna (最上乘), as found in e.g. the Diamond Sutra, the Gaganaganjapariproccha Sutra, the Mahayanasutralamkara, and the Ratnagotravibhaga, but it's generally synonymous with Mahayana. One example where it becomes something higher than Mahayana is where Chan is called the highest vehicle.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 18th, 2022 at 6:59 PM

Title: One Mind by Huangbo

Content:

Astus wrote:

Below are a number of quotes from Huangbo Xiyun's two texts translated by Robert E. Buswell Jr. and Seong-Uk Kim as found in the book A Bird in Flight Leaves No Trace. The quotes are intended to clarify the meaning of the term one mind (yixin 一心) as used by Huangbo.

'[The master himself] just esteemed the stamp of the Supreme Vehicle, which stayed far removed from words and letters. He transmitted only the one mind; there was no other dharma. The essence of mind is also empty, and the myriad conditions are all quiescent. It is like the great orb of the sun that rises in the sky: its radiance shines brightly, and it is clear without the slightest trace of dust.'

That is from Pei Xiu's preface summarising the essentials. It highlights that Huangbo taught exclusively about the one mind that covers both the essence of mind (xinti 心體) and the myriad conditions (wanyuan 萬緣), as both are empty (kong 空) and quiescent (ji 寂).

'All the buddhas and sentient beings are only the one mind; there is no other dharma. Since time immemorial, this mind has never been produced or extinguished. It is neither green nor yellow; it has neither form nor characteristics (lakṣaṇa). It does not belong to the categories of either existence or nonexistence. It cannot be measured in terms of new or old, long or short, large or small. It transcends all limits, measures, names, traces, and comparisons. What is right in front of you — that is it. But if you start to think, you will be far off the mark.

[The one mind] is like empty space. It has no boundaries and cannot be measured. Only this one mind is the buddha. There is utterly no difference between the buddha and sentient beings. Sentient beings are attached to appearances and seek outside [for the buddha]; but in seeking the buddha, they lose the buddha. They make a buddha look for a buddha and use the mind to grasp the mind. Even though they exhaust themselves until the end of the eon, they will never be able to get it.'

That's the beginning of the first text and it contains practically all the basics to know. Both buddhas and beings are included in the one mind, it is without any characteristics (xiang 相) to identify, so it is like space. What separates beings from buddhas is only thinking (nian 念), attachment to appearances (zhuoxiang 著相), seeking outside the mind.

'Dharmas originally are unproduced, and now they are also not extinguished. Do not arouse such dualistic views as revulsion or delight. All dharmas are just this one mind; subsequently, this [insight] becomes the Buddha Vehicle. Ordinary people, generating thoughts about sense objects, pursue delights and revulsions with their minds. To be free from objects, they must forget their minds. If their minds are forgotten, sense objects will become void. If sense objects become void, the mind will be extinguished. If you just want to remove sense objects without forgetting the mind, you will not be able to remove sense objects but will only increase your bewilderment and agitation. Thus the myriad dharmas are just the mind. But as the mind also cannot be ascertained, what more do you seek? Those who train in prajñā see not a single dharma that can be ascertained. They stop conceiving that there are three vehicles. There is only the one genuine reality, which cannot be realized or attained. To claim, "I have had realization and attainment," is the height of conceit.'

First it points to the Mahayana view that dharmas are originally unborn, and by realising that there is no more liking or disliking - that is the correct insight of the one mind. On the other hand those who are ignorant see arising and cessation and have greed and anger. It shows how letting go of mind/thoughts makes the objects empty, and in turn seeing objects to be empty eliminates delusion, thus there is neither something to cling to nor something that clings. That absence of both mind and objects is being without anything attained, without anything to seek.

'There is the phrase "in similar fashion, this one seminal brightness divides into six that combine together." The "one seminal brightness" is the one mind. The "six that combine together" are the six sense organs. These six sense organs combine, respectively, with the six sense objects: the eyes combine with forms, the ears combine with sounds, the nose combines with smells, the tongue combines with tastes, the body combines with touch, and the mind combines with mental objects. Between them, six sense consciousnesses arise. Together, these make up the eighteen elements of cognition. If you understand that the eighteen elements of cognition have no objective reality, then these six will combine together into the one seminal brightness. This one seminal brightness is nothing but the mind. All practitioners of the Way know this. They simply cannot avoid creating conceptual understanding of this one seminal brightness and these six combinations. Eventually, these practitioners are bound by dharmas and do not conform with the original mind.'

Here it's shown that there is no one mind apart from the six consciousnesses, the only issue is whether one imagines something real to grasp at or not.

'Only if there are no states of mind involving birth and death, defilements, and so forth is there then no need for such dharmas as bodhi. Therefore, it is said,
The Buddha taught all dharmas to eliminate all states of mind.
Since I retain no states of mind,
what need is there for all dharmas?
From the Buddha to the patriarchs, they speak only of the one mind and the one-vehicle.'

Whatever mind one takes to be the real thing, it is only birth and death. That's why one mind is no mind.

'The master replied, "Whatever characteristics there may be, all of those are spurious. But if you see that all characteristics are free from characteristics, you will see the Tathāgata.' Both buddhas and sentient beings are utterly false views that you have created. Because you do not recognize the original mind, in vain you create such views and understandings. The very moment you create the notion that there is a 'buddha,' you are obstructed by that 'buddha.' The moment you create the notion that there are 'sentient beings,' you are obstructed by those 'sentient beings.' If you create such notions as 'ordinary' and 'saint,' 'pure' and 'impure,' those will all become obstructions. By obstructing your mind, all these [views] lead to the cycle of rebirth, like an ape that throws one thing away and picks up another without ever taking a break. The highest training of all is invariably no-training. There is neither worldling nor saint; neither pure nor impure; neither large nor small. It is uncontaminated and unconditioned. In this way, the one mind is assiduously adorned with skillful means.'

The sole obstacle is in not seeing characteristics to be empty. To think that there is something to be discovered beyond characteristics - that is, a substance - is very much the type of thinking that can only bring misery. The last sentence is from the closing stanzas of the Brahma Net Sutra:

'If you imagine a self and attach to marks,
You cannot have faith in this teaching.
Those who extinguish affliction and seize realization
Are also not of an inferior type.
Wishing to grow sprouts of bodhi,
Your luminosity shines out upon the world.
You should quietly contemplate
The true character of dharmas,
Which neither arise nor cease,
Are neither eternal nor temporary,
Neither the same nor different,

Neither coming nor going.
Within this One Mind
There is the adornment by the application of skillful means.
The works of the bodhisattvas
Should be put into practice in order,
And you should not create thoughts of distinction
Between discipline and being beyond discipline.
This is called the Supreme Way—
It is all called the Mahayana.
All bases of intellectual play
Are fully extinguished from this point.'
(BDK ed, p 75-76)

'If there is not a single dharma that is ascertainable, you will not be obstructed by dharmas. You transcend the three realms of existence and the spheres of both worldlings and saints. Then and only then will you deserve to be called a 'supramundane buddha.' Therefore, it is said, 'I bow my head before that which, like empty space, has no support.' I have left behind non-Buddhist paths. Since the mind is already undifferentiated, dharmas are also undifferentiated; since the mind is already unconditioned, dharmas are also unconditioned. The myriad dharmas all derive from transmutations of the mind. Therefore, [it is said,] 'Since my mind is empty, all dharmas are empty; so too are the thousands of types and the myriad species.' The realm of space that spreads out in all the ten directions is identical to the essence of the one mind. Since the mind is originally undifferentiated, dharmas also are undifferentiated. It is only because your views and understanding are not the same that distinctions appear. 'It is just like all heavenly beings, who eat together from the same bejeweled bowl but, depending on their merit and virtue, the color of their meals is different.' All the buddhas in the ten directions have in fact never attained even a modicum of dharma — this is called anuttara[samyaksaṃ]bodhi. There is only this one mind; there are no differentiated characteristics. It also has no luminosity or colorations, nothing superior or inferior. Since there is no superior, there are no characteristics of a buddha; since there is no inferior, there are no characteristics of a sentient being.'

When there is nothing found to grasp, nothing relied on, nothing obtained, that is the space like one mind without conceptualisation. So Huangbo repeats that in the next three quotes:

'There is only this one mind; there are no differentiated characteristics. It is also has no luminosity or colorations, nothing superior or inferior.'

'There is only the one mind, which involves neither identity nor difference, neither cause nor effect.'

'This immaculate self-nature is originally neither deluded nor awakened. The realm of empty space that entirely pervades the ten directions is intrinsically our one-mind essence.'

'This being the case, all the worlds of the ten directions are not separated from our one mind. Lands as numerous as tiny motes of dust are not separate from our one thought.'

Since this is so, how can we speak of what is inside and outside? It is like the nature of honey: if honey is sweet by nature, then all honey is sweet — you cannot say that a specific honey is sweet while the rest is bitter. Where would such a thing be possible? Therefore, it is said, 'Empty space has neither inside nor outside'; so too is it with the dharma nature. Empty space has no middle; so too is it with the dharma nature. Therefore sentient beings are buddhas and buddhas are sentient beings.'

It is not the case that on the one hand there is one mind, and on the other there are everything else. All are such already. It's only grasping at characteristics, taking things to be real and essential, that one is led into differentiating conceptualisation.

'If you can avoid clinging to a single sign, then it is said,
In this way, the one mind,
is assiduously adorned with skillful means.'

For the last quote again the same stanza from the Brahma Net Sutra as above that brings one mind to not clinging to characteristics, translated here as sign.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 19th, 2022 at 8:18 PM

Title: Re: One Mind by Huangbo

Content:

Tao said:

It sounds a lot Yogachara to me (which is not bad). Maybe Lankavatara was an important sutra for Huangbo? Samdhinirmocana?

Astus wrote:

Neither of those two sutras are quoted directly in Huangbo's records. It's mostly from the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Awakening_of_Faith_in_the_Mahayana, as likely the most influential treatise in East Asian Buddhism, and there are <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Fazang> and https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Mazu_Daoyi as additional sources. Huangbo's contemporary, Guifeng Zongmi also uses the term one mind.

The term one mind, as used by Huangbo, is unlikely to be of Indian origin. Although for instance Zongmi quotes the Lankavatara Sutra (Zongmi on Chan, p 127): "The calmed is called one mind. One mind is the buddha-in-embryo.", but that passage (T16, no. 671, p. 519a1-2) is better translated otherwise as done by Red Pine: "Tranquility means oneness, and oneness means the tathagata-garbha", because 'one mind' (yixin 一心) here is ekagra, one pointed.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 19th, 2022 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: One Mind by Huangbo

Content:

master of puppets said:
Isn't this what we call freedom?

Astus wrote:
If you mean freedom from afflictions, then yes.

Author: Astus
Date: Saturday, May 21st, 2022 at 12:17 AM
Title: Re: Is there a non-sectarian Mahayana?
Content:

khemindas said:
But maybe there was a certain Mahayana school that was accepting all sutras, doctrines, concepts, ideas, Buddhas, Bodhisattvas equally? I'm asking only about pure Mahayana (non-tantric). And how about modern days if there are masters who have this equal approach nowadays and books of these masters in english?

Astus wrote:
All sutras have been accepted by everyone, the difference is in what sutras have prominence. One modern example is Fo Guang Shan that embraces all eight schools of Chinese Buddhism (八宗兼弘).

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, May 23rd, 2022 at 7:01 PM
Title: Re: The route to nirvana
Content:

Stigg said:
My question is, how do you know whichever school you subscribe to, is the real deal? Especially so when another school opposes your view. What is your yardstick when it comes to discerning these entanglement?

Astus wrote:
There are mainly superficial differences, and a few only a little deeper. The fundamentals are the same all over the schools, like the five aggregates, six sense areas, dependent origination, three root defilements, and the 37 auxiliaries to awakening.

'Mendicants, whoever has missed out on the noble eightfold path has missed out on the noble path to the complete ending of suffering. Whoever has undertaken the noble eightfold path has undertaken the noble path to the complete ending of suffering. '
(SN 45.33, tr Sujato)

'Whether one wants to train on the level of Disciple, or Pratyekabuddha, or Bodhisattva, - one should listen to this perfection of wisdom, take it up, bear it in mind, recite it, study it, spread it among others, and in this very perfection of wisdom should one be trained and exert oneself.'
(PP8K 1.2, tr Conze)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 25th, 2022 at 3:04 PM

Title: Re: Trouble reconciling Pali/Sanskrit teachings

Content:

Joel327 said:

So are the Pali/Mahayana suttas/sutras compatible, completely different, or a gradual learning process??

Astus wrote:

The sutras are quite compatible, things get complicated when it comes to texts that interpret those scriptures, i.e. mainly commentaries and treatises.

If you want to compare doctrines and practices, it's better to start with an accepted summary treatise that's based on major treatises that are based on the entire canon.

Even easier if one begins with introductory teachings by contemporary teachers who are knowledgeable about their tradition. But if you want to see the whole picture, that takes studying at least those texts that are the primary sources of a specific community.

Naturally, that much studying may take a couple of years or decades.

There are quite a few good introductory works available, just some examples: The Heart of the Buddha's Teaching by Thich Nhat Hanh; Daring Steps by Ringu Tulku; The Core Teachings by Hsing Yun; The Essence of Buddhism by Traleg Kyabgon; The Way to Buddhahood by Yin-shun.

For bringing together some Theravada and Mahayana:

<https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/compassionemptiness.pdf>;

https://www.abhayagiri.org/media/books/amaro_small_boat_great_mountain.pdf.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 26th, 2022 at 2:35 PM

Title: Re: Hinayana Buddhism

Content:

MGeorge116 said:

Where can I learn about Hinayana Buddhism, or did it go completely extinct and become lost in time? I'm not referring to Theravada Buddhism by the way. I believe that is a common misconception.

Astus wrote:

There is some literature of Hinayana schools translated to English, plus a number of studies. The main source still in use - mainly in the Tibetan traditions - is the

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Abhidharmako%C5%9Ba-bh%C4%81sya>. The book

<https://buddhadharma.co/Sarvastivada-Abhidharma> by Bhikkhu KL Dhammajoti is a good summary of the teachings of this most influential school.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 30th, 2022 at 4:01 AM

Title: Re: most survivable non-tantric mahayana school in western world in 21 century

Content:

khemindas said:

That leaves only Huayan (Kegon) with its focus on theory.

Astus wrote:

It's not an existing school, and has not been for a very long time. Huayan, like any Buddhist school, was not just theory. Furthermore, Huayan teachings are among the less studied ones, so unless one reads classical Chinese, it's not possible to have a proper theoretical understanding of them.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 2nd, 2022 at 4:34 PM

Title: Re: most survivable non-tantric mahayana school in western world in 21 century

Content:

Vert said:

Huayan is very much alive and organized having also come to exist in the West even in the US, thanks to missionary effort.

Astus wrote:

Thank you for bringing that up. There is a study available in English of its development in the last century: <https://books.google.hu/books?id=RBbYDwAAQBAJ> by Erik J. Hammerstrom. The Huayan Lotus Society is a good example that it's not just pure theory, but there are monastics and various ritual ceremonies besides studies. Unfortunately, their activities seem to be limited to Chinese speakers.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 3rd, 2022 at 11:00 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana vs Theravada

Content:

Astus wrote:

Zen emphasises sudden awakening, unlike 'classical' Mahayana where there are various levels and stages of the bodhisattva path. This is not to say that only emptiness counts, but rather that when all false concepts are eliminated the abilities of a buddha are automatically present.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 4th, 2022 at 7:58 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana vs Theravada

Content:

Tao said:

Do Zen really aims to one sudden awakening instead of gradual stages?

Why people say so?

Astus wrote:

Because it's the fundamental narrative of Zen, that there is a special lineage of people who are equals of Shakyamuni and transmit his ultimate awakening in a direct form. Without that story there is no Zen to talk about. And this doctrine of no doctrine allows the bearers of the seal of bodhi to teach in whatever way they see fit.

Guishan asked Yangshan, "If no spark from flint can go so fast, nor lightning flash pass by, how did the old-time sages save men?"

"What do you think, Venerable Priest?" asked Yangshan.

Guishan said, "No words have actual significance."

"Not so," disagreed Yangshan.

"Then what do you think?" asked Guishan.

"Officially, a needle is not permitted to enter; privately, carriages can get through."

(Record of Linji, tr Sasaki, p 51)

Dayu then struck the meditation platform again and said, "The three worlds,' all the buddhas,' these phrases are all just a headache. What I say to you all is, can you avoid it? Is there a single person who can avoid it by finding a place where it doesn't exist? Not avoiding it, the ocean-seal radiates brilliantly."

(Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 383)

It is practically a manifestation of the skilful means of a bodhisattva.

'In order to guide and benefit all human beings, they do not rely on words. Sometimes, for the sake of weak-willed people, they show how to attain perfect enlightenment quickly by skipping over the stages [of the bodhisattva]. And sometimes, for the sake of indolent people, they say that human beings may attain enlightenment at the end of numberless eons. Thus they can demonstrate innumerable expedient means and suprarational feats. But in reality all these bodhisattvas are the same in that they are alike in their lineage, their capacity, their aspiration, and their realization [of suchness]; therefore, there is no such thing as skipping over the stages, for all bodhisattvas must pass through the three terms of innumerable eons [before they can fully attain enlightenment]. However, because of the differences in the various worlds of beings, and in the objects of seeing and hearing, as well as in the capacity, desires, and nature of the various beings, there are also different ways of teaching them what to practice.'

(The Awakening of Faith, 3.III.3, BDK ed, p 66-67)

'Foolish thinking deeply rooted is difficult to suddenly dig up, so even skilful means can rob you of the most rudimentary understanding. It is like taking yellow leaves [for gold] to stop the howling [of little children] – what is the point? Or like a man starting a shop to sell all of kinds of goods, as well as precious gold and silver ones. People only compare according to their circumstances – talking of Shitou, his shop deals in goods of pure gold, whilst my shop here is a mixed bag. If people come looking for rat droppings, I pull it out and give it to them. If one comes in search of real gold, I pull that out too and give it to him.'

...

'If I proclaim the Chan School, then there will only be myself for company, no one else. But will this conduce to having an assembly of several hundred? However, if I proclaim both this and that, then they can vie for the best deal for themselves. This is just like deceiving a child with an empty hand, for there is nothing real in it at all. Although speaking clearly now of spiritual things, do not still try to get it out with consciousness. Just go to your own ocean of bhūtatathatā, be sincere and practise. There is no need of the three illuminations or the six penetrations – why? These things are spiritually insignificant; what is really necessary now, is to get to the source in awareness. Just get to that source without worrying about inessentials. Later everything will fall into place. If the source has yet to be attained, even studying it exhaustively will not obtain it.' (Yangshan Huiji, in Records of the Transmission of the Lamp, vol 3, 11.221; also in Original Teachings of Ch'an Buddhism, p 212-213)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 4th, 2022 at 8:09 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana vs Theravada

Content:

SaaZ said:

I mean this also from a very practical point of view, for instance: when anger arises in me, would be better to go beyond it, or as Dogen would maybe say "drop body and mind and do Zazen", or instead practice some loving kindness?

Astus wrote:

Whatever works. Neither Theravada, nor Zen is limited to a single method.

SaaZ said:

I like to think that zazen might be a distilled form of Buddhism

Astus wrote:

Only if zazen is understood as awakening. Otherwise it's just a temporary posture.

'The true zazen which has been transmitted by the buddhas and ancestors is the Tathagata's jijuyu-zanmai. It is the state in which the body and mind of perfect nirvana always abide peacefully.'

(Jijuyu-Zanmai, in Heart of Zen, p 43)

SaaZ said:

But ultimately all these people have probably decades of practice before something clicked

Astus wrote:

If one needs decades, lives, innumerable lives to prepare before there is awakening, it is pointless to call it sudden, direct, or immediate, isn't it?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 13th, 2022 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: The Bendowa and Teachers in Zen

Content:

FiveSkandhas said:

And yet “face to face transmission” is repeatedly stressed as essential or all but essential for true Zen education.

Astus wrote:

It is stated to be essential not for education but for certification. As Dumoulin (in Zen Buddhism: Japan, p 70) have noted, Dogen's insistence on direct meeting is a rather direct rejection of the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/N%C5%8Dnin> (more on http://www.thezensite.com/ZenEssays/DogenStudies/DarumaShu_Dogen_Soto.html). And the current emphasis on it in Sotoshu began in the late 17th century against other forms of transmission (see a summary https://www.sotozen.com/eng/library/key_terms/pdf/key_terms20.pdf).

FiveSkandhas said:

Can it serve as a substitute for a master, as suggested by the first quote?

Astus wrote:

No. The teacher, at least a more capable one, can fit the needs of the student, unlike any text.

FiveSkandhas said:

Or is practice useless without a realized master, as later suggested in the same work?

Astus wrote:

No. Proper practice is never useless. Improper practice is. As for what proper practice is, there's already a lot of explanations for that, like on the official Sotoshu homepage <https://www.sotozen.com/zazen/index.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 13th, 2022 at 3:10 PM

Title: Re: trophy teachers

Content:

clyde said:

Who do you think are Zen “trophy teachers”?

Astus wrote:

It's those one uses to prove one is better/correct unlike others who have another/no teacher.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 19th, 2022 at 7:08 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen simply "sitting"/Zazen?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Here:

Astus wrote:

That's a mistaken view of zazen that's criticised.

'There are many other ways to practice zazen, but, among them, the properly transmitted, genuine Way is not to be found. This is why Dogen Zenji criticized the Zazenshin or Zazenmei in the Keitoku-Dentoroku and the Katai-Futoroku, etc., saying that none expressed the Way which has been properly transmitted.

...

People in the present day often practice zazen in this manner. This is the attitude of ordinary people, Hinayana practitioners, and bodhisattvas within the provisional Mahayana practice of zazen. They aspire to rid themselves of delusions and to gain enlightenment; to eliminate illusory thoughts and to obtain the truth. This is nothing but creating the karma of acceptance and rejection. Such an attitude is just another form of dualism, in that one escapes from one thing and chases after another. If we think this kind of practice is the same as that transmitted by the buddhas and ancestors, as the Tathagata's zanmai-o-zanmai, or as Bodhidharma's sitting facing the wall for nine years, these also become mere methods to rid oneself of delusions and to obtain enlightenment. What a pitiful view!

(Jijuyu-Zanmai by Menzan Zuiho, in Heart of Zen, p 42-23)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 21st, 2022 at 5:14 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen simply "sitting"/Zazen?

Content:

Tao said:

Always found that the Five ranks were very useful, it's strange to me that Soto doesn't use them but Rinzai does, as it was a proposal from a Caodong master...

Astus wrote:

'The use of Dahui's "short cut," or huatou (literally, head word), method of working with koans was also known in Japan at this time. This emphasized concentrating on the principle point or critical phrase of a koan in order to minimize unnecessary distractions or misleading discursive thoughts that might arise from studying the entire exchange. In contrast to these formulized views, Dogen's approach to koans was wide ranging. He addressed key points of each case, as well as minor secondary points. He frequently examined the koans from the perspective of the "Five Ranks of the Universal and Particular" of Dongshan. He also pointed out the questions that should be addressed, challenging the practitioner to examine them and sometimes also providing his responses.'

(Dogen and Koans by John Daido Loori, in Dogen's Extensive Record - A Translation of the Eihei Koroku, p 62-63)

'Dogen's apparent criticism of koans ran parallel to his condemnation of the Five Ranks of Dongshan. And it had a similar purpose. Dogen was not opposed to the principles conveyed by the Five Ranks. He was critical of the very intellectual, stylized, and inconsequential way that they came to be used in his time.'

(p 63)

'One unusual aspect of Dogen's treatment of koans is his use of the Five Ranks and, more than likely, the Fourfold Dharmadhatu teaching of Huayan. He never explicitly talked about either system, except to summarily dismiss the Five Ranks, but he definitely engaged them in a way that reflected a profound understanding and appreciation for their method.'

(p 64)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 21st, 2022 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen simply "sitting"/Zazen?

Content:

Tao said:

Can you talk more about: the Fourfold Dharmadhatu teaching of Huayan?

Astus wrote:

The four are the dharmadhatu (fajie 法界) of: things (shi fajie 事法界), principle (li fajie 理法界), unimpeded things and principle (lishi wuai fajie 理事無礙法界), unimpeded things and things (shishi wuai fajie 事事無礙法界).

It's basically the usual set of appearances, emptiness, and unified appearances and emptiness; then the fourth is the most interesting where it's just purely appearances to talk of, or it could be called suchness if you like, where there is no more talk of any principle/emptiness. It's like saying that there is no need to talk of no-self but enough to comprehend the aggregates. After all, any ultimate is purely fictional, and such a conceptual construct eventually has to be let go. It fits well with Dogen's criticism of the common reification of buddha-nature. One just has to see clearly the present experiences ("eyes are horizontal and the nose is vertical"). At the same time, on a linguistic level this gives the freedom and playfulness of saying confusing and contradictory things, like the teaching of insentients.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 21st, 2022 at 9:29 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen simply "sitting"/Zazen?

Content:

Anders said:

Talk about covering all bases. No idea how one can soundly arrive at such a conclusion.

Astus wrote:

Maybe he was very familiar with his texts? Nowadays a few keyword searches in all the known works should do the job.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 22nd, 2022 at 4:33 PM

Title: Nuns Receive Full Ordination in Bhutan

Content:

Astus wrote:

'Today, on the 21st June, 2022, corresponding to the 23rd day of the 4th lunar month, His Holiness the Je Khenpo is conferring the Gelongma vows to about 144 nuns as announced by the Bhutan Nuns Foundation at Ramthangkha, Paro. Nuns who are receiving the vows are not only from Bhutan but also from neighboring countries. Auspicious signs such as rainbows encircling the sun could be witnessed today.'
(<https://www.buddhistdoor.net/news/144-buddhist-nuns-receive-full-ordination-at-landmark-ceremony-in-bhutan/>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 22nd, 2022 at 5:46 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen simply "sitting"/Zazen?

Content:

Anders said:

Sounds like kumbaya scholarship to be honest.

Astus wrote:

I doubt it was meant to be any sort of scholarship. The author was not a scholar either.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 24th, 2022 at 8:01 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana vs Theravada

Content:

Malcolm said:

The basis is different, the path is different, the result is different.

Astus wrote:

Is dzogchen outside the framework of the four noble truths? If so, then how is it not just perpetuating samsara?

Malcolm said:

There is no similarity between Dzogchen and Theravada at all.

Astus wrote:

Maybe you know this one: <https://www.abhayagiri.org/books/423-small-boat-great-mountain>.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 25th, 2022 at 4:37 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana vs Theravada

Content:

Malcolm said:

The four truths are diagnostic, not ontological. There is a problem. There is a cause of that problem. When the cause of a problem is known, it can be remedied. There is a method to remedy the cause of the problem. Thus, the four truths apply to everything from car repair to samsara.

Astus wrote:

The four noble truths have that structure, but it also has a content, so it outlines the entirety of the Buddha's teaching, and at the same time encompasses the essential liberating insights. Dzogchen, like the other vehicles, fit into it, as they all recognise suffering, its cause, its cause's ending, and the three trainings leading to that end.

Malcolm said:

The difference between the nine yānas and the great perfection is that the former take mind as the basis; where as the great perfection takes gnosis as the basis. This has consequences for the path: the nine yānas are paths based on causes and results; path of Dzogchen is not based on causes and results. This also has consequences for the result. In the the nine yānas the three kāyas are a result that arise from the two accumulations; in Dzogchen, the three kāyas are path experiences and do not exist in the result.

Astus wrote:

Dzogchen still has view, meditation, conduct, and result, doesn't it? Its gnosis is not something other than prajnaparamita, is it?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 25th, 2022 at 4:41 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana vs Theravada

Content:

Queequeg said:

I'll refer to some zen teachings here for the sake of convenience and general familiarity.

Astus wrote:

Maybe something like this:

https://kokyohenkel.weebly.com/uploads/1/2/7/4/127410773/view_meditation_and_conduct_in_dzogchen_and_zen.pdf

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 26th, 2022 at 4:57 AM

Title: Re: Is Zen simply "sitting"/Zazen?

Content:

Aemilius said:

Entangling Vines (Thomas Yūhō Kirchner, 2013) Case 139 Nanyue Polishes a Tile

Astus wrote:

"To attach to the sitting form is not to have attained the principle of that [sitting]." This "to attach to the sitting form" means to reject the sitting form and to defile the sitting form. The fundamental principle here is that when we are already practicing sitting buddha, it is impossible not to be attached to the sitting form. Because it is impossible not to be attached to the sitting form, although attachment to the sitting form is something brilliant, it may be "not to have attained the principle of that [sitting]." Effort like this is called "the dropping off of body and mind." Those who have never sat do not possess this state of truth. It exists in the moment of sitting, it exists in the person who is sitting, it exists in the buddha that is sitting, and it exists in the buddha that is learning sitting.'

(Zazenshin, in SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 2, p 121)

'Polishing a tile to make a mirror is effort in practice.

How can people plan to take a mirror and make it a tile?

The point of deceiving each other is completed within clarity.

Square and circle mold their forms, using themselves as models.

Even when called the iron man, how can you be a tile or mirror?

Even before killing Buddha is born, the sitting Buddha descends.

Sitting, lying, and walking meditation are all just right.

Clouds arise south of the mountain; rain falls on the western river.'

(Eihei Koroku, vol 9, case 38, p 562)

'When polishing a tile to make a mirror, our body is not the four great elements, but is suchness, imposing and magnificent. When polishing a hammer to make a needle, our mind is not the five skandhas but is the absolute, completely clear and bright. Therefore, no colors obstruct our eyes, no sounds plug our ears, no interactions bind our body, no affairs mislead our mind. Taking away objects is like a donkey looking at a donkey; taking away the person is like the well seeing the well. 169 Ultimately, what is it? A wooden horse neighing in the wind freely settles in the mountains; a clay ox bellowing at the moon is able to enter the ocean.'

(Eihei Koroku, vol 4, Dharma Hall Discourse 345, p 309-310)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 5th, 2022 at 5:12 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Awakening

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dajian Huineng:

If you activate the correct and true and contemplate with prajñā, in a single instant [all your] false thoughts will be completely eradicated. If you recognize the self-nature, with a single [experience of] enlightenment you will attain the stage of buddhahood.

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 33)

Dazhu Huihai:

Q: What is Sudden Enlightenment?

A: "Sudden" means instantly stopping false thought. "Enlightenment" means [awareness] that one attains nothing.

(<https://www.ymba.org/books/entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment/treatise-entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment>)

Sudden Enlightenment means liberation during this lifetime. Just as a lion-cub, from the moment it is born, is a real lion, likewise anyone who practices the Sudden-Enlightenment method has, from the moment he begins his practice, already entered the Buddha-Stage. Just as the bamboo-shoots growing in springtime are not different from the parent bamboo-shoots, because they are also empty inside, likewise anyone who practices the Sudden-Enlightenment method to rid himself suddenly of false thought abandons, like the Buddhas, the sense of an ego and a personality forever. Being absolutely deep, still and void, he is, then, without an iota of difference, equal to the Buddhas. Thus, in this sense it can be said that the worldly is holy. If one practices the Sudden-Enlightenment method, he can transcend the three realms during this lifetime.

(<https://www.ymba.org/books/entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment/treatise-entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment>)

Baizhang Huaihai:

Question: What is the essential method for sudden enlightenment in the great vehicle?

The master said,

You all should first put an end to all involvements and lay to rest all concerns; do not remember or recollect anything at all, whether good or bad, mundane or transcendental - do not engage in thoughts. Let go of body and mind, set them free.

...

Once affirmation and negation, like and dislike, approval and disapproval, all various opinions and feelings come to an end and cannot bind you, then you are free wherever you may be; this is called a bodhisattva at the moment of inspiration immediately ascending to the stage of Buddhahood.

(Sayings and Doings of Pai-Chang, p 77-78)

Huangbo Xiyun:

If you suddenly realize right here and now that your own mind is originally a buddha, there is no dharma that needs to be attained and no practice that needs to be cultivated. This is the unsurpassed Way. This is the buddha of true suchness.

(A Bird in Flight Leaves No Trace, 1.4)

Ordinary people who are about to die should just perceive that the five aggregates are all empty and the four great elements are not the self. The true mind is signless; it neither goes nor comes. At the moment of birth, the nature does not come, and at the moment of death, the nature does not go; placid, it remains perfectly quiescent. The mind and sense objects are one and the same. If you can simply attain sudden understanding right here and now in this manner, you will not be bound by past, present, or future. You will then be a person who has transcended the world.

(A Bird in Flight Leaves No Trace, 1.6)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 8th, 2022 at 2:37 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Awakening

Content:

curtstein said:

I have heard that someone who attains the first bhumi is able to manifest in 100 different places with 100 different bodies at the same time - and in each place one is applying skillful means to help the sentient beings in that place. I heard this from a Lama in the Kagyu tradition (Lama Chodron, based in Richmond VA), and I believe she was relying on Gampopa's Jewel Ornament of Liberation, or some Kagyu commentary thereon.

Although my own tradition is different (Korean Soen), that particular teaching has really stuck with me. On the one hand it can be discouraging to realize just how far one is from such a state. On the other hand a little humility on the path goes a long way.

Astus wrote:

It's actually from the Ten Stages chapter of the Avatamsaka Sutra.

'Having gone forth, enlightening beings instantly attain a hundred concentrations and see a hundred buddhas and acknowledge their power; they stir a hundred worlds, go to a hundred lands, illumine a hundred worlds, mature a hundred beings, live for a hundred eons, penetrate a hundred eons past and future, contemplate a hundred teachings, and manifest a hundred bodies, each body manifesting a company of a hundred enlightening beings. Then enlightening beings with superior power of commitment, by the quality of excellence of vows, transform their bodies, auras, mystic powers, vision, spheres of operation, voices, conduct, adornments, power, resolutions, and performances in countless ways.'

(Flower Ornament Scripture, p 710-711; <https://read.84000.co/translation/toh44-31.html#UT22084-036-002-390>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 8th, 2022 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Awakening

Content:

Tao said:

So not known person reached first bhumi not even Buddha?

Astus wrote:

From A Bird in Flight Leaves No Trace (2.4):

Huangbo: 'Even though [you may attain] bodhi, suchness, the characteristic of reality, liberation, or the dharma body and directly reach the sanctified ranks of the ten stages or the four fruitions, all these involve the [expedient] gate of salvation. They have nothing to do with the buddha mind.'

Commentary: 'All gradual stages are far removed from the Way. Turn one thought around and realize completely the fact that a buddha's nature and your nature are not different.'

Huangbo: 'Only if there are no states of mind involving birth and death, defilements, and so forth is there then no need for such dharmas as bodhi.'

Commentary: 'There is nothing that can be named "mind." It is not that the mind does not exist; rather, it reveals itself as causes and conditions are produced. Whether good or evil, there is no exception to this rule.'

There is neither birth and death nor defilements; they are all shadows created through corresponding causes and conditions. Not knowing this fact, people try to remove all these shadows. If they suddenly turn one thought around and realize that all shadows are originally empty, their minds will be at rest. If this happens, not only birth and death and defilements but also nirvāṇa and bodhi will be at rest. Whether it is this or that is all relative. Therefore, if one is extinguished, the other will naturally be extinguished as well.'

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 9th, 2022 at 4:17 AM

Title: Re: The Karmapa fathered a child - DNA test reveals

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

I once asked my Thai monk friend (Ajahn) about the vinaya prohibition about monks touching women (they aren't supposed to). The Theravada monks are pretty strict about this, or at least the ones I know are.

Astus wrote:

That's only a Thai custom. The actual rule is about touching with lust, <https://www.dhammatalks.org/vinaya/bmc/Section0011.html#Sg2>. See also FAQ. 2
<https://www.buddhanet.net/e-learning/buddhistworld/faqmonks.htm>.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 9th, 2022 at 7:09 PM

Title: Re: The Karmapa fathered a child - DNA test reveals

Content:

Dhammanando said:

It's from the Pali Vinaya, not Thai custom, though if the contact is intentional but not lustful the offence is far less serious.

Astus wrote:
Thank you for the correction.

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, July 10th, 2022 at 4:11 AM
Title: Re: Yijing in Zen
Content:

Astus wrote:
<https://terebess.hu/zen/mesterek/OuyiZhixu.html> (1599– 1655), one of the four eminent Buddhist masters of the Ming era, wrote a commentary on the Yijing that was translated by Thomas Cleary and published under the title
<https://www.shambhala.com/the-buddhist-i-ching-319.html>.

Author: Astus
Date: Wednesday, July 13th, 2022 at 3:37 AM
Title: Re: The Life and Letters of Tofu Roshi
Content:
clyde said:
“. . . consider the koan called “The Sound of One Hand Scratching.” No Bun once asked Bush Wak, “If a mosquito bites Buddha, will it become enlightened?”
Something to ponder.

Astus wrote:
What's there to ponder about it? There is no salvation in Buddhism by consuming anyone's body.

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, July 18th, 2022 at 4:35 AM
Title: Re: Are all Mahayana sutras sutras of definitive meaning?
Content:
Malcolm said:
If we consider paratantra, the dependent nature, to be the all-basis consciousness, there is an internal contradiction in asserting that something compounded becomes uncompounded in the transformation of the basis into the perfected nature, parinispanna.

Astus wrote:
Things have never been apart from emptiness in the first place.

"Parinispanna or Ultimate Reality is the complete and perfect 'real nature' of all dharmas which is revealed by the two 'Voids' (sunyas)."
(Cheng Weishi Lun, p 633, tr Wei Tat)

Malcolm said:

There are other problems with Yogacāra view as well, which mainly arise from their reluctance to accept that consciousness is also a dependent designation.

Astus wrote:

Apart from space and various forms of cessation the only uncompounded in Yogacara is suchness (Abhidharmasamuccaya, p 23-25; http://www.cttbusa.org/100shastra/100dharma_1.asp.html).

Who says consciousness isn't compounded? Sounds more like a buddha-mind type of idea.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 18th, 2022 at 5:42 AM

Title: Re: Are all Mahayana sutras of definitive meaning?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Emptiness is yogacāra is clearly an extrinsic emptiness. As asserted in the Madhyantavibhanga, "emptiness exists" as a consciousness devoid of duality.

Astus wrote:

Where does it assert such a consciousness? In I.13 it merely states that it is 'the being of the non-being of duality' (Anacker, p 217) or 'the assertion of the negation of that pair' (Kochumuttom, p 241), and then it goes on to explain emptiness with reference to the relationship between universal characteristics to specific objects.

From Mipham's commentary: 'If it were the case that the emptiness of duality did not exist, the duality of apprehended and apprehender would become existent, as a double negation is an affirmation.' (Middle Beyond Extremes, p 37)

Malcolm said:

Even so, it is pretty clear Asanga's view has an internal contradiction when looking at Mahāyānaśāstra, as above. And there is the fact that Vimuktisena chides the Yogacāra school for possessing a realist view of the objective support in Abhisamayālamkāraṭīkā {Spareham, vol. 1, pg. 88}.

Astus wrote:

Thanks, I'll look into them.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 18th, 2022 at 4:27 PM

Title: Re: Are all Mahayana sutras of definitive meaning?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Abhidharmasamuccaya is not a Yogacāra text.

Astus wrote:

How so?

Malcolm said:

Even so, it is pretty clear Asanga's view has an internal contradiction when looking at Mahāyānasamgraha, as above.

Astus wrote:

The problems <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=635791#p635791>: 'Thus, all-basis consciousness here is asserted to transform into the dharmakāya, consequently (1) something compounded is asserted to transform into something uncompounded or (2) the all-basis consciousness is uncompounded, or (3) dharmakāya is compounded. These are three undesirable consequences of the three natures scheme.'

There is no compounded becoming uncompounded, nor an uncompounded consciousness, nor a compounded dharmakaya. At X.3.c it states explicitly:

'[The dharmakāya has] the characteristic of nonduality because (1) by virtue of its having the characteristic of the nonduality of existence and nonexistence, it is the nonbeing of all phenomena and the being of the characteristic of emptiness. (2) [The dharmakāya also has] the characteristic of the nonduality of being conditioned and unconditioned because it is not formed by karma and afflictions and masters the display of what appears as being conditioned.'

Furthermore, as it's in your original quote of X.3.a, the conversion is from the impure to the pure aspect of dependent nature, so as the text says in IX.3:

'When the knowledge of the sameness
Of saṃsāra and nirvāṇa has arisen,
At that point, in them, therefore Saṃsāra itself becomes nirvāṇa.
For that reason, saṃsāra
Is neither abandoned nor not abandoned.
Consequently, nirvāṇa too
Is neither attained nor not attained.'

Malcolm said:

And there is the fact that Vimuktisena chides the Yogacāra school for possessing a realist view of the objective support in Abhisamayālamkāravṛtti {Spareham, vol. 1, pg. 88}.

Astus wrote:

Is there any known Yogacara author who actually proposed such a view as given by Vimuktisena? Note 64 only tries to track down the sutra quote in the qualm.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 18th, 2022 at 5:35 PM

Title: Re: Are all Mahayana sutras of definitive meaning?

Content:

Malcolm said:

"The imagination of the unreal exists..."

One cannot have an imagination of the unreal in absence of a consciousness imagining the unreal.

Astus wrote:

Imagination exists as unreal, it appears real to the deluded and false to the wise. And when it is seen as actually unreal, there is no observing consciousness either, as the verse after the next stanza states explicitly.

Malcolm said:

That does not address the point, and even Mipham admits in this text that consciousness exists ultimately

Astus wrote:

Is there such an admittance somewhere explicitly, or is it something assumed? Furthermore, Yogacara works are quite explicit that there are eight consciousnesses, none of them ultimately existing.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 18th, 2022 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: Are all Mahayana sutras of definitive meaning?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Think you need to brush up a bit on Yogacara.

Astus wrote:

That's probably so. Still, I cannot recall encountering the idea somewhere in a Yogacara work that there is an ultimate, uncompounded consciousness, despite this being a standard charge against them. On the other hand, the twofold emptiness is regularly affirmed.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 19th, 2022 at 9:38 PM

Title: Re: Are all Mahayana sutras of definitive meaning?

Content:

Malcolm said:

You can find evidence of this in the Bodhisattvabhumi [Engles, pp. 77-86], where Asanga excoriates mādhyamikas for over-negation, where he describes the negation of a designation as valid, but strongly objects to the negation of the basis of designation, a so-called "bare substance."

Astus wrote:

How is that practically different from saying that things are empty mere appearances? For both Yogacara and Madhyamaka come to a perception that is without conceptualisation but not without phenomena.

Mipham comments on verse 78 of Madhyamakalankara:

'If there is no appearance, there is no emptiness, for emptiness and appearance depend upon each other. The absence of one entails the absence of the other; the presence of one entails the presence of the other. It is not that appearance and emptiness exist separately, like a white and a black thread twisted together. Neither are they alternate in the sense that when one goes, the other comes. Emptiness entails appearance; appearance entails emptiness. The two can never be separate.'

(The Adornment of the Middle Way, p 329)

What Asanga refutes is not necessarily Madhyamaka but a misconception of emptiness as nothingness.

'The validity of emptiness is [defined by] the nonexistence of that [quality] of which [entities] are empty and the existence of that [state] which constitutes emptiness. But if it is [held to be] a [state of] complete nonexistence, what could be [the entity] in relation to which this empty [state] might occur, what could this empty [state] consist of, and what [quality] could [entities] be empty of? It would also not be possible for emptiness [to be a state that] pertains to this [particular entity] or for it to be [a state in which an entity is] empty of this [particular quality]. Therefore, this is how emptiness becomes wrongly grasped.'

(The Bodhisattva Path to Unsurpassed Enlightenment, I.4.6, p 83)

Might as well be read like Mipham's commentary to Janggya Rölpe Dorje's poem:

'also the great lord Tsongkhapa has adopted the very profound essence of the intention of Nāgārjuna and Candrakīrti. A dry understanding of being empty alone is easy, but emptiness appearing as dependent origination is difficult. Therefore, he emphasized everywhere in his teachings [the need for] serious practice and that dependent origination is more important than emptiness. Not understanding this as the actual meaning of his view and to then just practice some sort of hearsay in terms of mere [outward] behavior is the unprecedented approach of some Gedenpas [obsessed] with nonimplicative negations.'

(Straight from the Heart, p 413)

Malcolm said:

Here it is seen that the dependent nature, the cognition that appears as the unreal or appears as real is never itself negated. And, given Asanga's references to a "bare substance" in the BBh above, one can only conclude that this ultimate is an existent cognition devoid of duality, itself ultimately established even if its contents are not, since, it cannot be nonexistent according to the Yogacāra scheme set forth by Asanga.

Astus wrote:

Dependent nature is not negated, so there is no independent, uncompounded consciousness to find anywhere, otherwise it wouldn't be dependent. It's also dependent nature that's like an illusion, a mirage, a dream, a reflection, an optical illusion, an echo, a water-moon, a magical creation (MS II.27).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 19th, 2022 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: Are all Mahayana sutras of definitive meaning?

Content:

Malcolm said:

What is this suchness he is asserting? It is the dependent nature, of course, which he asserts exists ultimately. So, he does not escape the charge of asserting something compounded becomes uncompounded in the transformation of the basis. Why? Because the purification of the all-basis consciousness is the entire keystone of the yogacāra system. I will leave it here because we are going now in circles.

In Madhyamaka, the ultimate is simply the absence of inherent existence in conventional entities.

Astus wrote:

Conventional entities - that are dependently originated - with an imputed essence is the imagined nature, without an essence it's the perfected nature. If the distinction here is whether entities exist apart from the mind or not, it's not really an issue, as the imagined essence is necessarily mental for both, while the nonconceptual is without inside or outside. This also solves the case of a compounded becoming uncompounded, as emptiness is not compounded for anyone, and conditionality is compounded for both, and apart from those two - since the ultimate, you say, is dependent nature - there is nothing else.

'How do the Two Truths, Samvrtisatyr and Paramarthasatyr, correspond to the three natures?

The meaning is that Samvrtisatyr (mundane truth) is Parikalpita, Paratantra, and Parinispāna, while Paramarthasatyr (ultimate supramundane truth) is exclusively Parinispāna.

(1) Samvrti is of three kinds:

- a. Prajnaptisamvrti, i.e., fictitious or conventional mundane truth ;
 - b. Prattipatisamvrti, i.e., impure, mutable mundane truth;
 - c. Udbhavanasamvrti, i.e., mundane truth that reveals Tathata through the two Voids.
- These three kinds correspond, in the right order, to the three natures, Parikalpitasvabhava etc.

(2) Paramartha is also of three kinds:

- a. Arthaparamartha, which is Tathata, because the latter is the artha of parama, i.e., the object of supreme wisdom ;
- b. Praptiparamartha, which is Nirvana, because the latter is the parama artha, i.e., the supreme thing;

c. Pratipattiparamartha, which is the Noble Path, because the latter has parama as artha (object), i.e., the supreme Dharma, Nirvana.

All these three kinds are included in Parinispanna: the first two, because they are immutable; the third because it is non-erroneous.'

(Cheng Weishi Lun, p 649-651, tr Wei Tat)

Malcolm said:

That's not why the dependent nature is called "dependent." This is a misunderstanding. It is called the "dependent nature" because samsara and nirvana both depend on how it is perceived, not because it itself is "dependent."

Astus wrote:

That certainly changes things. Would you elaborate?

'The other-dependent nature, however,
Is the act of graspable-grasper discrimination;
It depends for its origin on conditions.'
(Trimsatika, v 21, tr Kochumuttom)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 20th, 2022 at 7:30 PM

Title: Re: Are all Mahayana sutras sutras of definitive meaning?

Content:

Malcolm said:

My definition comes from how it is read from Tibetan.

Astus wrote:

Thank you for looking it up and providing the translations. It's much appreciated.

Malcolm said:

So you see the dependent itself is not "dependent," it produces conceptuality, i.e. samsara, which is different than itself. If it were the same thing as conceptuality, it could not be suchness, in this case, vijñāptimātra, perception-only.

Astus wrote:

The nature of the dependent is conceptuality. This is stated by Vasubandhu and Sthiramati explicitly. Unless you take 'nature' to mean something that is produced by something else, in which case what the dependent is isn't defined at all.

Sthiramati's statement that 'causes and conditions are called "dependent,"' matches the definition given in the Samdhinirmocana Sutra

(<https://read.84000.co/translation/toh106.html#UT22084-049-001-345>): 'what is the other-dependent defining characteristic [of phenomena]? It is the dependent arising of phenomena.'

On the matter of how the dependent is the same as conceptuality Xuanzang gives two versions:

'It should be understood that the definition given in the Stanza whereby 'Paratantra consists of discriminations produced by causes and conditions', refers only to the defiled Paratantra, i.e., the Vikalpa. Pure Paratantra is not, in fact, termed Vikalpa; it is as much Parinispāna as Paratantra.

The second opinion is that all minds and their attributes, whether defiled or pure, are designated in the Stanza by the term vikalpa, because they are all capable of apprehending and perceiving objects. Thus, the definition given in the Stanza includes all Paratantras, pure as well as defiled.'

(Cheng Weishi Lun, p 633, tr Wei Tat)

And here's his summary of the three natures (p 637):

"We may conclude that these three 'Natures' (svabhava) are all inseparable from the mind and its attributes (Citta-Caittas). That is to say:

a. The mind and its attributes, together with the manifestations produced by it (darsana and nimittabhaga), are engendered through numerous conditioning factors, and are thus like the phenomena produced by a magician's tricks, which, not really existing though they seem to exist, deceive the ignorant. All this is called the 'nature of dependence on others' (Paratantra).

b. The ignorant thereupon perversely believe in them as Atman and as dharmas, which exist or do not exist, are identical or different, are inclusive or exclusive, etc. But, like 'flowers in the sky', etc., they are non-existent both in inner nature and external aspect. All this is called the 'nature of mere imagination' (Parikalpita).

c. These things, which are thus dependent on others and are wrongly regarded as Atman and as dharmas, are, in reality, all void (sunya). The genuine nature of consciousness thus revealed by this 'voidness' is called the 'nature of ultimate reality' (Parinispāna). Thus, these three natures are all inseparable from mind, etc."

Malcolm said:

Any, my point is simple, the Yogacārin clearly define consciousness as a substance, they are clearly unhappy if one denies the existence of this substance, and given the absence of another other than minds in their scheme of the universe, their presentation of mind-only in the sūtras suffers from a realist bias.

Astus wrote:

On how dependent origination - i.e. the dependent nature - includes a level of reality, we can look at Madhyantavibhāṅgabhāṣya III.18b (tr Anacker, p 241-242):

'A denial regarding causality would be to construct that nothing like causality takes place at all.'

'A denial regarding effect would be to construct that even when ignorance does not exist, ensnaring motivating dispositions would arise.'

'A denial regarding activity would be to construct that even ignorance has no power to make the motivating dispositions arise.'

I don't see how that's much of a problem, it's like correct relative truth. As for the interpretation that 'the Yogacārin clearly define consciousness as a substance', it fits only when 'substance' stands for causal efficacy, and not for some independent, permanent entity. After all, if the final truth Yogacara had to offer was an ultimately existing mind, then they would be subject to the below objection made against the Sautrantikas:

'If you hold your consciousness-species to be a real thing (dravya), you adopt the opinion of the Tirthikas (Vaisesikas).'
(Cheng Weishi Lun, p 205, tr Wei Tat)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 20th, 2022 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: Are all Mahayana sutras of definitive meaning?

Content:

Malcolm said:

There cannot be causal efficiencies if there are no actual subjects and objects.

Astus wrote:

How does that interpretation reflect on Madhyamaka?

Verse 8abc: 'A mere thing (vastu-mātra), which is not confused with anything that is imagined and arises dependently, is known as correct relative [truth].'

Commentary: 'Mere things are capable of effective action (artha-kriyā-samartha) that corresponds to appearances (yathādarśana). [Mere things] also depend for their arising on causes and conditions, so they are known as correct relative truth. If something appears consistently to be caused in the cognition of [everyone from a scholar] to a child, it is correct relative [truth], because something exists that is consistent with what appears in cognition.'

(Commentary on the Distinction Between the Two Truths, in Jñānagarbha on the Two Truths, p 75)

'The conventional that appears just-as-it-is is established by being produced by causes and conditions. If it were impossible to establish it, by whom would the moon in water and the like be produced?

Therefore all appearances are established as being produced by various causes and conditions. If the continuance of conditions is interrupted, they do not arise even conventionally.'

(Entry to the Two Realities by Atiśa, v 22-23, in Jewels of the Middle Way, p 121)

Malcolm said:

Throughout their analysis, consciousness itself left unnegated, and so on, try as they may to avoid the charge of realism, their own words betray them.

Astus wrote:

If by consciousness you mean conditioned appearances devoid of essence, what's there to negate? If you mean something else, like a real consciousness, how would that not be practically an atman? Therefore, as consciousness is the one that grasps things, it is very much negated (Sutralamkara VI.7-8 (also quoted in Mahamudra the Moonlight on pp 64, 85, 185); Sangraha III.7-8).

'The Bodhisattva, in the state of Samadhi,
Perceives that images are merely his mind;
The aspects of emptiness and being having already been eliminated,
He realizes that only his thoughts exist.
Abiding thus in his interior mind,
He knows that what is grasped (Grahya) does not exist.
He then realizes that what grasps (Grahaka) does not exist either ;
Later he "touches" the state of "having gained nothing" (anupalambha).'
(Cheng Weishi Lun, p 683, tr Wei Tat)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 21st, 2022 at 4:13 AM

Title: Re: Are all Mahayana sutras sutras of definitive meaning?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Do dualistic appearances exist apart from a consciousness or not?

Astus wrote:

Appearances are whatever appears as an experience, and they become dualistic through conceiving them in terms of apprehended and one who apprehends. How could there be an experience without a consciousness?

Malcolm said:

And if in fact dualistic appearances are utter nonexistents (which the yogacārins claim is the case), how is the consciousness in which they appear conditioned?

Astus wrote:

What is nonexistent - i.e. it never actually appears - is the assumed substantiality of appearances.

Malcolm said:

What are the causes and conditions of this substantial consciousness?

Astus wrote:

Consciousness is not a single thing, and each instance of consciousness is conditioned by various factors, most importantly the three poisons.

Malcolm said:

This is the whole problem with the yogacārin interpretation of the three nature and why mādhyamikas attack it.

Astus wrote:

Brunnhölzl's summary of the three natures:

'From the Yogācāra School's fundamental point of view — that whatever we encounter is always nothing but an experience in our mind — the three natures can be summarized as follows. The imaginary nature stands for our habitual way of misperceiving the other-dependent nature — dependently-originating mere appearances in our minds. We insist that these are real in just the way they appear, existing as distinct entities of internal consciousness and its external objects. Although such dependent dualistic appearances (the other-dependent nature) lack any self-sufficient existence, they cannot simply be claimed to be nothing, as they keep appearing and being experienced due to our habitual mental tendencies. The perfect nature basically refers to perceiving the unity of dependently-originating mere appearances and emptiness. This means realizing that any imaginary subject-object duality and all superimpositions of personal and phenomenal identities never existed in other-dependent appearances. However, this does not mean to reify either the other-dependent or the perfect nature as some truly existent remainder after duality has been removed.'

(Straight from the Heart, p 45)

Malcolm said:

As far as I can tell, you are misreading Jñānagarbha, conflating his "mere thing" with Asanga's "mere thing":

'A mere thing (vastu-mātra), which is not confused with anything that is imagined and arises dependently, is known as correct relative [truth].'

Asanga's "mere thing" in the BBh is an ineffable ultimate, as indicated above.

Astus wrote:

No conflation, just coincidence (or not) that Jñānagarbha happens to use the same term that is used in Yogācāra. On the other hand, apart from categorising one as conventional and the other as ultimate, what difference is there? In Madhyamaka conventional mere appearances are mistaken for substantial entities, i.e. as ultimate, and that brings about suffering. In Yogacara ultimate mere appearances are mistaken for substantial entities, i.e. as perceiver and perceived, and that brings about suffering.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 24th, 2022 at 6:50 PM

Title: Re: Nirvana in 3 innumerable kalpas, or in a single lifetime?

Content:

yokosukasailorboy said:

As I have heard, enlightenment takes 3 innumerable kalpas to achieve.

Astus wrote:

'The words of the Buddha are true. But the three asankhya kalpas refer to the three poisoned states of mind. What we call asankhya in Sanskrit you call countless. Within these three poisoned states of mind are countless evil thoughts. And every thought lasts a kalpa. Such an infinity is what the Buddha meant by the three asankhya kalpas. Once your real self becomes obscured by the three poisons, how can you be called liberated until you overcome their countless evil thoughts? People who can transform the three poisons of greed, anger, and delusion into the three releases are said to pass through the three asankhya kalpas. But people of this final age are the densest of fools. They don't understand what the Tathagata really meant by the three asankhya kalpas. They say enlightenment is only achieved after endless kalpas and thereby mislead disciples to retreat on the path to buddhahood.'

(Breakthrough Sermon, in The Zen Teaching of Bodhidharma, p 85-87; https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/X63n1220_p0009b12)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 25th, 2022 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: A Mahayana version of "In the Buddha's Words"

Content:

Javierfv1212 said:

I was wondering, if someone were to make a similar compilation for Mahayana, which Mahayana sutra passages would you say definitely must be included in it?

Astus wrote:

Something like that has been done already.

<https://www.bdkamerica.org/product/buddha-dharma-the-way-to-enlightenment-2e-paperback/>

<https://buddhistuniversity.net/content/monographs/common-buddhist-text>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 26th, 2022 at 3:50 AM

Title: Re: A Mahayana version of "In the Buddha's Words"

Content:

Javierfv1212 said:

Yes but i was thinking of something that's specifically Mahayanist.

Astus wrote:

There's the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sutrasamuccaya>, but its English translation by Bhikkhu Pāsādika seems hard to come by.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 27th, 2022 at 5:52 PM

Title: Re: Questions about various Buddhist schools

Content:

Tukaram said:

From what I have said does one tradition sound more my style than others?

My plan is to keep studying, keep meditating, and see where it goes. Any reading, practice, teachers... any advice would be greatly appreciated.

Astus wrote:

Any and all. There are stereotypes, like Theravada being monastic focused, Zen being simplistic, and Vajrayana being ritualistic, but practically it's about what inclinations one has regardless of the tradition. The decisive factors are mostly what sort of rhetoric you find acceptable and what are your options in terms of accessible teachings. It is also possible to start at one place and then move to another as one's understanding matures about Buddhism.

A generally recommended introductory book is Mahayana Buddhism: The Doctrinal Foundations by Paul Williams. The Heart of the Buddha's Teaching: Transforming Suffering into Peace, Joy, and Liberation by Thich Nhat Hanh is a good and short summary of key concepts. But there are other great books and websites as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 28th, 2022 at 11:05 PM

Title: Re: A Mahayana version of "In the Buddha's Words"

Content:

Malcolm said:

As for the path, readings on ethics, the six perfections, śamatha and vipaśyāna, pure land,

And for the result, clearly, readings on ten stages, the nature of the two or three kāyas such as the lifespan of the Tathāgata chapter in the Lotus, etc.

Astus wrote:

Either for the path (pure land) or the result a short list of the most important/popular buddhas and bodhisattvas should be included. One limiting criteria could be that they're accepted on both the Chinese and the Tibetan sides. So along the lines of Sakyamuni, Amitabha, Bhaisajyaguru, Avalokita, Manjusri, Samantabhadra, Ksitigarbha, Maitreya.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 4th, 2022 at 7:42 PM

Title: Re: Garchen Cakrasamvara Transcriptions?

Content:

KonchogUrgyenNyima said:

Anyone know a guy?

Astus wrote:

Maybe <https://dakinitranslations.com/2021/10/01/utter-illumination-of-the-innermost-essence/> can work for you.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 7th, 2022 at 3:45 AM

Title: Re: Christian apologetics vs Buddhism

Content:

Knotty Veneer said:

The problem Buddhism seeks to overcome is desire and that its goal is the extinction of all desire. Nirvana more or less equals non-existence. Basically, it's nihilism.

Astus wrote:

There's nothing wrong with that interpretation in general. What is missing from it is that nirvana is attainable while still alive.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 7th, 2022 at 5:47 AM

Title: Re: Christian apologetics vs Buddhism

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

No, "desire" itself, isn't the issue.

Astus wrote:

Right, three types of desire/thirst are the issue: desiring sensual pleasure, desiring to exist, and desiring not to exist. But there are also other definitions.

PadmaVonSamba said:

The issue is desiring conditionally arising phenomena, believing that it brings lasting satisfaction. That mistaken desire is what needs to be abandoned. Buddhism doesn't say that there anything wrong with craving a pizza.

Astus wrote:

There is a problem (i.e. suffering) with such cravings if one can't satisfy it, or if the way taken to satisfy it is painful/harmful in some way. And there is the usual problem with craving that it keeps recurring even if satisfied.

PadmaVonSamba said:

But the misrepresentation of Buddhism claims that the dharma teaches that wanting anything, happiness, security, friends, is somehow a bad thing. It isn't.

Astus wrote:

It's not necessarily bad morally.

'Blinded by desire they do not see
Sensuality's faults, like a leper scratching.
Those free from desire see the infatuated
As suffering like the leper.'

(Aryadeva's Four Hundred Stanzas on the Middle Way, 3.64)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 7th, 2022 at 8:08 PM

Title: Re: What if Buddhism Doesn't Work?

Content:

wei wu wei said:

We'll often read the following advice: if our practice is "working," the people in our lives will notice it.

Astus wrote:

Sounds like a serious misunderstanding of Buddhist practice. Developing mindfulness is a key element, and as such it shows directly how things are going on in terms of skilful and unskilful qualities. Without such awareness we can at best collect some worldly merit.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 8th, 2022 at 4:10 AM

Title: Re: Christian apologetics vs Buddhism

Content:

Knotty Veneer said:

From the few of these Christian vs Buddhist apologetics videos that I've seen on Youtube are there to serve two main purposes: To basically denigrate other faiths in way that reassures the Christian listener that their belief is justified.
To discourage the listener from looking outside Christianity for answers.

Astus wrote:

'Apologetics: A theological science which has for its purpose the explanation and defence of the Christian religion.'

(<https://www.newadvent.org/cathen/01618a.htm>; cf. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Christian_apologetics)

Knotty Veneer said:

I wonder why the Christian apologists do not seem to mention the Mahayana?

Astus wrote:

Theravada at least leaves some sort of subtle mechanics as the ultimate basis, while Mahayana destroys even that much with refuting any sort of true foundation of reality.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 11th, 2022 at 4:03 AM

Title: Re: I have some confusion regarding this tradition, and have questions.

Content:

Mdg137 said:

Is it possible to get to enlightenment (or at least, some level of transcendent realization, not necessarily full Buddhahood) through recitation of Amida's name and through other power, in the here-and-now?

Astus wrote:

Recitation in and of itself can be a form of calming (samatha) practice. A calm state of mind is conducive to wisdom, but for insight one needs to engage in some form of contemplation. Then based on the insight there can be awakening of various levels.

Mdg137 said:

When Pure Land Masters speak of "birth", do they mean birth in the common sense (I.E., your physical body dies, and you are reborn in a lotus in an external Western Pure Land), or do they mean birth in a more absolute sense (I.E., causal birth, from one moment to the next, "birth in one thought-moment" as Ippen said)?

Astus wrote:

Generally it is birth in the Pure Land after one has died. In an absolute sense there is no birth.

Mdg137 said:

Why do the Japanese Masters seem to advocate exclusive recitation, rather than mixing practices?

Astus wrote:

Honen initiated the concept of focusing solely on recitation as the most effective method, so his followers kept up this approach. However, as long as there is no conflict with nenbutsu one may engage in other practices. However, if you prefer a more inclusive approach you might want to look at Chinese Pure Land teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 12th, 2022 at 2:51 PM

Title: Re: Kasina practice or similar

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

are there any cycles of teachings that recommend anything like Kasina practice?

Astus wrote:

Abhidharmakośa 8.34-36 - they discuss the liberations (vimokṣa), the spheres of mastery (abhibhvāyatana), and the spheres of totality (kṛtsnāyatana). The last of those is the equivalent of the Pali kasina, in Tibetan: <https://read.84000.co/glossary/entity-33443.html>. On their meaning and usage see this introduction by Lamotte: <https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225619.html>, where the summary of the Abhidharma approach is:

'In general, the vimokṣas are the gateway into the abhibus, which in turn are the gateway into the kṛtsnas. The vimokṣas are 'complete emancipation' (vimokṣamātra) from the object. The abhibhus exert a twofold mastery (abhibhavana) over the object, entailing the view of the object as one wishes it (yatheṣṭam adhimokṣaḥ) and the absence of the negative emotion provoked by the object (kleśānutpatti). The kṛtsnas embrace the object without a gap and in its totality (nirantarakṛtsnaspharaṇa). All are derived from the dhyānas and the samāpattis.'

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 13th, 2022 at 1:48 AM

Title: Re: Refining a Meditative Practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

Since you're OK with zazen, have you studied any zen teachings, like those of Dogen?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 13th, 2022 at 8:11 PM

Title: Re: Refining a Meditative Practice

Content:

Parsifal said:

So far, I have implemented this way of Zen practice for a long time but I seem to fall in a fatal trap. Should I refrain from any practices other than Zen? I want find any clue to make myself free from any noise or disturbance from outside.

Astus wrote:

An advice to fit one's personal situation needs to be from someone who knows and understands it, and at the same time knows ways to help. Other than that you need to see for yourself to apply the general teachings to your particular case. Zazen, as dropping body and mind, is the ultimate sword of wisdom to cut all entanglements of the misconceptions of self and belonging to a self. However, if it's not a tool one can wield, there are many other approaches to take, one just needs to find and train in the appropriate method. Still, if one can see how from a single attractive thought whole worlds can bloom, it's possible to not perpetuate the first thought. In order to be motivated to let it go it's good to recognise the drawbacks of delighting in that idea.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 14th, 2022 at 7:35 PM

Title: Re: Requesting help understanding Buddhism proof regarding existence of consciousness outside brain

Content:

Astus wrote:

Verification in Buddhism is a subjective process, not objective. Is the thought of a glass of water physical like a glass of water or not? It is fairly easy to see for oneself. As for the ontological idea of there being a completely distinct immaterial consciousness, that's a misconception and is refuted by the doctrine of dependent origination.

"Mendicant, if you have the view that the soul and the body are the same thing, there is no living of the spiritual life. If you have the view that the soul and the body are different things, there is no living of the spiritual life. Avoiding these two extremes, the Realized One teaches by the middle way: 'Rebirth is a condition for old age and death.' ...

'Ignorance is a condition for choices.'"

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn12.35/en/sujato>)

'The living of the holy life (brahmacariyavāsa) is the living of the noble path. One who holds the view "the soul and the body are the same" (taṃ jīvaṃ taṃ sarīraṃ) holds that the soul and the body are annihilated together (at death). For one who holds this, the annihilationist view follows, for he holds that "a being is annihilated." Now this noble path arises to stop and eradicate the round of existence. But on the annihilationist view the round ceases even without the development of the path, and thus the development of the path becomes purposeless. In the second case, one holding the view "the soul is one thing, the body another" (aññaṃ jīvaṃ aññaṃ sarīraṃ) holds that the body alone is annihilated here, while the soul goes about freely like a bird released from a cage. This view is eternalism. But if there were even one formation that is permanent, stable, and eternal, the noble path would not be able to bring the round to an end; thus again the development of the path would be purposeless.'

(The Connected Discourses of the Buddha, p 756, n 107)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 15th, 2022 at 4:29 AM

Title: Re: Refining a Meditative Practice

Content:

Parsifal said:

However, I cannot but be tempted to another meditation scheme to make me mentally more affluent and stabler due to still my feeling like adhering to my ego. To help such myself, I want to try something even only a little bit useful.

Astus wrote:

If zazen is insufficient, then it's good to first be clear about what is missing for you. There are some more extensive classical teachings on zazen that address various difficulties in one's practice, like those of <https://antaiji.org/en/classics/english-zazen-yojinki/> and <https://www.sotozen.com/eng/library/leaflet/heartofzen/index.html>. You may also look into traditional meditation manuals that discuss various hindrances and their antidotes, like <https://www.bdkamerica.org/product/the-sutra-on-the-concentration-of-sitting-meditation/> and the http://kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/ebm_book_page.htm.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 16th, 2022 at 3:05 PM

Title: Re: Pacifying the mind

Content:

Astus wrote:

"But how could one [even] gain the ability to know that it is no-mind [that sees, hears, feels, and knows]?"

"Just try to find out in every detail: What appearance does mind have? And if it can be apprehended: is [what is apprehended] mind or not? Is [mind] inside or outside, or somewhere in between? As long as one looks for mind in these three locations, one's search will end in failure. Indeed, searching it anywhere will end in failure. That's exactly why it is known as no-mind."

(Treatise on No-Mind 無心論, tr Urs App)

Another question: "Teach me, your disciple, to quiet mind."

Answer: "Bring your mind here and I will quiet it for you."

Also: "Just quiet my mind for me!"

Answer: "This is like asking a craftsman to cut out a garment. When the craftsman obtains your silk, then he can for the first time set his cutting tool to work. At the outset, without having seen the silk, how could he have cut out the pattern from space for you? Since you are unable to present your mind to me, I don't know what mind I shall quiet for you. I certainly am unable to quiet space!"

(The Bodhidharma Anthology, p 42)

'When practitioners have distracted, false thoughts during meditation, their minds cannot be at peace. Many practitioners think that trying to pacify the mind is necessary. Therefore, when they hear about a Zen master, they immediately set out on their way to look for a method. If they study this method or that method to pacify their minds, this is only using hot to treat cold or using bright to erase darkness. All these dualisms are unreal and false symptoms. Bodhidharma did not teach that way. He simply said, "Bring me your mind and I will pacify it." When one looks directly at the anxious mind, it will disappear, leaving no trace. Hui-Ke had to say, "I cannot find it." Bodhidharma only had to reply, "There, I have pacified your mind for you." Hui-ke right away saw the Way. For a long time now, we have believed that the agitated, thinking mind is real. However, if we look inside we will find no trace of the thinking mind and will then know it is empty of ownbeing. When we know it is empty, our thoughts no longer grab our attention and so will not disturb us. When thoughts arise, if we do not follow them, our minds will be calm. Following thoughts, thinking of this or that, never stopping, our minds cannot be at peace. The moment that a thought arises, if we know that it is empty and do not follow it, it will disappear by itself. This is a wonderful way for pacifying the mind. This way does not rely on any method or form.

Also, if we look directly at the false thoughts, they will disperse like clouds or smoke. This is "directly pointing at the mind," not relying on any means. If we all practiced in this manner, no one would be unwise enough to run after their thoughts, trying to destroy illusions. We only need to know that thoughts are false and not follow them. This is the essence of Bodhidharma's pacification of mind.'

(Keys to Buddhism by Thich Thanh Tu, p 51-52)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2022 at 3:55 AM

Title: Re: What does "kido" mean? (I'm pretty sure it does not mean "energy way")

Content:

curtstein said:

But I am pretty sure that the actual Hanja for 기도 is 祈禱, which means something like "pray" or even "worship".

Astus wrote:

That seems to be the correct reading. Here are some monasteries providing information on their regular prayers (jeong-gi/sangsi gido 정 기/상시 기도):
<http://www.doseonsa.org/ceremony/pray.asp>,
<http://www.jinkwansa.org/html/?pCode=507&cate=EV01&cate2=AL02>, http://www.bongeunsa.org:90/common/common.do?jsp_path=user/event/prayerAbove.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2022 at 8:38 PM

Title: Re: Contra a Popular Misconception: The Pure Land is not a Bodhisattva "Training Ground"

Content:

Zhen Li said:

It occurred to me that it is often claimed that the Pure Land is a training ground or school for bodhisattvas. I think this explanation helps people to overcome the misconception that the Pure Land is a paradise or heaven. As a skilful means that is fine, but the Pure Land scriptures do not support that claim.

Astus wrote:

If, as you seem to suggest, birth in Sukhavati would magically turn beings into buddhas, then all the many vows would be meaningless, plus it would defy the basic doctrine that everyone has to attain liberation on their own.

Zhen Li said:

28. sacenme bhagavan bodhiprāptasya tatra buddhakṣetre kasyacitsattvasyoddeśo vā svādhyāyo vā kartavyaḥ syāt, na te sarve pratisaṃvitprāptā bhavyeḥ, mā tāvadahamanuttarāṃ samyaksambodhimabhisambudhyeyam.

If, O Bhagavān, having attained bodhi, instruction or learning should have to be done by any being in that buddha land, and they should not all be possessed of perfect and complete knowledge, then may I not fully awaken to anuttara-samyak-sambodhi.

Astus wrote:

It is not 'perfect and complete knowledge', as <https://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/sbe49/sbe4924.htm> translated it. Pratisaṃvid is unhindered/analytical knowledge and it has four types, as given in the <https://www.ancient-buddhist-texts.net/Texts-and-Translations/Dharma-Sangraha/Dharmas-041-060.htm#toc10> and explained in the <https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225795.html>.

Samghavarman: 設我得佛，國中菩薩智慧辯才若可限量者，不取正覺。
(https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T12n0360_p0268c05)

In Inagaki's http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/sutra_of_immeasurable_life.html#div-7 (The Three Pure Land Sutras, BDK ed, p 16):
'30. If, when I attain buddhahood, the wisdom and eloquence of bodhisattvas in my land should be limited, may I not attain perfect enlightenment.'

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2022 at 4:45 AM

Title: Re: What does "kido" mean? (I'm pretty sure it does not mean "energy way")

Content:

curtstein said:

I think it might come as a surprise to many western Buddhists to realize that "chanting" is at least in some sense really "praying"!

Astus wrote:

According to <https://blog.daum.net/511-33/12370671> the word entered Korean Buddhism in the modern times from Christianity.

<http://www.ibulgyo.com/news/articleView.html?idxno=206999> explains how Buddhist prayer (bulgyoi gido 불교의 기도) is unlike other religions. And <http://www.beopbo.com/news/articleView.html?idxno=203416> about how to pray mentions various occasions, like meal prayer (sigsa gidomun 식사기도문; also calls it an offering gatha: gong yang ge 공양게 供養偈), birthday prayer (saeng-ilchugha gidomun 생일축하 기도문), school exam prayer (siheom gido 시험기도), also mentions dharani prayer (dalani gido 다라니기도) and that reciting a buddha's or bodhisattva's name as an easy form of prayer.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2022 at 9:15 PM

Title: Re: What does "kido" mean? (I'm pretty sure it does not mean "energy way")

Content:

curtstein said:

The article cited by astus claims that Buddhists only started using this term in modern times due to the influences of individualism, Christianity, and capitalism.

Astus wrote:

Prayer

(<https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/search/?q=%E7%A5%88%E7%A6%B1&lang=en>) appears a few times, for instance as praying to gods

(https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T08n0261_p0867c03) for longevity; to slaughter sheep as prayer (https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T16n0682_p0760a19); and prayer in a god's temple (https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T21n1299_p0389b03). I assume the post meant the more widespread use of the word for all sorts of religious activities.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2022 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: Contra a Popular Misconception: The Pure Land is not a Bodhisattva "Training Ground"

Content:

Zhen Li said:

As for the many vows, they actually all speak to this one fact—assurance of nirvāṇa, non-retrogression, attainment of all the powers and 32 marks, etc. There are no limitations or wants of beings upon birth.

Astus wrote:

How so? If upon birth one becomes a buddha, then talk of humans and gods, various abilities given to them, plus the qualities of the land itself are quite irrelevant and rather limited compared to a buddha's attributes.

Zhen Li said:

As for attaining liberation on their own—this is where Pure Land as a Buddha-Nature practice comes into play.

Astus wrote:

What does 'Buddha-Nature practice' mean?

Zhen Li said:

If we are thinking of things dualistically from the perspective of the Saha world, yes, there are stages and levels to birth and there are individual beings and selves—these cease to be of relevance or reality upon the fulfilment of birth.

Astus wrote:

If they were irrelevant, then why talk of them?

Zhen Li said:

Besides, questioning this matter of self-liberation as being a "basic doctrine," actually the Mahāyāna sūtras frequently use the language of liberating other beings—the share of agency involved in fulfilling this is not thereby necessarily 100% one way or the other, and again, this only makes sense from a dualistic perspective.

Astus wrote:

Shakyamuni could not simply wish others to become even believers, much less liberated. On the contrary, he urged people to follow the teachings and put them into practice. Similarly, Lokeshvararaja could not transform Dharmakara into a buddha, so he cultivated the paramitas for innumerable aeons.

Liberating beings means guiding them, providing them with the correct teachings, and it is for that reason that a bodhisattva masters all sorts of skilful means. Otherwise there should be only one method to master: wishing beings into buddhas. And even that one power could be granted by other buddhas.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 20th, 2022 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: Contra a Popular Misconception: The Pure Land is not a Bodhisattva "Training Ground"

Content:

Zhen Li said:

It means that the practice is fulfilled by the Buddha's power, which is the innate nature of all beings, rather than the power of a limited being that relates to their illusory attributes like the skandhas.

Astus wrote:

Since all have the Buddha's power as the innate nature, but it makes no difference in everyone's being trapped in birth and death, it is not a power that can liberate anyone.

Zhen Li said:

Skilful means are necessary for limited beings to grasp the path. Otherwise the Dharma dispensation would just start and end with the perfection of wisdom and no one would be any the wiser.

Astus wrote:

Consequently it's not possible to just transform another being into an awakened one. Each has to work on their own liberation.

Zhen Li said:

Ultimately, all attain liberation through "other power."

Astus wrote:

If by ultimately you mean on the level of ultimate truth, then there is neither liberation nor other to talk of. If you mean in the end, then what's the purpose of cultivating the path?

Zhen Li said:

Upon birth they will assuredly realise the Dharma body.

Astus wrote:

There is a big difference between eventually realising through their own efforts, or realising it exclusively through the influence of somebody else.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 20th, 2022 at 7:12 PM

Title: Re: Contra a Popular Misconception: The Pure Land is not a Bodhisattva "Training Ground"

Content:

Zhen Li said:

The point in Pure Land is that its power is manifested through Dharmākara's vows and brings people to a point where they can realise it themselves. Buddhānubhāvena (by the Buddha's power) is how many people achieve all sorts of things in the sūtra literature—the realisation, however, is for themselves alone and not forced upon them by the Buddha.

Astus wrote:

In that case why wouldn't Sukhavati be a so called 'training ground'? It provides an optimal state of existence for beings to attain awakening.

Zhen Li said:

To overcome reliance on self power is to directly see one's true nature.

Astus wrote:

Then no reason to talk of any other power, since, as you stated above: 'everyone is liberated when they realise Buddha Nature'.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 20th, 2022 at 7:58 PM

Title: Re: Four transmissions in Kagyu mahamudra

Content:

shagrath said:

If Mahamudra also has both ka dag and lhun grub aspects, how come there is no thod rgal in tradition?

Astus wrote:

Togal is a technique, kadak and lhundrup are qualities of the nature of mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2022 at 3:03 PM

Title: Re: Contra a Popular Misconception: The Pure Land is not a Bodhisattva "Training Ground"

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Because training is a dualistic conception and birth in the fulfilled land is beyond dualities.

Astus wrote:

Why would it be beyond dualities? The sambhogakaya ('fulfilled body' 報身) is within dualities in its functions, so its land (報土) should be as well, otherwise it'd be the dharmakaya and the dharmadhatu of no birth.

Zhen Li said:

For this reason, Buddha Nature appears to us as Other Power until it is directly realised. As the Nirvāṇa Sūtra puts it, bodhisattvas never fully see Buddha Nature until the attainment of Buddhahood itself, even those on the 10th bhūmi see it like birds in the corner of one's eye: one isn't sure whether they might be a crane or some other bird.

Astus wrote:

So it is not how it was phrased above that one realises one's true nature when abandoning self-power, since only buddhas realise that.

Zhen Li said:

In essence, the Primal Vow is made for evil beings like us, who, though aspiring to do good, out of karmic habit have no other destiny than Avici hell. We need only rely on the Nembutsu, and thereby leap crosswise across the six realms and assuredly attain non-retrogression and birth in Sukhāvātī.

Astus wrote:

That's not been the issue here, but rather the assumption that such evil beings transform into buddhas immediately out of no effort on their own just because they are born in Sukhavati.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2022 at 6:11 PM

Title: Re: Contra a Popular Misconception: The Pure Land is not a Bodhisattva "Training Ground"

Content:

Zhen Li said:

The fulfilled land or true and fulfilled land (眞実報土) is the dharmakāya, the transformed land (方便化土) is that of the saṃbhogakāya.

Astus wrote:

What about the palaces, trees, bodies of water, etc. in the Pure Land? Are they somehow equated with the dharmakaya? Or is it that there is no land at all where one can be born? If the former, then it is a very different view of the dharmakaya than what is found in Mahayana usually. If the latter, then why the need to die first?

Zhen Li said:

But actually, Nirvana is attained upon birth.

This is partially because means and end are ultimately part of the same essence. But since we are ordinary beings, we can only interact with it by an expedient.

Astus wrote:

Same as above, if nirvana is attained immediately upon birth without any cultivation of the paramitas, why the need for birth in the first place?

Zhen Li said:

You say "just because they are born in Sukhavati" as if that is not itself an attainment that takes the coming about of the right causes and conditions.

This is the claim of the sutra, and has been the claim of the Pure Land tradition for over a millenium.

Astus wrote:

The standard claim is that one is born in Sukhavati to then engage in the bodhisattva activities required for buddhahood.

'It is not that these acts are not effective. It is simply that it is too difficult for mortals in the period of the decline of the Dharma to fulfill the practice of holding and reciting the sutras. Therefore, they should first attain birth in the Pure Land through nembutsu while relying on the essential vow, be blessed to encounter Tathāgata Amida, Bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara, and Bodhisattva Mahāsthāmaprāpta there, study various holy teachings, and then realize enlightenment.'

(An Outline of Nenbutsu, in The Promise of Amida, p 144)

'Strive to attain birth expeditiously in the Pure Land of Ultimate Bliss, and once there with Amida Buddha and Bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara as mentors, try to learn and internalize the subtle principle of all holy teachings: the school of the realization of enlightenment through ascertainment of the profound principle of absoluteness and the equality of the ultimate reality taught in the Lotus Sutra, the concept of the ultimate principle of emptiness presented in the Perfection of Wisdom Sutra, and the theory of realization of buddhahood in your present body in the Shingon school.'

(Dialogue on the Essentials of Nenbutsu, in The Promise of Amida, p 213)

See also this summary on

<https://web.archive.org/web/20060101052628/http://jsri.jp/english/honen/teachings/senchaku/process.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2022 at 7:56 PM

Title: Re: Contra a Popular Misconception: The Pure Land is not a Bodhisattva "Training Ground"

Content:

Zhen Li said:

On the condition that nirvāṇa is attained upon birth for those with Shinjin, birth is a given in the premises. If you rather attained nirvāṇa here and now, there would be no need for birth in the vows of Dharmākara. But since assured birth is the way by which we easily cut off the six realms, we attain non-retrogression in this life, and full nirvāṇa upon birth.

Astus wrote:

My question is: why the need for birth if a buddha can make beings awakened out of his own volition without the need for a being to do anything, apart maybe for wishing so?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2022 at 9:11 PM

Title: Re: Contra a Popular Misconception: The Pure Land is not a Bodhisattva "Training Ground"

Content:

Zhen Li said:

A Buddha cannot will a being into awakening, but he can transfer merit to allow us to be born in Sukhāvati if we are willing to accept it.

Astus wrote:

That explains birth through other power. It does not explain awakening immediately at birth, i.e. liberation without cultivation.

Zhen Li said:

The only pure cause is the Buddha's mind. Thus, receiving Shinjin is understood to be partaking in the Buddha's mind. The connection is made in this life, and its full realisation is attained through birth.

Astus wrote:

The cause of birth is explained by faith and the transference of merit, but the cause of realisation is not explained by birth at all.

Zhen Li said:

While in this world we are still in the oil, but upon death we become one with the flame.

Astus wrote:

It's explained in many sutras and treatises how ignorance is eliminated by wisdom. How can birth generate wisdom?

Zhen Li said:

So, there is no ordinary self who can attain awakening, but Buddha Nature is realised with the burning up of the ordinary/saṃsāric self.

Astus wrote:

How would ordinary self be burnt away by birth?

Zhen Li said:

There is no all-powerful Buddha reaching into this reality and shaking us awake out of the slumber of saṃsāra while within saṃsāra, but there is a Buddha who transfers merits for this to occur upon our birth.

Astus wrote:

Do you say that merit transference can generate not only birth but also awakening?

Zhen Li said:

That is just not how saṃsāra and liberation works, and this is why no amount of satoris or kenshos is going to give someone the 32 marks in this life.

Astus wrote:

How samsara and the path to liberation works has been explained many times, but the idea that deluded beings can immediately turn into buddhas upon birth in Sukhavati seems to very much contradict those teachings on the path to liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2022 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: Contra a Popular Misconception: The Pure Land is not a Bodhisattva "Training Ground"

Content:

Mirror said:

Astus what Zhen Li describes is a Jōdo Shinshū perspective. Chinese Pure Land Buddhism doesn't have such concept of being spontaneously liberated just by being born in Sukhavati (as far as I know).

Astus wrote:

Thank you. Apparently not even Honen had such a view.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 23rd, 2022 at 4:43 AM

Title: Re: Contra a Popular Misconception: The Pure Land is not a Bodhisattva "Training Ground"

Content:

Zhen Li said:

It's a hongaku (original awakening) kind of liberation.

Astus wrote:

The assumption of buddha nature makes no difference in the need to purify the mind before its nature becomes manifest.

Zhen Li said:

The non-practice practice means that stages and levels are transcended.

Astus wrote:

There is no problem with going to full 'sudden awakening, sudden practice' (https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T48n2008_p0358c28). At the same time, while some direct disciples of Shakyamuni attained realisation very quickly, others did not. Therefore Huineng said, 'The Dharma is without sudden and gradual; it is people that are clever or dull, therefore the names sudden and gradual.' (Platform Sutra, ch 8, BDK ed, p 72)

Zhen Li said:

It is explained thoroughly how bodhisattva conduct is truly beyond the dualities of stages and gradations, and is, in fact, contiguous with the dharmakāya of the buddha.

Astus wrote:

That is the common Mahayana understanding, while at the same time there are stages and gradations.

'Sariputra: If, venerable Subhuti, the Bodhisattva is a non-production and also the dharmas which constitute him, and also the state of all-knowledge, and also the dharmas which constitute it, and also the common people, and also the dharmas which constitute them, -then, surely, the state of all-knowledge is reached by a Bodhisattva without any exertion?

Subhuti: I do not wish for the attainment of an unproduced dharma, nor reunion with one. Further, does one attain an unproduced attainment through unproduced dharma?

Sariputra: Is then an unproduced attainment attained through an unproduced dharma, or through a produced dharma?

Subhuti: Is then an unproduced dharma produced, or is it unproduced?

Sariputra: Is then production a dharma which is a non-production, or is non-production dharma which is production?

Subhuti: To talk of a production as a non-production-dharma is not intelligible.

Sariputra: To talk of non-production is also not intelligible.

Subhuti: Non-production is just talk. Non-production just appears before the mind's eye. Non-production is just a flash in the mind. Absolutely it is nothing more than that.'

(PP8K, 1.6, tr Conze)

'Subhuti: If that is so, how can a Bodhisattva arrive, without an increase in perfect wisdom, at the full attainment of enlightenment, how can he know full enlightenment?

The Lord: In actual fact a Bodhisattva who courses in perfect wisdom neither increases or decreases. Just as perfect wisdom is empty, without increase or decrease, just so also a Bodhisattva is empty, without increase or decrease. It is because of this fact, - i.e. that just as perfect wisdom is empty, without increase or decrease, - that a Bodhisattva arrives at the full attainment of enlightenment, and thus knows full enlightenment.'

(PP8K, 22.4, tr Conze)

Zhen Li said:

This realisation is uncaused because it is original.

Astus wrote:

If it were uncaused, it could never occur. If realisation never occurs, then there is no end to suffering.

Zhen Li said:

There are teachings of instant and gradual awakening. Pure Land is a path of instant, not gradual, awakening.

Astus wrote:

One can talk of instant awakening for an unlimited amount of time, it's the listener that will either comprehend it or not. Furthermore, since even Shakyamuni couldn't make everyone suddenly awakened, it should be clear that there is no such wondrous doctrine or method. Hence it still remains very much unexplained how could all become immediately buddhas at birth.

Zhen Li said:

It is not generating wisdom.

Astus wrote:

If birth gives no wisdom, it sure cannot give liberation.

Zhen Li said:

No, I am not saying that. Vasubandhu and Shandao talk about the merit transference from Dharmākara's vows of birth, and return to this world to aid beings (Oso and Genso Eko).

Astus wrote:

So merit is of no help in immediately transforming ordinary beings to buddhas.

Zhen Li said:

Karmic bonds are severed at the end of one's life.

Astus wrote:

By what? Merit transference does not eliminate karma. Wisdom is not produced to cut off afflictions. What could do it then?

Zhen Li said:

Pure Land practice is easy, instant, and takes one lifetime.

Astus wrote:

That's Pure Land practice in this life, but it does not liberate anyone in this life.

Zhen Li said:

Honen's extant writings do not contradict this idea

Astus wrote:

I have <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=639532#p639532> two quotes directly from Honen and one summary from a Jodoshu site that all show Honen did teach engaging the holy path after birth through nenbutsu.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 23rd, 2022 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: Contra a Popular Misconception: The Pure Land is not a Bodhisattva "Training Ground"

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Birth doesn't create the wisdom, it's inherent in liberation which is original.

Astus wrote:

Original awakening is not the same as actualised awakening. The question still is: how can a being be moved from one to the other?

Zhen Li said:

birth brings about liberation

Astus wrote:
How?

Zhen Li said:
The Pure Land has no conditions to bring karmic seeds to fruition.

Astus wrote:
A little calming meditation provides the same conditions. It still does not make one permanently free from craving and clinging.

Zhen Li said:
The Buddha's light of wisdom emerges (see above) and directly eliminates the darkness of delusion.

Astus wrote:
Amitabha's light has no limits, so it should eliminate darkness everywhere, but it does not.

Zhen Li said:
And Shinran and Rennyo also encouraged simply saying the Nembutsu.

Astus wrote:
The point was not the method but the need for cultivation after birth.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 23rd, 2022 at 5:56 AM

Title: Re: Contra a Popular Misconception: The Pure Land is not a Bodhisattva "Training Ground"

Content:

Malcolm said:

It does not even actually transfer (if it did, it would be compounded, impermanent).

Astus wrote:
Since it was not claimed to be the cause of liberation I thought it an irrelevant issue. But it's still nice you mentioned it.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 23rd, 2022 at 5:02 PM

Title: Re: Contra a Popular Misconception: The Pure Land is not a Bodhisattva "Training Ground"

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Why should anyone have desires in the Pure Land? The conditions that give rise to the fruition of those seeds are simply not present.

Frankly, you are far overstating what "a little calming meditation" does. If a little bit of calming meditation provided the same conditions as Sukhāvatī, there would be no point for the Mahāyāna vaipulya sutra to be taught.

Astus wrote:

When the mind is calm and focused there is also no condition to give rise to craving, anger, or confusion, that's also why it's optimal for insight and why sometimes various absorptions can also be called liberation of a temporary type. The reason I mentioned it, however, was simply to point out that just because no disturbing emotions are present one does not automatically gain wisdom.

Zhen Li said:

Actually it does. From Sanghavarman's translation: With my divine power I will display great light,
Illuminating the worlds without limit,
And dispel the darkness of the three defilements;
Thus I will deliver all beings from misery.

Astus wrote:

Still beings are lost in delusion, so actually no defilements are eliminated by it. Therefore the cause of liberation cannot be that light. What is the cause then?

Zhen Li said:

You are missing the point about transformed birth. Shinran and Rennyo still hold that cultivation is necessary after birth for those born in the transformed land. Again, different teaching for a different audience.

Astus wrote:

It does not fit what Honen wrote. In both works (An Outline of Nembutsu, Dialogue on the Essentials of Nembutsu) Honen talks of attaining birth through the right cultivation of nembutsu ('attain birth in the Pure Land through nembutsu while relying on the essential vow' & 'It should be known that his essential vow was not made in vain. If sentient beings recite his name, they will, with certainty, attain birth in the Pure Land.' - passages preceding the description of cultivation of the holy path after birth in those two texts). There is no such distinction made by him that you refer to, as if it were possible to become buddha without due causes.

Zhen Li said:

Frankly, Honen many times in the Senchakushu quotes Shandao's passages on birth being birth into the land that is the same as nirvāṇa, and equating sukhāvatī with the unconditioned nirvāṇa.

Astus wrote:

I have found one such quote (BDK ed, p 119-120):

'Because [the Land of] Supreme Bliss is the world of unconditioned nirvana, it is difficult to be reborn there by means of the Miscellaneous Good Practices that correspond to people's varying capacities. That is why the Tathagata chose the needed Dharma and taught that one should think solely and wholeheartedly on Amida Buddha. One should do this for seven days and seven nights with no break in attention. When undertaking longer periods of practice, one should do this even more. Just as their lives are about to end, a multitude of Holy Beings bearing lotus pedestals with them will appear to such people. With their bodies and minds exulting, they will be seated on these golden lotus pedestals, and when thus seated, they will immediately gain insight into the unproduced [quality of all things]. In an instant, they will be welcomed and be led before the Buddha himself. Then the Dharma's friends will vie with one another to clothe them in Dharma robes. At that time they will realize the Stage of Non-Retrogression and enter into the Stage of the Three Wisdoms.'

Saying that it is the world of the unconditioned nirvana is not the same as being nirvana. The last sentence is the most telling, since besides the 'usual' mention of non-retrogression there is the 'three wisdoms'

(<https://www2.buddhistdoor.net/dictionary/details/%E4%B8%89%E8%B3%A2>, lit. <https://www.nichirenlibrary.org/en/dic/Content/T/172>), and that refers to the forty stages of the bodhisattva path before the ten bhumis. In other words, they are not even arya-bodhisattvas, much less buddhas.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 23rd, 2022 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: Contra a Popular Misconception: The Pure Land is not a Bodhisattva "Training Ground"

Content:

Zhen Li said:

It is uncaused.

Astus wrote:

To say that there is no cause for liberation means that it can never happen, everyone is eternally without any freedom from suffering.

Zhen Li said:

Amitābha's light is the wisdom that always dispells delusion, in all space and time. That is what it is saying. Why are we deluded then? Amitābha is not the cause of delusion, his light is there and it is always ready to dispell our delusion, but we and our habitual conditions are the originators of our delusion that has no discernable beginning.

Let's put it in different words. The sunlight is always shining on your window, but the curtains are open or closed by your own choosing. Whatever darkness there is, inside or outside your room, is always dispelled by the sunlight without exception. But it won't come into your room unless you open the curtains.

Astus wrote:

Then Amitabha's light is very much ineffective, since delusion is exactly the obscuration. Since the sun cannot move the curtain, the light cannot eliminate the hindrances of liberation. So, just as the <https://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra50.html> teaches, the main requirement to attain buddha nature is removing the afflictions. It is not enough to have the nature of a buddha, that in and of itself does not liberate anyone. Therefore, just as you write, the light will not come into the room unless one opens the curtains. That opening of the curtains is done by oneself, that is removing the afflictions. This purification is what is missing from the explanation regarding immediate buddhahood upon birth.

Zhen Li said:

What Honen doesn't talk about in his extant works is the distinction between birth with immediate attainment of nirvāṇa and birth with gradual attainment of nirvāṇa.

Astus wrote:

Because such a distinction does not exist in Jodoshu, or in Chinese Pure Land Buddhism, or in other Buddhist schools. Looks like an exclusively Shinshu idea that lacks an explanation for it.

Zhen Li said:

But he quotes Shandao who writes about this—so he was familiar with and did not contradict the idea.

Astus wrote:

Not really. That was the only quote in the Senchakushu from Shandao that only resembles the idea, but does not actually say so.

Zhen Li said:

Of course it is. That is why you can only be born there through the Buddha's power, and not by self power practice. Hence: "it is difficult to be reborn there by means of the Miscellaneous Good Practices that correspond to people's varying capacities."

Astus wrote:

Being difficult and being impossible are not the same. Also, if it were meant that Sukhavati was literally nirvana, then any statement regarding birth there would have been meaningless.

Zhen Li said:

It is a non-discriminatory birth by realisation of Buddha-Nature that one directly realises unconditioned nirvāṇa.

Astus wrote:

Not discriminated by whom? The ordinary being who is born cannot do it yet. The noble beings are already without any discrimination. So what is a 'non-discriminatory birth'? If it can happen by the realisation of buddha nature, then the cause of such a birth is awakening and not the primary vow, so it is no different from the holy path.

Zhen Li said:

This is referring to the transformed land. Any birth with manifestational appearance is birth in the transformed land, and it is preceded by a description of self power Nembutsu.

Astus wrote:

That is not supported by the quote itself, since it talks of birth in the Pure Land that is the 'world of unconditioned nirvana', where 'they will be seated on these golden lotus pedestals', and 'enter into the Stage of the Three Wisdoms'. So such a distinction between lands is not found in that quote. What it explicitly says is that those born in Sukhavati cultivate the bodhisattva path.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 23rd, 2022 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: Contra a Popular Misconception: The Pure Land is not a Bodhisattva "Training Ground"

Content:

Zhen Li said:

You are mixing conventional and ultimate.

Astus wrote:

The ultimate is emptiness where talk of liberation is meaningless. The conventional is where liberation can happen, but to say that there is no cause for liberation is tantamount to denying it ever happening. So either there have to be conventional causes and conditions, or there is no liberation to talk of.

Zhen Li said:

This is simply a question of soteriological realism. In the Pure Land tradition it is admitted that Buddhahood is impossible by the power of the ordinary being, the conventional level. Awakening is always on the side of Buddha Nature.

Astus wrote:

As above, without awakening on the conventional level there is no awakening at all.

Zhen Li said:

Buddhas and bodhisattvas are ultimately inactive. Their appearance of action and cultivation is what happens when their activity comes in contact with our limited minds.

Astus wrote:

Ultimately what activity or inactivity to differentiate for anyone or anything? None. Therefore it is an impossibility that there is contact, since contact means conditionality and conventionality.

Zhen Li said:

So, from the side of awakening, it is realised very much that in fact the curtains are actually opened by the Buddha. The appearance of needing to open is only something manifest to our unawakened cognition.

Astus wrote:

From the side of awakening there is no curtain, so how could there be a moving of it? Therefore no buddha can move it for anyone. That's why it's left to each being to do it on their own.

Zhen Li said:

The Buddha can and does do heavy lifting for ordinary beings, that is entirely within the orbit of Mahāyāna buddhology. This doesn't mean that there is no choice on the part of the practitioner, and it doesn't mean that things won't appear to be done out of their own power prior to awakening.

Astus wrote:

What heavy lifting? Since there are beings in samsara clearly no buddha could ever save them. And if beings have to arrive at awakening to benefit from the activities of the buddhas, then first all the actual purification of the mind has been done already by the being alone, and then there is no further need of any help from any buddha after awakening.

This is illustrated very well by your quote:

Likewise the Aṣṭasāhasika: Whatever, Venerable Sariputra, the Lord's Disciples teach, all that is to be known as the Tathagata's work. For in the dharma demonstrated by the Tathagata they train themselves, they realise its true nature, they hold it in mind.

Thereafter nothing that they teach contradicts the true nature of dharma. It is just an outpouring of the Tathagata's demonstration of dharma.

That is, first 'they train themselves, they realise its true nature, they hold it in mind' and 'Thereafter nothing that they teach contradicts the true nature of dharma.' The being has to do the purification, and only after that there is harmonisation between the being and the buddha.

Zhen Li said:

Understanding and teaching are on the side of the Tathāgata, the sentient being, the prthagjana, is a limited conduit which we imagine to be independently liberating itself, but all such attempts are futile.

Astus wrote:

If realisation were on the side of the tathagata, then it would mean no being ever gains liberation, or all should be already awakened. Furthermore, a tathagata needs no realisation, only ordinary beings do.

Zhen Li said:

But the orthodox Nishi Hongwanji position is of Nirvāṇa upon birth.

Astus wrote:

So it's not even a view shared by all Shinshu adherents, much less others outside the followers of Shinran. Do you know perhaps who established this doctrine of nirvana upon birth at the Honganji-ha?

Zhen Li said:

In truth, they are one with suchness. Once a being is there, they no longer have adverse conditions to overcome, so they immediately attain buddhahood. This is not a question of practice or non-practice, purification or non-purification. It is simply a question of suchness and buddha-nature.

Astus wrote:

Everything is already such, it doesn't make anyone awakened. Absence of adverse conditions is not a sufficient cause of liberation, because that in itself does not remove any underlying tendencies.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2022 at 4:43 AM

Title: Re: Contra a Popular Misconception: The Pure Land is not a Bodhisattva "Training Ground"

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Conventionally, one is born in the Pure Land through the Primal Vow. After that, the innate awakening is realised.

Astus wrote:

The issue is that such a realisation cannot be provided by any vow of another being.

Zhen Li said:

Both birth and gradual awakening are done by the heavy lifting. This is what my quotes illustrated quite clearly.

Astus wrote:

What they illustrate is that beings are originally buddhas, not that buddhas can do the awakening in lieu of deluded beings. If they could there would already be no deluded beings left.

Zhen Li said:

The prior quote shows that when they train, it is through the buddha's power as well.

Astus wrote:

If that were so why don't all beings train? What is it that a buddha's power cannot fix?

Zhen Li said:

It's explicit in Shinran, let alone Vasubandhu, Tanluan, and Shandao. It is also expressed by other of Honen's disciples. So, it is reasonable to assume that Honen held this view too.

Astus wrote:

Since only one branch of Shinshu interpret it like you do it shows that it's not really that explicit.

Zhen Li said:

Underlying tendencies do not come to fruition in Sukhāvatī. This is how karmic obstacles are eliminated—they simply lie dormant until nirvāṇa is attained, so it is as if they are not there.

Astus wrote:

The main question is: how is nirvana attained if not by the standard cultivation of the holy path by each being born in the Pure Land?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2022 at 4:59 AM

Title: Re: Contra a Popular Misconception: The Pure Land is not a Bodhisattva "Training Ground"

Content:

Malcolm said:

The kindest thing is to help them eliminate clinging from the root in this life, then they do not have to wait for some putative liberation later on.

Astus wrote:

“I will move the Western [Paradise] for you in an instant, so you will be able to see it right in front of you. ... the very form-bodies of people in this world are the city walls [of the Pure Land]. Your eyes, ears, nose, and tongue are the gates [of the Pure Land]. Externally, you have five gates, and within is the gate of the sensory mind. The mind is the ground, and the nature is the king. The king resides on the mind-ground, and the nature exists just as a king exists. When the nature goes, the king is absent. When the nature is present, the body and mind continue. When the nature departs, the body disintegrates. ‘Buddha’ acts within the nature—don’t look for it outside your bodies! When one is deluded as to the self-nature, one is a sentient being, but when one realizes the self-nature, one is a buddha. ... By illuminating the self-nature within, the three poisons are eliminated, and all the transgressions [leading to] the hells are dissolved in an instant. Clearly penetrating within and without, it is no different from the Western [Paradise]. If you do not cultivate in this fashion, how could you ever arrive there?”

(Platform Sutra, ch 4, BDK ed, p 39-40)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2022 at 9:33 PM

Title: Re: Contra a Popular Misconception: The Pure Land is not a Bodhisattva "Training Ground"

Content:

Zhen Li said:

As for why there are still deluded beings left—going back to the analogy before, not all beings choose to open the curtain.

Astus wrote:

Let's stick with that analogy then.

A little review of previous discussions:

You originally mentioned it

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=639618#p639618>, to what I

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=639625#p639625> that 'the light will not come into the room unless one opens the curtains. That opening of the curtains is done by oneself, that is removing the afflictions. This purification is what is missing from the explanation regarding immediate buddhahood upon birth.'

Then for some reason you

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=639632#p639632> that beings don't move the curtain, contrary what you said before: 'So, from the side of awakening, it is realised very much that in fact the curtains are actually opened by the Buddha. The appearance of needing to open is only something manifest to our unawakened cognition.' ... 'To express it in conventional terms, then, the weight of our karmic evil is so heavy that we can never attain buddhahood. But the infinitude of Amitābha is such that his direction of merit can always bring us to birth.'

To that was a little mix up about conventional and ultimate where you

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=639649#p639649> that: 'The moving is a conventional perspective. From the conventional perspective the fact that there is no moving will appear to be removal. '

Now back to the point of beings choosing to open the curtain or not. If there is a choice, there is an act of opening on the side of beings, then it is not on the side of any buddha, no buddha does that for the beings, therefore it is not by the power of any buddha.

Otherwise, if it is by a buddha, then all curtains should already be open. If you accept that beings do have a choice and they do need to act, then the possibility of liberation forced on others is excluded and everyone has to actually walk the path until awakening.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2022 at 4:24 AM

Title: Re: Contra a Popular Misconception: The Pure Land is not a Bodhisattva "Training Ground"

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Firstly, one can open the curtains by oneself—this is birth by the 19th and 20th vows.

Astus wrote:

It was not raised regarding the causes of birth but the causes of awakening, although it might be applied to both cases.

Zhen Li said:

As for the case of birth by the 18th vow, they are conceived of as being opened by the Buddha because faith (Shinjin) is the mind of the Buddha that is bestowed on beings. Since faith is the cause for birth, the curtains are opened by the Buddha.

Astus wrote:

If it were bestowed by the Buddha then all should have faith, but that's not the case.

Zhen Li said:

One must be open to receiving faith, however. So the analogy breaks down there.

Astus wrote:

The primary and only problem is with the claim that something (no matter what) is done by a buddha to another being's karma or mind without the active participation of said being is that such an act of one sided influence would need to apply to everyone already. So, if a buddha can make beings be born in Sukhavati, then all should be born there and not in other realms. If a buddha can make beings free from afflictions, then all should already be free from them. And so on.

Zhen Li said:

As for receptiveness, it comes about by 1. karmic conditions, 2. encountering a good teacher, and 3. Amitābha's light (which is always shining). With the conjunction of 1 and 2 alone, if one listens without reflection, or recites the Nembutsu out of self power blindly, no faith will result. One must reflect on the Primal Vow and understand its significance for one's life. In reflection, from the ultimate perspective, one can see 1 and 2 as manifestations of the Buddha's compassionate working—there don't exist coincidences in the Dharma.

Astus wrote:

That explanation defeats itself by saying that actually all three conditions are by 'the Buddha's compassionate working', so everyone should already be receptive. Unless you leave reflection and reciting out of self-power up to the being, in which case there are not three but at least four conditions, out of which three are already universally provided by a buddha, and only reflection and self-power recitation are something a buddha does not influence for some reason. But if those two conditions are not the result of karma, then where do they come from?

Zhen Li said:

beings naturally come to abide in suchness and receive the mind of faith.

Astus wrote:

What do you mean by naturally? Without any cause whatsoever? Or is it again by the Buddha's power? If it's by the Buddha's power then why can that power not take effect outside Sukhavati? After all, Amitabha's light reaches everywhere.

Zhen Li said:

But the consummation of awakening is still only on the side of buddha-nature.

Astus wrote:

Buddha-nature needs no awakening, so why would it do anything for achieving it? And if it can do something, why not do it already before birth in Sukhavati?

Zhen Li said:

Above all, understanding this working is not necessary for birth or liberation—all this talking when one can be practising Nembutsu is, ultimately, counterproductive. But if I can help elucidate these matters in some way, I am happy to assist.

Astus wrote:

It is not counterproductive if it assists in reciting the name. Your happy assistance is appreciated.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2022 at 4:05 PM

Title: Re: Contra a Popular Misconception: The Pure Land is not a Bodhisattva "Training Ground"

Content:

Zhen Li said:

You are assuming that the Buddha is an omnipotent god.

Astus wrote:

On the contrary, it seems you attribute all sorts of abilities to buddhas to actively liberate beings, from controlling their samsaric conditions up to making them awakened. For instance <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=639741#p639741> that 'one can see 1 and 2 as manifestations of the Buddha's compassionate working', that is, it is the working of a buddha what karmic conditions a being has. That is practically direct control of beings' karma. Or what is it you meant?

Zhen Li said:

The Buddha manifests in accord with beings minds and does not force them to do things that are not appropriate. Acting by the Buddha's power, buddhānubhavana, which occurs frequently in the sūtras, is something that occurs when the conditions are right for teaching, understanding, etc.—again, see the Tathāgataguhya quotes above, Vajrapāṇi explains this clearly.

Astus wrote:

Since buddhas manifests according to beings' minds, it is solely up to each being to purify their own minds, no buddha can do it for them. So the differences between who can perceive what body of a buddha: nirmanakaya for ordinary beings, sambhogakaya for arya-bodhisattvas, dharmakaya for buddhas.

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=639632#p639632> states basic buddha-nature doctrine, it does not say beings are influenced by an external power of a buddha. Rather the opposite actually, beings can understand the explanations of a buddha because they have the same nature as a buddha. But there is no magic power involved, no beings are transformed into buddhas by other buddhas.

Zhen Li said:

It does take effect everywhere. Jinen honi, or natural working, occurs in this world upon the confluence of conditions, a teacher, Amitābha's light, and deep listening/reflection.

Again, the Buddha is not a god or omnipotent saviour who can play with humans like toys. That is just an incorrect premise that doesn't belong in Buddhist thought.

Astus wrote:

Then such natural working makes no difference, since beings still have to come to the required level themselves where any interaction with a buddha is possible.

Zhen Li said:

By saying the consummation of awakening is only on the side of Buddha-nature simply means that the dualistic prthagjana is not a thing that transforms into something else. Awakening = bodhi. It is on the side of buddha-nature because it is innately awakened.

Astus wrote:

Buddha-nature, since it is innate, is already present in all beings. That is exactly why ordinary beings have to cultivate the way themselves in order to be able to discover buddha-nature.

'Seeing that sentient beings' afflictions
Conceal their Buddha store,
I teach them how to remove their afflictions
And acquire the overall wisdom-knowledge.'
(<https://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra50.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2022 at 5:49 PM

Title: Re: Contra a Popular Misconception: The Pure Land is not a Bodhisattva "Training Ground"

Content:

Zhen Li said:

So, working like a magnet through his non-intentional manifestation power, beings undergo their own intentional action, but when it orients them towards buddhahood, it is the working of the buddha—even though the intention is only on their side:

Astus wrote:

What exactly is the working of a buddha in a being's liberation from afflictions? In other words: do beings have to gain wisdom and let go of the three poisons, or can a buddha do it for them? If beings have to do it, then a buddha is a guide, a teacher - just as it's said even in your quotes - and not a saviour. If a buddha can do it for them, then it should have been done for all already.

Zhen Li said:

So, to answer your question, yes the Buddha's working is what leads us to liberation in a conventional sense, but the Buddha is not acting intentionally like a god—that is still the intentionality only of the saṃsāric being.

Astus wrote:

Leads in what sense? By providing the proper instructions, or by supernatural manipulation of the beings themselves and their environments?

Zhen Li said:

I am not saying that the Buddha's power is external—if it were then shinjin would be impossible.

Astus wrote:

If it's not external then what's the point of talking of buddhas influencing beings? It's just us, ordinary beings cultivating the path.

Zhen Li said:

Self-power and other-power are actually designations for actions that rely on the calculating self and those that are inaccord with the Buddha's manifesting power. So, this is not a question of either buddhas doing it or beings doing it. It's both.

Astus wrote:

If self-power means the approach of 'me cultivating the path', and other-power means 'in accord with the Buddha's manifesting power', and those two are not exclusive, it just means that 'I cultivate the path taught by the Buddha', because that's when one makes the effort in accord with the Buddha's teachings. Or did you mean something else?

Zhen Li said:

Again, you are thinking dualistically about this. If beings had to cultivate themselves without the Buddha's involvement in the way I described, there would be no awakening and the way you are conceiving of it has no connection to buddha-nature doctrine.

Astus wrote:

It is quite vague and unclear what you actually mean by any involvement of the Buddha. See the paragraphs right above this one with the various questions about it. The quote is from one of the fundamental texts of buddha-nature teachings. How is that not connected?

Zhen Li said:

This discussion is in an eternal loop now, and we are just repeating what we said before, so are we going to take a break?

Astus wrote:

We can do that.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 3rd, 2022 at 4:11 AM

Title: Re: How to search CBETA for the uninitiated?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The whole text is here: https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/X0424_001

To search by canon references, like X424, 22:606b, that means it's the 22nd volume of Xuzangjing, book 424, page 606 section b.

In the top left corner the three lines give you the text selector, then choose By Book Volume.

To see the page references click on the cogwheel icon at the top.

There's also the CBETA operation manual for the https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/doc/en/03-01_select1.php, the https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/doc/en/03-02_select2.php, and the https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/doc/en/03-03_read_setting.php.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 5th, 2022 at 4:26 PM

Title: Re: An Ode to Not Meditating

Content:

Astus wrote:

“Good friends, one’s enlightenment (one’s Way, dao) must flow freely. How could it be stagnated? When the mind does not reside in the dharmas, one’s enlightenment flows freely. For the mind to reside in the dharmas is called ‘fettering oneself.’ If you say that always sitting without moving is it, then you’re just like Śāriputra meditating in the forest, for which he was scolded by Vimalakīrti!

“Good friends, there are also those who teach meditation [in terms of] viewing the mind, contemplating tranquility, motionlessness, and nonactivation. You are supposed to make an effort on the basis of these. These deluded people do not understand, and in their grasping become mixed up like all of you here. You should understand that such superficial teachings are greatly mistaken!”

(Platform Sutra, ch 4, BDK ed, p 43)

“There are a bunch of blind shavepates who, having stuffed themselves with food, sit down to meditate and practice contemplation. Arresting the flow of thought they don’t let it rise; they hate noise and seek stillness. This is the method of the heretics. A patriarch said, ‘If you stop the mind to look at stillness, arouse the mind to illumine outside, control the mind to clarify inside, concentrate the mind to enter samādhi — all such [practices] as these are artificial striving.’”

(Record of Linji, tr Sasaki, p 17)

“Although a great many people practice zazen, almost all of them practice in the way of ordinary people, Hinayana practitioners, or bodhisattvas with provisional Mahayana understanding. Those who understand jijuyu--zanmai as the true enlightenment of all buddhas are very few.

That is why some hurry on their way to gain enlightenment by wrestling with koans.

Some struggle within themselves, searching for the subject that sees and hears.

Some try to rid themselves of their delusory thoughts in order to reach a pleasant place of no-mind, no-thought. Many other methods of practicing zazen were advocated by various teachers in the Song, Yuan, and Ming dynasties in China. But, it appears that fewer than one in a hundred knew the true samadhi transmitted by the buddhas and ancestors."

(Jijuyu-Zanmai, in Heart of Zen, p 41)

"Sitting" meditation means that you maintain a calm and steady mind while entrusting every single thing to Juigong, with the faith that Juigong is the source and destination of all things. Thus "sitting" meditation is possible in any circumstance - it is the mind that sits, not the body. As long as you let go and entrust with belief, your daily life itself can be meditation.

When some people first hear about letting go, it seems too ambiguous or difficult. They feel uncertain about what to do when they hear about letting go, because no method or detailed instruction is given. You may feel that you have to use sitting meditation in order to practice. However, your mind doesn't sit just because your body does.

Meditation is done through mind, not through the body. You have to begin by taking care of problems through mind. You're doing things backward if you're trying to use your body to grasp your mind.

From the very beginning, you have to practice through mind. This mind should be your fundamental mind, not the false self, not "I." If you're trying to rely upon something other than mind, it's like trying to hold a shadow. Your basic direction is already wrong, so you can't avoid going astray. This is why I don't give people the traditional hwadus to practice with.

Calm and steady practice, together with deep and sincere faith, is itself meditation. This can also be called true meditation, where you do not have even the thoughts "I'm doing..." or "I was sitting in meditation." It is also living meditation: you can practice in whatever circumstances you find yourself.

Light the lantern of your mind, and keep it bright every single day. Seon is nothing other than this. In your daily life, if you do not give rise to the illusion of "I," if you entrust everything to Juigong, and if your mind is completely unshakable, regardless of whether you find yourself in heaven or in hell, then this is true meditation.'

(No River to Cross by Zen Master Daehaeng, p 53-54)

"Good sons, when you know illusion, you will immediately be free, without devising expedient means. Freedom from illusion is in itself enlightenment, and there are no stages. All Bodhisattvas and sentient beings of the degenerate age who practice like this will be permanently free from all illusion."

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/sutra_of_perfect_enlightenment.html#div-2)

'How should the venerable monks understand this? Not accomplishing it by skill-in-means is also without gradual stages. Where was the meaning of that ancient? If this is understood, then all the Buddhas are forever in ones sight. If not understood, do not fall to discussing The Sutra of Full Awakening. Now the Buddhadharma, from of old until today, has never not been in full view. All worthy monks in all times have collectively inherited this powerful light, so it is necessary to have a great root of faith, so that the lotus can begin to rise. Unable to see the Buddhas, astute practioners crossing to the other shore are capable of being useful as vessels of the Dharma. Even if not endowed with other virtues, those of long practice in purifying karma have to be like a big butcher throwing down his knife and testify to the fruits of arhatship, beginning like this straightaway. Therefore an oldie said that if one joins the ranks of the Buddhists, then straightaway pass it on to ordinary folk.'

(Records of the Transmission of the Lamp, vol 6, 25.885)

'The sutra says that when we recognize illusions, we should detach ourselves from them without the use of expedient means. How can we perceive illusions as illusions? What methods can practitioners use to progress through these four levels?

First, we must settle our minds. This method is known as "stilling the mind." In order to see illusion as illusion, we must be mentally calm. Once this is achieved, we can effectively use the second method of practice: contemplating the self and worldly phenomena, or worldly dharmas. It is extremely difficult to detach oneself from the body, mind, and worldly phenomena without practicing these two methods.'

(Complete Enlightenment: Zen Comments on the Sutra of Complete Enlightenment by Ch'an Master Sheng Yen, p 116)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 6th, 2022 at 3:12 PM

Title: Re: Supernatural powers

Content:

Jokingfish said:

Are they real or just a metaphor?

Astus wrote:

They are real as far as they happen in stories and occur as meditative or visionary experiences.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2022 at 4:28 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment

Content:

Astus wrote:

About nirvana from the Theravada tradition:

"Reverend Sāriputta, they speak of this thing called 'extinguishment'. What is extinguishment?"

"Reverend, the ending of greed, hate, and delusion is called extinguishment."
(<https://suttacentral.net/sn38.1/en/sujato>)

"And what is complete understanding? The ending of greed, hate, and delusion. This is called complete understanding."

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn22.106/en/sujato>)

"The ending of greed, hate, and delusion. This is the culmination of the spiritual path."

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn45.6/en/sujato>)

“Mendicant, the removal of greed, hate, and delusion is a term for the element of extinguishment. It’s used to speak of the ending of defilements.”

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn45.7/en/sujato>)

'A fire that does not get any more fuel cannot continue to burn but simply dies down and becomes extinguished. Likewise, an arahant’s aggregates that have been caused through previous kamma do not arise as a new life or new aggregates but, after having arisen, simply cease and become extinguished. After the cessation of the aggregates the aggregates no longer arise. As a result, the aggregates that constantly arise in an arahant due to the momentum of previous kamma do not continue to arise in a new life but are extinguished in this very life.

Nibbāna without residue remaining is synonymous with the cessation of the aggregates (khandhaparinnibbāna). Once the path has been attained and after having entered parinnibbāna, there is no longer any opportunity for the arising of mental and physical phenomena that would come into existence if the path were not attained. In addition, cessation of the five aggregates is accomplished with the realization of the path knowledge of arahantship.'

(Manual of Insight by Mahāsi Sayādaw, p 459-460)

'Only in the commentaries we find a distinction made in this respect. The parinnibbāna of the living arahant is called kilesaparinnibbāna, the perfect extinguishment of the defilements, while what comes at the last moment of an arahant's life is called khandhaparinnibbāna, the perfect extinguishment of the groups or aggregates. Such a qualification, however, is not found in the discourses.'

(https://seeingthroughthenet.net/wp-content/uploads/2018/03/Mind-Stilled_HTML.htm#Mindstilled19)

'In nibbāna there are no such things as mind or mental concomitants, which can be met with in the sense-sphere or form-sphere. It naturally follows that mind and matter that belong to the thirty-one planes of existence are totally absent in nibbāna. However, some would like to propose that after the parinnibbāna of the Buddha and the Arahants, they acquire a special kind of mind and matter in nibbāna. Such an extraordinary way of thinking may appeal to those who cannot do away with self or ego.

With regard to this proposition a learned Sayādaw reasoned that if there is a special kind of mind and matter in nibbāna, there must also be a special kind of rebirth which gives rise to a special kind of old age, disease, and death, which in turn bring about a special kind of sorrow, lamentation, suffering, distress, and despair. When the teachings explicitly say cessation, it will be improper to go beyond it and formulate an idea of a special kind of existence. Extinction points to nothing other than Nothingness. Nibbāna, which is not involved in mind and matter, cannot be made to get involved either in this world or in other worlds.'

(<http://www.aimwell.org/On%20the%20Nature%20of%20Nibbana.pdf>, p 64-65)

'The genuine kind of Nibbāna, different from the Nibbāna of other sects, was discovered by the Buddha. Natural Nibbāna can happen simply because the defilements arise and end naturally, because they are just another kind of concocted nature. Every time the defilements don't appear, Nibbāna becomes apparent to the mind. This temporary Nibbāna nourishes the lives of living things so they survive and don't go crazy. At least, it lets us sleep at night. Nibbāna isn't any kind of special city anywhere. It is realized in the mind that is now void of besieging defilements. For the morality of ordinary people at home, its name is 'nibbuti.' Nibbāna isn't the mind, but it appears to the mind as a certain āyatana. We can experience Nibbāna here and now by breathing in cool and breathing out cool. It is the automatic quenching of heat, of thirst, of dukkha in ordinary life, even without our being conscious of it. It is the eternal nourishment and sustenance of life.'

(<https://www.suanmokkh.org/books/84>, p 11)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2022 at 7:48 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment

Content:

Jokingfish said:

Any truth in this idea?

Astus wrote:

Not really. Check out the <https://suttacentral.net/dn1/en/sujato> about the 62 wrong views (or the shorter summary in the <https://suttacentral.net/mn102/en/sujato>), that's where the various outsider teachers can be categorised with their extremist views.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2022 at 5:13 AM

Title: Re: Chan is

Content:

Astus wrote:

Even if that toy plastic stick of Chan was made of the iron of Acala's sword it wouldn't amount to more than flowery words.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2022 at 6:03 AM

Title: Re: Chan is

Content:

LastLegend said:

Show yourself stop hiding in the bush.

Astus wrote:

It's just a bush blown by the wind. Who are you looking for?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2022 at 4:40 PM

Title: Re: That story (in "The Hidden Lamp") about Yantou and "Ganji's Family"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Ganzhi (<https://authority.dila.edu.tw/person/?fromInner=A007166>) has his own entry in the Records of the Transmission of the Lamp, vol 3, 10.203

(https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T51n2076_p0279b07), but the story with the needle appears almost 200 years later in volume 6 of the Liandeng Huiyao (聯燈會要, https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/X79n1557_p0063c01), then elsewhere, like the Xutang Heshang Yulu (虛堂和尚語錄), vol 5

(https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T47n2000_p1022b07) and the Gaofeng Yuanmiao Chanshi Yulu (高峰原妙禪師語錄), vol 2

(https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/X70n1400_p0694c08).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2022 at 3:29 PM

Title: Re: That story (in "The Hidden Lamp") about Yantou and "Ganji's Family"

Content:

curtstein said:

I found one more instance, and this one seems to be the one that Cleary translated and that eventually ended up in "The Hidden Lamp". It's called "Ganzhi's Wife" (甘贄妻), and it is found, as near as I can make out, in a collection of stories about "Excellent Women" (優婆夷志目錄) found in CBETA here:

http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/mobile/index.php?index=X87n1621_001.

Astus wrote:

Great catch, it's the right version. The title of the collection Youpoyi Zhi (優婆夷志) means Record of Upasikas, compiled by Yuanxin

(<https://authority.dila.edu.tw/person/?fromInner=A001408>) and Guo Ningzhi

(<https://authority.dila.edu.tw/person/?fromInner=A001771>) around 1644-1647

(according to <https://core.ac.uk/download/pdf/12215045.pdf>).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 27th, 2022 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: Twelve Links

Content:

clyde said:

Does anyone else feel this way about the Twelve Links? Or do you understand it and if you do, what do you understand?

Astus wrote:

It can be summarised

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=601525#p601525>. For a more in depth explanation I recommend these from Bhuddhadasa Bhikkhu:

<https://www.suanmokkh.org/books/126> and

<https://books.google.com/books?id=EaHRDgAAQBAJ>. And this one is likely the best that's readily available: <https://buddhadhamma.github.io/dependent-origination.html>.

For a short overview from the Mahayana perspective see The Heart of Interdependent Origination and its commentary by Nagarjuna in http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/nagarjuna.pdf on pages 58-64. There's also this section of the Mahaprajnaparamitasastra explaining in even less words:

https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-

sastra/d/doc225106.html. For more by Nagarjuna, see chapter 26 of the Middle Treatise (Mulamadhyamakakarika). The Compass of Zen by Seung Sahn also has a chapter on the twelve links.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 27th, 2022 at 5:05 PM

Title: Re: Twelve Links

Content:

clyde said:

How is ignorance a condition for mental concocting even before there is consciousness?

Astus wrote:

Dependent origination applies to beings, so it's the five aggregates that are affected at each link. The individual link highlights the most outstanding factor influencing other qualities.

clyde said:

What can ignorance mean in this regard? Or mental concocting? And so on for each link; e.g. - How is attachment a condition of 'becoming' (and what does that mean) and how is becoming a condition of birth?

Astus wrote:

When one is ignorant about how suffering arises and ceases, then one concocts/fabricates physical, verbal, and mental activities to perform, and that results in a mindset/attitude (consciousness) that regulates one's bodily and mental functions, thus colouring one's senses, so when there is an impression (contact) and a related quality (feeling), then necessarily one enjoys and delights in it (craving), therefore wants to hang on to it (clinging), and that turns into an identity (becoming), so it defines one's whole being (birth), but eventually, like everything else, it'll fall apart and thus cause pain.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 28th, 2022 at 5:56 PM

Title: Re: Twelve Links

Content:

clyde said:

While this seems sensible, where is this stated or taught? And that would imply that the five aggregates are already existent and not dependent on these links for their existence - but then that contradicts the Twelve Links teaching.

Astus wrote:

It is taught at each link. As you well noted, to say that there is ignorance without there being one who is ignorant is meaningless. Ignorance is a mental factor, a defilement of the mind, so to say it exists apart from a being is like saying it is not a mental factor at all. The twelve links are not about the original beginning of things, it is not like there was nothing before ignorance somehow arose. The twelve links can be understood both in terms of three lives (past, present, future), and in a momentary process as well. In both cases there is us who go through those links.

clyde said:

As I understand your explanation, "ignorance" is ignorance of the Dharma or at least of the Second Noble Truth and you say this ignorance gives rise to concocting. How does ignorance give rise to concocting? How does ignorance give rise to anything? And are you meaning that if one knows the Dharma and how suffering arises, then concocting doesn't arise and all that follows, including consciousness, birth and death don't arise?

Astus wrote:

Ignorance is often defined as not knowing the four noble truths, but it can also be not knowing dependent origination and dependent cessation, hence ignorance about how suffering arises and ceases. It gives rise to concocting/fabrication because one believes that's the way to satisfy one's desires, to achieve one's goals. Ignorance gives rise to concocting because one sees only the advantages, the allure of something beautiful and pleasant, but not the drawbacks of craving for and grasping at it. That's why it takes mindfulness and wisdom to avoid falling for such impulses. Knowing the Dharma (how suffering arises and ceases) in theory is important but insufficient on its own to overcome one's bad habits, that's why developing all factors of awakening is necessary. In other words, samadhi and prajna are both needed for liberation.

clyde said:

As traditionally given, each link is "a requisite condition" from which comes the following link; i.e., without the precedent link the following link doesn't arise. You present the links as "colouring" or modifying the following link. That seems to be a departure from the traditional understanding.

Astus wrote:

The twelve links are present at each instance of suffering ignorantly. It's not that when there is one link present, like feeling, then the others are missing. Using the three lives format, when one feels something pleasant (note that already that single feeling exists in a compounded way within a network of conditions), then there had to be a contact with something through the six sense gates, and that thing is recognised as a particular form with a particular name, and one has an opinion (mindset) of that thing that is primarily driven by an intention, and that motivation can exist because of not knowing any better. Because of the presence of the preconditions it is inevitable that the feeling of something pleasant is met with liking it, the need to hold it, and thus defining one's whole experience of the world, what in turn gives rise to a fixed set of particular behaviour and mentality that will necessarily deteriorate and debase.

Let's take an apple juice as an example for a pleasant object. To recognise it as such one needs to come in contact with it (seeing/tasting/imagining), and that contact to be meaningful one needs a couple of preconditions, like knowing what an apple juice is and an opinion of it whether one likes it or not. Since one recognises the apple juice as something desirable, it is a pleasant object. With the recognition of the tasty juice comes the thirst for it, the thirst develops into the need to have it, that grows into the thought of being the one who delightedly experiences drinking it. With those present arises the view and entity of the subject partaking of an object, the subject being the actor and enjoyer, while the object what is seen/tasted/imagined. Then with the changing of the object, for instance finishing a glass of apple juice, the subject loses its reason to exist and experiences some dissatisfaction because of that. All this can go down in a few seconds from seeing the apple juice to having drunk it. And then it happens again and again with the various experiences happening, the previous conditioning the next.

clyde said:

Also, your definition of becoming as identity seems strange. But then all the definitions of becoming seem odd. In the suttas, Buddha is said to explain that there are three types of becoming: sensual, form, and formless. What does that mean? And how is that identity?

Astus wrote:

Identity in the sense of identifying with a certain action plan, a route to take, an attitude towards something, as the strongest form of owning/being preceding the actual manifestation of that conglomeration of physical and mental force. It is the point between the determination to have/keep something and actively being the one who works to get or preserve it.

The three types of becoming categorises the general motivation of one's actions. Sensual means enjoying things, so in case of the apple juice it means appreciating its colour, its smell, its taste. Form refers to perceiving things without the sensuous-emotional tone, like when analysing the physical properties or the chemical components of the juice in a scientific way, or it can also be from an artistic point of view. Formless stands for the abstract, the conceptual, like thinking about why an apple juice is called an apple juice. That's more in modern terms of course, in the usual explanation form and formless are exclusively the domain of religious practitioners and philosophers.

clyde said:

I could go on and I'm not trying to difficult, but I am trying to understand a teaching, the Twelve Links, which doesn't make sense to me, seems convoluted, and seems to confound even Buddhist teachers. The other core teachings of the Buddha, in contrast, are relatively easy to understand and often available to one's experience.

Astus wrote:

'What are the profound dharmas (gambhīradharma)?

The twelve causes and conditions (dvādaśahetupratyaya) are called gambhīradharma. Thus the Buddha said to Ānanda: “The twelve causes and conditions (or pratītyasamutpāda) are profound (gambhīra), difficult to probe (durvigāhya) and difficult to understand (duranubodha).”

(<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225102.html>; cf <https://suttacentral.net/dn15/en/sujato>)

'When they see a sight with their eyes, if it's pleasant they desire it, but if it's unpleasant they dislike it. They live with mindfulness of the body unestablished and their heart restricted. And they don't truly understand the freedom of heart and freedom by wisdom where those arisen bad, unskillful qualities cease without anything left over. Being so full of favoring and opposing, when they experience any kind of feeling—pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral—they approve, welcome, and keep clinging to it. This gives rise to relishing. Relishing feelings is grasping. Their grasping is a condition for continued existence. Continued existence is a condition for rebirth. Rebirth is a condition for old age and death, sorrow, lamentation, pain, sadness, and distress to come to be. That is how this entire mass of suffering originates.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn38/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 29th, 2022 at 4:19 AM

Title: Re: Twelve Links

Content:

clyde said:

For example, how is “identifying with” the sensual (“enjoying things”) requisite for birth which leads to old age and death?

Astus wrote:

If one assumes the perspective of one who likes to drink apple juice it turns into a habit that one follows instinctively. But as conditions necessarily change, feeding that habit creates various challenges, starting with the effort required to feed it down to detrimental consequences like preferring exclusively the company of apple juice drinkers and hating those who say anything bad about apple juice. In other words, becoming (bhava) is when a clinging becomes a personally held truth, and birth (jāti) when the motivation/inclination given by that truth turns into a personality trait.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 29th, 2022 at 5:27 AM

Title: Re: Twelve Links

Content:

clyde said:

How does identifying lead to becoming?

Astus wrote:

Becoming (bhava) is what was called identifying, so identifying does not lead to becoming, unless you mean how the momentary/present life version connect to the many lives version of dependent origination. If the latter, then becoming stands for the type of karma accumulated (habituated) in the current life that defines future birth.

clyde said:

And I don't understand the meaning of "becoming" ("a clinging becomes a personally held truth"?) nor the "becoming process". What is "becoming" that leads to birth, a birth which leads to old age and death (so it must mean a birth of a being capable of aging and death)?

Astus wrote:

Becoming above was used with reference to its momentary, presently observable form, and there birth means the solidification of an identity that then changes, deteriorates, to eventually cease. If you are asking about birth in a future life, then as in the previous paragraph.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 29th, 2022 at 3:59 PM

Title: Re: Twelve Links

Content:

clyde said:

But to use your apple juice example, how does identifying as an apple juice drinker give rise to the birth of anything that grows old, sick and dies?

Astus wrote:

It gives birth to a personality trait that serves as one of the factors in making decisions and acting in the world. Its impermanence (decay and cessation) is visible on various levels. Momentarily one is an apple juice drinker when the situation of choosing it as one's beverage for dinner comes up. Once one has made the choice the mind (thoughts, attention, etc.) moves on to other topics/objects, like what to eat, what to talk about, what to listen to. Right there the entity of the apple juice drinker has disappeared, died. As a habit it can manifest again and again, either throughout a certain period of one's life, for instance during one's childhood, or it can persist until the current lifespan is finished. It is also possible that it recurs in future lives, given the right circumstances. No matter the extent of time we look at, the self/entity/being/person (I drink apple juice / I am an apple juice drinker) is temporary, subject to change, and not something that can exist independently of other factors. Because things change, the maintenance of that entity comes with confrontations with the changing circumstances. Since one is the being who drinks apple juice, it is hoped for and expected to be able to act as such, in other words, to always have apple juice to drink. Strong habits also have the tendency to give birth to other habits, like requiring a specific type of glass to drink from, particular brands of apple juice to consume at different times of the day, and so on, up to the level of complexity of a whole set of rituals. There is also the tendency to propagate the activity to others, so that they not only appreciate one's personality but also adopt the same set of behaviours. And the more one builds up the more confrontations can occur, and the more elements keep changing and ceasing. Apart from its momentary impermanence it might be easier to see the decay and death of personality traits, habits, entities with other examples, like with being a wine/beer drinker, being a smoker, being a meat eater or vegetarian, being a fan of a football team, being a husband/wife, and so on. One would say that between the wedding ceremony and the issuing of a divorce/death certificate one remains a husband. But no person can keep in mind "I am a husband" even for just a couple of minutes. That's momentary decay and death of what was born as an entity. One acts as the husband within limited circumstances during the day, but when at the office, when travelling, when being annoyed by the slow progress of a queue the "husband" is nowhere. Still, it's not impossible to be the husband of the same person even in the next life (e.g. AN 4.55).

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 2nd, 2022 at 7:08 PM

Title: Re: Twelve Links

Content:

clay said:

Perhaps if you used "becoming" in a sentence, not to explain the Twelve Links, but in a typical sentence so that I might see what "becoming" means to you.

Astus wrote:

The series from craving to birth is how beings emerge, from a weak intention to a solid entity. Becoming is the habituation of what one has grasped, and once it has become second nature, then that is birth where one doesn't do it but one is it. The distinction between 'action-becoming' (kammabhava) and 'resultant-becoming' (upapattibhava) reflects how during the phase of becoming there is on the one hand the need to actively habituate something, i.e. keep repeating, and there is also the established habit that one follows.

Let's say one likes the idea of winning a marathon, that is craving. If one immediately dismisses it as unrealistic or simply moves on to another idea, then it's over. If one holds on to the idea of winning a marathon, then that's clinging. Because of clinging to the idea of winning a marathon one reads training plans, orders a pair of running shoes, and goes out for a little jogging. If one decides not to continue with the training, then it's over. If one keeps at it, makes it a regular habit to train, then that's becoming. Because of the continued training one has become ready to run an entire marathon. If one decides that it's better not to risk losing a race, then it's over. If one signs up to a race and wins/loses, then that is the birth of a winner/loser.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 3rd, 2022 at 4:11 AM

Title: Re: Twelve Links

Content:

clay said:

Astus, If I understand you correctly, you're understanding "becoming" as the habit

(repetition) of grasping. But how is the habit of grasping a requisite condition for the birth of a being which ages and dies?

And in your example, it's the signing up to run in a race that is the requisite condition for winning or losing, regardless of whether one trains (the habit) or not.

Astus wrote:

Becoming is the habituation of grasping, or in other words identifying with something. It is the requisite condition of the birth of a being that ages and dies because being somebody means taking a habit not as something to pursue but as something one evidently is, as a fact. A being/entity/person means a set of habitual truths, in other words a karmic formation. The ageing and dying means that what are held as truths/facts of oneself are constantly influenced and changed by new choices and actions.

The signing up and participating in the race is the fulfilment of becoming, that it's come to the point of being fixed into the entity of one who's completed one's goal. But the same process applies to practically any other story, like how one becomes a painter, a carpenter, or a Buddhist.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 3rd, 2022 at 3:26 PM

Title: Re: Twelve Links

Content:

clyde said:

Astus, It seems to me that by your understanding all the links prior to the birth of a being that ages and dies are beyond the influence of the being birthed. Or you're redefining the plain meaning of birth, aging and dying.

Astus wrote:

Regardless if two minutes ago or two aeons ago, the past is already gone, so how could anyone change it? What can be changed has to happen now.

clyde said:

Sentient beings are born, age and die, and have innumerable labels applied (and self-applied) on them, but it is the sentient beings which are born, age and die, not the labels.

Astus wrote:

A sentient being is a label. Because labels are mere concepts they seem to imply something permanent and continuous. A being (satta) is being attached (satta) to the aggregates (<https://suttacentral.net/sn23.2/en/sujato>, & <https://www.themindingcentre.org/dharmafarer/wp-content/uploads/2018/05/52.2e-Radha-Satta-Sutta-s23.2-piya.pdf>). There is a new being every time we find something to occupy ourselves with. This also applies on a larger scale, from childhood to old age, from the previous life to the next one. So, becoming (bhava) means the process of habituation, a stronger form of clinging (hence: identifying), and that leads to both the momentary birth of a being just as it does to the next life. In the latter case it's usually just called karma.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2022 at 4:32 AM

Title: Re: Twelve Links

Content:

clyde said:

My point about the links prior to 'birth' is that, as you noted, they can't be changed.

Since 'ignorance' (and all the links to 'becoming') are prior to 'birth', nothing can be done to prevent birth.

Astus wrote:

I meant that once a being was born what had happened before that had already happened. But it doesn't mean that before birth there was no birth, it's just that that was another life. So when the twelve links are split into three lives, then the first two are in the previous life, the middle eight in the present life, and the last two in the future life. At the same time, the current life is the past of the next one and the future of the previous one.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2022 at 9:45 PM

Title: Re: Is Frank Yang an arhat?

Content:

Astus wrote:

It seems the correct question is: is Frank Yang a Buddhist teacher? Based on a couple of his writings, he does not uphold any specific or general Buddhist doctrine and discipline, and has his own version of things.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2022 at 5:47 AM

Title: Re: Is Frank Yang an arhat?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Apart from the Theravada view of arhats there's also the Mahayana version, in particular the popular image of arhats in East Asia as a bit mundane, sometimes even vulgar saints like https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ji_Gong.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2022 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: Is Frank Yang an arhat?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

The more we want to see a Buddha, the more likely one will seem to appear, even if it isn't real.

Astus wrote:

'Mendicants, there are these five drawbacks of placing faith in an individual. What five? The individual to whom a person is devoted falls into an offense such that the Saṅgha suspends them. ... the Saṅgha makes them sit at the end of the line. ... Furthermore, the individual to whom a person is devoted departs for another region ... disrobes ... passes away.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/an5.250/en/sujato>)

'Not seeing the teaching, they do not see me. ... Seeing the teaching, they see me.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/iti92/en/sujato>; cf. <https://suttacentral.net/sn22.87/en/sujato>)

'Therefore do not rely on individuals,
But rely upon the Dharma.
Freedom comes from the genuine path that is taught,
Not from the one who teaches it.

When the teachings are well presented,
It does not matter what the speaker is like.
Even the bliss-gone buddhas themselves
Appear as butchers and such like to train disciples.

If he contradicts the Mahāyāna and so on,
Then however eloquent a speaker may seem,
He will bring you no real benefit,
Like a demon assuming Buddha's form.'

(<https://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/mipham/sword-of-wisdom>, v 63-65)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 6th, 2022 at 3:47 PM

Title: Re: Abhidharma Question about Killing

Content:

Astus wrote:

'The noble Cloud of Jewels states clearly that it is permissible to kill someone who is about to commit an action of immediate retribution. And also, in the monastic code of the disciples, a basis for a root downfall that is done out of compassion, such as to set free deer and so on, is said not to be a downfall.'

(The Training Anthology of Śāntideva, p 165-166)

'There are also certain naturally objectionable acts such that, when they are performed by a bodhisattva with a particular kind of skillful means, he or she not only remains free of any offense but also generates a great amount of merit. An example would be a situation in which a bodhisattva sees a thief or a robber who is intent upon killing many hundreds of living beings—great persons [such as] listeners, solitary realizers, or bodhisattvas—for the sake of a small amount of material wealth, [making this person] someone who is preparing to commit many instances of an immediate misdeed. Having seen this, [a bodhisattva] then forms the following thought with his or her mind: “Even though I shall have to be reborn in the hells for depriving this living being of his or her life, it is better that I should be reborn in a hell than that this sentient should end up in the hells because of having committed an immediate misdeed.” After a bodhisattva who has had such a thought determines that his or her state of mind toward this living being is either virtuous or indeterminate, and after developing a single-minded attitude of sympathy about the future while experiencing [a sense of] abhorrence, he or she then deprives [this living being] of his or her life. [Having done this, a bodhisattva] will not only remain free of any offense but will also generate a great amount of merit.’

(The Bodhisattva Path to Unsurpassed Enlightenment, I.10.2.10.11)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 6th, 2022 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: Abhidharma Question about Killing

Content:

Seeker12 said:

I don't understand how setting a deer free is a root downfall.

Astus wrote:

Goodman writes in the note for that sentence: 'If deer have been captured by a hunter, setting them free could be considered stealing; but, according to Śāntideva, this would not be a violation of the monastic code.'

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2022 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: Highest Texts/Sutras/Tantras for Seon Buddhism?

Content:

nomono said:

Which set of texts or techniques are held to be the highest in the tradition?

Astus wrote:

As for texts, Seon (just as Chan) is called a distinct path from those that follow sutras.

'The transmission of the mind by the World Honored One at three sites is the gist of Seon; what was spoken by him over his lifetime is the gate of Doctrine. Therefore it is said, “Seon is the Buddha mind; Doctrine is the Buddha word.”'

(Seonga gwigam, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 3, p 58)

In practice that means that there isn't one particular scripture taken as the best or the highest, but rather the whole canon can be used, with a number of texts studied and referenced more regularly.

Regarding the technique, the mainstream method in current Seon is hwadu practice. You can read about that in this online summary:

http://koreanbuddhism.net/bbs/board.php?bo_table=3020, and there's also this translation published not too long ago: <https://academic.oup.com/book/41233>.

<https://global.oup.com/academic/product/the-letters-of-cha-master-dahui-pujue-9780190664169?cc=us&lang=en&> and <https://global.oup.com/academic/product/the-cha-whip-anthology-9780190200725?cc=us&lang=en&> are also recommended. Plus the works on the topic by Jinul and Hyujeong in the http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/bbs/board.php?bo_table=5040&sca=The+Collected+Works+of+Korean+Buddhism%2C2012.

nomono said:

Any more deeper teachings, sutras, tantras and commentaries than the already known, for later advanced studies?

Astus wrote:

If you are finished with studying the Heart Sutra, the Diamond Sutra, and the Platform Sutra, then read the Complete Enlightenment Sutra (圓覺經), the Vajrasamadhi Sutra (金剛三昧經), and the Surangama Sutra (楞嚴經).

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 9th, 2022 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: If my eons of negative karma are purified through Mahayana buddhist practice, then why am I still suffering?

Content:

rodolfosancheznusa36 said:

It is a common belief in Mahayana that chanting certain mantras or the names of Buddhas or Bodhisattvas, prostrating, etc can purify eons and eons of bad karma. If that is the case, why am I still facing so much adversity and suffering?

Astus wrote:

Purification means changing one's current attitude. Unless one's current behaviour and way of thinking changes there is no change in how events are experienced.

On this matter see: <https://suttacentral.net/mn101/en/sujato> and <https://suttacentral.net/an3.100/en/sujato>.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 10th, 2022 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: Can meditation be bad?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Meditation can be called bad if it does not yield the results expected. Whether it has some difficulties or not is another matter.

'Mendicants, there are four ways of practice. What four? Painful practice with slow insight, painful practice with swift insight, pleasant practice with slow insight, and pleasant practice with swift insight.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/an4.162/en/sujato>, cf. <https://read.84000.co/translation/toh317.html#UT22084-072-017-99>)

There is meditation, and there is correct meditation (sammāsamādhi/samyaksamādhi).

'And what is noble right immersion with its vital conditions and its prerequisites? They are: right view, right thought, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, and right mindfulness. Unification of mind with these seven factors as prerequisites is called noble right immersion with its vital conditions and also with its prerequisites.'
(<https://suttacentral.net/sn45.28/en/sujato>, <https://suttacentral.net/mn117/en/sujato>)

There is meditation, and there is the perfection of meditation (dhyānapāramitā).

'Moreover, the tīrthikas, śrāvakas and bodhisattvas acquire all the dhyānas and samāpattis. There are three kinds of faults in the tīrthika dhyāna: attachment to enjoyment (āsvādanābhīniveśa), wrong view (mithyadr̥ṣṭi) and pride (abhimāna). In the śrāvaka dhyāna, loving-kindness (maitrī) and compassion (karuṇā) are slight; they do not have at their disposal a knowledge in regard to the Dharma sufficiently sharp as to progressively penetrate the true nature of dharmas; being exclusively interested in their own selves, they destroy the lineage of Buddhas [within themselves]. In the bodhisattva dhyāna there are no defects; wishing to unite all the attributes of Buddha, they do not forget beings during the dhyāna and they endlessly extend their kindness even to insects.'

(<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225441.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 14th, 2022 at 10:28 PM

Title: Chan and the Bodhisattva Way

Content:

Astus wrote:

<https://www.facebook.com/jianhu.shifu/> (見護法師), hosted by <https://www.facebook.com/profile.php?id=100026068752182> (見銷法師) from the https://miao-fa.de/?page_id=82&language=en, talks about the basic elements of Chan and the fundamentals of the bodhisattva way. Both venerables are disciples of <https://www.ctworld.org.tw/english-96/html/a2FOUNDING%20MASTER1.htm>.

https://www.youtube.com/channel/UCFu7Jdz_3yT94BLgsb3XsNw/
<https://www.youtube.com/channel/UCHreujuXtmCowcz1b7kTkWQ>

"Let's examine the mind a little bit. You see a shifu here, right, you see two shifus or three shifus here. So you see something, 'Oh, that's a Buddhist monk or Buddhist nun.' Right? That simple experience you see with your eyes and you say oh that's a Buddhist monk, speaking. That simple experience consists of two parts: knowing and consciousness. Knowing means you perceive something through your eyes. You perceive there's an object here wearing brown robes, looking like a person. Right? See, perceiving this through your eyes, that's called knowing. Now at this point you have not formed a concept, but immediately, in less than a second, you say, 'Oh, that's a Buddhist monk.' That's a concept, that's an idea that you learned. Right? If you've never seen a Buddhist monk, you say, 'What is this, what is this person? Right? You don't know. But because you have some knowledge about Buddhism, so you say, 'Oh, that's a Buddhist monk.' That's an idea, that's part of your consciousness, that's the part of your mind we call consciousness. It consists of ideas, concepts, emotions, judgment, decision, discrimination, in a good and bad way. So all of that is consciousness. Most of what we call our mind is actually consciousness. Most of us ignore a more basic function of our mind, and that is knowing, or just simple perception, they just perceive some information."

(<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=xNEQvav9qAQ>, 54:16-56:39)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 18th, 2022 at 4:31 AM

Title: Re: The real problem

Content:

Astus wrote:

'In dependence upon the eye and form

Mind arises like an illusion.

It is not reasonable to call

Illusory that which has existence.

When there is nothing on earth

That does not amaze the wise,

Why think cognition by the senses

And suchlike are amazing.

The firebrand's ring and magical creations,

Dreams, illusions, and the moon in water,

Mists, echoes, mirages, clouds

And worldly existence are alike.'

(Aryadeva, in Four Hundred Stanzas on the Middle Way, 13.323-325)

'Because you relate everything to yourself, everything looks like a huge problem. Where there is no mind, there are no problems.'

(Kodo Sawaki, in To You, ch 19)

'In short, we must once see into our own nature directly. When we see thoroughly that our nature is intrinsically empty, the problem of life and death will vanish like mist.'

(Koun Yamada, in Zen: The Authentic Gate, ch 2)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 26th, 2022 at 2:37 PM

Title: Re: Two Truths Doctrine

Content:

Ardha said:

there is no reason to feel a certain way about anything because stuff just happens but that conventional reality is the world of meaning that we live in.

Astus wrote:

Quite the opposite, there is always a reason, or rather several conditions, to feel a certain way about things. Conventionally: feeling is an act and experience of a being, a self. Ultimately: a temporary feeling is a product of causes and conditions, there is neither an actor nor an experiencer behind the feeling. That is the emptiness of person, of self. And if one investigates further, the feeling, its arising and disappearing, and its causes are also just mere concepts. That is the emptiness of phenomena.

Ardha said:

I don't understand if there is ultimate reality then how can you just go back to living the day to day as if things matter, aren't you pretending at that point?

Astus wrote:

There is no one to go away or come back, that is the primary delusion of positing a self. So if it feels like pretending, then that is a misconstruction of what emptiness means.

Ardha said:

I also didn't understand loss being false at ultimate reality (in regards to someone dying), heck I don't even understand ultimate reality.

Astus wrote:

Without an owner there is no possession, without a possession there is nothing gained or lost.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 12th, 2022 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: What does Buddhism teach?

Content:

laic said:

As an offshoot from another thread, I have began to reflect upon what Buddhism (aka the Dharma) actually "teaches". Of what parameters should be set - if any - as to what constitutes Buddhist teachings.

Astus wrote:

It's dependent origination and the four noble truths that the Buddha discovered and taught (SN 12.65). All the Buddha's teachings are encompassed by the four noble truths (MN 28), and it's a teaching unlike those of others' (MN 11). A Mahayana definition of what constitutes Buddhism is given as the https://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Four_seals
(<https://read.84000.co/translation/toh155.html>).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2022 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: Indian history of "Sudden Enlightenment" found in Chan/Zen

Content:

SilverFantasy said:

But were there schools that had "Chan" like practices in India, before Chan? Or was Chan really the originators of this idea?

Astus wrote:

The radical version of sudden awakening (see nature and become buddha 見性成佛) that came to be the hallmark of Chan is an approach that developed within the tradition, with various teachers and lineages taking different approaches regarding it.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2022 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: Indian history of "Sudden Enlightenment" found in Chan/Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

'Whereas Tao-sheng had spoken of gradual practice as a prerequisite for sudden enlightenment, Tsung-mi (780-841), representing the later Ch'an position, would take enlightenment to be a priori (pen-chüeh) and accordingly deem practice to be its derived function — a gradual cultivation based on sudden enlightenment.'

(Tao-sheng's Theory of Sudden Enlightenment by Whalen Lai, in Sudden and Gradual: Approaches to Enlightenment in Chinese Thought, p 194)

What probably fits the more popular interpretation of sudden enlightenment:

'The notion of sudden enlightenment stresses the instantaneity or immediacy of enlightenment, the existential-experiential, holistic (not merely intellectual) "sudden opening" and awakening, as one realizes one's own Buddha-nature. This immediacy transcends dualistic distinctions such as means and goal, cultivation and realization, practice and attainment, parts and whole, and so forth. For sudden teaching (dunjiao), there is no order or procedure of a gradual path that can directly lead to the final goal. It is a path of no-path.'

(Historical Dictionary of Chan Buddhism by Youru Wang, p 211)

Ven. Sheng-yen in Orthodox Chinese Buddhism (p 100-103) measures Chan's sudden awakening with the six identities taught in Tiantai and states that it cannot be anything higher than buddhahood in semblance. Hyujeong (Explanation of Seon and Doctrine, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 3, p 274), just like Jinul (Treatise on the Complete and Sudden Attainment of Buddhahood, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 2, p 283-284), would disagree, and Huangbo (Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 16) even more so.

How approaches can vary is summed up by Zongmi:

'Of the various sutras and treatises and the various Chan gates, some say that one first relies on the merit accumulated through step-by-step practice and then suddenly all-at-once awakens. Some say that one first relies on all-at-once awakening and then can engage in step-by-step practice. Some say that relying on all-at-once practice, one step-by-step awakens. Some say that awakening and practice are both step-by-step. Some say that they are both all-at-once. Some say that the dharma has neither all-at-once nor step-by-step, that all-at-once and step-by-step are in the dispositions [of trainees].'
(Chan Prolegomenon, in Zongmi on Chan, p 118)

For a more complete picture, Robert E. Buswell Jr. in the introduction of Numinous Awareness is Never Dark (p 46-48) has collected the main forms of sudden/gradual cultivation/awakening schemata, based on the works of Chengguan, Zongmi, and Jinul:

1. Gradualist schemata

1.1. Sudden awakening/gradual cultivation (tono chōmsu/dunwu jianxiu 頓悟漸修): This schema is described from the vantage point of the understanding-awakening.

Awakening is like the rays of the morning sun; cultivation is like polishing a mirror so that it gleams ever more brightly. Zongmi's similes in his Preface are even clearer: the sun rises suddenly at dawn (awakening) but only gradually evaporates the morning dew (cultivation); or, an infant is born all at once with all the inherent capacities of a human being (awakening), but only gradually matures into an adult who can put those capacities to use (cultivation).

1.2. Gradual cultivation/sudden awakening (chōmsu tonu/jianxiu dunwu 漸修頓悟): Its vantage point is the realization-awakening. Cultivation is like a gleaming mirror; awakening is the reflectiveness of that mirror. Zongmi's simile in his Preface is that cultivation is like gradually chopping away at a tree, awakening is the moment when the tree finally falls.

1.3. Gradual cultivation/gradual awakening (chōmsu chōmo/jianxiu jianwu 漸修漸悟): This schema is described from the vantage point of the realization-awakening. Cultivating is like climbing a tower; awakening is like seeing more and more the higher you climb.

1.4. Sudden cultivation/gradual awakening (tunsu chōmo/dunxiu jianwu 頓修漸悟): This is an alternative listed only in Zongmi's Preface; it is not included in Chengguan's Zhenyuan Commentary. The vantage point of this schema is also the realization-awakening, as Yanshou clarifies in his discussion. Cultivation here is like going through the singular motion of shooting an arrow over and over; awakening is gradually learning to hit the bull's-eye consistently. This is also like an apprentice model of learning, where one learns the craft as a whole (sudden cultivation) but only gradually masters it (gradual awakening).

2. Radical subitist schemata

2.1. Sudden awakening/sudden cultivation (tono tonsu/dunwu dunxiu 頓悟頓修):

According to Chengguan, this schema is described from the vantage point of the understanding-awakening, though Yanshou in his treatment in Common End of Myriad Good Deeds claims it is actually the realization-awakening. This is like a mirror that naturally gleams (awakening) without needing to be wiped or polished (cultivation). Zongmi's simile in his Preface is that a spool of thread sliced by a single strike of the sword (awakening) will cut through the entire spool instantly (cultivation).

2.2. Sudden cultivation/sudden awakening (tonsu tono/dunxiu dunwu 頓修頓悟): This schema is described from the vantage point of the realization-awakening. Cultivation is like taking medicine; awakening is like curing the disease.

2.3. Simultaneity of sudden cultivation and sudden awakening (su'o ilsi/xiuwu yishi 修悟一時): This schema is described from the vantage point of both the understanding- and realization-awakenings. Cultivating is like a gleaming mirror; awakening is that mirror reflecting everything in existence.

2.4. Simultaneous sudden awakening and sudden cultivation, using slightly different terminology: this schema also encompasses both the understanding- and realization-awakenings. To be originally endowed with all the qualities of buddhahood is awakening; to have all the practices mastered along the path to buddhahood inherent in a single thought is cultivation. In this alternative, cultivation is like drinking ocean water; awakening is like knowing the taste of all the rivers that have ever flowed into that ocean.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2022 at 11:57 PM

Title: Re: Indian history of "Sudden Enlightenment" found in Chan/Zen

Content:

Malcolm said:

And the topic is, Chan-like practices in India...all this business about Chan texts is just rehash.

Astus wrote:

I deemed it a necessary point to make, just to see what might qualify as 'sudden enlightenment' as found in Chan. For instance, stories of quick attainments are far from being definitive (already the Nikayas have examples for that, like the <https://suttacentral.net/ud1.10/en/sujato>, but subitism is rejected, e.g. <https://suttacentral.net/mn70/en/sujato>, <https://suttacentral.net/ud5.5/en/sujato>), even if the case of the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Longn%C3%BC> is often quoted in Chan.

The fundamentally important Treatise on Awakening Mahayana Faith is quite explicit:

'Sometimes, for the sake of weak-willed people, they show how to attain perfect enlightenment quickly by skipping over the stages [of the bodhisattva]. And sometimes, for the sake of indolent people, they say that human beings may attain enlightenment at the end of numberless eons. Thus they can demonstrate innumerable expedient means and suprarational feats. But in reality all these bodhisattvas are the same in that they are alike in their lineage, their capacity, their aspiration, and their realization [of suchness]; therefore, there is no such thing as skipping over the stages, for all bodhisattvas must pass through the three terms of innumerable eons [before they can fully attain enlightenment]. However, because of the differences in the various worlds of beings, and in the objects of seeing and hearing, as well as in the capacity, desires, and nature of the various beings, there are also different ways of teaching them what to practice.'

(The Awakening of Faith, BDK ed, p 66-67)

And the Surangama Sutra states:

'You may suddenly reach an understanding of the principle of the aggregates, and on that basis you may presume the aggregates will all vanish together. But, in fact, they do not all vanish at once; they must be ended in sequence.'

(The Śūraṅgama Sūtra - A New Translation, p 461; referenced by Hyujeung in Seonga gwigam 37 (CWKB, vol 3, p 103-104))

While it's possible to find statements fitting the Chan style, they are not of the systematised path descriptions.

'Furthermore, the bodhisattva acquires the Prajñāpāramitā without practicing any dharma and without acquiring any dharma. Why? All practices (caryā) are erroneous and futile: from near or far, they present faults. In fact, bad dharmas (akuśaladharma) are faulty from close up; as for good dharmas, they are transformed and modified from far away; those who become attached to them will end up by experiencing pain and sorrow; thus they show defects from far off. [Good and bad practices] are like an appetizing food and a disgusting food both of which have been poisoned. As soon as one eats the disgusting food, one feels dissatisfied. When one eats the appetizing food, one feels pleasant satisfaction for the moment, but later it takes one's life. Therefore both kinds of food should be avoided, and it is the same for good and bad practices.

...

For the person who practices the absence of practice thus, nothing exists any longer: errors (viparyāsa), deceptions (vañcana) and the afflictions (kleśa) no longer arise for they are purified like space (ākāśaśuddha). He acquires the true nature of dharmas by holding his non-acquisition (anupalabdhī) as an acquisition.'

(<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225469.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 19th, 2022 at 9:22 PM

Title: Re: Indian history of "Sudden Enlightenment" found in Chan/Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Another way to go by is to see the sutras regularly quoted in Chan, like the Diamond Sutra.

'Those who are free from all notions are called buddhas.'

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html#div-15)

Like in the poem of <https://www.globaljiki.org/en/sub.do?menukey=4301&no=45>:

'If it can leave false conditions, it is the true buddha.'

(T51n2076p268a22-23 / Records of the Transmission of the Lamp 9.174 / quoted in Master Hsu Yun's Discourses and Dharma Words, p 121)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 23rd, 2022 at 5:48 PM

Title: Re: Karma and Consequences

Content:

Leo Rivers said:

Will I suffer karma for that market with all 3 parts of an action causing act missing? If so, ...

Astus wrote:

The main element of karma is intention, and the main effect is in one's experience. It's less about external events, but more about how events are sensed and interpreted. So the karma one suffers for is in the quality of the experience primarily, not much in the specific happenings.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 26th, 2022 at 7:49 PM

Title: Re: how do mahayana respond to theravada criticism of "Bodhisattva refuse nirvana to liberate all living beings "

Content:

dawn of peace said:

some Theravada Buddhists who criticize Mahayana Buddhism, said that Mahayana Buddhists have no desire for liberation because Bodhisattva vow to not attain nirvana until all living beings are liberated, such as Ksitigarbha Bodhisattva in Chinese Sutras who vow to refuse nirvana until all living beings are liberated.

Astus wrote:

That's about not mistaking a temporary state of peace for liberation.

dawn of peace said:

also, they said that Mahayana Buddhists believe that the samsara is not real, or just illusion, there is no need to liberate. They think that the desire for liberation only make sense when samsara and suffering are all real.

Astus wrote:

Even in Theravada what ordinary beings take to be real are merely conceptual, while those who see things for what they are are neither deluded nor attached.

dawn of peace said:

can Theravada's "desire for liberation" and Mahayana's "liberate all living beings" be reconciled.

Astus wrote:

There's no contradiction.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 26th, 2022 at 8:05 PM

Title: Re: Garchen Rinpoche's empowerments

Content:

Malcolm said:

Meaning empowerments don't use any substances, so they can definitely be given on line.

Astus wrote:

'With regard to receiving the empowerment Lord Jigten Sumgon had said that when you understand the meaning of the empowerment, when the meaning of the empowerment arises in your mind stream, that is when you have received the empowerment. So receiving the empowerment is not only receiving the vase on your crown. The vase is also just a symbol. But what's important is to understand the meaning and to gain some experience. So this is how what actually receives the empowerment.'

(Drupon Rinchen Dorje Rinpoche, 11.07.2020, https://youtu.be/4FtkBvOxuGc?t=1240 - 21:19)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 27th, 2022 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: how do mahayana respond to theravada criticism of "Bodhisattva refuse nirvana to liberate all living beings "

Content:

dawn of peace said:

yes, some Theravada Buddhist masters do teach this, which similar to Mahayana.

Astus wrote:

I was referring to the generally accepted distinction that apart from dhammas everything is paññatti.

'According to dhamma theory, only the dhammas are real; all things besides the dhammas are conceptual constructs or logical abstractions with no objective counterparts.'

(from the introduction of The Theravada Abhidhamma by Y. Karunadasa; see more on this online: https://www.bps.lk/olib/wh/wh412_Karunadasa_Dhamma-Theory--Philosophical-Cornerstone-of-Abhidhamma.pdf)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 27th, 2022 at 8:23 PM

Title: Re: Garchen Rinpoche's empowerments

Content:

conebeckham said:

By this logic, many who attend live in-person empowerments don't "receive" the empowerment.

Astus wrote:

I guess that's up to where a line is drawn.

'In my own ignorant opinion, all of these must come together as a foundation. In particular, it is my understanding that the vital point is to receive the blessings and realize the nature of the empowerment that is pointed out, which is based on the strength of the meeting between the master's blessings and the disciple's devotion. It appears to me that once you receive such a blessing, (realization of the nature of the empowerment) does not depend solely upon a material empowerment being or not being conferred.'

(Empowerment by Tsele Natsok Rangdrol, p 37)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 27th, 2022 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: Garchen Rinpoche's empowerments

Content:

Malcolm said:

That's not really what we are talking about here. You ought to stay in your lane. Vajrayana is not your speciality.

Astus wrote:

I claim no such thing. It merely seems to me that there are various interpretations, and some allow even the vase empowerment to happen online.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 5th, 2022 at 4:59 PM

Title: Re: Indian history of "Sudden Enlightenment" found in Chan/Zen

Content:

Agent Smith said:

the concept does exist as akrama mukti (sudden liberation)

Astus wrote:

It's not a common concept but one used by him only, so it's nothing to do with Buddhism in India.

Shaiksha said:

The earliest one can probably be found in the Bahiya Sutta - where Bahiya woke up right there after hearing the Buddha's words.

Aemilius said:

Also the stream-entry (enlightenment) of Shariputra/Upatishya

Astus wrote:

See <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=647370#p647370>: 'stories of quick attainments are far from being definitive (already the Nikayas have examples for that, like the Bāhiyasutta, but subitism is rejected, e.g. Kiṭāgirisutta, Uposathasutta)'

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 7th, 2022 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: Indian history of "Sudden Enlightenment" found in Chan/Zen

Content:

Aemilius said:

The quick awakening of the Dharma-eye has existed, in case of some persons, at the very beginning.

Astus wrote:

Incidental cases of quick insight are not the same as a specific teaching/method/path identified as providing an immediate realisation.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 9th, 2022 at 6:41 PM

Title: Re: Indian history of "Sudden Enlightenment" found in Chan/Zen

Content:

Aemilius said:

Quite naturally so, but it is not a method.

Astus wrote:

So it is unlike what is taught in Chan, i.e. the sudden teaching (dunjiao 頓教).

'In a single leap, you directly enter the stage of Tathāgata.

Just grasp the roots, don't worry about the branches;

It is like a pure beryl gem containing the moon.

Having understood this wish-fulfilling gem,

Using it for the benefit of yourself and others, it will never be exhausted.'

(Yongjia's Song of Actualizing the Way, BDK ed, p 14)

'To simply right now suddenly comprehend that one's own mind is fundamentally Buddha, without there being a single dharma one can attain and without there being a single practice one can cultivate—this is the unsurpassable enlightenment, this is the Buddha of suchness.'

(Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 20)

Aemilius said:

Four Courses of Meditation (pratipad); one of the four courses is quick and easy.

Astus wrote:

It is discussed in the <https://suttacentral.net/an4-patipadavagga?view=normal> in the Anguttara Nikaya (4.161-170). There it becomes clear that 'easy' stands for the four absorptions, and 'quick' for the five powers being strong. It is still a gradual path.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 11th, 2022 at 8:02 PM

Title: Re: Indian history of "Sudden Enlightenment" found in Chan/Zen

Content:

Aemilius said:

All cases that seem like a "sudden awakening", have been preceded by life, by the informal training that is called "life", for many years and for many lifetimes.

Astus wrote:

The sudden teaching of Chan is not about the idea that people may suddenly awaken, since that is not really a teaching to use, nor is it a novel concept unique to Chan.

The sudden awakening in Chan is about directly cutting off deluded concepts and achieving simultaneously and immediately the state of a buddha.

You may review what sudden enlightenment in Chan may stand for in <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=647356#p647356>.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 12th, 2022 at 5:15 AM

Title: Re: Which Zen school is closest to Theravada?

Content:

anagarika said:

which Zen school(s) would be closest to the original teachings of the historical Buddha (as preserved in the Pali canon).

Astus wrote:

The view within Zen is that it transmits the original mind of Shakyamuni Buddha, not any scriptural material, although supposedly there can be no contradiction between his words and his mind.

The doctrine of buddha-nature is quite central in Zen, just like several other Mahayana teachings, therefore it could not be derived from the early scriptures.

anagarika said:

There is a very prominent school within Theravada known as "Thai forest tradition" which seems to be a very good example of how the early Buddhist teachings and doctrine can be mixed with elements of Zen practice and the general mindset.

Astus wrote:

There are not that many elements of Zen practice to mix with. Practically there are only two: kanhua (observing the phrase) and mozhao (silent illumination). The latter seems more amenable to be copied, but not so without its proper understanding that is founded upon Mahayana teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 12th, 2022 at 6:01 AM

Title: Re: Which Zen school is closest to Theravada?

Content:

Virgo said:

Perhaps after the divisions of the 18 schools happened some of those, from the very beginning of their formations, did believe in the emptiness of all phenomena, but probably not until after we see the bodhisattva movement begin to happen (and I am no expert on this).

Astus wrote:

First people had to come up with the specific idea of the dharma as an ultimate unit, then define it as self-existent in order to allow others to say that it's not, thus inventing the concept of emptiness of dharmas. That whole process is found in post-abhidharma literature.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 12th, 2022 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: Which Zen school is closest to Theravada?

Content:

anagarika said:

Is mozhao an equivalent to shikantaza?

Astus wrote:

Generally, yes.

anagarika said:

there could be at least some overlap between the practice of shikantaza and certain practices from the Thai forest tradition which seem somewhat similar (such as the "choiceless awareness", "centering oneself in the citta", "focused non-meditation" - I put these in quotation marks as they are non-canonical).

Astus wrote:

The teachers of the Thai Forest tradition (that I know of) teach within the standard framework of the threefold training, where one needs a solid foundation in moral discipline to develop samadhi, and a sufficient level of samadhi to cultivate wisdom. The terms you mention are pointers to what correct mindfulness means. Strictly speaking, Zen is not about cultivating mindfulness (nian 念), and if anything, it's cultivating mindlessness (wunian 無念 - a key Zen term, often translated as no(n)-thought, and is an equivalent of the term hishiryō 非思量).

anagarika said:

Are you suggesting that shikantaza cannot be divorced from the Mahayana philosophy?

Astus wrote:

It is an idea within Mahayana philosophy. So the question is then: how do you define shikantaza?

anagarika said:

I would find that slightly disappointing as I assumed this practice to be completely non-conceptual, which I considered its biggest strength

Astus wrote:

If by non-conceptual you mean thoughtless, absent-minded, then it's not Zen at all, just blank stupidity. The central part of "mindlessness", i.e. non-thought is the direct realisation of emptiness, so wisdom is a key ingredient, that sees things as they really are. It is not about any special state, rather recognising that all states are insubstantial and incomprehensible.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 12th, 2022 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: Which Zen school is closest to Theravada?

Content:

anagarika said:

This sounds quite interesting and maybe something in the direction I´m looking for - could you please point me to some further resources?

Astus wrote:

The Platform Sutra (<https://www.bdkamerica.org/product/the-platform-sutra-of-the-sixth-patriarch/>) is a key Zen text. It discusses nonthought in chapter 2 (p 33-34) and chapter 4 (p 43-44).

anagarika said:

By non-conceptual I meant training the mind to see whatever there is not through the lens of any concepts.

Astus wrote:

Then the meaning of "concept" should be clarified, because for instance saṃjñā/saññā is very much a basic mental function.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 19th, 2022 at 4:17 PM

Title: Re: Direct perception of interdependent origination

Content:

sun-and-moon said:

What are traditional mahayana meditation instructions for a practitioner to cultivate direct perception of interdependent origination of momentarily arising dharmas in the mind?

Astus wrote:

A short form of contemplation can be found in part four of <https://www.bdkamerica.org/product/the-awakening-of-faith/> (p 78-79).

https://www.bdkamerica.org/product/the-sutra-on-the-concentration-of-sitting-

meditation/ (p 16-18, 70-81) has quite an extensive treatment of contemplating dependent origination as the antidote to ignorance. It is also a topic discussed under prajnaparamita in <https://read.84000.co/translation/toh70.html#UT22084-043-007-150>.

Observing dependent origination is an integral part of contemplation in Zhiyi's smaller manual (http://kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/ebm_book_page.htm, ch 6), just as it is of Dushun's instructions (Cessation and Contemplation in the Five Teachings of the Hua-yen, in Entry into the Inconceivable).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2022 at 5:45 AM

Title: Re: Indian history of "Sudden Enlightenment" found in Chan/Zen

Content:

akuppa said:

If its not about speed, do you mean it could take place over time? Could it be lost and then gained again? In my reading some medieval Japanese thought so.

Astus wrote:

'A single moment's stupidity and prajñā is eradicated, a single moment's wisdom and prajñā is generated. ... With a preceding moment of deluded thought, one was an ordinary person, but with a succeeding moment of enlightened thought, one is a buddha. To be attached to one's sensory realms in a preceding moment of thought is affliction, but to transcend the realms in a succeeding moment of thought is bodhi.'

(Platform Sutra, BDK ed, ch 2, p 30)

'Within continuing moments of thought one should not think of the previous [mental] realm. If one thinks of the previous thought, the present thought, and the later thought, one's thoughts will be continuous without cease. This is called 'fettered.' If one's thoughts do not abide in the dharmas, this is to be 'unfettered.'

Thus it is that nonabiding is taken as the fundamental.'

(ch 4, p 43)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2022 at 5:22 AM

Title: Re: Indian history of "Sudden Enlightenment" found in Chan/Zen

Content:

akuppa said:

So sudden awakening doesn't rule out a certain kind of development over time.

Astus wrote:

Where do you see any development?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2022 at 6:27 AM

Title: Re: Indian history of "Sudden Enlightenment" found in Chan/Zen

Content:

akuppa said:

But if you consider the person from our point of view, there is a development as awakening is actualized over time, with more and more moments of bodhi and fewer of delusion.

Astus wrote:

That would be the perspective of an imagined being persisting over time. Such a point of view then would raise some issues, like: What factors change with more frequent moments of awakening? If awakening can be gained and lost, what other conditions have to be met to reach final awakening?

Or there really aren't any new issues, since it would be mostly like the standard gradual path. And that is the understanding of those who subscribe to the view of 'sudden awakening, gradual cultivation'.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2022 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: Indian history of "Sudden Enlightenment" found in Chan/Zen

Content:

akuppa said:

If it can be lost, its not full awakening and if it takes place over time, it's gradual and not sudden. So I'm rather confused if this is what is taught as sudden awakening in Chan.

Astus wrote:

There are different versions of sudden awakening, as <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=647356#p647356>.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 23rd, 2022 at 4:08 PM

Title: Re: Early Chan Primary Sources

Content:

Javierfv1212 said:

What am I missing?

Astus wrote:

'A Treatise on the Ceasing of Notions' and 'Treatise on the Transcendence of Cognition' are the same Jueguanlun (絕觀論). Another famous one by Niutou is the Xinming (心銘).

The 'Wake-up Sermon' (Wuxing lun 悟性論) and the 'Treatise on No-Mind' (Wuxinlun 無心論) are quite different texts.

Everything by Heze Shenhui are also important.

For background the following texts should be also included besides the Vajrasamadhi sutra: Awakening of Faith in the Mahayana, Śūraṅgama Sūtra, Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment.

The Dunwu yaomen (頓悟要門) attributed to Dazhu Huihai is likely to be a treatise preceding the Hongzhou school (see: The Hongzhou School of Chan Buddhism by Jinhua Jia, p 60-62).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 23rd, 2022 at 5:57 PM

Title: Re: Early Chan Primary Sources

Content:

Anders said:

The Xin Xin Ming?

Astus wrote:

'According to Japanese scholars Nishitani Keiji and Yanagida Seizan, the Hsin-hsin Ming was composed in the eighth century, two centuries after Seng-ts'an (see Nishitani Keiji and Yanagida Seizan, eds., Zenke Goroku4 vol.2; Tōkyō: Chikuma Shobō, 1974, pp. 105-112). Yanagida Seizan also suspects that the Hsin-hsin Ming is the work of the fourth patriarch Tao-hsin (580-651). Chinese scholar Yin-shun shares this opinion in his Chung-kuo Ch'an-tsung Shih5, pp. 52-60.'

(Problem of Authorship. in <https://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/zen/fm/fm.htm>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2023 at 3:50 PM

Title: Re: nirvana mathematically not possible

Content:

Astus wrote:

'Just as the end of a seed is seen

Though it has no beginning,

When the causes are incomplete

Birth, too, will not occur.'

(Aryadeva's Four Hundred Stanzas on the Middle Way, 8.200)

'Conjecture about [the origin, etc., of] the world is an un conjecturable that is not to be conjectured about, that would bring madness & vexation to anyone who conjectured about it.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/an4.77/en/thanissaro>)

'Householder, there are many different views that arise in the world. For example: the cosmos is eternal, or not eternal, or finite, or infinite; the soul and the body are the same thing, or they are different things; after death, a Realized One exists, or doesn't exist, or both exists and doesn't exist, or neither exists nor doesn't exist. And also the sixty-two misconceptions spoken of in the Prime Net Discourse.

These views come to be when identity view exists. When identity view does not exist they do not come to be.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn41.3/en/sujato>)

'it's not the Realized One's concern whether the whole world is saved by this, or half, or a third. But the Realized One knows that whoever is saved from the world—whether in the past, the future, or the present—all have given up the five hindrances, corruptions of the heart that weaken wisdom. They have firmly established their mind in the four kinds of mindfulness meditation. And they have truly developed the seven awakening factors. That's how they're saved from the world, in the past, future, or present.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/an10.95/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 13th, 2023 at 6:56 PM

Title: Re: Explain Pure Lands and the differing views on them?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Fourfold Summary of Chan and Pure Land (禪淨四料簡) attributed to Yongming Yanshou is often quoted:

'With Ch'an but no Pure Land, nine out of ten people will go astray.

When death comes suddenly, they must accept it in an instant.

With Pure Land but no Ch'an, ten thousand out of ten thousand people will achieve birth [in the Pure Land].

If one can see Amitabha face to face, why worry about not attaining enlightenment?

With both Ch'an and Pure Land, it is like a tiger who has grown horns.

One will be a teacher for mankind in this life, and a Buddhist patriarch in the next.

With neither Ch'an nor Pure Land, it is like falling on an iron bed with bronze posters [i.e., one of the hells].

For endless kalpas one will find nothing to rely on.'

(translation from Yung-ming's Syncretism of Pure Land and Ch'an by Heng-ching Shih, in JIABS, vol 10, no 1, p 118)

And a modern explanation:

'The Chan School (which became Zen in Japan) focuses on attaining enlightenment in this lifetime. The Pure Land School, on the other hand, teaches cultivators how to be reborn to Amitabha's Western Bliss Pure Land, where they will be able to attain enlightenment in their very next lifetime. In the parallel practice of Chan and Pure Land, we aspire to become enlightened in this life; however, we are also aware that this is an incredibly difficult goal to attain, and thus we use the Pure Land Dharma as a backup plan. In fact, the Pure Land Dharma is like an insurance policy that will enable us to keep making progress in our next lifetime, should we fail to reach enlightenment before we die.'

(<https://www.chanpureland.org/practices.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 18th, 2023 at 5:36 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Publication Review Websites

Content:

Svalaksana said:

I'm looking for a website that concentrates and reviews Buddhist publications, whether books or academic papers, course thesis and such other kinds of literary output.

Astus wrote:

<https://networks.h-net.org/h-buddhism> is a site like that.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 18th, 2023 at 6:37 AM

Title: Re: Deep-rooted Hindu wants to practice Buddha Dharma esp. Dzogchen

Content:

mahabuddha said:

Choose one and stick with it.

Astus wrote:

Not necessarily. Some examples:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Robert_Kennedy_%28Jesuit%29 (born June 20, 1933) is an American Jesuit priest, professor of theology, psychoanalyst and Zen rōshi in the White Plum lineage.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ama_Samy (Arul Maria Arokiasamy), S.J., born in 1936, is an Indian Zen master and Jesuit priest.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/James_Ishmael_Ford (Zeno Myoun, Roshi) is an American Zen Buddhist priest and a retired Unitarian Universalist minister.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 18th, 2023 at 3:39 PM

Title: Re: Deep-rooted Hindu wants to practice Buddha Dharma esp. Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

This talk (<https://suttacentral.net/dn25/en/sujato>) by the Buddha is also worth mentioning here:

“Nigrodha, you might think, ‘The ascetic Gotama speaks like this because he wants pupils.’ But you should not see it like this. Let your teacher remain your teacher.

You might think, ‘The ascetic Gotama speaks like this because he wants us to give up our recitation.’ But you should not see it like this. Let your recitation remain as it is.

You might think, ‘The ascetic Gotama speaks like this because he wants us to give up our livelihood.’ But you should not see it like this. Let your livelihood remain as it is.

You might think, ‘The ascetic Gotama speaks like this because he wants us to start doing things that are unskillful and considered unskillful in our tradition.’ But you should not see it like this. Let those things that are unskillful and considered unskillful in your tradition remain as they are.

You might think, ‘The ascetic Gotama speaks like this because he wants us to stop doing things that are skillful and considered skillful in our tradition.’ But you should not see it like this. Let those things that are skillful and considered skillful in your tradition remain as they are.

I do not speak for any of these reasons. Nigrodha, there are things that are unskillful, corrupting, leading to future lives, hurtful, resulting in suffering and future rebirth, old age, and death. I teach Dhamma so that those things may be given up. When you practice accordingly, corrupting qualities will be given up in you and cleansing qualities will grow. You’ll enter and remain in the fullness and abundance of wisdom, having realized it with your own insight in this very life.”

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 19th, 2023 at 7:18 PM

Title: Re: The Origin of Living Beings & the World in Shurangama sutra chapter VI

Content:

Astus wrote:

「佛言：「阿難！當知妙性圓明離諸名相，本來無有世界眾生，因妄有生因生有滅」
(T19n945p138b7-8)

The Buddha said, “You should know, Ānanda, that the wondrous enlightened nature is endowed with perfect understanding. It is apart from all names and attributes, and in it, at the fundamental level, there are no worlds and no beings. It is because of delusion that there is coming into being, and because there is coming into being, there is ceasing to be.”

(The Śūraṅgama Sūtra - A New Translation, p 314)

「阿難！云何名為眾生顛倒？阿難！由性明心，性明圓故；因明發性，性妄見生。從畢竟無成究竟有，此有所有非因所因，住所住相了無根本，本此無住，建立世界及諸眾生」
(b12-16)

“What is the distorted phenomenon that we call beings, Ānanda? The enlightened nature of the true mind that understands is such that its understanding is perfect and complete. But, Ānanda, from this understanding, another understanding may be created as another entity, and from that other entity, a deluded awareness will come into being. Thus from within the original state which has no attributes whatever, that which has definite attributes comes into being.

“Neither what comes into being nor what it comes into being from are based on anything, nor are they a basis for anything. Beings and the worlds they dwell in have no foundation, and yet, despite their having no foundation, beings and the worlds come into being.

(p 314-315)

「迷本圓明是生虛妄，妄性無體非有所依。將欲復真，欲真已非真真如性，非真求復宛成非相，非生非住非心非法，展轉發生生力發明，熏以成業同業相感，因有感業相滅相生，由是故有眾生顛倒。」

(b16-20)

“Confusion about the original perfect understanding results in delusion, but this delusion has no essential nature of its own; it is based on nothing. One may wish to return to what is real, but to wish for the real is already a falsification. The true nature of the suchness of reality is not a reality that one can seek to return to. If one were to try to return to it, one would merely experience something that does not have the attributes of reality.

“Through their mutual interaction, there comes into being what does not really come into being, as well as what does not really abide, what is not really the mind, and what are not really phenomena. From the force of their coming into being, an understanding is created, and its influence leads to activity subject to karma. Similar karma mutually attracts, and because of the karma of this mutual attraction, there is a coming into being and then a ceasing to be. This is the reason for the distorted phenomenon of beings.”

(p 315-316)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 22nd, 2023 at 5:06 AM

Title: Re: In Madhyamaka is everything empty, without exception? Or is there something that exists?

Content:

Dgj said:

Is it that there is no such thing as any thing, whatsoever, because all is empty, no exceptions? Or is the Madhyamaka teaching that all things are empty, which points to some transcendent reality?

Astus wrote:

'It is not to be asserted that the Buddha exists beyond cessation, nor “does not exist” nor “both exists and does not exist,” nor “neither exists nor does not exist”—none of these is to be asserted.

Indeed it is not to be asserted that “The Buddha exists while remaining [in this world],” nor “does not exist” nor “both exists and does not exist,” nor “neither exists nor does not exist”—none of these is to be asserted.

There is no distinction whatsoever between saṃsāra and nirvāṇa. There is no distinction whatsoever between nirvāṇa and saṃsāra.'

(Madhyamakasastra, 25.17-19, from Nagarjuna's Middle Way)

'There is not anywhere anything

That ever exists without depending.

Thus never is there anywhere

Anything that is permanent.

There is no functional thing without a cause,

Nor anything permanent which has a cause.

Thus the one who knows suchness said what has

Come about causelessly does not exist.

If the unproduced is permanent

Because impermanent [things] are seen to be products,

Seeing that the produced exists

Would make the permanent non-existent.'

(Catuhsataka, v 202-204, from Aryadeva's Four Hundred Stanzas on the Middle Way)

"All phenomena" refers to the eighteen constituents, the six types of contact,

The six feelings that arise from contact,

Physical phenomena, nonphysical phenomena,

And conditioned and unconditioned phenomena.

All of these phenomena are void of their own entity.

This emptiness is the emptiness of all phenomena.'

(Madhyamakavatara 6.200-201ab, from The Karmapa's Middle Way: Feast for the Fortunate)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 22nd, 2023 at 4:28 PM

Title: Re: The Humanities

Content:

Astus wrote:

Might be different in the US, but to give a well rounded education was/is the purpose of secondary/high school (https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Gymnasium_%28school%29).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2023 at 5:16 AM

Title: Re: Don't Know Mind

Content:

KeithA said:

If one wants to know what Kwan Um style teaching style is like, this it.

Astus wrote:

The "don't know mind" is something to learn and master in order to know the truth. Thus one is required/invited to know instead of not knowing. Very tricky.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2023 at 3:03 PM

Title: Re: Don't Know Mind

Content:

clayde said:

One doesn't learn "Don't Know Mind", one unlearns so that DKM may appear.

Astus wrote:

One first has to learn the term DKM, hear it in the proper context and from a source one trusts, otherwise it's quickly forgotten. Then one has to invest more time and effort to comprehend the meaning of the term, plus gain further knowledge about what to do in order to apply it.

clayde said:

And one certainly doesn't master DKM, DKM has no master.

Astus wrote:

Is simply hearing about DKM, knowing the expression, and perhaps understanding it in the right way enough, or should one make use of it in one's life? If one should, then there is practice and there is proficiency, i.e. mastering it.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2023 at 3:13 PM

Title: Re: Don't Know Mind

Content:

KeithA said:

Learn and master what, exactly?

Astus wrote:

First the words, then the meaning, and then its application/usage.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2023 at 4:42 PM

Title: Re: Indian history of "Sudden Enlightenment" found in Chan/Zen

Content:

Malcolm said:

We have, for example, a text attributed to Vimalamitra on a nongradual approach, the The Meaning of the Sudden Entrants Nonconceptual Cultivation [cig car 'jug pa rnam par mi rtoḡ pa'i bsgom don], is preserved in the Tenjur. Does this really represent an Indian sutra-based simultaneous entry? Hard to say.

Astus wrote:

On that text:

https://www.academia.edu/23331168/The_Sudden_and_Gradual_S%C5%ABtric_and_Tantric_Approaches_in_the_Rim_gyis_jug_pa_and_Cig_car_jug_pa by Joel Gruber.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 24th, 2023 at 3:04 PM

Title: Re: Don't Know Mind

Content:

clayde said:

Learning the term and comprehending the meaning of the term are not necessary and are not DKM. And one doesn't apply DKM; it's not a technique or tool to be applied, nor a skill to be mastered.

Astus wrote:

So the teachings on DKM are pointless, and there is no way to attain it either. Why then even mention it?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 24th, 2023 at 3:12 PM

Title: Re: Don't Know Mind

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

The conceptual mind can't see past itself.

Astus wrote:

That there is anything past it, sounds like a concept.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 24th, 2023 at 3:15 PM

Title: Re: Don't Know Mind

Content:

clayde said:

No, I didn't say that the teachings are pointless; in fact, the teaching of DKM (or Buddha-nature, and Zen teachings in general) are well regarded as pointers.

Astus wrote:

If so, then learning and comprehending are necessary, so is the application of the teachings.

clayde said:

Yes, DKM (or Buddha-nature) is unattainable - because we already are it.

Astus wrote:

There is a distinction between the hidden and the revealed buddha-nature, so there is a path to purify the mind and attain awakening.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 25th, 2023 at 2:27 AM

Title: Re: Don't Know Mind

Content:

clyde said:

Dear Astus, My response is found in your signature.

Astus wrote:

That begins with investigating the nature of mind, and then gaining genuine insight. How do you connect it to the DKM?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 25th, 2023 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: Don't Know Mind

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

I didn't say anything about what is past it.

Astus wrote:

If there is nothing beyond the conceptual mind, why should it see past itself?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 25th, 2023 at 5:59 AM

Title: Re: Don't Know Mind

Content:

clyde said:

Yes, purify and attain, investigate and gain, but . . .

Astus wrote:

Why "but..."? It's rather "then..." That is, once one has purified the mind and attained awakening, then there is no cultivation and nothing to gain. In other words, although both oneself and all things are already empty and without anything to grasp, that has to become an actual realisation in order to be free from self-centredness and clinging.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 25th, 2023 at 5:34 PM

Title: Re: In Madhyamaka is everything empty, without exception? Or is there something that exists?

Content:

Dgj said:

So, the Shentong position is in clear, undeniable contradiction of Nagarjuna, it sounds like, no?

Astus wrote:

Seems so, yes.

'The Jonangpas assert that the nature of all phenomena, the ultimate truth, is permanent and stable, and is not empty of its own entity. Their position is well refuted here, using the teaching that the empty nature of all phenomena is empty of its own nature.'

(The Karmapa's Middle Way: Feast for the Fortunate, p 471-472)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 10th, 2023 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: Awareness: singular, or composite?

Content:

Astus wrote:

'Hearing the word "buddha-nature," many students have misunderstood it to be like the "self" described by the non-Buddhist Senika. This is because they do not meet people, they do not meet themselves, and they do not meet with a teacher. They vacantly consider mind, will, or consciousness — which is the movement of wind and fire — to be the buddha-nature's enlightened knowing and enlightened understanding.'

(Bussho, in SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 2, p 5)

'Silly man, who on earth have you ever known me to teach in that way? Haven't I said in many ways that consciousness is dependently originated, since consciousness does not arise without a cause?'

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn38/en/sujato>)

'But an unlearned ordinary person would be better off taking this body made up of the four primary elements to be their self, rather than the mind. Why is that? This body made up of the four primary elements is seen to last for a year, or for two, three, four, five, ten, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, or a hundred years, or even longer. But that which is called 'mind' or 'sentience' or 'consciousness' arises as one thing and ceases as another all day and all night. It's like a monkey moving through the forest. It grabs hold of one branch, lets it go, and grabs another; then it lets that go and grabs yet another.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn12.61/en/sujato>)

'Great king, no phenomenon whatsoever transmigrates from this world to another world, yet there are the manifestations of death and birth.

Great king, the cessation of the final consciousness is known as death. The arising of the first consciousness is known as birth. Great king, the moment the final consciousness ceases, it does not go anywhere. The moment the first consciousness pertaining to birth arises, it also does not come from anywhere. Why is that? It is because they are devoid of essential nature.'

(<https://read.84000.co/translation/toh226.html#UT22084-063-007-73>)

'The view expressed now is absolutely not the Buddha's Dharma; it is the view of the non-Buddhist Senika. According to that non-Buddhist view, there is one spiritual intelligence existing within our body. When this intelligence meets conditions, it can discriminate between pleasant and unpleasant and discriminate between right and wrong, and it can know pain and irritation and know suffering and pleasure—all [these] are abilities of the spiritual intelligence. When this body dies, however, the spirit casts off the skin and is reborn on the other side; so even though it seems to die here it lives on there. Therefore we call it immortal and eternal. The view of that non-Buddhist is like this. But if we learn this view as the Buddha's Dharma, we are even more foolish than the person who grasps a tile or a pebble thinking it to be a golden treasure; the delusion would be too shameful for comparison.'

(Bendowa, in SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 1, p 14)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 11th, 2023 at 2:39 PM

Title: Re: Awareness: singular, or composite?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

And if the mind is dependently arisen, how can it be that which is realized upon awakening?

Astus wrote:

It might be good to recall that mind means the six types of experience: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thought. It's not some abstract thing but immediately observable.

It is its dependent nature that is realised. The mind is believed to be one's self and thus it's the basis of grasping. When seen as merely the product of conditions without essence, then there's nothing left to cling to.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 13th, 2023 at 2:10 PM

Title: Re: Awareness: singular, or composite?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

It's like saying "the true nature of fire is always that it will be hot. This fact doesn't change. That which does not change is permanent".

Astus wrote:

In brief that's what svabhava and svalaksana mean. Emptiness can be called nihsvabhava.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2023 at 8:15 PM

Title: Re: Samyaksamadhi vs Samyaksambodhi

Content:

Abhijñāñānābhibhu said:

In the Eightfold Noble Path, why did the Buddha teach the eighth limb as right samadhi (samyaksamadhi), and not right enlightenment (samyaksambodhi)? Isn't enlightenment the goal and summit of the path? What then is the relationship between samyaksamadhi, or right meditation, and samyaksambodhi? Is samyaksamadhi a kind of synonym of samyaksambodhi?

Astus wrote:

The N8P has its parts working together, not in sequential order. For the result, there are two more: right knowledge and right liberation. Those are possessed by arhats. See: MN 117.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 17th, 2023 at 6:06 PM

Title: Buddhist and non-Buddhist Ethics in MPPS

Content:

Astus wrote:

Furthermore, there are sūtras of the heretics that allow killing (prāṇātipāta), theft (adattādāna), sexual misconduct (kāmaṁithyācāra), lying (mṛṣāvāda) and the use of wine.

They say:

- 1) In sacrifices to the gods (devayajña), killing is not wrong because it is the practice of religion; if one is in difficulties, it is not wrong to kill an ordinary person to save one's life, for in difficulties, it is to follow the right path.
- 2) Except for gold, it is permitted to steal in order to save one's life. Later, the heretics will suppress this residue of fault.
- 3) Except for the consort of one's teacher (guru), the wife of the king, the wife or daughter of a spiritual friend (kalyāṇamitra), it is permitted to violate other women and to have sex with them.
- 4) It is permitted to lie in the interest of one's teacher, one's parents, one's own life, one's cattle, or in the rôle of a middleman.
- 5) When it is cold, it is permitted to drink liquor made from crystallized honey and, in the sacrifices to the gods, it is permitted to take one or two drops of wine.

In the Buddha's Dharma, this is not permitted.

- 1) Out of loving-kindness (maitrīcitta) and equanimity (samacitta) towards all beings, it is forbidden to take the life of even an ant, the more so a man.
- 2) It is forbidden to take a needle (sūci) and thread (tantu), even more so, a valuable object.
- 3) It is forbidden to touch a courtesan (veśya), the more so another man's wife (parakalatra).
- 4) It is forbidden to lie as a jest, the more so to make a (real) lie.
- 5) It is forbidden to drink any wine at any time, the more so when it is cold and during sacrifices to the gods.

The distance between the heretics and the Buddha's Dharma is like the distance between heaven and earth. The law of the heretics is a generating source for passions (kleśamautthāpaka); the Buddha's Dharma is the place of destruction of all the passions: this is the great difference.

(<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225457.html>; Ven. Dharmamitra's translation http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/N6P_excerpts/N6P_X-Bk4_X-15.pdf on p 10-11; https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T25n1509_p0192a08)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 21st, 2023 at 3:42 PM

Title: Re: The Four Stages of Awakening in Vajrayana Buddhism

Content:

dpcalder said:

Does Vajrayana Buddhism have an equivalent concept?

Astus wrote:

The <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Abhidharmakośa> is the primary source in Tibetan Buddhism of all kinds of topics related to the hearer's vehicle, and it covers the four attainments in chapter 6. It is somewhat different from the Theravada interpretation.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 23rd, 2023 at 6:13 AM

Title: Re: Drikung mahamudra books

Content:

ZopaChotso said:

Can anyone recommend a good book on Mahamudra from the Drikung tradition?

Astus wrote:

https://www.drikung.org/storage/2022/02/Mahamudra_Teachings_by_Garchen_Rinpochhe.pdf

<https://pktc.org/books/gampopas-mahamudra/>

<https://www.shambhala.com/garland-of-mahamudra-practices.html>

<https://www.namsebangdzo.com/Introduction-to-Mahamudra-p/5748.htm>

ZopaChotso said:

Has anyone read the Chetsang's book "The Practice of Mahamudra", if so, is it a good book?

Astus wrote:

Yes.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 27th, 2023 at 6:03 AM

Title: Re: Korean style Medicine Buddha Mantra chanting

Content:

KeithA said:

Sino-Korean version of the Diamond Sutra

Astus wrote:

Like http://www.buljahome.com/amsong_dia/song_file.htm? Or http://www.buljahome.com/amsong_dia/1_nfile.htm?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 3rd, 2023 at 8:22 PM

Title: Re: Skandha question

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, it is part of the nature of the mind, in other words, wherever there is mind, there is clarity, just as there is emptiness. Both clarity and emptiness are uncompounded in the sense that they are invariable characteristics of any given mind. You cannot remove the clarity of the mind anymore than you can remove its emptiness.

Astus wrote:

Why single out mind to be anything other than empty? Earth has the nature of solidity, etc. up to all the many dharmas.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 4th, 2023 at 12:01 AM

Title: Re: Skandha question

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Do you mean "element" earth or the planet Earth?

Astus wrote:

The element.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 5th, 2023 at 3:55 PM

Title: Re: Skandha question

Content:

Malcolm said:

Mind is not only empty. But that is a common sutra attitude.

Astus wrote:

All things have their unique attributes, and categories of things have their shared qualities that make them different from other categories. So why say that only the category of mind is special?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 6th, 2023 at 5:25 PM

Title: Re: Skandha question

Content:

Malcolm said:

It's only by knowing the nature of the mind liberation is attained. If one claims the nature of mind is only emptiness, this is insufficient. But we are going off topic.

Astus wrote:

If the unique qualities of an instance of consciousness is held to be uncompounded, the same can be applied to all dharmas. How is that any different from denying the emptiness of dharmas? Or even affirming a sort of ultimate awareness/self.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 8th, 2023 at 3:44 PM

Title: Re: Skandha question

Content:

Abhijñāñānābhibhu said:

it is also innately endowed with all the qualities of Buddhahood/Buddha-nature

Astus wrote:

That's standard buddha-nature doctrine to encourage everyone to buddhahood, etc.

Abhijñāñānābhibhu said:

The ultimate bodhicitta or buddha-nature can be uncompounded, but still contain all the infinite marvelous qualities of all the Tathagatas.

Astus wrote:

Uncompounded means it's without arising and ceasing, so it's incapable to perform any function (unlike buddha-nature). Aryadeva says:

'All are produced for their effect,
Thus none are permanent.
There are no Tathagatas other than Subduers [who cognize] things as they are.
There is not anywhere anything
That ever exists without depending.
Thus never is there anywhere
Anything that is permanent.
There is no functional thing without a cause,

Nor anything permanent which has a cause.
Thus the one who knows suchness said what has
Come about causelessly does not exist.
If the unproduced is permanent
Because impermanent [things] are seen to be products,
Seeing that the produced exists
Would make the permanent non-existent.'
(Four Hundred Stanzas on the Middle Way, 9.201-204)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 8th, 2023 at 3:52 PM

Title: Re: Skandha question

Content:

Malcolm said:

Things other than minds have no possibility of liberation.

Astus wrote:

Do you imply that it's a practical teaching without much consideration of a bigger (theoretical) picture? Or <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=657768#p657768> to your previous response was missed?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 8th, 2023 at 7:51 PM

Title: Re: Skandha question

Content:

Malcolm said:

Minds also are conscious, but that consciousness is not fabricated by someone or something. Minds cannot be reduced in such a way as to exclude consciousness, consciousness is an irreducible fact of minds. Unlike inanimate phenomena, minds possesses two irreducible qualities, consciousness and emptiness.

Astus wrote:

Minds are defined by being cognizant (vijñānaṃ prativijñaptiḥ - Kośa 1.16; MPPS XXX.4.1.5), by knowing an object (ālambanaṃbijñaptiḥ - Pañcaskandhaprakaraṇa 112; cf. Kośa 1.34), and they always arise not simply based on conditions but also with concomitants (caitta - Kośa 2.23-24). Hence the issue with saying that somehow the quality of cognizance/consciousness is independent of conditions seems contrary to what's generally taught about the mind. As Śāntideva points out (Bodhicaryāvatāra 9.60), consciousness without an object makes no sense. Also, the MPPS, when discussing the emptiness of all dharmas (<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc226211.html>), covers also the defining characteristic of mind as cognizant.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 10th, 2023 at 4:45 PM

Title: Re: Skandha question

Content:

Malcolm said:

If there is no object for it, does a consciousness cease and become nonexistent? If this is the case, how does someone arise from a samadhi of cessation?

Astus wrote:

Consciousness is when it is conscious of something. Not being conscious of something is simply no consciousness. So to say that consciousness somehow can cease to be conscious of something and then stop existing is not an option, like saying that first the light of a candle ceases to be bright and then ceases to be light.

As for arising from a samadhi of cessation and other similar examples used by some to propose a theory of an unbroken stream of consciousness, even those theories maintain momentariness and the need for an object. So no matter what, consciousness stays no longer than a moment and never without something to be conscious of.

Malcolm said:

More to the point, if consciousness must always have an object, how can one practice prajñāpāramitā?

Astus wrote:

By not perpetuating the attachment to consciousness or any other phenomenon.

Malcolm said:

Candra points out in his MAV autocommentary, "Yogis do not perceive all aspects, when those are not perceived, that which is appropriated by the eye, and so on, and so on does not occur. In this way, yogis do not perceive an intrinsic nature in any entities, and therefore, they are liberated from samsara."

Astus wrote:

That's about ending the misconceptions of self and belonging to a self, as in MMK 18.4 that the autocommentary quotes.

Malcolm said:

If consciousness must always have an object, such a nonperception would be impossible, and therefore, liberation also would be impossible, and one must accept the consequence that liberation involves consciousness becoming a nonexistent, and therefore, one's view is necessarily annihilationist, like that of sautrantikas.

Astus wrote:

It can be said that recognising that the door key is not in one's pocket is an instance of nonperception, but that's actually a deduction, a conceptual inference. In the case of inherent existence, once its mistaken assumption is removed, there is simply no generation of the idea of a self. So there is no need for a consciousness without object.

"'But there couldn't be any seeing of such a nature, could there? So how do they then see?' Though that is true, it is said that, 'It's by not seeing it that they see.'"
(<https://www2.hf.uio.no/polyglotta/index.php?page=record&vid=1113&mid=1927236>)

'It is said in the very profound sūtras that the state of nonseeing is seeing [ultimate reality]. In that (ultimate reality), there is neither seeing nor seer, but peace without beginning or end.'
(Entry to the Two Realities, v 7, in Jewels of the Middle Way, p 119)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 10th, 2023 at 5:25 PM

Title: Re: Skandha question

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

As the Buddha purportedly brings up in the Surangama Sutra, if you cover your eyes so that you can't see anything, how do you know that you can't see anything? You know because the 'eye consciousness' doesn't cease simply because there is no object to see.

Astus wrote:

That's only one half of the reasoning presented in the sutra, but if one takes only that much from it, that would not "differ from the 'truth of the unmanifested nature' as taught by the Brahmin Kapila, or from the 'true self' as taught by the ascetics who smear ashes on themselves, or by others who are not on the right path" (2.9, p 72). So the conclusion drawn is that "Statements that account for its existence cannot be negated, yet one cannot say that they cannot be negated. Such statements cannot be affirmed, yet one cannot say that they cannot be affirmed. What is entirely beyond all defining attributes — that is the entirety of Dharma." (p 74)

From Ven. Sheng-yen's commentary:

'You must try to not cling to either extreme and to let go of the center, as well – this is Madhyamika, the middle way. Could this be the way to find true self?

If you continue to hold on to a concept such as a true self, or an idea of something that pervades through all space and time, then you are holding on to an attachment.

Buddhadharma does not speak of true self; it speaks only of causes and conditions.

You might ask if causes and conditions are the true Dharma, the true way. No, these are only concepts, expedient ways of explaining things.'

(<https://chancenter.org/download/free-books/Until-We-Reach-Buddhahood-Vol-I-Book.pdf>, p 123)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 13th, 2023 at 3:31 PM

Title: Re: Identifying the object of negation in meditation

Content:

Astus wrote:

“What is this grasping at self?” enquired Drom.

“This is something that wants all positive qualities for oneself alone and wants others alone to take on all misfortunes.”

“Then please explain this in such a manner so you can say ‘This is selfgrasping,’” asked Drom.

Atiśa replied: “Where would one find something of which it could be said that ‘This is the reified self-grasping?’”

“In that case, please explain to me how it is that [this self-grasping] wants everything and transfers [all] blames onto others.”

Atiśa replied, “Upāsaka, why even ask me? This is pervasive in sentient beings. You know this, so what need is there to ask? Even so, I have also seen attachment and aversion labeled as self-grasping.”

“Atiśa, there are people who possess such forms of grasping?”

“Where do they exist?” responded Atiśa.

“They are [within] our own mental continuum,” replied [Drom].

“Upāsaka, what is one’s own mental continuum?”

“It is that which wants everything and grasps [at it all] replied Drom.

Atiśa: “I, too, would say the same.”

(The Jewel Garland of Dialogues, ch 6, in The Book of Kadam, p 121-122)

Consider, for example, that someone accuses you of having committed an offense which you did not do. When you are accused of this, you say, “I didn’t do that.” With this accusation, because thinking “I” rises from deep in the center of your heart, this clarifies how we perceive the “I” which is innate self-grasping.

(<http://theguildny.org/wp-content/uploads/2015/11/Quick-Path-English-Mnyur-Lam-by-Panchen-Blobzang-Yeshes-Quick-Path-Tr.-Lozang-Jamspal-TCTG.pdf>, p 141-142)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 28th, 2023 at 6:30 PM

Title: Re: Cessation of sensory experiences as the state of Prajnaparamita

Content:

Astus wrote:

“Master Gotama, it’s when the eye sees no sight and the ear hears no sound. That’s how Pārāsariya teaches his disciples the development of the faculties.”

“In that case, Uttara, a blind person and a deaf person will have developed faculties according to what Pārāsariya says. For a blind person sees no sight with the eye and a deaf person hears no sound with the ear.”

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn152/en/sujato>)

“Suppose there was a black ox and a white ox yoked by a single harness or yoke. Would it be right to say that the black ox is the yoke of the white ox, or the white ox is the yoke of the black ox?”

“No, reverend. The black ox is not the yoke of the white ox, nor is the white ox the yoke of the black ox. The yoke there is the single harness or yoke that they’re yoked by.”

“In the same way, the eye is not the fetter of sights, nor are sights the fetter of the eye.

The fetter there is the desire and greed that arises from the pair of them. The ear ... nose ... tongue ... body ... mind is not the fetter of thoughts, nor are thoughts the fetter of the mind. The fetter there is the desire and greed that arises from the pair of them.”
(<https://suttacentral.net/sn35.232/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 3rd, 2023 at 3:00 PM

Title: Re: Which best describes Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Buddhism is polytheist, since there are many gods and heavens, like the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Four_Heavenly_Kings, the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tr%C4%81yastri%E1%B9%83%C5%9Ba>, <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tushita>, <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Y%C4%81ma>, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 5th, 2023 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: Does East Asian Buddhism have a concept of Arahant/Arhat

Content:

dpcalder said:

I specifically have in mind Chan and Zen Buddhism. Do they recognize the existence of humans who have totally and irreversibly eradicated all karmic reactivity?

Astus wrote:

Arhats are actually quite popular in East Asian Buddhism. See for instance https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ji_Gong, who is believed to be one of the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Eighteen_Arhats.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 6th, 2023 at 7:49 PM

Title: Re: Does East Asian Buddhism have a concept of Arahant/Arhat

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

The Eighteen Arhats seem to be a closed group (no more to be added) and more like minor deities than advanced disciples. The Theravadins seem to see becoming an Arhat as an achievement open to anyone, any time - theoretically at least.

Astus wrote:

The system of the https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ten_realms show well that arhats are above all samsaric beings. It is recognised as a significant attainment, but there's more to go.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 10th, 2023 at 8:30 PM

Title: Re: Stressed and discouraged by the suttas

Content:

anagarika said:

I don't dispute the validity of many of the above statements, but they have to be put in a meaningful and broader context. Taken at face value and in isolation, I believe, is a recipe for disaster.

Astus wrote:

Those are all quite basic teachings very much present in Mahayana as well (see e.g. https://books.google.hu/books/about/Four_Illusions.html?id=9pyqUV89ZQcC by Candrakirti, or the teachings on <https://www.lotsawahouse.org/topics/parting-from-four-attachments/>). The issue rather seems to be with wishing for the happy results but seeing oneself inadequate to achieve it. That might be a case of 'renunciate sadness' (<https://suttacentral.net/mn137/en/sujato>) that turned into restlessness (uddhacca), one of the basic hindrances that can come from trying too hard (<https://suttacentral.net/an3.102/en/sujato>).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 14th, 2023 at 4:25 AM

Title: Re: The body and mind of the Buddha is non-dual

Content:

Malcolm said:

there is disagreement on this point from both the Theravada school as well as Dzogchen teachings.

Astus wrote:

Not in Theravada. See: <https://suttacentral.net/kv8.8/en/aung-rhysdavid>s. The commentary (The Debates Commentary, p 136) identifies those who believed that there was matter in the immaterial realm as the Andhakas, i.e. the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Caitika> s.

Also: 'In the sense planes, twenty-eight material phenomena are found; in the fine-material planes, twenty-three; among the non-perceivers, seventeen; but none in the immaterial plane.' (A Comprehensive Manual of Abhidhamma, p 258)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 21st, 2023 at 4:24 AM

Title: Re: Tiantai and Nichiren Buddhism and their views of the Madhyamaka and Yogachara schools of Buddhism

Content:

Vert said:

In Great Concentration and Insight Zhiyi writes the following:

“Vasubandhu and Nāgārjuna clearly perceived the truth in their hearts, but they did not teach it. Instead, they employed the provisional Mahayana teachings, which were suited to the times.”

Astus wrote:

That's not exactly what Zhiyi wrote.

The original:

天親龍樹內鑒冷然。外適時宜各權所據。

(https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T46n1911_p0055a21)

Translation by Paul L. Swanson (Clear Serenity, Quiet Insight, vol 2, p 830):

'Vasubandhu and Nagarjuna internally had insight and were enlightened, and externally each responded appropriately to the needs of their times on the basis of tentative means.'

And that is the proper way to explain the Dharma, as it becomes clear in the sentences following the above one:

'However, some [Buddhist] teachers have a one-sided understanding, and some scholars are carelessly attached [to their own limited interpretation], so that they [argue and fight uselessly,] like shooting arrows at a rock. They each maintain one extreme, and thus pervert the noble path. If you obtain this meaning, then you comprehend both the impossibility of verbal expression and the necessity of verbal expression.'

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 30th, 2023 at 2:57 PM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism a philosophy or a religion?

Content:

cookies said:

Is Buddhism a philosophy or a religion?

Astus wrote:

Very much a religion, as it has a number of fundamental doctrines given in a set of canonised scriptures, and various ideas about supernatural forces and phenomena are required to be accepted as true.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 1st, 2023 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism a philosophy or a religion?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

1. Please define “true” in this context.
2. Please give examples of ‘required’ phenomena.

Astus wrote:

1. True, as in being of consequence, having an effect.

2. Rebirth, karma, six realms, buddhas, bodhisattvas - just to mention the basics. Things like repentance, transference of merit, magical powers, dharanis, mantras might also be mentioned as common Buddhist things.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 1st, 2023 at 1:32 AM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism a philosophy or a religion?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

The validity of Rebirth can be deduced using logical inference.

Astus wrote:

It starts with belief in something immaterial, and the existence of anything beyond matter cannot be proven objectively.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Buddhism doesn't require belief in any Buddhas, merely in the teachings of Gautama Buddha which lead one away from dukkha.

Astus wrote:

If one accepts Mahayana, then the existence of other currently living buddhas is taught by Shakyamuni Buddha.

PadmaVonSamba said:

The "magical stuff" is there but not required.

Astus wrote:

It is taught by the Buddha, and it's even in his standard awakening story as recalling his past lives and seeing the rebirth of all beings.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 1st, 2023 at 3:55 AM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism a philosophy or a religion?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Awareness is both immaterial and self-evident. It doesn't require objective validation yet is undeniable.

Astus wrote:

If an immaterial awareness were self-evident, it couldn't be questioned. Anything immaterial is clearly denied by all sorts of materialist views.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Although this forum is Mahayana, the opening question doesn't limit the answer to the Mahayana context.

Astus wrote:

Almost the same amount of supernatural is found in Theravada, so it doesn't really make a difference.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Even though the Buddha spoke of things we cannot observe in this lifetime, he also said not to just hff we lived something you cannot test for yourself merely because someone said it's true.

Astus wrote:

That's a dubious and debatable interpretation. No common human can test if the Buddha was a buddha, but accepting that is a necessary starting point in being a Buddhist.

PadmaVonSamba said:

It's in the believing of things which one cannot verify for oneself that makes one's approach to Buddhism a religious one rather than a philosophical one.

Astus wrote:

There's not much that can be verified for oneself in Buddhism, especially at the beginning, so it is necessarily a religious approach one must have. An even more crucial difference is that while in philosophy one may argue this way and that way, in Buddhism either one's view matches with the teachings or one is wrong.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 1st, 2023 at 1:17 PM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism a philosophy or a religion?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Well, maybe that's been your experience, and I respect that. But that doesn't mean that the fiid of 'faith' has been everyone's entry into the dharma. If it is, then Buddhism is one's religion, and if not, then Buddhism is one's philosophy.

Astus wrote:

Can one be a Buddhist without accepting that the Buddha was a buddha? If not, then either one believes so without verifying it, or one has some sort of supernatural power to be able to see the mind of someone who has been dead for thousands of years.

PadmaVonSamba said:

But is one a Buddha because he reveals the dharma or does one reveal the dharma because he is a Buddha?

Astus wrote:

A buddha has

https://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Eighteen_unshared_qualities_of_a_buddha.

PadmaVonSamba said:

And what does 'questioning awareness' even mean? Awareness is an irrefutable fact.

Astus wrote:

If it were self-evident, its existence wouldn't be questioned by anyone. Also, if one argues by merely claiming something to be self-evident, it only means the absence of analysis, reason, and proof, thus no different from unfounded faith.

PadmaVonSamba said:

And awareness is also not material.

Astus wrote:

How can you tell? Is it not aware of material things? If it is, then it cannot be of an entirely separate nature.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 1st, 2023 at 6:47 PM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism a philosophy or a religion?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Without awareness, how can you even suppose that?

Astus wrote:

The contended point if it's immaterial, and that is not self-evident.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 1st, 2023 at 9:56 PM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism a philosophy or a religion?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

But following the Dharma path to freedom from samsara doesn't require believing any of that. It doesn't even require that what has been preserved as the Buddha's words were ever spoken by the Buddha.

Astus wrote:

Are you aware of any Buddhist tradition that teaches such a reduced view? Also, to say that there is such a thing as samsara is already a matter of faith and not something verified.

PadmaVonSamba said:

If they didn't work, if the teachings said that liberation is attained by suicide or eating sand or whatever, faith in Buddhism would have died out a long time ago.

Astus wrote:

Such an argument could be made for any religion, custom, superstition, and whatnot.

PadmaVonSamba said:

When people imagine Buddha the way Christians imagine God, then it's a religion.

Astus wrote:

In that case Mahayana is necessarily a religion, as buddhas create buddha-realms.

PadmaVonSamba said:

When people conceive of Buddha as the teacher of the true way, then it's a philosophy.

Astus wrote:

That would still qualify it to be a religion, as in philosophy there is no single teacher giving the true way.

PadmaVonSamba said:

But if awareness were a product of physical matter, that wouldn't mean much. Physical matter is still an object of awareness. A flute is a device for causing air molecules to vibrate against the ear drum. But music is an interpretation in the mind, of the electrical impulses in the brain caused by those vibrations. That interpretation is observed by awareness.

Astus wrote:

That doesn't answer the problem that because physical things are matter, what can interact with them has to be of the same nature, therefore awareness is matter.

PadmaVonSamba said:

How can one question the existence of awareness without the awareness that one is questioning?

Astus wrote:

The problematic point is to say that awareness is immaterial, thus it could serve as a basis for rebirth. See <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=663451#p663451> that originated this topic.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 1st, 2023 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism a philosophy or a religion?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The nature of samsara is suffering. Suffering isn't made up, and everyone experiences it. Therefore, "samsara" is not a matter of faith.

Astus wrote:

Samsara as the rounds of births in the six realms is, without the divine eye.

Malcolm said:

The essence of Mahāyāna is not creating buddhafiels. The essence of Mahāyāna is compassion

Astus wrote:

As great compassion with the final aim to become a buddha includes the creation of a buddha field.

Malcolm said:

Which is also the case in Buddhism as a whole.

Astus wrote:

But no teaching is proven correct just by having followers beyond a few centuries.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 2nd, 2023 at 3:48 AM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism a philosophy or a religion?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Samsara does not necessarily entail rebirth, however. It can just be birth, jati.

Astus wrote:

The word samsara literally means moving on, from one place to another. Still, even by saying that samsara happens on a momentary basis, the many lives version is also a standard one everywhere.

Malcolm said:

Mahāyāna does not need to included this, it is ancillary, especially considering that no one actually attains buddhahood in a created buddhafiels.

Astus wrote:

What makes it the bodhisattvayana if one removes the basic idea that the path is a matter of innumerable lifetimes, just as working on liberating all beings is more than a single life's achievement? Then many of the mahayana sutras (including popular ones like the Amitabha Sutra, Medicine Buddha Sutra, Ksitigarbha Sutra, Lotus Sutra) are not much more than bad fiction.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 2nd, 2023 at 5:15 AM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism a philosophy or a religion?

Content:

Malcolm said:

And? It is not necessary to believe in rebirth to practice Dharma:

Astus wrote:

Sure, one can practise some elements (the <https://suttacentral.net/mn60/en/sujato> is a nice one on it, while at the same time note how the <https://suttacentral.net/mn76/en/sujato> calls annihilationism an approach that negates spiritual life), but that's not the issue. For Buddhism to be excluded from the category of religion, there would have to be some version of it where the unverifiable elements do not exist.

Malcolm said:

Certainly the Buddha taught rebirth, but he did not expect people to necessarily accept it.

Astus wrote:

It is repeatedly called wrong view, the opposite of right view, that <https://suttacentral.net/mn114/en/sujato?layout=plain&reference=none¬es=none&highlight=false&script=latin#10.1>. So, it is expected, as much as having right view is expected.

Malcolm said:

Without compassion, there are no bodhisattvas at all, which is why Candrakīrti prostrates to compassion, rather than the Buddha, bodhisattvas, or even bodhicitta. So let's begin with that.

Astus wrote:

Compassion is not limited to Mahayana, or to Buddhism. So that would be an insufficient criteria to label one's view/practice/philosophy something specific.

Malcolm said:

The fact is that all Buddhāśāśa can be approached as a religion, as philosophy, or as both.

Astus wrote:

'Indeed, Buddhism can be either a religion or a philosophy, or it can be neither. It may even be called a science, a psychology, a way of life, and so on. To apply any of these terms may be either right or wrong according to what we mean by such terms. In other words, it depends on the usage and implication of the term in question. In any event, it does not matter what we call Buddhism. What really matters is why Buddhism is called so, i.e. what is meant by Buddhism.'

(Some Basic Concepts of Buddhism by Phra Payutto, in https://www.watnyanaves.net/uploads/File/books/pdf/vision_of_the_dhamma_a_collection_of_buddhist_writings_in_english.pdf, p 148)

Malcolm said:

In any case, there are many people who consider themselves Mahāyānis who nevertheless do not accept rebirth, particularly in your school.

Astus wrote:

I'm not trying to set up or prove some sort of barrier or criteria for who is or is not a real Buddhist. The point is simply that all Buddhist traditions accept a good number of supernatural elements as facts, so Buddhism is rightly called a religion.

'People interested in Chan practice often find it difficult to have religious faith. As faith is intrinsically emotional, and Chan practitioners emphasize personal cultivation to gain physical and mental benefits or the experience of Chan, they find it hard to accept religious faith. This is actually a great mistake.'

(<https://www.shengyen.org/freebook/pdf/E-9.pdf> by Ven. Sheng-yen, p 2)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 2nd, 2023 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism a philosophy or a religion?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

But by that criteria, only those who have taken a Bodhisattva vow are practicing Buddhists. Is that what you are saying?

Astus wrote:

No. Those who have taken the bodhisattva vows are the followers of the bodhisattva path. Not all Buddhists follow the bodhisattva path.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 2nd, 2023 at 5:44 PM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism a philosophy or a religion?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Then philosophy is also religion, since in them all unverifiable elements exist.

Astus wrote:

The unverifiable elements were mentioned in reference to a <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=663457#p663457> that stated: 'It's in the believing of things which one cannot verify for oneself that makes one's approach to Buddhism a religious one rather than a philosophical one.'

One possible key difference between a religious and a philosophical approach is that in the former the source of and the authority over truth is in a set of doctrines, while in the latter it is systematic thinking (generally speaking).

Malcolm said:

Clearly Buddha understood he was living in a pluralistic society, otherwise, there would be no reason for his teaching the four solaces.

Astus wrote:

And so the distinction between the various levels of engaging in Buddhism has been maintained in the traditions. The lowest of teachings/vehicles, that of gods and humans (e.g. Treatise on the Origin of Humanity, in Three Short Treatises, BDK ed, p 153-155; Gateway to Knowledge, vol 3, ch 15), is the teaching of moral behaviour, for what the fundamental belief in ethical causality is required.

'when an individual has wrong view, whatever bodily, verbal, or mental deeds they undertake in line with that view, their intentions, aims, wishes, and choices all lead to what is unlikable, undesirable, disagreeable, harmful, and suffering.'
(<https://suttacentral.net/an1.314/en/sujato>)

'a mendicant whose view and development of the path is pointing the wrong way cannot break ignorance, produce knowledge, and realize extinguishment.'
(<https://suttacentral.net/sn45.9/en/sujato>)

Apart from being a wrong view, it is also called the view of a bad person (<https://suttacentral.net/mn110/en/sujato>), a failure in view (<https://suttacentral.net/an3.117/en/sujato>), and a lost opportunity (<https://suttacentral.net/an8.29/en/sujato>). It is a view that comes from grasping at the aggregates (<https://suttacentral.net/sn24.5/en/sujato>), and as such it is abandoned by those who enter the stream.

'Whoever One may be, especially if striving to perform one's religious duty, one should believe firmly in the law of causality. If one lacks this belief and does whatever one likes, not only will one fail in the performance of religious duty, but also there will be no escape from this law (of causality) even in the three unhappy ways.'
(<https://www.emptycloud.net/articles-2/chan-meditation-%E7%A6%85/the-chan-training/> / <https://www.hrfjw.com/fjrw/hcrw/xyfs/68094.html>)

'the prerequisites of all those who would enter upon the vehicle of [any spiritual] path are the three kinds of faith. When, among these, one is motivated mainly by the faith born of conviction in the results of past actions, [it is clear that] the attainment of virtuous actions by means of the four correct ways of progressing [on the path] will itself be preliminary to engaging in the vehicle of the exalted realms.'
(The Treasury of Knowledge, vol 4, p 422-423)

Malcolm said:

And yet, HHDL famously stated, "my religion is kindness."

Astus wrote:

If kindness alone qualifies as religion, then Buddhism is surely a religion. But most probably there's more to his religion than kindness.

Malcolm said:

As do all philosophies, and thus all philosophies are rightly called religions, and all religions are rightly called philosophies.

Astus wrote:

Not all philosophies accept the existence of something supernatural, as there are the various versions of materialism and physicalism.

Malcolm said:

So what do you think? Bodhisattva or not a Bodhisattva? Nishijima certainly recited the bodhisattva vow daily.

Astus wrote:

There are even atheist Christian ministers (<https://www.bbc.com/news/world-europe-14417362>), but that doesn't make Christianity in general not a religion.

Malcolm said:

So, can one take the bodhisattva vow and reject transmigration?

Astus wrote:

It is contradictory to do so, but it's always good to have the attitude of a bodhisattva.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 2nd, 2023 at 6:43 PM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism a philosophy or a religion?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Aren't you are saying that faith in (let's call it) 'the 'unprovable stuff' is essential to practice Mahayana? But then you are saying that one doesn't have to believe in 'unprovable stuff' if one isn't on the Bodhisattva path? So doesn't mean that faith isn't required?

Astus wrote:

Mahayana begins with the intention to attain buddhahood to liberate all beings. At the time of aspiration there is no direct knowledge of what buddhahood is, nor of many other elements of the path needed to get there. Furthermore, unless one reduces the meaning of the terms like 'bodhisattva' and 'all beings', and does not take into account the Jatakas and other accounts of bodhisattvas, there are necessarily rebirth and other things involved.

As for faith in Buddhism in general, if one interprets it as a temporary method to alleviate some stress, then not much is needed apart from trusting in the outcome. But that seems to fall short of being a follower of the Triple Jewel.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 4th, 2023 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism a philosophy or a religion?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Buddhism can be a philosophy, or a science, or a religion. It really depends on who you are and what your expectations are. For example, HHDL said, "Buddhism is more than a religion. It is a science of the mind."

Astus wrote:

That's playing with labels, which is fine, since they stand for various ideas and feelings depending on the person who uses them. In the end what matters is to get clear on what Buddhism is about, as I quoted Phra Payutto's words on that <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=663589#p663589>.

The general concept of religion, when looked into, can be problematic. An example:

'The Ministry of Education published a new primer for teaching Buddhism in schools [Buddhadharmaya. Mul pota (Education Dept., Colombo, 1965).], intended for study by six-year-olds, no doubt the first book in a projected series. In the first paragraph of the introduction occurs the sentence, 'The Buddhist religion is not a religion' ('Buddhāgamaya āgamayek no vē'). This is immediately amplified: 'In the Buddhist religion there is no religion limited to offerings and devotions. The Buddhist religion is a way of life.' ('Puda pūjā, ādahilivalaṭa sīmā vū āgamayek Buddhāgamayē nāta. Buddhāgamaya jivana kramayeki.') Didactically this may be admirable, but the amplification was not enough to avert attention and wrath from the simple statement that Buddhism is not a religion, a statement which through the very exigencies of the Sinhalese language stands in a self-contradictory form! There was a political storm: the Marxists who were in the coalition government had obviously infiltrated the Ministry of Education; this was part of their campaign to abolish Buddhism. Some of those who started these charges may have been disingenuous, but the Sinhalese villagers who heard them may be forgiven if not only the six-year-olds were unable to grasp the sophisticated claim that their religion was no religion.'
(Buddhist Precept and Practice: Traditional Buddhism in the Rural Highlands of Ceylon by Richard F. Gombrich, Routledge, 1995, p 74)

Damien Keown tries to answer the question whether Buddhism is a religion or not by using a https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ninian_Smart#Dimensions_of_religion created by Ninian Smart. Here is the conclusion:

'Once we begin to think of a religion as an organism with various dimensions, however, it becomes easier to see how Buddhism -- despite its unusual and distinctive features -- can take its place among the family of world religions. Returning to our original question, we can also see why it would be inadequate to define Buddhism simply as a philosophy, a way of life, or a code of ethics. It includes all of these things and sometimes seems to present itself predominantly in one of these modes. However, this depends largely on the perspective from which it is being viewed, and the extent to which some of its dimensions are being ignored. If someone wishes to see Buddhism as a rational philosophy free of religious superstition, then -- by focusing on the doctrinal and philosophical dimension -- it can be understood in this way. If another wishes to see it essentially as a quest for mystical experience, then -- by making the experiential dimension central -- that too is possible. Finally, someone who wishes to see Buddhism as a set of humanistic moral values will also find justification for that view by making the ethical and legal dimension primary.

I have mentioned these particular interpretations of Buddhism because they are ones which have proved popular with Westerners in the course of the last century. While not altogether illegitimate, they suffer from being incomplete, and typically represent a reaction of some kind to the perceived deficiencies of religion in the West. To focus on just one of the dimensions of Buddhism in this way is to make the same mistake as the blind men did in grasping hold of just one part of the elephant.'

(Buddhism: A Very Short Introduction, p 14-16)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 4th, 2023 at 5:44 AM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism a philosophy or a religion?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

But isn't that only because one is matching it up with what one already categorizes as "religion"?

And what are the components of that? Temples? Statues? Candles? Celestial beings?

Astus wrote:

Yes, Buddhism fits the category of religion because it looks like the other things that are called religions.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Yet is my birthday party a religious activity?

Astus wrote:

It could be a religious activity if the people participating in it viewed it as such and if it was a manifestation of a complex system of beliefs and practices. Think of the difference between Christmas being celebrated at home using mostly identical elements by a Christian and a non-Christian family.

PadmaVonSamba said:

My point is, it's not the activity of the structure itself which makes something a matter of religion.

Religion is faith, faith is believing something to be true without having any other reason to assume it is true.

Astus wrote:

Faith without activity, without structure, without community, etc. is not a religion but simply a personal belief. And if it's only activity without belief, then it's a custom. If it's just a structure without belief, then it's an organisation. If it's a community without the shared principles, then it's a group of friends. If it's just a set of ideas without personal engagement, then it's a thought. And so on.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 4th, 2023 at 4:47 PM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism a philosophy or a religion?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Speaking strictly for myself, Buddhadharma is not a religion, philosophy, or belief. It's direct knowledge of one's own state.

Astus wrote:

But that 'direct knowledge of one's own state' has a specific meaning to it, doesn't it? It could mean simply knowing when to eat and when to sleep. Like, mindful eating (<https://suttacentral.net/sn3.13/en/sujato>) and mindful sleeping (<https://suttacentral.net/an5.210/en/sujato>) are good and beneficial, but those have temporary results, they're not the goal.

“Reverend, the spiritual life is lived under the Buddha to know, see, attain, realize, and comprehend that which is unknown, unseen, unattained, unrealized, and uncomprehended.”

“But what is the unknown, unseen, unattained, unrealized, and uncomprehended?”

“‘This is suffering.’ ... ‘This is the origin of suffering.’ ... ‘This is the cessation of suffering.’ ... ‘This is the practice that leads to the cessation of suffering.’ ... This is the unknown, unseen, unattained, unrealized, and uncomprehended. The spiritual life is lived under the Buddha to know, see, attain, realize, and comprehend this.”

(<https://suttacentral.net/an9.13/en/sujato>)

That type of direct knowledge of the four noble truths has its purpose.

'Purification of knowledge and vision is only for the sake of extinguishment by not grasping. The spiritual life is lived under the Buddha for the sake of extinguishment by not grasping.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn24/en/sujato>)

Therefore,

'This spiritual life is lived for the sake of restraint, giving up, fading away, and cessation.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/an4.25/en/sujato>; Iti 35)

'I taught the Dhamma to my disciples in order to rightly end suffering in every way.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/an4.245/en/sujato>)

So when it comes to eating and sleeping, there's more to it than being aware of them, or even directly knowing.

'When hungry, eat;

Tired, sleep.

Fools laugh at me,

But the wise know its wisdom.'

(Enjoying the Way by Nanyue Mingzan, tr Jeff Shore)

That's not the same as ordinary people eating and sleeping. Huihai explained:

'While they are eating, they are not really eating due to too much thinking. While they are sleeping, they are not really sleeping due to too much mental agitation. Therefore, they do not work in the same way I do.'

(<https://ymba.org/books/entering-tao-sudden-enlightenment/tsung-ching-record>)

In the suttas:

'When solid food is completely understood, desire for the five kinds of sensual stimulation is completely understood. When desire for the five kinds of sensual stimulation is completely understood, a noble disciple is bound by no fetter that might return them again to this world.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn12.63/en/sujato>)

'A brahmin who is fully extinguished always sleeps at ease.
Sensual pleasures slip off them,
they're cooled, free of attachments.
Since they've cut off all clinging,
and removed the stress from the heart,
the peaceful sleep at ease,
having found peace of mind.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/an3.35/en/sujato>, <https://suttacentral.net/sn10.8/en/sujato>)

Both the temporary and the permanent peace of mind is beyond the worldly, rightly called transcendental.

'Withdrawn into the forest,
Alone, he wipes out his faults.
In calm and rest, he attains single-mindedness;
His happiness is greater than divine.
People seek wealth, nobility and profit,
Fame, garments and comfortable beds,
But their happiness is not peace:
The search for profit is insatiable.
He who wears the robes and begs his food
Does not know restlessness; his mind is always fixed.
With the eye of wisdom
He contemplates the True [nature] of dharmas.
Into all kinds of sermons
He penetrates with the view of sameness.
Wisdom and peace of mind
Have no equal in the threefold world.'

(<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225325.html>; and http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/N6P_excerpts/N6P_X-Bk4_X-07.pdf)

So, even if what are commonly seen as supernatural elements and 'all the ancillary stuff' are put aside, there are the absorptions and liberation, each to be recognised as 'a footprint of the Realized One' (<https://suttacentral.net/mn24/en/sujato>), beyond the scope of those occupied by mundane matters and conventional thoughts. These could even be called religious experiences.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 4th, 2023 at 4:51 PM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism a philosophy or a religion?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

So, you're saying that Buddhism exists today as a something identified with, and labeled as, a religious structure, and is therefore a religion because two or more people think it is.

Astus wrote:

Of the various words the term religion covers the different aspects that are part of Buddhism. Calling it a philosophy does not account for many ordinary elements like stupas and prayers, nor for the different meditative practices.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 4th, 2023 at 7:58 PM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism a philosophy or a religion?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

And various aspects of its teachings also make it a philosophy. I don't understand your insistence that it can't be both.

Astus wrote:

Philosophy in religion and religion in philosophy are somewhat different. The former means reasoning founded upon religious elements (revealed theology) or aimed at proving religious teachings (natural theology). The latter is thinking about religious ideas without being based on or arriving at a specific doctrine.

What makes something a Buddhist philosophy is that it may accept the Buddha's words as true from the beginning, and/or it is aimed at fulfilling the goal of Buddhism by guiding to teachings that are viewed as liberating. The second type is illustrated by the simile of the arrow (<https://suttacentral.net/mn63/en/sujato>), and that shows well why philosophising may actually seem contrary to Buddhism.

PadmaVonSamba said:

The Buddha offered logical arguments and methods of reasoning in his teachings. That's philosophy.

Astus wrote:

One may also find such arguments in the Bible and other religious texts as well.

PadmaVonSamba said:

But while its religious practices are not held by every follower of the Buddha's teachings, its philosophical components are.

Astus wrote:

How much philosophy is required to recite the name of Amitabha? Honen wrote:

'Reciting the nembutsu does not come from studying and understanding its meaning.'
(<http://www.jodo.org/teachings/teachings02.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 5th, 2023 at 4:40 AM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism a philosophy or a religion?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

I'll grant you that. Shin Buddhism is totally faith based. But why is that? Because practically all other schools of Buddhism are philosophical, and Shin Buddhism is an alternative to that (because in this degenerating era, etc).

Astus wrote:

Maybe one could say that there are some schools that are more philosophical looking, like the Gelugpas and some branches of Theravada with a strong emphasis on Abhidhamma, but otherwise not so much. Pure Land and Chan are the two most common traditions in East Asia, and they're explicitly non-philosophical. The Thai Forest Tradition and other similar Theravada communities elsewhere are not too keen on theorising either. The Nyingmapas and Kagyupas, although they have their shedras, are otherwise quite practice oriented and uphold their meditative traditions as paramount. And then when looking at the majority of Buddhists, most of them lay people, their engagement with the Dharma is primarily about prayers, ceremonies, and donations.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Within the scope of Buddhist traditions in general, Shin and Nichiren can probably be regarded as the exceptions to the rule.

Astus wrote:

I don't really see that. Note: those two also run universities in Japan.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 5th, 2023 at 7:59 PM

Title: Re: Is zazen a form of open monitoring meditation?

Content:

dpcalder said:

As opposed to the focused attention meditation more often associated with Theravada Buddhism?

Astus wrote:

Zazen simply means seated meditation. What type of meditation happens while seated can vary. First of all, to make it a Buddhist meditation (sammāsamādhi - right immersion), other elements of the path have to be present as well.

'And what is noble right immersion with its vital conditions and its prerequisites? They are: right view, right thought, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, and right mindfulness. Unification of mind with these seven factors as prerequisites is called noble right immersion with its vital conditions and also with its prerequisites.'
(<https://suttacentral.net/mn117/en/sujato>)

In case of the bodhisattva path it is similar (<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225915.html>), for meditation (dhyāna) to be a perfection (pāramitā) it requires the perfection of wisdom (prajñāpāramitā).

The Zen view on the connection between meditation (samādhi) and wisdom (prajñā) is that they are inseparable:

'Meditation and wisdom are of one essence, not different. Meditation is the essence of wisdom, and wisdom is the function of meditation. At times of wisdom, meditation exists in that wisdom; at times of meditation, wisdom exists in that meditation.'
(Platform Sutra, ch 4, BDK ed, p 41-42)

And in the same chapter it is written:

'Good friends, there are also those who teach meditation [in terms of] viewing the mind, contemplating tranquility, motionlessness, and nonactivation. You are supposed to make an effort on the basis of these. These deluded people do not understand, and in their grasping become mixed up like all of you here. You should understand that such superficial teachings are greatly mistaken!'
(p 43)

The way it is put into practice has various names, one common label is nonthought/no-thought/non-thinking (wunian 無念). Again, from the Platform Sutra:

'Good friends, in wisdom's contemplation both interior and exterior are clearly penetrated, and one recognizes one's own fundamental mind. If you recognize your fundamental mind, this is the fundamental emancipation. And if you attain emancipation, this is the samādhi of prajñā, this is nonthought. What is nonthought? If in seeing all the dharmas, the mind is not defiled or attached, this is nonthought. [The mind's] functioning pervades all locations, yet it is not attached to all the locations. Just purify the fundamental mind, causing the six consciousnesses to emerge from the six [sensory] gates, [causing one to be] without defilement or heterogeneity within the six types of sensory data (literally, the “six dusts”), autonomous in the coming and going [of mental phenomena], one’s penetrating function without stagnation. This is the samādhi of prajñā, the autonomous emancipation. This is called the practice of nonthought.

If one does not think of the hundred things in order to cause thought to be eradicated, this is bondage within the Dharma. This is called an extreme view.

Good friends, to be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is for the myriad dharmas to be completely penetrated. To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to see the realms of [all] the buddhas. To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to arrive at the stage of buddhahood.'

(ch 2, p 33)

This was summarised by Guifeng Zongmi in the following words:

'When you are aware that all characteristics are void, it is true mind, no mindfulness (wunian 無念). If a thought arises, be aware of it; once you are aware of it, it will disappear. The excellent gate of practice lies here alone.'

(Chan Letter, in Zongmi on Chan, p 88;

https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T48n2015_p0403a04)

The main instruction is included in The Manual of Zazen Practice by Changlu Zongze:

'One must not delve into thoughts that arise, whether good or bad. As soon as a thought arises, he must become aware of it. He must always be aware of what arises in the sphere of consciousness without losing clear discrimination, and without becoming dull or scattered. A myriad of years is nothing but one moment of thought, which is neither discontinuous nor continuous. This is the essential Way (or method) of Zen practice. Zazen is in itself the doctrinal gateway of “comfort and ease.”'

(The Baizhang Zen Monastic Regulations, BDK ed, p 256;

https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T48n2025_p1143a12)

And based on that Dogen wrote his zazen manual that says:

'Sitting in balance in the mountain-still state, think the concrete state of not thinking.

How can the state of not thinking be thought? It is non-thinking (hishiryō 非思量). This is the real secret of zazen. Sitting in zazen is not learning Zen meditation. It is the great peaceful and joyful gate of Dharma. It is untainted practice and experience.'

(Zazengi, in SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 3, p 226; https://21dzk.l.u-

tokyo.ac.jp/SAT2018/T2582_.82.0217c08.html)

Whether it is called the perfection of meditation, no-thought, or non-thinking, the main point is that it is founded upon the insight of emptiness, that no matter what experience occurs, it cannot be grasped, and there is nobody to grasp it. So, 'open monitoring', just letting thoughts come and go, is insufficient without recognising that thoughts come and go anyway.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 7th, 2023 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: Is zazen a form of open monitoring meditation?

Content:

Matylida said:

In fact one cannot find in any teachings such classification. It is Western product. Futile.

Astus wrote:

That Zen is the unification of concentration (定, samadhi) and wisdom (慧, prajna) is explained in the fourth chapter of the Platform Sutra, and by various later masters. As for Dogen, he wrote:

'in the state of clearly realizing the buddha-nature there is practice, which is the equal practice of balance and wisdom (定慧 - samadhi and prajna).'

(Bussho, in SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 2, p 24; https://21dzk.l.u-tokyo.ac.jp/SAT2018/T2582_.82.0098c27.html)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 7th, 2023 at 5:54 PM

Title: Re: Is zazen a form of open monitoring meditation?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Since it is relatively common, can you point to a correct translation then?

Astus wrote:

'shikan taza. (C. zhiguan dazuo; K. chigwan t'ajwa 祇/只管打坐). In Japanese, "just sitting"; a style of meditation emblematic of the Japanese SŌTŌSHŪ of ZEN, in which the act of sitting itself is thought to be the manifestation of enlightenment.'
(The Princeton Dictionary of Buddhism, p 804-805)

The term zhiguan/shikan 只管 comes up a lot in the Blue Cliff Record for instance. The first two examples:

In case 3, tr Cleary:

'People mostly do not see Hsueh Tou's meaning, but only (只管) say that he is ridiculing the state.'

(T48, no. 2003, p. 143a21-22)

In case 4, tr Cleary:

'Look at how the old adept Kuei Shan meets him; he just (只管) sits there and observes the outcome.'

(T48, no. 2003, p. 144a5-6)

Also appears in the Book of Serenity (case 5), tr Cleary:
'Only (只管) concerned with village songs and festival drinking'
(T48, no. 2004, p. 230b14)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 10th, 2023 at 4:59 AM

Title: Re: Traditional Soto approach clarification

Content:

Tao said:

how the Soto view can be maintained when post-kensho it's so obvious that meditation has changed so radically? (towards good) and you see your previous meditation as a poor intent.

Astus wrote:

Kensho is to arrive at the realisation of the nature of mind. Shikantaza is a practice with the realisation of the nature of mind. So it is to the level of shikantaza that one should arrive at post-kensho.

Tao said:

In Tibet first is the path of seeing, then the meditational path. Which agrees clearly with Rinzai view (and the experience of many).

Astus wrote:

That is the gradual path. However, the beginning is not the path of seeing but the path of accumulation, at least in the https://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Five_paths system used in Tibet. In East Asian Buddhism the <https://zh.wikipedia.org/zh-hant/%E4%BA%94%E5%8D%81%E4%BA%8C%E4%BD%8D> system is used, that begins with the 10 stages of faith, then 30 more stages before one arrives at stage 41 that is the first bhumi, what is equivalent to the path of seeing.

Tao said:

I always found the Soto view to be hard to maintain for persons who have realized the nature of mind. I don't know if I'm missing something... Because it's so obvious that there's a big change after kensho.

Astus wrote:

Maybe it is not the nature of mind that was found, or it is not the Soto view itself that seems off.

Tao said:

BTW how is Ch'an or Thien on this matter?

Astus wrote:

There is no unified or official Chan view (and I assume no central Thien view either). Generally speaking, since kanhua is the usual path, the approach is similar to Rinzai. That is, students most often need the tool of the huatou in order to break through the discriminating mind and arrive at no-thought to be settled in buddha-nature.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 10th, 2023 at 6:44 PM

Title: Re: Traditional Soto approach clarification

Content:

Tao said:

The impression I get is that there're two Zen, Dogen Zen and the rest.

Dogen Zen or Soto (but not Caodong) is very different, probably unique in buddhism.

Astus wrote:

I find Dogen's approach generally consistent with Zen before/without the investigation of the phrase (kanhua) method introduced by Dahui, something that Dogen directly opposed, unlike his near contemporary Jinul in Korea who eventually embraced it. But before Jinul championed the new trend, here's how he had explained Zen practice:

'Cultivators nowadays belong to the Buddha's spiritual family. They rely upon the direct-pointing (chikchi 直指) approach of the Sudden school, and, having developed firm faith and understanding, they straightaway comprehend that their own minds are perpetually calm and ever alert. Since they initiate their cultivation on such a foundation, even though they cultivate the manifold practices [of the bodhisattva], they only regard no-thought (munyŏm 無念) as their core and nonconstruction (mujak 無作, akṛtaka) as their basis. Because of this no-thought and nonconstruction, their practice is free from any temporal (sigŏp 時劫) or soteriological (chiwi 地位) sequences and also devoid of any sign of discrimination between dharmas and their aspects (dharmārtha). Since their cultivation is complete, approaches to dharma as numerous as dust motes and the meritorious qualities developed on all the bhūmis are also complete in the essence of their sublime minds, which is accordingly the same as a wish-fulfilling gem (cintāmaṇi).'

(Encouragement to Practice: The Compact of the Samādhi and Prajñā Society, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 2, p 148-149)

Here the terms 'calm and alert' (寂惺) are equivalents of samādhi and prajñā (定慧), and also of 'silent illumination' (默照). Ven. Sheng-yen practically reintroduced the practice of silent illumination that has been out of fashion in Chan for centuries.

'Silent Illumination is another name for shamata-vipashyana, the meditative practice of stilling the mind and developing insight into its true nature. This practice originated in Indian Buddhism as early as the time of Shakyamuni Buddha. Traditionally, shamata-vipashyana was practiced sequentially. A practitioner progressed from shamata (stilling the mind) to vipashyana (insight, or illumination). The first stage was to practice shamata to achieve samadhi and then to practice vipashyana to achieve levels of insight. By contrast, in Chan Buddhism, which emphasizes the sudden approach to realization, shamata and vipashyana are practiced simultaneously.'

(The Method of No-Method, p 3)

'In silence there is illumination; in illumination there is silence—the two cannot be separated. If separated, they are reduced to the practices of shamata to enter samadhi and vipashyana to gain insight.'

(p 63)

'It is empty of subject or object, devoid of one who engages in Silent Illumination; it is free from dualities and self-reference. Because it is empty, it is spacious; because it is spacious, it is all-encompassing; because it is all-encompassing, it includes myriad forms. Yet it is not a mere void. This function of illumination enlivens everything, bringing to light the myriad forms. Thus in the silence there is illumination; in silence the "empty" and the "luminous" are united. It illumines in self-purity says that there is also illumination in silence. This self-purity is free of coloring or defilement. This is not defilement in the moralistic sense, but means being free of self-attachment and vexation, free from external influences. Since there is no self, there is also no notion of one who illumines. Yet this illumination does exist in the mind of one who encounters it. Sentient beings who come across greatly enlightened practitioners perceive that they are being helped, but for the bodhisattva there is no purity nor is there an illuminated mind. It is just a spontaneous and natural way of being, and sentient beings deliver themselves in response. Beyond the workings of causes and conditions means transcending the cycle of birth and death, the world of dependent origination, of samsara. Apart from subject and object means to be without the obstructions of subject-object dualisms. This is a state of one who has gained liberation; for such a practitioner there are no more hindrances. He or she has consummated the practice of Silent Illumination. This is sudden enlightenment.'

(p 67)

'On the one hand we seize and halt this mind of clinging and vexations, and on the other hand we polish this mirror-mind to restore its luminosity. This is shamata-vipashyana, or stillness and contemplation done together—which is Silent Illumination. However much we can silence the mind and free it from vexation and clinging, to that extent we will be able to illumine it.'

(p 81)

And a short explanation from one of Ven. Sheng-yen's disciples:

"Silence" is the metaphor for the wisdom of emptiness. So are quiescence, formlessness, spaciousness, stillness. These are all Hongzhi's poetic terms for the Mahayana teaching of selflessness. "Illumination" refers to the wondrous activity of this selfless wisdom that, in Buddhism, is none other than compassion. Just as wisdom and compassion are inseparable, so are silence and illumination. They are simply two aspects of our natural awakened buddha-nature within.'

(Silent Illumination: A Chan Buddhist Path to Natural Awakening by Guo Gu, p 5)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 14th, 2023 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: Traditional Soto approach clarification

Content:

Matylda said:

Well, zen should be just one clear stream, as it was originally. The lineage should be secondary issue in fact.

Astus wrote:

Clear stream in what sense? Zen has been without any clearly defined doctrinal tenets or practical methods, and it's been primarily the idea of a special lineage that has kept it apart from the rest of the Buddhist community from the beginning.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 14th, 2023 at 10:15 PM

Title: Re: Traditional Soto approach clarification

Content:

reiun said:

This may or may not clear up your challenge about zen doctrinal tenets:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Doctrinal_background_of_Zen

Astus wrote:

That article is quite a mixture of disorganised ideas without much relevance to Zen's historical development.

reiun said:

But zen emphasizes direct experience of reality through clearly defined practice methods.

Astus wrote:

Could you name some of those clearly defined practice methods? For instance, anything similar found in the works of <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dushun>, <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Zhiyi>, or in the so called https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dhy%C4%81na_sutras?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 14th, 2023 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Traditional Soto approach clarification

Content:

Matylda said:

It is very clear. Satori. Kensho how it was originally taught by Bodhidharma or the 6th patriarch.

Astus wrote:

'To be enlightened (悟) to this Dharma is to be without thought (無念).'

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 31; T48, no. 2008, p. 350c6-7)

'To be enlightened (悟) to the Dharma of nonthought (無念) is to see (見) the realms of [all] the buddhas. To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to arrive at the stage of buddhahood.'

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 34; T48, no. 2008, p. 351b4-5)

Nonthought (無念) is practically no different from non-thinking (非思量), and non-thinking is the essence of just sitting (只管打坐). That should mean that the teaching of zazen as practice-verification is very clear and authentic. What other satori and kensho could be lacking?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 14th, 2023 at 11:06 PM

Title: Re: Traditional Soto approach clarification

Content:

reiun said:

The best explication of clearly defined practice methods that you can trust would be in either of Meido Moore Roshi's two books, or even one of his videos on Youtube. Clearly defining practice methods is one of his core teachings in his books.

Astus wrote:

That's something specific to what he teaches. I meant something more universal in Zen, not limited to modern Rinzai.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 16th, 2023 at 5:32 AM

Title: Re: Traditional Soto approach clarification

Content:

Matylda said:

no-thought etc. is job of a realized teacher to explain/show what this really means. It is not realm of scholars or just people who practice zen. Bodhidharma clearly spoke about kensho, and warned that those without kensho will make big mistakes.

Astus wrote:

If one requires awakening before engaging in zazen, then that's a clear rejection of the basic doctrine emphasised by Dogen, and the Soto tradition in general, that practice and enlightenment are one.

Of the usual texts attributed to Bodhidharma (少室六門; T2009), kensho (見性) is mentioned in the Bloodstream Sermon (血脈論). However, if we look at that text, it is quite the radical type of Zen that dispenses with all forms of practice, seated meditation included.

'To find a Buddha all you have to do is see your nature (見性). Your nature is the Buddha. And the Buddha is the person who's free: free of plans, free of cares. If you don't see your nature and run around all day looking somewhere else, you'll never find a buddha. The truth is there's nothing to find.'

(The Zen Teaching of Bodhidharma, p 13; T48, no. 2009, p. 373c17-20)

'To attain enlightenment (成佛) you have to see your nature (見性). Unless you see your nature, all this talk about cause and effect is nonsense (外道法). Buddhas don't practice nonsense. A Buddha free of karma free of cause and effect. To say he attains anything at all is to slander a Buddha. What could he possibly attain? Even focusing on a mind, a power, an understanding, or a view is impossible for a Buddha. A Buddha isn't one sided. The nature of his mind is basically empty, neither pure nor impure. He's free of practice and realization (無修無證).'

(p 17; p. 374a15-20)

'People who don't see their nature (見性) and imagine they can practice thoughtlessness (無作想) all the time are liars and fools. They fall into endless space. They're like drunks. They can't tell good from evil. If you intend to cultivate such a practice (無作法), you have to see your nature (見性) before you can put an end to rational thought (息緣慮). To attain enlightenment without seeing your nature is impossible.'

(p 19; p. 374a24-27)

'Buddha is Sanskrit for what you call aware (覺性), miraculously aware (靈覺). Responding, arching your brows blinking your eyes, moving your hands and feet, its all your miraculously aware nature. And this nature is the mind. And the mind is the Buddha. And the Buddha is the path. And the path is Zen. But the word Zen is one that remains a puzzle to both mortals and sages. Seeing your nature (見本性) is Zen. Unless you see your nature, it's not Zen.'

(p 29; p. 375a5-9)

'Once mortals see their nature (見本性), all attachments end. Awareness (神識) isn't hidden. But you can only find it right now. It's only now. If you really want to find the Way, don't hold on to anything. Once you put an end to karma and nurture your awareness (神), any attachments that remain will come to an end. Understanding comes naturally. You don't have to make any effort. But fanatics (外道) don't understand what the Buddha meant. And the harder they try, the farther they get from the Sage's meaning. All day long they invoke Buddhas and read sutras. But they remain blind to their own divine nature (神性), and they don't escape the Wheel.

A buddha is an idle person. He doesn't run around after fortune and fame. What good are such things in the end? People who don't see their nature (見性) and think reading sutras, invoking Buddhas', studying long and hard, practicing morning and night, never lying down (長坐不臥), or acquiring knowledge is the Dharma, blaspheme the Dharma. Buddhas of the past and future only talk about seeing your nature (見性). All practices are impermanent. Unless they see their nature (見性) people who claim to have attained unexcelled, complete enlightenment are liars.'

(p 35-37; p. 375b22-c3)

'Basically, seeing, hearing, and knowing (見聞覺知) are completely empty (本自圓寂). Your anger, Joy, or pain is like that of puppet. You can search but you won't find a thing.

According to the sutras, evil deeds result in hardships and good deeds result in blessings. Angry people go to hell and happy people go to heaven. But once you know that the nature of anger and joy is empty and you let them go, you free yourself from karma.'

(p 45; p. 376b2-6)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 16th, 2023 at 6:01 AM

Title: Re: Traditional Soto approach clarification

Content:

Tao said:

The one that brings 無念 and 非思量 when not sitting.

Astus wrote:

They're not limited to sitting.

'It continues in an unbroken cycle, so that there is not the slightest interval between establishment of the mind, training, bodhi, and nirvana: conduct and observance is a continuing cycle.'

(Gyoji, in SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 2, p 163)

'In zazen both body and mind drop off. Zazen is far beyond the form of sitting or lying down.'

(<https://antaiji.org/en/classics/english-zazen-yojinki/>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 18th, 2023 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: Pratityasamutpada question

Content:

Rick said:

Nagarjuna said: "Neither from itself nor from another Nor from both, Nor without a cause Does anything anywhere, ever arise." This seems to negate causality. But the ultimate truth is sunyata, which is grounded in pratityasamutpada, which involves causality. I'm confused!

Astus wrote:

Causality is how things seem to operate on a conventional level, but when analysed, there is no reality found in that. It is only without any reality in it that causality can work (because no arising from itself (cause and result are exactly the same) or from other (cause and result are totally separate) is possible), and that's how emptiness and dependent origination go together.

Might also check Madhyamakavatara 6.33-38, it has now quite a few commentaries available in English.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 18th, 2023 at 6:03 AM

Title: Re: Traditional Soto approach clarification

Content:

Matylda said:

This is not radical, but correct teaching of zen.

Astus wrote:

Why do you object then to the doctrine of zazen being practice-realisation?

'Someone who seeks the Way doesn't look beyond himself. He knows that the mind is the Way. But when he finds the mind, he finds nothing. And when he finds the Way, he finds nothing. If you think you can use the mind to find the Way, you're deluded. When you're deluded, buddhahood exists. When you're aware, it doesn't exist. This is because awareness is buddhahood.'

(Wake-up Sermon, in The Zen Teaching of Bodhidharma, p 59; T48, no. 2009, p. 371c10-13)

'To see form but not be corrupted by form or to hear sound but not be corrupted by sound is liberation. Eyes that aren't attached to form are the Gates of Zen. Ears that aren't attached to sound are also the Gates of Zen. In short, those who perceive the existence and nature of phenomena and remain unattached are liberated. Those who perceive the external appearance of phenomena are at their mercy. Not to be subject to affliction is what's meant by liberation. There's no other liberation. When you know how to look at form, form doesn't give rise to mind and mind doesn't give rise to form. Form and mind are both pure.'

(Wake-up Sermon, in The Zen Teaching of Bodhidharma, p 61; T48, no. 2009, p. 371c17-23)

'Do not think "good" or "bad." Do not judge true or false. Give up the operations of mind, intellect, and consciousness; stop measuring with thoughts, ideas, and views. Have no designs on becoming a buddha. How could that be limited to sitting or lying down?'
(<https://www.sotozen.com/eng/practice/zazen/advice/fukanzanzeng.html>)

'We just sit. Still many different kinds of thought come and go naturally. It is very clear that thoughts, emotions, and daydreams are illusions like bubbles rising in water. We let go of them. No clinging to them, chasing after them, or pushing them away. We really do nothing but sit.'

(A Path of Just Sitting, in <https://www.sotozen.com/eng/library/leaflet/sotozen/index.html>, p 18)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 19th, 2023 at 5:17 AM

Title: Re: Traditional Soto approach clarification

Content:

Matylda said:

Your quotes are very nice but do not reflect the actual situation within soto, which became void of realization. That is the main point and problem.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean like, the majority of the priests are only priests out of family duty or something, not because of the Dharma? If so, isn't that the norm in all the Japanese schools that left behind actual monastic practice? Nevertheless, there can be some who still believe in the words of the Buddha and the ancestors, and therefore follow the precepts, cultivate zazen, etc., don't you think so? Aren't there at least a few training temples with long term residents?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 19th, 2023 at 6:19 PM

Title: Re: Traditional Soto approach clarification

Content:

Matylda said:

This situation has nothing to do with faith in dharma.

The residency is not dependent on place but ones wish to do it. There are very few people who do it for long in fact.

Astus wrote:

So it seems the issue of the presence of attainment in Soto (and Rinzai) is not related to the teachings and practices, but it's rather an organisational matter where the majority of the temples within Soto exist to serve communal needs of the laity. And there are still a relatively few temples and communities where they focus on the bodhisattva path and follow the teachings of the tradition. Therefore there isn't really some sort of error or decline to fix by adopting or inventing something, and those who actually want to engage in zazen have some places to go and some teachers to learn from.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 20th, 2023 at 12:13 AM

Title: Re: Pratityasamutpada question

Content:

Rick said:

Sorry, I still don't get it. It doesn't make logical sense to me and I don't know how else to assess it!

Astus wrote:

If we say that a tree really exists, that means it exists in and of itself, apart from every other things, and so we say of a seed and a chair as well, both being actually existing objects. That makes it impossible for a seed to grow into a tree, and a tree to become a chair, because all three are independent isolates, existing substantially. A seed is not a tree, so to say that from a seed comes a tree is nonsense, just as saying that from a pebble comes a tree. They are totally unrelated. But if a seed is not a thing in itself, nor is a tree, then there is no real separation as they are mere expressions, meaning that we do not actually find any seed for real, it's simply a made up name not referring to any true entity.

More importantly, all the logic and refutation applied are about removing clinging to ideas, but at the same time not denying the ordinary functionality of things. So it's like: yes, trees grow from seeds and chairs are made of wood, but better not make an issue out of it.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 21st, 2023 at 5:16 AM

Title: Re: 6 Indriyas

Content:

Vajrasambhava said:

But what about thinking? Why we cannot think in this state?

Does this mean the 6th consciousness is governed by brain?

If the answer is "no" then how anesthesia can influence a non-material apparatus?

Astus wrote:

The six types of consciousness are not things that wait around to be used but events of conscious awareness of something. If one closes one's eyes there is no eye-consciousness to talk about, because of the lack of any visual object. If there is a sudden loud noise there is no conscious thinking, nor is there much of it during powerful sensory input (pain/pleasure), although the fact that one is aware of a particular sensory experience means some level of consciousness is there, just not necessarily the speculative kind. Anyhow, this problem of the relationship between body and mind is based on a different view than what is taught by the Buddha, hence he rejected to take part in the debate whether the body and the soul are identical or separate, and even called such views a hindrance to liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 23rd, 2023 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: Am I misunderstanding Soto Zen's zazen?

Content:

dpcalder said:

It was my understanding that zazen is nothing more than open monitoring meditation - you just sit in awareness and monitor your thoughts as they arise and fall away, like clouds passing in the sky, and this is all there is to it.

Astus wrote:

Thoughts come and go anyway, no need to monitor them. If anything, it's the posture/body that one might initially pay attention to.

There is this very simplified explanation of zazen on the <https://www.sotozen.com/zazen/index.html>.

There are three main components of Zazen: Posture, Breathing, Adjusting your mind.

POSTURE

The target of the zazen posture is to sit comfortably and spontaneously. In zazen, you sit in a relaxed manner and releasing the muscles that are usually overused.

Zazen is not painful or difficult if you sit properly.

BREATHING

Breathe slowly through your nose and try to breathe carefully.

If you are not used to this, try to take deep and long breaths, focusing on the exhale.

ADJUSTING YOUR MIND

During zazen, various kinds of thoughts come to mind. It is natural as long as we are alive.

The important thing is not to chase them or hold them.

You do not need to force yourself to think about getting rid of thoughts, becoming nothing, or unifying your mind.

And there was this topic not too long ago:

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?t=42330>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 2nd, 2023 at 2:11 PM

Title: Re: Philosophical implications of the emptiness of the teachings themselves

Content:

Astus wrote:

One better not forget conditionality that goes hand in hand with emptiness. Emptiness is not causelessness. Therefore it's not the case that anything can come from anything.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 5th, 2023 at 3:19 AM

Title: Re: Don't Know Mind

Content:

master of puppets said:

What is it that attained, really?

Astus wrote:

That there's nothing to attain.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 5th, 2023 at 2:29 PM

Title: Re: Don't Know Mind

Content:

jimmi said:

Why do I need to know that, given the deep insight of DKM?

Astus wrote:

The deep insight of DKM is that there is nothing to get (to know, to obtain). Otherwise it's just ordinary ignorance.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 7th, 2023 at 8:47 PM

Title: Re: How flatworms acquire consciousness?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sounds like a thousand years old question.

Chan master Yanqing Faduan ... was asked by a government official, 'When an earthworm is chopped in two and both parts are still moving, in which half is the Buddha-nature?'

The master opened both his hands.

(Dongshan also said, 'The one posing the question, which half is that?')

(Records of the Transmission of the Lamp, vol 3, 12.287;

https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T51n2076_p0296b24)

Shengguang split an earthworm while hoeing, then asked:

'Someone today split an earthworm with a hoe. Both its ends move. Which one has life?'

The teacher (Zihu) picked up the hoe, hit down on the left end, hit down on the right end, hit down on the empty middle, threw back the hoe and left.

(https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/X68n1315_p0075b15)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 12th, 2023 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: Teachers with clairvoyance, alive

Content:

Astus wrote:

"And what is the demonstration of revealing? In one case, someone reveals the mind, mentality, thoughts, and reflections of other beings and individuals: 'This is what you're thinking, such is your thought, and thus is your state of mind.'

Then someone with faith and confidence sees that mendicant revealing another person's thoughts. They tell someone else who lacks faith and confidence: 'Oh, how incredible, how amazing! The ascetic has such psychic power and might! I saw him myself, revealing the thoughts of another person!'

But the one lacking faith and confidence would say to them: 'There's a spell named Māṇikā. Using that a mendicant can reveal another person's thoughts.'

What do you think, Kevaḍḍha? Wouldn't someone lacking faith speak like that?"

“They would, sir.”

“Seeing this drawback in revealing, I’m horrified, repelled, and disgusted by demonstrations of revealing.”

(<https://suttacentral.net/dn11/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 12th, 2023 at 4:11 AM

Title: Re: Non-duality and human limits

Content:

JCA said:

In order to make serious progress on the path to enlightenment it is necessary to achieve states of mind that are non-dual and non-conceptual.

However, it seems to me those states of mind are fundamentally incompatible with human existence.

Astus wrote:

Non-dual and non-conceptual mean not falling into extreme views of being and non-being. They're not about some sort of altered state of mind. So there's nothing incompatible with living a functional life, as you can see from the many stories of awakened beings.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 12th, 2023 at 3:43 PM

Title: Re: Non-duality and human limits

Content:

JCA said:

Your definition really describes the “middle way”

Non-duality means - No difference between subject and object.

Non-conceptuality means - transcending a discursive mind characterized by a lack of discreet thoughts and images.

At least those are the meanings as I’m using them in my OP

Astus wrote:

Those definitions describe a type of an absorbed state that is naturally limited to specific circumstances. They are not the non-duality and non-conceptuality that are required for insight and liberation in Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 12th, 2023 at 5:42 PM

Title: Refuge: 30 Years of the Dharma Gate in Hungary

Content:

Astus wrote:

A film was made about the Dharma Gate <https://www.tkbh.hu/english/dharma-gate-buddhist-church-2/> and <https://www.tkbh.hu/english/introduction/> on the occasion of its 30 years of operation in Hungary. It is not a documentary but rather a spiritually inspired introduction of the current state of this unique organisation that encompasses different religious and educational institutions.

The film is freely available on YouTube with English subtitles:
<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=fbYbFvFHBms>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 12th, 2023 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: Non-duality and human limits

Content:

JCA said:

Insight and liberation are predicated upon seeing and experiencing the true nature of reality. That nature is non-dual and non-conceptual, according to Buddhists and, more recently, many scientists.

Astus wrote:

The definitions you gave to non-duality (advaya, 不二, gnyis med) and non-conceptuality (nirvikalpa, 無分別, rnam par mi rtog pa) are not how they are understood in Buddhism. Hence the problem with seeing how awakening is possible in this life.

JCA said:

My theory is that we can only become truly enlightened after death, when we are free from the constraints of a physical body, as we know it (I understand the term body is often used for bardo states, as in subtle body).

Astus wrote:

Indeed, your theory, not what is taught in Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 3rd, 2023 at 5:26 PM

Title: Re: was thinking today

Content:

master of puppets said:

we know that when the mind is empty the wisdom and the meaning appears. as it reaches everywhere without an obstacle. Then you can become whatever you want. This is called enlightenment.

Astus wrote:

The mind is already empty, like everything else. What unique interpretation do you imply that makes wisdom and 'the meaning' (what meaning?) appear?

If one wants to become something, how is that any different from the basic drive of rebirth, i.e. thirst for being/becoming (bhavatrṣṇā / 有愛)?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 3rd, 2023 at 7:32 PM

Title: Re: was thinking today

Content:

Aemilius said:

A better and more advanced view, or series of views, is expressed in the Hua Yen, which is based on the Avatamsaka sutra.

Astus wrote:

No matter how complicated a view one can conceive, it still comes down to the same distinction between being driven by afflictions or not.

On the idea that 'afflictions are bodhi' (煩惱即菩提) the Platform Sutra (BDK edition) has this:

'Good friends, ordinary people are buddhas, and the afflictions are bodhi. With a preceding moment of deluded thought, one was an ordinary person, but with a succeeding moment of enlightened thought, one is a buddha. To be attached to one's sensory realms in a preceding moment of thought is affliction, but to transcend the realms in a succeeding moment of thought is bodhi.'

(ch 2, p 30)

'The afflictions are bodhi. They are nondual and not separate. If one [tries to] use the illumination of wisdom to destroy the afflictions, this is the interpretation of the two [Hinayana] vehicles [held by] those fit for the sheep and deer [carts]. Those of superior wisdom and Mahayana capabilities are completely different. ... If you want to understand the essentials of the mind, you should simply not think about all the [different types of] good and evil. You will then naturally attain entry into the pure essence of the mind, which is peaceful and always serene, with wondrous functions [as numerous as the] sands of the Ganges River.'

(ch 10, p 80-81)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 4th, 2023 at 4:21 AM

Title: Re: was thinking today

Content:

Aemilius said:

Are these not a form of trishna (thirst or wanting) ?

Astus wrote:

Craving/thirst is a particular form of intention that is classified into three types: thirst for sensual pleasure (kāmatrṣṇā / 欲愛), thirst for becoming (bhavatrṣṇā / 有愛), thirst for not becoming (vibhavatrṣṇā / 無有愛).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 4th, 2023 at 5:56 PM

Title: Re: was thinking today

Content:

Astus wrote:

"And how is a mendicant content? It's when a mendicant is content with robes to look after the body and almsfood to look after the belly. Wherever they go, they set out taking only these things. A Buddhist monk has three robes: a lower robe (sabong or sarong), an upper robe, and an outer cloak. They're like a bird: wherever it flies, wings are its only burden. In the same way, a mendicant is content with robes to look after the body and almsfood to look after the belly. Wherever they go, they set out taking only these things. That's how a mendicant is content."

(<https://suttacentral.net/dn2/en/sujato>)

"And how are they one who knows moderation? It's when a mendicant knows moderation when receiving robes, almsfood, lodgings, and medicines and supplies for the sick. If a mendicant did not know moderation, they would not be called 'one who knows moderation'. But because they do know moderation, they are called 'one who knows moderation'. Such is the one who knows the teachings, the one who knows the meaning, the one who has self-knowledge, and the one who knows moderation."

(<https://suttacentral.net/an7.68/en/sujato>)

"And how does a mendicant eat in moderation? It's when a mendicant reflects rationally on the food that they eat: 'Not for fun, indulgence, adornment, or decoration, but only to sustain this body, to avoid harm, and to support spiritual practice. In this way, I shall put an end to old discomfort and not give rise to new discomfort, and I will live blamelessly and at ease.' That's how a mendicant eats in moderation."

(<https://suttacentral.net/an3.16/en/sujato>)

"Eye, ear, nose,
tongue, body, and likewise mind:
a mendicant who makes these sense doors well guarded—

eating in moderation, restrained in the sense faculties—reaps happiness
both physical and mental.

Not burning in body,
not burning in mind,
by day or by night
such a person lives in happiness."

(<https://suttacentral.net/iti29/en/sujato>)

"Then Māra the Wicked went up to the Buddha and addressed him in verse:

"What, you're asleep?
Really, you're asleep?
You sleep like a loser—
what's up with that?
You sleep, thinking that the hut is empty.
You sleep when the sun has come up—
what's up with that?"

"For them there is no craving—the weaver, the clinger—
to track them anywhere.
With the ending of all attachments
the awakened Buddha sleeps.
What's that got to do with you, Māra?"

Then Māra ... vanished right there."
(<https://suttacentral.net/sn4.7/en/sujato>)

Once a Vinaya Master came and asked: "In your practice of the Tao, do you still work hard?"

The Master answered: "Yes, I still work hard."

The Vinaya Master asked: "How hard?"

The Master retorted: "If I'm hungry, I eat. If I'm tired, I sleep. "

The Vinaya Master asked: "Do all other people work hard just as you do?"

The Master answered: "No, not in the same way."

The Vinaya Master asked: "Why not?"

The Master answered: "While they are eating, they are not really eating due to too much thinking. While they are sleeping, they are not really sleeping due to too much mental agitation. Therefore, they do not work in the same way I do."

The Vinaya Master, on hearing this, fell silent.

(<https://www.ymba.org/books/entering-tao-sudden-enlightenment/tsung-ching-record>)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 22nd, 2023 at 10:54 PM

Title: Re: American Soto Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Without any definition or measurement of realisation how could the number of realised beings be asserted?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 23rd, 2023 at 4:36 AM

Title: Re: American Soto Zen

Content:

reiun said:

The "definition . . . of realization" i.e., seeing into one's true nature, is not hard to find.

Suggest pages 1 - 5, The Rinzai Zen Way, and or pages 9 - 13, Hidden Zen, both by Meido Roshi.

As for "measurement", that would be assuming it can be measured.

Astus wrote:

There, especially in the latter book, realisation - or 'kensho' - is equated with insight into no-self. As such, it should be identical to the path of seeing (darśanamārga), the first stage (bhūmi) of the bodhisattva path, about what there is plenty to find in the sutras and treatises defining the qualities such a noble being possesses. Although the two (kensho and the path of insight) might not actually be the same, since there is no falling back from the level of a noble being.

If it could not be measured, then affirming another's kensho would not be possible.

Here's one that sounds similar to what shikantaza is supposed to be from the very start (i.e. dropping body and mind):

'Eventually we will be able to enter into a truly profound samadhi and experience the "great death" in which body and mind completely drop away. Emerging from this, we may recognize our true self-less nature and for the first time know the experience of kensho for ourselves.'

(The Rinzai Zen Way, p 71)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 24th, 2023 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: American Soto Zen

Content:

Malcolm said:

Sharf has shown that the New Buddhism was distinct from traditional or classical Zen on multiple levels. He disputes the notion of a "pure experience" that can be uncoupled from its institutional and doctrinal constraints, noting that classical Zen is one of the most scholastic and ritualistic forms of Buddhist monasticism and that enlightenment in Zen is "constituted in elaborately choreographed and eminently public ritual performance."⁴² He has also questioned the legitimacy of New Buddhist proponents, pointing out that they were largely laypeople who were not trained in traditional Zen monastic settings. Nonetheless, this modernist vision of Zen was largely embraced by Western scholars and lay practitioners as an historically accurate picture of traditional Zen until recent studies such as Sharf's illuminated its specifically modernist and nationalist contextual origins.⁴³

Gleig, Ann. American Dharma . Yale University Press. Kindle Edition.

Astus wrote:

That strongly suggests the worries regarding and the emphasis on authentic awakening within Zen is a modern phenomenon, while those focusing on rituals and scholarly studies are the followers of the pre-modern tradition.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 25th, 2023 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: American Soto Zen

Content:

rejun said:

Koan collections originated in 8th-12th century China. They were used to cultivate insight and enlightenment.

Astus wrote:

There have been collections of 'old cases' or 'ancient precedents' (guze/kosoku 古則), i.e. stories of ancestral teachers, that were later commented on, thus, with the commentary, came about the 'public cases' (gongan/kouan 公案), and still later emerged the practice of 'observing the phrase' (kanhua/kanna 看話) that has eventually been established as the standard method. So, it's only in the 12th century when such collections came to be actively 'used to cultivate insight and enlightenment' and the old cases themselves were also labelled koans. It's not that the stories themselves were collected and commented on from the beginning with the intent to be a special form of practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 25th, 2023 at 4:20 AM

Title: Re: American Soto Zen

Content:

clyde said:

If a realized Zen teacher isn't able to know who is and is not realized, then who is? And how would a Zen student get confirmation?

Astus wrote:

To assess the level of one's initial attainment the Buddha has provided the 'mirror of the teaching' (e.g. <https://suttacentral.net/sn55.8/en/sujato>). The Buddha has also talked about how to test if somebody claims to be liberated (<https://suttacentral.net/mn112/en/sujato>), and also about the need to be close to another in order to be able to measure his/her qualities (<https://suttacentral.net/an4.192/en/sujato>). Another option is telepathy (cetopariyāñāṇa/paracittajñāṇa), although it's not among the recommended methods.

Ven. Sheng-yen taught:

'The most important thing in recognizing masters is to be able to judge whether they have a correct view of Buddhadharma. If their views of the Dharma are correct, then even if their behavior reveals some weaknesses, they should not be considered false masters. On the other hand, if teachers do not have a correct view of the Dharma, they cannot be considered authentic or virtuous masters.

Of course, this presupposes that the person making the judgment has some understanding of correct Dharma. Without an understanding of the Dharma, there is no way a practitioner can tell if a teacher is genuine or false.'

(<http://old.ddc.shengyen.org/cgi-bin/ccdd/show.py?s=09-06p0027>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 25th, 2023 at 5:04 AM

Title: Re: American Soto Zen

Content:

Malcolm said:

Anyone can deluded themselves into such as idea.

Astus wrote:

If one can delude oneself into trusting the Three Jewels and living ethically, that sounds like a beneficial delusion.

Malcolm said:

If one is a follower of śravakayāna. But that is only applicable to those on the path of renunciation.

Astus wrote:

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=153592#p153592> then, although points 5 and 6 are still about total renunciation.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 25th, 2023 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: American Soto Zen

Content:

Matylda said:

it is absolutely false argument, since the term kensho was not used in the XIII century.. if Dogen did not like it, then nobody like the term kensho.. you cannot find it in texts of rinzai masters like Rankei Doryu, or Shoichi and others. It is sheer imputation that Dogen did not like the term kensho since he did not use it. It is wrong logic.

Astus wrote:

He did use it.

"Seeing the mind and seeing the nature (見性) is the animated activity of non-Buddhists."

(Sansuigyo, SBGZ, vol 1, p 219, BDK Edition; https://21dzk.l.u-tokyo.ac.jp/SAT2015/T2582_.82.0063b27:0063b28.cit)

"Some fellow has said, "Old Man Śākyamuni, besides expounding the teaching and the sutras throughout his life, also authentically transmitted to Mahākāśyapa the Dharma of the one mind which is the supreme vehicle, and this transmission has passed from rightful successor to rightful successor. So the teaching is opportunistic idle discussion, but the mind is the essential true reality. This authentically transmitted one mind is called 'the separate transmission outside the teachings.' It is not to be likened to discussion of the three vehicles and the twelve divisions of the teaching. Because the one mind is the supreme vehicle, we speak of 'direct pointing into the human heart' and 'seeing the nature (見性) and becoming buddha.'" This expression is never about the everyday conduct of the Buddha-Dharma: it lacks the vigorous road of getting the body free, and it has no dignified behavior throughout the body. Fellows like this, even hundreds or thousands of years ago, were proclaiming themselves to be leading authorities; but we should know that, if they had such talk as this, they neither clarified nor penetrated the Buddha's Dharma and the Buddha's truth."

(Bukkyo, SBGZ, vol 2, p 70, BDK Edition; http://21dzk.l.u-tokyo.ac.jp/SAT2015/T2582_.82.0107a13:0107a26.cit)

"The essence of the Buddha-Dharma is never seeing the nature (見性). Where has any of the Seven Buddhas or the twenty-eight patriarchs of India said that the Buddha-Dharma is only "seeing the nature" (見性)? The Sixth Patriarch's Platform Sutra contains the words "seeing the nature," (見性) but that text is a fake text; it is not the writing of one to whom the Dharma treasury was transmitted, and it is not the words of Sōkei. It is a text upon which descendants of the Buddhist Patriarch absolutely never rely."

(Shizen-biku, SBGZ, vol 4, p 269, BDK Edition; https://21dzk.l.u-tokyo.ac.jp/SAT2015/T2582_.82.0298b23:0298b29.cit)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 27th, 2023 at 6:14 PM

Title: Re: American Soto Zen

Content:

Malcolm said:

It is interesting to learn that Dogen rejected the Platform Sutra.

Astus wrote:

Maybe in some sense, or in certain contexts, but he does quote from it (or parts that he might have found in other collections) a couple of times.

Malcolm said:

So, really, the root of the dispute is that not the Dogen rejected awakening, (obviously), he rejected a subitist term from a text he considered forged, one of the seminal texts of the entire Chan/Zen tradition. And in reading the rest of Faure's article, Dogen was critical of the Chinese founder of Rinzai as well.

Astus wrote:

The main objection Dogen (SBGZ, vol 1, p 14 & p 65; vol 2, p 5) had was against what he called the Senika/Śreṇika (先尼) heresy (based on the Nirvana Sutra account (chapter 45, scroll 39, https://21dzk.l.u-tokyo.ac.jp/SAT2015/T0374_.12.0594a14:0594a15.cit)) of taking buddha-nature as a soul and kensho as its realisation.

In the Record of Linji we can find expressions that may lead one to such a soul view. E.g.

'In the eye it is called seeing, in the ear, hearing, in the nose, sense of smell. In the mouth it talks and argues, in the hands it holds and grasps, in the feet it moves and runs.' (tr JC Cleary, in Three Chan Classics, BDK ed, p 17)

If it is accepted that Dogen's take on zazen means 'dropping body and mind', there is indeed no point in proposing separately a method and a goal. The possible objection to it can be that most people are simply incapable of putting it into practice and a gradual path is required. If so, Mahayana has plenty of methods and stages to offer, no need for any special transmission.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 27th, 2023 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: American Soto Zen

Content:

Queequeg said:

He seems to be objecting to something more fundamental - Reading those passages in context he's criticizing "realization" that still flows from a subject-object dynamic.

Astus wrote:

I guess there's no issue with calling it 'subject-object dynamic', as it's still the same old self-view situation. Still, it's not that abstract or sophisticated.

'It is the view of the non-Buddhist Senika. According to that non-Buddhist view, there is one spiritual intelligence existing within our body. When this intelligence meets conditions, it can discriminate between pleasant and unpleasant and discriminate between right and wrong, and it can know pain and irritation and know suffering and pleasure—all [these] are abilities of the spiritual intelligence. When this body dies, however, the spirit casts off the skin and is reborn on the other side; so even though it seems to die here it lives on there. Therefore we call it immortal and eternal. The view of that non-Buddhist is like this. But if we learn this view as the Buddha's Dharma, we are even more foolish than the person who grasps a tile or a pebble thinking it to be a golden treasure; the delusion would be too shameful for comparison.'

(SBGZ, vol 1, p 14)

'Many students, however, misunderstand that "mind here and now is buddha" did not exist in India but was first heard in China. As a result, they do not recognize their mistake as a mistake. Because they do not recognize the mistake as a mistake, many fall down into non-Buddhism. When stupid people hear talk of "mind here and now is buddha," they interpret that ordinary beings' intellect and sense perception, which have never established the bodhi-mind, are just buddha.' ... 'they are no different from the non-Buddhist Senika. He said, 'In our body there is a single spiritual essence. This essence can recognize pain and irritation. When the body decays the spirit departs; just as when a house is burning the master of the house departs. The house is inconstant; the master of the house is constant.' When I examine people like this, they do not know the false from the true. How can they decide what is right?'

(SBGZ, vol 1, p 65, 67)

Compare it to this passage quoted by Chinul:

'In the womb it is called a fetus. On being born it is called a person. In the eyes it is called seeing and in the ears it is called hearing. In the nose it smells, in the tongue it talks, in the hands it grasps, and in the feet it runs. When it is expanded, it contains worlds as numerous as grains of sand. When it is compressed, it exists within one minute particle of dust. Those who have recognized it know that it is the buddha-nature; those who have not call it the spirit.'

(Moguja's Secrets on Cultivating the Mind, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 2, p 209-210)

Queequeg said:

I don't know absolutely about "special transmissions," whether they are necessary or not, but I surmise, transmission from living teachers helps, assuming the transmission is the real deal - there are some things that just aren't transmitted in books.

Astus wrote:

'Special transmission outside the teachings' (教外別傳) is a slogan used to distinguish the Zen school from everyone else.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 27th, 2023 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: American Soto Zen

Content:

Malcolm said:

Um, Astus, he straight up calls it a forgery, along with the Sūtra of Perfect Enlightenment, and another text. I checked the BDK translation against the Shambhala edition.

Astus wrote:

Nevertheless he quotes from the Platform Sutra and presents those as authentic teachings of Huineng.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 28th, 2023 at 3:17 PM

Title: Re: It's no small thing

Content:

KeithA said:

There is story that I don't remember the details of, that has a master lamenting the fact the even though he is very famous, even he has to take piss for himself. No one can do it for him.

Astus wrote:

Maybe case 315 in the Record of Zhaozhou

(<https://www.anhsiangchan1983.tw/%E5%B0%8E%E5%B8%AB%E8%AC%9B%E8%A9>

%9E/%E8%B6%99%E5%B7%9E%E7%A6%AA%E5%B8%AB%E8%AA%9E%E9%8C%84.
htm; https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/X68n1315_p0085a05);

A monk asked, "I ask you to say something about that which is immediately at hand."
The master said, "Pissing is an easy matter, I can do it by myself."
(The Recorded Sayings of Zen Master Joshu, p 103, tr James Green)

Someone asked, "Being on the verge, that point of absolute immediacy - what is that like?"
Joshu said, "Pissing is a small thing to do, but I have to do it myself."
(Radical Zen: The Sayings of Joshu, case 280, tr Yoel Hoffmann)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 28th, 2023 at 8:32 PM

Title: Re: American Soto Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

It seems the one essential question is: is shikantaza a valid teaching?

'Remember, among Buddhists we do not argue about superiority and inferiority of philosophies, or choose between shallowness and profundity in the Dharma; we need only know whether the practice is genuine or artificial.'
(SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 1, p 9)

Is it true that shikantaza is the realisation of suchness, is dropping off body and mind, is being buddha?

Rujing said, "Sanzen is dropping off body and mind. We don't use incense burning, making prostrations, nembutsu, the practice of repentance, or reading sutras. We only engage in just sitting."

Dōgen asked, "What is dropping off body and mind?"

Rujing said, "Dropping off body and mind is zazen. When we just practice zazen, we part from the five desires and remove the five coverings."

(quoted from Hōkyōki in Realizing Genjokoan, p 81-82)

'Zen Master Dogen says that the zazen of the Buddha-ancestors is Buddha's practice. It is a very simple and plain practice of just continuing to sit, letting go of our views. Such zazen embodies the "situation of Buddha's house" in which the essence (foundation/enlightenment), expounding (explaining the Dharma) and practice are one and the same. Therefore, there is no need to seek the Buddha outside zazen. Zazen is not a practice that produces a Buddha-ancestor but an action causing the Buddha-ancestors to live as Buddha-ancestors.'

(https://www.sotozen.com/eng/library/key_terms/pdf/key_terms01.pdf)

'The thing itself is emptiness, but because you add something to it, you spoil the actual reality. So if we don't spoil things, that is to empty things. When you sit in shikantaza, don't be disturbed by sounds, don't operate your thinking mind. This means not to rely on any sense organ or the thinking mind and just receive the letter from the world of emptiness. That is shikantaza.'

(<https://www.lionsroar.com/letters-from-emptiness/>, from Not Always So, p 37-38)

'When we sit in zazen, we are immediately buddha. We go directly into buddhahood.'
(Master Dōgen's Zazen Meditation Handbook, p 168)

If shikantaza is not what they claim it to be, then of course it is not a genuine practice, and by Dogen's own standard one should avoid it. But if it is as they say, where is the fault?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 29th, 2023 at 7:13 PM

Title: Re: American Soto Zen

Content:

Matylda said:

But Japanese Shumicho the administrative body over all Soto schools on all continents, is supervising the activity of its priests, whether Japanese or non-Japanese. They even give some financial support to those outside of Japan. So there is somehow institutional continuity in the sense of administration and regulations.

Astus wrote:

Only a mere fraction of overseas communities are affiliates of the Japanese church. Most of them operate completely independently, hence the many differences.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 30th, 2023 at 2:24 PM

Title: Re: American Soto Zen

Content:

Clyde said:

If you are correct about Soto Zen, then lineage is no guarantee of realization and if Malcolm is correct that "ordinary people" (like me) cannot infer or sense if someone is realized - then we are all lost.

Astus wrote:

Lineage is no guarantee, after all, every single Buddhist is theoretically a descendent of the Buddha. From the beginning the idea of a special lineage has been used in Zen to separate one group from another and claim authenticity for one's own.

What one can do is to rely on the scriptures and see if a teacher is in agreement with them. That is taking the Dharma and the Vinaya as the guide. And there is the other aspect of using the four establishments of mindfulness for experiential verification. Those two sides have been the advice of the Buddha for the future. They can be applied to Soto as well, for instance by studying the works of Dogen and practising zazen.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 30th, 2023 at 6:29 PM

Title: Re: American Soto Zen

Content:

Matylda said:

There is no guarantee that will find proper person.

Astus wrote:

The question is if one who is accepted as a realised teacher can confirm a disciple who is not realised? If yes, then lineage is meaningless. If no, then all within a lineage must be accepted in the same way as the original teacher.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 31st, 2023 at 3:48 AM

Title: Re: Attaining rigpa and which bhumi

Content:

Astus wrote:

According to Shechen Gyaltsap it matches the path of joining.

'Now, when the nature of awareness is unmistakably recognized through the paths of Mahāmudrā and the Great Perfection, many holy beings of the Mahāmudrā tradition and others believe that since awareness is experienced directly, this constitutes authentic ultimate luminosity. On the other hand, the omniscient Longchenpa and others say that in the true actualization of ultimate luminosity, twelve sets of one hundred excellent qualities, among other things, must be present. Consequently, even though the awareness just referred to is experienced directly, Longchenpa and others identify it as the example luminosity.

...

'For practitioners on the path of accumulation, there is understanding; for those on the path of joining, there is experience; and for those on the path of seeing, there is realization. This has been affirmed by the great and noble beings who have well perceived the truth of the dharmatā, and it should be understood as a profound key point. Beginners, who are on the path of accumulation, rely on their teachers and listen to their instructions. Through an understanding that derives from study and reflection, they rid themselves of misconceptions regarding the fundamental nature of things—namely, the union [of appearance and emptiness]. When, on this basis, they recognize that the mind is unborn and have a decisive experience of this, the example luminosity arises in their mind stream. And since, thanks to the example luminosity, they will be directly joined to the ultimate luminosity, this stage is called the “path of joining.” The occurrence or otherwise of the example luminosity is the criterion that determines whether one is on the path of joining or not. The moment when the example luminosity develops and transforms into ultimate luminosity is the point when the truth of ultimate reality, the dharmatā, is realized, and this is the path of seeing. From that moment onward, to grow used to what has been realized constitutes the path of meditation. And when this has been completed, the path of no more learning is attained.'

(Practicing the Great Perfection: Instructions on the Crucial Points by Shechen Gyaltsap Gyurme Pema Namgyal, p 22-23)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 31st, 2023 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: American Soto Zen

Content:

Matylda said:

This is first of all a question of affinity. Actually disciple should meet the requirements of particular teacher/lineage/school. Soto school does not make requirements concerning realization, as far as I know.

Astus wrote:

The idea of dharma transmission in Zen, Soto included, is the recognition of the disciple's awakening being the same as that of Shakyamuni Buddha, as exemplified by the so called Flower Sermon.

'In the Zen tradition, the transmission of the formless, ineffable buddha mind (busshin 佛心) down through the lineage of ancestral teachers (soshi 祖師) is referred to metaphorically as "transmission of the flame" (dentō 傳燈).'

(definition of 'dharma lamp (hōtō 法燈)' in the <https://www.sotozen.com/eng/library/glossary/index.html#!section-d>)

Matylda said:

For example SZBA as I see requires for the membership just how many years one has to practice , how many sesshins etc.

Astus wrote:

The first requirement is: 'Ordination and dharma transmission in a recognized Soto Zen lineage'.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 31st, 2023 at 4:14 AM

Title: Re: Attaining rigpa and which bhumi

Content:

Malcolm said:

In trekcho, there is no corresponding map to the paths and stages of lower yānas.

Astus wrote:

Is it problematic to connect trekcho to Mahamudra where such correspondence is well known? Although there the example wisdom is the third empowerment, while the fourth is the actual (e.g. Treasury of Knowledge, vol 6, p 231). Are there different views on that too?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 31st, 2023 at 4:47 AM

Title: Re: American Soto Zen

Content:

Malcolm said:

And if this is the case, then what to we do with so-called Buddhas who get permanently kicked out of the SZBA? Or other teachers, who have received inka, and are consistently involved in scandals decade after decade?

Astus wrote:

It is one of those systemic contradictions mostly left untouched.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 31st, 2023 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: American Soto Zen

Content:

Matylda said:

But his does not exist for long time already. Today the meaning is that one becomes a priest and is allowed to preform certain rituals. Nothing else.

Astus wrote:

How could it not exist today when the definition is still very much in use? Here's another one:

Buddha-mind (busshin 佛心) is the awakening (bodai 菩提, S. bodhi) that turns ordinary beings into buddhas. The Zen lineage is said to transmit Shakamuni's buddha-mind from master to disciple "without relying on scriptures" (furyū monji 不立文字). That wordless "mind to mind transmission" (ishin denshin 以心傳心) is likened to the kind of non-verbal communication that takes place when a carved seal (in 印), used in East Asia as a legally binding signature, is inked and pressed on a piece of paper. The awakened mind of the master presses directly, as it were, on the mind of the disciple, thereby replicating itself. A disciple whose understanding of the dharma is formally approved and documented by a master is also said to have received a "seal of approval" (inka 印可).

(seal of the buddha-mind (busshin in 佛心印) in https://www.sotozen.com/eng/library/glossary/individual.html?key=seal_of_the_buddha_mind)

This is said to be in Sotoshu Regulations, Article 21:

“Dharma transmission” is defined as experiencing face-to-face transmission between master and disciple, receiving the Three Things, and realizing preservation of the Dharma Lamp.'

(https://www.sotozen.com/eng/library/key_terms/pdf/key_terms20.pdf in https://www.sotozen.com/eng/library/key_terms/index.html)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 31st, 2023 at 2:07 PM

Title: Re: American Soto Zen

Content:

Matylda said:

The definition does not mean anything. ... It is not inka, which is meant to be a confirmation of thorough realization. ...

The whole discussion would have never taken place if dharma transmission had been as you suggested.

Astus wrote:

On paper, by definition, dharma transmission means the transmission of buddha-mind, the awakening of Shakyamuni and all the ancestors. That in practice it is not so, shows that it is a misconception to look at lineage as a sufficient source of verification of someone as a Zen teacher. The same applies even if it is called inka, because, on paper, there is no difference. However, without lineage there is no Zen either.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 31st, 2023 at 7:18 PM

Title: Re: American Soto Zen

Content:

Matylda said:

Inka is completely different issue.

Astus wrote:

It is also based on the idea that the buddha-mind is transmitted from one generation to another, is it not?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 1st, 2023 at 7:16 PM

Title: Re: Doctrinal Perspective on Prayer

Content:

Astus wrote:

Prayers and wishes are of no help in liberation:

"Suppose there was a chicken with eight or ten or twelve eggs. But she had not properly sat on them to keep them warm and incubated. That chicken might wish: 'If only my chicks could break out of the eggshell with their claws and beak and hatch safely!' But they can't break out and hatch safely. Why is that? Because that chicken with eight or ten or twelve eggs has not properly sat on them to keep them warm and incubated. In the same way, when a mendicant is not committed to development, they might wish:

‘If only my mind was freed from the defilements by not grasping!’ Even so, their mind is not freed from defilements by not grasping. Why is that? You should say: ‘It’s because they’re undeveloped.’ Undeveloped in what? Undeveloped in the four kinds of mindfulness meditation, the four right efforts, the four bases of psychic power, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven awakening factors, and the noble eightfold path.”
(<https://suttacentral.net/sn22.101/en/sujato>)

Just as they are useless for worldly gains:

"Long life, beauty, happiness, fame, and heaven. These are the five things that are likable, desirable, and agreeable, but hard to get in the world. And I say that these five things are not got by praying or wishing for them. If they were, who would lack them?"
(<https://suttacentral.net/an5.43/en/sujato>)

Or for helping the deceased:

“Chief, suppose a person were to throw a broad rock into a deep lake. And a large crowd was to come together to offer up prayers and praise, circumambulating it with joined palms, and saying: ‘Rise, good rock! Float, good rock! Float to shore, good rock!’ What do you think, chief? Would that broad rock rise up or float because of their prayers?”

“No, sir.”

“In the same way, take a person who kills living creatures, steals, and commits sexual misconduct. They use speech that’s false, divisive, harsh, or nonsensical. And they’re covetous, malicious, and have wrong view. Even though a large crowd comes together to offer up prayers and praise ... when their body breaks up, after death, they’re reborn in a place of loss, a bad place, the underworld, hell.”

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn42.6/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 2nd, 2023 at 3:34 AM

Title: Re: schools besides Jonang which hold the Emptiness-of-other view

Content:

npr said:

There is no Zen sect that hold this position?

Astus wrote:

Zen does not proclaim a particular doctrinal position. It's in its 'credo' not to: special transmission outside the teachings, not relying on words and letters (jiaowai biechuan, buli wenzi 教外別傳、不立文字).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 2nd, 2023 at 9:26 PM

Title: Re: Doctrinal Perspective on Prayer

Content:

ThreeVows said:

Generally speaking, what you shared here relates to simply wishing for something without being willing to basically change or do anything at all, just a sort of passive prayer. That is not necessarily all that 'prayer' is, though it might be semantic.

Astus wrote:

If prayer on its own does not help, but one still has to make it happen, then what's the efficacy of praying? One can have dinner as long as one prepares it, no point in praying for it. That's what the simile of the hen and the eggs explain.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 2nd, 2023 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: Doctrinal Perspective on Prayer

Content:

ThreeVows said:

Do you think that requesting a realized guru for teachings helps?

Astus wrote:

Only if the guru hears you, answers the request, you can then comprehend the answer, and make good use of it.

ThreeVows said:

How is it any different to pray to, say, Avalokiteshvara that Avalokiteshvara helps you to develop along the path? Do you think that Avalokiteshvara has the capacity to subtly have an impact in your life?

Astus wrote:

Chapter 24 of the Lotus Sutra lists a couple of miracles he can make if one calls on him. Some of those are easy to test. Let me know if they actually worked.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 2nd, 2023 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: Doctrinal Perspective on Prayer

Content:

ThreeVows said:

Moggallana, however, works sort of peripherally, using various siddhis to mature the seeker.

Astus wrote:

Buddhas and bodhisattvas are innumerable with boundless powers, so what more peripheral influence can there be? Still, we all are where we are.

Devotion as a method is not the same as the idea that prayers are effective.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 3rd, 2023 at 7:06 PM

Title: Re: Doctrinal Perspective on Prayer

Content:

muni said:

Devotion frees us from our experience of ego, what keeps us in samsara.

Astus wrote:

If one is devoted, one follows the instructions. If devotion only consisted of a feeling of love but not followed by actual practice, then how could it make any difference? It would be like saying that one loves one's child but not caring for that child. At the same time, as long as one cultivates correctly, then the results occur. So devotion can be used as motivation, but it's not real devotion/motivation without actively being devoted/motivated. Similarly, one can pray as much as one likes, but it does not spare one from actually doing the work oneself.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 5th, 2023 at 2:31 PM

Title: Re: Have I attained Sotapatti?

Content:

Astus wrote:

What to do with verification, what desire or anxiety does that serve?

“Subhūti, what do you think? Does a practitioner who has attained the level of srota-āpanna think: ‘I have attained the realization of the srota-āpanna?’”

Subhūti said, “No, World-honored One. And why not? Because the name srota-āpanna means ‘stream-enterer,’ and there is in fact no stream to be entered. One does not enter form, sound, odor, taste, touch, or concepts. Therefore one is called a srota-āpanna.”

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html#div-10)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 5th, 2023 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: How Do You Know?

Content:

Astus wrote:

“There is a method—apart from faith, preference, oral tradition, reasoned contemplation, or acceptance of a view after consideration—that a mendicant can rely on to declare their enlightenment. That is: ‘I understand: “Rebirth is ended, the spiritual journey has been completed, what had to be done has been done, there is no return to any state of existence.”’

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn35.153/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 13th, 2023 at 1:57 AM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

Tolya M said:

What do they say nibbana is? It is total extinction of consciousness!

Astus wrote:

Nibbana is the extinction of greed, hate, and delusion. This is so in both Theravada and Mahayana. Consciousness is momentary in both, so it ceases every moment anyway.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 13th, 2023 at 4:06 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

Tolya M said:

I have a version of why they twisted the question so much.

Astus wrote:

Who are they? Could you specify whose view is that nibbana is cessation of consciousness, preferably with direct quotes?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 14th, 2023 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

DNS said:

Many Theravada teachers advocate that it is complete cessation, even of consciousness, but argue that it is not annihilation since there was no being, no soul to begin with.

Astus wrote:

Nibbana is attained while alive. Neither the body, nor the mind suddenly disappears with nibbana, otherwise there would have been no living arahants and buddhas. It is the consequence of the end of craving that there is no more birth.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 14th, 2023 at 2:10 AM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

DNS said:

It is the latter that they refer to as complete cessation.

Astus wrote:

So it is, as there is no more birth. How is the end of the cycle of birth and death a problematic view in Buddhism?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 14th, 2023 at 3:44 AM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

DNS said:

See the OP, apparently it is for some or perhaps many Buddhists.

Astus wrote:

That is based on an incorrect assumption, that nibbana means the cessation of consciousness. If that were so, then non-percipient gods (asaññasattā) and the attainment of cessation (nirodhasamāpatti) would both equal extinction.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 14th, 2023 at 2:43 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Any assumption of complete cessation of consciousness can be nothing other than pure speculation

Astus wrote:

Consciousness ceases completely every moment. How is that a speculation?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 15th, 2023 at 2:55 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

It doesn't start and stop like separate frames in movie film.

Each instant of awareness creates the conditions for a subsequent instance to arise.

But it's like a river flowing, each wave propelling the next.

You can't isolate any point in a river and say "this is where it starts and this is where it stops".

Astus wrote:

Not every instance of consciousness is caused by a previous instance. One may dwell on a train of thought for a little while, in which case it is acceptable to say that from one thought came another. But then if either a different thought, or a different sense impression catches one's attention, then it is not the continuation of the previous train of thought. When one series of thoughts have ceased, it does not continue to exist in the next moment, nor does it cause it. Even more obvious if one sees various sights or hears various sounds, then consciousness of one sight or one sound is not the cause of the next instance of consciousness.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 15th, 2023 at 3:10 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

Tolya M said:

How does it arise in this case from complete nothing? Nothing comes from nothing. It is impossible.

Astus wrote:

The six types of consciousness arises dependent on the six types of sense areas. Just as the sense areas, so is consciousness impermanent. One smells the smell of tea, thus there is olfactory consciousness, and that instance of consciousness is gone just as one either engages in some thoughts about tea or focuses on another sense impression.

'consciousness is dependently originated, since without a cause, consciousness does not come to be ... Consciousness is reckoned according to the specific conditions dependent upon which it arises. ... It's like fire, which is reckoned according to the specific conditions dependent upon which it burns.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn38/en/sujato>)

"'The six classes of consciousness should be understood.' That's what I said, but why did I say it? Eye consciousness arises dependent on the eye and sights. Ear consciousness arises dependent on the ear and sounds. Nose consciousness arises dependent on the nose and smells. Tongue consciousness arises dependent on the tongue and tastes. Body consciousness arises dependent on the body and touches. Mind consciousness arises dependent on the mind and thoughts. 'The six classes of consciousness should be understood.' That's what I said, and this is why I said it."

<https://suttacentral.net/mn148/en/sujato>

'And what, mendicants, is the origin of suffering? Eye consciousness arises dependent on the eye and sights. The meeting of the three is contact. Contact is a condition for feeling. Feeling is a condition for craving. This is the origin of suffering. ... And what is the ending of suffering? Eye consciousness arises dependent on the eye and sights. The meeting of the three is contact. Contact is a condition for feeling. Feeling is a condition for craving. When that craving fades away and ceases with nothing left over, grasping ceases. When grasping ceases, continued existence ceases. When continued existence ceases, rebirth ceases. When rebirth ceases, old age and death, sorrow, lamentation, pain, sadness, and distress cease. That is how this entire mass of suffering ceases. This is the ending of suffering.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn12.43/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 15th, 2023 at 5:56 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

That's merely a shift in the object of awareness.

That isn't the same at all as consciousness (awareness) stopping and starting again.

Astus wrote:

Consciousness/awareness is defined by and dependent on its object. If the object changes, it is necessarily a different instance of consciousness.

PadmaVonSamba said:

then how do you know you can't see?

Astus wrote:

That is mental consciousness, not visual consciousness.

PadmaVonSamba said:

This requires the establishing of indivisible starting and ending points for each separate instance

Astus wrote:

It does not, unless one is aiming for establishing an ultimately existing substance. But there is no trouble in defining how within a certain period of time one has been thinking of one thing, and then later of another, or that one saw someone walking by at 11:54.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 16th, 2023 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

cdpatton said:

So, yeah, early Buddhists ended up sounding nihilistic because they were all about ceasing rebirth. But when they were being specific about what they meant by Nirvāṇa, they refused to take the view that it was a kind of existence or non-existence. It is strange and sounds disingenuous, but I think it was actually a kind of mysticism. Other religions had heavens and such that they described in concrete ways, but Buddhists refused to describe where liberated people "go." And this refusal to define Nirvāṇa eventually led to Madhyamaka philosophy (IMO), which refuted the reality of dualistic categories altogether.

Astus wrote:

The matter of an arahant's (the Tathagata's) existence after death is discussed quite extensively. As I take it, it is not mystical.

'Any form ... feeling ... perception ... choices ... consciousness by which a Realized One might be described has been cut off at the root, made like a palm stump, obliterated, and unable to arise in the future. A Realized One is freed from reckoning in terms of consciousness. They're deep, immeasurable, and hard to fathom, like the ocean. To say that after death, a Realized One still exists, or no longer exists, or both still exists and no longer exists, or neither still exists nor no longer exists: none of these apply.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn44.1/en/sujato>; same explanation in SN 22.85-86)

'Those who crudely think:
"The Tathagata does exist,"
Will think, regarding his nirvana,
"He does not exist."
(MMK 22.13, tr Padmakara)

'Mendicant, it's due to the cessation of views that a learned noble disciple has no doubts regarding the undeclared points. 'A Realized One still exists after death': this is a misconception. 'A Realized One no longer exists after death': this is a misconception. 'A Realized One both still exists and no longer exists after death': this is a misconception. 'A Realized One neither still exists nor no longer exists after death': this is a misconception. An unlearned ordinary person doesn't understand views, their origin, their cessation, or the practice that leads to their cessation. And so their views grow. They're not freed from rebirth, old age, and death, from sorrow, lamentation, pain, sadness, and distress. They're not freed from suffering, I say.'
(<https://suttacentral.net/an7.54/en/sujato>, same point made in MN 72)

It is a matter of understanding the four noble truths, dependent origination, and eliminating identity view (see MN 2). In other words, as long as one grasps at the six senses, there is the concept of a being, and one thinks in terms of continuity or discontinuity, in terms of existence or non-existence (SN 44.7, AN 4.173-174).

"I am not, I will not be.
I have not, I will not have,"
That frightens all the childish
And extinguishes fear in the wise.
...
Having seen thus the aggregates as untrue,
The conception of I is abandoned,
And due to abandoning the conception of I
The aggregates arise no more.'
(Ratnavali v 26, 30; tr Hopkins)

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, August 22nd, 2023 at 3:47 AM
Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias
Content:
PadmaVonSamba said:
I just asked my Thai monk friend today.
He said that after nibbana,
there is still awareness,

but no memory.

Astus wrote:

Awareness of what? It should be kept in mind that all forms of consciousness is compounded, it can exist only with name and form

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn12.67/en/sujato>), with the other aggregates

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn22.53/en/sujato>), as a result of a sense organ and a sense object (Dutiyadvayasutta).

Here are two answers from renowned Theravada teachers:

"In nibbāna there are no such things as mind or mental concomitants, which can be met with in the sense-sphere or form-sphere. It naturally follows that mind and matter that belong to the thirty-one planes of existence are totally absent in nibbāna. However, some would like to propose that after the parinibbāna of the Buddha and the Arahants, they acquire a special kind of mind and matter in nibbāna. Such an extraordinary way of thinking may appeal to those who cannot do away with self or ego.

With regard to this proposition a learned Sayādaw reasoned that if there is a special kind of mind and matter in nibbāna, there must also be a special kind of rebirth which gives rise to a special kind of old age, disease, and death, which in turn bring about a special kind of sorrow, lamentation, suffering, distress, and despair. When the teachings explicitly say cessation, it will be improper to go beyond it and formulate an idea of a special kind of existence. Extinction points to nothing other than Nothingness. Nibbāna, which is not involved in mind and matter, cannot be made to get involved either in this world or in other worlds."

(Absence of Mind and Matter in Nibbāna, in <http://aimwell.org/natureofnibbana.html> by Mahāsi Sayādaw)

"An inevitable question that arises in the discussion of Nibbāna is: 'What happens to an arahant after death?' or: 'Does a person who has realized Nibbāna exist after death or not?' In truth, this question is centred around self-view: the devotion to self is acting as a catalyst in posing the question. This attachment to self or to the label of self (attavādupādāna) – a doctrine of self – is firmly embedded in the hearts of unenlightened people, supported by the thirst for being (bhava-taṇhā) and based on ignorance (avijjā). The Buddha did not encourage debating this question if one has not eliminated ignorance and craving. He encouraged knowledge through application rather than conjecture.

No matter how one responds to these inquiries, the latent root attachment to self will inevitably lead to a biased understanding. The questioner will incline towards a wrong view of Nibbāna as either an enduring self or an eradication of self. It is easy for annihilationists to view Nibbāna as extinction, because Buddhism emphasizes disentangling from the widespread belief in eternalism. As for eternalists, when their idea of self is invalidated, they search for a substitute to compensate for the sense of void or to restore the idea of a stable self. When they encounter a teaching that advocates uprooting the fixed belief in self, it can seem to them that the self vanishes. They may then seize Nibbāna as a haven for the self or equate Nibbāna as eternal life or the Promised Land.

Many esteemed and wise individuals who are free from almost all forms of attachment get caught up in these views. The escape from this net leads to complete liberation." (<https://buddhadhamma.github.io/nibbana-supreme-peace.html#what-happens-after-an-arahants-death> in <https://buddhadhamma.github.io/> by Bhikkhu P. A. Payutto)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 22nd, 2023 at 4:55 AM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Just luminous awareness.

awareness of whatever might fly by.

It's like we a mirror is just always reflecting.

Astus wrote:

If you meant after nibbana while still alive, then the five aggregates are still operational, and indeed it consciousness can then be called luminous in the sense of being free from defilements. If you meant after death, then it is problematic.

PadmaVonSamba said:

that refers to consciousness arising in samsara

Astus wrote:

Consciousness is still conditioned regardless of attaining nibbana.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 23rd, 2023 at 4:25 AM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

When ignorance has been overcome, the luminous awareness which has always been there remains.

Astus wrote:

An eternal awareness, is it same or different from the aggregates? If it's the same, it is necessarily conditioned and impermanent. If it's different, then it lacks the attributes of the aggregates, such as feeling and perception, so it cannot actually be called an awareness as it's not aware of anything.

Then the Buddha, picking up a little bit of dirt under his fingernail, addressed that mendicant: ...

"There's not even this much of any consciousness that's permanent, everlasting, eternal, imperishable, and will last forever and ever. If there were, this living of the spiritual life for the complete ending of suffering would not be found. But since there isn't, this living of the spiritual life for the complete ending of suffering is found."

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn22.97/en/sujato>)

“Mendicants, it would make sense to be possessive about something that’s permanent, everlasting, eternal, imperishable, and will last forever and ever. But do you see any such possession?”

“No, sir.”

“Good, mendicants! I also can’t see any such possession.”

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn22/en/sujato>)

'There is not anywhere anything
That ever exists without depending.
Thus never is there anywhere
Anything that is permanent.
There is no functional thing without a cause,
Nor anything permanent which has a cause.
Thus the one who knows suchness said what has
Come about causelessly does not exist.'
(Catuhsataka 9.202-203, tr Ruth Sonam)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 23rd, 2023 at 5:13 AM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

ThreeVows said:

Just one thought, that time arises within the nature of mind, not the other way around.
As such, the discussion about 'eternal' is somewhat tricky.

Astus wrote:

Rather, time arises as a concept, an idea, and as such it is a mental phenomenon, so it is "within" the mind, so to speak, although it is a somewhat misleading metaphor, as there is no mind apart from mental factors, nor is it a box to contain things. Then, when it comes to the nature of mind, that means what mind is like, what its nature is, but it's quite a strange idea that there can be something inside what the mind is like. That would be like saying that the toy is inside the cubicity of a box.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 23rd, 2023 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

A Buddha’s awareness is beyond the duality of permanent/impermanent.
Referring to the aggregates is about what creates the experience of a “me” happening.
They arise within awareness. They aren’t the cause of awareness.
Awareness isn’t a “thing”. It’s what “things” happen in. It’s like 3D space.

Simply put, it's impossible to assert the cessation of awareness, even for a Buddha, because there would still be awareness of that cessation.

Astus wrote:

If the Buddha had been unaware of the ideas of permanent and impermanent, he could not have been able to conceive and teach about them.

The aggregates mean the physical and mental experiences. To say that they create the misconception of a self is to say that even a buddha - who clearly has a body and a mind - is mistaken and believes in a self.

Awareness is the act of being aware of something, and as such it arises dependent on its object. It is what the aggregate of consciousness is.

Space is simply a conceptual fabrication, and so is an eternal awareness, i.e. a self.

Since an unconditioned awareness is a mere expression, there is nothing to cease but the mistake of believing it to be real.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 23rd, 2023 at 5:28 AM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

ThreeVows said:

In a dream, hypothetically one might be able to experience a billion years within the span of a single second, 'from the outside'. The experience of time - not just as a concept, but as a phenomenon - arises 'within' the dream.

Astus wrote:

What is the phenomenal quality, its defining attribute, that you call the experience of time? Is it something seen or heard? Or is it rather a mental fabrication that conceives whether something has lasted for long or short, and what can be further complicated by specific measurements, like hours and years? If it's the latter, then it is very much conceptual.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 23rd, 2023 at 4:16 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Awareness with imputed duality is samsara.

Awareness without duality is bodhi.

Astus wrote:

That does not render awareness unconditioned in either case, rather it shows its conditioned nature. It arises and ceases with its conditions, like anything else.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 23rd, 2023 at 4:21 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

ThreeVows said:

I mean, I have no problem with that as long as you then acknowledge that literally everything is conceptual. Including the experience for instance of being punched in the nose and breaking your nose, bleeding all over the floor, etc. For instance.

Astus wrote:

The point is that there can be no separate 'nature of mind' identified apart from phenomena.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 24th, 2023 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

...in samsara.

Astus wrote:

Mind is a phenomenon. To say that one can find the nature of mind outside mind is like saying one can identify redness apart from colours.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 24th, 2023 at 5:11 AM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

If mind is a phenomenon...

...how are you not saying that nirvana is complete annihilation of awareness?

Astus wrote:

Nirvana means the ending of defilements, not the ending of the aggregates. Without defilements, there is no cause for birth, hence the Buddha's exclamation: 'My freedom is unshakable; this is my last rebirth; now there are no more future lives.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn26/en/sujato>, etc.)

PadmaVonSamba said:

...how is your view essentially any different from the materialist view that awareness is a product of matter?

Astus wrote:

The six types of consciousness arise based on the six sense bases and sense objects, as <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=673850#p673850>. It is not how materialists imagine it.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Mind is aware of phenomena.

Phenomena are all objects of awareness.

Astus wrote:

Even if you want to categorise like that, mind arises dependent on phenomena, and ceases dependent on the cessation of its object. So the Buddha has stated: 'For in many ways I have told you that consciousness is dependently originated, since without a cause, consciousness does not come to be.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn38/en/sujato>).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 24th, 2023 at 3:00 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Again, the context: the buddha is talking about skandhas, which refers to beings in samsara.

Astus wrote:

Skandhas mean simply body and mind. Whether one assumes them to be a self/being, or a self as their owner, or a self inside them, or outside of them (i.e. the 20 types of self-view), that's what binds one and generates suffering.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Anyway, the monk said that after 'nibbana' there is awareness. If there's no disagreement about that, then that's that.

Astus wrote:

There is no unconditioned awareness, awareness is simply a function of the skandhas.

Since there is no birth once one has attained complete liberation, it is baseless to assume any form of awareness to remain. See also the explanations

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=673850#p673850> by authoritative

Theravada teachers https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Mahasi_Sayadaw and https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/P._A._Payutto.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 24th, 2023 at 3:24 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

SvatahSiddha said:

The realization of buddhahood (nibbana) is a cessation of the world; it reveals the unborn awareness shining underneath, free of any separation.

Astus wrote:

Unborn awareness is a Mahayana expression that means that awareness is empty. It is no different from the basic teaching that the aggregates are no-self. It does not mean a hidden soul to be discovered, as that would be just common self-view and mistaking the aggregate of consciousness to be something permanent.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 24th, 2023 at 7:13 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

SvatahSiddha said:

Awareness is empty of any independent causation or origination; this is seen because the aggregates have no self (they go away completely in the realization and thus have never been truly established)..

Astus wrote:

Awareness, like anything else, is empty of an independent self/essence/substance/nature (i.e. svabhāva), and it is causally and dependently produced by conditions.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 24th, 2023 at 8:18 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

So, you are saying total annihilation then?

Astus wrote:

There is annihilation (uccheda) and there is cessation (nirodha). Annihilation usually means the extreme view of the ending of a being/self at the time of death. Cessation usually stands for the cessation of suffering, as in the third noble truth.

“There is, brahmin, a sense in which you could rightly say that I’m a teacher of annihilationism. For I teach the annihilation of greed, hate, and delusion, and the many kinds of unskillful things. In this sense you could rightly say that I’m a teacher of annihilationism. But that’s not what you’re talking about.”

(<https://suttacentral.net/an8.11/en/sujato>)

As for the matter of what happens to the Buddha after death, whether he exists or does not, that is a question based on the incorrect view of self, as noted before

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=673470#p673470> and

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=673850#p673850>.

PadmaVonSamba said:

No pure realms, none of that?

Astus wrote:

There are heavens, among them those that are called the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Pure_Abodes as the highest places in the realm of form, where non-returners are born.

PadmaVonSamba said:

My understanding is that the skandhas are the basis of self-grasping, not of awareness itself.

Astus wrote:

Indeed, the aggregates are all that can be grasped as self, but grasping and the aggregates are not the same, 'the desire and greed for them is the grasping there.' (<https://suttacentral.net/mn109/en/sujato>), and the whole point is not to grasp, because 'When you grasp, mendicant, you're bound by Māra. Not grasping, you're free from the Wicked One.' (<https://suttacentral.net/sn22.63/en/sujato>). So there is the distinction between the five aggregates and the five grasping aggregates (<https://suttacentral.net/sn22.48/en/sujato>).

PadmaVonSamba said:

How can there be skandhas without their first being awareness?

Astus wrote:

Awareness is the aggregate of consciousness.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Without a stream of awareness as a foundation, it is also baseless to assume any cause for rebirth. As the materials say, you die, and that's it. Poof.

Astus wrote:

Birth is not caused by a stream of awareness but by craving. The view that awareness is a constant has been most clearly and strongly rejected by the Buddha, e.g. <https://suttacentral.net/mn38/en/sujato>, <https://suttacentral.net/sn12.61/en/sujato>.

PadmaVonSamba said:

So then, no such thing as tathagatagarbha.

Astus wrote:

Tathagatagarbha is the potential for attaining buddhahood. Like by having legs there is a potential for running a marathon. But 'potential' is not concrete thing, simply an imagined future event.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Zen is wrong about 'unborn mind'.

Astus wrote:

The mind is unborn, just like all appearances are unborn. It is another way to say that mind is dependently arisen, therefore empty.

PadmaVonSamba said:

There is no Pure Land of Amitabha.

Astus wrote:

It is still a temporary place where one can work on attaining buddhahood.

PadmaVonSamba said:

What is aware of this conditionally dependent production?

Astus wrote:

Comprehending dependent production is a complex mental process, similarly to how comprehending a series of lines and dots as words and sentences is a complex mental process. Not taking into account that complexity and simply assuming a constant subject behind objects is a superficial approach that generates the false impression of there being a self.

PadmaVonSamba said:

What comes into contact with these conditions?

Astus wrote:

Conditions interact with conditions. Awareness of conditions is itself a conditional product and factor.

“What is the cause, Master Gotama, what is the reason why these various misconceptions arise in the world? That is: the cosmos is eternal, or not eternal, or finite, or infinite; the soul and the body are the same thing, or they are different things; after death, a Realized One still exists, or no longer exists, or both still exists and no longer exists, or neither still exists nor no longer exists.”

“Vaccha, it is because of not knowing consciousness, its origin, its cessation, and the practice that leads to its cessation that these various misconceptions arise in the world. This is the cause, this is the reason.”

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn33.5/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 24th, 2023 at 9:39 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

If Buddhas have no awareness, how can they establish pure abodes?

Astus wrote:

A living buddha has awareness, just as he also has a body, no different in that regard from any other human being. As for buddha lands, those are established through the vows made and merits accumulated over innumerable lifetimes as a bodhisattva.

PadmaVonSamba said:

I still say that you are confusing the arising of conceptual subject-object interaction with awareness.

What I'm saying is that awareness interacts with objects of awareness and this is what results in the experience we call consciousness (which involves the skandhas, etc).

Astus wrote:

As <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=673437#p673437>, the six types of consciousness arises from the six types of sense organs and sense objects, that is: 'Eye consciousness arises dependent on the eye and sights. Ear consciousness arises dependent on the ear and sounds.' to 'Mind consciousness arises dependent on the mind and thoughts.'. Seeing how consciousness arises dependently is what can lead to liberation (<https://suttacentral.net/sn35.234/en/sujato>).

It should also be clear that the six types of consciousness are what the consciousness aggregate is.

'And what is consciousness? There are these six classes of consciousness: eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind consciousness. This is called consciousness.

Consciousness originates from name and form. When name and form cease, consciousness ceases. The practice that leads to the cessation of consciousness is simply this noble eightfold path, that is: right view, right thought, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, and right immersion.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn22.56/en/sujato>)

PadmaVonSamba said:

It's because of ignorance that awareness experiences objects of awareness as intrinsically existing (and not merely temporary composites) and this ignorance results in grasping > samsara.

Astus wrote:

Taking awareness to be something intrinsically existing and not merely a temporary composite is similarly a form of grasping resulting in suffering.

PadmaVonSamba said:

But awareness itself is not a "thing". It's like space. It's where "things" happen.

Astus wrote:

Awareness is likened to space because it has no essence, not because it is some sort of infinite container.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Your view is basically the same as the materialist view that consciousness emerges from matter.

Astus wrote:

What makes you believe so? I have repeatedly stated here that consciousness arises based on the sense organ and sense object, just as it is taught by the Buddha. That is not the same as identifying the mind with the body as materialists do.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 25th, 2023 at 3:54 AM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

SvatahSiddha said:

Awareness is empty of any independent causation or origination; this is because it is uncaused and unborn; it is outside of causation of any form.

Astus wrote:

An independent, unconditioned awareness, that is an impossibility, and is basically no different from the view of atman.

SvatahSiddha said:

I'm interested in any source in the buddhadharma you might quote from that holds awareness itself as dependent on conditions.

Astus wrote:

There is no unconditioned awareness in the buddhadharma, just as there is no ultimate self.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 25th, 2023 at 3:36 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

If that's true, then ultimately there is no liberation from samsara. Follow the logic.

Astus wrote:

Liberation means change. What cannot change cannot have liberation. So the Buddha has stated that if there were something permanent, liberation would be impossible and the path would be meaningless (<https://suttacentral.net/sn22.97/en/sujato>). Same applies to the views that body and soul are the same or different (<https://suttacentral.net/sn12.35/en/sujato>). What should be recognised is that it's neither the sense organs, nor the sense objects that are the problem, but the craving and clinging to them (<https://suttacentral.net/sn35.232/en/sujato>).

Therefore the view of an unconditioned awareness apart from the aggregates is rejected, as it is a hindrance to liberation, it is an unnecessary assumption, and keeps one trapped in rebirth.

PadmaVonSamba said:

‘Self’ and ‘awareness’ are not the same thing.

Astus wrote:

If one believes something to be the unconditioned essence of existence, that qualifies as one of the common philosophical views of self, just like one finds so in Sankhya and Vedanta where an ultimate, independent witness is taken as the final reality. Such a view has been rejected and refuted in Buddhism from the beginning.

PadmaVonSamba said:

The problem with asserting that the true nature of awareness is conditional or dependent on aggregates is like saying that because removing dirt from a glass window reveals its clarity, that therefore the original clarity of the glass only exists in the first place because the dirt has been removed.

Astus wrote:

Awareness is the aggregate of consciousness, as it is consciousness that is aware of its six types of objects (as <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=674037#p674037>). The nature of awareness/consciousness is that it's empty, insubstantial, without essence. It is because awareness is conditioned that it is empty. An unconditioned, independent awareness very much qualifies as not empty, as a substance, an essence, a soul, a self. And since it's unconditioned, no change can affect it, no liberation is possible. That awareness, i.e. consciousness, just like the other aggregates, in other words: the entirety of body and mind is empty means that it's originally pure. The empty nature of mind is what cannot be grasped, and without grasping there is no defilement.

PadmaVonSamba said:

The Skandhas don't describe the mind's true nature. They describe the basis for obscuring the mind (self grasping) through attachment to form, feeling, and so on. They describe the “mud on the window” that creates the dichotomy of subject-object.

Astus wrote:

The skandhas are all there is, both body and mind. In fact, the skandhas are used to highlight that mind is a composite (the the six senses highlight the body being a composite). The nature of the skandhas is the nature of mind. That's why insight into the nature of the skandhas is a key to liberation. But not like it's done in Vedanta, where one has to peel away the sheaths (pañcakoṣa) to find inside the self. Rather in the Buddha's teaching one eventually does not find anything, no essence, no substance, no soul, no self whatsoever. There are merely conventional, conditioned phenomena without a core or ultimate source.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 25th, 2023 at 4:22 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

SvatahSiddha said:

It isn't 'independent'; it is the root of your own (and every other) awareness. It is buddha nature before it encounters conditions.

Astus wrote:

If it isn't independent then it is conditioned, so there is no time when it is not involved with conditions.

SvatahSiddha said:

It's not an ultimate self; it is awareness experienced before self (manas) begins.

Astus wrote:

There is no self, merely the misconception of a self. If by awareness you mean the wisdom of not conceiving a self, then that is not before the misconception arises, but rather after one has realised the emptiness of the aggregates.

SvatahSiddha said:

That is the realization of a Buddha; it is found when the repository consciousness empties and the perfected mode of reality shines forth.

Astus wrote:

That Yogacara type of description is fine, it says the same: the wisdom after realising the twofold emptiness.

SvatahSiddha said:

I'm still interested in any source in the buddhadharma you might quote from that holds awareness itself as dependent on conditions.

Astus wrote:

As you stated above, awareness is not independent. As for consciousness (what is conscious/aware of things), with the other aggregates being dependent and conditioned, statements of that have been quoted directly from the Buddha in this thread already, like <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=674037#p674037>.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 25th, 2023 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

So, what do you think about the idea of RigPa?

<https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Rigpa>

Astus wrote:

In dzogchen it means knowing the nature of mind. It's not an unconditioned awareness, not even a synonym for consciousness, but rather a specific type of wisdom.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 25th, 2023 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

What I'm referring to is this statement and others like it:

“Great Perfection texts can define the liberation of sentient beings as timeless, meaning that the state of liberation is their unconditioned essential state. “

Astus wrote:

The 'state of liberation' is not an awareness or consciousness, it is simply the original purity of emptiness, that things are already such(ness). Just as it can be said that all conditioned appearances are impermanent, that is their universal characteristic, however, as long as that is not known clearly, beings remain attracted to and enchanted by them. But the fault is not in the impermanent things, they themselves cause no problems, it's the deluded, ignorant mind that causes suffering. So in that sense everything is already pure.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 26th, 2023 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

I understand that for an instance of consciousness to arise, there is the meeting of subject and object (usually through the sense faculties) and that what the experience of consciousness is, is this interaction.

Would you say that this is correct?

Astus wrote:

Not really. Consciousness arises because of the meeting of sense organ and sense object, like eye and form. Then the three together produces contact, when the very basic impression happens, and then necessarily come other factors, like feeling, attention, and intention. That can be followed either by craving/hating/confusion if ignorance is present, or no defilement if there is wisdom. That is the crucial part where one can gain suffering or liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 26th, 2023 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Do you think that, during any given moment, one can be aware of anything that they are not thinking about, that they are not actively cognizing?

Astus wrote:

That depends on what you define as being aware, thinking, and cognising.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Since there is no point of contact between my awareness and things which are not happening, then if I experience them not happening, how am I aware that they are not happening?

Astus wrote:

What doesn't happen is not experienced. One can merely imagine or recognise conceptually the absence of something, based on one's memory or imagination.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 27th, 2023 at 3:13 AM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

In the Surangama Sutra, the Buddha asks, if you cover your eyes so that you can't see, then how do you know you can't see?

(There's no contact between sense organ and sense object).

Astus wrote:

Just as one can know that there is not a whale in the bathroom. It does not take any special, constant, independent awareness, rather it requires standard mental functioning.

By the way, the point of the Surangama Sutra is not that consciousness is somehow unconditioned, as assumed by the Sankhya and Vedanta (see ch II.9, p 72-74 in BTTS new translation), but rather that the nature of consciousness - like the nature of everything else - is beyond the extremes of being and nonbeing, in other words, it is empty. See also <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=658121#p658121>.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Actually, we are constantly aware of millions of bits of sensory data that we don't pay attention to.

Astus wrote:

That might be so on some level, however, it makes no difference. Buddhism is about how suffering arises and how it ceases. Religious, philosophical, and scientific theories and systems about the body, the mind, the earth, or outer space are quite irrelevant.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 27th, 2023 at 4:28 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

But answer the question: if you can't see, how do you know you can't see?

Astus wrote:

Just as one knows there is no whale in the room. One has the concept of a whale/seeing, and recognises its absence.

PadmaVonSamba said:

In one of the talks given by Bankei, he mentions to those in attendance that there are birds singing just outside of where they are gathered, and that our already illuminated "unborn Buddha mind" is aware of that even though we are not consciously listening to them.

Astus wrote:

If there is no attention paid, one is not consciously aware, hence forms neither thought nor intention to it, then it's like being unaware of its presence. Thus no relationship is established, no action/karma occurs, and has no part in the chain of suffering/liberation.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Again, it's like how a the true nature of a mirror is always that of reflectivity regardless of whether an object is placed before it or not.

Astus wrote:

If the function of awareness/reflection is lacking, it cannot be considered aware/reflective. That's why consciousness without object is impossible.

PadmaVonSamba said:

And this includes being obstructed by that duality which forms the basis for samsaric attachment: the skandhas.

Astus wrote:

Skandhas are not hindrances themselves, nor is there a separate awareness or consciousness.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 27th, 2023 at 5:58 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

So, what are you saying comes into contact with a concept of not seeing?
Consciousness?

Astus wrote:

Of course, the sixth type of consciousness is mental consciousness, as <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=673446#p673446>.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 27th, 2023 at 6:31 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

What are its components?

Astus wrote:

Awareness of mental phenomena is what's called mental consciousness, it arises with the standard universal mental factors (mainly the other three mental aggregates), and the mental factors specific to the situation.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 28th, 2023 at 3:55 AM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

There is still awareness of that awareness of mental phenomena.

Astus wrote:

There is not and cannot be. That type of self-awareness requires the presence of multiple minds, so it's regularly rejected. It is also quite impractical as it merely ends up in an infinite series of awareness of awareness.

'The Guardian of the World himself has said

That mind cannot be seen by mind.

In just the same way, he has said,

The sword's edge cannot cut the sword.

"But," you say, "it's like the flame

That perfectly illuminates itself."

The flame, in fact, can never light itself.

And why? Because the darkness never dims it!

(Bodhicaryavatara 9.17-19, tr Padmakara)

PadmaVonSamba said:

The advaitaists may be wrong about an ultimate self or atman, but I think they are correct that anything one may point to as awareness is still an object of awareness.

Astus wrote:

That is upholding an insurmountable gap between sense organ and sense object, imagining them to be substantially distinct. If that were so, then they couldn't actually meet, and the whole relationship of subject-object would be meaningless.

'One thing cannot meet itself

And other does not meet with other.

Neither meeting nor the met with

Nor the thing that meets exist at all.'
(Mulamadhyamakakarika, 14.8, tr Padmakara)

Here is a useful explanation of what mind is:

'The Pali word citta is derived from the verbal root citi, to cognize, to know. The commentators define citta in three ways: as agent, as instrument, and as activity. As the agent, citta is that which cognizes an object ((ārammaṇaṃ cintetī ti cittaṃ). As the instrument, citta is that by means of which the accompanying mental factors cognize the object (etena cintetī ti cittaṃ). As an activity, citta is itself nothing other than the process of cognizing the object (cintanamattaṃ cittaṃ).

The third definition, in terms of sheer activity, is regarded as the most adequate of the three: that is, citta is fundamentally an activity or process of cognizing or knowing an object. It is not an agent or instrument possessing actual being in itself apart from the activity of cognizing. The definitions in terms of agent and instrument are proposed to refute the wrong view of those who hold that a permanent self or ego is the agent and instrument of cognition. The Buddhist thinkers point out, by means of these definitions, that it is not a self that performs the act of cognition, but citta or consciousness. This citta is nothing other than the act of cognizing, and that act is necessarily impermanent, marked by rise and fall.'

(https://www.bps.lk/olib/bp/bp304s_Bfodhi_Comprehensive_Manual_of_Abhidhamma.pdf by Bhikkhu Bodhi, p 27-29; see also The Theravada Abhidhamma by Y. Karunadasa, ch 5)

And this one might also help:

'In the Buddhist discussion of mind, then, we are not talking about some sort of "thing" or organ that is in our head, like the brain. Nor are we talking about a space, as is implied by the Western expression, "Imagine in your mind this or that" – as if mind were a stage or room in our head through which thoughts parade or in which memories are stored. Rather, we are talking about some sort of occurrence that is happening on the basis of the brain and nervous system.

What is happening when we see, hear or think something? Although we may be able to describe the occurrence biochemically or electrochemically, we can also describe it subjectively. This latter is what we mean by "mind" in Buddhism. When we see, hear, think or emotionally feel something, there is an experience from moment to moment. This is what is happening. Furthermore, experience always has contents. An equivalent way of saying that is: "Mind always has an object." In fact, "mind" in Sanskrit and Tibetan is also called "that which has an object."

...

Experience always has contents. We cannot have an experience without experiencing something. A thought does not exist without a thinking of the thought, and no one can think without thinking a thought. Nondual, then, means that in any moment, these two things – mind and its object, or experience and its contents – always come together as one entity. Putting this in simple, everyday language, we can say they always come together in the same package. There cannot be one without the other. Therefore, in Buddhism "mind" always refers to experience with contents.

...

What occurs when we experience something? There is the giving rise to something. For ease of expression, we need to say, "mind gives rise to something." This is preferable to saying, "something arises." "Something arises" puts too much emphasis on what is happening from the side of the object, whereas the accent needs to be more on the subjective side. The phrase, "mind gives rise to something," however, also has its shortcomings. It is just a convenient manner of expression. Mind is not an entity or "thing," so there is nothing that is actually an agent giving rise to anything. The word, "mind," is simply a term mentally labeled onto the occurrence of the subjective event of the giving rise to something.

...

In summary, mind in Buddhism refers to experience, namely the mere arising and cognitive engaging with the contents of experience. The continuity of experience is known as the mind-stream, or "mental-continuum." It is always individual, with each moment of experience following from previous moments of experience according to the karmic laws of behavioral cause and effect. There is order in the universe, and "my" experience is never "your" experience. If I experience eating a meal, I and not you will next experience the physical sensation of being full. Buddhism does not posit a universal or collective mind.

The never-ceasing, moment-to-moment event of arising and engaging that constitutes experience, then, refers to the arising of a sight and merely seeing it, the arising of a sound and merely hearing it, the arising of a thought and merely thinking it, the arising of an emotion and merely feeling it, and so on. This is the conventional nature of mind – it gives rise to things and apprehends them. Its deepest nature is its voidness, namely that it is devoid of existing in any impossible manner, from being a physical entity itself up to involving a solid, concrete subject, content or experience. Such a mind, then, with these two true natures – or "two truths" – is the topic of mahamudra meditation.'

(<https://studybuddhism.com/en/advanced-studies/vajrayana/mahamudra-advanced/the-practical-application-of-mahamudra/the-initial-level-of-mahamudra-meditation>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 28th, 2023 at 2:44 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

You can observe it for yourself.

You can observe yourself observing it.

You are aware that you are aware.

And everything you observe is still an object of awareness.

The fact of observation,

simply because there are objects of awareness, proves that there is awareness.

You can quote as many sutras as you like.

It doesn't change that fact.

Astus wrote:

Awareness of awareness is not observed. First of all, it does not happen simultaneously but one thinks of thinking, recognises recognition, conceives conception, perceives perception, etc. as a second thought/.../perception following the first instance.

Secondly, if you stipulate that everything can only be an object of awareness and not awareness itself, that already rules out the possibility of ever becoming aware of awareness. So, in both cases awareness is nothing more than another idea.

Furthermore, such an approach of putting thought upon thought, mind upon mind, head upon head (the parable of Yajñadatta in Surangama Sutra IV.4, p 159), merely maintains the confused chain of thoughts.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 28th, 2023 at 8:47 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

How do you know that you know this?

Astus wrote:

In the same way one can know other things: experience, logic, tradition (oral/textual).

Practically, if one is engaged in some activity, it takes extra effort to monitor how one is engaged, and that can even disturb one's original activity. This is easier to discern when an activity requires a high level of attention.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 28th, 2023 at 10:26 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

stong gzugs said:

This debate about awareness can be summed up quite nicely by Duckworth in terms of a distinction from phenomenology (favored by Yogacara and Vedanta) vs. ontology (favored by Madhyamaka)

Astus wrote:

It can remain a phenomenological observation that no matter what state of mind, no matter what experience it is, it necessarily arises and passes away. So, even if one feels like being the observer behind whatever happens, that is itself a temporary feeling that is not always there.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 29th, 2023 at 5:27 AM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

stong gzugs said:

The argument is that awareness isn't some temporary state, and that as the result of studying, contemplating, and practicing (shravana, manana, nididhyasana), you actually can maintain awareness continuously: not only throughout your waking life, but also as the waking world collapses into the dream world and into deep sleep, such that you never drift off but maintain lucidity throughout; that you can maintain awareness continuously during the void before a thought arises, noticing its arising, and seeing its passing away into void; etc.

Astus wrote:

If such a continuous awareness is a result of cultivation, then it is itself a temporary creation.

stong gzugs said:

In no sense is awareness itself contingent upon whatever thought or state of existence (waking, dreaming, deep sleep) the mind is entering.

Astus wrote:

An awareness that exists without being aware is not awareness.

stong gzugs said:

Moreover, the key argument is that awareness is not really the "witness" on the subject side of a subject-object mental duality, but a basic self-illuminating space in which all dualistic mental activity occurs.

Astus wrote:

If it were self-illuminating, it would not need discovery, nor cultivation to maintain it.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 29th, 2023 at 2:50 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

stong gzugs said:

Is enlightenment the result of cultivation? If so, shouldn't it be impermanent by definition? If it's impermanent, then buddhas can become sentient beings again, so why bother?

Astus wrote:

Enlightenment is the result of cultivation, as it's stated by one of the most fundamental doctrines: the four noble truths. It is not impermanent, as it is the ending of the causes of suffering, and without causes there is no reason for it to reemerge.

stong gzugs said:

Namely, the explanations are those like: awareness doesn't have to be created, but realized (which some people can do instantly (i.e., cig car bas) but others need to paradoxically work at), that such realization is about overcoming ignorance rather than creating something new, and ignorance is basically a fundamental misidentification that treats the contents of our experience as real and external to us which reifies us into limited subjects, where all of this occurs analogously to how the presence of clouds doesn't mean the sun doesn't exist and so a practice that scatters the clouds doesn't create the sun but simply reveals it, etc.

Astus wrote:

If awareness can be ignorant, then it is not a good idea to merely arrive at identifying with such an unreliable thing. If awareness cannot be ignorant, then it cannot mistakenly identify with the contents.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 29th, 2023 at 2:57 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

That's like saying that if the original nature of the mind is bodhi (awakened) there would be no cause for samsara to occur.

Astus wrote:

Even a toenail's original nature is bodhi, as it is not inherently defiled. Defilement is the identification with and grasping at a toenail. Similarly, to mistake the mind/awareness as something that can be rightly called one's essence, one's true identity, is ignorance that keeps one from being free from suffering.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 29th, 2023 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

stong gzugs said:

Yes, yes, but this just gets us right back to the start of the thread. If enlightenment is sheer negation/extinction/extinguishment, as it is described in some Theravada sources, then the extinction of grasping, etc. as the causes for becoming will lead to a lack of becoming (which is thus defined as enlightenment). To use the Buddha's example, there's a fire burning because of grasping, and enlightenment is the extinguishing of the fire.

Astus wrote:

Enlightenment is the end of defilements even in Mahayana.

'Some who objectify it think that nirvana is something existent, but it is not like that. ... If nirvana were something existent, then it would have to be something compound. If it were something compound, then eventually it would perish. ... It is the complete exhaustion of all thoughts which grasp existence and nonexistence. Nirvana is beyond conceptualization and is inexpressible. ... Therefore, nirvana is merely pacification of engagement in conceptual thought. It does not exist as any phenomena whatsoever — rising, cessation, abandonment, attainment, and so forth.'

(Jewel Ornament of Liberation, p 245-246)

stong gzugs said:

But if enlightenment has positive characteristics, like the continuity of some type of first-person experience, so you aren't a zombie while living and don't just disappear after dying, then you end up with a lot of special pleading for how such an experience can be cultivated but permanent and what the basis is for such experience, and this is what leads those like Thanissaro Bhikkhu to posit an unconditioned mind, and so on. The Buddha treated all of this as a question he refused to answer as I'm sure you know.

Astus wrote:

Enlightenment has numerous positive characteristics, in fact, it's the most positive thing there is. But to wonder about the continuity or discontinuity of a liberated being is still grasping at an entity.

“Vaccha, the wanderers of other religions regard the eye like this: ‘This is mine, I am this, this is my self.’ They regard the ear ... nose ... tongue ... body ... mind like this: ‘This is mine, I am this, this is my self.’

That’s why, when asked, they declare one of those answers to be true.

The Realized One, the perfected one, the fully awakened Buddha regards the eye like this: ‘This is not mine, I am not this, this is not my self.’ He regards the ear ... nose ... tongue ... body ... mind like this: ‘This is not mine, I am not this, this is not my self.’

That’s why, when asked, he does not declare one of those answers to be true.”

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn44.7/en/sujato>)

stong gzugs said:

Nobody in the Vedantic traditions I know of claims that awareness can be ignorant, it's rather the same argument made in Mahayana texts about adventitious defilements, where it's not that the sun has stopped shining, just that some clouds have arisen.

Astus wrote:

Just as the sun isn't bothered by clouds, an unaffected awareness needs no liberation. Then it remains to be answered who then is the one who misidentifies himself. Do clouds mistake themselves to be clouds? But that's not a mistake, as they are actually clouds.

stong gzugs said:

So the white screen itself doesn't liberate us, but when there's a pause in the movie (as through meditation, for instance), and we see the white screen for what it is, then the ignorance is overcome by this newfound vidya or knowledge of the white screen (awareness), and we no longer fool ourselves into thinking that the screen changes colors. This is also why the argument claiming that an awareness that isn't changing can't be a cause for liberation doesn't hold much weight IMO.

Astus wrote:

Whose ignorance is overcome? Isn't the white screen the symbol of our very essence, the ultimate knower? Also, as long as there are all the colours of a movie on the screen, it is not a white screen. In other words, if there is a substance independent of the attributes, then the substance is not related to the attributes, nor does it have any qualities to account for, so it is not different from not existing at all.

stong gzugs said:

Interesting. What sources are you relying on that claim insentient objects have bodhi as their nature?

Astus wrote:

Bodhi is freedom from defilements, and since the nature of all insentient objects is emptiness, they are in that sense bodhi. Otherwise, just in case you are interested in it, there are studies and books about the topic of the buddha-nature of insentients.

'In sum, "that without constancy" of grass, trees, and forests is just the buddha-nature. And "that without constancy" of the body-and-mind of a human being is the buddha-nature itself. National lands and mountains and rivers are "that without constancy" because they are the buddha-nature. The truth of anuttara samyaksambodhi, because it is the buddha-nature, is "that without constancy." The great state of parinirvāṇa, because it is "that without constancy," is the buddha-nature.'

(The Buddha-nature by Dogen, in Shobogenzo, BDK ed, vol 2, p 14)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 30th, 2023 at 1:35 AM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

at the same time, all composite phenomena are unsatisfactory. If the awakened awareness of a Buddha was a composite, then enlightenment would be unsatisfactory. Then what would be the point of practice?

Astus wrote:

The awakened body of a buddha is also composite. The point of practice is to be free from attachment and identification.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 30th, 2023 at 4:45 AM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Oh I think there's more to it than just that.
Lots of paths can do that much.

Astus wrote:

Not really.

'There are some other ascetics and brahmins who claim to propound the complete understanding of all kinds of grasping, but they don't really. They describe the complete understanding of grasping at sensual pleasures, views, and precepts and observances, but not theories of a self. Why is that? Because those gentlemen don't truly understand this one thing. That's why they claim to propound the complete understanding of all kinds of grasping, but they don't really.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn11/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 30th, 2023 at 4:55 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

stong gzugs said:

This is an interesting argument. Every thoughtful person and all cultures across the history we know of have wondered about what happens to us after we die. It's one thing to say that we don't want to get lost in a thicket of views, etc. because the answer itself isn't necessary for enlightenment. But it's quite another to say to even think about these questions is to be grasping and un-enlightened. Is there such a danger of wrong-think?

Astus wrote:

It's not about afterlife in general, but the fate of a liberated being in particular. That topic is counted among the undeclared points on which there is a collection of discourses in the Abyākatasamyutta (<https://suttacentral.net/sn44>), but is also discussed elsewhere, like the <https://suttacentral.net/mn63/en/sujato> and the <https://suttacentral.net/mn72/en/sujato>. The topic is also addressed in chapter 22 of the Mulamadhyamakakarika by Nagarjuna.

stong gzugs said:

without the screen there couldn't be any of those attributes, without the mirror there couldn't be any reflections, and so on. So, I disagree with your logic there, the underlying and unchanging substance is absolutely needed, and is not the same thing as not existing at all.

Astus wrote:

That shows the interactive and dependent nature of the screen. After all, it would not be called a screen if no movies could be watched on it. That's why it is not an unchanging substance, but rather a dependent factor.

stong gzugs said:

Any studies/books you'd personally recommend?

Astus wrote:

There's a collection on https://buddhanature.tsadra.org/index.php/Topics/Buddha-nature_of_insentient_things you may check.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 30th, 2023 at 5:45 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Freedom from attachment and identification? Buddhism doesn't have a monopoly on that.

Astus wrote:

Certainly no monopoly. But is there any other system/teaching where all four types of grasping mentioned in the quote are eliminated?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 30th, 2023 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

Shaiksha said:

So, I don't think that "free from attachments (I prefer to use clinging/grasping as the sutta uses - no word of attachment in that sutta you quoted, by the way) and identification" is the point of the practice.

Astus wrote:

The ultimate goal is ending all grasping.

'The purpose of leading the spiritual life under the Buddha is extinguishment by not grasping.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn45.48/en/sujato>)

'It's good that you understand that I've taught the Dhamma for the purpose of complete extinguishment by not grasping. For that is indeed the purpose.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn35.75/en/sujato>)

That's what knowledge is for.

'Purification of knowledge and vision is only for the sake of extinguishment by not grasping.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn24/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 30th, 2023 at 10:42 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

My monk friend said that after nibbana, there is just awareness.
You stated that even a Buddha's awareness arises from skandhas.

Astus wrote:

Awareness is part of the skandhas, not arising from them.

PadmaVonSamba said:

I'm bringing up the fact that according to the Buddha, all impermanent things are unsatisfactory, and as stated (in the four seals) all compounded things are impermanent.

But if that's the case, and Buddha's awareness arises from compounded things (skandhas) then nirvana would be unsatisfactory.

Astus wrote:

Because all compounded are unsatisfactory, a buddha does not identify with any of them. Nirvana is not awareness, it is the ending of all afflictions, of greed, hate, and delusion.

PadmaVonSamba said:

So, how do you reconcile this with your assertion that a buddy's awareness still involves the Skandhas process?

What I'm saying is that the Skandhas apply to becoming within the cycle of samsara, and not to a Buddha's awareness.

Astus wrote:

Awareness is the aggregate of consciousness, there is no other type of awareness but what falls within the aggregate of consciousness, and the aggregate of consciousness functions with the other mental aggregates. Just as a buddha has a physical body like other humans, so he has a mind as well. The distinction between a buddha and ordinary beings is that the former does not misconstrue the aggregates as 'mine, me, my self', as explained in detail in the <https://suttacentral.net/mn1/en/sujato>, and in brief for instance in the <https://suttacentral.net/sn22.7/en/sujato>. It's the aggregates that should be completely understood and it's the ending of greed, hate, and delusion that is complete understanding (<https://suttacentral.net/sn22.106/en/sujato>).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 30th, 2023 at 10:56 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

stong gzugs said:

Person 1, Buddhist, some time later: So, if we turn to the next chapter in the Mahāyāna-sūtrālamkāra, we'll see that after you realize the dharmakaya upon death and become a Buddha, you will emanate countless forms to guide sentient being towards maturity...

Astus wrote:

The trikaya concept has its own twists and turns, but to say that 'you will emanate' is somewhat problematic.

stong gzugs said:

Nothing substantive changes about the cloth whether images are projected upon it or not.

Astus wrote:

The cloth changes its look, otherwise there would be no images. To claim that hidden behind that it remains white is claiming that something can be white without looking white, in which case even black is white.

stong gzugs said:

The claim "we're the only ones who encourage letting go of attachment and identity" unfortunately, and ironically, for some people becomes an identity that they get attached to.

Astus wrote:

“Ānanda, take a mendicant who practices like this: ‘It might not be, and it might not be mine. It will not be, and it will not be mine. I am giving up what exists, what has come to be.’ In this way they gain equanimity. They approve, welcome, and keep clinging to that equanimity. Their consciousness relies on that and grasps it. A mendicant with grasping does not become extinguished.”

“But sir, what is that mendicant grasping?”

“The dimension of neither perception nor non-perception.”

“Sir, it seems that mendicant is grasping the best thing to grasp!”

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn106/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 31st, 2023 at 4:21 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

stong gzugs said:

When you say a buddha doesn't identify with compounded phenomena, who exactly is it that isn't identifying with compounded phenomena?

Astus wrote:

Identification - conceptions of 'this is mine, I am this, this is my self' - or in other words, grasping at the aggregates (<https://suttacentral.net/sn22.151/en/sujato>) is not by a distinct person/being/knower/agent, but it is an activity, a factor of mind, thus included in the formations aggregate.

“But sir, who grasps?”

“That’s not a fitting question,” said the Buddha.

“I don’t speak of one who grasps. If I were to speak of one who grasps, then it would be fitting to ask who grasps. But I don’t speak like that. Hence it would be fitting to ask:

‘What is a condition for grasping?’ And a fitting answer to this would be: ‘Craving is a condition for grasping. Grasping is a condition for continued existence.' ... That is how this entire mass of suffering originates."

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn12.12/en/sujato>)

stong gzugs said:

If that experiencer/awareness is reducible to compounded phenomena (i.e., skandhas), it cannot last and be satisfactory and therefore the notion of a buddha is undermined.

Astus wrote:

It is an incorrect notion of a buddha if it is taken to be the aggregates, or something other than the aggregates (<https://suttacentral.net/sn22.85/en/sujato>, also MMK 22), just as it is incorrect to assume a person/being/knower/agent as identical with or different from the aggregates.

stong gzugs said:

If you're saying that buddhahood is the cessation of all consciousness (which are compounded), then you have to explain how buddhas can act to benefit all beings without any thought (a reliance on habits of mind learned previously won't work, because habits alone cannot shape how to interact in novel situations, which all require ongoing selection and updating of prior learning in memory, which require the consciousnesses) and on an ongoing basis (one could say it's based on the vows one takes, but those vows like all volitional actions are also impermanent and will not last infinitely).

Astus wrote:

In the three bodies interpretation of buddhahood, dharmakaya is the essence that is suchness, emptiness, etc. For the rupakaya, that's the product of vows and merits manifesting according to the needs of beings. The former is uncompounded but not awareness, the latter is awareness but compounded. As for existing infinitely, that is no different from ordinary beings that are also without any uncompounded essence but still have been wandering in samsara without beginning.

stong gzugs said:

And with all of these, it becomes very hard to understand how any such buddha could survive the death of the physical body, such that buddhas will only be of benefit for sentient beings for a limited time that they can interact with us physically.

Astus wrote:

Naturally, and such worries are based on conceiving a buddha as a person/being/knower/agent. This type of worry is addressed in the <https://suttacentral.net/an7.54/en/sujato>.

stong gzugs said:

Because the cloth remains white even after the movie ends.

Astus wrote:

The cloth changes colour according to conditions, so it is not an example of an unconditioned substance/substrate. A ball rolls if pushed, and then stops. Is the true nature of a ball to be stationary because it was so previously too? The cloth looks white if the appropriate light is present, looks different if the light changes, and has no colour at all if there is no light. And if the cloth is coloured not by light but by paint, or just gets dirty, it will be more difficult to make it white again.

stong gzugs said:

Substances can be in asymmetric dependence relations

Astus wrote:

If it is in any relation, it is not independent. A drop of rain or a crystal is not a prism unless it functions as such, and that function depends on temporary conditions. Similarly, it is not awareness unless it is aware of something, hence the distinction between eye-consciousness and ear-consciousness.

stong gzugs said:

this sutta is about people getting attached to blissful jhanic states

Astus wrote:

It was meant as an example where people can grasp at all sorts of views.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 31st, 2023 at 4:50 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

So, now you are saying awareness is not a composite?

Astus wrote:

The aggregates are composite, so awareness - being the aggregate of consciousness - is composite.

PadmaVonSamba said:

No experience of the end of afflictions, etc.

Astus wrote:

How couldn't there be? Not conceiving an experience as me and mine is not the same as not having any. Ordinary beings are also capable of recognising if their hatred has disappeared, even if it's merely temporary for them.

PadmaVonSamba said:

So, how is that different from nihilism or the materialist view that when you die, the lights just go out and that's it?

Astus wrote:

The common materialist view, in other words annihilationism, is based on grasping at the aggregates, on having the misconception of there being a real person/being/knower/agent, that at one point (death) ceases to exist. If there is no grasping at the body, or the mind, or both, then there is no worry of ceasing to exist either. If the consciousness is seen for what and how it is, then it is clear that it does not last even for a minute and ceases to be uncountable times during a single day (<https://suttacentral.net/sn12.61/en/sujato>).

PadmaVonSamba said:

Are you saying that awareness cannot occur by itself, but only as a component of subject-object consciousness?

Astus wrote:

Consciousness is generally counted as six types according to the six types of objects it can be conscious of. Whether someone conceives there to be a subject/me and an object/mine is another matter. But regardless if one still has or doesn't have a self-view, consciousness arises based on conditions.

PadmaVonSamba said:

his consciousness is conditional and thus by his own definition, unsatisfactory

Astus wrote:

Even in the case of a buddha consciousness is conditioned and unsatisfactory, just like the body. The distinctive part is that a buddha does not conceive them to be his or himself.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 31st, 2023 at 5:14 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

Shaiksha said:

So, if I can modify the translation, it will be something along the line: attaining the final nibbana without taking up any more fuel. It is a huge difference (for me at least) to the term: extinguishment by not grasping.

Astus wrote:

Either case, the goal of the whole path remains being free from grasping.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 31st, 2023 at 9:36 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

I think many will disagree with you here.

Astus wrote:

'The Buddha has a body
with which he senses touch.
But he has no desire and greed,
for his mind is well freed.
The Buddha has a mind
with which he knows thought.
But he has no desire and greed,
for his mind is well freed.'
(<https://suttacentral.net/sn35.232/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 31st, 2023 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

stong gzugs said:

This sort of metacognitive awareness is necessary for all sorts of everyday activities, particularly those related to self-knowledge.

Astus wrote:

That is very much within the functions and capabilities of the mental aggregates. No need to posit any independent, unchanging awareness on top of them.

stong gzugs said:

If vows that give rise to the form bodies are conditioned and impermanent, and Buddhas don't generate new karma, then eventually they should disappear into emptiness/dharmakaya?

Astus wrote:

Shakyamuni died, didn't he? But according to the three bodies theory, he was merely an emanation, not a real entity anyway. Can unreal entities appear and disappear? As for the other side of the issue, since bodhisattvas accumulate immeasurable merits, how could those ever be exhausted?

stong gzugs said:

Are you saying that when the rope looks like a snake, it is a snake?

Astus wrote:

Nobody gets scared by a rope that looks like a snake, only by what looks like a snake. Then if it's analysed, a snake turns out to be a rope, then a rope to be threads, and the threads to be ultimately nothing at all.

stong gzugs said:

the screen doesn't depend on the projections: its main quality is its whiteness that allows it to become a useful substance for projection.

Astus wrote:

It is called a screen - and not a handkerchief or a tablecloth - because it is used to project movies on it. If whiteness were its main quality, then it would cease to be a screen the moment it no longer looked white, in which case it couldn't function as a screen. Thus assuming an unchanging substance contradicts functionality.

stong gzugs said:

Likewise, awareness doesn't depend on its contents, but the contents depend on awareness.

Astus wrote:

If awareness did not depend on the fact that it is aware of something, that means unawareness is also awareness, as insentient things are not aware of anything either.

stong gzugs said:

In this view, it's the unchanging nature of the screen that makes it useful.

Astus wrote:

Quite the opposite, because the white screen can appear as all sorts of colours when projected on it, it means that its changeability is what makes it useful. If it were to just stay white, no movies would be visible on it.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 31st, 2023 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Yeah. The Buddha has a mind.

That's what I've been saying.

duuuuhhh!!!

Astus wrote:

A mind like all sentient beings, conditioned and impermanent.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 1st, 2023 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Then there's no point in practice or attaining.

Astus wrote:

It's because mind is conditional that there is a way to remove defilements and thus end suffering. How is that not meaningful and worthwhile?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 1st, 2023 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

According to you, I wouldn't even be aware that it had ended.

Astus wrote:

Defilements are specific mental factors (i.e. the three root unskillful qualities of greed, hate, and delusion, and their derivatives) affecting how one acts in body, words, and mind. It is not the entirety of body and mind (i.e. the five aggregates). Their presence, just as their absence, can be well discerned by <https://suttacentral.net/mn10/en/sujato?lang=en&layout=plain&reference=main¬es=asterisk&highlight=false&script=latin#34.1>, just as it is recommended in the <https://suttacentral.net/sn35.153/en/sujato>. So why wouldn't you be aware of their end?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 1st, 2023 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

Shaiksha said:

Actually, the goal of the whole path is the ending of suffering (dukkha).

Astus wrote:

How is there a difference between being free from suffering and being free from grasping?

Here's a series of six discourses giving six different goals:

<https://suttacentral.net/sn45.42-47/en/sujato>.

There are also variations on the four noble truths (e.g.

<https://suttacentral.net/an6.63/en/sujato>), one commonly mentioned being where suffering is changed to defilements (āśava), e.g. DN 2, DN 10, MN 100, MN 101, MN 112.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 1st, 2023 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Also, any time one wasn't grasping or thinking "me" one would be experiencing nibbana.

Astus wrote:

That is actually the case, to a certain extent. It is expressed by the various uses of vimutti and vimokkha in the suttas.

It is more clearly stated in the Platform Sutra, e.g. 'A single moment's stupidity and prajñā is eradicated, a single moment's wisdom and prajñā is generated.' and 'When one is enlightened for [even] a single moment, then sentient beings are buddhas.'

And from a Theravada side, see this essay: <https://www.suanmokkh.org/books/84>.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 3rd, 2023 at 2:35 PM

Title: Re: is Dharmakirti's epistemology congruent with Dzogchen?

Content:

Baz0 said:

simpler summaries that are well explained are preferred at this point.

Astus wrote:

You might look into https://buddhanature.tsadra.org/index.php/Books/Mipham%27s_Sword_of_Wisdom

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 4th, 2023 at 3:06 PM

Title: Re: What is the difference between Zazen & Shamatha as practised in Vajrayana?

Content:

Ophidian Rainbow said:

What are the differences between Zazen and Shamatha as practised by Vajrayana buddhists? Is there a difference?

Astus wrote:

Zazen in general simply means seated meditation, so that can be practically anything done while sitting. So to tell the difference it should be something more specific, like http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/bbs/board.php?bo_table=3020&wr_id=53 or https://www.sotozen.com/eng/library/key_terms/pdf/key_terms01.pdf.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 4th, 2023 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: What is the difference between Zazen & Shamatha as practised in Vajrayana?

Content:

Ophidian Rainbow said:

What exactly are the differences between shikantaza and shamatha as practiced by Vajrayana Buddhists?

Astus wrote:

A lot. Shamatha is a method used to tame the mind in order to be fit for vipashyana, to make it pliant and workable. Shikantaza in Soto Zen is the entirety of Buddhism, it is buddhahood embodied in the present, the essence and the goal of the whole of Buddhadharma.

In shamatha one learns to keep the mind in a particular state, to make it calm and focused. In shikantaza it is about letting body and mind drop, in other words, to recognise and realise immediately that there is nothing that could be held on, that all phenomena are pure suchness as they are, so there is nothing to improve and nothing to remove.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 5th, 2023 at 4:16 PM

Title: Re: The Modern Western Theravada bias

Content:

Astus wrote:

Abhidharmakosa 3.18 and commentary by Wangchuk Dorje (Jewels from the Treasury, p 337-338):

'There is no self—mere aggregates.

Continuums of between states

Assembled by afflictions and karma

Enter the womb. It's like a lamp.

According to outsiders, it follows that there is a self because sentient beings transmigrate to different worlds, you say. This does not pervade, because there is no self that accepts or rejects in the internal aggregates that make up the being. Well then, what provides continuity between the state of death and rebirthlinking? you ask. There is merely the continuum of the aggregates themselves. Labeling that continuum as the "self" is not refuted, because it is suitable to call it by any name. The aggregates alone have no power to transmigrate to new aggregates without stopping, because continuums of the between states that are fully ripened results and personally made results assembled by afflictions and karma enter the womb. It is like a lamp that is momentary but burns in a continuum of moments.'

<https://read.84000.co/translation/toh226.html#UT22084-063-007-73-14>, also quoted in Madhyamakavatahabhasya 6.40:

'Great king, no phenomenon whatsoever transmigrates from this world to another world, yet there are the manifestations of death and birth.

Great king, the cessation of the final consciousness is known as death. The arising of the first consciousness is known as birth. Great king, the moment the final consciousness ceases, it does not go anywhere. The moment the first consciousness pertaining to birth arises, it also does not come from anywhere. Why is that? It is because they are devoid of essential nature.

Great king, the final consciousness is empty of final consciousness, transmigration after death is empty of transmigration after death, action is empty of action, the first consciousness is empty of the first consciousness, and birth is empty of birth, yet actions manifest without being lost.'

But Candrakirti

(<https://www2.hf.uio.no/polyglotta/index.php?page=record&vid=1113&mid=1927253>)

writes how various provisional teachings are acceptable:

'The kinds of students who have previously had prolonged exposure to misguided (tirthika) views will struggle to assimilate the profound nature of things (dharmatā), and become frightened when hearing statements such as, 'I am not, nor will I be ...' When from the very outset they relate to the instructions of the Teacher like they would the edge of a precipice, backing away from it, they will not accomplish the supreme goal. By initially presenting them with such topics as the substrate consciousness, their misguided beliefs are counteracted as they are steered towards the greater purpose of these instructions. Since they will later, when gaining an unmistakable understanding of the teachings, naturally abandon these, it is definitely a beneficial approach and in no way mistaken.'

So, if some are frightened by the concept of nirvana as if it were annihilation, it is acceptable to talk of some special form of mind, like buddha-nature and such, in order to keep them on the path, like in the case of Nanda and the heavenly maidens (<https://suttacentral.net/ud3.2/en/sujato>), or in the parable of the three carts (<https://read.84000.co/translation/toh113.html#UT22084-051-001-711>).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 14th, 2023 at 5:34 AM

Title: Re: only Dzogchen & Mahamudra realize nature of the mind?

Content:

Astus wrote:

What the nature of mind is and how that is discovered is debatable and debated within Buddhism itself. What is not argued over - as far as I've seen - is that the point is to eliminate the three poisons. So the beneficial and practical question should be whether a particular method can achieve that. That is the measurement taught in the <https://suttacentral.net/an3.78/en/sujato>.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 14th, 2023 at 1:10 PM

Title: Re: only Dzogchen & Mahamudra realize nature of the mind?

Content:

Baz0 said:

The nature of the three poisons upon investigation is also unobtainable so how will Buddhists remove them?

Astus wrote:

Be realising them to be unobtainable.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 14th, 2023 at 3:41 PM

Title: Re: It's Madhyamaka's methodology not its content...

Content:

wei wu wei said:

If all Madhyamikas agree that the ultimate truth is that there is no ultimate truth, or that the ultimate truth is not ultimately true, or that ultimate reality is non-conceptual, then why all the fuss and bickering over the conventional points of the teachings?

Astus wrote:

Which one is agreed upon? No ultimate truth, or the ultimate is not really ultimate, or that the ultimate is non-conceptual? That's already three versions of what is claimed to be unanimously accepted.

wei wu wei said:

It's the methodology of Madhyamaka that has liberative power--at least over conceptual grasping--not so much the content of the conventional teachings themselves.

Astus wrote:

Is there any school/tradition that actually uses madhyamaka for that purpose? Apparently so called sutrayana is mainly to read and debate about, while it's vajrayana that is the practice (with little reading or debating about).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 15th, 2023 at 5:04 AM

Title: Re: It's Madhyamaka's methodology not its content...

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

I think what you are observing is people who jump straight to Vajrayana due to the peculiarities of our time, i.e. being able to access empowerment very easily without any study of common Mahayana teaching. Spend time with nearly any Tibetan teacher I'm aware of and it will be a teaching topic.

Astus wrote:

Such analysis can serve as part of the preparation for vajrayana, just like contemplating the four thoughts. But is it used for its "liberative power", similarly to vajrayana?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 19th, 2023 at 2:43 PM

Title: Re: What is the difference between Zazen & Shamatha as practised in Vajrayana?

Content:

bowsamic said:

Shikantaza is about resting in the pure luminous nature of your own mind and can only really be done after your teacher points out your mind to you.

Astus wrote:

On what interpretation of shikantaza do you base that? Do you have any sources for it perhaps?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 19th, 2023 at 3:49 PM

Title: Re: What is the difference between Zazen & Shamatha as practised in Vajrayana?

Content:

bowsamic said:

It's what I was taught by my Soto Zen teacher.

Astus wrote:

It sounds like a novel take on it, maybe influenced by Vajrayana a bit. Compare it to <https://www.sotozen.com/eng/practice/zazen/howto/index.html>.

And from a https://www.sotozen.com/eng/library/leaflet/sotozen/pdf/soto_zen.pdf:

'In zazen, our body and mind is like the vast sky, receptive to all change. We just keep an upright posture and let go of any kind of thoughts. We don't identify any of the clouds as "myself." We understand that no cloud stays forever. And we trust that above the clouds, there is always a blue sky and bright sun. But we need to live beneath the clouds. We need to experience different kinds of weather. We try to live without being overwhelmed by any condition. This is what we learn from zazen.'

That is in agreement with what was taught by Huineng and Dogen about impermanence ('without constancy') being buddha-nature:

'In sum, "that without constancy" of grass, trees, and forests is just the buddha-nature. And "that without constancy" of the body-and-mind of a human being is the buddha-nature itself. National lands and mountains and rivers are "that without constancy" because they are the buddhanature. The truth of anuttara samyaksambodhi, because it is the buddha-nature, is "that without constancy."'

(The Buddha-nature, in SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 2, p 14; http://21dzk.l.u-tokyo.ac.jp/SAT2015/T2582_.82.0095a25:0095a25.cit)

bowsamic said:

Huineng says

Astus wrote:

Rather:

'Bodhi is fundamentally without any tree;

The bright mirror is also not a stand.

Fundamentally there is not a single thing—

Where could any dust be attracted?'

(Platform Sutra, ch 1, BDK ed, p 22; http://21dzk.l.u-tokyo.ac.jp/SAT2015/T2008_.48.0349a07:0349a07.cit)

bowsamic said:

Dogen says

Astus wrote:

<https://www.sotozen.com/eng/practice/zazen/advice/fukanzanzeng.html> on the Soto homepage is less interpretative and closer to http://21dzk.l.u-tokyo.ac.jp/SAT2015/T2580_.82.0001a03:0001a03.cit.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 19th, 2023 at 4:37 PM

Title: Re: Origin of Mushotoku

Content:

Tao said:

Is in the Shobogenzo ?

Astus wrote:

It's not there. The closest are chapters 18 and 19: Mind Cannot Be Grasped (心不可得).

Comes up once in Koun Ejo's <https://wwzc.org/dharma-text/komyozo-zanmai-practice-treasury-luminosity>: 'Practice the nothing gained (http://21dzk.l.u-tokyo.ac.jp/SAT2015/T2590_.82.0458a12:0458a13.cit) of luminosity.'

The (<https://www.sotozen.com/eng/practice/sutra/pdf/01/04.pdf>) has it though:

'With nothing to attain (http://21dzk.l.u-tokyo.ac.jp/SAT2015/T0251_.08.0848c13:0848c13.cit), a bodhisattva relies on prajnaparamita'

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 19th, 2023 at 5:09 PM

Title: Re: What is the difference between Zazen & Shamatha as practised in Vajrayana?

Content:

bowsamic said:

How could it be novel when I gave three quotes from Zen masters that say the same thing?

Astus wrote:

It is novel in the idea that it 'can only really be done after your teacher points out your mind to you'. That is not a requirement stated in the quotes.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 19th, 2023 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: Origin of Mushotoku

Content:

Tao said:

do you know when the concept won its importance in Soto? as a central idea... it was later?

Rinzai shares that importance?

Astus wrote:

I do not know.

Tao said:

BTW, is it "nothing to attain" or "non profit for oneself"? I see both ways to explain it here in Spain, but mostly they use the "non profit", and for me it's not the same...they're close, but not the same, literally is "nothig to attain", isnt it?

Astus wrote:

It is 'nothing to attain'.

'to transcend the characteristics of the various dharmas, without anything that is attained (https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T48n2008_p0356c22): this is called the Supreme Vehicle'

(Platform Sutra, ch 7, BDK ed, p 63)

Pei Xiu asked, "How do we arouse the bodhi mind?"

The master replied, "Bodhi is not something to be attained

(<https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T48n2012Bp0385c24>). Right now you need only arouse this mind that is unascertainable (無所得), which is certain that there is not a single dharma that can be attained (不得). That is the bodhi mind."

(A Bird in Flight Leaves No Trace, 2.10)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 19th, 2023 at 8:57 PM

Title: Re: What is the difference between Zazen & Shamatha as practised in Vajrayana?

Content:

bowsamic said:

Anyway, that's just what "mind-to-mind transmission" means. Dogen talks about it in Bendowa and in a few other places. That's why you need a teacher in Zen. I didn't expect that would be the controversial part of what I said! It is usually well known that Zen cannot be practised without a teacher. In Rinzai, they even do shikantaza as the last practise, because they think it's impossible to do shikantaza without awakening!

Astus wrote:

Shikantaza in Soto is not separated from awakening, so it cannot be that one first needs realisation before practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 21st, 2023 at 4:10 AM

Title: Re: Middle Way

Content:

Rick said:

The Middle Way is a path between (a transcending of) the extremes of eternalism and nihilism. Does that betweenness/transcendence also apply to the extremes: duality and non-duality, atman and anatman, conventional and ultimate? Does it apply to ALL extremes, all conceptual opposites?

Astus wrote:

In Buddhism it applies to dependent origination in theory, and the noble eightfold path in practice. Otherwise one can conceptualise all sorts of middle ways, like between genocide and harmlessness.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 22nd, 2023 at 10:45 PM

Title: Re: Middle Way

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

distrust and avoid all kinds of extremes. Both asceticism and indulgence are bad for us when taken too far. Ditto doctrinaire fundamentalism and wishy-washy new-age-ism, loony-right politics and loony-left politics, and every other pair of extremes I can think of.

Astus wrote:

That can easily take to a false middle ground, where anything can be an extreme one simply dislikes. Apparently the Buddha made clear distinction between what is skilful/beneficial and what is unskilful/harmful (e.g. <https://suttacentral.net/an3.6/en/sujato>, <https://suttacentral.net/mn114/en/sujato>) and that's what he used as a measure even in the case of asceticism (see: <https://suttacentral.net/an10.94/en/sujato>). So just as in his first teaching (<https://suttacentral.net/sn56.11/en/sujato>), and in others (e.g. <https://suttacentral.net/mn139/en/sujato>) the middle way of practice is identified as the noble eightfold path, in other words, what and how should things be done to gain liberation. As for the first of the eightfold path, right view can be defined along the lines of knowing skilful and unskilful and in other ways too (<https://suttacentral.net/mn9/en/sujato>). But it's not the case that it's left to one's common sense of what could/should be between two arbitrary positions.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 27th, 2023 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: Is there really a need for a pointing out instruction frpm

Content:

Lasse said:

Look for the looker. If you find nothing, that's the finding. You don't need a master in a room to realise that.

Astus wrote:

That may or may not be all right. The practical question is: then what? How does that help in eliminating all the ingrained unskilful and harmful habits? How does that help in developing all the skilful and beneficial qualities?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 3rd, 2023 at 11:00 PM

Title: Re: New to zen, Question on Tao

Content:

Astus wrote:

'The main thrust of the non-Buddhist teachings, however, is to establish the conduct for humanity, not to inquire into its ultimate origin. The myriad things discussed in the two teachings are limited to the phenomenal world. Although they point to the great Dao as the root, they do not completely explain agreeability and adversity, arising and ceasing, purity and defilement, or causes and conditions. Consequently, those who practice these teachings are not aware that the doctrines are provisional and cling to them as perfect teachings.'

(Treatise on the Origin of Humanity by Guifeng Zongmi, in Three Short Treatises, BDK ed, p 149)

'People today of the great kingdom of Song mostly uphold the principle of agreement between Kongzi and Laozi and the Buddha's truth. It is the gravest of wrong views, as later I shall expand.'

(Shizen-biku by Dogen, in SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 4, p 268)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 8th, 2023 at 3:33 PM

Title: Re: Before Becoming

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Before becoming (taking birth) where does the craving which leads to becoming reside?

Astus wrote:

Craving, like the other elements of the twelve links, applies to the five aggregates, i.e. the being.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 9th, 2023 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: Before Becoming

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Thank you. How does that answer the question?

Astus wrote:

The question - it seems to me - assumed that craving somehow exists on its own, in a vacuum. But that is not the case, that's how the question is answered.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 12th, 2023 at 3:46 PM

Title: Re: Modern, advanced books on Zen

Content:

Desafinado said:

Which advanced books would you recommend from the past four or five decades?

Astus wrote:

I recommend advancing beyond the "Zen" title and investigate the source material that has been studied and applied by all the outstanding bodhisattvas. Normally that means studying the sutras and treatises, but likely it's easier to begin with textbook summaries.

Buddhist Thought: A Complete Introduction to the Indian Tradition by Paul Williams, Anthony Tribe, Alexander Wynne

Chinese Buddhism: A Thematic History by Chün-fang Yü

A History of Japanese Buddhism by Kenji Matsuo

Buddhism as Philosophy: An Introduction by Mark Siderits

The Golden Age of Indian Buddhist Philosophy by Jan Westerhoff

The Way to Buddhahood: Instructions from a Modern Chinese Master by Yin-shun

The Core Teachings: Essays in Basic Buddhism by Venerable Master Hsing Yun

Orthodox Chinese Buddhism: A Contemporary Chan Master's Answers to Common Questions by Chan Master Sheng Yen

Common Questions in the Practice of Buddhism by Chan Master Sheng Yen

Then one might start going through more ancient texts, like those found

<https://www.bdkamerica.org/tripitaka-list/>,

https://www.kalavinka.org/kp_main_pages/books.htm,

<https://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra0.html>, and <https://read.84000.co/section/all-translated.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 21st, 2023 at 7:15 PM

Title: Re: Dealing with a world of self-centeredness and malice

Content:

Desafinado said:

Has Buddhism said anything related to this? Have you personally dealt with this problem? What do you think?

Astus wrote:

Is it the world's problem or yours? If it's the world's, what does it matter to you? If yours, then you have a problem to solve for yourself, not the world.

'According to the purity of his mind is his buddha land pure!'
(Vimalakirti Sutra, ch 1, BDK ed, p 78; also quoted in Platform Sutra, ch 3, BDK ed, p 38)

"Good friends, the 'sentient beings of our own minds' are the mental states of delusion, confusion, immorality, jealousy, and evil. All these are sentient beings, and we must all [undergo] automatic salvation of the self-nature. This is called true salvation. What is 'automatic salvation of the self-nature'? It is to use correct views to save the sentient beings of false views, afflictions, and stupidity within our own minds. Having correct views, we may use the wisdom of prajñā to destroy the sentient beings of stupidity and delusion, automatically saving each and every one of them. When the false occurs, it is saved by the correct. When delusion occurs, it is saved by enlightenment. When stupidity occurs, it is saved by wisdom. When evil occurs, it is saved by good. Salvation such as this is called true salvation."
(Platform Sutra, ch 6, BDK ed, p 48-49)

'If your minds are steep and crooked, then the buddha is [hidden] within the sentient being. If a single moment of thought is level and direct, then the sentient being becomes a buddha.'
(Platform Sutra, ch 10, BDK ed, p 90)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 21st, 2023 at 7:51 PM

Title: Re: is there any relationship between secular law, the precepts and karma?

Content:

dawn of peace said:

could secular law or local customs directly or indirectly have influence on the working of the karma? could breaking the secular law by itself cause bad karma?

Astus wrote:

If one has done something bad there is naturally a fear of being found out (AN 6.45), and recollecting one's virtues, living free of fear brings about calm.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 12th, 2023 at 5:03 AM

Title: Re: "My mind isn't like that"

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

My assumption when people who don't practice meditation say things like this is that they are likely wrong, and really haven't looked at their minds well enough to know what's going on well, because the skills to do so are not common.

Is that fair, or just unfounded arrogance? If so, how would you reply to someone saying a practice does not make sense to them because they "don't have that problem" when the problem being addressed is assumed to be universal by Buddhism, or even by mental-health based mindfulness practices?

Astus wrote:

It seems like the common problem that needs to be tackled by all sorts of psychological tests and questionnaires. In order to circumvent the mere idea of what one imagines and similar verbal habits the question shouldn't be a direct one, but rather something like presenting a simple situation where the answer shows clearly one's actual view.

In the <https://suttacentral.net/sn42.11/en/sujato> the Buddha points out the nature of suffering and its cause very well with reference to the pain caused by losing a loved one and the absence of pain when strangers die. There are other great discourses like that of a similar type, for instance the <https://suttacentral.net/an3.55/en/sujato> about nirvana.

At the same time, people can be and sometimes actually are quite well developed in various forms of mental powers and insight, so such a possibility should not be dismissed.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 17th, 2023 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: Enlightenment as soon as possible

Content:

chonyid bardo said:

how can one achieves enlightenment in this life, as soon as possible, right now?

Astus wrote:

'With a preceding moment of deluded thought, one was an ordinary person, but with a succeeding moment of enlightened thought, one is a buddha. To be attached to one's sensory realms in a preceding moment of thought is affliction, but to transcend the realms in a succeeding moment of thought is bodhi. ... To use wisdom to contemplate all the dharms without grasping or rejecting is to see the nature and accomplish the enlightenment of buddhahood.'

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 30, 31)

'If you suddenly realize right here and now that your own mind is originally a buddha, there is no dharma that needs to be attained and no practice that needs to be cultivated. This is the unsurpassed Way. This is the buddha of true suchness.'

(A Bird in Flight Leaves No Trace, 1.4)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 21st, 2023 at 7:29 PM

Title: Re: Logical refutations of a permanent self

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Those are objects of awareness, Even your reaction to the taste. Buddhism says that like/dislike is changing awareness but AV argues that the change happens within the scope of awareness.

Astus wrote:

Awareness/consciousness/perception/knower/etc. is bound to, dependent on, defined by its object. An awareness that is not aware of something is simply unawareness/unconsciousness/etc. no different from inanimate matter.

'Consciousness is reckoned according to the very same condition dependent upon which it arises. Consciousness that arises dependent on the eye and sights is reckoned as eye consciousness. Consciousness that arises dependent on the ear and sounds is reckoned as ear consciousness. Consciousness that arises dependent on the nose and smells is reckoned as nose consciousness. Consciousness that arises dependent on the tongue and tastes is reckoned as tongue consciousness. Consciousness that arises dependent on the body and touches is reckoned as body consciousness. Consciousness that arises dependent on the mind and ideas is reckoned as mind consciousness.

It's like fire, which is reckoned according to the very same condition dependent upon which it burns. A fire that burns dependent on logs is reckoned as a log fire. A fire that burns dependent on twigs is reckoned as a twig fire. A fire that burns dependent on grass is reckoned as a grass fire. A fire that burns dependent on cow-dung is reckoned as a cow-dung fire. A fire that burns dependent on husks is reckoned as a husk fire. A fire that burns dependent on rubbish is reckoned as a rubbish fire.

In the same way, consciousness is reckoned according to the very same condition dependent upon which it arises.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn38/en/sujato>)

'The flesh and skin are not the "I,"
And neither are the body's warmth and breath.
The cavities within the frame are not the "I,"
And "I" is not accounted for in sixfold consciousness.
If the hearing consciousness is permanent,
It follows that it's hearing all the time.
And if there is no object, what does it cognize?
On what grounds do you call it consciousness?
If something that's unconscious knows,
It follows that a stick has knowledge also.
Therefore in the absence of a thing to know,
It's clear that consciousness will not arise.
If the selfsame consciousness detects a form,
At that time, why does it not hear?
Perhaps you say the sound's no longer there.
Then neither is there consciousness of sound.'
(Bodhicaryavatara 9.59-62. tr Padmakara group)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 21st, 2023 at 10:26 PM

Title: Re: Logical refutations of a permanent self

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

So by this understanding, awareness itself isn't a "thing" but is an interactive event between subject and object, each of which lacks inherent reality.

Astus wrote:

Consciousness occurs as a result of the meeting of sense organ and sense object.

'Mendicants, consciousness exists dependent on a duality.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn35.93/en/sujato>)

'Eye consciousness arises dependent on the eye and sights. Ear consciousness arises dependent on the ear and sounds. Nose consciousness arises dependent on the nose and smells. Tongue consciousness arises dependent on the tongue and tastes. Body consciousness arises dependent on the body and touches. Mind consciousness arises dependent on the mind and ideas.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/mn148/en/sujato>)

PadmaVonSamba said:

AV asserts that there is something aware that such contact is taking place, otherwise how would it be known? Who would hear it?

Astus wrote:

The hearer cannot precede the sound when there is nothing yet to hear, so the assumption of a constant awareness is unfounded.

PadmaVonSamba said:

While I support the Buddhist model, I still think the AV model makes some logical sense (re: OP question regarding logical refutations of a permanent self).

Astus wrote:

What is the logic here that makes sense?

PadmaVonSamba said:

AV asserts that something witnesses that stream of consciousness occurring. "I am witness to the fact that there is awareness and objects of awareness". Does Buddhism reply that there is no witness, that no further witness to the interaction of subject and object is even necessary?

Astus wrote:

At the time of being aware of a sound there is no awareness of awareness, and when there is awareness of awareness, that is an after thought. There is no witness of a stream either, since neither the past nor the future thought is there, hence calling it a stream is simply an abstract idea.

The Buddhist description is quite straightforward. In order for some experience to occur, it takes three things: sense organ, sense object, sense consciousness. That's given as the eighteen elements. The experience then is called contact, and from contact comes feeling, etc. The triad of organ, object, and consciousness are very ordinary: one needs a functioning eye, one needs a visible object, and one needs to pay some attention. Remove any of the three and it is registered as an experience. But when it is registered, that's when it is perceived, that's when one can have a thought and intention related to that. And that's where the whole business of dependent origination, conditioning, karma, and suffering come into the picture.

On the other hand, to assume a witness behind all things, that simply clouds one's perception of what's going on and is a false escape, because having the experience of being the witness of whatever is happening is just another temporary state of mind misconstrued as self.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 22nd, 2023 at 6:41 AM

Title: Re: Logical refutations of a permanent self

Content:

SvatahSiddha said:

Buddha nature is the unconditioned awareness that knows conditions.

Astus wrote:

Such an unconditioned awareness is an impossibility, as no functional thing can be unconditioned, because function itself requires relating to other things.

'There is not anywhere anything
That ever exists without depending.
Thus never is there anywhere
Anything that is permanent.
There is no functional thing without a cause,
Nor anything permanent which has a cause.
Thus the one who knows suchness said what has
Come about causelessly does not exist.
If the unproduced is permanent
Because impermanent [things] are seen to be products,
Seeing that the produced exists
Would make the permanent non-existent.'
(Catuhsataka, 9.202-204, tr Ruth Sonam)

SvatahSiddha said:

Regardless of the unfolding conditions elaborated upon, the manas, the consciousness of a self, is always first condition to arrive and last to disappear.

Astus wrote:

Manas in Yogacara has the function of misapprehending the storehouse consciousness as self, but that's a delusion, the cause of samsara, not that somehow there actually is a self. Also, Yogacara maintains the momentary and conditioned nature of all eight consciousnesses.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 22nd, 2023 at 4:01 PM

Title: Re: Logical refutations of a permanent self

Content:

SvatahSiddha said:

Buddha nature not a functional thing; it is uncaused; it is realized as the unconditioned when the repository consciousness is emptied.

Astus wrote:

If buddha nature has no function it is practically no different from being non-existent, since it does nothing and is good for nothing. So what's the point of even supposing it?

SvatahSiddha said:

As we see in the quote from the Nibbāna Sutta, the Buddha is clear that there is the unconditioned and that it is the reason why the buddhadharma is available.

Astus wrote:

It says there is an unconditioned, it does not say it is an awareness. Rather, as the Asaṅkhatasutta (<https://suttacentral.net/sn43.12/en/sujato>) and other discourses state: 'The ending of greed, hate, and delusion. This is called the unconditioned.'

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 22nd, 2023 at 4:24 PM

Title: Re: Logical refutations of a permanent self

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

But that's only if unconditioned awareness itself were a "thing" isn't it? Space isn't conditioned but things fill it. So why can't things fill awareness without awareness being conditioned?

Astus wrote:

Space, as a "non-thing" is simply a non-existent, a conceptual abstraction even on a conventional level. Similarly, an unconditioned awareness is the abstract idea of self of non-Buddhists that is invalid even on the conventional level.

'That space and so forth are permanent
Is a conception of common beings.
For the wise they are not objects perceived
Even by conventional [valid cognition].'
(Catuhsataka 9.205, tr Ruth Sonam)

'Indeed! This self, if permanent,
Is certainly inert like space itself.
And should it meet with other factors,

How could they affect it, since it is unchanging?'
(Bodhicaryavatara 6.29, tr Padmakara group)

If there were a permanent self/consciousness, it'd have nothing to do with liberation. In fact, liberation itself would be impossible.

'How can what is permanent be harmed,
Or the unharmed be liberated?
Liberation is irrelevant
For one whose self is permanent. '
(Catuhsataka 10.244)

'Then the Buddha, picking up a little bit of dirt under his fingernail, addressed that mendicant: "There's not even this much of any consciousness that's permanent, everlasting, eternal, imperishable, and will last forever and ever. If there were, this living of the spiritual life for the complete ending of suffering would not be found. But since there isn't, this living of the spiritual life for the complete ending of suffering is found."
(<https://suttacentral.net/sn22.97/en/sujato>)

"Mendicants, it would make sense to be possessive about something that's permanent, everlasting, eternal, imperishable, and will last forever and ever. But do you see any such possession?" "No, sir." "Good, mendicants! I also can't see any such possession. It would make sense to grasp at a doctrine of self that didn't give rise to sorrow, lamentation, pain, sadness, and distress. But do you see any such doctrine of self?" "No, sir." "Good, mendicants! I also can't see any such doctrine of self."
(<https://suttacentral.net/mn22/en/sujato>)

Author: Astus
Date: Saturday, December 23rd, 2023 at 2:08 AM
Title: Re: Logical refutations of a permanent self
Content:
PadmaVonSamba said:
Space is not dependently arising.

Astus wrote:
If so, then it cannot interact with anything, nothing could be in it, or 'take up space'.

PadmaVonSamba said:
Aggregation and dependent arising are the criteria buddhist theory uses to refute the true existence of things. Space has neither, yet everything is obviously occupying space. So, you can't say that there's no space.

Astus wrote:
Space exists as a mere concept, and not something that is 'obviously occupied'.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Aryadeva may not have been able to perceive space, but I'm perceiving it right now. At least let's say that I have awareness of it. It's very 3D, btw.

Astus wrote:

If you perceive it, is it something you can see or hear? If none of the five senses can perceive it, then what's left is thought, therefore space is a concept.

PadmaVonSamba said:

The AV's would argue that a permanent self is what is already liberated, just as Buddhists assert that the mind's true nature is already Buddha, but that all this samsaric attachment is just standing in the way of realizing it.

Astus wrote:

If it's already liberated, then it has no need for any teaching, thus the spiritual path is useless. If it has attachment though, then since it's permanent, it's never going to be liberated. If attachment and liberation has nothing to do with a permanent self, then no reason to even theorise it.

PadmaVonSamba said:

If that's the case, then why wouldn't that contradict the Mahayana assertion of "buddhahood" which says that Buddhas continue to exercise functional awareness?

Astus wrote:

Buddhas do not continue to exist, that's one of the wrong views. See e.g. <https://suttacentral.net/sn22.85/en/sujato>, MMK ch. 22.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Per the question posed by the OP (are there logical refutations of a permanent self), I think the problem with talking about the "self" is that "self" is an abstract concept like "god" or "art".

You can say such and such thing is (a work of) art but you can't say that "art" is absolutely definable as this or that.

Astus wrote:

Self is always something related to the aggregates (<https://suttacentral.net/sn22.47/en/sujato>), and as such is the root of all the wrong views (<https://suttacentral.net/sn41.3/en/sujato>).

PadmaVonSamba said:

Buddhism thus asserts that No thing can be found which can be called a self.

Astus wrote:

The 20 possibilities of asserting a self (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) is refuted, thus there is no room left to assume some special case of a self.

PadmaVonSamba said:

1. awareness has no characteristics.

2. Individual streams of consciousness are not parts of some great consciousness (god).

Astus wrote:

Consciousness has characteristics. Not all hindu philosophies assume a universal consciousness.

PadmaVonSamba said:

I think the best refutation of the 'self' argument, using the very logic of those who assert it, is that any notion of a 'self' is already (by virtue of being a concept) an object of awareness and therefore cannot be awareness. In other words, you can't say that awareness is self, or is god, or some combination of the two, because then it becomes an object of awareness instead of awareness.

Astus wrote:

That might work for Vedanta, so they can maintain an ultimate subject, but not so from a Buddhist perspective.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 23rd, 2023 at 2:17 AM

Title: Re: Logical refutations of a permanent self

Content:

Anders said:

Most of the ontological refutations run into trouble the moment you point the same razor to Nirvana. Which is basically the same as Atman except it's not self and therefore not something that can ultimately be apprehended as real either.

Astus wrote:

Atman has some defining qualities, like consciousness, permanence, and existence. Nirvana is basically the end of defilements and not a special thing.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 23rd, 2023 at 6:29 AM

Title: Re: Logical refutations of a permanent self

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

yes, I am perceiving the relative distance between objects. I am perceiving there is a hole in the middle of a donut. I have two functioning eyes and therefore depth perception.

Astus wrote:

What you describe - and what I presume you call the obvious space - is the conditioned space, the space element. See for instance: Abhidharmakosa 1.28.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Just because your senses cannot perceive something doesn't mean it's only a concept.

Astus wrote:

If something is not perceived by the physical senses, then it is by definition experienced as a concept, a thought, a mental phenomenon.

PadmaVonSamba said:

If the true nature of mind is not already enlightened, then no amount of teachings can liberate it.

Astus wrote:

Liberation is the ending of the defilements. That can happen only if the mind is changeable. A permanent mind is stuck forever in whatever state it is in.

PadmaVonSamba said:

In other words, the true nature of mind is already full luminous and infinite, i.e., bodhi but attachment obscures that, like clouds block the Sun which is always shining.

Astus wrote:

That is a fine parable, but it does not mean a hidden unchanging awareness. A piece of chocolate is emptiness, is suchness in its true nature, but perceiving it as a substantial entity with a desirable quality turns it into an object of sensual lust and thus a source of many suffering. That's how the chocolate's luminous, undefiled state is obscured by the clouds of ignorance. Similarly, the mind is without any permanent essence, but misconstruing it as one's true self, there is much conceit and craving.

PadmaVonSamba said:

That's a difference in view between Mahayana and Theravada. So if you are quoting Pali scriptures then yes, that's valid. But not valid in Mahayana.

Astus wrote:

There is no disagreement here.

“In that case, Anurādha, since you don't actually find the Realized One in the present life, is it appropriate to declare: ‘Reverends, when a Realized One is describing a Realized One—a supreme person, highest of people, who has reached the highest point—they describe them other than these four ways: After death, a Realized One still exists, or no longer exists, or both still exists and no longer exists, or neither still exists nor no longer exists’?”

“No, sir.”

“Good, good, Anurādha! In the past, as today, what I describe is suffering and the cessation of suffering.”

(<https://suttacentral.net/sn22.86/en/sujato>, see also:

<https://suttacentral.net/mn72/en/sujato>, <https://suttacentral.net/an7.54/en/sujato>)

'Now that the Lord has passed into nirvana,

We cannot say that he exists.

Likewise “he does not exist” we cannot say.

And neither both nor neither can we say of him.
And when the Lord was still alive,
We cannot say that he existed.
Likewise “he did not exist” we cannot say.
And neither both nor neither can we say of him.'
(MMK 25.17-18, tr Padmakara group; see also MMK 22)

'In nirvana there are no aggregates
And there cannot be a person.
What nirvana is there for one
Who is not seen in nirvana?'
(Catuhsataka 9.221, tr Ruth Sonam)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 23rd, 2023 at 4:20 PM

Title: Re: Logical refutations of a permanent self

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

3D depth is a concept and you are also directly experiencing it. And if you have depth perception, then you are perceiving it with the senses.

Astus wrote:

That is not even perceiving space but the spatial dimensions of visual objects, i.e. their form.

PadmaVonSamba said:

But what is it which is aware of and experiences the ending of the defilements? The point is, anything that you can say is changeable isn't awareness. It's an object of awareness.

Astus wrote:

There is no experience without awareness. To say that experience consists of an object and a subject is a conceptual explanation. Awareness does not exist on its own, only as awareness of something. Trying to carve out a distinct subject apart from the object renders awareness meaningless, as there's never an awareness unaware of something. What experiences, that is consciousness with its various mental factors, in other words: the four mental aggregates. So the five aggregates is the teaching used to refute all forms of self concepts and show the conditioned and compounded nature of mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 24th, 2023 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: Logical refutations of a permanent self

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Depth of space is definitely perceived visually. So are holes in donuts.

Astus wrote:

Depth, distance, those are not seeing space but the dimensions of visual objects. Holes, etc. are called the space element, and it is conditioned.

PadmaVonSamba said:

What you are saying is that neither awareness nor objects to of awareness exist or even occur until they meet. how is that logical?

Astus wrote:

What I'm saying is that dividing experience to subject and object is an after thought. There is no awareness on its own, outside experience, nor is there something that one is aware of apart from its presence in experience. So to say that awareness meets its object is a secondary division that's possible after experience happened.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Neither consciousness nor objects of consciousness are experienced. It's the interaction of the two which is our experience.

Astus wrote:

Going back to the standard description: sense organ + sense object > consciousness. The three (organ, object, consciousness) together is contact, and with contact comes feeling, perception, and intention. They all give what is experienced and how it is experienced. When it is consciousness (as the sense organ) meeting its object, that too goes with the many conditions and factors.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Awareness can't be experienced, because it is what is experiencing. Objects of awareness lack intrinsic existence.

Astus wrote:

There is no distinct subject, no distinct consciousness to do the experiencing. If there was, it would mean awareness can exist without being aware of anything.

PadmaVonSamba said:

are you saying that aggregates are consciousness? The aggregates (form, feeling, perception, formation) are all objects of awareness. They are what is experienced. So how can they be what is doing the experiencing?

Astus wrote:

Consciousness does not occur without feeling, perception, formation. To feel something is to experience it, there is no meaning in or a place for a second experiencer. In other words, experience is a complex, conditioned process without any agent doing it.

Here's a summary of how consciousness is defined in where assuming an entity is avoided.

'In the Abhidhamma psychology, bare consciousness, that which constitutes the knowing or awareness of an object, is called citta. It can never arise in its true separate condition. It always arises in immediate conjunction with mental factors, the factors that perform more specialized tasks in the act of cognition. In the books of the Abhidhamma Piṭaka the individual nature of consciousness is often sought to be described by positioning it in relation to other basic factors (dhamma) into which individual existence is analyzed. This perhaps explains why we do not find in them a formal definition of consciousness.

In the Abhidhamma exegesis we find consciousness being defined in three different ways. The first is by way of agent (kattu-sādhana): "Consciousness is that which cognizes an object" (ārammaṇaṃ cinteti ti cittaṃ). It is of course true that apart from the object (ārammaṇa), there are other conditions, such as immediate contiguity (samanantara) and support (nissaya) necessary for the genesis of consciousness. However, if they are not mentioned here it is because even if they are present, consciousness cannot arise without the object condition. The importance given to the object is also shown by the fact that consciousness is also defined as "that which grasps the object" (ārammaṇika). This definition is intended to refute the wrong notion that consciousness can arise without an object (nirālambaṇavāda).

The second definition is by way of instrument (karaṇasādhana): "Consciousness is that through which the concomitant mental factors cognize the object" (etena cinteti ti cittaṃ). In this definition, while consciousness becomes the instrument, the concomitant mental factors become the agent. The third definition is by way of activity or mode of operation (bhāva-sādhana): "Consciousness is the mere act of cognizing the object" (cintanamattam'eva cittaṃ).

It is only the third definition that is valid from an ultimate point of view (nippariyāyato), because, strictly speaking, consciousness is neither that which cognizes (agent) nor that through which cognition takes place (instrument), but is only the process of cognizing an object. As a basic factor of actuality (dhamma), consciousness is the mere occurrence due to conditions.

It is not an entity but an activity, an activity without an actor behind it. The point being emphasized is that there is no conscious subject behind consciousness. Therefore the two definitions by way of agent and instrument are to be understood as provisional defining devices. Their purpose is to facilitate our understanding (sukha-gahaṇattham) of the nature of consciousness and, more important, to refute the wrong belief that a permanent self-entity is the agent or instrument of cognition.

If there is an agent or an instrument of cognition, it is not beneath or behind the mental phenomena into which the mental continuum is analyzed.'

(Theravada Abhidhamma by Y. Karunadasa, ch 5)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 24th, 2023 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: Logical refutations of a permanent self

Content:

SvatahSiddha said:

The unconditioned is found via the undoing of conditions; the first and last delusion is the manas; it is the manas that allows greed and hate to arise via the activity of the conceptual consciousness.

If the ending of the ending of greed, hate, and delusion left anything behind, what is left wouldn't be unconditioned.

Likewise, if the unconditioned was just the ending of a subset of conditions then how would it allow the path to be discerned?

Astus wrote:

With an unconditioned mind no path, no liberation is possible, and it's no different from the view of self professed by non-Buddhists.

'Your position is untenable. Those scriptural quotations explain the way of realizing selflessness. They reference the Buddha's actualization of selflessness with the terms such as "actualizing the self." When the genuine beings fully comprehend the freedom from elaborations, the freedom from elaborations is sometimes labeled with the term "self." You, however, simply did not understand this point.

If an ultimate self existed, sentient beings would either have no chance whatever of gaining liberation from saṃsāra or would gain liberation without any effort at all. One of those two situations would absurdly follow. For, firstly, due to the ultimate existence of the self, some beings would be bound in saṃsāra while others would be liberated in nirvāṇa — desire to change this would be impossible. And, secondly, the ultimate self is perceived, according to you, by the perception of a correct consciousness, unlike the self of the relative. Your assertion resembles that of Īshvara! If a self existed ultimately, this existence would contradict all of the Transcendent Conqueror's teachings about the selflessness of all phenomena of saṃsāra and nirvāṇa.'

(The Karmapa's Middle Way: Feast for the Fortunate, p 402-403)

As for what buddha-nature means:

'By what reasoning can it be shown that sentient beings have Buddha-nature? Because all sentient beings are pervaded by the emptiness of Dharmakaya, because there are no differentiations in the nature of suchness, and because all beings have a "family " For these three reasons, all sentient beings are of the Buddha-nature. ...

To explain the first reason "all sentient beings are pervaded by the emptiness of Dharmakaya" means that the ultimate Buddhahood is Dharmakaya, Dharmakaya is all-pervading emptiness, and emptiness pervades all sentient beings Therefore, all sentient beings are of the Buddha-nature.

Saying "there are no differentiations in the nature of suchness" means that the suchness of the Buddha is identical to the suchness of sentient beings None is better or worse, none is bigger or smaller, none is higher or lower So, because of that, all sentient beings are of the Buddha-nature.'

(The Jewel Ornament of Liberation, p 49-50)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 24th, 2023 at 5:02 PM

Title: Re: Logical refutations of a permanent self

Content:

SvatahSiddha said:

No one is talking about an unconditioned mind though, not even the quote you're providing, it talks about an ultimate self not unconditioned mind.

Astus wrote:

Such an unconditioned mind/awareness is what your interpretation seems to be, as you have stated before:

SvatahSiddha said:

Buddha nature is the unconditioned awareness that knows conditions.

Astus wrote:

Thus such an assertion is no different from the view of a permanent self. If you say it's not that, what is the difference?

SvatahSiddha said:

The dharmakaya is uncaused and all conditions arise from it; this is how and why there is a complete lack of any independent causation or origination to be found. claim to be.

Astus wrote:

If the dharmakaya were the source of all phenomena, how is that unlike a creator god?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 24th, 2023 at 5:15 PM

Title: Re: Logical refutations of a permanent self

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

How is the view that awareness arises when senses & sense consciousness meet objects of consciousness really any different from the materialist view that awareness arises from physical matter (the brain)?

The sense organs and brain are physical matter.

Astus wrote:

It's the meeting of sense organ (e.g. eye) and sense object (e.g. form) when consciousness becomes. In other words, when one sees a tree there arises the thought of a tree. That's how it simply works for us all. It's nothing to do with materialism, but with ordinary perception. See the explanation posted before
<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=682029#p682029>.

PadmaVonSamba said:

If we make the distinction between senses and sense consciousness (which materialists don't do) then from where does sense consciousness arise?

If we say that without objects of consciousness that consciousness doesn't arise, then how is that different than saying consciousness arises from objects?

If we say that there is something that already exists which is not an object of awareness that arises to meet objects (and subsequently result in consciousness) then why is that not a permanent self?

Astus wrote:

None of that applies.

Consciousness arises from the meeting of organ and object.

There is no separate existence of object and consciousness stated.

We don't say that.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 25th, 2023 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: Logical refutations of a permanent self

Content:

SvatahSiddha said:

Mind, the conceptual consciousness, is both a result and a cause, it rests firmly within conditions; there is no unconditioned mind.

Unconditioned awareness is simply, as longchenpa said, the "original purity" of "timeless awareness" that the realization of is a breakthrough into "buddhahood without meditation."

Astus wrote:

What is the difference between mind and awareness? Isn't awareness what is aware of appearances? If it is, then it performs the same function as mind/consciousness, and so it is conditioned. If it is not aware of things, what does it do then and why call it awareness?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 25th, 2023 at 8:10 AM

Title: Re: Logical refutations of a permanent self

Content:

SvatahSiddha said:

Mind, the conceptual consciousness, is the process of generating the understandings that relate phenomena to the sense of self, i.e., the manas.

It is the products of the conceptual consciousness that populate the repository consciousness and, from there, form the basis for the conditions of future experience.

Awareness, buddha nature, is what is aware of appearances, yes, but it performs no function.

Astus wrote:

Conceptual understanding and other mental phenomena are the products of the four mental aggregates together.

Awareness of appearances is the very function of the fifth aggregate, consciousness, and it is a conditioned process dependent on various factors.

So, to assume that there is an unconditioned awareness is mistaking the changing and impermanent consciousness aggregate as something continuous and permanent.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 25th, 2023 at 7:09 PM

Title: Re: Logical refutations of a permanent self

Content:

SvatahSiddha said:

Again, are you saying these to longchenpa and the buddha?

Obviously, they knew what they were talking about and this objection wasn't applicable.

Why don't you address their words?

Astus wrote:

I'm questioning your interpretation and presentation of their words. If Longchenpa and the Lankavatara Sutra advocated atmavada, then they should not be considered in harmony with the established Buddhist view. So why don't you explain the reason you believe there to be an unconditioned awareness that is in direct contradiction with the doctrine of no self?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 25th, 2023 at 7:13 PM

Title: Re: Logical refutations of a permanent self

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

But there is a difference between a permanent consciousness and a never ending stream of consciousness, just like the difference between water trapped in a water globe and a river that is constantly changing.

Astus wrote:

A stream is like a row of ants, only nominal. Nothing goes from one state of consciousness to the next. Similarly, causal continuity applies not only to mind but to cups and snowmen as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 8th, 2024 at 4:59 AM

Title: Re: Question about "unshakeable causes" from Gampopa Jewel Ornament of Liberation

Content:

truthb said:

In the section on Impermanence, Gampopa concludes with a discussion of faith.

Concerning Trusting Faith one sentence reads:

"Trust that the happiness of the two higher realms is the result of unshakeable causes."

Anyone know what he is discussing here?

Astus wrote:

Gampopa explains it later on p 118-120.

'[There are three actions:] (1) meritorious actions, (2) demeritorious actions and (3) immovable [aniñja] actions. [Moreover,] there are three actions of which the action conducive to pleasant experience is the first. Meritorious action is good action in the realm of desire; immovable action is good action above [the realm of desire].'

(Abhidharmakośabhāṣya, 4.45cd-46ab, vol 2 p 1374)

See also: <https://suttacentral.net/mn106/en/sujato>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 17th, 2024 at 7:09 PM

Title: Re: The Dharmakaya in Mahayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

'When all the brittle twigs of what is known
Are burned, peace comes – the Victor's dharma form.
And then there is no birth and no decay,
The mind will cease, the kāya manifest.'

(<https://www2.hf.uio.no/polyglotta/index.php?page=record&vid=1113&mid=1927492>)

'Dharmakaya is all-pervading emptiness'

(Jewel Ornament of Liberation, p 50)

'Dharmakaya is merely labeled as the exhaustion of all errors through realization of the meaning of the all-pervading emptiness of all phenomena, or as the mere reverse of the nature of confused projection. In reality, it does not possess in any way whatsoever the identification, characteristics, or the designation of "Dharmakaya." This is just as Milarepa said.

If expressed from another angle, Dharmakaya has eight characteristics:

1. Sameness. There is no difference between the Dharmakaya of all the Buddhas.
2. Profundity. Because it is free from all elaboration, it is difficult to realize.
3. Permanence. It is not compound; it has no beginning, middle, or end; and it is free from birth and cessation.
4. Oneness. It is indivisible because the Dharmadhatu and primordial wisdom cannot be differentiated.

5. Perfection. It is unmistakable because it is beyond exaggeration and underestimation.
6. Purity. It is free from the three obscurations.
7. Radiance. There are no discursive thoughts; only nonconceptual thoughts are projected in the nonconceptual state.
8. Relationship to Enjoyment. Embodying the nature of vast good qualities, it is the foundation of the complete enjoyment (Sambhogakaya).'
(Jewel Ornament of Liberation, p 288-289)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 18th, 2024 at 7:10 PM

Title: Re: Relationship Between Mahayana Sutras And Abhidharma

Content:

vgh238 said:

i have been sort of wondering, whats the relationship between the mahayana sutras such as prajnaparamita series or Suramgamasamadhisutra and commentaries such as abhidharmakosabhasya by vasubhandu is the abhidharma the essence of those mahayana sutras or is the relationship between them more complicated and how should i approach them together.
thank you for any answers

Astus wrote:

Mahayana sutras can mention/use/refer to various concepts found in different abhidharma literature (see e.g.

https://serval.unil.ch/resource/serval:BIB_ADB8A4E3744C.P001/REF.pdf).

Most of the extant abhidharma works represent different non-Mahayana Buddhist schools.

The main Mahayana abhidharma works are the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Abhidharma-samuccaya> and the

http://www.cttbusa.org/100shastra/100dharma_1.asp.html

(<https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T31n1614>), although other works might also be categorised as such.

One can approach non-Mahayana abhidharma material as representatives of specific interpretations of Indian Buddhism, and many of those ideas live on in Mahayana, either accepted as they are, or in a reinterpreted form, or as something rejected.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 18th, 2024 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: Relationship Between Mahayana Sutras And Abhidharma

Content:

Aemilius said:

In Entering the Middle Way (Madhyamaka-avatara), Chapter 6, Chandrakirti says:

" The Buddha unqualifiedly rejected the ultimate reality of both mind and material forms in the Perfection of Wisdom Texts, while in the Abhidharma he affirmed the conventional reality of both of them. [93]" in Indian Madhyamaka Buddhist Philosophy After Nagarjuna, Volume 2, translated with notes and commentaries by Richard H. Jones, Jackson Square Books, New York, 2012.

Astus wrote:

It's in the

<https://www2.hf.uio.no/polyglotta/index.php?page=record&vid=1113&mid=1927303>

(https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/zh/B09n0045_p0735b24), but it actually says something different.

In general, mental and material dharmas in Abhidharma are ultimate realities, not conventional.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 19th, 2024 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: The Dharmakaya in Mahayana

Content:

Shinjin said:

What's the difference with Nirguna Brahman besides Dharmakaya being non self?

Astus wrote:

Dharmakaya is the term for a buddha's realisation/wisdom of emptiness. Nirguna Brahman is eternal, ultimately existing consciousness. Quite different.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 20th, 2024 at 12:11 AM

Title: Re: Relationship Between Mahayana Sutras And Abhidharma

Content:

Sādhaka said:

Could you explain your statement a bit more and/or provide some quotes?

Astus wrote:

Ultimate has a somewhat different meaning in Abhidharma. It means that something is actually a thing (i.e. dharma), an effective force. It does not mean it is necessarily eternal.

An example:

'The cognition [buddhi] of a pitcher ends when the pitcher is broken; the cognition of water ends when, in the mind [dhi], one analyzes [anyāpoha] water. The pitcher and the water, and all that resembles them, exist relatively or conventionally. The rest exists absolutely.'

(ABK 6.4; vol 3, p 1891)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 20th, 2024 at 7:32 AM

Title: Re: Relationship Between Mahayana Sutras And Abhidharma

Content:

Sādhaka said:

Although what does “The rest exists absolutely.” mean here?

Astus wrote:

The term is 'paramārthasat'. From the auto-commentary (p 1892):

'Therein, even when a thing is being broken - or [likewise, even when its (constituent) factors] are mentally removed - and the cognition of this thing continues, this thing exists absolutely (paramārthasat). For example, visible form (rūpa): for, therein, when a visible [thing (vastu)] is broken into atoms or infinitesimal particles [paramāṇu] and when taste [rasa] and the other factors have been mentally removed, the cognition of the intrinsic nature [svabhāva] of visible form persists. Sensation [vedanā], etc., is also to be seen in the same way. As this exists absolutely (paramārthasat), this is absolute truth (paramārthasatya).'

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 21st, 2024 at 6:44 PM

Title: Re: New book on Ch'an

Content:

Astus wrote:

I see no good reason to obtain a book that's based on anti-Buddhist ideas and propagates a view that's opposed to Chan itself.

If it's the translations of Chan texts, there are others available. If it's scholarship, there are proper studies to read. If it's Chan and Daoism, try Linguistic Strategies in Daoist Zhuangzi and Chan Buddhism by Youru Wang.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 22nd, 2024 at 4:35 PM

Title: Re: Which of the following activities do you consider sexual misconduct?

(continued)

Content:

Charles Jones said:

The lay precept is deliberately vague: just don't commit sexual misconduct. But then, what constitutes sexual misconduct?

Astus wrote:

It is not that vague. Sexual misconduct (kāmesumicchācāra/kāmamithyācāra) has a standard definition (e.g. MN 41, MN 114; <https://read.84000.co/translation/UT22084-068-021.html#UT22084-068-021-4413>) of avoiding women who have a guardian or are protected in other ways. Another way to put it is contentment with one's wife (AN 5.179, Snp 1.6; <https://read.84000.co/translation/toh44-31.html#UT22084-036-002-462>). For other references on the extended rules

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=480779#p480779>.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 22nd, 2024 at 11:45 PM

Title: Re: Which of the following activities do you consider sexual misconduct?
(continued)

Content:

Zhen Li said:

This is true, but not everyone is a textual absolutist. How the third precept is discussed/interpreted in contemporary circles seems to incorporate some culturally/temporally specific attitudes and views.

Astus wrote:

I might be missing something here - like the contemporary interpretations - but the basic formulation is supposed to be simple enough, 'easy for householders to abstain from it' (AKB 4.33, vol 2, p 1352). Might be reformatted as not to cheat or be the one who is cheated with.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 23rd, 2024 at 7:52 PM

Title: Re: New book on Ch'an

Content:

tingdzin said:

what specifically is anti-Buddhist in it?

Astus wrote:

The basic concept of claiming that Chan is Taoism with different words. As the introduction (p 3) states:

'This is a revisionary history of Ch'an in a number of ways, a project of recovery. It traces the development of Ch'an's deepest philosophical levels, the conceptual assumptions that make awakening possible and are largely lost in modern Zen practice and literature (as China Root demonstrates). This history reveals Ch'an to be essentially a refinement and extension of Taoism - again, as China Root demonstrates.'

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 23rd, 2024 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: Which of the following activities do you consider sexual misconduct?
(continued)

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Yeah, well, that reformatting is an example of the kind of contemporary interpretation you hear. We do this because, if you read the scriptural formulations, it is often worded in ways that sound inapplicable today. Not only don't we talk in terms of being bound to another, but our common sense understanding of the most serious kinds of sexual misconduct (see the poll in the previous thread) is not encompassed by them.

Astus wrote:

Old texts may sound inapplicable today, but for that the solution is the old approach of looking for the meaning instead of just the words. People were attached to their loved ones millennia ago just as they are today. The fear of having an unfaithful partner, the fear of being found out, and the pain of being cheated on is recognised in ancient texts just as it is well known today. Furthermore, if it is accepted that sexual misconduct can have long term consequences because it is one of the ten unwholesome actions, what it means cannot be something specific to time and place but quite universal, a basic law of how things work. Like this: 'If someone were to have sexual relations with my wives, I wouldn't like it. But if I were to have sexual relations with someone else's wives, he wouldn't like that either.' (<https://suttacentral.net/sn55.7/en/sujato>) Similarly, in some discourses (like DN 4, DN 26, AN 3.65-66, AN 5.174, Dhp 18.246) approaching another's wife (paradāraṃ gacchati - i.e. adultery) is used instead of sexual misconduct. And, in line with that, not being unfaithful (anaticariyā) is applied to both husband and wife (DN 31).

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 28th, 2024 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: Two truths question

Content:

Rick said:

Per Nagarjuna and Madhyamaka, are the two truths (conventional, ultimate) actually

Astus wrote:

Conventional are dependently arisen conceptual fabrications commonly accepted as real. That there is no essence in/beyond conventions is called the ultimate. Therefore mistaking the conventional as ultimate is the conventional, and seeing the conventional as just conventional is the ultimate. So the two truths are not things to be identical or different but simply conventional methods.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 28th, 2024 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: Two truths question

Content:

Rick said:

But there are Buddhists that posit a third truth, right? Not the middle truth of Tiantai, rather a kind of 'ultimate ultimate truth' — ineffable nondual tathata dharmakaya kind of non-thing?

Astus wrote:

It is the ultimate truth of emptiness that is also called suchness, and is ineffable and inconceivable.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 29th, 2024 at 1:48 AM

Title: Re: Two truths question

Content:

Rick said:

Why include the unfathomable tathata with the fathomable sunyata/pratityasamutpada? Avoiding that seems like a good reason for having a level of the unfathomable above (alongside) the fathomable ultimate.

Astus wrote:

Suchness is another term for emptiness. It is ineffable and inconceivable because there is nothing to name or cognise, as emptiness means the absence of an essence, a substance, a self. It is not that there is a special experience that is so otherworldly one cannot put it into words.

Sugar is sweet, salt is salty - that's how they are. To make an issue out of taste is not seeing its suchness, its empty, meaningless, insubstantial quality, but grasping at an idea and giving free rein to like and dislike. That's when one mistakes the conventional as ultimate.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 29th, 2024 at 2:58 AM

Title: Re: Two truths question

Content:

Rick said:

From what I read online the Madhyamaka interpretation you present here isn't universally accepted by Buddhists. Some schools, Vajrayana Yogacara Zen for example, differentiate nontrivially between sunyata and tathata (with the latter leaning a bit towards woo-woo-ishness). True?

Astus wrote:

I don't see it with those schools either. But it's natural that individuals imagine so before they are more familiar with the teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 29th, 2024 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: No-Self Concept

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huangbo Xiyun put it this way (Bird in Flight Leaves No Trace, 1.4):

'Practitioners of the Way, have no doubt that the four great elements constitute the body, that these four great elements have no self, and that the self has no master.

Know that this body has no self and no master. The five aggregates are mind, but the five aggregates have no self and no master.

Know therefore that this mind has no self and no master. The six sense bases, six sense objects, and six sense consciousnesses come into contact with each other and become subject to production and cessation, so this is also the case with them as well. Since these eighteen elements of cognition are empty, everything is empty. There is only the original mind, which is serene and pure.'

This sums up the standard analysis according to the four great elements (<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Mah%C4%81bh%C5%ABta#Buddhism>), five aggregates (<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Skandha>), and the eighteen elements (<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/%C4%80yatana>). How does it apply to everyday activities? Hunagbo continues:

'There is the nutriment of consciousness and the nutriment of wisdom. The body consisting of the four great elements is tormented by hunger and disease. Nurturing this body with only what it needs, without generating greed and craving, is called the nutriment of wisdom. Self-indulgently clinging to what is tasty, mistakenly giving rise to discrimination, seeking out only what pleases your taste buds, and without generating any sense of loathing — this is called the nutriment of consciousness.'

Just as Sengcan wrote (Three Chan Classics, BDK ed, p 123):

'The perfect Way is not difficult;
It only avoids discrimination.
If only there is no love or hate,
Completely clean and clear is it.'

The teaching of no-self is to develop the wisdom that cuts the root of greed, hatred, and delusion. In other words, one is concerned or anxious when something is perceived as impacting oneself or things/beings belonging to oneself. But when the mind is peaceful, not upset by self-centred emotions, there is openness with understanding and compassion.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 30th, 2024 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: Two truths question

Content:

Rick said:

I am drawn to the Buddhist teachers/teachings that see ultimate truth as having an effable and ineffable aspect.

Astus wrote:

Most of them are like that, even some in Madhyamaka, like Bhavaviveka and Jnanagarbha.

'Ultimate truth is free of all conceptual projection. It is of two types: the ultimate truth that can be expressed, and the ultimate truth that cannot be expressed. The former is of two kinds: the ultimate truth expressed in terms of argument, and the ultimate truth expressed in terms of arising.

The “ultimate truth expressed in terms of argument” is concerned with the reasons refuting the four options concerning arising. (That is, the argument that something arises from itself, from something else, from both itself and something, and from neither itself or something else.) The “ultimate truth expressed in terms of arising” negates the true arising of every apparent entity.

What is empty of all conceptual projection, clear and subtle, is known as the “ultimate truth that cannot be expressed in words.” The ultimate truth is approximately this: totally empty of the two extremes of “being” and “nonbeing” (i.e., neither eternal nor totally nonexistent).'

(Summary on the Meaning of the Middle Way by Bhavaviveka, v 4-8; tr Richard H. Jones)

Others, like Atisa, disagree.

'The ultimate is one only. Others maintain that it is twofold. How can the nature of reality (chos nyid), which cannot be established as anything, be two, three, and so on? [The ultimate] is defined as nonarising, noncessation, and so forth according to the formula [given] by treatises. Because of the way in which different ultimates do not exist, there is neither a subject (chos can) nor its property (chos nyid) [for inferential reasoning]. There is not any differentiation in emptiness. When cognized in a nonconceptual manner, it is conventionally designated that “emptiness is seen.”'

(Entry to the Two Realities by Atisa, v 4-6; tr James B. Apple)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 30th, 2024 at 6:22 AM

Title: Re: Two truths question

Content:

Rick said:

Should you be comfortable sharing, do you think it's useful/illuminating to ascribe aspects to ultimate truth?

Astus wrote:

Ultimate truth is a term with various meanings in Buddhism. What matters is whether the definition one has a liking of is something helpful in reducing troublesome qualities and increasing beneficial ones. For instance, in the various abhidharma systems all the dharmas are considered ultimate. But they are not aspects of a single ultimate.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 1st, 2024 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: Which of the following activities do you consider sexual misconduct?

(continued)

Content:

tingdzin said:

I also disagree with the notion that there must be some universal at work in determining what is and is not ethical.

Astus wrote:

Karma is quite the universal ethical principle that applies even to non-human beings. Also, in what situation is this not valid: 'If someone were to have sexual relations with my wives, I wouldn't like it. But if I were to have sexual relations with someone else's wives, he wouldn't like that either.' (<https://suttacentral.net/sn55.7/en/sujato>)?

tingdzin said:

Such things as polygamy and polyandry, for example, would not necessarily cause such unwholesome emotions as jealousy if they had long been acceptable to the society a person grew up in, because they would not be necessarily be regarded as a betrayal.

Astus wrote:

Sexual misconduct is not about monogamy. Having multiple wives was fairly normal in the Buddha's time.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 2nd, 2024 at 4:48 PM

Title: Re: Which of the following activities do you consider sexual misconduct?

(continued)

Content:

tingdzin said:

If one were brought up in a strict Christian environment, one might become extremely jealous if someone else slept with his wife. If one were living in a society in which it was good etiquette to offer your spouse to a guest (and there used to be such societies), he might not be upset. If a person brought up in the latter society visited a Christian society, he would quickly find that his frame of reference was not acceptable. How can there be a one-size fits all foundation for ethics?

Astus wrote:

That's two different scenarios, just as there is the difference between stealing another's book and borrowing it with the other's consent. But just because one may borrow a book, it does not make stealing a harmless act.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 3rd, 2024 at 5:31 AM

Title: Re: I'm looking for a good introductory book for a friend...

Content:

Astus wrote:

<https://plumvillage.org/books/the-heart-of-the-buddhas-teaching> by Thich Nhat Hanh is a great introductory book.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 6th, 2024 at 5:00 PM

Title: Re: Yogachara: Ontological or Epistemological Idealism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

This practical clarification by Karl Brunnhölzl might help (<https://dharmaebooks.org/an-overview-of-the-five-texts-of-maitreya/>, p 19-21):

'Cittamātra is not a metaphysical assertion of a transcendental reality consisting of "mind-only" but a description of our delusion — the dreams of this sleep from which the Buddha has awakened. If the dream-world saṃsāra is "merely mind," freedom and the Buddhist path are possible because we can change our minds through creating a counter-dream within the dream of our delusion. Most important, we can wake up from this dream.

That cittamātra is constantly referred to in Yogācāra texts as the delusional perception of what does not exist (these texts moreover abound with dreams, illusions, and so on as examples for it) hardly suggests that it exists in a real or ultimate way. Thus, the notion of "mere mind" refers only to the mistaken minds and mental factors of saṃsāra (the realities of suffering and its origin) but not to the realities of the path or cessation. Many Yogācāra works make it clear explicitly and repeatedly that not only external objects but also "mere mind" does not exist and is to be relinquished in order to attain the realization of the path of seeing and eventually buddhahood.

In this context, the four "yogic practices" (Skt. prayoga) in Yogācāra works are the following four steps of realization:

1. Outer objects are observed to be nothing but mind
2. Thus, outer objects are not observed as such
3. With outer objects being unobservable, a mind cognizing them is not observed either
4. Not observing both, nonduality is observed

This means that stages (1)–(3) — and thus the notion of cittamātra — are progressively dealt with only up through the end of the path of preparation. Stage (4) marks the path of seeing (the first bhūmi), on which bodhisattvas have to let go of the notion of cittamātra as well. In other words, like so many other Buddhist notions, cittamātra is no exception to simply being an expedient pedagogic tool to realize a certain level on the path. However, it is neither the final realization, nor to be reified in any way (thus becoming an obstacle to this very realization), but to be discarded once its intended function has been accomplished.'

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 6th, 2024 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Yogachara: Ontological or Epistemological Idealism?

Content:

anagarika said:

Thanks for the recommendation, I will try to look for the book on Scribd.

Astus wrote:

No need, <https://dharmaebooks.org/an-overview-of-the-five-texts-of-maitreya/>, it's freely available.

anagarika said:

Does this lack of metaphysical assertion of a transcendental mind apply to the whole of Yogachara, or were there really some subschools which reified the mind and elevated it to some sort of ground of being? If not, where does this misinterpretation come from?

Astus wrote:

It's a good way to mischaracterise one's opponent. And possibly some had such misinterpretation anyway.

anagarika said:

However, as I understand, for Yogacharin there ultimately is "something", right?

Astus wrote:

They uphold the twofold emptiness. Again from Brunnhölzl (p 26):

'The perfect nature is emptiness in the sense that what appears as dependent false imagination is primordially never established as the imaginary nature. As the ultimate object and the true nature of the dependent nature, this emptiness is the sphere of nonconceptual wisdom, which is nothing other than phenomenal identitylessness.'

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 19th, 2024 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: Finding Common Ground

Content:

Astus wrote:

If you're drawn to Kagyu, then you might want to get familiar with their teachings, starting with the Jewel Ornament of Liberation by Gampopa and its modern commentaries.

The website <https://studybuddhism.com/> is also a good place to start, for instance it has a page about <https://studybuddhism.com/en/advanced-studies/lam-rim/shamatha/concentration-terminology> and <https://studybuddhism.com/en/advanced-studies/abhidharma-tenet-systems/comparison-of-buddhist-traditions/the-four-close-placements-of-mindfulness-in-mahayana>.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 21st, 2024 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: Was Nagarjuna's Madhyamaka an implicative negation?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Other translations might help in a better understanding:

'Such things spoken of as the "great elements",
These are fully absorbed into consciousness;
Since they are dissolved by understanding them,
Are they not falsely imputed?'
(Sixty Stanzas of Reasoning, v 34, tr Thupten Jinpa)

"The great elements, etc. that they have spoken about are gathered in [i.e., are projected by] consciousness. Since you become free [from them] by understanding that, certainly they are falsely imagined."
(Sixty Verses of Reasoning, v 34, tr Gareth Sparham)

"The primary elements etc. are included in consciousness. If freedom arises through this understanding, why are they not erroneously imagined?"
(Reasoning: The Sixty Stanzas, v 34. tr Peter Della Santina)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 22nd, 2024 at 6:07 AM

Title: Re: Does the doctrine of karma blame victims for their own suffering?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The teaching of karma is meant to show how skilful and unskilful intention resulting in action influences one's state of mind, and that in turn defines one's experience. Although it is generally viewed as things happening out there, the main point is still what is happening in here. As far as the external manifestation of karma is relevant is ethical behaviour, the first part of the threefold training. Grasping that teaching wrongly can easily lead to long series of conjectures that are quite unfounded, like the idea that it blames victims. Grasping it correctly shows that virtuous and unvirtuous actions readily produce happy and unhappy experiences, and that there is a way to make an end to karma.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 22nd, 2024 at 8:07 PM

Title: Re: English translation collection of basic sutras that has had its language adapted for modern readers

Content:

Astus wrote:

You might want to start with this booklet: https://www.bdk.or.jp/pdf/buddhist-scriptures/02_english/TheTeachingofBuddha.pdf.

Perhaps

https://books.google.hu/books/about/The_Threefold_Lotus_Sutra.html?id=dKxKyQEAC

AAJ is also OK.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 23rd, 2024 at 5:09 PM

Title: Re: How to respond to theistic/deistic arguments from a Madhyamaka point of view?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are two situations where one is occupied by such questions:

- as a mere mental exercise for amusement, in which case it's simply meaningless and futile, a type of wrong speech (<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/essay/the-buddhist-path-to-enlightenment-study/d/doc1187810.html>)
- as a way to establish a specific set of rules and regulations, precepts and practices, in other words a doctrine to be followed

The first case needs no answer. The latter case, like the view of eternalism and the assumption of a creator, are refuted in various ways. For instance, positing a creator, believing in determinism, or denying causality are all doctrines that reject the possibility of personal development and a way to be free from suffering (<https://suttacentral.net/an3.61/en/sujato>)

- 1) Issues with Madhyamaka's usage of an 'infinite chain of casualty' as a concept
- 2) Issues with infinite past, and with samsara having no beginning
- 3) The fine-tuning argument
- 4) The issue of how Madhyamaka doesn't explain why existence actually exists

Those show a misunderstanding and misapplication of the teachings. Views about the eternal/temporary and finite/infinite nature of the world are meaningless (<https://suttacentral.net/mn63/en/sujato>) and based on the mistaken views of substantial existence (<https://suttacentral.net/sn41.3/en/sujato>). So Nagarjuna wrote:

"Other than as the imputation of a convention

What world is there in fact

Which would exist or not?

For this reason the Buddha,

Except for keeping silent, said nothing

About the fourfold format: having or

Not having a limit, both, or neither."

(<https://media.dalailama.com/English/texts/Nagarjuna-Precious-Garland-ENG.pdf>, v 114-115)

- 5) Karma's apparent perfection without an intelligent mind behind it

Although that is very much like the cosmological views of the previous four, it is an opportunity to redirect one's attention of imaginary entities and worlds out there somewhere back to the very process of conceiving beings and universes. Karma is about what goes on in one's heart, the craving to find and remain in a pleasant experience, the hatred of encountering and being in unpleasant situations, and the confusion regarding the uncertainty of all the changes happening. Views give the illusion of a fixed existence, of knowing one's place, of being somebody. And those very same views cause one to suffer, because our actual physical and mental world of experiences (the five aggregates) keeps changing. So, the entirety of the Buddhist teachings are aimed at liberating one's heart from the endless cycle of pain and trouble.

'If one has the thesis of real entities,
Awful and vicious views arise,
Which give birth to attachment and aversion;
From this contentions ensue.
This is the cause of all dogmatic views;
Without it no afflictions will arise;
So if this is understood thoroughly,
All views and afflictions will cease.
"Who understands this?" one might wonder;
It's those who see dependent origination.
The supreme knower of reality has taught
That dependent arising is unborn.
For those who are suppressed by false knowledge
And grasp the untrue to be true,
In them arises from attachment
A series of grasping and contentions.
Those who are great beings,
They have neither thesis nor contention;
For those who have no thesis,
How can there be opposing thesis?'

(<https://ibc-elibrary.thanhxiang.org/files/public/Nagarjuna-Sixty-Stanzas-of-reasoning-Buddhism.pdf>, v 46-50)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 27th, 2024 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: Was Nagarjuna's Madhyamaka an implicative negation?

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

However, even the ones you quoted don't entirely eliminate the Yogacara elements.

Astus wrote:

It eliminates the suggestion that there is somehow a special consciousness not empty. After all, the need to establish mind as ultimately real is simply a form of clinging to self. So it doesn't agree with even the fundamental and universally accepted Buddhist doctrines.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 28th, 2024 at 6:12 AM

Title: Re: Was Nagarjuna's Madhyamaka an implicative negation?

Content:

Javierfv1212 said:

Well, this is kind of unfair. It begs the question for the Madhyamaka position. This statement is basically saying, either you agree with this specific Madhyamaka position, or you are clinging to self.

Astus wrote:

Denying ultimate reality to consciousness is not specifically a Madhyamaka concept, especially when the definition of ultimate reality is to exist independently and on its own. In Abhidharma terms it'd be calling the mind uncompounded.

Javierfv1212 said:

Philosophically speaking, anti-foundationalism (which is the common reading of Madhyamaka as a metaphysics) is also quite rare in modern philosophy, most metaphysicians would probably go for some kind of foundationalism.

Astus wrote:

Yogacara accepts the emptiness of both self and dharmas, and it denies ultimate reality to both mind and its objects. What foundation is left?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 28th, 2024 at 9:33 PM

Title: Re: Was Nagarjuna's Madhyamaka an implicative negation?

Content:

Javierfv1212 said:

However, Yogacara does say that there is something which is real, an ultimate reality, which is not a sheer negation, the thing-in-itself (vastumatra). Why? Because for them, it is only when there is something to be empty that we can speak of emptiness (e.g., a cup is empty because it exists as a cup and so it is empty of liquid)

Astus wrote:

Mere things (vastumātra) and mere appearances (snang ba tsam) are not that different. One is labelled ultimate, the other conventional, but in both cases they represent the level that is mistaken for something else. More importantly, both stand for a view where grasping no longer has an object and ignorance no longer has a foundation. Coming back to the basics, clinging to the aggregates is the problem, not the aggregates themselves. It doesn't matter at all whether one labels the aggregates as the ultimate or the conventional in their system, as long as they are not mistaken as a self or as belonging to a self.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 14th, 2024 at 6:01 AM

Title: Re: AUTHETNIC Buddhist Quotes

Content:

Astus wrote:

If they are meant to be authentic, it should give the sources properly, including the actual source, like the title of the book, date of publication, and the name of the translator.

For instance, at 0:51 is a quote from "The Sutra of Hui Neng":

"By amending our mistakes, we get wisdom.

By defending our faults, we betray an unsound mind."

It is found in "The Diamond Sutra and The Sutra of Hui-neng" on page 92 of the Shambhala Publications edition of 2005, translated by A. F. Price and Wong Mou-Lam.

In The Sixth Patriarch's Dharma Jewel Platform Sutra by the Buddhist Text Translation Society (2001, p 198):

"Correcting failings gives birth to wisdom.

Guarded errors expose a petty mind."

And in McRae's translation (which is generally the best one available):

"By reforming transgressions one will necessarily generate wisdom.

To defend shortcomings within one's mind is not wise."

(<https://www.bdkamerica.org/product/the-platform-sutra-of-the-sixth-patriarch/>, ch 3, BDK ed, p 41)

Reliable sources online:

<https://suttacentral.net/>

<https://84000.co/>

<https://www.bdkamerica.org/tripitaka-list/>

<https://kalavinka.org/>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 21st, 2024 at 4:48 AM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism compatible with the modern world and modern thinking?

Content:

Difeed said:

Is it still practical to practice buddhism (traditional buddhism) today?

Astus wrote:

A regular description of the Dharma taught by the Buddha is that it is "apparent in the present life, immediately effective, inviting inspection, relevant, so that sensible people can know it for themselves" (<https://suttacentral.net/an3.53/en/sujato>; <https://suttacentral.net/sn35.70/en/sujato>). Humans were humans thousands of years ago just as they are today. It is a teaching that is verifiable directly in one's own experience.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 25th, 2024 at 4:55 AM

Title: Re: Form and emptiness

Content:

Rick said:

"Form is emptiness, emptiness is form."

Does Mahayana/Madhyamaka say all phenomena are empty and have form? Or are there exceptions, non-empty or form-less phenomena?

Astus wrote:

Form is the first of the five aggregates. That often quoted line from the <https://read.84000.co/translation/toh21.html#UT22084-034-009-75> is followed by the other four aggregates: "In the same way, feeling, perception, formation, and consciousness are empty."

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 30th, 2024 at 5:22 AM

Title: Re: East Asian Buddhism - any what-is-what (each school) overview?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The series <https://www.buddhistdoor.com/OldWeb/bdoor/archive/nutshell/index.htm> can give you a fair summary from a Chinese Buddhist perspective. See chapters 21-24 and 53-97. And if you'd like a basic introduction to East Asian Buddhism, I recommend the treatise <https://www.bdkamerica.org/product/the-awakening-of-faith/>.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 31st, 2024 at 11:32 PM

Title: Re: Authentic Dzogchen teachers Europe

Content:

Astus wrote:

<https://simplybeing.co.uk/about-james-low-2/>

https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Erik_Pema_Kunsang

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 23rd, 2024 at 5:37 AM

Title: Re: Can Alayavijñāna be seen/discerned in meditation?

Content:

Alex123 said:

Can a person discern Alayavijñāna, or only 6 consciousnesses?

Astus wrote:

The ālayavijñāna and the manas are convenient theories to explain the continuity of the stream of consciousness within samsara, hence they are not perceptible.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 25th, 2024 at 3:51 PM

Title: Re: Do you get rid of suffering for good with Dzogchen ?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Minus Zen (IMO) many of the vehicles that hold those teachings as definitive tend to still see enlightenment as a result of the two accumulations.

Astus wrote:

That is common tathagatagarbha doctrine, that the buddha qualities are already present and practice is about removing the two veils

(https://www2.hf.uio.no/polyglotta/index.php?page=record&vid=1125&mid=1944022 / 5.170). Since in dzogchen it's assumed that the eight other vehicles know practically nothing about it, it is more about how the nine vehicles are conceived and not about what other traditions actually teach.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 27th, 2024 at 5:13 AM

Title: Re: How is Buddha-nature different from atman?

Content:

It'sYa1UPBoy said:

This is a genuine question because of the ways that Dharmakaya and Buddha-nature are often described--- eternal, pure, true self, true being ---and how Vairocana Buddha is described as the Dharmakaya of Shakyamuni Buddha, eternal and pure and the true form and so on.

Astus wrote:

Buddha-nature means that a being has the nature of a buddha. A buddha means a perfectly enlightened one endowed with many special qualities. That a being has the nature of a buddha refers to the availability of the special qualities of a buddha. What others believe the atman to be is necessarily mistaking one of the five aggregates for something permanent, like believing that there exists a mind, an awareness that is eternal. Such misconceptions are clearly refuted in Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 28th, 2024 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: How is Buddha-nature different from atman?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

What is the difference between the dharmakaya and Brahman?

Astus wrote:

Dharmakaya is the term used for the complete realisation of emptiness, therefore it is something only buddhas have. Brahman is a being, an entity, not a realisation.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 29th, 2024 at 3:06 AM

Title: Re: How is Buddha-nature different from atman?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Brahman is the ultimate reality of the universe,

And 'ultimate reality of the universe' can also describe dharmakaya.

Astus wrote:

Brahman is the one and only real being, everything else are illusory, according to Vedanta. The dharmakaya is in a sense identical to emptiness, and emptiness is the ultimate reality of all phenomena, but the term for that is dharmadhatu. Furthermore, while Brahman is alone, not mixed with anything else, in Buddhism emptiness is never apart from appearances, and the dharmakaya is not separate from the other buddha bodies.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 7th, 2024 at 1:50 AM

Title: Re: Taisho Canon Catalogue No. Shingon works

Content:

Astus wrote:

<https://terebess.hu/zen/szoto/Map-of-the-Taisho.pdf>.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 11th, 2024 at 4:06 AM

Title: Re: Invitation to Comment/Critique

Content:

Astus wrote:

"But this entity existing prior

To sight and hearing and the other senses,

Feeling and the rest—

By what means can it be affirmed?

And if it could be there,

When sight and all the rest are absent,

There's no doubt that these in turn

Could, in its absence, also come to be.

Someone is revealed by something;

Something is revealed by someone.

How can there be someone without something?

How can there be something without someone?

...

If that which sees is also that which hears
As well as that which feels,
These senses it must needs precede.
But this does not make sense.
If the seer is different from the one who hears
And different also from the one who feels,
Then, when there is the seer, there would also be the hearer
And thus there would be many selves.
Neither does this self exist
In what gives rise
To seeing, hearing, and so forth,
Feeling and the rest."
(MMK 9.3-5, 8-10, tr Padmakara; see also Bodhicaryavatara 9.60-68)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 12th, 2024 at 1:58 AM

Title: Re: Invitation to Comment/Critique

Content:

haha said:

However, Vedanta would say this universal fire is inside the stick; intended meaning is that it is always there.

Astus wrote:

Just as there is no fire in a stick, a consciousness that is not conscious cannot exist.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 12th, 2024 at 2:58 PM

Title: Re: Invitation to Comment/Critique

Content:

haha said:

While rubbing two sticks, it springs out, fire should be always there. It is different than Buddhist argument.

Astus wrote:

It is different in that it's faulty, as it mistakes the potential with the actual. Just as the potential of fire does not function as or has the attributes of fire, so it's wrong to call it fire, a consciousness that isn't conscious of anything is without the functions or attributes of consciousness.

haha said:

In deep sleep, one is not conscious. After one wakes up, one knows that s/he was in deep sleep. Is there no consciousness in deep sleep as it is not conscious?

Astus wrote:

Since it is agreed one is not conscious during deep sleep, there is no consciousness present. That one has been sleeping before is known by inference.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 12th, 2024 at 7:04 PM

Title: Re: Invitation to Comment/Critique

Content:

haha said:

Those types to metaphor or simile are used to describe some intended meaning. Their cosmology is dissimilar to Buddhist.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean it's not possible to match Buddhist with Vedanta reasoning? In that case they are all boxed in their own ideas, and arguments are rather mere statements of faith. That view defeats the point of making a reasoned argument. Thus Vedanta would amount to nothing more than blind faith in their textual tradition. The <https://suttacentral.net/mn95> addresses that type of belief quite well.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 12th, 2024 at 8:34 PM

Title: Re: Invitation to Comment/Critique

Content:

haha said:

My point is that such thing should be understood in their respective context.

Astus wrote:

The point of this topic is, however, reviewing the presented interpretation from a Buddhist perspective.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 17th, 2024 at 6:45 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Ethics Paradox

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

But the Precepts are guidelines or aspirations rather than commandments, and killing oneself (even through deliberate malnutrition) is also frowned upon, and Buddhists throughout Asia have always included meat in their diets (vegetarianism is the exception rather than the rule).

With all that in mind, I'm going to call meat-eating, for survival, mixed karma rather than a paradox.

Astus wrote:

The precepts are training rules, but they reflect the laws of cause and effect.

'And what are the dark deeds with dark results? It's when someone kills living creatures, steals, commits sexual misconduct, lies, and uses alcoholic drinks that cause negligence. These are called dark deeds with dark results.'

(<https://suttacentral.net/an4.235/en/sujato>)

'Classification of Taking Life. There are three types: taking life through the door of desire, taking life through the door of hatred, and taking life through the door of ignorance. The first one means to take life for meat, pelts and so forth, for sport, for one's own wealth, and to maintain oneself and loved ones. The second one means to take life through the arising of hatred, out of resentment, or in competition. The third one refers to making sacrifices and so forth.

Three Results of Taking Life. There are three results of taking life: the result of the maturation of the act, the result similar to the cause, and the general result of the force.

"Result of maturation of the act" means that the actor will be born in the hell realms.

Experiencing a "result similar to the cause" means that even if the actor is born in the human realm, his life will be short or he will experience much sickness. "General result of the force" means that the actor will be born in an inauspicious place where there is little dignity.'

(Jewel Ornament of Liberation, p 112-113)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 12th, 2024 at 3:12 PM

Title: Re: English resource on Prajñaparamita-saṅcayagatha

Content:

Astus wrote:

It's also available as <https://read.84000.co/translation/toh10.html#UT22084-029-001-chapter-84>, translated by <https://khyentsefoundation.org/story/dr-gareth-sparham/>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 18th, 2024 at 3:48 PM

Title: Re: Why Zen? A Pure Land and Zen comparison...

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is no opposition, so there is no reason to choose one over the other. Both are collections of teachings and methods for the cultivation of the six perfections and the attainment of complete awakening. In fact, buddha-remembrance has been a common method within zen practically from its beginning.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 29th, 2024 at 4:53 AM

Title: Re: Big Mind vs small mind (and real-life application)

Content:

a Zen Rōnin said:

Dogen Zenji in his writings differentiate the Big Mind and small mind.

Astus wrote:

Where exactly does he write about those two?

In the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tenzo_Ky%C5%8Dkun of the Eihei Shingi he writes about the three minds where the third is "magnanimous mind" or "great mind" and he defines it the following way:

"As for what is called magnanimous mind, this mind is like the great mountains or like the great ocean; it is not biased or contentious mind. Carrying half a pound, do not take it lightly; lifting forty pounds should not seem heavy. Although drawn by the voices of spring, do not wander over spring meadows; viewing the fall colors, do not allow your heart to fall. The four seasons cooperate in a single scene; regard light and heavy with a single eye."

(Dogen's Pure Standards for the Zen Community, p 49)

a Zen Rōnin said:

He also said that the Big Mind means "accepting everything we encounter in our life as the True Self".

Astus wrote:

Where did Dogen say that?

a Zen Rōnin said:

But does this mean that we turn a blind eye to people who mistreat us?

Is being "indifferent to them" the way out of such situation?

Or do we need to literally "love" them in spite of what they are doing to us?

Astus wrote:

It is the perfection of forbearance (kṣāntipāramitā) that is the practice of facing all sorts of difficulties. You can learn more about it for instance

<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc82346.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 30th, 2024 at 6:20 PM

Title: Re: Honen's conception of the Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

'The fourth and the last stage is perhaps best thought of as the stage after death, when one has succeeded in being born in the Pure Land in the West. At this fourth stage, all of the practices of the Holy Path aimed towards gaining final enlightenment that were rejected as being too difficult for people living in the age of the final Dharma are readmitted on their own terms. Since they now dwell amid the wonders of the Pure Land, people are continuously in the presence of the Buddha and hear his teachings without the distortions caused by the many disturbing passions of the present world. Now they can indeed obtain the bodhicitta, reach the stage of non-retrogression, and be assured of eventual enlightenment. Therefore, the practices of the Holy Path which were rejected as too difficult are now all reinstated and practiced in their full essence. This stage is indicated in a number of Honen's works, for example, in the Nembutsu tai-i, he states, "Sentient beings in the age of the final Dharma, being incapable of attaining any goal through manifold practices, should first rely on the power of Amida's vow and attain birth in the Pure Land through the recitation of the nembutsu. After achieving birth in the Pure Land and seeing Amida Buddha and bodhisattvas Avalokiteshvara and Mahasthamaprapta, they should learn the holy teachings and attain enlightenment" (JZ. 9:512a). Because he saw the nembutsu alone as able to encompass ordinary and deluded persons, Honen taught the way of salvation in the Pure Land through calling upon Amida's name. Once that goal is achieved, then all of the practices of the bodhisattva are reinstated with their original intent of leading to complete enlightenment. This fourth stage, often lost sight of, nonetheless informs Honen's thought, since it had been a part of the thought of all his Pure Land predecessors.' (<https://web.archive.org/web/20150711131503/http://www.jsri.jp/English/Honen/TEACHINGS/senchaku/process.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 3rd, 2024 at 4:45 AM

Title: Re: Shōbōgenzō / Uji in Japanese?

Content:

Cittapalo said:

For reference: I'm looking for this poem specifically:

Zen master Guixing of She Prefecture is the heir of Shoushan, a dharma descendant of Linji. One day he taught the assembly:

For the time being mind arrives, but words do not.

For the time being words arrive, but mind does not.

For the time being both mind and words arrive.

For the time being neither mind nor words arrive.

I don't think either version has those.

Astus wrote:

葉縣ノ歸省禪師ハ。臨濟ノ法孫＊ナリ。首山ノ嫡嗣ナリ。アルトキ大衆ニシメシテ
イハク。

有時ハ意到テ句不到ラ。

有時ハ句到テ意不到ラ。

有時ハ意句兩ツナカラ俱ニ到ル。 有時ハ意句俱ニ不ト到ラ。

(http://21dzk.l.u-tokyo.ac.jp/SAT2015/T2582_.82.0047a22:0047a22.cit)

Zen Master Kishō of the Shōken region is a Dharma descendant of Rinzai, and the rightful successor of Shuzan. On one occasion he preaches to the assembly:

Sometimes the will is present but the words are absent,
Sometimes the words are present but the will is absent,
Sometimes the will and the words are both present,
Sometimes the will and the words are both absent.
(SBGZ BDK ed, vol 1, p 148)

Chan Master Guixing of Shexian was a descendant of Linji, the direct heir of Shoushan.
On one occasion, addressing the great assembly, he said,
Sometimes, the intention reaches it, and the words don't reach it.
Sometimes, the words reach it, and the intention doesn't reach it.
Sometimes, both the intention and the words reach it.
Sometimes, neither the intention nor the words reach it.
(SBGZ SZTP ed, vol 2, p 210)

It is found in Dahui's Zhengfayanzang:

有時句到意不到。妄緣前塵分別影事。
有時意到句不到。如盲摸象各說異端。
有時意句俱到。打破乾坤界。光明照十方。
有時意句俱不到。無目之人縱橫走。忽然不覺落深坑。
(https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/X67n1309_p0594b05)

Sometimes expression reaches but mind does not — you mistakenly focus on phenomena that are reflections of thought about present sense data.
Sometimes mind reaches but expression does not — you are like blind people touching an elephant, each describing it differently.
Sometimes mind and expression both reach — breaking through heaven and earth, light illumines the ten directions.
Sometimes neither mind nor expression reach — people with no eyes run hither and thither, and suddenly fall unawares into a deep pit.
(Treasury of the Eye of the True Teaching, vol 1, §316)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 3rd, 2024 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: English resource on Prajñaparamita-saṅcayagatha

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Do you know if it is possible to pull up the chapters on stand-alone pages? The longer sutras on 84000 usually crash my browser.

Astus wrote:

If you open the link it opens only that chapter while the others remain hidden. I've also made the chapter into an attachment to this post.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 7th, 2024 at 6:44 AM

Title: Re: Directly Pointing to the Mind

Content:

Matt J said:

A special transmission outside the scriptures.

No dependency on words and letters.

Pointing directly to the human mind.

Seeing into one's nature and attaining Buddhahood.

Astus wrote:

It seems to me to be immediately embodied and accomplished in zazen.

Zazen is transmitted face to face.

Zazen is not depending on concepts.

Zazen is directly encountering the mind.

Zazen is seeing one's nature and attaining buddhahood.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 8th, 2024 at 2:43 PM

Title: Re: The self is not existentially privileged

Content:

Rick said:

The self is not existentially privileged, it is exactly as real/unreal as everything else.

Would any Buddhist school agree with this?

Astus wrote:

The ordinary self is a conventionally valid conceptual construct, like trees and rocks.

The self of various beliefs, a soul, is even conventionally false.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 9th, 2024 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: The self is not existentially privileged

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

In buddhist teaching, "self" is really nothing more than a reoccurring experience. It is what happens when consciousness is mistaken for an object of consciousness.

Astus wrote:

That's more like a Vedanta view. Buddhism defines self view in terms of 20 possible relations to the aggregates, see: <https://www.dhammadownload.com/index.php/Sakkaya-ditthi>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 9th, 2024 at 3:34 PM

Title: Re: The self is not existentially privileged

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

Trees and rocks are percepts. The ordinary self is never perceived, it is merely a unexamined concept we believe in fiercely. As such, any beliefs about self are equally false whether they have any functional value within deluded experience or not.

Astus wrote:

In ordinary usage it's not simply a self on its own but something that is regarded as a self or related to a self. That is, whenever we say "I am ..." and "My ...", that's the conventional self.

It is a valid, understandable, and common manner of speaking to say "Look at me." and "Give me that." also "I hear him." and "I envy her." Those personal pronouns point to a specific being, an entity, a self. Just as you can do the same with other conventional things, like rocks and trees (and chariots, as it goes in the <https://suttacentral.net/sn5.10/en/sujato>).

An important role of the conventional self is in ethics. Murder is killing another being. Theft is taking something that belongs to another. To deny the conventional reality of a self is to deny the reality of morality.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 9th, 2024 at 3:41 PM

Title: Re: The self is not existentially privileged

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

I don't see how you arrive at that. Vedanta doesn't regard self as a reoccurring experience but rather as a constant observer.

Astus wrote:

What Vedanta posits as the source of illusion is mistaking the objects of the observer for the self, that is, as you wrote: "when consciousness is mistaken for an object of consciousness".

PadmaVonSamba said:

Aggregates by definition are not a self, because a self would have to be unitary.

Astus wrote:

While they are not actually a self, they are what get mistaken for a self, that's why self is defined in Buddhism in relation to them.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 10th, 2024 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: The self is not existentially privileged

Content:

Rick said:

Assuming this is right, does it mean ultimately the self is no more important-meaningful than a rusty ball bearing?

Astus wrote:

"Like oneself, all sentient beings hold themselves most dear."

(<https://suttacentral.net/an7.64/en/sujato>) This shows well that the self is the most important there is for everyone (see also: <https://suttacentral.net/ud5.1/en/sujato>). In other words, it is what we call "I" and "my" that we cling to the most. That is, the self is the label for maximum attachment.

Rick said:

Assuming this is right, what good does knowing it conceptually do, nudge you towards ekarasa?

Astus wrote:

Clinging hurts when we lose what we don't want to let go. And we always lose it. That's the suffering one can escape from by recognising the futile and painful nature of attachment.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 13th, 2024 at 4:20 AM

Title: Re: Four Yogas sources Beyond Lankavantara

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

I was talking with a India friend and he point that this was similar to this Four Yoga set from Theravada sources:

Astus wrote:

That's from the Dharmadharmatāvibhāga (verse 35), not Theravada.

"Application with a focal point,
Application without a focal point,
Application without focusing on a focal point,
And the application of focusing on the absence of a focal point."

"In the first application one observes that all phenomena are nothing more than mind. Based on that, one's application is such that the apprehended is not observed. This then leads to an application in which neither apprehended nor apprehender are observed.

Based upon that, one's subsequent application involves the observation of suchness, without observing any apprehended or apprehender at all. This approach enables one to generate nonconceptual wakefulness."

(Distinguishing Phenomena from Their Intrinsic Nature, p 43-44)

See also: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Yogachara#Four_prayogas.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 15th, 2024 at 3:53 AM

Title: Re: I need some help.I don't know What's the point of following the path if I will die?

Content:

Artziebetter1 said:

so a permanent soul or vijnana cannot exist,I get that,and I welcome it.

Astus wrote:

It does not exist even now, there is no self existing from one moment to the next in this life either. It is not that there is a mind/self that ceases to exist at death, that's the annihilationist view.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 15th, 2024 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: What to read after the Dhammapada?

Content:

usagibryan87 said:

What is a good next text to read, for a beginner, in the official Buddhist canon, which I understand is vast, and what would a good translated version with commentary of that be?

Astus wrote:

A short anthology by Thanissaro Bhikkhu:

<https://www.accesstoinight.org/lib/authors/thanissaro/wings/index.html>

A collection of essential teachings: <https://ancient-buddhist-texts.net/Texts-and-Translations/Dhammatthavinicchaya/index.htm> based on a text found in the Chinese and Tibetan tradition: <https://read.84000.co/translation/toh317.html>

An anthology from Pali, Chinese, and Tibetan sources:

https://buddhistuniversity.net/exclusive_01/Common%20Buddhist%20Text%20%282015-12-29%29.pdf

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 19th, 2024 at 3:59 AM

Title: Re: Free Will?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Buddha has rejected both determinism and indeterminism

(<https://suttacentral.net/an3.61/en/sujato>), and he practically ridiculed those who denied autonomy in their actions (<https://suttacentral.net/an6.38/en/sujato>). Naturally, what's been done is done, but currently one chooses how to act (<https://suttacentral.net/sn35.146/en/sujato>), therefore bad habits can be rectified (<https://suttacentral.net/sn42.8/en/sujato>), and even the consequences of past actions can be mitigated (<https://suttacentral.net/an3.100/en/sujato>).

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 20th, 2024 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: Free Will?

Content:

Queequeg said:

Implicitly, he's saying, such positions are irrelevant to liberation, his standard position on these questions.

Astus wrote:

If they were true, or believed to be true, the path to liberation would not be possible, therefore they are not accepted, in other words: rejected.

Queequeg said:

His reasoning here was, volition is self evident.

Astus wrote:

There is also a list of factors (initiative, persistence, exertion, etc.) that exemplify the validity of individual effort.

Queequeg said:

Here, too, he doesn't really address the question and assumes we have the capacity to make causes.

Astus wrote:

The significance of the discourse is in the recognition and distinction of old and new action, the assertion of the ability to choose and act.

Queequeg said:

Again, he does not actually address the question of whether there is determinism or not, but rather expands on the possibilities of following the path. Implicitly he is acknowledging the ability of beings to set their own course but that is it.

Astus wrote:

The possibility of following the path is contrary to determinism that would deny such an option. See also Gosāla's determinism in the <https://suttacentral.net/dn2/en/sujato>. That is a fruitless view (<https://suttacentral.net/mn76/en/sujato>), and, like other wrong views (<https://suttacentral.net/sn41.3/en/sujato>), it is based on the various forms of self view (<https://suttacentral.net/sn24.8/en/sujato>).

Queequeg said:

The Buddha distinguishes between the spiritual capacities and how karma plays out for one who is undeveloped versus one who is developed.

Astus wrote:

Consequences would be identical if effects were determined. Exactly because there can be development there is no determined result.

Queequeg said:

This response fails to address whether there is free will from the Buddhist perspective.

Astus wrote:

Beings are the makers and heirs of their own actions. If they were not the makers, that would be determinism. If they were not the heirs, that would be indeterminism. Such denial of cause and effect is called wrong view (e.g. <https://suttacentral.net/an3.119/en/sujato>), and is based on the mistaken belief in a self (<https://suttacentral.net/sn24.5/en/sujato>).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 22nd, 2024 at 10:32 PM

Title: Re: Analysing breath

Content:

Jokingfish said:

Therefore I ask - should you analyse breathing or just observe it passively or..?

Astus wrote:

That Buddha taught mindfulness of breath (ānāpānasmṛti) in sixteen aspects, as in the <https://suttacentral.net/mn118/en/sujato>, the <https://read.84000.co/translation/toh317.html#UT22084-072-017-165>, and elsewhere. Then it was extended and regrouped into six phases, as one can see in <https://www.bdkamerica.org/product/the-sutra-on-the-concentration-of-sitting-meditation/> and Zhiyi's https://kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/sgs_book_page.htm, or even to eight phases, as in Buddhaghosa's <https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/visuddhimagga-the-path-of-purification/d/doc1085076.html>. The point is, mindfulness of breath is a complete training, and analysis has its place in it.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 23rd, 2024 at 5:57 PM

Title: Re: Getting assaulted as a monk

Content:

Astus wrote:

'Bodhisattvas who reside in the inconceivable emancipation possess the power of awesome virtue and therefore manifest the practice of pressuring, showing sentient beings difficulties such as these. Ordinary people are inferior and lack energy, and they are unable to pressure bodhisattvas in this way.'

(Vimalakirti Sutra, ch 6, BDK ed, p 122 /

<https://read.84000.co/translation/toh176.html#UT22084-060-005-237>)

'When a person of little worth looks you up and down and treats you fearfully, you are tempted to not endure him. However, the sin of impatience is more serious than the insult. Why? Because the impatient person is scorned by the saints and by honest people, whereas the patient person is scorned only by common people. Of the two despisals, better to be despised by the ignorant than by the saints. Why? The ignorant scorns what is not despicable, [namely, patience], whereas the saint despises that which is despicable, [namely, impatience]. This is why one should practice patience.'

(<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225351.html>)

'What is the practice of accepting adversity? When suffering, a practitioner of the Way should reflect: "For innumerable kalpas, I have pursued the trivial instead of the essential, drifted through all spheres of existence, created much animosity and hatred, maligned and harmed others endlessly. Even though now I have done no wrong, I am reaping the karmic consequences of past transgressions. It is something that neither the heavens nor other people can impose upon me. Therefore I should accept it willingly, without any resentment or objection." The sutra says, "Face hardships without distress." How? With thorough insight. With this understanding in mind, you are in accord with the Principle, advancing on the Way through the experience of adversity. This is called the practice of accepting adversity.'

(<https://buddhagate.org/the-essence-of-mahayana-practice/>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 2nd, 2024 at 4:13 PM

Title: Re: Is rebirth a fundamental aspect of the Dhamma, or is it a reflection of Indian culture during the Buddha's era?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Let's simplify this:

If a practitioner does not believe in multiple lifetimes caught in the cycle of rebirth, then what is liberation exactly? What differentiates the psychological well-being coming from practicing Buddhism in this life vs. what comes from practicing therapy or Stoicism, for example?

Astus wrote:

Liberation is from the three poisons and suffering. If any other doctrine or system can give the same, they should rightly be called equivalent to the Buddhadharma. But is the threefold training and the noble eightfold path found anywhere else?

SilaSamadhiPanna2004 said:

Is rebirth a fundamental aspect of the Dhamma, or is it a reflection of Indian culture during the Buddha's era?

I am genuinely curious and am not trying to disrespect the Dhamma or the Buddha, thank you to anyone who responds.

You can actually answer this question very easily by simply reading some Buddhist Suttas, such as the many, many places where the Buddha talks about endless lives through endless universes of contraction and expansion, the notion that nibbana means the end of rebirth, etc.

Astus wrote:

Both the Dhamma and nibbana is taught as verifiable in this life (e.g. <https://suttacentral.net/an3.53/en/sujato>, <https://suttacentral.net/an3.55/en/sujato>). Regardless of the status of afterlife this practice is beneficial (<https://suttacentral.net/mn60/en/sujato>).

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 3rd, 2024 at 5:37 PM

Title: Re: Is rebirth a fundamental aspect of the Dhamma, or is it a reflection of Indian culture during the Buddha's era?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The idea that it is consciousness that is reborn is somewhat troublesome (e.g. <https://suttacentral.net/mn38/en/sujato>), even if it is sometimes taught that way for the sake of easier communication. One might as well say that it is the body that is reborn (see e.g. Gongchig 2.4). It is often emphasised that nothing goes from one life to the next (e.g. <https://read.84000.co/translation/toh210.html#UT22084-062-010-99>, <https://read.84000.co/translation/toh226.html#UT22084-063-007-73>). There is also the undeclared matter whether body and mind are identical or different, thus the argument that while the body remains the mind can go on falls into an extreme view. Where does rebirth fit then?

'For whom there is emptiness there are all natural and supernatural things. Why? For whom there is emptiness there is dependent origination. ... For whom there is all this, the law of the fortunate and unfortunate states of rebirth, the attainment of the fortunate and unfortunate states of rebirth, the way of going toward the fortunate and unfortunate states of rebirth, the passing beyond the fortunate and unfortunate states of rebirth, the means for passing beyond the fortunate and unfortunate states of rebirth as well as all worldly conventions are established.'

(Vigrahavyāvartanī v 70 commentary, in The Dispeller of Disputes, p 130)

'Since dependent origination lies beyond the scope of those [who assert] things and nonthings, therefore one should liberate oneself from the erroneous views of eternalism and nihilism. Hence, one becomes convinced and maintains that things are dependent imputations, and thus, the presentations of the agent, karma, effect, experiencer, afflicted being, and the body are tenable; yet the errors of eternalism and nihilism do not ensue, and samsara is established.'

(Mūlamadhyamakavṛtti v 17.33, in Buddhapālita's Commentary on Nāgārjuna's Middle Way, p 229)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 4th, 2024 at 2:16 AM

Title: Re: Is rebirth a fundamental aspect of the Dhamma, or is it a reflection of Indian culture during the Buddha's era?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

I'm saying that a claim that "rebirth is unnecessary to Buddhist practice" needs to be based on something other than personal preference if it's being universally applied - as it's advocates usually want it to be.

Astus wrote:

What is it in the six paramitas, the eightfold path, or the three trainings that requires rebirth?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 4th, 2024 at 4:03 AM

Title: Re: Is rebirth a fundamental aspect of the Dhamma, or is it a reflection of Indian culture during the Buddha's era?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

From a Sravakayana viewpoint liberation means liberation from rebirth, and the - complete- extinction of the defilements, this is not the view employed by secular practitioners, and no rhetorical device, however clever will make that the case.

Astus wrote:

Liberation means the extinction of defilements in all vehicles. Since neither the path nor the result requires rebirth, at what point does it become necessary?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 4th, 2024 at 6:22 AM

Title: Re: Is rebirth a fundamental aspect of the Dhamma, or is it a reflection of Indian culture during the Buddha's era?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

If someone's idea of liberation is simply feeling better in this life and being ethical, then it's not.

Astus wrote:

Is being free from defilements 'simply feeling better'? Might be so. After all, it is called the highest bliss (Dhp 204).

Johnny Dangerous said:

Again though, it is disingenuous to pretend that someone who thinks that death will extinguish their defilements -no matter their actions- is engaging in practice with the same motivation as someone who assumes their defilements propel endless rebirth and dissatisfaction.

Astus wrote:

If that were so, anyone who accepts rebirth - Buddhist or not - or even just the existence of afterlife, should all be quite pious and devout people, not much interested in earthly matters. Apparently that is not so, nor is it taught like that in Buddhism. It is rather a whole theme of contemplation to inculcate the loathsome and painful nature of all forms of existence. Thus there is meditation on rebirth being without a known beginning (SN 15.1-10), on the rarity of human and heavenly birth (SN 56.102-131), but there are also other topics (e.g. AN 10.56) that serve a similar purpose, among them the topic of one's own mortality.

Johnny Dangerous said:

Such a persons view of what constitutes liberation from samsara is not defined or distinguishable from the goals of therapy, secular philosophy, etc.

Astus wrote:

Is there any non-Buddhist system that teaches complete liberation from afflictive emotions? If not, then there is indeed a defined distinction between the Buddhist path and others. The Cūḷasīhanādasutta (MN 11) addresses the difference between the teaching of others and of the Buddha in terms of four kinds of grasping, and while three of those (grasping at sensual pleasures, views, and precepts and observances) are known by others, grasping at theories of a self is not. And it is this fourth kind that causes one to be troubled by thoughts regarding one's past, future, and present existence.

Since the teachings about an afterlife and the doctrine of rebirth is neither unique to Buddhism, nor does it necessarily have a role on the Buddhist path, what makes it indispensable to cultivating the three trainings and attaining correct liberation?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 9th, 2024 at 3:05 PM

Title: Re: Is rebirth a fundamental aspect of the Dhamma, or is it a reflection of Indian culture during the Buddha's era?

Content:

natusake said:

1. For everyone other than arhats and chigcharwas, rebirth is a necessary part of the path. You cannot accumulate merit and wisdom in one lifetime alone.

Astus wrote:

That does not make it part of one's current practice though.

natusake said:

2. Without rebirth, the entire idea of a tathagata and bodhisattva is defunct. Bodhisattvas no longer pass through many eons of lives to become completely awakened, and tathagatas simply die and do not emanate countless emanations to benefit sentient beings.

Astus wrote:

Those are ideas, not the practices.

natusake said:

3. Speaking of, if tathagatas merely die, and if people merely die not to be reborn, then this carries with it the fault of annihilationism. The whole system of Buddhist doctrine regarding eternalism and annihilationism, necessary to understand what buddhadharma is getting at, no longer makes any sense.

Astus wrote:

To the same extent, if they survive then it's eternalism. But more importantly, this is again a matter of theory and not the application of the practices.

natusake said:

4. Without rebirth, dependent arising makes no sense, because rebirth and death form part of its elements, and it is meant to explain the cycle of rebirth and death.
5. Without dependent arising, neither emptiness nor selflessness can be explained.
6. Without emptiness or selflessness, buddhadharma is defunct.

Astus wrote:

It's not about whether there is rebirth in Buddhism but if it's needed for its actual cultivation. The six points listed does not concern any of the three trainings or the six paramitas. So even if one does not accept rebirth, what is it that such a person could not practice?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 10th, 2024 at 6:08 AM

Title: Re: Is rebirth a fundamental aspect of the Dhamma, or is it a reflection of Indian culture during the Buddha's era?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Right view, essentially. Or more accurately, their view and any aspirations derived from it are limited in scope.

Astus wrote:

The goal of the path is to end suffering by eliminating all defilements. If one does not intend to do that in this life, then when? And how is that actually helpful in achieving liberation?

Johnny Dangerous said:

I think Bodhisattva aspirations are most definitely a practice.

Astus wrote:

Are those aspirations not to be fulfilled in this life? What is the benefit of believing that one is incapable of achieving one's goal in one's entire lifetime? And if that is indeed how it should be approached, are teachings that advocate complete awakening in a single lifetime wrong?

Johnny Dangerous said:

People can practice these things with whatever beliefs they like, but some ways of seeing things create limitations. I don't really understand why one would want to insist that this kind of practice shouldn't be distinguished.

Astus wrote:

Having correct view, even on a purely intellectual level, is already a challenging achievement. How does one get there if not with an incorrect, or partially incorrect view? If correct view is necessary to cultivate the path, then what is the path to correct view?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 10th, 2024 at 6:24 AM

Title: Re: Is rebirth a fundamental aspect of the Dhamma, or is it a reflection of Indian culture during the Buddha's era?

Content:

Aemilius said:

And you practice the right view.

Astus wrote:

What is it you call the practice of right view? Making vows and dedication of merit?

Aemilius said:

The noble Eight fold path begins with the right view. The Noble eight fold path does not exist without the right view. You know well what the right view is, I assume.

Astus wrote:

The standard definition of right view in the noble eightfold path is the four noble truths (<https://suttacentral.net/sn45.8/en/sujato>, <https://suttacentral.net/mn141/en/sujato>), and although there are various ways to put it (<https://suttacentral.net/mn9/en/sujato>), they are quite alike.

Aemilius said:

One formulation of the right view is that the five aggregates do not exist in the past, present or future and neither do they not exist in the past, present or future.

Astus wrote:

If there are many formulations of right view, which one is the definitive?

Aemilius said:

If you do not accept the right view, you are holding onto and practicing the wrong view.

Astus wrote:

With what method can one with a wrong view accept the right view?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 10th, 2024 at 6:48 AM

Title: Re: Is rebirth a fundamental aspect of the Dhamma, or is it a reflection of Indian culture during the Buddha's era?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

No one has said that people shouldn't or can't practice Buddhist meditation or ethics because they are unsure about rebirth. It was never stated in the thread, and I and others explicitly said that indeed, people can practice this way within the limitations of their view.

Astus wrote:

If rebirth is a necessary element of the view to practise the path, what else would it mean than those without such a view cannot cultivate it? So it is completely logical to say that "If there is no rebirth according to Karma then there is nothing to awaken from anyway". But isn't the actual goal the removal of defilements, while freedom from birth is rather a consequence of that?

Johnny Dangerous said:

The question is "necessity" of rebirth to Buddhist practice in general, and certainly to end the cycle of rebirth, one first has to be convinced it's a thing.

Astus wrote:

If it is not denied that one can cultivate the path without belief in rebirth, then through such cultivation one can remove the defilements, and with that end all future births, even if never wished for it (e.g. <https://suttacentral.net/an7.71/en/sujato>).

Johnny Dangerous said:

As I've said a bunch of times now, that's a laudable goal by itself, and what I'm objecting to is an attempt to conflate two obviously very different approaches to practicing Buddhism, the second of which is purely therapeutic by definition.

Astus wrote:

There are no two paths in Buddhism, are there? Not killing is not killing. Mindfulness of the body is mindfulness of the body. Not grasping at pleasant and painful feelings is not grasping at pleasant and painful feelings. If the actual method used by those who accept and those who do not the teaching of rebirth, then the result should be the same anyway. But if the results are different, then the path to them are different. And if the paths are different, it means unbelievers cannot cultivate what believers can.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 10th, 2024 at 7:04 AM

Title: Re: Is rebirth a fundamental aspect of the Dhamma, or is it a reflection of Indian culture during the Buddha's era?

Content:

natusake said:

Understanding the four noble truths is understanding death and rebirth, and vice versa. So there is no need to assert one as provisional and another as definitive, because they do not directly contradict each other, but all are various ways to explain the same dharma.

Astus wrote:

They are not contradictory, but that doesn't make them the same. The Mahācattārīsakasutta (<https://suttacentral.net/mn117/en/sujato>) makes a distinction between the two types of right view: one "is accompanied by defilements, partakes of good deeds, and ripens in attachments" and the other "is noble, undefiled, transcendent, a factor of the path". What ripens in attachments is not a factor of the path, that is, does not lead to liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 10th, 2024 at 4:31 PM

Title: Re: Is rebirth a fundamental aspect of the Dhamma, or is it a reflection of Indian culture during the Buddha's era?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

It can't be the same practice.

The main reason it cannot (purely my point of view) is that if someone takes the materialist view of mind as a given they don't believe they can experience the ultimate reality of their own mind, because a purely physicalist point of view precludes that possibility.

Astus wrote:

Why would it preclude that? The mind arises momentarily dependent on a specific sense faculty and sense object. How is seeing that such a mind is conditioned and without essence dependent on belief in rebirth?

Johnny Dangerous said:

I believe that people raised in our society that tend towards a secular point of view implicitly accept that the scientific worldview is "correct" in this sort of static sense and that it has determined the mind to be an epi-phenomena of matter, therefore mind ends entirely at death. This being the case, adoption of this point of view precludes any Buddhist idea of liberating the mind, it can only be improved before it ceases to be.

Astus wrote:

Among non-Buddhists at one point (<https://suttacentral.net/an10.29/en/sujato>) the Buddha called the annihilationist view the best, because "When someone has such a view, you can expect that they will not be attracted to continued existence, and they will not be repulsed by the cessation of continued existence."

As for the Buddhist view of mind, it is a very temporary product of causes and conditions, and it ends practically every moment. So the fault of the annihilationist view is also the same mistaken view of misconceiving the mind as something enduring, as a self.

Johnny Dangerous said:

What exactly constitutes liberation for someone practicing in a one-lifetime context with no Karma and rebirth? How does it differ from therapy of self-help

Astus wrote:

Liberation is the end of craving. Where is the issue of rebirth relevant to that?

Johnny Dangerous said:

You guys seem to have this mythical practitioner in mind that is seeking and acknowledges a transcendental state not reachable through means other than Dharma, but would have no explanation for its importance or validity beyond feeling good in this life.

Astus wrote:

The benefits of freedom from craving is apparent in this life (e.g. <https://suttacentral.net/sn35.70/en/sujato>), and there is no need to consider past or future (<https://suttacentral.net/sn42.11/en/sujato>). Then it is through actual insight into the nature of one's existence that right view is attained.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 10th, 2024 at 7:34 PM

Title: Re: Is rebirth a fundamental aspect of the Dhamma, or is it a reflection of Indian culture during the Buddha's era?

Content:

natusake said:

Either way, wrong view is univocally explained as a denial of karma and rebirth.

Astus wrote:

Yes. The question though is whether faith in rebirth is necessary or not in order to engage in Buddhist practice. In other words, obtaining right view is a prerequisite or a result of the path? If one needs right view - including the view of rebirth - before one can cultivate the way, what is it that leads to right view if not the path?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 10th, 2024 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: Is rebirth a fundamental aspect of the Dhamma, or is it a reflection of Indian culture during the Buddha's era?

Content:

natusake said:

Are you asserting that an untaught, ignoble, ordinary person can obtain supramundane right view that is stainless before any prior entrance to the dharma? I would say that's true in only one lineage.

Astus wrote:

If the path cannot be engaged in without right view, one first has to obtain right view, but there is no path to right view. What to do then?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 11th, 2024 at 2:01 AM

Title: Re: Is rebirth a fundamental aspect of the Dhamma, or is it a reflection of Indian culture during the Buddha's era?

Content:

natusake said:

Simple, you begin with mundane right view, as the suttas advise. Just like conventional truth is used to lead one to ultimate truth in Madhyamika.

Astus wrote:

The main hindrance is that it's not what is commonly accepted as conventional truth, therefore in order to arrive at such a perspective - what happens to include belief in the efficacy of sacrifices - there needs to be a way, unless you think a "leap of faith" is a valid expectation.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 11th, 2024 at 4:45 PM

Title: Re: Is rebirth a fundamental aspect of the Dhamma, or is it a reflection of Indian culture during the Buddha's era?

Content:

natusake said:

Perhaps, but if this is your move, you must recognize you've already ceded the main point - which is whether rebirth is a necessary part of the dharma.

Astus wrote:

Quite the opposite. Right view, just like right concentration, is something learnt and not a prerequisite. Therefore belief in rebirth is not a condition to engage fruitfully in the path. Otherwise one would need to already possess all the factors of the path before cultivating it.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 13th, 2024 at 9:49 PM

Title: Re: Is rebirth a fundamental aspect of the Dhamma, or is it a reflection of Indian culture during the Buddha's era?

Content:

Aemilius said:

How can you read, recite and maintain the four, five or ten bodhisattva vows, without belief in reincarnation?

How could you contemplate the Four thoughts that turn the mind without belief in reincarnation?

Astus wrote:

The particular issue was whether belief in rebirth is a requirement for practice, e.g. the six perfections. Can one practise generosity without the bodhisattva vows and the four thoughts? Can one practise the perfection of generosity without them?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 30th, 2024 at 7:22 PM

Title: Re: merit transfer

Content:

Astus wrote:

Merit (punya) - or in other words: goodness, virtue - is not a thing to be given or taken, but refers to the positive quality of an action (karma) that has a positive outcome (vipāka). Dedicating merit is a practice of generosity, cultivating the relinquishment of desiring good for oneself and the wishing for the good of others, that's why it is a virtuous act to do so and gives one even more positive results. For the goodness, the merit of an action to be shared means that one agrees with and rejoices in the positive action of another. At the same time, agreeing with and rejoicing in another's negative action is a cultivation of an evil mind that generates painful consequences.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 4th, 2024 at 3:09 PM

Title: Re: Why do we keep practicing Mahayana and Vajrayana if they contain forgeries and conflict with Early Buddhist Texts (E

Content:

seeker_of_dharma said:

1. If EBTs are not the words of Buddha, then nothing can be shown to be words of the Buddha and he might've not even existed then

Astus wrote:

The agamas/nikayas are accepted as authentic words of the Buddha. I'm unaware of any Buddhist school ever questioning that.

seeker_of_dharma said:

2. If we understand EBTs, their definition AND VERY GOAL is to achieve nibbana which is defined completely differently to Mahayana's nibbana

Astus wrote:

Not really. Nirvana is defined everywhere as the ending of defilements.

seeker_of_dharma said:

3. If we insist on following Mahayana, we are then willingly not following Buddha's teachings and truth despite calling ourselves Buddhist

Astus wrote:

Taking refuge in the Three Jewels is what makes a Buddhist. That is accepted by everyone.

Furthermore, in terms of doctrine and practice, Mahayana accepts such basic concepts as the aggregates, elements, and sense fields; the three characteristics and dependent origination; the four noble truths and the thirty-seven factors of awakening.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 4th, 2024 at 4:45 PM

Title: Re: Why do we keep practicing Mahayana and Vajrayana if they contain forgeries and conflict with Early Buddhist Texts (E

Content:

Aemilius said:

It is perfectly logical and possible that Buddha Shakyamuni taught the Three turnings of the wheel of Dharma. But certain sections of the Sangha didn't accept the later turnings of the Wheel of Dharma that include Mahayana, Perfection of Wisdom and Chittamatra/Tathagatagarbha. And they have edited their version of the Tripitaka accordingly.

Astus wrote:

Unless you claim that the various abhidharma works and commentaries are by the Buddha, since Mahayana sutras rely on and refer to them, the above view is unsustainable.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 4th, 2024 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: Why do we keep practicing Mahayana and Vajrayana if they contain forgeries and conflict with Early Buddhist Texts (E

Content:

Aemilius said:

But his view, that all the teachings of Abhidharma can be found in the sutras, is to be found also elsewhere.

Astus wrote:

There are several terms and ideas not found in the nikayas/agamas, only in abhidharma or commentarial works.

Some examples: 37

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bodhipakkhiy%C4%81dhamm%C4%81>, 18

<https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225801.html>, 22 <https://www.wisdomlib.org/buddhism/book/maha-prajnaparamita-sastra/d/doc225733.html>, <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dipankara>, <https://www.oxfordreference.com/display/10.1093/acref/9780190681159.001.0001/acref-9780190681159-e-2260>, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Five_precepts.
See also: https://serval.unil.ch/resource/serval:BIB_ADB8A4E3744C.P001/REF.pdf.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 5th, 2024 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: Why do we keep practicing Mahayana and Vajrayana if they contain forgeries and conflict with Early Buddhist Texts (E

Content:

natusake said:

All of those appear in the nikayas. You can find them all in the Samyutta Nikaya, except the āveṇikadharmas, but I doubt that you couldn't find those elsewhere.

Astus wrote:

Not all of them, and only what they refer to, but not the terms themselves.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 5th, 2024 at 5:27 AM

Title: Re: Why do we keep practicing Mahayana and Vajrayana if they contain forgeries and conflict with Early Buddhist Texts (E

Content:

natusake said:

I can tell you that the indriya's are literally named in a vagga of the Samyutta Nikaya

Astus wrote:

They are found in SN 48, the Indriyasamyutta, but there is no grouping and naming them as the 22 faculties (bāvisatindriyāni).

Same applies to the 37 factors of awakening (sattatimsa bodhipakkhiyā dhammā), although its seven groups are found all over the discourses, they are not called as such in a single group. The term bodhipakkhiyā dhammā is found (SN 48.55, SN 48.67-70), but it's identified as the five faculties of faith, energy, mindfulness, immersion, and wisdom.

natusake said:

and Dīpaṃkāra is named in the Buddhavamsa and elsewhere. It's possible, but am really skeptical of that the other terms couldn't be found.

Astus wrote:

The Buddhavamsa is hardly a discourse (sutta).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 5th, 2024 at 1:19 PM

Title: Re: Why do we keep practicing Mahayana and Vajrayana if they contain forgeries and conflict with Early Buddhist Texts (E

Content:

natusake said:

In context, the question is whether these teachings can be found in the sutras. These terms already exist in some form in the nikayas. If a specialized term used for convenience or for summary is in commentarial literature, I hardly see this as evidence of something genuinely new.

Astus wrote:

The point is that if certain terms are found only in texts that are accepted to have been composed after the Buddha, then other works using them are also after him. We can also apply this to ideas, like dharma (as an ultimate unit), two truths, and universal momentariness.

This is not to say that such concepts are in harmony or not with the Buddha's teachings, only that they have emerged later.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 5th, 2024 at 3:00 PM

Title: Re: Why do we keep practicing Mahayana and Vajrayana if they contain forgeries and conflict with Early Buddhist Texts (E

Content:

natusake said:

Only if you regard the appearance of the material body of Shakyamuni as the Buddha. This would be a grave error.

Astus wrote:

It matters not, as it's Shakyamuni who first taught the Dharma in this era.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 5th, 2024 at 5:43 PM

Title: Re: Why do we keep practicing Mahayana and Vajrayana if they contain forgeries and conflict with Early Buddhist Texts (E

Content:

Aemilius said:

There is no reason to hold the view that those ideas and concepts that are found in Mahayana sutras, do not belong to the original teachings of Shakyamuni.

Astus wrote:

The reason is that Mahayana sutras use terms and refer to concepts that are known to have been developed within the abhidharma and later treatises, like the self-nature of dharmas, two truths, and momentariness. Or for instance the concept of cessation without deliberation (apratisaṃkhyānirodha), it appears in the Jñānaprasthāna (e.g.

https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T26n1544_p0923b06), and is eventually established as one of the three unconditioned dharma in Sarvastivada, but it's not an idea from the sutras. Still it appears in texts like the Lankavatara Sutra (3.73 (T16n672p613a19-20), 3.78 (T16n672p616b9)), and the Nirvana Sutra (8.40; T12n374p567c9, c26).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 6th, 2024 at 4:39 PM

Title: Re: Why do we keep practicing Mahayana and Vajrayana if they contain forgeries and conflict with Early Buddhist Texts (E

Content:

Aemilius said:

My point is that we do not know the contents of the oral traditions. The written sutras (and commentaries) are based on oral traditions. Therefore you cannot draw the conclusion that the word "moment" or "momentariness" was not used by Shakyamuni, if it is found only in Abhidharma and Mahayana sutras.

Astus wrote:

Ideas like momentariness verifiably developed after the Buddha's time, so there is no need to guess about a lost oral tradition.

Aemilius said:

Actually "the two truths" appears atleast once in the Pali Canon, -if that sutta hasn't disappeared. (It is in Anguttara Nikaya I:60, according to Jayatilleke: 361).

Astus wrote:

That is <https://suttacentral.net/an2.24/en/sujato> mentioning the distinction between explicit teachings and those requiring explanation. It is not about the distinction between conventional and ultimate truths.

Aemilius said:

"the Heart sutra was not spoken by Avalokiteshvara..", which is just a silly thing to say.

Astus wrote:

Just out of curiosity, which version of the Heart Sutra is by Avalokiteshvara?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 9th, 2024 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: Parinirvana

Content:

SkyFox said:

Hey guys. I was reading quite a bit and pondering death and parinirvana and started getting anxious, which never happened before. The idea that you no longer exist in this form is scary.

Astus wrote:

In the Discourse to Seniya (<https://suttacentral.net/sa105/en/analayo>) there is a straightforward distinction between three types of views:

Annihilationism: there is a self now but not after death.

Eternalism: there is a self now and after death.

Buddhism: there is no self now nor after death.

SkyFox said:

I know the Buddha refused to answer what happens after but why?

Astus wrote:

There was a mendicant called Yamaka who had this view
(<https://suttacentral.net/sn22.85/en/sujato>):

'a mendicant who has ended the defilements is annihilated and destroyed when their body breaks up, and doesn't exist after death'

Eventually Sāriputta pointed out to him that a fully liberated being cannot be found in this life, because there is no more identification with any of the aggregates, therefore it is not sensible to claim that there is anything destroyed at the time of death. The reason the Buddha has not declared a position regarding certain matters is because all such ideas are based on the view of a self (see: <https://suttacentral.net/sn41.3/en/sujato>). Once one has recognised the actual nature of bodily and mental phenomena, views like the continuity or cessation of a liberated being (e.g. SN 24.15-16) are abandoned.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 9th, 2024 at 1:14 PM

Title: Re: Parinirvana

Content:

tingdzin said:

Slightly off-topic, but I would like to know what word is being translated as "soul" here.

Astus wrote:

https://dsal.uchicago.edu/cgi-bin/app/pali_query.py?qs=j%C4%ABva&searchhws=yes&matchtype=exact.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 10th, 2024 at 5:19 PM

Title: Re: Using signs or random events to make decision(?)

Content:

Astus wrote:

Following omens is not the recommended way, rather one should understand the causes and effects of one's actions (AN 5.175, Snp 2.13).

See also these stories: <https://suttacentral.net/ja453/en/rouse>,
<https://suttacentral.net/ja87/en/chalmers>.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 12th, 2024 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: Conventional truth (sammuti-sacca) and absolute truth (paramattha-sacca) in Pali Canon

Content:

Astus wrote:

As the quote says, the two truths as a concept is not found in the canonical scriptures but come up only in the commentaries.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2024 at 4:09 AM

Title: Re: Conventional truth (sammuti-sacca) and absolute truth (paramattha-sacca) in Pali Canon

Content:

Aemilius said:

footnote says: " According to Japanese editor, Ekottara Agama (TD 2, p.740a-741b)."

Agamas are canonical scriptures, Kathavatthu is a canonical scripture (Abhidhamma pitaka). Mahayana sutras are also canonical scriptures.

Astus wrote:

The agama referred to (https://cbetaonline.dila.edu.tw/en/T02n0125_p0740a25/ / <https://suttacentral.net/ea40.6>) makes no mention of the two truths but is a version of the <https://suttacentral.net/mn2>. The Kathāvatthu is in the Pali Canon, but it is clearly written centuries after the Buddha, and is traditionally attributed to Moggaliputtatissa.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2024 at 4:12 PM

Title: Re: Forbidden question?

Content:

Wheat said:

How are we distinct? How do these minds intersect in this space fabricated completely by one mind?

Astus wrote:

The idea expressed in the first stanzas of the Dhammapada is that one acts how one intends. That is actually quite easily understood: out of anger comes violence, out of love comes care. Therefore one should learn to tame one's mind. This is a very practical and useful teaching.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 29th, 2024 at 4:01 AM

Title: Re: What Carries On? (Rebirth)

Content:

Astus wrote:

'Here, there is nothing whatsoever that transmigrates from this existence to the next. And yet, because there is no deficiency of requisite causes and conditions, the result of karma nonetheless manifests.'

(<https://84000.co/translation/toh210#UT22084-062-010-93>)

'Great king, no phenomenon whatsoever transmigrates from this world to another world, yet there are the manifestations of death and birth.'

(<https://84000.co/translation/toh226#UT22084-063-007-73>)

'There are aggregates of form, feeling, perception, volitions and consciousness. Their re-emergence means that from an extinguished cause another effect originates, (but) from this world to the next, not so much as an atom transmigrates.'

(Nagarjuna's Commentary to The Heart of Interdependent Origination in https://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/nagarjuna.pdf, p 63)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 9th, 2024 at 4:39 am

Title: Re: Unconditioned and unchanging qualities of dharmas and Madhyamika

Content:

Kalyāṇamitra said:

According to Madhyamika and the idea of emptiness, are the properties of dharmas unconditioned inherent in them or are dharmas endowed with properties depending on changing causes and conditions?

Astus wrote:

See chapter 1 of Mulamadhyamakakarika where the reality of conditions is refuted.

'Therefore neither a product consisting of conditions nor one consisting of nonconditions exists'

(MMK 1.14, tr Siderits)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2024 at 5:10 am

Title: Re: The Zen of Seeing

Content:

clyde said:

But searching the Shobogenzo in some different ways I eventually found this from 51 On the Buddha's Way, So, you need to keep in mind that the Buddha's Way, which was Transmitted and received from a previous Buddha, was not called 'contemplative meditation', much less was it ever called, or discussed as, 'the Zen sect'! Clearly, you need to realize that calling It 'the Zen sect' is a mistake of enormous proportions. By thinking that religious practice must be part of either a concrete sect or an abstract sect, the inexperienced defame the Way, as if It were something not worth exploring if It were not called 'a sect'. The Buddha's Way cannot be like that, so be certain that It has never been called 'the Zen sect'.

Astus wrote:

That's a misleading translation, since the point of that work is to emphasise that there is just Buddhism and no Zen school apart from that.

From The Way of the Buddhas (Butsudō 佛道) (Treasury of the True Dharma Eye, tr SZTP. vol 3, p 330):

'If there were [a dharma] other than the way of the buddhas and ancestors, it would be a dharma of an other path." As descendants of the buddhas and ancestors, we should study the bones and marrow, face and eyes of the buddhas and ancestors.'" We have cast ourselves on the way of the buddhas and ancestors and should not skulk off from here to study an other path.'

Just as it's mentioned briefly in the Bendōwa (vol 7, p 199-200):

'We should realize that this name, "Zen school," occurred in Cinasthana to the east and was never heard of in India. ... We should recognize the fact that this is the entire way of the buddha dharma that has been transmitted.'

So, the translation by the Soto Zen Text Project (vol 3, p 333):

'Thus, we should know that the way of the buddhas transmitted and received by prior buddhas is not even called Zen meditation, much less described as the "Zen school." We should clearly understand that calling it the "Zen school" is an error in the extreme. Crude types, thinking that it must be like the school of being or school of emptiness, lament that, without a school name, there would seem to be nothing to study. The way of the buddhas cannot be like this. We should be firmly convinced that it was never called the "Zen school."

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 16th, 2025 at 4:45 am

Title: Re: What is consciousness?

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

What is consciousness (sentience) and why does it arise? Is there some larger consciousness that individual consciousness derives from? Why are there sentient beings? What is the relationship between consciousness and matter?

Astus wrote:

Consciousness (vijñāna) is the act/event of knowing/cognising/being conscious of (vijñānāti) something, or what makes something known (vijñapti), thus the six types of consciousness that arise dependent on the six types of sense faculties and sense objects.

'[The aggregate of] consciousness is that which makes known [vijñapti], [i.e., the apperception,] relative to each [object-field].'
(Abhidharmakośa 1.16a, tr Sangpo, p 231)

'What is the characteristic of consciousness? Knowing is the characteristic of consciousness. It is consciousness by means of which one knows (visible) form, sound, odor, taste, the tangible, mental objects and various realms.'
(Abhidharmasamuccaya, p 4, tr Boin-Webb)

Queequeg said:

In some systems, mind is posited as a primary element, Namely space. That might be a helpful way to understand consciousness as co arisen with the dharmadhatu.

Astus wrote:

The teaching of the six elements includes the consciousness element (vijñānadhātu) as the sixth.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 18th, 2025 at 4:14 am

Title: Re: What is consciousness?

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

Thanks, Astus. Could you explain the relationship between vijñāna and saṃskāra? The latter are said to condition the former (i.e. saṃskāra precedes vijñāna). But since there is no consciousness yet, where are the saṃskāra occurring?

Astus wrote:

Dependent origination applies to the five aggregates, so it's not that its elements exist in a vacuum but rather point out specific factors of how suffering arises. That formations condition consciousness means one's predispositions influence one's state of mind, one's way of thinking; or in terms of multiple lives it's about how past lives' karma conditions a new being.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 25th, 2025 at 5:20 am

Title: Re: Does no-self mean no free will?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here's a speech by Ajahn Brahmali on the matter of free will that gives a well rounded Buddhist explanation: <https://bswa.org/teaching/dhamma-talk-10-january-2025/>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 29th, 2025 at 3:14 am

Title: Re: I get the zen mind

Content:

Astus wrote:

Whatever can be found can also be lost. Grasping at passing experiences is a source of suffering.