I think the teacher's role is so much more than this, Astus. For instance no scripture can diagnose the particular student's obstacle and device just the right treatment - the old hen pecking from the outside as the hatchling is trying to break through the shell.

Astus wrote:

That sounds like projecting psychotherapy on Buddhism. The very meaning of meditation is looking at one's own mind, exactly in order to see how it works. If the practitioner cannot see what goes on, nobody else will be able to do that either. That's why both sutras and meditation instructions contain information on various types of hindrances and how to tackle them. Do you know of any sutra or treatise where it is taught that people should get examined by someone else in order to identify unwholesome qualities?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 2:01 AM

Title: Re: 'What are you saying'?

Content:

Dan74 said:

I would've thought you'd know the answers to your question, Astus, as well as recognise the reference to the chick breaking out of the shell.

Astus wrote:

I am not aware of any sutra or instruction that tell people to be analysed by someone else. Except perhaps the late idea of koan practice that contains stages to go through. But otherwise on the gradual path it is the practitioner's job to cultivate the factors of enlightenment, like mindfulness and investigating phenomena, not to mention the general role of right effort.

In case 16 of the Blue Cliff Record this teaching style of breaking in, breaking out is said to be from Jingqing Daofu. If it meant cooperation between teacher and student, it's the same as the teaching of skilful means, nothing particularly noteworthy. He is quoted there: "foot-travelers must have the 'simultaneous breaking in and breaking out' eye and must have the 'simultaneous breaking in and breaking out' function". Break in and break out is according simultaneously, meeting face to face, that is, realising that one's mind is Buddha. How could it be about the mundane matters of social interaction? Even if it were, what is the shell, and why should travelling monks have both eye and function of it?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 5:37 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land and the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

As noted earlier, Tendai includes both the Lotus Sutra and Amitabha. Also, both Nichirenshu and Jodo (Shin) Shu are explicitly exclusivist sects, while schools preceding them were generally inclusivists. And once you move from Japanese Buddhism you can find that such strict separations between schools don't actually exist. For instance, Chinese monastics recite mostly the same every morning and evening, regardless of what their preferences are in doctrine and practice. And that can be because the organising factor in Buddhism is primarily the Vinaya, and it is only secondary whether you prefer reciting a specific sutra, or a name of a buddha, or maybe neither.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 6:04 PM

Title: Re: the place of creativity in Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Creativity can be used in the service of the Dharma or as an indulgence in one's passions. For instance, there are works of art made by Buddhists in order to express the Dharma, and there are works of art made by artists influenced by Buddhist ideas to express their own world view. So the difference lies in the author's view behind the work whether it accords with the Dharma or not. It should also be noted that creativity is not that easy to define, since it is a basic mental function to adapt to various situations and come up with new ideas. In a way every human being is necessarily creative. Liberating the mind from attachments to entrenched thinking and following habitual patterns naturally brings about creativity.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 6:07 PM

Title: Re: New schools in early buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

How can one differentiate 'attained' people from simple philosophers? Rather, the question should be if a given teaching accords with the fundamental doctrines of the four noble truths, dependent origination, etc. The Buddha himself taught in various ways to instruct people.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 24th, 2015 at 6:19 AM

Title: Re: New schools in early buddhism

Content:

lostitude said:

By knowing if what they say is based on direct knowledge or on intellectual speculation...

Astus wrote:

How do you know that?

Here's an example. Is the teaching of the five aggregates based on direct knowledge or speculation? It was taught by the Buddha himself, so we could say it must be direct experience. But that assumption itself - that it is based on experience - is based on speculation. So one has to see if there are really such five aggregates. Only then it is confirmed in direct experience that the teaching is valid. However, the five aggregates are also theoretical categorisations, educational devices, so actually the "five aggregates" cannot be experienced at all.

There are numerous early schools. There are also many later schools. And even within schools there can be many lineages, groups and factions. Look at https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Nichiren_Buddhism#Major_Nichiren_Buddhist_schools_and_organisations for instance. Could it be that among all the schools there is only one that is true? Or maybe a couple? There is actually a way to differentiate between acceptable and unacceptable teachings within Buddhism, and it is called the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Four_Dharma_Seals.

You mention that those schools have "theories about reality, existence and so on". That is not necessarily so. Buddhism is not about making up definitions to believe in but guiding people to liberation. Some say that one should meditation on the ugliness on the body to remove attachment, others may say that it is better to contemplate the four elements, or perhaps the five elements. All three versions are perfectly valid and can be used. It all depends on one's inclinations.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 24th, 2015 at 5:58 PM

Title: Re: 'What are you saying'?

Content:

Dan74 said:

I don't think I mentioned psychotherapy or 'mundane matters of social interaction'. I spoke of the importance of the teacher knowing the student's mind and helping clear just the right obstacle.

Astus wrote:

If it is the teacher (who is required / who helps) clearing the obstacles, how is it not like psychotherapy and social interaction? Also, if it is about teacher-student interaction, why should people have the eye and function of both break in and break out? They should only have the function of break out, and not even its eye.

Dan74 said:

What is the shell? The shell is of course ignorance and delusion and the right teacher helps us break free. Not half of the holly life, the Buddha said, all of the holly life is the companionship of spiritual friends.

Astus wrote:

Ignorance is unawareness of emptiness, equally for all beings. Zen teaches that people should look at their mind right now, instead of following appearances. Once the mind is seen the obstacles are gone. What else is there to do?

As for good friends being the whole of holy life, the Buddha advises associating with and emulating wise and virtuous friends

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an08/an08.054.nara.html#friendship>), who have good qualities, like revealing their secrets and keeping your secrets

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an07/an07.035.than.html>). Also, the scripture where you cited the saying from (<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn45/sn45.002.than.html>), identifies the Buddha as the friend of all beings, because he showed the noble eightfold path, and the sutta also says that the one who has good friends follows the eightfold path. That is, the student's delusions are cleared to the extent of knowing what the path is, but the path is followed on one's own after that, since no other person can be ethical, concentrated and wise for another. As the Dhammapada (v 276) says, "You yourselves must strive; the Buddhas only point the way."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 24th, 2015 at 7:00 PM

Title: Re: New schools in early buddhism

Content:

lostitude said:

The reputation of the author maybe? If he is known by his peers to have reached a level giving him direct knowledge of the things he discusses, or not.

Astus wrote:

Schools recognise their own teachers as enlightened. As noted by Malcolm, the debates on the nature of arhats happened between arhats. Otherwise, as you have observed, who cares?

lostitude said:

You can also tell from the style, with on one hand the highly logical, if x is true then y is true then it follows that z is true, and on the other hand, a more intuitive phrasing like 'as your insight improves you will see clearly that x and y and z.

Astus wrote:

That doesn't really apply to Buddhism. The same person can compose very logical texts and also "intuitive" poetry. One of the most highly regarded master in Mahayana is Nagarjuna who wrote a number of works that may sound overly theoretical to outsiders, but actually they are precise instructions for practitioners.

lostitude said:

none of those who debated it were Arahats themselves, otherwise the answer would be obvious to them

Astus wrote:

How could anything be obvious if first that thing needs to be defined? For instance, can a genius tell if he's a genius if the meaning of "genius" is not clear?

lostitude said:

it's about knowing on what/whose authority exactly they have been expounded and used to oppose other similar theories.

Astus wrote:

Buddhism doesn't have a single leader to tell who is right and who is wrong. So, practically anyone can go on and teach. Then either he gains followers to support him or not. The various early schools were all well established and recognised as valid by many people for centuries.

lostitude said:

Who taught him and trained him? Did his teacher(s) certify that he has reached an advanced enough level to discuss what he discusses?

Astus wrote:

The Buddha didn't have a teacher and was authorised by nobody. That is actually part of him being a buddha and not a disciple. And there were and are several generally respected teachers who did not claim anyone in particular as their teacher, although at the same time it is only natural for any Buddhist, and especially for monastics, to be members in a community and learn from several people. Here's a teaching from the Buddha on how to recognise a teacher:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an04/an04.192.than.html>.

lostitude said:

The kind of argument I read about sounded so much like hair-splitting (like, can an arahat produce semen while sleeping) that I asked myself this question which is a very natural question to ask in an islamic context.

Astus wrote:

My view on that kind of experience is that if it feels like irrelevant theoretical debate, it is because of the lack of thorough understanding of the topic and the lack of personal connection with it. The debate itself normally shows that for at least a couple of people it was important, since before the time of full-time academic employment people were not paid to publish new materials every month.

lostitude said:

Everything you have all written makes sense, but does not really answer my question

Astus wrote:

That is likely because of the difference in premises. Ultimately, one has to find the answers on one's own.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 24th, 2015 at 7:45 PM

Title: Re: 'What are you saying'?

Content:

Dan74 said:

The way I see it, the interaction that clears obstacles is intimate, no separation, that's what the koan refers to, if I understand correctly. In that interaction, there's no gap between the student's action and the teacher's response. ... I don't quite get your question about the eye and the function. Naturally, the student should have the eye and the function to break out of the shell and the teacher to sync with him/her to break in.

Astus wrote:

If you look at the commentary in the BCR, there Jingqing is quoted saying "foot-travelers must have the 'simultaneous breaking in and breaking out' eye and must have the 'simultaneous breaking in and breaking out' function". That is to show how this break in and break out was used in his community. That is, this is a teaching device, not a description. Otherwise, as you say, the itinerant monks should only have the break out part, but Jingqing says they should have both the ability to go in and go out.

Dan74 said:

But in a more mundane way, being with a teacher who knows you well, can be very helpful as your habitual patterns of unawareness and sloppiness comes into sharp relief.

Astus wrote:

Yes, that's not questioned at all. And that's similar to how therapy works.

Dan74 said:

As for 'once the mind is seen, the obstacles are gone. What is there to do?' That's for you to figure out.

Astus wrote:

I mention that as what I see as the basic idea of Bodhidharma's coming from the West. Isn't that repeated all over again and again in Zen teachings? Of course, there's the option to say that it's just rhetoric (the rhetoric of immediacy), but then the whole Zen school is a bad joke.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 24th, 2015 at 9:08 PM

Title: Re: 'What are you saying'?

Content:

Dan74 said:

I'm not following - 'a teaching device'? How?

Astus wrote:

Yuanwu comments: "From this we see that they did have the device of 'simultaneous breaking in and breaking out' in Ching Ch'ing's school." Even the original case itself displays how the monk raised the topic of breaking in and out, so it's not like it is a description of what went on, but a saying to look into. Thus Xuedou's first line: "The Ancient buddhas had a family style", and Yuanwu's comment after quoting Yunmen on killing the baby Buddha: "devices of breaking in and breaking out are all in the family tradition of the Ancient Buddhas".

Dan74 said:

The intention was not to go into the koan, but to illustrate that the importance of the teacher is a well-established teaching in Zen. I bet you know many more and more convincing instances of it.

Astus wrote:

Platform Sutra, ch 2 (BDK Edition):

You should each contemplate your minds and each see the fundamental nature. If you do not become enlightened by yourself, then you must seek a great spiritual compatriot, someone who understands the Dharma of the Supreme Vehicle, to indicate directly the correct path for you. This spiritual compatriot will have a great background and will, so to speak, lead you to the attainment of seeing the nature. This is because the spiritual compatriot is able to manifest the causes of all the good dharmas. All the buddhas of the three periods of time and the twelve divisions of the canon are fundamentally and naturally immanent within the natures of people, but if you cannot become enlightened yourself, you must seek a spiritual compatriot's instructions in order to see [the nature]. If you can become enlightened yourself, don't rely on external seeking—don't think I'm saying you can only attain emancipation through [the help of] a spiritual compatriot other than yourself. This is not the case! Why? Within your own minds there is a spiritual compatriot [who will help you] become enlightened by yourself! If you activate the false and deluded, you will become all mixed up with false thoughts. Although some external spiritual compatriots may be teachers, they cannot save you. If you activate the correct and true and contemplate with prajñā, in a single instant [all your] false thoughts will be completely eradicated. If you recognize the self-nature, with a single [experience of] enlightenment you will attain the stage of buddhahood.

So here Huineng says that either one obtains assistance from a good friend or works on his own. However, it should be recognised that just by reading the Platform Sutra one is already relying on a good friend, a presentation of the Dharma. In fact, only pratyekabuddhas and samyaksambuddhas can be said to be without teachers.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 24th, 2015 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: 'What are you saying'?

Content:

Dan74 said:

That makes no sense to me at all. Of course it is a description. Or do you suppose it's a made up phrase referring to nothing?

Astus wrote:

What would be the point of a story like that just to say that teacher and student work together? How is that information conducive to liberation?

What I propose is that it is a phrase to say the same thing that is always said in any Zen work: enlightenment is seeing the nature of mind. The shell is broken not through stages of discussing age old stories but at the very moment of meeting Shakyamuni face to face. See Xuedou's poem: "Chick and mother hen do not know each other; / Who is it that breaks in and breaks out together?"

Dan74 said:

Whether you look at the actual case, Koun Yamada's commentary I quoted from above, Meido's brief comment or also a talk by Subhana Barzaghi online, they are all talking about actual interaction between teacher and student. Or do you think all those koans and mondo were put on performances or fictional stories with no relation to actual practice and we all go it terribly wrong?

Astus wrote:

Yes, they have everything to do with one's actual practice. But is the practice about figuring out teacher-student relationships or is it about clarifying the fundamental matter?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 25th, 2015 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: 'What are you saying'?

Content:

seeker242 said:

I don't know about that. It seems to me that the value of a teacher is them being able to see things about you, that you yourself cannot see. If they can't do that, then what's the point of having them?

Astus wrote:

Teachers are those who know more, who have a clear understanding and realisation of the teaching. That way they can transmit the Dharma according to the needs of the listeners. It is no different from learning various things where an instructor can help the student. But that doesn't mean a teacher has to be informed about people's personal lives. In a monastery with hundreds of residents it is not like that every monk talks to the abbot weekly, monthly, or even in a decade.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 26th, 2015 at 6:52 AM

Title: Re: 'What are you saying'?

Content:

Meido said:

Finally, it is why I wince whenever someone refers to zazen as "the primary practice of Zen" without mention of sanzen or other encounter which is at least another equal wheel of the cart.

Astus wrote:

Thank you for your post.

I think it is always difficult to restrict Zen to this or that. Here's a Soto perspective (and not mentioning now anything from Korea, China or Vietnam):

"In the conventional Soto Zen world (meaning temples and teachers who do not use koans as teaching tools), there is no such thing as dokusan. I'm sure there are some exceptions to that, but in my 12 years in Japan, I have yet to find even one. A student can always meet formally with a teacher — structures exist for that. But even then — even if the meeting opens and closes with prostrations, even if it produces all the intensity we might expect — it is also more likely than not that tea will be served, and that the conversation will stretch on for an hour or more. There will not be a line of students waiting their turns; there will not be an attendant guarding the door." (source: <http://nyoho.com/2012/11/26/behind-closed-doors/>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 28th, 2015 at 12:04 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://www.khenposodargye.org/2015/05/the-relationship-between-chan-and-dzogchen/>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 28th, 2015 at 9:15 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Khenpo Sodargye, in the video posted

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=298833#p298833>, around the 44th minute compares Chan's view of the nature of mind to Semde. He is probably the closest among Tibetan teachers to make any comparisons between current Chan and Dzogchen, as he actually lectures on the Platform Sutra. But probably the most well known practitioner of both Chan and Dzogchen is (was) Yogi Chen.

Further on Khenpo Sodargye's presentation, it is quite clear he approaches Chan from a very Tibetan interpretation, like saying that Chan is based on the Platform and the Surangama sutras, plus it transmits an oral tradition of upadesa based on those two scriptures. An interesting view, but hardly representative of anyone. Nevertheless, it shows how difficult it is to make any comparisons when the fundamental elements are not clarified. But in order to do that, the person should be aware of not only some Chan and Dzogchen teaching, but the larger history of Chinese and Tibetan Buddhism. Alas, Khenpo Sodargye is explicitly against any scholarly study of Dzogchen, claiming that it should not be subject to critical investigation and logic.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 28th, 2015 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: 'What are you saying'?

Content:

DGA said:

to practice zazen is to practice Zen is their assumption--and hence what one needs is a democratic practice group with no authoritative leadership. Is Zen practice possible in the absence of a competent teacher-student relation, regardless of what the apparent role might be?

Astus wrote:

"Zazen is the most venerable and only true teacher."

(<http://antaiji.org/services/english-the-seven-points-of-practice-uchiyama/?lang=en>)

Zazen is practice-enlightenment, according to Dogen. What is there to improve? What else is there to teach?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 28th, 2015 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Crypto-Buddhism, Crypto-Taoism, Crypto-Dzogchen...

Content:

DGA said:

My point is that it's not always so easy to determine what is Dharma and what is not by name alone. It can take some probing.

Astus wrote:

"Those who teach a Dhamma for the abandoning of passion, for the abandoning of aversion, for the abandoning of delusion — their Dhamma is well-taught. Those who have practiced for the abandoning of passion, for the abandoning of aversion, for the abandoning of delusion — they have practiced well in this world. Those whose passion... aversion... delusion is abandoned, its root destroyed, made like a palmyra stump, deprived of the conditions of development, not destined for future arising: they, in this world, are well-gone."

(<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/an/an03/an03.072.than.html>; also see:

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.21.2x.than.html#goal>,

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/an/an03/an03.078.than.html>)

"Bhikkhus, only here is there a recluse, only here a second recluse, only here a third recluse, only here a fourth recluse. The doctrines of others are devoid of recluses: that is how you should rightly roar your lion's roar."

(<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.011.ntbb.html>)

"In whatsoever Dhamma and Discipline, Subhadda, there is not found the Noble Eightfold Path, neither is there found a true ascetic of the first, second, third, or fourth degree of saintliness. But in whatsoever Dhamma and Discipline there is found the Noble Eightfold Path, there is found a true ascetic of the first, second, third, and fourth degrees of saintliness." (<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.16.1-6.vaji.html#fnt-54>)

DGA said:

My other point is that I'm not satisfied with this concept of "crypto-" anything in this context. I don't think ancient yogis were attempting a kind of Dharmic trojan horse to smuggle Buddhist concepts into tribal regions along the silk road. I think you had people doing their best with what they had, engaging with people as best they could, and now we have the outcome of that.

Astus wrote:

So-so. If they had seen Buddhism as something they want to follow, they simply could have become Buddhists themselves. Otherwise it is the same as now with New Age and such, cherry picking.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 28th, 2015 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Crypto-Buddhism, Crypto-Taoism, Crypto-Dzogchen...

Content:

DGA said:

I'm not sure it's quite so straightforward as that.

Astus wrote:

Then we can follow the criteria set in MN 11 - either they teach no-self or not. That sutta is relevant also because it lists many elements of the Buddhist path that are found in other teachings as well, and that is not a problem for anyone. Similarly, if you look at the various Mahayana traditions, they may teach all sorts of things, but they all end up contemplating and realising emptiness, i.e. no-self. So, if there is a teaching that does not call itself Buddhist but contains the path of ethics-concentration-wisdom, it is practically in agreement with the Buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 29th, 2015 at 5:11 PM

Title: Re: Crypto-Buddhism, Crypto-Taoism, Crypto-Dzogchen...

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

That's true, but if the resultant hodge-podge is good enough (useful enough, exciting enough) to attract others it eventually becomes a well-defined 'school' of Buddhism, Taoism or whatever, and the original cherry-picker becomes a revered teacher and founding father.

Astus wrote:

Of course, just as you say. Mutual influence is natural, so for instance "Taoist" elements are found in Chinese Buddhism, and Buddhist elements are found in Taoist teachings. But what makes a Buddhist is first of all refuge, which practically means accepting the frame of Dharma-Vinaya as presented in the Tripitaka, and from that comes accepting a number of fundamental doctrines, i.e. karma, rebirth, dependent origination and no-self - in other words: the four noble truths and the noble eightfold path. On the other hand, if it is for instance a Taoist implementing some Buddhist techniques, while it may use various meditation practices and even follow certain ethical principles, in terms of doctrine he will have to negate, disregard or transform those fundamental teachings to fit into his own frame of world view. Similarly, people today who like mindfulness and meditation are happy to practice but at the same time they're happy even to ridicule the teachings, although most of the time they just simply don't know and don't care, thus the popular view that Buddhism is not a religion but a method, that actually means "no study, only meditation", and the common term for "real Buddhists" as practitioners. On this very forum it is apparent how people regard meditation as the most important element of the Buddha's teachings and they may believe most of the scriptures to be just philosophy, while actually what they see as philosophy is the most emphasised method that brings about liberation: insight. No wonder many waste their time trying to focus on their breath without ever moving on to seeing it as unstable.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 29th, 2015 at 7:25 PM

Title: Re: 'What are you saying'?

Content:

Meido said:

Not to mention those who refuse to engage with a tradition as a whole , but believe they can strip out some essential method and use it on their own terms or for their own purposes.

Astus wrote:

Isn't that the very essence of Zen, reducing the immeasurable methods of Mahayana to seeing nature? From Bodhidharma through Linji to Dogen, they all taught that the six paramitas and ten stages are included in direct realisation of mind. Although that is not the same as denying the gradual path of methods, but it is how they set the difference between the usual bodhisattva career and sudden enlightenment. How do you see it?

Meido said:

there could be zazen practice without a teacher, but not Zen.

Astus wrote:

What do you say about the <http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=298372#p298372> from Huineng? What about people like Bojo Jinul, Hanshan Deqing, Zibo Zhenke, Xuyun, Gyeongheo, Seongcheol, Daehaeng and Thich Thanh Tu - all of whom are considered outstanding Zen masters who did not really study under or receive confirmation from a Zen teacher?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 30th, 2015 at 12:20 AM

Title: Re: 'What are you saying'?

Content:

Meido said:

Zen is not a reduction of myriad methods to one of seeing nature. It is a way of approaching myriad methods with seeing nature as the basis of practice. This approach is what marks it as a One Vehicle school, and ultimately without fixed methods.

Astus wrote:

In order to practice the paramitas, a bodhisattva has to realise prajnaparamita. In other words, what you say seems no different from how Mahayana is generally taught. On the other hand, several ancestors - although not all (e.g. Zongmi) - taught that "To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to arrive at the stage of buddhahood." (Platform Sutra, p 34, BDK Edition) and "Awakening is to awake to one's original nature.

Once awakened, one is awakened forever, there being no more ignorance." (Mazu Daoyi, in Sun-Face Buddha, p 67-68). And there is of course Linji:

"Outside mind there's no dharma, nor is there anything to be gained within it. What are you seeking? Everywhere you say, 'There's something to practice, something to obtain.' Make no mistake! Even if there were something to be gained by practice, it would be nothing but birth-and-death karma. You say, 'The six pāramitās and the ten thousand [virtuous] actions are all to be practiced.' As I see it, all this is just making karma."

(Record of Linji, p 17, tr Sasaki)

also:

"people everywhere say that there is a Way to be practiced, a dharma to be confirmed. Tell me, what dharma will you confirm, what Way will you practice? What is lacking in your present activity? What still needs to be patched up?"

(p 18)

Do you consider them relative teachings that were meant to motivate beginner practitioners who were lacking determination and had been frightened by the long path of the bodhisattva? Is it all rhetoric and skilful means? Or is it that they were meant only for the best of the best, a few people of the highest capacity?

Meido said:

But glancing at the people you name I see a number of people who went to be ordained, who entered into communal practice, who received crucial practice advice from teachers, and so on. Most if not all, I expect, took the role of teacher to others, and most transmitted to successors?

Astus wrote:

Yes, everyone listed there were (are) ordained monastics, and eventually took up teaching. Naturally, the very meaning of a monastic community is preserving and passing on the Dharma. Technically it is not possible to become a monk without a teacher, it is how it works everywhere. In that sense, talking about a lineage that goes back to Shakyamuni is redundant, as ordination necessarily goes back to him, and the same goes for the Dharma as well. And so we can see how the idea of a lineage as developed in Chinese Buddhism (first in the Sanlun, then the Tiantai, and after that in the Chan school), is about something else than authenticity or legitimacy, but that's a different topic.

Meido said:

i think the mainstream and traditional understanding is worth emphasizing very strongly. There is also the issue of the rarity of people with sufficiently great ability to progress far on the path without guidance.

Astus wrote:

Does that traditional understanding include monastic life? If I understand it correctly, the Zen teachers (shike), who are actually authorised to train monks, in Rinzi are celibate monks.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 30th, 2015 at 6:50 AM

Title: Re: 'What are you saying'?

Content:

Meido said:

I would argue that both are theoretically possible, but the former is so rare as to not be worth talking about much. On the ground, past and present, people were living together and practicing-even in these monasteries where Rinzai and others put on robes each day, engaged in ceremony and monastic activity, conducted periods of retreat, met with and guided students, traveled to test themselves under other teachers, and so on- in order to not only awaken, but to clarify and test that awakening over periods of years. Or such is the (here comes that word again) traditional understanding.

Astus wrote:

Isn't that how it goes among Buddhists throughout the world? Do you then consider Zen, or Rinzai Zen specifically, simply a matter of choice from all the other equally viable paths? That is, instead of believing in the ultimate superiority of Kanna Zen (like people claiming http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/bbs/board.php?bo_table=3020&wr_id=56), do you see it as 1 of 84000 methods? Or, as you mentioned before, Zen being a One Vehicle path without fixed methods, isn't that contrary to maintaining a "traditional understanding"? And since the teacher-student relationship is a crucial element of Rinzai Zen, these questions apply to that aspect as well. Like if it matters at all whether someone studies Buddhism with a Rinzai teacher, a Nichirenshu teacher, or a Sakyapa lama?

Here's another from the same text by Huangbo: "If you can just [attain] no-mind, then that is the ultimate [state of enlightenment]. If a trainee does not instantly [attain] no-mind but spends successive eons in cultivation, he will never achieve enlightenment. He will be fettered by the meritorious practices of the three vehicles and will not attain liberation. In spite of the length of time it takes them to [attain it, once they] reside in no-mind there is nothing else to be cultivated or realized. Truly without anything to be attained, true and not false [is no-mind]. Whether it is attained in a single moment of thought or at the tenth stage [of the bodhisattva], its efficacy is identical." (tr McRae, BDK Edition, p 16)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 3:53 AM

Title: Re: 'What are you saying'?

Content:

Meido said:

It is a distinctive approach granting great freedom because the essence of all methods can be grasped right at the outset. And in this approach the teacher is seen to necessarily play a role.

Astus wrote:

What is that essence of all methods, and how is a teacher necessary to grasp that?

As White Lotus mentioned, no-mind is practically the realisation of impermanence, a core teaching of the Buddha found in every tradition, although it is also true that traditions approach impermanence and its realisation in various ways. So, what do you say is the Zen/essential way, and how is a teacher has an important role there?

(I'm asking for your views/teachings, not debating.)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 4:09 AM

Title: Re: Towards a Buddhist Fundamentalism: Part II

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sounds very misled. If they want to go hard core Buddhist, become dhutanga bhikkhus in some remote jungle or mountain and stop wasting their time on the internet. Also, Buddhism has Fundamentalist Non-violence as well, maybe they should start there.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 7:07 AM

Title: Re: 'What are you saying'?

Content:

Dan74 said:

Do you want to open another thread, Astus? I think it would be better.

/

Astus wrote:

Sure, why not.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 5:04 PM

Title: Re: Devotion??

Content:

Astus wrote:

It seems to me you try to maintain a warm feeling all the time (or at least in relation to your practice). And as you can see for yourself, feelings are neither permanent nor obedient to your will. At the same time, because of this view that feelings should be in a specific way, you are dissatisfied. And that is three out of three universal characteristics: unstable, unsatisfactory, not owned.

Faith in the Three Jewels is simply the established understanding that this is the path that leads to liberation. Determination is the established understanding that liberation is the only true happiness that oneself and all beings desire. If you know that those two qualities are present, there is no need to long for any specific feelings, since regardless of your physical and mental condition, you are certain of the Three Jewels' immeasurable value, just like you may have fluctuating emotions toward a friend, but you remain sure that the other person is your friend.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 5:19 PM

Title: Re: Why Buddhism over Vedanta?

Content:

coldmountains said:

1. how one can know who is right (since the high attainments of both are not exactly easily accessible or common experiences)?
2. What does Buddhism say specifically about the pure/infinite/absolute consciousness that Vedantic masters claim to achieve?
3. What persuaded you that Buddhism has got it right over Vedanta?

Astus wrote:

1. Knowing which one is right is already accepting one and rejecting the other. There is no objective - third point of view - measurement.

2. An absolute consciousness is the mistaken view of grasping at self within a sophisticated teaching. That is, unlike ordinary beings who don't philosophise, in this case it is a cultivated view. And it is a wrong view, since it contradicts dependent origination and results in dissatisfaction. Also, since nobody ever experiences a permanent self, it is just a conceptual fantasy.

3. "When one reaches the height of the second stage, he realises that the concept of the 'I' does not exist. But he has only abandoned the small 'I' and has not negated the concept of basic substance or the existence of God; you may call it Truth, the one and only God, the Almighty, the Unchanging Principle, or even the Buddha of Buddhism. If you think that it is real, then you are still in the realm of the big 'I' and have not left the sphere of philosophy and religion." See:

http://www.westernchanfellowship.org/lib/wcf////what-is-chan/; summary:

http://www.dharmadrum.org/content/chan_garden/chan_garden3.aspx?sn=48.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 8:58 PM

Title: Zen - The Essence of Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

This is a topic coming from <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=299242#p299242>, to give a new thread to the idea that Zen is the essence of the Buddha's teachings.

First, here are a few words from Shengyan:

"To the extent of my knowledge, I believe that Chan Buddhism as developed in China is the core of the Buddha's message.

...

Since the time of Śākyamuni Buddha, the teaching of Chan—whether it is found in Mahāyāna teachings or the earlier teachings, whether the teaching is gradual or sudden—has consistently been focused on the realization of no-mind, the mind free of self-attachment. In all the various teachings, the essence is still the same.

...

Broadly speaking, all forms of Buddhadharma can be said to be Chan Buddhism. "The teachings stem from Chan; from the teachings one realizes Chan." All Buddhadharma is inseparable from the teachings of Chan. Specifically, "Chan Buddhism" refers to the Chinese Chan School; and even though the Chan School encompasses the foundation and essence of the Mahāyāna and Hīnayāna traditions of Buddhism, all of these teachings are precisely the teachings of silent illumination and critical phrase."

(http://www.shengyen.org/e_content/content/about/about_04_06.aspx)

Shengyan's point is to show not only that Chan is not only the essential teaching of the Buddha, but by that it is the best and most authentic school. He also mentions that "Chinese Chan Buddhism is the only tradition that was institutionalized as a corporate entity with a community of monastics who developed a system of transmissions from master to disciple." - although that is historically <http://eubuddhist.blogspot.in/2011/05/undisputed-lineages.html> at all.

The main topic to look into here, however, is to identify what the essence of Zen is, and how that could be taken as the essence of the whole of Buddhadharma. There was a thread here on the <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=145499#p145499>, and both the Platform Sutra and Shengyan confirms that no-thought is that central teaching of Zen that also equals prajnaparamita, and prajnaparamita is claimed by many sutras to be the essential teaching for both sravakas and bodhisattvas.

Question is: if Zen teaches the same as any other tradition, why say that it is anything special?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: Zen - The Essence of Buddhism

Content:

DGA said:

perhaps the better question is: best for whom, and for what purpose...

Astus wrote:

The purpose cannot really be a question, unless we go outside the boundaries of Mahayana. There are (triumphalist) answers in various traditions for the whom:

1. for those with little dust on their eyes / best capacity
2. for everyone

3. for those with the worst capacity

Zen is usually said to be either the first or the second answer.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 10:52 PM

Title: Re: Zen - The Essence of Buddhism

Content:

seeker242 said:

I would not say that is the same as any other tradition.

Astus wrote:

Killing as a metaphor for removing defilements already occurs in the early scriptures (<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn01/sn01.071.than.html>), plus it is discussed in the Lankavatara Sutra (3.58) in a similar way as well.

Negating the various stages of the path is a classic theme in the prajnaparamita sutras. That the Linjilu has developed its unconventional style over the time does not mean it has new content.

Or would you say that Zen is special because it offers sudden enlightenment? (Although that was "invented" before as well, particularly in Tiantai.)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 11:09 PM

Title: Re: Zen - The Essence of Buddhism

Content:

seeker242 said:

Even with all that, I don't think one can say, conventionally speaking, that it's the same. Ultimately speaking, perhaps you could say it's the same because the "ultimate truth" is the same regardless. Also, I don't think it has to be brand new or unique, to be "special". But of course, that all depends on how one defines "special" to begin with.

Astus wrote:

What is it then that you consider Zen's own unique approach?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 1st, 2015 at 3:42 AM

Title: Re: Zen - The Essence of Buddhism

Content:

DGA said:

I was thinking of Pure Land practice with regard purpose. The immediate purpose of practice is different there.

Astus wrote:

See this from the same text by Shengyan quoted in the OP: "“pure land” can be said to be the final destination—the final goal—of all of Mahāyāna Buddhists. Why? Because the construction of a pure land, or buddhaksetra, is the goal of all bodhisattvas and buddhas. ... The pure land is a generalized Mahāyāna goal. All schools of Mahāyāna Buddhism recollect buddhas’ names, including the Chan School."

DGA said:

Another factor is time: many schools promote their approach as being the best and most appropriate for this historical moment (the Kali Yuga or mappo argument). It's not unusual to see Zen and Dzogchen in particular described today as being especially relevant to the "modern world." (frankly there aren't enough questions about what the word "modern" means in this context.)

Astus wrote:

I have rarely seen that kind of argument in Zen. If the topic of the Dharma-ending age is raised at all, it is pointed out that all beings have buddha-nature and that past ancestors were no different from today's people. Although there are some Chinese teachers who say that while people in the past could gain enlightenment simply by hearing a few words, humans' capacity had declined and for that reason teachers invented skilful means like sitting meditation and huatou.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 1st, 2015 at 4:59 PM

Title: Re: What does it mean to be a "traditionalist"?

Content:

Astus wrote:

For example, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/James_Ishmael_Ford calls himself a http://www.huffingtonpost.com/james-ishmael-ford/faith-of-a-liberal-buddhist_b_3059820.html. You can read one of his latest posts <http://www.patheos.com/blogs/monkeymind/2015/08/the-karma-and-rebirth-debate-within-contemporary-western-buddhism-some-links-to-follow.html> on karma and rebirth.

Since the realisation of either a stream-enterer or a bodhisattva necessarily includes the understanding and acceptance of rebirth, what kind of transmission is it that authorises annihilationists/materialists to appear as Zen teachers? From a "traditionalist" perspective they are more like manifestations of Mara.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 1st, 2015 at 5:08 PM

Title: Re: Zen - The Essence of Buddhism

Content:

DGA said:

Yes, there is a long historical connection between Pure Land practice and Ch'an practice. Is that also so in Zen? I'd thought we were discussing Zen in the strict sense.

Astus wrote:

Zen in the strict sense? Do you mean Japanese Zen? The OP itself has quotes from a Chinese teacher. But even if it's only Japanese Zen, they do have nenbutsu practices, plus there's the Obaku school.

DGA said:

it's not unusual for contemporary Zen teachers to claim that Zen practice is especially suited to the "modern" mind, as I was saying. But the sense there is that the "modern" mind is an advanced, rational one, not a symptom of a degraded Dharma-ending-age.

Astus wrote:

How does that fit into Zen being the essence of Buddhism?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 1st, 2015 at 5:22 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land and the Nembutsu

Content:

PorkChop said:

this passage is talking about the merit of the Bodhisattvas of the Pure Land (you know, the Bodhisattvas that all Pure Landers are aspiring to become...)

Astus wrote:

It seems the Lotus Sutra (ch 23, BDK Edition, p 285-286) agrees:

"If there is any woman five hundred years after the parinirvana of the Tathagata who hears this sutra and practices according to the teaching, she will immediately reach the dwelling of the Buddha Amitayus in the Sukhavati world, surrounded by great bodhisattvas, and will be born on a jeweled seat in a lotus flower. Never again troubled by the [three poisons] of greed, anger, or ignorance, by arrogance or jealousy, he will attain the bodhisattva's transcendent powers and the acceptance of the nonorigination of all dharmas. After attaining this acceptance, his faculty of sight will be pure; and with this pure eye faculty, he will see all the Buddha Tathagatas, equal in number to the sands of seventy-two million kotis of nayutas of Ganges Rivers. At that time all the buddhas will praise him from afar, saying:

Splendid! Splendid! Son of a virtuous family! You have preserved, recited, and contemplated this sutra from the teachings of the Buddha Śākyamuni and taught it to others. The merit you have obtained is immeasurable and limitless. Even fire cannot burn it. Even water cannot wash it away. Even thousands of buddhas cannot give a complete description of your merit. You have already destroyed the maras. You have already conquered the armies of birth and death. You have defeated all enemies. O son of a virtuous family! Hundreds of thousands of buddhas together protect you with their transcendent powers. There is no one equal to you among the devas and humans of the entire world. With the exception of the Tathagata, the wisdom and meditation of all sravakas, pratyekabuddhas, and bodhisattvas can never equal yours."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 1st, 2015 at 6:53 PM

Title: Re: Zen - The Essence of Buddhism

Content:

DGA said:

I didn't know contemporary Zen schools taught nembutsu outside of Obaku. That's good to know.

Astus wrote:

I meant nenbutsu as buddhanusmrti, not specifically oral recitation of Amida's name. It is generally part of various ceremonies and rituals.

DGA said:

By this logic, zazen, which is Zen in this context, is the most essential practice for the most essential people: hurried, bustled, "modern" man, who can't be bothered with holdovers from "premodern" cultures. "Zen goes to the essence" in this milieu. Many of the claims made for mindfulness now have also been made on behalf of Zen.

Astus wrote:

I think it could be for lay people if the emphasis were not on seated meditation but cultivating no-thought. Second best is maintaining great doubt, as an entry practice to no-thought. Seated meditation is often either a limited practice that many view as a challenge to do regularly, or it is simply not done at all. It also tends to be a quietist practice. Mindfulness is similar to seated meditation in that it is taken as quietism or something even less beneficial (i.e. "living in the moment"). That not just fails to be Zen but has very little to do with Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 1st, 2015 at 7:25 PM

Title: Re: Zen - The Essence of Buddhism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

An 'essence' is the 'is-ness' of something - that which remains whilst all the characteristics change. ... The whole point of Zen teaching was, I thought, non-attachment to form.

Astus wrote:

That essence is no essence, that is, there are just changing characteristics without anything remaining. That's how there cannot be attachment to anything.

Wayfarer said:

I admit, it has to take some form, even to be spoken of, otherwise we can't say anything whatever. But to then say 'this is the essential form of Buddhism', seems to me not necessarily in keeping with the intent of the tradition - 'the Buddha twirls a flower'.

Astus wrote:

Change is the essence, understanding change yields non-attachment. The difference between Buddhist schools is about how to bring about that understanding. Not prescribing any set methods is possible when there is a teacher who can give guidance on the spot. But once such personal instructions become subjects of study - i.e. koan practice - it is not any different from learning from the Buddha's own teachings. So, while on the one hand, as seeker242 said, koan/huatou is uniquely Zen, on the other hand, it is falling back on written materials and fixed methods.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 1st, 2015 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Zen - The Essence of Buddhism

Content:

Caodemarte said:

I wonder if the unique feature of Zen would be its stress on existential (not intellectual, not academic) doubt (Great Doubt) that characterizes all forms of Zen.

Astus wrote:

Great doubt is one of the three important qualities of huatou practice. But those who do not use that method don't cultivate great doubt either.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 2nd, 2015 at 3:23 AM

Title: Re: Zen - The Essence of Buddhism

Content:

seeker242 said:

Except that koan/wato practice is not study or learning. And its crux is found in the encounter between teacher and student - on the spot - rather than between student and text.

Astus wrote:

This I what I think of when someone says "outside the scriptures". Personal, private dharma combat with the teacher, where he swings at you and sometime you duck, and sometimes you get your head chopped off! I don't think a book can bring that level of "aliveness" I guess you can call it. Especially if you have a good, clear, high energy teacher who gets right up in your face. Nothing I have ever read in a book can compare to that.[/quote]

Teachers of other traditions can and do the same, while at the same time such "Dharma combats" can and do become mere formalities.

The method described by Wumen contains no reference to any interaction between teacher and student, nor is there such a requirement mentioned in Dahui's letters (note:

he communicated with many lay disciples through letters, so face-to-face encounter did not really happen) or Jinul's teachings. Interestingly, while in Japanese sanzen (参禅) means interview with a teacher, in Chinese canchan (参禅) means to practise meditation. But this is not what I have referred to when I compared studying koans to studying sutras. The Wumenguan itself is a literary work, just like the Blue Cliff Record and others. It has its own name actually: Literary Zen (文字禅 wenzichan). Heine writes (Like Cats and Dogs, p 6) that Dahui's phrase-watching zen (看话禅 kanhuachan) was his way of bringing the focus away from linguistic sophistry to mental cultivation, and that way allowing ordinary lay people (or actually higher class literati) access to what is normally a monastic training by providing a short-cut path. But it still remains that whoever wants to know what Chan/Zen is about, they have to read a lot of stories as well. And even if they don't read, they will hear them every time during lectures and discussions among fellow practitioners. Similarly, if one learns for instance the Heart Sutra, one can go through various stages of doubt, perplexity, confusion, over conceptualisation, internal investigation and others before it becomes somewhat clear. One can also have lively discussions with teachers. And in order to be completely clear, one needs to arrive at true realisation.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 2nd, 2015 at 4:47 AM

Title: Re: Zen - The Essence of Buddhism

Content:

Caodemarte said:

"In Sôtô Zen the focus is spoken of as "[untainted, uncontrived] just sitting," shikan-taza [只管打坐]. Not mere sitting in blankness or clarity. Dôgen [道元; 1200-1253], the father of Japanese Sôtô Zen, struggled with this Doubt since his youth, and had it resolved through a decisive Awakening he described as "body-mind fallen off," shinjin-datsuraku [身心脱落].

Astus wrote:

That is a story written by Keizan and nowhere mentioned by Dogen himself. On the other hand, Dogen criticises Dahui in several chapters of Shobogenzo:

in Sesshin sesshō: "He had never seen thusness nature. Because of this, he had a mistaken view of buddha dharma."

in Jishō zanmai: after lots of criticism, Dogen sums up: "ignorant people think that Zonggao was not less than earlier masters. But those who see and know agree that he did not have clear understanding. Without clarifying the great dharma, he merely chattered groundlessly."

in Ō saku sendaba: "there was someone called Zonggao, Zen Master Dahui of Mount Jing, a remote descendant of Nanyue. People all over Song China think he equaled or even excelled Xuedou. This mistake was made because monks and laypeople in Song China are shallow in their studies and their eyes are not clear; they do not discern true persons, nor do they have the power to discern themselves."

in Jinshin inga: "People in China nowadays regard Zonggao as an established ancestor.

However, his view does not equal even the expedient teachings in the buddha dharma. It resembles a view of spontaneous enlightenment by people outside the way."

How could then Dogen had embraced Dahui's approach?

Caodemarte said:

He even states in his work, Bendôwa [辨道話]: "With this, the one great matter of my entire life was resolved." [一生 参学の大事ここにをはりぬ]"

Astus wrote:

The full sentence actually is: "Finally, I became a student of Zen Master Rujing of Taibai Peak and completed my life's quest of the great matter." (つひに太白峰の浄禅師に参じて、一生参学の大事ここにをはりぬ。) No mention of resolving great doubt. However, the "great matter" (大事) is an important expression in the Lotus Sutra: "For this one great reason (大事) alone the buddhas have appeared in this world." (是爲諸佛以一大事因縁故出現於世)

Caodemarte said:

and in Exhortations for Those Unable to Arouse the Doubt, Boshan, one of the founders of the Caodong tradition that Soto claims descent from, drives home the fact that if Great Doubt is not allowed to arise, Zen practice sinks into a sickness.

Astus wrote:

<http://terebess.hu/zen/boshan.html>, aka Boshan, was a Ming era Caodong monk. However, by that time huatou was practised in China regardless of one's lineage affiliation, just like today.

Caodemarte said:

Korean Seon, of course, strongly stresses its importance.

Astus wrote:

And it was introduced to Korea by Jinul, who had read it in Dahui's works.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 2nd, 2015 at 7:35 PM

Title: Re: Zen - The Essence of Buddhism

Content:

Meido said:

"the dharma of the exoteric and esoteric schools will be as clear as the palm of one's hand" (I paraphrase here, as I'm away from texts at the moment). The point is simply that the gate of Zen is the experiential, rather than intellectual or conceptual, grasp - in a shallow manner or deeply - of that realization to which it may be said all methods point.

Astus wrote:

Would you say that it works the other way around as well? That is, if someone learns fully an exoteric or esoteric school, that person clearly knows what Zen is all about. Also, can you identify what that common essence is?

As for Zen being experiential, this applies to Buddhism in general as well. At the same time, Zen has produced a large number of sophisticated texts, not unlike any other tradition, and the way Zen works are different from other Buddhist materials is a matter of style.

Meido said:

I expect you have read the introduction to the Mumonkan, where Mumon Ekai's interaction with students is indeed described

Astus wrote:

It shows well how literary materials were actively used by monastics, and that apparently had inspired Wumen to write a collection and his own commentary, that again got used by other monastics and further commentaries were written.

Meido said:

I would say that the lack of mention comes from that fact that such interaction was commonly understood to be a given, as demonstrated time and again in so many of the writings and stories you mention.

Astus wrote:

The history of the development of koan collections from the early 11th century on shows how those so called records are more literary works than actual accounts of past events. Supposing that such encounters happened just like it's written is unfounded. And that's not the same as saying that there was no teacher-student relationship or interaction between people, but if you look into works like <https://books.google.com/books?id=sNhj17-DNNGC>, it becomes clear how the Zen style of the Song era was projected on stories and teachings from the Tang, for instance that Zhaozhou's No and the whole huatou practice idea was put in Huangbo's record by editors centuries later.

Naturally, Dahui had been in close contact with the monks in his monastery. But maintaining a direct relationship with lay disciples who live all over the country is a different matter. It is not a given at all that face to face meetings happened.

Meido said:

Koan collections, both in their content and their use, were treated as practice documents - accompanied by a great deal of oral practice instruction - rather than literary works (except when misused that way, which would bring immediate scolding...a criticism Tahui also leveled when he prevented publication of Hekiganroku due to its misuse by the literary-minded).

Astus wrote:

Koan collections are writings. Taking them to be practice documents shows how said writings are highly valued, virtually like holy scriptures that convey something more than words. I didn't mean any scholarly or intellectual analysis of those books.

Meido said:

Really, if you want to say that in Zen practice there exists a kind of mandatory literary engagement with koan and other Zen works, yet the centrality of teacher-student interaction - of which, most often, koan and Zen works tend to be records - is not certain, I really can't follow what you're getting at here. In any case, the reality of what I have seen Chan, Zen and Son practitioners actually doing on the ground has always, without exception, been centered within relationship with the teacher.

Astus wrote:

I don't question the centrality of the teacher's role. As you say, the Zen texts are all about teacher-student interaction, not to mention the importance of lineage. And from that comes that because lineage is one of the central concepts of Zen, the stories that retell crucial elements of the lineage (e.g. the so called flower sermon) are inevitably known by all Zen students. And both the lineage and the stories - lamp records - are written materials preserved and kept alive by Zen communities.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 2nd, 2015 at 7:53 PM

Title: Re: Zen - The Essence of Buddhism

Content:

Caodemarte said:

So, from you quotes, are you saying that Chinese Zen, Korean Zen, and other forms of Zen EXCEPT Japanese Soto stress or use the idea of Great Doubt?

Astus wrote:

What I say is that great doubt is a method of kanhuachan/kannazen only. It is used if one engages in investigating a huatou or koan as taught by Dahui and his later followers. Dogen, on the other hand, taught that zazen itself is practice-enlightenment, so there is no place to raise any doubts about. For instance, in Keizan's Zazen yojinki he advises that in case the mind wanders during zazen, one can use koans as a countering technique against that, among other methods like counting the breath. That is quite different from the idea of kanhuachan. Others, like Daehaeng, say that there is no point in artificially generating doubt with a huatou, and it may come naturally from personal questions.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 2nd, 2015 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: Zen - The Essence of Buddhism

Content:

Meido said:

If someone attains experiential insight using the methods of their school, at that time they should certainly understand what the essential point of Zen is. I do not say they will grasp how to use Zen methods, nor do I say that by seeing nature in Zen one grasps how to use the methods of other schools which one has not learned.

Astus wrote:

If we say that Zen teaching comes directly as the function of buddha-mind, every realised person can teach the Zen way. There are stories like Naropa hitting Tilopa on the head with a sandal and Ajahn Chah kicking Nyanadhammo in the chest. On the other hand, when you say that not just anyone may know how to use Zen methods, it shows that there are certain techniques within the Zen tradition. And that is what I was pointing to by referring to koans as literature and how it is not that different from using sutras.

Meido said:

The approach of Zen, again, is that this understanding is meant to come at the beginning of the path. I have described elsewhere the teacher's responsibility for this, and (in a general way) some of the means by which it is accomplished.

Astus wrote:

I think one of the greatest appeal of Zen is its sudden enlightenment approach. On the one side, there is the view that it is more a rhetoric than reality, since first one has to work for years with a single koan until the initial breakthrough, and after that one has to refine that realisation for many more years. Thus, sudden enlightenment there actually means that a reliable and clear path is exchanged for a mostly circumstantial and naturalist view of insight. And this is something I don't really see the value of, as it's neither faster nor easier, but at the same time has difficult to meet requirements, like a so called clear eyed teacher, attending regular sessions and retreats, etc. On the other side, if sudden enlightenment means gaining insight to the nature of mind in a simple and easy way, then it is of course highly recommendable.

Meido said:

To Buddhism, I agree. But not necessarily to the approaches taken by Buddhists.

Astus wrote:

Do you have a couple of non-experiential approaches in mind as examples?

Meido said:

"Inevitably" goes too far here.

Astus wrote:

It sounds like a very hypothetical case where someone practises Zen in a community without knowing a single thing about it. But, not impossible.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 12:21 AM

Title: Re: knowledge of a bodhisattva and/or stream enterer

Content:

DGA said:

Would a stream enterer or bodhisattva necessarily have direct knowledge of how rebirth works? (as distinct from accepting karma/rebirth as a doctrine, or understanding it doctrinally)

Astus wrote:

Direct knowledge of how it works on what level? Seeing one's own past lives and the process of rebirth of others' is a matter of possessing the super-knowledges (abhijna) of past lives and the divine eye. Those abilities are not necessarily possessed even by an arhat, while non-buddhists may also have them. On the other hand, because of gaining insight into how the mind works, they know clearly how dependent origination works.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 4:04 AM

Title: Re: Zen - The Essence of Buddhism

Content:

Meido said:

Again, the way koan texts and sutras are actually used in Zen differs from one another.

Astus wrote:

What difference do you mean? There are a couple of sutra passages in koan collections, so it's not that a koan is necessarily an encounter dialogue.

Meido said:

Sudden enlightenment rhetoric aside, all the so-called highest/most swift traditions require a great deal of practice to actualize promised results.

Astus wrote:

And that's the problem. It negates the whole point of a sudden path, a supreme vehicle. It goes contrary to the teachings of Bodhidharma, Huineng, Mazu and Linji. How do you reconcile it?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 4:08 AM

Title: Re: knowledge of a bodhisattva and/or stream enterer

Content:

DGA said:

Does it follow, then, that someone who does not "get it" with regard to dependent origination / rebirth lacks the characteristics of a first-bhumi bodhisattva or stream enterer?

Astus wrote:

I like <http://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/tsongkhapa/three-principal-aspects>:

"Yet when they arise at once, not each in turn but both together,
Then through merely seeing unfailing dependent origination
Certainty is born, and all modes of misapprehension fall apart—
That is when discernment of the view has reached perfection.

When you know that appearances dispel the extreme of existence,
While the extreme of nothingness is eliminated by emptiness,
And you also come to know how emptiness arises as cause and effect,
Then you will be immune to any view entailing clinging to extremes."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 6:10 AM

Title: Re: Zen - The Essence of Buddhism

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

How do you understand "beholding" in this case?

Astus wrote:

Beholding the mind (觀心) is awareness of one's thoughts and emotions, thus seeing that they are empty.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 6:32 AM

Title: Re: Zen - The Essence of Buddhism

Content:

Meido said:

I personally reconcile things for myself through the mainstream path which we see in Chan, Zen, and Son today: seeing one's nature as the entrance and then - if such proves to be not total and sufficient, as is almost always the case - continued cultivation based upon that recognition in order to dissolve remaining traces/habit-energy (essentially, endlessly repeated recognition in unity with samadhi, until it is fully clarified and seamlessly embodied 24/7).

Astus wrote:

That is exactly how <https://books.google.hu/books?id=bUgg9aWaAH8C> taught it: sudden enlightenment, gradual cultivation. However, he is not recognised as anyone important by most, and he is outside of the later patriarchal lineages. He had two influential followers: Yongming Yanshou, author of the Zongjinglu (a great collection of Chan teachings, only the first fascicle is <https://books.google.hu/books?id=2Kc-zsuweBoC> yet), and Bojo Jinul. Of them, Yongming is mostly forgotten as a Chan teacher, but Jinul remains one of the most important Korean teacher.

It might interest you that Zongmi argued against the Hongzhou school that he considered too subitist. As we know now, the Hongzhou approach had become the orthodox eventually by the Song era.

Meido said:

Certainly, though, I think it fine to re-examine and challenge the mainstream. I wonder, actually, if you've read Jia's or Poceski's works on the Hongzhou school (I've not, but the discussion brought them to mind).

Astus wrote:

Yes, I have read both of them. Jia's book also contains a fine translation of Mazu's teachings based on early sources.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 7:14 AM

Title: Re: knowledge of a bodhisattva and/or stream enterer

Content:

DGA said:

Yes, that is very good. Do you think it rebuts the assertion Malcolm made above? And if so, how?

Astus wrote:

I agree with Malcolm's responses. My point with that quote was simply to show that dependent origination is the correct view, the middle way. And seeing how dependent origination works is understanding how rebirth works.

I think the difficulty for many is that they don't see themselves and the world as an experiential realm (see:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn35/sn35.023.than.html>), they lack the insight into the often repeated teaching of "all phenomena are mind only". As Hanshan <http://terebess.hu/zen/mesterek/HanshanDeqing.html#c>: "The Buddha has said, "The three realms are mind-only and the myriad dharmas are mere consciousness." All Buddhadharma is only further exposition on these two lines so everyone will be able to distinguish, understand, and generate faith in this reality." And because of that they cannot accept a non-material mind, the six realms, and basically the whole spiritual world. This is a symptom of the view that only objective things exist, so people disregard their subjective experiences. Another symptom of that same assumption is the strong emphasis on authorisation and confirmation of one's experiences by a certified person. These are all cultural things, neither Buddhist nor necessarily logical.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 5:44 PM

Title: Re: Slow server problems?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Yes. But it seems to be getting better now.

Proof: I could log in and post this.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 6:34 PM

Title: Re: Does Zen result in Buddhahood as described in sutras?

Content:

Sara H said:

Buddhahood in the classic sense of the term, (not just experiencing the Buddha Nature) is very possible in Zen.

Astus wrote:

The sutras themselves say that experiencing the buddha-nature is buddhahood. Just as Dogen often likes to quote the Lotus Sutra: "No one but the buddhas (yuibutsu yobutsu 唯佛與佛) can completely know the real aspects of all dharmas"

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 7:29 PM

Title: Re: Zen - The Essence of Buddhism

Content:

Meido said:

The sudden awakening-gradual cultivation approach has been the mainstream Rinzai path from the earliest arrival of Rinzai lines in Japan, including the line brought over by Nanpo Shomyo which became the foundation of the surviving Otokan lineage. Naturally Zongmi's writings were known in Japan in the Kamakura period, but I have not heard there was any real Japanese Zen debate centered on this issue.

I'm not so clear how things developed in later China into the Ming. In the writings of modern Chan teachers we do find the same understanding

Astus wrote:

While the sudden-gradual set up confirms to how things seem to happen for practitioners, at the same time it is equivalent to admitting a defeat, since it means that Zen cannot meet its own ideals emphasised primarily in the Platform Sutra. Apparently many have forgotten how early teachers argued why Zen is not just about a sudden glimpse but instant buddhahood - that's what "mind is buddha" actually stands for. It is not just some general statement of buddha-nature hidden somewhere, that doctrine of tathagatagarbha is common to all schools. It is "this very mind is buddha", that practically means seeing that experiences (phenomena) are ungraspable and inconceivable just as they are. And that's how Zen can not only take part in the essence of the Dharma but point directly and transmit only that essence.

Mazu explains what "mind is buddha" means very clearly (all quotes from <http://terebess.hu/zen/mazu.html>):

"The self-nature is originally complete. If one only does not get hindered by either good or evil things, then that is a person who cultivates the Way. Grasping good and rejecting evil, contemplating sunyata and entering Samadhi-all of these belong to activity. If one seeks outside, one goes away from it. Just put an end to all mental conceptions in the three realms. If there is not a single thought, then one eliminates the root of birth and death and obtains the unexcelled treasury of the Dharma king. Since limitless kalpas, all worldly false thinking, such as flattery, dishonesty, self-esteem, and arrogance have formed one body. That is why the sutra says, 'It is only through the grouping of many dharmas that this body is formed. When it arises, it is only dharmas arising; when it ceases, it is only dharmas ceasing. When the dharmas arise, they do not say I arise; when they cease, they do not say, I cease.' "The previous thought, the following thought, and the present thought, each thought does not wait for the others; each thought is calm and extinct. This is called Ocean Seal Samadhi."

And an interesting "lost fragment" from Mazu found in the Zongjinglu:

"Why does [the Lankavatāra sūtra say] 'Buddha taught that mind is the implicit truth?'" As for "Buddha taught that mind is the implicit truth," mind is Buddha. Because the words currently [attributed to the Buddha] are mind-words (i.e., designations for mind; xinyu), when it says, "Buddha taught that mind is the implicit truth, and 'gatelessness' is the dharma-gate," [it means that] they understood the emptiness of the inherent nature [of things] (benxing), on top of which there is not a single dharma. Nature itself is the gateway. But because nature has no form and also lacks a gateway to access it, [the sūtra] says "'gatelessness' is the dharma-gate." Why is it also known as the "gate of emptiness (kongmen)," and as the "gate of physical forms" (semen)? Emptiness refers to the emptiness of the dharma-nature; physical forms refer to the physical forms of the dharma-nature. Because the dharma-nature has no shape or form, it is referred to as "empty." Because the dharma-nature is known and seen in everything without limit, it is referred to as "physical forms.""

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 7:39 PM

Title: Re: Does Zen result in Buddhahood as described in sutras?

Content:

MiphamFan said:

Buddhas can display all the 6 abhijnas, different powers etc.

Astus wrote:

"You say, 'A buddha has six supernatural powers. This is miraculous!' All the gods, immortals, asuras, and mighty pretas also have supernatural powers—must they be considered buddhas? Followers of the Way, make no mistake! For instance, when Asura fought against Indra and was routed in battle he led his entire throng, to the number of eighty-four thousand, into the tube in a fiber of a lotus root to hide. Wasn't he then a sage? Such supernatural powers as these I have just mentioned are all reward powers or dependent powers.

Those are not the six supernatural powers of a buddha, which are entering the world of color yet not being deluded by color; entering the world of sound yet not being deluded by sound; entering the world of odor yet not being deluded by odor; entering the world of taste yet not being deluded by taste; entering the world of touch yet not being deluded by touch; entering the world of dharmas yet not being deluded by dharmas. Therefore, when it is realized that these six—color, sound, odor, taste, touch, and dharmas—are all empty forms, they cannot bind the man of the Way, dependent upon nothing. Constituted though he is of the seepage of the five skandhas, he has the supernatural power of walking upon the earth."

(Record of Linji, p 20, tr Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 7:53 PM

Title: Re: Zen - The Essence of Buddhism

Content:

seeker242 said:

It seems to me that it's not admitting defeat of the sutra, but simply confirming that it varies for different people. Although, if one can say sudden is impossible for anyone and everyone, then perhaps you could say it's admitting defeat. However, if one takes the view that very few people are "sharp", then maybe not. One could say that zen can meet the ideals of the sudden, but only with people who are sharp, which are few and far between. -

Astus wrote:

Yes, people are different, thus there are different teachings. One of the popular description of that is from Zongmi's " <http://terebess.hu/zen/mesterek/zongmi.html#a> " where he talks about the "five types of zen".

Platform Sutra, ch 2:

"This teaching is the Supreme Vehicle: it is preached for those of great wisdom, it is preached for those of superior capacities. Those of small capacities and small wisdom who hear it will generate doubt."

further explanation in ch 7: "To penetrate all the myriad dharmas and to be equipped with all the myriad dharmas, without any defilement at all; to transcend the characteristics of the various dharmas, without anything that is attained: this is called the Supreme Vehicle."

Huangbo explains the relevance of the difference between capacity:

"Some students attain the state of liberated Mind quickly, some slowly. After listening to a Dharma talk, some reach "no mind" directly. In contrast, some must first pass gradually through the ten grades of Bodhisattva faith, the Dasabhumi of Bodhisattva development, and the ten stages before attaining the Perfectly Awakened Mind.

Whether one takes a long or a short time, however, once attained, "no mind" can never be lost."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 10:51 PM

Title: Re: Zen - The Essence of Buddhism

Content:

Meido said:

Just to add that honestly I don't think it much of a defeat to say that if one doesn't complete the path in an instant, one may do so within this life or a handful of lives.

Astus wrote:

I don't see it as a matter of personal competency or ability, but rather as how the path and its goal are understood. The sole realisation required is to personally confirm that dharmas are unattainable. From that it is obvious that there is nothing to gain or lose, take or drop, grasp or relinquish. The main obstacle is that the instruction should be in a language that the listener understands. That's where the importance of a proper teacher comes in. As Zongmi writes, the difference between Chan and the sutras is that Chan uses a simple and direct language appropriate for Chinese people. However, reading even Zongmi - who does not use later Song era Chan lingo known from koans - takes some level of specialised knowledge to make sense of.

For instance, the <http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/practice/zazen/howto/index.html> given in Soto can be very simple and direct: "When various thoughts arise in your mind, do not become caught up by them or struggle with them; neither pursue nor try to escape from them. Just leave thoughts alone, allowing them to come up and go away freely." or even <http://antaiji.org/dharma/okumura-mind-and-zazen/?lang=en>: "you let go of whatever thoughts come up, and you also don't sleep." That is already no-thought, abiding nowhere, manifesting the buddha-mind of empty awareness. How could it not be called practice-enlightenment? Alas, many who attempt zazen get bogged down in maintaining a physical posture they assume to be the correct one.

And something similar could be said about kannazen (note: this is just my pet idea, so you can openly criticise it as foolish, if you think so). That is, maintaining the great doubt is already not abiding in any view or interpretation, but actively letting go while at the same time being aware. Although there are normally stages described as taking up the question, generating doubt and then shattering the great doubt, but from another perspective, taking up the question immediately brings doubt with it (or it's not a question but a statement) and that doubt is without the question (or we're just using it as some mantra), it is also without an answer (otherwise there is no more doubt), so one is basically forced into independence (although the traditional examples are a rat trap and a stuck ball), and that way maintaining doubt is not getting lost in names and concepts (not clinging to names and concepts is freedom).

Meido said:

A defeat to me would rather be to think that the masters quoted had means only for those rare individuals with the most deep, sharp roots...and that everyone else has to complete the common path of 3 eons.

Astus wrote:

On the one hand, there is the view that Chan gives a direct access only to the first of the 52 stages, or the first of the 10 stages. There is also the view that whoever gains sudden enlightenment (buddhahood) in this life must have been on the bodhisattva path for a long time already. On the other hand, it shouldn't be a problem to follow the common Mahayana path. In fact, I'm in favour of letting people know more about the traditional gradual practices.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 11:39 PM

Title: Re: The Mahayana idea of karma and vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm said:

The Hevajra Tantra, a Mahāyāna Scripture, the teaching of the Buddha, is also very clear: "Those with compassion eat meat."

Astus wrote:

Couldn't find that in either the Snellgrove or the Farrow-Menon translation. Could you give its location please?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 4th, 2015 at 3:35 AM

Title: Re: Does Zen result in Buddhahood as described in sutras?

Content:

tomamundsen said:

Does the Chinese/Japanese canon contain sutras that make this kind of assertion? I know this is present in Indo-Tibetan Mahayana, not sure about East Asian Mahayana.

Astus wrote:

"Having gone forth, enlightening beings instantly attain a hundred concentrations and see a hundred buddhas and acknowledge their power; they stir a hundred worlds, go to a hundred lands, illumine a hundred worlds, mature a hundred beings, live for a hundred eons, penetrate a hundred eons past and future, contemplate a hundred teachings, and manifest a hundred bodies, each body manifesting a company of a hundred enlightening beings."

(https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Avatamsaka_Sutra, p 710-711)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 4th, 2015 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: Does Zen result in Buddhahood as described in sutras?

Content:

Sara H said:

there's a difference between experiencing your Buddha Nature (A direct experience of the Unborn) and Being a Buddha (someone who will not be reborn again.)

Astus wrote:

"If sravakas, pratyekabuddhas and the Bodhisattva of the ten abodes do not see the Buddha-Nature, we say "Nirvana". It is not "Great Nirvana". If they clearly see the Buddha-Nature, there is Great Nirvana."

(Nirvana Sutra, ch 29, tr Yamamoto)

"The Buddha-Nature of beings is what all Buddhas can see; it is not what sravakas and pratyekabuddhas can know. All beings do not see the Buddha-Nature. That is why they are all bound up by defilement and repeat birth and death. When one sees the Buddha-Nature, no bonds of defilement can tie one up. Emancipation comes and one attains Great Nirvana."

(ch 34)

"To see the Buddha-Nature is to attain unsurpassed Enlightenment. To attain unsurpassed Enlightenment is to arrive at unsurpassed Great Nirvana."

(ch 36)

"Whoever sees his nature is a buddha; whoever doesn't is a mortal. But if you can find your buddha-nature apart from your mortal nature, where is it? Our mortal nature is our buddhanature. Beyond this nature there's no buddha. The buddha is our nature. There's no buddha besides this nature. And there's no nature besides the buddha."

(Bodhidharma, Bloodstream Sermon, tr Red Pine)

"To use wisdom to contemplate all the dharms without grasping or rejecting is to see the nature and accomplish the enlightenment of buddhahood."

"If you recognize your own mind and see the nature, you will definitely accomplish the enlightenment of buddhahood."

"If you recognize the self-nature, with a single [experience of] enlightenment you will attain the stage of buddhahood."

"To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to arrive at the stage of buddhahood."

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, tr McRae)

"since the mind of all sentient beings is the same as original Buddha-Nature, there is no need to practice; for if one recognizes one's own Mind and sees one's own Nature, there is nothing at all to seek outside oneself."

(Huangbo, Wan-ling Record, tr Lok To)

Sara H said:

The Buddha Himself experienced His first kensho as a child. That's not the same as Full Enlightenment.

Astus wrote:

'I recall once, when my father the Sakyan was working, and I was sitting in the cool shade of a rose-apple tree, then — quite secluded from sensuality, secluded from unskillful mental qualities — I entered & remained in the first jhana: rapture & pleasure born from seclusion, accompanied by directed thought & evaluation. Could that be the path to Awakening?' Then following on that memory came the realization: 'That is the path to Awakening.' (<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.036.than.html>)

The first level of absorption is quite far from seeing buddha-nature, but it is not unheard of that people confuse it with enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 4th, 2015 at 5:38 AM

Title: Re: Does Zen result in Buddhahood as described in sutras?

Content:

tomamundsen said:

Doesn't Zen follow the Mahayana tradition that Shakyamuni was an emanation of the "Eternal Buddha" as explained in the Lotus sutra?

Astus wrote:

Yes, of course it does.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 4th, 2015 at 6:17 AM

Title: Re: Does Zen result in Buddhahood as described in sutras?

Content:

Sara H said:

You don't become free from suffering, and rebirth, just because you have a kensho.

Astus wrote:

Kensho means literally "see nature". There are a number of possible interpretations what it could mean to see nature.

1. An intellectual understanding of emptiness.
2. Attaining stream-entry.
3. Attaining the 1st bhumi.
4. Attaining the 8th bhumi.
5. Attaining buddhahood.

There is a well known phrase in Zen: see nature and become buddha. It seems to point to the 5th option. Just as it is stated in the Nirvana Sutra and by numerous ancestors, as quoted previously. Which one is your interpretation?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 4th, 2015 at 6:59 AM

Title: Re: Does Zen result in Buddhahood as described in sutras?

Content:

Sara H said:

I think you guys are being a little too in your heads about this.

This is something that has to be directly experienced. Speaking as someone who's had more than one kensho, I can tell you that I am not a Buddha. I still have a great deal of training left to go before that happens.

Astus wrote:

Could you please define what exactly you mean by kensho? What is actually realised in/with kensho? What is the nature that is seen? Please be specific, maybe then the differences can be sorted out.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 4th, 2015 at 7:08 AM

Title: Re: The Mahayana idea of karma and vegetarianism

Content:

Astus wrote:

In the Taisho Tripitaka both the Surangama Sutra (<http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T19n0945>) and the Hevajra Tantra (<http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T18n0892>) are in the same category of Esoteric Teachings (密教).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 4th, 2015 at 5:58 PM

Title: Re: Does Zen result in Buddhahood as described in sutras?

Content:

Sara H said:

Well it wouldn't work. The only way to understand a kensho is by having one. It's not something you can understand intellectually.

Astus wrote:

If one does not know what an apple is, one can eat dozens of apples without knowing that they are apples. That is, how can one tell if it is a kensho if one has no idea what a kensho is?

Sara H said:

I mean this is why, in a lot of Zen traditions, traditionally they wouldn't even teach you any Dharma until you've had a kensho.

They'd just wait until you've had one, and then they'd be like "Okay, now we can actually teach you something."

Astus wrote:

One can have kensho without knowing any Dharma? I think the following applies to this situation, from chapter 27 of the Nirvana Sutra:

"If one can see the Buddha-Nature even without having heard this Great Nirvana Sutra, all beings must also be able to see it, even though they have not heard it."

However, even bodhisattvas on the highest level cannot see the buddha-nature:

"Although innumerable Bodhisattvas may well perfectly practise the paramitas [spiritual perfections], they might only reach the stage of the ten abodes ["bhumis"] and yet may not be able to see the Buddha-Nature."

"Such Bodhisattvas may well reach the stage of the ten soils ["bhumis" - stages of Bodhisattva development], and yet they cannot clearly see the Buddha-Nature. How could sravakas and pratyekabuddhas well see [it]?"
(Nirvana Sutra, ch 12)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 5th, 2015 at 6:35 PM

Title: Re: Does Zen result in Buddhahood as described in sutras?

Content:

Sara H said:

Yes, they can. Children can have kenshos. Christians can have kenshos.

...

There were lots of mystics in His time that had had kensho's and lots of other spiritual experiences, even some higher ones.

Astus wrote:

Then it seems you really mean by kensho something like the 1st jhana.

Sara H said:

Buddhism does not have a license on experiencing the Unborn. It's a natural part of life.

Astus wrote:

Again, it depends on what you mean by "the Unborn". In Buddhism that stands for the emptiness of appearances, and that is something that one can achieve only via the path taught by the Buddha. Also, that insight into the insubstantiality of the dharmas means one at least stands on the level of a 1st bhumi arya-bodhisattva.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 5th, 2015 at 6:38 PM

Title: Re: Does Zen result in Buddhahood as described in sutras?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

D T Suzuki translates the Sanskrit term 'paravrtti' in the Lankavatara Sutra as 'a turning-around in the seat of the mind'.

Astus wrote:

Asraya-paravrtti is when one becomes a buddha and the eight consciousnesses become the four wisdoms. Hakuin has an essay on the subject and describes how he connects Zen with this teaching: <http://terebess.hu/zen/hakuin-works.html#i>.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 5th, 2015 at 9:26 PM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sanders sounds almost like a European, except for his accent. Plus he's of Polish-Jewish descent. So it's him.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 6th, 2015 at 5:17 AM

Title: Re: Hosso/Yogacara vocabulary

Content:

Astus wrote:

Wei Tat's Ch'eng Wei-Shih Lun is a bilingual book and usually mentions the Sanskrit expression in the English translation. Can be used as a good source for terminology.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 6th, 2015 at 6:14 AM

Title: Dogen & Kensho

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Some people think mind to be permanent and body to be impermanent. In this case, mind was considered to be atman; that is, pure and permanent. And the body was considered to be the source of delusive desire and impermanent. In this case, mind was called shinsho (mind nature) and body was called shinso (bodily form). And this mind-nature was often used as a synonym of buddha-nature. This is the reason Dogen negates the idea of kensho (seeing the nature)."

(http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Dogen_Teachings/Genjokoan_Okumara.htm)

"Seeing the mind and seeing the nature is the animated activity of non-Buddhists."
(Sansuigyo, SBGZ, vol 1, p 219, BDK Edition)

"The essence of the Buddha-Dharma is never seeing the nature. Where has any of the Seven Buddhas or the twenty-eight patriarchs of India said that the Buddha-Dharma is only "seeing the nature"? The Sixth Patriarch's Platform Sutra contains the words "seeing the nature," but that text is a fake text; it is not the writing of one to whom the Dharma treasury was transmitted, and it is not the words of Sōkei. It is a text upon which descendants of the Buddhist Patriarch absolutely never rely."
(Shizen-biku, SBGZ, vol 4, p 269, BDK Edition)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 6th, 2015 at 4:57 PM

Title: Re: Dogen & Kensho

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

I feel Dogen may be criticizing some kind of quietism where you "view" the mind and feel the matter of life/death is thereby resolved, or that one has some permanent buddhahood simply from having a mystical experience, or for doing religious practice at all.

Astus wrote:

It is not quietism but the separation of practice from enlightenment that is the problem addressed here, that is, when one uses a method in order to attain kensho. Dogen teaches the unity of practice-enlightenment, thus the complete realisation is already present in zazen. There is no other nature to be seen besides the ungraspability (不得) of appearances.

"Study thusness as ungraspable. Inquire about ungraspability in thusness. This thusness, this ungraspability, is not merely concerned with buddha thoughts. Understanding is ungraspable. Enlightenment is ungraspable."
(Inmo, SBGZ, ed. Kazuaki Tanahashi)

Therefore positing a kensho to be gained or realised through a process is a mistaken approach. Actually, that's the same thing the Platform Sutra says, and that's the very meaning of the sudden teaching.

"Dogen was critical of kensho oriented practices such as the kensho jobutsu practice of the Nihon Daruma-shu."
(Okumura: Realizing Genjokoan, p254, n14)

"One difference between Dogen's use of koan study and a stereotypical modern view of koan practice can be found in his critique of kensho as a goal. This term, which means "seeing the nature," has been understood at times to refer to an opening experience of attainment of realization, going beyond conceptual thinking. Dogen believes that this is a dualistic misunderstanding and such experiences are not to be emphasized. For Dogen, Buddha nature is not an object to merely see or acquire, but a mode of being that must be actually lived and expressed."
(Taigen Dan Leighton: Introduction, in Dogen's Extensive Record, p 30)

"Because the one mind is the supreme vehicle, we speak of 'direct pointing into the human heart' and 'seeing the nature and becoming buddha.'" This expression is never about the everyday conduct of the Buddha-Dharma: it lacks the vigorous road of getting the body free, and it has no dignified behavior throughout the body. Fellows like this, even hundreds or thousands of years ago, were proclaiming themselves to be leading authorities; but we should know that, if they had such talk as this, they neither clarified nor penetrated the Buddha's Dharma and the Buddha's truth. Why not? Because of not knowing "buddha," not knowing "the teaching," not knowing "the mind," not knowing "inside," and not knowing "outside."
(Bukkyo, SBGZ, vol 2, p 70, BDK Edition)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 6th, 2015 at 10:35 PM

Title: Re: Does Zen result in Buddhahood as described in sutras?

Content:

Dan74 said:

Hakuin, in the essay you mention, Astus, talks about 'seeing the ox'. This is kensho.

Astus wrote:

Sheng-yen says in his <http://terebess.hu/english/oxherd5.html> on the third picture: "This is also described as seeing the face of pure mind, or the momentary disappearance of self-centeredness. This picture is sometimes described as seeing one's intrinsic nature, but it is only a glimpse of something -- only the tail of the ox."

And that is what <http://terebess.hu/english/oxherd0.html#Trungpa> identifies as the 1st bumi, quite logically. After commenting on the pictures, Sheng-yen says,

"Going through these stages in order is not considered sudden enlightenment. It is best called gradual enlightenment. People who experience sudden enlightenment may share some of these experiences, but not necessarily in this order. The Sixth Patriarch (638-713), who taught before the Pictures were developed, never made reference to such a progression."

Practically, it is equal to the concept of polishing the mirror in the Platform Sutra. However, what Huineng means by seeing the nature is not that. Thus my <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=293657#p293657> in this thread.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 7th, 2015 at 5:37 AM

Title: Re: Dogen & Kensho

Content:

Caodemarte said:

could you clarify "and that's the very meaning of the sudden teaching.?"

Astus wrote:

the very meaning: "the unity of practice-enlightenment, thus the complete realisation is already present in zazen. There is no other nature to be seen besides the ungraspability (不得) of appearances."

In other words, instead of gradually following a process to reach enlightenment, one goes from ignorance to wisdom in a single step.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 7th, 2015 at 5:27 PM

Title: Re: Does Zen result in Buddhahood as described in sutras?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I apologize to Astus for my posting above.

Astus wrote:

No problem.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 7th, 2015 at 5:34 PM

Title: Re: Dogen & Kensho

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

How then to stop the habit of grasping, even if grasping is ungraspable?

Astus wrote:

Grasping is the result of ignorance about the nature of experiences. Seeing that appearances are originally thus - i.e. no matter what you do, the aggregates and the six sensory impressions come and go - the unfounded, illusory quality of a substantial reality is revealed right there. The point is, you don't stop anything, you directly enlighten that there is no permanent entity to liberate.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 7th, 2015 at 10:54 PM

Title: Re: Dogen & Kensho

Content:

Dan74 said:

The thing is the delusive habits of old don't suddenly dissipate and the practice must continue to sweep them clean. At the very least. Isn't that what Hongzhi taught too?

Astus wrote:

Practically speaking, if it is clear that phenomena are without substance, thus they don't move you, they are not defilements any more. If one had to wait for habits to dissipate it would never end. In fact, life is a huge mass of habits. It is within habits that one should find liberation. Or as I was once told: within the fixed posture of zazen one has to find total freedom. When Hongzhi seems to talk about is not the "polish the mirror" type, but rather stabilising one's practice. See for yourself:

From <http://terebess.hu/zen/shoyo-roku.html#p:>

"From the beginning the clouds leisurely release their rain, drifting past obstacles. The direct teaching is very pure and steady. Nothing can budge it. Immediately, without allowing past conditions to turn you, genuinely embody it."

"The practice of true reality is simply to sit serenely in silent introspection. When you have fathomed this you cannot be turned around by external causes and conditions. This empty, wide open mind is subtlety and correctly illuminating. Spacious and content, without confusion from inner thoughts or grasping, effectively overcome habitual behavior and realize the self that is not possessed by emotions. You must be broad-minded, whole without relying on others."

"Emptiness is without characteristics. Illumination has no emotional afflictions. With piercing, quietly profound radiance, it mysteriously eliminates all disgrace."

"Spiritual and bright, vast and lustrous, illuminating fully what is before you, directly attain the shining light and clarity that cannot attach to a single defilement. Immediately tug and pull back the ox's nose. Of course his horns are imposing and he stomps around like a beast, yet he never damages people's sprouts or grain."

"From the beginning it is altogether complete, undefiled and clear down to the bottom. Where everything is correct and totally sufficient, attain the pure eye that illuminates thoroughly, fulfilling liberation. Enlightenment involves enacting this; stability develops from practicing it."

"Immediately you follow conditions and accord with awakening without obstruction from any defilements. The mind does not attach to things, and your footsteps are not visible on the road. Then you are called to continue the family business. Even if you thoroughly understand, still please practice until it is familiar."

"Open-minded and bright without defilement, simply penetrate and drop off everything. Today is not your first arrival here. Since the ancient time before the empty kalpa, clearly nothing has been obscured. Although you are inherently spirited and splendid, still you must go ahead and enact it. When doing so, immediately display every atom without hiding a speck of dirt."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 8th, 2015 at 12:11 AM

Title: Re: Does Zen result in Buddhahood as described in sutras?

Content:

Dan74 said:

I don't think it is equal to polishing the mirror, Astus. How do you figure that??

Astus wrote:

Look at the poems:

Shenxiu:

The body is the bodhi tree;

The mind is like a bright mirror's stand.

Be always diligent in rubbing it—

Do not let it attract any dust.

That is, it confirms buddha-nature and its realisation, but says that one should regularly purify it. In fact, they had a practice called "concentration on purity" that was directly criticised by Huineng.

Huineng:

Bodhi is fundamentally without any tree;
The bright mirror is also not a stand.
Fundamentally there is not a single thing—
Where could any dust be attracted?

In other words, instead of cleansing, purifying, etc., i.e. the usual gradual elements, it says there is nowhere to go. It is truly just "see nature, become buddha". Or, as it says in ch 2:

"Those with deluded minds appear to be cultivating and seeking buddhahood, but they are unenlightened to their self-natures. Hence are they of small capacities. If one is to be enlightened to the sudden teaching, one cannot cultivate externally (i.e., superficially): one should just constantly activate correct views in one's own mind, and the enervating defilements of the afflictions will be rendered permanently unable to defile one. This is to see the nature."

Dan74 said:
I have a deja vu feeling, haven't we discussed it before?

Astus wrote:
Possible. This is a great topic to discuss.

Dan74 said:
So, what is the relevance of this to your practice, if I may ask?

Astus wrote:
It is a matter of defining what practice is. On the one hand, I think that the so called gradual path of ethics-meditation-wisdom is very powerful but sadly neglected in Zen. And I'm not talking about schemes like "sudden enlightenment / gradual cultivation" and going through a koan curriculum, but the traditional path established in the sutras and treatises. It is because of this concept of "sudden enlightenment" that things are messed up somewhat. On the other hand, the very teaching of suddenness is not taken seriously at all. There are various excuses to disregard the most popular works of the Zen tradition, and instead end up with a confused teaching and confused practice. I'm calling it confused, because while there is a strong feeling against systematic study and practice, the instructions are gradualist. That is actually a symptom of not understanding the scriptures nor maintaining the mind-to-mind transmission. Thus we can have Zen teachers who are not even Buddhists.

My practice is no-thought, and I deeply believe that it is not only immensely beneficial but also broadly available. Beneficial, that is, I can personally testify that it can be used daily from cleaning the toilet to debating the meaning of life. Available, that is, any being can learn it and use it, no special requirements. But if you want more details, please ask specific questions.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 8th, 2015 at 3:58 AM

Title: Re: Does Zen result in Buddhahood as described in sutras?

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

Astus, is the practice of no-thought expressed in this passage from Bodhidharma?
When mortals are alive, they worry about death. When they're full, they worry about hunger. Theirs is the Great Uncertainty. But sages don't consider the past. And they don't worry about the future. Nor do they cling to the present. And from moment to moment they follow the Way.

Astus wrote:

Yes. Huineng taught (Platform Sutra, ch 2): 'mahāprajñāpāramitā' is the most honored, the supreme, the primary. It is without abiding [in the present], without going [into the past], and without coming [from the future]. It is from this that all the buddhas of the three periods of time emerge.

For a detailed explanation, look at this passage from Dazhu Haihai's

<http://www.ymba.org/books/entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment/treatise-entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment:>

If your mind is void of thinking, then there is no grasping. If you wish to recognize clearly the non-dwelling mind, then during your meditation just be aware that your mind does not think about any object or hold on to any dualities, such as good and evil, etc. Since past things are already past, you should not think about them anymore; and, thus, any thought about the past vanishes. This is known as being without the past. Furthermore, since future things have not yet arrived, you should neither seek nor wish for them; and, thus, any thought of the future vanishes. This is known as being without the future. Finally, since present things are already present, you should not grasp them nor allow a thought of love or hate to arise; and, thus, any thought about the present vanishes. This is known as being without the present. In summary, if no thought about these three time periods arises, then the three time periods do not exist. If a thought of moving arises, do not follow it; and the thought of moving will vanish. If a thought of dwelling arises, do not follow it; and the thought of dwelling will vanish. However, grasping at the thought of non-dwelling is abiding in non-dwelling. On the other hand, if you understand clearly that your mind does not abide anywhere whatsoever that is abiding, then you are neither abiding nor not abiding anywhere. If you understand clearly that your mind does not abide anywhere at all, then you are clearly seeing your Original Mind, which is also referred to as "clearly seeing the nature of seeing." Just this Mind, that abides nowhere at all, is the Mind of Buddha and the Mind of liberation, the Mind of Bodhi and the Mind of the Uncreate. It is also referred to as realizing that the nature of form is void. Finally, it is what the sutra calls "Attaining the patient endurance of the Uncreate."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 9th, 2015 at 10:17 PM

Title: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Astus wrote:

If, as Kamalashila states, analysis is a necessary element of the path, it excludes all other options to reach insight into the nature of reality. Consequently, there can be no direct methods (pointing to the nature of mind, empowerment, direct introduction, etc.) that avoid using analysis. How can it be argued that the popular methods lacking the conceptual methods of discerning appearances are valid?

"Those who do not meditate with wisdom by analysing individually the entity of things, but merely meditate on elimination of mental activity, cannot avert conceptual thoughts and also cannot realise identitylessness because one lacks the light of wisdom. If the fire of consciousness knowing phenomena as they are is produced from individual analysis of suchness, then like the fire produced by rubbing wood it will burn the wood of conceptual thought."

(<http://www.preciousteaching.org/sutra/kamalasilas-bhavana-krama-the-middle-meditation-stage/>)

"Thus it is on the basis of obtaining unobscured knowledge that one understands every single teaching of the Buddha. Hence without the discernment of reality there is no arising of perfect knowledge, nor also the abandonment of the afflictive obscurations."

(Necessity of Bhutapratyaveksa, Bhavanakrama 3, in Martin T. Adams: Meditation and The Concept of Insight in Kamalasila's Bhavanakramas (thesis), p 247)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 9th, 2015 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

He is talking about sutra. It does not apply to Vajrayāna. Apples and oranges.

Astus wrote:

How so? Vajrayana doesn't aim at a different emptiness, does it?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 9th, 2015 at 11:35 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

muni said:

There are many tools for that, isn't?

Astus wrote:

What other tool is there but correct analysis?

muni said:

Only when we cling to the analytical, then it is not a cure anymore.

Astus wrote:

That happens only when the analysis is not performed correctly and completely.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

Sūtra works with analysis, Vajrayāna works with experiences.

Astus wrote:

How can experience make one understand suchness, when the error lies not in what is experienced but in how that experienced thing is viewed?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

MalaBeads said:

When you view the rising or setting sun, do you analyze it or view it? Is that an experience or not? It is something like that. Wherein one experiences the sun instead of analyzing it. But it is only something like that.

Astus wrote:

One may watch the rising sun without a single thought, but it makes no difference in one's view of the world. Such thoughtless moments happen to everyone. But it does not bring about the realisation that appearances are without substance.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 5:55 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

There is no experience outside of suchness. Therefore, experiences can be used to introduce suchness.

Astus wrote:

Experiences are already such, but not everyone sees in such a way. What occludes such seeing are not experiences in general but the identification with some of them, thus establishing a self, and the habitual substantialisation of appearances, that is, attachment to concepts. If even temporary cessation of ideation cannot overcome that fundamental ignorance, what kind of experience is it that can?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 6:11 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

smcj said:

"What's next?" you may ask.

Astus wrote:

There is no next. The end of conceptualisation (grasping at a false essence) is the attainment of the ultimate view, prajnaparamita itself.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 6:26 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

DGA said:

Is it not plausible that analysis may be necessary at some points in the path, and other options necessary at other times?

Astus wrote:

Analysis is necessary to eliminate the wrong views of the two selves. Within analysis there are various forms of reasoning one can use. For other goals there are other methods.

Kamalashila <http://www.preciousteaching.org/sutra/kamalasilas-bhavana-krama-the-middle-meditation-stage/> the Samdhinirmocana Sutra: "When the selflessness of phenomena are individually examined and meditations performed on the basis of that analysis, that is the cause of the resultant liberation; no other cause can pacify."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 6:30 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Caodemarte said:

Exactly how is analysis defined by Kamalasila in this context?

Astus wrote:

Read from " <http://www.preciousteaching.org/sutra/kamalasilas-bhavana-krama-the-middle-meditation-stage/> "

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 6:45 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

Hence, the purpose of introduction. For example, one may see faces in a crowd everyday and never recognize them; but when they are introduced to you, you will never fail to recognize them again.

Astus wrote:

If the face of prajnaparamita could be pointed at, it would have to be an object of mind, an experience, and as such it could be viewed both correctly and incorrectly. It wouldn't be the end of conceptualisation, but rather an opportunity for further proliferation. How is that avoided?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 4:52 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

DGA said:

I still don't see how this means, as you said before, "it excludes all other options to reach insight into the nature of reality"

Astus wrote:

Since ignorance is attachment to concepts, because they are thought to be substantial, the medicine is to realise that there is no such substance. If one does not address that ignorance, the root of delusion, it is not eliminated. It's like the story with the arrow wound. It is the arrow that must be pulled out, there is no workaround. Nevertheless, what other methods do you have in mind?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 4:58 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

The face of prajñāpāramitā is not different than all appearances [this is fundamental tenet of Ati yoga, one of things that differentiates it from Chan/Zen, etc.], hence it is an object of mind, an experience. Therefore, it is viewed correctly and incorrectly. Hence, introduction is necessary. Without introduction, buddhahood is not possible.

Buddhahood is not a result of effort or analysis. The difference between a buddha and sentient being is just the difference recognition and nonrecognition.

Astus wrote:

All appearances are such. Are you saying that there is an appearance that is more such? If not, and what matters is recognising the suchness of any appearance, there are no special objects to be apprehended. As Kamalashila

<http://www.preciousteaching.org/sutra/kamalasilas-bhavana-krama-the-middle-> meditation-stage/: "With the knowledge that the mind is without an end and a centre, no identity of the mind is perceived. What is thoroughly realised by the mind too is realised as being empty. By realising that, the very identity which is established as the aspect of the mind, like the identity of physical form, etc., is also not ultimately perceived."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 5:25 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

smcj said:

If you're a Gelugpa, true. If you're a Kagyu, the prajnaparamita view is a provisional teaching and there is a "next".

Astus wrote:

It was intentional that I had not quoted Tsongkhapa on the requirement of analysis, although there is a whole chapter on it in his Lamrim Chenmo. As for the Kagyu, the Jewel Ornament of Liberation's chapter on prajnaparamita is fairly explicit in saying that not only there is nothing more to realise, but it even encompasses the entire path, and that is practically Gampopa's so called "Sutra Mahamudra".

"The term Mahamudra is described in a commentary to the Kalachakra Tantra written by Padma Chin. There, he explains the essence of Mahamudra as being the actual Prajnaparamita; that is, the wisdom which is the source of all the Buddhas of the past, present, and future. They all arise from the Prajnaparamita, the ultimate wisdom, and that ultimate wisdom is none other than Mahamudra."

(Drikung Kyabgon Chetsang Rinpoche: The Practice of Mahamudra, p 26)

However, that's not really the topic.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 5:34 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

catmoon said:

if the goal is as ill-defined as, say, attaining a realization of suchness, then we enter a whole new arena that is much less deterministic than any tool-oriented paradigm. What analysis will produce is analytic results, theorems and hypotheses. Maybe even a proof or two. Enlightenment is ... a different breed of cat.

Astus wrote:

How could it be ill-defined? From the four noble truths on the teachings are quite specific in what is to be achieved and how. The analysis here is not about producing ideas but clarifying that ideas themselves are unfounded.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 6:06 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I don't really understand the meaning of 'analysis' in this context.

Astus wrote:

It is the investigation of appearances within the conceptual framework of the teachings. Early examples are the fourth section of the anapanasati and satipatthana methods. Or look into the Bhavanakrama to see what actually is meant by analysis.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 8:51 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

DGA said:

notice that Shakyamuni gives an analysis of the situation, and delineates analytically which questions are helpful and which are not.

Put differently: I'm still not convinced that the use of analysis means that any or all other methods are foreclosed. I think "both/and" is entirely possible, and happens all the time.

Astus wrote:

If you look at <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.052.than.html> where various methods are mentioned, while the entrance parts vary, the step to insight is the same each time.

We can leave the possibility open for other ways to gain insight, and that's one of the things that should be debated actually. Especially since it seems that very few use analysis within various Mahayana schools. Also, Kamalashila was supposedly the one who debated with <http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Hashang> and defeated the Chinese approach. Plus in the Bhavanakrama the arguments against the non-analytical method is possibly there because of the popularity of it.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, there is no special object to be apprehended.

Your question was, "Is analysis necessary." In sūtra yes; in Varjayāna, no. As Vimalamitra states in his Buddhahood in This Life:

If it is objected, "If afflictions are liberated into dharmatā without antidotes, there is no need for purification on the path. Otherwise, liberation would require no effort," for what reason would those who do not understand be liberated? Asserting that those who understand are liberated merely by recognizing concepts as dharmatā is the fruit of one's wishes. As such, in order to recognize that concepts are dharmatā, the intimate instructions of the guru are important.

Astus wrote:

There is still no explanation given what kind of experience it is that can take one to realising suchness. Also, that quote is basically asserting the supremacy of Vajrayana and the ineffectiveness of analysis without giving a reason. And it misrepresents vipasyana as if it were mere intellectual exercise.

Thrangu Rinpoche says in <http://s151421314.onlinehome.us/nbp/docs/PDF/7.%20Guide%20to%20Mahamudra.pdf>:

"The reason that the path of the sutras takes so long is that there are no direct or practical instructions in the sutras for cultivating the direct experience of emptiness, whereas in the Vajrayana there are these uncommon instructions for gaining direct experience." (p 31)

That seems to agree with what you say. It continues:

"What are these extraordinary instructions of the Vajrayana? Essentially the concept of emptiness in the Vajrayana is the same as that taught by the Buddha in the sutras. The only difference is the method which is used in the Vajrayana. In the Vajrayana method of Mahamudra we do not to worry about external appearances because external appearances, such as mountains and buildings are not our problem, nor do they particularly help us. In fact, they are empty as is logically proven in the sutras, but we don't meditate on them. Nor do we particularly meditate upon the emptiness or insubstantiality of the body. In the Vajrayana we meditate upon that which is most important, which is the nature of our mind because it is the mind creates pleasure and pain, it is the mind that gives rise to experience, it is the mind that experiences everything." (p 31-32)

That is, Vajrayana goes directly to the mind and does not bother with outer appearances and extensive study of reasoning. Practically, that still confirms the previous statement that Vajrayana works with experience and does not require analysis. So, what is the special Vajrayana method?

"Now, even in the midst of stillness, your mind still has a cognitive capacity, it still has awareness, so you will recognize the stillness. You will actually experience it, and that is the state of Shamatha. Then you look to see exactly what this stillness consists of, that is, what it means to say my mind is at rest. If you look, then the clarity or lucidity that is there will emerge. And you can experience what your mind is, and what your mind is like, and what your mind is doing, without needing to infer by deduction. Because you can simply, directly experience your own mind, nothing about it has to be deduced or inferred in any way." (p 32-33)

Yes, it is very much experiential, no inference or deduction. But it does not end here.

"So within that state of Shamatha, you look at your mind, and you look to try to see what is resting. By saying your mind is at rest, we mean that it is free of thought. If the mind has some kind of substantial existence; then it must be at rest in some particular way in some particular location. If the mind is something, then it will be at rest somewhere. For example, if a car is parked, we can say this car is parked in this place.

But when your mind is at rest or parked, you can't find it anywhere. You don't find anything placed anywhere. Even if you try to go through the parts of your body to find where your mind is located, or where your mind is at rest when you're not thinking, you won't find it, no matter how finely you divide your body. And if you try to find the substantial characteristics of the mind, such as a color or shape, or even if it lacks those—some kind of evidence of substantial existence—you won't find anything. Now substance, for example a car, has all sorts of definite characteristics. The car could be parked facing east or west, or it could be parked wrong sticking out in the middle of the street. Nevertheless, even though your mind is somehow parked, your mind is still, you don't find it anywhere. It doesn't point anywhere. It doesn't rest anywhere. And yet, your mind is at rest, and you can experience that. This indicates that the nature of your mind is emptiness. The nature of the rest, is also emptiness; and the location of your mind at rest, is also emptiness.

In that way, when you meditate on the nature of your mind, you don't find the mind anywhere. Not finding anything, you initially think that you have somehow failed. Either you misunderstood how to look, or you just haven't looked enough. But in fact this is not true. The reason you didn't find anything is that the nature of your mind is utter insubstantiality, which is why, according to the Buddha, it is empty. To thoroughly comprehend this emptiness, we need to experience this directly in meditation." (p 33)

This is where, after a thorough investigation of the mind, one finally confirms that it cannot be found, that is: empty. And after that it goes on to similarly investigate thoughts and realise their emptiness as well. Let's see what Kamalashila <http://www.preciousteaching.org/sutra/kamalasilas-bhavana-krama-the-middle-meditation-stage/>:

"In this way when the identity of the mind is individually examined by wisdom, in the ultimate sense it is perceived neither within or without. It is also not perceived in the absence of both. Neither the mind of the past, nor that of the future, nor of the present is perceived. When the mind is born, it comes from nowhere and when it ceases it goes nowhere because it is inapprehensible, undemonstratable and non-physical. If one asks, what is the entity of that which is inapprehensible, undemonstratable and non-physical? It is as Arya Ratnakuta states: "O Kashyapa, when the mind is thoroughly searched, it cannot be found. What is not found cannot be perceived. And what is not perceived is neither past nor future nor present." Through such analysis, the beginninglessness of the mind is not ultimately seen, the end of the mind is not ultimately seen and the centre of the mind is not ultimately seen."

So, the difference that actually is there is that while Kamalashila goes from outside to inside, Thrangu begins at the mind, and then the analysis is performed on the mind itself. As a result both arrives at the realisation that the mind cannot be found anywhere. Same method, same result.

As a side note, it could be said that actually one performs the investigation of the mind right where the skandhas are being looked into and the lack of any self is confirmed.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

The limitation of Madhyamaka vipaśyāna is that it is an intellectual analysis.

Astus wrote:

What does it limit? Unless it is argued that vipasyana does not result in wisdom, it works. Question then is: since vipasyana is the established method all over the sutras and shastras, what other methods can work and why? You say Vajrayana is different, and that's fine, but it has not yet been clarified how and in what way.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 3:03 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

Vipaśyāna is conceptual. That is its limitation. Plus, Madhyamaka analysis is ultimately dualistic.

Astus wrote:

Of course it is conceptual, and conceptuality is dualistic. Every teaching is within the realm of the conceptual, and the point is to see that what are grasped as real, solid things are actually conceptual and dependent.

Malcolm said:

It has been clarified, you just refuse to listen:

As such, in order to recognize that concepts are dharmatā, the intimate instructions of the guru are important.

Astus wrote:

The question is about those instructions, that you say do not involve analysis.

As for directly accessing the view of suchness, Kamalashila writes,

"If it is said that one enters (nonconceptuality) through nonmindfulness and nonattention toward all dharmas, that is not reasonable. For Without the discernment of reality it is impossible to undertake either nonmindfulness or nonattention toward all dharmas even though they are being experienced. And if one would (attempt to) cultivate nonmindfulness and nonattention toward those (dharmas) cultivating thus,"These which are called dharmas are not to be noticed nor paid attention to by me" then still more would.they have been noticed and paid attention to by him! Thus if the mere nonexistence of mindfulness and attention constituted the nonmindfulness and nonattention intended, then in what manner does the nonexistence of those two come about?"

(Bhavanakramana 3, tr MT Adam, p 245)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 3:15 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

If you want those instructions, you will have to go and get them.

Astus wrote:

You said that Vajrayana is exempt from analysis, but then did not support that with an explanation of how could that be. That doesn't mean you have to copy instructions here, the general description of its functioning should be enough.

Malcolm said:

Kamalashila's citation is completely irrelevant.

Astus wrote:

How so? The direct experience of suchness is what Vajrayana teaches, isn't it?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 4:46 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, actually I did.

Astus wrote:

I don't see how "the intimate instructions of the guru are important" is an explanation for it, but it seems there is nothing more than that.

Malcolm said:

Everyone is already experiencing suchness directly. It simply needs to be pointed out through experience. It is not discernible through analysis. The analysis itself is the obstacle.

Astus wrote:

Pointing out through experience - since one cannot directly transfer experience to another, there are only teachings one can follow to confirm reality for oneself. What blocks the vision of reality is conceptual attachment. Analysis removes that attachment, thus allows the experience of insight. Skipping analysis and going directly to insight is the idea that the <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=300777#p300777> section from Kamalashila argues against. What other version of "pointing out through experience" do you mean?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 6:42 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

Analysis merely substitutes one conceptual attachment for another, thus blocking the seeing of the truth; which one already sees anyway without knowing that one is seeing it. The question is really, "what does one hope to find in analysis?" Is there something to find? If there is nothing to find, then the analysis itself is a deviation from reality.

Astus wrote:

Analysis results in the elimination of attachment, it does not go on indefinitely as a substitute, just as the desire to reach nirvana ends with attaining it
(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn51/sn51.015.than.html>).

Kamalashila <http://www.preciousteaching.org/sutra/kamalasilas-bhavana-krama-the-middle-meditation-stage/>:

"In this way when the person does not firmly grasp on to the entity of a thing as ultimately existing, having investigated with wisdom, then the practitioner engages in a non-conceptual single-pointed concentration."

And as quoted in the OP, "like the fire produced by rubbing wood it will burn the wood of conceptual thought."

Analysis cannot be a deviation from reality for two reasons. On the one hand, while one is bound by ignorance, one needs a path to escape that ignorance. On the other hand, saying that one is already in reality and ignorance itself is such, then analysis is such as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 5:12 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

Is the consciousness that engages in analysis deluded or undeluded? Is the object of analysis delusive or non-delusive?

If either the consciousness or the object are respectively deluded or delusive, there is no means by which the analysis can result in non-delusion.

If on other other hand the consciousness or the object is respectively non-deluded or non-delusive, the analysis is unnecessary.

Astus wrote:

That's some nice analysis you present.

Same could be said about any other teaching or instruction. Thus they are all skilful means used within a conventional context. Actually, there is just this conventional context to operate in, and supposing a separate realm is a mistake.

The reason analysis works is because it removes wrong views and eventually attachment to any view. Analysis is a means, not an end. And analysis is required because the wrong views that generate all the problems are conceptual.

But let's not stop there. Is there a consciousness to be deluded or undeluded? Is there an object to be deluded or undeluded? Since neither a consciousness nor an object can be established, talking about their state of ignorance and enlightenment is like describing the graceful stance of the son of a barren woman.

Gangottara asked in turn, "If this question were put to one who had never come into being, how should it be answered?"

The Buddha replied, "That which has never come into being is nirvana itself."

Gangottara asked, "Are not all things identical with nirvana?"

The Buddha replied, "So they are, so they are."

"World-Honored One, if all things are identical with nirvana, why did you ask me, 'Do you not seek the state of nirvana?' "Furthermore, World-Honored One, if a magically produced being asked another magically produced being, 'Do you not seek the state of nirvana?' what would the answer be?"

The World-Honored One told her, "A magically produced being has no mental attachments (and thus seeks nothing)."

Gangottara inquired, "Does the Tathagata's very question stem from some mental attachment?"

The World-Honored One told her, "I raised the question because there are in this assembly good men and good women who can be brought to maturity. I am free of mental attachments. Why? Because the Tathagata knows that even the names of things are inaprehensible, let alone the things themselves or those who seek nirvana."

(<http://www.purifymind.com/GangottaraSutra.htm>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 5:35 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

plwk said:

But let's face it Astus, both Sutra & Tantra have divergent methods and criterias, no amount of force fitting will work... anymore than trying to convince Nichiren that Shingon isn't Hinayana...

Astus wrote:

It's not just Tantra. As I have mentioned before, analysis is not a popular method, even neglected and looked down on to some extent in Mahayana.

At the same time, we can see in the works of Kamalashila and Vimalamitra for instance that they claim not simply superiority of analysis but exclusivity. So why not look into the veracity of that claim?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 5:43 PM

Title: Re: Can't explain ? Blame Karma

Content:

Astus wrote:

Blaming karma is not understanding what karma is and how to utilise that fundamental teaching.

1. There is the practice of accepting bad karma. It is not about blaming but not getting upset. It also reinforces one's motivation to avoid evil and do good.

2. Karma is not some force out there but one's mental habits. Thinking that bad things come from outside is not realising that the situations one goes into and the way those situations are interpreted are both the workings of one's habitual thinking, that is, one's personality. And one should not only exchange bad habits to good ones, but also see that the whole complex of mental attachments are based on false presumptions, otherwise known as ignorance.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 7:24 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

plwk said:

how many Buddhists and their teachers actually engage in analysis as recommended by the texts and teachers that you quote in here?

Astus wrote:

I am unaware of any research on that subject. I think it is natural that Buddhist communities eventually reflect the larger society in that only a few belong to the class of literati. And the majority of Buddhist texts are produced by them and read by them. As I have seen, most of the Westerners interested in Buddhism come from that class. Therefore it looks sensible to propagate analytical meditation, as it might be actually more fitting than other methods, although it is understandable that people who daily use their intelligence in their line of work are attracted to something that appears to be trans/non-conceptual. DT Suzuki thought that Shin Buddhism could match Western people because of its similarity to Christian teachings, but it's turned out that exactly because of Shinshu's aura of religiousness many don't even accept it as Buddhist. Somewhat similarly to that, the teachings of Abhidharma, Madhyamaka and Yogacara are mostly subjects of academic studies and only recently has some books appeared with a Buddhist audience in mind.

plwk said:

And to what extent is that analysis utilitarian for most people here who are more interested if the stock market will plunge or if next week's astrology chart is favourable? Sounds like worldlings?

Astus wrote:

That is perfectly normal. There is a <https://books.google.com/books?id=hf1Sm6K6Ze8C> by Faure discussing common misconceptions about Buddhism. Among those the role of meditation is discussed, and how it is not at all as ubiquitous in Buddhism as many believe. In fact, it is practised mostly by only a handful of monastics. But as we can see, in the West the majority of Buddhist communities consisting of middle class people are centred around meditation. And there is the other side, often neglected when surveying the Buddhist scene, the Buddhist courses at universities. It's as if those who study Buddhism in established higher educational institution were non-existent or irrelevant.

plwk said:

No, I found them in many centres. Most people are struggling with bread and butter issues to even be bothered with much Dharma analysis, perhaps some taking an easier way out by relying on a teacher to do their homework for them and then taking it by 'faith' than cracking their skulls over it.

Astus wrote:

True, but they are not the only demographic group. And I am not saying everyone should immediately study Nagarjuna and Aryadeva. At the same time, since those you refer to have little interest in liberation, they are not the right audience for engaging in vipasyana.

plwk said:

Superiority, exclusivity Astus? In many places that I have been to, the vital importance of analysis is merely a nicely decorated poster slogan in the kitchen, even in Theravadin ones! But at the end of the day, nothing much of what I see pages of scholastic assertions on forums ever happens in real life Samghas, from my limited experience other than the usual housewife gossips. If you know of one that engages in compatible stringent analysis of Dharma & Vinaya in a real life Samgha practice and lifestyle, let me know.

Astus wrote:

You are right. Even monastic communities often have other things to busy themselves with. On the other hand, you might find such groups at universities. (note: it is a prejudice to say that all those who study texts are not practitioners)

plwk said:

Let's import what you quoted here say to the shores of Japan, say in the time of Honen and Shinran and even today amongst their adherents, what do you think?

Astus wrote:

Both Honen and Shinran belonged to the educated monastic elite from a good family background. As for preaching to the illiterate masses, they did a great job. I personally like their approach to the whole matter. Although others like to say as well that their teaching is available to everyone, actually I don't see any other tradition as open and embracing as the Pure Land path. In a sense, it is truly the original intention of Shakyamuni.

plwk said:

Will it work? And to what extent? I dare not say there's no analysis of Dharma at all but rather not to the point of what Kamalasila or Vimalamitra teaches. I am all for what you are advocating here but perhaps, it only works for a limited few. For the rest of us, there are other methods, apparently...

Astus wrote:

Buddhism as a whole works only for a limited few. Just consider the size of humanity. Then think about the percentage of Buddhists, and then the number of Buddhists who actually care about the Dharma. So, it's all very limited.

As for the applicability of analysis, I think it is mostly for those who are inclined to reasoning and study. And there are quite a few of them on this forum.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 10:15 PM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism too hard ?

Content:

Bodhidharma said:

The part that I say Buddhism is "too hard" is the 6th perfection - wisdom or the prajñā pāramitā. Attempting to understand the Two Truths and Emptiness is not something for the faint-hearted. Given that there are countless sentient beings, isn't it unfortunate that "reality" is beyond them when it is beyond even most of us.

Astus wrote:

I think there can be basically two difficulties.

1. Buddhism has its own terminology and it can take a while to learn what is meant by expressions like emptiness.
2. From an ordinary perspective it can be difficult to face that there is no fixed and permanent element in the world.

The first difficulty can be overcome by studying, and asking teachers.

The second difficulty can be overcome by recognising that there has never been anything that can be relied on, and the misunderstanding about the world only leads to problems.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

Madhyamaka analysis is not required, it is merely the approach of sūtra.

Astus wrote:

As noted earlier, it is there in Mahamudra, although to that you might say "not in Tantric Mahamudra". Also, in vol 2 of Jigme Lingpa's Treasury of Precious Qualities at the end of the discussion of the path of Dzogchen he gives not only a direct but also an analytical method. So, even if there are other methods, it is considered quite efficient if Vajrayana masters have no problem including it in their teachings on the highest levels.

Malcolm said:

Therefore, since there is no consciousness nor object to be established discussing their analysis is like discussing the horns on a rabbit.

Astus wrote:

And to a similar statement Nagarjuna <http://www.fodian.net/world/1631b.html>,

"If any thesis does not bear on the totality of causes and conditions, or on them separately,

Is not emptiness proved because of the fact that there is no self-existence in existing things?

...

Just as a magically formed phantom could deny a phantom created by its own magic, Just so would be that negation."

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

What page are you thinking of?

Astus wrote:

The practice of those who perceive appearances in the manner of sense objects, p 269-274.

That is within the section of "An explanation of the key points of the practice", within the chapter "The Extraordinary Path of Practice of the Great Perfection".

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 12:54 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

Here, what is being recommended is the intimate instructions of the guru

Astus wrote:

There is little difference between someone orally giving the instructions or handing over a book containing the same instructions. The discussion has been regarding the instructions, not its format. As the <http://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/mipham/sword-of-wisdom> says,

"Therefore do not rely on individuals,

But rely upon the Dharma.

Freedom comes from the genuine path that is taught,

Not from the one who teaches it."

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 12:58 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

conebeckham said:

Well, what does it mean to "realise that there is no such substance?" Does it mean one analyses, using the rational, conceptual mind, and comes to the conclusion that there is no substance? Or does it mean something further?

Astus wrote:

Kamalashila clearly states that the result is not simply a conceptual understanding, a philosophical statement, but the direct, personal experience of emptiness, of suchness.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

conebeckham said:

You can read this description as a sort of "analysis," but it's really not. The last line, "experience this directly in meditation," is the key. Meditation, in this instance, is not a conceptual, analytical undertaking. It is a direct seeing. A direct experience. It cannot be illustrated in words and concepts, but there are methods which a skillful teacher can use to engender such direct experience. In fact, Thrangu Rinpoche is using some of those methods, here. You must apply them, though, and not merely "work through them" using your conceptual intellect.

Astus wrote:

Kamalashila's Bhavanakramas are instructions for meditation. I dare say that even the Middle Treatise of Nagarjuna is good for meditation, not to mention the many prajnaparamita sutras. Just as Vajrayana texts can be taken for purely philosophical writings, so can the teachings of the Buddha can and often are mistaken as theoretical matters. Analysis is not meant for achieving an objective statement but to attain insight. I'm not even sure why it happens that while it is obvious that the Dharma is for liberation, teachings are regularly dismissed as if they were products of a bored academic. It is another thing that philosophy is viewed with contempt, calling it idle talk. But once we rename it as ideology, it becomes more apparent how thoughts govern action.

For instance, when there is a teaching about the aggregates, it is not about abstract ideas with no relevance to one's personal life and experience, but instructions on what and how to investigate in order to see the true nature of reality and gain liberation. It is always about direct seeing, that's what vipasyana is. Reducing the words of the Buddha and numerous teachers to mere theorising is not just insulting but inconsiderate and ignorant. (And I'm not saying here, Cone, that you are like that, these are just my general observations.)

It is not a question of conceptuality but how those concepts are understood. Keeping a distance between oneself and some ideas is when it is mere theorising, fantasising about things that have no weight. On the other hand, when a concept is taken seriously, when it is reflected on and connected to one's experience, that is heeding the advice and following the teachings. It becomes a personal matter. Just like when one can listen to any teacher and not find anything noteworthy in his words, if that teacher is seen as one's guru, even the most innocent movements become Dharma instructions.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 7:22 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

oriented towards showing that this kind of analysis is just not necessary at all in Mahāyāna. That in fact, it is an obstacle to understanding the real meaning of Mahāyāna.

...

Why is this important? Because in general, the whole notion of direct perceptions, inferences, and so on are defined on the basis of of the conceptual cognitions of ordinary people.

Astus wrote:

The text itself you quoted is not only a heap of concepts, but goes through stating first the ultimate reality, that it cannot be analysed, then analyses the problem and its causes, then analyses appearances to show that they are false, from which it comes to the conclusion that because they are all false they are the ultimate. That is no different from how a sutra or a shastra teaches emptiness through reasoning and analysis. And after all that it states that for some unknown reason symbolic visual forms and devotion are appropriate methods, although just before that it's argued a lot for the futility of methods.

So, while analysis may not be necessary and even an obstacle, Manjusrimitra could not avoid it either. In fact, we could say that he not only performs analysis but even posits a number of solid-looking elements when it describes the appearance of ignorance, similarly to Yogacara. In the end, he very much agrees with the Buddha's words and Nagarjuna's writings.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: Can't explain ? Blame Karma

Content:

Bodhidharma said:

If not blame, then Buddhists have an annoying tendency to readily dismiss these circumstances as karma as if karma is sufficient explanation.

Astus wrote:

That is still mistaking karma for an external force. Karma is one's own mind's perspective on experiences, like calling a bowl of soup delicious or disgusting. It's not that your karma cooked the soup, but it is one's habitual conditioning (i.e. karma) that prompts one to love or hate something.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 13th, 2015 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

The point I am making is that intellectual analysis will only result in an intellectual apprehension of the object of analysis. Even when you are finished with the analysis, for example, the famous diamond sliver analysis, and so on, still in the end you are left with the concept "emptiness", "nonarising", "freedom from extremes" and so on, even though, as Mañjuśrimitra points out, since the conceptualized extreme does not exist, therefore the extreme to analyze does not exist. Therefore, conventional analysis by mundane minds cannot be used in an ultimate analysis because they cannot escape their own conceptual clinging, indeed they are always with concepts.

Astus wrote:

There are at least two problems with that view:

1. it supposes there is something to gain beyond concepts, instead of realising the nature of conceptuality.
2. it denies what is taught in the sutras and shastras: that vipasyana results in wisdom, practically negating the validity of all paths but the vajrayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 13th, 2015 at 11:25 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

smcj said:

It does not matter how critically you examine a bicycle and the physics of riding a bike. Until you get on it, fall a couple of times, and then finally master it you cannot say you "know how to ride a bike". And, you can learn how to ride without any analysis whatsoever.

It's the experience that counts. Meditation is something you do, not just something you think about (Dzogchen rhetoric aside).

Astus wrote:

The type of abstract analysis you mention is not the vipasyana talked about. Analysis means that in order to ride a bike, one has to be aware of where to sit, what the pedals are for and how to steer. Insight without analysis would mean that a child would immediately know what a bike is and how to use it without having any previous information of it. Analysis is applying the teachings to one's experience, not pure theorising.

As for there being something beyond concepts, that is another concept. Non-conceptuality is not the lack of concepts but knowing concepts for what they actually are.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 13th, 2015 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

1. it supposes there is something to gain beyond concepts, instead of realising the nature of conceptuality.

How?

Astus wrote:

By saying that arriving at the conceptual understanding of emptiness is insufficient and it should go beyond.

Malcolm said:

2. it denies what is taught in the sutras and shastras: that vipasyana results in wisdom, practically negating the validity of all paths but the vajrayana.

How?

Astus wrote:

By saying that analysis does not result in insight into the nature of concepts and so in non-attachment.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 14th, 2015 at 5:04 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

So you are claiming that the conceptual knowledge of emptiness, the conceptual knowledge known to a mundane authority, is sufficient?

Astus wrote:

Knowing that fire is hot is a conceptual knowledge. If one has never encountered fire, it is an unconfirmed conceptual knowledge. If one has encountered fire, it is a confirmed conceptual knowledge. Similarly, only hearing about emptiness without knowing what it means is just verbal information. Once it becomes clear what emptiness refers to in one's present experience, it is a confirmed conceptual knowledge. For example, one sees fire and knows that it is fire. If one sees fire without knowing what fire is, that has no power to inform one's knowledge (and therefore subsequent actions), while knowing fire without ever seeing one has no power to inform one's actions (as there is no use of that knowledge in any situation).

Malcolm said:

Here, when we should understand that the term "mundane" eye refers to exactly the kind of mundane authorities Mañjuśrimitra is critiquing.

It is this analysis with mundane authorities that goes exactly nowhere.

Astus wrote:

That mundane analysis is the view uninformed by emptiness, the thinking of an ordinary being (prthagjana). The Dharma is for ordinary beings to gain insight. That is, through the correct teaching ordinary beings can gain the correct view. Analysis is the method by what one can arrive at confirming what one has learnt and understood. That is, if one is told how to light fire, one is able to test it. Knowing how to make fire is not the same as using that knowledge, but without knowledge there cannot be any fire lit. So it is the mundane eye that has to be directed in the right way to turn it into a supramundane eye. The direction given is the teaching, and moving on the right path is when analysis is applied during vipasyana.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 14th, 2015 at 5:12 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

smcj said:

Practice is something you do. Madhyamaka is something you think about.

Astus wrote:

If one only thinks about Madhyamaka, it has little use. Applying it is how one can gain the wisdom of emptiness, and that is what the practice of Madhyamaka is about. The Bhavanakrama is a great example for using the teachings of Madhyamaka. Or look into Brunnhölzl's The Center of the Sunlit Sky, especially the chapters under Madhyamaka Path - it includes a section entitled How Can Madhyamaka Be a Personal Practice? - and those under Madhyamaka Meditation that includes the section Why Is Analytical Meditation Necessary? where he writes:

"As was explained in detail, the main cause for all our samsaric problems is basic ignorance that expresses itself as our instinctive clinging to a personal self and really existing phenomena. The only means for eliminating this fundamental unawareness is to develop its opposite: an awareness through which we see our mind and phenomena as they really are. In technical terms, this is called discriminating knowledge, which is the seed for the omniscient wisdom of a Buddha.

As a sutra says:

If you discriminate that phenomena are identityless
And meditate by discriminating them in this way,
This is the cause for the result of attaining nirvana.
Peace will not come about through any other cause."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 14th, 2015 at 5:32 AM

Title: Re: How dedication works?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dedication is a practice of rejoicing over and letting go of the consequences of one's good deeds. Partaking in another person's merit is rejoicing over another's good deeds. Similarly, agreeing with and rejoicing in another's evil deeds generates bad karma. It's not that there are some mystical merit particles travelling between beings.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 14th, 2015 at 6:50 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

smcj said:

HHDL weighs in. From "Dzogchen: Heart Essence of the Great Perfection"

Astus wrote:

That is the same as when one has reached, after analysis, insight into suchness.

Kamalashila <http://www.preciousteaching.org/sutra/kamalasilas-bhavana-krama-the-middle-meditation-stage/>:

"In this way one who has entered in the suchness of the selflessness of person and phenomena is free from concept and analysis because there is nothing to be thoroughly examined and observed. One is free from expression and with one-pointed mental engagement one automatically enters in meditation without manifest discrimination. Thus one very clearly meditates on suchness and abides in it. While abiding in that meditation, the mind should not be distracted.

...

If and when the mind is spontaneously engaging in meditative equipoise on suchness free of sinking and mental agitation, at that time it should be left naturally and the efforts relaxed. If effort is applied when the mind is in meditative equipoise, it will distract the mind."

And HHDL comments on the preceding section of the Bhavanakrama:

"It is important to note that in order to enter into non-conceptual absorption it is crucial to engage in thorough analysis first. When the objects of imputation are sought by discerning wisdom, nothing is findable. The true meaning of understanding selflessness needs to be appreciated in perspective. Mere lack of mental activity does not constitute understanding selflessness. Mere absence of a misconception of self does not imply a knowledge of selflessness. Selflessness is understood by the wisdom that finds that both the perceiving mind and the perceived objects lack any self-identity in the ultimate sense. This knowledge dawns on the practitioner after thorough and discerning scrutiny and analysis."

(Stages of Meditation, p 136)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 14th, 2015 at 8:47 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

A conceptual knowledge of emptiness is still a mere concept, and results in being fettered. A simulacrum, not the real thing.

Astus wrote:

Ignorance is based on the mistaken concept of self. Removing that is wisdom. Knowledge of emptiness as a mere concept is not knowledge of emptiness. The conceptual knowledge of emptiness is when the concept of substance is proven to be false. Just like if one were to think that there is a tiger in the house then there would arise fear from entering it. But if one actually goes and checks the rooms and find no tiger, from the confirmed knowledge of that the fear vanishes. We might say that "there is no tiger in the house" is a conceptual knowledge, but what it means is that the idea of there being a tiger is removed, so in that sense it is relinquishing the concept. It is not that one just sits far from the house and wonders whether there is or there isn't any tiger, one actually has to check it for himself. Same goes for vipasyana, it is not merely theorising about there being a self or not but actually looking for it. Although it could be said that searching the house for a tiger is still based on delusion, without actually doing a thorough analysis, one will not just enter the house.

Malcolm said:

Having a view of emptiness does not make one an ārya.

Astus wrote:

A view of emptiness is knowing that there is no view to uphold, otherwise it is a view of self.

Malcolm said:

But this contradicts the Saddharma-pundarika sūtra: ... And the...

Astus wrote:

The quotes talk about the attainment, not the path. In order to be free from conceptualisation of extremes one has to see that there is nothing to conceptualise about.

The Surangama Samadhi Sutra says (BDK Edition):

"If a Bodhisattva wishes to attain this samadhi, he should cultivate the dharma of ordinary people. If he perceives the dharma of ordinary people, the dharma of the Buddha will be neither conjoined nor dispersed. This is called cultivation of the Surangama Samadhi." (p 40)

and

"If a Bodhisattva is able to contemplate the dharma as empty and unobstructed, with each moment of thought completely extinguished and transcending like and dislike, this is to cultivate this samadhi." (p 77)

The Lotus Sutra (p 197, BDK Edition):

"A bodhisattva, at proper times,
Should enter a quiet chamber
And contemplate all dharmas
With correct thoughts,
According to the meaning."

Malcolm said:

That is fine if one thinks nirvana comes about from causes, which is a characteristic approach of the causal vehicle a.k.a, the vehicle of characteristics.

Astus wrote:

If realisation has no causes, there is neither path nor teachings. Nirvana is the elimination of ignorance, and that happens through correct understanding and correct contemplation. Vajrayana is no different, since it is itself a path with instructions and practices.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 15th, 2015 at 3:39 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

Finding there is no tiger in the room is not a matter of analysis.

Astus wrote:

One checks each room if there is a tiger there. Similarly, one checks the aggregates if there is a self there. If this is not analysis, then what is called analysis is not analysis. And probably this is where the misunderstanding of analysis lies, mistaking it for theorising instead of informed observation and investigation of phenomena.

Malcolm said:

It is, providing you have ascertained there is no tiger. Otherwise, you can analyze whether there is or is not a tiger in a room until the end of time, without being one step closer to the truth. This is the problem with Madhyamaka analysis.

Astus wrote:

Again, as above, vipasyana is not theorising.

Malcolm said:

Yes, so it is not a matter of analysis. It is a matter of direct perception.

Astus wrote:

There is direct perception, yes. The analysis is pointing one's perception in the right direction. Otherwise the basic nature of emptiness is already apparent, suchness is not hidden even a bit. The reason it is not recognised is because of the lack of direction, and that is what the teachings and the analysis performed based on the Dharma helps with.

Malcolm said:

Thus, there is no real need for analysis. One does not need to understand mere that there is no tiger in a house, one needs to understand that tigers, houses, snakes and indeed all phenomena are completely equivalent with illusions — this is the real intention of Mahāyāna.

Astus wrote:

The tiger is a metaphor for substance, the house for the six sensory areas. Realising that the six senses are insubstantial, illusory, is all there is to know. The way to realise that is observing clearly what the six senses actually are, that is, looking through the rooms, and that is analysis.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 15th, 2015 at 5:49 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

What you are essentially recommending is going through a conceptual exercise of imagining that something is there, and then spending time to find out whether what you imagine is true.

If, on the other hand, someone tells you, "There are no tigers in that house", it may be the case that you have some doubt and need to confirm this for your self. Likewise, if someone tells you that there is no self in the aggregates, then you look and you will not find one. Of course it is up to you to look, and not leave it as a mere concept.

Astus wrote:

If there were no pre-existing concept of a tiger, someone saying that there is no tiger in the house would make no sense. In both cases one needs to have the assumption of a tiger. And that view of a real tiger is the mistake everyone has. Without seeing for oneself that there is no tiger, the mistake remains.

Malcolm said:

Well, the kind of vipaśyāna analysis you are now favoring is really, because unlike tigers and snakes, the absence of the four extremes is not something that really can be confirmed with ordinary thinking and cognitions because it is not an object. Therefore, you have to imagine something to negate and so on.

In other words, having seen a tiger, one can know what the absence of a tiger is because there are sign by which tigers can be apprehended. But there are no signs by which an extreme can be apprehended, and hence the analogy breaks down as it must.

Astus wrote:

One already has the view of substantial entities, conceiving things as independent objects. That is the misconception that needs to be eliminated. At the same time, one is normally unaware of the presence of wrong view, so it has to be highlighted as the source of the problem. Thus the structure of the four noble truths and the twelve links. So it is not the case that the extremes are not there, because they are the basis of all the problems.

Malcolm said:

Even if you think you have confirmed the absence of extremes, this is just an intellectual confirmation. In order to actually confirm this, you have to go beyond the conceptuality of the mind. Conceptual analysis will not get you there. Conceptual investigation will not get you there.

Astus wrote:

The extremes are conceptual assumptions. And just like with any other wrong view, it can be corrected through understanding it to be wrong. And that understanding requires concepts.

Malcolm said:

What you work with is the concepts themselves. They are your experiences. So you observe them: where does this thought come from, where does it go? You do this until you understand that concepts do not come from anywhere nor go anywhere. Then you can go beyond concepts. But even this is still a conceptual exercise. It should only be done after receiving direct introduction on the basis having the experience of a moment of ordinary mind.

Astus wrote:

Similarly to samatha, in vipasyana one goes from the grosser to the subtler objects, simply because that is normally easier. But eventually one arrives at investigating the mind to see that thoughts are inconstant and unreliable. A moment of mind without concepts becomes a memory in the next moment and then serves as just another concept, thus people can even imagine it to be a real self and set up a duality of thoughts versus no thoughts. Then they need to look again and integrate all experiences to see that all has the same nature as the mind. That way it becomes an analysis in the reverse order.

Malcolm said:

As pointed out, mundane direct perceptions are deceptive.

Astus wrote:

All perceptions are inconstant and unreliable, and when that is recognised, there is no more basis for attachment. It doesn't matter whether it's an elephant or just the illusion of an elephant.

Malcolm said:

The reason it is not recognized is because of lack of introduction. Someone might, eventually exhaust their concepts through analysis, and understand. But this is a very slow route, it takes eons.

Astus wrote:

Analysis is directed investigation, that is: vipasyana. Not theorising or arguing. That "slow exhaustion of concepts" is a straw man.

Malcolm said:

No, you merely need look at the perceiver who uses the six sense media, and understand it is not established in any way, mere empty clarity. You do not need analysis, you need direct introduction through experiences.

Astus wrote:

Analysis is exactly like that, except it does not posit a perceiver but investigates the six areas as they are and confirms directly that there is nothing to grasp.

Malcolm said:

Since the kind of analysis used by Kamalashila and which are you now advocating involves coarse conceptuality, it is very difficult, virtually impossible through analysis to discover the nonconceptual empty clarity of the mind and go beyond mind. But when one works with direct introduction, it is very easy.

Astus wrote:

In a sense it is understandable that analytical meditation had been put away as too complicated and more experiential methods were raised as the direct path. Madhyamaka had become a large heap of arguments and theories, so no wonder many felt that it is too slow and such. The same happened to abhidharma. But that doesn't mean it was always like that or that's how it was meant to be used. Dzogchen and Mahamudra emphasising that one should go directly to the nature of mind, however, is practically not different from analysis. It goes through the same steps of establishing a calm mind, then investigating that very mind to ascertain its emptiness, finally arriving at the unity of samatha-vipasyana. If the mind were not looked into it would be simply just samatha. Kamalashila arrives at the nature of mind as well:

"One analyses by thinking that just as the mind, the identity of all phenomena too is like mere illusion. In this way when the identity of the mind is individually examined by wisdom, in the ultimate sense it is perceived neither within or without. It is also not perceived in the absence of both. Neither the mind of the past, nor that of the future, nor of the present is perceived. When the mind is born, it comes from nowhere and when it ceases it goes nowhere because it is inapprehensible, undemonstratable and non-physical."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 5:53 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

The extremes are not there, they are not established, they never existed from the beginning.

Astus wrote:

The problem is that they are thought to be established, although they are not. And that's the basic mistake.

Malcolm said:

But you don't even need to make these conceptual assumptions and then go about eliminating them. This is a very dim-witted approach.

Astus wrote:

Ignorance is already present, no need to establish it, only to point it out as the source of the problems.

Malcolm said:

No, really it is much simpler than that. They need to receive direct introduction — then they need to work with the instructions of the lineage, which in general do not involve any analysis whatsoever, at least in Dzogchen.

Astus wrote:

Same happens everywhere else. One learns the teaching, understands it, then applies it. Analysis is following the guidance of the teachings to confirm for oneself its validity, like checking if there's a self in the sensory areas.

Malcolm said:

If all perceptions are inconstant and reliable, then all analysis is unreliable.

Astus wrote:

Yes, even the teachings are empty, conventional and conditioned. If there were a teaching of the ultimate nature, then it would really contradict universal emptiness.

Malcolm said:

Analysis is directed investigation, that is: vipasyana. Not theorising or arguing. That "slow exhaustion of concepts" is a straw man.

But above, you clearly indicate that you have to adopt a theory to investigate. So you are now contradicting yourself.

Astus wrote:

Analysis is using the teachings to do an investigation. So when it talks about checking if there is any permanent element within the physical area, it's not just theorising whether that is the case or not, but looking at one's own present experience. This is what I have said before and say now.

Malcolm said:

No one is positing an ultimate perceiver here — the point there are not six consciousnesses apprehending six different kinds of media. There is one consciousness functioning through the six sense organs. The point is that when one understands that the magician is not real, one immediately understands that his tricks are also false. Going through and analyzing the six external sense objects is a waste of time.

Astus wrote:

There are a number of problems with positing a single consciousness, as taught from the early texts on in the context of the 18 dhatus. Actually, that's what one should recognise during analysis, that the mind is not a single entity but a series of instances, and then one can go further to see that even instances are not graspable as distinct entities. That's how the emptiness of both self and dharmas are confirmed. Looking for that single perceiver is no different from looking for the self and not finding it anywhere.

Malcolm said:

Madhyamaka, in reality, merely serves as a corrective to the realism of the three lower tenet systems. It has no tenet system of its own. This is why Madhyamaka has not independent path which is separate from the path of Yogacara. The path of Yogacara and Madhyamaka is the same path, five paths and ten stages.

Astus wrote:

This interpretation of "corrective to the realism of the three lower tenet systems" makes sense only in the Tibetan system where only Vajrayana is viewed as something practical, while the so called sutra teachings are reduced to mere theory. Kamalashila does not seem to see that way, nor do other Madhyamikas. As for the path, why should it come up with a new one? It is a Mahayana teaching for bodhisattvas.

Malcolm said:

The kinds of analysis Madhyamaka engages in is meant to serve as a corrective to realism.

Astus wrote:

If by realism you mean the basic grasping at supposedly real entities, then yes. If by that you mean only a theoretical view, then it is limiting the scope of the teachings for no good reason.

Malcolm said:

This is not the nature of the mind. The nature of the mind is not only emptiness.

Astus wrote:

Saying that the nature of mind is "empty-clarity" does not really add anything. When it is said that the mind is empty, that's not the same as saying there is no mind. Since the mind is per definition aware, saying that its nature is empty is the same as saying that awareness is empty, but the awareness of it is not diminished by this at all. Similarly, saying that a ball is red doesn't mean it is not also round, since being a ball means that it is round.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 6:09 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

conebeckham said:

No, it's based on habitual patterns; concepts are just the tip of the iceberg, really. This is why replacing one concept with another conceptual understanding is not close to liberation.

Ignorance is based on a mistake, but it is a much more pervasive misapprehension than just a "mistaken concept of the self."

Astus wrote:

Non-conceptual wisdom is the correct view of prajnaparamita that liberates all beings. It is non-conceptual not because there are no concepts, but because concepts are not reified and grasped. If concepts were just the tip of the iceberg, freedom from them would be less than upholding the precept against murder. However, freedom from conceptualising is liberating because if there is no self grasped, then no matter what experience appears, they have no impact and generate no karma.

Although I think what you meant by concepts were not the basic personal truths governing all one's actions but rather superficial verbalisations.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 7:41 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I think surely non-conceptual wisdom is associated with trance states or at least profound inner stillness. The reason it escapes 'conceptual formations' is because they are quiescent in those states. That is why in some sense it is not an 'analytical' process, at least in the sense of 'analysis' understood by modern thinking.

Astus wrote:

If it were bound to a specific state it had no effect on one's life in general where concepts are plenty. Also, it'd be just like one of the absorptions, not liberation but part of samsara.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 10:03 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, and as pointed out above, it is a very slow approach because it relies on a coarse mind.

Astus wrote:

How slow? If someone cares to study a bit, then follow through the instructions, it is not that difficult. And I'm not bringing up here the whole minimum three aeons schedule, just the fairly ordinary person interested in the Dharma with the proper conditions to accept the teachings, etc.

Malcolm said:

So you admit that all analysis is unreliable.

Astus wrote:

Is there anything reliable?

Malcolm said:

Well then, it is pretty clear your notion of impermanence is merely an imputation, because there are plenty of counterfactual experiences of permanence.

Astus wrote:

I'm not sure I follow you here. Are you saying that there are experiences of permanence?

Malcolm said:

There is only one stream of momentary consciousness. It functions through the six sense organs like a monkey jumping from one window to the next. For example, when it functions through the eye, it is called "eye consciousness", when it jumps to the ear, it is called "ear-consciousness." But one does not possess multiple consciousnesses at the same time. To propose that one does contradicts the basic definition of vijñāna-skandha.

Astus wrote:

No, there was no mention of multiple consciousnesses at the same time. However, the mind-stream does not affirm a single consciousness either, rather a series of many. The monkey's simile means that consciousness occurs where the hand and the branch makes contact, but there is no monkey going from one place to another. As the sutta explains: "what's called 'mind,' 'intellect,' or 'consciousness' by day and by night arises as one thing and ceases as another"

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.061.than.html>), and in another speech: "Consciousness, monks, is classified simply by the requisite condition in dependence on which it arises. ... Just as fire is classified simply by whatever requisite condition in dependence on which it burns"

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.038.than.html>).

Malcolm said:

In the contrary, Madhyamakas also take this stance, as Nāgārjuna states; "If I had a position, I would be at fault; since I alone have no position, I alone am without fault."

Astus wrote:

That is where one has to arrive at, after due analysis. You know, relative truth first.

Malcolm said:

The problem with Madhyamaka is that it has a theoretical view: the two truths.

Astus wrote:

That is called an expedient means, and it has its use. It does not stand alone as some statement of ultimate value.

Malcolm said:

Madhyamaka analysis does not address the nature of the mind; it merely rejects claims for existing existents and that is all.

Astus wrote:

True nature is no nature. What other nature is there to address?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: Why Buddhism over Vedanta?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Also, since nobody ever experiences a permanent self, it is just a conceptual fantasy.

lostitude said:

How do you know that? Maybe some people have?

Astus wrote:

If they had experienced a permanent self, then they must have had that all the time. Permanence does not allow an experience to arise or disappear, thus no path or teaching to reach it.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: Why Buddhism over Vedanta?

Content:

catmoon said:

What made the difference to me was exposure to the Baghavad-Gita. I just couldn't make any sense of it at all. Then I heard a little of one of the Dalai Lama's talks, and his clarity, humour and depth caught my attention immediately.

Astus wrote:

Interesting, I liked the Gita very much and turned to Buddhism partly because koans were hard to make sense of.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 11:27 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

And again, the mind of analysis is a very coarse mind. That itself is a block for realization. For example, with our ordinary eyes we cannot see very subtle things. Likewise, with our ordinary conceptual minds we cannot realize what which is subtle and hard to realize. The best we can do is generate a coarse conceptual simulacrum. Then, in order to generate the subtle mind necessary for realizing the true nature of things, well, it takes a long time through sūtrayāna methods, many eons, just to even realize the first bhumi.

Astus wrote:

What defines coarse and subtle mind for you? No simulacrum is mentioned in the Bhavanakrama or other texts I'm aware of.

Malcolm said:

Sure.

Astus wrote:

And what is reliable? Something one can grasp and hang on to?

Malcolm said:

Yes, just like people have convincing experiences of ropes as snakes.

Astus wrote:

Nobody sees snakes all the time, they at best think there is a permanent substance behind/within what they can experience in the six senses.

Malcolm said:

Again, here is your claim that you have to begin with a position, only to abandon it later. This is like believing that in order to walk barefoot, one must first put on shoes and then take them off.

Astus wrote:

As noted before, people are already in the state of assuming positions and it is not adding another to point out the error.

Malcolm said:

And yet, again and again, so-called Madhyamikas make strenuous efforts to defend what they know is not true. This is the problem with Madhyamaka, again identified by Rongzom:

Astus wrote:

So, there are three things not understood: homogeneity (unity of the two truths), non-duality (unity not conceived as 1+1) and non-arising (lack of substance to come or go).

The two truths are not established as anything real, so talking of their homogeneity and non-duality is meaningless. As for non-arising, that is no different from knowing emptiness. While it sounds interesting how to make up faults in various systems, and then eventually repeat the same teachings with different words, it fails to actually show any errors. Unless this is merely a critique of style and not content, but in that case it is an aesthetic question.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 11:38 PM

Title: Re: Why Buddhism over Vedanta?

Content:

lostitude said:

I don't see why? You can experience something permanent but not always be in the right frame of mind to experience it. It is like perceiving background noise, you actually hear it only if you pay sufficient attention to it.

Astus wrote:

Permanence excludes causality. Being recognised is a change in conditions. Also, if it is one's permanent self, the self is the one that should recognise itself, and since it is permanent, it either always knows itself or never.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 5:07 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

Of course there is, it is the conceptual emptiness meditated/cultivated during heat on the path of application.

Astus wrote:

Still, Kamalashila does not talk about conceiving emptiness but realising it directly.

Malcolm said:

An experience of permanence is going to a place and seeing the same rock there, year in year out. Does not mean the rock is permanent, but it is the kind of thing that provides common people with their notion of permanence and durability.

Astus wrote:

It is a notion of permanence, a concept, that can be removed by directing them to analyse what they actually experience.

Malcolm said:

No, actually they are not. A lot of Buddhist training involves planting ideas in people's heads that actually they don't hold.

Astus wrote:

Ideas, like the permanence of rocks and other objects? Like the endurance of a real self? Otherwise, yes, there is a teaching to learn, in order to become aware of one's incorrect presumptions and then overcome them.

Malcolm said:

No, Madhyamikas understand nonarising [It is Yogacaras who do not], their problem is clinging to true relative truth.

Astus wrote:

How could it be true if it is conventional? The very meaning of conventional is that it is not true.

Malcolm said:

it is a critique of grasping in different systems, as already explained above.

Astus wrote:

It does not actually address the systems but reinterprets them according to his preferences and thus criticises systems that never existed. It's like those non-Buddhists who attack the Dharma because they misconstrue it as nihilism.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 6:17 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

you did not provide a very detailed presentation.

Astus wrote:

Kamalashila <http://www.preciousteaching.org/sutra/kamalasilas-bhavana-krama-the-middle-meditation-stage/>:

"What properly examines suchness from within a state of calm-abiding meditation is penetrative insight."

"When suchness is properly meditated upon with wisdom, purified transcendent wisdom is realised. Since wisdom alone can realise suchness and can effectively eradicate the obscurations, I shall therefore search for suchness through wisdom while engaging in calm-abiding meditation. And I shall not remain content with calm-abiding meditation alone.

What is suchness like? It is the nature of all phenomena that ultimately they are empty of the self of person and the self of phenomena. This is understood by the perfection of wisdom and not otherwise."

"What is thoroughly realised by the mind too is realised as being empty. By realising that, the very identity which is established as the aspect of the mind, like the identity of physical form, etc., is also not ultimately perceived. In this way, when a person does not ultimately see the identity of all phenomena through wisdom he would not analyse whether physical form is permanent or impermanent, empty or not empty, contaminated or non-contaminated, produced or non-produced and existent or non-existent.

Just as physical form is not examined, similarly feeling, recognition, compositional factors and consciousness are not examined. When the object does not exist, its particularities also cannot exist. So how can they be examined? In this way when the person does not firmly grasp on to the entity of a thing as ultimately existing, having investigated with wisdom, then the practitioner engages in a non-conceptual single-pointed concentration. And thus identitylessness of all phenomena is also realised."

"In this way one who has entered in the suchness of the selflessness of person and phenomena is free from concept and analysis because there is nothing to be thoroughly examined and observed. One is free from expression and with one-pointed mental engagement one automatically enters in meditation without manifest discrimination. Thus one very clearly meditates on suchness and abides in it."

"If and when the mind is spontaneously engaging in meditative equipoise on suchness free of sinking and mental agitation, at that time it should be left naturally and the efforts relaxed."

Malcolm said:

Obviously, this does not work — case in point, eternalists.

Astus wrote:

Nobody can be forced to do vipasyana.

Malcolm said:

Many people do not have this idea. They meet Buddhadharma and then spend lots of time refuting a self they never believed existed to begin with.

Astus wrote:

The general idea of self includes that it remains the same from one day to another. What not many people have is a more sophisticated soul/atman view.

Malcolm said:

Umm, no.

Astus wrote:

How so? That something is only a conventionally agreed name means that it has no basis beyond the concept.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 4:35 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Wayfarer said:

But what I'm pointing out is not a 'special state' - it is seeing through or beyond the machinations of discursive intellect.

Just remind us all again, what is the derivation of the terms 'ch'an' and 'zen'?

Astus wrote:

The machinations of discursive intellect cannot be seen through when it is suspended during absorption (dhyana). So, the Platform Sutra, chapter 4, says (BDK Edition, p 43): "Nonthought is to be without thought in the context of thoughts."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 5:07 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

This suchness is a generic image of suchness, it is not real suchness.

Astus wrote:

"Thus such a mind in the entity of ultimate bodhicitta included within the path of seeing, which apprehends the selfless nature of all phenomena is generated. Through this achievement one enters into the path focusing on the reality of things and one is then born in the family of tathagatas, enters the bodhisattva category without flaws, turns away from all migrations, abides in the suchness of bodhisattvas and attains the first bodhisattva bhumi (spiritual level)."

Malcolm said:

Many commoners do not really have this idea — first they have to be brainwashed into refuting a self most of them will readily agree they do not have, unless they have a belief in a soul. Many atheists are quite happy they have no soul, and if you tell them their "self" is a cognitive imputation, they happily go along with this idea.

Astus wrote:

Materialists take the body as the self and they are mostly unaware of the mind. Taking something as a self basically means being attached to it and taking it as the centre of one's view of the world. So it is meditation on and the analysis of the body and the physical world that is taught for them. In Kamalashila's method:

"The aggregates, sources of perception and elements in the ultimate sense are nothing other than aspects of the mind. This is due to the reason that when these are broken into subtle particles and the nature of the parts of the subtle particles are individually examined, there is no definite identity that can be found. Due to attachment since beginningless time to imperfect things like physical form, to an ordinary being these things appear separate and outside the realm of the mind. This is like physical forms appearing in dreams. In the ultimate sense, physical form and so forth are nothing other than aspects of the mind."

Malcolm said:

we cannot say a car is nonexistent, even though it is conventional

Astus wrote:

There is no negation of apparent phenomena, rather the pointing out that they are only apparent without any basis or foundation, in other words: empty. Since emptiness is dependent origination, causality is not a problem at all, as long as it is understood what interdependence means. Objecting against dependent origination is not recognising its emptiness.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 5:13 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

catmoon said:

A while back Malcolm equated suchness and emptiness.

Can anyone (Malcolm included) think of an example where this doesn't hold? I can't, but I'm a bit foggy on suchness.

Astus wrote:

Suchness emphasises reality as a whole, emptiness emphasises the lack of substance. They are synonyms, but they highlight different aspects. Similarly, no-self is the same as emptiness, but it has a personal emphasis in it, while dharmadhatu is more a universal emptiness, and at the same time dharmakaya is the emptiness of the buddhas' realisation, etc. There are so many expressions that basically mean the same but are used in various contexts.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 5:21 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Brev said:

Is the argument that analysis alone isn't the only route here basically analogous to the following? You could prove that the earth is roughly spherical by analysis by setting up big pillars, measuring their shadows, and roughly calculating the circumference of the earth based on that . . . but you still wouldn't have the exact shape of the earth because it's flatter on top and bottom and bulges in the ocean, so you'd then have to send expeditions to the North and South Poles, take measurements in the ocean, etc. In the meantime, continuing to insist that earth's not flat would be pointless because that was long ago established and you're onto finer measurements. Or . . . you could just see the shape of the earth from a shuttle.

Astus wrote:

Here's my perspective:

Analysis is measuring the Earth from all angles. Realisation without analysis is saying that measuring takes too long and one should just take a look from space. The problem with that non-analytical approach is that they don't have a spaceship.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

"This is the path of engaging in a union of calm abiding meditation and insight. Its focuses on the image conceptually and non-conceptually." pg. 140.

Thus, "This suchness is a generic image of suchness, it is not real suchness," as I said.

Astus wrote:

According to HHDL's commentary (p 141) it doesn't refer to some image but it's a synonym:

"Then once more continue your meditation on the union of special insight and calm abiding, which is also known as focusing on the reflection both conceptually and non-conceptually."

And Kamalashila continues:

"Thus, through this progress, a yogi should meditate on suchness for an hour, or half a session in the night, or one full session, or for as long as is comfortable. This is the meditative stabilization thoroughly discerning the ultimate, as taught in the Descent into Lanka Sutra."

It is on suchness, not some image of suchness. And that's what is in the text in every place, directly seeing suchness, not simply an image or concept of it.

The quote provided in my previous post states: "apprehends the selfless nature of all phenomena", and that's the very result of the vipasyana. It would be quite pointless to achieve simply a generic concept, since for that there is no need to perform any meditation.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 12:20 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, Astus, this part of the text is not talking about the first bhumi. This is talking about heat on the path of application where in fact you reflect on generic concepts of emptiness.

Astus wrote:

That does not really fit with the description of what is performed during meditation.

"In this way, when the person does not firmly apprehend the entity of a thing as ultimately existing; having investigated it with wisdom, the practitioner engages in non-conceptual single-pointed concentration. And thus the identitylessness of all phenomena is realized."

Then that conclusion of vipasyana is false. Or in the following paragraphs it switches topic to describe the path from a different perspective.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 12:47 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

The term " rtoḡs pa " in Tibetan means either "to realize" or "to understand." Here it means the latter more than former.

The conclusion is not false, it is merely a conceptual approximation that is cultivated on the path of application. And the text does not switch topics, you just are not following the gradualist perspective of Kamalashila correctly.

Astus wrote:

In Adam's translation (p 207):

"When a yogin does not actually hold firmly to the nature of any entity, then he enters nonconceptual samadhi. And he also understands the absence of inherent nature of all things."

And while he uses understanding there, the previous sentence says one realises nonconceptual samadhi, and it is because of that that one can understand emptiness. If the suchness there were just an imagined concept, it wouldn't be nonconceptual samadhi.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 3:05 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

Thus, still, this shows a yogin who has not yet achieved the path of seeing.

Astus wrote:

Here are some further clarifications then from Adam's translation of the 1st Bhavanakrama, key terms underlined by me:

From the section on moving from reasoning to meditation

"Thus having ascertained the real meaning by means of the wisdom of thinking, one should give rise to the wisdom of meditation in order to directly perceive it."
(p 134)

From the section on vipasyana

"When this is so, one is established in the practical realization of the lack of inherent nature of all dharmas. Because the one who is established there enters ultimate suchness, there is the entry into nonconceptual samadhi. And thus when the yogin is established in the knowledge that has no appearance of nondual knowledge, then, due to his being established in the ultimate suchness he sees the Mahayana."
(p 142)

From the section on meditation on the absolute

"Thus other conceptualizations definitely do not arise for him at that time because of the pervasion of all conceptualizations by conceptions of existence and nonexistence, and because when there is an absence of pervader there is no possibility of that which is to be pervaded. This itself is the yoga of the highest nonconceptualization."
(p 145)

From the section on the bhumis

"Thus in this stage, the bodhisattva is delighted on account of understanding for the first time the suchness that was not understood. Hence this stage is called 'delighted'."
(p 154)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Brev said:

Definitely makes sense that it seems fishy for analysis to be unnecessary in practice. How could you be sure that wrong views weren't sneaking in if you couldn't analytically identify them as wrong views and correct your view through one-pointed concentration on emptiness?

Astus wrote:

Correct view is first obtained by studying the teachings. Meditation is to confirm their validity and apply it to one's life.

Brev said:

However, aren't there experiences that are certainly within reach that would deepen just about any practitioner's understanding of this or that facet of emptiness?

Astus wrote:

Experiences of impermanence, dependent origination and emptiness are always there, as those are the very nature of experiences. The important thing is to recognise them. Thus no matter what experiences one may have, unless their's nature is realised, there is no insight.

Brev said:

is your objection to the approach of direct introduction that it too is only an approximation and must be supported by analysis, that it is a false path (i.e. not a "spaceship" to see "Earth" from), or something else?

Astus wrote:

If introduction means bringing one's attention to the nature of reality, then it is not different from what one does during analysis. However, if it means simply putting oneself into the realised state, it lacks the cause for insight, therefore it's not possible.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

conebeckham said:

Shall we say that the taste of honey can be adequately grasped by the intellect? Or must one have first hand experience of the taste of honey to actually experience it? To paraphrase one of my favorite quotes, "analyzing the taste of honey is like dancing about architecture."

Astus wrote:

It is the intellect that tells one that a certain group of experiences are what can be called honey. But that's not the same as not tasting honey. It's just that without intellect you can never know if that's honey or not.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 6:29 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

conebeckham said:

And without the experience of tasting honey, all intellectual conceptualizations are inadequate.

Astus wrote:

And that's the point of vipasyana, to bring the teachings to the level of experience. Similarly, knowing of the precepts but not abiding by them has little use in generating merit.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 4:42 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

And a counterclarification from the same text, pg. 153.

Unshakable by the likes of Mārā, when one cultivates suchness with the power of zeal, then the stage of zealous conduct is distinguished on the basis of intense zeal. The bodhisattva existing in this stage, although still an ordinary person, has completely passed beyond all the calamities of a fool and is endowed with innumerable qualities like samadhis, spells, freedoms, superknowledges and so on.

Astus wrote:

And the preceding sentence says: "as long as one does not directly experience the suchness (tattvam) of the selflessness of the personality and of dharmas, (there is) only a very intense zeal"

However, as shown in my previous collection of clarifying quotes, meditation is about direct perception, and through vipasyana that is what is achieved. The zealous stage is about aspiring to that direct experience, it is the time of practice on the basis of the instructions, required before realisation is attained.

The text continues in the section on zealous conduct:

"But when one would ascertain the non-dual knowledge which is devoid of the forms of the object and subject, then this is the degree of penetration designated "The best (worldly) condition" (agradharma). And this is called "The samadhi without interval" because, in fact, immediately following it one enters into suchness."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

The point is that you kept denying there was a conceptual meditation on suchness and thus, were quoting passages not in accordance with their meaning.

Astus wrote:

The point here is that vipasyana's aim is not just gaining a theory but attaining an understanding through insight into emptiness, and thus it qualifies for at least the first bhumi.

And from previous posts:

Malcolm said:

Vipaśyāna is conceptual. That is its limitation. Plus, Madhyamaka analysis is ultimately dualistic.

Astus wrote:

Of course it is conceptual, and conceptuality is dualistic. Every teaching is within the realm of the conceptual, and the point is to see that what are grasped as real, solid things are actually conceptual and dependent.

Malcolm said:

A conceptual knowledge of emptiness is still a mere concept, and results in being fettered. A simulacrum, not the real thing.

Astus wrote:

Ignorance is based on the mistaken concept of self. Removing that is wisdom. Knowledge of emptiness as a mere concept is not knowledge of emptiness. The conceptual knowledge of emptiness is when the concept of substance is proven to be false.

Malcolm said:

Anyway, such analysis is not necessary in Dzogchen practice, not in any sense at all.

Astus wrote:

At this moment, you are free from all fixed notions of what mind might be, and liberation itself is actualized: "There is nothing there: transfixed in wonder," (<http://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/patrul-rinpoche/tsik-sum-nedek-commentary>)

In the 3rd Bhavanakrama, (tr Adam, p 246), Kamalashila writes:

"And if the yogin's mindfulness and attention towards dharmas can't proceed because of being bereft of mindfulness or in a state of stupefaction, then how could this completely stupefied one be a yogin? And in that circumstance, by practicing nonmindfulness and nonattention without the discernment of reality, ignorance itself would become one's habit! Precisely on account of that, the light of knowledge would recede. But if this [yogin] is not bereft of mindfulness, nor stupefied, then how in that circumstance could he undertake nonmindfulness and nonattention without the discernment of reality? For it is not logical to assert that it is precisely in being mindful that one is not mindful, and that precisely in seeing one does not see."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

DGA said:

At this point, I'm having a hard time tracking what is meant by "conceptual" and "analysis" in this discussion. In regard to suchness: it seems to me that The Awakening of Faith of Asvaghosa is precisely a series of contemplations, analytical in nature, delineating suchness. This text uses a kind of analysis in order to point the reader toward something in particular. is this an example of analysis, or nothing, or both?

Astus wrote:

Analysis in the context of meditation, i.e. vipasyana, means investigating one's experiences based on the teachings to confirm their emptiness. It is a conceptual process (involves thinking), as one relies on the teachings. So, if one has to consider whether the self is found in the eyes, the seen or the eye-consciousness, one has to be aware of the meanings of eyes-seen-seer, and then observe whether there is anything stable or graspable. The observation part is informed by the teaching - i.e. the instruction to check if there's anything permanent - but at the same time it is also related directly to one's experience of seeing. It is not merely theorising, as some like to think about it, but it is also not suspending one's thoughts.

The AFM contains instructions for both samatha and vipasyana, although it is not in the usual Indian format. There it is during the practice of samatha/cessation that one directly enters suchness:

"All thoughts, as soon as they are conjured up, are to be discarded, and even the thought of discarding them is to be put away, for all things are essentially in the state of transcending thoughts, and are not to be created from moment to moment nor to be extinguished from moment to moment; thus one is to conform to the essential nature of Reality (dharmata) through this practice of cessation. And it is not that he should first meditate on the objects of the senses in the external world and then negate them with his mind, the mind that has meditated on them."

And in chapter 1:

Question: If such is the meaning of the principle of Mahayana, how is it possible for men to conform themselves to and enter into it?

Answer: If they understand that, concerning all things, though they are spoken of, there is neither that which speaks, nor that which can be spoken of, and though they are thought of, there is neither that which thinks, nor that which can be thought of, then they are said to have conformed to it. And when they are freed from their thoughts, they are said to have entered into it.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 11:10 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

I don't know why you bother citing Patrul Rinpoche, as he merely illustrates my point.

Astus wrote:

Yes, it is clear that there is no contradiction between what you and what Patrul Rinpoche (and others) say. I did not mean to imply that you are misrepresenting Dzogchen or Vajrayana.

What I have tried to highlight is that the amazement/wonder/shock technique in Dzogchen seems to be what's addressed by the quoted passage from Kamalashila.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Brev said:

When Kamalashila mentions becoming stupefied, is he talking about engaging in shamatha without vipasyana? If so, then I think the heart of the disagreement might just be about whether resting in the natural state is equivalent to shamatha.

Astus wrote:

The necessity of vipasyana after samatha is discussed elsewhere. The state of stupefaction is used as an example of the suspension/cessation of concepts in order to experience nonconceptuality, as a kind of short cut to realisation.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 11:41 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

I don't think so. He is addressing a different problem.

Astus wrote:

How so?

Patrul Rinpoche:

"introduced in and upon the very dissolution of conceptual mind"

Kamalashila:

"If it is said that one enters (nonconceptuality) through nonmindfulness and nonattention toward all dharmas, that is not reasonable."

...

"when nonmindfulness and nonattention occur, without the discernment of reality how could dharmas' lack of independent existence come to be realized?"

...

"And if the yogin's mindfulness and attention towards dharmas can't proceed because of being bereft of mindfulness or in a state of stupefaction, then how could this completely stupefied one be a yogin?"

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

smcj said:

I really think it means mental torpor or dullness. It's a faulty attempt at shamatha, like a cow not thinking much as it stands in it's field.

Astus wrote:

The word used is "mūḍha".

<http://www.sanskrit-lexicon.uni-koeln.de/scans/MWScan/tamil/index.html> mfn. stupefied , bewildered , perplexed , confused , uncertain or at a loss about (loc. or comp.) AV. &c.&c. ; stupid , foolish , dull , silly , simple Mn. MBh. &c. ; swooned , indolent L. ; gone astray or adrift As3vGr2. ; driven out of its course (as a ship) R. ; wrong , out of the right place (as the fetus in delivery) Sus3r. ; not to be ascertained , not clear , indistinct A1past. R. ; perplexing , confounding VP. ; m. a fool , dolt MBh. Ka1v. &c. ; pl. (in Sa1m2khyā) N. of the elements Tattvas. ; n. confusion of mind Sarvad.

<http://spokensanskrit.de/>: at a loss about, not to be ascertained, confounding, foolish, uncertain or at a loss about, gone astray or adrift, uncertain about, out of the right place, silly, indistinct, confused, perplexing, wrong, indolent, perplexed, swooned, driven out of its course, simple [dull-witted], stupefied, not clear, bewildered, idiotic.

<http://dictionary.buddhistdoor.com/chi/word/256041/m%C5%AB%E1%B8%8Dha%E1%B8%A5>: 癡者 (imbecile / sentimental / stupid / foolish / silly), 呆子 (fool / sucker); tib. glen pa

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 19th, 2015 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Brev said:

Ah, I see. Isn't it possible that the wonder that Patrul Rinpoche referred to is an awareness beyond concepts that induces wonder?

Astus wrote:

It is an awareness without concepts. Just like when you are frightened by something, there is a moment of strong/bright awareness without being busy with ideas. Or when you are amazed by some fine piece of art or natural phenomenon. But perhaps Malcolm is willing to elaborate.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 19th, 2015 at 5:17 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

smcj said:

Those definitions seem to support my post.

Astus wrote:

It is used in the context of directly accessing non-conceptuality. It is mistaking a vacant mind as the realisation of emptiness.

So, Patrul Rinpoche writes that when the mind is shocked, there is a mind without concepts, and that is the insight into suchness. And there is another approach, looking at the gap between thoughts, as for instance Dudjom Rinpoche taught:

"In the gap between the last thought's cessation and the next's arising, isn't there a fresh, present knowing that has not been modified even in the slightest—luminous, naked awareness? That itself is awareness's abiding state!" (Wisdom Nectar, p 49)

I think that is the approach Kamalashila criticises.

However, Dzogchen does not stop at that point, and it moves on to integrating movement and appearances in general into the view of the natural state, that way learning gradually that phenomena are not to be grasped, because they are the display of that pristine awareness. Thus it is not enough to have an experience of mind without concepts, but one needs to diligently apply the teaching that experiences arise and dissolve, in other words: self-liberate; or in traditional terminology: they are impermanent. At this point we arrive at the very basis of vipasyana as it's been taught since the Nikayas.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 19th, 2015 at 6:45 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm said:

All that was said was that Dzogchen is not a path of analysis and that Kamalashila's objections were rejected.

Astus wrote:

When I wrote "the very basis of vipasyana as it's been taught since the Nikayas", I meant that it teaches the primary form of analysis. True, not like going through all the arguments of one-many, cause-effect, production-extinction, etc., however, those are not used with mind-only either that Kamalashila also writes about.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 20th, 2015 at 6:19 PM

Title: Re: The Nature of Buddhahood

Content:

Astus wrote:

Turning buddhas into gods creates a large number of theological problems that are not particularly addressed in any meaningful manner. That is because while on the surface people pray to Guanyin for health, wealth, good weather and such, for those who look for a deeper meaning she becomes the heroine of compassion and wisdom to emulate, and ultimately a manifestation of the nature of mind.

"the Tathagata isn't concerned with whether all the cosmos or half of it or a third of it will be led to release by means of that [Dhamma]. But he does know this: 'All those who have been led, are being led, or will be led [to release] from the cosmos have done so, are doing so, or will do so after having abandoned the five hindrances — those defilements of awareness that weaken discernment — having well-established their minds in the four frames of reference, and having developed, as they have come to be, the seven factors for Awakening."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an10/an10.095.than.html>)

"There is a great castle, which has only one gate. Many people come and go, and pass through it, without hindrance. And no one destroys it and takes it away. That is how matters stand."

(Nirvana Sutra, ch 36, tr Yamamoto)

Some works on buddhahood:

<https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/buddha-omniscience.pdf>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=50pEORtu4jQC>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=1vGzvLkYs2MC>

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=uNiW2YElyQYC>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 21st, 2015 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: The Nature of Buddhahood

Content:

smcj said:

it creates problems for us because anything that even remotely reminds us of Christianity sends us into hysterics.

Astus wrote:

I meant theological/philosophical problems, not general materialist antipathy towards spiritual entities. Buddhism is polytheist, but gods are not the saviours of humanity, nor do they really care about them. Also, they are neither omnipotent nor omniscient. A pantheon of powerful benevolent deities who are supposed to help all beings is fine as long as one does not question the various inconsistencies. Since even buddhas are unable to make the slightest change in beings' karma, it's all up to each individual to correct their errors and attain liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 21st, 2015 at 5:13 PM

Title: Re: The Nature of Buddhahood

Content:

smcj said:

That depends on what you mean by "savior". Do you think they have not soteriological function? Plus you've just dismissed a whole lot of literature about the compassion of Chenrezig, etc.

Astus wrote:

Is there any sutra or even some school of Buddhism where they say that a buddha or a bodhisattva can actually put a being into nirvana? I have not yet to see one. Although when I write gods I mean gods, not buddhas. Chenrezig is not a god.

smcj said:

But I don't have a problem with the idea of an omniscient Sambhogakaya or Dharmakaya. Do you?

Astus wrote:

If omniscient is understood as literally knowing everything, then yes, there are problems with that. To begin with, it is in conflict with choice, i.e. the classic philosophical problem of fate/predetermination vs. free will. Also, <http://metta.lk/tipitaka/2Sutta-Pitaka/2Majjhima-Nikaya/Majjhima2/076-sandaka-e1.html> contains a number of objections against people claiming omniscience.

smcj said:
Such as....?

Astus wrote:
First and foremost, that there is no clear manifestation of superhuman beings interfering with humans. While innumerable sects and religions claim that it is their god/s doing this and that, none can put forth anything beyond unfounded claims.

smcj said:
If so, then why are all my teachers telling me to do 111,111 Vajrasattva mantras?

Astus wrote:
You do the practice, not Vajrasattva. And there is a nice term in Buddhism for that: skilful means.

smcj said:
Their intention and efficacy is to transform the sentient being into an enlightened being. The sentient being must choose to practice. In the Vajrayana deity practice it is a joint effort, there is a lot more "oomph" to it. Think of it like the difference between an acoustic guitar and an electric guitar. The amplification is coming from somewhere other than the willpower of the guitarist.

Astus wrote:
If buddhas cannot modify beings' minds they cannot make them enlightened or even bring closer to them directly. That does not mean there can be no interaction, it only excludes one's karma being in any way modified by external forces. So, Amitabha cannot put beings into Sukhavati, beings have to establish the required conditions in their minds in order to gain birth there. Same with other buddha-lands.

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, September 21st, 2015 at 5:22 PM
Title: Re: The Nature of Buddhahood
Content:
pothigai said:
How do they benefit beings then?

Astus wrote:
In terms of liberation, gods (Indra, Brahma, etc.) are mostly useless. Nevertheless, just like one person may build a bridge that others use, it is not impossible for gods to be of some assistance. In a similar way, bodhisattvas and buddhas can provide help using numerous means. But in the end it's up to each and every person to develop the factors of enlightenment and attain bodhi.

On the other hand, if one understands that whatever one experiences depends on one's karma - mental conditioning - it becomes clear that even what appears the work of buddhas or maras are only one's own concepts. At the same time, because those are one's own concepts, they are the works of buddhas or maras.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 21st, 2015 at 6:52 PM

Title: Re: The Nature of Buddhahood

Content:

pothigai said:

I meant, how do Buddhas/Bodhisattvas benefit beings?

Astus wrote:

It is through giving that bodhisattvas and buddhas benefit beings. There are three kinds of giving (dana paramita): material objects, reverence, Dharma.

(http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/N6P_excerpts/N6P_X-Bk4_X-03.pdf)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 21st, 2015 at 11:06 PM

Title: Re: The Nature of Buddhahood

Content:

smcj said:

I am doing the practice. Vajrasattva is doing the purifying. Otherwise I might as well be visualizing Mickey Mouse and chanting M-I-C-K-E-Y-M-O-U-S-E, because there actually is no Vajrasattva doing the cleansing of my karma, right? Mickey too would be just as much "skillful means" as anything else, right?

Astus wrote:

It all depends on one's beliefs. A buddha can't do anything unless one has faith, but a dog's tooth (nb. a dog is traditionally a very lowly animal) can bring immense blessings if one is devoted enough. Apparently the object is irrelevant.

"If you have no faith and devotion at all, you will get absolutely nothing. Without faith, even meeting the Buddha himself and being accepted as his disciple would be quite useless, as it was for the monk Sunaksatra ... and for the Buddha's cousin, Devadatta.

...

When one has confident faith, the Buddha's compassion can be present in anything. This is illustrated by the tale of the faithful old woman who was helped towards Buddhahood by a dog's tooth."

(Patrul Rinpoche: The Words of My Perfect Teacher, p 173)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 22nd, 2015 at 4:14 AM

Title: Re: The Nature of Buddhahood

Content:

Astus wrote:

The object is irrelevant in determining the efficacy, because what matters is devotion. At the same time, devotion is conditioned normally by how an object is perceived. There is the common metaphor of a child in a temple who knows nothing about the various buddhas, bodhisattvas and deities, but is simply awed by the colourful pictures and statues. But once one learns things like who is Vajrasattva, who is Chenrezig, who is Padmasambhava, then those exist within a net of associated attributes, just like other objects of the world. Similarly, while most people know nothing about John of Nepomuk or Gerard Sagredo, to others they are not only people of the past but also active spiritual entities they can interact with. However, while Guanyin and Mary may share some attributes outwardly, they exist in very different contexts and represent different values, therefore, religious practices involving one or the other strengthen distinct mental qualities.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 22nd, 2015 at 5:11 PM

Title: Re: The Nature of Buddhahood

Content:

smcj said:

He certainly created an unnecessary hornet's nest by banning one particular practice, which according to you is completely irrelevant.

Astus wrote:

Irrelevant in terms of efficacy. Not irrelevant in what things symbolise and people associate them with.

smcj said:

you might actually be saying that there is no "source of Refuge" in couched terms.

Astus wrote:

People take refuge in all sorts of things and beings. What makes the Triple Jewel special is that it leads to freedom from all forms of reliance, in other words, refuges. If there were an ultimate refuge it would mean a permanent thing/being.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 23rd, 2015 at 4:41 PM

Title: Re: The Nature of Buddhahood

Content:

BrianG said:

The blessings are dependent on one's devotion. It is difficult to develop devotion towards an ordinary dog's tooth. The reason it brought blessings in the story is because someone thought that it was a relic of the Buddha.

Astus wrote:

Exactly as you say. It is one's perception (judgement) of the object that made it something to be devoted to and worshipped. I did not say that ordinary objects are themselves inspirational, quite the opposite. That's why there is Vajrasattva practice and no Mickey Mouse puja. Although it could be said that Mickey has probably more followers/devotees than Vajrasattva, it's just that the philosophies involved are different.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 23rd, 2015 at 5:28 PM

Title: Re: How dedication works?

Content:

Fortyeightvows said:

dedication is watering the seeds on the alaya. there are no 'all beings' and no merit. so in other words: yes

Astus wrote:

The storehouse-consciousness (alayavijnana) is individual and not universal.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 24th, 2015 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: How dedication works?

Content:

Fortyeightvows said:

of course it is individual and not universal... but other beings and their suffering is coming from our mind. without the seeds for suffering we would not even see suffering or hear suffering.

Astus wrote:

If that were so, buddhas could not know about beings who suffer.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 24th, 2015 at 4:35 PM

Title: Re: How dedication works?

Content:

kirtu said:

And in fact there are schools that assert that Buddhas do not see the suffering of sentient beings.

Astus wrote:

Since the earliest scriptures it is taught that a buddha knows his own past lives and sees the way beings are reborn according to their karma. Not seeing that beings suffer would mean being oblivious to their karma. Also, it seems clear from the stories of Shakyamuni that he was very much aware of the mental conditions beings are in. It might be said that dharmakaya and sambhogakaya are not in contact with ordinary beings, but not the nirmanakaya.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 25th, 2015 at 6:52 PM

Title: Re: Creation through perception in Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Short answer: no.

Although Buddhism teaches that ignorance distorts one's sense of reality, it primarily refers to the assumption of a permanent self, because based on that one grasps at experiences and thus generates dissatisfaction. Removing that ignorance does not mean the collapse/disappearance of the world but the liberation from suffering. Although one being may attain liberation, it does not mean everyone else becomes free at the same time. Thus the Buddha taught the path to nirvana to others.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 25th, 2015 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: Creation through perception in Buddhism?

Content:

Oriander said:

So, how I must to understand the diamond sutra?

Astus wrote:

Regarding appearances as illusory means not assuming a substance within them, or a substrate behind them. In other words, one has experiences, but there is no solid self to experience them. From one moment to another there are instances of consciousness, but no enduring, unchanging mind to be aware of them. Seeing that experiences are without substance and without a solid experiencer, there is nothing left to be attached to. Again, in different terms, one calls things this and that, but those names are just names, they don't represent or address anything solid. Therefore one should know that concepts are without any ultimate reality and they are used only according to conventions.

Here is the origin of that stanza, with the Buddha's explanation:

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.095.than.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 25th, 2015 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: Creation through perception in Buddhism?

Content:

Oriander said:

My understanding about yogacara is correct?

Astus wrote:

Not really.

What Yogacara describes as the teaching of mind only (cittamatra) or cognition only (vijñaptimatra) means that what we experience is given meaning within a mental framework that projects identity and substance, setting up both subject and object. This conceptual framework of defining experiences is habitually maintained from moment to moment and from life to life, as one bases one's actions on one's judgements about one's perceptions, and those perceptions are interpreted according to the mental framework that conceives them. Thus there is a continual feedback between framework - perception - action, establishing habits. As long as one is unaware of this process, one keeps following those habits. The realisation that appearances are cognition only means that one understands how one's concepts about oneself and the world are unfounded, and that they are the products of one's own mind, thus there is no more reason to cling to the conceptual framework as if it were real.

As you can see, it is not about setting up some universal mind or a solipsist metaphysics. It is the point out the processes going on in one's mind in order to attain enlightenment.

Recommended readings:

<http://www.acmuller.net/yogacara/articles/intro.html>

<http://online.sfsu.edu/rone/Buddhism/Yogacara/basicideas.htm>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 2:10 AM

Title: Re: 11th Tantric Vow and Shikantaza?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Emptiness is the ultimate reality. Shikantaza is embodying prajnaparamita. It does meet the requirement to be called "meditating on voidness", unless what is meant in that samaya is some "let's give some thoughts to the general concept of the lack of substance".

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 6:54 AM

Title: Re: Creation through perception in Buddhism?

Content:

Oriander said:

Thank you. Please, could you evaluate this 25-years experienced buddhist monk? What he say about? He say about 65 frames/seeds per moment - they create whole world.

Astus wrote:

Besides what DGA mentioned, what he seems to say there is just the general teaching of momentariness mixed with the Yogacara teaching of seeds. However, what is metaphorically called a seed is not just anything but habitual impressions stored in the mind. It is not just any activity, but things that one is conditioned to and thus conditioned by. It can also be added that this is not simply memory or knowing a skill, but what is primarily referred to are karmic attachments, that is, those charged with emotional values that can be simply summed up as things we like and things we dislike.

Here is an example for how habitual conditioning (seeds) affects our perception:

"This is also exemplified by a particular beautiful physical form. When a lustful person looks at it, he takes it to be pure and marvelous and so his mind develops a defiling attachment. When a person who practices the contemplation of impurity looks at it, he perceives all manner of disgusting discharges and finds that there is not a single part of it that is pure. When one who is also a woman looks at it, she may be jealous and hateful to the point where she is filled with disgust, cannot bear to look upon it, and is of the opinion that it is impure. The lustful person contemplates this same thing and regards it as pleasurable. The jealous person contemplates this and takes it as a cause of bitterness. The yogin contemplates this and gains the Path. A person with no particular interest contemplates this and finds nothing either attractive or repellent in it. It is the same for him as looking at earth or trees."

(http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/N6P_excerpts/N6P_X-Bk4_X-03.pdf)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: Creation through perception in Buddhism?

Content:

Fortyeightvows said:

Sixty five seeds per second is a traditional teaching

Astus wrote:

In what tradition? What treatise?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 27th, 2015 at 5:43 PM

Title: Re: Niu-T'ou Fa-Jung & Oxhead School of Ch'an

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is no English language study devoted mainly to the Niutou school, only bits and pieces in other works. For instance: Robert Sharf: Coming to Terms with Chinese Buddhism, p 39-51.

"By far the most cited Chan master was Niutou Farong, who is cited a total of thirty-three times (including fifteen times as Rong Dashi; and six times each to Niutou Farong's Notes to the Vimalakīrti and Huayan sūtras). If we add the nine references to the work of Niutou Farong's disciple Niutou Foku (Wusheng yi), over 10 percent of all references to Chan faction masters (not including the generic references to Gude, Xiande, etc.) in the Zongjing lu are associated with the Niutou lineage. The appearance of the Niutou faction in the Zongjing lu is attributable to the strong presence of Niutou lineage masters, like Foku*, on Mt. Tiantai."

*Foku: "Foku established the Foku Chan Cloister 佛窟禪院 on Mt. Tiantai, and Foku's senior disciple, Yunju Puzhi 雲居普智, propagated Niutou teaching from the Yunju Cloister 雲居院, revived through the efforts of Deshao."

(Conception of Chan in the Zongjinglu, p 116-117; p297n9)

"fascicle 4 of the Chuandeng lu devotes considerable attention to the collateral Niutou (Oxhead) lineage descended from Daoxin. The Niutou lineage is charted through six generations: Niutou Farong, Zhiyan, Huifang, Fachi, Zhiwei, and Huizhong.

In total, the names of seventy-six masters are mentioned in association with the Niutou faction, seventeen with records included."

(Monks, Rulers, and Literati, p 129)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 27th, 2015 at 6:02 PM

Title: Re: Pyrokinesis, demonstration. Siddhi in Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

If you are looking for practices to attain powers, look into the Visuddhimagga, ch 12-13 (<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/authors/nanamoli/PathofPurification2011.pdf>).

As a side note, looking for powers can come from insecurity. It is natural that beings want to take control and feel certainty. However, it is also a reason for suffering and feeling dissatisfied. Things change and we cannot manipulate them as we wish to, as everything depends on numerous causes and conditions. Even what we call our thoughts, feelings and body are often beyond our control. To contemplate this is how to gain insight into the true nature of the way things are.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 29th, 2015 at 3:31 AM

Title: Re: Care to critique this notion for me?

Content:

Brev said:

I've long thought that virtually any explanation for existence is nonsense because most fail to be ultimate explanations and hence are themselves unexplained.

Astus wrote:

That's a fine beginning of building up some philosophical system, but it's not relevant to Buddhism. In what way does it relate to the four noble truths, to bodhicitta?

Brev said:

And our mindstream is a dependently designated fiber running through this ocean or static of awareness that only exists in a particular way once it is designated so.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean here that mind-stream exists within a larger mind? That would be a pointless supposition of a larger mind.

Brev said:

the natural way to stop the endless circling is to purify our karma and cultivate the roots of virtue.

Astus wrote:

Cultivating virtue is good, but does not end rebirth.

Brev said:

the only way to permanently free our mindstream from cycling through the various realms of minds is to undo our ignorance of the actual manner in which we exist, i.e. to perceive emptiness.

Astus wrote:

The mind-stream is what is generally called mind, there are no two minds for one being. Perceiving emptiness is realising the emptiness of the mind, that it is without any basis or substance. It is just a stream of experiences that are themselves nothing solid or reliable.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 29th, 2015 at 5:35 AM

Title: Re: Care to critique this notion for me?

Content:

Brev said:

I meant that the mind-stream is within the basic space of phenomena.

Astus wrote:

Phenomena are what occur as the mind-stream, instances of experiences that make up a series, i.e. the mind-stream.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 29th, 2015 at 6:11 AM

Title: Re: Care to critique this notion for me?

Content:

Matt J said:

There's a thought experiment about a color theorist who lives in a (literally) black and white world. The walls are black, her clothes are white, and so on. She learns everything there is no know about color: the physics, the science, how it is used in language and poetry. But this doesn't really tell her what color is even like.

Astus wrote:

Blue Cliff Record, case 88:

Hsuan Sha, teaching the community, said, "The old adepts everywhere all speak of guiding and aiding living beings. Supposing they encountered three kinds of sick person, how would they guide them? With a blind person, they could pick up the gavel or raise the whisk, but he wouldn't see. With a deaf person, he wouldn't hear the point of words. With a mute person, if they had him speak, he wouldn't be able to speak. But how would they guide such people? If they couldn't guide these people, then the Buddha Dharma has no effect."

A monk asked Yun Men for instruction on this. Yun Men said, "Bow." The monk bowed and rose. Yun Men poked at him with his staff; the monk drew back. Yun Men said, "You're not blind." Then Yun Men called him closer; when the monk approached, Men said, "You're not deaf." Next Yun Men said, "Do you understand?" The monk said, "I don't understand." Yun Men said, "You're not mute." At this the monk had an insight.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 29th, 2015 at 5:42 PM

Title: Re: Anti-semitism at DW

Content:

Astus wrote:

Read through the thread. Still no sign or citation of anti-semitism present on DW.

As some may notice, I live in Budapest (one of its nicknames, coming from far-right people but embraced by some Jews: Judapest). I generally recognise anti-semitic statements and attitudes when I see them, although how it happens in other countries/cultures might be different. As why there are still those who have a general negative attitude towards Jews, it's a cultural heritage. It's now moved to the level of myth, at least in my region of the world where Jews are mostly invisible (no special robes, hats, etc., and even if one or two wears them, nobody recognises them to be Jews). At the same time, Muslims are fairly visible, especially women, so nationalist people do have a group of people to recognise as the enemy, they're easy targets.

Still, as mentioned before, presence of anti-semitism at DW has not yet been demonstrated.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 5:42 AM

Title: Re: Care to critique this notion for me?

Content:

Brev said:

Would it be correct to say that the mindstream is an illusion, there being no arising, and each moment of experience is an expression of the Dharmadhatu?

Astus wrote:

Arising, duration and cessation are concepts. Even a mind-stream is just a concept. Nevertheless, it is a useful description. As for "expression of the Dharmadhatu", no. The mind-stream is the Dharmadhatu.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Care to critique this notion for me?

Content:

Brev said:

The mindstream is a useful concept, absolutely. Does that contradict it being illusory? We ordinary beings don't recognize it as an illusion, but it is, right?

Astus wrote:

What do you mean by illusion? If you mean that it's without a permanent substance, then yes, it is illusory.

Brev said:

And a single moment in the mindstream is the Dharmadhatu in the sense that each phenomenon reflects all others, but an individual recognizes in that moment phenomena in an obscured way and not the Dharmadhatu proper, right?

Astus wrote:

The dharmadhatu is the ultimate nature. That phenomena are empty, that is called the ultimate truth. There is no emptiness outside of phenomena. Phenomena themselves are empty. Whether one realises that or not is a different matter.

Brev said:

Doesn't one only recognize it upon enlightenment? Do you mean that the mindstream is the Dharmadhatu in that the true nature of experience is the emptiness of phenomena?

Astus wrote:

Yes, experience itself is empty. It cannot be anything else.

Brev said:

Or that one inevitably attains enlightenment, upon which omniscience is achieved and the Dharmadhatu is recognized and hence the mindstream itself really is at that point the Dharmadhatu proper?

Astus wrote:

Enlightenment is not inevitable unless one is already on the path.

In the Huayan school they talk of https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Four_Dharmadh%C4%81tu.

1. discrete objects (excluding emptiness - 'this is a vase')
2. emptiness (excluding objects - 'there is no vase')
3. mixing of objects and emptiness (but still thought of as two sides - 'conventionally vase, ultimately no vase')
4. non-obstruction of objects (single reality of suchness - 'a vase is just a vase')

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 1st, 2015 at 5:52 PM

Title: Is Zen Mindfulness?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"zazen is just to become present in the process of zazen itself ... Whatever happens, all we have to do is to be constantly present right in the middle of the process of zazen. This is the beginning and also the end. You can do it; it is open to all people, whoever they are. This is shikantaza." (<https://naturalmind.wordpress.com/2009/03/13/to-live-is-just-to-live/>)

"Mindfulness meditation is unique in that it is not directed toward getting us to be different from how we already are. Instead, it helps us become aware of what is already true moment by moment. We could say that it teaches us how to be unconditionally present; that is, it helps us be present with whatever is happening, no matter what it is." (<https://www.psychologytoday.com/blog/the-courage-be-present/201001/how-practice-mindfulness-meditation>)

"Mindfulness is meeting the moment as it is, moment after moment after moment, wordlessly attending to our experiencing as it actually is. It is opening to not just the fragments of our lives that we like or dislike or view as important, but the whole of our experiencing. ... It is the active recognition that any perceptions you have of "you" are just details rising and falling within countless other details, shifting and changing moment after moment. Mindfulness means please, please, please shut up and pay attention to this life as it really is, opening attention again and again through remembrance to some aspect of present experience in order to open past that to the context in which experiences rise and fall as such." (<http://wwzc.org/dharma-text/meaning-mindfulness>)

What difference is there between the ever more popular mindfulness practice and zazen? Or are they actually the same?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 1st, 2015 at 7:47 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen Mindfulness?

Content:

DGA said:

conflates Zen, a Mahayana Buddhist tradition, with Zazen, which is a meditation practice that is characteristic of Zen Buddhism.

Astus wrote:

In a sense, yes. Although, as you can see in my signature, I'm not really convinced by the popular view that meditation is a central thing, nevertheless, it is regarded as such, sometimes to the exclusion of everything else.

"In Zen, the emphasis is on zazen. Whether we are talking about Soto school or Rinzai school, whether we are dealing with koan introspection or silent illumination, the cornerstone of Zen is zazen." (<http://www.mro.org/mr/archive/18-4/articles/stillpt.htm>)

And there is Dogen's view how Zen is really just zazen: "Nowadays, dropping the word "za," they talk of just the Zen sect. This interpretation is clear from records of the patriarchs." (Bendowa, SBGZ, v 1, p 11, BDK Edition)

DGA said:

Are those objectives the same or different?

Astus wrote:

Both mindfulness and zazen are described as practising without specific goals. Although the larger context can be different, here the topic is what happens during meditation.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 2nd, 2015 at 6:13 AM

Title: Re: Is Zen Mindfulness?

Content:

Bakmoon said:

Could someone explain in plain English for me how these types of meditation are practiced?

Astus wrote:

"If the body is motionless, it won't create a heavy flow of physical sensations that stir up big waves. even though we may have some discomfort, or itches, or runny noses, it is worthwhile to relate openly to these in sitting, and not shift, or scratch, or sniffle as we otherwise might. To relate openly means to take each experience as just itself, neither clinging to our opinions or feelings about it, nor trying to avoid it. ... in zazen we sit as still as we can, maintaining stillness even in the eyes, regardless of the sensation that arise. We are simply aware of and accepting of what comes up, just as it is - without running away from it or clinging to it. This is what sitting is."
(Zen Meditation in Plain English, ebook p 65)

"Do not concentrate on any particular object or control your thought. When you maintain a proper posture and your breathing settles down, your mind will naturally become tranquil. When various thoughts arise in your mind, do not become caught up by them or struggle with them; neither pursue nor try to escape from them. Just leave thoughts alone, allowing them to come up and go away freely. The essential thing in doing zazen is to awaken (kakusoku) from distraction and dullness, and return to the right posture moment by moment."

(<http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/practice/zazen/howto/index.html>)

"Noise, light and darkness, ache, pain, drowsiness, heat and cold, hunger, worry, past, future, fantasising and associating, leave them as they are."

(<http://www.enryouji.net/zazen.html>)

"Keep your lower abdomen relaxed. Do not think of "good" or "evil." When a thought arises be aware of it; as soon as you are aware of it, it will disappear. If for long periods you forget all ties, you will naturally become One. These are the essential techniques of zazen."

(<http://zen.rinnou.net/zazen/sitting.html>)

"In zazen we simply allow any thought, feeling or emotion to come up and then we simply let them go away; we actually do nothing. In sitting, any thought or condition of mind is like a cloud in the sky. Somehow clouds appear in the sky, changing form as they stay for a while, and then they disappear. Similar to clouds in the sky, any thought that appears in zazen simply stays for a while and then disappears."

(<http://antaiji.org/dharma/okumura-mind-and-zazen/?lang=en>)

"The state in Zazen is without intention and is different from thinking. This statement sounds strange as we normally believe that we are always thinking. We avoid intentionally following a train of thought during Zazen by concentrating on maintaining the posture. Of course spontaneous thoughts and images arise in our consciousness during Zazen, but they are not important. When we notice that we are thinking about something, we should simply stop. If we correct our posture, the thought or perception will disappear and our consciousness will slowly become clear and we will feel peaceful. In this peaceful and balanced state, we are in the state that is "different from thinking.""

(Introduction to Buddhism and the Practice of Zazen, <http://www.dogensangha.org.uk/IBPZ/IBPZ-English.pdf>)

Now compare those to the following instructions on mindfulness practice:

"The key is not to stop the thoughts, but to acknowledge them. They'll float away on their own. And then the many benefits of mindfulness practice — from reduced anxiety and heart rate to increased memory and awareness — can start to follow."

(<http://www.businessinsider.com/how-to-practice-mindfulness-meditation-2015-4>)

"Mindfulness is the energy of being aware and awake to the present moment. It is the continuous practice of touching life deeply in every moment of daily life. To be mindful is to be truly alive, present and at one with those around you and with what you are doing."

(<http://plumvillage.org/mindfulness-practice/>)

"Mindfulness means maintaining a moment-by-moment awareness of our thoughts, feelings, bodily sensations, and surrounding environment.

Mindfulness also involves acceptance, meaning that we pay attention to our thoughts and feelings without judging them—without believing, for instance, that there's a "right" or "wrong" way to think or feel in a given moment. When we practice mindfulness, our thoughts tune into what we're sensing in the present moment rather than rehashing the past or imagining the future."

(<http://greatergood.berkeley.edu/topic/mindfulness/definition>)

"So what is mindfulness, and how does it work? Unlike mantra meditation, which involves focusing concentration on a particular word or sound, mindfulness aims to achieve a relaxed, non-judgmental awareness of your thoughts, feelings and sensations ... direct knowing of what is going on inside and outside ourselves, moment by moment"

(<https://www.theguardian.com/lifeandstyle/shortcuts/2014/jan/07/mindfulness-beginners-guide-meditation-technique-treatment-depression>)

"Start this activity with mindfulness of the breath. Allow yourself to notice any thoughts that come into your head as you are aware of your breathing. Notice, pay attention to and accept these thoughts, without judgment. Thoughts are not bad or good, positive or negative, they just are what they are – the thought that you happen to be having at this particular moment. You may become aware that you are having difficulty thinking about your thoughts – so think about that. You may be thinking: "I can't do this very well." Well, that's a thought too. Allow yourself to think about that. Some people like the metaphor of allowing the thoughts to just float like leaves on a stream, or clouds in a sky, noticing each passing thought and then the one that comes after it, and then the one that comes after that. A Buddhist idea is to think of thoughts as pages written on water. You may notice that just at the moment you become aware of a thought, it passes and is replaced by another thought. That's what happens – thoughts come, and they go. Finally, bring yourself back to awareness of the breath."

(<http://www.livingwell.org.au/wp-content/uploads/2012/11/8-MindfulnessofThoughts.pdf>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 2nd, 2015 at 6:26 AM

Title: Re: Is Zen Mindfulness?

Content:

DGA said:

when does meditation start or stop? Does Zazen begin or end? Does mindfulness? is meditation even comprehensible without considering the frame in which it is presented and practiced?

Astus wrote:

Meditation starts when one consciously beings to apply the given instructions, and stops when one stops applying them. Same goes for zazen, unless one is a buddha. Mindfulness as well has a beginning and end, since it is a method consciously used.

Meditation is comprehensible as a mental exercise. It is also an important element, since it is believed to bring about certain results, exactly because of what and how is done as a meditation. Cause and effect. It should not matter what we believe outside of the meditation practice, if it is only what is practised during meditation that should generate the desired achievements.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 2nd, 2015 at 7:52 PM

Title: Re: Pyrokinesis, demonstration. Siddhi in Buddhism?

Content:

Jesse said:

So, even under the assumption they exist, it'd be a bad idea to make it public.

Astus wrote:

As ClearblueSky said, the numerous stories that are supposed to show that magical powers are real talk about public performances, starting with the accounts of the Buddha's miracles. So, if anyone thinks s/he possesses superpowers, please step forward and show it. Otherwise it's better to keep that claim confined to D&D sessions.

Regarding government use of magical powers, I recommend this fine study:

<https://books.google.com/books?id=9MbONFbWlmYC>, It contains accounts of Vajra-masters using mantras and deities in warfare.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 2nd, 2015 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen Mindfulness?

Content:

Dan74 said:

I guess Zen is a lot more like mind less ness than mind ful ness. Dropping the mind rather than filling it with non-existent objects.

Astus wrote:

Can you point out how that difference appears in practice?

"Even if it is understood that Zen practice is not physical or verbal, there still arises a question about the statement that Zen is not mental performance either."

and

"The various formal teachings and practices of Buddha are designed as expedients to guide people according to their individual needs and potentials. They are formulated to lead people into the realm of enlightenment and are applied to the state where unenlightenment and enlightenment have already been distinguished.

Zen, in contrast, aims for the fundamental state, which is prior to this distinction.

Therefore it does not admit of practices based on an existing dualism but points directly to the primordial unity underlying fabricated dualities. As the third patriarch of Zen said,

"It is a mistake to apply the mind to the mind." The abstruse teaching of Zen is to "neither strive nor neglect."

(Musō Kokushi – Dream Conversations on Buddhism and Zen)

And there is this essay:

http://buddhiststudies.berkeley.edu/people/faculty/sharf/documents/Sharf_Mindfulness%20and%20Mindlessness.pdf

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 3rd, 2015 at 6:16 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen Mindfulness?

Content:

Dan74 said:

Dropping the mind, as far as I can tell, is the recognition of emptiness of all phenomena, so we don't 'take them up' as real, as an 'object', with ourselves as 'the subject'.

Recognising it all as empty, both subject and object dissolve and in practice this is no-thought, just responding to causes and conditions as they arise and not making anything.

Mindfulness, on the other hand, is cultivating attention to objects, external and internal and not necessarily seeing into their empty nature. Mindfulness doesn't imply insight and liberation, though of course it is very helpful, even necessary, for both.

Astus wrote:

So the difference is like this:

mindfulness: being aware of the present experiences without judging them - one has to actively focus on the moment, avoids falling into daydreaming about past and future zazen: not holding on to whatever experience presents itself - there is nothing to do with anything, avoids creating streams of thoughts (thinking) or blocking thoughts (not thinking)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 3rd, 2015 at 6:39 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen Mindfulness?

Content:

Bakmoon said:

When one practices Zen meditation in this way, when objects arise to the mind, what does it mean that they are left alone? In mindfulness practice, this would mean that the object is simply observed but not altered or pushed away or drawn in. It is passive in the sense that the meditator doesn't try to change or push away the object, but at the same time, one is actively watching and being aware of the object. Is this the same in Zen?

Astus wrote:

To leave things as they are means not meddling, not manipulating. You don't even observe things, as that would be an attempt to make something. So, for instance, when you sit at home, you hear people talking from outside. There is no need to actively turn to it, listen to it, as you already hear them. When you turn to it, that is already adding something, grasping at an object. While if you feel disturbed by the noises - the feeling itself coming from grasping the noise - and you try to shut them out, that is rejecting.

There is also a way to learn leaving things alone through using an object to hold on to, and that is usually the process of breathing. When you concentrate on your breathing, although you can still see, hear, feel and think, you don't do anything with them. Here it is possible to avoid manipulating because one's attention is fixed on an object. But that's only a temporary method with limited use. It should be understood that no matter what you do, no matter how much you struggle, experiences still just come and go, they are without anything to keep or improve. So, even leaving things as they are is not something that needs practising or holding on to, simply because things are already as they are.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 3rd, 2015 at 7:06 PM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Serenity509 said:

It's interesting to see that both Shinran and Nichiren, despite their differences, see Amida as the Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Astus wrote:

In your quote: "they mistake the reflection of the moon on the water for the real moon shining in the sky" That is, for Nichiren Shakyamuni is the true buddha, others are reflections. While for Shinran it is Amida who's the true buddha and Shakyamuni is a manifestation.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 4th, 2015 at 7:25 PM

Title: Re: Pyrokinesis, demonstration. Siddhi in Buddhism?

Content:

BrianG said:

Siddhis are well within the realm of what is natural, from the viewpoint of Buddhism. From the point of view of Charvaka's like James Randi, the mind is "supernatural".

Astus wrote:

They are natural if that nature is within the realm of personal experience, i.e. subjective. From that comes that it does not appear as anything objective, thus not measurable through scientific methods. It also means that those who claim to be able to perform magical feats within the realm of what is commonly called the physical world are necessarily frauds.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 4th, 2015 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: How to eliminate self-cherishing?

Content:

Astus wrote:

One must see things as they are, dependently originated without a single essence. Agnosticism or verbal repetition of "there is no self" are useless.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 4th, 2015 at 7:36 PM

Title: Re: Lack of inherent non-existence

Content:

Astus wrote:

When one thing cannot be established as real, many things cannot be established either, as many means several ones. Thus dependent origination is only a conventional expression, without existence or non-existence.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 5th, 2015 at 4:52 AM

Title: Re: Lack of inherent non-existence

Content:

Brev said:

I seem to have misinterpreted Madhyamaka, thinking it implies universal conventional existence of sorts. Would it be more accurate to say that all dharmas are conceptual constructions but that any particular conceptual construction only exists if it has a basis of designation in experience?

Astus wrote:

Although some thinkers may involve himself in the areas of epistemology and some general analysis of conventional reality, Madhyamaka is primarily about relinquishing attachment to views and bringing about insight into emptiness. And that exists within the larger context of the bodhisattva path. At the same time, the path exists within the context of ordinary, conventional world.

As for the relationship between concepts and experience, actually neither of them are particularly reliable. Experiences in the six sensory areas are completely ungraspable, as they don't remain even for a moment. What we generally operate with are mental creations of stories of events, and so they are conceptual. Such conceptual constructs can include various values and judgements about what is true and what is false depending on various conditions. But debating those values does not generate liberation from attachment to concepts, thus not a topic for Madhyamaka analysis.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 5th, 2015 at 4:54 AM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Malcolm said:

It's all just a bunch of attachments to names and concepts...it is not very important.

Astus wrote:

What is?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 5th, 2015 at 5:16 AM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Malcolm said:

It's all just a bunch of attachments to names and concepts...it is not very important.

Astus wrote:

What is?

Malcolm said:

The meaning.

Astus wrote:

And what meaning is that here?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 6th, 2015 at 4:43 PM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Serenity509 said:

Since there are so many different sutras that appear to contradict each other on so many things, what should we do when the literal meaning of one sutra contradicts the literal meaning of another? One possibility is to compare and contrast divergent sutras, and then hopefully come to a middle ground between them.

Astus wrote:

The common rule: differentiate between figurative (neyartha) and literal (nitartha) statements.

"To know the categories of the scriptures,
Understand that sutras explaining other than the meaning of suchness,
Teach expedient truth, – these are to be interpreted,
While those explaining emptiness teach certain truth."
(Madhyamakavatara, 6.97)

There are also the so called

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=22185#p22185>.

<http://www.drbachinese.org/vbs/publish/321/vbs321p024.htm>:

If one accepts [only] one's own dharmas, honors [only] one's own dharma, and cultivates [only] one's own dharma, while refusing to accept or honor another's dharma, and while maintaining that [other's dharmas] are faulty, if one maintains that this is pure and has attained the benefit of the supreme meaning, then among all of them, there are none which are impure. How is this so? Because they all [exclusively] love their own dharma.

Question: If all views possess faults, then what is [the status] of the supreme-meaning siddhanta?

Reply: It goes beyond the path of all discourse. The locus of thought activity is extinct in it. Nowhere is there anything upon which it relies. It does not proclaim any dharma. The actual characteristic of all dharmas has no beginning, has no middle and has no end. It is inexhaustible and indestructible. This is what is meant by the "supreme-meaning siddhanta."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 6th, 2015 at 9:12 PM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra (Split)

Content:

DGA said:

importance of learning the Dharma from a capable teacher.

Astus wrote:

Who counts as a capable teacher depends on whom one likes. Thus both the best and the worst can gather a large community where both call the other incompetent. How to tell which one is correct? That's when one has to start learning from the Buddha himself by reading his words. And if that's not enough, there are numerous traditionally approved masters, like Nagarjuna, Aryadeva, Asanga and Vasubandhu to consult with. And if even that's not enough, there are quite a few generally reliable works by modern teachers, like the Dalai Lama, Thrangu Rinpoche, Thich Nhat Hanh, Hsing Yun, Sheng Yen, etc.

DGA said:

Buddha Dharma is described as an oral tradition to the present, even with all these texts available.

Astus wrote:

By whom? There are teachers, true. But hardly any of them could recite even just a few major Mahayana sutras, not to mention the whole canon of the Buddha's words.

Buddhism has been a scriptural tradition for over two millennia. It doesn't mean there are no explanations given orally, on the spot. But even the most important commentaries are textual.

DGA said:

What little understanding I have comes primarily from listening to teachers teach, and watching their example.

Astus wrote:

That can show how worthy teachers are important and beneficial. Or that you prefer to listen to people instead of reading. Or both. Or maybe neither.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 6th, 2015 at 9:46 PM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Malcolm said:

You are like a person who mistakes the leaves for the trunk, in this respect.

Buddhadharma has always been, and will always be, a tradition in which the meaning of the Dharma is communicated orally.

Astus wrote:

There are several cases where a tradition was revived/reformed/established based on scriptural materials. Recent cases include most of modern Theravada, the Soto Zen reform of Menzan Zuiho in Japan and the reforms of Taixu, Yinshun and others in China/Taiwan.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 6th, 2015 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Malcolm said:

Hearing, Astus, not reading...

Astus wrote:

Where is the difference?

"Since they maintain they have no need of written words, they should not speak either, because written words are merely the marks of spoken language. They also maintain that the direct way cannot be established by written words, and yet these two words, 'not established' are themselves written."

(<http://www.cttbusa.org/6patriarch/6patriarch20.asp>, ch 10, tr BTTS)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 6th, 2015 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

DGA said:

He didn't advocate for everyone to just read Dogen and avoid hearing the Dharma.

Astus wrote:

Neither did Dogen, nor do I. What I object against is the primacy of oral transmission, when the teachings are actually preserved in written form. Like for instance the teachings of Dogen that were generally forgotten but they have returned to the mainstream in their textual form.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 6th, 2015 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

PorkChop said:

Maybe I'm reading this wrong but this seems like a fairly bold statement that's almost certainly false.

Astus wrote:

Yes, there are smaller sutras and excerpts that are used for daily recitation. There are also some who focus on a single text (Lotus Sutra, Diamond Sutra) or a group of texts (the three Pure Land sutras). What is missing is the oral transmission of those sutras, not to mention the rest of the canon. On the other hand, the practice of copying texts is still preserved (e.g. <http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/practice/sutra/shakyo.html>).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 6th, 2015 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: If 5 skandha are empty, why would you need to save being

Content:

Astus wrote:

As long as there is this idea that there is someone to save someone else, it is paramount to do all the saving activities. Once it's clear that the aggregates are empty, there is nobody to save anyone.

Here the Bodhisattva, the great being, thinks thus: 'countless beings should I lead to Nirvana and yet there are none who lead to Nirvana, or who should be led to it.' However many beings he may lead to Nirvana, yet there is not any being that has been led to Nirvana, nor that had led others to it. For such is the true nature of dharmas, seeing that their nature is illusory. Just as if, Subhuti, a clever magician, or magician's apprentice, were to conjure up at the crossroads a great crowd of people, and then make them vanish again.

(PP8000, 1.4, tr Conze)

Gods: Beings that are like a magical illusion, are they not just an illusion?

Subhuti: Like a magical illusion are those beings, like a dream. For not two different things are magical illusion and beings, are dreams and beings. All objective facts also are like a magical illusion, like a dream. The various classes of saints, from Streamwinner to Buddhahood, also are like a magical illusion, like a dream. Gods: A fully enlightened Buddha also, you say, is like a magical illusions, is like a dream? Buddhahood also, you say, is like a magical illusion, is like a dream? Subhuti: Even Nirvana, I say, is like a magical illusion, is like a dream. How much more so anything else! Gods: Even Nirvana, Holy Subhuti, you say, is like an illusion, is like a dream? Subhuti: Even if perchance there could be anything more distinguished, of that too I would say that is like an illusion, like a dream. For not two different things are illusion and Nirvana, are dreams and Nirvana.

(PP8000, 2.3, tr Conze)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 6th, 2015 at 11:32 PM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

PorkChop said:

Since you bring up Pure Land, the Nembutsu has always been an oral tradition. It's always been passed on by a teacher.

Astus wrote:

Didn't Honen base his teachings on Shandao and other texts, without anyone transmitting anything orally?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Malcolm said:

But the Dharma has always been communicated through the medium of the voice, not the medium of the page, and even Huineng's awakening story bears this out.

Astus wrote:

Not sure what exactly you mean here. People have been studying the Dharma through texts for ages. Also, teachers have been teaching from texts for ages. Many have composed treatises and other written materials in order to preserve what they want to communicate. Textual communication has also been used for a long time now to disseminate the teachings, communicate it to those one has never met. And the process of translation has not even been addressed.

Malcolm said:

The oral transmission for all the Sūtras in the Tibetan Canon still exists and is given at regular intervals.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean the practice that someone reads out loud what is written? It's not exactly like when one person knows a teaching by heart and transmits it in a way that the other memorises it from hearing. But then perhaps the <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=NBDtAhLxpLQ> of the Great Prajnaparamita Sutra (大般若經轉讀) could be called oral transmission as well, even if they only shout the title and volume number of 600 fascicles of text.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 3:44 AM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra (Split)

Content:

PorkChop said:

Actually no. Honen's monk name on Hiei was "Genku". He was in the lineage of Genshin. The Nembutsu had already been transmitted via Tendai. Yes, Honen modified his understanding of the Nembutsu from the writings of ShanTai and from personal experience. This is also the reason for such a big deal made about the dream encounter Honen had with ShanTao.

Astus wrote:

If by that transmission you mean Honen must have heard people reciting the nenbutsu, then probably most East Asian Buddhists (and even non-Buddhists) are members of that lineage of buddha-remembrance. But it seems to me that Honen did not consider oral transmission reliable, since already in his life many misinterpreted his teachings, so he composed his <http://www.jsri.jp/English/Honen/WRITINGS/ichimai.html>. His <http://www.jsri.jp/English/Honen/WRITINGS/senchakushu.html> consists mostly of quotes from scriptures, similarly to the <http://shinranworks.com/the-major-expositions/>. I would be surprised if there were even one reference to some oral teaching he had personally received.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 3:04 PM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Malcolm said:

What I mean exactly is that meaning of the Dharma is always learned from a teacher, not a text. A text cannot convey even its own meaning. In order to learn the meaning of a text, one must have a teacher. And also the Dharma does not depend on texts. One does not need books and texts to communicate its essentials.

Books do not communicate, only people do. Books may support that communication, but they are entirely incapable of replacing human transmission of the Dharma from mouth to ear.

Astus wrote:

Words can be communicated both through voice and letters. What is the difference between you telling me the above words over the phone or over this board? The meaning is something I have to derive from the words in both cases, so it is not communicated in either way.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 3:51 PM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra (Split)

Content:

PorkChop said:

It's not the same thing as just having 'heard people reciting the nenbutsu' whatsoever.

Astus wrote:

Then what is it? Honen had his own unique interpretation of the Pure Land teachings and did not rely on Tendai doctrines for that, otherwise he would have remained a Tendai priest. He himself set up the differences between various interpretations of nenbutsu, and he did not establish a continuity with Tendai. What was then transmitted?

PorkChop said:

the Nembutsu is transmitted orally from teacher to student

Astus wrote:

How does that define the efficiency of the practice of nenbutsu? Are people who have no contact with Jodoshu priests excluded from following Honen? And I'm not asking if they can be considered members of the church, that's a different matter. If those with no connection to a recognised Jodoshu teacher can still attain birth according to the Jodoshu doctrine, what is the role of oral transmission besides maintaining a community?

Your quote from <https://bffct.org/bff/what-is-shin-buddhism/>: "Such an encounter can come through direct listening to that teacher, or through "listening" by hearing or reading the teacher's written words"

And from <http://web.mit.edu/stclair/www/OFUMI.html>: "it is evident [in the received texts]"

That is, listening can happen through spoken as well as written words, and Rennyo bases his statement on texts in a text.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 5:06 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism as type of agnosticism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

But I think it only applies to a minority.

Astus wrote:

I think it's the opposite. It's just that they don't show up on weekly pujas except when there is a rather famous teacher handing out Dharma-bites. It's similar to how most Christians don't regularly attend services, but if the Pope comes thousands show up, although probably many know very little of the doctrines of the church (not to mention following the commandments), and likely some are not even Catholics.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 10:02 PM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

DGA said:

He was part of a living culture. He was not a consumer.

Astus wrote:

Very true. It might as well be emphasised that he was a fully ordained monk. Plus he could read literary Chinese. And he was male. Those are all qualities that is true for almost every recognised teacher within East Asian Buddhism in the last 2000 years. But - understandably - the common requisites of leaving home and being male are not often brought up on the forum.

Since it's not been debated that whatever words that can be pronounced through the mouth can also be written down, there can be no difference made between the actual communication of the teachings through the two media. What may count are other factors that have not been mentioned. For instance, the teacher's ability to quickly adapt to the disciple's needs, respond to questions, explain difficult points in a way that is easily comprehensible, and other similar elements that make a living teacher beneficial in all sorts of studies.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 11:09 PM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

Caodemarte said:

Of course Chinul was a great scholar, thinker, and monk (not the reader of Internet forums like us). The point is that literally hearing the words was not necessary in his case. The other activities (years of meditation, study, etc.) were what helped prepare him.

Astus wrote:

You could add Wonhyo, Chengguan, Dushun, Jizang, Huisi and probably every Buddhist teacher who did not belong to a specific lineage, but rather studied the Dharma, listened to various people, contemplated the teachings, came to a realisation, then started to teach publicly and write some treatises.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, Chinul had a Seon master, Jonghwi of Sagulsan.

Astus wrote:

Jonghwi was his ordination master. Jinul gained realisation and developed his teachings on his own, particularly he introduced the huatou/hwadu method - propagated by Dahui Zonggao - to Korea without ever having visited China.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

Malcolm said:

Jonghwi was also a Seon master.

Astus wrote:

Apparently Jinul was not satisfied with the teachings provided by him or others, so he did not continue their tradition.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Malcolm said:

Words do not communicate, people communicate. ... The transmission of the Dharma does not lie in words themselves, it lies in the interaction between two people.

Astus wrote:

And what is the means of interaction between two people? Words.

Malcolm said:

Words cannot adapt with circumstances.

Astus wrote:

That's a matter of hermeneutics.

Malcolm said:

Words cannot estimate your level of understanding.

Astus wrote:

If there are levels of understanding - as defined in scriptures - then even teachers can only use that for reference. If there are no clear definitions, then it is arbitrary and unreliable.

Malcolm said:

Words cannot answer your questions.

Astus wrote:

How does a non-verbal question look like

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 8th, 2015 at 5:08 PM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Malcolm said:

Sūtras and tantras are not written documents. The written documents that record them are merely a shadow of verbal discourse that took place at some time. The meaning of those documents is not contained within the documents.

Astus wrote:

Either you say that the texts are incomplete - in which case you'd need to be in possession of some original audio record - or you claim that words as voice are significantly different from words as letters - in which case you either imply meta-communication or something else that I hope you can demonstrate. If meaning exists outside of the means of communication, it cannot be communicated, so even a living teacher is of no use. Finally, if meaning cannot be derived from scriptures, the whole literary corpus of mankind is literally meaningless, so it is truly a miracle that such a pointless method has been in use for such a long time.

"If, Mahamati, meaning is different from words, it will not be made manifest by means of words; but meaning is entered into by words as things [are revealed] by a lamp. It is, Mahamati, like a man carrying a lamp to look after his property. [By means of this light] he can say: This is my property and so is kept in this place. Just so, Mahamati, by means of the lamp of words and speech originating from discrimination, the Bodhisattva-Mahasattvas can enter into the exalted state of self-realisation which is free from speech-discrimination."

(http://lirs.ru/do/lanka_eng/lanka-nondiacritical.htm, 3.65)

Malcolm said:

We can certainly come to understand the meaning of the Dharma by studying with a teacher. We can never come to understand the meaning of the Dharma merely by reading books.

Astus wrote:

Does a teacher gives any Dharma not contained in the sutras? If yes, then his teaching fails to follow the Dharma of the buddhas. If no, then sutras are both valid and beneficial sources of the Dharma.

"all of the buddhas and all of their teachings of peerless perfect enlightenment spring forth from this sūtra"

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html, ch 8)

Malcolm said:

For example, the name of a teaching like Kalacakra, does not mean that the real Kalacakra can be found in the book called Kalacakra. Just as the real Prajñāpāramitā cannot be found in all the books that bear that name. The meaning of Kalackara and Prajñāpāramitā can only be learned from a teacher, never from the books themselves.

Astus wrote:

Prajnaparamita is not obtained from anyone or anything. How could a person today instruct in that better than the Buddha?

"Wherever this sutra is taught, read, recited, copied, or wherever it is to be found, one should build a seven-jeweled stupa of great height and width and richly ornamented. There is no need to put a relic inside. Why is this? Because the Tathāgata is already in it. ... the highest, complete enlightenment of all the bodhisattvas is within this sutra. This sutra opens the gate of skillful means and reveals the marks of the truth."
(Lotus Sutra, ch 10, p 161, 162, BDK Edition)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 8th, 2015 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

DGA said:

he was part of a living culture of Dharma. Peter Hershock, a contemporary Ch'an master and scholar, makes the point that awakening in East Asian Buddhism is fundamentally social in nature. It's collaborative.

Astus wrote:

Buddhism is a religion, and religion means communal faith and practice. In other words, pratyekabuddhas exist only when there is no Dharma in the world. Also, Buddhism is mostly focused on ordained monastics, thus one of the meanings of sangha stands only for monks and nuns. Even lay communal activities are centred around monasteries most of the times. So it could be argued that without monasteries there is no Buddhist practice.

DGA said:

transmission outside the scriptures (and hence available only from a relationship with a teacher).

Astus wrote:

Zen is neither a scriptural nor an oral lineage. Enlightenment is not bound to texts or people, while both can function as catalysts. At the same time, all other schools besides Zen are called Teaching Schools (教宗), as they are based upon specific scriptures or treatises, not some sort of oral transmission. Still, see what Yongming has to say about sutras and enlightenment:

"All [the patriarchs] are descendants of the Buddha. I now cite the words of the original teacher [Śākyamuni] to train and instruct disciples, encouraging their practice by having them follow his statements; to know the implicit truth [zong] through reading the Dharma, and not rush around searching for it elsewhere; to personally realize the Buddha's intention. After they understand the message, they at once enter the ranks of the patriarchs; none of them argues over sudden and gradual methods. When they see their nature, they exhibit evidence of their perfect comprehension; how can they advocate ranking one patriarch over another? If this is the case, what contradiction is there between the scriptural teachings and the message of Chan patriarchs? In the case of the twenty-eight patriarchs of former ages in India, the six patriarchs in this land, as well as Great Master Mazu of Hongzhou, and National Preceptor [Hui]zhong of Nanyang, Chan master Dayi of Ehu, Chan master Benjing of Mount Sikong, and so on, all of them perfectly awakened to their own minds through thorough knowledge of the scriptures and treatises. Whenever they preached to their followers, they always referred to real documented evidence. They never speculated beyond what was in their own hearts, or expounded on the basis of false presuppositions. Consequently, even as the years pass uninterrupted, the winds of truth do not abate. By regarding the words of the sage [the Buddha] as the true measure, you will not be deceived by perverse and false claims. By using the teaching as your guide, you will have something to rely on." (Yongming Yanshou: Zongjinglu, in Conception of Chan, p 249)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 8th, 2015 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

DGA said:

One of our limitations is that a connection to an authentic source of Dharma is indispensable to our awakening. And that takes the form of an oral tradition. I'm not discounting the value of books here; I value study as much as anyone does, even if I'm not very good at it. My point is merely that pratyekabuddhas are extraordinarily rare, and for the overwhelming majority of us, working in a tradition is the only viable way up the mountain.

Astus wrote:

Reading the sutras and treatises is part of connecting with the authentic tradition.

Pratyekabuddhas don't have access to any of that kind. On the other hand, dissemination of texts is an important way of spreading the Dharma (e.g.

http://www.buddhiststudies.net/print_culture_dissertation.html - academiccommons.columbia.edu/download/fedora_content/download/ac:161474/COCONTENT/Scott_columbia_0054D_11367.pdf). Also, consider the impact of Kumarajiva in Chinese Buddhism.

Hongren wrote: "whosoever practices in harmony with the text will be the first to attain Buddhahood". That's one of the closing sentences of his only known work, the <https://sites.google.com/site/blinddharmainsamsara/home/useful-and-important-english-teachings/the-secret-heart-of-the-chen-forest/losseis-maestros-del-lanka-tradicion/5-ho/treatise-on-the-supreme-vehicle>.

Here's an illustration of how it is neither an oral nor a scriptural matter (sidenote: koans are literary works):

One day, Guishan said to Xiangyan, "I'm not asking you about what's recorded in or what can be learned from the scriptures! You must say something from the time before you were born and before you could distinguish objects. I want to record what you say." Xiangyan was confused and unable to answer. He sat in deep thought for a some time and then mumbled a few words to explain his understanding. But Guishan wouldn't accept this.

Xiangyan said, "Then would the master please explain it?"

Guishan said, "What I might say would merely be my own understanding. How could it benefit your own view?"

Xiangyan returned to the monks' hall and searched through the books he had collected, but he couldn't find a single phrase that could be used to answer Guishan's question.

Xiangyan then sighed and said, "A picture of a cake can't satisfy hunger."

He then burned all his books and said, "During this lifetime I won't study the essential doctrine. I'll just become a common mendicant monk, and I won't apply my mind to this any more."

Xiangyan tearfully left Guishan. He then went traveling and eventually resided at Nanyang, the site of the grave of National Teacher Nanyang Huizhong.

One day as Xiangyan was scything grass, a small piece of tile was knocked through the air and struck a stalk of bamboo. Upon hearing the sound of the tile hitting the bamboo, Xiangyan instantly experienced vast enlightenment.

Xiangyan then bathed and lit incense. Bowing in the direction of Guishan, he said, "The master's great compassion exceeds that of one's parents! Back then if you had explained it, then how could this have come to pass?"

(Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 191-192)

What do Zen students do then? Here's the answer (sidenote: <https://books.google.com/books?id=JkGTSWEUCeUC>):

One day the Councilor Wang visited the master. When he met the master in front of the Monks' Hall, he asked, "Do the monks of this monastery read the sutras?"

"No, they don't read sutras," said the master.

"Then do they learn meditation?" asked the councilor.

"No, they don't learn meditation," answered the master.

"If they neither read sutras nor learn meditation, what in the world are they doing?" asked the councilor.

"All I do is make them become buddhas and patriarchs," said the master.

The councilor said, “Though gold dust is valuable, in the eyes it causes cataracts.”
“I always used to think you were just a common fellow,” said the master.
(Record of Linji, p 38, tr Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 9th, 2015 at 1:29 AM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

Malcolm said:

What I am claiming is that oral communication and teaching is different than reading. For example, our conversation here is dry and logical [at least my side of the conversation is]. If we were talking, or I was listening to you teach Dharma, there is a qualitatively different sort of communication happening.

Astus wrote:

That is meta-communication, all those other things that go on during a face-to-face conversation. It is not a matter of words being pronounced or written. Then there are two options to maintain that orality is the only way of communicating the Dharma: either that words combined with other signifiers/expressions transmit the whole, or that words are irrelevant and only the other expressions convey the meaning. It also raises the question if anything can be communicated at all through the written form.

One of the advantages of texts is exactly their "dry and logical" nature (although I wouldn't dismiss the literary arts as capable of more than that). Unlike spontaneous verbal communication, writing generally requires some focus and organising of thoughts, except perhaps instant messaging.

Malcolm said:

The Buddha also addresses this issue later on in the text, beginning on folio 212/a of the Lhasa edition:

That being the case, therefore Mahāmati, apart from spoken explanations, the Buddha and the other bodhisattvas have taught "The Tathāgatas have never explained and will never explain even a single letter." Why? For this reason, because in all Dharmas there are no letters, in absence of the meaning [the Dharma] cannot be explained. There is an explanation through taking hold of concepts. Mahāmati, if Dharma is not explained, the doctrine will perish. If the doctrine perishes, there will be no buddhas, pratyekabuddhas and śravakas.

Astus wrote:

"For this reason, Mahamati, it is declared in the canonical text by myself and other Buddhas and Bodhisattvas that not a letter is uttered or answered by the Tathagatas. For what reason? Because truths are not dependent on letters. It is not that they never declare what is in conformity with meaning; when they declare anything, it is according to the discrimination [of all beings]. If, Mahamati, the truth is not declared¹ [in words] the scriptures containing all truths will disappear, and when the scriptures disappear there will be no Buddhas, Sravakas, Pratyekabuddhas, and Bodhisattvas; and when there is no one [to teach], what is to be taught and to whom?"

(Lankavatara Sutra, 3.76)

There is no mention of an exception for "spoken explanations" in Suzuki's translation. In T670 it says "我等諸佛及諸菩薩，不說一字、不答一字。" (We, all buddhas, and all bodhisattvas, don't say a word, don't respond a word.), in T671 it says "是故我經中說，諸佛如來乃至不說一字不示一名" (It is because I say in the scriptures, all buddha-tathagatas don't go as far as saying a single word or giving a single name.), , and in T672 it says "我經中說，我與諸佛及諸菩薩，不說一字不答一字。" (I say in the scriptures, I, and all buddhas, and all bodhisattvas, don't say a word, don't respond a word). So, neither of the three Chinese Lankavatara translations speak of such an exception.

As for the rest of the quote and its general meaning, it simply warns about attaching to words, just as the sutra does at other places as well. Also, it clearly says that the teachings are necessary, because without them there is no realisation of any kind. So, while not a word's spoken, the teaching must be said anyway.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 9th, 2015 at 5:50 PM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

Malcolm said:

The Tibetan text is extremely clear on this point. I don't much care what the Chinese translations or Suzuki's incredibly inaccurate paraphrase state.

Astus wrote:

The discourses in the sutra are supposedly spoken explanations. Since Mahamati and the Buddha are talking to each other, it is out of place to say that "apart from spoken explanations". Making an exception of verbal communication is problematic whether the sutra is meant as a spoken discourse or as a written text. If it is a spoken discourse, the whole sutra is an exception, like any other sutra. If it is a written text, it negates everything found there, including the stated exception. So, unlike other versions of the Lankavatara, the Tibetan seems to be in error.

Malcolm said:

Then of course there many, many statements like the following from the Ārya-niṣṭhāgantabhagavajjñānavaipūlya-sūtrarātñānanta-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra: Maudgalyāyāna, the awakening of a bodhisattva is connected with the virtuous mentor

Astus wrote:

There are several statements on the importance of good friends already in the early discourses (e.g. "the whole of the holy life" in the <http://www.accesstosight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn45/sn45.002.than.html>). However, it does not address the difference between written and oral communication. That sutta itself explains that the importance of a good friend is visible in the fact that the Buddha himself taught the noble eightfold path, based on which beings can attain liberation. In another discourse

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an08/an08.054.than.html>) the Buddha teaches that lay people should learn virtue, generosity and discernment by associating with good lay friends. But that doesn't mean they could not learn the same qualities by listening to the Buddha and his monastic disciples, since there are quite a few cases where people gain faith and insight from a single teaching. Good friends are also said (<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an09/an09.001.than.html>) to be a prerequisite for developing the wings to self-awakening, because through them one learns the Dharma. The reason for it being a prerequisite is because one has to learn of the teachings. It does not say that the source is limited to face to face communication using voice.

By the way, what is that sutra you quote from? Any English translation? Any other title (Sanskrit/English/Chinese)?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 10th, 2015 at 1:22 AM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

Malcolm said:

There is absolutely no precedence in the sūtras for the idea that you can learn Buddhadharma by reading books.

Astus wrote:

Several Mahayana sutras contain their own "advertisement", saying things like knowing just a single stanza gives immeasurable merit and bring about enlightenment.

This matches well with my previous quote about how the Lotus Sutra itself is the Buddha:

"The Lord: If, Kausika, on the one hand you were given this Jambudvīpa filled up to the top with relics of the Tathagatas; and if, on the other hand, you could share in a written copy of this perfection of wisdom; and if now you had to choose between the two, which one would you take?

Sakra: Just this perfection of wisdom. Because of my esteem for the Guide of the Tathagatas. Because in a true sense this is the body of the Tathagatas. As the Lord has said: "The Dharma-bodies are the Buddhas, the Lords. But, monks, you should not think that this individual body is my body. Monks, you should see Me from the accomplishment of the Dharma-body.""

(PP8000, 4.1, tr Conze)

And others:

"If all bhiksus, bhiksunis, upasakas, upasikas, and even tirthikas hold this sutra, read, grasp and expound it to other persons, or copy or have others copy it, all such actions will become the cause of Enlightenment."

(Nirvana Sutra, ch 16, tr Yamamoto)

"If beings are dying for wealth, I shall give it to them, and later recommend this Nirvana Sutra and have them read it. With the nobility, I shall use loving words, follow them and later, by degrees, recommend this Mahayana Great Nirvana Sutra to them and get them to read it. With the dull, I shall force them to read it"

(Nirvana Sutra, ch 20, tr Yamamoto)

"You should accept, uphold, and read and recite this sūtra. Kauśika, suppose that a good man or woman trains to attain bodhi and practices the six pāramitās for kalpas as numerous as the sands of the Ganges. Then suppose that a good man or woman hears, accepts, reads and recites, and upholds this sūtra. The merit acquired by the latter surpasses that of the former, not to mention that the latter widely expounds it to others. Therefore, Kauśika, you should read and recite this sūtra, and widely expound it to gods in your Thirty-three Heavens."

(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra51.html>)

"there are three kinds of sentient beings that will be reborn there ... Second, those who read and recite Mahāyāna vaipulya sūtras. ... Those who wish to achieve a middling rebirth in the high rank need not read or recite vaipulya sūtras. However, they should have a good understanding of their tenets, and their minds should not be upset by the highest truth."

(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra24.html>)

"If they have heard this Dharma Door, whether they copy this sūtra, read and recite it, or explain it, whether they persuade others to copy it, read and recite it, or explain it, I can see that these individuals will not go down the evil life-paths. Their three kinds of hindrances—afflictions, karmas, and requitals—will all be annihilated. In a future life they will acquire the five eyes. They will have nectar sprinkled on their heads by all Buddhas."

(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra05.html>)

"To remain untainted by worldly dharmas,
To acquire the affliction-free wisdom,
To take every action to benefit sentient beings,
And to be reborn in a pure Buddha Land,
One should hear, copy, and uphold
This wondrous sūtra treasure.
One should read, recite, ponder, and propagate it,
In order to understand the Buddha Ground."

(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra48b.html>)

Malcolm said:

I generally translate my citations myself directly out of the canon. As far as I know, there is no other translation of this passage. But the Tibetan of this one is extremely simple and straight forward.

Astus wrote:

I was simply curious, because a search on the title does not give any results.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 10th, 2015 at 2:07 AM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

conebeckham said:

Isn't it obvious that words are always approximations? Two people can read the same passage and gain different conceptual understandings. This should be obvious--I mean, right here in this thread, there are examples of various interpretations of the very same source text!

Astus wrote:

It's not just texts people can have problem with.

"Three hundred years ago in Korea, there was a monk named Sok Du, which means 'Rock Head.' He was a very stupid man. The sutras were much too difficult for him, so he decided to study Zen. But sitting Zen was also too difficult. So he only did working Zen, in the kitchen and in the monastery fields. Twice a month the Zen Master would give a Dharma Speech, which would always fill Sok Du with confusion. One day, after the Dharma Speech, he went to the Zen Master and said, 'Master, I'm tired of being so stupid. Isn't there some way I can understand?'

The Master said, 'You must ask me a good question.'

Sok Du scratched his head and thought for a few minutes. Then he said, 'Okay. You are always talking about Buddha. What is Buddha?'

The Master answered, 'Juk shim shi bul,' which means 'Buddha is mind.' But Sok Du misunderstood, and thought that the Master had said, 'Jip shin shi bul,' which means 'Buddha is grass shoes.'

'What a difficult kong-an!' Sok Du thought, as he bowed to the Master and left. 'How can Buddha be grass shoes? How will I ever understand?'

For the next three years, Sok Du puzzled over this great question as he did his working Zen. He never asked the Master to explain; he just kept the question in his mind at all times. Finally, one day three years later, he was carrying a large load of firewood down the hill to the monastery. His foot hit a rock, he lost his balance, the wood fell, and his grass shoes went flying into the air. When they landed on the ground, they were broken, and he had attained enlightenment."

(from Seung Sahn: Dropping Ashes on the Buddha)

conebeckham said:

Dharma is a living tradition, no book has ever been enlightened. Anyone who has met a genuine master and made connection understands the benefit of doing so, and the dimensions of Dharma that cannot be obtained through reading or study.

Astus wrote:

If it were so simple that genuine masters produced genuine masters, there would never have been any disagreement within Buddhism. On the contrary, the disciples of the same teacher establish different schools and have different ideas. And when one group starts to debate another group, all they can do is to pick up the written records of the teachings of the original teacher as a reference.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 12th, 2015 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: Scientific, Non-Mystical Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

What may seem mystical and supernatural in Buddhism are generally about the inner world. Just consider how the various heavens are connected to different levels of absorption (see <http://www.accesstoinight.org/ptf/dhamma/sagga/loka.html>). The various visions of the world can be summed up in what is called the <http://www.sutrasmantras.info/glossary.html#eye>, where the first one is our ordinary eye, and the second one is where all the supernatural things can be seen, while the other three are actually different levels of wisdom. Karma also is something that operates within one's inner world, defining one's perception of things and what could be called one's personality.

With a materialist ideology the entire inner world of one's mind is disregarded as if it had never existed. But we all experience thoughts, emotions, dreams, visions and various mental states. In fact, the concepts of materialism are also mental creations. Every experience one can have is within the mind, otherwise there is no consciousness of the experience and as such it cannot be called an experience. Since suffering/dissatisfaction exist within experience, it is within the realm of experience where one needs to look for solutions. Similarly, dreams and visions are also experiences, no different from ordinary events, like drinking a cup of tea. The difference is that while common people rarely encounter anything beyond the everyday worldly experiences, those who engage in spiritual cultivation - like meditation - can and often do have so called other-worldly experiences. Those other-worldly events are then reflected in the teachings and numerous stories that modern people easily and unthinkingly disregard as myths.

It is actually not particularly difficult to get in touch with the mystical side of our world. What it takes is to move our attention from the outside world of ordinary experiences to the inner realm. Normally the path to do that in Buddhism is to gain a firm foothold within the basic levels of absorption, that is, to be capable of maintaining a stable, calm and attentive mind at your will. There are other ways as well, generally not used by Buddhists, because those are not really conducive to liberation. Once one has a fairly good command of one's mind, it is then a matter of directing one's attention toward a particular topic or area of investigation. It can be used for the cultivation of the six supernormal powers (e.g.

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an05/an05.028.than.html>), while in Mahayana it is applied to so called visualisation practices, where one can visit buddhas and buddha-lands (e.g. <http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra22.html>). Used properly, one can gain the benefits of both concentration and insight.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 13th, 2015 at 4:37 AM

Title: Re: Scientific, Non-Mystical Buddhism

Content:

PorkChop said:

Your meteorite falls under the first, which is mechanistic and falls under physical laws.

Astus wrote:

The meteorite's path falls under a natural process. The meteorite crushing a being or a being's possessions is the third one. At the same time, the realms are created by the beings' karma, so it's hard to say that there are non-karmic forces. Also, consider the Yogacara description of how appearances emerge from karmic seeds stored in one's consciousness.

Here's this from Bodhidharma:

"What is the practice of accepting adversity? When suffering, a practitioner of the Way should reflect: "For innumerable kalpas, I have pursued the trivial instead of the essential, drifted through all spheres of existence, created much animosity and hatred, maligned and harmed others endlessly. Even though now I have done no wrong, I am reaping the karmic consequences of past transgressions. It is something that neither the heavens nor other people can impose upon me. Therefore I should accept it willingly, without any resentment or objection." The sutra says, "Face hardships without distress." How? With thorough insight. With this understanding in mind, you are in accord with the Principle, advancing on the Way through the experience of adversity. This is called the practice of accepting adversity."

(http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enUS/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=146&Itemid=57)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 13th, 2015 at 4:40 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen Mindfulness?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Wisdom and samadhi cannot be separated, just as wisdom and compassion cannot be separated. The wisdom that is without samadhi and/or compassion is not the wisdom of the buddhas, but rather some ideology, emptiness grasped incorrectly.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 13th, 2015 at 6:42 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen Mindfulness?

Content:

Dan74 said:

Nothing can be separated or even established ultimately, but it can be useful to speak of such things.

Astus wrote:

I didn't mean 'ultimately'. It is more a matter of how those words are defined. On the one hand, there is the path of sila-samadhi-prajna. On the other hand, there is the unity of samadhi-prajna in the Platform Sutra, or <http://antaiji.org/archives/eng/zzyk.shtml> 's statement "Zazen is also not based upon discipline, practice, or wisdom. These three are all contained within it." And even the PP8000 (3.4) says, "The five perfections are in this manner contained in the perfection of wisdom, and the term 'perfection of wisdom' is just a synonym for the fulfillment of the six perfections. In consequence, when the perfection of wisdom is proclaimed, all the six perfections are proclaimed." At the same time, <http://www.ymba.org/books/entering-cao-sudden-enlightenment/treatise-entering-cao-sudden-enlightenment> writes, "People who are confused or deluded do not understand that the other five paramitas all evolve from the dana-paramita.

Therefore, in practicing the dana-paramita, one also fulfills the practice of the other five paramitas." How does all this work? Nagarjuna explained it in the http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/N6P_excerpts/N6P_X-Bk4_X-15.pdf (p 41-45) that one can cultivate any one of the six that includes all the others, or can focus on one or two paramitas and thus cultivate the rest, or it is also possible to cultivate none and thus realise all.

In the case of the immediate enlightenment of Zen, there are no stages or levels, everything is included in the single realisation of no-mind. Talking of the general teachings for bodhisattvas is another matter.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 14th, 2015 at 8:41 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen Mindfulness?

Content:

seeker242 said:

I think you could say that is true, IF that is how you are defining "mindfulness" to begin with AKA "actively focus on the moment". However, if you don't define mindfulness like that, then perhaps that's not the case because the difference is entirely dependent on how you are defining it to begin with. John Kabat-Zinn doesn't really have a monopoly over the definition of mindfulness IMO

Astus wrote:

That definition seems to me like the general idea of what mindfulness is understood to be. Other definitions are possible and welcome.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 15th, 2015 at 6:35 AM

Title: Hong Kong nun accused

Content:

Astus wrote:

Hong Kong nun accused of embezzlement and sham marriages

Hong Kong officials have arrested four people from the scandal-hit Ting Wai Monastery, whose abbess has been accused of extravagant spending, mishandling donations and engaging in fake marriages.

<http://www.bbc.com/news/blogs-china-blog-34525474>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 15th, 2015 at 4:53 PM

Title: Re: Karma's "place" of effect

Content:

Astus wrote:

Karma is how one sees everything. Karma is one's habitual inclinations and ideas. It could be said that karma is one's personality. Whatever one encounters, whatever happens, it's always perceived through one's concepts and feelings about oneself and the world. That way karma is also the driving force for one's decisions and actions. At the same time, that is why one can become free from karma by discovering the insubstantiality of the self and all experiences.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 15th, 2015 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: Karma's "place" of effect

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Have a look at that source I cited, which says that 'karma doesn't explain everything'.

Astus wrote:

That sutta talks about considering only past actions is wrong. That's because one should take into account the present mindset as a factor.

Wayfarer said:

That seems rather at odds with 'karmic determinism', don't you think?

Astus wrote:

It is because of wholesome karma that one attains human birth. Similarly, it is because of the bodhisattva path that one attains buddhahood. This is not a matter of chance.

"For only stress is what comes to be;
stress, what remains & falls away.

Nothing but stress comes to be.

Nothing ceases but stress."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn05/sn05.010.than.html>)

"There is no doer of a deed
Or one who reaps the deed's result;
Phenomena alone flow on—
No other view than this is right.

And so, while kamma and result
Thus causally maintain their round,
As seed and tree succeed in turn,
No first beginning can be shown.

Nor in the future round of births
Can they be shown not to occur:
Sectarians, not knowing this,
Have failed to gain self-mastery."
(Visuddhimagga XIX.20)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 20th, 2015 at 7:49 PM

Title: Re: Zen is No Secret

Content:

jundo cohen said:

Also, a bit of a comment on the the emptiness of the Bhumis perhaps, Astus? How did Chinul otherwise comment on the Bhumis?

Astus wrote:

From Cleary's translation:

"If you can practice this moment to moment, not neglecting to be attentive, seeing to it that concentration and insight are equally sustained, then love and hate will naturally lighten and thin out, while compassion and wisdom will naturally increase in clarity, sinful deeds will naturally end, while meritorious actions will naturally progress."

Jinul accords with the Hwaeom teachings of the first arousal of bodhicitta, the attainment of the first level of faith, includes all the attainments through the entire path of the 52 levels, so in terms of wisdom one is equal to the buddhas, but then one must gradually manifest the buddha qualities until perfection. This goes back to Guifeng Zongmi, who clarified this teaching of sudden enlightenment with gradual cultivation as the meaning.

"As for gradual practice, having suddenly realized fundamental essence, no different from Buddha, beginningless mental habits are hard to get rid of all at once. Therefore one cultivates practice based on enlightenment, gradually cultivating the attainment to perfection, nurturing the embryo of sagehood to maturity. Eventually, after a long time, one becomes a sage; therefore it is called gradual practice. It is like an infant, which has all the normal faculties at birth, but as yet undeveloped; only with the passage of years does it become an adult."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 20th, 2015 at 10:24 PM

Title: Re: This is why you need a teacher!

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are instructional videos.

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s = document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

This is the <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=A6G9GVKpK20>.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 21st, 2015 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: What is Buddhism?

Content:

tomschwarz said:

Is Buddhism simply discernment? And all the kindness and compassion flows there after? For example, is there Buddhism 3000 years ago before the Dharma as we know it?

Astus wrote:

It cannot be simply discernment, since there are trainings to do before and realisations to attain after. Thus there are the threefold training, noble eightfold path, six paramitas, etc. Various good qualities (e.g. kindness) are both parts of training and results as well. Buddhism is the path to liberation, something that must be revealed. Although the path has always existed, there was no knowledge of such a path before Siddhartha (within the generally known past, not counting various buddhas).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 21st, 2015 at 10:26 PM

Title: Re: How can one's progress be tested?

Content:

zenman said:

How can one's progress in meditation and in the buddhist path be tested?

Astus wrote:

If it is a specific method of meditation, there are stages of progress. You may consult your meditation instructor and the relevant meditation manuals.

Progress on the Buddhist path has a number of traditional measurements already mentioned.

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=69&t=11885>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 22nd, 2015 at 8:09 PM

Title: Re: Bowing.

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Master Seongcheol once again began a pilgrimage participating in retreats at numerous meditation halls around the country. It was around this time, in a valley in front of Anjeong-sa Monastery in South Gyeongsangnam-do Province, that he constructed the Cheonjegul Grotto and led the believers who had come to see him in a practice of doing three-thousand prostrations. No matter who came to see him, young or old, business magnates or government officials, before he would do anything with them they first had to do three-thousand prostrations in front of the Buddha. The reason he ordered every one of his followers without exception to partake in this practice originated in the desire to get each of them to see themselves directly and to cultivate their minds to remove their own impurities. It was within the physical suffering felt in the knees and backs during the constant bending of the prostrations that this process could naturally take place."

(http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/bbs/board.php?bo_table=1030&wr_id=52)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 22nd, 2015 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: How can one's progress be tested?

Content:

avisitor said:

What does the progress in meditation have to do with the progress in the Buddhist path? Are the two related in such a way as to be able to use one to gauge the other?

Astus wrote:

As amanitamusc wrote, it depends on the type of meditation used.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 23rd, 2015 at 10:17 PM

Title: Re: What is superstition?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"What is the clinging to mere rules and ritual? The holding firmly to the view that through mere rules and ritual one may reach purification: this is called the clinging to mere rules and ritual."

(http://what-buddha-said.net/library/Buddhist.Dictionary/dic3_u.htm)

"Endowed with these five qualities, a lay follower is an outcaste of a lay follower, a stain of a lay follower, a dregs of a lay follower. Which five? He/she does not have conviction [in the Buddha's Awakening]; is unvirtuous; is eager for protective charms & ceremonies; trusts protective charms & ceremonies, not kamma; and searches for recipients of his/her offerings outside [of the Sangha], and gives offerings there first. Endowed with these five qualities, a lay follower is an outcaste of a lay follower, a stain of a lay follower, a dregs of a lay follower."
(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an05/an05.175.than.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 23rd, 2015 at 11:21 PM

Title: Re: What is superstition?

Content:

DGA said:

if a practice or a view looks like a superstition to you

Astus wrote:

Likely most things that are culturally foreign look superstitious. Calling something a superstition is a roundabout way of rejecting its validity. But there is more to it than that, since people are also curious of strange things.

"And Elijah came unto all the people, and said, How long halt ye between two opinions? if the Lord be God, follow him: but if Baal, then follow him. ... And call ye on the name of your gods, and I will call on the name of the Lord: and the God that answereth by fire, let him be God."

(1 Kings 18:21, 24)

That is, one's idea is invalid because it lacks effective power. Such a definition of valid perception is known within Buddhism, and that's how belief in rituals and charms are rejected in favour of karma. Also, within the context of enlightenment, all wrong views are superstitious, as they don't bring about liberation.

DGA said:

then the best course of action is to try to understand it from the perspective of the one who holds that view or undertakes that practice.

Astus wrote:

Most likely we cannot understand another's motivations, since that includes that person's entire mental and physical conditioning. It is always possible to come up with various explanations from our own perspective, but those are only good for placating our original rejection of unfamiliar phenomena.

DGA said:

insisting on cutting away or dismissing beliefs of past or present masters, such as the excellent Soto Zen masters described in the link at the top of this thread, is itself a kind of superstitious act--a belief in one's own capacity of reason without adequately recognizing the limits of that reason.

Astus wrote:

There is this romantic idea that something old is valuable simply because it is old. And there is also the modernist idea that something old is necessarily wrong because it is old. Instead of discriminating based on temporal biases, there are other criteria one can use to discern the value of any given activity. The Buddha's recommendation is to distinguish what is wholesome and what is unwholesome (<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/an/an03/an03.078.than.html>).

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 24th, 2015 at 6:19 AM

Title: Zazen Easier Than Nenbutsu

Content:

Astus wrote:

If you practice zazen because you want to become plucky and courageous like Saigo Takamori or Katsu Kaishu (Japanese heroes), your attitude is totally different from the aspiration, practice, awakening, and nirvana of the buddhas and ancestors. After all, as a foundation for determined faith, there must be jijuyu zanmai, which actualizes the reality of life through just doing zazen. In that sense, the teaching of other-power (tariki) of Shinran Shonin is a good attitude for faith. It is grounded in buddha-dharma. However, there are a lot of people who are deeply deluded and cannot enter the faith of other-power. For those people, just sitting zazen is the easiest practice, because as soon as they sit zazen right now, right here, the world of zazen will open. Yet even if you sit zazen, it can be overturned into self-power (jiriki) practice, depending exclusively upon your attitude toward zazen. Realizing this thoroughly, you must practice zazen on the basis of letting go of thought.

(Kosho Uchiyama: The Wholehearted Way, p 90-91)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 25th, 2015 at 6:35 PM

Title: Re: Zen - The Essence of Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Zen's authenticity lies in the mind-transmission. That means: "To not attain a single dharma is called the transmission of the mind. If you comprehend this mind, then there is no mind and no dharma." (Huangbo, in Zen Texts, p 36, BDK Edition) Practically it means that the personal experience of the nature of life is what validates the truth of the Buddha's teaching. That nature of the world is universally understood among Buddhists as interdependent and empty. I am unaware of any tradition disagreeing with that. So it seems fair to say that what is labelled as the fundamental view has not been lost. As for everything else, they are skilful means to help beings attain liberation, i.e. realising the nature of appearances. Zen, similarly to other Mahayana schools, advocates freely using various means, as it should be clear from the many stories preserved in the tradition. In the early texts themselves the Buddha is quite flexible in how he taught his disciples, using their inclinations to introduce them to the correct understanding. Because the methods are virtually unlimited, it is difficult to say how anything - especially when found in a traditional setting - is not authentic.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 26th, 2015 at 6:19 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen pointless without a teacher?

Content:

Astus wrote:

What do you call Zen?

There are certainly some elements where you need someone you recognise as a teacher, mostly to utilise the benefits of having discussions with a wise person.

Otherwise, if by Zen you mean counting your breath while seated, or other methods, you may learn them from various sources, including Pure Land teachers, especially those of Chinese and Vietnamese origin, since there isn't really such a sectarian separation in those traditions.

And if you call Zen the "buddha-nature" or "seeing nature", it cannot be taught even by the Buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 26th, 2015 at 8:40 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen pointless without a teacher?

Content:

DGA said:

Are you speaking from experience, Astus?

Astus wrote:

Experience of what? Having a discussion with a teacher?

BTW, I was referring primarily to how Japanese Rinzai and Western Zen communities like including interviews in their programmes. Although probably it could be done online as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 26th, 2015 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen pointless without a teacher?

Content:

Matt J said:

Evidently, you've never experienced dokusan with a Rinzai teacher.

Astus wrote:
What makes that evident?

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, October 26th, 2015 at 10:59 PM
Title: Re: Is Zen pointless without a teacher?
Content:
Matt J said:
That you think it can be done online, for one, and calling it a "discussion".

Astus wrote:
Why couldn't it be done online? As for calling it a discussion, I don't see it as anything worse than interview, and maybe even better in some aspects - an exchange of expressions.

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, October 27th, 2015 at 12:32 AM
Title: Re: Is Zen pointless without a teacher?
Content:
Matt J said:
For the same reason that cybersex isn't the same as sex. Online interaction as we have it simply isn't as immersive as real-time, face-to-face confrontation.

Astus wrote:
That might be so for Rinzai teachers like Eido Tai Shimano and Joshu Sasaki. But otherwise it may still be manageable, even if not exactly the same, since it is not a requirement to have physical contact normally.

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, October 27th, 2015 at 12:57 AM
Title: Re: Multiple or Single Practices in Soto Zen
Content:
Astus wrote:

If we want to go to the essence that encompasses all, then even seated meditation is redundant. At the same time, what is generally perceived and transmitted are the various practices not only of sitting but many others, like funerary rituals for instance. Dogen himself was quite thoroughgoing in taking a large number of elements of Buddhism to Japan from precepts to architecture.

"The fact that neither the general public nor the Zen priests or parish members actually practice zazen in large numbers has become a truism amongst scholars of Zen Buddhism in Japan. According to surveys conducted by the two largest Zen sects, Sōtōshū and Rinzai-shū (as represented by Myōshinji), zazen is not a widespread practice"

(Jørn Borup: Easternization of the East?, in Journal of Global Buddhism Vol. 16 (2015):79)

"It feels strange to say this as a Soto Zen monk, but I've always been uncomfortable with this all-or-nothing focus on zazen. Maybe it's the implicit suggestion that it's a return to what the ancient teachers (Dogen, or Bodhidharma, or maybe even the Buddha himself) really advocated. But more than that, I think it's my feeling (biased, I confess) that it's not really challenging. The discipline of zazen is challenging, of course. Zazen itself is hard work; coming back to it is hard work. But too often, the rhetoric around zazen-only practice feels like wish fulfillment: this is why I got into Zen, and this is something I like, so this must be the only thing that has any value or carries any authenticity. Even if every cell in your body resists doing zazen, philosophically, at least for many, I think it's easy to get on board with it. Other aspects of the tradition do challenge us, directly, on a philosophical level: a hierarchical student/teacher dynamic, bowing, ceremonies as expressions of "offering," robes.... It's easy to look at those practices that make us itch a little and label them as "extra.""

(<http://nyoho.com/2013/06/11/the-zen-toolbox/>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 27th, 2015 at 7:28 AM

Title: Re: Is Zen pointless without a teacher?

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

As for what I'm calling Zen, I'm using Kosho Uchiyama's book Opening the Hand of Thought as my primary source. In it, he describes One Zazen, Two Practices (vow & repentance) and Three Minds (joyful, parental, magnanimous).

Astus wrote:

In Chinese Pure Land you find the four types of buddha-remembrance (四種念佛), and among them the real-mark (i.e. ultimate) buddha-remembrance (實相念佛). See a brief explanation <http://www.ymba.org/books/buddhism-wisdom-faith-pure-land-principles-and-practice/essentials-pure-land/5-practice/buddha>.

The Zen explanation of that practice is from Daoxin, the fourth patriarch, in his "Fundamental Expedient Teachings for Calming the Mind Which Attains Enlightenment" (T85n2837p1286c19), who sums up the definition of yixin sanmei as "the mind which is aware of the Buddha is the Buddha, whereas [the mind which] does false thinking is the ordinary person" (tr. David W. Chappell), based on the <http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra13.html>. After that he quotes the Sutra of Meditation on the Bodhisattva Universal Virtue (T09n0277p0393b10-11): "The ocean of impediment of all karmas / Is produced from one's false imagination. / Should one wish to repent of it / Let him sit upright and meditate on the true aspect [of reality]." (tr. Bunno Kato) And here meditation on the true aspect is "念實相", i.e. (using the translation above) remembering/thinking real-mark. Further on repentance, or rather formless repentance, there is the 6th chapter of the Platform Sutra. Then Daoxin (tr. Chappell) continues:

"The Dapinjing [couldn't find what it actually refers to, but an almost identical teaching is found in the first volume of the Fozangjing T15n0653p785a25] says: "No object of thought (wu-suo-nian) means to be thinking on Buddha (nianfo)."

Why is it called wu-suo-nian? It means the mind which is "thinking on Buddha" is called thinking on no object (wu-suo-nien). Apart from mind there is no Buddha at all. Apart from Buddha there is no mind at all. Thinking on Buddha is identical to the thinking mind. To seek the mind means to seek for the Buddha.

Why is this? Consciousness is without form. The Buddha lacks any outer appearance. When you understand this truth, it is identical to calming the mind (anxin). If you always are thinking on Buddha, grasping [onto externals] does not arise, [and everything] disappears and is without form, and thinking is impartial without [false] discrimination. To enter into this state, the mind which is thinking on Buddha disappears, and further it is not even necessary to indicate [the mind as Buddha]. When you see this, your mind is none other than the body of the real and true nature of the Tathagata."

Uchiyama's zazen is letting go of thoughts, what Dogen calls hishiryo, what the Platform Sutra calls no-thought (wunian). It is the same as real-mark nianfo. Not anything complicated. But whether one manages to abide by not abiding anywhere is another question.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 27th, 2015 at 7:52 AM

Title: Re: Multiple or Single Practices in Soto Zen

Content:

DGA said:

Meaning is necessarily limitation; meaning is built on a system of differentiation (x is not y, up is not down, cat is not dog). The idea of meaning being without limitations / differentiations, or "boundless meaning," seems confounding.

Astus wrote:

Not explaining what Jundo means, just replying to that confounding expression:

<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra20.html>. That sutra basically equates the realisation of prajnaparamita with immeasurable meaning, because "Bodhisattvas next observe intently that all dharmas arise and perish instantly, as thoughts, one after another, never stay. They also observe the instantaneous birth, stay, change, and death of all dharmas. Having made these observations, Bodhisattvas then penetrate the capacities, natures, and desires of sentient beings. Because their capacities, natures, and desires are immeasurable, Bodhisattvas pronounce immeasurable Dharmas. As the Dharmas pronounced are immeasurable, their meanings are also immeasurable. The immeasurable meanings are born from one dharma. This one dharma is no appearance, which is not apart from appearance." Since zazen is thoughts coming and going unhindered, it is no different from the "Dharma Door of Immeasurable Meaning".

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 27th, 2015 at 6:32 PM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Astus wrote:

From the path perspective: Samsara is grasping things as if they were real. Nirvana is the elimination of the wrong view of substance.

From the correct view perspective: There is no substance within phenomena, thus grasping is based on ignorance. It is understanding how phenomena actually are that ignorance is eliminated, there is no new state to create or attain.

Therefore: understanding appearances incorrectly is samsara, understanding it correctly is nirvana. Samsara and nirvana are not two separate realms, so it can be equally said that all appearances are already nirvana and that nirvana is samsara.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 28th, 2015 at 6:41 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen pointless without a teacher?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"A student preparing for an entrance examination wants to pass; no one wants to fail. Yet the world in which there is no success or failure is the best. We cannot expect such a world in Japan today. It is possible only in the world of zazen. However, there is a group of people who try to put pass and fail into the world of zazen through satori. If you attain satori you succeed, if not you fail. This attitude has nothing to do with the buddha-dharma; it is samsara.

We only have to sit with the self that is only the self, without comparing it to others. It is not necessary at all to visit a Zen master to ask if one is enlightened or not. That is really a stupid question. First of all, to practice the buddha-dharma is to live out the self that is only the self. The truth is that one always has to live out the self that is only the self in any situation, so it is impossible to bring up the question of whether one succeeds or fails."

(Kosho Uchiyama: The Wholehearted Way, p 118)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 28th, 2015 at 7:48 PM

Title: Re: Multiple or Single Practices in Soto Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dogen says that it is only zazen that has been transmitted by the patriarchs. This idea expresses that not only is there a buddha-mind but it is manifest in actuality. Even more strongly: buddha-mind is actuality and there is nothing to find beyond what is apparent. Dogen stated clearly that he meant to transmit the whole package of Buddhism from China to Japan, as he had seen it there. It would be perhaps better to say that his view was holistic, considering the complete religious culture. It should be noted that while his time in Tiantong under Rujing is important, he spent significantly more time travelling around.

When zazen is highlighted as the single practice, it is naturally a huge simplification. Like everything, zazen can only have any meaning within a context. If it is removed from that environment and put into another, inevitably it gains a new meaning. At the same time, with asserting that zazen is the bloodline of buddhas, it is stating that, no matter what, if one knows zazen one knows what the main message is and the rest is optional. Dogen was aware that customs in India were different from that in China, and Japan did not completely copy everything from China either. In fact, Dogen could be critical with Chinese Buddhism, like in the case of the use of toothbrush instead of twigs.

The reason that the question of "multiple or single practice" does not really apply to zazen is that it is not a practice. Zazen is not something to be perfected, developed or understood. It is buddha being buddha. It is not one or many. It is just oneself being oneself. Then whether one follows a monastic lifestyle of the Kamakura era or something else is quite another matter.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 29th, 2015 at 8:29 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen pointless without a teacher?

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:
to delve into Zen practice.

Astus wrote:

While I agree that Uchiyama's books are quite lucid and easy to follow, it should be kept in mind that he represents his own interpretation of one approach of Soto Zen. If you want for instance to familiarise yourself with Chan, i.e. Chinese Buddhism, there are other sources you may want to look into. For a start there is <http://www.ymba.org/books/fundamentals-meditation-practice> (or in http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/chanmed1.pdf) by Ting Chen. That teaching shows very well how in Chinese Buddhism the methods of Tiantai, Chan and Pure Land are equally used and they form an organic whole. A similar teaching nicely summed up by the Vietnamese teacher Thich Thanh Tu can be found on the pages 41-58 in <http://www.thienvientuquang.org/kinhsach/english/KeysToBuddhism.pdf>.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 29th, 2015 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen pointless without a teacher?

Content:

Astus wrote:

As a practice without teacher, <http://www.ymba.org/books/fundamentals-meditation-> practice/varieties-chan recommends the <http://www.tientai.net/lit/mksk/v2/v2p2-1p5.htm>:

"The practices of The Maha-Chih-Kuan method are thorough, assuredly, but are too subtle to be done without the aid of an accomplished teacher. However, until such time as the reader may discover such a teacher, he might practice the following effective method of observing the mind. Sit comfortably in the lotus position or in any other position that is suitable for you. Lay down all things, and even give up the thought of laying everything down. In this way, thinking of neither good nor evil, close your eyes gently and lightly observe where your thoughts seem to issue from. This permits you passively to be aware of your false thoughts as they suddenly come and just as suddenly go, neither grasping at them nor driving them away; thus, in time, you can come to understand profoundly that false thought has no self-nature (is empty) and that it is originally void. When false thought is then illuminated by your mind, a stillness becomes evident, which then becomes suchness. Then if another thought suddenly arises, using the same approach, just observe lightly to see where the thought seems to come from. Do this at least once a day for at least half an hour."

Gishin in <http://www.bdkamerica.org/book/essentials-vinaya-tradition-and-collected-teachings-tendai-lotus-school> writes that it is the practice recommended for also for lay followers, while the other three samadhis are primarily for monastics. And as you may recognise, that is practically the same as zazen.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 30th, 2015 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: pure land buddhism as anachronistic concept

Content:

Astus wrote:

It seems a fairly common knowledge among those who study Chinese Buddhism now that the whole sectarianism of Japanese Buddhism has been projected on China, including not only PL but Chan as well. If you look at the four big schools of Taiwanese Buddhism you find that they are all inclusive of the "eight schools". Also, there has never actually been an independent Chinese PL church ever.

May check some works by Robert Sharf, like

<http://buddhiststudies.berkeley.edu/people/faculty/sharf/documents/Sharf2003.%20TP%20Chan%20and%20Pure%20Land.pdf> and

<https://books.google.com/books?id=pSazfSorJzgC>.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 31st, 2015 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: pure land buddhism as anachronistic concept

Content:

PorkChop said:

Depends if you take Shan-Tao's teachings of Exclusive Single Practice seriously or not.

Astus wrote:

The Chinese monastic system is Vinaya based, followed by the way political forces influenced its operation. So even Chan and Tiantai were not as exclusive as in Japan, although they did establish a loose organisational structure based on lineage families. That resulted in today's situation where almost every monastery is nominally Chan. Pure Land practices did not form the basis of a similar monastic organisation, and it should be recognised that various forms of nianfo are ubiquitous. Monks and nuns have always enjoyed a relative freedom in what studies and practices they pursued, so even if one happened to reside in a monastery led by an abbot with a specific affiliation, they were not hindered by that.

PorkChop said:

Most everyone else who's actually read Shan-Tao's writings has repeated that he promoted exclusive practice. There's a <http://purelandbuddhism.org/> that solely follows Shan-Tao's writings in endorsing exclusive practice and 13th Pure Land Patriarch Yin Kuang references Shan-Tao as well when endorsing not mixing Pure Land practice with other methods.

Astus wrote:

While the list of the so called 13 Chinese PL patriarchs include Shandao, it begins with Huiyuan, who emphasised visualisation, and includes people like Yongming Yanshou, who was more like a well educated bodhisattva monk with an all around knowledge of Mahayana, Lianchi Zhuhong, who was similarly an educated monastic proficient in the teachings, Chan, and Pure Land, just like Ouyi Zhixu. They were definitely not exclusivists. And that is what you can find from modern luminaries as well like Yinshun and Shengyan.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 31st, 2015 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: Is Zen Mindfulness?

Content:

Astus wrote:

An example of how Zen practice and mindfulness looks fairly the same.

Watch <https://youtu.be/ooypUuwXf7Y?t=44> (2 mins) first.

Then compare the followings from a discussion in a Zen group:

A quote from Dan Leighton initiated the discussion:

"Zazen is not about something else - when we sit, in our regular daily practice, we just sit, it's not about reaching some other state of being or mind, or experience, or understanding in the future. Just this is it. We see what's actually happening in this body/mind here and now, quite apart from our stories about who we are or what the world is or what we want to get from practising - it's not about something else - we're not practising to get some other place in the future - the point is just to enjoy the next breath, or the breath that's happening right now. To appreciate our uprightness or to appreciate our expression of Buddha's mudra right now. ... It's ACTUALLY this... we sit upright like buddha. and that's the point, we are not sitting to get something else, if that was the meaning of our zazen then it would just be another business transaction. It's hard to get this because that's how we think of our lives, we think we're doing something to get something else out of it. "

So I asked how it is different from blankness. Someone replied:

"this is not about 'blankness' this is about dynamically allowing ourselves to be present in every instant. It is very much part of the bodhisattva path. This was part of a talk on dogen and the lotus sutra - talking about the part of the sutra which discusses the myriad bodhisattvas coming up from under the earth - he quotes Dogen saying "the family style of all buddhas and ancestors is to first arouse the vow to save all living beings by removing suffering and providing joy. Only this family style is inexhaustibly bright and clear".

The things you bring up about feeling hungry and eating, or being mindful of others is not irrelevant at all, but during zazen... the most important thing is zazen.

I'm reminded of a thing Taisen Deshimaru infamously said "When you're doing zazen, don't think about sex, when you're having sex, don't think about zazen"

Another person's explanation:

"When you finish Zazen, take the Zafu with you.

I was once told that sitting is like a launching pad, once we get up from the Zafu, keep yourself in the buddhas space and being present all day.

Also, when you practice Gongfu tea you must be totally present in every single thing you do or you'll ruin your tea. Every single movement and gesture is vitally important. Bring the gongfu practice into every action in waking life is a lure expression of being "this just is" So, when doing gongfu, practice Gongfu. When taking a shit, shit gongfu. When brushing your teeth, brush gongfu. When eating, eat gongfu. When chanting, chant gongfu. When sitting, sit gongfu. When frak, frak gongfu."

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 31st, 2015 at 2:16 AM

Title: Re: pure land buddhism as anachronistic concept

Content:

Astus wrote:

Pure Land devotionism could include a diversity of practices for a variety of purposes: for example, meditation on the heroic vows of Amitabha, visualization of his features, cultivation of one's desire to be reborn in the Pure land, visualization of the Pure land, invoking the name of Amitabha either to be reborn in the Pure land or as a means to calm the mind as preparation for other forms of meditation, etc. By way of contrast, what is unique about the outlook of Tao-ch'o and Shan-tao is the force with which they singled out Pure Land devotionism as the only practice needed and available to Buddhists of that time which could guarantee salvation. T'an-luan and Tao-ch'o both were plagued by a lack of confidence in the effectiveness with which they could master other forms of traditional Buddhist training. T'an-luan distinguished between the "difficult path" and the "easy path of the Pure Land," while Tao-ch'o divided the "path of the sages" from the "path of the Pure land." In fact, the An-lo-chi of Tao-ch'o primarily consists of an extended argument demonstrating the appropriateness and necessity of Pure Land devotion as the only effective practice because of the trauma of the times and the decrease in man's capacities. Thus, the Shansi Pure land thinkers were concerned to stress the differences between Pure land practice and other methods, even though Chinese Pure Land never rejected these other methods as harmful in the way that occurred among Japanese Pure Land thinkers.

The ascendancy of Pure Land devotion as a necessary, sufficient, all-consuming and finally inclusive religious orientation is an extreme development in China. Even at its height, Shansi Pure Land activity never radically separated from a monastic, philosophical, and meditational base, nor did it form a distinctive institutional structure or formalized methods of succession, as it did in Japan. Chinese Pure Land sectarianism was neither based on an exclusive organization nor limited to particular religious practices, but was a loosely-knit association of those who were committed to single-minded devotion to Amitabha and rebirth in his Pure Land as the only guaranteed source of salvation. Although the names in the lineages highlight individual leaders, they also show that the separatist movement existed for a relatively brief period of time in Chinese Buddhist history, principally extending from the sixth to the ninth centuries. Approximately, it was during these centuries that Chinese Buddhism generally was specializing in many different directions and all the major "schools" were formed. It should be emphasized, therefore, that Chinese Pure land thinkers never went to the extreme of the Japanese Pure Land movement which actively rejected other practices as detracting from reliance on Amitabha. In China nien-fo (nembutsu) was decisive for salvation but not exclusive, and Pure Land thinkers always assumed that it would be supplemented by other forms of meditation and purifying practices. A good illustration of this difference between China and Japan is the fate of Hsuan-chung-ssu, the birthplace of Pure Land sectarianism in China. Unlike Japanese Buddhism or Christianity in the West, Buddhist schools in China are lines of practice and thought, not institutionally-strong, property-holding denominations. Accordingly, a monastery took its identity from the activities of its members, and especially its abbot. Because of its local autonomy, any monastery could include a number of "lines" or Buddhist schools, or change from one to the other as the attitudes of people changed. Accordingly, Michihata discovered that by the late T'ang Dynasty the Hsüan-chung-ssu was most famous for its ordination platform and expertise in rituals and precepts, and had become known as a Vinaya Monastery (lū-ssu). At other times, because of the prominence of its meditation hall, it was called a Ch'an Monastery (ch'an-ssu). In the early Sung, after the destructive losses suffered by Buddhism during persecution and war, the Hsüan-chung-ssu became active as a center for making metal buddha-images. Thus, the "ten-thousand practices" (wan-hsing) subordinated by Tao-ch'o as inadequate, which were renamed the "mixed practices" (tsa-hsing) and again deemphasized by Shan-tao, became the main focus of attention in the eyes of later generations as the rich symphony of Chinese religious eclecticism supplemented and absorbed the single sound of chanting Amitabha's name.

(<https://books.google.com/books?id=tztMqPReAYC>, p 144-146)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 31st, 2015 at 6:35 AM

Title: Re: pure land buddhism as anachronistic concept

Content:

PorkChop said:

Sentence is self-contradictory and basically shoots down your entire argument up till now.

in fact the whole passage establishes; without a doubt, that there were Pure Land school(s) exclusively devoted to Amitabha. The OP never mentioned lineage, nor Nianfo, merely Pure Land, which is defined by exclusive devotion to Amitabha and the exclusive goal of rebirth in his Pure Land.

Astus wrote:

My argument has not been that there was no Pure Land Buddhism in China, since they have invented the whole thing and it is still the most popular teaching there. What I have been saying is that there was no independent organisation established, unlike in Japan, and that's what the quote talks about as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 1st, 2015 at 6:20 PM

Title: Re: Nature of mind vs. soul theory.

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is this misleading way of talking about a nature to be discovered or perceived, and even more misleading is the talk about manifestations of the nature. But actually it's like in the Heart Sutra, that the five aggregates are empty, and that emptiness is the nature of the aggregates, and the aggregates themselves are what the mind-body is. So, the emptiness of the nature is that there is no substance in the aggregates, luminosity is that there are aggregates as experience, and their unity is that experience has no substance. Then one can go on considering how the lack of an essence is eternal, especially since it's not a thing, and so on.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 3rd, 2015 at 12:05 AM

Title: Re: Is Zen pointless without a teacher?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Monlam Tharchin,

Here are my comments to Jundo's comments. What do you think?

jundo cohen said:

One Universal Virtue is to drop (by non-dropping-dropping) all waves of karma, impediments and thoughts of "true or false" into and as this Ocean, Repent/Atonement as At-One-ment, sitting upright as True Aspect. All thoughts as waves just constantly non-arise and flow.

Astus wrote:

Thoughts are just thoughts. Don't imagine them something more or less, then they come and go without hindrance. And even if one tries to turn thoughts into something more or less, they come and go without hindrance. That is, they are impermanent no matter what.

jundo cohen said:

No object of thought and what thought to object to, not two. What "Buddha" can be thought or not thought and is not all thoughts? Sitting as Buddha is precisely Buddhastically Buddhasting.

Astus wrote:

All thoughts are Buddha (impermanent no matter what), thus sitting is Buddha-sitting, and "Buddha-sitting" is the Buddha sitting as Buddha.

jundo cohen said:

Sitting as Buddha is thinking no object. Apart from sitting, there is no mind and no Buddha at all. Apart from Buddha, there is no mind of sitting. Sitting as Buddha is identical to the sitting Buddha. To seek the mind or to seek for sitting is to seek for Buddha. The trick is to seek by not seeking, finding what cannot be found. The Form of Sitting is without form, the appearance of sitting lacks any appearance or in and out. What mind is there to calm? Never mind! In simply sitting, no internal or external to grasp or arise, all is without form or discrimination right in and as all form and discrimination ... nirvana is samsara, no nirvana no samsara from the startless start. The sitting mind disappears and re-emerges, what is there to indicate when all the world is free of directions in the pivot point of sitting? Sitting this, body-mind are none other than the real and true Tathagata.

Astus wrote:

That is: don't fuss about sitting. There is nothing to make up or discover, as things are already such. Such, that is, cannot be grasped. Cannot be grasped, because there is nothing to grasp. There is nothing to grasp, because they come and go naturally.

jundo cohen said:

How does one lay down without laying down? Open the Hand of Thought. There was never a thing to pick up from the start, nor a thing in need of letting go.

Astus wrote:

Letting go is not an act, it is in the recognition of things being such. And whether recognised or not, things are such anyway.

jundo cohen said:

Dropping all thought of good and evil, attraction and aversion, we do not observe (in our way) where thoughts arise or go, but simply do not grasp them as they come and go non-coming-non-going. False thoughts have no self-nature, and the same for true thoughts. There is no thought. Thought-no-thought. As human beings, we do our best (we have no choice so long as we are living beings in a complex world) to live in a world of thoughts, both true and false, doing our best to be free of the latter and to nurture the former (doing our best to be free of greed, anger and divisive thinking, seeking to nurture generosity, peace and unity). Nevertheless, all through all thoughts are no thought from the start. There is stillness to be heard at the heart of the greatest noise. A light shines, illuminating both false and true thoughts.

Astus wrote:

Things are such anyway, so we can freely do our best to be the force of compassionate buddhahood.

jundo cohen said:

Think about it! Or you don't. Yet Thinking-Non-Thinking It-No-It You-No-You

Astus wrote:

The X-notX formula of inseparable appearance-emptiness. That is, there are thoughts, just don't make a fuss.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 6:16 AM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Malcolm said:

Tibetan Buddhists in general interpret all sūtra paths as gradual paths, generally considering other interpretations incorrect and baseless.

Astus wrote:

Only in order to legitimise their own sudden version of Vajrayana as superior. Similarly, Chinese schools have categorised gradual teachings to a lower position. E.g. the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tiantai#Five_Periods.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 6:25 AM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Queequeg said:

Let me modify my question - among active, living traditions?

Astus wrote:

Practically they all teach a gradual path. It's just that the <https://books.google.hu/books?id=LyfysMjKooEC> is naturally more popular.

If the unwise Bodhisattva counts the kotis of aeons,
And has the notion that it is long until the full attainment of enlightenment, he is bound to suffer,
And for a long time he will be suffering while moving unto Dharma.
Therefore he is inferior in the perfection of vigour, and essentially indolent.
(Ratnagunasamcayagatha, ch 30, tr Conze)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 7:01 AM

Title: Re: Is Zen pointless without a teacher?

Content:

jundo cohen said:

It is a little hard for folks to fathom who are used to the "common sense" human idea that something can only be found by looking for it (rather than by transcending looking vs. not looking), attained by striving (rather than striving and non-striving at once), either yes or no, etc etc.

Astus wrote:

Teachings are meant to be read, studied and understood. Just like any other writings. Buddhism is not an exception. But to say that just because at first Spinoza or Kierkegaard seems difficult, doesn't mean one should suspend thinking and achieve some special state of mind. Zongmi was of the opinion that Chan is the summary of the Indian sutras and treatises, intended specifically for a Chinese audience to make things easier (see: Zongmi on Chan, p 105). However, already if we move on from the Tang era to the Song, once common colloquial expressions become obscure, and of course it is even more mysterious to non-Chinese. While it is a fine literary achievement to be able to reproduce sophisticated ancient East Asian word plays, it is likely more productive to use today's language, that way one can uphold the maxim of pointing directly.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 5:00 PM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

PorkChop said:

I know you're probably not looking for Pure Land input, but my impression is that Jodo Shu is more of a gradual teaching and Shin is more of a sudden teaching. Jodo Shu teaches the 9 grades of Pure Land birth straight from the sutras - most notably in the story of the samurai Kumagai Naozane wanting to be born in the highest grade so he could begin Bodhisattva work as soon as possible. Shinran talks about sudden, horizontal transcendence in the Kyogyoshinsho, thus setting the tone for Jodo Shin Shu.

Astus wrote:

The idea of enlightenment in one lifetime is present in all the Pure Land teachings, because once one is born in Sukhavati buddhahood is guaranteed.

"Suppose we have a worm, born inside a stalk of a bamboo. To escape, it can take the hard way and crawl "vertically" all the way to the top of the stalk. Alternatively, it can poke a hole near its current location and escape "horizontally" into the big, wide world. The horizontal escape, for sentient beings, is to seek rebirth in the Pure Land of Amitabha Buddha."

(Parable 62 in <http://www.ymba.org/books/thus-have-i-heard-buddhist-parables-and-stories/parables>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 5:05 PM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Malcolm said:

No caveats in Dzogchen...just saying...

Astus wrote:

Do you mean it is explicitly gradual or sudden?

(Sam van Schaik has a <https://books.google.hu/books?id=0Tg6AwAAQBAJ> on that subject.)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Malcolm said:

No. "Sudden" does not apply to Dzogchen, neither does "gradual." That's like asking the question, "Is a bar of gold suddenly gold, or gradually gold."

Astus wrote:

That's like saying Dzogchen lacks the path to liberation, while that is not actually true. In other words, one can get to that bar of gold either through the process of digging, clearing and melting (or something http://www.miningandmetallurgy.com/gold/assets/images/Gold_Technology_and_Gold_Production_Plant.PNG); or by discovering it in its pure form. The former is the gradual, the latter is the sudden way. It is of no help to say that the gold is already gold regardless of its location or information of its whereabouts.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Queequeg said:

But not this lifetime. And birth in Sukhavati does not guarantee Sudden awakening, but rather infinite life and conditions conducive to awakening and complete absence of obstacles.

Astus wrote:

Not in this lifetime. But in the next single lifetime one can attain enlightenment, even if that time is fairly long. Although it is of little or no concern how long one stays in Sukhavati. And since in this life one can be guaranteed of birth and birth definitely brings about complete liberation, some Pure Land teachers were right to say that even now one is similar to a bodhisattva on the stage of no return.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 10:25 PM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Malcolm said:

The Innermost Great Potentiality states:

The Soaring Garuda states:

The Cuckoo of Vidyā states:

Astus wrote:

"no suffering, origination, cessation or path; no gnosis, no acquisition and no non-acquisition. ... Due to non-acquisition, the bodhisattva, having relied on Perfect Wisdom, dwells without mental obstruction. From the non-existence of mental obstruction, he is fearless, he overcomes inverted erroneous views, and ultimately reaches Nirvāṇa."

(https://drive.google.com/file/d/0B4-

3ivsK5Q6MMWI3OGFjODctZTQ1Ni00NzU5LWJiOTgtMjdiNWM1YWE4N2Nk/view)

"if the bodhisattva refrains from taking up the practice of any particular dharma, because he does not apprehend any dharma whatsoever, he may thereby succeed in realizing prajñāpāramitā. How can this be the case? All practices are essentially false and unreal."

(Nagarjuna: Realization of Prajñāpāramitā through no Seizing on Practices, in http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/N6P_excerpts/N6P_X-Bk4_X-15.pdf)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen pointless without a teacher?

Content:

jundo cohen said:

Do you have a better way to approach this, Astus? I am an old dog always open to new tricks.

Astus wrote:

In the area of skilful means what qualifies better is whether it brings about realisation or not. That depends on the audience. As you well know, even a finger or a no-finger can work.

Otherwise, there is no need for lot of explanations. One just has to see what is "right in front of one's eyes", that is, that all experiences in the six fields change moment to moment, and even one moment cannot be grasped. Therefore, whatever's believed to be a reality is only a conceptual creation. Nevertheless, conceptual creations follow a certain pattern, that is, they are interdependent (network of associations).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Malcolm said:

Who said the meaning of Prajñāpāramitā and Dzogchen were different? I merely said that in Dzogchen there were no caveats.

Astus wrote:

As you wrote, "Tibetan Buddhists in general interpret all sūtra paths as gradual paths". So, while there are five paths and ten bhumis, a bodhisattva does not get stuck by such conceptual fabrications.

"No caveats" here would mean that Dzogchen plays with open cards. How does it translate to the topic of gradual teachings?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 6th, 2015 at 1:19 AM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Malcolm said:

Shabkar Natsog Rangdrol wrote:

Rongzom Pandita wrote:

Astus wrote:

If there are no stages and practices, what are all those levels, stages, and practices in Dzogchen?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 6th, 2015 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Queequeg said:

Right, but that is still not a Sudden path. If you're a bad person, you're born in a lotus calyx and stay there for a time until your bad causes are exhausted - a purgatory of sorts. Then you emerge and continue purification and perfection. Its one life, but still the Gradual path.

Astus wrote:

Yes, they maintain the bodhisattva stages to follow. Another gradualist teaching is the Hosso school (Japanese Dharmalaksana, aka Yogacara).

Queequeg said:

Shinran (as little as I know), in contrast to Honen, seems to have more deeply drawn on Tientai theory. Honen's interpretation is literal and seems to push Tientai aside.

Astus wrote:

I have not seen Shinran actually diverting from Honen's interpretation of what happens in Sukhavati.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 6th, 2015 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Malcolm said:

Which levels, stages and practices?

Astus wrote:

Semde, longde, menngagde. Preliminaries, trekcho, togal and its visions. And probably there are others associated with or included in Dzogchen.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 6th, 2015 at 2:55 AM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Malcolm said:

The three series are a literary division.

"Preliminaries, trekcho, togal and its visions" are not stages or levels.

Astus wrote:

So those literary divisions do not mean difference in the teachings, one superior to the other, etc?

If those are not stages/levels, then what? Gradual instructions maybe?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 6th, 2015 at 3:37 AM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Queequeg said:

My understanding is that the Hosso school, (and Kegon), exist in name only.

Astus wrote:

I have no information myself, but <https://books.google.com/books?id=1C4qAwAAQBAJ> is by a Hosso priest and it is proper Yogacara.

Queequeg said:

My impression of Shin is that its more philosophical and the idea of Pure Land is to an extent treated metaphorically.

Astus wrote:

There are various interpretations, similarly to how some may deny rebirth and still claim to be Buddhists. So perhaps it's better to just stay with the canonical works (Shinran and maybe Rennyo) or identify the sources of various views.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 6th, 2015 at 5:27 AM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Queequeg said:

Like this?

<https://www.google.com/maps/@34.9897763,135.7596349,3a,75y,270.75h,93.11t/data=!3m6!1e1!3m4!1shD2gk8GHsb1e4xELypKTxQ!2e0!7i13312!8i6656!6m1!1e1>

Astus wrote:

There is a sermon on that expression on their website.

http://www.higashihonganji.or.jp/sermon/radio/detail22_01.html It should also be noted that the Japanese uses two words, whereas <http://jisho.org/search/inochi> (命) is the subject and <http://jisho.org/search/ikiru> (生きる) is the predicate. In the sermon it is explained as 今、南無阿弥陀仏が私を生きている i.e. "Now, Namuamidabutsu is living me." That shows probably quite well how it is not some sort of "sudden teaching", but an expression of total relinquishment to Amitabha, very much in line with the general idea of other-power.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 6th, 2015 at 6:21 PM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Queequeg said:

I don't read Japanese well, and I don't know enough about Shin to speak knowledgeably, but that way of characterizing what is happening now seems a departure from literal Pure Land.

Astus wrote:

There is a fuller explanation of the slogan: http://japanese-religions.jp/publications/assets/JR34%201_a_Porcu.pdf on p 61-64.

"In the English leaflet available at the head temple the meaning of the slogan is explained by dividing it into three stages: Now 1) "'Now' is only here while you are reading this leaflet;" 2) Life is living you means that "'Life' is constantly, continuously and pervasively in the infinite universe. As conditions emerge, 'Life' works as one's body, mind and spirit." And finally, 3) "Now, life is living you" is explained as a calling to live one's life as one is, "regardless if life is going along with [one's] wish or not—happy or sad." The constant saying of Amida's name, the nenbutsu, "is the constant reminder of this calling.""

(from p 62)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 6th, 2015 at 6:39 PM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Malcolm said:

The preliminaries are for those who have not yet understood what the primordial state is. Tregchö and thögal are inseparable: sometimes however, tregchö is parsed as "sudden" and thögal as "gradual", but this too is in reality misleading.

Astus wrote:

So, there is a gradual path for those who have not yet attained understanding. And once there is understanding, one should still follow through tregcho and thögal practices, so again, it seems gradual.

Malcolm said:

The long and short of it is that Dzogchen teachings did not fit in the mold of gradual and sudden dichotomy [which is a conversation is only tangentially relevant to Dzogchen due to the conflict in Tibet over Indian and Chinese approaches to Mahāyāna sūtra]. They also do not fit into the mold of ultimate and relative truths. They do not fit into the mold of paths and stages.

Astus wrote:

Sudden means direct access to the ultimate. If there are stages involved in the path, it is necessarily gradual. So, if Dzogchen were just recognising the primordial state, then it would be a sudden method. If preliminaries and follow up practices are also included, it is gradual.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 6th, 2015 at 7:06 PM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

MalaBeads said:

I dont think you "get to" the gold, i think you discover you are the gold.

Astus wrote:

That makes no difference, as finding the gold is just a metaphor for the realisation of the nature of mind/world/reality. One still has to arrive at that discovery.

MalaBeads said:

But all that is left behind when you discover your true nature.

Astus wrote:

That discovery should happen at the so called introduction. However, one cannot engage in Dzogchen without that introduction, while at the same time all the teachings and methods come after it. So it doesn't look like as if all that were simply left behind.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 6th, 2015 at 8:50 PM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

alpha said:

I am sure this has been said many times before but dzogchen is the path from mind to nature of mind and in that sense is direct and instantaneous.

Astus wrote:

Buddhism teaches moving from ignorance to knowledge, so in that sense it would all be sudden.

alpha said:

So all the Dzogchen practices are there to develop capacity to recognise and integrate with the primordial state which is already there and not to develop qualities, abilities and various accomplishments or go through various stages of development since all these aspects are already complete and perfected in the primordial state.

In other words doing dzogchen practices means developing capacity to recognise what is already there.

Astus wrote:

From the practical perspective it makes no difference at all whether one develops new abilities or lets hidden abilities surface. In both cases it means that one gradually gains new abilities, the only difference is a mostly irrelevant theoretical concept behind it that at best can serve as inspiration.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 10th, 2015 at 10:05 PM

Title: Re: the idea of historicity and spiritual practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

I personally find very informative the modern historical scholarship on Buddhism. It can show well how certain concepts changed from one era to the other, and then how other concepts were added or modified in response to that. It also covers the way Buddhists adapted to their cultural and linguistic environments, e.g. the transmission from India to China, and then the sinification of Buddhism. It is also incorrect to think that people in Asia were unaware of textual changes and apocryphal texts, since there were various corrections made during the centuries, and historical verification of texts was among the cardinal issues in debates.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 11th, 2015 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: the idea of historicity and spiritual practice

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

But the rise of modern historical methods threw a wrench into that, by raising the possibility that a given concept of the Buddha and his teachings can be established (or refuted) independently, i.e. through avenues that are not linked to a tradition. So when a person goes for refuge in the Buddha, who are they taking refuge in? The Buddha who appears in the Dharma and taught, for instance, the Lotus Sutra? Or the Buddha identified by historians? And which Buddha is that, exactly -- Gombrich's Buddha, Harvey's Buddha, Schopen's Buddha?

Astus wrote:

I don't really see that happening. Those who fancy believing in whatever they find appealing are very much unaffected by academic studies. Scientific concepts are rapidly integrated into the weirdest New Age type beliefs. While a few theologians developed hermeneutics, Biblical studies and other more or less science-based methods, the masses don't know and don't care. Even Western practitioners who are mostly educated middle class people are happy to just go regularly to zazen sessions, pujas and empowerments without knowing a thing about Buddhist studies, or even sutras for that matter. As everywhere, the majority is content to listen once a week to some authority figure, then go home and watch TV.

Mahayana is quite clear in that the Buddha is not some ordinary being, or even an extraordinary being, but the ultimate truth/nature of mind. Just see how Vimalakirti educated poor Ananda:

"You should understand, Ānanda, the bodies of the Tathāgatas are bodies of the Dharma, not bodies of longing. The Buddha is the World-honored One, who has transcended the triple world. The Buddha's body is without flaws, the flaws having been extinguished. The Buddha's body is unconditioned and does not fit the [conventional] analytic categories. A body such as this—how could it be ill, how could it be vexed?" (Vimalakirti Sutra, ch 3, p 95, BDK Edition)

As one way to see the historical evolution of Buddhist traditions and texts is that everyone of various ages realised the same truth of dependent origination and used expressions fit for their environment. Thus, there is really just one vehicle with 84k methods. This is also a good way to eliminate the ubiquitous sectarian biases many get lost in. Mahayana itself is such an ecumenical approach, encompassing every manifestation of the Dharma.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 12th, 2015 at 11:55 PM

Title: Re: the idea of historicity and spiritual practice

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

are the Sravakayana and Mahayana vehicles actually headed to the same destination?

Astus wrote:

Yes. I think it is best illustrated by the five aggregates. They are already impermanent, dependently originated and without self. The difference between delusion and enlightenment regarding that is what results in either attachment and dissatisfaction or freedom and peace. So there are the "five aggregates with attachment" for the deluded, and the "five aggregates" (as they are) for the enlightened. This is true in every Buddhist system I'm aware of.

Lazy_eye said:

Nirvana according to...

Astus wrote:

This is where things can become difficult, as texts and people can use all sorts of poetic language to talk about nirvana for various reasons. To keep it simple, it's just as in the four noble truths: the end of the cause of suffering.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 6:13 PM

Title: Pointing Out through Appearances

Content:

Astus wrote:

1. Whatever thing or being we perceive are concepts, mental fabrications.
2. There is no thinker behind concepts, no creator of ideas.
3. While there is no thinker, thoughts come and go on their own.
4. As thoughts come and go on their own, there is nothing to attain or release.

"Now all objective appearances are like water and waves, all are apparitions of the mind and in reality are unestablished. By realizing this, one recognizes all appearances as the mind. By analyzing the essence of the mind in terms of going, staying, and arising, it turns out not to be established as anything. So, like horses and elephants in a dream, it is unestablished in reality. By realizing this, one recognizes that the mind is empty. From the state of emptiness, clarity, and limpidity in unceasing great joy, it spontaneously arises as manifold appearances, like the moon's reflections in water. By realizing this, one recognizes emptiness as spontaneous presence. Thus, from simple spontaneous presence arising and release occur spontaneously, without wavering from immutable great bliss that is clear, empty, spontaneous, and free of elaboration, like a snake that unravels its own knots. By ascertaining this, one recognizes spontaneous presence as self-liberating."

(Wangchuk Dorje: Pointing Out the Dharmakaya, quoted in Spacious Path to Freedom, p 120-121)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 8:10 PM

Title: Re: Pointing Out through Appearances

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I am very interested in 'mind-only', but I find these teachings pretty hard to interpret on face value. If you are injured or hurt, that has consequences beyond the purely conceptual, doesn't it? How is that 'a mental fabrication'?

Astus wrote:

That area is covered under the topic of "attachment to body", right from the early teachings, as in Satipatthana for instance. It starts with the concept there there is such a thing as a "body", and goes up to "my body is injured". Consider the difference between seeing a stranger hurt, seeing a family member hurt, and feeling your toe hurt. Or the difference between a falling vase and the falling of your favourite vase from grandma.

Wayfarer said:

Same could be said for all manner of experiences, especially painful or injurious ones; we have to deal with the reality of such things. How can they be regarded as mental fabrications?

Astus wrote:

There are a number of teachings on handling pain, e.g.:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn36/sn36.004.than.html> and

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn36/sn36.006.than.html>. That is, when a sensory impression occurs, it is first of all experienced by the mind. Then it is judged and identified by the mind. Following that one associates the perception with a number of other concepts, thus integrating it in one's general view of oneself and the world.

After that intention arises about what to do, and that is followed by action. So, even if one were to say that the initial point of bodily impression is not a mental fabrication, following that they all are.

Wayfarer said:

I can see how it applies to many of the things that people assume are real, or to things that we attribute importance to. I get that, but I can't see how it applies to the raw truth of experience as such.

Astus wrote:

What is the raw truth of experience? Is it important? Is it personal?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 8:48 PM

Title: Re: Merit -- how would you explain this?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Think good -> do good -> feel good -> see good.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 11:56 PM

Title: Re: Pointing Out through Appearances

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

Okay -- sorry to be thick-headed here -- how does this apply to daily interactions with others? Acquaintances, friends, relatives, significant others, etc? These are statements indicating how things are, but what do we do with this knowledge when we interact?

Astus wrote:

One usual source of suffering is interpreting others' actions as being personally addressed towards oneself. Instead of that one should recognise how one's own reactions, feelings and thoughts originate not from others but one's own mind. Thus the reason to be moved - conceptually and emotionally - by others is cut off, that way eliminating afflictions. It also prevents falling for stereotypes, assumptions and categorisations that one readily projects on people. Ultimately it shows the futility of relying on expectations and opens up one's mind to changing situations, at the same time giving insight into how people's minds function, where their suffering comes from, and hence compassion towards them becomes natural. So, it is not really that there is something in particular to do, but one should fully understand the meaning of the teaching in one's experience, then the effects manifest.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 14th, 2015 at 6:15 AM

Title: Re: Pointing Out through Appearances

Content:

florin said:

I would think that for the purpose of establishing the truth of this point one would have to be able to distinguish between an appearing object and an apprehended object because conflating the two can lead to various errors and deviations such as saying that the outer objects are created by mind, etc...

Astus wrote:

Whatever can be called an appearance is an experience. Experience can exist only within consciousness, as besides consciousness there is no awareness of anything, otherwise we would be experiencing things unconsciously. It is indeed a deviation to say that outer objects are created by the mind, since there are no objects outside the mind anywhere.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 14th, 2015 at 11:38 PM

Title: Re: Pointing Out through Appearances

Content:

pothigai said:

What do you mean by 'consciousness' or 'mind'? They seem to have a meaning equivalent to 'experience' or 'appearance' in this context.

Astus wrote:

By consciousness/mind I simply meant the faculty of being conscious. It is inseparable from experience, as experience is necessarily an instance of consciousness. Similarly, whatever can be called an appearance is an experience. But for the sake of communication experience/consciousness can be divided to subject (mind) and object (mental event). In Mahamudra this is called "spontaneous presence" and "co-emergence", the unity of emptiness and awareness/appearances.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 15th, 2015 at 7:02 PM

Title: Re: The Big Bang and the Heart Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Emptiness is not a substratum whence things emerge, that is a very mistaken interpretation. The Heart Sutra is perfectly clear on this, saying that the five aggregates and emptiness are one and the same. So, turning emptiness into the source of the universe not only contradicts the established cosmology but also the basic principles of Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 16th, 2015 at 4:01 AM

Title: Re: The Big Bang and the Heart Sutra

Content:

Serenity509 said:

My Dharma friend, did you read this article, and if so, could you please tell me where, specifically, this article is incorrect?

Astus wrote:

It is wrong in its assumption that things come from or are created by emptiness. As it starts here:

"It has always been Buddhism's contention that all things are "One", as seen in the video from the previous post. This means that all physical phenomena, including human beings and everything that surrounds them, come from the same origin. They are different only in the way they are manifested, which is the result of nothing more than the differences in the type of atoms they have and the way these atoms are arranged. Despite their differences, they share the same "Essence"."

Not to mention that it fails to give a definition of emptiness, besides it being inexplicable, it takes it as some sort of substratum or even a creator deity. Naturally, from then on all comparisons it tries to make cannot actually apply to the Buddha's teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 16th, 2015 at 6:33 PM

Title: Re: The Big Bang and the Heart Sutra

Content:

Serenity509 said:

If a Buddhist were asked what existed before the Big Bang, if it were shown the Big Bang as the universe's origin is actually true, the answer should be simple: Dharmakaya existed before the Big Bang. Very simple.

Astus wrote:

As I have already commented on the error in the referenced article, it seems redundant to repeat the same claims without establishing them in the Buddha's teachings. The very idea of a beginning is directly against such fundamental doctrines as dependent origination. Therefore, whatever scientific source you quote to claim a real beginning, has no relevance whatsoever to Buddhism.

There is an entire samyutta (the 15th) on the topic of no discernible beginning. Here is a quote from the first sutta (SN 15.1, tr Bhikkhu Bodhi):

"Bhikkhus, this samsara is without discoverable beginning. A first point is not discerned of beings roaming and wandering on hindered by ignorance and fettered by craving. Suppose, bhikkhus, a man would cut up whatever grass, sticks, branches, and foliage there are in this Jambudipa and collect them together into a single heap. Having done so, he would put them down, saying [for each one]: 'This is my mother, this my mother's mother.' The sequence of that man's mothers and grandmothers would not come to an end, yet the grass, wood, branches, and foliage in this Jambudipa would be used up and exhausted. For what reason? Because, bhikkhus, this samsara is without discoverable beginning. A first point is not discerned of beings roaming and wandering on hindered by ignorance and fettered by craving. For such a long time, bhikkhus, you have experienced suffering, anguish, and disaster, and swelled the cemetery. It is enough to experience revulsion towards all formations, enough to become dispassionate towards them, enough to be liberated from them.”

And from a definitive Mahayana source, Nagarjuna's Middle Treatise, 11.1 (tr Ocean of Reasoning, p 266):

"When asked if the beginning is known,
The great sage said “no.”
Cyclic existence is without origin or terminus.
Because there is no beginning or end."

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2015 at 1:48 AM

Title: Re: Can women become Buddhas?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Anyone who thinks 'I'm a woman' or 'a man' or 'Am I anything at all?' — that's who Mara's fit to address."

(<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn05/sn05.002.than.html>)

"Good man, it is in this sense that good men and good women who listen to this Mahayana Great Nirvana Sutra will always decry the marks that characterize a female and seek to be male . Why? Because this Mahayana scripture has the characteristic of manliness (pauruṣa). I am referring to buddha-nature. If someone does not understand buddhanature, then he does not have male characteristics. Why do I say this? Because he cannot grasp the fact that the buddha-nature exists within himself. I would say those unable to know the buddha-nature are to be called women. I would say those who are able to know themselves that the buddha-nature exists are characteristically male. If a woman is able to know definitively that the buddha-nature exists within herself, you should know that this constitutes her as male."

(Nirvana Sutra, p 301-302, tr Blum, BDK Edition / p 135 in tr Yamamoto)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2015 at 4:07 AM

Title: Re: Can women become Buddhas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

This is clearly chauvinistic and merely perpetuates androcentrism and misogyny in the Dharma.

Astus wrote:

Yes, and before that section in the Nirvana Sutra it talks about how women are full of insatiable desire. However, the reason I quoted it is, that it can be taken as one way of Buddhist scriptures tackling widespread misogyny prevalent in texts and societies. Instead of reading the negative characteristics of female birth as referring to biology, it transforms that to a spiritual level. Sure, it's not that same as what one finds in the Soma Sutta and others claiming sex to be another mistaken self-identity, but as tathagatagarbha teachings are transitory teachings from self-view to no-self, it fits well into the scheme of gradually eliminating sexism.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 30th, 2015 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: Buddha-nature and Non-Self

Content:

Astus wrote:

To realise that there is nothing stable (self) in the six sensory areas is attaining buddha-nature (self). Thus no self is the real self.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 30th, 2015 at 7:29 PM

Title: Re: Is doing art just a waste of time?

Content:

Astus wrote:

As I see it, the question is: What is not a waste of time?

Time goes by no matter what. Is art more, less, or equally as valuable as sitting on the toilet? Are social and religious values better, worse, or the same as arbitrary personal judgements? Can we even judge something independent of already integrated views?

Buddhist morality puts emphasis not on the act but the intention. Intention can be wholesome, unwholesome and neutral. Maybe you should measure art that way.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 1st, 2015 at 12:21 AM

Title: Starting Zen Practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is a geographical problem. Locate the nearest Zen group, then visit them.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 1st, 2015 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: Starting Zen Practice

Content:

Rita_Repulsa said:

I'm a bit drawn to Dogen. Is "Zen just Zen," in the sense that I shouldn't have to worry too much about sectarian differences? If that's the case, I'll just take a trip.

Astus wrote:

Probably the only time to worry about sectarian differences is when you want to win a sectarian debate. Otherwise, you need to look around and see what fits your taste. Likely it will have more to do with the individuals in the group than their affiliation with some bigger organisation.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 1st, 2015 at 3:08 AM

Title: Re: Starting Zen Practice

Content:

Caodemarte said:

If it is true Zen practice then won't you end up at the same place no matter what color robes are worn?

Astus wrote:

Rather it should be genuine bodhisattva practice. Teachers provide various means to help others, that's their bodhisattva activity. Disciples need to cultivate open ears and open mind, that's their bodhisattva activity. Teachers and disciples share the same vows and aspirations of saving all beings and attaining unsurpassed enlightenment.

Zen is pointing directly to the mind to see nature (kensho) and become buddha. What is the mind? The mind is buddha. Nothing to add, nothing to remove, just as it is: changing moment to moment.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 2nd, 2015 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: Places to Ordain in the Chinese Tradition

Content:

Astus wrote:

What kind of monasticism do you think there was until the mid-20th century? As far as I am aware, the great communities in Taiwan mentioned here are not that different at all, and in some ways even better because of the modern conditions and such. Still, if you want to ordain in Taiwan or PRC, you need to be able to speak Chinese (eventually). Most of the smaller Buddhist churches and even larger monasteries do not have English language websites, except for tourists.

Another thing to keep in mind is that the whole monastic realm is not like a restaurant chain where you can rely on some quality control and order whatever food you like. On the ground things might turn out to be quite different from what you would expect, for better or worse. Not because no information is available, but because there are aspects one may not think of beforehand, like all the rituals and ceremonies, or the kinds of food they have, etc.

A good thing about such organisations like FGS is that you can actually visit them, even spend some time there if you like, and they are not only prepared for that, but invite people.

I don't know what books you have read about Chan, but maybe you should read for instance Holmes Welch's work: <https://books.google.com/books?id=17PBC3e4dmMC>. And some other relevant works, like <https://books.google.com/books?id=rU5AgAAQBAJ>, <https://books.google.com/books?id=nYdOnj41h-AC>, <https://books.google.com/books?id=dWL6EEkL8goC>, <https://books.google.com/books?id=efwxhVSRJv0C>, <https://books.google.com/books?id=J1tZBMy52oYC>, <https://books.google.com/books?id=0D0IUv8NeWMC>, <https://books.google.com/books?id=pSazfSorJzgC>, and others that discuss the social history of Buddhism in China. It clarifies how the Chan world that may come through their own religious works (i.e. Chan books) is little more than a myth.

Also, Chan actually means Chinese Buddhism, with all its teachings, practices and rituals. There is no exclusive Chan school where monks sit all day long contemplating an old phrase. At the same time, one may find places where one can find certain practitioners who focus more on meditation than other matters. Even more so, if one is drawn to emulating the old masters of the Chan school, that means long solitary retreats, just as Xuyun did, and so did people like Shengyan (founder of Dharma Drum) and Weijue (founder of Chung Tai).

The best way to get information on places of ordination is to establish a personal connection with the people of the nearest Chinese Buddhist community. Then they can refer you to their home monastery.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 3rd, 2015 at 6:05 PM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://www.simplybeing.co.uk/about-james-low/> is an English Dzogchen teacher (so is <http://www.keithdowman.net/>, but he doesn't really go to the UK), and there are many fine teachings available on his website.

As for the whole status of the Vajrayana tradition from a Theravadin perspective, you can take it as similar to the individual teachings of people like Ajahn Mun and Ledi Sayadaw. Not exactly the words of the Buddha, but rather something that comes from insight based on the Dharma. What can be somewhat confusing at the beginning is the different terminology, but eventually you may find that essentially they teach the same thing of anicca, dukkha, and anatta.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 3rd, 2015 at 7:24 PM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Astus wrote:

Not exactly the words of the Buddha, but rather something that comes from insight based on the Dharma.

Vasana said:

Not exactly true within the context of Dzogchen. Not the words of the historical flesh-and-blood Buddha, but the words from the perspective of the primordial Buddha, which is timeless realization it's self. Something not far away, but temporarily obscured.

Astus wrote:

I don't really see the difference there. You call it "primordial Buddha, which is timeless realization itself". I called it "insight based on the Dharma". Insight = realisation. Dharma = primordial Buddha. Nevertheless, I meant it as a possible approach from a Theravadin perspective, not as Dzogchen's self-definition.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 3rd, 2015 at 9:56 PM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

fckw said:

With "countering" I did not mean that you do it during Vipassana practice. But there is a presumption that certain mind states are actually negative and others are positive, and as a consequence that you should avoid the negative ones and cultivate the positive ones. This simply does not hold in Dzogchen in the same way. In Dzogchen, to see things as primordially pure is an important meditation instruction. However, if they indeed are this way, there cannot be such a thing as "negative mind states".

Astus wrote:

Dzogchen maintains the distinction between wholesome and unwholesome, otherwise it'd be in denial in a way they accuse Hashang's doctrine. It's just that in terms of view one realises that all phenomena are empty, thus no need to grasp or reject. Same is taught in Theravada with the contemplation on the three characteristics.

fckw said:

Furthermore, another important difference is that according to the Theravadin tradition there's no such a thing as rigpa, whereas in Dzogchen rigpa is the "underlying mind" of all appearances (and the primordial ground, kun zhi, is again underlying rigpa), and the five skandhas are seen as five different forms of wisdom. In Theravada there's actually nothing beyond the 5 skandhas. A more informed discussion of the matter can be found <http://vajracakra.com/viewtopic.php?f=23&t=1342>.

Astus wrote:

Rigpa is the knowing of reality, and such knowledge is the goal of Theravada as well. Assuming a self (an absolute) beyond the five aggregates is denied not only in Theravada but in Mahayana as well. There is also no disagreement in that it's not the skandhas themselves that are the problem but the attachment to them based on ignorance. So once reality is seen (no self inside, outside or in between the aggregates), there is no clinging, and without clinging there is liberation. Although that doesn't mean that there is no difference in terminology and in some methods.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 3rd, 2015 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: Starting Zen Practice

Content:

Rita_Repulsa said:

The necessity of a teacher, however, is my biggest concern. I suppose I'll have to read up and reach out.

Astus wrote:

You have to meet a teacher to see if you can become a student.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 4th, 2015 at 12:21 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dzogchen maintains the distinction between wholesome and unwholesome...

Malcolm said:

Citation please, from an original Dzogchen text.

Astus wrote:

"It is the very state of unawareness, which is the cause of delusion. In that state you suddenly lose consciousness, and from that unclear state fear comes into being. From that arises clinging to self and clinging to other as enemy. This habitual tendency gradually grows, and from this a progressive entry into samsara occurs. Next, the five poisons of the passions develop, and the karma of these five poisons is unceasing."
(http://www.vajrayana.org/media/files/files/d74e3a90/Kunzang_Monlam_letter_format.pdf)

Malcolm said:

If you think Dzogchen can be summed up by the two kinds of selflessness [persons and phenomena], you have not understood Dzogchen at all.

Astus wrote:

"Mipham Rinpoche tells us that we should not understand what appears and what is empty in the way that we understand light and darkness. The proper way for us to understand them is as fire and warmth. In this way, we become skillful at understanding emptiness and dependent arising, dependent arising and emptiness. There is no more profound understanding of the view of Dzogchen than this."

(Anyen Rinpoche: Journey to Certainty, p 134-135)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 4th, 2015 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, but where is anything defined as wholesome or unwholesome? Something to be accepted as opposed to something be to be rejected?

Astus wrote:

The text goes on about the five poisons and how they're remedied by recognising the natural state. It also mentions the six realms here and there. Since it recognises the various types of births, as they depend on good and bad inclinations, it includes the system of the wholesome and unwholesome states. Of course, it is not really a text to get into the details of karma, but it is obviously presupposed.

Malcolm said:

[T]he emptiness arrived at through the power of analysis does not rise above a nonaffirming negation, it does not become the view of Mantra...Someone who maintains that emptiness is good and maintains that existence is bad places great importance on the nonaffirming negation. The Bhagavan said that it is better to abide in a view of the personality complex the size of a mountain. The view of the nonexistence of the personality complex is wrong.

Astus wrote:

The quote from Anyen Rinpoche talks about the unity of emptiness and appearances as the correct view, and not to take them separately. I see no contradiction between the two quotes.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 4th, 2015 at 2:55 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Malcolm said:

It describes the state of samsara, but it does not recommend some practice of accepting and rejecting wholesome and unwholesome things.

Astus wrote:

It doesn't have to, as pure view also means pure conduct, the natural manifestation of buddha activities. But, as I said before, the teachings do not say that within samsara there are no good and bad, it's just that for a dzogchenpa the solution to that is the ultimate approach of neither grasping nor rejecting.

"Briefly, for the best practitioners,
Unwholesome thoughts are settled in the dharmakaya.
Good thoughts, bad thoughts — both are on a level.
Therefore there's no need for antidotes."
(Treasury of Precious Qualities, vol 2, p 58)

Malcolm said:

In the Commentary on Liquid Gold, Ju Mipham asks the question: Also, in terms of the claim, “appearance and emptiness are nondual,” what is the single identity holding both appearance and emptiness together as one thing?

One can say that appearances and emptiness are 'du bral med, that is, they cannot be put together ['du] or separated [bral], in other words, they are whole and indivisible, but to say they are a union, well, that involves a whole other set of problems as Ju Mipham points out.

Astus wrote:

I used the word unity, as in "one" and "single". There is no selflessness or emptiness as a thing or being anywhere, it's just how appearances are. Otherwise it would be assuming a self outside the aggregates, or taking the aggregates as one thing and emptiness another.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 4th, 2015 at 4:26 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Malcolm said:

as the Soaring Great Garuda states:
Butchering, prostitution, the five uninterrupted deeds, immoral behavior and that avoided by the world, are totally perfect, the nectar of Dharma — there is nothing other than great bliss.

Astus wrote:

It clearly says they are immoral behaviour. So there is awareness of a difference between good and bad. It's another thing that it claims that nothing can defile primordial purity, a logical consequences of the oneness of samsara and nirvana. Still it maintains that for the deluded beings of the world those are unwholesome activities.

Malcolm said:

Yup, but you did not answer Mipham's question.

Astus wrote:

"what is the single identity holding both appearance and emptiness together as one thing?"

The question assumes that appearances and emptiness are two and need holding together. I do not hold such an assumption.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 4th, 2015 at 5:39 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Malcolm said:

The Dzogchen point of view is that delusion is just delusion, and there is no liberation through engaging in deluded virtue, let alone avoiding deluded nonvirtue.

Astus wrote:

So says everyone else in Buddhism. Skilful and unskilful acts bring about karmic results within samsara, and I see no denial of that in Dzogchen either, since it does talk about the lower and higher realms.

Malcolm said:

You have not eliminated the reification of oneness and manyness, that is the point of the question.

Astus wrote:

Are we still on the subject of selflessness?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 4th, 2015 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Malcolm said:

Therefore, it is shown that there is not the slightest difference between Buddha Samantabhadra and the King of Hell, Dharmarāja.

-- Vimalamitra

Astus wrote:

Yes, both good and bad dharmas are empty, kleshas are bodhi, and samsara is nirvana. That is not the same as refuting/denying the conventional existence of wholesome and unwholesome for deluded beings, as the driving forces behind the various forms of birth, as stated in the referenced aspiration prayer for instance. I did not say that Dzogchen uses specific antidotes, just that it recognises the function of various mental inclinations.

Malcolm said:

We were on your point about union of appearance and emptiness.

Astus wrote:

And they are so, nobody claimed otherwise. What you seemed to object against was summing up the ultimate view as the two kinds of selflessness, I guess because it may be mistaken for some annihilationist extreme, while Dzogchen likes to equally emphasise awareness and emptiness as the inseparable nature of mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 12:13 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Malcolm said:

What denial are you claiming would be a result if Dzogchen does not make this distinction?

Astus wrote:

The problem (Hashang and his black and white clouds) is detailed in e.g. Lamrim Chenmo, vol 2, p 87-89. At the same time, Longchenpa in the Way of Abiding, p 134-135, says that Dzogchen does agree with such a view that's criticised by Tsongkhapa and others. As I take it, they can be consolidated, if statements are put in the right context.

Malcolm said:

In point of fact, Ju Mipham, since you invoked him, is not comfortable with the idea that there is a "union" or "nonduality" of appearance and emptiness, this is why he questions the idea.

The ultimate view of Dzogchen is not merely the two kinds of selflessness. It goes beyond that. Mipham's perspective, again, since you brought him up, is that the view of sūtra does not approach the view of mantra.

Astus wrote:

Terms like appearance and emptiness are meant for guidance, not for getting hung up on them and splitting hairs. But as it usually happens, things can deteriorate to the point where terminology needs to be reviewed.

What higher view can be presented than not being bound by any view? It would be falling back to clinging to views.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 12:54 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Malcolm said:

Thus the view in Dzogchen is the direct perception of pristine consciousness introduced by the guru, it is not a result of intellectual analysis.

Astus wrote:

That's at best a difference in method, of how to relinquish attachment, but not in what is realised. Or it is about criticising those who mistake emptiness for a reified concept of emptiness, a position already rejected by Nagarjuna and his followers.

Malcolm said:

What single entity ties them together? You still did not answer the question.

Astus wrote:

Tying together would need two things to be tied together. Who would consider that there is such a thing as "selflessness" on the one hand and "aggregates" on the other? It makes no sense. Even saying that there is a thing/being/object as "selflessness" is misreading the expression, like saying that one's pocket is filled with "pennilessness".

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Malcolm said:

Really? Than please tell us what is to be realized.

Astus wrote:

The emptiness of self and phenomena, what else?

Malcolm said:

That is exactly what "union" means, tying two things together, for example, the union of a man and a woman.

Astus wrote:

For educational purposes it is fine to talk of emptiness, appearances and their unity. Then eventually it becomes clear that all three terms are conventional expressions.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 2:05 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Malcolm said:

What else is to be realized? Vidyā.

Astus wrote:

What more does vidya include?

Malcolm said:

Apparently not, otherwise, Mipham would not have taken it to task.

Astus wrote:

I am not familiar with Mipham's intellectual-cultural context, where such terminology was a problem, but I can imagine such a situation. Still, it doesn't look like that everyone in Tibetan Buddhism stopped using it.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 5:00 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Malcolm said:

Mipham writes in his Original Mind:

Once one has realized the meaning of the Great Perfection (the conclusion of the Dharma of the eight vehicles that make mind into the path) which makes pristine consciousness into the path, it is explained that buddhahood will not be attained until the vidyā of the Great Perfection, self-originated pristine consciousness, is realized. In other words, buddhahood does not come about solely from realizing emptiness, the dharmatā of emptiness, buddhahood requires realizing vidyā, the dharmatā of the mind.

Astus wrote:

And what is the dharmata of the mind? That it is without inherent existence. That is what should become clear to anyone investigating the aggregates and the sensory areas. How is that any different from simply calling it "realising emptiness"?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 5:23 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Malcolm said:

Just that is, according to Mipham, "...the ultimate state of the sublime Dharma."

Astus wrote:

Seems to be no different from the Yogacara term citta-dharmata, that is actually the same as emptiness.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 5:47 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Unknown said:

they hold that as truly existent

Astus wrote:

I don't see that accusation valid, at least not against Vasubandhu.

Dzogchen: "empty knowing dharmatā of the mind of the eight consciousness"

Yogacara: "empty intrinsically knowing pristine consciousness"

Both sound to me like a non-abiding mind. Also,

"What is the difference between ordinary wisdom, which arises from a mind endowed with subject/object grasping, and individually self-cognizant wisdom? Ordinary, conventional superior wisdom arisen from intellect differentiates between subject and object, this and that, whereas these defining characteristics of ordinary mind are nowhere to be found in individually self-cognizant wisdom. There is no ordinary apprehension or conceptualization whatsoever. Thus, to recognize the level of wisdom that is being expressed by the mind, we must become skillful at noticing and cutting through any mode of grasping."

(Journey to Certainty, p 119)

and

"the perception of samsara is nothing more than the result of subject/object grasping. When grasping is not present, this is liberation."

(Journey to Certainty, p 146)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm said:

it is definitely valid

Astus wrote:

That would mean that they still maintain a real subject, contradicting themselves.

Malcolm said:

No, the second is svasamvedana [rang rig] that is merely empty of subject and object, but truly exists -- standard Yogacara.

Astus wrote:

True existence of a mind without subject-object would be no different from some concept of a self, actually a subject without object. But they state explicitly that neither outer objects nor an inner mind is established as anything real.

"Through the perception

That there is only thought,

There arises the non-perception of knowable things;

Through the non-perception of knowable things,

There arises the non-perception of thought, too."

(Treatise on the Three Natures, v 36, tr Kochumuttom)

See also: Treatise in Thirty Stanzas, v 26-29.

Malcolm said:

There is an important citation in the Inlaid Jewels Tantra that clarifies the difference between these two:

Untainted vidyā is the kāya of pristine consciousness.

Since intrinsic knowing [rang rig, svasaṃvedana] is devoid of actual signs of awakening, it is not at all the pristine consciousness of vidyā [rig pa'i ye shes].

Astus wrote:

The reason I brought that citation is to show that the difference between knowing and unknowing lies in the presence or absence of dual vision. Self-awareness is another matter.

Malcolm said:

Might I suggest that if you are going to argue about Tibetan traditions, you do so on the basis of understanding Tibetan and the etymologies of Sanskrit terms in Tibetan?

Astus wrote:

Certainly a useful thing. But here it's just your quote's definitions that looked similar. I'm happy to receive clarifications.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 7:58 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm said:

With respect to the Yogacara school, they do indeed posit an ultimate consciousness — it is the meaning of line of Madhyantavibhaga, "The imagination of the unreal exists..." and so on, though I understand it is fashionable these days to try and rescue Yogacara from being hoisted on its own petard.

Astus wrote:

As I read it, the Madhyantavibhaga there says nothing different from what Nagarjuna writes about the equality between dependent origination and emptiness. It is also repeated in how the three natures are explained. If that means Yogacara is at fault, then so is Madhyamaka.

Malcolm said:

Yes, that is the whole point.

Astus wrote:

That's quite a huge point, putting Yogacara into the position of not only a less developed view, but actually means that they massively failed in setting up a coherent system. Then it is certainly strange how Yogacara has such a big influence on virtually every Mahayana (incl. Vajrayana) school. So, I'm still doubtful about that interpretation's validity.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 8:07 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

(1) vidya = direct knowledge of the dharmata of the mind, and the dharmata of the mind = self-originated pristine consciousness.

(2) in Ch'an there is no realization of the dharmata of the mind (= self-originated pristine consciousness); instead there is the realization of emptiness, which is an entirely different (because incomplete) realization.

Does the difference boil down to the dharmata being understood differently in Ch'an and Vajrayana/Dzogchen?

If so, how are their understandings different?

Astus wrote:

Beings are made of body-mind, the five aggregates, the six sensory areas. To realise their emptiness is to see their true nature (dharmata). Not to see the true nature of the mind would mean that someone understands only that the body is empty but not the mind. A highly unlikely situation for a Buddhist practitioner. Unless Dzogchen posits something beyond the possible realm of experience (body-mind), the difference you mention is non-existent.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm said:

The Madhyantavibhanga is basically asserting that the perfect is the absence of the imagined in the dependent. The dependent however is never refuted. It is the emptiness that exists in which no duality exists.

Frankly, I am a little surprised that you don't understand the difference between Madhyamaka and Yogacara. Yogacarins and Madhymakas in India certainly understood the differences between their respective schools, and there is an extensive polemical literature which exists between them detailing the differences.

Astus wrote:

In the basic works of Asanga and Vasubandhu there is no attack against Nagarjuna's teachings or Prajnaparamita works in general. While there were people in the later centuries who thought in terms of opposing views, there were others who could put the two into a single system.

Just as the dependent is the ultimate without the imagined, so is seeing the inseparability of interdependence and emptiness, the conventional and the ultimate, is called the middle way. Not reifying appearances is seeing their dependent-empty nature for both Yogacara and Madhyamaka.

Regarding their differences, Yijing's summary (quoted by Malcolm David Eckel in his "Bhavaviveka and His Buddhist Opponents", p 95; and "Undigested Pride" in "Madhyamaka and Yogacara - Allies or Rivals?", p 133) sounds nice and succinct: "For Yogacara ultimate (真) is (有), conventional (俗) isn't (無). They use the three natures as the foundation. For Madhyamaka ultimate isn't, conventional is. Indeed the two truths is primary [for them]. The Prajnaparamita's great teaching contains both ideas." (T40n1817p783a29-b1)

In East Asian Buddhism they talk about the two approaches to the Dharma in terms of existence/is (you/u 有) and non-existence/isn't (wu/mu 無), what appears in the popular question about the http://www.sanbo-zen.org/shoyoroku_18.pdf. But it's been synthesised early on in Tiantai's https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tiantai#The_Threefold_Truth, so they likely did not miss the later Indian developments of first Madhyamaka and Yogacara attacking each other, then their coming together in the teachings of for instance Shantarakshita and Kamalashila.

Malcolm said:

Please give us a specific example of how Yogacara doxology influences Vajrayāna? You surely are aware that Tantras such as the Hevajra subordinate Yogacara to Madhyamaka? And are you sure that it is not merely a case of Madhyamakas using terminology found in Yogacara but repurposing it?

Astus wrote:

Look at this thread as an example:

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=100&t=13491>. There's also the whole Shentong teaching among Nyingmapas and Kagyupas, of which Brunnholz writes: "what is called Shentong is nothing other than the Yogacara (Yoga Practice) system of Maitreya, Asanga, and Vasubandhu, also called "the lineage of vast activity."" (Center of the Sunlit Sky, p 445)

Malcolm said:

As long as you think the unconditioned nature of the mind is merely emptiness, for that long you will never understand either Dzogchen or Mahāmudra.

Astus wrote:

Mind, per definition, is conscious. To say that the mind is empty is to say that awareness is empty. It's not denying awareness, nor is it reducing it to insentience. Awareness is the interdependent stream of experiences, and it is not separate from its insubstantiality. Mind is conditioned, that's why it is without essence, otherwise it would not function at all. So being conditioned is the unconditioned, and unconditioned is the conditioned itself. How is that wrong for Dzogchen?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 7th, 2015 at 6:23 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm said:

Sure there are.

Astus wrote:

Just as Madhyamaka affirms a conventional dependent origination and does not claim total non-existence, the same is stated by saying that there is a dependent nature.

"How should one understand the other-dependent pattern? It should be understood through the teaching on such similes as a magic trick, a mirage, a dream trace, a shadow, a reflection, a valley echo, the moon in water, a transformation." (section 26)

Candrakirti's critique does not apply, when it is understood that the lack of subject and object means the incorrect reification is no more, otherwise it would be self-defeating, asking for a self to perceive no-self.

Malcolm said:

For example? Who did do you gave in mind?

Astus wrote:

Yes, Shantarakshita and Kamalashila, as they go from mind-only to analysis of emptiness. Shentong seems like another good example. Or here's a modern one:

"We can look at these two views and take the stand that Nagarjuna's view is correct and Asanga's view is incorrect, or we can consider Asanga's view as correct and Nagarjuna's view as incorrect. Jamgon Kongtrul, however, says that this is not the way to look at this issue at all. We should not think, "One side is correct, therefore the other side must be wrong." Instead, we should realized these two views are a unity with neither side being right or wrong."

(Thrangu Rinpoche: "Two Views of Emptiness: Shentong and Rangtong", p 118)

Malcolm said:

Yogachara and Madhyamaka did not "come together" in Shantarakshita because the latter never uses the scheme of the three own natures, which is the key doctrine of the Yogacara school.

Astus wrote:

Why is that the key doctrine? They also have quite a few other unique ideas. I'd say the teaching of mind only is an equally important teaching for instance.

Malcolm said:

No, even Karl B recognizes that the system of the three own natures used by Maitreya, Asanga and Vasubandhu [type a] is not the system used by the gzhan stong pas [type b].

Astus wrote:

What is the difference? Or if you have a book reference, that might be enough as well.

Malcolm said:

What Tibetan term do you mean for awareness? Rig pa?

Astus wrote:

It's nothing like that. You can change that word to consciousness or mind. What I try to highlight is that the quality of consciousness/awareness is already and necessarily present in the mind (mental aggregates), and generally in the whole realm of experience, since without being aware/conscious of something, one cannot say that it is experienced.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 7th, 2015 at 4:38 PM

Title: Re: Tanaka & Robertson on Ch'an vs Dzogchen

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

Yet there is a difference, since for Ch'an the fundamental root is to be sought, while for rDzogs-chen the intrinsic awareness is spontaneous.

Astus wrote:

The third practice as taught by Bodhidharma (from the same text that talks about wall-contemplation):

"Third, to seek nothing. Ordinary people, in their perpetual ignorance, crave and form attachments to everything, everywhere. This is called seeking. The wise are awakened to the Truth, and choose reason over convention; even though their forms follow the law of causality, their minds are at peace and empty of effort. Since all existence is empty, there is nothing to be desired. Blessing and Darkness always follow each other. This long sojourn in the Triple Realm is like living in a burning house; to have a body is to suffer, how can one attain peace? Those who understand this renounce all mundane existence, cease desires, and stop seeking. The sutra says, "To seek is to suffer, to seek nothing is bliss." It follows that to seek nothing is to truly follow the Way. This is the practice of seeking nothing."

(http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enUS/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=146&Itemid=57)

Linji Yixuan:

"Bring to rest the thoughts of the ceaselessly seeking mind, and you will not differ from the patriarch-buddha. Do you want to know the patriarch-buddha? He is none other than you who stand before me listening to my discourse. But because you students lack faith in yourselves, you run around seeking something outside. Even if, through your seeking, you did find something, that something would be nothing more than fancy descriptions in written words; never would you gain the mind of the living patriarch. Make no mistake, worthy Chan men! If you don't find it here and now, you'll go on transmigrating through the three realms for myriads of kalpas and thousands of lives, and, held in the clutch of captivating circumstances, be born in the wombs of asses or cows."

(Record of Linji, p 8, tr Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 7th, 2015 at 6:19 PM

Title: Re: Tanaka & Robertson on Ch'an vs Dzogchen

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

If it is the same text, how do you account for the seeming inconsistency?

Astus wrote:

The text (Two Means and Four Practices) is not inconsistent. The first means, entering via principle (理 - principle, ultimate reality), practically means the realisation of how things actually are, i.e. suchness, buddha-nature. It says that one moves from being deluded to enlightened by non-discrimination, as all appearances are now seen as without essence. The second means, entering via practice (行 - practice, action), describes four ways to cultivate in a way that induces entering the principle, or in a sense cultivating the principle. It could be said that the difference between the two means is like jumping and walking, or theory and practice.

treehuggingoctopus said:

In the first passage you quote, this bit seem actually to be one of the problems which according to the authors Dzogchen has with Ch'an: 'Since all existence is empty, there is nothing to be desired'. The difference would appear to be between all existence being emptiness and everything being luminous display, would it not?

Astus wrote:

What is the difference between emptiness and luminous display? Emptiness means that there is nothing to grasp. Luminous display means that all experiences are the emanations of buddha-nature, thus there is nothing to fix. In both cases one remains unaffected and free, and appearances do not induce afflictions. Furthermore, Zen does also talk about all phenomena being the buddha-nature as well, it is not limited to only one kind of teaching, neither is Mahayana in general.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 7th, 2015 at 7:09 PM

Title: Re: Tanaka & Robertson on Ch'an vs Dzogchen

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

I think you are missing what the emotive difference between 'emptiness' and 'luminous display' points towards. The difference is even more visible if you compare the early Ch'an's 'all existence is emptiness'

Astus wrote:

Emotive difference is important, that's how people with various inclinations select their favourite tradition. But since it is more a matter of style than content, it is a question of skilful means used for the same purpose.

Early Chan is not just about emptiness. Shenxiu - the first imperially recognised Chan teacher - was quite strong on buddha-nature. In fact, the only group that seems to have emphasised mainly emptiness and Madhyamaka-style rhetoric was the Niutou school.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 7th, 2015 at 8:20 PM

Title: Re: Tanaka & Robertson on Ch'an vs Dzogchen

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

Imagine your girlfriend's reaction when you tell her that she does not exist, is perfectly empty of herself, no girlfriend in the girlfriend, zero inherent existence in her -- and in everything else, for that matter, too, she and everything else being equally empty and bereft of self-nature.

Astus wrote:

Let's change that a bit. Instead of talking about insubstantiality, tell her that everything down to the cellular level changes in her. That's no surprise really, fairly common knowledge. Then say that emotions, thoughts and even memories change. Not particularly surprising either. Since both body and mind are inconstant, there is no single entity to call one's self. Sounds logical even to ordinary intelligent people.

treehuggingoctopus said:

Compare that with her response to you telling her that she is perfectly and consummately divine, luminous and imbued with all the radiant potentiality there is -- as, fair enough, is everybody else and everything else.

Astus wrote:

That's very poetic, but unless such terminology is clarified, it doesn't mean much. So, what is being divine? Not omnipotent, omniscient or immortal, is it? Rather, it is a synonym for buddhahood, and that stands for being free from all afflictions and attachments, while at the same time fully compassionate and insightful. Now, that's quite a high standard to live up to, especially when one is in the role of a girlfriend, who not only is involved in a romantic relationship full of clinging, expectations and all sorts of other entrapments, but also lives the life of an ordinary person with family, work, personal goals, consumerism, and so on. Or, if one were to say that one is divine with all that included, the word becomes just a hollow term used for ego-boost. And when one is explained that one has to realise being divine through following a set of methods, the story about being perfectly divine becomes a bait, in other words, a skilful device to get people into Buddhism.

treehuggingoctopus said:

Maybe they understood the Buddhanature differently? That is what Malcolm suggested in the un/wholesome thread.

Astus wrote:

Without digressing into philosophical disputes, buddha-nature in Zen is just one's own mind. What is mind? This mind reading and thinking. Thoughts, emotions, impressions come and go. One doesn't have to do anything, as experiences are already ungraspable and naturally non-abiding. In other terms, the mind is free and aware just as it is.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 7th, 2015 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: Tanaka & Robertson on Ch'an vs Dzogchen

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

My point still stands: you have just introduced a third narration, which (if I read you correctly) you see as underlying the other two. OK. But the tension between the first two very much remains.

Astus wrote:

I meant it as another way to express the "no inherent existence" part, not a new narration. Wasn't intended to solve any tension.

treehuggingoctopus said:

That terminology does not mean much if you are looking at language the way Ayer or Carnap would

Astus wrote:

I'm no positivist, but I prefer accuracy (to a certain degree) over free style lyrics when discussing Buddhism in a written form.

treehuggingoctopus said:

and all of it is already divine, you do not have to work at it -- you need only recognise it.

Astus wrote:

Same with emptiness, impermanence, buddha-nature and the rest. However, recognising it is also changing it, as the very cause of clinging is ignorance. Remove ignorance and the whole illusory castle of samsara falls apart. And since rarely anyone can switch immediately from worrying about tonight's lottery numbers to "all is divine", there is a path involved.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 7th, 2015 at 10:17 PM

Title: Re: Tanaka & Robertson on Ch'an vs Dzogchen

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

I would not agree that it is an accuracy vs 'free style lyrics' match. When you say that all appearances are divine, you may be absolutely precise and spot-on (as Vajrayana teachings claim to be). Your statement may not be intersubjective in the sense of the word logical positivists used, though.

Astus wrote:

Yes, it can be perfectly accurate. When there is a definition. What does divine mean then?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 7th, 2015 at 11:09 PM

Title: Re: Tanaka & Robertson on Ch'an vs Dzogchen

Content:

DGA said:

Historical question:

Is there historical evidence to suggest that either Ch'an preceded Dzogchen historically, or that the reverse is true? I know that scholars prefer the former claim, but I'm increasingly inclined to the latter.

I'm not trying to claim that one is better than the other, merely to suggest that the influence may be stronger in one direction than the other. I'd be interested in a survey of the evidence going both ways.

Astus wrote:

What/Who is the first historically verifiable Dzogchen text and/or teacher?

John McRae (The Northern School and the Formation of Early Ch'an Buddhism, p 101-102) identifies a text from Dunhuang dated around 550-59 as the earliest of Chan work containing the Two Entrances and Four Practices attributed to Bodhidharma and some correspondence of Huike (see in English:

<https://books.google.com/books?id=BNfuSJ7cvnIC>). Other early notable people include Dayi Daoxin (580–651), Daman Hongren (601–674), Yuquan Shenxiu (606?-706) and Faru (638-689), and there is the famed Record of the Masters and Disciples of Lanka (https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Lengqie_shizi_ji) from 708 (see in English: <https://books.google.com/books?id=JlqVPwAACAAJ>).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2015 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm said:

Unlike Yogacara, Madhyamaka removes claims for existing existents.

Astus wrote:

I don't follow you here. What is an existing existent? Either something exists or not; and if it does, there is no need to double it.

Malcolm said:

Of course it applies — he proves that the other-dependent is incoherent.

Astus wrote:

It is only as incoherent as dependent origination, since dependent nature is just that: causality.

Malcolm said:

Because that is how they attempt to explain the meaning of mind-only.

Astus wrote:

It's not even mentioned in the Vimsatika that talks about consciousness only.

Malcolm said:

Yes, and for this reason, you don't really get the sense of Dzogchen. Mipham writes:

Astus wrote:

Do you mean that Dzogchen posits a consciousness of the type that's independent, unconditioned, removed from the five aggregates? If yes, it's difficult to maintain how that's not like an atman. If no, then I see no difference between what I said and what Mipham talks about.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2015 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Anders said:

This might be a can of worms, but are you effectively saying Vasubandhu et al were not aryas?

Malcolm said:

There is no way for me to know this as there is no way for me to know what their actual view and realization was.

Astus wrote:

Nevertheless, if they taught an incoherent and incorrect teaching, that is intentionally misleading people, something that's unfit for any bodhisattva.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2015 at 4:23 AM

Title: Re: Tanaka & Robertson on Ch'an vs Dzogchen

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

Some tentative answers here: <http://earlytibet.com/2008/01/24/early-dzogchen-iii/>

Astus wrote:

That makes it clear that Dzogchen occurred in its very early forms when in China Chan was already developing into various factions. Also, while Chan was very much <https://books.google.hu/books?id=1Tu-rQEACAAJ> around that time, there is no sign of Dzogchen in China as far as I'm aware, although there were some Indian masters who brought <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tangmi> into the Tang empire during the 7th-8th century.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2015 at 4:59 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm said:

For you, the dharmatā of the mind is only emptiness. For Mipham, the dharmatā of the mind is unconditioned jñāna.

Astus wrote:

Is jnana knowing, an active awareness of appearances? Or is it without knowing of objects? If the former, it is conditioned. If the latter, it is unaware. Or is it perhaps the stream of experiences that can be described as equally empty and conscious, but still without falling into being conditioned by subject and object?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2015 at 5:20 AM

Title: Re: Tanaka & Robertson on Ch'an vs Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm said:

Pretty defective buddhanature, I'd say.

Astus wrote:

What special features would you add?

Question: "What is called Buddha Mind?" Answer: "Mind's having no mark of variation is called Thusness. Mind's unchangeableness is called the Dharma Nature. Mind's not being connected to anything is called liberation. The mind nature's unimpededness is called enlightenment. The mind nature's quiescence is called nirvana."

(Bodhidharma Anthology, p 16)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2015 at 5:59 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm said:

Self-originated jñāna is the unconditioned essence of the eight consciousnesses, as Mipham puts it: [The] unconditioned self-originated wisdom of the original empty knowing dharmatā of the mind of the eight consciousness is the mind of luminosity. However, one needs to take care to understand what this "mind" is. Again, Mipham states: Here, dharmatā is called "original mind [ādyacitta]." Though it is explained with the name mind or vidyā from the aspect of being intrinsically clear, it is not the mind included with the conditioned eight consciousnesses.

Astus wrote:

All it seems to say is that the eight consciousnesses have the attribute of consciousness, and that is their inherent quality; and that quality is not any singular instance of being conscious of something, but it is true for all eight, so in a sense it is unconditioned and nothing in particular at the same time. Did I miss something?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2015 at 6:11 AM

Title: Re: Tanaka & Robertson on Ch'an vs Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm said:

Mipham might say: Since there is nothing to designate as being produced from a cause or generated by condition because the great emptiness that has always been self-originated is intrinsically luminous, it is self-originated pristine consciousness. That is the mind of dharmatā or the luminous pristine consciousness.

Astus wrote:

"Therefore, thought of the unreal from the outset is calmed, and sense objects from the outset are void. The mind of voidness and calm is a spiritual Knowing that never darkens. This calm Knowing of voidness and calm is precisely the mind of voidness and calm that Bodhidharma formerly transmitted. Whether you are deluded or awakened, mind from the outset is spontaneously Knowing. [Knowing] is not produced by conditions, nor does it arise in dependence on sense objects. Even during delusion the depravities are Knowing, but [Knowing] is not the depravities. Even during awakening the divine transformations are Knowing, but Knowing is not the divine transformations."
(Zongmi: Chan Letter in "Zongmi on Chan", p 88)

"If you wish to differ in no way from the patriarch-buddha, just don't seek outside. The pure light in a single thought of yours—this is the dharmakāya buddha within your own house. The nondiscriminating light in a single thought of yours—this is the sambhogakāya buddha within your own house. The nondifferentiating light in a single thought of yours—this is the nirmāṇakāya buddha within your own house. This threefold body is you, listening to my discourse right now before my very eyes."

(Record of Linji, p 9, tr Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2015 at 6:32 PM

Title: Re: Huang Po's One Mind & Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Rigpa is a concept, so is One Mind. Concepts exist dependent on other concepts, they don't actually possess any meaning of their own. Concepts are also thoughts that just come and go. If one grasps at a thought, at a concept, that means taking it as something substantial, real, personal, important. From that single grasping occurs numerous other ideas and a view is formed, from the view actions come, and so on. Better just see concepts and thoughts for what they are: dependent and unreliable. Not abiding on a single thought, that is what the Buddha's path is about. Is it rigpa or one mind then?

See: Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, in Zen Texts (BDK Edition), p 14, 23-25, tr McRae

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2015 at 10:20 PM

Title: Re: You Are Already Enlightened

Content:

Unknown said:

what is the role of cessation of thought in Ch'an/Zen?

Astus wrote:

See what is in the Platform Sutra (BDK Edition):

"If you empty your minds and sit in quietude, this is to become attached to the emptiness of blankness."

(ch 2, p 29)

"If one does not think of the hundred things in order to cause thought to be eradicated, this is bondage within the Dharma. This is called an extreme view."

(ch 2, p 34)

"Nonthought is to be without thought in the context of thoughts."

(ch 4, p 43)

"In this teaching of seated meditation, one fundamentally does not concentrate on mind, nor does one concentrate on purity, nor is it motionlessness. If one is to concentrate on the mind, then the mind [involved] is fundamentally false. You should understand that the mind is like a phantasm, so nothing can concentrate on it. If one is to concentrate on purity, then [realize that because] our natures are fundamentally pure, it is through false thoughts that suchness is covered up. Just be without false thoughts and the nature is pure of itself. If you activate your mind to become attached to purity, you will only generate the falseness of purity. The false is without location; it is the concentration that is false. Purity is without shape and characteristics; you only create the characteristics of purity and say this is 'effort' [in meditation]. To have such a view is to obscure one's own fundamental nature, and only to be fettered by purity."

(ch 5. p 45)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2015 at 10:26 PM

Title: Re: Huang Po's One Mind & Dzogchen

Content:

steve_bakr said:

You are very correct, of course. I was looking for a kind of ecumenical connection between Huang Po's Zen and Dzogchen, but your words transcend both sects, and are true in a more absolute sense.

Astus wrote:

There is connection, as both come from the perfect enlightenment of the Buddha, and both aim us toward the same liberation from suffering. Establishing a philosophical connection is a lot more complicated matter, as you can see for yourself in several threads on this forum debating the relationship between Zen and Dzogchen. But there is already a strong common basis for both not only in the words of the Buddha contained in the canonical scriptures, but also in the individuals' realisations preserved and passed on by the community.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2015 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: Huang Po's One Mind & Dzogchen

Content:

DGA said:

It would really help if someone who knows Huang Po's writings well and the context in which he wrote could give the characters that are translated as "One mind" or "universal mind" in English, and give a summary of how that is meant in the body of his teachings.

Astus wrote:

There are three translations out there:

<https://books.google.com/books?id=v5BxwNWlyfkC>,

<http://www.ymba.org/books/dharma-mind-transmission> and http://www.bdk.or.jp/pdf/bdk/digitald/dBET_ZenTexts_2005.pdf. They are all fine, as long as one can see how and what various terms mean.

One Mind (一心): As often in Chan texts, and other Chinese works, the numerical one is used instead of non-dual. They mean the same. Although "one mind" can also mean a one-pointed mind (concentration), that is not the case in Huangbo's work. As for its definition, it's already given in the text.

As for "universal mind", Blofeld writes (translator's intro, p 19): "In an earlier translation of the first part of this book, I ventured to substitute 'Universal Mind' for 'the One Mind', hoping that the meaning would be clearer. However, various critics objected to this, and I have come to see that my term is liable to a different sort of misunderstanding; it is therefore no improvement on 'the One Mind', which at least has the merit of being a literal translation."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2015 at 12:05 AM

Title: Re: Huang Po's One Mind & Dzogchen

Content:

DGA said:

心 translates the Sanskrit citta, correct? if so, then there's some basis for working out a textual comparison between Dzogchen and Ch'an on the basis of "mind."

Astus wrote:

I wouldn't go there. Chan is mainly about translating the Dharma to common Chinese and not about transplanting Indian Buddhism, as that's already happened through other channels. Although Chan teachers were (almost?) exclusively educated elite monastics, so references to texts and concepts of Indian origin is not unusual, but it is not the main characteristics of the tradition. There is even a slight division between the so called eight schools to Chinese (Tiantai, Huayan, Chan, Jingtu (Pure Land)) and Indian (Madhyamaka (Sanlun), Yogacara (Faxiang), Vinaya (Lu), Mantra (Zhenyan)), that signifies mostly their origin in a sense.

Xin (心) can mean all sorts of things, even contradictory ones within the same sentence. Or as an illustration for its versatile use, here is the entry from the Soothill-Hodous dictionary of Chinese Buddhism:

心

hrd, hrdaya 汗栗太 (or 汗栗馱); 紀哩馱 the heart, mind, soul; citta 質多 the heart as the seat of thought or intelligence. In both senses the heart is likened to a lotus. There are various definitions, of which the following are six instances: (1) 肉團心 hrd, the physical heart of sentient or nonsentient living beings, e. g. men, trees, etc. (2) 集起心 citta, the ālayavijñāna, or totality of mind, and the source of all mental activity. (3) 思量心 manas, the thinking and calculating mind; (4) 緣慮心; 了別心; 慮知心; citta; the discriminating mind; (5) 堅實心 the bhūtatathatā mind, or the permanent mind; (6) 積聚精要心 the mind essence of the sutras.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2015 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: Huang Po's One Mind & Dzogchen

Content:
Malcolm said:
All of these usages map to sems [citta] in Tibetan.

Astus wrote:
Well, then maybe it can work.

Author: Astus
Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2015 at 12:28 AM
Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen
Content:
Malcolm said:
If that were true, it would be a tautology and there would be no point.

Astus wrote:
Yes. Saying that consciousness is conscious is redundant.

Malcolm said:
It is saying that vijñāna/citta/manas has a dharmatā that is more than emptiness, which would render the dharmatā of the mind inert if all it was is emptiness. According to everything you have said, you maintain that the dharmatā of the mind is only emptiness.

Astus wrote:
The nature (dharmata) cannot be separate from the thing (dharma). To say that the mind is empty is meant to help one get rid of reified concepts and identities, not to establish an emptiness separately from the mind. The mind cannot be inert exactly because it is dependently originated and functional. To add a knowing/awareness as the source of the experiencing function of the mind sounds very much like denying the functionality of dependent origination and establishing a substance separately from appearances. How is that not the case?

Author: Astus
Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2015 at 1:21 AM
Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen
Content:
Malcolm said:
If the dharmatā of the mind is only emptiness, how then is the mind not something inert? How does consciousness arise? From itself? From other? From both?
Dependent origination is just the perception of the deluded.

Astus wrote:
Inert would be something unconditioned and without interaction. Consciousness is interdependent, changing, and that's how it can sense objects, how there can be perception. An independent knower is without any object, consequently it does not sense anything, it is unknowing, unaware, unconscious. As an interdependent consciousness it does not need an origin, and that origin would mean an ultimate cause without a cause. Also, this original knower is a position discussed in the 9th chapter of MMK. Dependent origination is what the deluded does not realise, instead they assume inherent existence.

I assume you see that the above ones are common arguments against self-view. How come they don't apply to jnana?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2015 at 7:15 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm said:

Astus, "inert" means "without sentience". Emptiness is not sentient. Thus, if emptiness were solely the nature of the mind, the mind could not be sentient.

Astus wrote:

Emptiness means conditioned, interacting. Sentience is living, connecting with events, phenomena influencing phenomena. Mind is sentient, perceptive, because impressions, emotions and thoughts move. If consciousness were unconditioned, it had no effect on anything and could not sense anything, that is, it were insentient.

Malcolm said:

How is consciousness interdependent? Does it come from the sense organ or the object? Without either?

Astus wrote:

The 18 dhatus is a basic description of how consciousness is interdependent, further elaborations are found in abhidharma and yogacara materials. The mind-stream continues from the preceding mind to the present mind.

Malcolm said:

Who said anything about an independent knower?

Astus wrote:

What you called the unconditioned knowing, the core and basis of mind and all appearances. It is unconditioned, therefore independent. It is knowing, what knows, so it is a knower, pure awareness.

Malcolm said:

This still does not explain the origin of consciousness, that is, how there can be a mind/consciousness at all.

Astus wrote:

Is there a situation where there is no mind? Can consciousness occur from non-consciousness? Samsara is without a beginning, so is the mind-stream of beings.

Malcolm said:

Self-originated pristine consciousness is nondual emptiness and knowingness, termed "the nondual dharmadhātu and vidyā." Pristine consciousness [ye shes, jñāna] is the core of the mind, self-arisen, unconditioned, uncontaminated, unaffected by the three times. When it is not recognized, then through that ignorance its potentiality becomes mind, dependent origination and all the phenomena of samsara. When it is recognized, one is the peer of Buddha Samantabhadra.

Astus wrote:

Since it is unconditioned and unaffected, it cannot recognise or forget itself. So a second perceiver is required that is conditioned, and its core cannot be the unconditioned knowing. In what other way can pristine consciousness be recognised or ignored?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2015 at 6:00 PM

Title: Re: Huang Po's One Mind & Dzogchen

Content:

DGA said:

Maybe so, but I think your caution bears repeating. Literary Chinese presents its own challenges and possibilities as a medium for Dharma transmission. Context matters tremendously, so someone attempting a comparative study would need to have a very firm grip on how Huang Po uses this concept throughout his known writings.

Astus wrote:

Choosing Huangbo is a good start. Now for comparison's sake we also need a single Dzogchen text to work with, one that's been translated a few times to English and contains enough information (e.g. definitions).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2015 at 8:39 PM

Title: Re: Buddha, true death and escape from reincarnation.

Content:

Techno Yogi said:

In fact there's <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/index.html#avyakata> devoted to discounting this view, and indeed any view of the status of the Buddha after death.

Astus wrote:

And as the suttas explain it very clearly, the reason it makes zero sense to ask whether there is or isn't a Tathagata after death, is because even before death the Tathagata cannot be pinpointed as this or that. This is a very important point that people seem to forget almost every time, or they just not have heard about it.

DGA said:

I don't think that's so for Mahayana, though. As I suggested earlier in this thread: Lotus Sutra, Chapter 16. It does not leave much room for interpretation on this point. Buddha Shakyamuni spells out his position clearly and directly.

Astus wrote:

There are a number of ways to interpret the meaning of an "eternal buddha". Even what a buddha is needs some clarification.

Chapter 22 of Nagarjuna's Middle Treatise (MMK) discusses the nature of the Tathagata. Here are some conclusions:

This stanza shows the error in the assumption of the OP:

"One who holds firmly
That the Tathāgata exists
Will have to fabricate his nonexistence
After having achieved nirvana."
(MMK 22.13, tr from Ocean of Reasoning)

And solves it by:

"Since he is essentially empty,
Neither the thought that the Buddha exists
Nor that he does not exist
After having achieved nirvana is tenable."
(v 14)

The following stanza (v 15) matches with the http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html (ch 26):

"Someone who tries to discern me in form
Or seek me in sound
Is practicing non-Buddhist methods
And will not discern the Tathāgata"

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 10th, 2015 at 12:04 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm said:

You mean there is no emptiness of the unconditioned? Emptiness means being free from all extremes, it does not mean being "conditioned." If it did, that would be a very inferior kind of emptiness.

Astus wrote:

Emptiness means the lack of substance in appearances. Appearances - experiences in the six sensory areas - are conditioned. Appearances lack substance as they are interdependent, so the state of being conditioned and being empty is practically the same. Sure, there are the so called 16/18/20 types of emptiness, but that's besides the point here, because it has little merit to analyse non-appearances and other theoretical categories for now.

Malcolm said:

Wind moves, but it is neither sentient nor perceptive. Waves move, they are neither sentient nor perceptive. Clouds move, they are neither sentient nor perceptive. So it seems you definitive of sentient and perceptive because of the movement of thoughts, and so on is inadequate.

Astus wrote:

Wind, waves, and clouds move, but they are still not one and the same thing. Sentience requires movement, i.e. changing as well, to know appearances coming and going. A static (unconditioned) perceiver perceives nothing or always the same thing, so it is useless.

Malcolm said:

Are thoughts the same thing as the mind or are they different? If they are latter, how can a mind move inside of itself? Of they are different, how does their movement give the mind sentience?

Astus wrote:

There is no independent mind to contain objects. Experiences in the six sensory area occur as experienced, that is, qualified as known, thus the six consciousnesses. And that stream of experience can then be divided to subject and object, container and contained, and other such common terms.

Malcolm said:

Did anyone say consciousness [vijñāna] was unconditioned?

Astus wrote:

If jnana is the source and presence of sentience, and it is unconditioned, it means all perceptions happen to/by an unconditioned knower.

Malcolm said:

The eighteen dhātus does not actually explain how the mind is interdependent. It is a hinayāna model that assumes that a consciousness arises from the contact of sense object with a sense organ. In other words, it does not explain perception, it merely provides a taxonomy of our sensory apparatus.

Astus wrote:

If by explaining perception you mean giving it an ultimate origin, there is no such absolute source. The eighteen dhatus describes a simple mechanism of experience whereby consciousness is always related to various sense objects. That is, a perceiver without anything perceived is not a perceiver. Also, the purpose of the 18 dhatus is to eliminate the idea that there is a single, independent, unconditioned mind.

Malcolm said:

This fault does not apply, just as the mind of which it is the core is not established, also the unconditioned vidyā is not established, is empty by nature and is not something real or truly existent.

Astus wrote:

So vidya is not real, just a theoretically unconditioned knowing that is merely a figure of speech and not a source of all experiences and the whole world? Then I'm not sure why insist on it being anything other than emptiness, a conventional linguistic phrase, a utilitarian concept, a skilful means used according to the situation.

Malcolm said:

Is there a situation in which the mind can be found?

Astus wrote:

Conventionally it is very easy to find it: as thoughts, emotions, and impressions. It's only when one looks closer for anything substantial that it turns out to be ungraspable.

Malcolm said:

This presumes two things, one, that there is fact a distinction between sentient and nonsentient. Two, it presumes that time exists independently.

Astus wrote:

Ordinarily even animals can recognise whether it's an inanimate object or a living being. Otherwise, all appearances that are there are necessarily experiences, so they are sensed, they exist within the realm of sentience, and that way the only distinction one may make is on a conventional level. As for an independent time, I don't know what you mean there.

Malcolm said:

Since unconditioned self-originated pristine consciousness is the core of a conditioned mind, it indeed can be forgotten by that conditioned mind, or as it more accurately the case, not recognized. It is just like someone who looks for their keys all over the house not recognizing that they are holding those very same keys in their hand.

Astus wrote:

That sets up two knowers perceiving each other: one unconditioned and one conditioned.

Malcolm said:

Emptiness is unconditioned, but we have no problem describing it as the dharmatā of entities. Likewise, unconditioned, empty, self-originated pristine consciousness is the dharmatā of the mind.

Astus wrote:

Emptiness is not a thing, or appearance, so there's not much to make of it besides using as a way of clarifying how things are. If vidya is similarly a descriptive term to say that appearances are necessarily qualified by knowing, then it is fine. The problem comes up with vidya in the same way that it can with emptiness: when it is separated and positioned as an independent entity apart from appearances.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 10th, 2015 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: Huang Po's One Mind & Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm said:

We already have such a text, it is called bsam gtan mig dgron by Nubchen Sangye Yeshe. The advantage to that text is that it has many citations from seminal early Chan texts already translated into Tibetan by Tibetan and Chinese Chan practitioners during the 8th century.

Astus wrote:

Is there an English translation already? Although, it certainly has no information on Huangbo.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 10th, 2015 at 6:36 PM

Title: Re: Huang Po's One Mind & Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

This is a section Blofeld (The Zen Teaching of Huang Po, p 46) comments about that "This paragraph is, perhaps, one of the finest expositions of Zen teaching, for it encompasses in a few words almost the entire scope of that vast and penetrating wisdom."

"When an ordinary person is about to die, he should merely contemplate the five skandhas to be all empty and the four elements to be without self. The true mind is without characteristics and neither goes nor comes: when one is born the [mind]-nature does not come [into one], and when one dies neither does the nature go [anywhere]. Peaceful, perfect, and serene, the mind and its realms are identical. If one can only right now suddenly achieve comprehension in this fashion, you will not be fettered by the three periods of time (i.e., past, present, and future) and will be a person who has transcended the world. You must definitely avoid having even the slightest bit of intentionality. If you see Buddhas of excellent characteristics (i.e., in their resplendent superhuman forms) coming to greet [and escort you to the Pure Land], with all the various phenomena [involved in such visions], then have no thought of following them. If you see various phenomena with evil characteristics, neither should you have any thoughts of fear. Simply forget your mind and identify yourself with the dharma dhātu, and you will attain autonomy. This is the essential gist [of my teaching]."

(Huangbo: Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, tr McRae in "Zen Texts", BDK Edition,

p 24-25)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 11th, 2015 at 5:50 PM

Title: Re: A good book on Jhanas

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jhanas are meditative states (not stages on the path to enlightenment). Mahayana contains mostly the same description of them as in the Pali Canon. Such states are part of the calming (samatha) practice, however, they are not really used in later Mahayana meditation manuals for various reasons. The closest thing you can find that is still in use is probably the Tibetan's nine stages system. See: <http://www.lionsroar.com/the-nine-stages-of-training-the-mind/>, <http://terebeck.hu/english/oxherd27.html>.

Otherwise, if you want to learn calming meditation, it is taught to a certain degree in every tradition and community as part of their meditation system.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 11th, 2015 at 5:51 PM

Title: Re: A good book on Jhanas

Content:

Techno Yogi said:

Well, the Sanskrit translation of the Pali jhāna is dhyāna, which was then translated into Chinese as 禪, which is pronounced as chán in Mandarin, but you may be more familiar with the Japanese pronunciation, which is Zen. Yes, there's an entire sect with a number of sub-sects named after jhāna!

Astus wrote:

But don't think the so called Chan/Zen school has anything to do with jhana.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 11th, 2015 at 11:41 PM

Title: Re: "If you can understand the mindfulness of no mindfulness

Content:

steve_bakr said:

Yet surely there must be an "original"--i.e., undefiled--state of mind. I intuitively think so, and have had results from a slight variation of the instructions derived from a Koan:

"Return to the state you were in before your grandparents were born." This is the original nature without all the toxic mental garbage. But perhaps that state can be called, "No-Mind" in the sense that our mind (lower case "m") is nothing other than the toxic garbage.

Astus wrote:

Any state of mind it be, it changes. Because it changes, it is unreliable. When it is seen that all states of mind are unreliable, one does not abide in any. That not abiding is what is sometimes called no mind. It is also the original mind, because mind changes all the time, no matter what, and it never abides in the same state for consecutive moments. That's also why trying to find a true mind, attempting to attain an ultimate state is actually pointless.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 12th, 2015 at 7:15 PM

Title: Re: Chan, Mahamudra, and Tibet

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are a number of studies on Mahamudra's sutra sources. E.g. Klaus-Dieter Mathes: <http://docslide.us/documents/klaus-dieter-mathes-bka-brgyud-mahamudra-chinese-rdzogs-chen-or-the.html>, or David Higgins: <https://journals.ub.uni-heidelberg.de/index.php/jiabs/article/viewFile/8979/2872>.

Although texts like the Vajrasamadhi Sutra (an early Chan text, likely from Korea) and the Lankavatara Sutra (often used as reference in early Chan) appear in Mahamudra teachings, not to mention the Prajnaparamita texts that are equally important in both Chan and Mahamudra, it does not mean that a direct connection between the two traditions can be established.

For instance, the same chapter of the Lankavatara Sutra (2.37 in Suzuki) is used in Chan, Yogacara and Mahamudra to set up their meditation system. But that only means that the sutra is a common basis.

And as Anders mentioned, the "Daoism+Buddhism=Chan" is fairly unfounded, plus oversimplified.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 13th, 2015 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: Chan, Mahamudra, and Tibet

Content:

kirtu said:

Nor is it likely that there was that much interaction between Daoist meditators and Chan meditators since their views of enlightenment are quite different.

Astus wrote:

Daoism, similarly to Hinduism, is not a single religion, and at the same time it encompasses all sorts of indigenous beliefs and practices. There are "Daoist" elements found all over Chinese Buddhism, but it could be equally called simply Chinese. When it comes to doctrines and methods, it seems to me that Buddhists were very much aware of the differences, just as today a Westerner would not confuse Christianity with Buddhism, even when certain terms are of Christian origin.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 13th, 2015 at 7:36 AM

Title: Re: "If you can understand the mindfulness of no mindfulness

Content:

Astus wrote:

The question is from the 1st chapter of the Platform Sutra (It also appears as case 23 of Wumenguan.):

不思善，不思惡，正與麼時，那箇是明上座本來面目？惠明言下大悟。

‘Do not think of good, and do not think of evil. At just such a time, what is Elder Huiming’s original face?’ At these words, Huiming [experienced] a great enlightenment.

This <https://www.dailyzen.com/journal/treatise-on-sitting-meditation> gives some clear explanations. The point is that when one is not caught by craving and hatred, one sees things just as they are. Seeing clearly is the original face, where experiences are not coloured by one's preconceptions and inclinations. It is not about a special experience - although in a sense it is special - but about discovering the defilements to be from one's ignorance of how the mind works.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 15th, 2015 at 7:33 AM

Title: Dhyana in Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

What role do dhyanas have in Zen?

In the teachings by Huineng, Mazu, Linji and other classical teachers there is little talk of any kind of meditation, and no discussion of cultivating absorption. Although Dogen did emphasise seated practice, but definitely not in a gradual manner. In the teachings of later Chinese masters from Dahui Zonggao through Hanshan Deqing to Xuyun the method of huatou is the preferred way to enlightenment.

In whose teachings can we find something on the dhyanas?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 15th, 2015 at 8:17 PM

Title: Re: Huang Po's One Mind & Dzogchen

Content:

tingdzin said:

But even aside from that, there is no real need to think that Huang po's teaching is at odds with devotion to Kwan Yin.

Astus wrote:

Not at odds, it's just mostly useless in terms of enlightenment.

[The teaching that one can] cultivate the six perfections and the myriad practices in order to achieve Buddhahood—this is the progressive [approach to Buddhahood]. Since beginningless time, there has never been a Buddha [who achieved that state] progressively. Just be enlightened to the One Mind and there will not be the slightest dharma that can be attained—this is the true Buddha.

(Huangbo, in "Zen Texts", BDK Edition, p 14)

If you can just [attain] no-mind, then that is the ultimate [state of enlightenment]. If a trainee does not instantly [attain] no-mind but spends successive eons in cultivation, he will never achieve enlightenment. He will be fettered by the meritorious practices of the three vehicles and will not attain liberation.

However, there is fast and slow in realizing this mind: there are those who attain no-mind in a single moment of thought after hearing the Dharma; those who attain no-mind after [passing through] the ten faiths, the ten abodes, the ten practices, and the ten conversions; and those who attain no-mind after [passing through] the ten stages [of the bodhisattva]. In spite of the length of time it takes them to [attain it, once they] reside in no-mind there is nothing else to be cultivated or realized. Truly without anything to be attained, true and not false [is no-mind]. Whether it is attained in a single moment of thought or at the tenth stage [of the bodhisattva], its efficacy is identical. There are no further gradations of profundity, only the useless striving of successive eons.

(p 16)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 15th, 2015 at 10:35 PM

Title: Re: Dhyana in Zen

Content:

Aemilius said:

For example Faith in the Mind, verse 8 : "Stop speaking, stop thinking", which implies the second or above dhyanas, that are without thoughts or thinking.

Astus wrote:

Thinking for the dhyanas are vitarka (尋) and vicara (伺), while the verse says 慮. Also, it seems meaningless to talk about speaking in the context of calming meditation. And there are other problems with interpreting that line in your way.

Aemilius said:

And in verse 1: "stop loving and hating" means overcoming two of the five hindrances to dhyana. The practice of Dhyana is implied in the Faith in the Mind, otherwise it makes little or no sense.

Astus wrote:

Hate (憎) and love (愛) mean general preferences, something that's not come over until enlightenment.

Aemilius said:

The Sutra of Hui Neng is speaking of unified Prajñā contemplation, does this not mean unified Dhyana & Prajñā?

Astus wrote:

Not unified but one. The chapter on samadhi and prajna (chapter 4) explicitly criticises both the view that there is samadhi and prajna separately, and the view that one should sit calmly and attain tranquillity.

Aemilius said:

The Chapter Six in Hui Neng Sutra is called [i]Sitting Chan [/i], ie Sitting Dhyana! This chapter is certainly about sitting meditation and nothing else.

Astus wrote:

That chapter is actually not about any formal meditation in a seated posture but rather that "seated meditation" (zuo chan/zazen) means the mind's nature.

"In this teaching of seated meditation, one fundamentally does not concentrate on mind, nor does one concentrate on purity, nor is it motionlessness. ... To have such a view is to obscure one's own fundamental nature, and only to be fettered by purity."
(Platform Sutra, ch 5, BDK Edition, p 45)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 16th, 2015 at 6:36 PM

Title: Re: Dhyana in Zen

Content:

Aemilius said:

That is misleading. The true path consist of ethics (shila), meditation (dhyana) and wisdom (prajñā). Zen is a true (Mahayana) path. You must understand that it necessarily consist of the three trainings. But You have constructed a fantasy that is divorced from the three trainings, that does not contain them, that is contrary to reality.

Astus wrote:

There is a difference between gradual and sudden. What you talk about is the gradual method, the one attributed to Shenxiu in the following paragraph:

The master said, "I have heard that your master teaches students about morality, meditation, and wisdom, but I don't know how he explains them. What are the characteristics of his practice? Tell them to me."

Zhicheng said, "Great Master Shenxiu teaches that 'not to do evil is called morality, to practice good is wisdom, and to purify one's own intentions is called meditation.' Thus does he teach. I wonder, with what Dharma does Your Reverence teach people?"

The master said, "To say that I have a Dharma for people would be to deceive you. I simply release people's fetters according to the situation. The samādhi of provisional names, such as your master's explanation of morality, meditation, and wisdom, is truly inconceivable. [But] my view of morality, meditation, and wisdom is different."

(Platform Sutra, ch 8, p 73, BDK Edition)

See also what Keizan wrote in <http://antaiji.org/archives/eng/zzyk.shtml>:

Zazen is also not based upon discipline, practice, or wisdom. These three are all contained within it.

Discipline is usually understood as ceasing wrong action and eliminating evil. In zazen the whole thing is known to be non-dual. Cast off the numberless concerns and rest free from entangling yourself in the "Buddhist way" or the "worldly way." Leave behind feelings about the path as well as your usual sentiments. When you leave behind all opposites, what can obstruct you? This is the formless discipline of the ground of mind. Practice usually means unbroken concentration. Zazen is dropping the bodymind, leaving behind confusion and understanding. Unshakeable, without activity, it is not deluded but still like an idiot, a fool. Like a mountain, like the ocean. Without any trace of motion or stillness. This practice is no-practice because it has no object to practice and so is called great practice.

Wisdom is usually understood to be clear discernment. In zazen, all knowledge vanishes of itself. Mind and discrimination are forgotten forever. The wisdom-eye of this body has no discrimination but is clear seeing of the essence of awakening. From the beginning it is free of confusion, cuts off concept, and open and clear luminosity pervades everywhere. This wisdom is no-wisdom; because it is traceless wisdom, it is called great wisdom.

It agrees with Dazhu's teaching in the <http://www.ymba.org/books/entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment/treatise-entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment>:

Discipline is centered upon purity and non-defilement. Meditation is centered upon stilling the mind so that it is moved by no object whatsoever. Wisdom is reached when the knowing mind is agitated by no object, but yet does not hold any thought of being unagitated. Wisdom is reached only when the knowing mind is clear and pure but has no thought of being clear and pure. Wisdom is reached when you can discriminate between good and evil, as well as other dualities, but, grasping none of them, remain free. Finally, if you realize that the "substances" of discipline, of meditation and of wisdom, none of which can be possessed, are indistinguishable -- i.e., are of only one substance -- this, in itself, is equal to the three studies undertaken and completed separately.

Aemilius said:

Moreover, Zen/Chan tradition is known for its poetic style and poetic liberties, they often try to express the path in a fresh and poetic manner. They are not bound to a limited abhidharmic technical vocabulary!

Astus wrote:

And what Zen is even more famous about is sudden enlightenment, that is, immediate realisation.

[The teaching that one can] cultivate the six perfections and the myriad practices in order to achieve Buddhahood—this is the progressive [approach to Buddhahood]. Since beginningless time, there has never been a Buddha [who achieved that state] progressively.

(Huangbo, in "Zen Texts", BDK Edition, p 14)

Aemilius said:

Mahayana dhyana is distinct from the sravakayana dhyana. You must not take the sravakayana tradition as a basis for evaluating the Mahayana dhyana, because they are not similar.

Astus wrote:

What are the differences between the 8/9 dhyanas of sravakas and bodhisattvas, and where are they described?

Aemilius said:

In the explanation of tripitaka master Hsuan Hua the Fifth Chapter of the Sutra of Hui Neng is unambiguously about sitting meditation

Astus wrote:

From his commentaries:

"Ch'an is not necessarily just sitting in meditation. One may practice Ch'an while walking, standing, sitting, and lying down."

"If you know how, you can practice Ch'an at all times, not just while sitting in meditation."
"

"You shouldn't just sit there and not move. You should cultivate nonmovement in the midst of movement; in the midst of your daily activities, do not move."

"Sitting in one place is not necessarily "sitting." You are said to be "sitting" when your mind is no longer disturbed by external conditions, be they good or bad."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 16th, 2015 at 9:46 PM

Title: Re: Dhyana in Zen

Content:

Dan74 said:

Astus, I doubt that Shenxiu and Huineng are truly two different paths. Rather, I believe they are parts of the same training. The error many of us make, IMO, is becoming seduced by the nondual teachings, while our dualistic habits and deep-seated clinging still rule the roost.

Astus wrote:

On one hand, I agree, and in that way I agree with Aemilius as well in that there is just morality, meditation, and wisdom. On the other hand, it is a cardinal point of the Zen teachings that unlike the so called gradual path, it is a direct one.

If we just go and break down the immediate path to the bodhisattva way, that's basically calling Zen's bluff and bursting its bubble of fancy rhetoric. That is, in my view, perfectly fine, but then it should also be accepted that once the veneer is blown away the whole Zen set up is untenable, and the so called masters of present and past are nothing more than clowns.

Or we can take the message seriously and consider the possibility that there is more to Bodhidharma's arrival than entertaining words. If the mind transmission actually means something, this is not found in historical records, written words, meditation practice, or nice robes with cool titles. It is simply realising for oneself that all experiences are empty and unattainable. That insight is of course no different from what the sutras and the gradual path teaches. The question then is: how can one go directly instead of by stages? That's what all the Zen teachings are the answer for. Anyone can easily confirm that no bodily or mental occurrence remains for a moment, and it is only out of ignorance of this simple truth that one pointlessly attempts to hold on to something and experience dissatisfaction. So the mind is indeed originally pure and can never be tainted. Therefore, engaging in any kind of cultivation is not only meaningless but actually contra-productive and misleading.

What may be lacking to put a finger on the subitism of Zen is the general context of everyday life either in a monastery or as a lay person. That's a false impression texts (and films) can make, as inevitably the whole picture cannot be included into a few pages, not to mention all the things that were evident for contemporary readers. Basically, Zen is not a separate school or organisation, but exists as a (small) part of the larger East Asian tradition where monastics follow the precepts and perform rituals, and the laity visits the monastery to gain merit and hear some chanting. It's like high brow theology for everyday church goers and parish priests.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 17th, 2015 at 5:12 PM

Title: Re: Dhyana in Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Shikantaza can't really be equivalent to any state of absorption, as what absorption means is calming down through the exclusion of various mental states. That is, within even the first level of absorption such emotions as lust and hatred cannot occur, that's why one has transcended the realm of sensuality (but not the realms of form and formlessness). Also, a state of absorption is conditioned and impermanent, and it does not include insight into the nature of reality.

As for similarity between shikantaza and absorption, maybe in some very limited aspects, but then there are similarities with numerous other activities as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 17th, 2015 at 8:49 PM

Title: Re: Dhyana in Zen

Content:

jundo cohen said:

So, I do not feel your description is the final verdict which closes the case in all its aspects.

Astus wrote:

Dogen says in the

http://web.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/gongyo_seiten/translations/part_3/fukan_zazengi.html that "The zazen I speak of is not meditation practice.", where "meditation" stands for 習禪 (T82n2580p1b1), and <http://dictionary.buddhistdoor.com/chi/word/144136/%E7%BF%92%E7%A6%AA> to practise dhyana (禪那), i.e. calming (靜慮). The reason for it not being a meditation practice is given in the next sentence: "It is simply the dharma gate of joyful ease, the practice-realization of totally culminated enlightenment." On the other hand, progression through the dhyanas is a method that has a number of preliminary requirements before and requires further training after in order to attain realisation.

What do you miss from the description (this one and the preceding one)?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 17th, 2015 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: Dhyana in Zen

Content:

BrianG said:

This is retarded. Are you omniscient?

Astus wrote:

This is basic Zen.

"Outside mind there's no dharma, nor is there anything to be gained within it. What are you seeking? Everywhere you say, 'There's something to practice, something to obtain.' Make no mistake! Even if there were something to be gained by practice, it would be nothing but birth-and-death karma. You say, 'The six pāramitās and the ten thousand [virtuous] actions are all to be practiced.' As I see it, all this is just making karma. Seeking buddha and seeking dharma are only making hell-karma. Seeking bodhisattvahood is also making karma; reading the sutras and studying the teachings are also making karma. Buddhas and patriarchs are people with nothing to do. Therefore, [for them] activity and the defiling passions and also nonactivity and passionlessness are 'pure' karma."
(Record of Linji, p 17, tr Sasaki)

"I say to you there is no buddha, no dharma, nothing to practice, nothing to enlighten to. Just what are you seeking in the highways and byways? Blind men! You're putting a head on top of the one you already have. What do you yourselves lack? Followers of the Way, your own present activities do not differ from those of the patriarch-buddhas. You just don't believe this and keep on seeking outside. Make no mistake! Outside there is no dharma; inside, there is nothing to be obtained. Better than grasp at the words from my mouth, take it easy and do nothing. Don't continue [thoughts] that have already arisen and don't let those that haven't yet arisen be aroused. Just this will be worth far more to you than a ten years' pilgrimage."

(Record of Linji, p 22, tr Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 17th, 2015 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: Dhyana in Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

In whose teachings can we find something on the dhyanas?

seeker242 said:

Does it really matter if we can find them or not?

Astus wrote:

Since the question is about the role of dhyanas in Zen, yes.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 6:59 AM

Title: Sexism and the Singer

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://www.dailymail.co.uk/wires/reuters/article-3364376/Hungary-cancels-Magyar-Telekom-contracts-sexism-row.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 7:16 AM

Title: Re: Dhyana in Zen

Content:

seeker242 said:

I guess what I meant to say is "Why does it matter?" Or "Does it really matter if we can find them or not? If so, why?"

Astus wrote:

First and foremost, there is a common trend to start explaining Zen by retracing the word's etymology. I consider that very misleading, but at the same time it fits the modern desire for meditation.

Secondarily, this is a way to look into what Zen is about. For instance: Are there specific meditative states to be achieved? Is pursuing such states even relevant or helpful? How should one approach Zen practice?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 7:48 AM

Title: Re: Buddha, true death and escape from reincarnation.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Furthermore, the Tathagata wisely knows, for what they really are, the tendencies of countless beings to make positive and negative statements about objects. For he knows that all these ideas arise in dependence on form, and the other skandhas. How has he discerned the dependence on the skandhas of those positive and negative statements? If we take such statements as –‘The Tathagata continues to exist after death,’ ‘The Tathagata does not continue to exist after death,’ ‘The Tathagata does and does not continue to exist after death,’ ‘The Tathagata neither does nor does not continue to exist after death’ – then these statements refer to the skandhas only [and they have no basis in the true reality of the Tathagata]. The same holds good of similar statements, i.e. when one says: ‘Eternal are self and the world, -just that is the truth, everything else is delusion.’ And so if one maintains that self and the world are non-eternal, both eternal and non-eternal, neither eternal nor non-eternal. Or, similarly, if one maintains that self and the world are finite, or not finite, or both finite and not finite, or neither finite nor not finite. Or, finally, if one says ‘that which is the soul, that is the body,’ or ‘one thing is the soul, another the body,’ all these statements refer only to the skandhas. It is thanks to the perfection of wisdom that the Tathagata knows those positive and negative statements for what they really are. The Tathagata cognizes the skandhas as identical with Suchness. That is why He knows, thanks to perfect wisdom, those positive and negative statements for what they really are. It is thus that the Tathagata makes known Suchness through the Suchness of the Tathagata, through the Suchness of the skandhas, through the Suchness of positive and negative statements. And just that Suchness of the skandhas, that is also the Suchness of the world. For it has been said by the Tathagata that “the five skandhas are reckoned as the ‘world.’”

(PP8000 12.3, tr Conze)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 7:14 PM

Title: Re: Dhyana in Zen

Content:

jundo cohen said:

I believe where I do not follow is the "either/or, yes/no" aspects of some of this conversation. Zen Teachers (especially the old dead ones) have a tendency to speak through both sides of their no sided mouth on these issues.

Astus wrote:

I don't see it as that complicated. Either it is a direct entrance or a gradual approach.

That's because if the immediate is something that one needs to cultivate or repeat, that is already gradual. For instance, the concept of sudden enlightenment with gradual practice, that is virtually just the gradual path. If there is a step by step practice to follow that results in a sudden realisation, that is again a gradual path.

jundo cohen said:

yet he also (from all the little available historical evidence) engaged in Zazen and other standard Buddhist Practices and believed that there is much to be gained, and the possibility to enlighten. Same with Dogen.

Astus wrote:

It is likely that he followed some kind of monastic routine, but there is no historical evidence besides the heavily edited and reworked Linjilu. So, there is no basis to assume such a belief of Linji, when the text itself speaks directly against it. Nevertheless, the text is not a rulebook but a collection of sermons and some anecdotes, so it is not about organising monastic duties and such. At best such daily tasks are not about brining enlightenment but simply keeping the community functional. I also don't see Dogen saying that following rules can generate some attainment. In fact, such a concept is directly against some basic doctrines of Buddhism and constitutes the <http://www.dhammadownload.com/index.php?title=Silabbata-paramasa>.

jundo cohen said:

Certainly, there is both a sudden and gradual aspect (as well as that which is beyond before and after and all time) to Zen Training including Dogen's way.

Astus wrote:

What are those aspects? Either something is practice-realisation or not. The gradual aspect is the view that through practice one gains realisation. That is in opposition to the doctrine of practice-realisation. What is your interpretation that harmonises them?

jundo cohen said:

Linji is quoted ... "Better take your ease sitting cross-legged on a meditation platform in the monastery."

Platform Sutra quoted ... "Be the same as you would if I were here, and sit all together in meditation."

Astus wrote:

Both refer to the simplest and most comfortable daily activity of a monastery: sitting together and not doing anything. It's as if the office manager told the employees to just go and sit in the relax room and don't do anything. Although meditation may have this reputation of being heavy work and tiring, that's likely because of viewing retreats and Japanese training monasteries as if they were the norm.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 7:32 PM

Title: Re: Dhyana in Zen

Content:

Aemilius said:

The Lankavatara says that the Dhyanas of Sravakayana and Mahayana are different, Chapter XXXVII in D.T. Suzuki. It is discussed in other sutras too, like Samdhi-Nirmocana. Because the view is different the dhyanas differ accordingly.

Astus wrote:

From that section of the Lankavatara comes the term "Tathagata Chan", a name for Zen coming primarily from Guifeng Zongmi. It is the highest vehicle above both Hinayana and Mahayana that goes directly to buddha-nature.

"The Teaching of the One Vehicle That Reveals the Nature holds that all sentient beings without exception have the intrinsically enlightened, true mind. From [time] without beginning it is permanently abiding and immaculate. It is shining, unobscured, clear and bright ever- present awareness. It is also called the Buddha- nature and it is also called the tathāgatagarbha. From time without beginning deluded thoughts cover it, and [sentient beings] by themselves are not aware of it. Because they only recognize their inferior qualities, they become indulgently attached, enmeshed in karma, and experience the suffering of birth- and- death. The great enlightened one took pity upon them and taught that everything without exception is empty. He further revealed that the purity of the numinous enlightened true mind is wholly identical with all Buddhas." (<http://terebess.hu/zen/mesterek/zongmi.html#a>)

"If one's practice is based on having all-at-once awakened to the realization that one's own mind is from the outset pure, that the depravities have never existed, that the nature of the wisdom without outflows is from the outset complete, that this mind is buddha, that they are ultimately without difference, then it is dhyana of the highest vehicle. This type is also known by such names as tathagata-purity dhyana, the one-practice concentration, and the thusness concentration. It is the basis of all concentrations. If one can practice it from moment to moment, one will naturally and gradually attain the myriad concentrations. This is precisely the dhyana that has been transmitted down from Bodhidharma."

(Chan Prolegomenon in "Zongmi on Chan", p 103)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 21st, 2015 at 6:29 PM

Title: Re: Dhyana in Zen

Content:

jundo cohen said:

You may have heard my own description of Practice-Realization as like a climb up a mountain, from the bottom to the top, changing vistas along the way, actually getting better and more skillful at climbing as we go, making progress step by step ...

(seemingly gradual on first impression perhaps)

Astus wrote:

That is exactly the gradual path, where a bodhisattva has to realise emptiness/prajnaparamita and then, on the one hand, deepen it (implement it), and on the other, perfect himself in the other paramitas. But at the same time the wisdom of emptiness is the same, or in other words, the mirror needs cleaning even though the mirror is originally shiny as can be glimpsed at small spots whence the dirt's already been removed.

jundo cohen said:

All I might add is that, in a lovely Hua Yenny way, each sudden dot holds and intimately is every other sudden dot, every dot embodying all time and space and then some

Astus wrote:

It is a Huayan teaching, based on chapter 17 (Merit of the Initial Determination for Enlightenment), that at the first level (of 52) one already at the same time is equal to the buddhas. Tiantai has a similar teaching called the six identities. They basically say that one gradually accomplishes the full attainment/manifestation of buddha-nature that's found in all beings. Zen's sudden path is supposed to be instead the direct cut to buddha-nature itself rather than polishing the mirror.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 21st, 2015 at 6:40 PM

Title: Re: Dhyana in Zen

Content:

Jesse said:

Direct just means you experience awakening directly through seeing(I believe), and gradual is experiencing it through the elimination of karma along with all the other Buddhist training's. Just because the path is gradual doesn't mean instantaneous enlightenment isn't instant, because in that moment there is nothing left to do. It's not one or the other, it's both.

Astus wrote:

That kind of direct insight is the requirement to become a stream-enterer or a bodhisattva on the first bhumi. Such insight developed and followed up by gradual training is what has always been the teaching. If Zen is also like that - which is possible - then it is basically contradicting its own claims of uniqueness.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 22nd, 2015 at 1:22 AM

Title: Re: Dhyana in Zen

Content:

Caodemarte said:

What exactly is meant by "the Zen claim to uniqueness?" Was "sudden enlightenment" meant instead of "uniqueness?"

Astus wrote:

That Zen is a tradition on its own, separate from others like Tiantai, Huayan and Madhyamaka, and therefore having its own methods and doctrines, like sudden enlightenment through direct pointing to the nature of mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 24th, 2015 at 8:25 PM

Title: Re: Dhyana in Zen

Content:

LastLegend said:

I speak of suffering and end suffering by removing attachment to all.

Astus wrote:

There is also a fourth truth: the path. How to end attachments?

LastLegend said:

I speak of medicine and illness, and medicine in this case emptiness to remove attachment which is the illness that causes suffering.

Astus wrote:

How do you obtain and apply that medicine?

LastLegend said:

I also speak of the direct clear knowing mind. Where clear knowing mind is present, there is no delusion and confusion.

Astus wrote:

The question is the same: how do you realise a clear knowing mind?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 6:20 AM

Title: Re: What is wrong with feminists these days?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Where is all this anger from against the idea that women are as much human beings as men? We are all humans, and biological sex does not define most, if not every, qualities of one's personality. How is this view so dangerous?

Female privilege is not something I have seen anywhere. Certainly, it can happen to some men that they feel frustrated because it looks like as if women had it easier in getting sex and securing relationships, that is actually nothing else but the misguided projection of one's own desires - i.e. as one feels like he'd be happy with any woman (as long as they fit one's ideals of course, so it's not at all 'free for all', but that's not acknowledged), while at the same time women don't seem to be willing to accept him, thus the female privilege. Actually, that kind of 'female privilege' is simple male chauvinism and blaming others for one's own frustration and the feeling of inferiority.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 6:27 AM

Title: Re: What is wrong with feminists these days?

Content:

rory said:

Let's go back to the source - men. What should men do to prevent unwanted births?

Astus wrote:

As I understand the process, conception is generally the result of the activities of two consenting adults (not talking about criminal acts here). Blaming one or the other side is certainly not recognising the other person as a conscious agent. If there is such a thing as an 'unwanted birth', that means there were two people who had been ignorant of where babies came from.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 8:35 PM

Title: Re: Ethics are more important than religion?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Ethics do not exist in a vacuum, they are based on various views. Whether that view is religious or non-religious is a secondary matter, but there must be a set of ideas to have ethics. Since people with differing views do not agree, their ethics clash as well. How could there be then a universal ethics without a universal view? Sure, it seems that all could agree that violence is bad. But people do not attack each other because they argue about the importance of peace, rather they become violent over 'smaller' disagreements, like what marriage is, how people should be governed, which is the best sports team, etc. The same applies to other seemingly universal principles, like not stealing. So, while it may not necessarily be a religious one, but view is clearly more important than ethics.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 28th, 2015 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: Happiness from Buddhism is impermanence

Content:

umesh said:

Did we get too attached to the teaching ?

Astus wrote:

That's not really possible. One may get stuck with some wrong views of the Dharma, but if it is the correct view, it inevitably brings one to liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 1st, 2016 at 6:52 PM

Title: Re: Devotional Practices to Kannon in Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

All of East Asian Buddhism:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/N%C4%ABlaka%E1%B9%87%E1%B9%ADha_Dh%C4%81ra%E1%B9%87%C4%AB

Chinese Buddhism:

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=n86HQgAACAAJ>

Japanese Zen (and in other schools):

http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/glossary/individual.html?key=ten_line_kannon_sutra

Kwan Um (and Korean) Zen:

<http://www.kwanumzen.org/?teaching=kwan-seum-bosal-chanting>
<http://www.kwanumzen.org/?teaching=thousand-eyes-and-hands-sutra>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 2nd, 2016 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: Do you need to know what a mantra means, to get benefits

Content:

Astus wrote:

From the Zen side:

Good friends, people of this world always recite prajñā with their mouths, but they don't recognize the prajñā of the self natures. This is like talking about eating, which doesn't satisfy one's hunger. If you just talk about emptiness with your mouths, you won't be able to see the nature for a myriad eons. Ultimately, this is of no benefit at all.
(Platform Sutra, ch 2, p 28, BDK Edition)

Another student said, "I've heard that certain mantras have power inherent in them-that Sanskrit sounds, for example, have some link to the energy of the universe. Does it make a difference which mantra you use?"

Soen-sa said, "Three things are important: first, your reason for doing the mantra; second, strong faith that the mantra works; and third, constant practice."

"So you can chant Coca-Cola all day long and it will work?"

"If someone tells you that the words Coca-Cola have power in them and you really believe that, then Coca-Cola will work for you.

(Seung Sahn: Dropping Ashes on the Buddha, p 82)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 2nd, 2016 at 7:22 PM

Title: Re: Devotional Practices to Kannon in Zen

Content:

Taco_Rice said:

Is it permissible to have a statue of Kannon on one's altar?

Astus wrote:

Since Zen is not focused on a single buddha or bodhisattva, you can have whoever you like on the altar.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 2nd, 2016 at 7:38 PM

Title: Re: Do you need to know what a mantra means, to get benefits

Content:

Ray Rudha said:

The quote from the platform sutra does not reference mantra. It does mention prajna. The Heart Sutra is very very clear as to the effects of the Prajnaparamita mantra, saying it is the mother of all Buddhas and leads to enlightenment, cutting through everything.

Astus wrote:

If saying only the words were enough, there is no point in bothering with the teachings. Zen teaches enlightenment by seeing the nature of mind. Mantras may be helpful as a possible method to tame the mind, but it's not the same as seeing the nature.

Reciting mantras or contemplating mind

Are merely herbs for polishing a mirror.

When the dust is removed,

They are also wiped away.

(Hanshan Deqing: Contemplating Mind, in Getting the Buddha Mind, p 58)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 2nd, 2016 at 8:38 PM

Title: Re: Do you need to know what a mantra means, to get benefits

Content:

Ray Rudha said:

Since mantra is primordial, the primordial sound of Mind, there is no such thing as wiping away mantra. It is prior to wiping, and of the same nature as the Vajra Mirror.

Astus wrote:

All dharmas by their nature are no different from ultimate reality. In that sense, all sounds are mantra, from the chirp of birds to the vroom of motorcycles. Why would only certain syllables be special to be selected for practice?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 2nd, 2016 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: Do you need to know what a mantra means, to get benefits

Content:

Astus wrote:

I see all that in much simpler and ordinary terms. There are experiences in the six sensory areas. Either one imagines them to be personal and permanent or not, thus forming attachment or not. Attachments bring about dissatisfaction, and the whole cycle of rebirth. Not being attached frees one from dissatisfaction and the rest. The goal of any method is to help one see experiences for what they are and therefore relinquish clinging. This, as I understand, is what the Buddha's teachings are basically about, and so the teachings of Zen patriarchs and others.

Mantra practically is a set of syllables and used for practice in the form of recitation. Sure, there can be a complete philosophy behind that, but that still does not change the activity. Or it does. That is actually what the original question is about in this topic. So, since recitation is at best a way of concentrating on an object, it does not generate in and of itself wisdom.

It is possible you understand something completely different as mantra. In that case, it is not a practice of repeating syllables and such, so the above may not necessarily apply. However, that's not what was asked about in this thread.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 4th, 2016 at 10:21 PM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are two kinds of transmissions: scriptural and experiential. Scriptural is necessary for the tradition to live on, and it is generally easier to pass on, as monasteries can store the canon without anyone reading them. Experiential transmission is of two kinds: customs of the community and the individual realisations of the person. Customs are what anyone joining a community has to follow, both in terms of behaviour and theory. Customs are what is usually the "living tradition", and it is like any tradition in both carrying on old elements and integrating/developing new ones. The individual realisation is not something that can actually be transmitted, but often that's what the upholders of scriptures and customs claim to pass on. It's the realisation that is both the true goal of both kinds of transmissions and what keeps them truly alive.

Scriptural change happens through translation and interpretation, as both depend on one's present circumstances. Customs as well change according to upcoming situations and conditions. What cannot change is realisation. But as realisation does not just happen, there is necessarily a path, and thus we arrive at the four noble truths as the ultimate template. There are three suttas where the Buddha states: "cannot be stopped by brahman or contemplative, deva, Mara, or God or anyone at all in the cosmos": <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn56/sn56.011.than.html>, <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.117.than.html>, <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.141.than.html>. They teach and explain the four noble truths and the eightfold path. And what is realised is the very nature of phenomena (<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/an/an03/an03.134.than.html>).

Other teachings beyond those can even be seen as elaborations and extensions, and at the same time all teachings can be traced back to the noble truths. Therefore that's what cannot be changed.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 5th, 2016 at 11:13 PM

Title: Solving Problems the Buddhist Way

Content:

Astus wrote:

The basic method:

There is a problem because you crave (for something else). In order to stop craving realise that all experiences are unstable, unsatisfactory, and impersonal. That is, no matter what you crave for, it will not be a solution, thus craving is pointless.

The empty method:

No problem is a real problem. It only looks real because you don't recognise it as a mere concept. To see it as a mere concept, analyse the problem in order to define it, then you shall see that it cannot be established in any way.

The mind method:

The problem comes from imagining it to be something beyond what is experienced, an independent object. Since only what is experienced can be called a problem, the problem itself is nothing but a thought. Once there is nothing to think of, thinking of the problem itself ends.

The direct method:

The thought of problem occurs, then it disappears. No need to do anything. It had been gone even before it had arrived.

What other methods are there?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 6th, 2016 at 5:06 AM

Title: Re: Solving Problems the Buddhist Way

Content:

boda said:

- 1) Define the problem.
- 2) Brainstorming and lateral thinking.
- 3) Forming a hypotheses.
- 4) Testing.

Astus wrote:

Where is that found in Buddhism?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 6th, 2016 at 7:19 PM

Title: Re: Solving Problems the Buddhist Way

Content:

Queequeg said:

I think you need to specify what you mean by "problem".

Astus wrote:

It is intentionally vague, the focus is on methods. So we can go with "A matter or situation regarded as unwelcome or harmful and needing to be dealt with and overcome".

Queequeg said:

Is there a Buddhist physics or mathematics?

Astus wrote:

Probably not, so there are no methods for those, and that's fine.

Queequeg said:

Realizing the emptiness of my hunger will not solve the problem of my starvation.

Astus wrote:

At what point does one need Buddhism to solve hunger?

Once a Vinaya Master came and asked: "In your practice of the Tao, do you still work hard?"

The Master answered: "Yes, I still work hard."

The Vinaya Master asked: "How hard?"

The Master retorted: "If I'm hungry, I eat. If I'm tired, I sleep. "

The Vinaya Master asked: "Do all other people work hard just as you do?"

The Master answered: "No, not in the same way."

The Vinaya Master asked: "Why not?"

The Master answered: "While they are eating, they are not really eating due to too much thinking. While they are sleeping, they are not really sleeping due to too much mental agitation. Therefore, they do not work in the same way I do."

The Vinaya Master, on hearing this, fell silent.

(<http://www.ymba.org/books/entering-tao-sudden-enlightenment/tsung-ching-record>)

Queequeg said:

The larger point I was making, the 'Buddhist' problem solving described above has a discrete scope and if applied beyond that scope, it is absurd.

Astus wrote:

That is very true, and the Buddha was quite clear on that as well: "Both formerly & now, it is only stress that I describe, and the cessation of stress."

(<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.086.than.html>, also the famous <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn56/sn56.031.than.html>).

At the same time, even if we were to restrict it to dukkha, one of its definitions is "not getting what is wanted", and that befits the general idea of what any problem is. Still, the question is about possible methods offered. As for whether it is good for a particular problem is another question.

Queequeg said:

I would posit that Buddhist problem solving is action flowing from wisdom

Astus wrote:

What kind of wisdom? And again, the method could as well be called the path to wisdom, but that definition would likely take us to a different discussion.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 6th, 2016 at 8:25 PM

Title: Re: What is faith?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Faith is accepting without understanding.

From <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn25/sn25.001.than.html>:

"One who has conviction & belief that these phenomena are this way is called a faith-follower" vs

"One who, after pondering with a modicum of discernment, has accepted that these phenomena are this way is called a Dhamma-follower"

Faith in the Triple Jewel is the first and foremost (<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn55/sn55.001.than.html>) of all objects of faith. Then it is followed by faith in particular teachings, like in SN 25.1 the faith in the impermanence of the six senses.

The treatise http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Translations/Awakening_of_faith.html is a seminal text in East Asian Buddhism. It writes:

"Now, in developing the aspiration for enlightenment through the perfection of faith, what kind of mind is to be cultivated? Briefly speaking, three kinds can be discussed. The first is the mind characterized by straightforwardness, for it correctly meditates on the principle of Suchness. The second is the mind of profoundness, for there is no limit to its joyful accumulation of all kinds of goodness. The third is the mind filled with great compassion, for it wishes to uproot the sufferings of all sentient beings."

That fits the idea, articulated extensively in Huayan doctrine, that the first moment of faith (it is also the first section of the bodhisattva path in the Huayan - and therefore the East Asian - system) is equal to buddhahood. Sung Bae Park wrote a book on faith in East Asian Buddhism, particularly in Patriarchal Chan:
https://books.google.com/books?id=_A2QS03MP5EC.

The Bodhisattva who has observed this foremost perfection,
When in the past he served [the Buddhas], is learned and does not doubt:
As soon as he has heard it he will again recognize the Teacher,
And he will swiftly understand the Peaceful Calm of enlightenment.

Though in the past he has honoured millions of Buddhas, and served them
If without faith in the Jina's perfection of wisdom,
Hearing of it, he will cast it away, one of small intelligence;
After he cast it away, he will go to the Avici Hell, and non one can save him.

Therefore, have faith in this Mother of all the Jinas,
If you wish to experience the utmost Buddha-cognition:
Let him be like a merchant, who has traveled to the treasure island,
And who, having lost his goods would [nevertheless] again return [to it].
(Ratnagunasamcayagatha, ch 7, tr Conze)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 1:09 AM

Title: Re: Solving Problems the Buddhist Way

Content:

Queequeg said:

The tradition I follow embraces the full scope of human experience and interexperience - I don't think its exclusive in this embrace, but is idiosyncratic. This scope of course includes disciplines such as maths and sciences, as well as every other conventional truth and circumstance; of course it incidentally embraces Boda's suggestion of the scientific method as a means of problem solving. We can be theoretical physicists and Buddhists and have both hats be the same.

Astus wrote:

Buddhism can exist besides all sorts of other skills, that does not make shoemaking and calculus parts of the Buddhist tradition. What does such embracing mean then?

Queequeg said:

All of these are problems that must be addressed, and if your interpretation of Buddhism does not address them, it is not a complete teaching.

Astus wrote:

How many teachings do you know from the Buddha on agriculture, waste management and other common matters of society?

Queequeg said:

But even the Tripitaka embraces the conventional world - what is right livelihood if not addressing the right way to engage in the world?

Astus wrote:

The recommended livelihood is the celibate monastic life, even in Mahayana. I have not yet encountered a sutra or treatise advising people to enjoy the five desires (五欲) and be driven by the eight winds (八風).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 6:44 PM

Title: Re: Klesas are Bodhi & dating 18 y/o girls.

Content:

Astus wrote:

That afflictions (klesa) are enlightenment (bodhi) (煩惱即菩提) is the same idea as samsara is nirvana, the commons (prthagjana) are nobles (arya), etc. It means that one has to realise that afflictions are empty and such, instead of trying to suppress them or remove them. It is a teaching meant to correct the view that one should use force instead of wisdom. This teaching is in a number of Mahayana sutras (e.g. Vimalakirti Sutra, ch 4: "The afflictions are bodhi [煩惱是道場], because of understanding according to actuality." (BDK Edition, p 100)), and an expression used in Chan as well.

"Good friends, ordinary people are buddhas, and the afflictions are bodhi. With a preceding moment of deluded thought, one was an ordinary person, but with a succeeding moment of enlightened thought, one is a buddha. To be attached to one's sensory realms in a preceding moment of thought is affliction, but to transcend the realms in a succeeding moment of thought is bodhi."

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK Edition, p 30)

"Space and the Dharma body are without any dissimilar characteristics (lit., "characteristics of differentiation"). The Buddhas and sentient beings are without any dissimilar characteristics, samsara and nirvana are without any dissimilar characteristics, and the afflictions and bodhi are without any dissimilar characteristics. To transcend all characteristics is to be a Buddha. Ordinary people grasp at [their sensory] realms, while religious persons grasp at the mind. For the mind and the realms to both be forgotten is the True Dharma. To forget the realms is relatively easy, but to forget the mind is extremely difficult. People do not dare to forget the mind, fearing that they will fall into the void (i.e., the emptiness of space) with nowhere to grab hold. They do not understand that the void is without void, that there is only one true Dharma body."

(Huangbo, in Zen Texts, BDK Edition, p 21)

"In the Ultimate Vehicle, we neither transform our afflictions nor extinguish them; our mind is originally pure and lucid. This mind is inherent in everyone; we do not need to seek it externally. This is the Chan School's principle of "affliction is bodhi; birth and death (samsara) is nirvana.""

(Weijue:

http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enUS/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=219&Itemid=59)

"If you know how to use it, affliction is Bodhi; if you don't know how to use it, then Bodhi becomes affliction. Bodhi is analogous to water, and affliction to ice. Ice and water are of the same substance; there is no difference."

(Xuanhua:

http://www.drbachinese.org/online_reading_simplified/dharma_talks/kaishrlu-7/volume7-ce-25.htm)

"In Buddhism we say, "Affliction is Bodhi (enlightenment)." This means that when we encounter afflictions (distressful circumstances), we must use wisdom to perceive and understand them clearly, turning the afflictive outlook into joy, freedom, and tranquility. "Affliction" and "joy" are, in reality, within one single thought."

(Weijue:

<http://cthouston.org/Dharma%20Lectures%20by%20the%20Grand%20Master/Words%20of%20Wisdom%20from%20the%20Grand%20Master%20.pdf>)

"The mental formation is not our enemy. It is ourself and it is our duty to look after it. Many people think that meditation is a war, a struggle between good and bad, between the Buddha and Mara. But in the light of interbeing, rubbish makes flowers and flowers make rubbish. There is affliction and there is bodhi. Bodhi is not the enemy of affliction. Affliction is not the enemy of bodhi. If we don't know how to look after our awakened nature it will become affliction. If we know how to look after our afflictions they will become awakened nature. That is what is meant by saying afflictions are the bodhi nature, are awakened nature."

(Thich Nhat Hanh: http://www.buddhist-

canon.com/PLAIN/TNHSUTTA/1998%20Feb%2022%20%20The%20Four%20Establishments%20of%20Mindfulness%20%28part%202%29.htm)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 7:47 PM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

Astus wrote:

1. Rebirth is not really the problematic point, rather it is seeing the mind as a bodily function. Those who come to Buddhism with some concept of an independent soul have no problem with rebirth in particular, they rather fall into the other extreme view of eternalism.

2. The mind as a separate function from the body can be directly perceived and understood using the experiential-phenomenological (five aggregates, six sensory areas) model.

3. In the teaching on the five levels of Zen the first one is the kind of therapeutic, present life centred view embraced by agnostic/materialist beginners. So, it has its value, but it is certainly very far from the fifth level of the ultimate vehicle that is the teaching of Bodhidharma and his heirs.

4. Mahayana makes zero sense without rebirth, as the bodhisattva path goes through innumerable lifetimes.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 8:14 PM

Title: Re: What is faith?

Content:

Punya said:

It seems to me like they are generally talking about faith in the trust and confidence sense.

Astus wrote:

Yes, that's the point of faith, to trust in the teachings, and therefore keep studying until one arrives to actual confirmation. It is like faith in any other kind of instructor, for instance when one learns a foreign language you accept that the teacher knows what he talks about and explains things correctly.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 8:32 PM

Title: Re: Solving Problems the Buddhist Way

Content:

Queequeg said:

There are many examples of practitioners whose daily activities are their practice - Vimalakirti for one. The integration is implicit in the bodhisattva ideal.

Astus wrote:

What makes everyday activities practice is the presence of wisdom. Thus for ordinary people activities are karmic, for bodhisattvas they are the path to buddhahood. Therefore, it's not the activity but the wisdom that makes it Buddhist.

Queequeg said:

There is indeed the teaching on klesa are bodhi... It goes hand in hand with Nirvana is Samsara.

Astus wrote:

Again, that is a matter of having or not having insight into the reality of afflictions. And once afflictions are seen for what they actually are, they are no longer afflictions.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 8:34 PM

Title: Re: Solving Problems the Buddhist Way

Content:

SeeLion said:

I think Right Concentration is a method, because the problem never arises in the first place.

Astus wrote:

Concentration is a very useful method to calm down. However, it is more like not facing the problem but putting it aside for a while.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 9:26 PM

Title: Re: Klesas are Bodhi & dating 18 y/o girls.

Content:

Adamantine said:

from a Tibetan perspective there is also a view that one can take on residual obscurations (drip) from another, most especially through sexual union.

Astus wrote:

That very much contradicts the whole meaning of karma. Following that logic, hunger could be lost around well fed people. Afflictions reside in one's own mind, generated and maintained through one's own actions. One may agree with or imitate others' actions, but that's still not the same as obscuration-transmission.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 10:00 PM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

jundo cohen said:

how the commentators distinguished the Buddha's purported words here from his own Teachings on rebirth?

Astus wrote:

Speculations about the future involve wrong views of immortality (percipient, non-percipient, neither) or annihilation. The Buddha, of course, avoids both extremes, as he does not posit an immutable self, nor complete destruction, but dependent origination. There are several suttas on the topic of kamma and rebirth (e.g. MN 41, 57, 101, 135, 136), and it is clear from the Buddha's debates with various ascetics, as described in the sutta right after the Brahmajala (i.e.

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.02.0.than.html>), that the interpretation of kamma and rebirth is very much a central doctrine that makes Buddhism unique, and the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sama%C3%B1aphala_Sutta#The_king.27s_questioning_of_six_ascetics represent views that are still held by various people today.

As for DN 1, here are some commentaries:

http://www.dhammadalks.net/Books11/Bhikkhu_Bodhi-Discourse-All-Embracing_Net_of_Views.pdf.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Klesas are Bodhi & dating 18 y/o girls.

Content:

Malcolm said:

Here, the word is contamination ['grib] rather than obscuration [sgrib].

Astus wrote:

And what does contamination stand for? The description given sounds like 'ritual impurity', that might be relevant in Tantra.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 11:27 PM

Title: Re: Klesas are Bodhi & dating 18 y/o girls.

Content:

Malcolm said:

These are more connected with the Tibetan cultural ideas than the Dharma.

Astus wrote:

East Asian countries have their own versions of such contaminations (e.g. the <http://www.reed.edu/hellscrolls/scrolls/Aseries/A06/A06e.html>), as probably every culture.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 8th, 2016 at 2:00 AM

Title: Re: Klesas are Bodhi & dating 18 y/o girls.

Content:

Adamantine said:

I'm assuming this is a relic of Bramhanic ideas of orthodox purity

Astus wrote:

The whole idea of 'contamination' seems like that. But it is quite possible that there is no actual connection, it's just that every culture has its own set of superstitions and taboos (e.g. in Japan women were not allowed on whole mountains because of fear of contaminating the holy places, like monasteries).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 8th, 2016 at 5:39 PM

Title: Re: Solving Problems the Buddhist Way

Content:

SeeLion said:

Concentration is a state of being, which can be cultivated during the daily life.

Astus wrote:

What do you call concentration, what method/technique/practice? What does one do to be concentrated? As I understand it, it is one-pointed attention to a single object where one disregards, or does not recognise at all, every other phenomena.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 8th, 2016 at 6:36 PM

Title: Re: Solving Problems the Buddhist Way

Content:

Jeff H said:

I think this discussion is missing the teaching on wisdom with compassion. All Buddhist methods invoke wisdom, but none lead to inaction. That's because of compassion.

Astus wrote:

Compassion is the intention to solve others' problems. Do you also consider it to be a method of alleviating their suffering, or is it just the willingness to do that?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 8th, 2016 at 7:29 PM

Title: Re: Solving Problems the Buddhist Way

Content:

Queequeg said:

Are ordinary people categorically devoid of wisdom? This amounts to a denial of Buddhature, and is an inferior teaching. My understanding is that nescience and wisdom lie at the ends of an infinite spectrum in dynamic tension. Where is there wisdom without nescience, and vice versa? Wisdom can only be distinguished in relation to nescience, and the other way around. How do you separate them?

Astus wrote:

If ordinary people had wisdom there would not be ordinary any more. Buddha-nature is not relevant at all, because for ordinary people it is completely hidden and cannot make any use of it.

As you say, since recognising ignorance is needed to posit knowledge, ordinary people are similarly the opposite of noble ones. But that doesn't mean that buddhas cannot exist without deluded beings, or that deluded beings cannot be without nobles, since only the terminology is dependent on each other, not the beings.

Queequeg said:

This dynamic interaction between wisdom and nescience is complete and any attempt to draw distinctions between wisdom and nescience is groundless except to illustrate a rather inferior point for people who still posit dualities.

Astus wrote:

There is no such coexistence. One cannot be literate and illiterate at the same time. Wisdom is not in any dynamic relation with ignorance.

Queequeg said:

The interaction between Bodhisattvas and ordinary people takes place in what we ordinary people call ordinary life. For the Bodhisattva, that interaction takes place in the Buddhafield. Both of these views are correct because ordinary life and the buddha field are the same thing.

Astus wrote:

If they were the same there would be either just one or the other.

Queequeg said:

Once you've been exposed to the Buddha dharma, to the Buddha's Mind (which has always already been accomplished), you are embraced in the Buddha's Mind - ie. nescience and wisdom perfectly complement, and all of your activities are activities on the Buddhist path that inevitably blossoms into full blown Buddhahood, even as you consciously have no inkling while you shovel poop in the Rich Man's latrines.

Astus wrote:

That denies any conscious effort of perfecting the paramitas, accumulating merit and wisdom, etc. All that would be required were to take refuge and nothing else. Thus it negates the entire path. In other words, it claims that it's enough to believe that problems will be solved, and that belief itself is the end of every attempt, or even consideration of handling anything.

Queequeg said:

Where exactly is the Buddha path tread? Where are the problems solved with Buddhist solutions? Where is Wisdom cultivated? In the Mind? Where is Mind abstracted from Form and the perpetual activity of life? What lies outside of the Buddha's Mind?

Astus wrote:

Phenomena are not the problem, attachment to them is. Just because one does not have to go/be outside of phenomena doesn't mean that the solution is found within appearances, or that all will sort out themselves automatically.

Queequeg said:

They were never afflictions in the first place. Your position seems to be that Buddhism only solves misperception, as if that solution can be abstracted from all the other solutions to life's problems.

Astus wrote:

If afflictions are not afflictions, then there is nothing to do, no teachings to follow, and no liberation to gain. That again negates the whole path.

Misperception of how things are is the cause of afflictions, so that is what needs to be corrected. Does that help with every possible problem in the world? If yes, in what way? Those are the questions I have originally intended to discuss here.

Queequeg said:

Jeff makes an excellent point - another way to illustrate the full scope of Buddhism and Buddhist problem solving is to point out that wisdom implies compassion (action based on wisdom), and wisdom without action is not really wisdom at all.

Astus wrote:

I agree, they are very much connected. Action comes from intention, intention comes from perception/view. Correct view then also means correct intention and correct action.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 8th, 2016 at 7:40 PM

Title: Re: What is faith?

Content:

Punya said:

And, if you accept the advice of teachers like HH the Dalai Lama about the complexity of karma, and you content yourself with a more basic understanding, is that just accepting it on faith. (There are more than enough threads here on karma so please confine the discussion to the faith aspect).

I'd still be interested in responses to this part of the question.

Astus wrote:

It's fine to just accept it on faith:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.060.than.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 8th, 2016 at 7:42 PM

Title: Re: What is faith?

Content:

Vasana said:

That's not the same as accepting it blindly on faith. ... your example is more akin to trust in the testimony of reliable persons, witnesses & masters such as HHDL.

Astus wrote:

That is actually what accepting on faith is: trusting in what others say without gaining an understanding on one's own.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 9th, 2016 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: The "four methods" that prove the existence of future li

Content:

Astus wrote:

Those four reasons are likely to be found in pramana works. The second half of the reasons - and I'm just guessing here based on other sources - are about how a newborn baby can eat and other basic things of growing up (e.g. language acquisition) from what one could assume previous knowledge, practically what is now called instincts and explained by biology.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 9th, 2016 at 8:20 PM

Title: Re: The "four methods" that prove the existence of future li

Content:

prsvrnc said:

How would you distinguish, "the logic that the mind has gained familiarity with things in the past" and "the logic of having gained experience of things in the past"?

Astus wrote:

No idea. Finding that out would require more information.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 9th, 2016 at 8:44 PM

Title: Re: Klesas are Bodhi & dating 18 y/o girls.

Content:

Taco_Rice said:

So, if I understand all of this right... this means that when a given desire arises, we simply recognize that it is a part of ourselves and if its effects are constructive, we act on it, but if not, we recognize its emptiness and let it go or sublimate it?

Astus wrote:

Afflictions are unwholesome mental phenomena based on greed, hatred, and ignorance. Realising that they are enlightenment means insight into their nature as empty, thus ending the mistaken impulse of grasping and acting on them.

The differentiation between wholesome and unwholesome intentions is the practice of https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Four_Right_Exertions, a part of the noble eightfold path and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 9th, 2016 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Solving Problems the Buddhist Way

Content:

Queequeg said:

What are Buddhas without ordinary beings? What is to distinguish the category "deluded being" without "enlightened being"?

Astus wrote:

For categorisation they are set up as opposites. Still, deluded beings are deluded regardless of the presence or absence of buddhas, and buddhas are enlightened regardless the presence or absence of deluded ones.

Queequeg said:

truth is infinitely refined; each refinement redefines the distinction between true and not true.

Astus wrote:

Something is either true or false within a given context, and without context there is no truth or falsity to talk about either. When a system of categorisation of teachings is set up, that system itself defines what is true and what is false. It's not that truth becomes more sublime, but rather it systematically rejects everything else but their own proposition of truth.

Queequeg said:

The best I can approximate my view of them is the connection between the wave and particle natures of light; they're the same thing, at the same time, of utterly exclusive characters. To be more specific and accurate, I'm referring to Zhiyi's Threefold Inclusive Truth - distinct from the various Two Truth formulations as well as Non-Inclusive Threefold Truth formulations.

Astus wrote:

The difference between delusion and enlightenment is attachment or lack of it to phenomena. The phenomena are the same, the relation to them is different. Since it cannot be that one is attached and not attached at the same time, ignorance and wisdom do not exist simultaneously. What the Three Truths mean is that emptiness is not the absence of appearances but the realisation of dependent appearances being insubstantial just as they are.

Queequeg said:

Being too hungry to contemplate dharma is a Buddhist problem with a Buddhist resolution - even as that resolution may seem very similar to the efforts of a preta to quench hunger. The circumstances are different, the end is different. Foraging for food and water is a Buddhist activity because it supports Buddhist endeavor. Consider the difference between a monk's alms round and a beggar's begging round.

Astus wrote:

What makes it Buddhist? It's not that the activity is particular to Buddhists, but because it is also performed by Buddhists. I don't see how that definition is important or relevant here.

Queequeg said:

It's the principle underlying Samaya or the Direct Introduction of our Dzogchen cousins, as I understand it. I understand it as adhimukti, awareness that precedes understanding. Without being introduced to the Buddha Mind, it is not possible to penetrate it. This means the Buddha's teaching always precedes awakening. The standard example is a description of Chocolate Cake (Enlightenment) is not comparable to actually eating Chocolate Cake. In Eating it, you actually get to experience and come to an intimate understanding of Chocolate Cake that replaces any speculative notion about Chocolate Cake. On initiation, on introduction, you enter into the respective enlightened consciousness. You may not understand it fully, but now that you are in, (now that you have actually taken a bite) it's just a matter of becoming thoroughly familiar with it. Perfecting paramitas, if one wishes to structure one's practice that way, happens within this context of the Buddha's Mind. The goal of achieving the Buddha Mind is complete. That does not mean it cannot be perfected further, and there are myriad practices to do this, which, if we really get it, we do just because.

Astus wrote:

Bodhicitta is the intention to attain complete enlightenment. If that intention ceases before reaching the goal, that is falling from the path, but when the intention arises one steps on the path. Bodhicitta does not require the realisation of emptiness, so there are stages before becoming a noble or sage (i.e. reaching the first bhumi). Also, neither empowerment nor the theory of buddha-mind is required for aspiring to buddhahood. But when one experiences personally the true nature of the world, that is when one attains nobility. What is experienced is no different from what buddhas know as the real truth, the difference between a practising noble and one fully awakened lies in the remaining habits binding one to various phenomena. Practising could as well be called familiarisation with suchness, but it still does not mean the coexistence of ignorance and wisdom.

Queequeg said:

And, since Buddhas have appeared (if you believe it), that categorically means this reality is fully embraced in the Buddha Mind, and we're already, as we are, been embraced within it, and all of our "problems" are likewise embraced in it; all of our thoughts, words and deeds transpire in it, are it.

Astus wrote:

Buddha-mind is not a god or being to embrace anything. It is, as its name suggests, the mind of a buddha, one that is completely liberated. In the sense that a free mind is free because of realising suchness, and suchness is the nature of all phenomena, everything is free, that is, buddha-mind. But that does not help anyone or anything, since all beings must realise this for themselves.

Queequeg said:

OK, Sure, but now we're back to you determining what problems Buddhism can address. There is nothing outside the scope of Buddhism, and that problems beyond the one's you posit are embraced in that scope even if they are not enumerated in the scriptures. That's my story and I'm sticking to it.

Astus wrote:

In a similar sense, there is nothing outside the scope of biology either, as we are all biological entities. Still, you wouldn't look for financial advice in an anatomy book. Therefore it is only misleading to say that there is nothing outside the scope of Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 10th, 2016 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: Klesas are Bodhi & dating 18 y/o girls.

Content:

pael said:

Why Vimalakirti Sutra says "by the equality of the five deadly sins, you reach the equality of liberation"?

<http://www2.kenyon.edu/Depts/Religion/Fac/Adler/Reln260/Vimalakirti.htm>

Are those sins empty?

Astus wrote:

The Sutra itself explains:

Lord, when I heard these words of the Licchavi Vimalakirti, I wondered what I should say and what I should do, but I was totally in the dark. Leaving the bowl, I was about to leave the house when the Licchavi Vimalakirti said to me, 'Reverend Subhuti, do not fear these words, and pick up your bowl. What do you think, reverend Subhuti? If it were an incarnation created by the Tathagata who spoke thus to you, would you be afraid?' I answered, 'No indeed, noble sir!' He then said, 'Reverend Subhuti, the nature of all things is like illusion, like a magical incarnation. So you should not fear them. Why? All words also have that nature, and thus the wise are not attached to words, nor do they fear them. Why? All language does not ultimately exist, except as liberation. The nature of all things is liberation.'

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 10th, 2016 at 7:17 PM

Title: Re: Solving Problems the Buddhist Way

Content:

Queequeg said:

So there is some self existent aspect to deluded beings?

Astus wrote:

Delusion is not caused by wisdom, nor is wisdom caused by delusion. Rather, the end of delusion is when wisdom can occur.

Queequeg said:

Are you actually familiar with Zhiyi or is this your opinion? I'm not positing him as authority, but I think if you actually understood the argument you wouldn't flatly reject it like this.

Astus wrote:

As I understand it, the three truths of Tiantai is emptiness, appearance, and middle, meaning that things are inseparably empty and apparent. What does that reject flatly?

Queequeg said:

Zhiyi doesn't actually reject anything as untrue. Rather he teaches something of a radical contextuality. The teaching is actually a way to integrate all truth, Buddhist and non-Buddhist, into a single, encompassing system.

Astus wrote:

Can you show where he integrates non-Buddhist teachings, like a creator god and annihilation at death?

Queequeg said:

Of course you can be attached and unattached simultaneously. We all in fact are this way. I'm attached to my son at the level of my gross consciousness. At the consciousness level of my involuntary biological functions, I am not attached.

Astus wrote:

Attachment is a present mental attitude, actively grasping at an object. So to have both at the same time would mean loving and disregarding your son at the same time with the same mind.

Queequeg said:

Everything is defined by intension, right? So if an act is done for dharma, its Buddhist.

Astus wrote:

That would mean only a buddha's activity is Buddhist, as only he has pure intentions fully in accord with the Dharma.

Queequeg said:

Once aroused, bodhicitta never dissolves. And moreover, its intrinsic in the true aspect so what you are talking about is a rather shallow and gross level arousal. It could equally be said the arousal of bodhicitta at the gross level is nothing more than recognition of an intent that has been there all along. Losing intent at the gross level is just that - loss at that gross level where the construct "I" is found.

Astus wrote:

If bodhicitta were never lost why are there warnings against abandoning it in the sutras?

What are the gross and subtle minds? There are the inclinations present as latent conditioning, i.e. samskaras. Those are the basis of all afflictions and samsara. What else do you mean?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 11th, 2016 at 4:26 PM

Title: Re: Engrossing thoughts

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thoughts are what we think. If you want to stay outside of thoughts, that means two thoughts. It also means you have an idea of what kind of a mental state is desirable while others are not. Thoughts exhaust themselves whether one wants it or not. Thoughts pop up whether one wants it or not. Trouble occurs whenever we think that one thought is good and another thought is bad. So the instruction says: "Don't think of good and evil."

What exactly is happening when we become lost in thought or emotion?

See for yourself what it's like to intentionally think through something, and what it's like when the process ends. What do you call lost then?

Why, given the thousands of times daydreams have vanished before my eyes, I don't seem to learn from the process or see through them more readily as time goes on?

You seem to have learnt that they vanish. What more do you expect?

And why can we notice some perceptions without becoming engrossed, yet others are engrossing? Thoughts pull me in often, yet sounds or touch rarely do. They're more scenery, while thoughts steal the show.

That sounds more like your own arbitrary criteria. How is it different to think of the wall and see the wall? They are both complete unstable experiences.

Does it even matter in terms of aiming our practice?

The practice is to see that there is no thought, emotion or any experience at all that one can grasp, rely on, and identify with. All of them inevitably and unstoppably come and go. To imagine that there is some state or position one can maintain or should cultivate is the wrong idea.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 11th, 2016 at 6:44 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Theravada aims for arhat status, says that arhats and buddhas do not affect beings after parinirvana.

Mahayana aims for buddha status, says that bodhisattvas and buddhas affect beings after parinirvana. And then it is further explained how that affecting occurs naturally from their vows, that the ultimate buddha dharmakaya is totally impersonal and ungraspable, plus all that beings can perceive are what their karma lets them to. So, the deity-like bodhisattvas and buddhas are eventually explained as very abstract ideas and inconceivable beings, very much like the nirvana of Theravada.

What happens is that Mahayana transformed devotional elements from non-Buddhist to Buddhist, so instead of some general mother-goddess people can instead pray to Guanyin, but when you go deeper you are taught how Guanyin is about practising and manifesting compassion, and so on. And in that fairly tangible sense Mahayana is more encompassing, as it embraces and transforms various religious elements, plus the teachings are often more flexible to a certain extent, following the idea of skilful means. So, if anything, then those aspects show how Mahayana is the Broad Vehicle.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 7:01 AM

Title: Re: Engrossing thoughts

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

It's this process of tangling/untangling in sensory phenomena that I'm asking about, just what is going on, and whether examining it in this way is helpful or not, in posters' opinions.

Astus wrote:

When there is a concept/feeling of what is correct meditation, in order to maintain that state takes practice and effort, and even then it is eventually lost. That idea of correctness occurs right when one thinks that there is a point where meditation begins. It becomes a unique activity. On the other hand, when one just sits around, like waiting on the corridor for someone, or sitting down on a bench to rest one's legs, at those times the mind is aware and calm without effort. True, after a few moments one can feel bored, or one automatically grabs something to serve as a distraction. But just before beginning to fiddle with something, it is nothing special. Is that what you would call an untangled mind? And then, out of habit, an impulse, one begins to take up something to play with. Is that what you call tangled? And right in that distinction of labelling tangled bad and untangled good the idea is established that one should be in one way but not another. In that way it is no different from any calming meditation technique where one has to return again and again to the object. In fact, it is probably just that. However, when ideas of good and bad mind states are put aside, what is there to awake from?

Consider these classic stories:

Huike said to Bodhidharma, "My mind is anxious. Please pacify it." To which Bodhidharma replied, "Bring me your mind, and I will pacify it." Huike said, "Although I've sought it, I cannot find it." Bodhidharma then said, "There, I have pacified your mind."

Daoxin said, "I ask for the master's compassion. Please tell me of the gate of emancipation." Sengcan said, "Who has bound you?" Daoxin said, "No one has bound me." Sengcan said, "Then why are you seeking emancipation?"

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 5:24 PM

Title: Re: Engrossing thoughts

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

What then, given your post, might "life fogged over by thought" be?

Astus wrote:

That is taking experiences to be substantial, to be self or related to the self, to be important. It is like seeing a shadow and mistaking it for a snake - there is a shadow, but it can appear as something solid and threatening (or attractive), because we quickly associate the sight with an idea, and with that idea comes other thoughts and emotions. That is only an example, and as such can lead to the wrong concept that one should not make mistakes and have no fears whatsoever, but that would be the idea of "thoughts are bad, no thoughts are good".

Monlam Tharchin said:

For what there is to awaken from, the answer to me is suffering.

Astus wrote:

Suffering is the effect of delusion, not the cause. The cause is the belief that experiences (five aggregates & six senses) are enduring, satisfying, and controllable; or simply that they are substantial and one can and should do something with them. However, samsara cannot be fixed. The very idea that one has to fix life is the cause of the problems. That's why in zazen there is nothing to keep or let go. Waking up is only waking up from the delusion of anything to attain or be free from.

Monlam Tharchin said:

As such, there is the distinction between zazen and daydreaming or sleeping, as seemingly described in book I quoted, and no amount of thoughts linked together has yet undone that.

Astus wrote:

We are dependent origination itself. Dream is the whole of life. Looking for nirvana anywhere beyond is like adding another head.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 6:55 PM

Title: Re: Klesas are Bodhi & dating 18 y/o girls.

Content:

Queequeg said:

This is a mistaken gloss. This is the Separate/Special or Provisional Mahayana view I pointed out is wrong.

Astus wrote:

How so? Zhiyi does not seem to say anything contradictory, he only takes a different way in explaining it. As he is quoted:

"He comprehends that the realm of evil is itself the realm of actuality [i.e., the dharma-nature, the absolute], and thus can attain liberation even in the midst of the midst of the five unforgivable sins."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 7:00 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

kirtu said:

Of course Arhats and Buddhas affect people after their own personal Parinirvana. Go to any Theravadin temple (at least Thai and Cambodian, less Sri Lankan) and you will see pictures of Arhats and honored contemporary monks (who are not publicly acknowledged as Arhats). They affect people by their example and the stories about them.

Astus wrote:

That's quite different from how buddhas and bodhisattvas stay in samsara actively liberating beings. At least theoretically. And that's one of my points actually, that Mahayana has a scriptural and philosophical system to integrate such devotional practices, while I have not met anything like that in the Nikayas or treatises. Or do you know such Theravada sources?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Simon E. said:

So if we follow that logic the Mahayana should stop referring to itself as the Mahayana..after all it is not the Great Vehicle relative to something abstract. It is the great vehicle relative to less complete vehicles.

Astus wrote:

No "less complete vehicle" mentioned here...

PP8000 1.5 (tr Conze):

Subhuti: It is thus, O Lord, that a Bodhisattva, a great being is armed with the great armour, and becomes one who has set out in the great vehicle, who has mounted on the great vehicle. But what is that great vehicle? How should one know the one who has set out in it? From whence will it go forth and whither? Who has set out in it? Where will it stand? Who will go forth by means of this great vehicle?

The Lord: 'Great vehicle,' that is a synonym of immeasurableness. 'Immeasurable' means infinitude. By means of the perfections has a Bodhisattva set out in it. From the triple world it will go forth. It has set out to where there is no objective support. It will be a Bodhisattva, a great being who will go forth, -but he will not go forth to anywhere. Nor has anyone set out in it. It will not stand anywhere, but it will stand on all-knowledge, by way of taking its stand nowhere. [And finally], by means of this great vehicle no one goes forth, no one has gone forth, no one will go forth. [24] Because neither of these dharmas, - he who would go forth, and that by which he would go forth – exist, nor can they be got at all. Since all dharmas do not exist, what dharma could go forth by what dharma? It is thus, Subhuti, that a Bodhisattva, a great being, is armed with the great armour, and has mounted on the great vehicle.

Subhuti: The Lord speaks of the 'great vehicle.' Surpassing the world with its Gods, men and Asuras that vehicle will go forth. For it is the same as space, and exceedingly great. As in space, so in this vehicle there is room for immeasurable and incalculable beings. So is this the great vehicle of the Bodhisattvas, the great beings. One cannot see its coming, or going, and its abiding does not exist. Thus one cannot get at the beginning of this great vehicle, nor at its end, nor at its middle. But it is self-identical everywhere. Therefore one speaks of a 'great vehicle.'

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 13th, 2016 at 6:48 PM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

SpinyNorman said:

I've been involved in previous debates around the definition of "Buddhist", and the most pragmatic and inclusive answer I remember was: "anyone who is doing some form of Buddhist practice."

Astus wrote:

Not really.

"Venerable sir, in what way is one a lay follower?"

"Mahanama, inasmuch as one has gone to the Buddha for refuge, has gone to the Dhamma for refuge, has gone to the Sangha for refuge; in that way, Mahanama, one is a lay follower."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an08/an08.025.kuma.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 13th, 2016 at 6:55 PM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dear Jundo,

Do you consider mind to be material, or produced by/from matter? If not - unless you conceive an independent mind, i.e. a self - then the causal, dependent nature of mind means there is rebirth. That's how dependent origination is interlinked with rebirth and called the correct view. As for the kinds of births, the six realms include all sorts of possibilities, and there is a certain logic to it as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 13th, 2016 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: Should the Open Dharma forum continue in its present form

Content:

Malcolm said:

Why would we, as a Mahāyāna forum, wish to encourage a subforum where people can engage in the unmeritorious activity of criticizing Mahāyāna Dharma?

Astus wrote:

People have questions whether they can post it or not. They also have disagreements to various degrees. Since the sections for specific traditions are meant to accept and maintain the given school's tenets - that is, as I imagine it, in a discussion those are the sources that take primacy over other. Therefore, Open Dharma means that no source whatsoever have primacy. Although in a way that is a straight way to chaos and confusion, it could also mean a 'pure reason' arena, where only the very basics of perception and logic counts. Except that very few, if any, can uphold such argument rules. Still, we can try.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 14th, 2016 at 5:51 PM

Title: Re: Klesas are Bodhi & dating 18 y/o girls.

Content:

Anders said:

Bhikshu dharmamitra has also translated the Mohezhiguan in full http://www.kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/ebm_book_page.htm

Astus wrote:

That is the Xiaozhiguan

(<https://ja.wikipedia.org/wiki/%E5%A4%A9%E5%8F%B0%E5%B0%8F%E6%AD%A2%E8%A6%B3> - Small Calming-Insight), written before the MHZG.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 14th, 2016 at 6:15 PM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

jundo cohen said:

I do not know know if the mind is material or not or something else all together (and neither do any modern neurologists, nor modern and ancient Buddhist teachers in my opinion). I really do not care all so much with regard to Liberation. It is simply not important to my Practice. We sit and embody "what is" ... whatever that "is" is ... even beyond and right through "is vs. is not".

Astus wrote:

I think the mind and its nature is the central topic of Zen, so it is particularly important to be clear about it, on both the theoretical and the experiential level. After all, it is not the body that needs liberation.

"Throughout the twenty-four hours of the day, you operate and act in all sorts of ways, seeing and hearing, laughing and talking, raging and rejoicing, affirming and denying: now tell me, ultimately who is it that can operate and act in this way?

If you say it is the physical body operating, they why is it that when people's lives have just ended and their bodies have not yet decomposed at all, their eyes cannot see, their ears cannot hear, their noses cannot smell, their tongues cannot talk, their bodies do not move, their hands do not grip, their feet do not step? So we know that what can see, hear, and act must be your basic mind, not your physical body. "

(Jinul: Secrets of Cultivating the Mind, tr Cleary)

jundo cohen said:

However, I fail to see in any way why "unless you conceive an independent mind, i.e. a self - then the causal, dependent nature of mind means there is rebirth." I am glad that you see that.

Astus wrote:

The body dies and decomposes. If the mind is not a part nor a product of the body, then it does not die with it, but it follows its own causal continuum.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 14th, 2016 at 7:51 PM

Title: Re: "Right" for Buddhism, or need the right Gate?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Buddhism is certainly not for everyone, otherwise everyone would be a Buddhist. But we see right in the story of the Buddha's enlightenment that only a few people can understand it.

"Enough now with teaching what only with difficulty I reached.
This Dhamma is not easily realized by those overcome with aversion & passion.
What is abstruse, subtle, deep, hard to see, going against the flow — those delighting in passion, cloaked in the mass of darkness, won't see."
(<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn06/sn06.001.than.html>)

As for Zen:

"Out of thousands and thousands of Dharma students in the Dhyana School, only three or five attain the fruit."
(Huangbo: "The Chung-Ling Record", tr Lok To)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 14th, 2016 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

jundo cohen said:

I may suggest that the best and clearest knowing comes when one drops all these categories and characterizations. Matter or not matter, inside or out ... what does it matter?

Astus wrote:

That's highly unlikely. In such a state of mind one cannot even tell one's left hand from the right. It is completely non-functional, i.e. useless. That's not wisdom, just apathetic blankness.

jundo cohen said:

Need we know all of it and what it is? Of course not! For example, one may not know all the sea, where it begins or ends and shape of every shoreline on which it crashes, its chemical makeup and the latin name of each species of coral ... yet thoroughly taste the salt of the sea right here. That saltiness is all the sea, all the shores in every briny grain. Understand? So it is with Mind.

Astus wrote:

Similarly, just by seeing that thoughts are not sights, sounds or anything tangible, one can know that it is not material, but at the same time subject to dependent origination.

jundo cohen said:

When the old Zen Masters asked such questions they did not wish a considered response.

Astus wrote:

Jinul was not the type of Zen teacher who liked to play word games. He is quite sensible, direct and scholarly in his works, unlike others influenced by Song era literary Chan.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

jundo cohen said:

Another area which I believe is related to "How much should Buddhism Change" is the question "How much can Buddhism do without superstition?" That is certainly eye of the beholder, depending on such basic questions as what one considers "superstition". I personally advocate Buddhism abandoning much within it that is perhaps superstition and fallacy.

Astus wrote:

I consider that too extreme a view. It is undeniable that not only rebirth but also superpowers have always been very much elements of Buddhism. Seeing them as metaphors and superstitions is failing to understand what they meant to our ancestors and even to many contemporary practitioners. Instead of rejecting them out of cultural habit, there are two important areas where we can practise openness towards initially strange teachings. One is the anthropological and historical approach, considering the role of those teachings in the past. Second is the practical approach, in how we can actually make use of those elements of the path. I think both are possible, interesting and educational.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 1:50 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

jundo cohen said:

Inner tools and inspiration, whether from insight to visions to voices, are also notably subjective and subject to anything from misinterpretation to simple hallucination to full blown mental illness mistaken for a pipeline to Jesus or the Buddha

Astus wrote:

That is a good example of common dismissal of subjective experiences. It is just like how foreign gods were demonised by preachers. However, as it is clear from various manuals for instance, Buddhists have been aware of all sorts of possible mistakes that can come from meditation. But as human beings we cannot avoid the subjective side - in a way, we can only be subjective. The extreme denial of personal, first hand experience is at the root of the difficulty some modern people have in fully understanding and appreciating Buddhism. Although that is not a universal phenomenon among today's men, only a certain segment bound by materialist/objectivist ideas.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Both Theravada and Mahayana aim for no attachment to the five aggregates and six senses, thus one is unbound. According to Theravada after parinirvana there is nothing to say, since even before that there is no individual to point to. Mahayana says that because of compassion bodhisattvas and buddhas do not leave samsara, nor do they enter nirvana, but because they have realised the emptiness of appearances they can function without being affected. So actually both affirm that there is no individual entity to be bound.

As we can see, they can accuse each other with wrong views: Hinayana is annihilationist, Mahayana is eternalist. But as everyone is aware, the topic of the existence or non-existence of the Tathagata after death is a question based on the incorrect assumption of self.

"There is really no establishment of various vehicles, and so I speak of the one vehicle; but in order to carry the ignorant I talk of a variety of vehicles."
(Lankavatara Sutra, 2.56, tr Suzuki)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 16th, 2016 at 2:10 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Adamantine said:

And since a Theravadan is not likely to practice in Mahayana for a number of years to test it, the best attitude is one of giving "the benefit of the doubt". "Perhaps it is a faster, more efficacious path, but it may not be right for me, for my own karmic makeup and mindstream at this time. Because of that, the Theravada is supreme for me and others like me."

Astus wrote:

How is that the best attitude? Would you apply that to Buddhists who are told that Vedanta is a superior path?

Adamantine said:

So for followers of Shakyamuni Buddha, it is never a good idea to quarrel between traditions.

Astus wrote:

Isn't it in Mahayana sutras where one can find all sorts of arguments against sravakas?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 16th, 2016 at 2:51 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Adamantine said:

We are discussing people who have all mutually taken refuge in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha. Followers of Shakyamuni Buddha. So your seeming parallel is a non sequitur.

Astus wrote:

It would be possible to point out that Mahayana has a different interpretation of all three of the treasures, so while on the surface they sound the same, they don't mean the same, just like Buddha is the ninth incarnation of God for Vaisnavas. And even if they are the same, it still seems illogical to give any "benefit of doubt", as that would also mean doubting one's own tradition.

Adamantine said:

However Mahayana sutras are addressed to those embarking on the Bodhisattva path, they're not intended to make sravakas feel bad about themselves. As I already said, these types of things are contextual teaching devices, not proclamations to be heralded on billboards or in a Theravadan forum.

Astus wrote:

Vimalakirti sutra, ch 3 is a good example of making sravakas feel bad. But if such instances are teaching devices, then there is no discussion of any Hinayana school, only a number of misinterpretations that do not represent any actual doctrine and discipline, therefore it not only has nothing to do with Theravada, but it's not relevant to the Agama scriptures either. Personally, I am sympathetic to that interpretation of the Mahayana supremacist rhetoric, but so far it has not really surfaced in this thread as an option.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 16th, 2016 at 8:10 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The point actually is that if there is no Mahāyāna there could not be a Theravada or any other Hināyāna school because there would be no Buddha to teach śrāvakas the arhat path.

Astus wrote:

How is that the point? Theravada has its own version of the bodhisattva path, and in Mahayana there are several versions.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 17th, 2016 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm said:

He never equates the attainment of arhatship with total awakening.

Astus wrote:

Thus the requirement of a bodhisattva accumulating merit on a grand scale over aeons. But then it's been overwritten by the inherent buddha-nature whereby anyone can reach buddhahood in a single lifetime. And how can the full function of buddha-nature manifest? By not being attached to appearances, thus removing all obscurations. However, since arhats are also without clinging to appearances, their buddha-nature should manifest in the same way.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 17th, 2016 at 6:43 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm said:

This latter statement of yours is false, the latter does not preclude the former.

Astus wrote:

Still, it made it possible and became the mainstream.

Malcolm said:

All obscurations are not removed merely through lacking attachment to appearances.

Astus wrote:

What obscuration is left without attachment?

Malcolm said:

Different people heard different things.

Astus wrote:

What different people? Numerous Mahayana sutras have the same disciples as the Agamas.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 17th, 2016 at 11:47 PM

Title: Removing Obscurations

Content:

Astus wrote:

This is a topic raised by the question

(<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=320501#p320501>) of whether freedom from attachments equals realising buddha-nature. Please tell if you agree or disagree and why. Here are some initial quotes.

Buddha-nature is hidden by the two obscurations:

"Buddhahood, spoken of as being luminous by nature [but] having been obscured by the massive web

Of the thick clouds of adventitious afflictive and cognitive [obscurations], just as the sun and the sky"

(Uttaratantrashastra 2.3, in When the Clouds Part, p 416)

What are those two?

"The barrier of vexing passions (Klesavarana) means the belief in what is wholly imaginary as being a real Atman; it gives precedence to the view that there is real individuality (Satkayadrsti). Its primary vexing passions (mulaklesas), with the other accompanying secondary passions (upaklesas), all perturb and torment the bodies and minds of sentient beings and act as a barrier to Nirvana. That is why they are all termed the barrier of vexing passions.

The barrier that hinders Absolute Knowledge (Jneyavarana) means the belief in what is wholly imaginary as being real dharmas ; it, too, gives precedence to the view that there is reality of individuality. Its false view, together with doubt, ignorance, desire, hate, conceit, etc., obscures the true nature of the known world and acts as a barrier to perfect Wisdom (Bodhi). That is why these are all termed the barrier that hinders Absolute Knowledge or Mahabodhi."

(Cheng Weishi Lun, p 671, tr Wei Tat)

What is required to be free from obscurations/hindrances (avarana)?

"Since generosity just leads to wealth,
Discipline [just leads to] heaven, and meditation [just] relinquishes the afflictions,
While prajna eliminates all afflictive and cognitive [obscurations],
It is supreme, and its cause is to study this [dharma]."
(Uttaratantrashastra 5.6, p 456)

"Since emptiness is the antidote to the darkness of afflictive and cognitive obscurations, how is it that one desiring omniscience does not promptly meditate on it?"
(Guide to the Bodhisattva Way of Life, 9.54)

And a commentary:

"To be sure, emptiness is the only corrective for the darkness of the emotional obscurations (the principal obstacle to liberation) and of the cognitive obscurations (which obstruct omniscience). Therefore, those who wish swiftly to rid themselves of these two obscuring veils and thus attain omniscience should by all means meditate on emptiness."

(Nectar of Manjushri's Speech, p 345)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 18th, 2016 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: Removing Obscurations

Content:

Malcolm said:

it does not remove the knowledge obscuration.

Astus wrote:

How do you define knowledge obscuration?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 18th, 2016 at 5:57 AM

Title: Re: Removing Obscurations

Content:

Malcolm said:

See the Abhisamaya-ālamkara, etc.

Astus wrote:

Then it is the mistake of the grasper-grasped, the not seeing of the emptiness of appearances, just as already defined. Therefore once attachment is relinquished, no more obscurations remain of either kind.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 18th, 2016 at 7:56 AM

Title: Re: Removing Obscurations

Content:

krodha said:

The emotional obscuration is sustained by kleśas, which can only be exhausted by the force of prajñā.

Astus wrote:

All obscurations are eliminated by wisdom.

krodha said:

there are different causes, and hence cessation of different causes to be rid of either obscuration.

Astus wrote:

"In general, whatever is an afflictive obscuration is necessarily a cognitive obscuration, but cognitive obscurations are not necessarily afflictive obscurations."

(Groundless Paths, p 575)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 18th, 2016 at 8:07 PM

Title: Re: Removing Obscurations

Content:

krodha said:

The point is that only Buddhas are free of the knowledge obscuration. Only Buddhas see dharmakāya.

Astus wrote:

That's fine. It's not even been questioned.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 18th, 2016 at 8:14 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land and the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Carlita said:

Given Nichiren was extremely against Pure Land teachings, how can one practice both without conflict even though they are both Meyahana teachings with the history you provided?

Astus wrote:

Go to schools like Tendai, or anything outside Japan, and such exclusivism is non-existent. Also, in real life, everyone is free to practice in whatever way one likes.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 6:34 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Dan74 said:

Is it? In Dhammapada, the Buddha says: Just as a bubble may be seen, just as a faint mirage,
so should the world be viewed

Astus wrote:

If we analyse a bit deeper than just repeating over and over the same things (<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=kQFKtl6gn9Y>) of superior or not, then it can be clear that on the wisdom side of things the Agamas teach the same complete freedom as any Mahayana or Vajrayana path (see <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=66&t=19609> and <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=39&t=21768>). However, it should also be recognised that the bodhisattva path is more extensive when it comes to other aspects, particularly the ability to teach beings, as that's the main quality a buddha has to possess. And when I say extensive, it doesn't mean one cannot find those qualities in arhats, but they are not requirements.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 7:50 PM

Title: Re: Saving all beings

Content:

Astus wrote:

"The bodhisattvas and mahāsattvas should subdue their thoughts like this: All the different types of sentient beings, whether they be born from eggs, born from a womb, born from moisture or born spontaneously; whether or not they have form; whether they abide in perceptions or no perceptions; or without either perceptions or non-perceptions, I save them by causing them to enter nirvana without remainder. And when these immeasurable, countless, infinite number of sentient beings have been liberated, in actuality, no sentient being has attained liberation. Why is this so? Subhūti, If a bodhisattva abides in the signs of self, person, sentient being, or life-span, she or he is not a bodhisattva."

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html, ch 3, also see ch 17)

As it states, it is a way to "subdue their thoughts". This is explained further by various Zen teachers:

"Good friends, now that we have done the repentances, I will express for you the four great vows. You should all listen closely: the sentient beings of our own minds are limitless, and we vow to save them all. ...

"Good friends, why don't we all say [simply] 'sentient beings are limitless, and we vow to save them all'? How should we say it? Certainly it's not me who's doing the saving!

"Good friends, the 'sentient beings of our own minds' are the mental states of delusion, confusion, immorality, jealousy, and evil. All these are sentient beings, and we must all [undergo] automatic salvation of the self-nature. This is called true salvation.

"What is 'automatic salvation of the self-nature'? It is to use correct views to save the sentient beings of false views, afflictions, and stupidity within our own minds. Having correct views, we may use the wisdom of prajñā to destroy the sentient beings of stupidity and delusion, automatically saving each and every one of them. When the false occurs, it is saved by the correct. When delusion occurs, it is saved by enlightenment. When stupidity occurs, it is saved by wisdom. When evil occurs, it is saved by good.

Salvation such as this is called true salvation.

(Platform Sutra, ch 6, p 48-49, BDK Edition)

Question: "Does the Buddha really save or rescue all sentient beings?" The master said: "There are really no sentient beings to be saved by Tathagata. Since there is, in reality, neither self nor non-self, how then can there be a Buddha to save or sentient beings to be saved?"

(Huangbo Xiyun: <http://www.abuddhistlibrary.com/Buddhism/C%20-%20Zen/Ancestors/The%20Zen%20Teachings%20of%20Huang%20Po/Zen%20Teachings%20of%20Huang-po.htm>)

"Because he persevered in these three pure practices of morality, meditation, and wisdom, he was able to overcome the three poisons and reach enlightenment. By overcoming the three poisons he wiped out everything sinful and thus put an end to evil.

By observing the three sets of precepts he did nothing but good and thus cultivated virtue. And by putting an end to evil and cultivating virtue he consummate all practices, benefited himself as well as others, and rescued mortals everywhere. Thus he liberated beings."

(Bodhidharma: <http://www.abuddhistlibrary.com/Buddhism/C%20-%20Zen/Ancestors/The%20Zen%20Teachings%20of%20Bodhidharma/The%20Zen%20Teachings%20of%20Bodhidharma/THE%20ZEN%20TEACHINGS%20OF%20BODHIDHARMA.htm>)

"The Bodhisattva, thought after thought, never separates himself from sentient beings; and since he understands that the substance of the mind is void, that in itself is known as and called 'the conversion and delivery of all sentient beings.' Thus, the wise man converts and delivers himself and thereby imperceptibly converts and delivers all other sentient beings from either reincarnation or extinction."

(Dazhu Huihai: <http://www.ymba.org/books/entering-tao-sudden-enlightenment/tsung-ching-record>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 20th, 2016 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The Agamas/nikāyas teach leading a path of freedom, but not a path leading freedom and omniscience, the latter is found only in Mahāyāna.

Astus wrote:

Omniscience is not an attribute of the Buddha in the Agamas. Quite the contrary, some gods and other teachers claim omniscience, but they are refuted and, to some extent, ridiculed for that. At the same time, there are events in the Buddha's life that could not have happened if he had been omniscient. See this essay:

<https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/buddha-omniscience.pdf>.

As for Mahayana, omniscience is really just the prajnaparamita, not abiding in any dharma whatsoever.

"It will not stand anywhere, but it will stand on all-knowledge, by way of taking its stand nowhere."

(PP8000 1.5, tr Conze)

"For that reason all-knowledge also is a state in which one neither takes hold of anything, nor settles down in anything."

(PP8000 13.3, tr Conze)

Furthermore, buddha-nature is completely revealed once there is no grasping at illusory appearances, and all possible buddha-qualities manifest. Since the Agamas teach not relying on any dharma, that should also mean the accomplishment of all attributes of perfect enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 20th, 2016 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm said:

That is not all omniscience is for Mahāyāna. There are two kinds of omniscience a buddha possesses: the omniscience of just how things are and the omniscience of all things that there are.

Astus wrote:

And what are those two and three kinds of knowledges? The first is the knowledge of emptiness, thus the core of liberation. The second is the knowledge of paths, thus the ability to teach well. The third is the knowledge of things, that is the way appearances appear. Emptiness is not separate from dependent origination, so knowing the middle way covers the first and last knowledge. Also, since one just does not accidentally happen to earn the wisdom of buddhas, the path of how such wisdom is attained is known experientially, not to mention the wisdom coming from the fact of knowing how the mind works. So, while those three can be divided to arhats, bodhisattvas and buddhas, it seems logical to me that the full knowledge of one requires the other two as well.

Malcolm said:

So for you, arhats, first stage bodhisattvas, buddhas and pratyekabuddhas all demonstrate precisely the same qualities and realization. If not, why not?

Astus wrote:

Yes, from the wisdom side of things that's exactly what should happen. But there are a number of other factors that can be taken into account for such differences. The closest at hand is the explanation of establishing vows and accumulating merit. Vows separate people's aspirations - and that can even apply to buddhas with various features and buddha-lands - while merit accounts for differing abilities and qualities developed. That is basically saying that there is no tathagatagarbha and follows the other/older model of the bodhisattva path. But that's not the only option.

It is possible to keep buddha-nature with a one-vehicle explanation, where every level is only a stage on the path to buddhahood. And in order to explain the historical problem raised here by many, it can be said that while the Agamas are not at fault or lacking, the way they were interpreted by some is incorrect, thus we see that Mahayana apologetics are against Abhidharmic ideas primarily. Similarly, in Tibetan Buddhism they find the sutra teachings somewhat deficient as they actually view them through a number of treatises (while, for instance in some Mahamudra works quoting sutras that match with the highest teaching is fine).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 20th, 2016 at 6:59 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm said:

But it is not the case. For example, even Maudgalyāyāna needed to ask the Buddha where his mother had taken rebirth.

Astus wrote:

Do you refer to the Ullambana Sutra? I don't find that story anywhere else.

Malcolm said:

But again, it isn't the case. Why? Because if it were the case, than even hinayāna stream entrants should have the same realization as a buddha, but they do not.

Astus wrote:

A stream-enterer is not yet free from ignorance, only an arhat is.

Malcolm said:

Or, the Agamas, as Nāgārjuna says very clearly, do not teach the path to Buddhahood, let alone buddhanature (which itself can only be seen by buddhas).

Mahāyāna sūtras provide details on a path that are not detailed in the Agamas. If they were detailed, the Mahāyāna sūtras would be unnecessary, not to mention the tantras and the Dzogchen tantras, etc.

Astus wrote:

As the Agamas teach freedom from appearances, and that means no obscurations, it is no different from realising buddha-nature. They do not describe any path to buddhahood and such, only the bare essentials. Mahayana teachings expand, clarify, and repeat the same teachings in different words, or sometimes with identical phrases.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 20th, 2016 at 8:02 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Neither arhats nor pratyekabuddhas are completely free from ignorance, only a buddha is

Astus wrote:

I meant in the Agamas, an arhat is completely free from ignorance, otherwise he would still be stuck in samsara. Of course, in a one vehicle approach, only a buddha is truly wise and free.

Malcolm said:

Arhats have ignorance, and this means they possess the knowledge obscuration.

Astus wrote:

What are they ignorant of? Knowledge obscuration means being bound by the view of grasper and grasped, the concepts of agent, object, and action. They are free from clinging to the five aggregates and the six sensory areas, so there is nobody to grasp anything. What is left then to be obscured by?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 20th, 2016 at 8:48 PM

Title: Re: Taigen Shodo Harada Roshi Introduction to Zen

Content:

kirtu said:

Well that's true. But every teachers introduction to Zen will be somewhat different. I didn't watch all of the video myself - did Harada Roshi actually get into shinkantaza or koan study in his short introduction?

Astus wrote:

Long talk on posture and breathing, then in the last few minutes mentioned how this calmness can eventually be brought out to everyday life and that is the "helping all beings" attitude. But mostly it's about detailing the basics of his style of zazen.

It is interesting how he explained the posture with chi, while there is Nishijima going on about the nervous system. However, neither of the two can be found in the sutras, treatises or even Zen classics. Nevertheless, apparently both feel the need to explain the posture with some non-Buddhist philosophy.

Still, all these nice physical and mental athletics, while perfectly fine and useful in a way, do not really touch the Zen of the buddhas and patriarchs, i.e. seeing into nature.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 20th, 2016 at 9:56 PM

Title: Re: Taigen Shodo Harada Roshi Introduction to Zen

Content:

jundo cohen said:

That is the case, that seeing the nature is where's its atlessly at.

Astus wrote:

Atlessly? Less likely? At least? Sorry, I don't get it.

jundo cohen said:

But what makes you think that the pure act of sitting and "seeing the nature" are necessarily two things?

Astus wrote:

Depends on what you mean by pure act.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 20th, 2016 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm said:

You can read the Agama citations which detail the non-afflictive ignorance of arhats and pratyekabuddhas in the Abhidharmakośaṭīkālakṣaṇānusāriṇ, etc.

Astus wrote:

Such a category can be used to exploit otherwise ordinary stories and claim that arhats are not that perfect. At the same time, similar events in the Buddha's biography can be found as well, but those are explained in a very different light.

But still the source of such ignorance is not explained. Or maybe it's the expectation of fantastic omniscience - beyond what logically can come from clear seeing of appearances - of a buddha that would need to be established. Otherwise, such stories can only fall into the category of parables.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 21st, 2016 at 12:26 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Glad you have placed it on such a subjective basis.

Astus wrote:

When there are such stories on both disciples and the Buddha, then some treatises come up with a way to explain those events in one way and another, that is those author's interpretations. As for my side, such theories are neither well established nor balanced, although they certainly serve a purpose. And again, as I have mentioned before, this is the case of divergences in exegesis.

As a footnote: those who are believed to have attained buddhahood (or something similar) in traditions like Zen and Vajrayana are at the same time added with an explanation for why they did/do not appear as magnificent and superhuman as buddhas are supposed to be. Unless they are people who lived long ago and have entire books of legends about their lives.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 21st, 2016 at 3:49 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm said:

All this amounts to saying is that you have no confidence in any sources, apart from the ones you like and serve your exegetical purposes.

Astus wrote:

I think the technical term for that is discerning direct (nitārtha) from indirect (neyārtha). However, that does not address any of the raised issues, particularly the ignorance of arhats.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 21st, 2016 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

tomamundsen said:

Ignorance... moha or avidyā ?

Astus wrote:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/ptf/dhamma/sacca/sacca2/avijja.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 21st, 2016 at 8:00 PM

Title: Re: Solving Problems the Buddhist Way

Content:

Queequeg said:

they mutually cause each other. They are designations that have meaning in tension. To speak of wisdom, you have to speak of nescience, and to speak of nescience it must stand in contrast to wisdom.

Astus wrote:

They are relative terms, there's no disagreement on that.

Queequeg said:

If one being's experience is invoked then the intersubjective experience of every being from time without beginning to time without end, within the immediate present scope of experience to the extent of the dharmadhātu, are all invoked.

Astus wrote:

That sounds fine, but I don't see it as anything more than pure rhetoric. For instance, in order to include past and future appearances would require some Sarvastivada style eternal dharmas. Also, to mix the experiences of all beings would mean the denial of personal karma. Don't get me wrong, I'm familiar with Huayan's four dharmadhātus and the idea of non-obstruction of phenomena, but that is basically a nice way to say dependent origination.

Queequeg said:

In considering the learning in China before the introduction of Buddhism, Zhiyi saw them as preparatory teachings.

Astus wrote:

Guifeng Zongmi has a similar scheme he describes in the https://books.google.com/books/about/Inquiry_into_the_origin_of_humanity.html?id=HdQKAAAYAAJ treatise, a system otherwise known as the five levels of dhyana. I have no problem with that idea, although I don't find it particularly important either.

Queequeg said:

An expansive, integrative approach draws Buddhism into an engaged stance with the full spectrum of human experience. The more formalistic approach you advocate has an effect that I would describe as isolating.

Astus wrote:

There are lot of confusion about what is the Dharma and how to use it. So, I believe that that is what needs to be clarified. Matching it up with all sorts of philosophies and religions only adds to the confusion, especially because one would need to be knowledgeable about those other ideas as well as Buddhism in order to engage properly. There is no need to study Confucianism or any other philosophy in order to learn Buddhism. Rather, one should put aside whatever information one already possesses and open one's mind to the Dharma. But once one has a good grasp on the teachings, it is no problem to engage with whatever comes up. And that is where this topic was intended to start, from the perspective of using the teachings to tackle various problems in life. Because, as I think you say as well, one has to address all sorts of experiences. But it comes after one has taken refuge (actually, not just formally) in the Triple Jewels, not before.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 22nd, 2016 at 12:01 AM

Title: Re: Taigen Shodo Harada Roshi Introduction to Zen

Content:

kirtu said:

is definitely found in traditional instruction.

Astus wrote:

Which one? Can you point to some classic Buddhist meditation manuals discussing it?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 22nd, 2016 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm said:

It was addressed. I referred you to where you can find the Sarvastivadin discussions, as well as Agamic sources, for the idea that śrāvaka arhats and pratyekabuddhas possess a nonafflictive ignorance.

Astus wrote:

Anything in English? Also, the question I referred to is the reason for it, since generally it's the knowledge obscuration attributed to sravakas, but such obscuration can exist only if they have attachment to something, however, they are free from the skandhas and dhatus, so there cannot be anything to be obscured by.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 22nd, 2016 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: Taigen Shodo Harada Roshi Introduction to Zen

Content:

kirtu said:

So it's more oral instruction (or more correctly included in oral instruction that I have received).

Astus wrote:

There are not that many meditation manuals in the canon, and almost none from the Zen school. It's quite another matter that certain teachers use old Chinese medical ideas in their oral instructions, but that's a cultural thing.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 22nd, 2016 at 1:54 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Asanga states in his commentary in the Uttaratantra: ...

Vasubandhu states in the Sūtra-ālambkāra, he states:

He provides a definition as well: That concept of the three wheels, is asserted as the knowledge obscuration.

Then of course there is the passages in the Lanka in which the Buddha states that due to not realizing selflessness in phenomena, śrāvaka arhats and pratyekabuddhas possess a knowledge obscuration.

Astus wrote:

All that are good and well. And in order to be obscured by agent-action-object and the emptiness of appearances one needs to maintain some attachment, an identification with the aggregates and sensory areas. So if such clinging is asserted in the sravakas, then they cannot even be called liberated, they are lost in some pseudo-nirvanic state (e.g. the apparitional city in ch. 7 of the Lotus Sutra). But if there is no such grasping, they cannot be obscured either.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 22nd, 2016 at 6:15 AM

Title: Re: Taigen Shodo Harada Roshi Introduction to Zen

Content:

Meido said:

Naturally on the Japanese Rinzai side the works of Hakuin, Torei and so on give a great deal of instruction in terms of energetic practices which are still transmitted (though again, the texts do not transmit the entirety of the oral instruction).

Astus wrote:

As you say, when such elements were included, you can find them in texts. Similarly, their lack in teachings mean that they were not considered important, mainstream, or did not exist at all.

Meido said:

However, I have yet to meet any Zen (Soto or Rinzai) or Chan teacher whose instruction did not contain references to ki/qi, directions on where the breath and energy should be placed and cultivated, instruction for recognizing energetic imbalances and exercises prescribed to remedy such, etc. So I would not say that it is simply a case of "certain teachers".

Astus wrote:

Remedying hindrances is part of any manual, like the <http://antaiji.org/archives/eng/zzyk.shtml>. It could be an interesting research to find out when exactly such energy related elements started to occur.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 22nd, 2016 at 6:31 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Well, your qualm directly contradicts the Buddha's statement in the Lanka that śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas are liberated, but they have obscurations to full awakening.

Astus wrote:

I recognise it as well that there are contradictions. At the same time, the concept that sravakas are unbound (from attachment to skandhas) but still obscured (by conceptual attachments) is a contradiction in itself.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 22nd, 2016 at 6:54 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, this is resolved by what the Buddha says, they retain the knowledge obscuration because of traces they fail to eradicate. It is not the case that they have active afflictions. But they do not eliminate all traces and until they do, they still possess a knowledge obscuration, in addition to the fact that as the Buddha says, śrāvaka arhats and pratyekabuddhas do not realize the emptiness of phenomena, only the emptiness of persons.

Astus wrote:

What traces and where? Are those the effects of past deeds, what we can see (e.g. <http://www.buddhanet-de.net/ancient-buddhist-texts/English-Texts/Why-the-Buddha-Suffered/index.htm>) affecting the Buddha in the same way?

Knowledge obscuration is clinging to mental phenomena, dharmas that are within the skandhas. But if somebody is still bound by the skandhas, that is not liberation from samsara.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 22nd, 2016 at 7:27 AM

Title: Re: Saving all beings

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

How does a Buddhist work in this life to save all beings?

Astus wrote:

As Malcolm said: the six perfections.

Monlam Tharchin said:

But if any sutra is used to make the medicine of emptiness into poison, it is this sutra (along with the Heart Sutra).

Astus wrote:

It is a poison when grasped as nothingness, as repression, as elimination. For instance, if you want to eradicate suffering, that is a mistake.

Monlam Tharchin said:

if beings lack physical and emotional health, how on earth will they practice the Dharma?

Astus wrote:

What gives beings well being according to the Buddha? Good deeds. Their own personally made merit. Similarly, bad fortune is the result of evil actions. That is why accumulating merit and so called purification practices are common.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 22nd, 2016 at 8:03 AM

Title: Re: Saving all beings

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

It's easy to interpret this as leaving others to their karmic retribution

Astus wrote:

It also tells you that if you want riches, you should be generous. If you need such motivational statements. It doesn't actually tell you what to do, but informs about the law of cause and effect. Apathy towards other beings is not exactly a positive mental factor, rather it's rooted in ignorance. At the same time, restlessness is also no good. Anyhow, not even buddhas can just put all beings into nirvana, they have to do it themselves.

Monlam Tharchin said:

So the proper response to others' suffering instead is the Six Perfections?

Astus wrote:

The six perfections constitute the path of the bodhisattva, the way to liberate all beings. It is also a wonderful summary of the path. The very first one is giving: benefiting others and practising letting go at the same time.

You can read extensively on them in http://kalavinka.org/kp_book_pages/n6p_book_page.htm.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 23rd, 2016 at 7:58 PM

Title: Re: What's in simple, brief explanation, emptiness?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Ideas define the world and the self. To believe that the world and the self are like this and that on their own: that is delusion. To see that everything is defined by fictional ideas: that is seeing the emptiness of all phenomena.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 25th, 2016 at 7:58 AM

Title: Buddha-Nature is Change

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Therefore, that the grasses, trees, thickets and groves are impermanent is the buddha nature; that humans and things, body and mind are impermanent — this is because they are the buddha nature. That the lands, mountains, and rivers are impermanent — this is the buddha nature. Annuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi, because it is the buddha nature, is impermanent; the great parinirvāṇa, because it is impermanent, is the buddha nature."

(Dogen:

<http://stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/shobogenzo/translations/bussho/tra> nslation.html)

"Buddhahood is emptiness, yet emptiness does not mean non-existence. Emptiness means that all things lack permanence. There is objective existence, but nothing is unchanging and eternal; everything that exists changes constantly. This ever-changing nature is Buddha-nature. Enlightenment is realizing the empty and impermanent nature of ourselves and the world. If you can live in emptiness without attaching to it, it is called "neither abiding in existence nor emptiness." Although everything continues to exist, there is no self that attaches to anything. Not abiding in existence and not abiding in emptiness is enlightenment."

(Sheng-yen: <http://ddc.shengyen.org/cgi-bin/ccdd/show.py?s=09-04p0056>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 25th, 2016 at 6:25 PM

Title: Re: Taigen Shodo Harada Roshi Introduction to Zen

Content:

tingdzin said:

This, I think, is a stunningly wrongheaded statement, based on my own experience. Up until the latter half of the twentieth century, for example, a lot of esoteric Tibetan stuff was passed on strictly orally. While Zen is not Vajrayana, it seems to me there are still many things in the latter that students just don't hear about until they have been around for some time and made a commitment. Also, by the way, teachings not being "mainstream" does not mean they could not be vitally important; it could be that a teacher wanted to evaluate a disciple thoroughly over a long period before imparting them.

Astus wrote:

There were a lot of oral/personal instructions in Zen, and they were included in the records if the circumstances were right. That's what a significant amount of Zen literature is made up of. There was the practice of taking notes during lectures and personal discussions, then they were shared in a smaller or larger circle. Besides those that eventually made it into official records, there are some still in private/monastic collections that survived (e.g. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kirigami_%28Soto_Zen%29).

Also, if you note the point at which those explanations involving the body's energetic system in the video come up, it is a topic to be covered at the beginning. It is not some high level secret instruction at all. I'm not saying that it is incorrect, unorthodox, or anything of that kind. But the fact that the language and teachings used are not present within the canonical materials is not because of some conspiracy to hide them.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 25th, 2016 at 6:30 PM

Title: Re: Buddha-Nature is Change

Content:

Wayfarer said:

But I think "Buddha nature" ought to be put in quotes, or said with a wink.

Astus wrote:
Why?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 25th, 2016 at 8:44 PM

Title: Re: Buddha-Nature is Change

Content:

Mother's Lap said:

In the Lankavatara the alaya-vijnana is designated as the tathagatagarbha. So grass, tress etc. being traces manifesting from the alaya-vijnana, could in a sense be designated as such, however grass obviously does not manifest the two kayas separately and so cannot be taken as tathagatagarbha in that sense.

Astus wrote:

Appearances are all mind itself, not external entities, nor products manifesting out of the mind. So, "when it is understood that there is nothing in the world but what is seen of the Mind itself, discrimination no more rises, and one is thus established in his own abode which is the realm of no-work." (Lankavatara Sutra 3.77, tr Suzuki) And the point of the teaching is realisation of buddha-nature, not to set up a theory of it. "Now, Mahamati, what is perfect knowledge? It is realised when one casts aside the discriminating notions of form, name, reality, and character; it is the inner realisation by noble wisdom. This perfect knowledge, Mahamati, is the essence of the Tathagata-garbha." (2.23) How do you do that? "If you simply transcend the various dharmas of being and nonbeing, so that your minds are like the orb of the sun—always in the sky, its brilliance shining naturally, illuminating without [intending to] illuminate—isn't this a matter that requires no effort? When you attain this, there is no place to rest. This is to practice the practice of the Buddhas, and it is to "be without abiding and yet to generate the mind." This is your pure Dharma body, which is called the unsurpassable bodhi." (Huangbo, in Zen Texts, p 38, BDK Edition)

So, why say that buddha-nature is change, is lifting a finger, raising an eyebrow, "earth, grass, trees, walls, tiles, and pebbles"? Because it is not dwelling anywhere. "There is no place to stand where ones leaves the Truth. The very place one stands on is the Truth; it is all one's being. All dharmas are Buddhadharmas, and all dharmas are liberation. Liberation is identical with suchness; all dharmas never leave suchness. Whether walking, standing, sitting, or reclining, everything is always inconceivable function." (Mazu, in Sun Face Buddha, p 66)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 25th, 2016 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: Buddha-Nature is Change

Content:

Mother's Lap said:

Dependent nature (alaya-vijnana) sans imputed nature is the perfected nature. Neither the dependent nature nor perfected nature are "change".

Astus wrote:

Dependent-nature is causes and conditions, the way everything changes. Imputing fixed elements is the delusion itself to get rid of.

Mother's Lap said:

The point of the quotes from the masters in the first post and in your last are upaya for the realisation of buddha-nature; the alaya-vijnana being designated as tathagatagarbha is a tenet. Conflating the two is where e-Zennists go astray.

Astus wrote:

What is the meaning of a tenet if not to establish correct view and generate liberating insight? Therefore, the Lankavatara Sutra (2.28) states: "the doctrine of the Tathagatagarbha is disclosed in order to awaken the philosophers from their clinging to the idea of the ego, so that those minds that have fallen into the views imagining the non-existent ego as real, and also into the notion that the triple emancipation is final, may rapidly be awakened to the state of supreme enlightenment."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 26th, 2016 at 5:26 AM

Title: Re: Buddha-Nature is Change

Content:

Wayfarer said:

We don't want to be literalistic about such expressions. Otherwise you make a concept out of them, and then it becomes a matter of belief, like the kinds of ideas found in scholastic philosophy. And they're OK, in their own way, but they don't capture the living essence of Zen, which is ever elusive.

Astus wrote:

In that case everything should be put between quotation marks. Rather, it is http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Four_reliances all over Buddhism that the teachings serve a purpose and should be used on the path. The teachings are brought alive by learning them, understanding them, and confirming them in one's own experience.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 27th, 2016 at 6:39 AM

Title: Re: Solving Problems the Buddhist Way

Content:

Queequeg said:

First, if you insist on just dealing with appearances, you're on your own, literally, isolating yourself into little more than the impressions of light you perceive bouncing off objects. We can disagree, but you need to acknowledge, we're not talking about the same thing unless you are talking about not just appearances, but subjective experiences as well.

Astus wrote:

Appearances are everything that there is. All dharmas. They can be split to the categories of external and internal, physical and mental, etc. as they usually are.

Queequeg said:

The difference is the emphasis.

Astus wrote:

Agreed.

Queequeg said:

Emptiness doesn't get your laundry done, and not doing it because "emptiness" just makes you gross.

Astus wrote:

People usually know how to manage their laundry, otherwise they can ask for help from mom. What more often is the problem is being bored and fed up with doing the laundry every weekend. That's where a deeper understanding of emptiness comes useful.

Queequeg said:

Everything can be Buddhist Problem Solving - if I am a medical doctor ... If I am a plumber ... The idea here is turning our entire experience into Buddhist practice, and not just in an isolated way for ourselves

Astus wrote:

I can agree with being a Buddhist all day long. That's what actual practice is about, during all activities.

My daily activities are not unusual,
I'm just naturally in harmony with them.
Grasping nothing, discarding nothing,
In every place there's no hindrance, no conflict.
Who assigns the ranks of vermilion and purple?—
The hills' and mountains' last speck of dust is extinguished.
[My] supernatural power and marvelous activity—
Drawing water and carrying firewood.
(Pang Yun, tr Sasaki-Iriya-Fraser)

Queequeg said:

I think that approach of setting Buddhism apart pursued too zealously yields a bone dry Buddhism that is as appetizing as a bowl of chalk and of the most questionable efficacy

Astus wrote:

What I meant is to differentiate Buddhist methods from others. Regardless of a plumber being Buddhist or not, the same tools and methods are required to fix the toilet. And not a word of Dharma comes up in a plumbers school. That doesn't mean Buddhism cannot be used by a plumber in his job, nor that functional pipes are not important.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 27th, 2016 at 7:05 PM

Title: Re: Taigen Shodo Harada Roshi Introduction to Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

It's interesting how an "intro to Zen" easily turned into a question of belief in esoteric papers, astrology and cosmic energy. Until now I have not considered that they are related. So far the only time I have encountered qi related statements in classical Zen teachings - not modern teachers - was in Zongmi's Inquiry into the Origin of Humanity (原人論) criticising the belief in the "primal pneuma" (元氣) as the origin of the world.

The noted Indian origin of energy practices do not come up in the sutras, treatises or meditation manuals. The concept of prana and its yogic utilisation is a feature of Anuttarayogatantra, something not particularly related to Zen or even East Asian Buddhism. I am not really familiar with Shingon, but I don't recall that they have an energy system like that either. So, at what point has it become an element of Zen? There is Hakuin, so the origin in Rinzaishu is explained - and that also shows how such teachings were missing from the tradition before him. Shodo Harada is a Rinzaishu teacher after all.

The authenticity and validity of energy teachings aside, what do they have to do with Zen practice? What is their role? Is it only about obtaining a nice seated position? Is it an auxiliary practice to support zazen? Is it something more?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 27th, 2016 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

Astus wrote:

What counts as an oral tradition? The Tripitaka has existed in written form for quite a long time now. Mahayana sutras in particular are texts and not sayings, and they actively encourage people to read and copy them. Even nominally oral traditions like Zen have a huge literature. As an example, the famous koan collections (e.g. Blue Cliff Record, Book of Serenity) are purely literary works (wenzi chan 文字禪), and they were meant as such. As for enlightenment from sutras, there are a couple of famous examples even in Zen: Huineng (Diamond Sutra), Zongmi (Complete Enlightenment Sutra), Jinul (Platform Sutra), Hanshan Deqing (Shurangama Sutra). And even if we put aside Zen, there is no Mahayana doctrine that one should become a disciple and learn some sort of oral tradition. As Rory noted, the Huayan school is based on scriptures, so is every other school. And when it comes to commentaries, those are written as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 28th, 2016 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Other examples are the 19th and 20th century reforms in Buddhism. Theravada was revived through returning to the Pali Canon as the primary source of authority. A strong example of such a reform is https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kiribathgoda_Gnanananda_Thero and the <http://mahamevnawa.lk/inenglish/> where they focus only on the suttas without commentaries. Chinese Buddhism experienced something similar when they started to establish seminaries and began to study classical materials like Yogacara, and from that movement developed today's Humanistic Buddhism, and its founder, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Yin_Shun, was a great scholar. Even in Soto Zen we can see that the scholar https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Menzan_Zuih%C5%8D brought Dogen and his works back into currency and his reform ideas, based on written materials, define today's Soto in many aspects.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 28th, 2016 at 7:27 AM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

Bakmoon said:

That being said, even in such cases there is a big danger in going all on your own armed with a bunch of books. A teacher can monitor the student's progress and step in to correct misunderstandings.

Astus wrote:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Changlu_Zongze 's Zuochanyi states (tr. Bielefeldt): "The Śūraṅgama-sūtra, T'ien-t'ai's Chih-kuan, and Kuei-feng's Hsiu-cheng i give detailed explications of these demonic occurrences, and those who would be prepared in advance for the unforeseen should be familiar with them."

That is, a meditation manual - actually, the number one Zen manual from the Song era - recommends the study of three other texts if one wants to be familiar with further details, like hindrances and difficulties. It doesn't say: "ask the abbot" or "ask an enlightened master". That doesn't mean that teachers cannot be of assistance, but even they rely on the written works of the ancients.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 28th, 2016 at 5:56 PM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

jikai said:

In fact I actually said that it must be accompanied by practice.

Astus wrote:

One can get all the instructions both in person and from scriptures, and it usually happens in combination. But the purpose is to confirm that information in one's own experience. And that's what Zen's mind-to-mind transmission means, and all the other similar statements. The sutras themselves are the words of the Buddha, so dismissing them or labelling them insufficient is almost like rejecting the Dharma.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 28th, 2016 at 8:00 PM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

Dan74 said:

I think, Astus, Meido has previously disputed your interpretation of the mind-to-mind transmission in Zen. As someone who has not received it, do you think you are qualified to assert what it is and what it is not?

Astus wrote:

Has he? In which thread?

As for the definition, it's not simply my assertion.

The master said: To not attain a single dharma is called the transmission of the mind. If you comprehend this mind, then there is no mind and no dharma.

[The questioner] said: If there is no mind and no dharma, why do you call it a transmission?

The master said: You have heard me say "transmission of the mind" and have taken it that there is something that can be attained. It is for this reason that the patriarch said, "When one recognizes the mind-nature, it should be called inconceivable. Clearly and distinctly without anything that is attained, when one attains it one does not speak of it as understanding."

(Huangbo, in Zen Texts, p 36, BDK Edition)

Besides that, if what you refer to is the unbroken chain of transmission from Shakyamuni to the present day, that's another issue.

Dan74 said:

lets not go too far and argue that Zen has not been an oral tradition, even in your examples of Huineng...

Astus wrote:

What is an oral tradition? Where the teachings and stories are preserved in an oral format, not something written. However, not only Zen, but Buddhism itself has been a literate religion for at least two thousand years. The canonical materials are not transmitted by memorisation, but in a written format. Buddhism in China established itself through written translations, not to mention that Chinese culture itself is strongly literate. What oral tradition is it you think there is?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 28th, 2016 at 8:28 PM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

jikai said:

Of course it happens in combination. That was never really the issue. I also made no suggestion that one should dismiss or label sutra as insufficient. Nothing I've written suggests that.

Astus wrote:

Yes, I did not assume so either. My post was ambiguous to that extent, as I wasn't simply responding to you but rather following up on what you had written, continuing the line of thought.

jikai said:

I think part of what drives the either/or discussions about this is that the traditional accounts tend to come down as suggesting the importance of a teacher and thus oral transmission. But we live in a time in which many practice without teachers/ a sangha.

Astus wrote:

Surely the community is important and precious, that's what keeps the Dharma alive. What I object to is this idea that an "authentic teacher" is somehow the key to everything. And I'm not judging Vajrayana here, it's another business. If there is anything in the tradition that is regularly emphasised on the social level, that is monastic life. With monastic life comes not only the rules but also a number of teachers and Dharma-brothers. However, as people rather stay householders, and there are not many actual monks or nuns around, this idea of the teacher gained currency. But I think it is truly a modern view - not that there is anything wrong with that - that has a romantic baggage with it.

I am not an advocate of people following their own ideas and never contacting communities. But, as you say, there are new situations, and it is a fact that some are loners and/or have no access to communities. However, there is better access to fellow Buddhists than ever before, for instance through this forum. Saying that those who do not visit a teacher at regular intervals are not proper practitioners and their meditation leads only to their own damnation, that's harsh.

“Good friends, if you wish to cultivate this practice, you may do so either as a householder or in a monastery. Householders who are able to practice this are like those persons of the East whose minds [harbor] good. Those in the monastery who do not cultivate it are like those people of the West whose minds [harbor] evil. It is only that the mind should be pure—then it is the Western [Paradise] of the self-nature!”

Lord Wei asked further, “How can householders cultivate this practice? I hope you will teach us this.”

The master said, “I will recite a formless verse for this great assembly. Just cultivate according to this, doing exactly as if you were always with me. If you do not cultivate according to this, what benefit would it be to take the tonsure and leave home [to become a monk]?”

(Platform Sutra, ch 4, p 40, BDK Edition)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 28th, 2016 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dear Malcolm,

I appreciate your quotes (as always), and I can only agree with them. However, they don't seem to say the indispensability of teachers.

Malcolm said:

such a guru is to be praised

Astus wrote:

Certainly.

Malcolm said:

Rely on a virtuous mentor

Astus wrote:

An unvirtuous one definitely sounds like a bad idea.

Malcolm said:

should never be abandoned even at the cost of one's life

Astus wrote:

Since it's not that easy to find one, it seems logical not to abandon them after all the trouble.

Malcolm said:

give them respect.

Astus wrote:

Doesn't that go without saying?

These lines from the Perfect Enlightenment Sutra (http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/sutra_of_perfect_enlightenment.html#div-10) are probably much closer to that intention:

"Good Sons, sentient beings of the degenerate age must arouse "great mind" and seek Genuine Teachers. Those who want to practice should seek out only someone with correct insight, whose thoughts do not abide in characteristics, who is not attached to the realms of the arhats and solitary realizers, and whose mind is constantly pure even while manifesting the world's afflictions."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 28th, 2016 at 11:30 PM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

DGA said:

working with an authentic teacher is indispensable.

Astus wrote:

For what? There are the three trainings: discipline, meditation, wisdom. Discipline requires to keep the precepts. The precepts themselves are well explained in the scriptures. True, full ordination normally has requirements, but that's probably not what you meant. Meditation requires cultivation on one's own. As for the methods, stages and hindrances, they are explained in detail in texts. Wisdom requires studying the teachings. The teachings themselves are contained in the canon. At what point is a teacher indispensable?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 28th, 2016 at 11:35 PM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

Malcolm said:

...pretty much says a teacher is indispensable.

Astus wrote:

It's possible to read it that way. Or it can mean that once such a precious opportunity has arisen one better not let it slip away.

Malcolm said:

in Vajrayāna, a teacher, it goes without saying, is definitely indispensable

Astus wrote:

Yes, it is a good example. There is no doubt left about it, as it's repeated over and over. However, I don't see the same rule set up outside that tradition.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 29th, 2016 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Actually, what is means is that you need a teacher. There are a ton of other citations that make the same point.

And, of course, there is the story of Sadaprarudita in the 8000 PP sūtra.

Astus wrote:

In that story, Sadaprarudita is told that the teaching will be either oral or scriptural:

"When you progress like this, you shall before long be able to study the perfection of wisdom either from a book, or from the mouth of a monk who preaches dharma."

And then we see how the teaching is deposited in a stupa:

"Sadaprarudita replied: "Where is this perfection of wisdom, the mother and guide of the Bodhisattva?"

Sakra answered: "The holy Bodhisattva Dharmodgata has placed it in the middle of this pointed tower, after he had written it on golden tablets with melted Vaidurya, and sealed it with seven seals."

Following that, the Buddha entrusts Ananda with the prajnaparamita to be written down and spread through copying:

"Therefore then, Ananda, a Bodhisattva who wants to acquire the cognition of the all-knowing should course in this perfection of wisdom, hear it, take it up, study, spread, repeat and write it. When, through the Tathagata's sustaining power it has been well written, in very distinct letters, in a great book, one should honour, revere, adore and worship it, with flowers, incense, scents, wreaths, unguents, aromatic powders, strips of cloth, parasols, banners, bells, flags and with rows of lamps all round, and with manifold kinds of worship.

...

As long as this perfection of wisdom shall be observed in the world, one can be sure that "for so long does the Tathagata abide in it," that "for so long does the Tathagata demonstrate dharma," and that the beings in it are not lacking in the vision of the Buddha, the hearing of the dharma, the attendance of the Samgha."

And there are other sections in PP8000 where it is made clear that one can perfectly well obtain prajnaparamita from the book (sutra) itself. E.g.:

"The Lord: So it is, Kausika. Moreover, not only one who has learned studied and repeated the perfection of wisdom, will have those qualities, but also one who worships a copy of it, he also, I teach, will have those advantages here and now.

Sakra: I also will protect one who worships a copy of the perfection of wisdom, and still more so one who in addition learns, studies and repeats it."

and this section explains your quote about "should never be abandoned even at the cost of one's life.":

"If a Bodhisattva reacts in such a way to the perfection of wisdom, if he delights in seeing and hearing it, bears it in mind and develops it, keeps his mind fixed on it without diverting it elsewhere, feels an urge to take it up, bear it in mind, preach, study and spread it, if, once he has heard the perfect wisdom, he follows and pursues the reciter of dharma and does not let him go, until he knows this perfection of wisdom by heart or has got it in the form of a book, just as a cow does not abandon her young calf"

Malcolm said:

The Ārya-ratnākara-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states: In order to fully enter the dharmadhātu, one must rely on a virtuous mentor, associate with them and honor them.

Astus wrote:

Now that is something, although without context it is still not that clear. When it says mentor, is it kalyanamitra, upadhyaya, or something else?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 29th, 2016 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The point is that even though he has a vision of the Tathāgatas before hand, he insists on finding Bodhisattva Dharmodgata to hear the PP directly from him.

Astus wrote:

That is a possible interpretation, not really emphasised in the sutra itself. However, it is stated repeatedly in this and other sutras that the scripture itself is the carrier and transmitter of the teaching - after the demise of Shakyamuni - worthier of veneration than relics.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 29th, 2016 at 1:55 AM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

Matt J said:

Classical Indian teachings

Astus wrote:

Which ones?

Matt J said:

The teacher prevents one from getting caught up in one's own delusions.

Astus wrote:

Only if one trusts in, listens to, and understands that teacher. But then carefully studying the sutras can do the same.

Matt J said:

The scriptures prevent the teachers from making up their own stuff.

Astus wrote:

If they are faithful to the Buddha's teachings. That also means there is nothing new a teacher can say. On the other hand, as long as students rather listen to anyone who looks authentic, there is little chance of catching the master talking nonsense. That's where the role of a larger community comes in, fellow elders, monastic peers, and such.

Matt J said:

And personal experience prevents it from being a merely intellectual exercise.

Astus wrote:

That's not an easy one at all, since people usually see what they want to see. And that's what a clear eyed teacher should protect against, they say. Except that they can only do that to a good student who listens ("good sravaka"). So, right view comes first. Something that can also be learnt from books.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 29th, 2016 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, you have not understood the colophons of this sūtra: once he has heard the perfect wisdom, he follows and pursues the reciter of dharma and does not let him go, until he knows this perfection of wisdom by heart or has got it in the form of a book, just as a cow does not abandon her young calf"

"Hearing" requires hearing it from someone.

Astus wrote:

That's in chapter 14, not the colophon. Also, the sutra has existed as a book as far as we can tell, not to mention that its translations are definitely textual works. Plus the sutra itself makes it clear that one should read and copy it, just like other Mahayana scriptures recommend the same for themselves. Why make copies if one needs to hear it? And what difference does it make if one reads it on paper or listens to the same text read out?

How about reading it loudly for oneself? Especially the sections of the Lotus Sutra that talks about the Lotus Sutra. That's some serious self-referential loop. It's like the Pure Land practice of mind reciting, mind listening (一心念一心聽): "The mind begins to think, which moves the tongue; the tongue in turn moves, producing sound, and that sound returns to the Self-Mind."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 29th, 2016 at 6:31 PM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

Malcolm said:

the sūtra makes it clear that the doctrine of the PP must be heard from another.

Astus wrote:

The doctrine is contained in the sutra, and the sutra is a written text. What is there to be heard from another? It is pointless to have someone read it out, and nowadays even a smartphone can do that.

Chapter 4 not only states that a single copy is worth more than innumerable relics, but explains that the reason for that is it being the source of buddhahood. Similar statements are found in other scriptures - or possibly the majority of Mahayana sutras. It does not simply state that it is meritorious to copy them, it equates the text with the Tathagata himself, therefore the sutra can be used (venerated and studied) in the same way as if one had the Buddha in front of oneself.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 29th, 2016 at 11:38 PM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Sūtras are not written texts. This idea is at the heart of your misunderstanding.

Astus wrote:

What non-written sutra do you know of? Even in Tibetan iconography Manjusri holds a book as a representative of the PP teachings.

Malcolm said:

How can the PP, which is inexpressible, beyond thought and concepts be contained in a book?

Astus wrote:

Since it is inexpressible, it is not obtained from buddhas or teachers.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 30th, 2016 at 12:26 AM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

conebeckham said:

Sakyamuni Buddha wrote so many books, eh? Good thing, too, for his followers, since there were no teachers to teach.

Astus wrote:

Very good point. Still, they were eventually penned down and preserved as scriptures. And there are some other things: Why do they refer to themselves as books? How can they be placed in a stupa? What was hidden by the Nagas and retrieved by Nagarjuna?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 30th, 2016 at 5:10 AM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

tomamundsen said:

In Tibetan iconography, Dharma books are a symbol representing the enlightened speech of the Buddha.

Astus wrote:

Good to know. Then writing and speech are truly inseparable.

"Since they maintain they have no need of written words, they should not speak either, because written words are merely the marks of spoken language."
(Platform Sutra, ch 10, tr BTTS)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 31st, 2016 at 6:28 PM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

DGA said:

Does anyone know of an example of a contemporary or historical Buddhist master who has attained any degree of realization with nothing in support of his or her endeavors (in this lifetime) but a library card? (or audio/video recording for that matter?)

Astus wrote:

It's assuming that there could be a situation where the person knows not a single Buddhist. And if there were such a being, who would know about them anyway? On the other hand, there are famous historical masters who attained realisation from written works, as I have <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=322047#p322047> some of them.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 1st, 2016 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

Matt J said:

Let's examine your list:

Astus wrote:

Huineng:

"When he reached the words 'responding to the nonabiding, yet generating the mind' I experienced a great enlightenment, [realizing that] all the myriad dharmas do not transcend their self-natures."

(Platform Sutra, ch 1, p 23, BDK Edition)

That is a line directly from the Diamond Sutra, not an explanation.

Zongmi:

"Indeed, it would be difficult to over-emphasize the importance that the Scripture of Perfect Enlightenment had for Tsung-mi. It was, to begin with, the catalyst for his first enlightenment experience. Shortly after having become a novice monk under Tao-yi in Sui-chou (Szechwan) in 804, he came across a copy of the Scripture of Perfect Enlightenment for the first time at a maigre gathering (chai) at the home of a local official. After only reading two or three pages, he had an awakening, an experience whose intensity so overwhelmed him that he found himself spontaneously dancing for joy. (It is worth noting that Tsung-mi's initial enlightenment did not occur while he was absorbed in meditation. Nor, as in the case of so many well-known Ch'an enlightenment stories, did it occur as a sudden burst of insight at the turning words or dramatic action of a master. Rather, it came about as a result of reading several lines of scripture.)"

(Peter N. Gregory: <http://terebess.hu/zen/mesterek/Tsung-Mi-s-Perfect-Enlightenment-Retreat.pdf>)

Hanshan:

"Since I had no one there to consult with about my enlightenment experience, I read The Surangama Sutra, hoping to gain insight and verification. I had previously read the Sutra but I hadn't understood its main theme. Now, however, I absorbed its meaning effortlessly. As the months passed, my understanding deepened and expanded until I could grasp its profundity without a single doubt."

(The Autobiography & Maxims of Chan Master Han Shan, p 16)

"For Yunqi Zhuhong and Hanshan Deqing, training through self-cultivation was encouraged, and nominal and formulaic instructions from pretentious masters were despised. Eminent monks, who practiced meditation and asceticism but without proper dharma transmission, were acclaimed as acquiring "wisdom without teachers" (wushizhi), a laudable title for them but a misfortune in the eyes of the more orthodox Chan masters in later generations, for whom dharma transmission defined their identity as Chan monks in a certain lineage.

The negative attitude toward the role of teacher can be seen from Hanshan Deqing's perspective. Though never receiving dharma transmission, he was often asked to write prefaces to the records of transmission in some obscure lineages. His writings testify that although the practice of dharma transmission was revived, Hanshan Deqing questioned its value seriously. For him, the enlightenment of the mind was more important than the nominal claim of dharma transmission. Because true enlightenment experience was valued, a few self-proclaimed Chan masters in the late Ming gained reputations as eminent monks without acquiring dharma transmission."

(Jiang Wu: Enlightenment in Dispute, p 41)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 1st, 2016 at 4:37 AM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

DGA said:

My point is merely that study alone, or meditation alone, is inadequate to the path. Where do the masters quoted above disagree with that?

Astus wrote:

Nowhere, of course. The general idea is that one should obtain a solid level of training, and then one should practise on one's own, in a self-sufficient way. And even there practising alone doesn't necessarily mean leaving the monastery or the city.

Still, you might also consider this (i.e. they discard not only book knowledge, but oral sayings as well):

"Followers of the Way, don't have your face stamped with the seal of sanction by any old master anywhere, then go around saying, 'I understand Chan, I understand the Way.' Though your eloquence is like a rushing torrent, it is nothing but hell-creating karma. The true student of the Way does not search out the faults of the world, but eagerly seeks true insight. If you can attain true insight, clear and complete, then, indeed, that is all."

(Record of Linji, p 13, tr Sasaki)

"Virtuous monks, what are you seeking as you go around hither and yon, walking until the soles of your feet are flat? There is no buddha to seek, no Way to complete, no dharma to attain."

(Record of Linji, p 27, tr Sasaki)

"In reality, there is not the slightest thing that could be the source of understanding or doubt for you. Rather, you have the one thing that matters, each and every one of you! Its great function manifests without the slightest effort on your part; you are no different from the patriarch-buddhas! [But since] the root of your faith has always been shallow and the influence of your evil actions massive, you find yourselves all of a sudden wearing many horns. You're carrying your bowl bags far and wide through thousands of villages and myriads of hamlets: what's the point of victimizing yourselves? Is there something you all are lacking? Which one of you full-fledged fellows hasn't got his share?

Though you may accept what I am saying for yourself, you're still in bad shape. You must neither fall for the tricks of others nor simply accept their directives. The instant you see an old monk open his mouth, you tend to stuff those big rocks right into yours, and when you cluster in little groups to discuss [his words], you're exactly like those green flies on shit that struggle back to back to gobble it up! What a shame, brothers!"

(Record of Yunmen, p 103-104, tr App)

DGA said:

Is that the behavior of someone who actively avoids oral instruction in Dharma?

Astus wrote:

That's fairly absurd. People are already conditioned to find enlightened masters as the direct source of knowledge. At the same time, because of that, looking for liberation from others is a mistake, just like the contempt of thinking oneself to be all-knowing.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 1st, 2016 at 5:33 PM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

Malcolm said:

he loves taking indefensible positions merely for the hell of it.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 1st, 2016 at 5:40 PM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

rory said:

also the great reviver of modern Korean Son Kyongho Song'u.

Astus wrote:

While he lacked the training from any particular teacher - like Hanshan or perhaps Xuyun - he was a strong meditator like the other two. Although, most interestingly, in his last seven years he just disappeared from the scene. An even bigger name in Korean Buddhism is Wonhyo, who not only did not go to China to become a student, unlike his friend Uisang, but had an interesting life story as well. But these people are more examples of individual effort rather than simply learning from scriptures.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 1st, 2016 at 9:39 PM

Title: Re: Clarification re: Dharmakaya and ...

Content:

Astus wrote:

Emptiness

- as the nature of all appearances: dharmadhatu

- as the wisdom of buddhas: dharmakaya

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 1st, 2016 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: Milarepa's secret to success

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here's a different approach:

Reverend Ma was sitting in a spot, and Reverend Rang took a tile and sat on the rock facing him, rubbing it. Master Ma asked, "What are you doing?" Master [Huairang] said, "I'm rubbing the tile to make it a mirror." Master Ma said, "How can you make a mirror by rubbing a tile?" Master [Huairang] said, "If I can't make a mirror by rubbing a tile, how can you achieve buddhahood by sitting in meditation?"

And a spin on that story by Dogen in Kokyo (SBGZ, vol 1, p 329-330, BDK Edition):

"Clearly, in truth, when polishing a tile becomes a mirror, Baso becomes buddha. When Baso becomes buddha, Baso immediately becomes Baso. When Baso becomes Baso, zazen immediately becomes zazen. This is why the making of mirrors through the polishing of tiles has been dwelled in and retained in the bones and marrow of eternal buddhas; and, this being so, the eternal mirror exists having been made from a tile. While we have been polishing this mirror—in the past also—it has never been tainted. Tiles are not dirty; we just polish a tile as a tile. In this state, the virtue of making a mirror is realized, and this is just the effort of Buddhist patriarchs. If polishing a tile does not make a mirror, polishing a mirror cannot make a mirror either. Who can suppose that in this “making” there is [both] “becoming” buddha and “making” a mirror? Further, to express a doubt, is it possible, when polishing the eternal mirror, to mistakenly think that the polishing is making a tile? The real state at the time of polishing is, at other times, beyond comprehension. Nevertheless, because Nangaku’s words must exactly express the expression of the truth, it may be, in conclusion, simply that polishing a tile makes a mirror. People today also should try taking up the tiles of the present and polishing them, and they will certainly become mirrors. If tiles did not become mirrors, people could not become buddhas. If we despise tiles as lumps of mud, then we might also despise people as lumps of mud. If people have mind, tiles must also have mind. Who can recognize that there are mirrors in which, [when] tiles come, tiles appear? And who can recognize that there are mirrors in which, [when] mirrors come, mirrors appear?"

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 1st, 2016 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: Clarification re: Dharmakaya and ...

Content:

smcj said:

the Dharmakaya the nature of appearances as well.

Astus wrote:

One better not fixates too much on words.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 1st, 2016 at 11:38 PM

Title: Re: Taigen Shodo Harada Roshi Introduction to Zen

Content:

Caodemarte said:

If so, then please be the first one to cast your stones!

Astus wrote:

Dogen did not agree with the use of toothbrush in China - virtually called them idiots - and wanted people to go back to using sticks to clean their teeth.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 2nd, 2016 at 9:34 PM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

Astus wrote:

What is this simultaneity important for? Certainly not for relaying teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 3rd, 2016 at 1:19 AM

Title: Re: All Buddhist traditions are oral traditions. Or...?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, it is important for relaying the teachings. We have already discussed this you and I. Not into a repeat.

Queequeg said:

Can you link the discussion?

Astus wrote:

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=40&t=19445>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 4th, 2016 at 3:04 AM

Title: Lay Chan Teachers

Content:

Astus wrote:

Inspired by the article: <http://www.buddhachan.org/en/en-learn/origin>.

There are two major records of biographies of lay students.

Jushi fendeng lu (居士分燈錄 / Record of the Division of the Lamp for Laymen; X86n1607) in 2 fascicles (72+38 biographies), by Zhu Shi'en (朱時恩), published in 1610. Jushi zhuan (居士傳 / Biographies of Lay Buddhists; X88n1646) in 56 fascicles, by Peng Jiqing (彭際清), published in 1775.

I have looked up the names from the first fascicle of Shi'en's work and tried to provide some information in English. Most of them are quite famous historical figures, either as rulers, or as literati, or as both.

維摩詰 <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Vimalakirti>
傅大士 <http://terebess.hu/zen/fuxi.html>
楊銜之 https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Yang_Xuanzhi
向居士 Xiang jushi (disciple of https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dazu_Huike)
李通玄 <http://gradworks.umi.com/34/83/3483183.html>
龐道玄 https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Layman_Pang
崔群 https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Cui_Qun
甘贄 Gan Zhi (disciple of https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Nanquan_Puyuan)
陸亘 Lu Gen (disciple of https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Nanquan_Puyuan)
白居易 https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bai_Juyi
裴休 https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Pei_Xiu_%28Tang_dynasty%29
李翱 https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Li_Ao_%28philosopher%29
于頔 https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Yu_Di
王敬初 Wang Jingchu (disciple of https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Guiyang_school)
陳操 Chen Cao (disciple of <http://terebess.hu/zen/muzhou.html>)
陸希聲 https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Lu_Xisheng
張拙 Zhang Zhuo (disciple of Shishuang Qingzhu)
王延彬 Wang Yanbin (disciple of Changqing Huileng, governor of Quanzhou, nephew of https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Wang_Shenzhi)
王隨 Wang Sui (disciple of Shoushan Shengnian, prime minister)
楊億 Yang Yi (disciple of Guanghui Yuanglian)
曾會 Zenghui (disciple of Xuedou Zhongxian)
李遵勗 Li Zunxu (disciple of Guyin Yuncong, military commissioner, son-in-law of emperor Taizong, brother-in-law of emperor Zhenzong, elder relative of emperor Renzong)
許式 Xu Shi (disciple of Dongshan Xiaocong)
夏竦 Xia Song (disciple of Guyin Yuncong, general, Duke of Ying)
范仲淹 https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Fan_Zhongyan
楊傑 Yang Jie (disciple of Tianyi Yihuai)
劉經臣 Liu Jingchen (disciple of Zhihai Benyi)
孫比部 Sun Bibu (disciple of Yangqi Fanghui)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 4th, 2016 at 8:46 PM

Title: Re: What is the objective of Mahayana Buddhist practice?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Buddha said to Subhūti: "The bodhisattvas and mahāsattvas should subdue their thoughts like this: All the different types of sentient beings, whether they be born from eggs, born from a womb, born from moisture or born spontaneously; whether or not they have form; whether they abide in perceptions or no perceptions; or without either perceptions or non-perceptions, I save them by causing them to enter nirvana without remainder. And when these immeasurable, countless, infinite number of sentient beings have been liberated, in actuality, no sentient being has attained liberation. Why is this so? Subhūti, If a bodhisattva abides in the signs of self, person, sentient being, or life-span, she or he is not a bodhisattva."

(Diamond Sutra, ch 3, tr Muller)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 5th, 2016 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: What is the objective of Mahayana Buddhist practice?

Content:

DGA said:

Does this mean that such a one has no more afflictions? or does it mean that what had seemed to be trouble (the endless barrage of thoughts and emotions, the hurt of the world) has become indistinguishable from wisdom and compassion?

This matters in terms of method, because if it's the former, then the point is to cease thinking. If it's the latter, then you do something else with the mind--there's no use in ceasing thought if it's of the same stuff as wisdom.

Astus wrote:

Affliction is anything one has an emotional attachment to. Once there is no such involvement, it is not an affliction. But this might be mistaken for lack of emotions and apathetic detachment.

Afflictions are already empty as they are. So there is no need to do anything with them. But this might be mistaken for embracing delusion.

Realistically, we can neither turn into robots nor keep our dissatisfying mindset. Thus the usual resignation that buddhahood is something far far away, that we are all sinful humans who can only hope for salvation from some higher being. That is one valid solution in Buddhism offered in Mahayana.

But I like to believe that there is another way. And that way is total relinquishment of subject, object and action. In other words: there is nobody to do anything. With a positive tone: everything is fine as it is. Translating it back to the basic terminology: the answer to dissatisfaction is not in satisfying it but dropping the wish itself. Although that sounds like we need to do something (drop the wish), that is not exactly true. To give up all hope one only needs to see that the goal is false. And that is realising that nobody can do anything. As Guanyin says in the Heart Sutra: "Due to non-acquisition, the bodhisattva, having relied on Perfect Wisdom, dwells without mental obstruction. From the non-existence of mental obstruction, he is fearless, he overcomes inverted erroneous views, and ultimately reaches Nirvāṇa."

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 6th, 2016 at 2:56 AM

Title: Re: What is the objective of Mahayana Buddhist practice?

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

Thoughts and reflection serve the thinker. Who will serve the sea of beings?

Astus wrote:

How are beings served? Can they be served at all? To know that, we should ask the reason for the detriment of beings, and address the cause.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 6th, 2016 at 9:20 AM

Title: Re: What is the objective of Mahayana Buddhist practice?

Content:

Taco_Rice said:

rather than decide to leave all goals, instead decide to take up some Ultimate Goal like making the world into a Pure Land or something?

Astus wrote:

Hopelessness is not about despair, it is about seeing that there is nothing that can be wished for. It is already the pure land.

Vimalakirti sutra, ch 1 (BDK Edition, p 78):

"if a bodhisattva wishes to attain a pure land he should purify his mind. According to the purity of his mind is his buddha land pure!"

...

"Śāriputra, it is through the transgressions of sentient beings that they do not see the purity of the Tathāgata's buddha land. This is not the Tathāgata's fault! Śāriputra, this land of mine is pure, but you do not see it."

See also: Platform sutra, ch 3.

Taco_Rice said:

Doesn't Vimalakirti's non-attachment ironically account for so much of the opulence he was able to use for the benefit of others?

Astus wrote:

Is this a section in the sutra you refer to or your interpretation of something in it?

Taco_Rice said:

Similarly, isn't the Emptiness of all phenomenon all the more reason to take up the Way of the Bodhisattva?

Astus wrote:

It is the way, not the reason to take it up.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 7th, 2016 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: What is the objective of Mahayana Buddhist practice?

Content:

Taco_Rice said:

Right, but not everyone knows that it's the way. That's same rationale for transforming the world into a Pure Land, (changing society in a way to foster that understanding,)

Astus wrote:

Changing society is a political goal. The pure land is when the world is perceived with a pure mind, and that's a bodhisattva's goal.

Taco_Rice said:

The layman unmistakably teaches emptiness, but his realization of emptiness (or at least, his actualization of his realization,) seems very different from that of the recluse.

Astus wrote:

It shows that the Dharma can be taught in any circumstances and even by an apparently ordinary layman. That's one of the main points of the sutra.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 8th, 2016 at 5:36 AM

Title: Re: What is the objective of Mahayana Buddhist practice?

Content:

Vasana said:

Objective of the Bodhisattvayana or 'Mahayana' = The complete liberation of all sentient beings. (Buddhahood)

Astus wrote:

Sentient beings must seek to save themselves and not wait for the Buddha to do it. If the Buddha could liberate sentient beings, then, since there have been Buddhas as numerous as all the dust motes that have ever existed, surely all of them would have been delivered by now. So why do we still loaf about in these realms of birth and death, unable to become Buddhas? Everyone should understand that sentient beings must save themselves. The Buddha will not do it. Make an effort! Practice yourself! Do not depend upon the power of other Buddhas. Therefore, the sutra says appropriately: "To seek and find the Dharma, do not depend upon the Buddha."

(Dazhu Huihai: <http://www.ymba.org/books/entering-tao-sudden-> enlightenment/treatise-entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 8th, 2016 at 5:36 PM

Title: Re: What is the objective of Mahayana Buddhist practice?

Content:

Vasana said:

No one ever said anything about Buddhas saving beings.

Astus wrote:

Hasn't the objective of Mahayana been defined as saving all beings?

Vasana said:

they can manifest to inspire and teach the methods of doing so.

Astus wrote:

Certainly, that's the job of every Dharma teacher.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 8th, 2016 at 6:36 PM

Title: Re: What is the objective of Mahayana Buddhist practice?

Content:

Vasana said:

There's a difference between guiding and saving.

Astus wrote:

Does then the Mahayana resolve comes down to the will to spread the Dharma far and wide? That is, active proselytisation.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 8th, 2016 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: What is the objective of Mahayana Buddhist practice?

Content:

Vasana said:

It kinda seems like you're grasping at straws here if that's your conclusion.

Astus wrote:

What else is there to it?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 9th, 2016 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: What is the objective of Mahayana Buddhist practice?

Content:

Vasana said:

Proselytizers try and recruit or convert people to their faith and beliefs. ... The resolve in Mahayana is to facilitate the natural liberation of all beings (in the sphere beyond subject, object & activity) , but it doesn't mean you go need to go screaming it from the roof-tops and handing out leaflets to anyone passing by. It's just not very skillful or effective and for the most part, completely unnecessary.

Astus wrote:

That's just a matter of efficiency in spreading the word. Marketing techniques, etc.

Vasana said:

If beings are ripe enough to want to explore the Dharma, then the conditions for this to happen will naturally come in to place by the force of their merit and spiritual inclinations. This is spoken of countless times in various sutras and again, is not exclusive to Mahayana as far as i know.

Astus wrote:

So, bodhisattvas do not need to pursue such course of action, there is no actively guiding beings, except for those who come and ask for it.

Vasana said:

Furthermore, trying to convert or benefit people is pointless unless you actually posses the wisdom and means for doing so,

Astus wrote:

That is, anyone not yet on the stage of nobility should not worry about all this saving all beings business.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 9th, 2016 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: What is the objective of Mahayana Buddhist practice?

Content:

Vasana said:

Not sure what point you're trying to make here.

Astus wrote:

That no matter the method, it's still about turning people to the Dharma, i.e. converting them.

Vasana said:

In this way, you share any merit you have amassed with all beings, thus multiplying it immeasurably and ensuring that even beings with very little or no merit at all with evil tendencies are not left out.

Astus wrote:

Dedicating merit is about letting go. But there is no benefit in it for others, unless they recognise and accept such sharing, that is, knowingly agree to such good actions.

Vasana said:

Even if you can't help all beings, the intention and resolve to eventually be able to do so is what will make this an actuality.

Astus wrote:

The point I'm pursuing here is about how that helping happens. As you said, they cannot save them but only provide guidance through giving instructions, just like Shakyamuni, who travelled far and wide and established the four orders.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 9th, 2016 at 5:22 AM

Title: Re: Does Karma explain everything.

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Also see this chapter in Dan Lusthaus' book Buddhist Phenomenology called <https://books.google.com.au/books?id=leiwsT-XqwQC&lpg=PP1&pg=PA175#v=onepage&q&f=false>.

Astus wrote:

Lusthaus goes wrong there for three reasons.

1. See <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn36/sn36.021.than.html> to the quoted sutta.
2. In Yogacara all phenomena originate from the alaya-vijnana.
3. The whole of samsara and all the realms arise from the beings' karma.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 10th, 2016 at 5:37 PM

Title: Re: Does Karma explain everything.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Karma is all there is.

"What is the All? Simply the eye & forms, ear & sounds, nose & aromas, tongue & flavors, body & tactile sensations, intellect & ideas. This, monks, is called the All."
(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn35/sn35.023.than.html>)

"Now what, monks, is old kamma? The eye is to be seen as old kamma, fabricated & willed, capable of being felt. The ear... The nose... The tongue... The body... The intellect is to be seen as old kamma, fabricated & willed, capable of being felt. This is called old kamma.

And what is new kamma? Whatever kamma one does now with the body, with speech, or with the intellect: This is called new kamma."
(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn35/sn35.145.than.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 11th, 2016 at 5:37 PM

Title: Re: Does Karma explain everything.

Content:

Simon E. said:

Isn't part of the problem that we are conditioned to analyse everything ?
Our education systems value that analytical process without always teaching concomitant synthesis..so we see cetana, vipaka and karma as separate phenomena for investigation..in reality of course all arises together from Shunyata.

Astus wrote:

I would say it's the opposite. As long as one takes mind and mental phenomena without properly analysing them, they seem substantial. Once seen correctly - impermanent, empty, dependent - they turn out to be neither self nor related to self.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 15th, 2016 at 9:38 PM

Title: Re: Seeing the True Self and then Dropping it.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Master Keizan: The master of the house is "I" (Keizan: Denkoroku, case 1 on Siddharta Buddhas enlightenment: The Transmission of the Lamp(Light?))

Please look into what Dogen calls the Srenika heresy in Bendowa and Bussho. That will make it clear that there is no place for any self.

Master Zhao Zhu/Joshu: Take one look at me, I am nothing other than I am. The True Self is simply this. Right here what more is there to be sought for? (Zhao Zhu: The Recorded Sayings of Zen Master Joshu: James Green Translation: p 78.)

That is a misleading excerpt. Here's what's translated as "true self":

主人公 - hero (of a novel or film) / main protagonist

The Foguang E-dictionary (佛光電子大辭典) explains: It is a Chan term used to point to everyone's inherent buddha-nature. (禪林用語。指人人本具之佛性。)

Another interesting note is that Daehaeng's hallmark term is Juingong (主人空), and that's pronounced the same as 主人公 but the last character is changed to 空, i.e. emptiness, so it means "empty doer", because there is no constant element. Once one assumes a changeless thing or self, that's falling into the extreme view of eternalism.

The section the excerpt is from means that there is no other self to look for, buddha-nature is just what is. To suppose a "big/true self" behind a "small/false self", that is not Buddhism at all, much less Chan.

The preceding paragraph in Green's translation says:

"To hold on to self is corrupt, to not hold on to self is pure.' It is just like a mad dog who is always trying to get more and more to eat. Where is the Buddha to be found? Thousands and ten thousands of people are 'seeking-for-Buddha' fools. If you try to find one person of the Way [among them] there are none. If you want to become a disciple of the 'King of Emptiness', don't give illness to your mind."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 16th, 2016 at 8:59 PM

Title: Re: Seeing the True Self and then Dropping it.

Content:

jundo cohen said:

The one caution I might offer is that many Zen folks might step right through and back on questions of either affirmation or denial. This is true with Dogen as well, where certain concepts and propositions might be rejected only to be turned on their head and reinvigorated again. That was a good way to avoid both the extremes of eternalism or nihilism.

Astus wrote:

Word play may have its time and place, but, especially on a forum, I prefer straightforward language. Avoiding extremes is not that difficult.

"when one sees the origination of the world as it actually is with right discernment, 'non-existence' with reference to the world does not occur to one. When one sees the cessation of the world as it actually is with right discernment, 'existence' with reference to the world does not occur to one."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.015.than.html>)

In practice that is quite simple as well. It is neither grasping/thinking, nor rejecting/not thinking, but seeing that all phenomena come and go. There the error of eternity is assuming that there is an independent witness/awareness, while the error of annihilation is the attempt to eliminate some/all experiences.

jundo cohen said:

Many Zen Teacher ancient and modern would speak of a "True Self" of some kind, but the danger was in reifying the concept.

Astus wrote:

There is no problem with talking about a true self, original nature and such. It's just that it turns out to be nothing more than this ordinary mind, even though it suggests something significantly more fascinating.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 17th, 2016 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: Seeing the True Self and then Dropping it.

Content:

jundo cohen said:

In Zen speak, with all those wise-crazy Koans, sometimes the straight is crooked, and the crooked is the straightest non-way from A to B.

Astus wrote:

While it may seem so, that there is some strange Zen lingo, it is rather a literary product of the Song era, primarily known from the koan collections (e.g. Blue Cliff Record).

While there might be some Christian communities around who like to imitate the language of the original KJV, normally people use today's English. I think that a code language for Zen does not facilitate going beyond conceptuality, rather it is a hindrance people only waste their time on to figure it out. Thus Dahui put aside the literary style and offered the huatou method as a direct cut. Even today his letters are quite readable, especially when compared to Yuanwu's comments in the BCR or Dogen's Shobogenzo. Similarly, if you look at works from the Tang era (e.g.

<http://www.ymba.org/books/entering-tao-sudden-enlightenment/treatise-entering-tao-sudden-enlightenment>, <http://www.abuddhistlibrary.com/Buddhism/C%20-%20Zen/Ancestors/The%20Zen%20Teachings%20of%20Huang%20Po/Zen%20Teachings%20of%20Huang-po.htm>), they lack the over complicated style and follow standard Buddhist terminology.

As for wise-crazy koans:

"Unfortunately, the majority of the exchanges or anecdotes composed in the encounter dialogue format are not very good stories, in any meaningful sense. In fact, a huge number of Chan stories or exchanges, included in texts such as Jingde chuan deng lu and Bi yan lu, can be viewed as little more than nonessential ramblings, a peculiar type of religious gibberish. Basically, we are confronted with countless examples of mass-produced textual materials that tend to be highly formulaic, numbingly repetitive, and ostensibly pointless. One of the things that keeps amazing me is how otherwise intelligent or sincere people can take this sort of stuff seriously, although the history of religion is filled with blind spots of that sort."

(Mario Poceski: The Records of Mazu and the Making of Classical Chan Literature, p 170-171)

jundo cohen said:

It is our ordinary thinking, ordinary assumptions, common sense and ordinary ways of expressing it all in language which misleads and gets us into so much trouble. Only by twisting and reinventing the language can one express what is so hard to express, and straighten out what is crooked.

Astus wrote:

The problem is not with ordinary language or even ordinary thinking. It is taking all that seriously that makes us dissatisfied and craving for something else. A reinvented language is still a trap, perhaps even more so, it is a double trap: looking for a second head, exchanging one dark pit for another, holding on the neighbouring branch instead of the current one.

jundo cohen said:

it is not that at all, and is through and through something "significantly more fascinating."

Astus wrote:

What is it then?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 17th, 2016 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: Seeing the True Self and then Dropping it.

Content:

DGA said:

So one can't assume that mimicking the complex dialectics of the debates at Nalanda, or the rhetoric-less rhetoric of eleventh-century Ch'an masters, in an environment like this will have the effect one intends.

Astus wrote:

As I see it, if there is any meaning behind "not relying on words and letters", that is using "live words" (活句, http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/bbs/board.php?bo_table=3020&wr_id=30), i.e. expressing the Dharma in common language based on one's understanding. And that's not a new idea, since this is what wisdom is, and from wisdom arises skilful means. However, history seems to teach that ossification is inevitable. Much like what the Buddha said about old age. But the solution is not in creative terminology either (see: <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn20/sn20.007.than.html>).

DGA said:

Peter Hershock's idea that Ch'an masters communicate much as improvisational jazz musicians do may be helpful here. It's situational, collaborative, of-the-moment--always something new, and because you don't have time to think about your next move, you have no choice but to open up and pour out whatever it is you got.

Astus wrote:

There are stories like that in every tradition. Chan only formalised it, thus turning it into a repetitive standard, therefore losing its vitality.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 17th, 2016 at 10:05 PM

Title: Re: Seeing the True Self and then Dropping it.

Content:

jundo cohen said:

The reason that the Mūlamadhyamakakārikā is so strange to read is not because of the unfamiliarity of individual words and sentences (most of which, individually, are quite short and simple), but because of the radical concepts (and non-conceptual concepts) being depicted which defy ordinary language and grammar. So it is with so many teachings of the Mahayana, especially through a Zen lens.

Astus wrote:

Just like any other work, the MMK is bound by its own context. The topics discussed is not difficult to read because of language and grammar - especially when we read translations - but the concepts involved. And that is what you seem to agree with. The concepts discussed do not defy language and grammar, they are simply foreign concepts. And the way they are discussed are also foreign. So it takes some learning to familiarise oneself with the relevant Buddhist teachings and that way learn ideas, like the the four conditions brought up in the first chapter. Eventually one can get a clear picture what the text is about, simply by going through a studying process no different from what one is already familiar with from one's school years. However, MMK is usually not the first Buddhist teaching one learns.

jundo cohen said:

Rather, it is that there is still a need today, as much as in Nagarjuna's time, to express what can barely be expressed, and certainly not with ordinary subject-predicate, past present or future tense grammar.

Astus wrote:

Nagarjuna, or Madhyamaka in general, is not a linguistic challenge but a philosophical. Also, it does not try to express some ultimate reality, rather it points out the problems with substantialist views. In turn, the insubstantiality of dependent origination is the ultimate view.

jundo cohen said:

Yes, my language is strange sometimes, and also inelegant (I am not a gifted writer), but neither do I repeat those old cliches;

Astus wrote:

What matters, to both of us I presume, is to be able to communicate. If what you intend to express requires a number of strange expressions, it is perfect as long as it delivers the required effect. My point about the artificially convoluted style many can take up mostly out of the habit of repeating the words, not only in Zen, likely happens either because of carelessness or lack of understanding. On the other hand, every group of people develop their own linguistic style, so there is nothing to do about some unique terminology. But that is far from avoiding the traps of communication.

jundo cohen said:

You do not hear me yelling KATZ! or MU! or giving blows or telling folks "The Cypress Tree in the Garden". That is just regurgitating the words of others.

Astus wrote:

Some could say you are neglecting the family style.

jundo cohen said:

I think it should be fresh, heart felt and relevant to the modern. But neither can you express these things in simple A is B sentence structure, because you are ultimately leaving so much out.

Astus wrote:

Expressing in simple sentences should be perfectly sufficient. Beyond that it is not different from plunging into sophistry. Especially from the Zen perspective where direct pointing is valued over gradual training. But if immediacy fails, one should follow the step by step method of the sutras and treatises.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 17th, 2016 at 10:18 PM

Title: Re: Seeing the True Self and then Dropping it.

Content:

Wayfarer said:

But surely the ordinary man doesn't realise 'the extraordinary in the ordinary'? I am very much centred in the 'ordinary mind' teaching but an essential corollary of that is that 'the ordinary is extraordinary', which is something we don't realize. But if there were nothing whatever to realize, then why, as the koan has it, did Bodhidharma come from the West?

Astus wrote:

All we have is the ordinary. That we want something extraordinary is what blinds us and makes us look for it without success. So, in a sense, it is extraordinary to realise that there is nothing to search for, nothing to realise.

Someone asked, "What was the purpose of the [Patriarch's] coming from the West?"

The master said, "If he had had a purpose he couldn't have saved even himself."

Someone asked, "Since he had no purpose, how did the Second Patriarch obtain the dharma?"

The master said, "'To obtain' is to not obtain."

Someone asked, "If it is 'to not obtain,' what is the meaning of 'to not obtain'?"

The master said, "It is because you cannot stop your mind which runs on seeking everywhere that a patriarch said, 'Bah, superior men! Searching for your heads with your heads!' When at these words you turn your own light in upon yourselves and never seek elsewhere, then you'll know that your body and mind are not different from those of the patriarch-buddhas and on the instant have nothing to do—this is called 'obtaining the dharma.'"

(Record of Linji, p 28, tr Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 18th, 2016 at 10:22 PM

Title: Re: Seeing the True Self and then Dropping it.

Content:

Wayfarer said:

So, why any teaching? Why is there anything called 'Buddhism' whatever? Why don't we all just carry on, doing what we generally do?

Astus wrote:

It is the teaching that there is no teaching.

Master Yunmen related [the legend according to which] the Buddha, immediately after his birth, pointed with one hand to heaven and with the other to earth, walked a circle in seven steps, looked at the four quarters, and said, "Above heaven and under heaven, I alone am the Honored One."

The Master said, "Had I witnessed this at the time, I would have knocked him dead with one stroke and fed him to the dogs in order to bring about peace on earth!"

(Record of Yunmen, p 194, tr App)

Why is that? Gold in the eye.

"All of these, up to and including the Three Vehicles' twelve divisions of teachings, are just so much waste paper to wipe off privy filth. The Buddha is just a phantom body, the patriarchs just old monks."

(Record of Linji, p 19, tr Sasaki)

So it is stated in the sutras:

"what has been realised by myself and other Tathagatas is this reality, the eternally-abiding reality (sthitita), the self-regulating reality (niyamata), the suchness of things (tathata), the realness of things (bhutata), the truth itself (satyata). For this reason, Mahamati, it is stated by me that from the night of the Tathagata's Enlightenment till the night of his entrance into Nirvana, he has not in the meantime uttered, nor ever will utter, one word."

(Lankavatara Sutra, 3.LXI, tr Suzuki)

"there is no determinable phenomenon called peerless perfect enlightenment. And there is also no set teaching that can be delivered by the Tathāgata."

(Diamond Sutra, ch 7, tr Muller)

"Whatever is seen or heard or sensed and fastened onto as true by others,
One who is Such — among the self-fettered — wouldn't further claim to be true or even false.
Having seen well in advance that arrow where generations are fastened & hung — 'I know, I see, that's just how it is!' — there's nothing of the Tathagata fastened."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an04/an04.024.than.html>)

Thus we see there is no teaching and no attainment. Then is there anything special to do? Pang Yun does not write about turning chopping wood and carrying water into anything miraculous, rather there is no mystical phenomenon to be found beyond such ordinary, tedious activities.

"as to buddhadharma, no effort is necessary. You have only to be ordinary, with nothing to do—defecating, urinating, wearing clothes, eating food, and lying down when tired."
(Record of Linji, p 12, tr Sasaki)

Once a Vinaya Master came and asked: "In your practice of the Tao, do you still work hard?"

The Master answered: "Yes, I still work hard."

The Vinaya Master asked: "How hard?"

The Master retorted: "If I'm hungry, I eat. If I'm tired, I sleep. "

The Vinaya Master asked: "Do all other people work hard just as you do?"

The Master answered: "No, not in the same way."

The Vinaya Master asked: "Why not?"

The Master answered: "While they are eating, they are not really eating due to too much thinking. While they are sleeping, they are not really sleeping due to too much mental agitation. Therefore, they do not work in the same way I do."

The Vinaya Master, on hearing this, fell silent.

(<http://www.ymba.org/books/entering-tao-sudden-enlightenment/tsung-ching-record>)

Zhaozhou said, "Buddha is affliction. Affliction is Buddha."

A monk said, "I don't understand whose house is afflicted by Buddha."

Zhaozhou said, "All people are afflicted by Buddha."

The monk asked, "How can affliction be avoided?"

Zhaozhou said, "Why avoid it?"

(Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 155-156)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 19th, 2016 at 9:05 PM

Title: Re: Seeing the True Self and then Dropping it.

Content:

Wayfarer said:

As others have pointed out, Zen produces a lot of literature for 'a teaching which is no teaching'.

Astus wrote:

It's not just a Zen idea, as you can see from the referenced sutras as well.

Wayfarer said:

It is possible to read Zen as being about nothing at all, and I think you do that. But Zen is concerned with enlightenment, bodhi, liberation, Nirvāṇa. It is not simply 'nothing' or 'just being ordinary'.

Astus wrote:

We are bound by ideas of gain and loss. The Buddha teaches the way out of that. It would not be an escape if it were something to attain or get rid of. Hence it is seeing things for what they are: nothing more, nothing less. That is the insight into the nature of mind. The mind that is buddha. Even the third noble truth says that liberation is the end of craving, it is not about exchanging something wrong to something good. We may say that one attains health, but it is just returning to normal functioning. All appearances are already empty, there is nothing that can make them empty. The error is to assume that one needs to find something.

Enlightenment:

"Remember, there is really nothing to obtain, for the Bodhimandala is without any view whatsoever. To the enlightened ones, the Dharma is voidness and nothingness."
(Huangbo, Wan Ling record, tr Lok To)

Bodhi:

"Question: "How is it possible to develop the Supreme-Enlightenment Mind?" The master said: "Bodhi means nothing to attain. Even now, just as you allow a thought to arise, you get nothing. Thus, realizing that there is absolutely nothing to attain is the Bodhi Mind. The realization that there is nowhere to abide and nothing to attain is the Bodhi."
(Huangbo, Wan Ling record, tr Lok To)

Liberation:

"If anyone has a thought of attaining something, that is a false thought; he is then bound by grasping thought, which cannot possibly be called Liberation. One who truly realizes this stage understands clearly in himself that he cannot grasp this attainment nor even hold a thought of having attained something. This is true self-mastery and Real Liberation. Finally, if one allows the thought of vigorous perseverance toward attainment to arise, that is false, not real, vigorous perseverance. However, if one does not allow a false thought to arise regarding vigorous perseverance, then that is real, boundless perseverance."
(Dazhu Huihai: Treatise On Entering The Tao of Sudden Enlightenment, tr Lok To)

Nirvana:

"They are just empty names, and these names are also empty. All you are doing is taking these worthless names to be real. That's all wrong! Even if they do exist, they are nothing but states of dependent transformation, such as the dependent transformations of bodhi, nirvana, emancipation, the threefold body, the [objective] surroundings and the [subjective] mind, bodhisattvahood, and buddhahood. What are you looking for in these lands of dependent transformations!"
(Record of Linji, p 19, tr Sasaki)

+1 Buddha:

"there is no buddha to be obtained. Even the doctrines [including those] of the Three Vehicles, the five natures, and complete and immediate enlightenment—all these are but provisional medicines for the treatment of symptoms. In no sense do any real dharmas exist. Even if they were to exist, they would all be nothing but imitations, publicly displayed proclamations, arrangements of letters stated that way just for the time being."

(Record of Linji, p 31, tr Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 19th, 2016 at 10:21 PM

Title: Re: Path to Buddhahood in Chan/Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

"For the Chan school, understanding ... is instantaneous, now, not a matter of time!"

(Record of Linji, p 13, tr Sasaki)

To put back stages into Chan is turning it into general Mahayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 20th, 2016 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: Path to Buddhahood in Chan/Zen

Content:

Matt J said:

Tell that to Zongmi, Chinul, and Sheng Yen for starters.

Astus wrote:

Zongmi and Jinul mixed Chan with Huayan, Shengyan with Tiantai.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 20th, 2016 at 4:34 AM

Title: Re: Seeing the True Self and then Dropping it.

Content:

jundo cohen said:

" nothing to attain " means that there is nothing to attain, that " no word is spoken " means that nothing wonderful is said, or that " You have only to be ordinary, with nothing to do—defecating, urinating, wearing clothes, eating food, and lying down when tired " means that the secret of Zen is to put on pants, crap and take a nap. In that case, I believe that, when building the old monasteries, they would have gone no further than the beds and privies.

Astus wrote:

Where Huangbo says in my previous post that "there is really nothing to obtain" is 實無一法可得, and literally translates to "really there is not a single dharma that can be attained". It rhymes with the Diamond Sutra's tenth chapter - the same chapter that contains the line that awakened Huineng - where it says "in the Dharma there is really nothing attained" (於法實無所得). And there is chapter 22 that says it clearly (tr Muller): "I have not attained the slightest thing. This is why it is called peerless perfect enlightenment." The concept of unattainability (不可得/anupalabdha or 無所得/apraptitva) is nothing new, can be found in the <http://www.buddhanet.net/e-learning/heartv12.htm> and numerous others. It is practically another term for emptiness.

In simple terms, in the six types of experiences (sights, sounds, etc.) there is nothing that can be held on to. Generally speaking, all come and go according to conditions. And if we care to consider it further, there is no thing that can be pinpointed as arising and perishing, much less can we find conditions. What is then left to cling to? Thus one abides nowhere.

To further explain:

"To simply right now suddenly comprehend that one's own mind is fundamentally Buddha, without there being a single dharma one can attain and without there being a single practice one can cultivate—this is the unsurpassable enlightenment, this is the Buddha of suchness. The only thing trainees should fear is having a single thought that [such things] exist, which is to be alienated from enlightenment (the Way). For each successive moment of thought to be without characteristics, for each successive moment of thought to be unconditioned—this is Buddha. Trainees who wish to achieve Buddhahood [should understand that] it is completely useless to study any of the Buddhist teachings— just study nonseeking and nonattachment. Nonseeking is for the mind (i.e., moments of thought) not to be generated, and nonattachment is for the mind not to be extinguished. Neither generating nor extinguishing—this is Buddhahood. The eightyfour thousand teachings are directed at the eighty-four thousand afflictions and are only ways to convert and entice [sentient beings into true religious practice]. Fundamentally all the teachings are nonexistent; transcendence is the Dharma, and those who understand transcendence are Buddhas. By simply transcending all the afflictions, there is no dharma that can be attained."
(Huangbo, in Zen Texts, p 20, BDK Edition)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 20th, 2016 at 5:04 AM

Title: Re: Path to Buddhahood in Chan/Zen

Content:

Caodemarte said:

Given the historical development of Zen I am not sure how you could take Hua-yen and Tiantai out of the mix.

From my readings of Zongmi, Chinul, and especially the more contemporary Sheng Yen all held that awakening "is instantaneous, now, not a matter of time." No stages of awakening although it may be useful to conventionally (and conventionally only) speak of "stages" in cultivation as in the 10 Ox Herding pictures.

Astus wrote:

The point I hastily referred to was that they matched Chan ideas with those of other schools. Regarding Shengyan, see "Orthodox Chinese Buddhism", p 100-103. There he explains enlightenment using the Tiantai concept of the six identities.

Sudden enlightenment in the Platform Sutra is seeing the nature of mind once and attaining buddhahood. This has actually made it into a Zen slogan (見性成佛 - see nature, become buddha). There were others who followed this view in the Chan school, and there were those who taught otherwise. Nevertheless, the Platform Sutra is one of the central sources of authentic Chan, and has been for a long time now.

Some quotes from the Platform Sutra (BDK Edition):

"bodhi is fundamentally pure in its self-nature. You must simply use this mind [that you already have], and you will achieve buddhahood directly and completely."
(p 17)

"To use wisdom to contemplate all the dharmas without grasping or rejecting is to see the nature and accomplish the enlightenment of buddhahood."
(p 31)

"If one is to be enlightened to the sudden teaching, one cannot cultivate externally (i.e., superficially): one should just constantly activate correct views in one's own mind, and the enervating defilements of the afflictions will be rendered permanently unable to defile one. This is to see the nature."

...

If you recognize your own mind and see the nature, you will definitely accomplish the enlightenment of buddhahood.
(p 32)

"If you recognize the self-nature, with a single [experience of] enlightenment you will attain the stage of buddhahood."
(p 33)

"To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to arrive at the stage of buddhahood."
(p 34)

"Eradicating the true and eradicating the false, one sees the buddha-nature. This is to accomplish the enlightenment of buddhahood upon hearing these words."
(p 49)

"The self-natures are endowed with the three bodies.
Generating illumination, the four wisdoms are created.
Without transcending the conditions of seeing and hearing,
One transcendently ascends to the stage of buddhahood."
(p 60)

"The self-nature becomes enlightened itself, sudden enlightenment and sudden cultivation. There is no gradual progression. Therefore, one does not posit all the dharmas. The dharmas are quiescent—how could there be a progression?"
(p 75)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 20th, 2016 at 6:13 AM

Title: Re: Seeing the True Self and then Dropping it.

Content:

Wayfarer said:

It is completely about exchanging something wrong to something good. It is about the transformation from puthajjana to bodhisattva.

Astus wrote:

"Nothing real is meant by the word 'Bodhisattva.' Because a Bodhisattva trains oneself in non-attachment to all dharmas."

(PP8000, 1.3, tr Conze)

"The scripture also says that all ordinary beings are Thus, and all sages and saints are also Thus. "All ordinary beings", refers to us; "all sages and saints" refers to the Buddhas. Although their names and appearances differ, the objective nature of true thusness in their bodies is the same. Being unborn and undying, it is called Thus. That is how we know the inherent mind is fundamentally unborn and undying."
(Daman Hongren: Treatise on the Supreme Vehicle, tr Cleary)

Wayfarer said:

What is 'normal functioning'?

Astus wrote:

It is the ordinary mind, the buddha-nature.

Wayfarer said:

I think here you're making Buddhism into a means of adjustment, a coping mechanism, a way of dealing with the vicissitudes of life.

Astus wrote:

Samsara is the vicissitudes of life. The Dharma is the solution.

Wayfarer said:

But you're missing the vital point, the spiritual purpose of Buddhism, which is awakening to an identity beyond the wheel of life and death.

Astus wrote:

"As I see it, there isn't so much to do. Just be ordinary—put on your clothes, eat your food, and pass the time doing nothing. You who come here from here and there all have a mind to seek buddha, to seek dharma, to seek emancipation, to seek escape from the three realms. Foolish fellows! When you've left the three realms where would you go?" (Record of Linji, p 22-23, tr Sasaki)

Wayfarer said:

Nirvāṇa is something indescribably good, greater than anything the mortal mind can imagine.

Astus wrote:

What is nirvana? The extinction of craving, the end of attachment. If there is also some wonderful experience involved, why wouldn't that be as impermanent as all other experiences?

Wayfarer said:

The texts you quote carry a double meaning, but you're reading them literally. When such verses say there's 'nothing to attain', that is meant to undermine the 'grasping mind' which is seeking for advantages and gain. It is the same idea as behind 'Cutting through Spiritual Materialism'. It doesn't literally mean 'everything is OK just as it is, go about your business'.

Astus wrote:

Yes, they are meant to undermine grasping. They are especially meant to show that the world is without any essence, any substance, any purpose, any meaning. That is, there is nothing that could be grasped in the first place, and all attachments are based on deluded ideas.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 20th, 2016 at 7:14 AM

Title: Re: Seeing the True Self and then Dropping it.

Content:

Wayfarer said:

The whole point of the practice is to give rise to compassion- bodhicitta and to a sense of interconnectedness to all beings. The delusion to be overcome is the 'illusion of otherness'. But overcoming this 'delusion' is overcoming egoic life altogether.

Astus wrote:

All appearances are dependently originated, no disagreement here. It means that everything is bound by causes and conditions, from the minutest impulses to the movements of stars. That is, there is no real agent (doer, thinker), only conditioned processes. Seeing that is liberation.

Wayfarer said:

Why, in the Wheel of Life, is the Buddha depicted outside the wheel of samsara? The answer is: because the Buddha is outside the wheel of samsara.

Astus wrote:

"when you can't pin down the Tathagata as a truth or reality even in the present life — is it proper for you to declare, 'Friends, the Tathagata — the supreme man, the superlative man, attainer of the superlative attainment — being described, is described otherwise than with these four positions: The Tathagata exists after death, does not exist after death, both does & does not exist after death, neither exists nor does not exist after death'?"

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn44/sn44.002.than.html>)

"All things that have characteristics are false and ephemeral. If you see all characteristics to be non-characteristics, then you see the Tathāgata."

(Diamond Sutra, ch 5, tr Muller)

"Those who are free from all notions are called buddhas."

(Diamond Sutra, ch 14, tr Muller)

"The Thus-come One has no place from whence he comes, and no place to go. Therefore he is called 'Thus-come.'"

(Diamond Sutra, ch 29, tr Muller)

Wayfarer said:

The Deathless is the goal and consummation.

Astus wrote:

What is without death is without birth. Selflessness has never born and will never die. So it is with emptiness, suchness, dependent origination, unattainability, inconceivability, etc. All dharmas are unborn, so all dharmas are the deathless. That's how there is no difference between samsara and nirvana.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 21st, 2016 at 6:40 PM

Title: Re: Seeing the True Self and then Dropping it.

Content:

jundo cohen said:

Astus seems unwittingly to focus on a few quotes removed from surrounding context to offer his "nothing to obtain" and "just eat, just sleep, just piss." In doing so, he unwittingly overlooks the pages and pages of other quotes by the same teachers, in the same cited works, speaking of how subtle, wondrous and miraculous this "nothing to obtain" and "just eat" truly is.

Astus wrote:

What is it they call wondrous and miraculous? That there is nothing to obtain and one should be ordinary. It is exactly to remove the dreams about supernatural worlds and powers that are beyond us. True, there is a poetic way to talk about the Dharma, to say that it is full of wonders and miracles. However, those are just "Empty fists and yellow leaves used to fool a child!" But actually "Outside mind there's no dharma, nor is there anything to be gained within it. What are you seeking? Everywhere you say, 'There's something to practice, something to obtain.' Make no mistake! Even if there were something to be gained by practice, it would be nothing but birth-and-death karma." (Record of Linji, p 17, tr Sasaki)

jundo cohen said:

the phrase from the Diamond Sutra ... Passages point to the attaining which cannot be attained, the sublime which transcends small human notions of sublimity

Astus wrote:

All it says is that emptiness is the ultimate. Calling it the ultimate sounds nice, but does not mean there is something else besides emptiness. It exactly says that there is only emptiness. And because even the ultimate is empty, there is nowhere to abide and nothing to gain.

jundo cohen said:

you quote the Lankavatara Sutra ... immediately next words uttered by the Buddha ... like gold, silver and pearl

Astus wrote:

And the sutra reads: "been here all the time, like gold, silver, or pearl preserved in the mine". It is already there, not something new to be obtained. That is the very meaning of buddha-nature, of tathagatagarbha.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 22nd, 2016 at 10:04 PM

Title: Re: Seeing the True Self and then Dropping it.

Content:

jundo cohen said:

The best way in ordinary language to describe such a state of total escape amid no escape is not by words like "rest" or "peaceful" or "pleasant", because that ordinary human term does not even begin to scratch the surface. Until it is experienced, folks find it hard to imagine.

Astus wrote:

The escape (nissarana) from the dangers (adinava) of gratification (assada) is to see that there is always arising (samudaya) and passing away (atthangama). In other words, craving and attachment can have only an object regarded as substantial, thus making it a personal (self or related to the self) object. Once the concept of substance is no more, the rest of the chain collapses as well. Hence the instruction to see appearances as illusions and dreams.

Saying that there is a Rest beyond rest and unrest, a Stillness beyond stillness and motion, a Silence beyond quiet and noise, etc., such language suggests a third option beyond ordinary things. However, that is no less misleading than using words without capitalising them. Liberation is the cessation of clinging, not an added dimension or special experience.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 23rd, 2016 at 8:57 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

DGA said:

What happens when the subject-object distinction becomes less and less convincing?
I suspect that the sentient being / insentient matter distinction does too.

Astus wrote:

Sentience is defined by experience, a mental continuum, thus the six realms. Plants do not appear to be sentient, unlike animals and humans. And while externally we can generally only observe physical properties (with the flesh eye), the definition of sentience is not physical. Approaching from a scriptural perspective, because neither the Buddha nor others described birth as plants and such, they are insentient. There are other possible problems with rectifying the karma of a tree or a stone, as they seem to lack any intentional action, although that part may not be so different from some heavenly realms.

Moving the definition to another level, it can be safely said that Buddhism can conventionally accept categories set up by a given society, to a certain extent. But getting bogged down in biological definitions and endless moral issues are unwholesome distractions that only hinder the understanding of the Buddha's intention and the meaning of the path.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 23rd, 2016 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

DGA said:

I'm not convinced that only animals (including homo sapiens) appear to be sentient. I think fungi and (less convincingly) plants appear to be sentient, but do so from a physical substrate that is significantly different from that of the animal kingdom.

Astus wrote:

That is a question of measurement. As far as I'm aware, mushrooms to most people appear to be no different from plants. It is only some form of biological education that tells otherwise. Nevertheless, I speak only based on my own small cultural sphere.

DGA said:

Does Buddhism have anything to say about birth as a plant or fungus? I'm not sure, but I don't think the four categories of birth (from an egg, from a womb, from moisture, or from spontaneous transformation) disallow it.

Astus wrote:

It is not included as a realm one can be born in, it is not a question of categories of birth. However, if we were to add it, all plant life would need to receive a similar position to other realms of birth, with all the ethical issues involved in treating other sentient beings.

DGA said:

Where I disagree is in how the conventional definitions and categories of a particular society ("ours" whatever that means) are at cross-purposes with Buddhist practice and conduct.

Astus wrote:

I consider social issues a fairly secondary and external matter relative to the path. That's why I say that there needs not be problem with any culture.

You are probably aware of the East Asian idea of universal buddha-nature, where it is attributed to both sentient and insentient. However, and while it has (almost) nothing to do with the question here, it could be used in some constructive ways perhaps.

<http://www.shastaabbey.org/pdf/bookDenk02.pdf>, case 17 (Rahulata's story):

Ragorata was a man from Kapilavastu; the issue of the karmic cause from a past life arose in the following manner. Kanadaiba, after realizing enlightenment, was travelling about converting others when he arrived at Kapilavastu. In the city there resided a prosperous elder citizen named Bomma Jotoku (S. Brahmasuddhaguna, 'He Who Is the Pure Virtue of Brahma') in whose garden, one day, a tree had sprouted a large, ear-shaped mushroom with an exceedingly fine flavour; only he and his second son, Ragorata (S. Rahulata, 'He Who Has Been Seized') by name, picked and tasted it. From wherever they picked a piece, the mushroom would regrow; after they had picked it all, it sprouted anew; no others in the household were able to see it. Kanadaiba called on the family because of his awareness of the karmic cause of this mushroom from their past lives and, when the old man asked the reason for the mushroom's appearance, Kanadaiba replied, "Long ago your family gave alms to a monk but the monk vainly consumed the alms from the faithful without having succeeded in opening his Enlightenment-seeking Eye and, because of this, he became a tree mushroom in his next life as recompense. Since only you and your son have given alms with untainted sincerity, only the two of you have succeeded in acquiring this mushroom; the rest of your family have not."

...

Today's story is not about sentient and non-sentient beings; do not separate things into inner karmic tendencies and outer karmic conditions. A monk in a previous life duly became a tree mushroom in a present life. Whilst a tree mushroom, he did not know that he had been a monk and, whilst a monk, he did not know that he had manifested as a myriad things so, even though you are now sentient and have a bit of awareness and comprehension of what you are doing and can distinguish somewhat between a pain and an itch, you have never been in any way different from a tree mushroom. The reason for this is that the tree's not knowing you is, beyond doubt, dark ignorance, and your not knowing the tree mushroom is exactly the same thing; this is why people make distinctions between the sentient and the non-sentient as well as between outer karmic conditions and inner karmic tendencies. When you clarify what TRUE SELF is, what is there to call sentient, what is there to call non-sentient? IT is not past, present or future nor is IT the sense organs, their fields of perception or their types of perceptual consciousness and IT neither cuts itself off from these nor can IT be cut off from them. IT is neither self-made nor made by others. You will see by training thoroughly, probing deeply and dropping off body and mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 23rd, 2016 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Trees, plants, fungi and so in in general, breath, grow, excrete, defend themselves, communicate within their own communities and other communities, an using fungi as as a web for other plants to communicate, they respond to stimulus, learn, and so on.

Astus wrote:

Then we might consider computers are already or about to be sentient as well. And maybe a number of other phenomena too, like memes.

Malcolm said:

Stones, and rocks, etc. in general exhibit no living properties whatsoever.

Astus wrote:

Then perhaps from a more higher perspective, like volcanoes, a whole living planet, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 23rd, 2016 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, computers merely mimic sentience, they are not self-organizing. Self-organization is the hallmark of all living systems and is the benchmark for sentience.

Astus wrote:

What counts as self-organising? Programs have organisation skills, they can even learn and reproduce.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 23rd, 2016 at 11:56 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

DGA said:

I think that problems ensue when the assumptions of a culture directly contradict the objectives of Buddhist practice when people who belong to that culture attempt to practice Buddhism. I'm arguing that the assumption that this is a sentient being but that is not based on the taxonomy of life kingdoms (plant, animal, monera, protist...) is problematic in just this way.

Astus wrote:

Every culture directly contradicts the objectives of Buddhism, as they serve the continuation of samsara.

DGA said:

The question of why Chinese Buddhism but no other Buddhist tradition tends to emphasize a meatless diet is one that is beyond my scope.

Astus wrote:

Chuan Cheng in Ethical Treatment of Animals in Early Chinese Buddhism (p 98-99) gives three main reasons: The traditional custom of zhaijie (斋节 - "vegetarian feast") coinciding with Buddhist practices. The efforts of Emperor Wu of Liang to spread vegetarianism through laws and propagation. The popularisation of the Brahma Net Sutra.

DGA said:

But I did have a follow-up question for you. If Buddha-nature interpenetrates and mutually subsumes all things, then how, ultimately, do trees, stones, and human beings differ?

Astus wrote:

All things are buddha-nature. It is not some kind of ubiquitous spirit. In fact, that is a misconception Dogen wanted to eliminate, so his works contain numerous statements on the matter. Like this one:

"In sum, there is buddha-mind as fences, walls, tiles, and pebbles, and all the buddhas of the three times experience this as "it cannot be grasped." There are only fences, walls, tiles, and pebbles, which are the buddha-mind itself, and the buddhas experience this in the three times as "it cannot be grasped." Furthermore there is the state of "it cannot be grasped" itself, existing as mountains, rivers, and the earth."
(Shin-fukatoku (latter), in SBGZ, vol 1, p 300; BDK Edition)

The moment we separate ultimate and conventional there is a lot to debate. But even then we can still go with the usual distinction between essence and function. That is, the essence of all things is buddha-nature, the difference lies in the function of how it appears, so there is a difference between sentient and insentient. However, the function itself is the buddha-nature as well, so it doesn't really matter. Still, you don't piss in the kitchen and eat from the toilet, for functional reasons.

To make a more general point, all things are conditioned. A stone is as much bound by causes as a bird. To be blunt, everything is fully determined by their interdependency. In a sense, it's all mechanical.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 24th, 2016 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

There is a difference between the self-producing (autopoiesis) self-organization of living systems and static, other-produced (exopoietic) "self-organization" of inanimate things, like crystals. The latter only appear to be self-organizing, but are incapable of sustaining themselves.

Astus wrote:

That reminds me of the teaching on the four nutriments (e.g.

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.011.nypo.html>). That is, all beings depend on food. Also, the Wikipedia article itself quotes instances of mechanical and other phenomena that could be called self-producing. So, I think that is not sufficient either as a defining factor of living.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 24th, 2016 at 5:41 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Therefore, the mere fact that plants are capable of metabolism implies directly that they are capable of cognition. Hence they are sentient.

Astus wrote:

OK, let's start there then, that plants are sentient beings. What brings a being to be born as a plant? Is that a separate type of birth, or should it be included among animals, considering that they could be taken as the dumbest form of existence? Why was that not recognised by the Buddha and his followers?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 24th, 2016 at 5:51 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Matt J said:

If we reduce Buddhanture to impermanence, or more broadly, emptiness, I think that is not accurate. For example, this completely ignores the Third Turning sutras, and simply promotes the Second Turning as supreme. Personally, I think that what Dogen is referring when he says all things are Buddhanature is the non-duality of subject and object.

Astus wrote:

What school advocates those ideas of turnings? East Asian schools have different categories for sutras, and at the same time the teaching of universal buddha-nature - therefore the related tathagatagarbha sutras as well - is generally accepted. Not to mention that the Samdhinirmocana Sutra's definitions of the ultimate teachings of the second and third turning are identical.

As I see it, Dogen's point is to have people realise the non-abiding mind, that's why he argued against the popular view that made buddha-nature into a soul. Neither subject, nor object: that is emptiness.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 24th, 2016 at 6:22 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

DGA said:

This is an interesting point. "It's all mechanical" is an adequate description of samsara--the whole thing persists because causes and effects and conditions keep clicking into each other and reproduce the whole mess over and over without an out. when we talk about sentience, though, are we only talking about samsaric experience--that is, the experience of being bound & afflicted?

Astus wrote:

Samsara is the unsatisfying view that there is a real doer, a real subject. Nirvana is seeing that it's all interdependent. As the Diamond Sutra repeats over and over, to have the view of there being sentient beings is mistaken. It is like the <http://cext.org/zhuangzi/tree-on-the-mountain> 's story of the empty boat, people get angry as long as they assume there is somebody causing the problem.

The categories of sentience and insentience are primarily relevant in the context of ethics, not meditation nor wisdom. So, it is a matter of conventional views and not deeper analysis. That's why this can become a problematic topic, as we want to pinpoint a vague concept. While at the same time it is quite simple: we consider something a sentient being when we attribute it with similar subjectivity that we ourselves possess, that is, feelings and thoughts.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 24th, 2016 at 7:02 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

In the end, the basic failure of these conversations derives from the traditionalist urge to argue from some perceived "authority." It's like arguing that Meru Cosmology should be accepted at face value.

Astus wrote:

I thought you liked to refer to the authority of the tantras, sutras, shastras and occasionally transmission in debates. Still, shouldn't this fall into the matter of neyārtha and nitartha teachings? So it would require some integration into a general Buddhist framework.

Malcolm said:

Are planarians sentient beings? I think so. This then raises the question of how such consciousness that they possess individuates when a whole planarian is split into two or more viable segments. It seems that all creatures beyond the range of complexity of planarians lack this ability.

Astus wrote:

Government Minister Zhu asked Changsha [Jingcen], "When an earthworm is cut into two, I wonder which piece has the Buddha nature?"

Changsha said, "Don't have deluded thoughts."

The officer said, "What about when both pieces are moving?"

Changsha said, "That is only because the wind and fire has not yet dispersed."

After further discussion, Changsha said, "Ignorant people call this [consciousness that is the root source of life and death] the original person.

(Eihei Koroku, p 300; extended version: T51n2076_p0274c22-p0275a02)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 24th, 2016 at 4:25 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

DGA said:

I've been taught that samsara means the situation of being bound by one's afflictive patterns of karma to the cycle of endless rebirth. It's a problem of being bound to affliction, particularly ignorance of what one is (here we agree).

One answer to the question, "what's a sentient being?" may well be "a cluster of afflictions that can't get its act together on its own"

Astus wrote:

Afflictions are the results of ignorance, ignorance is clinging to self. So I think we are on the same page. However, if we classify something a sentient being based on its biological qualities, even buddhas are like that.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 24th, 2016 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

seeker242 said:

I think you could say that a "sentient being" is a being who experiences dukkha.

Astus wrote:

There is a heaven of unconscious gods (asamjnisattva). What sufferings do they have?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 24th, 2016 at 10:21 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Ayu said:

And Buddha himself claimed that he only taught a small amount of the knowledge he had.

Astus wrote:

And the reason for that was: "Because they are not connected with the goal, do not relate to the rudiments of the holy life, and do not lead to disenchantment, to dispassion, to cessation, to calm, to direct knowledge, to self-awakening, to Unbinding." Then he continues: "And what have I taught? 'This is stress... This is the origination of stress... This is the cessation of stress... This is the path of practice leading to the cessation of stress': This is what I have taught."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn56/sn56.031.than.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 24th, 2016 at 10:42 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

DGA said:

They get a temporary break from suffering, no? The suffering they have is waiting around the corner.

Astus wrote:

Of course, like for every god enjoying themselves for a while. It's just that such mindless deities have even less sentience than plants.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 24th, 2016 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The suffering of being conditioned.

Astus wrote:

Even for that there should be some experience present. Unconsciousness means no experience whatsoever. Or it simply means the general attribute of appearances being unsatisfactory, but even then, for those without mind there are no appearances.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 25th, 2016 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The first two are based in sensations, the last is not.

Astus wrote:

That would make it a purely theoretical category. On the other hand, that "all fabrications/compounded are suffering", that is because they are impermanent and therefore do not provide stability, while at the same time one craves for something to rely on.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 25th, 2016 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Whatever, this is how Shariputta teaches it in the Majjhima Nikāya.

Astus wrote:

Couldn't find that in MN. However, both Visuddhimagga (16.35, p 511) and Abhidharmasamuccaya (p 66) connect it with neutral feelings and other saṃskaras (except the pleasant and the painful ones), and they cause suffering because of what I've said above. But, as you noted, this is a very minor issue in this topic.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 25th, 2016 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Matt J said:

If I've learned anything from Madhyamaka, it's that the notion of a line, border, or separation is based on faulty concepts.

Astus wrote:

Certainly all seemingly real are nothing but concepts. That does not mean that the concepts themselves do not establish categories. Rather, it is because concepts operate in a way that there appear to be separate things is a sign of their illusoriness. That is, they do not function without isolating objects. In this way we can talk of humans, animals and plants as distinct groups. The question here seems to boil down to the size of the group contained in the category of sentient beings. But the cause of this problem is likely not a purely linguistic or philosophical one, but some personal inclinations toward other issues (e.g. vegetarianism).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 25th, 2016 at 9:33 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

But my approach to the 'nature of mind' is different, in that I say that mind is never 'an object of perception' - it is not 'out there' and can't be known as any kind of essence, substance, or in any objective sense. It is always the 'unknown knower, the unseen seer', which is a pre-Buddhist idea from the Upanisads.

Astus wrote:

That kind of inherent knowing is indeed the atman of the Vedanta. In Buddhism that is completely refuted, so it cannot really serve as a definition of sentience.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 26th, 2016 at 12:24 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Matt J said:

I think it cuts much deeper than that. You all are proposing a duality, but instead of creation/created, or subject/object, it is sentient/insentient. But simply looking at how other dualities are handled shows that proposing dualities are always going to be problematic.

Astus wrote:

Dualities are fine, everyday matters. And they should not be put aside just because there can be no substance to back them up. It is not the topic that requires the ultimate analysis that dissolves concepts. Nevertheless, we can keep in mind not to take things personally and imagine them to be anything more than fictitious ideas.

Matt J said:

There are also some basic metaphysical assumptions at play here, primarily that there are phenomenon apart from sentience, which also has some logical errors involved in it.

Astus wrote:

Can't avoid logical difficulties. But as Kant realised this centuries ago, there is a place for practical reason. In Buddhism that's where there is a talk of nominal beings and their karma.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 26th, 2016 at 10:00 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Matt J said:

I don't think that the problem of dualities is solved by multiplying dualities--- splitting the two truths, for example. I would further argue that allowing dualities to go unchecked in "everyday matters" simply reinforces habitual tendencies that lead to suffering.

Astus wrote:

You cannot avoid how language works. One can only clarify it for oneself that it is only a linguistic thing and does not mean anything beyond that. Since even such terms as "emptiness" can be understood as some sort of substance, or even the ultimate essence, why think that there is any chance of coming up with a better way of speaking?

Matt J said:

I would say a better question would shift from being to function. Instead of saying, where's the line between sentient and insentient, why not ask: which is more skillful from a Mahayana POV? Given that the evidence can be interpreted either way, and any definite tie breaker is unlikely to come along any time soon, is it more skillful to leave open the possibility that plants have sentience or not?

Astus wrote:

So you would go with the idea that the end justifies the means? Then I'd go with saying that it is a meaningless topic. It makes no difference what view one takes about sentient beings, because it's still just a view and grasping at it is only to generate more suffering. Even on a common level what matter are the cultivation of wholesome emotions and abandoning unwholesome feelings.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 26th, 2016 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I am interested in philosophical ideas. This idea is that mind is intrinsically aware or knowing. Otherwise, knowing or awareness must be a result or a consequence - in which case it is not fundamental.

Astus wrote:

Everything is dependent on causes and conditions. That does not leave space for anything inherent. However, because of the way causality works, there is always a sort of continuity, that is, the consistency that from an apple seed comes an apple tree. In that fashion there is a mind-stream, thoughts causing thoughts.

Nevertheless, there is a place in Buddhism to talk of awareness/knowing as the nature of mind. It's important to see the term in a similar way that expressions like impermanence and emptiness are used. It does not signify an actual object or being, it is only a description, in this case of the aspect of phenomena that they are always experienced, i.e. whatever occurs one is necessarily aware of. In particular, it is meant to point to an impartial consciousness that is often compared to a mirror where everything comes and goes unhindered. The mistake people may make at this point is to interpret it as something independent, and thus conceive it as a self. In order to avoid that it is added that this knowing is empty - i.e. cannot be found as something, it is without form; at the same time it is not separate from appearances, it is not an independent witness. That way there is no contradiction with the teaching of interdependence.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 26th, 2016 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

The suffering of impermanence. Viparinama-dukkha.

Astus wrote:

That is used to express the dissatisfaction about losing something pleasurable.

Unconscious beings cannot have any pleasure, nor can they be aware of any change, as QEII noted.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 26th, 2016 at 11:39 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

I get the feeling that you are misinterpreting the term "unconscious". Regardless, when (during their death) they start to regain conscious awareness, then they are aware of their suffering. But I tend to picture them as being like accomplished practitioners that focus on a blank/empty state of mind: ie they have awareness of the environment but... when the causes and conditions that lead to their mental state wane, so does the state.

Astus wrote:

They are devoid of the mental aggregates. And the moment any idea comes up, they are not in that state any more. See here:

http://www.palikanon.com/english/pali_names/ay/asannasatta.htm.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 26th, 2016 at 11:57 PM

Title: Re: Question about Genjokoan / Dogen classic Koan

Content:

MuggWortt said:

Does the following quote say something about - 1. Free will

Astus wrote:

No. Read this on <http://sweepingzen.com/karma-free-will-and-determinism/>.

MuggWortt said:

and also 2. Some kind of inherent responsive intelligence interacting with sentient beings as undivided universe?

Astus wrote:

No. Such a concept is repeatedly refuted by Dogen (and by Buddhists in general). He calls it the Srenika heresy. See his <https://web.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/shobogenzo/translations/busho/translation.html> and question 10 in <http://www.zen.org/sites/default/files/Bendowa-book.pdf>.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 27th, 2016 at 7:32 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Everything conditioned is dependent on causes and conditions. Every object of perception is dependent on causes and conditions.

Astus wrote:

Perception is only a perception of something. They are mutually dependent. One has to realise both as empty. As Vasubandhu states:

"That indeed is the supramundane knowledge
When one has no mind that knows,
And no object for its support"
(Trimsika 29, tr Kochumuttom, p 259)

Every born being is dependent on causes and conditions. Yet 'there is an unborn, unbecome, unmade...if there were not that...there would be no escape from the born, become, made...' (ud 8.3)

That unborn is nirvana. Nirvana is the extinction of craving, the absence of attachment, the emptiness of self. Similarly, all appearances are empty, without a substance, hence samsara is no different from nirvana. To assume a realm/thing/state beyond impermanent appearances as the world of true permanence is only further grasping and a cause of dissatisfaction.

Wayfarer said:

It is not existent--even the Victorious Ones do not see it.

It is not nonexistent--it is the basis of all samsara and nirvana.
This is not a contradiction, but the middle path of unity.
May the ultimate nature of phenomena, limitless mind beyond extremes, he realised.

Astus wrote:

That one, just like the Heart Sutra, Nagarjuna, and many others, talk of the middle way, where you don't find any ultimate outside conventional, no buddhas outside sentient beings.

Dependent origination is emptiness
Phenomena are there but no substance
Experience goes on without abiding
Therefore
Conventional believes itself ultimate Ultimate knows conventional as conventional

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 27th, 2016 at 7:42 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Everything is dependent on causes and conditions.

Sherab Dorje said:

Well, actually, apparently the Dharmakaya is not.

Astus wrote:

Dharmakaya is interdependence itself.

"Whatever is the essence of the Tathagata,
That is the essence of the transmigrator.
The Tathagata has no essence.
The transmigrator has no essence."
(MMK 22.16, Ocean of Reasoning, p 451)

"Thoughts and dharmakaya are inseparable. We have this dualistic approach of seeing dharmakaya as pure and thoughts as impure, but we need to understand the inseparability of thoughts and dharmakaya."
(http://www.kagyumonlam.org/english/news/Report/Report_20130103.html)

"Some people misunderstand the teaching "thought is dharmakaya" to mean that when a thought arises, it is pacified or dissolved, and then we are left with dharmakaya. Others misunderstand it to mean that if we realize thought to be dharmakaya, it is dharmakaya. The word dharmakaya, however, is made up of dharma meaning "the truth" and kaya meaning "embodiment". Thus dharmakaya refers to the ultimate mind of the Buddha. These two ways of misunderstanding the teaching stem from not understanding that, from the very beginning, thought is nothing other than the ultimate reality of the Buddha's omniscient mind. Thought doesn't become dharmakaya at some later time, and it doesn't depend on whether or not we are aware that it is dharmakaya." (Thrangu Rinpoche: Essentials of Mahamudra, p 158)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 28th, 2016 at 3:29 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dharmakaya is interdependence itself.

Sherab Dorje said:

In which case it cannot be dependently arising since (according to Nagarjuna) something cannot arise from itself as a cause.

Astus wrote:

Change does not come from change, it is merely a concept. Dharmakaya is the nature of buddhas, dharmadhatu is the nature of everything, and both are emptiness, and emptiness is dependent origination.

Based on statements made in <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.028.than.html> and

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.087x.wlsh.html> we read this in the Shalistamba Sutra (tr N. Ross Reat, p 32):

"How, then, does one see conditioned arising? In this connection, it is said by the Lord: 'Whoever sees-this conditioned arising (which is), always and ever devoid of soul, truly undistorted, without soul, unborn, not become, not made, not compounded, unobstructed, inconceivable, glorious, fearless, ungraspable, inexhaustible and by nature never stilled, (he sees Dharma). And whoever sees Dharma (which is) also always and ever devoid of soul... and by nature never stilled, he sees the unsurpassable Dharma-body, the Buddha, by exertion based on right knowledge in clear understanding of the noble Dharma.'"

Thus we see that it goes back to the earliest texts. May also check "Pratityasamutpada and Dharmadhatu in Early Mahayana Buddhism" in <https://books.google.hu/books?id=9a7qBgAAQBAJ>, p 11-28. And there is also some East Asian teachings, in particular those of the Huayan school, where they discuss the dharmadhatu as total interdependence being the ultimate reality. As Sung-bae Park sums up: "In the final analysis, the patriarchal faith which affirms that "I am Buddha" is the realization of the dharmadhatu of dependent origination." (Buddhist Faith and Sudden Enlightenment, p 26)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 28th, 2016 at 4:15 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

They are concerned with transformation, with entering a different realm or mode of being. There is something remarkable and amazing in Buddhism, which you're consistently deprecating and rationalising away by saying it is 'just ordinary'.

Astus wrote:

I'm calling it ordinary not because it could not be called extraordinary, but because after raising faith and enthusiasm for practice it becomes misleading and generate false expectations. As it is stated by the Buddha of himself:

"When cognizing what is to be cognized, he doesn't construe an [object as] cognized. He doesn't construe an uncognized. He doesn't construe an [object] to-be-cognized. He doesn't construe a cognizer."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an04/an04.024.than.html>)

Therefore:

"you should train yourself thus: In reference to the seen, there will be only the seen. In reference to the heard, only the heard. In reference to the sensed, only the sensed. In reference to the cognized, only the cognized. That is how you should train yourself. When for you there will be only the seen in reference to the seen, only the heard in reference to the heard, only the sensed in reference to the sensed, only the cognized in reference to the cognized"

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/kn/ud/ud.1.10.than.html>)

This is no different from Chan's no-mind:

"Having no-mind anywhere whatsoever means being free of love and hate. Being free of love and hate means that when you see good things, you do not allow a thought of love to arise, which is known as the "no-love" mind. Conversely, when you see evil things, you do not allow a thought of hate to arise, which is known as the "no-hate" mind. A mind that is void of love and hate is also known as a non-defiled mind, wherein the voidness of all forms is realized. This is also known as the termination of all conditions, and the termination of all conditions means attaining Liberation naturally and spontaneously."

(<http://www.ymba.org/books/entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment/treatise-entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment>)

Is there something extraordinary? Although calling it ordinary is not really appropriate either, but as I write above, it feels more skilful. Nevertheless, the difference before and after enlightenment can be recognised. As Zhuhong wrote: "The line in this self-narration to the effect that it's just a matter of eating when hungry and sleeping when tired is a matter for after you have produced enlightenment." (Chan Whip Anthology, p 96)

And here is Shenhui's differentiation between coarse and subtle obscuration:

"What does self-deception mean? You, who have assembled at this place to-day, are craving for riches and the pleasures of intercourse with males and females; you are thinning of gardens and houses. This is the coarse form of self-deception. To believe that it must be discarded is the fine form of self-deception. That you do not know. What is the fine form of self-deception? When you hear speaking of bodhi you think you must have that bodhi; and so when you hear speaking of Nirvana, of irreality (sunyata), of purity, of samadhi, you think you must have that Nirvana, that irreality, that purity, that samadhi. These are all self-deceptions, these are fetters, heresies. With that in mind you cannot attain salvation. If (unaware of the fact that) you are saved, that you are guiltless from the very beginning without anything additional required - you think of (leaving the world and) abiding in Nirvana, this Nirvana becomes a fetter (binding you to life) in the same way purity, irreality, samadhi, become fetters. Such thoughts impede your progress to bodhi."

(Sermon of Shenhui, tr Liebenthal, in Asia Major, New Series, III (1953), part II, pp. 144-145.)

Baizhang follows the same idea:

"The complete teaching discusses purity; the incomplete teaching discusses impurity. Explaining the defilement in impure things is to weed out the profane; explaining the defilement in pure things is to weed out the holy. Before the nine-part teaching had been expounded, living beings had no eyes; it was necessary to depend on someone to refine them. If you are speaking to a deaf worldling, you should just teach him to leave home, maintain discipline, practice meditation and develop wisdom. You should not speak this way to a worldling beyond measure, someone like Vimalakirti or the great hero Fu."

(Sayings and Doings of Pai-Chang, p 29. tr. T. Cleary)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 28th, 2016 at 4:22 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

This is merely one, and very incomplete definition. And here, it clearly refers to realization of the nature of things, not to the things themselves.

Astus wrote:

Please clarify what problem you see there.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 28th, 2016 at 4:25 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

What are you saying now? That oranges grow on apple trees?

Astus wrote:

What I mean is that interdependence is not a product of interdependence, so it is not the case of something arising of itself.

Sherab Dorje said:

Are we confounding the finger for the moon here?

Astus wrote:

Interdependence is a concept, as there is no such thing or even phenomenon that is interdependence itself, rather it is a description of how appearances are.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 28th, 2016 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Astus wrote:

What I mean is that interdependence is not a product of interdependence, so it is not the case of something arising of itself.

Sherab Dorje said:

So, if everything you say is true, then what is the cause and/or condition for interdependence, given that it is conditioned?

Astus wrote:

Interdependence is a teaching of the Buddha intended to liberate beings from ignorance.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 28th, 2016 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

DGA said:

Does that teaching correspond to anything outside the conceptual? Does it describe a phenomenon? If not, why would Buddha Shakyamuni mobilize this particular concept? If so, then to what does it correspond?

Astus wrote:

The teaching is conceptual meant to address the misconception of taking experiences to be substantial. Beyond that, since there is no thing to depend on another thing, how could there be real interdependence?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 28th, 2016 at 5:41 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

There is something to be attained, but something that can only be attained by non-attainment.

Astus wrote:

In a sense there is something (nirvana) to be attained, otherwise no point of a path.

Wayfarer said:

'First there is a mountain, then there is no mountain, then there is '....I think, all due respect, you're speaking from an exclusively 'no mountain' perspective.

Astus wrote:

I'm saying it's just a mountain in the first, the second, and the third time as well. The difference lies in that first one adds grasping, second time one adds not grasping, and the third time there is nothing added or taken away.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 28th, 2016 at 8:20 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

You defined dharmakaya as dependent origination. This is a clear error.

Astus wrote:

Why is that? Is there perhaps an emptiness outside of appearances? Or is it some inherent knowing maybe that makes it independent? Please elaborate.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 29th, 2016 at 12:19 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Dharmakāya is a result of seeing the nature [dharmatā] of those things, it is the subject.

Astus wrote:

True, it is a term used for the nature of buddhas. Still, their nature is not different from the nature of appearances. How could they be separated, since beings themselves are appearances?

Malcolm said:

Further, the dharmakāya is defined as unconditioned

Astus wrote:

And appearances are unborn.

Malcolm said:

Now, on the other hand, dependent origination is clearly defined as conditioned

Astus wrote:

Being conditioned is how/why all is unconditioned. Because of emptiness can there be interdependence.

Malcolm said:

Thus, if you call dependent origination "dharmakāya," you are making a fundamental error in judgement which leads to dharmakāya being impermanent, etc.

Astus wrote:

It is simply a different wording of the concept of the non-differentiation between samsara and nirvana.

"Therefore, Śāriputra, not apart from the realm of sentient beings is the dharma body; not apart from the dharma body is the realm of sentient beings. The realm of sentient beings is in effect the dharma body; the dharma body is in effect the realm of sentient beings. Śāriputra, these two dharmas under different names have the same meaning."
(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra14.html>)

And here Dogen states it clearly:

"Therefore, that the grasses, trees, thickets and groves are impermanent is the buddha nature; that humans and things, body and mind are impermanent — this is because they are the buddha nature. That the lands, mountains, and rivers are impermanent — this is the buddha nature. Annuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi, because it is the buddha nature, is impermanent; the great parinirvāṇa, because it is impermanent, is the buddha nature."
(<https://web.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/shobogenzo/translations/bussho/translation.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 29th, 2016 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

What is the difference between space and mind?

You are missing this point.

Astus wrote:

There is no space outside the mind, so I do not propose some inanimate thing. Appearances are experiences - i.e. the five aggregates (PP8000 12.2), the six sensory areas (SN 35.23). In other words, the emptiness-awareness of the mind is emptiness-interdependence, where awareness is consciousness of appearances (not an independent awareness without phenomena). Using basic terminology, no-self is that there is no self in the aggregates, it is a description of the aggregates, and not an entity called no-self.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 29th, 2016 at 1:44 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

So appearances are outside the mind?

Astus wrote:

No. There is just mind/experiences. From what did you conclude that?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 29th, 2016 at 3:39 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

I see, so you are proposing a nondependent consciousness then, since experiences are just mind, are indivisible from the mind, and are therefore, caused by the mind itself, without reference to any other cause or condition. You just argued yourself into the Vedanta corner.

Not even yogacara abandons external objects conventionally.

Astus wrote:

That would apply if I talked of a single mind. What I said, however, is that dependent appearances - all dharmas - occur as experiences.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 29th, 2016 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

experiences supported on what? Are those experiences the same as or different than the subject experiencing them?

Astus wrote:

Experiences are streams of phenomena on what we project subject and object. It is like paratantra of the three svabhavas.

Malcolm said:

And what the three dharma that be construed of as experiences, or even as appearances, at all?, space and the two cessations; four if you add emptiness to the those three.

Astus wrote:

All four denominate types of absences, and as such they are not different from common concepts like the blankness of a screen.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 29th, 2016 at 5:17 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

This does not solve anything, since you have effectively ruled out all causation for the mind, you are effectively left with an inherent causeless mind, which is also insentient since there is no objects which it can cognize.

Astus wrote:

I don't see how, unless you mean a cause for the mind-stream that is something else than mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 29th, 2016 at 6:08 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

In general, you have asserted that all objects are merely projections of the mind itself.

Astus wrote:

In the sense that it is through categorisation that we set up things and relations between them.

Malcolm said:

But there is no way these projections of the mind can be projected, there is also no basis for their impression.

Astus wrote:

I don't see your point here.

Malcolm said:

Since you have rejected subject and object even conventionally

Astus wrote:

I don't recall doing so. Just look back at the first quote in this post and my response to it.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 29th, 2016 at 6:45 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 29th, 2016 at 9:15 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

And we set them up from what cause? How does this setting up even happen? How can there be relations if there are no entities apart from the mind?

Astus wrote:

Whatever we perceive are what we experience. To imagine something behind/beyond what is experienced is only conjecture and irrelevant. At the same time, attributing independence to perceptions, separate existence from experience, is how substantiality is established and suffering ensues.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 29th, 2016 at 9:27 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

So there are phenomena existing outside of mind that are apprehended via the sense organs (given the existence of certain conditions like light, space, etc...) and then defined by the mind(s). It's the classic abhidharma/abhidhamma approach.

Astus wrote:

Appearances are what is experienced. While we may assume external phenomena, it does not change that all we have are perceptions, but it splits (categorises) the experiences to internal (subjective) and external (objective).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 29th, 2016 at 9:58 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

It is the "whatever" that is under scrutiny here. You claim experiences are the mind, and at the same time, deny they are the mind.

Astus wrote:

It all depends on what you mean by mind. Here I used it simply as another term for experiences in general.

Malcolm said:

In order for there to be dependently originated appearances, there must be conditions.

Astus wrote:

Conditions are between appearances, i.e. appearances are conditioned by appearances.

Malcolm said:

actually what you have said is that appearances are the experiences themselves. This can only be the case if the mind is its own appearances, appearing to itself, independently of any other cause or condition.

Astus wrote:

Again, what do you call mind? You seem to use it as if it were a single entity ("appearing to itself"), and that I do not do.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 29th, 2016 at 11:41 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

But according to you, there is nothing experiencing experiences. In this case then, experiences are impossible.

Astus wrote:

There is no need to establish such a duality. On the contrary, if there is a separate experiencer, there is no connection between subject and object.

Malcolm said:

So, there can't be any invisible conditions?

Astus wrote:

What's the point of theorising about that? While we can use such ideas (e.g. storehouse consciousness) as explanations,

I see, so for you one mind appears to another mind, unrelated?

An experience is already what is later conceptually separated to subject and object, viewer and viewed, but there is actually no need to establish various minds or even one mind. For example, there is a sound, that's an experience, an appearance. The sound is then followed by thoughts identifying the sound. Again, thoughts are experiences, caused by the sound. Then we have an idea of what kind of sound we heard, and further thoughts (feelings, intentions, etc.) come based on that idea. Like when the sound is identified as the doorbell and then we are happy because somebody we were expecting has arrived. That is a chain of conditioned appearances.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 1st, 2016 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Does that mean (for example) that a sound is not a sound?

Astus wrote:

What do you mean? Why is a sound not a sound?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 1st, 2016 at 2:29 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

So there is no sound which is not an experience? And what is thinking about that sound? Then "we have ideas?" etc.

Astus wrote:

Have you encountered any sound that you have not heard? I haven't. Thinking of a sound is another matter, and one can mentally listen to whole symphonies, but that's a function of imagination (can't think of a better word now).

Malcolm said:

Seriously? Are you drunk?

Astus wrote:

As far as I can tell, I was simply giving a description of a kind of epistemological phenomenology, i.e. appearances as experience, in line with the teaching that the scope of Buddhism is within the boundaries of the five aggregates and six sensory areas. But either I'm doing a really bad job at expressing myself, or you think in very different terms.

Malcolm said:

That chain of conditioned appearances is conventional, and depends on conventional dualities to function. To bring it back around — dharmakāya is unconditioned, and so it can never be a conditioned chain of appearances.

Astus wrote:

If you set up that separation, as unconditioned it does not have any function nor any relation, and that makes it as inert as space.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 1st, 2016 at 2:33 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

By appearances do you (also) mean phenomena or are you saying that there are just appearances?

Astus wrote:

Phenomena, appearances, experiences, dharma - I use them interchangeably.

Phenomenon is simply a Greek word appearance. Also, "In the philosophy of Kant, an object as it is perceived by the senses, as opposed to a noumenon." - hence experiences, perceptions.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 1st, 2016 at 6:30 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

So unless you hear it, a sound is not a sound? Unless you see it, a tree is not there?

Astus wrote:

Sound is what is heard. What is an unheard sound? What is seen are forms and colours, it is the interpretation of those impressions that make it a tree.

Malcolm said:

The five aggregates, 12 sense gates and 18 elements all include external and internal phenomena.

Astus wrote:

What is external in the five aggregates? Even the four elements are experiences of solidity, fluidity, heat, and movement. As for the elements of object-organ-consciousness, because experience exists only with consciousness, objects and organs are merely conceptual assumptions.

Malcolm said:

Dharmakāya can never be a conditioned chain of appearances. But I suggest you go and review the Samdhinirmocana Sūtra and the dialogue where it is explained how dharmin and dharmatā are neither the same nor different. Your assertion that dharmakāya = dependent origination is not only wrong, but it also violates this principle.

Astus wrote:

Samdhinirmocana Sutra, ch 2 (BDK Edition, p 18, 19):

Not identical

"It is not the case that at this very moment all the common worldlings have already gained insight into truth, are already capable of attaining the quiescent cessation of supreme skill, or have realized full, perfect awakening. Therefore the opinion that the descriptive marks of the truth of ultimate meaning are not different from the descriptive marks of conditioned states of being is not reasonable."

Not different

"It is precisely because they have been capable of liberation from these two obstacles that they have been able to attain the quiescent cessation of supreme skill and to realize full, perfect wisdom. Therefore, the opinion that the descriptive marks of the truth of ultimate meaning are entirely different from the descriptive marks of conditioned states of being is not reasonable."

As you say, equating dharmakaya with interdependence seems to contradict that, and also if I were to say that the two are different.

How do you define dharmakaya?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 1st, 2016 at 6:37 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

I can understand what you are saying, but just because I haven't encountered it, doesn't mean that it doesn't exist. You may have encountered it.

Astus wrote:

That is besides the point, because what I'm pointing to is that it is one's own experiences that requires investigation. As it's often repeated in Zen, don't look for buddha outside your mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 1st, 2016 at 9:14 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The five sense objects, one half of the material aggregate.

Astus wrote:

And those objects exist when they are sensed, that is, they exist in the continuum of experiences. So, while nominally they are external, it does not mean they are somewhere out there.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 1st, 2016 at 10:18 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

How can we have compassion (for example) if we ignore the validity of the others experiences? Wisdom is fine and dandy, but if you are missing compassion, then it becomes a very self-centred affair. So the experiences of others are not "beside the point".

Astus wrote:

A bodhisattva should not have the concept of sentient beings anyway. Also, when seeing phenomena as they are - occurrences of experiences - there is neither self nor other. At the same time, it makes no difference in how everything is ordinarily experienced, as it's only meant to remove attachment to experiences, and not eliminate them altogether.

I assume you're familiar with Mahamudra teachings on co-emergent appearances (e.g. <http://www.unfetteredmind.org/milarepas-song-to-lady-paldarboom/>) and that appearances are the dharmakaya (e.g. Mahamudra and Related Instructions, p 41). And because you quote Milarepa in your signature:

"Do you know what appearances are like?

If you don't know what appearances are like

Whatever appears is an appearance

Not realized, they are samsara

Realized, they are Dharmakaya

When appearances as Dharmakaya shine

There's no other view to look for

There's no other view to find"

(KTGR: <http://www.ktgrinpoche.org/songs/milarepas-six-words-sum-it-all>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 1st, 2016 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

But no, this is not the case, the five sense objects exist independently of the body as objects for the five senses, conventionally speaking.

Astus wrote:

There is no disagreement on the conventional concept of independent external objects.

Malcolm said:

But the form is not something that only exists when it is seen.

Astus wrote:

What makes a form form? That it is seen. What is it when not seen?

"What is the characteristic of the form element? The form element is that which becomes visible when it is seen by the eye, and over which is exercised the supremacy of the eye element. The characteristics of the elements of sound, odor, taste, tangibility and the mental object are like that of the form element."

(Abhidharmasamuccaya, p 4)

Let's take an apple as an example. We can agree that conventionally an apple does not come from any of the faculties, but it's grown on a tree whence it reaches our kitchen table in a complicated way, and during that time there is the apple travelling from there to here. Once we have that apple, it can be sensed by all five physical faculties. When we look at it, we see the form of the apple. Is that form what's come from the orchard to the kitchen? Is that form even the apple? The answer to both are now, because even by abhidharma terms the apple is conventional, and dharmas, like form, are momentary. So, it seems to me that form is only what and when it is seen.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 2nd, 2016 at 1:38 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

A thing must be visible, a priori, in order to be seen.

Astus wrote:

Visibility is a quality attributed after it is seen to the concept of the object. That is, a form exists either as a concept produced by the bifurcation of experience to subject and object, or as a subsequent concept about the object.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 2nd, 2016 at 2:05 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

This statement is figurative, not literal.

Astus wrote:

And what is its figurative meaning?

Here are a number of commentaries to chapter 3 (where it's stated: "If a bodhisattva abides in the signs of self, person, sentient being, or life-span, she or he is not a bodhisattva.") of the Diamond Sutra:

Te-ch'ing says, "The primary method taught by the Buddha to liberate beings is to realize that there is no self. Once there is a self, the other concepts follow. In liberating beings, a bodhisattva should realize that there is no self. Once there is no self, there are no beings. And if there are no beings, then all beings are naturally liberated. And once all beings are liberated, the fruit of buddhahood is not far off."

Tzu-hsuan says, "Belief in a self is the most basic of all beliefs. All other perceptions arise from this. Once there is no perception of a self, there is no perception of other beings. When there is no perception of other beings, self and other beings become the same."

Ting Fu-pao says, "The perception of a self refers to the mistaken apprehension of something that focuses within and controls the five skandhas of form, sensation, perception, volition, and cognition. The perception of a being refers to the mistaken apprehension that the combination of the skandhas creates a separate entity. The perception of a life refers to the mistaken belief that the self possesses a lifespan of a definite length. Finally, the perception of a soul refers to the mistaken apprehension of something that is reborn, either as a human or as one of the other forms of existence." (Red Pine: The Diamond Sutra, p 81-82)

"If a Bodhisattva crosses living beings over and yet attaches to a self who takes them across, the four marks are not yet empty, and the false heart is not yet subdued. Such a person turns his back on prajñā and becomes involved in the four marks that unite to form a self. The mark of self is the root of all marks. If one can turn the illusion of self around, then he can take living beings across to nirvāṇa. He can separate himself from the four marks, subdue his heart, and thereby become a true Bodhisattva." (Hsuan Hua: The Diamond Sutra, p 90)

"A person has to get rid of the four notions of self, a person, a living being, and a life span in order to have the wisdom of nondiscrimination.

"Self" refers to a permanent, changeless identity, but since, according to Buddhism, nothing is permanent and what we normally call a self is made entirely of nonself elements, there is really no such entity as a self. Our concept of self arises when we have concepts about things that are not self. Using the sword of conceptualization to cut reality into pieces, we call one part "I" and the rest "not I."

(Thich Nhat Hanh: The Diamond That Cuts Through Illusion, p 45-46)

"Since a Bodhisattva does not see the mark of self nor the mark of others, when he/she takes across the others, he/she would not cling on to any form of existence. By real mark prajna, there is not a slightest notion of inequality: "Dharma is level and equal, with no high or no low". A true Bodhisattva has no mark of the self and thus can take across all living beings to extinction. That is how a Bodhisattva can subdue his/her heart by relinquishing the four marks. That is why the Buddha said that if a Bodhisattva has any of the marks, he/she is not a Bodhisattva."

(http://www.buddhistdoor.com/OldWeb/bdoor/archive/sutra_comm/diamond/diamond_05.htm)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 2nd, 2016 at 2:12 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

How do you account for nonconceptual perception in your scheme? You can't. Since you can't, you are, prima facie, denying there is such a thing as a direct perception. Direct perceptions, for example, the direct perception of a blue vase, are nonconceptual by definition.

Astus wrote:

All experiences of the five physical categories are nonconceptual, as you say, as thoughts are attributed to them subsequently. The difference is that by direct perception you seem to mean an interaction between subject and object, while I say that it is an appearance. However, even in the 18 elements scheme the perception happens only once contact is made and a sensory consciousness occurred, that is, an experience. So in the end there is no difference between the two.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 2nd, 2016 at 2:56 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Virgo said:

Whether you see them or not, those physical phenomena are still there.

Astus wrote:

If it is not experienced, it is not a phenomenon, as it does not occur to us. But of course we can assume that it exists nevertheless, however, that is just an assumption. And from that assumption we can build up the system where from the encounter of object and organ a consciousness is produced.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 2nd, 2016 at 3:07 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

1. Meaning that a Bodhisattva does not perceive any difference between their "self" and another. That they do not consider the suffering of an other being as separate to them. That they do not consider the joy an other being feels as separate to them. That they identify completely with other beings, since they realise the true nature of their own existence.

2. If a Bodhisattva (or a Buddha) was literally no different (or not differentiated) to other beings, then their merit store would be our merit store. Their enlightenment would be our enlightenment. But that is quite clearly not the case.

Astus wrote:

That two sections do not add up to me. First you say there is no difference for a bodhisattva, then you affirm a difference. Is it perhaps that to you no-self means a unity with everything, therefore while a bodhisattva personally knows of a unity but is not actually one with all beings?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 2nd, 2016 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Astus wrote:

All experiences of the five physical categories are nonconceptual, as you say, as thoughts are attributed to them subsequently. The difference is that by direct perception you seem to mean an interaction between subject and object, while I say that it is an appearance. However, even in the 18 elements scheme the perception happens only once contact is made and a sensory consciousness occurred, that is, an experience. So in the end there is no difference between the two.

Malcolm said:

Astus, now you are contradicting yourself:

Astus wrote:

...a form exists either as a concept produced by the bifurcation of experience to subject and object, or as a subsequent concept about the object.

No contradiction:

experiences of the five physical categories -> bifurcation of experience -> subsequent concept

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 2nd, 2016 at 3:15 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

So space, emptiness and the two cessations are not dharmas? Really?

Astus wrote:

As <http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=326065#p326065>: "All four denominate types of absences, and as such they are not different from common concepts like the blankness of a screen."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 2nd, 2016 at 4:19 AM

Title: Re: What is a "sentient being"?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Astus, they are dharmas, the four unconditioned dharmas.

Astus wrote:

There are other nominal dharmas as well, like speed (java), number (samkhya), and syllables (vyanjanakaya).

Also, according to the Cheng Weishi Lun (tr Wei Tat, p 81, 85, 87):

"The Unconditioned Non-Active Dharmas (asamskrtadharmas), apart from rupa-citta-caittas, are definitely not real entities as the Sarvastivadins and others say. We do not, by our reason, recognize such Asamskrtas as real entities.

...

Here are the two ways in which we should understand them.

1. The three Asamskrtas exist as fictitious constructions dependent on the evolution of consciousness.

...

2. The three Asamskrtas exist as fictitious constructions of the true nature of dharmas, dharmata, also called Bhutatathata.

...

All these five Asamskrtas, Akasa etc., are only fictitious constructions formulated on the basis of the significations of Bhutatathata. But Bhutatathata itself is also only a fictitious designation (like food, oil, worm, etc.).

...

We are not like the other schools according to which a real eternal dharma exists, apart from matter, mind, etc., which is called Bhutatathata.

Hence the Asamskrtas are not real entities."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 3rd, 2016 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Authoritarianism, Splitting, and Buddhadharma

Content:

DGA said:

I venture the hypothesis that there is an authoritarian tendency in all of Buddhadharma as it is realized in institutions such as temples and Dharma centers, made much more explicit in some areas than others. Whether this is counterproductive or unavoidable or whatever else, I leave you to draw your own conclusions based on your experience and knowledge of the teachings.

Astus wrote:

It is human nature. Although there are some child-like people who want a parent-figure above them, most people are OK with some sort of commander simply out of lack of interest in taking charge and thinking for themselves in a given matter. So, it's more a matter of ignorance than attachment.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 3rd, 2016 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: what is happiness for you?

Content:

tomschwarz said:

and buddhism is quite clear that immeasurable happiness is found in 4 ways. and those 4 immensurables are all absolute/ non-dual. No?

Astus wrote:

The <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Brahmavihara> are limited, relative and impermanent. Getting stuck on them leads to a heavenly birth.

tomschwarz said:

how do you characterize happiness?

Astus wrote:

This is a great answer:

seeker242 said:

Not wanting anything.

Astus wrote:

However, living itself is beset by desires and needs. The kind of "no want" (apranihita) that is possible is when the very dependency of all physical and mental events are clearly seen and one no longer believes there is something to aim for.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 3rd, 2016 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: what is happiness for you?

Content:

tomschwarz said:

the four immesurables, when taken in their absolute context are quite well-fitting as absolute truth. don't forget that absolute love is one door-way to realizing the absolute truth.

Astus wrote:

They can lead to liberation, if realised to be impermanent, i.e. 'This awareness-release through good will is fabricated & intended. Now whatever is fabricated & intended is inconstant & subject to cessation.'

(<http://www.accesstinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.052.than.html#brahma>)

However, if only the immeasurables are practised, they are insufficient for liberation, as we can see from the story in the <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.097.than.html>, where the Buddha says: "Monks, Sariputta — when there was still more to be done, having established Dhanañjanin the brahman in the inferior Brahma world — has gotten up from his seat and left."

tomschwarz said:

when you read over the definitions in the link you sent, e.g. equanimity, does that not help you to feel better?

Astus wrote:

There are many things one can feel better from. That is their allure. And once one clings to such sensations, one is trapped and becomes dissatisfied. That's where one needs to know the escape from that.

tomschwarz said:

and that definition there above, is a good door for something like entering the path of seeing, no? do you think that getting "stuck" on the path of seeing leads to a heavenly rebirth? ...not a rhetorical question....

Astus wrote:

It does not lead to the path of seeing, it lacks the insight into the nature of experiences. It leads to a calm state that can be conducive to insight.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 4th, 2016 at 3:42 AM

Title: Re: what is happiness for you?

Content:

Astus wrote:

A comparison of the mentioned Zen story with the one in the Theravada tradition:

<https://bhikkhublog.blogspot.com/2007/04/desire-reposted-tale-of-two-similes.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 4th, 2016 at 10:24 PM

Title: Re: One continuous mistake

Content:

MalaBeads said:

Dogen zen-ji described practice as one continuous mistake.

Astus wrote:

As Jundo has already pointed it out, that is a misquote. However, what he definitely stated is that practice is enlightenment (and enlightenment is practice). And that teaching of practice-enlightenment is a way to say sudden awakening. That is something that Zen teaches, although in various versions, depending on whom you ask.

Also, it should be noted that Soto is not the only type of Zen out there.

MalaBeads said:

Another thing I have noticed (concerning the differences in the two traditions) in this: in zen I was taught that there are no symbols. This is important to understand I think: no symbols in zen.

Astus wrote:

It is chock full of symbols. Have you heard of the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Flower_Sermon, Zen's own origin myth? There are also Deshan's <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Keisaku> and Linji's https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Katsu_%28Zen%29. And how about <http://www.sanbo-zen.org/hek019.pdf> or <http://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/glg/glg38.htm>?

MalaBeads said:

Another thing i have noticed over time is that many people do not understand at all either tradition. Especially, if they have not practiced it.

Astus wrote:

"Many people" do not understand anything.

MalaBeads said:

Saying that zen is, for instance, just staring at a wall, is, to put it mildly, ludicrous.

Astus wrote:

It is indeed just <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bodhidharma#Wall-gazing> (biguan 壁觀), that's what http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enUS/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=146&Itemid=57. It means to be unattached (like a wall) and aware (gaze). The expression is quite symbolic.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 5th, 2016 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: what is happiness for you?

Content:

Jeff H said:

Refuge in the Three Jewels means that there is a way for both conditions (the illusion of happiness and suffering) to dissolve into the bliss of perfect, universal harmony, and it is possible to make that happen. I think that is Buddha's happiness, but it is nothing like ours.

Astus wrote:

I think setting up an otherworldly happiness is only extending the original pursuit of everlasting bliss and contentment. What Buddha clearly stated is that the cause of suffering is craving. And the most common reaction to that that I have heard was that giving up desire is completely negative, undesirable, and nihilistic. So, I consider it a skilful means in Buddhism that instead of proclaiming emptiness and extinction in a straightforward way, there is a currency of expressions like happiness, bliss, peace, and other nice words. The other objection I have regularly heard is that total contentment is unwanted, because then all the action is gone from life and there is no room for development, innovation, etc. left. That we need problems so we can solve them. Basically, we want to keep ourselves busy, either in a secular-materialistic way, or in a spiritual-religious way, or perhaps both. Then it is easy to find the idea that we need to practice a lot, we need to learn more, and so on, just to keep ourselves occupied with Buddhism, and consider that as virtuous. Certainly, excuses are plenty for that.

So, some may know of zazen as "<http://www.tricycle.com/interview/good-nothing>", and still make it a goal. Others might have learnt mahamudra's "<http://www.unfetteredmind.org/a-way-of-freedom/>", and think that it needs to be realised. And there are other terms around, going back to apranihita, a synonym of nirvana. While samsara means constant occupation, chasing thoughts, feelings, and impressions, nirvana is the end of it all, no more chase. But that sounds totally boring, to simply stop doing things. Fortunately, a bodhisattva is eternally liberating beings out of immeasurable compassion. That is definitely a virtuous (therefore happy) existence. As for the part that a bodhisattva knows that there is nothing to attain, let's leave that as a theory or far away aim. What that tells me is not that we are all poor helplessly deluded beings far away from the buddhas. It tells me that we love to be busy, and it is practically unimaginable even for Buddhists to accept that life is not only empty (of both meaning and purpose) but also suffering.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 5th, 2016 at 3:06 AM

Title: Re: One continuous mistake

Content:

barndoor said:

Gregory Wonderwheel had a recent blog post about "Practice is Enlightenment" <http://wonderwheels.blogspot.co.uk/2015/12/the-misnomer-of-dogens-practice-is.html> in which he argues that "Practice is Enlightenment" is a misunderstanding of 修證, pronounced in Japanese as shusho. He argues that Dogen was really asserting the identity of practice and its proof, or verification. I just wondered what anyone here with a knowledge of Dogen's original text makes of this.

Astus wrote:

"The literal meaning of sho (証) is "proof," "evidence," or as I usually translate it, "verification." In terms of Buddhist practice, sho is usually thought of as the result of practice. The compound word shusho (修証), for example, is an abbreviation of mon shi shu sho (聞思修証). Mon (聞) is "to hear," shi (思) is "to think," shu (修) is "practice," and sho (証) is "verification." When we listen to a Dharma talk, we may think about its contents and try to understand them, for instance. If we consider the teachings meaningful, we adopt them as part of our practice, and as a result of our experience we may come to know directly that the teachings are true. So sho, the result of shu (practice), is proof or evidence acquired from direct experience that something is true."

(Shohaku Okumura: Realizing Genjokoan p 128-29)

The term 聞思修證 occurs as early as the Dasheng yi zhang (大乘義章, T44n1851) written by Huiyuan (慧遠, 523-592). In that treatise at one point (669a18) he splits 證 ("verification") to two parts: 報生識智 (karmic consciousness knowledge) and 證智 (experiential knowledge), where of the two the latter is genuine insight. Later (0685c07) there's a definition for 修 as meditation (禪定) and for 證 it is abiding in the principle (住理). And while my interpretation of Huiyuan can be way off (as I have only searched for the exact term for this post), it seems quite clear that "verification" is equal to insight, the logical consequence of the first three.

An even more important place for 證 is the expression 證無生法忍 - realising/verifying the patience for unborn dharmas (anutpattika-dharma-ksanti). And that is a good example of enlightenment.

See also this essay by Rev. Seijun Ishii: http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/key_terms/pdf/key_terms07.pdf

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 6th, 2016 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: One continuous mistake

Content:

Temicco said:

Practice-enlightenment always struck me as the opposite of subitism -- is yours a common interpretation of Dogen?

Astus wrote:

It is a version of subitism. Zazen is not a practice to attain enlightenment, but enlightenment itself.

See this essay by Francis H. Cook: <https://journals.ub.uni-heidelberg.de/index.php/jiabs/article/viewFile/8591/2498>

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 6th, 2016 at 2:55 AM

Title: Re: Meditation

Content:

Astus wrote:

Most types of meditation are like any other skill, it takes time to learn. However, it should be recognised that while in the West the form of silent sitting is taken to be the practice of Buddhism, that is a biased interpretation. First of all, there are six paramitas, of those only one is related to that kind of silent sitting, and that's not even the most important of them.

Also, in East Asian Mahayana there are two widespread meditation techniques: <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Nianfo> and https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Hua_Tou. While you may use them in a seated position, that is not necessary at all. Other methods, like doing prostrations and reciting sutras are also popular. Tibetan Buddhism offers a large variety of ways of meditative practices as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 6th, 2016 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: One continuous mistake

Content:

MalaBeads said:

I have never heard that before. That "one continuous mistake" is a misquote. Do you have the actual quote?

Astus wrote:

See this post by Koun Franz: <http://nyoho.com/2013/04/01/here-i-am/>.

The source (Eihei Koroku, vol 1, discourse 88, p 131-2):

Enlightenment Day Dharma Hall Discourse

The teacher Dogen said: Two thousand years later, we are the descendants [of Sakyamuni]. Two thousand years ago, he was our ancestral father. He is muddy and wet from following and chasing after the waves. It can be described like this, but also there is the principle of the way [that we must] make one mistake after another. What is this like? Whether Buddha is present or not present, I trust he is right under our feet. Face after face is Buddha's face; fulfillment after fulfillment is Buddha's fulfillment. Here making mistakes is chasing after waves, and that means buddha-function. Then he clarifies that all functions, all appearances are the buddha's function.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 7th, 2016 at 6:29 PM

Title: Re: From a Buddhist point of view, how to live your life properly ?[Life choices in the light of impermanence and death]

Content:

Astus wrote:

... in the light of impermanence and death:

Karma is what defines both present and future, so https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Noble_Eightfold_Path#Right_effort is crucial. Beyond that, if you aim higher, for liberation, it is achievable through contemplation on impermanence and death, and by that realising that not even the best of heavens is worth aspiring for, much less anything below that.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 7th, 2016 at 9:40 PM

Title: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Astus wrote:

From Jingde Chuandeng Lu, vol 14 (T51n2076, p311, a4-17):

Zen master Danxia Tianran entered the hall and addressed the monks, saying, "All of you here must take care of the temple and monastery. Things in this place were not made or named by you, and have they not been given as offerings? Formerly I studied with Shitou, and he taught me that I must personally protect these things. This is not to be discussed further.

Each of you here has a place to put your cushion and sit. Why do you suspect you need something else? Is Zen something you can explain? Is a buddha something you can become? I don't want to hear a single word about Buddhism.

All of you, look and see! Skillful means and expedience, the unlimited mind of benevolence, compassion, joy, and detachment—these things aren't received from someplace else. Not an inch of these things is evident. Skillful means is Manjushri Bodhisattva. Expedience is Samantabhadra Bodhisattva. Do you still want to go seeking after something? Don't go using the Buddhist scriptures to look for emptiness!

These days Zen students are all in a tizzy, practicing Zen and asking about Tao. I don't have any Dharma for you to practice here! And there isn't any doctrine to be confirmed. Just eat and drink. Everyone can do that. Don't harbor doubt. It's the same everywhere! Just recognize that Shakyamuni was an ordinary old fellow. You must see for yourself. Don't spend your life trying to win some competitive trophy, blindly misleading other blind people, all of you marching right into hell, floundering in duality! I've nothing more to say. Take care!"

(tr. A. Ferguson: Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 129)

Alternative translation by Beishi Guohan:

Chan Master Danxia Tianran entered the hall and said,

"All of you here have to take good care of your own spiritual treasury, which is not attainable through labeling and describing by the effortful-effort of your deluded mind, and there is even no need to talk about attainment and non-attainment. ... You neither need to rely on the sutras and teachings, nor to fall into nothingness. These days Chan practitioners are all in a tizzy, investigating Chan and inquiring into the Way. Here in my place, there is no Way to be cultivated and no Dharma to be realized. Merely drink when you're thirsty and eat when you're hungry by way of clear awareness without self-referential deluded thinking. Just always act with this Mind in all places in your daily life to realize that Shakyamuni is the ordinary person."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 8th, 2016 at 12:47 AM

Title: Re: Treasury of the True Dharma Eye

Content:

Iconoclast said:

I'm still on the fence about Dogen's work. I just don't want to buy a big, expensive volume if I'm not going to understand what I'm reading. My mind is thoroughly Westernized, scholastic even. All of my deeper reading has been of Reformed Scholastic theologians so I really struggle with Eastern cosmology and philosophy.

Astus wrote:

You don't need to buy a thing, you can read the Shobogenzo online in two different translations, although personally I have found the <https://books.google.com/books?id=QTfqAwAAQBAJ> version the best for general reading. You better start with his http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/common_html/zuimonki/ anyway. Then read a few introductory works, like <https://books.google.com/books?id=tTs6AwAAQBAJ> and <https://books.google.com/books?id=dw0ldBlmyRYC>. Anyway, as I see it, Dogen is difficult to read, especially without prior knowledge of East Asian Buddhism, particularly of Song era Chan.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 8th, 2016 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

jundo cohen said:

Often in Zen, the "ordinary" is most extra-ordinary and miraculous if properly perceived. The fantastic and extra-ordinary is right at the heart of the most seemingly mundane, commonplace and ordinary.

Astus wrote:

The point of saying that Shakyamuni is an ordinary being is to remove dreamy ideas about the nature of reality. What's the point of calling ordinary fantastic?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 8th, 2016 at 9:46 PM

Title: Re: in enlightenment we only loose?

Content:

tomschwarz said:

is it true that in enlightenment we only loose and do not gain? I think that the answer is yes. and you?

Astus wrote:

What is there to lose or gain? Trying to get rid of something is as mistaken as trying to gain something. Rather, one should see that all experiences are impermanent: things arise, there is no loss; things pass away, there is no gain.

Śāriputra, foolish ordinary beings do not see the one dharma realm in accord with true reality. Because they do not see the one dharma realm in accord with true reality, they elicit the wrong views in their minds, saying that the realm of sentient beings increases or that the realm of sentient beings decreases.

(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra14.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 9th, 2016 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Jeff H said:

I think the point is that within each ordinary being there is buddha-nature to be realized and Buddha is an ordinary being who realized buddhahood.

Astus wrote:

That is like the common tathagatagarbha doctrine, where buddha-nature is taught to raise hopes.

Linji says:

There are a bunch of shavepate monks who say to students, 'The Buddha is the Ultimate; he attained buddhahood only after he came to the fruition of practices carried on through three great asaṃkhyeya kalpas.' Followers of the Way, if you say that the Buddha is the ultimate, how is it that after eighty years of life the Buddha lay down on his side between the twin śāla trees at Kuśinagara and died? Where is the Buddha now? We clearly know that his birth and death were not different from ours.
(Record of Linji, tr Sasaki, p 19)

It basically comes down to this:

When one is deluded as to the self-nature, one is a sentient being, but when one realizes the self-nature, one is a buddha.
(Platform Sutra, ch 3, p 39, BDK Edition)

In other words, do not wait for mystical lights and special feelings, just look at your own mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 9th, 2016 at 5:50 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

jundo cohen said:

Because the ordinary is fantastic. Chopping wood, fetching water, scratching one's nose or taking a breath. Wondrous.

Astus wrote:

When you call it that, it reminds me of <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=KN-> 8G0HCD5U. Still, what is your reason for talking that way? What does it mean to you?

Because to me it's just unnecessary embellishment and possibly a source of confusion.

jundo cohen said:
But the same Linji also said ...

Astus wrote:
What you quote simply says that the real buddha is one's own mind. Not anything to be sought outside (or attained inside), nor something 'fantastic'.

Author: Astus
Date: Wednesday, March 9th, 2016 at 9:59 PM
Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow
Content:

jundo cohen said:
I believe that there are so many people in this world who see the ordinary as merely "ordinary", nothing special, tedious, trying, sometimes amusing and often frustrating, sometimes beautiful and frequently very ugly, the source of Dukkha.

Astus wrote:
Such views are certainly problematic, the causes of problems actually. Exchanging it to another view, however, is not a solution, although "positive thinking" may prove helpful in some cases. Rather, it is seeing through every view as a view that brings about release from attachments.

jundo cohen said:
But it is hard for people to see what a wonder is the so-called "ordinary", how brass or gold is truly Gold, that breathing, an aching back or petting the cat is a more incredible feat than levitation.

Astus wrote:
Appreciation of everyday matters creates a good mood, and I do not doubt its beneficial effects. But it's not the same level as the teaching of the equality of beings and buddhas.

jundo cohen said:
If one merely describes "ordinary" as just "ordinary", perhaps the point is missed.

Astus wrote:
That is possible.

jundo cohen said:
Folks do not realize how special is this "nothing special", and how much can be attained by this "nothing to attain".

Astus wrote:
True, it can sound boring, therefore it is usually not recommended for those without motivation. On the other hand, why waste time with building up a nicer view if one can just get rid of one's present concepts? That is, after all, the direct method of Zen.

jundo cohen said:

There are many people who see shitting and pissing and changing light bulbs as shitting and pissing and changing light bulbs.

There are those who see Grand Shining Buddhas Exhibiting Major and Minor Marks as "Luminous"

But how easy to realize a broken light bulb and all "ordinary" functions as a Grand Shining Buddha's Major and Minor Marks?

Astus wrote:

First of all: great question!

While we might be on the same page on this matter as far as the meaning goes, it is about the way it is expressed that I can still raise an issue. My take is that there is no need to get anything grand and luminous put in the equations, rather just start from the broken bulb and point out how it is an essenceless conceptual creation. In other words, in order to drop body and mind, why first build up a magnificent buddha-body?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 9th, 2016 at 11:32 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

seeker242 said:

What's the point of saying he's ordinary?

Astus wrote:

To recognise that one is not a deficient being far from the perfection of buddhas. To see that buddhahood is about this life: one's present actions, words, and thoughts.

seeker242 said:

Can "ordinary" even exist without "fantastic"? Ordinary and fantastic are opposites are they not? How can thinking in opposites itself not be "floundering in duality"?

Astus wrote:

There is already a dual idea of ordinary and fantastic in one's mind. The point of showing that buddhahood is not in the category of fantastic is to clarify that realisation is seeing how things are now, not changing into something new. It is not about besmirching the Triple Jewel, dragging the sacred into the dust, but enlightening what holiness actually is in Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 10th, 2016 at 6:28 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

It is pretty clear from these statements, that "Buddha is an ordinary guy" simple means that the conduct of the Buddha, an awakened person, was completely unfabricated. Jeez, you Zen guys make everything so damn complicated and wordy. Must be a Chinese cultural thing.

Astus wrote:

There is a teaching by Mazu Daoyi where he says that "ordinary mind is the way" (平常心是道), it is also referred to in case 19 in the Wumenguan. That ordinary mind could be called "unfabricated". In that sermon he quotes the Vimalakirti Sutra: "Neither the practice of ordinary people (非凡夫行), nor the practice of sages (非聖賢行), that is the Bodhisattva's practice." The term translated in Danxia's sermon for "ordinary fellow" (凡夫) is like in the quote, not in the saying of ordinary mind (平常心). That is, ordinary person (凡夫) means prthagjana. Still, Mazu and Danxia are in agreement, as Mazu explains his ordinary mind in a similar fashion (tr from M. Poceski: Sun-Face Buddha, p 65): "Just like now, whether walking, standing, sitting, or reclining, responding to situations and dealing with people as they come: everything is the Way. The Way is identical with the dharmadhatu."

As I have written here before, the point of stating that "Just recognize that Shakyamuni was an ordinary old fellow." is to know (識得) that he was no different from us. To quote the Vimalakirti Sutra (ch 7, BDK Edition, p 128): "On behalf of the self-conceited, the Buddha explained that emancipation is the transcendence of licentiousness, anger, and stupidity. If one is not self-conceited, the Buddha explains that licentiousness, anger, and stupidity are emancipation." In other words, there is no state of being unfabricated to be attained, it is to see that all fabrications are already the unfabricated.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 10th, 2016 at 8:04 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

DGA said:

the Zen teaching situation is in part about creating a kind of context for encountering something. So all kinds of outrageous and confusing things can happen: the teacher charges in and kills a cat in front of everyone, for example. What was THAT about? I think the attempts to mobilize the literary figures of ancient Ch'an masters in the present are attempts to introduce someone to this kind of learning environment. Whether it's effective or not is knowable only after the fact--if it worked on the intended audience.

Astus wrote:

If there is a mechanism to describe the way "wordy Zen" works, it is like jokes. It is meant to prompt a turn in one's thinking from grasping at concepts to a total release. Not the type of release of falling into nothingness, but one that comes from understanding, from wisdom. There is actually a technique for this called the huatou method, something that Dogen did not actually agree with by the way.

Literary styles aside, if you look at the practical side of Zen, it is very simple. The huatou method is a concession to serve as an entry point, just like Soto's focus on the sitting posture. As Hanshan wrote: "to even speak about practice is really like the last alternative". But the essence of Bodhidharma's message remains the same: see the nature of mind. Everything else are just temporary instructions, better not take them too seriously.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 10th, 2016 at 8:30 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Wayfarer said:

This is not to idolize the Buddha but simply to acknowledge the import of the teaching. It is a soteriological teaching (in the technical language of scholarship) that is, concerned with deliverance from the wheel of birth and death. It isn't simply about rationalising it.

Astus wrote:

Showing that the buddha is one's mind and not something far away is to eradicate the distance created by the elevated status of the goal. Another function of this kind of teaching is to point out that there is no special knowledge or experience that one should acquire through various methods, but simply to recognise what is already there. Actually that is how liberation is gained anyway.

Wayfarer said:

Do you think it's possible you're reading a kind of 20th Century existentialist/nihilist view into the Zen texts?

Astus wrote:

I tell you what I read, then you can decide what it is.

Dissatisfaction with life comes from aspiring for peace and happiness in experiences. Experiences are completely unstable and unreliable, therefore they provide neither peace nor happiness. When it is recognised that experiences are like that, there is no more any reason to be dissatisfied. There are many ways to realise that, and what Zen teaches is the direct path to reflect on one's present experiences right now.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 10th, 2016 at 8:41 PM

Title: Re: in enlightenment we only loose?

Content:

tomschwarz said:

is there not a goal in Buddhism of loosing a self centered attitude?

Astus wrote:

How about gaining a selfless attitude?

tomschwarz said:

understood about a point farther along on the path, emptiness, no increase no decrease. but to begin to embody that realization we must loose quite a bit of fundemental ignorance. no?

Astus wrote:

Ignorance is lack of knowledge, so it is not actually something to lose. Rather, one needs to gain knowledge to, figuratively speaking, lose ignorance. And what knowledge is that? That there is neither increase nor decrease, no loss or gain.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 10th, 2016 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: is Cheontae/Tendai Seon/Zen and Pureland is the same?

Content:

ShineeSeoul said:

so why there is big deal between schools? and what sect you must follow?

Astus wrote:

Devotional practices of the laity and the monastic regulations are similar in East Asia, although Japan is somewhat different in its monastic set up. As for the differences between Tiantai, Chan, and Jingtu, there are a few actually. What should be clear, however, is that except for Japan, these are not really sects existing as distinct organisations, but rather areas of study. It's similar to how while all South Asian Buddhists are put under the category of Theravada, there are numerous groups that follow different methods and philosophies.

Tiantai has its own practices (e.g. samatha-vipasyana, four samadhis) and doctrines (e.g. three truths, 3000 worlds in a thought). It is a fairly comprehensive teaching of Mahayana that organises all into its own system. Those on this forum who specialise in it can certainly tell more, plus the differences between Tiantai in the various countries.

Chan in China is mostly a general term for Buddhism, and monasteries are usually called Chan temples, but this does not have any effect on what actually happens there. If we were to narrow it down to something actually related to Bodhidharma's traditions, Chan exists primarily as the practice of huatou and the occasional references to Chan stories. If you look at http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/chanmed1.pdf 's and http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/chandew.pdf 's manuals, you'll see that they describe Tiantai and classic Indian methods, even though both are nominally Chan. But of course there are teachers who actually specialise in the teachings of the historical Chan School, but again, it is nothing exclusive.

Seon in Korea is heavily influenced by the teachings of Wonhyo, Jinul, and Hyujeong, who are in turn continue the type of Chan propagated by Zongmi, Yongming, and Dahui. It is a combination of Huayan/Hwa'eom theory with Chan/Seon huatou/hwadu practice. But besides that there are individual differences between what a specific teacher or group follows. For instance, Seungsan, founder of the Kwan Um Zen School, taught koan practice (Japanese style) instead of hwadu meditation, while Daehaeng, founder of the Hanmaum Seon Centre, did not teach either hwadu or koan practice.

Zen in Japan is another story. Today they differentiate three branches: Soto, Rinzai, and Obaku. Soto, at least its modern form, is focused on seated meditation as its central method, and doctrinally they concentrate on the works of their Japanese founder. Rinzai and Obaku are not really two schools. On one hand, they have a joint council as a unified representational body, on the other there are several independent monastic groups within Rinzai. They generally follow the methods propagated by Hakuin, i.e. koan practice, that is somewhat separate from the huatou/hwadu style. It is also important to note that in Japan most of the monastics (clergy) are non-celibate, unlike in other countries where they still follow that full Pratimoksha.

Pure Land in China and Korea is not a separate school but, as noted before, a type of practice. What generally unifies Pure Land followers everywhere is the intention to attain birth in Sukhavati, but since practically any Mahayana practitioner can have such a goal, it is not that simple to draw some clear lines. So we could say that those who focus on some kind of practice centred on Amitabha and wish such a birth are those who could be considered Pure Land followers. Japan again presents a unique situation where there are some schools - independent organisations - that explicitly focus on Amitabha and birth in Sukhavati in an exclusive way.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 11th, 2016 at 12:17 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Matt J said:

Zen is a direct pointing at the nature of mind, which in my experience is much different.

Astus wrote:

And what is that direct pointing at the nature of mind? How is it any different from seeing that all are unstable, unsatisfactory, and impersonal?

From Huineng (Platform Sutra, BDK Edition):

"The wondrous natures of people of this world are empty, without a single dharma that can be perceived. The emptiness of the self-natures is also like this."

"To use wisdom to contemplate all the dharmas without grasping or rejecting is to see the nature and accomplish the enlightenment of buddhahood."

"If one is to be enlightened to the sudden teaching, one cannot cultivate externally (i.e., superficially): one should just constantly activate correct views in one's own mind, and the enervating defilements of the afflictions will be rendered permanently unable to defile one. This is to see the nature."

"There is in the self-nature fundamentally not a single dharma that can be perceived."

From Mazu's sermons (tr Poceski):

"Whatever arises in the mind is called form; when one knows all forms to be empty, then birth is identical with no-birth. If one realizes this mind, then one can always wear one's robes and eat one's food. Nourishing the womb of sagehood, one spontaneously passes one's time: what else is there to do?"

"It is because of not knowing how to return to the source, that they follow names and seek forms, from which confusing emotions and falsehood arise, thereby creating various kinds of karma. When within a single thought one reflects and illuminates within, then everything is the Holy Mind."

"The mind can be spoken of [in terms of its two aspects]: birth and death, and suchness. The mind as suchness is like a clear mirror which can reflect images. The mirror symbolizes the mind; the images symbolize the dharmas. If the mind grasps at dharmas, then it gets involved in external causes and conditions, which is the meaning of birth and death. If the mind does not grasp at dharmas, that is suchness."

From Dazhu's treatise (tr Lok To):

"If you understand clearly that your mind does not abide anywhere at all, then you are clearly seeing your Original Mind, which is also referred to as "clearly seeing the nature of seeing." Just this Mind, that abides nowhere at all, is the Mind of Buddha and the Mind of liberation, the Mind of Bodhi and the Mind of the Uncreate. It is also referred to as realizing that the nature of form is void. Finally, it is what the sutra calls "Attaining the patient endurance of the Uncreate.""

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 11th, 2016 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: is Cheontae/Tendai Seon/Zen and Pureland is the same?

Content:

ShineeSeoul said:

Zen still practice the recitation of Amitabha, they might do it for different reason but they still do it

Astus wrote:

The intention matters a lot, even more than the practice itself. If one aims at seeing the nature of mind in this life, that is Chan practice. If one aims at attaining birth in Sukhavati, that is Pure Land practice. And one can do both at the same time as well. But they are still not the same.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 11th, 2016 at 4:32 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I have said before, I don't think that is an adequate depiction.

Astus wrote:

It is just the four noble truths that I have rephrased.

Wayfarer said:

Buddhism generally is not simply a matter of accepting the reality of ordinary life, but cutting off the root of suffering altogether, through understanding the factors that give rise to 're-birth' (whether in this moment or in 'future lives').

Astus wrote:

The root of suffering (and rebirth) is attachment to appearances mistaken for substantial objects. Once that mistake is removed then things are seen as they are, that is, empty. That's why in zazen the instruction is to let things come and go, as there is nothing to manipulate, and that is the buddhas' realisation, as it is.

Wayfarer said:

But as I said before, Zen like any school of Buddhism is soteriological, which isn't just 'accepting things as they are'. If that was all there was too it, there wouldn't be Buddhism.

Astus wrote:

There is the problem of suffering, of dissatisfaction. It is solved by seeing emptiness. How is that not good enough?

Wayfarer said:

Hence 'paravritti', which is a 'turning about' in the deepest seat of consciousness, which is surely a description for 'religious conversion'.

Astus wrote:

Such conversion is the end of defilements through the realisation of the twofold emptiness, and from that the four wisdoms and three bodies manifest.

"The conversion of support means that, when its counteragent arises, the other-dependent pattern forever alters its basic nature as the defiled aspect and forever realizes its purified aspect. This conversion of support has six varieties: ... 6) extensive conversion—the realization by bodhisattvas of the non-self of things, wherein by understanding the merits of quietude and insight, they both abandon and do not abandon [transmigration]."

(The Summary of the Great Vehicle, ch 9, BDK Edition, p 99-100)

I don't see how that is particularly different from what I have already said.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 11th, 2016 at 6:17 AM

Title: Re: is Cheontae/Tendai Seon/Zen and Pureland is the same?

Content:

ShineeSeoul said:

still stressing upon differences, its not big deal, you can be in a chan school and recite Amitabha to reborn in Pureland, its all at the end depend on individual intention more

Astus wrote:

I'm not sure I follow. There is no such church as "Chan School", it is not a club one can be a member of, but a teaching and practice one either follows or not.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 11th, 2016 at 7:50 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Matt J said:

How is anicca, anatta, and dukkha able to see, hear, sense, and know?

Astus wrote:

It is to realise that the six kinds of experiences are empty. That is the meaning of no-abiding and no-thought. What the original mind is is nothing other than the non-abiding mind, or simply no-mind. So, what one should recognise is that seeing, hearing, sensing, and knowing are without anything to grasp. However, assuming an independent awareness, that is the belief in a soul.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 11th, 2016 at 8:17 PM

Title: Re: Why Pureland?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Aiming for Sukhavati is a great choice for any Mahayana practitioner. There is no other path that guarantees buddhahood in one lifetime for everyone. So, unless you make it to at least the first bhumi now, Pure Land is the way to go. And if you look at the many forms of practices in Chinese PL teachings, it has a great offer of all sorts of methods, in case recitation does not satiate your needs.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 12th, 2016 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

Au contraire, the Buddha was quite different from us. He was completely free from all afflictions, and had knowledge of all modes of awakening. Can you say the same? If not, then you must admit you and the Buddha are different.

Astus wrote:

What am I and what is the Buddha? What is that freedom and knowledge you point out as differences? Dogen writes in Genjokoan (SBGZ, BDK Edition, vol 1, p 41): "Those who greatly realize delusion are buddhas. Those who are greatly deluded about realization are ordinary beings." That is, to see appearances as self is delusion, to see them just as they are is clarity. As the Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment says (ch 2, tr Muller): "when you know illusion, you will immediately be free ... Freedom from illusion is in itself enlightenment". To further clarify the point:

"If you conceive of the Buddha in terms of the characteristics of purity, brilliance, and liberation, and if you conceive of sentient beings in terms of the characteristics of impurity, darkness, and samsara—if your understanding is such as this, then you will never attain bodhi even after passing through eons [of religious practice] as numerous as the sands of the Ganges River. This is because you are attached to characteristics. There is only this One Mind and not the least bit of dharma that can be attained." (Huangbo, in Zen Texts, BDK Edition, p 14)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 12th, 2016 at 12:46 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Simon E. said:

But you see, or perhaps it is all so familiar to you that you don't..that is exactly the kind of freemasoneque jargon I was talking about. I am not denying that it is meaningful to you. But it is completely meaningless to me. It's just noises.

Astus wrote:

Huangbo is still relatively easy to read, as most of the text is original 9th century, when Chan was still pretty close to general East Asian Mahayana. Although it can take a while to familiarise yourself with it. However, if you look at works a century or two later, like the Blue Cliff Record and Dogen, it is developed Chan and it is a lot harder to penetrate. So in that quote Huangbo is just alluding to the Diamond Sutra's passages about the Buddha being without characteristics.

E.g. in ch 5:

"All things that have characteristics are false and ephemeral. If you see all characteristics to be non-characteristics, then you see the Tathāgata."

And the stanza in ch 26:

"Someone who tries to discern me in form
Or seek me in sound
Is practicing non-Buddhist methods
And will not discern the Tathāgata"

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 12th, 2016 at 1:47 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

You are a bundle of afflictions who continually blunders through samsara because your afflictions generate actions which result in your own suffering.

Astus wrote:

That's it! We look at ourselves and see only all sorts of mundane, vulgar, basic, coarse, and totally ordinary things. While at the same time we think the Buddha is completely the opposite. The path is to go from mundane to supramundane, from delusion to enlightenment. As for the paths, in Zen there are all sorts of ways to categorise teachings, but the ultimate one is always sudden enlightenment. Among other things it means realising that afflictions are bodhi, to quote a general Mahayana concept. It also means the insight into the dharmas being unborn.

The master said, "The afflictions are bodhi. They are nondual and not separate. If one [tries to] use the illumination of wisdom to destroy the afflictions, this is the interpretation of the two [Hinayana] vehicles [held by] those fit for the sheep and deer [carts]. Those of superior wisdom and Mahayana capabilities are completely different." Xie Jian said, "What is the Mahayana interpretation?"

The master said, "Ordinary people see brightness and ignorance as different, but the wise comprehend that they are nondual in their nature. The nondual nature is the true nature, and the true nature is present in the ordinary and stupid [common people] without decrease, and in the sages and wise ones without increase. One abides in the afflictions without disruption; one resides in meditation without serenity. Not annihilationist and not permanent, neither coming nor going; neither located in an intermediate location nor in the internal and external; neither generated nor extinguished, permanently abiding without movement—this is called the Way." (Platform Sutra, ch 9, BDK Edition, p 80)

"If he perceives there to be generation [of the elements of reality] and moves toward [a state of] extinction, he will fall into the way of the srvakas. If he does not perceive there to be generation but only perceives extinction, he will fall into the way of the solitary enlightened ones (pratyekabuddhas).

The dharmas were originally not generated, and neither are they now extinguished. Do not activate the two views, and neither detest nor enjoy [things]. All the myriad dharmas are only the One Mind, and after [one realizes this] they become the vehicle of the Buddhas."

(Huangbo, in Zen Texts, BDK Edition, p 24)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 16th, 2016 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

There are hundreds and thousands of texts written about this, but at the end of the day, if you are churning out verbiage with no change in yourself, then, you are just a parrot.

Astus wrote:

Certainly, this is a well known teaching in Mahayana, and it is not any kind of novelty that is expressed by saying that the Buddha was an ordinary being. It is something one should realise for oneself.

"people of this world always recite prajñā with their mouths, but they don't recognize the prajñā of the self-natures. This is like talking about eating, which doesn't satisfy one's hunger. If you just talk about emptiness with your mouths, you won't be able to see the nature for a myriad eons. Ultimately, this is of no benefit at all."

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK Edition, p 28)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 16th, 2016 at 5:10 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Wayfarer said:

So the essay that this OP linked to in support, doesn't actually say 'life is meaningless'. In fact, it reaches the opposite conclusion!

Astus wrote:

What is that meaning? To attain liberation. Just as I have acknowledged there. What does liberation mean? To fully realise that there is nothing in samsara that is worth clinging to. Not only this life is without anything to rely on, but even the highest possible heavens are to be discarded. Also, on a personal level, not a single thought or feeling is one's real being, so all should be let go. That's how in life - in this series of experiences - there is nothing meaningful.

Wayfarer said:

Now I agree that Buddhism states that 'the world is without essence and substance'. That is straight-ahead teaching of emptiness. But 'without purpose and meaning' is another thing altogether.

Astus wrote:

What gives meaning to life is when there is something to hold on to and/or something to strive for. Karma makes life meaningful in the sense that no act remains without consequence. On the other hand, acts are conditioned, and both holding on and striving are the very causes of suffering. Without a substance there can be no meaning. Hence it is repeatedly taught in Zen that one should cease seeking and realise that Shakyamuni was an everyday person.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 16th, 2016 at 5:14 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

jundo cohen said:

This life and world is overflowing in meaning! Our way is not nihilism. For one, the meaning of life is life, just as the meaning of drinking tea is to drink tea, savoring as well that the tea cup holds within it all the universe. We can come to see every instant, every gesture, every up or down, every smile or tear as just the same ... holding and embodying all the universe, each and all just Buddha in life.

Astus wrote:

You just made a very fine empty fist.

That is: a clever way to say that there is no meaning, as meaning/purpose is necessarily beyond the act/thing itself.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 16th, 2016 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Wayfarer said:

But I think it is because there is something of greater worth than the things people are inclined to treasure.

Astus wrote:

As nirvana is the denial of samsara, it makes everything in/as samsara worthless and meaningless, exactly because it is greater than everything people normally treasure.

Wayfarer said:

Is that something you would concur with? You did cite it, after all.

Astus wrote:

That article is quite clear.

"According to Buddhism, the reality of life is dependent originated. The only way to transcend the state of relativity and experience the state of absoluteness, is to understand, grasp and experience the nature of dependent-origination. ... Conversely, if these self-attachments can be eradicated, the conditions to live will not arise. Then, we will be free from the cycle of live and death and attain the state of"

That is, life is fully dependent, and one should end the cycle of life completely, that is liberation. And that is what the article calls the ultimate significance of life, to fully and utterly end life.

Wayfarer said:

I quoted previously the passage in the Pali nikayas where the Buddha provides an account of what he is, and he explicitly says he is not a 'human being' (manussa)

Astus wrote:

It is not about what is a buddha and what is a sentient being. It is a given that there is a general difference between the two. However, that conventional concept is also an obstacle, so Danxia says that one should recognise that Shakyamuni was an ordinary fellow. This is the realisation of emptiness, or in other words, seeing buddha-nature. As for some scriptural references:

"The appearance of the realm of sentient beings is just like that of the realm of Buddhas."

(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra13.html>)

"Therefore, Śāriputra, not apart from the realm of sentient beings is the dharma body; not apart from the dharma body is the realm of sentient beings. The realm of sentient beings is in effect the dharma body; the dharma body is in effect the realm of sentient beings. Śāriputra, these two dharmas under different names have the same meaning."

(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra14.html>)

"Mañjuśrī, as the open sky is [pure, taint free, and attachment free], so too is bodhi. As bodhi is, so too are dharmas. As dharmas are, so too are all sentient beings. As all sentient beings are, so too are worlds. As worlds are, so too is nirvāṇa."

(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra46.html>)

And what identity is this about?

"What is meant by understanding the true reality of a sentient being? It means achieving a clear understanding of the Mahāyāna."

(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra48a.html>)

"All dharmas are empty like dreams.

Without self-essence, they are as pure as the open sky.

Dharmas have neither self nor no-self,

And I know that they are like illusions and lightning.

As a sentient being is born and dies,

No dharma can be captured.

The beginning, middle, and end have no self-essence,

Nor does a sentient being's life.

However, a sentient being receives requitals according to its karmas

And endlessly transmigrates through life-paths.
If one trains to attain bodhi,
One will come to know that dharmas have no self-essence."
(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra48a.html>)

Wayfarer said:

So again I think your interpretation is based on rationalising the human condition by not looking for any way out of it or anything beyond it. It's like you're taking the 'everyday mind' teaching and turning it upside down. It is more like reconciling yourself to the idea that life is basically meaningless.

Astus wrote:

There are the five aggregates and six sensory areas. The only difference between buddhas and beings is whether there is attachment to them or not. The aggregates and areas are no problem in themselves, grasping any of them as self is the mistake. However, there has never been any self anywhere to begin with, so selflessness is not a special state to gain.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 16th, 2016 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

That is not liberation, Astus, that is a realization. But liberation and realization are not the same thing, though the two are often confused. Liberation is freedom from affliction that causes rebirth in samsara. If one does not understand this, one has understood nothing of the Dharma.

Astus wrote:

When there is nothing seen to be attached to, how can affliction arise?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 16th, 2016 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, the difference between buddhas and sentient beings is the presence or absence of traces.

Astus wrote:

Traces depend on ignorance. Ignorance is removed by the knowledge of suchness, of emptiness. That's how when the aggregates are realised as insubstantial, there is no more basis for afflictions.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 16th, 2016 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Matt J said:

If that were the case, then we would achieve enlightenment every time we go unconscious.

Astus wrote:

What affliction is there in unconsciousness? Alas, consciousness arises again, that's why the path of asamjnikas are faulty.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 16th, 2016 at 11:35 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Matt J said:

Ignorance.

Astus wrote:

How do you define ignorance?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 16th, 2016 at 11:39 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

As long as one has not eradicated latent afflictions [anusayas], one continues to take rebirth in samsara, even after realizing emptiness

Astus wrote:

What maintains and what eradicates latent afflictions?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 17th, 2016 at 12:13 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

Ignorance sustains them and prajñā eliminates them, but it is not the case that prajñā can eliminate all the traces sustained by ignorance in a single moment. This is why there are nine grades of affliction — from course-course to subtle-subtle— that need to be removed gradually, after one has realized emptiness on the path of seeing.

Astus wrote:

That is, in the role of wisdom eliminating ignorance there is no disagreement.

"You must realize that there is fundamentally no distinction between the buddha natures of the foolish and the wise—it is only because of delusion and enlightenment that [you think they are] different and that there are foolish and wise."
(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK Edition, p 28)

So this is where we get really into the Zen part then, i.e. sudden enlightenment. Because Huineng also says (p 30):

"To be enlightened to this Dharma is the Dharma of prajñā, to cultivate this practice is the practice of prajñā. To not cultivate this is to be an ordinary [unenlightened] person. To cultivate this in a single moment of thought is to be equivalent to the Buddha in one's own body."

And (p 31): "To use wisdom to contemplate all the dharmas without grasping or rejecting is to see the nature and accomplish the enlightenment of buddhahood."

Also (p 33): "If you recognize the self-nature, with a single [experience of] enlightenment you will attain the stage of buddhahood."

And a clear description of what this Dharma is (p 33-34):

"in wisdom's contemplation both interior and exterior are clearly penetrated, and one recognizes one's own fundamental mind. If you recognize your fundamental mind, this is the fundamental emancipation. And if you attain emancipation, this is the samādhi of prajñā, this is nonthought. What is nonthought? If in seeing all the dharmas, the mind is not defiled or attached, this is nonthought. [The mind's] functioning pervades all locations, yet it is not attached to all the locations. Just purify the fundamental mind, causing the six consciousnesses to emerge from the six [sensory] gates, [causing one to be] without defilement or heterogeneity within the six types of sensory data (literally, the "six dusts"), autonomous in the coming and going [of mental phenomena], one's penetrating function without stagnation. ... to be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is for the myriad dharmas to be completely penetrated. To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to see the realms of [all] the buddhas. To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to arrive at the stage of buddhahood."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 17th, 2016 at 6:34 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

Astus, what Huineng says is nothing special. The realization of a first stage bodhisattva is the same wisdom a Buddha fully realizes. The difference between an ārya bodhisattva and buddha is whether or not that realization is sustained 24/7/365. Bodhisattvas have equipoise and post-equipoise phases, where they may still act out afflictively. Buddhas are only in equipoise.

What accounts for this is that veil of twin obscurations a bodhisattva must burn away with diligent practice, and of course, in every lifetime, bodhisattvas on the impure stages regress completely to the level of common persons, and need to begin again, albeit, advancing more rapidly. It is only when they reach the eighth bhumi that this regression ceases and they attain power over birth.

Astus wrote:

What you say is called in Zen "sudden enlightenment, gradual practice".

"As for "gradual cultivation," although he has awakened to the fact that his original nature is no different from that of the buddhas, the beginningless proclivities of habit (vāsanā) are extremely difficult to remove suddenly. Therefore he must continue to cultivate while relying on this awakening so that this efficacy of gradual suffusion is perfected; he constantly nurtures the embryo of sanctity, and after a long, long time he becomes a sage. Hence it is called gradual cultivation."

(Moguja's Secrets on Cultivating the Mind, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 2, p 216-217)

As for it being equal to the first bhumi, at least Sheng-yen agrees with that,

"At most, enlightenment in Chan Buddhism is something like attaining the "pure Dharma-eye" (S. dharmacaksu-visuddha; C. fayanjing) that is, seeing the path (jiandao), which corresponds to the first fruit [stream-entry] in Nikaya Buddhism."

(Sheng-yen: Orthodox Chinese Buddhism, p 102)

However, the Platform Sutra takes neither of those positions.

"The self-nature becomes enlightened itself, sudden enlightenment and sudden cultivation. There is no gradual progression. Therefore, one does not posit all the dharmas. The dharmas are quiescent—how could there be a progression?"

(Platform Sutra, ch 8, BDK Edition, p 75)

Neither does Mazu.

"Following the principle is awakening, and following phenomena is ignorance. Ignorance is to be ignorant of one's original mind. Awakening is to awake to one's original nature. Once awakened, one is awakened forever, there being no more ignorance. Like, when the sun comes, then all darkness disappears. When the sun of p~ajMem erges, it does not coexist with the darkness of the defilements."

(Sun-Face Buddha, p 67-68)

Dazhu.

"If one see his own Nature, he is no longer a worldly person. If one is suddenly enlightened about the Supreme Vehicle, he has transcended both the worldly and the holy stages. Only a deluded man talks about worldly and holy. The enlightened man transcends both samsara and nirvana. While the deluded man talks about action and basic principles, the enlightened man talks about the Great Function without limits. The deluded man seeks to obtain or attain something, while the enlightened man neither seeks, obtains nor attains anything whatsoever. The deluded man yearns for attainment in some distant kalpa in the future, while the enlightened man perceives the nature of all things suddenly and instantaneously."

(<http://www.ymba.org/books/entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment/tsung-ching-record>)

Huangbo.

"To simply right now suddenly comprehend that one's own mind is fundamentally Buddha, without there being a single dharma one can attain and without there being a single practice one can cultivate—this is the unsurpassable enlightenment, this is the Buddha of suchness."

(Zen Texts, BDK Edition, p 20)

Dogen.

"The zazen I speak of is not meditation practice. It is simply the dharma gate of joyful ease, the practice-realization of totally culminated enlightenment."

(https://web.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/gongyo_seiten/translations/part_3/fukan_zazengi.html)

Or Menzan.

"Eihei Dogen went to China, practiced under Nyojo, and received the transmission of this jijuyu-zanmai. After he returned to Japan, he advocated this samadhi, calling it shinjin-datsuraku datsuraku-shinjin (dropping off body and mind, body and mind dropped off). This is another name for anuttarasamyaku-sambodhi (ultimate awareness)."

(Jijuyu-zanmai <http://terebess.hu/zen/JijuyuZanmai.rtf>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 17th, 2016 at 6:41 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

DGA said:

From the perspective of one in a state of equipoise, there is no progression. From the perspective of one in a state of affliction, there is progression.

Astus wrote:

Such a distinction between equipoise and post-equipoise is not used in Chan. Rather, consider the third line from the <http://terebess.hu/english/hsin.html>: "Be off by a hair, And you are as far from it as heaven from earth." (毫釐有差天地懸隔) Dogen writes exactly the same in

https://web.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/gongyo_seiten/translations/part_3/fukan_zazengi.html: "And yet, if there is a hairsbreadth deviation, it is like the gap between heaven and earth." (然而毫釐有差天地懸隔) That is, you have either realised buddha-nature or not.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 17th, 2016 at 6:43 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

the fact is that buddhahood requires the elimination of the two obscurations. That does not happen in one lifetime, in general.

Astus wrote:

With seeing buddha-nature there is no place for any obscuration left.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 17th, 2016 at 7:05 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

I am quite certain that Chan Buddhism contains the teachings about karma and knowledge obscurations. Why? Because they are discussed at length in the Lanka sūtra. Or has the Lankāvatāra Sūtra been demoted?

Astus wrote:

The Lankavatara Sutra has a special place in Chan, but not because of its contents, as it is hardly ever quoted at all, but because of the story in the Further Biographies of Eminent Monks (Xu Gaoseng Zhuan, from around 660) that Bodhidharma handed over the Lankavatara Sutra to Huike as a form of legitimising his teachings. Furthermore, as we know now from the Dunhuang texts Annals of the Transmission of the Dharma-treasure (Chuan Fabao Ji) and Record of the Masters and Disciples of the Lankavatara Sutra (Lengqie Shizi Ji), the Lankavatara Sutra had a prominent legitimising place in early Chan (that's been later called the Northern School of Shenxiu), and while in those texts Hongren (5th patriarch) is said to have taught from that scripture, we can see in the Platform Sutra - the text that eventually superseded all previous works of similar nature - that it's been switched to the Diamond Sutra. So, assuming any doctrinal or practical position of Chan from the Lankavatara Sutra is mistaken.

The sutras in currency among various factions of Zen mainly are: Heart Sutra, Diamond Sutra, Vimalakirti Sutra, Avatamsaka Sutra, Lotus Sutra, Nirvana Sutra, Amitabha Sutra, Platform Sutra, Surangama Sutra, Complete Enlightenment Sutra, Vajrasamadhi Sutra

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 17th, 2016 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Anders said:

You are going to have to define what you mean by "realise buddha-nature" here.

Astus wrote:

Just the usual: no-thought. See last quote in <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=328785#p328785>.

Anders said:

Atm, you sound more like an Osho-wallah to me than a Zen practitioner, so I must be missing something here.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 17th, 2016 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

DGA said:

My frame of reference here is Seung Sahn Sunim's Compass of Zen. But I think the first quotation you give in this post, the one by Moguja, articulates it succinctly.

Astus wrote:

Seung Sahn used a circle to describe a practitioner's progress. It goes gradually up to fully realising buddha-nature, so it's more like gradual practice, sudden enlightenment. Otherwise, he says in Compass of Zen when describing the purpose of Buddhism:

"If attain your mind—which means, if you attain your true self—then you become Buddha." (p 16)

"When you attain your true self, you become Buddha. But Buddha is not something special, and it is not something outside you. Buddha means that if you attain your true self, you attain your own mind." (p 25)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 18th, 2016 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, this is exactly the distinction between an ārya's equipoise and post-equipoise. When in equipoise, one is in a state of realization, when not, then not, and one's realization remains at the level of a concept.

Astus wrote:

There is a difference between the two in that one can go in and out of equipoise, but realisation of buddha-nature is once and for ever (except for those advocating a sudden enlightenment followed by gradual practice system). So Danxia says, "Just eat and drink.

Everyone can do that. Don't harbor doubt."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 18th, 2016 at 12:47 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

DGA said:

Question about the Danxia quotation you use here. It seems to me that if one is advised against harboring doubt, that the teacher knows very well that doubt can emerge, and that the student may harbor it. Is this an example of going in and out of equipoise? For the purpose of this example, how does equipoise differ from realizing (or recognizing) Buddha-nature?

Astus wrote:

It is the doubt of questioning buddha-nature, it is the fear of the void, it is the confusion about how things are, it is the lack of faith in one's own mind. As for equipoise, that is still a conditioned experience based on ignorance about the emptiness of appearances, an approximation, but not the real wisdom. Seeing the nature is the first hand confirmation that there is nothing that can be grasped, so whether the mind is moving or still are no problem. That is knowing that the Buddha was a common being.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 18th, 2016 at 3:50 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

DGA said:

I think if you understand "equipoise" in the sense Malcolm does, which is the recognition of one's Buddha-nature, then my question about the Danxia quotation makes sense.

Astus wrote:

Seeing buddha-nature is being a buddha. Dogen often likes to quote the Lotus Sutra:

"No one but the buddhas (yuibutsu yobutsu 唯佛與佛 - this is also the title of chapter 91 of Shobogenzo) can completely know the real aspects of all dharmas".

"Although innumerable Bodhisattvas may well perfectly practise the paramitas [spiritual perfections], they might only reach the stage of the ten abodes ["bhumis"] and yet may not be able to see the Buddha-Nature."

"Such Bodhisattvas may well reach the stage of the ten soils ["bhumis" - stages of Bodhisattva development], and yet they cannot clearly see the Buddha-Nature. How could sravakas and pratyekabuddhas well see [it]?"

(Nirvana Sutra, ch 12, tr Yamamoto)

"If sravakas, pratyekabuddhas and the Bodhisattva of the ten abodes do not see the Buddha-Nature, we say "Nirvana". It is not "Great Nirvana". If they clearly see the Buddha-Nature, there is Great Nirvana."

(ch 29)

"The Buddha-Nature of beings is what all Buddhas can see; it is not what sravakas and pratyekabuddhas can know. All beings do not see the Buddha-Nature. That is why they are all bound up by defilement and repeat birth and death. When one sees the Buddha-Nature, no bonds of defilement can tie one up. Emancipation comes and one attains Great Nirvana."

(ch 34)

"To see the Buddha-Nature is to attain unsurpassed Enlightenment. To attain unsurpassed Enlightenment is to arrive at unsurpassed Great Nirvana."

(ch 36)

"Whoever sees his nature is a buddha; whoever doesn't is a mortal. But if you can find your buddha-nature apart from your mortal nature, where is it? Our mortal nature is our buddhanature. Beyond this nature there's no buddha. The buddha is our nature. There's no buddha besides this nature. And there's no nature besides the buddha."

(Bodhidharma, Bloodstream Sermon, tr Red Pine)

"To use wisdom to contemplate all the dharmas without grasping or rejecting is to see the nature and accomplish the enlightenment of buddhahood."

"If you recognize your own mind and see the nature, you will definitely accomplish the enlightenment of buddhahood."

"If you recognize the self-nature, with a single [experience of] enlightenment you will attain the stage of buddhahood."

"To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to arrive at the stage of buddhahood."

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, tr McRae)

"since the mind of all sentient beings is the same as original Buddha-Nature, there is no need to practice; for if one recognizes one's own Mind and sees one's own Nature, there is nothing at all to seek outside oneself."

(Huangbo, Wan-ling Record, tr Lok To)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 18th, 2016 at 4:38 AM

Title: Re: What's lineage, what is it for, & how does it work?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think it should (also) be asked why bother with claiming some kind of lineage in the first place? Sot'aesan, founder of Won Buddhism, didn't need any, nor did Sangharakshita, founder of the Triratna Buddhist Community. Same goes for Daehaeng, founder of Hanmaum Seon Centres, and Thich Thanh Tu, founder of the new Truc Lam school; and likely many others throughout Asia (https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Japanese_new_religions).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 18th, 2016 at 6:55 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

DGA said:

My only point is that this isn't the only perspective among Ch'an/Zen traditions, and this is legible in this very thread, and that's cool.

Astus wrote:

Certainly, there are various positions in that area, and it's perfectly fine.

"Some say that one first relies on all-at-once awakening and then can engage in step-by-step practice. Some say that relying on all-at-once practice, one step-by-step awakens. Some say that awakening and practice are both step-by-step. Some say that they are both all-at-once. Some say that the dharma has neither all-at-once nor step-by-step, that all-at-once and step-by-step are in the dispositions [of trainees]. Each of the above theories is significant."

(Zongmi on Chan, p 118)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 18th, 2016 at 5:02 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

you have written elsewhere many times that as far as you are concerned, buddhanature and emptiness are one and the same.

Astus wrote:

Yes. It is as Huangbo says,

"If Dharma students wish to know the key to successful cultivation, they should know that it is the mind that dwells on nothing. Emptiness is the Buddha's Dharmakaya, just as the Dharmakaya is emptiness. People's usual understanding is that the Dharmakaya pervades emptiness, and that it is contained in emptiness. However, this is erroneous, for we should understand that the Dharmakaya is emptiness and that emptiness is the Dharmakaya.

If one thinks that emptiness is an entity and that this emptiness is separate from the Dharmakaya or that there is a Dharmakaya outside of emptiness, one is holding a wrong view. In the complete absence of views about emptiness, the true Dharmakaya appears. Emptiness and Dharmakaya are not different. Sentient beings and Buddhas are not different. Birth and death and Nirvana are not different. Klesa and Bodhi are not different. That alone which is beyond all form is Buddha."

(Chung-Ling Record, tr Lok To)

Malcolm said:

If however by buddhanature you mean dharmakāya, well, than yes, only buddhas can see that. But your language is so imprecise as to be deceptive.

Astus wrote:

Buddha-nature is the dharmakaya as well.

"The non-abiding Mind is not green, yellow, red or white. It is not long or short, nor does it come or go. It is not pure or impure, nor does it have birth or death. It is only deep and permanent stillness. This is the non-abiding Mind, which is also called the Original Body. The Original Body is the Buddha's Body, which is also called the Dharmakaya."
(Treatise On Entering The Tao of Sudden Enlightenment)

"As to the three bodies, the pure dharmakāya is your nature, the perfect and complete saṃbhogakāya is your wisdom, and the thousand billion nirmāṇakāyas are your practices (i.e., saṃskāra, "mental activities"). To speak of the three bodies apart from the fundamental nature is called 'having the bodies but being without wisdom.' If you are enlightened to [the fact that] the three bodies have no self-natures, then you will understand the bodhi of the four wisdoms."
(Platform Sutra, ch 7, BDK Edition, p 60)

"If you wish to differ in no way from the patriarch-buddha, just don't seek outside. The pure light in a single thought of yours—this is the dharmakāya buddha within your own house. The nondiscriminating light in a single thought of yours—this is the saṃbhogakāya buddha within your own house. The nondifferentiating light in a single thought of yours—this is the nirmāṇakāya buddha within your own house. This is the threefold body is you, listening to my discourse right now before my very eyes. It is precisely because you don't run around seeking outside that you have such meritorious activities."
(Record of Linji, p 9, tr Sasaki)

However, Linji continues with this:

"According to the masters of the sutras and śāstras, the threefold body is regarded as the ultimate norm. But in my view this is not so. The threefold body is merely a name; moreover, it is a threefold dependency. A man of old said, 'The [buddha-]bodies are posited depending upon manifested meaning; the [buddha] lands are postulated in keeping with essential substance.' Therefore we clearly know that 'dharma-natured bodies' and 'dharmanatured lands' are no more than shimmering reflections."

And later he said (p 16-17):

"According to the masters of the sutras and śāstras, the dharmakāya is regarded as basic substance and the saṃbhogakāya and nirmāṇakāya as function. From my point of view the dharmakāya cannot expound the dharma. Therefore a man of old said, 'The [buddha-]bodies are posited depending upon meaning; the [buddha-]lands are postulated in keeping with substance.' So we clearly know that the dharma-nature body and dharma-nature land are fabricated things, based on dependent understanding. Empty fists and yellow leaves used to fool a child! Spiked gorse seeds! Horned water chestnuts! What kind of juice are you looking for in such dried-up bones!"

That's because Zen's primary teaching is just the non-abiding mind (no-mind), the awareness without grasping, that is labelled the essential and ultimate teaching of the buddhas. Details beyond that are only a matter of skilful means.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 18th, 2016 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Anders said:

I think it is fine to say, from the POV of internal vision, that a moment of true practise is a moment of Buddhahood. That is, as I understand it, how it is to be experienced and how it is to be actualised.

I don't think it's equally fine to extrapolate from there that Buddhahood in all given contexts, is fully accomplished in a moment of seeing the nature.

Astus wrote:

One moment of buddhahood should be followed by further moments of buddhahood.

"To always practice wisdom in all places, at all times, and in all moments of thought, without stupidity—this is the practice of prajñā. A single moment's stupidity and prajñā is eradicated, a single moment's wisdom and prajñā is generated."

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK Edition, p 28-29)

"If one is to be enlightened to the sudden teaching, one cannot cultivate externally (i.e., superficially): one should just constantly activate correct views in one's own mind, and the enervating defilements of the afflictions will be rendered permanently unable to defile one. This is to see the nature.

Good friends, one should not reside within or without, and one's going and coming should be autonomous. One who is able to eradicate the mind of attachment will [attain] penetration unhindered. Those who are able to cultivate this practice are fundamentally no different from [what is described in] the Prajñā Sutra."

(p 32)

Anders said:

But does it follow that a moment of seeing the nature gives access to the array of means that a Buddha has for transforming sentient beings? This is after all, the reason we talk about Buddhahood.

Astus wrote:

It is a matter of "correct view".

"What is 'automatic salvation of the self-nature'? It is to use correct views to save the sentient beings of false views, afflictions, and stupidity within our own minds. Having correct views, we may use the wisdom of prajñā to destroy the sentient beings of stupidity and delusion, automatically saving each and every one of them."

(p 48)

Anders said:

you need to start looking at what the masters say about things like manifesting the Nirmanakaya and how to engender the wisdom of perfection of action.

Astus wrote:

As I see it, one of the most important points of the buddha-nature teachings is that the three bodies are found within the mind. It is not something developed. That is, once false thoughts are removed, it manifests automatically.

"If they were without these enervating defilements, wisdom would always be manifest and they would not depart from the self-natures. To be enlightened to this Dharma is to be without thought. To be without recollection, without attachment, to not activate the false and deceptive—this is to allow one's self[-suchness]-nature to function. To use wisdom to contemplate all the dharmas without grasping or rejecting is to see the nature and accomplish the enlightenment of buddhahood."
(p 30-31)

"The person who has seen the nature apprehends [the dharmas] whether he posits them or not. He is autonomous in his going and coming, without stagnation or hindrance. He acts in response to the functions [of students], and he answers in response to their words. Always manifesting his nirmāṇakāya, he never departs from the selfnature. He attains the samādhi of autonomous disportment in the supernormal powers. This is called seeing the nature."
(p 74)

Anders said:

I think you need to apply a bit of two truths to this whole thing and get better at sorting out between practical and 'ultimate' concerns.

Astus wrote:

As I see it, if the validity of the sudden path is denied, then Zen is just a strange way of rephrasing the six paramitas and the gradual path of the bodhisattva. Why bother with that at all, if not for simply aesthetic (literary) reasons? My idea/vision is to take this view seriously and see where it goes. There are some studies on what a "sudden practice" is (<http://terebess.hu/zen/Practice-in-Shen-Hui.pdf>, http://digitool.library.mcgill.ca/R/?func=dbin-jump-full&object_id=31128&local_base=GEN01-MCG02, <http://buddhiststudies.berkeley.edu/people/faculty/sharf/documents/Sharf,%20Mindfulness%20and%20Mindlessness%20in%20Early%20Chan.pdf>), just to clarify further.

There is another problem. If "seeing nature" amounts "only" to a beginning, further instructions are required. As you say, Hakuin provided them. But what about the others?

In the first quote in this topic Danxia says that there's nothing else to do, and the same goes for most of the classical teachers as well. Sure, we can always claim that there were the secret personal instructions, but that's a very weak argument, and it makes the recorded teachings false. Plus, there is no point in not describing the whole path, as that's been already done by the sutras and numerous treatises. Also, when there was a Zen teacher who set up a gradual method, he discussed it.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 18th, 2016 at 9:23 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Wayfarer said:

So, are you saying there's no possibility that you're not 'off a hair'?

Astus wrote:

I don't think this is a topic about me, even if it is a common trend to turn everything into personal matters.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 18th, 2016 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

Astus, if one still has afflictions, one is on the path of cultivation, at best. Buddhas have no afflictions, so Huineng's statement is pointing to ārya practitioners, not buddhas. Buddhas have no enervating afflictions to worry about at all, because they have been eradicated [by the eighth bhumi].

Astus wrote:

The teaching was addressed to a mixed group of lay and ordained people, so the audience should be considered ordinary beings, who all attain enlightenment at the end of the speech. The quote says that with the realisation of the sudden teaching the afflictions will be eliminated.

Here's the BTTS translation: "When you become enlightened to the Sudden Teaching, you do not grasp onto the cultivation of external things. When your own mind constantly gives rise to right views, afflictions and defilement can never stain you. That is what is meant by seeing your own nature." (若開悟頓教，不能外修，但於自心常起正見，煩惱塵勞常不能染，即是見性。)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 18th, 2016 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

Right, this simply means that you are immune to the afflictions that you possess, not that you have eradicated them.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean "non-afflictive ignorance" / jneyavarana with immunity to afflictions? Otherwise, an affliction that does not afflict is not an affliction.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 18th, 2016 at 10:32 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

There are two kinds of afflictions: kleśas and anuśaya; the former is active; the latter, dormant or inactive. By the end of the seventh bhumi all afflictions are totally eradicated, leaving only the knowledge obscuration, which is like an increasingly sheer veil.

Astus wrote:

What is immunity to afflictions then?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 19th, 2016 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Anders said:

Are you going to be able to recognise the moment and on top of that, be able to manifest transformative action?

Astus wrote:

It's up to each being what serves as a transformative moment. Hence buddhas manifest depending on beings' karma, and monks wander to find the right teacher.

Anders said:

Pouring our heart and soul into a life's work for the opportunity to make a difference like that in someone's life, if it comes. It's not about what is the superior path or inferior path, or what is the easiest all accomplishing path and so forth. It's about saving lives, man.

Astus wrote:

How are lives saved? If by that you refer to the teaching, the Dharma, then it is crucial to answer the question about the most efficient and appropriate way(s). For instance, the Pure Land path is said to be appropriate for all kinds of people, all capacities, and it has fairly simple teachings and practices. So no matter what situation, one can always recommend buddha-remembrance as the optimal solution, like Honen did. Because of that it sounds only logical what the <http://web.mit.edu/stclair/www/shoshinge.html> says: "Sakyamuni Tathagata appeared in this world Solely to teach the ocean-like Primal Vow of Amida". How does Bodhidharma compare, going all the way from India to China? How many are saved by "this mind is buddha"? Also, to effectively save, shouldn't one already be in the position to do that? These and other similar questions are why I think it is worth probing the depth of the Chan pond. But if you think this is not how it is, please tell.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 19th, 2016 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

The nonconceptual equipoise on emptiness. When you are in nonconceptual equipoise on emptiness, the latent afflictions which cause rebirth in the three realms are gradually burned away.

Astus wrote:

So you mean immunity in the sense that they are not activated, therefore they do not even come up to one's consciousness. But then, because they are latent, they are not active except in the right conditions anyway.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 19th, 2016 at 7:41 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

Nevertheless, until they are burnt away, one can still take birth in the three realms. Buddhas do not take birth in the three realms at all.

Astus wrote:

Dogen writes in Shoji (SBGZ, vol 4, BDK Edition, p 299-300):

"If a person looks for buddha outside of life and death, that is like pointing a cart north and making for [the south country of] Etsu, or like facing south and hoping to see the North Star. It is to be amassing more and more causes of life and death, and to have utterly lost the way of liberation. When we understand that only life and death itself is nirvana, there is nothing to hate as life and death and nothing to aspire to as nirvana. Then, for the first time, the means exist to get free from life and death.

...

This life and death is just the sacred life of buddha. If we hate it and want to get rid of it, that is just wanting to lose the sacred life of buddha. If we stick in it, if we attach to life and death, this also is to lose the sacred life of buddha. We confine ourselves to the condition of buddha. When we are without dislike and without longing, then for the first time we enter the mind of buddha. But do not consider it with mind and do not say it with words! When we just let go of our own body and our own mind and throw them into the house of buddha, they are set into action from the side of buddha; then when we continue to obey this, without exerting any force and without expending any mind, we get free from life and death and become buddha."

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 19th, 2016 at 7:44 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

tomamundsen said:

Are there any Zen sources that describe what Buddhahood is, in an externally-verifiable kind of way? If we're going to compare Zen to Indian Mahayana, this will be helpful. Otherwise, it feels like we may be comparing apples and oranges.

Astus wrote:

There are two options. One can go with the usual Mahayana descriptions. Or one can look at the teaching of the buddha being the mind. Those who choose the first one usually also talk about gradual purification and such. While those who go with the second option say that one should just realise it for oneself immediately.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 19th, 2016 at 6:35 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

This is just a poetic restatement of Nāgarjuna's trope about the non differentiation of samsara and nirvana, but it does not address the core of my point.

Astus wrote:

Your point seems to be that afflictions need to be fully eliminated first, and only then one has attained full enlightenment. But Huineng says:

"If one [tries to] use the illumination of wisdom to destroy the afflictions, this is the interpretation of the two [Hinayana] vehicles [held by] those fit for the sheep and deer [carts]. ... Ordinary people see brightness and ignorance as different, but the wise comprehend that they are nondual in their nature. ... One abides in the afflictions without disruption; one resides in meditation without serenity. Not annihilationist and not permanent, neither coming nor going; neither located in an intermediate location nor in the internal and external; neither generated nor extinguished, permanently abiding without movement—this is called the Way."

(Platform Sutra, ch 10, BDK Edition, p 80)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 19th, 2016 at 7:11 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

99.999%

It is still what complete sudden enlightenment means.

(Huangbo, in Zen Texts, BDK Edition, p 16)

(Moguja's Secrets on Cultivating the Mind, CWKB, vol 2, p 213)

Malcolm said:

Buddhas are not on a way. They have reached their destination.

Astus wrote:

It says "the Way", not "a way". It is a synonym for bodhi, for enlightenment.

"Studying the Way is to always contemplate the self-nature:

This is to be identical with all the buddhas."

(Platform Sutra, ch 7, p 53)

Malcolm said:

Once upon a time, first bhumi realization was common, now it has become very rare.

Astus wrote:

Even a thousand years ago the belief in the end times

(https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Three_Ages_of_Buddhism#Latter_Day_of_the_Law) was popular.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 20th, 2016 at 3:17 AM

Title: Re: One continuous mistake

Content:

DGA said:

Astus, for the purpose of this conversation--what is meant by "subitism"? thanks

Astus wrote:

It is a term specifically created to mean the "doctrine of sudden enlightenment". Has its own <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Subitism>.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 20th, 2016 at 3:32 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

DGA said:

I'd thought that the character translated as Way in that instance (道), which is the same as Tao from Taoism, really does mean path, and is sometimes used to render the term Dharma. I'd thought bodhi was rendered in another way. Perhaps I'm missing some context here?

Astus wrote:

Yes, it is dao 道 translated as Way here. It has a wide variety of meanings in Buddhist texts.

A Dictionary of Chinese Buddhist Terms, William Edward Soothill and Lewis Hodous (excerpt)

A way, road; the right path; principle, Truth, Reason, Logos, Cosmic energy; to lead; to say.

佛教漢梵大辭典 (Chinese-Sanskrit Large Dictionary of Buddhism)

mārga, path, gati, pratipad; bodhi; bhikṣu; nyāya; adhvan, avacara, āśrama, gatika, gati-saṃdhi, caraṇa, cari, carī, caryā, jāti, dharma, naya, patha, pada, parāyaṇa, pratipatti, prahāṇa, bodhi-mārga, bhūmi, mārga-caraṇa, mārgaṇa, mārgatas, mārgatva, mārga-satya, yāna, rathyā, vartman, vidhi.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 20th, 2016 at 3:42 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

What does "this" refer to?

Astus wrote:

The preceding line. This = studying the Way = always contemplating the self-nature.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 20th, 2016 at 6:45 PM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Direct interaction between minds contradicts karma.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 20th, 2016 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Direct interaction between minds contradicts karma.

Sherab Dorje said:

Why?

Astus wrote:

Mind is a stream of momentary phenomena. If two such streams cross, they become one stream. That's one part. The other part is that if one can connect to another mind directly, that means one person's thought becomes another's, so one's will becomes another's will, hence what one intends is what the other intends. And while it is possible that two people agree on something, and that can be called shared karma, if a mind can take control of another, that violates another's ability to make decisions.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 20th, 2016 at 11:23 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Wayfarer said:

So my remark was about the seemingly black-and-white nature of this approach: enlightenment being immediate and complete, with a 'miss being as good as a mile'.

Astus wrote:

One is either a buddha, completely free from ignorance, or not. I think that's a fairly mainstream position even in the gradual paths. Similarly, if one has attained any level of nobility, there is no way back from that, as it includes permanent eradication of some defilements. Consequently, one has either realised the nature of mind, the dharmakaya, or not. That does not mean one cannot have concepts about the nature of mind, and even correct views.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 21st, 2016 at 2:46 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

Realizing emptiness is not realizing "dharmakāya." The realization of the dharmakāya is attended by the twin omniscience concerning the nature of what exists and all that exists. Now, if you wish to redefine, or dumb down, dharmakāya to make it seem more attainable, I can't stop you. But it is an error to do so.

Astus wrote:

No need to dumb down anything. All three knowledges/wisdoms are included in seeing the nature of mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 21st, 2016 at 4:43 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

That's it then, just see the nature of the mind and you are omniscient? If this is case, would you then claim that first stage bodhisattvas have not seen the nature of the mind? Because they are certainly not omniscient.

Astus wrote:

As far as the fully sudden approach goes, only buddhas know it. Consider <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=329214#p329214>, where Huangbo makes it clear what one is enlightened to directly and how it compares to the gradual path.

Also, Dazhu says:

Q: What is Sudden Enlightenment?

A: "Sudden" means instantly stopping false thought. "Enlightenment" means [awareness] that one attains nothing.

and

"Sudden Enlightenment means liberation during this lifetime. Just as a lion-cub, from the moment it is born, is a real lion, likewise anyone who practices the Sudden-Enlightenment method has, from the moment he begins his practice, already entered the Buddha-Stage. Just as the bamboo-shoots growing in springtime are not different from the parent bamboo-shoots, because they are also empty inside, likewise anyone who practices the Sudden-Enlightenment method to rid himself suddenly of false thought abandons, like the Buddhas, the sense of an ego and a personality forever. Being absolutely deep, still and void, he is, then, without an iota of difference, equal to the Buddhas. Thus, in this sense it can be said that the worldly is holy. If one practices the Sudden-Enlightenment method, he can transcend the three realms during this lifetime."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 21st, 2016 at 6:44 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

Question: how is the awakening put forward in Chan different than realization of an Arhat?

Astus wrote:

See for yourself the differences described:

"Whoever knows that the mind is a fiction and devoid of anything real knows that his own mind neither exists nor doesn't exist. Mortals keep creating the mind, claiming it exists. And Arhats keep negating the mind, claiming it doesn't exist. But bodhisattvas and Buddhas neither create nor negate the mind. This is what's meant by the mind that neither exists nor doesn't exist. The mind that neither exists nor doesn't exist is called the Middle Way."

(Bodhidharma: Wake-up Sermon)

"If one allows a thought to arise while seeing, one falls into heresy. When one desires to exterminate birth and death, one falls into the Sravaka realm. One who sees neither birth nor death and is aware only of cessation falls into the Pratyekabuddha realm. However, one might ask: Originally the dharmas know no arising, so how can they be subject to cessation? The answer one might receive is: With this non-dualistic outlook - that is, having neither desire nor aversion - everything is Mind. This alone is the Buddha of Supreme Awakening!"

(Huangbo: Chung-Ling Record)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 21st, 2016 at 9:38 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

This is certainly a Mahāyāna doxographical claim. And further, what is the difference then between a bodhisattva and buddha? This distinction is the one that you really fail to tease out.

Astus wrote:

"To awaken to the incomplete truth of voidness of self and then practice is inferior-vehicle dhyana. To awaken to the true principle of the dual voidness of self and dharmas and then to practice is great vehicle dhyana. (All four of the above types show such distinctions as the four [dhyanas of the realm of] form and the four [concentrations of the] formless [realm].) If one's practice is based on having all-at-once awakened to the realization that one's own mind is from the outset pure, that the depravities have never existed, that the nature of the wisdom without outflows is from the outset complete, that this mind is buddha, that they are ultimately without difference, then it is dhyana of the highest vehicle. This type is also known by such names as tathagata-purity dhyana, the one-practice concentration, and the thusness concentration."

(Zongmi on Chan, p 103)

"There are many methods in practicing Buddhism. The Lesser Vehicle practices "eradicating afflictions." The Great Vehicle (Mahayana) "transforms afflictions." In the Ultimate Vehicle, "afflictions are bodhi." Each method is centered on the mind. In the end, they all enable sentient beings to attain unsurpassed complete enlightenment.

Those who practice the Lesser Vehicle take afflictions as real; therefore, they must exterminate them. They still have the concept of subject and object; therefore, there is still attachment to the dharmas. They only realize the emptiness of self and enter into partial nirvana.

Those who practice the Great Vehicle use the method of "transformation (of the mind)" because they understand that amid our afflictions there is our inherent Buddha nature. It is like forging steel from iron. The nature of steel is within the wrought iron. If we throw away the pieces of iron, we will not be able to refine the steel. Similarly, "there is no water besides the waves." Therefore, in Mahayana, bodhisattvas cultivate the myriad good practices of the six paramitas. By benefiting self and others, they transform afflictions, and return to their pure inherent nature. Just as when we practice charity for a long time, we will naturally diminish greed. By contemplation of compassion, anger will naturally subside. When we are diligent in the cultivation of actions, speech, and mind, we can overcome sloth. When the mind is scattered and confused, we must use samadhi to overcome delusive thoughts. This is known as "transformation." The last of the six paramitas is “prajna.” Prajna overcomes ignorance. Our mind is filled with ignorance and confusion; it easily forms attachments to the external environment. If we can reflect inward, without falling into dualism, without the concept of subject and object, and attain “triple emptiness,” we will attain prajna paramita. We can then face each encounter with clarity and mindfulness, thereby extinguish all our afflictions.

In the Ultimate Vehicle, we neither transform our afflictions nor extinguish them; our mind is originally pure and lucid. This mind is inherent in everyone; we do not need to seek it externally. This is the Chan School’s principle of “affliction is bodhi; birth and death (samsara) is nirvana.””

(http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enUS/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=219&Itemid=59)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 21st, 2016 at 10:52 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Are these the sayings of 'an ordinary fellow?' Are 'ordinary fellows' 'absolutely deep, still and void, and 'devoid of ego and personality forever'?"

Astus wrote:

This is just what no-thought (wunian 無念) is, as said in the previous section. What "ordinary fellow" signifies is that the six senses function as before, the difference is in whether there is attachment.

Wayfarer said:

Related point: what original term is being translated as 'mind' in these verses? It might have a much more profound meaning than what moderns understand by the term, which I suspect is much closer to what Zen would call 'discursive thought'.

Astus wrote:

It's possible to check, but it is a case by case investigation.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 21st, 2016 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

I am pretty certain I don't agree with the characterization of Mahāyāna ārya practice above.

Astus wrote:

That's what normally happens in every characterisations to those relegated to a lower position. One of the reasons for the disagreements between Tibetan and EA Buddhism is that they do not share the same view of the Mahayana teachings. Naturally, when the Tibetan view of the bodhisattva path is used, there is no basis for Zen's and Tiantai's teachings of enlightenment in one life.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 21st, 2016 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

Revise to "...when the Indian Mahāyāna view of the bodhisattva path is used, there is no basis for Zen's and Tiantai's teachings of enlightenment in one life," then we can agree.

Astus wrote:

I'm OK with that, if we modify it to "Late-Indian Mahayana", or something to a similar extent. After all, Chinese Buddhism has Indian origins as well, but then it's developed on a separate path, and that's why even Xuanzang's teachings have not been as widely accepted as Fazang's.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 21st, 2016 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

We have no evidence, apart from perhaps Bodhidharma, of any kind of sudden awakening school in India.

Astus wrote:

I did not mean anything like that. Just in general the source of sutras and treatises that are of Indian (and Central Asian) origin.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 22nd, 2016 at 4:57 AM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

But do they actually? A buddha can taste with his sight, smell with his fingers and hear with his tongue, etc.

Astus wrote:

Dongshan said the following poem:

"How amazing, how amazing!

Hard to comprehend that nonsentient beings expound the Dharma.

It simply cannot be heard with the ear,

But when sound is heard with the eye, then it is understood."

(Record of Tung-shan, p 26)

Zhiyan says about Indra's net and interpenetration:

"The explanation according to the greater vehicle says that the great and small can interpenetrate by virtue of transformation by psychic power, or it says that they interpenetrate through a bodhisattva's power, or that they interpenetrate because they are nondual. This is not the same as the explanation of the unitary vehicle."

(Entry into the Inconceivable, p 136)

You might consider those abilities of the Buddha as supernatural abilities, but in Chan that is not so.

"On the nose is an eye that discerns fragrance and stench.

The Dharma sound universally spreads to all senses.

All who hear clarify the genuine truth.

An enlightened person is widely awakened to the mind that breaks through emptiness."

(Dogen: Eihei Koroku, p 611)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 22nd, 2016 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

They are "supernatural" compared to your abilities and mine, which is actually the point.

Astus wrote:

What I meant is that such abilities are not about magic powers (or synesthesia), but that categories of experiences are the works of conceptual discrimination, and concepts are interrelated and interpenetrate each other.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 22nd, 2016 at 11:09 PM

Title: Re: Buddha is an Ordinary Fellow

Content:

Malcolm said:

But in actual fact, the sensory experience of buddhas is not confined to their six sense gates in the way ours are.

Astus wrote:

And this is where the interpretation and view of the teachings come in. For Chan the mind is buddha and there is no other buddha to be found. What you talk about, however, are what could be termed an external buddha. For Chan all the teachings talk about are to see into the nature of mind. What you refer to, however, is an interpretation where the teachings provide accounts of other beings.

"The difference between Zen and the teaching sects is like the difference between one who gets hit by an arrow and dies on the spot and one who sees the incident and stands on the side saying this and that about why the person died. The one who sees directly into his own nature is the Zen man; the one who talks about it is from the teaching sect."
(Bassui: Mud and Water, p 7)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 25th, 2016 at 3:32 AM

Title: Re: Compassion practice in Zen

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

I feel the compassion aspect has been sorely lacking from my practice, making me become aloof and detached from others.

Astus wrote:

That can happen when emptiness is mistaken for apathy, disinterest, and such. It is a known "sickness" in Zen.

There was an old woman who supported a hermit. For twenty years she always had a girl, sixteen or seventeen years old, take the hermit his food and wait on him. One day she told the girl to give the monk a close hug and ask, "What do you feel just now?"
The hermit responded,

An old tree on a cold cliff;
Midwinter – no warmth.

The girl went back and told this to the old woman. The woman said, "For twenty years I've supported this vulgar good-for-nothing!" So saying, she threw the monk out and burned down the hermitage.
(Entangling Vines, case 162, tr Kirchner)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 25th, 2016 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: Compassion practice in Zen

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

Astus, what is advice given to people who have this emptiness sickness?

Astus wrote:

There are all sorts of ways to approach it, and those one can find in the scriptures, teachings, and hear advice from wise friends.

For a generic answer, I have three.

1. Emptiness is empty. Grasping at whatever state, whatever feeling, is still attachment. One has to let go of everything. Or as for instance Baizhang put it in three stages: Do not grasp anything. Do not grasp not grasping. Let go of even that. Daehaeng says practically the same, instructing to die again and again. The same can be seen in Jizang's formulation of the four levels of two truths. The point is, when everything is truly released, boundless wisdom and compassion can function unhindered.

2. Focus on interdependence. After cessation comes clear observation, as described in the Awakening of Faith in Mahayana. It is seeing clearly how karma works, how suffering emerges, how beings are bound by their ignorance. It is letting go of the hundred-foot pole (aloofness) to "appear with his whole body in the ten parts of the world". Or as the Genjokoan says "To forget ourselves is to be experienced by millions of things and phenomena." This is where one can learn not to fear appearances, because they are all illusory. These are the 9th and 10th pictures of the ten bulls. This is contemplating the function of the mind instead of its essence, because eventually it turns out to be not two different things.

3. Trust in buddha-nature. There can be this fear that if everything is let go, it will be just a big nothingness, total obliteration. Because of that fear, we want to keep control to ourselves, want to be able to influence things. That is basically our core belief in a self, and the source of all problems. The first option mentioned is when we see there is nobody in control. The second option is to see that all things change according to causes and conditions, so there is nothing to control. This third option is to let our inherent buddha-nature manage everything. This can be mistaken in two extreme ways: either as inactivity, or as following impulses mindlessly. Instead of those two, one should face every situation openly, so that buddha-activity can manifest. How to be open? When something comes, let it come. When something goes, let it go. When something is present, let it be. Letting go is not worrying about the past and the future. Letting be is embracing without hesitation. This is possible because one has faith that all is taken care of by the buddha-nature.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 26th, 2016 at 8:53 AM

Title: Re: Sanbo Kyodan question

Content:

DGA said:

he prefers working with traditions that have proven histories, rather than trying a "make it up as you go along" practice and hoping for the best

Astus wrote:

If it's about Zen, the so called transmission is only about the enlightened mind. Passing on methods is a different matter, and something that theoretically Zen is not supposed to be bound by. Although we can say that transmission matters only when one wants to, other times it's disregarded.

DGA said:

I'm not convinced that SK is merely a make-it-up-as-you-go-along organization. I say this because it has endured for long enough to suggest that if it were a bit of trivial fluff, it would have floated away in the breeze by now.

Astus wrote:

That argument doesn't hold. Just because something is old and/or popular is no proof of quality. There are numerous nonsense beliefs in the world that are both popular and old.

DGA said:

is there a distinctive logic by which the curriculum or pedagogy or typical development of the student (choose your wording) is laid out in SK? Does it "hang together" as a singular, integral path, or does it feel chockablock?

Astus wrote:

They follow the "Harada-Yasutani koan-curriculum, which is derived from Hakuin's student Takuju. It is a shortened koan-curriculum, in which the so-called "capping phrases" are removed. The curriculum takes considerably less time to study than the Takuju-curriculum of Rinzai" (https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/K%C5%8Dan#cite_note-FOOTNOTEFord200642.E2.80.9343-103).

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 27th, 2016 at 5:30 PM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Now the mechanism for this procedure, how it works exactly, is not really touched upon in the Abhidharma (and seems to contradict some of the theory therein) and yet...

Astus wrote:

This itself I find problematic. There is no sensible explanation in (or outside) Buddhism for telepathy.

Sherab Dorje said:

Personally I have experienced a phenomenon that can be described as telepathy.

Astus wrote:

I assume most of us have. However, a number of deja-vus don't mean there's a glitch in the Matrix.

Sherab Dorje said:

I believe that this idea that we are somehow completely and utterly separate physically and mentally from our surroundings has been proven false by yogi and scientists alike. So this idea that thoughts exist solely within the confines of your mind (head or brain) is a little misleading. It seems that reality is a little more fluid than that.

Astus wrote:

If it's allowed for minds to mingle, to lose integrity, then it also allows for one mind to manipulate another. However, our experiences are our own, just like our actions. So, we can share thoughts and even organs, but not deeds and perceptions.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 27th, 2016 at 6:01 PM

Title: Re: Sanbo Kyodan question

Content:

DGA said:

I'm interested in learning a bit more about the curriculum

Astus wrote:

From <http://www.desertlotuszen.org/koan-curriculum.html>:

Our curriculum is as follows:

1. Initial koan to open the body of reality.

We use a range of koans for this purpose, according to need and affinity. Examples are Zhaozhou's No, Yunmen's Medicine, What is your original face before your parents were born?, Linji's The true person with no rank, Zhaozhou when times of great difficulty visit us, how shall we meet them? Zhaozhou said "Welcome."

When this koan starts to open up there is an extensive process of exploration using checking questions to make the view clear and to teach the language of koans. The What is the sound of one hand? koan is included in this process. The final koan in the checking process is What is the source?

2. Miscellaneous Koans. By tradition the first koan in the miscellaneous collection is Stop the sound of that distant temple bell. These koans include a lot of explorations of emptiness.

3. The Gateless Barrier (Wumenguan)

4. The Blue Cliff Record (Piyen lu)

5. The Book of Serenity

6. The Five Ranks of Dongshan

7. The Sixteen Bodhisattva vows

8. Entangling Vines

Following the completion of this course senior people usually work on other books.

The Record of Linji

The Kido Koans

The Record of Zhaozhou

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 28th, 2016 at 7:29 AM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

How do you explain what happened to you?

Astus wrote:

My approach: Don't question the experience. Question the explanation. That's because of the same reason as what happens on a magic show. It looks real, but you know it's false. If you just believe your eyes, you accept that it's paranormal.

There are various plausible ways to approach telepathy and other abilities like that. The most reliable would be to test if it's even something one can actually do, to rule out coincidence and memory distortion. But I think that's never really happened. So I'd not go that way, and rather say that abilities are something else than what generally people think about them.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 28th, 2016 at 7:35 AM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Anders said:

"Our own"? That doesn't sound very dependently originated. Nothing in Samsara is wholly private.

Astus wrote:

Causal consistency. From an apple seed an apple tree grows, not a pear tree.

Dependent origination includes that every being experiences the fruits of their own actions, not another's. How is it not wholly private?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 28th, 2016 at 7:43 AM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

pothigai said:

My understanding would be that thoughts have in part have a physical basis and are thus not entirely private. The subjective experience of the thoughts is private, but the physical basis for them arising is not, so theoretically it could be accessed by other sentient beings.

Astus wrote:

What physical basis do you mean? Seeing the same vase?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 28th, 2016 at 8:14 PM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

pothigai said:

No, brain states.

Astus wrote:

I'm unaware of such a connection between brain and thoughts in Buddhism. Maybe there are such ideas in Vajrayana, but not anywhere else. Although the Visuddhimagga talks about observing another's blood colour (12.9, p 402-403), on the one hand there is no actual change in colour of the blood, on the other it is a preliminary practice to simply knowing the mind of others' (i.e. arupaloka beings don't have hearts). So actually even there is no explanation of how it can happen.

Beyond that, as it is taught in Prajnaparamita teachings (and Zen), the way the mind of other beings are known is through realising emptiness.

"Moreover, Subhuti, thanks to this perfection of wisdom the Tathagata wisely knows immeasurable and incalculable beings as they really are. And that through the absence of own-being in beings."

(PP8000 12.3)

It is said in the T'an-mo-ho-yen p'in (Mahāyānastutiparivarta): "If the minds and mental events of all beings existed essentially and in reality (tattvatas) and were not false, the Buddha could not know the minds and mental events of all beings. But because the minds and mental events of all beings are essentially and really false, without coming (āgati) or going (gati), the Buddha knows the minds and mental events of all beings." To take an example: if the bhikṣu is greedy (adhyavasita), he does not receive offerings (pūjā), but if he has no ulterior motive, he lacks for nothing. It is the same for the mind (citta). If it imagines (vikalpayati) and grasps at characteristics (nimittāny udgrhṇāti), it does not find the truth and, not finding the truth, it cannot penetrate or know the minds and mental events of all beings. On the other hand, if it does not grasp at characteristics and does not imagine anything, it finds the truth and, finding the truth, it penetrates and knows the minds and mental events of all beings without encountering any obstacles. (MPPS, vol 4, p 1503-1504)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 29th, 2016 at 6:04 AM

Title: Re: What's lineage, what is it for, & how does it work?

Content:

DGA said:

whatever his qualifications may be, they correspond to those of something other than Tendai.

Astus wrote:

That's an example of what the idea of lineage is for. To claim authenticity for those who belong to it, and exclude everyone else. As far as I know, Tendai had more than one group in China, and Saicho was not appointed as anything, but he spent less than a year there over all, mostly gathering texts. Should we then debate his qualifications?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 29th, 2016 at 4:35 PM

Title: Re: What's lineage, what is it for, & how does it work?

Content:

DGA said:

And besides, this thread is still in the fact-finding stage.

Astus wrote:

The reason I mentioned Saicho was to point out that it's not the fact of lineage that is the most important, but the teachings provided. So, perhaps the facts that should be established are whether what they teach there matches those of Saicho or not.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 29th, 2016 at 6:50 PM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Anders said:

You can genetically modify an apple to be something other than an apple.

Astus wrote:

Can buddhas then modify beings to be enlightened?

Anders said:

Beings are exposed to the fruits of other people's actions all the time. And profoundly influenced by them.

Astus wrote:

If experiences are not the products of previous actions, then karma does not exist. On the other hand, it is taught that both good and bad actions done by others to oneself are results of one's previous deeds.

Anders said:

Basically, you want minds to be souls. Something only you possess and whose autonomy is sheltered from other souls.

Astus wrote:

If one is not subject to one's own delusion only, then liberation is not possible.

Anders said:

This is not an a priori protected privilege in samsara.

Astus wrote:

It is a question of what karma means.

Anders said:

I get that you have trouble reconciling these concepts. But you aren't really representing any strand of Buddhism with your presentation here.

Astus wrote:

I try to follow the generally accepted teachings on karma, and consider that more significant than teachings on telepathy and such. But if you have another idea, please tell.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 29th, 2016 at 8:29 PM

Title: Re: What's lineage, what is it for, & how does it work?

Content:

DGA said:

The best basis of comparison would be to the conventions that are established in Tendai-shu at the present, since that's where we are and what we have available.

Astus wrote:

Then that should be used to clarify if a group fits the category of Tendai, don't you think?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 30th, 2016 at 5:32 AM

Title: Re: A Tale of Two (Not Two) Nagarjunas

Content:

Astus wrote:

As I understand it, the essence of Dogen's message is zazen, and the essence of zazen is hishiryo, also called shinjindatsuraku. What is non-thinking, dropping off body and mind? The experience that whatever appears there is nothing to grasp. And what is the essence of Nagarjuna's teaching? It is that all phenomena are without substance, hence there is nothing to grasp. So, in terms of goal, they likely agree. In terms of method, however, there is the difference between the gradual stages of the bodhisattva taught by Nagarjuna, and the direct realisation taught by Dogen.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 30th, 2016 at 7:38 PM

Title: Re: A Tale of Two (Not Two) Nagarjunas

Content:

krodha said:

The bodhisattva path begins with the direct realization championed by Dogen.

Astus wrote:

Where is that assertion from? Dogen is fairly clear that zazen is complete enlightenment.

"The zazen I speak of is not meditation practice. It is simply the dharma gate of joyful ease, the practice-realization of totally culminated enlightenment."

(https://web.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/gongyo_seiten/translations/part_3/fukan_zazengi.html)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 30th, 2016 at 7:49 PM

Title: Re: A Tale of Two (Not Two) Nagarjunas

Content:

Matt J said:

I don't think its a matter of resonance but a matter of capacity. Personally, I think Zen is actually high capacity stuff--- but high teachings require students with high capacity to receive it.

Astus wrote:

"A person who seems superficially dull but has a sincere aspiration will attain enlightenment more quickly than one who is clever in a worldly sense. Although he could not recite even a single verse, Cudapanthaka, one of the disciples of the Buddha, gained enlightenment during one summer practice period because he had earnest aspiration."

(http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/common_html/zuimonki/02-20.html)

"There is a saying in the secular world, "I sell gold, but no one will buy it." The Way of the buddhas and patriarchs is also like this. It is not that they begrudge the Way; even though it is always being offered, no one will accept it. To attain the Way does not depend on whether you are inherently sharp or dull witted. Each one of us can be aware of the dharma. Slowness or quickness in attaining the Way depends on whether you are diligent or indolent. The difference between being diligent or indolent is caused by whether your aspiration is resolute or not. Lack of firm aspiration is caused by being unaware of impermanence. Ultimately speaking, we die moment by moment, not residing for even a little while. While you are alive, do not spend your time in vain."

(http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/common_html/zuimonki/06-09.html)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 31st, 2016 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: A Tale of Two (Not Two) Nagarjunas

Content:

jundo cohen said:

I feel your two posts reveal another one of the "paradox-non-paradoxes" of Soto Zen ... attaining by non-attaining, goalless goaling and such ... "joyful ease" and "diligence" ...

Astus wrote:

I don't see any paradox here. (Although you conclude the same eventually)

"there is not the slightest interval between establishment of the mind, training, bodhi, and nirvana"

(Gyoji, in SBGZ, vol 2, BDK Edition, p 163)

jundo cohen said:

in a moment of Shikantaza, one can experience simply and clearly what Nagarjuna and Dogen were pointing to through all their words.

Astus wrote:

That should be the case, yes.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 31st, 2016 at 8:40 PM

Title: Re: A Tale of Two (Not Two) Nagarjunas

Content:

jundo cohen said:

It is the seeming paradox of "original enlightenment", namely, if we are already "Buddha" why don't we know it and act like it? If there is "nothing to seek and do", does that mean that we don't have to seek it?

Astus wrote:

Everything is already empty, never has been otherwise. Ignorance itself is empty, an illusion, and not knowing that is how ignorance functions. This story of Dogen searching for an answer, wasn't that Keizan's invention, something nowhere mentioned in Dogen's works? It is a sort of basic question anyway, like asking if there is no self why do we think there is.

jundo cohen said:

We begin at the bottom of the mountain, lost in ignorance. ... However, along the way, we realize that the entire mountain has been Buddha all along, top to bottom, although the fellow at the bottom and start of the climb did not recognize so until the fog of ignorance began to clear.

Astus wrote:

That is very much what the bodhisattva path is, moving from stage to stage, accumulating merit, deepening wisdom, and at the same time it's prajnaparamita all along. Zen is shedding body-mind completely, not just one piece at a time.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 31st, 2016 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: A Tale of Two (Not Two) Nagarjunas

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Question: how do you know you're not kidding yourself?

Astus wrote:

One is always kidding oneself. "I am correct." - that's a thought. "I am wrong." - that's another thought. Creating an identity of either is the basic error.

Wayfarer said:

there's a process of assessment

Astus wrote:

There is no measuring stick. It's up to whatever the local teacher considers acceptable.

Wayfarer said:

What if you have not really grasped the point of the teaching but you think that you have?

Astus wrote:

Ultimately, all views are wrong. What amounts to correct view in Buddhism is what helps in abandoning unwholesome qualities, developing wholesome qualities, and letting go of attachments.

Wayfarer said:

If you're a solo practitioner, is there anything to tell you that your understanding is erroneous?

Astus wrote:

There are a lot of things, starting with the sutras and shastras. Correct view develops from learning. Besides that, zazen is not simply a practice, but also verification. That is, if one pays attention to one's experiences, it becomes crystal clear that there is no physical or mental phenomena that is permanent. That's Zen's direct approach. Otherwise, one can follow the instructions for insight meditation.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 1st, 2016 at 5:11 AM

Title: Re: A Tale of Two (Not Two) Nagarjunas

Content:

krodha said:

Awakening to instant buddhahood is essentially unheard of

Astus wrote:

from http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/key_terms/pdf/key_terms04.pdf:

the Sotoshu doctrine is to realize (joto) shikantaza (just sitting) and sokushin zebutsu (the mind itself is Buddha).

In "Gakudo Yojinshu" ("Points to Watch in Practicing the Way"), joto is explained by Dogen Zenji as follows:

Joto (realizing) is to directly realize Buddhahood with this body-mind. In other words, it is not to change the former state of body-mind into some other special state but just to follow the realization of the other (one's teacher). It is called jikige (right here) or joto.

The fundamental Sotoshu teaching is that of realizing Buddhahood through shikantaza and sokushin zebutsu in each moment. Therefore sokushin zebutsu, as well as shikantaza, is a very important term and a basic teaching for Soto Zen Buddhists.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 1st, 2016 at 6:45 AM

Title: Re: A Tale of Two (Not Two) Nagarjunas

Content:

krodha said:

In my opinion, that passage isn't saying that one awakens to fully omniscient buddhahood in one fell swoop. Just that the reality of what buddhahood entails is directly encountered through awakening [bodhi].

Astus wrote:

Do you know of teachings in Zen, and in its Soto branch, where they establish the distinction you talk about?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 3rd, 2016 at 5:17 PM

Title: Re: Is Consciousness Produced by the Brain?

Content:

Astus wrote:

An immaterial consciousness cannot really be included in scientific investigation.

"If it can't be measured, that means, by definition, it can't affect anything."

(<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=nQHBAAdShgYI>, 1:00-1:05)

Even Aryadeva rules out the assumption.

"Intangible things do not Produce so-called motility.

Thus the life force is not Agent of the body's movements."

(Four Hundred Stanzas on the Middle Way, 10.230, p 217)

And the root of the problem is really the belief in a self.

"Is the body the same as the soul? ... Is the body one thing, and the soul another? ... that too has not been declared by the Blessed One"

"But the Tathagata, worthy and rightly self-awakened, does not assume of the eye that 'This is mine, this is my self, this is what I am.' ..."

"But the Tathagata, worthy and rightly self-awakened, does not assume form to be the self, or the self as possessing form, or form as in the self, or the self as in form. ..."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn44/sn44.007.than.html>,
<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn44/sn44.008.than.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 3rd, 2016 at 6:58 PM

Title: Re: Is Consciousness Produced by the Brain?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are nama and rupa. Rupa is the category of the five physical appearances, nama is for all the mental phenomena. Both are things we know of, so they are experienced as they occur. Problems of duality, the relationship between mind and matter, come up only when we consider them separate substances. The solution lies in understanding them to be simply experiences that are only nominally divided up.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 5th, 2016 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: The Perfectly Imperfect Beyond Perfection/Imperfection (Zen) Buddha

Content:

jundo cohen said:

I see much focus on "Wisdom" but not "knowledge" as such. Perhaps Astus can set me straight, as I may be missing the point.

Astus wrote:

I don't think there is any sensible difference made in Zen between prajna and jnana. Prajna is seeing nature, and jnana is seeing nature. Also, the word for jnana is 智, that is usually translated as wisdom, as in the following passage from Dogen (talking about Huineng first hearing the Diamond Sutra):

"This is just the truth of "Those who have wisdom, if they hear [the Dharma],/Are able to believe and understand at once." This "wisdom" is neither learned from other people nor established by oneself: wisdom is able to transmit wisdom, and wisdom directly searches out wisdom. In the case of the five hundred bats, wisdom naturally consumes their bodies: they have no body and no mind [of their own] at all. In the case of the ten thousand swimming fishes, due neither to circumstances nor to causes, but because wisdom is intimately present in their bodies, when they hear the Dharma they "understand at once." It is beyond coming and beyond entering: it is like the spirit of spring meeting springtime, for example. Wisdom is beyond intention and wisdom is beyond no intention. Wisdom is beyond consciousness and wisdom is beyond unconsciousness. How much less could it be related to the great and the small? How much less could it be discussed in terms of delusion and realization? The point is that although [the Sixth Patriarch] does not even know what the Buddha-Dharma is, never having heard it before and so neither longing for it nor aspiring to it, when he hears the Dharma he makes light of his debt of gratitude and forgets his own body; and such things happen because the body-and-mind of “those who have wisdom” is already not their own. This is the state called “able to believe and understand at once.””

(Inmo, SBGZ, vol 2, BDK Edition, p 156)

Huineng in the Platform Sutra talks about wisdom (prajna 智 & 智慧) in chapter two, however, he talks about the four wisdoms (catvari jnanani 四智) in chapter seven, where we read (BDK Edition, p 60-61):

Zhitong said further, “How might I hear the meaning of the four wisdoms?”
The master said, “If you understand the three bodies, then you will understand the four wisdoms. How could you ask any further? If I were to speak of the four wisdoms apart from the three bodies, this would be called ‘having the bodies but being without wisdom.’ This would be to have wisdom but make it into non-wisdom.” He preached another verse, saying:

The great round mirror wisdom is pure in nature.
The wisdom of the universally same nature is without illness in mind.
The seeing of the wondrous contemplation wisdom is not [the result of] merit.
The wisdom that creates that which is accomplished is identical to the round mirror [wisdom].
The five and the eighth, sixth, and seventh [consciousnesses] transform [through] results and causes.

These are just names that are used, with no true nature.
If one’s sentiments linger not in the places of their transformations,
In profusion does one generate in the locus of permanence — the samādhi of the dragon.

Zhitong [achieved] sudden enlightenment to the nature and the wisdoms. He then offered this verse:

The three bodies are originally the essence of oneself.
The four wisdoms are fundamentally the understanding of the mind.
The bodies and wisdoms interpenetrate without hindrance,
Responding to things in accordance with forms.

All [deliberate] activation of cultivation is false activity.
To guard one’s abiding is not true serenity.
The wondrous purport has been illuminated by the master.
I will forever forget [all] defiled names.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 6th, 2016 at 6:37 AM

Title: Re: Bliss in Zen (sukha)

Content:

Astus wrote:

坐禅は...安楽の法門なり - "The zazen ... is simply the dharma gate of joyful ease"
(https://web.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/gongyo_seiten/translations/part_3/fukan_zazengi.html)

The expression for "joyful ease" is anraku 安楽 (Ch. 安樂), where raku 楽 is sukha (i.e. 大樂 - mahasukha, 極樂世界 - Sukhavati). Also, anrakukoku 安樂国 is another name for Sukhavati. So Dogen might wanted to counter Pure Land teachings.

In ch 7 of the Platform Sutra bliss is mentioned in relation to nirvana, the ultimate reality.

"Even though the eon-[ending] fire burns to the floor of the ocean
And the winds pound upon the mountains like drums,
The true bliss of permanent quiescence—
The characteristic of nirvana—is suchlike."

There is a poem "

<https://beingwithoutself.files.wordpress.com/2011/07/enjoyingtheway.pdf> " (Ledaoge 樂道歌), but it doesn't speak about bliss (le 樂, i.e. enjoying) in particular.

Otherwise, it seems that bliss/sukha doesn't play any particular role, beyond it being one of the four characteristics of buddha-nature in the Nirvana Sutra. At the same time, it is one of the " http://www.sgilibrary.org/search_dict.php?id=535 " (pleasure), so it is to be avoided.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 6th, 2016 at 5:38 PM

Title: Re: Bliss in Zen (sukha)

Content:

Wayfarer said:

You mean, "otherwise" from it being infinite and eternal?

Astus wrote:

Otherwise, that is, apart from what's been listed above. As for being "infinite and eternal", it is only figurative speech, like calling it the "bliss of nirvana". Sounds good, but it is meant to express a contrast between the drawbacks of samsara and the advantages of liberation, therefore it is not a pleasurable experience at all, since all such experiences are samsaric.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 6th, 2016 at 7:06 PM

Title: Re: Bliss in Zen (sukha)

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Experience is indeed samsaric, but realisation is of a different order. That is why 'what is good' is the opposite to 'what is bad' in the ordinary sense, but that the bliss of liberation is not simply some relative good. It is a 'good with no opposite', so it's of a different order to merely a good experience.

Astus wrote:

Zen and Mahamudra agree that what needs to be realised is buddha-nature, however, their methods and terminology somewhat differ. The realisation of buddha-nature in Zen means that one realises that there is nothing to realise. As for Mahamudra, from the same book:

"When the emptiness of physical and mental phenomena is directly experienced as a subjective reality and the mind is stable and able to maintain awareness, the luminous clarity of the mind gives rise to a sense of well-being that transcends both happiness and unhappiness. This is the experience of all-pervasive bliss, the goal of Mahamudra practice. When we no longer fixate on our thoughts and emotions but let them arise without interference and without hope and fear, our minds will become blissfully clear."

(Mind at East, p 20-21)

We might suppose that with the realisation of emptiness, regardless if it's through Zen or Mahamudra, one attains the mentioned bliss. And that bliss, as noted earlier, is one of the four characteristics of buddha-nature. Since both systems agree that this bliss is not a feeling or emotion, the word "bliss" stands for the complete lack of "suffering" (duhkha), and that is the very meaning of nirvana.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 6th, 2016 at 7:44 PM

Title: Re: Bliss in Zen (sukha)

Content:

jundo cohen said:

"peaceful ease/comfort" for anraku 安樂. ... "安樂" had the meaning in Dogen's time or earlier in China of "peaceful/joyful ease/comfort" rather than "bliss" as "ecstasy, delight, rapture"?

Astus wrote:

The word is the combination of "peace" and "happiness", where 樂 also means "harmony" and "music". Besides anraku's meaning as a name for Sukhavati, there is another explanation: "peaceful body, happy mind" (身安心樂) and "not threatened body is peaceful, not anxious mind is happy" (身無危險故安, 心無憂惱故樂). So, I would say it's virtually nothing to do with ecstasy and rapture.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 6th, 2016 at 11:44 PM

Title: Re: Heart-to-heart Transmission

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is a basic Zen idea. It is even an idiom in Japanese. <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ishin-denshin>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 7th, 2016 at 6:35 AM

Title: Re: Bliss in Zen (sukha)

Content:

Wayfarer said:

realising it relies on a complete transformation of perception and if we say 'well there's nothing to realise' then why not simply stay as we are?

Astus wrote:

To stay as we are would mean being lost in the concepts of gain and loss. Seeing that all is empty means that there is nothing that can be grasped. When there is nothing to be grasped, there is no attachment, and without attachment there is no suffering. But nothing to grasp doesn't mean total blankness, it means that all experiences constantly change, hence nothing to rely on. That is the non-abiding mind, but not simply mindlessness.

Wayfarer said:

Realisation pertains to the nature of reality, or to the 'nature of all experience' if you like. As I understand it, that is why realisation is for keeps, it doesn't come and go

Astus wrote:

The realisation is the realisation of all being in a flux. It is giving up the mistaken idea of permanence, and once that misconception is completely removed, there is no view attached to, and that lack of grasping doesn't come and go.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 7th, 2016 at 5:49 PM

Title: Re: Bliss in Zen (sukha)

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Isn't the real difference here between being aware of no view, no grasping and simply dully having no view? One is clarity, the other is basically nihilism disguised as meditation of no view. The first one is exactly my perception of the "bliss" we are talking about.

Astus wrote:

Taking no view as the view is still an error. The options of falling into disinterest or unconsciousness are both the results of making no view a view. When there is just no view, it means the insight that all views are conditioned and insubstantial. At the same time, we always operate with some kind of view (thinking, clarity), the difference is in taking it as self or not.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 7th, 2016 at 6:00 PM

Title: Re: Bliss in Zen (sukha)

Content:

Wayfarer said:

That is why it's called paravritti, is it not?

Astus wrote:

That is a very Yogacara term referring to the transformation of the repository consciousness, so it is not per se about change of perception. Although probably we can take it to simply mean leaving behind habitual perception and acting, and accomplishing the mirror-like wisdom, however, in Yogacara at least, that applies only to the event of becoming a buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 7th, 2016 at 7:53 PM

Title: Re: Bliss in Zen (sukha)

Content:

Wayfarer said:

That is exactly what I meant by it, and what I think it means.

Astus wrote:

Thanks for the clarification.

Wayfarer said:

Because it is related to the point that bliss is not a transient emotion that comes and goes. It is intrinsic to the nature of realisation itself as in the very quote that you posted on page 1: The true bliss of permanent quiescence—
The characteristic of nirvana—is suchlike.

Astus wrote:

So it is. At the same time, the unity of bliss-emptiness has made a more outstanding career in Vajrayana.

"Non-Self is Samsara, the Self is the Tathagata; impermanence is the sravakas and pratyekabuddhas, the Eternal is the Tathagata's Dharmakaya; suffering is all tirthikas, Bliss is Nirvana; the impure is all compounded [samskṛta] dharmas, the Pure is the true Dharma that the Buddha and Bodhisattvas have. This is called non-perversion/ non-inversion."

(Nirvana Sutra, ch 3, tr Yamamoto, p 29)

Kasyapa said further: "You, the Buddha, say that utmost peace is Nirvana. How can this be? Now, Nirvana means relinquishing the body and intellect. If one relinquishes the body and intellect, who is it that can become blessed with peace?" The Buddha said: "O good man! As an example: there is a man here. He eats some food. After partaking of it, he feels sick, desires to go out and vomit. After vomiting, he comes back. A person who was with him asks: "Have you got rid of the trouble you had? You have come back here again. " Such may be the case. The same applies to the Tathagata. He fully segregates himself from the 25 existences and eternally gains Nirvana, which is peace and bliss. There can [then] be no more of the topsyturvy inversions, no ending and no extinction. All feeling is done away with. This is the bliss of non-feeling. This non-feeling is eternal Bliss. We can never say that the Tathagata feels Bliss. So, utmost Bliss is none but Nirvana. Nirvana is true emancipation. True emancipation is the Tathagata." (Nirvana Sutra, ch 7, tr Yamamoto, p 73; T12n375, vol5, p636b5-15)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 8th, 2016 at 8:57 PM

Title: Re: Is Kensho mentioned in sutra?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Besides those who equate seeing nature with buddhahood, there were the teachers Zongmi, Yongming, and Jinul, who put Chan and Huayan together, and equated the initial insight with the early stages of the 52 levels of the bodhisattva path. Here is a summary of Jinul's thoughts from Robert E. Buswell: The Collected Works of Chinul, p 64-66:

As Chinul observes time and again throughout his writings, the success of any practice depends on a sudden awakening at the beginning of one's efforts to the fact of one's fundamental Buddhahood. Without the confidence that such experience brings, the long ages of struggle the bodhisattva contemplates would be unbearable for even the most enthusiastic of adepts. To induce this awakening is the purpose of "faith and understanding according to the complete and sudden teachings"-the practice, based on Hwaom theory, intended for the majority of students. The discussion which follows recapitulates the explication of Li T'ung-hsuan's thought given in Chinul's Complete and Sudden Attainment of Buddhahood.

The unmoving wisdom of Buddhahood, otherwise known as the wisdom of universal brightness, is the source of all dualistic phenomena including Buddhas and sentient beings. Through faith and understanding that this unmoving wisdom is identical to the discriminative thoughts of sentient beings, the individual realizes that even in his present deluded state he is, and indeed has always been, a perfect Buddha. By understanding this fact at the very beginning of the spiritual quest-at the first of the ten levels of faith the student becomes fully endowed with the wisdom and compassion of Buddhahood in potential form. This accomplishment was usually assumed to occur only at the arousing of the bodhicitta stage of the ten abiding and only after the adept had supposedly passed through all ten levels of faith for ten thousand kalpas. But through the knowledge of this fundamental wisdom nonretrogressive faith is established, assuring the student's continued progress on the bodhisattva path and perfecting the other constituents of the ten stages of faith. Accordingly, the student is able to enter the initial abiding stage directly. At that stage there is immediate experience of the fact that he is a Buddha, and the former tacit faith and understanding are confirmed. With the tremendous potential of the "great effortless functioning" inherent in Buddhahood, the subsequent stages of the bodhisattva path are instantly completed. Consequently, the wisdom of universal brightness is not simply the origin of sentient beings and Buddhas: every accomplishment along the bodhisattva path reveals the operation of that fundamental wisdom. Thus faith and understanding are enough to consummate the immediate and full attainment of Buddhahood even when the adept has progressed no further than the normal level of the ordinary sentient being. This is the essence of the complete and sudden approach.

Although Buddhas and sentient beings are originally only the phantomlike manifestations of the fundamental wisdom of universal brightness, the defilements of passion and discriminative thought have narrowed that wisdom and obscured its brightness. Even though the bodhisattva who realizes this fundamental wisdom is completely endowed with the compassion and wisdom of Buddhahood, his ability to display that wisdom through expedient means of expression and spiritual powers is still inchoate. Consequently, he must continue to cultivate the wide-ranging practices and vows which are developed on the remaining stages of the bodhisattva path. Any defiling actions which might arise from the inertial force of habit must also be corrected; his awakening has given him the ability to see through these habits, however, so he is free to employ appropriate methods during his progression along the path until they subside. Once his practice has been perfected, he will have arrived in fact, as well as potential, at the stage of Buddhahood. Nevertheless, throughout all his subsequent development, the bodhisattva has in fact never strayed from the fundamental unmoving wisdom which was realized upon the initial awakening at the first of the ten stages of faith. This fundamental wisdom of universal brightness is thus the cause for the attainment of Buddhahood as well as its fruition-hence its importance in Chinul's system of practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 8th, 2016 at 11:09 PM

Title: Re: What if I am the only one...

Content:

Astus wrote:

Can't remember the source now, but there was a teaching I have encountered that said one should actually think that one is the last unenlightened being, and everyone else are bodhisattvas helping to achieve awakening.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 11th, 2016 at 5:38 PM

Title: Re: Essence of Chan

Content:

AlexMcLeod said:

enter the Chan state of mind

Astus wrote:

Chan mind is no mind. Whatever state it is, it is conditioned and impermanent. Therefore, the instruction has always been not to abide in any state.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 11th, 2016 at 7:07 PM

Title: Re: Bliss in Zen (sukha)

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

once it has become a "style" to adhere to, or a set of things to not do, it has lost it's original purpose entirely.

Astus wrote:

It's easy to repeat words and forget the meaning. Has always been like that. See this one from Fayen Wenyi (885-958):

"But when it came to continuation, their descendants maintained sects and factionalized their ancestries. Not basing themselves on reality, eventually they produced many sidetracks, contradicting and clashing with one another, so that the profound and the shallow became indistinguishable.

Unfortunately, they still do not realize that the Great Way takes no sides; streams of truth are all of the same flavor. These sectarians spread embellishments in empty space and stick needles in iron and stone, taking disputation for superknowledge and lip-flapping for meditation. Sword-points of approval and disapproval arise, and mountains of egotism toward others stand tall. In their anger they become monsters, their views and interpretations ultimately turning them into outsiders. Unless they meet good friends, they will hardly be able to get out of the harbor of delusion. They bring on bad results, even from good causes."

(<http://terebess.hu/zen/fayan.html#a2>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 11th, 2016 at 7:26 PM

Title: Re: Approach in the West: Scientific vs Spiritual?

Content:

Astus wrote:

None of the above.

I believe in the direct way to point to the heart of the matter. Anyone can confirm for oneself that no matter what experience occurs, it's unreliable. Because it's unreliable, there is nothing worth grasping. Cultivating that is what regulating, relaxing, and realising are about.

All of the above.

Skilful means is the application of wisdom in all sorts of situations. One better follows wisdom than recipes.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 11th, 2016 at 7:34 PM

Title: Re: Bliss in Zen (sukha)

Content:

jundo cohen said:

... the specialty of Zen, which is the separate transmission outside of doctrine.

Astus wrote:

It's buddha to buddha, mind to mind. Not a transmission of words and methods. The skilful means of a bodhisattva comes from wisdom. Wisdom comes from seeing appearances to be unborn. Seeing comes from understanding. Understanding comes from clear explanations. The clarity of explanations depend on the flexibility of the teachers, the efficient use of skilful means. If "Zen style" works, good. If it creates confusion and distrust, it is not good at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 11th, 2016 at 7:44 PM

Title: Re: Essence of Chan

Content:

AlexMcLeod said:

That may be, but how do you get there? One sure-fire way to do so is to start with the instructions above.

Astus wrote:

It can be a start, but it's more like the middle part if it's about gradual instructions. But it's hardly Chan, much less its essence.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 12th, 2016 at 1:33 AM

Title: Re: Intellectualization

Content:

conebeckham said:

In Zen, as I understand it,(based on very little exposure,) such sorts of analysis, intellectual reasoning, conceptual elaboration, are beside the point at best, and antithetical to the Zen path at an extreme.

Astus wrote:

The largest amount of canonical works by a specific school of Buddhism in East Asia is by the Zen tradition. This itself shows a strong conceptual and literary aspect.

Many of the famous teachers of the past have produced written teachings, and a number of them have even engaged in systematic philosophising. And those who appear only in stories were also apparently familiar with the scriptures to the extent to be able to freely quote them.

Historically speaking, those who were abbots - i.e. most of the "patriarchs/ancestors" - were members of the educated elite who interacted with the top echelons of the aristocracy and literati in order to ensure the stability of their monastic institutions.

The iconoclastic and anti-intellectual style of Zen is really just a style, as sophisticated and artificial as calligraphy, or a weird piece of modern art.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 12th, 2016 at 2:02 AM

Title: Re: Intellectualization

Content:

jundo cohen said:

Useful, of course, for getting around in the world.

Astus wrote:

1. I might be missing something, but so far I have not seen that knowledge of Buddhist teachings is a lucrative business.
2. Getting around in the world is the best anyone can expect, being free from all the entrapments and allures, moving like clouds.

jundo cohen said:

An obstruction to the heart of the matter.

Astus wrote:

1. From thinking comes understanding, from understanding comes realisation.
2. Thoughts are not hindrances in Zen.

jundo cohen said:

if one then scoffs at the anti-intellectual aspect of Zen, and the thinking non thinking aspect

Astus wrote:

Non-thinking and anti-intellectual slogans are two different things.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 12th, 2016 at 2:12 AM

Title: Re: Intellectualization

Content:

conebeckham said:

The caveat I'd add is that sometimes it's not "just a style"--you know?

Astus wrote:

If you refer to not getting stuck with words, that's not a unique concept of Zen. It's been around since the Nikayas.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 12th, 2016 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: Intellectualization

Content:

jundo cohen said:

Need to see through them.

Astus wrote:

How are they seen through?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 12th, 2016 at 2:23 AM

Title: Re: Intellectualization

Content:

conebeckham said:

I mean that it can be a "defense mechanism" against hearing or thinking about things that make one uncomfortable, or it can be used as a defense in argumentation.

Astus wrote:

Like when they say "all is relative", but what they mean is "I don't care what you mean, I know I am right".

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 12th, 2016 at 2:30 AM

Title: Re: Intellectualization

Content:

jundo cohen said:

You are trying to have a discussion of Zen leaving the Zen out of the Zen.

Astus wrote:

What is Zen? (so we don't omit it)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 12th, 2016 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: Intellectualization

Content:

jundo cohen said:

Now you got it!

Astus wrote:

What makes you say that? I certainly did not get anything.

How can you expect keeping Zen in the Zen forum if you don't specify what Zen is?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 12th, 2016 at 10:30 PM

Title: Re: Intellectualization

Content:

jundo cohen said:

the teachings of Soto/Caodong or Rinzai/Linji lines

Malcolm said:

Chan/Zen is ... the teachings of Bodhidharma and his followers

Astus wrote:

So, Zen is a set of teachings. Discussion of those teachings is the primary purpose of the Zen section on this forum. That is quite an intellectual activity. And since this topic, like the others, discusses Zen teachings, there is no lack of it.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 12th, 2016 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: Approach in the West: Scientific vs Spiritual?

Content:

Ayu said:

I was referring to science as a term for the exclusive belief in everything that can be proved scientifically. That belief in its pure form doesn't accept anything that isn't evidenced.

Astus wrote:

That does not exist on the human level. Also, that kind of "pure science" is a methodology, a technique of investigation, not a claim or statement, so it is not in the same category as being spiritual, or any view. Not to mention the problem that if one can actually understand the scientific proof, it is not a matter of believing it or not. So, I think that the "scientific approach" is simply physicalism, another word for materialism, the extreme view of annihilation.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 13th, 2016 at 12:01 AM

Title: Re: Approach in the West: Scientific vs Spiritual?

Content:

Ayu said:

one side wants to have scientific approach only, leaving out all those traditional prayers and rituals. The other side finds that strange and disagrees.

Astus wrote:

Or: one side doesn't understand the benefits of prayers and rituals in cultivation, the other side is a group of romantics. So I'd say both sides think that it's a religious-traditional thing only. And that creates this false controversy of "scientific or spiritual". Better go for Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 13th, 2016 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: Essence of Chan

Content:

seeker242 said:

So then what is the essence of chan?

Astus wrote:

"since the past this teaching of ours has first taken nonthought (wunian 無念) as its central doctrine (zong 宗), the formless (wuxiang 無相) as its essence (ti 體), and nonabiding (wuzhu 無住) as its fundamental (ben 本)."

(Platform Sutra, ch 4, BDK Edition, p 43)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 13th, 2016 at 9:11 PM

Title: Re: Is Consciousness Produced by the Brain?

Content:

WeiHan said:

I have an objection to this. Isn't electromagnetic field immaterial but it is a subject of scientific study. And the list goes on

Astus wrote:

Then call it https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Physical_body, if you like.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 13th, 2016 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: Is Consciousness Produced by the Brain?

Content:

WeiHan said:

Do you mean that consciousness is immaterial and thus cannot be subject to scientific investigation?

Astus wrote:

Yes.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 14th, 2016 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: Mechanics of Enlightenment

Content:

Astus wrote:

Zazen is where all the analysis leads to. Neither grasping nor rejecting. See for instance <http://www.dharma-friends.org.il/libitem/the-middling-stages-of-meditation-by-acharya-kamalashila/>:

"In this way, by entering into the suchness of the selflessness of persons and phenomena, you are free from concepts and analysis, because there is nothing to be thoroughly examined and observed. You are free from expression and with single-pointed mental engagement you automatically enter into meditation without exertion. Thus, you very clearly meditate on suchness and abide in it. While abiding in that meditation, the continuity of the mind should not be distracted. ... If and when the mind spontaneously engages in meditation on suchness, free of sinking and mental agitation, it should be left naturally and your efforts should be relaxed."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 15th, 2016 at 4:11 AM

Title: Re: Mechanics of Enlightenment

Content:

Justmeagain said:

I guess it doesn't actually feel like I have had a non-conceptual experience of the empty nature of phenomena when I am just sitting...

Astus wrote:

Experiences come and go. You cannot stop experiences to stay away. You cannot hold experiences to remain. That's all there is to recognise. Then there is nothing to grasp, nothing to identify with, nothing to gain, nothing to lose. At the same time, there is clear awareness of everything that occurs and disappears. What more do you want?

"When there is nothing to be gained, nothing to be realized, sitting zazen is "body-mind dropping off (shinjin datsuraku)." Body-mind dropping off is not a wonderful psychological state to be gained as a result of sitting zazen. Rather, zazen itself is nothing but "body-mind dropping off." It is to escape all kinds of clinging. When we sit zazen, our body-mind naturally drops off and the true Dharma manifests."
(http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/key_terms/pdf/key_terms01.pdf)

"When a thought arises during zazen and we become aware of it, it disappears by itself. And when another thought arises, we again become aware of it and it disappears. If we maintain this process, we naturally put aside everything outside and become one with ourselves. This is exactly the state of mind during zazen and the content of hishiryo. Hishiryo is not to attain a transcendental state of mind through meditation or to enter a state of no thoughts and no images. It is not to remain in a state full of defilements and delusions or to keep discriminative thinking, either. This is what Dogen Zenji meant when he used the word hishiryo. This concept was steadfastly handed down to Keizan Zenji's Zazen Yojinki. Thus, in the Soto Zen tradition we now emphasize hishiryo as a state of mind during zazen."

(http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/key_terms/pdf/key_terms08.pdf)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 16th, 2016 at 4:47 PM

Title: Re: The Beginning of Zen/Chan in China.

Content:

Astus wrote:

What does this have to do with Zen?

First martial arts book attributed to Bodhidharma was made in 1642. Even the association of martial arts with Shaolin goes back only to the 13th century. See for reference McRae's "Seeing through Zen", p 26.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 16th, 2016 at 7:47 PM

Title: Re: Mechanics of Enlightenment

Content:

Justmeagain said:

Ok, let me put it another way. What's the difference between sitting here in the couch and sitting on my cushion?

Astus wrote:

From Dazhu's <http://www.ymba.org/books/entering-tao-sudden-enlightenment/tsung-ching-record>:

Once a Vinaya Master came and asked: "In your practice of the Tao, do you still work hard?"

The Master answered: "Yes, I still work hard."

The Vinaya Master asked: "How hard?"

The Master retorted: "If I'm hungry, I eat. If I'm tired, I sleep. "

The Vinaya Master asked: "Do all other people work hard just as you do?"

The Master answered: "No, not in the same way."

The Vinaya Master asked: "Why not?"

The Master answered: "While they are eating, they are not really eating due to too much thinking. While they are sleeping, they are not really sleeping due to too much mental agitation. Therefore, they do not work in the same way I do."

The Vinaya Master, on hearing this, fell silent.

Similarly, either you accomplish non-thinking (hishiryo), or you are trapped in the extremes of thinking and not thinking. This is what should be clarified first, and that's what sitting on the cushion can help with.

Justmeagain said:

How can, just sitting, with no agenda or method bring about a permanent and transformative experience?

Astus wrote:

It is not an experience one should look for, it is the ongoing experiences one should look at. See them how they arise and fall, come and go. Delusion is wanting an experience, grasping an experience. Liberation is not being fooled by experiences, seeing them to be impermanent, empty of any substance that one can identify with or hang on to. Then, when it is obvious that experiences are ungraspable, there is no agenda or method.

Justmeagain said:

As a friend once suggested, a stone can just sit there doing nothing?

Astus wrote:

Humans cannot do that. We need to eat and sleep, we need clothes and sometimes medicine. And from those needs come all sorts of things to do. Not to mention the innumerable desires and cravings we have. So, we are already in this situation called life, where we want peace and happiness, but at the same time we are constantly bombarded by thoughts, feelings, sensory impressions, and all the social elements. The question is how to deal with all of that. And the Buddha's answer is to realise that the cause of dissatisfaction with life is craving, and craving comes from the ignorance about experiences being conditioned and impermanent. Hence zazen is the practice-realisation of what this body-mind (experiences) really is. In other words, as long as we want to manipulate life, we cannot be at peace, so when one sits, one should not manipulate anything, like a stone left at the bottom of a river.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 16th, 2016 at 8:11 PM

Title: Re: The Beginning of Zen/Chan in China.

Content:

AlexMcLeod said:

Especially considering that the books attributed to Damo have nothing to do with what the classics describe.

Astus wrote:

Can you give exact sources?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 18th, 2016 at 6:55 AM

Title: Re: Words on nihilism

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

Does anything we do in samsara (other than the endeavor of getting out of it) have value and meaning?

Astus wrote:

There are causes and effects. Whatever we do has consequences. When we want something to have value, have meaning, what we want is to have effects, that it matters what one does. Certainly it does. At the same time, because it's all causality, there is no actual self inside or outside that, so there is nothing that one should identify with. That everything is meaningful necessitates that it's all meaningless.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 18th, 2016 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Mother's Lap said:

Only buddhas can see a mind via direct perception. For ordinary beings, they either imagine the other mind, or in samadhi see a reflection of the other mind.

Astus wrote:

Buddhas do not have that subject-object distinction required to perceive another's mind. Also, assuming even resemblance or reflection of another's mind requires some sort of connection or conditions that would allow that communication, so it does not really solve the problem.

[Question:] if only consciousness exists, does knowledge of the minds of others [really I know the minds of others or not? [We reply,] if we agree, what is the error? [The opponent argues,] if you are unable to know, how can you speak of knowledge of others' minds? If you are able to know) the minds of others,) then consciousness only is not demonstrated (because you admit the real existence of others]. [We reply,] even though one knows the minds of others, still, it is not [knowing] according to reality (yatha-artha). A verse says,

How does knowledge of others' minds

Not know the object of perception according to reality?

In the same way that knowledge in knowing one's own mind

Does not know it in accordance with the object of perception of a Buddha.

The Treatise says, how can knowledge of the minds of others not know objects of perception in accordance with reality? It is like knowledge of one's own mind.

[Question:] Why does knowledge of one's own mind not know the object of perception according to reality? Because of ignorance of the object of perception. Because each of the two [kinds of knowledge] is concealed by ignorance, they do not know the ineffable object of perception in accordance with a Buddha's pure knowledge. These two do not know the object of perception in accordance with reality because of false appearances that resemble external objects of perception, and because the discrimination of the grasped and the grasper is not eliminated.

(Vasubandhu: Twenty Verses on Consciousness Only, from Three Texts on Consciousness Only, BDK Edition, p 406-407)

It might also be of some interest that Dogen has a short writing on this topic in the Shobogenzo, it's called "The Power to Know Others' Minds" (Tashintsu, in vol 4 of the BDK Edition). There he writes (p 121-122):

Furthermore, what is called in India “the power to know others’ minds,” should be called “the power to know the images in others’ minds.” [Mind readers] may dimly detect, on the outer edges of perception, images arising in the mind. In the absence of images in the mind, however, they are dumbfounded; that must be laughable. Moreover, the mind is not always mental images, and mental images are not always the mind. When the mind becomes the image, the power to know others’ minds cannot know it; and when the image becomes the mind, the power to know others’ minds cannot know it. This being so, the five powers and the six powers of India are not equal to our mowing weeds and working the fields in this country. They are of no use at all. For this reason, all the past masters in and to the east of China have not liked to practice the five powers and the six powers, because there is no need to do so. Even a one-foot gem can be necessary, [but] the five powers and the six powers are not necessary. Even a one-foot gem is not a treasure, [but] every inch of time is vital. How could a person who attaches importance to time want to learn the five or six powers? In sum, we should decisively affirm the principle that the power to read others’ minds cannot reach the boundary of the Buddha’s wisdom.

And concludes the matter in a very Zen way (p 126):

Now, if we say that there is the power to know others’ minds in the Buddha-Dharma, there must be the power to know others’ bodies, there must be the power to know others’ fists, and there must be the power to know others’ eyes. That being so, there must be the power to know our own mind, and there must be the power to know our own body. If the state is like this already, self-command of our own mind may be nothing other than “the power to know our own mind.” When expressions like this are realized, the state may be the power to know others’ minds [that naturally emerges] from the self itself and from the mind itself. Now let us ask: Is it right to command the power to know others’ minds or is it right to command the power to know our own minds? Speak at once! Speak at once! Setting that aside, [we can conclude that] “You have got my marrow” is just the power to know others’ minds.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 19th, 2016 at 12:52 AM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

The mind is considered a sense organ too, after all, so why would it not be able to sense the thoughts of others like the ear senses the sounds made by others? (Please feel free to add the word "apparent" before every single noun in the sentence).

Astus wrote:

There is an explanation of how sound goes from one's mouth to another's ear. What is the explanation of the movement of thoughts between beings?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 19th, 2016 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: Words on nihilism

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

But the path is a path out of the world -- an escape from samsara. So, in effect, actions and experiences in the world are judged by whether they will help us get out of the world. Because of this, we can't really say that dharmas have any intrinsic value, and insofar as that is true, Buddhism is similar to philosophical nihilism.

Astus wrote:

That only creates two levels of a value system: worldly (laukika) and other-worldly (lokottara). Those with worldly interest have the values of merit and sin, and those with other-worldly interest also have the values of conducive or unconducive to liberation.

Denying those values is the wrong view of the ten unwholesome actions: "There is nothing given, nothing offered, nothing sacrificed. There is no fruit or result of good or bad actions. There is no this world, no next world, no mother, no father, no spontaneously reborn beings; no contemplatives or brahmans who, faring rightly & practicing rightly, proclaim this world & the next after having directly known & realized it for themselves." (<http://www.accesstosight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.041.than.html>)

The only point where both worldly and other-worldly values lose meaning is where one is liberated from karma. But the consequences of previous actions do not disappear because of enlightenment, it's just that they do not cause suffering any more, and no new karma is generated.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 19th, 2016 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: Words on nihilism

Content:

Mother's Lap said:

Buddhas have cleared away all obscurations, and thus have no karma.

Astus wrote:

In the case of buddhas, they have the merits accumulated and the vows made during their bodhisattva career, and only because of those merits and vows can they produce a buddha-field and manifest skilful actions.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 19th, 2016 at 3:25 AM

Title: Re: Words on nihilism

Content:

Mother's Lap said:

There is no merit outside of good karma, and there is no karma outside of the alayavijnana. Are you saying that buddhas have an alayavijnana?

Astus wrote:

You can call them inconceivable merit and great mirror wisdom, if you like. Still, the idea is that it is accumulated on the bodhisattva path in order to accomplish the buddha qualities. So, there is cause and effect.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 19th, 2016 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Mother's Lap said:

There is no movement "between" beings, there is only the ruling condition.

Astus wrote:

Now that I could look into that text a little more, the DDV matches Vasubandhu's verses I have quoted, that there is no mind entering another. The DDV states explicitly that minds are not included in the shared category. In Mipham's commentary what are in the shared category are confirmed to be merely the products of one's own mind, while he makes the exception for knowing others' minds. So, since there are just distinct mind-streams, there is some sort of communication between them, otherwise not even a resemblance or reflection of another stream could occur. What is the explanation of such a communication?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 19th, 2016 at 3:57 AM

Title: Re: Words on nihilism

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

Sure, but are you using "consequence" as a synonym for "meaning"?

Astus wrote:

See in my previous <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=334039#p334039>: "When we want something to have value, have meaning, what we want is to have effects, that it matters what one does."

Causality is the basic rule of the world in Buddhism. That's what makes things good or bad, and that's what one is either deluded or enlightened about. Belief in an intrinsic value is not only against enlightenment, but against the worldly values as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 19th, 2016 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Mother's Lap said:

"Shared" is merely a designation

Astus wrote:

In other words, a convention. Telepathy is a conventional concept. Or rather, it was once, but in the modern times it's moved into the conventional reality of a few who believe in the paranormal and such. So, if someone argues that there is such a thing as telepathy, it requires a conventional explanation, just as there is one for how hearing works.

Mother's Lap said:

for when multiple minds see their own minds in a similar fashion to each other

Astus wrote:

How can such a similarity be established, when there is no way to compare one's mind with another's?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 19th, 2016 at 6:12 AM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Mother's Lap said:

Sraddha in Buddhadharma until we can know it for ourselves at buddhahood.

Astus wrote:

As I see it, the arguments presented in Yogacara (and Dogen's work) is not about explaining how telepathy could work, but to point to realising how our experiences are, and from that gain the liberating view that there is nothing that can be grasped.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 19th, 2016 at 4:35 PM

Title: Re: am i "suffering"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Samsara is not a container of beings, but the life of delusion. Hence the Vimalakirti Sutra: when the mind is pure, the land is pure. And as Yongjia's Song of Enlightenment says: "The true nature of ignorance is the buddha-nature; this empty body, an illusory transformation, is the dharma-body."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 19th, 2016 at 10:34 PM

Title: Re: Can women become Buddhas?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Really? Well I have yet to see this plethora of evidence. Normally it is one or two standard quotes that are trotted out. That is hardly "well documented" considering the volume of teachings attributed to the Buddha.

Astus wrote:

<http://www.dhammadharini.net/dhamma/dhamma-talks-from-the-bhikkhuni-sangha/aranya-bodhi-hermitage/non-historicity-of-the-eight-garudhammas>

<https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/bahudhatuka.pdf>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 21st, 2016 at 6:59 PM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Astus, indeed minds do not enter each other. However, in knowing the mind of another, what is required is that the mind to be known apprehends characteristics. If it does not apprehend characteristics, there is nothing for another to apprehend about that mind—for example, when some devas became unnerved when they could not locate a favored monk, they were informed that he was a) now an arhat b) in equipoise, which is why they were unable to find him with their minds.

Astus wrote:

That is the idea that

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=334111&sid=744a1659a6aff7331c07d0a6f592d7c9#p334111> analysed in his writing, and criticised it.

As for minds with characteristics, if we say that consciousness necessarily has an object - one is always conscious of something, not just conscious - then a mind without characteristics does not exist. What is called an <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.055.than.html> is the liberated mind, where there is no attachment to the aggregates. However, that doesn't mean that the mind and other functions stop, so even those who are liberated see, hear, sense, and think. So it seems that if the difference lies in the presence of ignorance, then what can be known of another's mind is ignorance only. However, in the

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.11.0.than.html#mindreading>, one can see even an undeluded and released mind, and there are also

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an03/an03.060.than.html#telepathy> to read another's mind, both with and without signs involved. So, when an arhat is not found, is after parinirvana (<http://www.tipitaka.net/tipitaka/dhp/verseload.php?verse=419>), so there is also an interpretation that unestablished consciousness means <https://suttacentral.net/en/sn22.87> <https://suttacentral.net/en/sn12.25>.

Here is a

http://www.zenguide.com/zenmedia/books/content.cfm?t=the_gateless_gate&chapter=42 on this topic (note: Momyo (lit. false/no light, i.e. ignorance) is on 1st bhumi):

Once, in the old days, in the time of the World-honored One, Manjusri went to the assembly of the Buddhas and found that everyone had departed to his original dwelling place. Only a girl remained, sitting in samadhi close to the Buddha's throne.

Manjusri asked Shakyamuni Buddha, "Why can the girl get near the Buddha's throne, while I cannot?"

Shakyamuni Buddha said, "Bring her out of her samadhi and ask her yourself."

Manjusri walked around the girl three times, snapped his fingers once, took her to the Brahma heaven, and exerted all his miraculous powers to bring her out of her meditation, but in vain.

The World-honored One said, "Even a hundred thousand Manjusris cannot make her wake up. But down below, past twelve hundred million lands as innumerable as the sands of Ganges, there is a Bodhisattva Momyo. He will be able to rouse her from her samadhi."

Instantly the Bodhisattva Momyo emerged from the earth and made a bow to the World-honored One, who gave him his imperial order. The Bodhisattva went over to the girl and snapped his fingers once. At this she came out of her samadhi.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 21st, 2016 at 10:02 PM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Malcolm said:

But it clearly does, since it is described as such in many sūtras, etc.

Astus wrote:

A mind without characteristics exists? That would be an independent consciousness, a soul.

Malcolm said:

Also, realized people (bodhisattvas, arhats) with liberated minds may indeed cognize characteristics when in post-euipoise. All the examples you gave merely demonstrate that point. Further, sound is apprehended by characteristics, etc. All cognitions are cognitions via characteristics from which we conceptually abstract our world.

Astus wrote:

Yes, consciousness is of something, of characteristics. Saying that telepathy is seeing the characteristics is equal to seeing the mind, just as there is no roundness and ball separately, therefore experiencing the same characteristic as another is being one with the other, a merging of minds.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 21st, 2016 at 10:32 PM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Malcolm said:

there is such a thing as a mind that does not apprehend characteristics, hence a mind without characteristics.

Astus wrote:

What counts as characteristic? What does a mind without characteristics depend on?

Malcolm said:

No, no more than seeing a ball is merging with a ball.

Astus wrote:

There are a number of differences between a ball and a mind. What makes a consciousness is a moment of cognition. If one has the very same moment of cognition, then it is the same mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 22nd, 2016 at 4:37 AM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Malcolm said:

For example, the blueness of a vase.

Astus wrote:

OK, that's a concept, a function of perception (samjna).

Malcolm said:

Upon what should a mind depend? If you assert it must continue based on sense perceptions, then you cannot explain how a mind continues in a completely nonconceptual samadhi, for example, nirvikalpa samadhi (which in a Buddha is called Vajropama Samadhi).

Astus wrote:

When there is nothing grasped, there is no grasper either. But that means only the lack of substantialisation of object and subject, not that there are no phenomena.

Malcolm said:

Same only in the sense in the sense that two fires are both hot; different in so far as the two fires are distinct. In other words, I I apprehend the ball in your mind's eye, the image I perceive in my mind will be identical to how you perceive the ball, but different in so far as our minds are distinct continuums.

Astus wrote:

Mind is the subjective experience. To make it an object is not any more a subjective experience, therefore not the experience of another's mind, but a concept about what is in another's mind. In other words, you can think that I think about a ball. That happens even when I tell you that I think of a ball, so you know what I think about. Telepathy is knowing what I think without I telling you. But since there is no connection between the minds, what is the cause of knowing it? Without connection it is like seeing a ball that's in another room - there is no light reaching the eyes from the ball, so it cannot be seen.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 22nd, 2016 at 4:44 PM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Minds are essentially unimpeded and nonimpeding so the question of how they connect is irrelevant. It's the wrong question.

Astus wrote:

Since we generally don't perceive others' minds, there is something impeding that perception, or there is a lack of condition for perception. What is it?

Also, if there is no separation between minds, they still remain separate continua, i.e. different causal sequences. If two continua could result in the same moment of consciousness, that would mean two sequences becoming one, and from then on they could not go on different sequences, unless we assume that from a single moment of consciousness two different moments could occur.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 22nd, 2016 at 8:34 PM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Who says we don't perceive others minds. We just don't know that the appearance of the triple realm is a mentally generated appearance. The traces of other minds are of enough strength even to create appearances for ourselves.

Astus wrote:

When and how do we perceive others' minds? Since the triple realm is a production of one's own delusions, even mountains are just the false projections of concepts. How could traces (what are such traces anyway?) of minds then come from others?

Malcolm said:

You seem to fail to grasp generic sameness as opposed to sameness as identity. If I apprehend someone else's direct perception of a blue vase, my perception and theirs are generically the same, but the sameness of identity.

Astus wrote:

What specific details would be different in a single moment of thought?

Malcolm said:

Then there is the funny case of the group of arhats who all shared one mind, in the sense that since they were completely open to one another, it appeared to them as if they had but a single mind.

Astus wrote:

Just out of curiosity, where is that story found?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 22nd, 2016 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The three realms are not just a production of solely our own traces

Astus wrote:

Then the triple realm is not just a mental construct. It sounds like you say the world is a virtual/mental reality of many minds.

Malcolm said:

Subject a has a thought that Subject b perceives.

Astus wrote:

OK. Still, what is the cause/condition/reason for being able to do so? You said that "It is a very simple principle that does not require much analysis." - that is practically like saying that "it just happens".

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 22nd, 2016 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Samadhi is the cause and condition of being able to perceive the thoughts in the mind of another.

Astus wrote:

Yes, so it is with all six powers.

"With his mind thus concentrated, purified, and bright, unblemished, free from defects, pliant, malleable, steady, and attained to imperturbability, he directs and inclines it to knowledge of the awareness of other beings. He knows the awareness of other beings, other individuals, having encompassed it with his own awareness."

(<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.02.0.than.html>)

Again, this does not actually explain how it is possible, or how it works, it just says that it happens so. So, "samadhi" is an insufficient reason. Unless what you mean is that we can have such experiences of the powers during meditation, but it should not be taken literally.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 23rd, 2016 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, it explains both how it is possible and how it works. When you are less distracted by your own thoughts, you can perceive the thoughts of others more easily. A mind is both unimpeded and unimpeding by nature. It should be taken literally.

Astus wrote:

If that's so straightforward as you say, where are all the telepathic and miracle making yogis (besides all the stories)?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 23rd, 2016 at 2:27 AM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

It's not as rare as you think.

Astus wrote:

If it were only a matter of gaining the fourth level of absorption - something that's not exclusive to Buddhists - magical feats would be as common as marathon runners, or at least as world class athletes.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 23rd, 2016 at 4:43 AM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

What would be called an exceptional level of emotional intelligence in western psych is pretty hard to separate from 'psychic ability', IMO they might actually one and the same. Knowing one's own mind makes it possible to know the minds of others.

Astus wrote:

That's possible, and takes the whole mystical side away.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 23rd, 2016 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Malcolm said:

These days? Tibet and India.

Astus wrote:

How come then that the world knows nothing about them? With all the parapsychologists, hermeticists, esoteric enthusiasts, New Age believers, media sensationalism, and the people who want to prove every one of them as frauds, it seems very unlikely that if there are people with genuine supernormal powers, they just remain unnoticed.

Malcolm said:

There are very few people who have attained even the first dhyāna, let alone the fourth, in this day and age.

Astus wrote:

There are also very few Nobel laureates and Olympic gold medalists.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 23rd, 2016 at 5:38 AM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Frankly, they prefer to remain unnoticed.

Astus wrote:

That sounds just like a good number of conspiracy theories do.

Malcolm said:

And, imagine how annoying it would be to be able to "hear" all the chatter in other beings' minds. What a cacophony.

Astus wrote:

If it is an ability someone has developed, then it can be controlled, and activates according to one's will.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 23rd, 2016 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

So my sneaking suspicion is that for a good chunk of people who have these abilities or qualities (personally I think quality might actually be a better description in some ways) don't really know how to do them at will, and in some cases maybe aren't even particularly aware of them..though for sure I'm open to the possibility that some very developed folks can use such things and know what they are doing.

Astus wrote:

Everyone should have those abilities. In a way, it is part of social interaction, and regularly experienced among family members and close friends. And there are people who take this to the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Mentalism>.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 24th, 2016 at 12:17 AM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Further clarification of my approach on the matter.

If powers are taken to be real magic, they actually remain only a matter of stories, good for entertainment and nothing more. But if they are understood as meditation/religious experiences, they regain their relevance and become something that people can relate to, that they can truly use for something, etc. And people do experience them, as many practitioner can testify.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 24th, 2016 at 1:31 AM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Your approach to the subject is no different than any other scientific materialist.

Astus wrote:

There is a history of testing claims of supernatural powers in Europe and the US. It is not the case that there is a lack of people who believe in magic, rather it's the lack of people who can perform in a controlled environment. There are monks who are scientifically tested for the benefits of meditation. But there are only old stories where monks and yogis display magical powers.

The materialist approach is to interpret the powers in a way that they should exist in a materially effective way, just like you seem to say. And that's why it is easily refuted as false by others with a similar materialistic approach.

Malcolm said:

What can you use clairvoyance for if it is not a real capacity of the human mind?

Astus wrote:

I don't recall the Buddha advising his disciples to use clairvoyance for anything.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 24th, 2016 at 3:04 AM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Bodhisattvas are supposed to cultivate the five abijñās to be of benefit to other sentient beings. For example, being able to know the minds of other sentient beings means that one will automatically know what kind of teaching for which they are suited, etc. Buddha gave much advice of this kind.

Astus wrote:

There are a number of stories of the Buddha where apparently he had no powers to prevent what had happened or know about it (e.g. <https://suttacentral.net/en/sn4.18>, <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn54/sn54.009.than.html>). Also, the very first abhijna includes all sorts of magical powers, that could have definitely helped in spreading and defending the Dharma over the centuries. But clairvoyance and telepathy should have proved useful in several cases, when Buddhist masters had encounters with all sorts of rulers.

Malcolm said:

We are talking about clairvoyance, manomāyakāyas and so on. What is material about that?

Astus wrote:

Do you know anyone who has passed some tests for those abilities? Likely not. At the same time, we don't need to look as far as India to find clairvoyants and such. If, as you say, it is something humanly capable - and it's not as hard as attaining insight into emptiness - I don't see why it is not a common thing.

Malcolm said:

People who have such capacities are not supposed to demonstrate them idly, and if they are monks, they are forbidden to do so.

Sherab Dorje said:

Do you believe that "proving" to the world that telepathy can arise as a consequence of dhyana is an idle demonstration?

Malcolm said:

Yup.

Astus wrote:

Not all people with such capacities are Buddhists, and even Buddhist monks, including the Buddha, have demonstrated their powers openly numerous times according to the stories. So, that kind of argument of "hiding magicians" does not stand either within Buddhism nor outside of it. Again, if it were something attainable by people, we would have dozens of them showing off in concert halls and live on TV, just like those "remote healers", "fortune tellers", etc. actually do.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 24th, 2016 at 7:36 AM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Malcolm said:

What makes you think they still don't? As I said, you apparently don't know any real yogis.

Astus wrote:

Because if there were even one, it would make news all over the world. Like https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Braco_%28faith_healer%29.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 24th, 2016 at 5:20 PM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

AlexMcLeod said:

I am in complete agreement with Malcolm on this one. But the reason is that the demonstration of such skill will never take a potential student in the correct direction. Always this leads to those who do not have sufficient roots gaining powers that they will inevitably abuse.

Astus wrote:

That does not match all those anecdotes about Buddhist masters using all sorts of magic. For instance, monks were employed by Japanese emperors to guarantee succession through a male heir. Also, look at how in the 17th century a Chinese monk who moved to Japan was perceived:

"Among common Japanese, Yinyuan and his disciples had been viewed as magic workers with extraordinary abilities such as divination, rainmaking, and telekinesis, which has been commonly referred to as "spiritual penetration" (jintsū) in Buddhist literature." (Jiang Wu: Leaving for the Rising Sun, p 165)

An example of one of the stories from the pen of a German visitor in Japan (p 164):

"His sanctity came to the test shortly after his arrival, and the result greatly enhanced the esteem in which he was held. He was asked by the farmers of the surrounding countryside to conduct a kitō, that is, a holy ceremonial prayer or mass, to draw rain from heaven onto their rice fields, which were being devastated by drought. He answered that he could neither make rain nor assure them that the kitō would produce the desired effect but that he would do his best. Thereupon he climbed up a mountain and conducted his kitō. The following day the rain poured down so heavily that even the smaller bridges in the city were washed away, and not only the farmers but also the city judged that he had made his kitō too strong."

It doesn't look like that Yinyuan was afraid of any misdirection of his disciples and the general people.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 24th, 2016 at 5:22 PM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Vasana said:

despite the staggering ammount of anecdotal accounts which are collectively significant pieces of data in and of themselves.

Astus wrote:

Christian literature is filled with stories of miracles. Would you call that proof of God's presence?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 24th, 2016 at 5:49 PM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Either that or he was a victim of good timing...

Astus wrote:

I guess we will never know. But it is telling that while Yinyuan was a Zen teacher - and people today would think them to be not magical at all, nor do such events play any important role in his teachings and records - he was famous among the masses as a miracle worker.

This discussion itself is somewhat strange. All we can talk about are interpretations of stories. As I see it, as long as they are just stories of extraordinary people who are long dead, they bear no relevance to one's practice and life at all. But the rddhipada is part of the 37 qualities for enlightenment, so it should not be foreign to anyone.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 25th, 2016 at 1:29 AM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

AlexMcLeod said:

The 17th Century and now are worlds apart in terms of the prevailing social conditioning. Whereas back then, such feats would make a person revered, today they would make the same person derided.

Astus wrote:

How so? Just reading through this thread shows that many acknowledge the validity of such powers. This little interview tells the same:

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=KKqmPSToWUU> Beyond that, all kinds of energy (Reiki, etc.) and faith (Christians) healers, fortune tellers, magicians and shamans have great popularity.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 25th, 2016 at 1:34 AM

Title: Re: can one mind enter another?

Content:

Vasana said:

I don't know about extraordinary displays of abilities in Theravada or Zen circles today, but they're actually still fairly common in the Tibetan traditions. Many students have themselves witnessed such feats so of course it bears relevance to one's life ,view and practice.

Astus wrote:

Such stories exist in traditional communities, like about Ajahn Chah and Hsuan Hua. But they all sound like the following:

In Taiwan, I have a disciple who has been practicing with me for quite sometime. He has a good command of English, so when a certain Tibetan rinpoche was scheduled to lecture, he was asked to translate. He was very nervous. He had never practiced Tantra, and was afraid that he wouldn't understand what the rinpoche said. In a quandary, he finally decided that if he didn't understand, it was the rinpoche's responsibility to make him understand. With this thought he went to sleep. The rinpoche came to him in a dream, placed his hand on the disciple's head, and said, "You don't have to be nervous. You will understand everything I say tomorrow. You don't have to worry." He had a wonderful feeling when the rinpoche touched him. The next morning it was the rinpoche who woke him up. My disciple immediately prostrated to the rinpoche and thanked him for entering his dream. Curious, the rinpoche asked, "What happened last night?" The disciple told him, and after a few more questions from the rinpoche, he concluded that it might not have been the rinpoche but a "yidam," a Dharma protector, who came to him.

Later I asked him if he had ever dreamed of me. He said, "Yes, indeed, many times." Then I asked if he thought that it was me who had entered his dreams. He said, "No, because Shih-fu doesn't have a yidam." So then I said to him, "O.K., I will go and find myself a yidam so that the next time you dream of me, you will be sure that it is my yidam that is entering your dream."

(<http://chancenter.org/cmc/1985/05/15/esoteric-and-exoteric-buddhism/>)

In other words, disciples like to believe that a teacher has special powers, so they attribute some otherwise ordinary events to those powers. That's not different from calling some events the acts of God.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 25th, 2016 at 5:11 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment and Phenomena

Content:

Astus wrote:

Two essays by Sharf:

http://kr.buddhism.org/zen/koan/Robert_Sharf-e.htm

http://buddhiststudies.berkeley.edu/people/faculty/sharf/documents/Sharf%20Is%20Nirvana%20the%20Same%20as%20Insentience_.pdf

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 26th, 2016 at 5:13 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

So how can it be realised then? It would be tantamount to running a race without knowing where the finish line is, or if there is even a finish line. Or even a track, given that suddenly dhyana is not the point of (some... any?) Buddhist meditations.

Astus wrote:

The Mind in terms of the Absolute is the one World of Reality (dharmadhatu) and the essence of all phases of existence in their totality. That which is called "the essential nature of the Mind" is unborn and is imperishable.

...

Question: If such is the meaning of the principle of Mahayana, how is it possible for men to conform themselves to and enter into it?

Answer: If they understand that, concerning all things, though they are spoken of, there is neither that which speaks, nor that which can be spoken of, and though they are thought of, there is neither that which thinks, nor that which can be thought of, then they are said to have conformed to it. And when they are freed from their thoughts, they are said to have entered into it.

(http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Translations/Awakening_of_faith.html)

As for the attainment of dhyanas, there are various views on them, particularly among Theravada teachers where they teach it in several ways (e.g.

<http://www.dhammadownload.com/viewtopic.php?t=4597>). However, essentially it means peace of mind, where in the first four stages one's enjoyment of peace calms down, while the formless stages are about refining the object that sustains the attention.

Naturally, there is the tendency to elevate holy concepts to unreachable levels, at which point they disappear from practice, while the actual practices are simply renamed. And that's how we have calming meditation with new names in Mahayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 26th, 2016 at 5:01 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

1. From where does it arise?
2. If wholesome behaviour is afflicted too, then how can it be a means to traverse the path?

Astus wrote:

1. The three realms have only 3 lower ones with more pain than pleasure. The rest, including numerous heavens, are all nice places. Similarly, there are significantly more wholesome dharmas than unwholesome in abhidharma charts. They are all parts of this world.

2. One can do all kinds of good things, and that will result in good fruits. That is still very much within the scope of how karma works. The reason it can serve as a support for liberation is that one can use the good conditions for peaceful reflection on the drawbacks of life, the four noble truths, dependent origination, and emptiness. Then when the futility of life generates renunciation, and the insight into the conditioned nature of existence shows the insubstantiality of oneself and all appearances, then there is nothing left to attach to and one gains freedom.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 26th, 2016 at 6:02 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Vasana said:

As far as i understand it, the wholesome virtues and karmas enable you to actually benefit beings through the Rupakayas where as the unconditioned karmas (primordial wisdom) are the cause of realizing Dharmakaya.

Astus wrote:

That is the bodhisattva path, where one is established in prajnaparamita. Before that, however, it's deluded wholesome action causing wholesome results.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 26th, 2016 at 8:27 PM

Title: Zen Language

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here are two comparisons. The first one is a Hongzhi comment on a section from the Platform Sutra. It is three poems with the same intention. The second one is an old Chan story in Dogen's version and a modern Theravadin teaching, again, pointing to the same idea.

Record of Hongzhi (vol 3, T2001p27c16):

Wolun was cited:

"Wolun has a trick
That can stop the hundred thoughts,
Meeting circumstances no mind rises
And bodhi grows daily."

To that the Sixth Patriarch said,

"Huineng has no trick
There are continuously hundred thoughts,
Meeting circumstances mind arises
How could bodhi grow?"

Hongzhi added,

"Sunflowers turn to the Sun.
Willow catkins fly with the wind."

<http://www.abuddhistlibrary.com/Buddhism/C%20-%20Zen/Modern%20Teachers/John%20Daido%20Looi%20-%20Dharma%20Talks/Discourse%20Yunyen%27s%20Insentient%20Beings%20Preach%20the%20Dharma.htm>:

Dongshan asked Yunyen, "Who can hear the teachings of the insentient?"
Yunyen said, "It can be heard by the insentient." Dongshan asked, "Do you hear it, Master?" Yunyen said, "If I heard it, then you would not hear my teaching." Dongshan answered, "That being the case, then I do not hear your teaching." Yunyen replied, "You don't even hear my teaching, how could you hear the teachings of the insentient?"
Dongshan was enlightened on hearing this and responded in verse:

Wondrous! Marvelous!
The teachings of the insentient are inconceivable.
If you listen with the ears, you won't understand.
When you hear with the eyes, then you will know.

https://www.ajahnchah.org/book/Samm_Samdhi_Detachment.php:

When the mind sees like this, wherever we go, we see aniccam. (transience), dukkham.

(imperfection) and anatta (ownerlessness). There's nothing left to hold on to. Whether we sit at the foot of a tree, on a mountain top or in a valley, we can hear the Buddha's teaching. All trees will seem as one, all beings will be as one, there's nothing special about any of them.

They arise, exist for a while, age and then die, all of them. We thus see the world more clearly, we see this body and mind more clearly. They are clearer in the light of transience, clearer in the light of imperfection and clearer in the light of ownerlessness. If people hold fast to things, they suffer. This is how suffering arises. If we see that body and mind are simply the way they are, no suffering arises, because we don't hold fast to them. Wherever we go we will have wisdom. Even when seeing a tree we can consider it with wisdom. Seeing grass and the various insects will be food for reflection.

When it all comes down to it, they all fall into the same boat. They are all Dhamma, they are invariably transient. This is the truth, this is the true Dhamma, this is certain. How is it certain? It is certain in that the world is that way and can never be otherwise. There's nothing more to it than this. If we can see in this way, we have finished our journey.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 27th, 2016 at 5:41 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Astus wrote:

What one gains insight of is non-conceptual awareness. However, at the beginning that is only like non-conceptual awareness, because one usually takes it to be a non-functional mind, the lack of thoughts. So, as in Mahamudra, one trains from one-pointedness, non-conceptuality, and one-taste up to non-meditation, where mind, thoughts, and appearances are all co-emergent and self-liberating; or in Madhyamika terms, non-dual emptiness and dependent origination.

The reason only buddhas see buddha-nature, is that buddha-nature means liberation and the buddha qualities at the same time, so there is the talk about both empty and not empty. Hence, sravakas know liberation, bodhisattvas know liberation and limited qualities/function, and only buddhas have both liberation and function.

The trick (or reinterpretation) for buddha-nature in so called direct teachings is to identify the buddhas' liberation and qualities/function with emptiness and awareness, whereby seeing the mind becomes seeing buddha-nature. But that still leaves space for a gradual development.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 27th, 2016 at 6:05 PM

Title: Re: Zen Language

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

So my question is: why this different kind of presentation (which some would call oblique). Why not just put the idea out there in a straightforward way, as in the Ajahn

Chan text? What happens as a result of the change in presentation?

Astus wrote:

There are simple and straightforward Zen teachings using conventional Mahayana terminology. Some Tang era records are mostly unedited, like those of Baizhang, Huangbo and Dazhu, while those of Huineng (Platform Sutra), Mazu, and Linji have been edited more extensively, but they are still fairly legible. When it comes to the Song era, on the one hand we have the koan collections with their complicated language, and the reason behind that is that they are literary products. On the other hand, if you read the works of Dahui Zonggao and Foyan Qingyuan, they are quite clear. You can read all those mentioned in English.

As always, one should keep in mind the intended audience of a text. In many cases, Chan writings are like calligraphy, artistic products for the educated elite. And Chan teachers themselves were members of the high society, who catered to the taste of the rulers, in exchange of support and other benefits. Of course, there are other types of writings as well, however, it shows the requirements of the Western audience that people reading Zen are also from the educated class, and they enjoy the peculiarity of exotic Eastern riddles. Among so called Zen practitioners, the majority probably do not want anything to do with common, prosaic, religious philosophy, so instead it's easier to pretend that Zen is beyond all concepts when the texts themselves are mostly non-sense.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 27th, 2016 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

If seeing the mind = seeing tathāgatagarbha, then this makes mind unconditioned or tathāgatagarbha conditioned, but undesirable consequences.

Astus wrote:

There is no such thing as the unconditioned. Unconditioned means unbound, empty. Seeing the mind means recognising that it's empty and conditioned, and by that one is not conditioned any more by imagined essences. So as they say, the emptiness is the dharmakaya, the awareness is the sambhogakaya, and appearances are the nirmanakaya.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 27th, 2016 at 9:39 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Depends on what you mean by "thing." I mean "dharma"

Astus wrote:

By thing what was meant was substance, an independent object. Dharma, in the sense you mentioned, is a conceptual category, and in that way there can be a category of unconditioned things, as they say in abhidharma.

Malcolm said:

If emptiness = the dharmakāya, then is the dharmakāya is just something inert, like a rock?

Astus wrote:

Dharmakaya refers to the ultimate nature of buddhas, and that is emptiness. It seems that Buddhist thinkers did not bother with creating a special word for the insubstantiality of rocks. Note: dharmakaya is just one of the three/four bodies, so it is not all there is to a buddha/mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 27th, 2016 at 11:25 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

So here you definition of dharmakāya = emptiness is inadequate, since it would leave dharmakāya as an inert void.

Astus wrote:

Dharmakaya is not a being to be anything, it is a term, a concept, used in various contexts. If you think it should be emptiness-awareness/wisdom/appearances/etc., so be it. We can then go on from there.

Malcolm said:

No, but they do have a word for the insentience of rocks.

Astus wrote:

What is it?

Malcolm said:

As for as there being more than three bodies of the buddha, that very much depends on whether one considers svabhāvakāya to be a synonym for dharmakāya or not. I am inclined to think it is a synonym.

Astus wrote:

As for the fourth body, I think it's just an extra emphasis on the oneness of the three bodies. Or another way to claim superiority of Tantra, similar to adding a fifth wisdom (jnana). Maybe both at the same time. Regardless if it's three or four, Linji said it all (p 19, tr Sasaki): "They are just empty names, and these names are also empty."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 27th, 2016 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, just as there is no partial awareness of dharmakāya, there is partial awareness of tathāgatagarbha.

Johnny Dangerous said:

That actually makes sense, can't have partial awareness of something that is by definition beyond partiality.

Astus wrote:

Just to add another version:

Those Bodhisattvas who, having advanced from the first stage of correct faith by setting the mind upon enlightenment through practicing contemplation, have come to realize the Dharmakaya, can partially comprehend this. Yet even those who have reached the final stage of Bodhisattvahood cannot fully comprehend this; only the Enlightened Ones have thorough comprehension of it. Why? The Mind, though pure in its self-nature from the beginning, is accompanied by ignorance.

(http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Translations/Awakening_of_faith.html)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 28th, 2016 at 12:50 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

is a term used to describe the mind of a buddha. It is not simply an term describing a blank insentient emptiness.

Astus wrote:

Then you have to change the roles given to sambhogakaya and nirmanakaya as the functional aspects. Because where dharmakaya refers to emptiness, the three bodies together make up a complete buddha-mind, and they do not exist separately.

Malcolm said:

Kansthā. It means anything that lacks a mind.

Astus wrote:

Interesting. In the dictionaries online it translates to "rag, patched garment; wall, town". But if it means anything mindless, how is it specifically for rocks?

Malcolm said:

That is how it is parsed in some Vajrayāna contexts, but never in sūtra, where it is generally treated as synonym of dharmakāya.

Astus wrote:

Maybe in TB, but have not encountered with it in EAB. But their unity is known:

"The dharmakāya, saṃbhogakāya, and nirmāṇakāya—
The three bodies are fundamentally a single body.
If one can see it oneself within the nature,
This is the cause of bodhi and the achievement of buddhahood."
(Platform Sutra, ch 10, BDK Edition, p 90)

Malcolm said:

it is easy to reduce everything to nihilism with flippant quotes.

Astus wrote:

"The concluding practice is the conviction that the ordinary mind that was from the beginning the unity of clarity and emptiness is itself the naturally arising three kayas - its emptiness is dharmakaya, its clarity is nirmanakaya, and the union of those is sambhogakaya."

(Jamgon Kongtrul on Mahamudra of the Shangpa Kagyu, in The Treasury of Knowledge: Book Eight, Part Four: Esoteric Instructions, p 246)

"The great state of dharmakaya is space-like emptiness. The expression arising out of the state of primordial purity is a spontaneous presence which includes the two form kayas - sambhogakaya and nirmanakaya. ... What that means is our essence, which is a primordially pure emptiness, is dharmakaya. Indivisible from that is the natural cognizance, the spontaneously present basis for experience that is the sambhogakaya aspect."

(Tulku Urgyen: As It Is, vol 1, p 100)

"As to the three bodies, the pure dharmakāya is your nature, the perfect and complete saṃbhogakāya is your wisdom, and the thousand billion nirmāṇakāyas are your practices (i.e., saṃskāra, "mental activities")."

(Platform Sutra, ch 7, BDK Edition, p 60)

"Emptiness is the Buddha's Dharmakaya, just as the Dharmakaya is emptiness. People's usual understanding is that the Dharmakaya pervades emptiness, and that it is contained in emptiness. However, this is erroneous, for we should understand that the Dharmakaya is emptiness and that emptiness is the Dharmakaya. If one thinks that emptiness is an entity and that this emptiness is separate from the Dharmakaya or that there is a Dharmakaya outside of emptiness, one is holding a wrong view. In the complete absence of views about emptiness, the true Dharmakaya appears. Emptiness and Dharmakaya are not different. The most important thing is your empty, cognizant mind. Its natural emptiness is dharmakaya, also called empty essence. Your natural ability to know and to perceive is cognizant nature, sambhogakaya."

(<http://www.abuddhistlibrary.com/Buddhism/C%20-%20Zen/Ancestors/The%20Zen%20Teachings%20of%20Huang%20Po/Zen%20Teachings%20of%20Huang-po.htm>)

"By what reasoning can it be shown that sentient beings have Buddhature? Because all sentient beings are pervaded by the emptiness of Dharmakaya, because there are no differentiations in the nature of suchness, and because all beings have a "family " For these three reasons, all sentient beings are of the Buddha-nature. ...

To explain the first reason "all sentient beings are pervaded by the emptiness of Dharmakaya" means that the ultimate Buddhahood is Dharmakaya, Dharmakaya is all-pervading emptiness, and emptiness pervades all sentient beings Therefore, all sentient beings are of the Buddha-nature.

Saying "there are no differentiations in the nature of suchness" means that the suchness of the Buddha is identical to the suchness of sentient beings None is better or worse, none is bigger or smaller, none is higher or lower So, because of that, all sentient beings are of the Buddha-nature."

(Gampopa: Jewel Ornament of Liberation, p 49-50)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 28th, 2016 at 2:39 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, you don't have to change anything.

Astus wrote:

If the dharmakaya includes both emptiness and awareness, what do sambhogakaya and nirmanakaya stand for?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 28th, 2016 at 8:48 PM

Title: Re: Zen Language

Content:

Meido said:

Who are the "so-called Zen practitioners", as opposed to Zen practitioners? From what experience do you make definitive statements about what the majority of them want?

Astus wrote:

Zen practitioners are anyone who engage in Zen practice, usually identified as zazen. I have not intended the larger group of Zenophiles (very good term!). As for the reason, it is simply my personal observation from both online and offline sources. It could be added that it is not an exclusively modern Western phenomenon, but a common human behaviour. Of course, it's not exclusive to Zen either. It is normally easier to follow a practical method than to change one's mindset, for example as it happened with yoga.

Meido said:

But really, I think sweeping generalizations about Zen in the West are not terribly useful, and it's not clear to me on what basis you make them.

Astus wrote:

You may consider it as a side note about a possible deviation. It is about how the supply and demand works in terms of Zen community programs and literary products. For Zen groups, the main events are retreats, while in Asia the main events are holiday ceremonies. As for books, let's look at some reading lists. It seems to me that they lack a significant doctrinal part, they focus on meditation, sometimes ethics, but not really on what's behind those things - karma, defilements, dependent origination, wholesome and unwholesome mental factors, etc. And because there is no view provided, people can fill in the gaps with whatever they like.

I think this sums up the attitude quite nicely:

I don't believe in rebirth and yet, I don't negate it. There is no basis to believe or negate it. What I can say for sure is, "I don't know." The important thing for me is to practice in this lifetime as the Buddha instructed in the Dhammapadam, "To refrain from anything bad and practice everything good. Purify your mind. This is the teaching of the seven Buddhas." (Shohaku Okumura:

http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Dogen_Teachings/Genjokoan_Okumura.htm)

So, let's look at those recommended works.

At <https://zmm.mro.org/training/recommended-reading/>:

They recommend DT Suzuki, that's sort of a strong negative. They use questionable translations (for the Diamond Sutra, Vimalakirti Sutra, Surangama Sutra), and history books (Armstrong, Dumoulin). Basic teachings on karma, rebirth, the bodhisattva path, etc. are marginal, while the three major koan collections and most of the available recorded sayings are there. Four books by Trungpa are included, but nothing from Nagarjuna, or on Madhyamaka, Yogacara, or Pure Land, while there is only one book on Tiantai meditation, and one on general Huayan concepts.

At <http://www.oceangatezen.org/resources/a-basic-soto-zen-reading-list/>:

Basic introductory list. Includes mostly modern practice oriented Soto teachings, a Theravada intro, and TNH's intro. It's OK for a start.

At <http://zmc.org/reading-list>:

1 Dogen, 2 Trungpa, 1 Pema Chodron, 12 modern Zen teachers, 5 koan collections. This lacks even the basics, not to mention fundamental Mahayana.

At <http://bostonzen.org/suggested-reading-list/>:

A good number of modern Zen books, one Nikaya anthology, a few Mahayana type intro books, a little Dogen, koan collections, and a mixture of Buddhist and spiritual works.

At http://www.mondozen.org/resource_library/reading_list.htm:

A big mixture of this and that. At least it mentions The Sun of Wisdom by KTG. It's hard to see how someone could gain a complete picture of Buddhism, or even just Zen from that list.

At <http://www.zen-azi.org/en/node/43>:

It gives the basic tone when the second book on the list is Buddhism without Beliefs. Lot of Soto Zen books. Has a nice list of the Nikayas and Mahayana sutras, but nothing comprehensive on schools or teachings besides a practice centred Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 28th, 2016 at 10:31 PM

Title: Re: Zen Language

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

That said, poetic transmissions are useful, really any teaching that goes straight for the jugular and shuts down the conceptual is a real gift.

seeker242 said:

And it seems these are the people who hate koans because koans don't allow for that!

Astus wrote:

"It has been noted that Zen was essentially associated with the literati and the means of dissemination of Zen, such as Recorded Sayings, history of lamp transmission, collections of koan stories, and so on, was highly literary and textual. Zen is basically a literary tradition and a high level of literacy is necessary for understanding the meaning of Zen."

(Jiang Wu: Leaving for the Rising Sun, p 34)

This type of literary Zen (wenzi chan 文字禪) goes back to the Song era when they started composing recorded sayings, lamp transmissions, and koan collections. The Blue Cliff Record is a prime example of that. So, actually it was not about "shutting down the conceptual" at all. And there is still a currency of this sort of literacy, as shown by http://www.thezensite.com/ZenBookReviews/Zen_Sand.html, but Meido can probably say more.

I would compare this "Zen language" to other forms of Buddhist intellectual products, like abhidharma, madhyamaka, yogacara, etc. They are all works of the educated elite for other members of that group, and they are meant to convey the Dharma in a respected and appropriate format.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 28th, 2016 at 10:35 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

conebeckham said:

See my post above for one explanation....

Astus wrote:

What you gave seems to follow the original quote in identifying the dharmakaya with emptiness ("non-thought" free of clear fixation), while clarity goes to the sambhogakaya, and appearances to the nirmanakaya. Or did I miss something?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 28th, 2016 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

In which system? In which context?

Astus wrote:

Whichever you think is fine.

Malcolm said:

If you claim, as you have, that dharmakāya is only emptiness, there is the fault that dharmakāya will be a blank void.

Astus wrote:

I don't hold the dharmakaya to be anything, not even blank void. It is just a term for the emptiness side of buddha-mind, while the rupakaya accounts for the aware, functional side. If we move the aware quality from the rupakaya to the dharmakaya side, it matters little to me, except that then the rupakaya needs new roles.

Malcolm said:

The dharmakāya is realization of emptiness, the realization of dharmatā. That realization is nondual with emptiness, but it still is a realization. A blank void cannot realize anything.

Astus wrote:

One realises things with the mind. That the mind is empty, that quality can be called the dharmakaya. Otherwise, if it is the realisation of emptiness, it is a very momentary occurrence. If it is the result of the realisation, the enlightened mind, then of course it cannot be a mere blankness.

Malcolm said:

Furthermore, the next fault is that a blank void cannot be a source of anything, and dharmakāya is the source of the two rūpakāyas.

Astus wrote:

If dharmakaya means the enlightened mind, what are the other kayas?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 29th, 2016 at 1:11 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

We have already seen that dharmakāya is defined as the buddha's jñāna, his pristine consciousness, which is characterized by the twin omniscience.

Astus wrote:

You also mentioned before that the dharmakaya is unconditioned. Do you propose an unconditioned consciousness then?

Malcolm said:

Which mind? Certainly not the eight consciousnesses. For example, which mind among the eight consciousnesses is operative in the realization of emptiness?

Astus wrote:

Realisation of emptiness is the elimination of the wrong concept of essence. That ignorance is removed from the mind (the 8th in the 8 consciousnesses system) by correct discernment (of the 6th).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 29th, 2016 at 1:20 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

conebeckham said:

I've not seen Rupakaya defined as the "aware" part.....It's defined as the "benefit for others" and so we can say it's the "functional" part. Dharmakaya is defined as the "benefit for oneself" so therefore it must mean more than just the empty quality. It must have some other "quality"--the quality of awareness, IMO.

Astus wrote:

There are the threefold body of the nature of mind, and the threefold body of buddhas. When applied to the mind, that's where sambhogakaya is called clarity. When to the buddhas, it is identical to the dharmadhatu.

conebeckham said:

Sambhogakaya, in this presentation, is bliss with non-thought. So, we can say it's empty as well, but it has a blissful quality.

Dharmakaya, in this presentation, is a state of "'non-thought' free of clear fixation." If we take 'non-thought' to be emptiness of mind, we still have to understand what is "free of clear fixation." "Clear Fixation" does not mean lack of clarity.

Astus wrote:

Is there anything that's not empty? Unless there is, there is no point in using it as a quality again and again. I mean, we can then say sambhogakaya is bliss. As for the dharmakaya, if it means "free of clear fixation", doesn't that simply mean without fixation? If the definitive quality of dharmakaya that it has no fixation, then it is just lack of fixation in the mind. And because it is an absence, it is not an actual quality of something, just like emptiness.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 29th, 2016 at 1:28 AM

Title: Re: Zen Language

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

On a related note, what is the sort of cultural history of Zen poetry involving depictions of the natural world?

Astus wrote:

Perhaps: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Shanshui_poetry.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 29th, 2016 at 1:34 AM

Title: Re: Zen Language

Content:

seeker242 said:

Did the 6th patriarch have a high level of literacy? If not, then that essentially proves that statement to be false, does it not?

Astus wrote:

The Platform Sutra is a literary product. In fact, as we can see from the Dunhuang version, it was used as the very emblem and source of transmission. As for Huineng's biography, it is good fiction.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 29th, 2016 at 5:53 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

I didn't mention it. The sūtras maintain this is so. They also maintain that dharmakāya is jñāna. Draw your own conclusions.

Astus wrote:

Unconditioned knowing is not possible, unless one accepts a soul. So, the meaning is something else.

Malcolm said:

Mano-vijñāna is a nonconceptual consciousness, like the other five sense consciousnesses.

Astus wrote:

The mano-vijnana is the thinking mind, the one with all the thoughts and ideas, i.e. concepts. It is also the one that becomes discerning wisdom (pratyavekṣaṇājñāna / 妙觀察智). So, what you seem to be saying is that conceptuality is non-conceptual. Manas only adds the grasping at self, and a number of basic defilements.

The first mind as subjective transformer is the ālaya-vijñāna. The ālayavijñāna flawlessly retains all of our past experiences, and recognizes and contextualizes things as we cognize them. our experiences, according to their depth and significance upon our lives, are difficult to remove.

The second subjective transformer is the manas. in this case, objects of cognition are transformed by a deep attachment to the self, and the resulting tendencies to protect and further that self.

Then, already subject to these subconscious influences, the cognitive function of the thinking consciousness and the five sense consciousnesses—that is, the discrimination of things — arises.

(Tagawa Shun'ei: Living Yogacara, p 17)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 29th, 2016 at 5:59 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

conebeckham said:

If something is merely empty, an emptiness, a null set, or whatever, then how could there be any fixation, how could there be anything to be fixated on, and what would be "doing the fixating?" Perhaps we can look into what could be fixated in the first place.....

Astus wrote:

Emptiness does not exist, it only means that the aggregates are without essence. But there are dependent appearances, it's not complete blankness. Fixation is just the mistake that there is an essence. Once that delusion is gone, there is no cause for fixating on appearances, but again, it's not the end of appearances.

conebeckham said:

You seem to want to equate "clarity" with awareness. I see clarity as a quality of a certain kind of awareness.

Astus wrote:

How many kinds of awareness do you have?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 29th, 2016 at 7:16 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

So for you Buddhamind is conditioned, therefore it is impermanent.

Astus wrote:

On the one hand, that's what Huineng and Dogen says, that buddha-mind is impermanent. On the other, supposing a buddha outside of one's mind (buddha-nature beyond the five aggregates) makes it an unattainable theory.

Malcolm said:

The presentation you provide of yogacara i really dont agree with. Try sourcing from Asanga.

Astus wrote:

Do you have a quote perhaps, to give the interpretation of manas and manovijnana you agree with?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 29th, 2016 at 7:18 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

conebeckham said:

Dependent appearances occur to a mind, these appearances or occurrences are the Nirmanakaya. Fixation does not merely mean that one mistakes an essence of objects, in this case.

Astus wrote:

Mind itself is a dependent appearance. What more does fixation mean?

conebeckham said:

There are different ways to answer that question, right? We can parse sense consciousnesses, mental consciousness, or we can talk of a single awareness, like the monkey in the window of a many-windowed house. Or we can talk about Pristine Awareness.

Astus wrote:

True.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 29th, 2016 at 7:14 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

So whatever 'the unconditioned' is, it is insentient?

Astus wrote:

Necessarily it is. Sentience requires the ability of cognisance, of perception. Those are conditioned events, just like any event is dependent. Unconditioned consciousness would mean a permanent consciousness, hence an eternal moment of a single thought, and that is as good as no consciousness at all.

Wayfarer said:

Is that so?

Astus wrote:

If it were independent, it would be useless, because it would be without contact to anything.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 29th, 2016 at 7:22 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

What is it that recognizes affliction? Is that faculty itself afflicted? If there is an unconditioned, an unborn, an unmade, what knows that? Is what knows that a mind that is made and born?

Astus wrote:

Afflictions are unwholesome thoughts and emotions. So, can one be angry at anger? Sure. Can one look at anger in a not angry manner? Of course. Thus one can either worsen one's situation or improve on it, or just keep it on.

Nirvana is the unborn and unconditioned. Nirvana means the end of afflictions, because all the causes of afflictions are gone. When there is no fuel, there is no fire. But a fire extinguished is not some being, self, or consciousness.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 29th, 2016 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

How could it be 'pleasant'? For whom? Why is it not just non-existence?

Astus wrote:

The Buddha says at the beginning of that sutta: "Just that is the pleasure here, my friend: where there is nothing felt."

Why?

"If, as he remains there, he is beset with attention to perceptions dealing with sensuality, that is an affliction for him. Just as pain arises as an affliction in a healthy person for his affliction, even so the attention to perceptions dealing with sensuality that beset the monk is an affliction for him. Now, the Blessed One has said that whatever is an affliction is stress. So by this line of reasoning it may be known how Unbinding is pleasant."

And the text goes through all the jhanas like that. So, because in nirvana there are no afflictions at all, it is pleasant.

Wayfarer said:

Again, is Nirvāṇa the 'end of afflictions' or complete non-existence?

Astus wrote:

It is the extinction of craving, the end of attachment. Craving is not all there is, so it is not total annihilation.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 30th, 2016 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: Sutras of the Chinese Canon?

Content:

seeker242 said:

So how would one go about determining what particular Mahayana sutras are canonical according to the Chinese Canon?

Astus wrote:

There are canons, not just a single authoritative collection. And even in one canon you can find more than one translation of a number of sutras. Previously it was the emperor in China who authorised (and sponsored) a collection.

You can read about it a bit on https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Chinese_Buddhist_canon.

seeker242 said:

Is there a list somewhere, in English?

Astus wrote:

Check this: <http://terebess.hu/zen/szoto/Map-of-the-Taisho.pdf>

seeker242 said:

For example, is the Lotus Sutra canonical? The Heart sutra? The Diamond sutra? The Surangama? I'm sure there is someone who could tell me if they are or not but how would I find out for myself?

Astus wrote:

If you look at the above "map", you find that there are whole sections, like one for the Lotus Sutra (Volume 9: 法華部類 Lotus Sutra Section: T0262 – T0277), a smaller for the Heart Sutra (T0250-T0257 般若心經 Wisdom Heart Sutras), and the Diamond Sutra (T0235-T0239 金剛般若經 Vajra Wisdom Sutras). As for the Surangama, there is the Surangamasamadhi Sutra (T0642) translated by Kumarajiva in the Sutra section, and there is the Surangama Sutra (T0945), the one popular among Chan people, in the Tantra section.

If you want to find out for yourself, check the source of the English translation. For instance, <http://sutrasmantras.info/sutra0.html> uses the CBETA version of the Taisho Canon, and he notes that in the translation, just like other translators do.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 30th, 2016 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Strange that they says this. It means that either you have not understood them, or that they are wrong.

Astus wrote:

As for Huineng, it wasn't given much weight anywhere - as far as I am aware -, probably because it is a short discussion between him and an advocate of the Nirvana Sutra. The exception is Dogen, who used that bit to turn it into an attack on a prevalent interpretation of buddha-mind. While it was Dogen who made that interpretation one of the main elements of his teachings, as he shows by a number of quotations, the common reification of buddha-nature has been pointed out by teachers before him as well. More on Dogen's buddha-nature interpretation: http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/key_terms/pdf/key_terms13.pdf, <http://www.lionsroar.com/impermanence-is-buddha-nature-embrace-changemay-2012/>, <http://terebess.hu/zen/dogen/Kodera-Dogen.pdf>, <https://books.google.com/books?id=AmKE2xljOwcC>.

Malcolm said:

Mipham states:

Astus wrote:

As I see it, the dual qualities of emptiness-awareness can be applied perfectly well to the five aggregates, in the sense that they are without essence, and at the same time exist as experiences. But assuming that there is something beyond, an eternal knower, is just a self-view.

Malcolm said:

The problem is, that aside from the five sense organ consciousness, all the three others can be described as conceptual consciousnesses

Astus wrote:

The reason I said it's the 6th, is because both the 7th and 8th are latent. They are proposed in order to set up a fairly coherent theoretical model, but nobody ever actually experiences them, they are practically non-functional.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 30th, 2016 at 2:24 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

conebeckham said:

Where are habitual tendencies? Where are karmic seeds? Where is memory?

Astus wrote:

Can there be an object of consciousness, a mental phenomenon, without consciousness/mind? If yes, then there are unthought thoughts and unfelt feelings. If no, then habits, seeds, and memory cannot exist in some hidden way.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 30th, 2016 at 2:48 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Dependent origination was never taught to explain the nature of things. It was taught only explain the process of delusion and how to reverse it.

Astus wrote:

I did not refer to the 12 links only, but the general concept of causality. Three examples:
<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Patthana>,
<http://www.chinabuddhismencyclopedia.com/en/index.php/Paratantra>, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Indra%27s_net.

Malcolm said:

Second, there are no "things" for which dependent origination is the nature.

Astus wrote:

"No things" is exactly what dependent origination is about. But illusory doesn't mean nothing.

Malcolm said:

since the eight consciousness are strictly deluded, there can be no buddhahood in them.

Astus wrote:

That's when they "turn into" the four wisdoms. But it's just the same old body-mind without delusion.

Malcolm said:

There can be no time, conditions, causes, etc., in a real sense.

Astus wrote:

It's all in an unreal sense. That's the whole point of emptiness, to see how unreal everything is. And they are all already unreal just as they are. The only error is this deluded idea of a real self, real substance. There is no error in a bowl of soup, or a pair of socks. The error is imagining them to be anything that they are not.

Malcolm said:

Since the the all-basis consciousness is the imputing nature, it is very active.

Astus wrote:

Do you experience the innumerable seeds replicating themselves every moment, waiting to be ripened in an unknown future time?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 30th, 2016 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Even so, this does not go beyond delusion.

Astus wrote:

Anything that is beyond causality is irrelevant in life.

Malcolm said:

No, it isn't.

Astus wrote:

In that case, there is neither enlightenment in this life, nor is it compatible with life.

Malcolm said:

This is a subtle reification of things. Your view here is very much the same as the Gelugpa view.

Astus wrote:

Do you think then that the problem is not (only) with attachment, but with appearances?

Malcolm said:
All delusion is the experience of seeds/traces.

Astus wrote:
Deluded experiences are manifestations of seeds, not the seeds themselves.

Author: Astus
Date: Saturday, April 30th, 2016 at 6:42 PM
Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?
Content:

Malcolm said:
Causality is a delusion. Further, your assertion proposes that there cannot be a consciousness of any kind which is free of the three realms, which does not take birth in the three realms, that outside of the three realms there can be no sort of consciousness at all.

Astus wrote:
If the three realms stand for a deluded approach, one should leave all that behind; but as long as there is something one takes as the true self, an ultimate consciousness, it is still the three realms of delusion. If the three realms can be viewed with either a pure or an impure mind, then there is no other realm or consciousness to look for either, thus we are already in the pure land of Shakyamuni.

Malcolm said:
Au contraire, this is why we have rainbow body.

Astus wrote:
This body-mind is no different from a rainbow - it looks like there is something, but it's just the momentary product of causes and conditions.

Malcolm said:
The problem is with deluded appearances. The appearances of pristine consciousness are not a problem, and nor can there be any attachment to them. If there is attachment, the appearance is automatically a product of delusion and is delusion.

Astus wrote:
Then this is only a matter of terminology.

Malcolm said:
All eight consciousnesses and their attendant dharmas are delusion, products of delusion and experiences of delusion.

Astus wrote:
The question is about experiencing seeds, not delusions. Since seeds are not experienced, they are conceptual assumptions of a theoretical explanation, a philosophical attempt to connect action and fruit.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 30th, 2016 at 6:47 PM

Title: Re: ye shes and jalus

Content:

Malcolm said:

but perhaps you will not cast a shadow.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 30th, 2016 at 7:14 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

When the three realms are seen as delusion from top to bottom, then it is seen correctly.

Astus wrote:

And the question is if you propose that the seer is real or illusory.

Malcolm said:

Pristine consciousness is not a product of causes and conditions since no causes and conditions can be found at all. If you insist that the only thing that exists are things produced out of causes and conditions, your view is really no better than realism, and betrays an inner attachment to a self of persons and things.

Astus wrote:

Pristine consciousness is the same consciousness as the deluded one, with the difference that it lacks identification. And then it can be said that the absence of identification is unconditioned.

Malcolm said:

What I am saying here is that what one experiences is the seeds in the sense that without the seeds/traces there are no deluded experiences to be had.

Astus wrote:

Yes, the seeds are the assumed causes of delusion. And because it is merely an assumption, it's nothing experienced, but an element of a theoretical explanation.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 30th, 2016 at 7:36 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The seer is empty clarity.

Astus wrote:

Is clarity a form of consciousness/awareness/knowing? If yes, it is conditioned. If no, what is it?

Malcolm said:

Pristine consciousness is not the same consciousness as the deluded consciousness, but you can say that the eight consciousnesses arise from mistaking the nature of self-originated pristine consciousness for being a self.

Astus wrote:

If the eight consciousnesses are the assumption of self in consciousness, when there is no such mistake, it is impure. Is that what you say?

Malcolm said:

So what, now you are saying that the all-basis consciousness is merely a theory?

Astus wrote:

I have been saying that for a while.

Malcolm said:

I also note that you did not reply to my charge that you are suffering from an hidden grasping to the self of persons and things by your insistence on the verity of cause and condition.

Astus wrote:

Causality is the basis of the conventional, the illusory. I don't say it is anything more than conceptual.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 1st, 2016 at 2:12 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Your assertion that all consciousnesses are conditioned is unproven. For example, Vasubandhu notes that there are unconditioned sensations and perceptions among the six unconditioned dharma he identifies.

Astus wrote:

So, the 6 unconditioned dharma are: space, 4 types of cessation, suchness. None of them are anything in particular. Calling them "consciousness" doesn't really fit, since they do not denote any thought, feeling, or perception.

Malcolm said:

Not only that, but the Bodhisattvapitika clearly states: Further, an unconditioned consciousness is a pristine consciousness (jñāna)

Astus wrote:

That refers to the absence of self-grasping. But what functions as consciousness is dependently arisen.

Malcolm said:

Consciousness in which there is no delusion is a pristine consciousness, self-originated and unconditioned.

Astus wrote:

See my previous comment. Although it can be said that since there is no attachment, it doesn't rely on anything, doesn't identify with anything, so in a way it is as you say. My problem is that when it is said there is an "unconditioned consciousness", because consciousness means knowing and thinking, and there can be no knowing and thinking without causes and conditions, it is a contradiction.

Malcolm said:

So what isn't a theory?

Astus wrote:

That's a valid question. The difference here is that while normally it is easy to identify the first six consciousnesses, and that's what one works with, the 7th and 8th are not seen nor used for anything, except for theorising about karma.

Malcolm said:

No, the basis of the "conventional" is delusion. Cause and condition cannot be established apart from delusion, they are rooted in delusion, and therefore, the basis of the conventional is also delusion.

Astus wrote:

The delusion in conventional is to take it for the absolute. When conventional is seen as conventional, there is no problem, so it is then the absolute. In other words, conventional is not negated but enlightened. But, again, we can say that there is either deluded functions and buddha functions, and the two never meet. However, I consider that model more misleading.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 1st, 2016 at 4:28 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Um, Astus, one is called vedana-asamkṛita, the other is called samjñā asamkṛita, respectively unconditioned sensation and unconditioned perception/ideation.

Astus wrote:

I used this one from Vasubandhu:

<http://www.acmuller.net/yogacara/outlines/100dharma.html>. What is your source?

Malcolm said:

If you claim it is merely an essence of phenomena that have not arisen, this means you grasp to the conventional as real. This comes from not understanding homogeneity and nonduality.

Astus wrote:

Being real requires an essence. Without essence, what is there to be called real? Conventionality is nominal interdependence, appearing illusion without anything substantiating it. To say that there is nothing that arises is a conventional expression that sounds like utter nothingness. I'm not saying that the dharmas are not unborn. What I'm saying is that there are other ways to put things.

Malcolm said:

That is really not true at all. For example, what takes rebirth in the yogacara system is precisely the ālayavijñāna.

Astus wrote:

That's how they came up with an explanation for karma, positing a hidden consciousness to bridge death and birth, cause and effect, etc.

Malcolm said:

When we see the conventional as the conventional, then we can understand that things like causes and conditions are just erroneous attributions. Since this is the case, conditioned consciousnesses are impossible. Why? Because when the conventional is seen as conventional, it is seen as a delusion.

Astus wrote:

And that's all we have, the illusory world. An opposite of that would be a real world, or nothingness. Here you just deny it, so that's the nothingness option.

Malcolm said:

Further, the Kāśyapa-parivarta Sūtra states: ...

Sthiramati's comment on how this is understood is instructive: ...

Astus wrote:

That is equal to saying: not this, not that, but I cannot say what. That is not an argument, or even a statement.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 1st, 2016 at 5:57 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

'Delusion' is a mental or existential state, isn't it? Rocks and other insentient objects can't be subject to delusion. So there must be a subject of delusion, musn't there?

What becomes of the subject when delusion is dispersed? If the subject merely ceases to exist, how is that not nihilism?

Astus wrote:

There is no subject of delusion, because in that case subject and delusion would be two things. And that's how buddha-nature often sounds like, for instance when in the <http://sutrasmantras.info/sutra50.html> they talk of it as hidden under defilements. However, assuming a duality between buddha-nature and the defilements is exactly the theory of atman. The Buddha has denied the existence of a subject, and only when a subject is assumed one falls into the extremes of eternity and annihilation. When you say that a subject ceases to exist, that is the mistake of positing a subject.

Delusion exists as an element of the mind-stream, and when delusion is removed, it's not a factor in the mind any more. It is like the clearing of water, that is not coloured by defilements (see:

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn46/sn46.055.wlsh.html>).

Wayfarer said:

But there are clear precedents for the 'transcendent' nature of mind even in the Pali sources:

Astus wrote:

It's jhana radiance, not soul radiance.

"In early Buddhism, the "radiant mind" (pabhassara citta) refers neither to an absolutely pure state of mind nor to spiritual liberation, but is the dhyanic mind that is radiant on account of not being disturbed or influenced by external stimuli."

(<http://dharmafarer.org/wordpress/wp-content/uploads/2009/12/8.3-Radiant-mind.-piya.pdf>)

Wayfarer said:

"Consciousness without feature, without end, luminous all around: Here water, earth, fire, & wind have no footing. Here long & short coarse & fine fair & foul name & form are all brought to an end. With the cessation of [the activity of] consciousness each is here brought to an end."

Astus wrote:

As the sutta itself says, consciousness ceases. Adding in brackets "activity of" means little, since a non-active consciousness is just unconsciousness. See more: <https://sujato.wordpress.com/2011/05/13/vinna%E1%B9%87a-is-not-nibbana-really-it-just-isn%E2%80%99t/>. More analysis on the unestablished consciousness: <http://dharmafarer.org/wordpress/wp-content/uploads/2009/12/17.8a-Khandha-5-Vinnana-piya.pdf>.

Wayfarer said:

There is also an exposition of the 'true nature of mind' in the Aspiration Prayer of Mahamudra.

Astus wrote:

Yes, it is part of the teachings of Mahamudra, Zen, etc. And what does it practically mean? Not much, really. One is promised to attain some marvellous mind, like Nanda was promised heavenly maidens, but then the practice is all about not grasping anything and seeing all phenomena as empty. There is even strong criticism of those who grasp a watcher mind, something that they identify as the true self in Vedanta. But in Mahamudra, just like as in Zen, there is nothing to be found, nothing to be seen, even buddhas don't see it.

"It is not nonexistent--it is the basis of all samsara and nirvana."

Chokyi Nyima's comment:

"But on the other hand, we have various sorts of feelings and thoughts, as well as our sense organs, which link objects and consciousness together. Different sense perceptions occur; we see forms, hear sounds and so forth. So because of perception, mind is not nonexistent. In this way the extreme of the mind as a complete nothing is also avoided."

(Song of Karmapa, p 65)

That is, we have thoughts and feelings, there are things coming and going. That's why it is not a big nothingness. Not because we have an eternal, independent knower. It is no different from Madhyamaka's middle way of empty interdependence.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 1st, 2016 at 6:09 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Same text, Tibetan translation from Chinese.

Astus wrote:

I don't see any feeling and perception among the unconditioned dharmas on that list. Unless you mean saṃjñā-vedayita-nirodha, what is a cessation.

Malcolm said:

If nothing substantiates nominal interdependence, why argue so hard that consciousness must be conditioned?

Astus wrote:

There is just nominal interdependence, that is, conditioned phenomena. Saying that there is an unconditioned consciousness leans towards permanence, and saying there is no consciousness leans towards nothingness. So, I prefer the language of dependence-impermanence.

Malcolm said:

It is not a hidden consciousness.

Astus wrote:

Who experiences it? Ordinary people don't see it, and buddhas don't even have it. Plus there is a problem that it requires innumerable moments of consciousness in a single moment, in order to maintain the flow of unripe past impressions.

Malcolm said:

No, there is no denial, even an illusory world is not established. Why deny what has never been established from the start?

Astus wrote:

Illusoriness is what not being established is. Besides that, see my comment on the leanings of terminology.

Malcolm said:

It is a very good argument, one that has left you silenced and unable to reply.

Astus wrote:

I have replied that it's not an argument. You just turned that into a personal remark now, instead of showing how it was a valid statement from your part.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 2nd, 2016 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I'm afraid I don't agree. If what you were saying were true, the Buddha would have ceased to exist at the moment of the enlightenment. But, he did not, obviously.

Astus wrote:

Why would he have ceased? It is only craving, attachment, ignorance that's removed. In other words, the difference is whether there is or there is not any grasping at the aggregates. The aggregates are not gone.

Wayfarer said:

The radiant mind, it says in that verse we are discussing, is 'obscured by adventitious defilements'; so how could the radiant mind and its obscurations be the same?

Astus wrote:

If something is dirty, it is not radiant. But if dirt and light are separate, then it is radiant no matter what.

Wayfarer said:

That verse you have quoted says 'consciousness without end', so how could something 'without end' come to cease? 'The consciousness that ends' is the mano-vijnana.

Astus wrote:

There is infinite consciousness, the 7th jhana. But it's not permanent. As for what mind ceases, it only says vijnana. The Yogacara version of mano-vijnana is a different system.

Wayfarer said:

But the intrinsically-aware or -knowing nature of mind is not the same as Ātman.

Astus wrote:

What is the difference?

Wayfarer said:

I understand what the 'problem of reification' is, but there is an opposite problem, which is the 'problem of nullification', which is what I think you're falling into.

Astus wrote:

Annihilation is the error when something is eliminated or something ceases to exist. There has never been an essence ever, so it cannot be nullified. So, where does it apply to what I say?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 2nd, 2016 at 1:22 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, delusion exists as an adulteration of the mind, but since it is not inherent to the mind, it is extraneous to the mind from the beginning.

Astus wrote:

Delusion is the delusion of the mind, not something outside it. As for its inherency, I did not say anything like that.

Malcolm said:

This not only a dhyānic radiance.

Astus wrote:

It is not, "In the later developed concept...", as the essay says. And so it's been further developed in Theravada, just like in Mahayana. But it has not been said so in the suttas themselves.

I also recommend Sujato's <https://sujato.wordpress.com/2014/10/29/on-the-radiant-mind/> of the scripture, where he writes: "Nowhere is there any suggestion that it has anything to do with Nibbana."

Similarly,

<http://www.dhammadownload.com/viewtopic.php?p=315864&sid=619c200efdfac56bfbf9d86acd213aaa#p315864> as well agree that the sutta refers to jhana.

Malcolm said:

So you are an advocate of cessation. When a buddha or arhat dies, his consciousness ceases. This is definitely not the Mahāyāna view.

Astus wrote:

I simply pointed out what the sutta literally says. However, the Nikayas do not support the idea that parinibbana equals cessation, as it's been repeated in several suttas regarding that question.

Malcolm said:

In order for one thing to depend on another thing, one thing must arise upon which another must depend. But this does not solve anything. Why? Since the arising of even one thing cannot be established, there is no arising.

Astus wrote:

Yes, that's fine.

Malcolm said:

Everything which appears is merely a conditioned self-apparent display nondual with an conditioned self-originated pristine consciousness.

Astus wrote:

That's certainly one way to say it. However, if we analysed that sentence, it would be quite problematic. For instance, just as you say that arising of even one thing is not established, self-origination is refuted in the same way.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 2nd, 2016 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

This is the error of your view. You imagine that conventional things are like hollow bubbles, they have no insides, but they still somehow exist.

Astus wrote:

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.095.than.html>, and

All conditioned phenomena

Are like a dream, an illusion, a bubble, a shadow

Like the dew, or like lightning

You should discern them like this

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html, ch 32)

Malcolm said:

In reality, also the hollow bubbles you cling to have never arisen, so what is the need to even speak of their essence?

Astus wrote:

Sure, all dharmas are unborn, inconceivable, and inexpressible. At the same time, there is no emptiness outside the aggregates, or to talk of anything else but the insubstantiality of one's experiences. Denying appearances, denying conventionality - what is that good for? As I have quoted before Chokyi Nyima's comment, it's not all just non-existence. Similarly, it is exactly because all things are unborn that they are interdependently apparent. As the quote goes (MMK 24.14): "All is possible when emptiness is possible. Nothing is possible when emptiness is impossible."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 2nd, 2016 at 5:41 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

In the Tibetan, it is clearly translated as "unconditioned" ('dus ma byas, asaṃskṛita), not "cessation" (nirodha, dgog pa). You are using Mueller's list, not the text itself.

Astus wrote:

Muller simply translated it: http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T31n1614_001, and it lists the same 6 unconditioned dharmas, 1 empty space (虛空), 1 suchness (真如), and 4 types of cessation (滅). <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kuiji> http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T44n1836_002 lists the same six. See also the <http://www.cttbusa.org/100shastra/100dharmas9.asp>.

Malcolm said:

There are no moments, so this is not a problem. The three times are not established.

Astus wrote:

If that's not a problem, then there is no need for any seeds to connect past actions with future fruits, thus the storehouse-consciousness is redundant.

Malcolm said:

It is an argument — nonconceptual pristine consciousness is immune to refutation because it is free from all extremes.

Astus wrote:

It is nonconceptual, and not conceptual. That's an extreme. It is pristine, not defiled. That's an extreme. It is an independent consciousness, not a dependent one. That's an extreme. Since it's not at all free from extremes, it is not immune to refutation either.

Malcolm said:

The point is that delusion is not part of the mind.

Astus wrote:

Is it outside the mind then? Because then the mind need not be purified.

Malcolm said:

Do you take the suttas to be the definitive statement on the Buddha's teachings?

Astus wrote:

It depends on what teachings. If the question is about the meaning in the context of the Nikayas, that's what should be looked at. If the question is, let's say, a Yogacara interpretation of the Agamas, then look at the Yogacara works.

Malcolm said:

One says "self-originated" because reality is only discerned for oneself without depending on another.

Astus wrote:

So is it another term for mind made?

Malcolm said:

Sure there is emptiness outside of the aggregates, the emptiness of emptiness, for example, or the emptiness of the unconditioned. The dharmadhātu is an emptiness "outside of the aggregates.

Astus wrote:

Seeing the emptiness of the aggregates is about clarifying whatever we experience. Otherwise, the various categories of emptiness are for refuting specific attachments to specific ideas, so theoretically we could have as many types of emptiness as concepts.

Malcolm said:

Who is denying appearances? Appearances self-display, but no cause and condition can be found for them. Who denies conventionality? The conventional is just deluded attributions for self-displayed appearances.

Astus wrote:

Is self-display like self-originated, i.e. mind made? If, as you seem to say, the correct view is when appearances only self-display without causality and interdependence, then how can one drink tea that way, or even get dressed?

Malcolm said:

But this not a confirmation of conventionality.

Astus wrote:

It seems so to me.

Magja Jagchub's commentary to MMK 24.14:

"For the one for whom emptiness is possible, all conventional principles, such as those pertaining to the four noble truths, will be possible as well. Below it is then explained how that which originates in dependence is devoid of nature and, therefore, emptiness.

...

As this is the case, conventional dependent origination is possible for those for whom natural emptiness is possible. All the [principles] mentioned above, from the noble truths to mundane conventions, will then be just as feasible since they are included within dependent origination. Yet for the one for whom emptiness is not possible, that is, the one for whom there is a nature, dependent origination is not possible either. Hence, everything that falls under the category of dependent origination, such as the noble truths and mundane convention, becomes impossible as well."

Tsongkhapa's commentary to the same verse:

"This is why it makes sense: we maintain emptiness to be the emptiness of essential existence of that which is dependently arisen. Therefore, for anyone to whom emptiness makes sense, dependent arising makes sense.

...

All mundane and transcendental phenomena, the sacred and the profane, their effects and mundane conventions make sense. The Commentary explains that the reason that all of these make sense is that they exist and that is also in accord with the madhyamika's system. Therefore, this does not mean that since they are said to exist, we fall into the extreme of reification or that all systems need to be consigned to the perspective of others."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 2nd, 2016 at 5:22 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Karma is only function of a delusion; the eight consciousness are just a name for different functions of one consciousness, that consciousness is deluded.

Astus wrote:

It cannot be a function of consciousness if there is no consciousness/awareness of it.

Malcolm said:

It is free from extremes since none of these terms are relevant to the meaning. It can't be refuted because it not a subject of analysis by ordinary persons.

Astus wrote:

What is relevant to the meaning then? It is still a statement made within the boundaries of conventional language, so it cannot be exempt from the rules of argument.

Malcolm said:

Right, the mind does not need to purified. It is an affliction to be abandoned.

Astus wrote:

Where are the afflictions, if not within the realm of consciousness?

Malcolm said:

Nope. Pratyatmyavedana, "personally known for oneself."

Astus wrote:

That's a strange Sanskrit word. If you mean that it is personal experience, then mind made also fits, in the sense that it happens only to/in the mind, in other words, it is subjective. It is something Theravadins sing in the http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/vandana.pdf, one of the <http://www.purifymind.com/Introduction.htm>: "Paccattam veditabbo vinnuhi" - to be personally realised by the wise.

Malcolm said:

Drinking tea and getting dressed are activities of delusion.

Astus wrote:

Delusions are all there is.

"Conditioned generation is the place of enlightenment, because ignorance and so forth through old age and death, are all unexhausted. The afflictions are bodhi, because of understanding according to actuality. Sentient beings are the place of enlightenment, because of understanding no-self. All dharmas are the place of enlightenment, because of understanding the emptiness of the dharmas."

(Vimalakirti Sutra, ch 4, BDK Edition, p 100)

Malcolm said:

Madhyamakās cling to correct relative truth, not understanding homogeneity and nonduality.

Astus wrote:

What do you mean by homogeneity and nonduality?

Malcolm said:

Everything is completely equivalent to an illusion, not merely "like" an illusion.

Astus wrote:

I think there are two possible reasons that rarely anyone puts up an extreme claim as you seem to do. Antinomianism is feared to be misused as <http://www.georgegatenby.id.au/kw40.htm>, or one wants a more coherent system that includes the stages of the path. Probably the two goes together.

Illusions are causes and conditions. It makes little difference to call pain and joy illusory as long as one is bound by them. And when not bound, it doesn't matter whether one calls them illusory or not either.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 2nd, 2016 at 5:58 PM

Title: Re: What is the ultimate good according to Mahayana and Vajrayana?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is neither a positive, nor a negative axiology. But at the same time there is. In Chinese they call them those who advocate existence (you 有), and those who teach non-existence (wu 無).

Theravada sounds like annihilationism, Mahayana sounds like eternalism.

The Nikayas state clearly that statements about the Tathagata after death is nonsense, since even in life there is nowhere to pinpoint him. In other words, there has never been a self, so there is no self to disappear.

Mahayana talks of the eternal life of the buddhas, and the true self of the buddha-nature. But once you care to actually look beyond those terms and analyse what is actually meant there, it will turn out to be nothing else but emptiness.

All of Buddhism follows the idea of the four noble truths, the gist of that is how attachment is the wrong move that leads to all problems. Consequently, it is not something to be attained, but attachment to be stopped in order to gain peace. One can go on from satipatthana through zazen to mahamudra, and that's what one has to understand, practice, and accomplish. On the other side, it is taught that with the attainment of wisdom comes morality as well.

As for the ultimate good, here's one famous stanza from Zen (Record of Linji, p 32, tr Sasaki):

When hunger comes I eat my rice;
When sleep comes I close my eyes.
Fools laugh at me, but
The wise man understands.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 3rd, 2016 at 12:52 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

So for you, there can only be conceptual consciousness, and no nonconceptual consciousness, which means there can be no direct perceptions, and awakening is therefore also a conceptual state.

Astus wrote:

How so? Even the highest jhanas can be experienced, they can occur in the realm of the mind. Seeds do not exist as experiences at all. It's not a question of nonconceptuality.

Malcolm said:

It is immune from the conventions of language because nonconceptual pristine cannot be accessed through conceptual analysis, that is the point of Sthiramati's presentation of the Buddha's meaning.

Astus wrote:

If it's not accessed through conceptual analysis, it is neither a statement, nor an argument, since it cannot be said what is immune.

Malcolm said:

Thus, mind is an affliction to be abandoned. Pristine consciousness is a quality to be acquired. Differentiating mind and pristine consciousness, in the end, is all the path is about.

Astus wrote:

Unfortunately, pristine consciousness is something that cannot be known. It can't be known because it is beyond ordinary mind, and it cannot be known because it is not even in the scope of consciousness. So, how do you differentiate?

Malcolm said:

That is a pretty pessimistic view, and is at the heart of what Wayfarer was trying to get at with "if there is a an born, etc., there is an unborn, etc."

Astus wrote:

Why pessimistic? That's the inseparable two truths. It's just that while you like to say rainbow bodies and unconditioned minds, I like a cup of coffee and a slice of <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kal%C3%A1cs>.

Malcolm said:

Sure, no sentient beings, no buddhas. Stands to reason. But there is still something before buddhas attained realization and sentient beings fell into delusion. In Kagyu, it is called the mahāmudra of the basis.

Astus wrote:

As I have <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=336108#p336108>, that basis of samsara and nirvana is the clarity-appearances, in other words, knowing and feeling of all sorts of phenomena.

Malcolm said:

Homogeneity means the two truths are inseparable. Since Madhyamakas assert a true relative truth, they do not understand this point. Nondual means that having understood the two truths as inseparable, one abandons views since all phenomena are in fact nondual.

Astus wrote:

Since they are one, why reject causality and views?

[Mañjuśrī] asked further, "Where should emptiness be sought?"

[Vimalakīrti] answered, "It should be sought within the sixty-two [heterodox] views."
(Vimalakīrti Sutra, ch 5, BDK Edition, p 109)

Malcolm said:

there is no ability to develop formations— not accepting, not rejecting, not moving, and not seeking. As such, this culmination of the comprehension of being like an illusion is also proven to be the culmination of comprehending the two truths as inseparable.

Astus wrote:

So, if such a person is offered a choice between strawberry and raspberry, can he not decide? If he can, how is that not accepting and rejecting?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 3rd, 2016 at 5:59 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

You are not only arguing that seeds are not experienced, you argue that the ālayavijñāna does not exist because according to you it is not aware.

Astus wrote:

The store-consciousness' function is to maintain the seeds, where the seeds and the store-consciousness depend on each other, forming a stream. So, the store-consciousness is aware of the seeds (plus the "material" (not the 5 sense-consciousnesses) world). It includes and maintains all that one is not actually aware of, but it is explained as if there were a consciousness that knows of innumerable things, just like the ordinary ideas about the subconscious and memory where so many things are hidden. However - and this is where the problem is - none of us are actually conscious of anything that the store-consciousness supposedly knows. And, as you have noted before, the eight are simply functions of one consciousness, and it is unreasonable to say that one cannot know what one actually knows, there cannot be such a store-consciousness.

Malcolm said:

We did say what was immune [to argument], and that is nonconceptual pristine consciousness.

Astus wrote:

The reason you say it is immune, is because it cannot be conceived. What cannot be conceived cannot have a meaning, because meaning comes from conceiving what something is. Therefore, it is immune, because it is meaningless. On the other hand, if it is meaningful, then there is something to be conceived, and it is within the boundaries of conceptual analysis, hence not immune.

Malcolm said:

It is differentiated because pristine consciousness is the dharmatā of the mind, the essence of the mind.

Astus wrote:

How can you separate something from its essence? Also, what is not the essence, the attributes? Is it the mind that discerns its own essence?

(It seems that this differentiation between essence and mind brings us to the problems of Aristotelian essence and accidents.)

Malcolm said:

Therefore, the original mind is dharmatā emptiness which is the luminous mind that does not become solely empty by nature or an inert emptiness and is called self-originated wisdom. Since there isn't an iota of a characteristic of conditioned or unconditioned apart from being intrinsically clear emptiness, it is beyond the inert composed of particles, clarity which possesses subject and object, and a knowing consciousness.

Astus wrote:

Emptiness is always emptiness of something, just as awareness is awareness of something. Saying that appearances are always experienced (awareness, consciousness, mind) and also without essence (empty, not self, ungraspable), is perfectly fine with me. And an empty knowing as an abstract concept is also good, as long as it's not turned into some transcendental soul.

Malcolm said:

Who rejected causality? No me. I said it was not something which could be established, that does not mean I negate it.

Astus wrote:

What would be an establishment, a substrate, for causality? Actually, an ultimate consciousness would be exactly that. However, that's not something I proposed. What I say is that causality is how appearances operate. I can also add to that, just to emphasise the lack of any substrate here, that causality is a conceptual interpretation of appearances, and appearances themselves are very much unattainable. In other words, I take it to be illusory, phenomenal, apparent.

Malcolm said:

For a completely realized person, there is no difference between a strawberry or a raspberry, so he or she does not need to make a choice.

Astus wrote:

Does such a person then simply starves to death (or dies from dehydration, or perhaps stops breathing...) because of his inability to function in the world?

Malcolm said:

When one is in nirvikalpa samadhi, is this an experience or not? Are there nonconceptual experience? If so, how?

Astus wrote:

Going with Vasubandhu's and Xuanzang's definition here (CWSL, tr Wei Tat, p 687):

"If, in perceiving the sphere of objects,
Wisdom (jnana) no longer conceives any idea of the object,
Then that wisdom is in the state of Vijnaptimatratā, Because both the object to be apprehended and the act of apprehending by consciousness are absent."

"Nirvikalpajñāna, which does not cling to the objective world, and accepts no kind of sophistry about its seeming appearance (prapañcānimitta). He is now said really to abide in the genuine and transcendent nature of Vijnaptimatratā, that is to say, he experiences the Bhutatathata (Absolute Reality)."

This is of course an experience, it is the realisation that there is no real substance. It could be said that it is the same experience as before, except here there is none of the usual personalisation and objectification.

Malcolm said:

Seeds occurs in the realm of the mind, so why they not experiences?

Astus wrote:

I think the above response should answer this question.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 3rd, 2016 at 6:37 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

conebeckham said:

Luminous Clarity, Buddha Nature, in Connection with Bliss-Emptiness Mahamudra
A Vajra Song by Khenpo Tsultrim Gyamtso

Astus wrote:

Thank you for sharing this here. Let me step out a bit of the ongoing debate, so perhaps we can do some other kind of discussion.

conebeckham said:

Namo Guru Asanga Ye

To the unequalled teacher, mighty Shakyamuni,

And the lord of the tenth ground, supreme Maitreya,
With my three gates filled with great respect, I prostrate.
I shall explain Buddha Nature, luminous clarity.

Astus wrote:

I have no special qualities to show for myself, so whatever explanations I seem to give here, is all an attempt at rephrasing words.

conebeckham said:

The subject of the final turning's Sutras on the Essence
Is mind's abiding reality, Buddha Nature itself,
Spontaneously present, not produced by causes,
Self-arisen and self-free, clarity-emptiness, fixation-free.

Astus wrote:

The tathagatagarbha scriptures are skilful means to point to the sublime experiential realm of the realised ones. This true nature of our minds is already there, and requires no learning or practice. Right now, everything comes and goes incessantly, and there is no force required to manipulate them in any way. Sights, sounds, feelings, and thoughts are here, yet they cannot be relied on.

conebeckham said:

Mind's essence is empty of duality's fleeting stains,
Beyond duality, ordinary mind is not empty.

Astus wrote:

When the mind is ordinary, it doesn't add or subtract anything. It is always without anything that can be held onto, even though it is filled with never ending bright images.

conebeckham said:

Beyond permanence and extinction is luminous clarity,
Permanence and extinction don't exist in this basic nature,
Affirmation and negation's stains don't cover it,
So it is explained to be self-arisen and self-free.

Astus wrote:

Unhindered awareness is clearly visible, when ideas of keeping and leaving are silent. In fact, the true mind cannot ever be pulled or pushed. Not because there is some unmoved mover, or a motionless watcher. Nor it is because one has conquered all the nasty defilements and obscurations. This world sensed now is simply such, changing and transforming according to its own ways right in front of our eyes.

conebeckham said:

This bliss-emptiness, self-awareness, inexpressible,
When described is luminous clarity, great bliss,
And when left undescribed, it is the same bliss-emptiness—
How amazing! Join this with the great secret path.

Astus wrote:

Contentment is neither gained nor lost. There is nothing we miss, so why not rest and rejoice? Talking and not talking are equally fine, the painting of a circle is black, but also white. The path is vividly clear, with every step you are there.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 3rd, 2016 at 5:30 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

conebeckham said:

Your comments about experiences--sights, sounds, feelings, etc.-are beside the point, the contents of discursive consciousness, the 6th consciousness, or "mental consciousness," and are excluded from the object under discussion--the "mind's abiding reality." Why? Because those things you've added--experiences, percepts, etc., are all "produced from causes," etc.

Astus wrote:

Is the nature of mind experienced in a vacuum where nothing whatsoever occurs and one is in the pure perception of awareness without content? I guess that is not the case, but rather one recognises how the nature of mind is free from fixating on whatever is displayed. Is that not so?

conebeckham said:

Just a clarification the "Luminous clarity" is something other than merely the "world sensed now as simply such." It is not the normal, transitory appearances of consciousness alone.

Astus wrote:

What more do you mean?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 4th, 2016 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

We are not conscious of direct perceptions either, since they are nonconceptual. Therefore, according to you, nonconceptual pristine consciousness (nirvikalpajñāna) is an impossibility.

Astus wrote:

Why wouldn't we be conscious of basic sensory impressions? I think we have a terminology problem here... We see many colours, hear many voices, etc. But of course we do not give special attention to all of that, don't label them all, don't start thinking about them, and so on. However, the store-consciousness is a whole different matter, and I don't see how your response even relates to that.

Malcolm said:

Again, you here make a wholesale rejection of nonconceptual jñāna, as well as direct perceptions. Thus, for you buddhahood is a conceptual, conditioned, impermanent mind, in contradiction with all the sūtras and tantras.

Astus wrote:

We can very well understand nonconceptual experiences, actually that's what we normally do all the time, conjecturing about sights and sounds, all sorts meditative experiences, and practically anything. And since sutras and tantras talk about nonconceptuality, they do give explanations and do conceptualise it.

Malcolm said:

Emptiness is not always the emptiness of something, for example, the emptiness of emptiness or the emptiness of the unconditioned. Awareness is not always an awareness of something, for example, yogic direct perception of emptiness on the path of seeing.

Astus wrote:

The emptiness of emptiness is dropping the conceptual grasping of the idea of emptiness, so it does have something there. Same goes for the unconditioned. Perception of emptiness is not perceiving anything (i.e. it's only nominally a type of perception), it is just normal perception without the imputation of substance.

Malcolm said:

No, you are imputing causality onto appearances, there is no causality which can be found in appearances themselves. If you assert that appearances operate according to causality, you are falling into realism.

Astus wrote:

What is the kind of causality then that you do not reject?

Malcolm said:

They act spontaneously.

Astus wrote:

What does that mean? They act out of habit? Or what is the cause, the intention for their actions?

Malcolm said:

And thus, it is an unconditioned experience, a nonconceptual pristine consciousness.

Astus wrote:

If that is what you call unconditioned pristine consciousness, we are not in disagreement on the level of meaning, only on the level of terminology/aesthetics.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 4th, 2016 at 4:44 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Direct perceptions are nonconceptual by nature. It means we are not conscious of them. We are not conscious of the blueness of the vase when it is perceived by vijñāna, it is only after it has been discriminated and become a second order perception that we become conscious of a blue vase that we have seen.

Astus wrote:

It sounds like you say that people have no experience of their senses, they only think of sense impressions. To me it seems common to just gaze without any thoughts or labels, but still being aware of the view.

Malcolm said:

No, the emptiness of emptiness is not a conceptual emptiness, neither is the emptiness of the unconditioned. These things are empty whether we conceptualize that emptiness or not.

Astus wrote:

Why make them categories of emptiness then?

Malcolm said:

The direct perception of emptiness is not a "normal" perception. If it were, all people would have it all the time.

Astus wrote:

Perceiving emptiness is not perceiving a particular object, but the lack of fabrication. Might call that uncommon, but I was referring to the usual sensory functions, that they do not cease to operate.

Malcolm said:

The causality that I do not reject is the same as the self that I do not reject.

Astus wrote:

Fair enough.

Malcolm said:

A buddha simply responds to the needs of sentient beings spontaneously without any thought at all, in just the same way a wishfulfilling gem grants all wishes without any thought at all about the one who possesses it.

Astus wrote:

That means that a buddha is either a robot or natural force, or that there are effects without causes.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 4th, 2016 at 4:59 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

conebeckham said:

For sentient beings such as ourselves, "Experience" occurs in the mental consciousness. Even "experiences" of nonconceptual bare awareness are reified into conceptual proliferation.

Astus wrote:

There is the tendency to objectify and personalise experiences, that is the deluded habit that generates dissatisfaction. At the same time, most of the experiences are not grasped or labelled as anything, and that's why they then often fall into the area of disinterest, unawareness, and ignorance, that is, the inclination to disregard them. This selective perception could be called the normal, but it is not that uncommon that one occasionally becomes aware of the larger amount of ongoing experiences, although it is most likely during the practice of meditation.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 4th, 2016 at 5:53 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

catmoon said:

I'm curious ... is anyone here serious about pursuing jhanic attainments? It seems that much of this discussion is about fitting the jhanas onto a Procrustean bed, said bed being preconceptions and teachings and arguments from authority. Anything that doesn't fit the preconceptions is simply lopped off.

Astus wrote:

If one has no experience, then there are only the theories. If one has experiences, then again there are only the theories to compare it with. The problem is that once one calls it "jhana/dhyana", there are so many associated ideas with that word, that it inevitably becomes a debate about definitions. Just consider the situation where two people's version of what constitutes absorption do not match. If they think there can be only one correct interpretation, they will start to argue about whose reading of whatever source material is correct. There are topics on Dhammawheel where it goes on endlessly, and the same applies to the larger community of Theravadins.

And to answer your question, I did experiment with states of absorption, and I have found them beneficial. As Ajahn Chah said (Collected Teachings, p 309), "We don't have to call it first jhana, second jhana, third jhana and so on, let's just call it `a peaceful mind'". If we take the practical approach, the first four describe a gradual calming, that makes sense once the first jhana is seen as a naturally pleasant, peaceful resting, that comes from abiding unmoved by thoughts and feelings. These same qualities experienced during meditation are recognised in the various Mahayana traditions as well, but they don't call it absorption, simply because that term has been elevated and alienated by earlier generations of abhidharma scholars and the tradition in general.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 4th, 2016 at 6:14 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

catmoon said:

I would not attach the label "bliss" to it because it seems to confuse things. It's just my way of sorting the labels.

Astus wrote:

The Nirvana and the Srimaladevi Sutra popularised the notion that nirvana is nitya, sukha, atma, subha. That is in opposition to the four classic elements of contemplation, but they also emphasise that they should not be confused with the mundane versions. As I take it, this is merely a wordplay to set up positive sounding qualities, instead of the original negative sounding ones. But practically there is no difference in the path.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 4th, 2016 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Because they are empty.

Astus wrote:

What isn't?

Malcolm said:

This is definitely a point of contention. In general, in sūtra, it is considered that on the path of seeing all ordinary appearances vanish, one does not perceive them anymore. It is only in post-equipoise that appearances, albeit, now truly dream-like and illusory, return.

Astus wrote:

If by "ordinary appearances" it is meant as perceiving with delusion, then it is OK. If what is meant is total cessation of perception, then it is more like nirodha-samapatti.

Malcolm said:

Mañjuśrimitra states:

Astus wrote:

That sounds just like the prajnaparamita teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 5th, 2016 at 1:01 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

When perceiving emptiness on the path of seeing, it is described as perceiving "space like emptiness." One does not perceive characteristics of things at all, therefore, there is no perception of things. It is not nirodha, because there isn't a total cessation of perception. There is a perception of emptiness.

Astus wrote:

Is there such a thing as emptiness to perceive?

"This is a perfection of what is not, because space is not something that is."
(PP8000 9.4, tr Conze; T8n227v4p553a25)

Malcolm said:

Dzogchen is the state of prajñāpāramita.

Astus wrote:

It looks like that prajnaparamita is a big common factor among all Mahayana schools.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 5th, 2016 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

When no characteristics are perceived, that is called "perceiving emptiness."

Astus wrote:

That's a good example of figurative speech.

"All things that have characteristics are false and ephemeral. If you see all characteristics to be non-characteristics, then you see the Tathāgata."
(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html, ch 5)

Malcolm said:

Yes, and this is why we can say that pristine consciousness is unconditioned

Astus wrote:

Again, figuratively speaking.

Q: Where does the mind dwell in its real abode?

A: Dwelling nowhere is its real abode.

Q: What is dwelling nowhere?

A: It is the mind not dwelling anywhere or on anything.

Q: What does "not dwelling anywhere or on anything" mean?

A: Not to dwell anywhere or on anything means not to dwell on good or evil, existence or non-existence, within or without or on the middle, nor on concentration nor dispersion, and neither to dwell on the void nor on the non-void. This is the meaning of "not dwelling anywhere or on anything". Just this alone is real abiding. This stage of achievement is also the non-abiding Mind, and the non-abiding Mind is the Buddha Mind.

(<http://www.ymba.org/books/entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment/treatise-entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 5th, 2016 at 7:12 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

There is no correspondence between what the Tibetan text says and this translation into Chinese.

Astus wrote:

It is clear from the context that "characteristics" refers to bodily characteristics of the Tathagata, because that's the original question in the chapter. Nevertheless, it is not unusual to use the text in a flexible way.

Here are two commentaries of the chapter.

"Tathagata is the true nature of life, wisdom, love, and happiness. Only when we can see the signless nature of signs do we have a chance of seeing the Tathagata. When we look at a rose without being caught by its signs, we see the nature of non-rose and therefore we begin to see the Tathagata in the rose. If we look into a pebble, a tree, or a child in this way, we also see the Tathagata in them. Tathagata means coming from nowhere and going nowhere, showing no sign of coming and no sign of going, no sign of being and no sign of non-being, no sign of birth and no sign of death."

(Thich Nhat Hanh: Diamond that Cuts Through, ch 5)

"Why can the Tathagata not be seen by his bodily characteristics? Because the existence of marks is false. All marks decay and become extinct. In the midst of marks one must be separate from marks. When there are marks, know them as empty. Then you see the Tathagata's Dharma body, which is without form or appearance."

(Hsuan Hua: The Diamond Sutra, p 96)

Malcolm said:

The Tibetan renders it as follows:

Astus wrote:

Xuanzang doesn't translate it as "bodily characteristics" but as "perfect characteristics", and seems that it matches the Tibetan rendering. I don't know if anyone has used his to make an English translation. As you may know, Kumarajiva's works generally beat everyone else's in popularity.

Malcolm said:

It is not figurative. It can be taken literally.

Astus wrote:

Pristine consciousness is the one the perceives emptiness, isn't it?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 5th, 2016 at 5:44 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

catmoon said:

Geez that's pretty absolutist don't you think?

Any mind with a modicum of clarity can follow a few simple logical arguments and arrive at a rough perception of emptiness. A more practised mind will perceive emptiness more clearly. A Buddha, completely separated from affliction, would have in a sense a pristine mind and a perfect apprehension of emptiness. It's a gray scale.

Astus wrote:

My point is that the difference between deluded and enlightened is not the attainment of a different type of mind, but the presence or absence of afflictions. That is actually expressed by the concept of buddha-nature that only requires unearthing from under the dirt. And then there is the sort of teaching where "this mind is buddha", that is, not something beyond everyday actions, feelings, and thoughts. The dirt is not what appears, not the experiences, but whether one grasps them or not, and attachment depends on seeing them empty or not. That's why I say that talking of an unconditioned pristine consciousness is figurative, otherwise it is a duality between conditioned and unconditioned, and people have two minds. That assumption of a pure mind can easily make people look for a second head, as http://www.cttbusa.org/shurangama4/shurangama4_8.asp goes.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 5th, 2016 at 7:39 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

catmoon said:

If the unconditioned mind arises from the conditioned mind.... then maybe it isn't unconditioned? At any rate there is no need for "both minds" to exist simultaneously. Pristine mind is a pretty concept but man there are some tricky problems attending it. Are we on the same page now? Getting closer?

Astus wrote:

It doesn't arise from anything, since it's not something to arise or disappear, so in that sense it is unconditioned. But as long as it's presented as if there were an "it" or "something", it keeps generating this misinterpretation of an ultimate object or subject, while the whole point is to realise the lack of substances.

To me, unfabricated sounds better than unconditioned, because fabrication implies active doing, while conditioning is being subject to something. So, an unfabricated mind is more like not making up ideas, while an unconditioned mind is like untouched by things. Although both can mean the same, unfabricated - or unfabricating - seems more accurate.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 5th, 2016 at 8:04 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

In which case, essentially we just have to let go of this deluded mind, but then the logical flaw arises that if enlightened mind is unconditioned, then why/how would it be effected by the conditioned?

Astus wrote:

That is the questions raised in the http://www.cttbusa.org/shurangama4/shurangama4_9.asp after Yajnadatta's story. The answer is not necessarily satisfactory, but shows that because of the type of language used, it results in a convoluted explanation, that could have actually been avoided if they did not start with talking as if there were some ultimate mind.

Sherab Dorje said:

Which is why I prefer the description of Tathagatagarbha as the potential for enlightenment that exists in all sentient beings. This description then avoids 16 pages of acrobatics.

Astus wrote:

As a potential it means that the tathagatagarbha teaching is only about raising spirits and trying to convince people who are afraid of prajnaparamita.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 5th, 2016 at 8:48 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

I disagree about the "fear" part because I believe the "ideas" of Tathagatagarbha and emptiness are just describing two aspects of the same thing being viewed from different angles...

Astus wrote:

If by buddha-nature what is meant is the mind without ignorance, then yes. But if tathagatagarbha is only a potential, then how?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 6th, 2016 at 6:49 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

"How" what?

Astus wrote:

Emptiness is about seeing that appearances are without anything concrete, anything personal. If tathagatagarbha means that all beings may attain that insight, that is not the other side of wisdom, it is only a chance to gain wisdom. Like, anyone with legs may be able to run, but that's not the other side of being a marathon runner.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 6th, 2016 at 6:55 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

catmoon said:

First Problem

Astus wrote:

Yes, there is a problem, if unconditioned mind means that there exists a special kind of awareness separate from the normal kind. It is not a problem, if it means that the normal mind is cleansed of ignorance.

catmoon said:

Second Problem

Astus wrote:

Again, the problem of something arising happens if unconditioned mind means an object/subject, a unique awareness, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 6th, 2016 at 5:49 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

AlexMcLeod said:

But when the movie ends, you have not been physically affected by the events of the story.

Astus wrote:

Samsara does not end, plus you're very much affected physically. Both body and mind are fully involved in life.

AlexMcLeod said:

you know it is just a story.

Astus wrote:

If one knows that only once it's over, it cannot apply to life, unless you think it will be OK once dead, in which case you are not considering rebirth.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 6th, 2016 at 5:53 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Time is not something real, therefore, this qualm does not apply [conditioned entities can only exist in time].

Astus wrote:

Time is not real, therefore conditioned entities are not real. That is clearly a liberating insight, since even body and mind are unreal. We can rest then.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 6th, 2016 at 6:03 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Bakmoon said:

Does this mean that jñāna is not some sort of 'thing' that is somewhere within the mind, but rather that jñāna is itself the very nature of mind itself?

Astus wrote:

The very nature of mind: "the dharmatā of the mind or the cittatā of citta".

The problematic element is that of the unconditioned awareness part. As I take it, experiences have the qualities of emptiness, awareness, and appearance. Neither of the three exists on its own. However, "unconditioned awareness" suggests a separate knower of emptiness and appearances, and that is practically a reified/objectified self/soul.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 6th, 2016 at 6:09 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Emptiness is how things are, the Tathagatagarbha is our inherent capacity or capability to see how things are. It is all part of the same equation.

Astus wrote:

That is, buddha-nature means that we are capable of getting rid of ignorance. I think that is a basic requirement for Buddhism to make any sense, otherwise there is no path to liberation. However, this does not account for all the ink spilt on the tathagatagarbha doctrine.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 6th, 2016 at 6:47 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

catmoon said:

This is just the kind of reductio ad absurdum I've been thinking about and fearing.

Astus wrote:

How so? It is a perfectly traditional and accepted teaching all over Mahayana. Even a meditation method. But, if what you mean is that this is too much of a jumping ahead, that might be so. Although, from a Zen point of view, dhyana goes together with wisdom.

catmoon said:

Rather than diving into THAT logical rat's nest, I think I'd far rather put it aside and return to the OP question.

Astus wrote:

Maybe you can say something on <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=336481#p336481>.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 6th, 2016 at 7:19 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

AlexMcLeod said:

your samsaric body and mind might be fully involved, but your true nature is unaffected.

Astus wrote:

Such a separate "true nature" does not exist. Even if it existed, it wouldn't matter.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 6th, 2016 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

AlexMcLeod said:

It is not separate, it just isn't affected, because the things you posit should have effect on it are not real. They can effect things in the story, but not the real. This doesn't make them separate, because stories exist in our minds, but we have power over them, not the other way around. And that is not to say that the real cannot affect the imagined. You see examples of this all the time, with story elements based on actual experiences.

Astus wrote:

If one is real and the other is unreal, that is an important difference separating them. One possible definition of reality is whether it makes some effect. That is, one can dream and imagine all sorts of things, they will not change one's everyday conditions. If there were a true nature separate from the aggregates, it would mean that such a true nature does not have the qualities of the aggregates, nor can it interact with the aggregates. If said true nature were not separate from the aggregates, then it is the aggregates, so it is affected by everything that affects the aggregates. If it were neither the same nor different, then as far as it's not the same, it is unconscious (consciousness is an aggregate), and as far as it's not different, it is affected.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 6th, 2016 at 8:35 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

catmoon said:

I got sent to a post in which you were talking about lack of experience leading to argumentation about definitions. If that's what you were referring to...

Astus wrote:

The point I wanted to refer to is that discussion of jhana/dhyana is a discussion of the definition of absorption, so it is theoretical regardless if somebody has or doesn't have experiences. But if you think there is a way around that, let's do it.

The second point there is my version of avoiding the problem of definitions.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 6th, 2016 at 9:48 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

catmoon said:

Ajahn Chah of all people should know better than this.

Astus wrote:

From the introduction of his collected teachings (p xi): "Ajahn Chah avoided talking about levels of attainment and levels of meditative absorption in order to counter spiritual materialism (the gaining mind, competitiveness and jealousy) and to keep people focused on the Path."

catmoon said:

The gradual calming he refers to is clearly nothing more than access concentration settling in, and is well described in the suttas and if anyone should know this, it would be Ajahn Chah.

Astus wrote:

He mentions development of jhanas to some extent, like in Detachment Within Activity on p 298-299.

In The Path in Harmony on p 316 he talks about the dangers of deep samadhi and that one should just go with access concentration. Then on the next page:

"So, there can be right samadhi and wrong samadhi. Wrong samadhi is where the mind enters calm and there's no awareness at all. One could sit for two hours or even all day but the mind doesn't know where it's been or what's happened. It doesn't know anything. There is calm, but that's all. It's like a well-sharpened knife which we don't bother to put to any use. This is a deluded type of calm, because there is not much self-awareness. The meditator may think he has reached the ultimate already, so he doesn't bother to look for anything else. Samadhi can be an enemy at this level. Wisdom can not arise because there is no awareness of right and wrong.

With right samadhi, no matter what level of calm is reached, there is awareness. There is full mindfulness and clear comprehension. This is the samadhi which can give rise to wisdom, one can not get lost in it. Practitioners should understand this well. You can't do without this awareness, it must be present from beginning to end. This kind of samadhi has no danger."

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 7th, 2016 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Right, this kind of one pointedness never abandon vitarka and vicara. It is essentially the first dhyāna or perfect śamatha.

Astus wrote:

Not necessarily. As I read the suttas, change from one jhana to another happens by recognition that the present mental factors are troubling. Then either one realises the true nature of appearances and abandons it all (i.e. nirvana) completely, or goes to the next level. It seems logical to me that unless there is a level of awareness, such a shift from one jhana to another could not happen. So, there is indeed correct samadhi and incorrect samadhi.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 7th, 2016 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Shifts between dhyānas cannot deliberately happen after the second dhyāna. There can only be a deliberate shift through the remaining dhyānas by exiting one and then entering another. Because of the absence of vitarka in the second dhyāna on up, we then have the notion of so called "access concentrations."

Astus wrote:

That depends on the interpretation of vitarka and vicara. Normally they are understood in this context as grabbing the object and maintaining the object of meditation. It is not about thinking about the object, but using one's attention.

For a practical description:

http://www.dhammatalks.net/Books/Ajahn_Chah_Samma_Samadhi.htm

For a linguistic analysis: <https://sujato.wordpress.com/2012/12/06/why-vitakka-doesnt-mean-thinking-in-jhana/>

Also, if you look at the description in the <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.111.than.html>, Sariputra goes through the 8 jhanas, and only following nirodha-samapatti does he emerges from it and reflects. And that's quite logical, since in nirodha both feeling and perception stops, but not before that. And if you look into the other texts describing the sequence, it goes deeper and deeper, it's not that they always have to stop and go back.

Of course, what you say is a known explanation, where absorption becomes something so otherworldly and absorbed, that it is practically useless for wisdom and overly difficult (if possible at all) to attain at the same time.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 7th, 2016 at 1:16 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

You apparently did not read this sutta carefully. Sariputra enters and exits each dhyāna before proceeding to the next one.

Astus wrote:

Please point me to the line you think means that.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 7th, 2016 at 6:39 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

catmoon said:

But you have to come down a step or two to redirect the mind, then back up you go.

Astus wrote:

Why would that be so? Accessing the first jhana already requires a level of peacefulness, and then further levels are even calmer states. How would it be helpful if one had to create disturbance in order to attain a deeper tranquillity? To me that is a contradiction. But perhaps we have different things in mind here.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 7th, 2016 at 6:44 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Bakmoon said:

we can't conclude that it is saying that Sariputra immediately went from one jhana to the next.

Astus wrote:

That might be so. I think there are enough references to the same sequence of the jhanas in numerous suttas to allow a general description of how it goes. And it goes by letting go first of external and emotional disturbances in order to establish the first absorption, and then gradually letting go of subtler factors to arrive at a mindful peace.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 7th, 2016 at 6:48 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

I think it is fair to say that it applies to all, because otherwise you have give a complicated explanation for why this is not said of the first six, etc.

Astus wrote:

That's like saying that to walk slower one has to walk faster first. It might be that this sutta is more of an exception in stating that he emerged from those states.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 7th, 2016 at 7:54 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Bakmoon said:

Emptiness is the nature of all phenomena as well, and emptiness is of course unconditioned, but no one would complain that all things having an unconditioned nature in that sense is impossible.

Astus wrote:

Emptiness means an absence, so calling a lack of something unconditioned is not a problem. It is when we come to unconditioned consciousness that needs more specifications as to what sense it is unconditioned. It is unconditioned in the form of not grasping at appearances, but the functioning of consciousness cannot be unconditioned, because being aware of things is a conditioned occurrence.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 7th, 2016 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

AlexMcLeod said:

I think they are confusing lack of "thoughts" with lack of ability to have an intention. An intention is all it takes to switch between mental states, and can be used in any mental state.

Astus wrote:

That is a good point. In a calm state one does not start verbalising in the usual form of internal monologue and daydreaming. At the same time, during the stages of absorption there are still the fundamental functions of mind, that is: attention (manasikara), feeling (vedana), volition (cetana), perception (sanna), and contact (phassa); or simply the four mental aggregates.

Here is a fine description of the four jhanas:

<http://measurelessmind.ca/anapanassatisamadhi.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 7th, 2016 at 8:22 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Astus wrote:

...but the functioning of consciousness cannot be unconditioned, because being aware of things is a conditioned occurrence.

Malcolm said:

So in terms of conditioned occurrences, their arising, abiding and perishing must be established. So how are you going to establish this? As conventions? That is fine, but a "convention" refers to an imputation and a reification.

Astus wrote:

That seems to imply a strong difference between appearances and emptiness. Conventions (interdependence) and emptiness (insubstantiality) has to form/be a single reality (called the Middle in Tiantai teachings). But I think you as well like to emphasise the non-duality of the two truths. And that singularity, where there are appearances without establishment, where consciousness and emptiness are inseparable, is all there is. Here is an example of how that is realised for dhyana:

In the case of one who has realized the true character of dharmas, on contemplating the five hindrances, he finds that they have no inherent existence at all. He then realizes that the true character of the five hindrances is identical with the true character of dhyāna and that the true character of dhyāna is identical with that of the five hindrances. In this way the bodhisattva is able to realize that the five desires as well as the five hindrances, the dhyāna concentrations as well as their component factors—they are all of a single character. Thus, without depending on anything whatsoever, he is able to enter dhyāna absorption. It is this which qualifies as dhyāna “pāramitā.”

(http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/N6P_excerpts/N6P_X-Bk4_X-13.pdf)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 7th, 2016 at 9:02 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Then it does not any sense to say that things arise from cause and condition, because as Mañjuśrimitra points out, they are nondual in the mind.

Astus wrote:

It is the apparent production and the ultimate non-production that are non-dual, so it is conditionality that means the absence of substance, and emptiness that exists only as illusoriness of phenomena.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 8th, 2016 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

So, production is not real and nonproduction is real, correct?

Astus wrote:

They form a single reality together.

Malcolm said:

in order for there to be an eye consciousness, there has to be an external object, a form, of which that consciousness is aware

Astus wrote:

Not exactly. What I say is that when there is consciousness, it is consciousness of something. Even more precisely, there are only experiences, and they can be theoretically separated into subject and object, but that's an added distinction, and not something experienced. To put that into the dhatu version, there are instances of consciousness, and it can be then imagined to be objects and senses.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 8th, 2016 at 3:57 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

So you subscribe to the third extreme then — that there can be something both existent and nonexistent. Because in reality, production and nonproduction are mutually exclusive.

Astus wrote:

No. Production is a concept to navigate within experiences. Non-production is a concept to eliminate attachment. The point is to be active and free at the same time. Do you consider that a contradiction?

Malcolm said:

So if I poke my finger in your eye, you will not experience my finger as an object, distinct from your eye?

Astus wrote:

Both finger and eye exist as experiences. To that basis comes all the qualifications.

Malcolm said:

If there are no objects, how can there consciousness of "something?"

Astus wrote:

Consciousness means there an instance of experience, a phenomenon. That is, an instance of seeing a vase is first a "vase-phenomenon" that is divided into a vase as object and a viewer as subject.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 8th, 2016 at 6:25 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

When it is understood that the illusion of an elephant is not an elephant, there is no concept of elephant to eliminate. One knows an elephant never existed where one seemed previously to appear. That elephant is self-liberated.

Astus wrote:

There is still an illusion, isn't there? Or do you mean by self-liberation a total nothingness?

Malcolm said:

But your contention is that we do not experience objects.

Astus wrote:

That doesn't sound like what I said.

Malcolm said:

But according to you, there must be a cause of that consciousness.

Astus wrote:

I think this got mixed up because of terminology. I only used the word consciousness to compare it to the 18 dhatu scheme, to show that experiences precedes subject and object. On the other hand, I debate an independent consciousness, because that is an absolutist version of subject, while even the subject itself is an abstraction from experience.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 8th, 2016 at 6:34 AM

Title: Re: What is the ultimate good according to Mahayana and Vajrayana?

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

What I'm particularly interested in, I think, is the question of whether (according to Mahayana doctrine) there is some property of awareness that can be ascribed to Buddhas who have entered parinirvana.

For example, a follower recites the nembutsu. Is Amitabha aware or cognizant of the nembutsu, or is it rather that the nembutsu activates the conditions of the vow taken long ago, and as a result the Pure Land manifests -- even though there is no actual "Amitabha" there in the sense of a being who has cognition and awareness?

Astus wrote:

The three bodies doctrine is a summary of three perspectives of buddhas. The nirmanakaya explains the story of Siddhartha. The sambhogakaya explains all the celestial buddhas. The dharmakaya explains the ultimate meaning of buddhahood as suchness. So, Amitabha is considered nirmanakaya in TB and sambhogakaya in EAB, for various reasons. In either case, it means that Amitabha is an active, living being, and that's how everyone imagines him anyway.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 8th, 2016 at 6:54 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

As far as the illusion itself goes, we can say that it depends on causes and conditions, but these also cannot withstand analysis and will be found to be unproduced as well. So in the end, everything winds up being illusion, and therefore, unproduced.

Astus wrote:

The elephant is illusory, just as causality. Illusory means apparent, functional, and at the same time insubstantial, empty.

Malcolm said:

The eighteen dhātu scheme demonstrates nothing of the sort. It shows, or intends to show, that consciousnesses are a product of the meeting of a sense organ and a sense object. It is elaborated to show that experience is derived from subject and object, not that it precedes it.

Astus wrote:

I used the 18 dhatus format in a reversed way, where from consciousness comes subject and object.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 8th, 2016 at 7:35 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

catmoon said:

It's because you need viccāna and vitakka to change the object of meditation. And you leave those behind in the third and fourth jhanas. Some sources vary on this sequence btw.

Astus wrote:

I'm not sure about what you mean by change of object. If one starts with one object, with that one it's possible to go through the stages of calming the mind.

catmoon said:

The fourth jhana is exquisitely delicate. It is a state so fine that the merest intention to do anything, and very lightest grasp on an object of meditation, both completely disappear.

Astus wrote:

As I see it, the rūpa jhanas have a specific object on what one rests the mind on, and only with the arūpa jhanas one changes from specific object to a "non-object", like infinite space.

As for the progression of jhanas, it moves from holding a specific object of focus, through the enjoyment of the peace coming from one pointedness, until one arrives at an unmoving mind. So the first jhana is about returning again and again to the object, the second and third about the pleasure of the stable mind, and the fourth is just the stable mind. The formless absorptions are about abandoning the experiences as identities. So, here is my model.

catmoon said:

Access Concentration

Astus wrote:

I don't use this category. Here could be mentioned the usual requirements to begin meditation.

catmoon said:

First Jhana

Astus wrote:

Vitakka and vicara are present to establish the mind repeatedly on the object, and this is the primary element to work with, while the others are supporting factors. Piti is the joy of resting, like when one can lie down after a tiring walk. Sukha is the contentment of peace, like when one is finished with a task and there's nothing more to do. Ekaggata is the one pointedness of attention, the quality of being focused internally on the body and mind.

catmoon said:

Second Jhana

Astus wrote:

With the mind further withdrawn and stabilised, there is no need to remind oneself of the object of attention, and one is absorbed in the joy of rest, with contentment and one pointedness in the background.

catmoon said:

Third Jhana

Astus wrote:

When the more intensive joy is let go as well, one rests content within the seclusion of internally focused mind.

catmoon said:

Fourth Jhana

Astus wrote:

The feeling of contentment with peaceful abiding abandoned, there is just the one pointed mind that is unmoved by appearances.

catmoon said:

Infinite space

Astus wrote:

With the mind that is stable in peace there is no need to hold any sensory objects, thus the senses go unfocused and they rest open and unmoved.

catmoon said:

Infinite Consciousness

Astus wrote:

The attention moves from the lack of objects to the lack of senses, hence consciousness itself is unbound and uniform.

catmoon said:

Infinite Nothingness

Astus wrote:

Without object to focus on, or a specific state of mind to maintain, one comes to the experience that there is nothing at all.

catmoon said:

Neither Perception nor Non-Perception

Astus wrote:

But holding that there is nothing is still something perceived, one realises that experiencing itself is unreliable, and abandons that as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 9th, 2016 at 2:09 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

catmoon said:

Yes, one can calm the mind with a single object, but there will be no jhana without the shift to the countersign. It's quite possible to calm the mind to within an inch of absolute silence without entering jhana. This is access concentration. Jhana is qualitatively different, not just a refinement of what went before.

Astus wrote:

That is the approach of the Visuddhimagga, which is fine, but it's not the only version.

catmoon said:

This is the whole point of jhana - to take a carefully honed consciousness, this laserlike focus, and use it in the pursuit of understanding and enlightenment. One pointed concentration is worthless if it is not put to use. It would just be mental gymnastics.

Astus wrote:

As you say. Although I would use "laser like focus", more like the metaphor of calm and transparent water.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 9th, 2016 at 2:33 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

You mean the illusory elephant can haul wood? Bear a rider?

Astus wrote:

Unless you mean that while elephants are illusory wood and riders are real, then of course an illusory elephant is functional, otherwise it is a very bad illusion. There are also Vasubandhu's answers in Vimsatika.

I think a relevant question here is whether there is a place for teachings that account for ordinary experiences, that go gradually from one level to the next.

Gangottara inquired, "If all things are empty space, why does the World-Honored One speak of form, feeling, conception, impulse and consciousness; the [eighteen] elements; the [twelve] entrances; the twelve links of dependent origination; the defiled and the undefiled; the pure and the impure; samsara and nirvana?"

The Buddha told Gangottara, "When I speak of a 'self', for example, although I express the concept by a word, actually, the nature of 'self' is inapprehensible. I speak of form, but in reality the nature of form is also inapprehensible, and so it is with the other [dharmas], up to nirvana. Just as we cannot find water in mirages, so we cannot find a nature in form, and so it is with the others, up to nirvana.

(<http://www.tuvienquangduc.com.au/English/Maha/20sutra.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 9th, 2016 at 2:37 AM

Title: Re: What is the ultimate good according to Mahayana and Vajrayana?

Content:

Vasana said:

there's a difference between a Buddha being eternal/permanent or unceasing. What is unborn can neither cease, there's no eternalism in Mahayana. So long as there are puddles and lakes, moons will be reflected.

Astus wrote:

A permanent entity is independent, therefore it is non-functional, hence it does not actually exist. Unceasing are causes and conditions, endless change, but there is nothing in particular that remains from one moment to the next. As for what is not born, that is not existent either.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 9th, 2016 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: What is the ultimate good according to Mahayana and Vajrayana?

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

But since the skandhas dissolve at the time of parinirvana, how can this be?

Astus wrote:

You mean remainderless (sopadishsha) nirvana, but Mahayana adds a third version: non-abiding extinction (apratishtita nirvana), and that is what the buddhas attain. Also, the eight consciousnesses transform into the four wisdoms at the attainment of buddhahood. So, there is an explanation how buddhas remain functioning.

Lazy_eye said:

Also, the Diamond Sutra tells us that "self, person, living being and lifespan" do not apply to Buddhas

Astus wrote:

They do not apply to anyone, it's just that deluded beings grasp at such mistaken concepts.

Lazy_eye said:

the recognition of a distinct Buddha can only take place in the mind of a spiritual practitioner who has not yet reached "the other shore."

Astus wrote:

That is a possible interpretation, often emphasised in Zen, that people should see that there is no buddha but their buddha-mind.

Lazy_eye said:

The spiritual practice is the cause for Amitabha to manifest, and our not being at the other shore is the reason he must manifest as a distinct being.

Astus wrote:

Amitabha is either the imagination of the practitioner, or a real being ten thousand buddha-lands away. However, everything is the creation of mind, from hells to the buddha-lands. Even the idea that "I exist" is only a concept. See http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/pureland.pdf, question 4, p 65.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 9th, 2016 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

catmoon said:

Yup. I frankly know diddly squat about the Mahayana approach to jhana (if it's Mahayana do I call it dhyana?) but it differs significantly, right? (I know, a Gelug should know this but I don't).

Astus wrote:

The eight stages dhyana is more a Hinayana thing, and the Mahayana approach is somewhat different, more clearly connected with wisdom. However, what I was referring to here is the difference between the jhana teachings in the suttas and in the Visuddhimagga. Those who follow the Vsm consider kasina meditation to be the primary form, while it plays a marginal role in the suttas and it is practically non-existent in Mahayana.

Here is a description of http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/N6P_excerpts/N6P_X-Bk4_X-13.pdf from the Mahaprajnaparamita-upadesha, an important treatise in East Asia.

catmoon said:

Do I need to go back and reread your model? Is it a Mahayana model? What about the Zen people?

Astus wrote:

The model I have provided is mostly my take on the sutta teachings. As noted above, there is no Mahayana version of the eight stages model. As for Zen, dhyana goes together with wisdom, and they together refer to the essence (emptiness) and function (discernment) of the nature of mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 10th, 2016 at 12:53 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Your model is some strange version that does not account for this fact.

Astus wrote:

How doesn't it account for it? I simply defined the basic focus of each stage. And of course one can get stuck at any stage. Moving to the next level depends on relinquishing the previous one. At the same time, it is also possible to let go of everything and attain liberation at any given stage.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 10th, 2016 at 1:24 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The point, Astus, is that each of these dhyānas is in fact a concept on which we focus, where as you treat them as if they are grades of consciousness, which they are not.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean that dhyanas are not stages of mental tranquillity, but a number of conceptual focuses people may be absorbed in according to their inclination?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 10th, 2016 at 2:00 AM

Title: Re: Is meditational absorption (jhana, dhyana) possible or not?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes. For example, one of Buddha's teacher taught him that meditating on 'infinite emptiness' was the highest stage of liberation, the other, that "neither perception nor nonperception' is the highest state. But these are just mental concepts upon which he focused, and he discovered that by focusing them they created paths for rebirth.

Astus wrote:

That is as you say, in a sense. However, I think it is important to note that these are experiences people can have, and that's what makes them really enticing.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 10th, 2016 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: Can women become Buddhas?

Content:

Nicholas Weeks said:

Arya Asanga, a Third Ground bodhisattva, says in his Bodhisattvabhumi that women cannot reach annutarasamyaksambodhi. Because they have too many mental afflictions and inferior wisdom.

During the first of the three big kalpas bodhisattvas use female bodies if they wish, but after that time period (a mere 10 to the 59th power years) the use only male bodies. So women can become great bodhisattvas, but not full Buddhas.

See Engle's new translation The Bodhisattva Path to Unsurpassed Enlightenment, pp 169-70.

Astus wrote:

The Astasahasrika says otherwise, attributing the freedom from female birth to much higher level bodhisattvas.

"Endowed with these attributes, tokens and signs a Bodhisattva should be borne in mind as irreversible from full enlightenment. Furthermore, an irreversible Bodhisattva does not pander to Shramanas and Brahmins of other schools, telling them that they know what is worth knowing, that they see what is worth seeing. He pays no homage to strange Gods, offers them no flowers, incenses, etc., does not put his trusts in them. He is no more reborn in the places of woe, nor does he ever again become a woman."
(PP 8000 17.1, tr Conze)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 12th, 2016 at 10:07 PM

Title: No Truth, Only Pain

Content:

Astus wrote:

I see a general tendency to search for the truth, to argue about the truth, to consider the truth as the final goal and measure in Buddhism. But what if we change that yardstick to pain, suffering, dissatisfaction and the lack of it? One can consult scriptures and teachers to decide what is orthodox and canonical in terms of doctrine and method. However, if the standard is one's own pain or peace, what is there to compare?

No need to search for truth,

Just put to rest all views.

(http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enUS/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=143&Itemid=57)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 13th, 2016 at 1:24 AM

Title: Re: is Buddhism a religious faith?

Content:

smcj said:

Let me ask everybody reading this some questions: Why is my position so unpopular? What is the source of resistance to it? Isn't it possible that this deep-seated emotional and conceptual antipathy towards all things "religious" is an attachment that is an obstruction?

Astus wrote:

As far as saying that Buddhism is polytheistic, I think it is true from the beginning. And with Mahayana it has even produced its own types of deities in the form of buddhas and bodhisattvas, then with Vajrayana we also have the magical elements fully internalised.

Arguing that Buddhism is actually about inner contemplation on emptiness is taking an idealised elite form as the mainstream. And while a small number of educated monks do contemplate on emptiness, they also pray to and bow before a wide arrange of deities, perform rituals, etc., just like the majority, who, on the other hand, don't know or care about contemplating the true nature of mind and such. Same thing you can see in Catholicism, with a small number of educated monks and a big mass of devotees.

There are a number of studies out there that discuss how the worship of <https://books.google.com/books?id=TtLEr3tod18C>, https://books.google.com/books?id=tFcy_5Ultq0C,

<https://books.google.com/books?id=WpyiqKZISw0C>,

<https://books.google.com/books?id=dgo7JV9vNCQC>,

<https://books.google.com/books?id=Pz6okTs7wdAC>, etc. defined Buddhism in East Asia. And for those who do not recognise the names:

http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/ancientsgrfx.pdf.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 13th, 2016 at 1:59 AM

Title: Re: No Truth, Only Pain

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

the problem is, it is easy to lose a sense of basic honesty in the search to rid oneself of pain, to gain peace or whatever. The naturally tendency is to cling, including to 'peace' or 'lack of pain', which is of an within itself, a kind of pain.

Astus wrote:

Certainly, we can make an identity of anything. With the identity comes the ideology.

Johnny Dangerous said:

IMO that's a big part of the reason that a teacher. lineage etc. is so important.

Astus wrote:

That is: an authority of the right ideology should correct one's mistakes, and that is fine. My direction in this topic, however, is about seeing the veracity of the Dharma in one's personal first hand experience. One possible argument against that is how people can so easily delude themselves in many ways, therefore it is necessary to have an external supervisor. To that my answer is that people believe whatever they want anyway, and a teacher can only advise but not force. This is not (another) debate about the role of receiving instructions. It is about trusting our mindfulness and facing what we actually experience.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 13th, 2016 at 3:25 AM

Title: Re: is Buddhism a religious faith?

Content:

tiagolps said:

Worshipping them alone won't take you to the summit, buddhahood. If it doesn't take you to buddhahood, how can it be mahayana? How can it be Vajrayana?

Astus wrote:

I don't think buddhahood is the first concern of most of the devotees, but rather more mundane matters, like health, wealth, success, safe travel, children, good afterlife, etc. And there are particular buddhas and bodhisattvas assigned to various wishes and domains, just like in polytheist religions. But for those who aim for buddhahood, worship can do the job. That is, by attaining birth in a buddha-land.

tiagolps said:

Dharma requires more study and practice than Catholicism.

Astus wrote:

How did you measure that? Have you, for instance, compared the time it takes to master the http://www.vatican.va/archive/ENG1104/_INDEX.HTM and the <http://www.nichirenlibrary.org/en/dic/Content/F/151> (<http://www.cbeta.org/result/T22/T22n1428.htm>)?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 13th, 2016 at 6:33 AM

Title: Re: is Buddhism a religious faith?

Content:

tiagolps said:

That is what I would call Folk Buddhism, which can be called polytheistic deity worship, not buddhadharma.

Astus wrote:

That is a serious reduction of followers from hundreds of millions to tens of thousands, worse than saying that only monastics are true practitioners. It also disregards a fair number of sutras that actively teach worship.

tiagolps said:

Sure, but aspiring to be born in a pure abode is different then polytheistic deity worship.

Astus wrote:

In Theravada the pure abodes (suddhavasa) are the five highest heavens of rupaloka. Other polytheist religions also teach about one or several heavens.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 13th, 2016 at 5:54 PM

Title: Re: No Truth, Only Pain

Content:

wuyouxianren said:

Doe the title of your post, "No Truth, Only Pain", express a view?

Astus wrote:

Of course, anything can be a view. It is the content that differs.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 13th, 2016 at 6:47 PM

Title: Re: No Truth, Only Pain

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Yes, for sure ultimately we are fully responsible for our own practice. Funnily enough though, taking full responsibility for it often means opening up and recognizing we are

NOT the authority we often think we are.

Astus wrote:

There are elements we should recognise that we do not know. There are also elements we should recognise that we know. The first great step on the path is losing our doubts about the Dharma. That's not the same as knowing everything there is to know, but knowing enough to be confident in our practice. Or, as Yangshan said of this stage (Book of Serenity, case 32): "You can take the seat and wear the robe. After this, see on your own."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 13th, 2016 at 6:52 PM

Title: Re: No Truth, Only Pain

Content:

Bristollad said:

I don't understand the dichotomy you are suggesting between the truth and pain, suffering, dissatisfaction

The Buddha taught four truths about suffering.

Astus wrote:

They are connected, yes. The point here is that whatever truths are discussed in Buddhism, they are to eliminate suffering. The goal as seeing reality is only the reality where no suffering can arise, it is not the sort of reality that can stand on its own.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 13th, 2016 at 7:18 PM

Title: Re: is Buddhism a religious faith?

Content:

tiagolps said:

Not saying that they are not buddhist, just saying many lack understanding to differentiate between their local folk religion and buddhism. I mean look at japan, how many people who say they are buddhists actually know the basics?

Astus wrote:

It depends on what you call the basics. If you look at what the Buddha called the <http://www.accesstoinight.org/ptf/dhamma/index.html>, there generosity, discipline, and heavenly birth come before discussing the drawbacks and renunciation of samsara, then finally comes the four noble truths. The gradual teachings of Mahayana work in a similar fashion, and the basis for everyone are generosity, virtuous action, and accumulating merit for good results in this life and the next. Cultivating meditation and wisdom are not the basics at all. Giving alms, good behaviour, and the belief in karma and rebirth are.

And there are some differences between Buddhism and "folk religion". For instance, Buddhists do not sacrifice animals. There is actually an opposite practice, they <http://www.buddhisma2z.com/content.php?id=504>.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 13th, 2016 at 8:55 PM

Title: Re: is Buddhism a religious faith?

Content:

tiagolps said:

I agree with that, but I still hold that that is not polytheism. Polytheism as no gradual training.

Astus wrote:

Polytheism simply means belief in many gods. Buddhism fits that. As for gradual training, all the priests, shamans, witches, etc. were trained gradually in their respective traditions and practices. For instance, one might even <http://www.kokugakuin.ac.jp/english/shintostudies.html> to become a Shinto priest.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 13th, 2016 at 9:00 PM

Title: Re: No Truth, Only Pain

Content:

Bristollad said:

can you put it another way?

Astus wrote:

Let's take impermanence as an example. As a truth on its own, it is about affirming that all things are impermanent. Then we can debate if there are still some permanent things or not. As a truth conducive to liberation, it is about seeing for oneself that things are impermanent, and from that recognition become free from suffering. In this case, it is not a question of ultimate truth, of affirming the impermanence of everything, to convince others about it, but to gain liberation by understanding personally the meaning of the teaching of impermanence.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 13th, 2016 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: A Fine Blend of Mahāmudrā and Madhyamaka: Maitrīpa's Collection of Texts on Non-conceptual Realization (Amanasikāra)

Content:

Astus wrote:

An older, but relevant study: <https://www.scribd.com/doc/255461191/Enlightenment-by-a-Single-Means-Tibetan-Controversies-on-the-Self-sufficient-White-Remedy>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 13th, 2016 at 10:04 PM

Title: Re: Is the nature of mind a fiction?

Content:

Temicco said:

The Atthakavagga of the Sutta Nipata talks about how if you relax and don't cling, you'll reach a state where nobody can define you and nothing you experience bothers you by being there.

Astus wrote:

Which sutta?

Temicco said:

This also appears in Chan texts. The only difference between the two, really, is that Chan texts discuss the nature of mind.

Astus wrote:

No attachment is certainly the essential teaching of the Buddha, and that is also the ultimate nature of mind.

Temicco said:

So, what then of the nature of mind?

Astus wrote:

No nature is the true nature.

Temicco said:

It seems like this state can be entered

Astus wrote:

That's already a wrong approach. If there is a state to enter, it is just another delusion.

Temicco said:

Are Chan and Mahamudra really adding anything substantial to the teaching of the Sutta Nipata by discussing the nature of mind?

Astus wrote:

Probably not.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 13th, 2016 at 10:35 PM

Title: Re: No Truth, Only Pain

Content:

wuyouxianren said:

Thanks. So then this statement of yours, "No need to search for truth", also expresses a view. Am I right?

Astus wrote:

Yes. The decisive question is whether one simply grasps at that view, or follows the instruction and lets it all go.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 14th, 2016 at 12:47 AM

Title: Re: No Truth, Only Pain

Content:

Vasana said:

Doesn't that suppose a false dichotomy between whatever an ultimate truth is and the personal realization of how that truth applies to one's own practice and liberation or am I also missing the intention behind this thread ?

Astus wrote:

It is, as you say, a difference in focal point. If we get stuck on the question of how things really are, that is missing the point of why the teachings were given. They are not meant as statements about reality, but as instructions for liberation. Therefore, the goal is not clear insight but freedom from dissatisfaction.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 14th, 2016 at 2:15 AM

Title: Re: Is the nature of mind a fiction?

Content:

Temicco said:

Why then discuss it using positive formulations? It seems potentially misleading, no?

Astus wrote:

The concept of "nature" (xing 性) has a history in China pre-dating Buddhism. See a short section on nature <http://plato.stanford.edu/entries/chinese-metaphysics/#ImpDif>, or for instance the opposing views of <http://plato.stanford.edu/entries/mencius/#3> and <http://plato.stanford.edu/entries/xunzi/#humans>. Besides that, the concept also comes from India in the form of the tathagatagarbha teachings. So, it is fairly complicated why and how certain terms are used.

Temicco said:

It just throws me for a loop when the nature of mind is so frequently discussed as if it's a thing that can be cognized, even if such a view is explicitly shot down. If it's not adding anything on, then why add it on?

Astus wrote:

One has to communicate somehow. Just consider how nirvana can be easily taken to be some kind of realm or state (e.g. nirvana as dhatu, or as dharma), when it literally means extinction.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 14th, 2016 at 2:30 AM

Title: Re: Is the nature of mind a fiction?

Content:

Temicco said:

Chan is all about the nature of mind. In what way do you propose it differs from the latter two?

Astus wrote:

Zen's " <http://www.nichirenlibrary.org/en/dic/Content/D/92> " is about seeing the nature of mind yourself, gaining a first hand experience without going through stages. In Mahamudra and Dzogchen " https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Pointing-out_instruction " means certain methods teachers use to induce an experience of the nature of mind. Although it could be said that Zen has stories where a teacher's words or actions trigger realisation in the student - and such stories exist even in sutras - it is not a formal technique.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 14th, 2016 at 2:32 AM

Title: Re: No Truth, Only Pain

Content:

Vasana said:

There is no freedom from dissatisfaction without clear-insight. The goal posts are not the goal but you need them to know where to aim.

Astus wrote:

Wisdom is part of the path. So are concentration and discipline.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 14th, 2016 at 3:19 AM

Title: Re: Is the nature of mind a fiction?

Content:

Temicco said:

I think it would be a bit silly to think that what's going on in Tibetan ngo sprod is any different from what's going on in some of the gong-ans.

Astus wrote:

In TB they give such introduction regularly, in a set format. That does not happen in Zen, you cannot go to such a programme. And even you can only compare it to some koans, that is, stories. In TB it's not just in stories, it's what they do.

Temicco said:

Does it really matter that Chan didn't reify this into a method?

Astus wrote:

Chan is a direct path. No methods, just see nature and become buddha. What nature? That there is nothing to see. How do you see that? Just sit and observe how everything comes and goes, and there is nothing to do about it. This is not complicated at all. At the same time, not even the buddhas can make you see it. You have to do it yourself. The approach in Vajrayana is somewhat different.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 15th, 2016 at 1:16 AM

Title: Re: No Truth, Only Pain

Content:

wuyouxianren said:

So, when you told others "Just put to rest all views", you were actually advocating views of your own, and even stronger ones; in other words, you are teaching others what you yourself have not been able, or are simply not willing, to do. Am I correct?

Astus wrote:

All teachings are views. However, there is a difference between views that only create further views, and views that eliminate views.

wuyouxianren said:

Next, would you elaborate where these statements, "No truth, only pain" and "No need to search for truth", come from? In particular, are they the Buddha's original teaching? Or are they the faithful representation or interpretation of such a teaching? If yes, what are your original sources? If not, would you briefly justify these statements based on Buddha's original teaching? And in particular, would it be more wrong or harmful to claim "No pain, only truth" than "No truth, only pain"?

Astus wrote:

"No truth, only pain" - that's simply a title. As for what it refers to has been explained already.

"No need to search for truth" - that is from a Chan text, but it goes back to teachings found in the sutras, like in chapter 6 of the http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html: "If even my correct teachings are to be abandoned, how much more incorrect teachings?"

wuyouxianren said:

Lastly, when you made such a claim as "No truth, only pain" or "No need to search for truth", were you aware of what kind of audience you were addressing? Or were you aware of the fact that traditionally there is a difference of emphasis between the Mahayana and Theravada teachings?

Astus wrote:

This is a public forum.

wuyouxianren said:

Can the Buddha's teaching be always explained, or re-taught, in a fully consistent, and therefore more convincing, way? If yes, why do we need to choose a less consistent or even self-contradictory way?

Astus wrote:

The Buddha's teachings have always been repeated and reformed ever since his disciples began to teach. As for the success of a teaching, it is measured by the realisation attained by the student.

wuyouxianren said:

If the Buddha is the ultimate authority of his teaching, would not it be a safer and better approach to have the so-called Chan Masters, together with their practices, to be critically examined rather than simply accepted or even blindly followed?

Astus wrote:

Chan is in agreement with the Buddha's teachings. If you want to debate that, just open a topic for it.

wuyouxianren said:

Would not it make more sense to first remove one's various wrong views and replace them with the Buddhist right views, and then talk of getting rid of these right views when one has moved into the proper stage of his Buddhist practice?

Astus wrote:

That's what normally happens.

wuyouxianren said:

And how can a person talk of giving up his swimming skills, or even refusing to have learned them at all, before he has swam across the river? Or how can one talk of destroying the boat or bridge even before he builds them?

Astus wrote:

As the Zen saying (from Record of Linji, p 38, tr Sasaki) goes: "Though gold dust is valuable, in the eyes it causes cataracts." Why keep building sand castles, when one could as well just stop?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 15th, 2016 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: No Truth, Only Pain

Content:

Matt J said:

I think this is a false dichotomy. Once you see the truth with clear insight, then you gain freedom from dissatisfaction.

Astus wrote:

What truth is that?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 15th, 2016 at 5:29 PM

Title: Re: No Truth, Only Pain

Content:

Wayfarer said:

There is definitely truth which can be distinguished from delusion.

Astus wrote:

And that truth, just as you say, is that all things are impermanent, unsatisfactory, and impersonal. However, they are truths in the sense as something to learn and contemplate, so that the imagined attributes of appearances as stable, satisfying, and personal are removed. They are not truths that one has to uphold just because the Buddha said so. This is expressed in Mahayana with the teaching that even emptiness is empty, and not a substance. In other words, the truths are all skilful means with practical value.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 15th, 2016 at 5:36 PM

Title: Re: is Buddhism a religious faith?

Content:

conebeckham said:

a positive expression of an Ultimate, which is certainly religious, and which is at least partly an object of faith, immune to the analysis of Madhyamaka.

Astus wrote:

Is it immune because it is an object of faith?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 16th, 2016 at 2:21 AM

Title: Re: is Buddhism a religious faith?

Content:

AlexMcLeod said:

If it is truly the Ultimate, it is immune because the Ultimate beyond description or analysis.

Astus wrote:

What makes something the ultimate?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 16th, 2016 at 2:23 AM

Title: Re: No Truth, Only Pain

Content:

Wayfarer said:
As always, I disagree.

Astus wrote:
What do you say about the purpose of the Buddha's teachings as being for liberation from suffering?

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, May 16th, 2016 at 2:40 AM
Title: Re: No Truth, Only Pain
Content:

Malcolm said:
I would say that is the essence of the Hinayāna path. But the Mahāyāna path also includes the attainment of omniscience.

Astus wrote:
What is the reason for attaining omniscience? Isn't it to liberate all beings from suffering?

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, May 16th, 2016 at 2:42 AM
Title: Re: No Truth, Only Pain
Content:

Bakmoon said:
If you mean that our emphasis should be on the soteriological effectiveness of the teachings rather than taking them as a way of fashioning more and more views for ourselves

Astus wrote:
That is exactly the point. That all the truths in Buddhism serve a purpose, they are not good because they are true, but because they deliver beings.

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, May 16th, 2016 at 3:07 AM
Title: Re: No Truth, Only Pain
Content:

Malcolm said:
However, the point is that the Buddha's path is not only about freedom from negative qualities. It is also about the attainment of positive qualities, such as the four fearlessness, the eighteen unshared qualities of a Buddha and so on.

Astus wrote:
I don't deny those.

Malcolm said:

So while it is true that the motive for the attainment of these positive qualities is in order to liberate other sentient beings, they are also positive in their own right, apart from that motivation.

Astus wrote:

They are positive, because they help in accomplishing one's own and others' liberation. What could be called positive on its own right is freedom/enlightenment itself.

Malcolm said:

The negative view of awakening that you consistently portray also shortens one's lifespan.

Astus wrote:

The buddha-nature is already perfect with all the qualities of buddhahood. The reason buddha-nature is not seen is grasping appearances. Once that mistaken identification is gone, the buddha-mind can manifest.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 16th, 2016 at 3:57 AM

Title: Re: No Truth, Only Pain

Content:

Malcolm said:

That is just a lot of conceptuality.

Astus wrote:

What isn't?

Malcolm said:

Anyone can see buddhanature, they just have to have the method.

Astus wrote:

E.g. "zazen is entering directly into the ocean of buddha-nature and manifesting the body of the Buddha" (<http://antaiji.org/en/classics/english-zazen-yojinki/>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 16th, 2016 at 3:59 AM

Title: Re: is Buddhism a religious faith?

Content:

AlexMcLeod said:

Ultimate is merely a shorthand term some people use for Ultimate Reality. Or True Nature, or I've heard a bunch of other colorful phrases people use to describe it.

Astus wrote:

In that way, even God and Atman can be exempt from analysis.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 16th, 2016 at 4:01 AM

Title: Re: is Buddhism a religious faith?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The term "ultimate" simply means an object of an undeceived cognition, for example, the direct perception of emptiness.

Astus wrote:

That is non-conceptual wisdom, where there is no view to analyse.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 16th, 2016 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: No Truth, Only Pain

Content:

Malcolm said:

That's not what I am talking about.

Astus wrote:

Then please clarify it.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 16th, 2016 at 4:19 AM

Title: Re: is Buddhism a religious faith?

Content:

conebeckham said:

Is that non-conceptual wisdom immune from analysis?

Astus wrote:

As a concept, no. As an experience, yes.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 16th, 2016 at 4:20 AM

Title: Re: is Buddhism a religious faith?

Content:

AlexMcLeod said:

I suppose that depends on how you are using those terms. In the common usage, no, they would not be considered either Ultimate or exempt from analysis.

Astus wrote:

In what way would they be inarguable?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 16th, 2016 at 4:31 AM

Title: Re: is Buddhism a religious faith?

Content:

AlexMcLeod said:

If you used those terms in a non-traditional way, they sometimes refer to the idea of True Nature, rather than a creator god or an individual soul. Like I said, people use a lot of terms to refer to the perception of reality.

Astus wrote:

There are examples for that.

AlexMcLeod said:

Mostly just to not be thrown out of their society for blasphemy.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean Indonesia?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 16th, 2016 at 7:07 AM

Title: Re: No Truth, Only Pain

Content:

wuyouxianren said:

I would love to have a debate on this topic, at the same time, however, I believe that there needs to be consequences for whoever loses the debate, for example, if I lose, I would commit myself to giving up all my wrong and/or unjustified views, at least those directly related to this debate, and would never, during my life time and anywhere and in any form, advocate them again.

Are you willing to make the same commitment? If yes, then we can move into the next steps of, for example, setting up and/or discussing the debate rules.

Astus wrote:

I'm open for a debate with the possibility of being proven wrong, however, I don't see how the conditions of conviction can be satisfyingly delineated. As for debating the rules of debating, that's a whole different topic.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 16th, 2016 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: is Buddhism a religious faith?

Content:

AlexMcLeod said:

People from any religion can have a realization, I just believe Buddhism to be most conducive to awakening.

Astus wrote:

No religion agrees with that idea, unless you consider things like Theosophy a religion.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 17th, 2016 at 3:34 AM

Title: Re: How to study Mahayana?

Content:

Temicco said:

Regarding Indo-Tibetan Mahayana, it seems I would just read everything I can get my hands on from the four tenet schools, especially primers written by people already familiar with the material. Is that enough? What order would I do it in and what texts in particular?

Astus wrote:

Go with the lamrim works. They give good summaries. Jamgon Kongtrul's http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Treasury_of_Knowledge is really a treasury of knowledge.

Temicco said:

I don't really know what to do for East Asian Mahayana besides reading some of the main sutras -- there seems to be less of a shared basis between the schools. Is this true? I've read the Awakening of Faith, but that seems to be mainly a Dhyaana school thing.

Astus wrote:

The Awakening of Faith in Mahayana is one of the most fundamental and influential texts in EAB. Here are some online resources covering numerous subjects.

Ven Xingyun: <http://hsingyun.org/books/core-teachings/>, <http://www.fgsitc.org/see-publications/>

Ven Shengyan: http://www.108wisdom.org/html/OTH_03.pdf,
<http://chancenter.org/cmc/publications/free-literature/>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 17th, 2016 at 6:03 PM

Title: Re: is Cheontae/Tendai Seon/Zen and Pureland is the same?

Content:

Iconodule said:

My understanding is that the sharp sectarian divisions of Japanese Buddhism have a lot to do with the way the Japanese government, early on, required the Buddhist sects to be separate and each receive a certain number of ordinands each year.

Astus wrote:

The strong separation of schools was established in the Tokugawa era through the enforcement of the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Danka_system, as part of the general classification of Japanese society, and a defensive measure against the spread of Christianity. For instance check this essay:
<http://www.columbia.edu/~wtd1/w4030/sjt/Ch33.pdf>.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 18th, 2016 at 6:40 AM

Title: Re: Reception of Japanese Buddhism in China

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are recent historical reasons that I doubt Japanese Buddhism can expect any welcome in the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Second_Sino-Japanese_War or the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Taiwan_under_Japanese_rule.

Ven Shengyan studied in Japan, and was a disciple of a Sanbo Kyodan teacher as well. But as for his teachings on Buddhism, I don't see any Japanese influence.

I remember someone mentioning that Shingon has some active groups in Taiwan.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 19th, 2016 at 4:14 AM

Title: Re: Zen events and small children?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Depends on what counts as a Zen event. As I have seen at a Chinese temple, children are no problem. However, since the people were almost exclusively Chinese and Vietnamese, it is a different style than Western convert communities, where the Buddhist activity consists almost exclusively of sitting silently after a minimal chanting.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 19th, 2016 at 5:43 PM

Title: Re: How to move from selfishness to happiness

Content:

Astus wrote:

If one approaches selflessness in the mundane way, it can give good results, but also lot of frustrations. It is as faulty as anything in life. The bodhisattva's great compassion is fundamentally different, because it is based on liberating wisdom (prajnaparamita), that is, the realisation of the conditioned, impersonal, and insubstantial nature of the entire world and all the beings in it. So, to move from selfishness one should see that there is no self to be obsessed about, also there are no others to worry about. Then one can be naturally and fully permeated by the immeasurable states.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 21st, 2016 at 7:50 AM

Title: Re: Single Stream of Consciousness and Rebirth

Content:

Iconodule said:

I've read and heard a fair amount of Buddhist teaching, but one question I don't recall hearing an answer to is this: Between rebirths there is a single stream of consciousness, so one death leads to one rebirth in one of the six realms depending on the karmic orientation. Why does this mindstream not split up and constitute in several different births? What keeps it from merging with other mindstreams?

Astus wrote:

The mind stream is an attempt to explain rebirth without self. However, rebirth and karma applies only to those who are attached to the concept of self. Since a self is always unitary, there is no splitting into two selves.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 21st, 2016 at 7:51 PM

Title: Re: Single Stream of Consciousness and Rebirth

Content:

Iconodule said:

But that would mean the mind-stream can be identified as a self which would undermine the basic Buddhist critique of self.

Astus wrote:

Yogacara teaches exactly that. The manas (also called klista-manas-vijnana, i.e. defiled-mind-consciousness) continually and incessantly grasps the alayavijnana as the self, and together they form the mind stream that stops only with enlightenment. That is also their explanation for how the mistaken concept of self persists even during states of unconsciousness and such.

On the other hand, it is not necessary to posit a mind stream - although we find it in both Mahayana and Theravada schools as a generally accepted theory. But if you take a look at how the idea of a mind stream developed, it is secondary to the teaching of rebirth and karma. That is, individual karma is a given and is a primary teaching, while the explanations are diverse and secondary. Therefore the question of splitting streams is based on a wrong approach to the matter.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 21st, 2016 at 8:55 PM

Title: Re: Single Stream of Consciousness and Rebirth

Content:

Anders said:

How is are emanations not a splitting of consciousness?

Astus wrote:

Only we can think that a bodhisattva has a body and mind. The bodhisattva does not have such ideas.

Anders said:

How do 100 emanations avoid the issue about karma of a single being ripening in multiple ones?

Astus wrote:

The short answer: it's magic.

The long answer: there are two kinds of rebirth (二種生死). For deluded beings it is fragmented rebirth (分段生死), that is, birth from body to body, but for bodhisattvas it is inconceivable transformation rebirth (不思議變易生死), because it is generated purely by compassion and vows. The second type is also called mind made body (意成身, manomayakaya), and transformation body (變化身, nirmanakaya). See: Cheng Weishi Lun, Wei Tat p 609-611 / Cook BDK p 276 / http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T31n1585_008#0045a11.

Anders said:

Also, how can a partless dharma be dependently arisen?

Astus wrote:

Dharmas are basic categories, so they are technically partless. Even the physical elements of earth, etc. are singular. On the other hand, they are all fabricated (samskara) and conditioned (samskrta), except space, the cessations, and suchness.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 23rd, 2016 at 1:27 AM

Title: Re: Result of Karma

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are two major speeches by the Buddha on karma in the Majjhima Nikaya. In <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.135.than.html> he gives the general effects of specific actions. In <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.136.than.html> he shows how causes and effects are a complicated matter, and one should not fall into simple generalisations. There is another important teaching, the <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.101.than.html>, where the Buddha refutes the Jain idea of the fatalist interpretation of karma, and the idea that asceticism can purify past karma.

In the <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.002.than.html> the Buddha lists a number of topics that are not only worthless, but even harmful to ponder about:

'Was I in the past? Was I not in the past? What was I in the past? How was I in the past?

Having been what, what was I in the past? Shall I be in the future? Shall I not be in the future? What shall I be in the future? How shall I be in the future? Having been what, what shall I be in the future?' Or else he is inwardly perplexed about the immediate present: 'Am I? Am I not? What am I? How am I? Where has this being come from? Where is it bound?'

The reason such questions are wrong is that they all involve one or another sort of self view. And the reason for the teaching of karma is that by seeing the consequences of bodily, verbal, and mental actions, one avoids harmful and cultivates beneficial actions. Then, through wholesome acts one can attain a level of peace and joy, and there it becomes possible to cultivate a tranquil mind, then with a tranquil mind one can attain insight, thus with insight one gains liberation. On the other hand, to take the teaching of karma as a theoretical truth to analyse, one can only fall into confusion and wrong views.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 23rd, 2016 at 6:28 AM

Title: Re: Obstacles and their elimination - The Degenerate Age

Content:

Queequeg said:

I wonder if the decline in religious affiliation and growth in atheism is a sort of rejection of milk?

Astus wrote:

It makes little difference whether one believes there is or there is no God. What matters is the everyday thinking and actions. Switching Christian folklore to materialist-consumerist folklore are equally mundane, superficial, and naive ideas about life that one rarely even thinks about.

Queequeg said:

In both Tibetan and East Asian Buddhism there is an idea that in a time marked by overall decline in standards of ethics, morality, religion, etc. the real, most profound teachings of Buddhism will spread.

Astus wrote:

I don't know about the spread of profound teachings (I guess it's a Tibetan idea), but the concept of the decline of Dharma is just the usual https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Golden_Age_myth.

Queequeg said:

I wonder if it's the breakdown in the perpetuation of (false) views that permits people open to the most profound teaching to arise, free of the fetters that hold people of previous generations back?

Astus wrote:

Don't think so. There are always a few people open to new ideas, and the rest either don't care or like to hear things in the way that sounds assuring of their existing beliefs.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 23rd, 2016 at 7:08 AM

Title: Re: Lists of buddha names in sutras?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is a sutra "The Buddha Proclaims the Names of Buddhas Sutra" (<http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T14n0440>), that was supposed to have been translated to English (see: <http://www.drbachinese.org/vbs/publish/523/vbs523p026.pdf>, <http://www.drbachinese.org/vbs/publish/521/vbs521p028.pdf>), but I couldn't find it. That sutra is 12 fascicles, but the one following it in the Taisho canon with an identical title is 30 fascicles. And there are other, shorter sutras giving lists of buddha names.

Besides that, if you search for names from the Amitabha Sutra like Sumeru Lamp Buddha (須彌燈佛), or Most Victorious Sound Buddha (最勝音佛), they appear only in other texts giving lists of names, like the above sutras, or the Thousand and Five Hundred Buddha Names in the Ten Directions Sutra (<http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T14n0442>).

For instance Sun Birth Buddha (日生佛) appears in T440 (12 fascicles Buddha Names Sutra) in fascicle 11, simply as "Namo Sun Birth Buddha". And in that fascicle only, there are 1119 other "Namo ... Buddha", and that's all there is. I assume the reason behind reciting the names of buddhas (they usually do the <https://kongmu.wordpress.com/2011/10/09/88-buddhas/>), is a form of meritorious activity, and extended version of buddhanusmrti. But there might be more.

If you look at a commentary (<http://www.ymba.org/books/mind-seal-buddhas/explanation-text/text-transmission> or <http://www.cttbusa.org/amitabhacommentary/amitabha15.htm>), they don't bother giving explanations and stories for each names. In the sutra itself they serve as buddhas who testify for Amitabha's and Sukhavati's greatness.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 24th, 2016 at 4:53 AM

Title: Re: Obstacles and their elimination - The Degenerate Age

Content:

Queequeg said:

So, is it easier for an Atheist to relate to Buddha Dharma than a Deist?

Astus wrote:

Is it easier for an annihilationist than an eternalist? Buddhism has elements for both that are harder and that are easier. Perhaps it is easier for those who believe in some sort of eternalism, because that's the type of view Buddhists had to contend with usually, and there are only a few cases where they argued against the carvakas.

Queequeg said:

I'm not sure the idea of the degeneration of Dharma is just a Golden Age delusion. Its based on the arising and perishing of phenomena. There is more to it - some remarkable observations about the passing of teachings and traditions over generations - the proverbial Telephone Game through the ages.

Astus wrote:

It rather seems to be the common human experience that things were better in the old times. There's also the general phenomenon of elevating the people of the past to saintly levels, while our present situation always seems like the worst ever. Just consider how a thousand years ago Buddhist teachers considered their times totally degenerate, and then those 500 years later thought about those before them as great times but theirs as crap.

Here are two quotes from the Tang era, that is generally considered by the Zen tradition to be the "golden age".

Pei Xiu (791–864):

Therefore, while among the followers of all the [Chan] lineages there have been awakened people, nevertheless, each [lineage] rests in its own practices, [and so] the flexible are few and the limited numerous. For several decades the teachings of the [Chan] masters has increasingly declined. They have taken their transmissions as doors-and-windows [separate sects], each opening outward in its own way.
(Preface to the Chan Prolegomenon, in Zongmi on Chan, p 193, tr J. L. Broughton)

Fayan Wenyi (855-958):

People of recent times take a lot lightly. They may enter communes, but they are lazy about pursuing intense inquiry. Even if they develop concentration, they do not select a true master; through the mistakes of false teachers, like them they lose direction to the ultimate.

...

In recent generations, Zen teachers have lost the basis; students have no guidance. They match wits egotistically and take what is ephemeral for an attainment. Where is the heart to guide others? No longer do we hear of knowledge to destroy falsehood. Caning and shouting at random, they say they have studied Te-shan and Lin-chi; presenting circular symbols to each other, they claim they have deeply understood Kuei-shan and Yang-shan.

(Ten Guidelines for Zen Schools, in Five Houses of Zen, tr T. Cleary)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 24th, 2016 at 7:19 PM

Title: Re: Obstacles and their elimination - The Degenerate Age

Content:

Queequeg said:

"It is not only the people who live during the Buddha's lifetime who obtain great benefits. In the last five-hundred-year period, the sublime way will spread and benefit humankind far into the future."

-Zhiyi

In these passages, Lotus Sutra = Ekayana = true teaching = sublime way.

Astus wrote:

I guess you are aware that a good number of sutras talk about the "later ages", and elevate themselves in making statements about themselves, just like in the Lotus Sutra.

"But if there is someone five hundred years hence who is able to hear this scripture, and believe, understand, and commit it to memory, then this person will be most rare."

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html, ch 14)

There are even texts discussing the end times: <http://sutrasmantras.info/sutra10.html>.

But although all the sutras will disappear, the <http://sutrasmantras.info/sutra25.html> will remain for another hundred years:

"In times to come, the Dharma will be annihilated. Out of lovingkindness and compassion, I will specially save this sūtra and make it stay for a hundred years more. Sentient beings that encounter this sūtra will all be delivered as they wish."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 24th, 2016 at 8:51 PM

Title: Re: Obstacles and their elimination - The Degenerate Age

Content:

Queequeg said:

I'd caution, though, that in the Lotus Schools the Lotus Sutra is not just a book but the awakening of Buddhas itself; the Buddha's own wisdom and action.

Astus wrote:

The same applies to some other sutras as well. Also, I think the Lotus Sutra itself is somewhat explicit on how "Lotus Sutra" means enlightenment.

"Subhūti, all of the buddhas and all of their teachings of peerless perfect enlightenment spring forth from this sūtra."

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html, ch 8)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 25th, 2016 at 3:46 AM

Title: Re: Obstacles and their elimination - The Degenerate Age

Content:

Queequeg said:

But, those quote only confirm the general tendency of decline through the Former and Middle Days...

Astus wrote:

Then see how even Mahakashyapa complained about monks at the time of the Buddha:

"What is the cause, lord, what is the reason, why before there were fewer training rules and yet more monks established in final gnosis, whereas now there are more training rules and yet fewer monks established in final gnosis?"

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn16/sn16.013.than.html>)

A study on the early scriptures' words on the decline of Dharma:

<http://dharmafarer.org/wordpress/wp-content/uploads/2009/12/1.10-Dharma-ending-age-piya-into.pdf>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 25th, 2016 at 4:48 AM

Title: Re: Obstacles and their elimination - The Degenerate Age

Content:

Queequeg said:

What is the teaching that is efficacious in the Degenerate Age...?

Astus wrote:

That is a question used only as a preamble before introducing one's own ideas of the "only true path".

Queequeg said:

By definition, all provisional teachings are not efficacious.

Astus wrote:

All teachings show the same and single idea of how the ending of attachment is liberation from suffering and delusion. As I see it, that's what the one vehicle really means.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 25th, 2016 at 5:10 AM

Title: Re: Obstacles and their elimination - The Degenerate Age

Content:

Queequeg said:

No, that's actually a question. Personally, I'm not even sure there is a viable question there.

Astus wrote:

Then isn't the question simply what a viable path is?

Queequeg said:

Your stab at "one true path"?

Astus wrote:
Exactly.

Author: Astus
Date: Wednesday, May 25th, 2016 at 6:56 AM
Title: Re: Obstacles and their elimination - The Degenerate Age
Content:
Queequeg said:
That is indeed the only viable question...

Astus wrote:
And how can it be answered? People stick to any path that fits their conditioning, and it has nothing to do with the usual claims of efficacy, velocity, and superiority.

Author: Astus
Date: Wednesday, May 25th, 2016 at 5:24 PM
Title: Re: Obstacles and their elimination - The Degenerate Age
Content:
Queequeg said:
That is indeed the only viable question...

Astus wrote:
If popularity is an acceptable measure, then faith based methods are the best, primarily faith in Amitabha and Sukhavati. Related to that are the ritual practices and chanting, where many people can participate. Studying the scriptures is probably the second most popular option, considering the many Buddhist education institutions. Third on the list might be the reclusive lifestyle with an emphasis on meditation.

As for a path that actually works, I think it's always been the same: discipline, concentration, insight.

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, May 26th, 2016 at 12:14 AM
Title: Re: Illusion
Content:
pothigai said:
If all phenomena are illusions, then what would real phenomena be?

Astus wrote:
There are a few steps to take before one can see the useful meaning of illusion in the Buddhist context.

1. One has an emotional bond with an object when it is viewed in a personal sense. That is, the difference between "a table" and "my table". It doesn't upset one if "a table" is repainted, carried away, or destroyed. It does upset one if that's "my table". Therefore, the first meaning of emptiness is the lack of self, lack of personal essence.

2. One can have a personal connection with an object only if there is actually an object to relate to. What is called an object, however, is simply a name, a concept, and not any actual physical or mental experience. So, there is a difference between seeing colours and forms, and the name "table".

3. Because there is no personal relation and nothing to relate to, the common view that there is such a thing as "my table" is an illusion.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 26th, 2016 at 7:34 PM

Title: Re: Obstacles and their elimination - The Degenerate Age

Content:

Iconodule said:

Right, but how do their Zen, Tendai, etc. neighbors look at them? As eccentric cousins? As deluded weirdos? And for those Mahayana who incorporate some tantric practices, like Tendai, but aren't full-blown Vajrayana, do they see these practices as superior to sutra and, if not, what purpose do they see them as serving?

Astus wrote:

Tendai takes the secret doctrines (mikkyo) on the same level as the Lotus Sutra teachings. They are equal. But we have some members of the Tendai school who know a lot more than me to elaborate on this.

As for the others, as far as I am aware, they see Vajrayana as a less efficient teaching, just like Vajrayana sees all the others. It is only because people are often not familiar with the other teachings that they assume the doxography presented by Vajrayana is the sole truth there is. Perhaps it is not that big a surprise to say that the only people who agree with what Vajrayana presents as valid are the Vajrayana followers themselves.

Dogen has the question about Shingon raised and answered in the Bendowa. The first sentence of his reply is:

"Remember, among Buddhists we do not argue about superiority and inferiority of philosophies, or choose between shallowness and profundity in the Dharma; we need only know whether the practice is genuine or artificial."
(SBGZ, vol 1, BDK Edition, p 9)

And his closing sentences (p 10-11) in the answer:

"From these intellectual ideas emerge all sorts of flowers in space: we think about the twelvefold cycle and the twenty-five spheres of existence; and ideas of the three vehicles and the five vehicles or of having buddha[-nature] and not having buddha[- nature] are endless. We should not think that the learning of these intellectual ideas is the right path of Buddhist practice. When we solely sit in zazen, on the other hand, relying now on exactly the same posture as the Buddha, and letting go of the myriad things, then we go beyond the areas of delusion, realization, emotion, and consideration, and we are not concerned with the ways of the common and the sacred. At once we are roaming outside the [intellectual] frame, receiving and using the great state of bodhi. How could those caught in the trap of words compare [with this]?"

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 26th, 2016 at 10:24 PM

Title: Re: Obstacles and their elimination - The Degenerate Age

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

What do you find shocking about that remark?

Astus wrote:

He has already said the same thing

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=339855#p339855>:

Malcolm said:

They reject them. What else can they do? If they accept them, they have to sign on.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 26th, 2016 at 10:25 PM

Title: Re: Obstacles and their elimination - The Degenerate Age

Content:

Queequeg said:

Is there an uncommon Mahayana?

Astus wrote:

That's another term for Vajrayana in TB.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 27th, 2016 at 7:13 PM

Title: Re: What is Sutra Mahamudra?

Content:

tomamundsen said:

Is Sutra Mahamudra something that would be viable in this situation? Even if it's not completely compatible, is it possible to engage in at all, even if it cannot be taken to the complete end result of Mahamudra? And if so, do you have any recommendations on which particular teachers would be best suited for such a presentation of Sutra Mahamudra?

Astus wrote:

The late John Crook taught not only Chan but also Mahamudra at Western Chan Fellowship. Anzan Hoshin of the White Wind Zen community has also been involved in Mahamudra teachings, and made some translations as well. On the other hand, Ken McLeod has included Zen in his Mahamudra teachings. So, I would say there is a possible connection, if one wants to make it.

If your friend just wants to learn the methods for samatha and vipasyana, he can do that from numerous sources, like <http://mahamudracenter.org/>. There are also live teachings around, if he wants that.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 27th, 2016 at 7:20 PM

Title: Re: Obstacles and their elimination - The Degenerate Age

Content:

maybay said:

Yes I do. Not as a requirement for attainment though, but as a criteria for engagement. If you fail in your practice of Dzogchen, nothing is lost. If you fail as a renunciate, you will either die or end up living a truly wretched existence. Bravery is a question of what risks you are willing to take.

Astus wrote:

Good point. That is another reason for recommending the Pure Land path over the path of sages (i.e. aryas). All who have faith in Amitabha and vows to be born there, will be born there. And once in Sukhavati, no more problems, and buddhahood is guaranteed.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 27th, 2016 at 9:28 PM

Title: Re: Obstacles and their elimination - The Degenerate Age

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, there are problems in the pure land, such as being born inside a lotus and stuck there for 18,000,000 human years.

Astus wrote:

That can happen only if one has some doubts about the Pure Land path. Besides that lotus is not itself a painful place, if somebody realises one's faults there, one can come out immediately.

That is, even if one has some doubts, one can attain birth. Not to mention those who commit all sorts of evil deeds and are totally lost in delusions.

Malcolm said:

Well, what about those who have committed the five actions which result in immediate rebirth in lower realms? They are excluded.

Astus wrote:

Actually, they are not. It states in the Contemplation Sutra that even those who commit the five worst actions can attain birth by remembering Amitabha. May read more on it from Shinran <http://shinranworks.com/the-major-expositions/chapter-on-shinjin/>.

Malcolm said:

Yes, after incalculable eons, the same as any other sūtra based path.

Astus wrote:

If you think there is a shorter path, then it is available in Sukhavati, simply because all beings there are free to visit any number of buddhas, not to mention Amitabha himself, and the present bodhisattvas.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 27th, 2016 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: Obstacles and their elimination - The Degenerate Age

Content:

Malcolm said:

This is not certain. Why? There are four causes required for birth in Sukhavati: the aspiration to do so, recollection of Amitabha, accumulation of virtue and dedication of merit. All four are required, as dictated by the 19th aspiration.

Astus wrote:

The minimal requirements are faith and vow. Beyond that everything else are commendable but not necessary. On this both the Chinese and Japanese masters agree.

Malcolm said:

All of these things depend on faith in something that may or may not happen after one dies.

Astus wrote:

Same goes for rebirth in general. Not to mention all the invisible forces at play in Vajrayana, like the whole role of a guru and empowerments.

Malcolm said:

Merely crying out to Amitabha like a lost child searching for its mother is not sufficient.

Astus wrote:

Mahasthamaprapta used this comparison (Surangama Sutra, tr new BTTS, p 230, 232-233):

"Consider someone who is always thinking of another person. This second person, though, has completely forgotten about the first person. Even if these two people were to meet, they might as well not have met, and even if they were to catch sight of one another, they might as well not have seen each other. But consider two other people who always have each other in mind so much so that they will be, in lifetime after lifetime, as inseparable as a man and his shadow. Similarly, the Thus- Come Ones in all ten directions think of all beings with compassion, just as a mother always thinks of her child. If the child were to run away from home, the mother's thinking of him will be of no use. But if the child is mindful of the mother, just as she is of him, the two will be inseparable in lifetime after lifetime. In the same way, beings who are always mindful of the Buddha, always thinking of the Buddha, are certain to see the Buddha now or in the future. They will never be far from Buddhas, and their minds will awaken by themselves without any special effort. Such people may be said to be adorned with fragrance and light, just as people who have been in the presence of incense will naturally smell sweet. The basis of my practice was mindfulness of the Buddha. I became patient with the state of mind in which no mental objects arise. Now when people of this world are mindful of the Buddha, I act as their guide to lead them to the Pure Land. The Buddha has asked us how we broke through to enlightenment. In order to enter samādhi, I chose no other method than to gather in the six faculties while continuously maintaining a pure mindfulness of the Buddha. This is the best method."

Malcolm said:

This is not certain.

Astus wrote:

As much as the sutras are certain, so it is this certain.

Malcolm said:

This is also not certain.

Astus wrote:

Why wouldn't it be? That's what the Buddha says in the sutra, it's a feature of Sukhavati. There are even vows for those (7, 9, 23).

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 28th, 2016 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: Obstacles and their elimination - The Degenerate Age

Content:

Malcolm said:

There are no invisible forces at play in Vajrayāna — if you think so, you have not understood anything.

Astus wrote:

That's good. Then empowerments work from a record as well as through live broadcast.

Malcolm said:

Crying out to Amitabha like a lost child can hardly be described as pratyahara and Buddhānusmṛti.

Astus wrote:

A child, when crying out, knows that there is the mother who can help. Similarly, one has faith in Amitabha to come and help.

Malcolm said:

It is not really certain at all.

Astus wrote:

Then there are no certain teachings, Pure Land or not.

Malcolm said:

These are not guarantees that these buddhas teach the short and quick path. These are listed as opportunities for gathering merit and hearing the teachings. Nothing about what teachings may be heard are mentioned.

Astus wrote:

Wouldn't a buddha teach the most beneficial and efficient method? And even if someone's karma requires the long road, that is the same situation in this life.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 28th, 2016 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: Obstacles and their elimination - The Degenerate Age

Content:

Malcolm said:

They have to given in person, otherwise, there is no transmission.

Astus wrote:

What is transmitted from teacher to disciple?

Malcolm said:

They hope there is a mother, but their desperation is driven by the fact that they are not sure. It is the same with Pure Land Buddhism. They may have convinced themselves, but in reality, they will never be sure until they find themselves in Sukhavati.

Astus wrote:

If what you mean by uncertainty is that one can never know for sure whether there is a slice of cheese left in the fridge as long as one doesn't go there and opens the door, then I think it's a level of unconfirmed hope we all have to live with every day.

Malcolm said:

Direct perception is always certain. This is the difference between lower and higher vehicles in general.

Astus wrote:

How is direct perception certain? We all see that the sun goes up and down. Does the sun actually go up and down? Or do you mean that first hand experience of the validity of the teachings is better than only believing in it based on a level of theoretical confirmation? If so, then I see no difference between the vehicles, they all point to seeing the truth for oneself. At the same time, isn't it the case that in the nine vehicles scheme all that the lower vehicles assume to be direct realisations are actually false? That is, it just shows how direct perception is uncertain.

Malcolm said:

There is no suffering in Sukhavati, so rapid means are not needed there. It is similar with our situation, the more pain-free the eon in which we live, the lower the teachings are available to us. Since there is no pain at all in Sukhavati, the path taught there is the longest one.

Astus wrote:

What do you base that idea on? Bodhisattvas are not in a hurry because they feel uncomfortable, but to liberate all the others.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 28th, 2016 at 1:22 AM

Title: Re: Obstacles and their elimination - The Degenerate Age

Content:

Malcolm said:

the path is transmitted to the student if they fail to achieve buddhahood during the empowerment

Astus wrote:

What sort of thing is the path to be given to another? Or, asking in another way, what is the medium between teacher and student?

Malcolm said:

That depends on what teachings you practice, and whether they are based on mind or pristine consciousness.

Astus wrote:

Wisdom first needs to be attained - hence the movement from ignorance to knowledge. Then, with that knowledge, that wisdom or pristine consciousness, one can progress on. That's what happens in all paths, where one goes from ordinary being to a noble one, and from noble practitioner to a non-practitioner. Unless it is the sudden enlightenment version, where with one step one goes from ordinary to buddha.

Malcolm said:

They all use the same rhetoric, "ehi, paśya," come and see. But in reality, the eight lower vehicles are based on intellectual theories, not pristine consciousness.

Astus wrote:

We could say even of the 9th vehicle that it is very much loaded with theories. Does that make it then intellectual? It certainly doesn't look as simple and free from theoretical matters as Pure Land and Zen.

As Honen wrote in his <http://www.jodo.org/teachings/teachings02.html>:

"Even if those who believe in the nembutsu study the teaching which Shakyamuni taught his whole life, they should not put on any airs and should sincerely practice the nembutsu, just as an illiterate fool, a nun or one who is ignorant of Buddhism."

Malcolm said:

The Vajrayāna is available to us in this epoch because it is the worst possible epoch in which liberation through Dharma is possible. Even Mahāyāna teachings are not always available. For example, Maitreya will not teach Vajrayāna.

Astus wrote:

Don't buddhas know all the teachings of all the vehicles? If they do, one can learn them just by asking for them.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 28th, 2016 at 2:31 AM

Title: Re: Obstacles and their elimination - The Degenerate Age

Content:

Malcolm said:

And then there is the third option. Pristine consciousness is innate. The stage of liberation is first. Vajrasattva lost his jewel, and needed to find it again.

Astus wrote:

It makes no difference if it's innate or not. As long as Vajrasattva does not know the actual place of his jewels, he's an ordinary being. Once he knows it, he's a noble one. Same story.

Malcolm said:

Buddhas don't proffer teachings like merchants displaying wares in the market. They teach according to circumstances. Since Sukhavati is so nice, easy and blissful, there is no reason at all to teach a swift path at all.

Astus wrote:

Circumstances? They teach according to the inclinations of the disciples. And again, beings in Sukhavati are not bound to that single buddha-land.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 28th, 2016 at 7:23 AM

Title: Re: Emptiness and Omnipresence: An Essential Introduction to Tiantai Buddhism

Content:

Iconodule said:

Here's something I wondered- how pronounced is Tiantai as a specific school in Chinese Buddhism today? Are there actually teachers/ monasteries explicitly advocating the Tiantai approach?

Astus wrote:

It seems to me that the answer lies in Chinese...

There are two outstanding Tiantai teachers (teacher and disciple) mentioned in English:

Dixian Guxu 諦閑古虛 (1858-1932)

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tan_Xu 倣虛 (1875-1963), there's also a book on his life

https://books.google.hu/books?id=z_wTDAAAQBAJ

It should also be noted that anyone can study and practice any school of Buddhism within a monastery, so there is no need for organisations like Fo Guan Shan or Dharma Drum Mountain to call themselves Tiantai, or anything in particular for that matter.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 28th, 2016 at 7:24 AM

Title: Re: Emptiness and Omnipresence: An Essential Introduction to Tiantai Buddhism

Content:

Iconodule said:

Now that I think about, I remember Ven Hsing Yun's book Only a Great Rain had some Tiantai methods in it. Not so much teaching Tiantai as a school but taking it for granted as part of Chinese Buddhism.

Astus wrote:

Exactly. If you look into Shengyan's Orthodox Chinese Buddhism, you will find Tiantai teachings there as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 28th, 2016 at 5:06 PM

Title: Re: Emptiness and Omnipresence: An Essential Introduction to Tiantai Buddhism

Content:

Iconodule said:

Tiantai methods

Astus wrote:

Tiantai teachings

Queequeg said:

I'm curious what these terms refer to...

Astus wrote:

As an example, Shengyan uses the five identities to explain the stages of enlightenment in relation to buddha-nature and sudden awakening. Thich Thanh Tu in Keys to Buddhism gives the six stages of breath meditation as the gradual method. Ting Chen in The Fundamentals of Meditation Practice describes the six gates with breath meditation and outlines the basics of Mohezhiguan. Does that make them Tiantai teachers?

Dongyang Dehui's collection of Pure Rules (BDK edition: Baizhang Zen Monastic Regulations) contains a manual for zazen (p 255-257), and there it is recommended, besides the Surangama Sutra and Zongmi's 18 volume Manual of Procedures for the Cultivation and Realization of Ritual Practice according to the Scripture of Perfect Enlightenment (<http://www.cbeta.org/result/X74/X74n1475.htm>), it is Zhiyi's zhiguan manual. So, from this we can see as well that there are no strict boundaries and no strong sectarian identities in Chinese Buddhism usually.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 29th, 2016 at 5:14 PM

Title: Re: Result of Karma

Content:

Norden said:

This is what I don't understand. Killing will result in short life, stealing will result in poverty. So how is that impossible to know the precise result of karma? Is it possible for a murderer experience poverty as the result of his killing? Again, if it's not possible, then why it's said the result of karma is imponderable?

Astus wrote:

Killing happens out of anger and fear, the act strengthens those feelings and harming as a solution to get rid of those feelings. Because aggression becomes the basic approach to problems in life, life itself turns to look like a fighting pit for the person. Similarly with other actions, that through influencing the thinking influence the view and experience of life. However, there are numerous other factors in the mind that modify the perception of acts and experiences. Just like one event means many things for many people, and they all react in their own ways. That's how on the one hand there are clear consequences, and on the other it is too complicated to calculate. And there is one more very important factor, the possibility to make decisions in the present, to change one's mind, and that opens the possibility for liberation, like in the story of Angulimala.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 30th, 2016 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: Emptiness and Omnipresence: An Essential Introduction to Tiantai Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

8

Queequeg said:

The Tiantai schools definitely had a self conscious identity, and I think the same can be said of Huayan. IIRC, in the Tang and Sung, sectarian identities were common - this is the Buddhism that was transmitted to Japan and is the reason Japanese Buddhism is characterized by sectarianism (though modern ideas of sectarianism are very different that what they had through the medieval period.)

Astus wrote:

I think it's difficult to do justice to how Buddhism functioned in China, because in Buddhist studies the Japanese model of distinct schools has a strong influence. For instance, neither a Huayan, nor a Pure Land school existed in China. Even talking about a Chan school before the Song is complicated. As for Tiantai, I have not really looked into its history.

Queequeg said:

My point stands - if there is a Tiantai school in China now, it's a revival, not a continuous lineage. To my knowledge there is no line of abbots at Mt. Tiantai claiming a continuous lineage back to Zhiyi.

Astus wrote:

I could find you two monks connected with a living Tiantai lineage. There could be more of course, but there's practically nothing in English.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sik_Kok_Kwong (1919–2014)

Mingzhe <http://www.nanshanchansi.com/?q=mingzhe> (1925-2012), 45th patriarch, a disciple and heir of https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tan_Xu (source http://www.guanhaisi.com/index.php/Fmcc/cc_tt, http://blog.sina.com.cn/s/blog_4b9fb39c0101ef88.html).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 30th, 2016 at 3:36 PM

Title: Re: The real meaning of Madhyamaka and Yogacara

Content:

Malcolm said:

Madhyamaka is the study of the objective state of reality.

Yogacara is the study of the subjective process of awakening.

When understood in this way, they are non-contradictory and harmonious.

Astus wrote:

That sounds like the reverse form of how they are used together, where mind only refutes external realities, and emptiness refutes the reality of mind.

At the same time, it is a fairly reductionist approach, as if the two systems were lacking in teachings for the whole path. I assume you propose this harmonisation of them with "study" standing for purely intellectual effort.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 30th, 2016 at 4:47 PM

Title: Re: Emptiness and Omnipresence: An Essential Introduction to Tiantai Buddhism

Content:

Queequeg said:

Though you realize that by pointing out a continuous lineage, you're kind of bearing out that at least Tiantai school has a self conscious identity... which is at least one exception to the rule you seem to be overstating.

Astus wrote:

Tiantai came up with the lineage idea even before Chan, so I would not say that it lacks a sense of identity. However, the extent and meaning of that identity is another matter. For instance, my source 1 for Mingzhe is a lineage of the current abbot of Guanhaisi (a temple in Dalian). However, abbot Yihui is not only the 46th ancestor of Tiantai, but also the 46th of Linji and the 49th of Caodong. And as for what sort of instructions he gives to people is another matter. Just consider how Ven. Xingyun is a member of the Linji lineage, but Foguangshan is primarily a school of Humanistic Buddhism, and as such they include all 8 schools of Chinese Buddhism.

Queequeg said:

But to suggest that Chinese Buddhism is and always has been an ecumenical melange within a common monastic system is also not true.

Astus wrote:

That's not exactly what I meant. Certainly, individual monks and certain groups formed a type of affiliation with specific teachings and practices, and from that emerged an identity. However, the monastic system is bigger than a few literati monastics arguing about abstract ideas. Before the establishment of the public monastery system in the Song dynasty, inheritance was a matter of tonsure lineage, not association with any school. And when the public monasteries were fixed to lineages (Chan, Jiao (teaching), Lu (Vinaya)), it also meant stronger state control, and the fight for sponsorship, hence the sectarian outlook. (source: How Zen Became Zen, p 37-40) However, I don't see how that would account for what appeared in Japan, since the Tendai and Shingon schools were set up before that, and then there was the appearance of independent Pure Land schools, something unique to Japan, and not an influence from China. Rather, it seems to me that the Japanese state exerted a stronger control over Buddhism than the Chinese central administration; but it could be something else as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 3rd, 2016 at 6:52 PM

Title: Re: "The Flat Truth" by Chogyam Trungpa

Content:

tomschwarz said:

"If you personally want to understand and realize the teachings, you will have no understanding at all if you don't sit and practice meditation.

Astus wrote:

What meditation? One can sit for a hundred years and not understand a thing. Even dying while seated is pointless. To see the truth of the Dharma takes only a single moment of insight of the nature of one's present experience.

Here are some illustrations:

O Śāriputra, you need not take this sitting [in meditation] to be sitting in repose. Sitting in repose is to not manifest body and mind in the triple world—this is sitting in repose. To generate the concentration of extinction while manifesting the departments—this is sitting in repose. Not to relinquish the Dharma of enlightenment and yet manifest the affairs of [ordinary] sentient beings—this is sitting in repose. To have the mind neither abide internally nor locate itself externally—this is sitting in repose. To be unmoved by the [sixty-two mistaken] views yet cultivate the thirty-seven factors of enlightenment—this is sitting in repose. Not to eradicate the afflictions yet enter into nirvana—this is sitting in repose.

(Vimalakirti Sutra, ch 3, BDK Edition, p 85)

When that buddha was seated on the terrace of enlightenment after having defeated Māra's army, he tried to obtain highest, complete enlightenment, yet the Dharma of the buddhas did not appear to him. In this way, even after having sat cross-legged for one to ten intermediate kalpas, undisturbed in body and mind, the Dharma of the buddhas still did not appear to him.

(Lotus Sutra, ch 7, BDK Edition, p 114-115)

A monk asked Koyo Seijo, "Daitsu Chisho Buddha sat in zazen for ten kalpas and could not attain Buddhahood. He did not become a Buddha. How could this be?"

Seijo said, "Your question is quite self-explanatory."

The monk asked, "He meditated so long; why could he not attain Buddhahood?"

Seijo said, "Because he did not become a Buddha."

(http://www.zenguide.com/zenmedia/books/content.cfm?t=the_gateless_gate&chapter=09)

During the Kai Yuan era of the Tang dynasty [713–41] there was a novice monk called Mazu Daoyi who constantly practiced Zen meditation upon Mt. Heng. Nanyue knew that Daoyi was a great vessel for the Dharma, and once walked up to him and said, "What does Your Worthiness intend to do by sitting in meditation?"

Mazu said, "I intend to become a buddha."

Nanyue then picked up a piece of tile from the ground and began grinding it on a rock.

Daoyi then asked, "What are you trying to make by grinding that?"

Nanyue said, "I'm grinding it to make a mirror."

Daoyi said, "How can you make a mirror by grinding a tile on a rock?"

Nanyue said, "If you can't make a mirror by grinding a tile on a rock, how can you become a buddha by sitting in meditation?"

Daoyi said, "What is the correct way?"

Nanyue said, "It can be compared to an ox pulling a cart. If the cart doesn't move, do you strike the cart or strike the ox?"

Daoyi didn't answer.

Nanyue then said, "Are you sitting in order to practice Zen, or are you sitting to be a buddha? If you're sitting to practice Zen, then know that Zen is not found in sitting or lying down. If you're sitting to become a buddha, then know that Buddha has no fixed form. With respect to the constantly changing world, you should neither grasp it nor reject it. If you sit to become a buddha, you kill Buddha. If you grasp sitting form then you have not yet reached the meaning.”

(Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 54)

Jiufeng served as Shishuang's attendant. When Shishuang passed away, the congregation invited the head monk to become abbot.

Jiufeng said to the congregation, “First, he must show that he understood our late master's great meaning, then he can become abbot.”

The head monk said, “What teaching do you mean?”

Jiufeng said, “Our late teacher said, ‘Desist! Become barren autumn ground! Have one thought for ten thousand years. Be a cold dead tree. Be an ancient incense dish. Be a blank strip of white silk.’ Not asking about the rest, what is a ‘strip of white silk’?”

The head monk said, “This teaching illuminates a matter of form.”

Jiufeng said, “Fundamentally, you don't comprehend our late teacher's meaning.”

The monk said, “You don't approve of my answer? Then light a stick of incense, and if I don't go before it is burned up, then you can say I don't understand our late master's meaning.”

A stick of incense was then lit, but before it burned down, the head monk died.

Shishuang patted the head monk's body on the back and said, “Dying while sitting or passing away while standing isn't it. You didn't see our late master's meaning even in your dreams.”

(Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 258-259)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 8th, 2016 at 9:05 PM

Title: Re: how do I know if I am progressing in Buddhism?

Content:

ShineeSeoul said:

I am trying to practice Buddhsim, but I have feeling like what I am doing is useless?

Astus wrote:

Progress can be measured in several ways. One direct method is to see if you have more peace, compassion, and mindfulness in your daily life. There are also the

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bodhipakkhiy%C4%81dhamm%C4%81>

that you should look out for in cultivating. On the bodhisattva path there are also the six paramitas as both practices and qualities to cultivate, and there are the <http://sgforums.com/forums/1728/topics/158325> as a description of the path (on that you can find more in English in the introduction of Buswell's Tracing Back the Radiance), but using the <http://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/patrul-rinpoche/stages-and-path> is also fine and there are more translations available in English.

ShineeSeoul said:

I am trying to Chant Buddhas name everyday, and bow 3 time.....what else I am supposed to do? is this enough?

Astus wrote:

What is your goal? There are various extensive meditation manuals out there that you can use even on your own, like http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/anapanasati.pdf.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 9th, 2016 at 5:31 AM

Title: Re: Essence of Chan

Content:

Alex123 said:

What is the exact difference between abiding in a certain state, vs not abiding in that state?

Astus wrote:

Whether one adds the idea that makes a state one's identity, considering it an actual state, existence, being; or not.

Good friends, one's enlightenment (one's Way, dao) must flow freely. How could it be stagnated? When the mind does not reside in the dharmas, one's enlightenment flows freely. For the mind to reside in the dharmas is called 'fettering oneself.' If you say that always sitting without moving is it, then you're just like Śāriputra meditating in the forest, for which he was scolded by Vimalakīrti!

...

Nonabiding is to consider in one's fundamental nature that all worldly [things] are empty, with no consideration of retaliation—whether good or evil, pleasant or ugly, and enemy or friend, etc., during times of words, fights, and disputation.

Within continuing moments of thought one should not think of the previous [mental] realm. If one thinks of the previous thought, the present thought, and the later thought, one's thoughts will be continuous without cease. This is called 'fettered.' If one's thoughts do not abide in the dharmas, this is to be 'unfettered.' Thus it is that nonabiding is taken as the fundamental.

(Platform Sutra, ch 4, BDK Edition, p 43)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 10th, 2016 at 7:18 PM

Title: Re: Difference views on fetters and kilesas?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Mahayana view is that afflictions are enlightenment, simply as they are: empty, ungraspable, and inconceivable.

Affliction, action, the body,
The agent, and the result
Are all like a city of scent-eaters,
Like an illusion, and like a dream.
(MMK 17.33)

Chapter 23 of MMK deals with afflictions in depth. Translation is from "Ornament of Reason" (v 1-4, 21-25).

It is taught that desire, anger, and stupor
Originate in dependence on thought.
Their arising depends
On the attractive, unattractive, and mistaken.
That which originates in dependence
On the attractive, unattractive, and mistaken
Cannot be due to its own nature.
Hence, the afflictions are not real.
The existence or nonexistence of the self
Is not established in any way.
How can the existence or nonexistence
Of the afflictions be established without it?
The one to which the afflictions belong
Is not in any way established.
When they do not pertain to anything at all,
The afflictions cannot exist in any way either.

...

If there is a self, something clean,
Something permanent, and something delightful,
The apprehending of self, clean, permanent, and delightful
Are not mistakes.
If there is no self, nothing clean,
Nothing permanent, and nothing delightful,
There cannot be any absence of self, anything unclean,
impermanent, and painful.
As error in this way ceases,
Ignorance comes to an end.
As ignorance ceases,
Formations and so forth end.
If someone's afflictions
Are existent by nature,
How can they be eliminated?
Who can eliminate the existent?
If someone's afflictions
Are nonexistent by nature,
How can they be eliminated?
Who can eliminate the nonexistent?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 10th, 2016 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: Difference views on fetters and kilesas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Your citations from the MMK don't say that. They merely state that afflictions are not ultimately real.

Astus wrote:

I cited the MMK only to give something from Nagarjuna related to the topic. But practically the quote backs up with reasoning what the sutras say on the matter, since once the afflictions are seen to be without substance, there is nothing to do about them and they are equal to enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 10th, 2016 at 11:43 PM

Title: Re: Difference views on fetters and kilesas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Lame, Astus. Everything is without substance, that does not mean that everything is awakened.

Astus wrote:

Seeing them to be insubstantial is awakening, and recognising all phenomena to be equal (samsara=nirvana).

Malcolm said:

You need a quote.

Astus wrote:

I'm sure you know a few yourself.

"For what is isolated cannot be defiled and purified, what is empty cannot be defiled or purified, and what is isolated and empty cannot know full enlightenment. Nor can one get at any dharma outside emptiness which has known full enlightenment, which will know it, or which does know it."

(PP8000 22.2)

"Conditioned generation is the place of enlightenment, because ignorance and so forth through old age and death, are all unexhausted. The afflictions are bodhi, because of understanding according to actuality.

Sentient beings are the place of enlightenment, because of understanding no-self.

All dharmas are the place of enlightenment, because of understanding the emptiness of the dharmas."

(Vimalakirti Sutra, ch 4, BDK p 100)

"Good sons, all hindrances are none other than ultimate enlightenment. Whether you attain mindfulness or lose mindfulness, there is no non-liberation. Establishing the Dharma and refuting the Dharma are both called nirvana; wisdom and folly are equally prajna; the method that is perfected by bodhisattvas and false teachers is the same bodhi; ignorance and suchness are not different realms; morality, concentration and wisdom, as well as desire, hatred and ignorance are all divine practices; sentient beings and lands share the same dharma nature; hell and heaven are both the Pure Land; those having Buddha-nature and those not having it equally accomplish the Buddha's enlightenment. All defilements are ultimately liberation. The reality-realms's ocean-like wisdom completely illumines all marks to be just like empty space. This is called 'the Tathāgata's accordance with the nature of enlightenment.'

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/sutra_of_perfect_enlightenment.html, ch 6)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 11th, 2016 at 12:34 AM

Title: Re: Difference views on fetters and kilesas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

I see phenomena as insubstantial. Am I awakened? (Answer: no) I recognize all phenomena as equal. Am I awakened? (Answer: no) So there must be something else you are leaving out.

Astus wrote:

What would that be?

"The mark of self is no mark. The mark of others, the mark of living beings, and the mark of a life are no marks. And why? Those who have relinquished all marks are called Buddhas."

(http://www.buddhistdoor.com/OldWeb/bdoor/archive/sutra_comm/diamond/diamond_02.htm#d14)

Malcolm said:

All these say that from the point of ultimate truth. But not from the point of view of relative truth. You must distinguish the two truths.

Astus wrote:

They talk about what should be clear, that the conventional reality is just conventional, and that is all the ultimate there is.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 11th, 2016 at 12:50 AM

Title: Re: Difference views on fetters and kilesas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

I also know there are no characteristics. So you are still leaving something out.

Astus wrote:

If it's not the difference between thinking and doing, then please tell what you mean.

Malcolm said:

That's why people think Chan is nihilistic.

Astus wrote:

It is quite the opposite, very much life affirming and down to earth. The only true Chan practices are eat, shit, sleep.

Wasn't it just recently that in some thread you were emphasising how everything is illusion? I mean, that must sound nihilistic as well then.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 11th, 2016 at 5:59 AM

Title: Re: Difference views on fetters and kilesas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

How does one relinquish marks that do not exist? And if it is the case that one must relinquish marks, is it not also the case that one must relinquish the afflictions that cause clinging to marks?

Astus wrote:

The part I quoted from PP8000 (22.2) asks the same question and answers in the following way:

"To the extent that beings take hold of things and settle down in them, to that extent is there defilement. But no one is thereby defiled. And to the extent that one does not take hold of things and does not settle down in them, to that extent can one conceive of the absence of I-making and mine-making. In that sense can one form the concept of the purification of being, i.e. to the extent that they do not take hold of things and do not settle down in them, to that extent there is purification. But no one is therein purified. When a Bodhisattva courses thus, he courses in perfect wisdom. It is in this sense that one can form the concept of the defilement and purification of beings in spite of the fact that all dharmas are isolated and empty."

Also from the <http://sutrasmantras.info/sutra13.html>
(http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T08n0232_001#0727c11):

The Buddha asked, "What is called true reality?"

Mañjuśrī replied, "The view that one has a self is true reality."

The Buddha asked, "Why is the view that one has a self true reality?"

Mañjuśrī replied, "Taking this view as an appearance of true suchness, which is neither real nor unreal, neither coming nor going, with neither a self nor no self, is called true reality."

Malcolm said:
Then everyone is a great master of Chan.

Astus wrote:
All beings have the buddha-nature. But, as <http://www.ymba.org/books/entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment/tsung-ching-record>:

"While they are eating, they are not really eating due to too much thinking. While they are sleeping, they are not really sleeping due to too much mental agitation. Therefore, they do not work in the same way I do."

Malcolm said:
The ultimate is just a pure absence. How can that be all the conventional is?

Astus wrote:
The conventional is just the conventional. Its substance is absent.

In Linji's words (tr Sasaki, p 19):

"All the dharmas of this world and of the worlds beyond are without self-nature. Also, they are without produced nature. They are just empty names, and these names are also empty. All you are doing is taking these worthless names to be real. That's all wrong!"

And in <http://sutasmantras.info/sutra13.html>:

"Just as self is only a name, so too Buddha is only a name. Realizing the emptiness of a name is bodhi. One should seek bodhi without using names. The appearance of bodhi is free from words. Why? Because words and bodhi are both empty."

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 11th, 2016 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: Difference views on fetters and kilesas?

Content:

BuddhaFollower said:

How do you even attain first bhumi, and the ability to emanate 100 emanations, in Chan?

Astus wrote:
As long as one grasps at words and ideas like bhumis and emanations, one is far from being an ordinary person with nothing to do.

You say, 'The six pāramitās and the ten thousand [virtuous] actions are all to be practiced.' As I see it, all this is just making karma. Seeking buddha and seeking dharma are only making hell-karma. Seeking bodhisattvahood is also making karma; reading the sutras and studying the teachings are also making karma. Buddhas and patriarchs are people with nothing to do. Therefore, [for them] activity and the defiling passions and also nonactivity and passionlessness are 'pure' karma.

(Record of Linji, tr Sasaki, p 17)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 11th, 2016 at 7:22 AM

Title: Re: Difference views on fetters and kilesas?

Content:

BuddhaFollower said:

I am not grasping at emanations. 100 emanations is a hallmark of the first bhumi.

Astus wrote:

The Ten Stages chapter of the Avatamsaka Sutra says about those who attained the first stage:

"Having gone forth, enlightening beings instantly attain a hundred concentrations and see a hundred buddhas and acknowledge their power; they stir a hundred worlds, go to a hundred lands, illumine a hundred worlds, mature a hundred beings, live for a hundred eons, penetrate a hundred eons past and future, contemplate a hundred teachings, and manifest a hundred bodies, each body manifesting a company of a hundred enlightening beings."

(tr Cleary, p 710-711 / http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T10n0279_034#0183b29)

Then on the next stage it's a thousand, then hundred thousand, then a billion, then a trillion, etc. There are a number of ways to interpret those lines. What is your version?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 11th, 2016 at 7:11 PM

Title: Re: Difference views on fetters and kilesas?

Content:

BuddhaFollower said:

Each bhumi has certain hallmarks. On 8th Bhumi you can directly see sambhogakaya Buddhas and have power over birth and death.

Astus wrote:

What is the practical role or value of that information?

- Someone practices buddha contemplation, like as it's taught in the Pratyutpanna-samadhi Sutra, one qualifies as being on the 8th stage. But what is that idea even good for to think that "I am 8th stage"? Fairly meaningless and shows lack of confidence. So, it cannot be it.
- It allows scholars to assign numbers to various bodhisattvas in scriptures. That's a cynical view.
- It serves as an excuse for people to consider the bodhisattvayana too difficult and impractical. But that cannot be the original purpose.
- The stages are a convenient schematic way to use in describing the path, and that is how they were actually applied, similar to the noble eightfold path.

As for the "magical powers" of the bodhisattvas on the stages, where they are said to be able to manifest hundred bodies, etc., those are to indicate meditative power and experiences, thus the sutra says that they are attained in a single thought by those who have gone forth, i.e. left home as monastics. As Vasubandhu explains in the Shastra on Dasabhumika Sutra (http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T26n1522_003#0144c19): "Then the bodhisattva leaves home and meditates with surpassing karma. Surpassing karma is two sorts. One is surpassing samadhi: so called because attains samadhi easily, so in a single thought attains a hundred samadhis. The second sort is surpassing act in samadhi: (seeing hundred buddhas and their lands, etc.)"

To that it should be also kept in mind that seeing a single buddha is equal to seeing all the buddhas, and all visions of buddhas are mind made.

"If they can continue, thought after thought, thinking of one Buddha, they will be able to see, in their thinking, past, future, and present Buddhas. Why? Because the merit acquired from thinking of one Buddha is immeasurable and boundless, no different from the merit acquired from thinking of innumerable Buddhas or thinking of the inconceivable Buddha Dharma."

(<http://sutrasmanttras.info/sutra13.html>)

"If one wishes to see the Buddha then one sees him. If one sees him then one asks questions. If one asks then one is answered, one hears the sutras and rejoices greatly. One reflects thus: 'Where did the Buddha come from? Where did I go to?' and one thinks to oneself: 'The Buddha came from nowhere, and I also went nowhere.' One thinks to oneself: The Three Realms—the Realm of Desire, the Realm of Form, and the Realm of the Formless—these Three Realms are simply made by thought. Whatever I think, that I see. The mind creates the Buddha. The mind itself sees him. The mind is the Buddha. The mind is the Tathagata. The mind is my body, the mind sees the Buddha."

(Pratyutpanna-samadhi Sutra, ch 2, BDK p 21)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 11th, 2016 at 9:23 PM

Title: Re: Difference views on fetters and kilesas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

This is prescriptive and not descriptive.

Astus wrote:

Marks/characteristics are concepts. As long as one believes those concepts to be substantial, there is clinging. Once they are seen as merely conceptual, there is nothing left to grasp.

Malcolm said:

This is is not an answer.

Astus wrote:

It answers it by showing how while we all have the qualities of a buddha, it doesn't mean we realise and manifest them.

Malcolm said:

But why?

Astus wrote:

As Huangbo puts it (Zen Texts, p 13):

"It is only this One Mind that is Buddha; there is no distinction between Buddhas and sentient beings. However, sentient beings are attached to characteristics and seek outside themselves. Seeking it, they lose it even more. Seeking the Buddha in search of the Buddha, grasping the mind with the mind, they may exhaust themselves in striving for an entire eon but will never get it. They do not understand that if they cease their thoughts and end their thinking, the Buddha will automatically be present."

Malcolm said:

So there is something other than the ultimate?

Astus wrote:

The ultimate is seeing the conventional as conventional.

Malcolm said:

So there are names? Or not.

Astus wrote:

We use words (i.e. names) here all the time, don't we?

Malcolm said:

So your basic conclusion is that there is no awakening, and therefore, the whole thing is a farce.

Astus wrote:

There is ignorance about and awakening to phenomena as inessential.

"when the sky-flowers disappear from the sky, you cannot say that there is a definite point of their disappearance. Why? Because there is no point from which they arose. All sentient beings falsely perceive arising and ceasing within the unarisen."

http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/sutra_of_perfect_enlightenment.html#div-1

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 11th, 2016 at 10:21 PM

Title: Re: Difference views on fetters and kilesas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Many people continue to grasp even though they know characteristics are concepts. So, there is still something missing. Your presentation is completely intellectual.

Astus wrote:

Grasping is always at characteristics. If one does not conceive characteristics, how can there be grasping? What many people may know and still continue to grasp at objects are words, that is, grasping at characteristics, imagining that emptiness is another thing.

Enlightenment is naturally true and is fundamentally without names. It is only that people of the world do not recognize it and remain deluded within their ratiocination. The Buddhas then appear [in the world] to destroy their misconceptions. I am afraid that you people do not comprehend but provisionally establish the name "enlightenment." You must not generate interpretations so as to maintain this name. Therefore it is said, "attain the fish and forget the trap."
(Huangbo, in Zen Texts, p 32)

Malcolm said:

So how do you do that (realize and manifest them)?

So what is the different between a buddha and the unconscious devas. Both have stopped thinking.

Astus wrote:

It is not thoughtlessness, but not grasping at thoughts.

"What is nonthought? If in seeing all the dharmas, the mind is not defiled or attached, this is nonthought. [The mind's] functioning pervades all locations, yet it is not attached to all the locations.

...to be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is for the myriad dharmas to be completely penetrated. To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to see the realms of [all] the buddhas. To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to arrive at the stage of buddhahood."

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK p 33, 34)

Malcolm said:

I see, so there is no ultimate.

Astus wrote:

Is there such a thing as "pure absence"?

Malcolm said:

So there are names.

Astus wrote:

Even names are without characteristics.

Malcolm said:

But this is still just intellectualism. Many people here understand that phenomena are inessential, and yet, they are not awake. There is still something missing from your presentation.

Astus wrote:

Thinking that there is no essence is grasping at an essence. To recognise in one's present experience that there is nothing that can be grasped is what is meant by seeing characteristics to be fictional.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 12th, 2016 at 2:36 AM

Title: Re: Difference views on fetters and kilesas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

So the only difference between buddhas and sentient beings is attachment to thoughts?

Astus wrote:

What more needed?

"To see form but not be corrupted by form or to hear sound but not to be corrupted by sound is liberation. Eyes that aren't attached to form are the gates of Zen. In short, those who perceive the existence and nature of phenomena and remain unattached are liberated. Those who perceive the external appearance of phenomena are at their mercy. Not to be subject to afflictions is what's meant by liberation. There's no other liberation. When you know how to look at form, form doesn't give rise to mind and mind doesn't give rise to form. Form and mind are both pure."

(<http://www.abuddhistlibrary.com/Buddhism/C%20-%20Zen/Ancestors/The%20Zen%20Teachings%20of%20Bodhidharma/The%20Zen%20Teachings%20of%20Bodhidharma/THE%20ZEN%20TEACHINGS%20OF%20BODHIDHARMA.htm>)

"The Buddhas of the ten directions realized the true nature of things and spontaneously perceive the source of mind; errant imagining does not arise, accurate awareness is not lost. The egoistic, possessive attitude disappears, so they are not subject to birth and death, they are ultimately tranquil; so obviously all happiness naturally comes to them. Ordinary people lose sight of the nature of reality and do not know the basis of mind. Arbitrarily fixating on all sorts of objects, they do not cultivate awareness; therefore love and hatred arise. Because of love and hatred, the vessel of mind cracks and leaks. Because the vessel of mind cracks and leaks, there is birth and death. Because there is birth and death, all miseries naturally appear.

The Mind King Scripture says that true thusness, the Buddha-nature, is submerged in the ocean of cognition, perception, and sense, bobbing up and down in birth and death, unable to escape. Effort should be made to preserve the basic true mind, so that arbitrary thoughts do not arise, egoistic and possessive attitudes vanish, and you spontaneously realize equality and unity with the Buddhas."

(<http://terebess.hu/zen/daman.html>)

Malcolm said:

This gets back to the question you have not answered, how does the mind become free from afflictions, since this is necessary precondition for what you are describing as nonconceptuality (nirvikalpa)?

Astus wrote:

Afflictions come from attachment to thoughts. Once there is no attachment, there are no afflictions either. The quoted line from the Platform Sutra continues as follows:

"[The mind's] functioning pervades all locations, yet it is not attached to all the locations. Just purify the fundamental mind, causing the six consciousnesses to emerge from the six [sensory] gates, [causing one to be] without defilement or heterogeneity within the six types of sensory data (literally, the "six dusts"), autonomous in the coming and going [of mental phenomena], one's penetrating function without stagnation."

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK p 33)

Nagarjuna writes as well:

"Liberation follows from the exhaustion of action and affliction.

Action and affliction are due to thought,

And thoughts proliferate due to mental construction.

They are brought to an end by emptiness."

(MMK 18.5, tr from Ornament of Reason)

Malcolm said:

How could there be?

Astus wrote:

Since you <http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=342396#p342396> that "The ultimate is just a pure absence.", you've answered the question.

Malcolm said:

That does not settle anything, since as you admit above affliction and clinging is the problem, not characteristics.

Astus wrote:

Affliction and clinging comes from not seeing emptiness. Since names are empty, there is no problem, when it is realised.

Malcolm said:

I see, so there is apprehension of characteristics, but you don't "grasp" them. Well, many people also understand this and practice this way, and yet, they still are not awakened. I still think you have failed to escape intellectualism here.

Astus wrote:

What awakening is it you miss?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 12th, 2016 at 6:43 AM

Title: Re: Difference views on fetters and kilesas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Then, please explain the difference between mere indifference (to thoughts) and liberation (from attachment to thoughts).

Astus wrote:

Indifference is a concept where one deems something uninteresting or irrelevant. Liberation means not abiding in any concept, neither grasping nor rejecting.

Malcolm said:

Yes, so, what does it look like to become free of attachment to thoughts? How does one actually do that?

Astus wrote:

If you think that none of the passages already quoted answer that, then here is the instruction for zazen:

"When you are aware that all characteristics are void, it is true mind, http://buddhiststudies.berkeley.edu/people/faculty/sharf/documents/Sharf_Mindfulness%20and%20Mindlessness.pdf. If a thought arises, be aware of it; once you are aware of it, it will disappear. The excellent gate of practice lies here alone." (Zongmi on Chan, p 88; same in <http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/practice/zazen/howto/index.html> and <http://zen.rinnou.net/zazen/sitting.html>)

Malcolm said:

Again, this is a prescription, not a description. How does one purify the fundamental mind? (I assume he means here the ālayavijñāna).

Astus wrote:

The fundamental mind (本心) is one's original buddha nature. To purify it means to see it, to recognise that it is originally pure.

Malcolm said:

What does "realizing emptiness" actually mean and how does one do it. Descriptions please, no more prescriptions, we have had enough of these already.

Astus wrote:

If Zen and prajnaparamita do not match your criteria for descriptions, there are all sorts of other manuals.

Malcolm said:

What awakening are you trying to describe? How do you do it?

Astus wrote:

I have described awakening as seeing the insubstantiality of afflictions. Regarding methods, there are numerous.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 12th, 2016 at 6:57 PM

Title: Re: Difference views on fetters and kilesas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

This is all very nice, Astus, but what you are describing is just an intellectual view that won't help one deal with afflictions at all.

Astus wrote:

What view is not intellectual? The teachings are all made of words. How one uses them decides if they are of any help. Even Bodhidharma

<http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enBodhiDharmaSutraWithAnnotation.htm> the direct entrance as "to awaken to the Truth through the doctrine". And direct entrance is where the teaching of afflictions are bodhi belongs to:

"In the Ultimate Vehicle, we neither transform our afflictions nor extinguish them; our mind is originally pure and lucid. This mind is inherent in everyone; we do not need to seek it externally. This is the Chan School's principle of "affliction is bodhi; birth and death (samsara) is nirvana.""

(http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enUS/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=219&Itemid=59)

As for teaching it, here's a short story.

For a long time Yaoshan did not enter the hall to speak.

The temple director said to him, "The monks have been waiting for a long time for the master to give them some instruction."

Yaoshan said, "Ring the bell!"

The monks assembled in the hall.

Yaoshan then got down from the Dharma seat and went back to the abbot's quarters.

The temple director followed him and said, "Master, since you consented to speak to the monks, why didn't you say anything?"

Yaoshan said, "Sutras have sutra teachers. Shastras have shastra teachers. Why are you unhappy with me?"

(Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 124-125)

So, what is there to do with views and words?

"The more words and thoughts the more you will go astray.

Stop speaking, stop thinking and there is nothing you cannot understand."

(<http://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/zen/fm/fm.htm>)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 12th, 2016 at 9:06 PM

Title: Re: Difference views on fetters and kilesas?

Content:

Malcolm said:

The point is that what you are describing is an intellectual view that is meaningless outside of the context of a teacher student relationship, where such a view is integrated meaningfully with practice. There is no liberation through words, my friend, as your final citation points out.

Astus wrote:

Whatever that can be described or taught by anyone is an intellectual view. To see that all views are nothing more than mind made concepts is to be free from them. To look for more than that is indeed falling in to the thicket of views.

Also, you could have added that the teachings were for monastics, so there is no point for us laity to dabble in such matters. However, to both objections here is a quote from the Platform Sutra:

Lord Wei asked further, "How can householders cultivate this practice? I hope you will teach us this."

The master said, "I will recite a formless verse for this great assembly. Just cultivate according to this, doing exactly as if you were always with me. If you do not cultivate according to this, what benefit would it be to take the tonsure and leave home [to become a monk]?"

(ch 4, BDK p 40)

And in the sutra's final chapter:

"I will tell you again, in order to make you see your natures. After my nirvana, practice in accordance with this just as if I were alive. If you go against my teaching, it would be no use even if I were alive. I will say another verse"

(p 91)

"This Platform Sutra has been transmitted in order to make manifest the central doctrine, to disseminate the triple treasure, and to benefit all living beings."

(p 93)

Malcolm said:

It is funny to watch ordinary people like us confidentially opine on awakening, it is like watching children playing at being royalty.

Astus wrote:

Who else would opine on awakening? On the other hand, since buddhas have infinite manifestations, there should be several of them present here.

"If the deluded people of some later time recognize sentient beings, [they will recognize them] as the buddha-nature. If they do not recognize sentient beings, they could seek the Buddha for ten thousand eons without ever meeting him. I teach you now: to recognize the sentient being in one's own mind is to see the buddha-nature in one's own mind. If you wish to see the Buddha, just recognize the sentient being [in your mind]. It is only sentient beings who are deluded as to the Buddha; the buddhas are not deluded about sentient beings. If you are enlightened to your self-nature, then the sentient being is the Buddha; if you are deluded as to the self-nature, then [what might be] a 'buddha' is [only] a sentient being."

(p 89-90)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 12th, 2016 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: Difference views on fetters and kilesas?

Content:

Saoshun said:

View based on clarity isn't intellectual.

Astus wrote:

What view is that?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 12th, 2016 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: Difference views on fetters and kilesas?

Content:

AlexMcLeod said:

Astus, the topic has been (this entire time) what to do to deal with the fetters or kilesas. Your quotes are stories of Awakened masters pointing the truth to very highly realized students. This is not appropriate response for the low level of development that is present day practitioners on the internet.

Astus wrote:

Zen is the easiest approach there is, but it's also easy to misinterpret the words. If you say that people have dull faculties and need simple methods, tell me, what is so complicated about recognising that all the six types of sensory phenomena are unattainable? Even reciting a buddha's name takes more effort than that.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 12th, 2016 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: Difference views on fetters and kilesas?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Similarly to the <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=342619#p342619> instructions for Zen, here are the instructions to "<http://www.purifymind.com/ObstaclesPath.htm>":

"once you have recognized the arising of whatever klesha it is, then you simply look directly at its nature without altering anything, without attempting to alter your mind or the klesha. As you look at its nature you will experience and recognize its nature."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 13th, 2016 at 3:59 AM

Title: Re: Pointing Out through Appearances

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Well, I can think of occasions where my actions were deliberately hurtful and gave rise to feelings of hurt in the object of my behaviour. So this idea that the "meaning" of all actions is just what we interpret them to be, seems to not stand true.

Astus wrote:

The situation you describe follows conventional causal relations, and there is no denial of that. However, there is also the possibility to hear angry words and not be offended.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 13th, 2016 at 8:23 PM

Title: Re: Britian's upcoming E.U referendum

Content:

Astus wrote:

If they vote to stay, the EU is justified, so further requests for special treatment of the UK can be dismissed.

If they vote to leave, they will still be subject to the same EU laws and regulations without any power to change them.

All in all, this whole referendum idea will likely cause the fall of the current British government, no matter the results.

And from the perspective of the ordinary citizen, better vote stay. The EU makes travel and such a lot easier.

As for the global concerns of industrialisation and protection of the environment, only larger groups can make efficient changes. So, it is ethically defensible to vote in.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 14th, 2016 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in three incalculable eons an improbable venture.

Content:

Astus wrote:

It all depends on how one counts those aeons.

For instance, these are not uncommon statements in the sutras

(<http://sutrasmantras.info/sutra13.html>):

"If good men and good women, having heard this profound prajñā-pāramitā, can come to resoluteness in their minds, not shocked, not terrified, not baffled, and not regretful, know that they stand on the Ground of No Regress. If those who have heard this profound prajñā-pāramitā are not shocked, not terrified, not baffled, and not regretful, but believe, accept, appreciate, and listen tirelessly, they have in effect achieved dāna-pāramitā, śīla-pāramitā, kṣānti-pāramitā, vīrya-pāramitā, dhyāna-pāramitā, and prajñā-pāramitā. Moreover, they can reveal and explicate [the teachings] to others and can have them train accordingly."

"If, among good men and good women, there are those who can believe and delight in this profound prajñā-pāramitā without doubts, they must have long trained and learned under past Buddhas, and planted their roots of goodness."

"If in future times, among good men and good women, there are those who, having heard this profound prajñā-pāramitā, listen and accept it with faith and delight, we should know by this indication that they too have heard it from past Buddhas, and have studied and practiced it."

So, if you can actually hear, accept, and even understand the sutra, you are already a great bodhisattva. Now, compare that to those who may only have a passing thought about the Buddha and how long they have left till buddhahood. And there are other reasons why the uncountable aeons are not that simple a matter. Although, it could be said that those who are shocked and afraid are not yet that advanced.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 14th, 2016 at 6:36 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in three incalculable eons an improbable venture.

Content:

Malcolm said:

Cooking the Dharma books....

Astus wrote:

It's called exegesis.

"the three-asankhya kalpas refer to the three poisoned states of mind. What we call asankhya in Sanskrit you call countless. Within these three poisoned states of mind are countless evil thoughts, And every thought lasts a kalpa. Such an infinity is what the Buddha meant by the three asankhya kalpas, Once the three poisons obscure your real self, how can you be called liberated until you overcome their countless evil thoughts? People who can transform the three poisons of greed, anger, and delusion into the three releases are said to pass through the three-sankhya kalpas. But people of this final age are the densest of fools. They don't understand what the Tathagata really meant by the three-asankhya kalpas. They say enlightenment is only achieved after endless kalpas and thereby mislead disciples to retreat on the path to Buddhahood."

(Bodhidharma: <http://www.fodian.net/world/dmpsl-e.html>)

"There are a bunch of shavepate monks who say to students, 'The Buddha is the Ultimate; he attained buddhahood only after he came to the fruition of practices carried on through three great asaṃkhyeya kalpas.' Followers of the Way, if you say that the Buddha is the ultimate, how is it that after eighty years of life the Buddha lay down on his side between the twin śāla trees at Kuśinagara and died? Where is the Buddha now? We clearly know that his birth and death were not different from ours."

(Record of Linji, p 19, tr Sasaki)

"In fact, time and space are concepts of ordinary people with discriminating minds. Noble bodhisattvas have no such conceptions, because time and space are merely conventional designations of the physical world. In the world of pure mind, concepts such as the length of time or the size of space cannot even be established. Even the dreams of ordinary people are unfettered by the limitations of ordinary time and space—how could noble ones who have transcended the world be bound by such limitations? A sūtra states that a long kalpa "enters" a short kalpa and a short kalpa enters a long kalpa, that one kalpa enters all kalpas and that all kalpas enter one kalpa, that a moment of thought enters the three times and the three times enter a moment of thought, that a billion-world universe enters a particle and a particle is the same as a billion-world universe, and even that one skin pore contains countless worlds (see the Avatamsaka Sūtra). While these statements may at first seem to be mind-boggling myths, after deeper and objective analysis we discover they are not without truth."

(Sheng-yen: Orthodox Chinese Buddhism, p 99-100)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 14th, 2016 at 6:52 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in three incalculable eons an improbable venture.

Content:

Anders said:

If the road looks heavy, aim for a holiday in the pure lands to solidify your roots and recharge your batteries.

Astus wrote:

That is indeed the universal advice, and the Pure Land path is the one that embraces people of all capacities. It should not be considered a lower method, since even great bodhisattvas go to Sukhavati. It is also not just a holiday, but the assured way to buddhahood.

"suppose there is a man who learns this teaching for the first time and wishes to seek the correct faith but lacks courage and strength. Because he lives in this world of suffering, he fears that he will not always be able to meet the Buddhas and honor them personally, and that, faith being difficult to perfect, he will be inclined to fall back. He should know that the Tathagatas have an excellent expedient means by which they can protect his faith: that is, through the strength of wholehearted meditation on the Buddha, he will in fulfillment of his wishes be able to be born in the Buddha-land beyond, to see the Buddha always, and to be forever separated from the evil states of existence. It is as the sutra says: "If a man meditates wholly on Amitabha Buddha in the world of the Western Paradise and wishes to be born in that world, directing all the goodness he has cultivated toward that goal, then he will be born there." Because he will see the Buddha at all times, he will never fall back."

(http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Translations/Awakening_of_faith.html)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 15th, 2016 at 7:18 PM

Title: Re: Keith Dowman's argument for his "interpretive free" translation style

Content:

Astus wrote:

Personally, I find most translations of Duff I have yet encountered not particularly readable, filled with made up terminology. Dowman's works are at least fluent. And in the long run, fluency beats accuracy. But I wouldn't go for either of them as my preferred sources.

As for the idea of a compulsory dictionary, unless you have a dictatorial system to force it, and of course sponsor the translations, it will never happen.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 15th, 2016 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: Disillusioned by gradual teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

For a clearer picture of Tang era Chan there are a number of fine studies out there, and likely more to come. What should never be forgotten is the monastic context and the Chinese Mahayana tradition, because they are always there, just like today. I'm not saying that the immediate method of Chan is not real, but it is not as pronounced as it may seem. Another thing is that in the end meditation is very much a personal matter, and there is no mind police to tell what practice you do.

Teachers today like Xingyun and Thich Nhat Hanh may not look even close to the stereotypical figures of Mazu and Linji, but my guess is that they are very close to how things actually looked like over a thousand years ago. And if you look into the works of Xingyun and TNH, they do teach Chan in its direct form.

There was an era in China when they revived the so called Patriarchal Chan in the 17th century, and that spread over to Japan as well. See Jiang Wu's two studies on this (Enlightenment in Dispute; Leaving for the Rising Sun). That reform came and went by, and while it had some lasting effects, the dramatisation of Chan stories - pretending to be like in the books - was not one of them. However, if you are looking for something like that, the Kwan Um School has it. Again, not because Korean Buddhism somehow preserved it (since there wasn't actually anything to preserve), but because Korean Buddhism had its 20th century revival and because Seung Sahn made that school what it is.

As I see it, there is currently only one community that openly follows a rather radical approach to Chan, and that is <http://www.hanmaum.org/eng/> - no koan, no zazen, just go directly to buddha-nature. However, because it is a community, there are numerous things people occupy themselves with, so in the end it is not that different from the others in practical matters.

Another thing with the genuine direct teaching is that it does not build a group. Dogen tried to sort this out, but then what you get as a result is a community obsessed with rules and rituals (this is not a critique of Soto in general, but an observation on a number of zazen-centred groups of today, and somewhat on Dogen's stance on rules).

In the end, the direct method is to drop all concepts and live freely in contentment. What's the point of looking for groups and teachers for that?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 15th, 2016 at 9:46 PM

Title: Re: Keith Dowman's argument for his "interpretive free" translation style

Content:

dzoki said:

Well if we keep the process of translation of Dharma a thing of democracy and personal preferences, then we will continue to have shitty translations.

Astus wrote:

Even now not all translations are crap. And just as now one can tell the better and the worse sources, eventually there will be those that survive and those that will be forgotten.

dzoki said:

For example, Ole Nydahl wrote several books which introduce many misconceptions.

Astus wrote:

That's how freedom of religion works.

dzoki said:

Then his students take these up and go ahead and translate Karma Kagyu texts according to Ole's personal preferences.

Astus wrote:

Same thing happens in other religions.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 15th, 2016 at 10:18 PM

Title: Re: On Buddhism and Nominalism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Buddhism is filled with universals, they are known as dharmas. The dharmas are not considered derivatives of particulars, it's the other way around. People conceive conventional terms, but behind those terms there are only dharmas. For instance the relationship between various physical objects and the four primary elements. However, dharmas don't all have equal ontological status.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 16th, 2016 at 5:32 PM

Title: Re: Disillusioned by gradual teachings

Content:

Temicco said:

The fact remains that Xu Yun taught something very different. Others, like Hsuan Hua, taught something very mixed.

Astus wrote:

What is so different in <http://hsuyun.budismo.net/en/dharma/>? All that's said in http://hsuyun.budismo.net/en/dharma/chan_sessions2.html is very much the norm since the 12th century. Compare it with <http://chancenter.org/cmc/2011/10/13/essentials-of-practice-and-enlightenment-for-beginners/>, and you'll see that they're not much different. As for Hsuan Hua, I find his teachings somewhat odd.

Other groups of the Chan brand:

http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enUS/index.php?option=com_content&task=category§ionid=4&id=15&Itemid=59, <http://www.thienvientuquang.org/node/203> (check <http://www.thienvientuquang.org/kinhsach/english/KeysToBuddhism.pdf>).

Temicco said:

Is there any evidence of that actually being the case? I didn't think the Chan Sangha just petered out of existence due to its lack of formalism. It's also weird of Dogen to emphasize the community over the Zen, IMO.

Astus wrote:

First of all, there hasn't been any "Chan Sangha", but simply monastic communities, and as monasteries they have various functions. Community and Zen have the same relation as Dharma and Sangha. The teachings remain relevant as long as there are people who follow them. As for Dogen's emphasis on monastic organisation, it was his goal to build an authentic community following the model he had seen in China. Also, what is the Zen part in Dogen's teachings? Could say it's zazen, but seated meditation is as common an element in Buddhism as sutra recitation. The idea is that all elements of monastic life is Zen, henceforth even the minutest details become important (note: this approach is nothing new in Soto). Then there's Keizan, called the second founder of Soto, whose greatest achievement was in the area of community building, while at the same time his teachings were more according to the contemporary trends in Zen.

Temicco said:

Everyone advises it, at any rate. But I know. At the very least a teacher could help me work through any reservations I may have, point me in the right directions, and urge me to anuttara samyak sambodhi (and not a partial buddhahood), as Dosha did for Bankei. It just seems like most teachers (or groups, at least) are more interested in teaching a bunch of doctrines than in spurring students towards buddhahood. And that's what puts me off.

Astus wrote:

You know your situation best. If you have not yet practised with a community, it is certainly a good idea to pay a visit. As for reservations and doubts, they are all conceptual phantasms. There is <http://antaiji.org/en/services/%E3%81%84%E3%81%BE%E8%87%AA%E6%AE%BA%E3%81%97%E3%82%88%E3%81%86%E3%81%A8%E6%80%9D%E3%81%84%E3%81%A4%E3%82%81%E3%81%A6%E3%81%84%E3%82%8B%E4%BA%BA%E3%81%B8%E5%86%85%E5%B1%B1%E8%88%88%E6%AD%A3%E8%91%97/> attributed to Dogen: "I have not visited many Zen monasteries. I simply, with my master Tendo, quietly verified that the eyes are horizontal and the nose is vertical. I cannot be misled by anyone anymore. I have returned home empty-handed." And as for how that is all to learn in (Soto) Zen, see <http://thatssozen.blogspot.hu/2014/09/zazen-or-no-one-can-help-you.html>. However, I think it's already too much.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 16th, 2016 at 6:44 PM

Title: Re: On Buddhism and Nominalism

Content:

Queequeg said:

Particulars are derivative of dharmas?

Particulars are themselves dharmas...

Astus wrote:

By particulars I meant ordinary things like chairs, shoes, coats, and sandwiches. There is no dharma for one particular chair, nor for chairs in general, but only the dharmas of name and form, and from those basic dharmas come the illusion of individual objects and beings.

Queequeg said:

you're talking about sravakayana conceptions of irreducible dharmas?

Astus wrote:

Dharmas are the basic elements in Mahayana as well. The difference is whether they are considered with or without self-being (svabhava).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 16th, 2016 at 6:52 PM

Title: Re: On Buddhism and Nominalism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

But Platonic universals are not at all like the dharmas. Dharmas are the 'constituents of experience', they are grounded in 12 links of dependent origination and the conditioned nature of perception. They're the momentary constituents of experience as revealed in meditative insight.

Astus wrote:

Dharmas are universal in the sense that they are the same for everyone. As for their momentary and empty nature, those are universal qualities of the dharmas. So, while the definitions are not the same in one aspect, they have a similar role as the basis of appearances.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 16th, 2016 at 7:12 PM

Title: Re: Disillusioned by gradual teachings

Content:

seeker242 said:

This, from the Platform Sutra, always comes to mind whenever I hear about Chan being sudden or gradual.

"The Dharma is originally of one school. It is people who think of North and South. The Dharma is of one kind, but people understand it slowly or quickly. Dharma is not sudden or gradual. Rather it is people who are sharp or dull. Hence the terms sudden and gradual."

Astus wrote:

It basically means that only stupid people think there is a gradual path. The whole point of that 8th chapter where North and South are distinguished is to vindicate Huineng's teaching of immediate enlightenment, just like it's done all over the text.

As Huineng tells Zhicheng: "The morality, meditation, and wisdom of your teacher is directed at people of the Great Vehicle. My morality, meditation, and wisdom are directed at people of the Supreme Vehicle."

Might also consider the following passages as well, to give a clearer picture:

"Good friends, those of small capacities who hear this sudden teaching are like plants whose capacities are small. Beset by a great rain, they all collapse and are unable to grow. People of small capacities are also like this. They possess the wisdom of prajñā fundamentally, no differently from those of great wisdom. So why do they hear the Dharma without being able to become enlightened? Because of the profundity of their false views and layered afflictions! Just as if great clouds are blocking the sun, unless a wind blows [them away], the light of the sun will not be visible.

There is also no great and small in the wisdom of prajñā; it is only that the delusion and enlightenment of the minds of all sentient beings differ. Those with deluded minds appear to be cultivating and seeking buddhahood, but they are unenlightened to their self-natures. Hence are they of small capacities. If one is to be enlightened to the sudden teaching, one cannot cultivate externally (i.e., superficially): one should just constantly activate correct views in one's own mind, and the enervating defilements of the afflictions will be rendered permanently unable to defile one. This is to see the nature."

(ch 2, BDK p 31-32)

"There are no sudden and gradual in the Dharma,
It is delusion and enlightenment that are slow or fast.
It is only this teaching of seeing the nature
Which stupid people cannot comprehend.

...

This verse is the sudden teaching.
It is also called the ship of the great Dharma.
In delusion one can listen to the sutras for eons, but Enlightenment occurs in a moment."

(ch 2, BDK p 34, 36)

"Good friends, the correct teaching is fundamentally without either sudden or gradual—it is human nature that is either clever or dull. Deluded people cultivate gradually, while enlightened people suddenly conform [to the truth]. If you recognize your own fundamental mind and see your own fundamental nature, there will be no such distinctions! Thus it is that sudden and gradual are posited as provisional names."

(ch 4, BDK p 43)

"Our patriarchs have transmitted only this sudden teaching,
And you should all vow to see the nature and be identical to them."

(ch 7, BDK p 53)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 16th, 2016 at 7:34 PM

Title: Re: On Buddhism and Nominalism

Content:

Vima Repa said:

That's not what "universal" means in the context of the problem of universals.

From https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Universal_%28metaphysics%29:

In metaphysics, a universal is what particular things have in common, namely characteristics or qualities. In other words, universals are repeatable or recurrent entities that can be instantiated or exemplified by many particular things.

Astus wrote:

Particular things have the dharmas in common, and those are their true characteristics and qualities. Dharmas are repeatable and recurrent as well, they exist in all the different experiences.

Vima Repa said:

Universals are hypothetical real entities that imbue particulars with their qualities.

Astus wrote:

Can be applied to the dharmas as well.

Vima Repa said:

A particular chair is a chair by virtue of its participating in the universal "chairness."

Astus wrote:

Buddhism approaches from a different angle, where both "chairness" and "a chair" are superficial, and the underlying universal qualities of dharmas are the true reality. However, just because it's the other way around, it does not mean they are not alike.

Vima Repa said:

In Buddhism, it's most certainly not the case that a dharma is impermanent by virtue of participating an abstract, eternal universal of "impermanence." This is exactly the sort of purely speculative philosophical entity that Buddhist thinkers have questioned for millennia.

Astus wrote:

The dharmas are the true realities whence illusory, conventional appearances are abstracted.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 16th, 2016 at 8:02 PM

Title: Re: On Buddhism and Nominalism

Content:

Queequeg said:

Where can I find a textual source that explains this?

Astus wrote:

It's how the conventional (sammuti) and ultimate truth (paramattha sacca) are differentiated in abhidhamma.

"Different characteristics of rupa can be experienced through eyes, ears, nose, tongue, body-sense and mind. These characteristics are real since they can be experienced. We use conventional terms such as 'body' and 'table'; both have the characteristic of hardness which can be experienced through touch. In this way we can prove that the characteristic of hardness is the same, no matter whether it is in the body or in the table. Hardness is a paramattha dhamma; 'body' and 'table' are not paramattha dhammas but only concepts. We take it for granted that the body stays and we take it for self, but what we call 'body' are only different rupas arising and falling away. The conventional term 'body' may delude us about reality. We will know the truth if we learn to experience different characteristics of rupa when they appear."

(<http://www.budsas.org/ebud/nina-abhidhamma/nina-abhi-01.htm>)

Also I can recommend Bhikkhu Bodhi's translation (and a great introduction in it) of https://store.pariyatti.org/Comprehensive-Manual-of-Abhidhamma-A--PDF-eBook_p_4362.html.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 17th, 2016 at 5:04 PM

Title: Re: Disillusioned by gradual teachings

Content:

Temicco said:

I question the idea that people's contemporary needs really differ all that much. It seems like there are teachers concerned with getting people to realize the truth, and teachers concerned with throwing people a raft. Ritualization isn't liberative in any meaningful way.

Astus wrote:

Ossification is a necessary element of any tradition. While there is the living myth of the enlightened teacher, actually the transmission from one generation to another is about maintaining the tradition, so it is fairly mechanical, therefore the primary requirement for transmission is upholding a minimal standard as best as possible. This may sound like a bad or cheap thing, but practically this is how it works. If one accepts that liberation depends on the teachings and rituals transmitted, this keeps the door open for every participant to make use of it. In other words, only the blueprint of a raft can be handed over, and everyone has to build their own vehicle. Others may assist in reading the blueprint and advice on the building process, but they cannot give their own raft.

Temicco said:

Still looking around for communities, but this was where the issue I mentioned in the last paragraph of my last comment comes up. So many groups (even well-regarded ones) content themselves with charging you excessive amounts of money for the chance to come meditate and listen to people talk about their feelings and how spiritual incense is. It's not a conceptual phantasm to notice a difference between teachings that focus on liberation and money-grubbing church circles, and unfortunately the second is all I've found so far.

Astus wrote:

If there is no acceptable community in your vicinity, you might have to travel. That is, if you want to connect with some group. I don't think you'd be alone in that.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 17th, 2016 at 7:14 PM

Title: Re: Mechanics of Enlightenment

Content:

Anders said:

I don't think this analysis has ever been 'required'. I think one of the down-sides of Tibetan Madhyamika is that in its present presentation, it is treated as a preliminary dialectic to something else, moreso than as a fullfledged school in its own right, with distinctive Madhyamika practices.

Astus wrote:

Madhyamika analysis in meditation is very much there in TB, for instance in Mahamudra, even if they pretend it's something different. But if one looks at the sutras where they teach that the unborn nature of the dharmas is what needs to be realised, then looks at MMK, it is easy to see how Nagarjuna gives a straightforward instruction in realisation. However, it is the natural progress of things that what was once a practical teaching becomes mere theory. That's why in the beginning we read that many attained enlightenment just by hearing the teachings, but later generations fail to achieve that. So, the teaching must adapt to the new conditions and must sound live and appropriate.

By the way, even Madhyamaka was once a novel form to correct the formalised teachings, and those formalised teachings themselves were at one point new and practical.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 17th, 2016 at 7:29 PM

Title: Re: On Buddhism and Nominalism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I understand that, but that doesn't make the meaning of 'dhammas' the same as what is meant by 'universals'. You're stretching the meaning of the term.

...

Just because dhammas are the supposed explanatory sub-stratum of experience, doesn't mean that they correspond to what was designated 'universals' in Western philosophy. They're nearer to atomism.

Astus wrote:

Then it turns out that universals are not found in Buddhism.

Wayfarer said:

I think this is as near as Buddhism gets to acknowledging universals.

Astus wrote:

The apoha idea seems to actually negate any possibility of universals. If a chair is defined by every non-chair, and all those non-chairs are again defined by everything other than those non-chairs, then we find how all definitions are non-definitions, and there is nothing defined by anything. This is basically another way to say that all phenomena are conditioned, and therefore empty.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 17th, 2016 at 7:50 PM

Title: Re: On Buddhism and Nominalism

Content:

Queequeg said:

my understanding is that the real dharmas you refer to arise in the contact between sense object and sense apparatus. Red, for instance, arises on the eye seeing something 'red'. Red, however, is nothing more than the sensation of red. The object itself is not red, nor is it not not red... it is inconveivable.

Astus wrote:

Of the four ultimate dharmas only nirvana is unconditioned. Red is a rupa-dharma (see: Comprehensive Manual, p 237), of the category of objective material phenomena (gocararupa), and within that it is a visible form (rupa). So, red is not a dharma, but only a derivative of a dharma.

Queequeg said:

So then what you're describing as a Buddhist universal is the consciousness that arises on contact.

Astus wrote:

Universals are the dharmas, and not all dharmas are mind (citta) or mental (cetasika).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 17th, 2016 at 7:54 PM

Title: Re: Disillusioned by gradual teachings

Content:

smcj said:

I believe, as do all my lamas, that you can attain the highest realisations through sadhana practice.

Astus wrote:

And what is it in a sadhana that is the cause of realisation?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 17th, 2016 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: Disillusioned by gradual teachings

Content:

smcj said:

The deity.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean the deity as an outer force makes you realised, or is it the visualisation of the deity that causes realisation?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 17th, 2016 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: Disillusioned by gradual teachings

Content:

Malcolm said:

In a sadhana you start with the realization of emptiness at the beginning.

Astus wrote:

So anyone who even begins one is a realised being?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 17th, 2016 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: Mechanics of Enlightenment

Content:

Malcolm said:

While it is true that there is some preliminary analysis derived from Madhyamaka reasonings which may be found in Lamdre, Kagyu Mahāmudra and so on, the key distinction is that Madhyamaka offers no method of directly experiencing one's own dharmatā.

Astus wrote:

It's not merely some preliminary analysis, but the method used to examine the mind and all phenomena, and through that examination can one arrive at genuine realisation. It is just like that in the Bhavanakrama. So, I don't see how Madhyamaka would be lacking in anything, when it can lead to - and it is used as such - to non-conceptual wisdom.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 17th, 2016 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: Disillusioned by gradual teachings

Content:

smcj said:

So your question is like asking if the pitcher of beer an "outer force" that is making me drunk, or is it my action of drinking the beer?

Astus wrote:

So, what is the cause of realisation?

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Alcohol_intoxication:

"Alcohol intoxication is the result of alcohol entering the bloodstream faster than it can be metabolized by the liver, which breaks down the ethanol into non-intoxicating byproducts. "

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 18th, 2016 at 12:42 AM

Title: Re: Disillusioned by gradual teachings

Content:

smcj said:

The deity, and my internalising it through meditation. "Meditating on the deity"="drinking the beer". Get it?

Astus wrote:

As far as I'm aware, meditation on a deity has several steps and elements, for instance the realisation of the deity as clarity-emptiness, or the whole process of completion stage with and without marks. What part do you mean by internalisation?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 18th, 2016 at 2:13 AM

Title: Re: Disillusioned by gradual teachings

Content:

smcj said:

Merging the deity with my mind.

Astus wrote:

"The visualization of oneself and all sentient beings in the form of Chenrezig is the development stage, and this is method. Recognizing that both the visualization and the form visualized are empty is the fulfillment stage, and this is wisdom. One should always combine these two aspects of practice, method and wisdom."

(<http://www.kagyu.org/kagyulineage/buddhism/dev/dev03.php>)

Based on the above quote, visualisation of being the deity is not the part where realisation happens, but when that vision is seen as mind-made and insubstantial. Or do you mean something else?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 18th, 2016 at 2:44 AM

Title: Re: Disillusioned by gradual teachings

Content:

Malcolm said:

It is termed "taking the result as the path."

Astus wrote:

Does that mean one has actually realised emptiness? Or is it just pretending?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 18th, 2016 at 7:31 AM

Title: Re: Disillusioned by gradual teachings

Content:

Malcolm said:

It means that one has received direct introduction through the word empowerment and is experientially familiar with the example wisdom. So no, one has not realized emptiness, but neither is one pretending.

Dzogchen, of course, is quite different.

Astus wrote:

Example wisdom occurs at the wisdom empowerment, but according to Tsele Natsok (Empowerment, p 41) if it's not genuine insight "there is no way to recognize all forms of conceptual thinking to be the innate nature (dharmata), and thus one misses the point of the third empowerment. Without experiencing the nature of the third empowerment, one does not obtain the true fourth empowerment."

Also, according to Thrangu rinpoche (Creation and Completion, p 142-143), the sudden pointing out of the nature of the mind "as authentic as it is, is in some ways adulterated by conceptualization and therefore remains an experience rather than a realization. The problem with this is that, while the recognition is authentic as far as it goes, because it is incomplete and imperfect, it will at some point vanish. When it vanishes, the student does not know how to bring it back, because their initial recognition was experienced under the dramatic circumstances of receiving the pointing out from their guru." That is practically a criticism of the example wisdom. Therefore, he says, the solution to that in the Kagyu tradition is "to enable students, through their own exploration, to come to a decisive recognition of the mind's nature."

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 18th, 2016 at 7:34 AM

Title: Re: Disillusioned by gradual teachings

Content:

smcj said:

Since the Sambogakaya is a manifestation of enlightenment, it is undeceived about the true nature of emptiness. And since your mind has mixed with the deity, when the deity is dissolved into unmistaken emptiness, your mind is unerringly brought to the same state. There is absolutely no need for philosophical positions or discrimination. This is unlike Sutra where you must find your way to emptiness.

Astus wrote:

That is, if one perfectly identifies oneself with the deity, one becomes a living buddha. Is that what you mean?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 18th, 2016 at 7:37 AM

Title: Re: Disillusioned by gradual teachings

Content:

Temicco said:

That's an interesting way to look at it, I just don't really get why a "tradition" is any more necessary than some kind of undefined sramana group. Is there evidence that there's more staying power and accessibility in the former?

Astus wrote:

Undefined sramana groups have a short lifespan. An early term for Buddhism is Dharma-Vinaya, that is, Doctrine and Discipline. Both are equally important. I think there is ample evidence of several communities that used rules and regulations to survive the centuries, while occasional groups that happened to come together dispersed.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 18th, 2016 at 5:46 PM

Title: Re: Disillusioned by gradual teachings

Content:

smcj said:

That is the goal, yes.

Astus wrote:

With sadhana practice one gradually develops a clear image, an understanding of the meaning of the image, and the pride in being the deity. That sounds more than ritualised practice to me, it is qualitatively different from merely reciting the sadhana. It is not a good example of how ritualised practice is liberating.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 23rd, 2016 at 1:15 AM

Title: Re: Does competition increase greed, malice, and covetousness?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Winning gives birth to hostility.

Losing, one lies down in pain.

The calmed lie down with ease, having set winning & losing aside.

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/kn/dhp/dhp.15.than.html.201>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 23rd, 2016 at 6:06 AM

Title: Re: Victims of Communism

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are victims of every social order, those who do not fit in are cast out or crushed, and there are those at the bottom of society, the poor. This was not different in the socialist era. The ex-Warsaw Pact country I live in (Hungary) had its own version of https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Goulash_Communist that made it the happiest barrack following the reforms in the 1960s. Those are the decades that people thought/think of with nostalgia after the collapse of the Eastern Bloc that, with the introduction of capitalism, resulted in several difficulties. No wonder that the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Hungarian_Socialist_Party - official successor of the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Hungarian_Socialist_Workers%27_Party - formed the elected government three times since then, and currently the strongest opposition party, although rapidly losing voters to the far-right.

But, before the "happy times", there were two darker episodes of communism in Hungary. Hungary was the second country in the world to become officially socialist, and it lasted from 21 March until 1 August 1919. It was the time of https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Red_Terror_%28Hungary%29 with its infamous https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Lenin_Boys, only to be followed by the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/White_Terror_%28Hungary%29 of the following government to eliminate communists, including a good number of Jews (this is not the Holocaust yet). Then the kingdom was restored (without a king), a million people killed (at least half of them in the Holocaust), another war lost, and with the Soviet army came "our nation's wise leader", "Stalin's best pupil", comrade https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/M%C3%A1ty%C3%A1s_R%C3%A1kosi, who happened to be the sixth child of Jewish parents. That was the era of proper dictatorship with purges, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/State_Protection_Authority, show trials, personality cult, and the usual methods required to establish a fine socialist state. There is a fantastic satire film about that era, made in 1969 - sponsored by the state, immediately banned by the state, and released to the public in 1979 by the state - https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/The_Witness_%281969_Hungarian_film%29. If you have the opportunity to obtain it with English subtitles, you should see it.

Regarding Buddhism, the <http://europeanbuddhism.org/members/buddhist-mission-hungary-church-of-arya-maitreya-mandala/> was officially recognised in 1956 by the state, and it is still an active group. As I have heard it, it was recognised as an official church in order to serve as a countermeasure against the Catholic Church, and it was of course under surveillance by the state. Here is a short introduction from the 1973 edition of Bulletin of Tibetology by the founder: http://himalaya.socanth.cam.ac.uk/collections/journals/bot/pdf/bot_10_01_03.pdf.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 23rd, 2016 at 6:29 AM

Title: Re: Does competition increase greed, malice, and covetousness?

Content:

Kaccāni said:

So the practice, in and competition, is to stay calm.

Astus wrote:

If you compete, you're not calm.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 23rd, 2016 at 5:02 PM

Title: Re: Does competition increase greed, malice, and covetousness?

Content:

Kaccāni said:

Yet you may be calm in competition.

Astus wrote:

How do you do that?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 23rd, 2016 at 7:23 PM

Title: Re: Does competition increase greed, malice, and covetousness?

Content:

Kaccāni said:

When there is awareness of the competition, you may argue that you're still "in" it, it's still within your awareness, it appears in consciousness, the situation lies before you, yet the competition will not defile you and you can be all calm you want.

Astus wrote:

To compete is the desire to defeat others and win. Competition that doesn't defile means one is without the desire to win and defeat others, hence one does not compete. To participate in a competition with some other purpose is possible, if that's what you mean, but then winning cannot be the goal. One should also be aware not to fall into the error of thinking that the end justifies the means.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 24th, 2016 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Does competition increase greed, malice, and covetousness?

Content:

Kaccāni said:

Compete can also only mean to engage in a contest.

Astus wrote:

Life might be described as a competition for survival and procreation, but that is a theoretical concept that one either subscribes to or not. Those who accept it as a valid truth are those who compete. And those who compete are in the mindset that desires winning, and that is engaging in a competition. Saying that others may label one's activity as competition is irrelevant, because there are also those who imagine life to be governed by fate or a god.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 24th, 2016 at 3:03 AM

Title: Re: Does competition increase greed, malice, and covetousness?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

the greater thing was challenging yourself through competition, rather than beating others.

Astus wrote:

How is that really better? Challenging yourself is trying to reach an ideal goal, that is often set by others. That concept of self-improvement is most apparent in the fitness and diet culture that makes many depressed when they fail to look like athletes or even just lose a few kilos. It creates an inner war, that leads many to feel disappointed with oneself, while others become obsessed with reaching and maintaining an ideal.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 24th, 2016 at 5:30 AM

Title: Re: Does competition increase greed, malice, and covetousness?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

There are times where you can only "self-improve" so far, in a traditional art at least, part of this means simply accepting your limitations, finding what you are good at, and doing your best with that, without fear of failure, and moving away from a goal-centered approach. For most people who are "lifers" it becomes a kind of joy for it's own sake, and indeed most of the people I've known (myself included) with long years in the arts long ago gave up on the goal-oriented approach and simply love doing it.

Astus wrote:

What you say sounds not like challenging yourself, but cultivating something. That is not competition in any sense, but simply finding joy in an activity.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 24th, 2016 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: Does competition increase greed, malice, and covetousness?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

IME there is a difference between healthy "pushing against" oneself - even if we consider it spiritually lesser pursuit-, and the kind of self-hatred and grasping that you are talking about, which is rife all over the world of fitness, diet etc. While it's true that many competitive pursuits end up there, IMO, and IME they do not have to.

Astus wrote:

Certainly, there are various degrees, and it is good to be able to have motivation but not fall into various traps of overdoing it. On the other hand, it is not an uncommon belief that any cultivation is pointless, because in this age the capacity of the people are meagre, their karma is heavy, and only through an external help can they be liberated.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 25th, 2016 at 2:56 AM

Title: Re: How to believe in rebirth

Content:

Boomerang said:

I've believed in rebirth longer than I've believed in Buddhism. Still, I feel that I could believe in rebirth more. Then I would have more samvega and bodhicitta.

Astus wrote:

If you accept rebirth and you want to improve your motivation, contemplate the six realms and the drawbacks of samsara.

As for beginning to believe in rebirth, Malcolm has already recommended the best way of investigating it on the experiential rather than the conceptual level. If we look at our present experiences, it easily becomes clear that the mind can operate independent of the body. Then we can see how the mind functions influenced by its own habitual patterns. Those two show that with the death of the body there is still a mind bound by its own inclinations.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 25th, 2016 at 6:38 AM

Title: Re: How to believe in rebirth

Content:

Boomerang said:

I've been trying to do that, visualizing myself burning, freezing, being eaten alive, and so on.

Astus wrote:

Perhaps a different approach to it might work better. To believe fully in something, is to regard it as natural and self-evident. When one accepts something as true, one acts according to that reality. What importance does rebirth have in one's daily life? It means avoiding unwholesome acts and cultivating meritorious deeds. And when one sees the total futility of endless rebirth, that generates renunciation and the wish to attain liberation. Furthermore, understanding that not only oneself is subject to a meaningless and painful cycle, but all other beings as well, compassion for all can rise. Continuing that line of thought, one may also realise that rebirth is not anything that one controls, but only the interplay of causes and conditions, without an personal element in it, and that provides an insight into emptiness.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 27th, 2016 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: Britian's upcoming E.U referendum

Content:

Astus wrote:

It seems so strange to me that those who would support Bernie in the US can at the same time rejoice over and approve Brexit. Is it not apparent enough that with Brexit the right wing, especially far-right politics won?

"The EU already has two member states – Poland and Hungary – that have moved towards authoritarian nationalism and away from liberal democracy. The success of the English nationalist revolution (and that is what Brexit is) will further energise those forces throughout the union."

(<http://www.irishtimes.com/opinion/fintan-o-toole-brexit-fantasy-is-about-to-come-crashing-down-1.2698974>)

See also: <http://www.irishtimes.com/news/world/uk/brexit-campaign-shows-perils-of-a-populist-paeon-to-ignorance-1.2700314>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 27th, 2016 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: Britian's upcoming E.U referendum

Content:

Lobsang Chojor said:

I agree that the far right see this as a victory for them, however the left (Corbyn etc.) supported brexit

Astus wrote:

Where did you get that from?

From 2 June:

<http://www.bbc.com/news/uk-politics-eu-referendum-36430606>

From 26 June (today):

"Analysis of the polling shows that Labour persuaded two-thirds of its supporters to vote remain. I think that is an achievement. And in part it is an achievement for Jeremy Corbyn and the shadow chancellor John McDonnell. Without the "remain and reform" demand they put forward, I think even more of our own people would have voted out."

(<https://www.theguardian.com/commentisfree/2016/jun/26/corbyn-leader-brexit-labour-rebels-sabotage>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 27th, 2016 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: Britian's upcoming E.U referendum

Content:

Malcolm said:

The American Left in general supported Brexit, because it represents the failure of neoliberalism.

Astus wrote:

Then it seems their assessment what the EU stands for is missing a number of key elements.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 27th, 2016 at 12:38 AM

Title: Re: Britian's upcoming E.U referendum

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

I keep hearing people say that Brexit is pretty much exclusively a victory for the far right, does this mean that staying in would have been a victory for the left? Would staying have been a victory for anyone? If so, who?

Astus wrote:

The Tories would have still failed, and Labour could have gained more support. It would have also allowed a reasonable position to address the grievances of Leave voters in a more peaceful way. Not the mention that the UK already had a special position in the EU. Although, all in all, the whole referendum was a bad idea.

Johnny Dangerous said:

How?

Astus wrote:

The EU is first of all is the organisation meant to keep Europe at peace and in mutual agreement. It is also a strong force against our Eastern neighbour Russia, plus a sizeable economy to keep things running in an orderly fashion (i.e. the EU regulations to protect its citizens and the environment). The other option, the voice of the nationalists, where there are independent states, is not a nice one. It may look like that Europe is a cultured and peaceful land, at least that's the impression I get from how American's see it. And while that is half true, there is another half. As https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=kgxglVm_2OY said about Hungary: "The fantasy home of every little girl who's young enough to love castles, but not quite old enough to be aware of neo-fascist political parties."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 27th, 2016 at 1:18 AM

Title: Re: Britian's upcoming E.U referendum

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

It's my impression that the EU leadership generally gives a squat about public opinion regardless of what goes on, that certainly seems to have been the case with the possibility of Grexit. I can see why people are scared about the far right thing though. The answer to that is a real movement to oppose far-right politics though, I don't quite understand how a neoliberal supra-national bureaucracy is some bulwark against far-right politics.

Astus wrote:

Have you followed the 2016 elections in Austria? First round was won by the far-right party by 35.1%, greens got second place by 21.3%, then the second round was won by the greens with 50.3% against 49.7%. Note, it was the far-right's gain (https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Freedom_Party_of_Austria and https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/J%C3%B6rg_Haider) in the 1999 elections that prompted the first ever http://www.demokratiezentrum.org/fileadmin/media/pdf/falkner_sanctions.pdf. Currently it is the new Polish right wing government that the <http://www.dw.com/en/eu-threatens-sanctions-if-poland-doesnt-reverse-high-court-overhaul/a-19298401>. The Hungarian right wing government has had its own clashes as well, and had to throw out a number of laws, e.g. about <http://www.loc.gov/law/foreign-news/article/european-union-hungary-european-parliament-resolution-on-hungarys-media-law/>.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 27th, 2016 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: Britian's upcoming E.U referendum

Content:

Myoho-Nameless said:

Someone I know in Europe says that these "far right" groups tend to be in favor of "leftists" policies like safety nets, socialized medicine etc. They just don't want immigrants to have access to them and other than that, they aren't really rightist.

Astus wrote:

Correct. It's called

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/National_Socialism_%28disambiguation%29. In case there is someone who does not recognise the term and does not check the link: the most famous national socialist party ever was lead by Adolf Hitler.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 27th, 2016 at 2:12 AM

Title: Re: Britian's upcoming E.U referendum

Content:

Astus wrote:

Far-right on the streets:

<http://www.independent.co.uk/news/uk/home-news/brexit-eu-referendum-racial-racism-abuse-hate-crime-reported-latest-leave-immigration-a7104191.html>

And online:

https://www.facebook.com/sarah.leblanc.718/media_set?set=a.10101369198638985&type=3&pnref=story

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 27th, 2016 at 7:57 PM

Title: Re: Britian's upcoming E.U referendum

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

I guess I don't really understand how the EU structure provides that, can someone explain that a bit better?

Astus wrote:

Every member state has to comply with a good number of EU laws including in their constitution. Any member state diverging from or violating those laws are taken to court. That actually provides a protection for all EU citizens who suffer injustice by any state institution. That is actually a great benefit for the people in general.

On the other hand, it should be clear that the EU is a union and not a federation or a state, so practically all member states are sovereign entities and there are many ways they can circumvent their own laws. For instance, the Hungarian government took away church status from all churches in 2012, set up a very short list of churches they accept, and then in 2014 the European Court ruled that the new church law is in violation of freedom of religion. Nevertheless, nothing has actually changed, and the churches haven't got back their previous legal status ever since.

Johnny Dangerous said:

how exactly does the EU prevent the rise of the far right, is it just that you fear national governments are more likely to lend the far right legitimacy, and have right parties ascend to power..

Astus wrote:

It cannot prevent it ultimately. There are actually far right parties in the EU parliament itself, who are against the EU. At the same time, it serves as a structure to bind countries and parties together, and through that prevent conflicts escalating between them. It should also be noted that a good number of far right parties are supported by and extensions of Russia, and there is an ongoing misinformation campaign to bring people to their nationalist causes. So far nothing really has been done by the EU, as far as I'm aware, but that is where again a united stand against that form of attack is important.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 27th, 2016 at 7:59 PM

Title: Re: Britian's upcoming E.U referendum

Content:

dreambow said:

Norway, Iceland and the Swiss are not part of the EU but in the free trade area EFTA and they are doing OK.

Why do people prefer this deal to the EU? Not because it's perfect – nothing is perfect – but because it allows participation in the European market while retaining self-government.

Astus wrote:

Wrong examples. They all have to adopt EU laws, pay in to the EU, and allow free worker movement. What they don't get is a vote in any of the laws and regulations they have to follow.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 27th, 2016 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: Britian's upcoming E.U referendum

Content:

Malcolm said:

The EU's approach has not been, "UK we'll miss you," but rather, "You fools, you will regret this." Not a very appealing message.

Astus wrote:

<http://www.reuters.com/article/us-britain-eu-germany-rethink-idUSKCN0ZC0IB>

<http://www.bbc.com/news/world-europe-36630326>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 28th, 2016 at 1:08 AM

Title: Re: Britian's upcoming E.U referendum

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, I was referring to the all the sturm and drung leading up to the vote.

But also from the second article you posted:

But politicians are talking tough. Concessions, they say, might encourage other member states to leave. For this reason one senior MP told me: "There must be consequences for Britain".

Astus wrote:

Well, it seems Merkel couldn't hold out against everyone else:

<http://www.independent.co.uk/news/uk/home-news/article-50-brexit-eu-referendum-result-german-eu-latest-news-leave-european-union-a7105946.html>

BTW, it's like when someone says that he wants a divorce but then procrastinates in leaving the house and doing the official paperwork.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 28th, 2016 at 1:27 AM

Title: Re: Britian's upcoming E.U referendum

Content:

Malcolm said:

Well, that would be a fair comparison is the leave vote was a clear mandate, but it wasn't. And, it is not a binding vote (which every one seems to forget). As long as the UK does not trigger article 50, they are in the EU still.

Astus wrote:

And how do you imagine they could disregard the referendum in the parliament? It might have worse consequences then leaving.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 28th, 2016 at 2:54 AM

Title: Re: Britian's upcoming E.U referendum

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

A very good piece from Paul Mason:

<https://www.theguardian.com/commentisfree/2016/jun/27/global-order-britain-survive-eu-alternative-economic-model>

Astus wrote:

If they went with EEA then free movement remains, and most of the other things. That's how they can make this Brexit mostly harmless and pointless.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 28th, 2016 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: Britian's upcoming E.U referendum

Content:

Ayu said:

I suspect it is a conspiracy

Astus wrote:

Comedian turned politician: <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=KpgavJ17uTk>, whose party gave Rome's new mayor, <http://www.euronews.com/2016/06/22/virginia-raggi-rome-s-first-female-mayor-talks-to-euronews/>.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 29th, 2016 at 3:29 PM

Title: Re: Britian's upcoming E.U referendum

Content:

dreambow said:

Farage's quip that many in the EU have never had a real job is very close to the truth. These Bureaucrats and their long talk fests and long lunches....an indulgent group who are completely removed from the man in the street and the consequences of their decision making.

Astus wrote:

Have you actually checked the facts?

<http://www.bbc.com/news/uk-politics-eu-referendum-36654901>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 29th, 2016 at 4:02 PM

Title: Re: Cancel the Order

Content:

Admin_PC said:

On the other hand, the approaches in Pure Land and Zen seem contradictory on the surface, but have the same ultimate aims.

Astus wrote:

If by ultimate aims you mean buddhahood, definitely true. However, it should not be forgotten that there are a number of differences between the Pure Land path and the path of sages.

<http://amida-ji-retreat-temple-romania.blogspot.hu/2016/06/an-answer-to-comment-comparing-zen-with.html>

Jeff H said:

Refuge means we have confident faith that liberation and enlightenment are possible due to the example of arhats and buddhas who've gone before us. It means that those beings have provided us with a road map to follow them -- by our own efforts -- in the Dharma. And it means that we can expect to find support among others who are similarly trying to change their lives. But it does not mean that we turn the job over to any other being to "handle it" for us.

Astus wrote:

No buddha can save beings on their own, otherwise samsara has already been over and we wouldn't need any path. The Pure Land way is a teaching, a method, that one can use for attaining complete enlightenment. The reason it is the path that is swift and easy is that the immediate goal is to attain birth in Sukhavati, and such a birth is possible because the conditions are simple: to have faith, intention/vow, and mindfulness/practice. That is how karma works anyway (see: <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.057.nymo.html>).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 29th, 2016 at 7:10 PM

Title: Re: Britian's upcoming E.U referendum

Content:

Dan74 said:

Why is automation an issue? Isn't the problem that so much manufacture has been abandoned in Europe? That given the recent instability, investors are wary which naturally impacts growth. EU is hardly a hub of commodity exports. And zero interest rates are not the cause of stagnation but an attempt to spur growth. So I am a bit lost here.

Astus wrote:

There is lot of manufacturing going on in the EU. With automation it requires less and less low-skilled workers.

"'Machinery and vehicles' is the most important individual product group in the international trade of the EU, accounting for 41 % of the total EU exports and 26 % of imports in 2013. The group records also the largest surplus in EU trade: EUR 275 billion in 2013.

The main exported products within the group are road vehicles, industrial machinery and electrical machinery, while the imports are dominated by electrical machinery, telecommunications equipment and IT products."

(http://ec.europa.eu/eurostat/statistics-explained/index.php/Extra-EU_trade_in_manufactured_goods)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 1st, 2016 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: Britian's upcoming E.U referendum

Content:

Astus wrote:

"By the same token, it seems unlikely that those in these regions (or Cornwall or other economically peripheral spaces) would feel 'grateful' to the EU for subsidies. Knowing that your business, farm, family or region is dependent on the beneficence of wealthy liberals is unlikely to be a recipe for satisfaction (see James Meek's recent essay in the London Review of Books on Europhobic farmers who receive vast subsidies from the EU). More bizarrely, it has since emerged that regions with the closest economic ties to the EU in general (and not just of the subsidised variety) were most likely to vote Leave. While it may be one thing for an investment banker to understand that they 'benefit from the EU' in regulatory terms, it is quite another to encourage poor and culturally marginalised people to feel grateful towards the elites that sustain them through handouts, month by month. Resentment develops not in spite of this generosity, but arguably because of it. This isn't to discredit what the EU does in terms of redistribution, but pointing to handouts is a psychologically and politically naïve basis on which to justify remaining in the EU."

(http://www.perc.org.uk/project_posts/thoughts-on-the-sociology-of-brexit/)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 1st, 2016 at 6:02 AM

Title: Re: Padmasambhava in Translation

Content:

Malcolm said:

from this perspective, he is saying his teachings are superior to translations.

Astus wrote:

But I assume hardly anyone today would think that a Westerner's similar statement would amount to anything serious. And if there were a group of students who followed such a living buddha, they'd be considered unorthodox and cult-like.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 2nd, 2016 at 7:10 PM

Title: Re: How to believe in rebirth

Content:

davidbrainerd said:

The 'self-view' he doesn't want us to have is a dogma of the self's origin (is it eternal, is it created). He never says we don't exist. He also never says we are only the aggregates, but the exact opposite: the aggregates are not the self.

Astus wrote:

The <http://www.dhammadownload.com/index.php?title=Sakkaya-ditthi> means any of the views that posit a self that identical with the aggregates, that is contained in the aggregates, that is independent of the aggregates, or that owns the aggregates. In other words, there is not any kind of self possible.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 3rd, 2016 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: How to believe in rebirth

Content:

Astus wrote:

Rebirth is as illusory and unfounded as this present body and mind. If we try to find what is there to be born again and again, we can only realise that there is no such entity. Similarly, there is no entity passing on from one moment to the next. That's how the true nature of birth is no birth, and of death is no death. When it becomes clear that there is neither birth nor death, it is also obvious how the illusion of existence occurs: by identification with concepts and feelings. Then it is only natural that there is running up and down all over the six realms.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 4th, 2016 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: How to believe in rebirth

Content:

davidbrainerd said:

Its not as simple as that. There are clearly two minds. In Pali you have nama and citta and it seems to me nama is physical and citta is non-physical. Bodhidharma says (Red Pine's translation, page 21) "But this mind is subtle and hard to see. It's not the same as the sensual mind."

If there is a material/sensual mind and an immaterial/subtle mind, which of the two is reborn? Its obvious. And which is part of the aggregates? The other one. So one mind is not part of the aggregates of which it is said "these are non-self."

Astus wrote:

There are the aggregates with grasping - that is the sensual mind. And there are the aggregates without grasping - that is the subtle mind. It's not about two minds existing at the same time, it'd be neither sensible nor practical to posit a second head. Rather, one has to see the nature of this present mind, and recognise that it is originally pure.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 5th, 2016 at 4:06 AM

Title: Re: How to believe in rebirth

Content:

undefineable said:

It seems that Buddhist teachers deny something over and above the rebirth of an 'underlying entity' called consciousness (and defined as the mental impression of an external or internal object in relation to a subject), yet stop short of denying rebirth altogether.

Astus wrote:

Beings have both bodies and minds. With rebirth the mind takes a new body. It is this simple. When the body and the mind are analysed, one can find that there is nothing substantial anywhere, and when that is realised, there is no more identification, then there is no more rebirth. But as long as there is identification, there is rebirth, and there is a mind to attain a body again and again.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 7th, 2016 at 6:12 PM

Title: Re: Britian's upcoming E.U referendum

Content:

Astus wrote:

"the real answer lies in the push factor in the east. People do not decide on emigration simply based on higher relative wages elsewhere. Mostly it is a lack of prospects in the domestic economy that drives them away. "

<https://www.socialeurope.eu/2016/07/solution-brexite-lies-eastern-europe/>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 9th, 2016 at 5:19 PM

Title: Re: Does all Zen teach the One-Mind?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huanbo teaches No Mind as much as One Mind. They mean the same. It should also be clear that 'one' means non-dual, and non-dual means without like and dislike, without existence and non-existence, it is simply the wisdom of emptiness, what has always been the Buddha's and patriarchs' essential message.

"The important thing is to learn the Truth; for without learning that there is really no holy, no pure, no dirty, no big, no small, etc., but only emptiness and non-action and that this alone is ONE MIND and that, always, any adornment is only an expedient to learn the truth, one only clings to illusion."

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 10th, 2016 at 2:32 AM

Title: Re: Mahanayan canon?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Currently the most popular edition of the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Chinese_Buddhist_canon is the http://21dzk.l.u-tokyo.ac.jp/SAT/index_en.html. Here is the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Taish%C5%8D_Tripit%E1%B9%AD to give you a basic outline, and here is a <http://terebess.hu/zen/szoto/Map-of-the-Taisho.pdf>.

<https://web.archive.org/web/20160328122520/http://fodian.net/world/> provides translations following the Taisho categories, while <http://mbingenheimer.net/tools/bibls/transbibl.html> is a bibliography of translations.

The major edition of the previous Qing era is the http://www.suttaworld.org/Collection_of_Buddhist/Chiarnlurng_Tripitaka/menu/index.htm, completed in 1738. Its structure is different from the Taisho, has the three main sections of Sutra, Vinaya, and Shastra, where the Sutra section sets up the order as Prajna section, Ratnakuta section, Mahasamnipata section, Avatamsaka section, Nirvana section, Five great foreign translations section, Mahayana single translations section, Agama section, Hinayana single translations section, All sorts of Song, Yuan, Tibetan scriptures section.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 13th, 2016 at 6:38 AM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Of the thousand or ten thousand people in this school, only three or five [have really understood Buddhism]."

(Huangbo: Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, in Zen Texts, BDK Edition, p 42)

"With a preceding moment of deluded thought, one was an ordinary person, but with a succeeding moment of enlightened thought, one is a buddha. To be attached to one's sensory realms in a preceding moment of thought is affliction, but to transcend the realms in a succeeding moment of thought is bodhi."

(Huineng: Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK Edition, p 30)

"The view that practice and realization are not one is skewed outside of the Way. In the Buddha Dharma practice and realization are one and the same. This is the practise of realization, and so from the beginning practice is the whole body of original Awakening. And so the instructions are to not to seek Awakening outside of the practice because the practice itself points directly to original Awakening."

(Dogen: <http://wwwzcn.org/sites/default/files/Bendowa-book.pdf>)

"If a person retaining the concept of there being anything to be gained generates the bodhi resolve and then proceeds to cultivate kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy, equanimity, giving, moral virtue, patience, vigor, dhyāna absorption, and wisdom, doing so for an incalculable number of asaṃkhyeyas of kalpas, one should realize that, on account of retaining the concept of something to be gained, such a person will not succeed in leaving behind birth and death and will not succeed in progressing towards bodhi."

(Vasubandhu: http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/V-Bcitta_excerpts/VBcitta_X-21_X-10.pdf)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 13th, 2016 at 4:07 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I once read there is a quotation from the Vajracchedikā Prajñāpāramitā Sūtra translated as 'even though I have realised the supreme ultimate truth I have gained nothing thereby'. But whenever I searched for it I was unable to locate the source. Would you be able to cast any light?

Astus wrote:

Subhūti said to the Buddha: "World-honored One. When the buddhas attain peerless perfect enlightenment, is it the case that actually nothing is attained?"

"Exactly right. Subhūti, as far as peerless perfect enlightenment is concerned, I have not attained the slightest thing. This is why it is called peerless perfect enlightenment."

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html, ch 22)

"And when these immeasurable, countless, infinite number of sentient beings have been liberated, in actuality, no sentient being has attained liberation. Why is this so?"

Subhūti, If a bodhisattva abides in the signs of self, person, sentient being, or life-span, she or he is not a bodhisattva."

(ch 3)

See the whole of ch 9.

"World-honored One, when the Tathāgata studied under Dīpaṃkara Buddha, there was, in reality, nothing that he attained in the dharma."

(ch 10)

This teaching of "nothing to be attained" is in many sutras, even in the <http://www.buddhanet.net/e-learning/heartv12.htm>.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 13th, 2016 at 6:49 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Malcolm said:

No problem. There are 21 capacities of Dzogchen practitioners divided into best, medium and average. The best achieve buddhahood in this life. The next 19 achieve buddhahood in the bardo. The last, the average of the average, achieve buddhahood in a nirmanakāya buddhafiield without ever returning to samsara.

Anders said:

On that note, I guess we can also say:

Pure Land: 100%

Astus wrote:

Here is a classic on the question on the success rate from the <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.16.1-6.vaji.html>:

59. Then the wandering ascetic Subhadda approached the Blessed One and saluted him courteously. And having exchanged with him pleasant and civil greetings, the wandering ascetic Subhadda seated himself at one side and addressed the Blessed One, saying: "There are, Venerable Gotama, ascetics and brahmans who are heads of great companies of disciples, who have large retinues, who are leaders of schools, well known and renowned, and held in high esteem by the multitude, such teachers as Purana Kassapa, Makkhali Gosala, Ajita Kesakambali, Pakudha Kaccayana, Sañjaya Belatthaputta, Nigantha Nataputta. Have all of these attained realization, as each of them would have it believed, or has none of them, or is it that some have attained realization and others not?"

60. "Enough, Subhadda! Let it be as it may, whether all of them have attained realization, as each of them would have it believed, or whether none of them has, or whether some have attained realization and others not. I will teach you the Dhamma, Subhadda; listen and heed it well, and I will speak."

"So be it, Lord."

61. And the Blessed One spoke, saying: "In whatsoever Dhamma and Discipline, Subhadda, there is not found the Noble Eightfold Path, neither is there found a true ascetic of the first, second, third, or fourth degree of saintliness. But in whatsoever Dhamma and Discipline there is found the Noble Eightfold Path, there is found a true ascetic of the first, second, third, and fourth degrees of saintliness. Now in this Dhamma and Discipline, Subhadda, is found the Noble Eightfold Path; and in it alone are also found true ascetics of the first, second, third, and fourth degrees of saintliness. Devoid of true ascetics are the systems of other teachers. But if, Subhadda, the bhikkhus live righteously, the world will not be destitute of arahats.

And in the <http://www.accesstosight.org/tipitaka/an/an10/an10.095.than.html>:

Master Gotama, when having directly known it, you teach the Dhamma to your disciples for the purification of beings, for the overcoming of sorrow & lamentation, for the disappearance of pain & distress, for the attainment of the right method, & for the realization of Unbinding, will all the cosmos be led [to release], or a half of it, or a third?

...

Uttiya, suppose that there were a royal frontier fortress with strong ramparts, strong walls & arches, and a single gate. In it would be a wise, competent, & knowledgeable gatekeeper to keep out those he didn't know and to let in those he did. Patrolling the path around the city, he wouldn't see a crack or an opening in the walls big enough for even a cat to slip through. Although he wouldn't know that 'So-and-so many creatures enter or leave the city,' he would know this: 'Whatever large creatures enter or leave the city all enter or leave it through this gate.'

In the same way, the Tathagata isn't concerned with whether all the cosmos or half of it or a third of it will be led to release by means of that [Dhamma]. But he does know this: 'All those who have been led, are being led, or will be led [to release] from the cosmos have done so, are doing so, or will do so after having abandoned the five hindrances — those defilements of awareness that weaken discernment — having well-established their minds in the four frames of reference, and having developed, as they have come to be, the seven factors for Awakening.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 13th, 2016 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Malcolm said:

If you believe that, then practice Pure Land. If you don't, practice something else.

Astus wrote:

I don't see much difference between the Dzogchen and the Pure Land version. And that difference is the very small percentage of superior practitioners who achieve buddhahood in this life, while the rest are beyond normal human perception, just like the Pure Land itself. Apparently both have a faith based 100% success rate.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 13th, 2016 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, of course you don't see any difference between Dzogchen and Pure Land because you do not know Dzogchen and thus do not understand its path. That can be remedied.

Astus wrote:

I didn't say their paths are the same, but their promises of success are very close.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 14th, 2016 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, but your error is claiming that both are faith-based. One is, the other is not.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean that with Dzogchen you necessarily gain the divine eye and can perceive other practitioners attaining buddhahood in the intermediate state and in buddha-lands?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 14th, 2016 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Malcolm said:

In any case, the only way one can confirm whether what I am saying is true or not (it is true, according the texts), is to actually discover what Dzogchen is. That discovery will never happen on an internet forum.

Astus wrote:

Same could be said about the Pure Land path. Looks like there are more similarities than one would expect.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 14th, 2016 at 4:33 PM

Title: Re: Does all Zen teach the One-Mind?

Content:

davidbrainerd said:

So then "One Mind" doesn't mean that we all share one mind? I didn't think so. I was thinking it meant like that we all share the same type of mind, or same essential nature, i.e. that it meant simply we all have/are Buddha Nature. But I encountered a guy in some amazon review of a book who seemed to be arguing that "One Mind" means something like we all share the same mind or self, and it sounded to me like he was arguing for the type of concept in the Upanishads with the concept of everyone being Brahman, except replacing Brahman with Buddha. And that's why I was wandering how wide-spread the concept is.

Astus wrote:

That kind of self/soul/substance based interpretation is clearly off the mark. One mind is the dharmadhatu, the single realm of experience. Being deluded about the one mind means positing subject and object, imagining that there are isolated, substantial elements independent of each other; in other words, grasping at phenomena. Awakening to the one mind is to realise that the concepts of stand alone entities, of self, are merely ideations. That's why misunderstanding the one mind as some universal and eternal entity is a wrong view.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 14th, 2016 at 5:19 PM

Title: Re: Does all Zen teach the One-Mind?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"The three worlds of samsara arise and return [as] the one mind. Buddhas of past and future transmit the mind by mind not relying on words and letters."

(http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/zh-cn/X63n1218_001#0002a24)

"All of you should believe that your mind is Buddha, that this mind is identical with Buddha. The Great Master Bodhidharma came from India to China, and transmitted the One Mind teaching of Mahayana so that it can lead you all to awakening. Fearing that you will be too confused and will not believe that this One Mind is inherent in all of you, he used the Lankavatara Sutra to seal the sentient beings' mind-ground. Therefore, in the Lankavatara Sutra, mind is the essence of all the Buddha's teachings, no gate is the Dharma-gate."

(Mazu Daoyi, in Sun-Face Buddha, p 62)

The teaching of one mind has become a central doctrine in East Asian Buddhism because of the treatise http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/Translations/Awakening_of_faith.html.

Following that work Wonhyo explained it extensively, so did Guifeng Zongmi and Yongming Yanshou in their treatises, who were studied and regularly quoted by Bojo Jinul.

"This one mind is not born with the physical body, nor does it die with the demise of the body. Though it can't be seen, it operates through the whole body, seeing with the eyes, hearing with the ears, smelling with the nose, speaking with the mouth and propelling the hands and legs. There isn't any place where it doesn't function. Seeking the Buddha and Dharma outside of this mind is called the delusion of ordinary people. A buddha is one who understands that this very body is Buddha. That's why nobody will attain Buddhahood who doesn't realize her own mind."

(Bassui: To the Abbess of Jinryoji Temple, in Mud and Water, p 190)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 14th, 2016 at 5:56 PM

Title: Re: Zen Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The practical response:

Zazen is the practise of awakening to the reality that all experiences of the six sensory areas are without anything that can be grasped. It is not about scriptures, teachings, methods, or traditions; and at the same time it includes all of that and accomplishes the Buddha's enlightenment.

The historical response:

It is only natural that a Theravadin sees Mahayana as unorthodox and inauthentic. It comes from not comprehending its meaning nor its historical evolution.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 15th, 2016 at 4:25 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment success rate

Content:

Tao said:

Maybe it is not of interest, but I found this in the Wanderling website, can anyone confirm the data?

Astus wrote:

Yes. there are several collections of Zen ancestors from the Song and Ming eras. Similarly, there are compilations of stories of birth in the Pure Land.

In English translation:

https://books.google.hu/books?id=QPn_8kKS3SAC

<https://books.google.hu/books?id=TrYKAAAAYAAJ>

And there are quite a few separate works dedicated to individual teachers.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 15th, 2016 at 6:46 PM

Title: Re: Does all Zen teach the One-Mind?

Content:

White Lotus said:

a buddhist approach may be... throw away the key in order to unlock the door of enlightenment. if we rely on words, concepts and names we cannot experience emptiness (or as a christian may put it: God). if we call emptiness Mind then we have already reified something, the same applies to the word Self. even use of the word emptiness is not a direct experience of emptiness and can be misleading.

Astus wrote:

Emptiness means simply that all the experiences of the six areas - whatever is seen, heard, smelt, tasted, touched, thought - are without an abiding, independent nature, that phenomena are not something that one can identify with, call a self. It is not some sort of transcendent experience or realm, and such an interpretation is a mistake. Therefore ideas about God are just ideas, and there is no place for it in Buddhism. Enlightenment is awakening to the lack of any substance in appearances and of any substratum beyond them. When there is no essence imagined, then there is no basis for grasping at or abiding in anything, and without grasping or abiding there is no dissatisfaction and delusion. To conceive emptiness, the absence of substance, as a distinct reality, is just another form of self-identity.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 16th, 2016 at 6:59 PM

Title: Re: Japanese monk's vestments

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Between 148 and 170 CE, the Parthian monk An Shigao came to China and translated a work which described the color of monastic robes (Skt. kāṣāya) utilized in five major Indian Buddhist sects, called Da Biqu Sanqian Weiyi (Chinese: 大比丘三千威儀).[6] Another text translated at a later date, the Śāriputrapariṣcchā, contains a very similar passage with nearly the same information. However, the colors for Dharmaguptaka and Sarvāstivāda are reversed. In the earlier source, the Sarvāstivāda are described as wearing deep red robes, while the Dharmaguptaka are described as wearing black robes. The corresponding passage found in the later Śāriputrapariṣcchā, in contrast, portrays the Sarvāstivāda as wearing black robes and the Dharmaguptaka as wearing deep red robes.

During the Tang dynasty, Chinese Buddhist monastics typically wore grayish-black robes and were even colloquially referred to as Ziyi (Chinese: 緇衣), "those of the black robes." However, the Song dynasty monk Zanning (919–1001 CE) writes that during the earlier Han-Wei period, the Chinese monks typically wore red robes.

According to the Dharmaguptaka vinaya, the robes of monastics should be sewn out of no more than 18 pieces of cloth, and the cloth should be fairly heavy and coarse."

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dharmaguptaka#Robes>

"Perhaps the most visible sign of this monastic distinction was the monk's clothing. Indeed, a common term for monks in medieval texts is the "black-robed ones" (ziyi). And when referring to monks and laymen, Buddhist texts commonly use the expression, "the black and the white" (zibai). Following this line of inquiry it would be possible to write a detailed study of the relationship between Indian styles of monastic clothing and indigenous Chinese fashion. But more than in the cases of sex or food, clothing provides us a glimpse into the ways in which monks distinguished among themselves, quickly dispelling the picture of a uniform clergy that is painted in secular sources. This is the aspect of the monastic uniform that I focus on below.

As the term "black-robed ones" indicates, Chinese monks often wore black robes, but other colors were also worn. In his Brief History of the Clergy, Zanning includes a section on monastic garb in which he relates that during the Han-Wei period, most monks in China wore red robes. An expert in the Vinaya, Zanning further notes that the color of a monk's robes depended in India on the school to which he belonged. Pitch black (zao) for members of the Sarvastivadins, deep red (jiang) for the Dharmaguptakas, blue (qing) for the Mahasamghikas, and so forth. After citing examples from the Biographies of Chinese monks who wore robes of various colors, Zanning goes on to describe the variety found in his day, that is, the late tenth century. At that time, a given color of robe was associated with a particular region: deep-black (hei) or red in the Jiangnan region, brown (he) in the area around the capital at Kaifeng, and so forth. Though some difference between the Chinese monk's robe and its Indian counterpart was tolerated, there were limits to the degree of innovation allowed. Zanning is critical of the practice of wearing deep-black robes, and even more so of monks who had in his day taken to wearing white robes. The wearing of either color, he insists, is forbidden in the Vinaya."

(John Kieschnick: The Eminent Monk, p 29)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 17th, 2016 at 1:35 AM

Title: Re: Zen Buddhism?

Content:

Justmeagain said:

I can see his point, can't you?

Astus wrote:

And what is that point?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 17th, 2016 at 6:50 PM

Title: Re: Zen Buddhism?

Content:

Matylda said:

almost to the XX century there were no mutual contacts between theravada, zen, tibetan vajrayana etc. Therefore after long ages of very autonomous development of each tradition, often in one country, the new meeting was sort of surprise for each party involved.

Astus wrote:

That's not exactly true. Chinese and Tibetans lived in the same empire for a very long time, just like they do now, and during the Yuan dynasty (1271-1368) Tibetan Buddhism was actually the state religion. In South-East Asia, similarly to India, Mahayana and Vajrayana were dominant forms of Buddhism until the 13th century. It should also not be forgotten that the whole area was a neighbour of the Chinese Empire, and Vietnam has both a Mahayana and a Theravada tradition in the same country.

Matylda said:

Anyway it is best to keep to one's own tradition without attempt to make judgments of what is and what is not 'true' Buddhism. It will only involve mundane thinking and operating of worldly dharmas in minds of practitioners. Finally it may end up in sectarianism. This is in my opinion truly non-dharmic activity.

Astus wrote:

Mahayana defines itself by rendering a set of teachings into a lower position. The Abhidhamma Pitaka of the Pali Canon has the book Kathavatthu discussing numerous controversial points to define what is orthodox and what is not. Critical assessments and debates cannot and should not be avoided. The problem occurs when it turns into a personal and emotional matter, and that makes it a fine test for one's Dharma practice.

Matylda said:

common language which they use to communicate is mostly.. English.. so basically non-dharmic language

Astus wrote:

The only language that might be called Dharmic is the Pali, as it is used only in Buddhist literature, while all the other languages exist as natural ways of communication.

Matylda said:

there are many mutual misinterpretations between traditions based simply on non-dharmic, dualistic language, lacking any proper dharma terms

Astus wrote:

All languages are dualistic. Terminology is simply a matter of an agreed upon glossary.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 17th, 2016 at 8:57 PM

Title: Re: No Difference in Results?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Accordingly, although these two vehicles are the same in that they both result in the attainment of buddhahood, they are different in the understanding or lack of understanding present in the methods for attaining it."

(Jigme Lingpa: Treasury of Precious Qualities, vol 2, p 88)

"Concerning [the seventh distinction of the mantras], through their levels: In the dialectics [the levels] are held to number eleven by differentiating the successive renunciations and antidotes. The mantras, however are superior because [they progress] to the twelfth level of the Unattached Lotus Endowed (ma-chags padma-can), the thirteenth level of the Holder of Indestructible Reality (rdo-rje 'dzin-pa) and so on."
(Dudjom Rinpoche: The Nyingma School of Tibetan Buddhism, p 254)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 18th, 2016 at 1:24 AM

Title: Re: Zen Buddhism?

Content:

Justmeagain said:

To clarify (again) I think he was suggesting that all that was needed was already within the Pali Canon and to move that far away from it, the point of petitioning deities etc was tantamount to justifying the question "was still 'Buddhism'!"?

Astus wrote:

Here's a traditional response:

The Pali Canon explains how to become an arhat, but does not tell you how to become a buddha. Therefore it does not contain everything one needs if one wants to attain anuttara-samyak-sambodhi.

From another perspective:

Mahayana is how Buddhism developed in Northern India and in other countries. It provides an extensive record of answering personal and cultural needs of people over two thousand years and various cultures, implementing and transmitting the Buddha's message again and again. Compared to that, relying only on the Pali canon means limited resources of only a few hundred years. So, even if one says that only the suttas can be the authentic teachings for historical reasons, the Mahayana is on the same level in reliability as the Abhidhamma and the commentaries of Theravada.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 19th, 2016 at 5:39 PM

Title: Re: karma in india before buddhism vs in buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Johannes Bronkhorst: <https://books.google.com/books?id=fjU6AwAAQBAJ>,

<https://books.google.com/books?id=4GNG5KuH73QC>

Richard Francis Gombrich: <https://books.google.com/books?id=YMILAQAAMAAJ>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 20th, 2016 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: karma in india before buddhism vs in buddhism

Content:

dreambow said:

All the scriptures in the world, before Buddhism, after Buddhism will not penetrate the great mystery. Karma is deeply multi layered, intent verses action, subtle, inscrutable, imponderable. All the concepts we ramble on about will not penetrate the workings of karma. Its like a knot within a tangle within a knot and we must simply say we know not.

Astus wrote:

That's unnecessary mystification, not scholarship or study.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 26th, 2016 at 5:51 PM

Title: Re: Thoughts and impulses

Content:

makewhisper said:

Hi there, I have three questions concerning the practice of shikantaza.

Astus wrote:

Shikantaza has a couple of versions. There are those who teach it as a body-centred practice, where the posture is the most important. There are those who teach it as a concentration practice where one focuses on the breath and the abdomen. There are those who teach it as practice-enlightenment where there is neither grasping nor releasing of appearances. And there are likely a dozen other forms as well.

So, when you say "the practice of shikantaza", what do you mean?

makewhisper said:

1) When thoughts enter the mind, is the best practice to become aware/mindful of "thinking" at the next possible moment?

Astus wrote:

If you focus on the body/breath, keep your attention there. If your practice is enlightenment, you have nothing to do with thoughts, they leave on their own anyway.

There is actually a simple logic at work here. If you concentrate on breath/body, you don't meddle with thoughts and other sensory inputs, but let them come and go. If you are stable in your recognition that there is nothing to grasp, you have left behind the intention to fixate on anything, in other words, dropped body and mind.

makewhisper said:

2) What should I make of impulses to, for example, move my hands or shift my body during zazen? What's the best method for overcoming the dichotomy between resisting an impulse and indulging in an impulse? Is it a problem if I move my hands? Or is it merely a problem if I do so without awareness?

Astus wrote:

Those are things you should experiment with. Then you will see the changes in your body and mind as they happen. As long as you uphold an idea of what and how shikantaza should happen, everything else is a disturbance. That is, to consider any specific state of body and mind as the proper method is grasping at body and mind.

makewhisper said:

3) Does "just sitting" encompass other actions such as moving one's hands with awareness?

Astus wrote:

If you just sit you just sit. What does that have to do with awareness? Of course, if you think it is a sort of mindfulness you cultivate, then moving one's hands are OK in mindfulness, and not moving one's hands without mindfulness is not OK. But is that just sitting?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 27th, 2016 at 5:01 PM

Title: Re: Thoughts and impulses

Content:

Matylda said:

Originally there was only one 'version' - dropping of body and mind... all other are made up things... specially in the XIX and XX century..

Astus wrote:

Dogen seems to have accepted following the breath as a method (http://shoresofzen.com/index_htm_files/KeizanAndDogenonBreathMeditation.pdf), while Keizan gave various instructions for different obstacles in the Zazen Yojinki. Although it is debatable whether they can be called shikantaza.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 27th, 2016 at 6:51 PM

Title: Re: Thoughts and impulses

Content:

makewhisper said:

What I find is that thoughts come without my control, they run their course without my control, so I avoid trying to control them. When thoughts come, they crowd out awareness of thoughts.

Astus wrote:

If thoughts move without your control, how could you ever do anything about them? If you think there is awareness separate from thoughts, isn't that just another thought? Sometimes there are thoughts, sometimes there are no thoughts. To favour one or the other is falling into the extremes of existence and annihilation. That's why the practice is neither-thinking / no-thought - if a thought comes, OK; if no thought comes, OK.

makewhisper said:

However, I find that when I become aware that they're there, the thoughts usually stop. I think before I was engaging in thought-stopping where I'd see a thought and then actively seek to diminish it.

Astus wrote:

Do you know the Tenpuku version of the Fukanzazengi? It says instead of the "think of not thinking" part: "When thought arises, be aware of it. When you are aware of it, it will disappear. Put aside everything outside continuously, and make yourself into one piece." That is from the instructions of Changlu Zongze, but this phrasing and calling it the essential art of zazen goes back even further to Guifeng Zongmi. It is the simple observation of you have discovered for yourself as well, that once one becomes conscious of one's thoughts, one does not continue to think about it. It is similar to the fourth method given in the <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.020.than.html>, if one interprets it as the method to calm thoughts.

makewhisper said:

But I've found that reminding myself that I'm not in control is useful.

Astus wrote:

That is somewhat like meditating on the theme of no-self. But again, that's not exactly practice-awakening.

makewhisper said:

And when I'm aware of the thoughts, there is awareness. But I believe I'm attached to that awareness. When I'm aware of awareness, there's usually a shift in my visual perception that lasts for a few seconds before my eyes move on their own and bring distraction. Perhaps it's a mistake to strive after awareness, to cling to awareness, if dropped-off body and mind is the realization of shikantaza as practice-enlightenment.

Astus wrote:

There are the ideas to do something and not to do something. It is of course quite normal, but then one should be clear about how to do that properly, and that means learning the Dharma. If you want to go with the ideal form of zazen, there is nothing to do at all, no state to accomplish, and no experience to get rid of. As you sit you have to immediately recognise that all the six types of appearances are such, there is nothing to improve or decrease, and there is no one to do or know anything either.

makewhisper said:

As for the movement of hands and such, I've gotten better at remaining still. I guess if just sitting is just sitting then moving one's hands is ill-advised.

Astus wrote:

Just sitting does not mean sitting still. It means not conceptualising sitting. You cannot sit still anyway, unless you're a corpse.

makewhisper said:

I guess in the instant that you move your hands there's an awareness of movement that is just another empty phenomenon appearing and then passing away, something the deluded mind grasps after.

Astus wrote:

That is lot of worrying.

makewhisper said:

While just sitting, the practice-enlightenment of dropped-off mind, is sudden---the result of nothing---and ungraspable?

Astus wrote:

Such Zen terminology can be misleading. Try to translate it to ordinary English.

makewhisper said:

But how does this inform practice?

Astus wrote:

The practice is the experience confirming that all things (sights, sounds, smells, tastes, bodily feelings, thoughts) are such, that is, they appear and disappear on their own. There is no one controlling or perceiving them, as they are all dependently originated ephemeral, illusory instances of experience. That is why there is nothing at all that can be grasped, as attachment itself is a conceptual fabrication of a subject grasping an object, while if you actually look at the experience itself there are no subjects nor objects.

makewhisper said:

Is it just a matter of sitting down and taking the posture with faith in the Buddha mind, and in doing so, hopefully relinquishing the delusion that we can control both the realization of the Buddha mind (through practice) and the conditions of samsaric existence?

Astus wrote:

That is practising with the aim of awakening, not practice-enlightenment. Plus it is the wrong attitude to practice itself, where one merely hopes for some realisation without actually realising anything.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 29th, 2016 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: Kensho and "stages of enlightenment"

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

I'm wondering if the Zen understanding of enlightenment

Astus wrote:

There are quite a few versions out there. Which one do you mean, whose interpretation?

Lazy_eye said:

can be mapped loosely onto the "four stages of enlightenment"

Astus wrote:

If we are OK to disregard the whole distinction between sravakayana and bodhisattvayana.

Lazy_eye said:

I know Zen has an initial enlightenment (kensho) and then ultimately full enlightenment (satori).

Astus wrote:

That is an idea coming from Japanese Rinzai. Soto Zen does not subscribe to it. As for Korean and Chinese teachings, it's possible to find similarities with such a gradualist view.

Lazy_eye said:

Do these two paradigms match up, sort of?

Astus wrote:

Kensho - stream entry. Satori - arhat.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 29th, 2016 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: Thoughts and impulses

Content:

makewhisper said:

One thing I don't understand is the role of "conscious endeavor" in all of this. Should I strive to be aware of my thoughts and sensations and perceptions? That is, should I focus my awareness on my these dharmas when the thought to do so occurs?

Astus wrote:

On the gradual path endeavour is important, it is the fourth paramita. On the sudden path there is no effort involved. Thoughts, and all experiences, are events that one is necessarily aware of. Then why add awareness on top of awareness? Whatever appears is a conscious appearance, otherwise it does not exist as an appearance.

makewhisper said:

I recently read Dogen's "Zazengi: Rules for Zazen" in The Art of Just Sitting, and he says:

"Zazen . . . is not conscious endeavor."

Astus wrote:

One important thing to learn when dealing with Buddhism is that one is reading a translation. So, while Kazuaki's version (Treasury of the True Dharma Eye) of Zazengi says:

"Zazen is not thinking of good, not thinking of bad. It is not conscious endeavor. It is not introspection. Do not desire to become a buddha. Let sitting or lying down drop away."

Look at the others:

<http://antaiji.org/en/classics/zazengi/>:

"Do not think of good, do not think of evil. Zazen has nothing to do with the function of intellect, volition, or consciousness, nor with memory, imagination, or contemplation. Do not seek to become a buddha. Be free from the discrimination of sitting and lying down."

<https://web.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/shobogenzo/translations/zazengi/zazengi.translation.html>:

"Good is not thought of; evil is not thought of. It is not mind, intellect or consciousness; it is not thoughts, ideas or perceptions. Do not figure to make a buddha; slough off sitting or reclining."

<http://www.shastaabbey.org/pdf/shobo/056zazng.pdf>:

"Do not think about what is good or what is bad. Do not exercise your discriminatory mind or weigh and judge your mind's remembrances, concepts, and reflections! Do not aim at becoming a Buddha, and drop off any concern with whether you are sitting or lying down."

<http://www.zen.org/dharma-text/zazengi-how-sit>:

"Don't think of good. Don't think of bad. It is not a matter of mind, intention, or consciousness; it is not a matter of thoughts, ideas, or perceptions. Zazen is not self-consciousness or self-contemplation. Don't sit to become a Buddha. Release ideas of sitting and lying down."

So, what becomes clear here, and what reflects on the way Kazuaki's translations are done, is that where it says "It is not conscious endeavor. It is not introspection." is a simplification and reinterpretation of "It is not mind, intellect or consciousness; it is not thoughts, ideas or perceptions." that is actually in the original: 心意識にあらず、念想観にあらず。

makewhisper said:

I'm having trouble reconciling the idea of bringing awareness to thoughts---"When thought arises, be aware of it" (do this when that happens)---with the idea of foregoing "conscious endeavor." I've probably misunderstood what Dogen meant by "conscious endeavor." Maybe he's making the claim that zazen is not conscious endeavor---there is no striving---because it's "confirming that all things . . . are such" as you put it.

Astus wrote:

This is a matter of what and how you practice. Don't forget the first part of https://web.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/gongyo_seiten/translations/part_3/fukan_zazengi.html, where he points to the original perfection and the necessity of practice being equally important. Although it is popular to interpret it in the extreme way of "must sit", the point is rather that it is not enough to understand original enlightenment, one has to embody it, and zazen is embodying buddhahood. It should also be added here that zazen is simply the easy and simple method to realise buddhahood, but enlightenment is not limited to sitting.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 1st, 2016 at 12:13 AM

Title: Re: Kensho and "stages of enlightenment"

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

I've heard some people say that the bodhiattvayana encompasses the sravakayana (including progression through the stages of enlightenment as taught in the nikayas), but because of the different aspiration does not become an arahant. Is this a misunderstanding? Or perhaps reflective of some schools and not others?

Astus wrote:

It encompasses it in the sense that a bodhisattva becomes free of emotional afflictions by the 8th bhumi, at attains the level equal to an arhat. But that's a comparison relevant only from a certain perspective.

Lazy_eye said:

Soto would be the sudden enlightenment view, correct? And Rinzai the gradualist?

Astus wrote:

Every Zen school claims to teach sudden enlightenment, as they all nominally descend from Huineng. Calling Hakuin's version of Rinzai gradualist is somewhat of a criticism.

Lazy_eye said:

If so, that would explain why Thich Nhat Hanh, for instance, is able to accommodate the Pali Canon to the degree that he does.

Astus wrote:

TNH is not a Japanese Rinzai teacher, so there is no connection either.

Lazy_eye said:

That was my impression -- sort of what I was trying to get at in the OP.

Astus wrote:

If we allow a little flexibility, it can be clear that all forms of Buddhism aims for freedom from grasping at appearances. That's what one learns in Theravada, in Mahayana, in Zen, and even in Vajrayana. There are differences in certain methods and doctrines of course.

Lazy_eye said:

I'm not aware of this being the case regarding the bhumis, at least in East Asian traditions such as Zen or Pure Land -- but again this may simply reflect my ignorance. Do practitioners here think about the bhumis and see them as concrete goals in practice?

Astus wrote:

The whole bhumis system is irrelevant and unused, and has been like that for a long time. Zen is not a gradual path, so setting up grades is contrary to it. Pure Land aims for reaching enlightenment only in the next life, so there is no point thinking about matters that are only confusing for ordinary deluded beings.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 1st, 2016 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: How to drop effort

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

How do you drop effort, without producing more effort?

Astus wrote:

Effort is wanting to reach a goal. Effortlessness - that is ultimately one of the doors of liberation: apranihita - is attained by recognising that there is nothing to attain. That recognition is the realisation of emptiness, so, in order to be free from effort one has to gain insight. It can be done with practises like contemplating how the past thought is no more, the future thought is not yet, and the present thought does not abide. Therefore it is actually impossible to grasp a thought or aspire for anything, and that is seeing the natural perfection.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 1st, 2016 at 4:26 PM

Title: Re: Kensho and "stages of enlightenment"

Content:

Wayfarer said:

So, people either totally get it, or they totally don't. No shades of grey?

Astus wrote:

On the gradual path of the bodhisattva, before the first bhumi there is only a conceptual view of emptiness, but it can and should be a correct view. From the first stage on it is a working, experiential insight into emptiness, i.e. prajnaparamita, but with varying degrees of application. Buddhahood is the completion not only of wisdom but also the qualities necessary for the all around use of skillful means. That is one generic description of the steps, however, one can find various interpretations. Using the stages model is one way to describe the path and set up the common sequence of things to learn. The drawback is to interpret it as a fixed order of things. Eventually, as we can see, it turned into a merely theoretical doctrine with no real use, I guess because it was a fitting teaching in India at one point, but not for later generations.

As for Zen, it is possible to find some descriptions of stages of insight, especially in the sudden enlightenment gradual cultivation model, but even there it is not about a clear set of stages to go through. We could also say that people go through the three stages of approaching, recognising, and cultivating, but all three are about the same thing. It might also be noted here that the bodhisattva path is like that as well, but because that had become a venerated teaching, people moved away from it to remain in touch with the practical application and to avoid complications.

As for totally getting it or not, it is a fairly simple matter.

"To practice in every moment of thought is called the true nature. To be enlightened to this Dharma is the Dharma of prajñā, to cultivate this practice is the practice of prajñā. To not cultivate this is to be an ordinary [unenlightened] person. To cultivate this in a single moment of thought is to be equivalent to the Buddha in one's own body. Good friends, ordinary people are buddhas, and the afflictions are bodhi. With a preceding moment of deluded thought, one was an ordinary person, but with a succeeding moment of enlightened thought, one is a buddha. To be attached to one's sensory realms in a preceding moment of thought is affliction, but to transcend the realms in a succeeding moment of thought is bodhi."
(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK Edition, p 30)

In other words, to be attached to the five aggregates is painful and unsatisfying. To not be attached is calm and peaceful. That is what has been stated from the very beginning in the four noble truths. As for the path, the emphatic point in Zen is to go directly to recognising suchness, and it's not about studying and cultivating other things to prepare one for such an insight. That's how stages are irrelevant, and that's what makes it a sudden method.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 5th, 2016 at 4:40 PM

Title: Re: Thoughts and impulses

Content:

makewhisper said:

"When you hear a sound, instead of remaining outside of it, and thereby fighting it, just become that sound yourself. Really being that sound yourself, that sound won't disturb you anymore. The "me" that perceives the sound becomes one with the sound, leaving only the sound itself. This is emptying yourself

Astus wrote:

What does it mean to be one with the sound? That there is no observing it, no judging it, no letting go of it, no perpetuating it, there is just the sound without any relation created with it. This is achieved through concentration, through wilful focus on a single object, until only that one thing is left and everything else is forgotten.

makewhisper said:

But there still remains the dharma, the object. So next, empty that too! Again, by really being thus, you become unaware of even being thus.

Astus wrote:

This is the shift from maintaining the object of concentration to simply maintaining the concentration, the state of mind. It could be said that here one moves from rupa-dhyana to arupa-dhyana.

makewhisper said:

This is a state of samadhi: both person and dharma are empty; subject and object are empty. This is called the great death. In describing the great death, Dogen Zenjui says, 'body and mind drop away.' When body and mind spontaneously drop away, you transcend the bondage of limited consciousness.

Astus wrote:

I think those are too big words. What was described was a temporary experience of calmness.

makewhisper said:

This passage stuck out to me because I often have a song stuck in my head when I'm practicing, and it persists even when I become aware of it in a way that random thoughts do not. The song just repeats itself interminably, and I've been ill-advisedly trying to fight that.

Astus wrote:

Do you want to get rid of breathing? Your hands? Your belly? Your back? There are so many things we could say they persist.

makewhisper said:

Hakuyu's writing suggests to me that I could "empty myself" by simply becoming the song or the thought or whatever dharma I'm objectifying in the moment.

Astus wrote:

Why not give it a try and see what happens?

makewhisper said:

I think I worried that such an approach would not be shikantaza, practice-realization, because it seems akin to taking an object of meditation.

Astus wrote:

There is nothing wrong with practising concentration. It is a sound method that helps one to relax and put aside ideation, although at the same time one can go wrong with becoming too tense from trying to maintain a specific state. As for just sitting, it is a very simple thing, and all it needs is the understanding that no matter what thought or other phenomenon occur, they necessarily and inevitably pass away, hence there is no need to do anything about it.

makewhisper said:

But what I get from Hakuyu's work is that mind and body dropping off is "spontaneous" or "automatic" and intrinsically not the result of effort.

Astus wrote:

When one is focused on one thing, everything else is left on its own, so they just come and go. They can come and go because they are left on their own. For instance, when one concentrates on the breath, it is only breathing that matters. Then one should eventually recognise that there is no effort in breathing, it happens anyway. And if one cares to look into what breathing is, it turns out that it is nothing in particular that one can grasp as breath, it is merely a concept.

makewhisper said:

So it makes no sense to make an effort at practice-realization of emptiness/buddha-nature. He seems to suggest that the emptying of the object is a spontaneous experience equivalent to the "great death" whereas the emptying of the subject can be accomplished with some practical application.

Astus wrote:

There is the wrong attitude to just wait for some realisation to happen. It won't. Furthermore, shikantaza is the realisation, because it is seeing clearly, as first hand experience, that there is nothing to grasp, nothing to identify with, nothing to attain, and no one to attain it.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 5th, 2016 at 5:29 PM

Title: Re: Thoughts and impulses

Content:

Matylda said:

I think you go simply too far.. why do not send questioner to qualified zen master? what is the point of giving answer with very limited insight, and altogether it is just petty judgement of contemporary zen master teachings...

Is there no any restriction on the zen forum concerning how far we may go, without taking undeservedly position of zen teacher in this public space after all?

Astus wrote:

This is a forum, intended for discussions. The usual "go visit a teacher" advice has already been posted twice

(<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=347592#p347592>, <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=348076#p348076>), and makewhisper has already written of the plans to <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=348121#p348121>.

If you think what I wrote is incorrect, please go on and correct it.

As for my comments on the quoted instructions, they are not criticisms of Maezumi at all. Or do you think it is inappropriate and unseemly to talk about teachings?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 6th, 2016 at 4:47 AM

Title: Re: Thoughts and impulses

Content:

Matylda said:

it is about possible misinterpretation, not about criticism...

Astus wrote:

Misinterpretation is possible even between close friends. But if you can read a different meaning in the quoted text, I'd be happy to read it.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 8th, 2016 at 7:20 PM

Title: Re: Thoughts and impulses

Content:

Matylda said:

Well it does not have anything to do with concentration.

Astus wrote:

So you think that Maezumi is teaching something that's wrong and should not call it shikantaza?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 8th, 2016 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: Thoughts and impulses

Content:

Matylda said:

No he did not teach in this sense wrong.. I related the passage to your comment, nothing else. You wanted me to write about misinterpretation, so it is what I did.

Astus wrote:

I see. And how does that differ from what is found in Maezumi's instructions? He seems to talk about concentration. What do you think it is actually about?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 9th, 2016 at 12:38 AM

Title: Re: Thoughts and impulses

Content:

Matylda said:

Yes.. please give me exact quote from Roshi's writting which you are referring to.

Astus wrote:

It was posted <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=349399#p349399> by makewhisper that I have commented to.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 9th, 2016 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: Thoughts and impulses

Content:

Matylda said:

Concentration is not zazen.

Astus wrote:

We agree on that.

Matylda said:

Anyway in English translation of Maezumi there is nothing about wilful concentration etc.

Astus wrote:

So how do you interpret this line?

"When you hear a sound, instead of remaining outside of it, and thereby fighting it, just become that sound yourself."

And then the second stage?

"But there still remains the dharma, the object. So next, empty that too! Again, by really being thus, you become unaware of even being thus."

What I read there is an instruction for concentration practice, not shikantaza.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 9th, 2016 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: Thoughts and impulses

Content:

Matylda said:

Definitely not...

Astus wrote:

Why not? What does it mean then?

Matylda said:

Anyway Roshi talks here about the realm of realisation, not about calmness of mind. ... He is using Hakuin's great death and Dogen's dropping body and mind as synonyms of enlightenment to explain the final result of unfolding enlightenment. ... And again he clearly says that it 'transcends' limited consciousness. Right?

Astus wrote:

He talks of two stages. First by "becoming the sound" one loses the self. Then, in some unspecified manner, one has to lose the object as well.

Does shikantaza have two stages? I have not heard of such a thing yet. And if there are no two stages in shikantaza, how could it be what is talked about here?

What is it to "become the sound"? Did Dogen teach such a thing? Or anyone else?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 9th, 2016 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: Thoughts and impulses

Content:

Matylda said:

this is realisation of selflessness, or optiness of person or subject one gives up all conditioning of the grasping self.. then you are the sound itself

Astus wrote:

He advises to be the sound, says nothing about realising that there is no self, rather it is the result of becoming the sound that one abandons the subjective viewer. As the quote says: "The "me" that perceives the sound becomes one with the sound, leaving only the sound itself. This is emptying yourself"

So, there is still nothing said about how one "becomes the sound", if that is not simply concentration.

Matylda said:

This is realisation of emptiness of object.. in deep realisation of selflessness you realise finally nature of all phenomena.

Astus wrote:

If with the realisation of no-self comes the realisation of the emptiness of object, then there is no point in differentiating the two.

Matylda said:

Then one attains complete enlightenment, not only selflessness of person..

Astus wrote:

Since with selflessness comes objectlessness, there can be no such thing as realising only no-self.

Matylda said:

Teachings of Shikan taza as it is popular in the West concerning sitting came in the XX century.. it was work of Sawaki Kodo..

Astus wrote:

There are other Soto teachers in the West besides the followers of Sawaki. Like the students of <http://www.sfzc.org/>, <http://www.shastaabbey.org/index.html>, <http://www.wzcc.org/>, <http://www.nebraskazencenter.org/>.

Matylda said:

unspecified manner - no, it is in samadhi of selflessness it is not unspecified

Astus wrote:

See above. If the samadhi of selflessness means realising the emptiness of objects, then there is no difference at all. Also, it has not been clarified what else is "becoming the sound" if not concentration. Realising selflessness is not a method but a result.

Matylda said:

shikan taza contains this 'double' realisation of selflessness of subject and object

Astus wrote:

Emptiness of self and phenomena is a general Mahayana doctrine, not a technique.

Matylda said:

Two stages are in position of madhyamaka of Nagarjuna

Astus wrote:

Do you mean the two truths or the twofold emptiness? In any case, they are not methods.

Matylda said:

Dogen speaks about this kind of realisation

Astus wrote:

Maezumi says "become that sound yourself". It's not a realisation, it is an instruction to do it. Or do you think one can just do realisation? If yes, how?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 9th, 2016 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: Differences between nichiren and pureland

Content:

Yuren said:

I must admit I don't understand Nichiren. I think I understand Shinran

Astus wrote:

On one hand, it's the same for me. However, if I look at Queequeg's post:

Queequeg said:

NMRK is a sudden practice. The Sudden Teaching is the complete and immediate revelation of the Buddha's Mind. All those things said about the Buddha apply here - beyond words, beyond conception, indescribable, etc. etc. No one understands it when it's revealed, even when they see it directly, except Buddhas. However, once you see it, even if you don't understand what you saw, you can't unsee it. NMRK is aspirational for those who want to see. It's affirmational for those who have caught a glimpse, as well as those fluently coursing in it.

Astus wrote:

it tells me that Nichiren taught a faith based method of recitation, just like Honen and Shinran, except that he claimed to teach something more than that, even though apparently he did not. That is, it is all "beyond words, beyond conception, indescribable", what is in other words: faith. There is neither calming nor insight in Nichiren's teaching, and even though ichinen sanzen seems to have a doctrinal relevance, it hasn't, because it explains nothing why repeating a text's title would make one a buddha in this life. All I have found so far are merely claims that in some mysterious way one's buddha-nature is recovered through repetition.

But, if there is something more to it, I hope that it will be clarified here.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 10th, 2016 at 1:05 AM

Title: Re: Differences between nichiren and pureland

Content:

Yuren said:

Shinran's is sudden as well ... because his birth is already settled now, in the present.)

Astus wrote:

That is "sudden" only in the sense of an assured birth, not in any actual attainment or realisation, unlike in Zen and Tiantai where immediacy means actual enlightenment. As for having shinjin is equal to being a buddha, that is only figurative speech, in the same way that we could say all beings are buddhas because they have buddha-nature. And while talking like that may sound nice, it has no practical relevance besides boosting some people's morale.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 10th, 2016 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: The Skandhas and the 8 Consciousness's

Content:

Astus wrote:

Since those are eight consciousnesses, isn't it quite logical that they belong to the aggregate that is actually called consciousness? Vasubandhu and Sthiramati says it is.

The complete explanation is given by Vasubandhu:

http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Analysis_of_the_Five_Skandhas, in English translation with Sthiramati's commentary published as <https://books.google.com/books?id=xa0VBgAAQBAJ>.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 10th, 2016 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: Differences between nichiren and pureland

Content:

Queequeg said:

First, the object of faith is different. In Pure Land the object of faith is Amida, and particularly his vow to draw everyone who calls on him to be reborn in Sukhavati. In Nichiren, it's the Primordial Shakyamuni Buddha.

Astus wrote:

That's fairly evident.

Queequeg said:

The word "faith" is also a little different. For Nichiren, when he refers to faith 信 shin its from 信解 shinge or adhimukti, rather than derived from 信 shin as related to sraddha or prasada.

Astus wrote:

That means little unless there is a definition of those terms by Nichiren. First of all, regarding the term, it is how <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=124473#p124473>, one should consider the Chinese first and the Sanskrit second, especially when a teacher like Nichiren probably has never encountered the Sanskrit version and could not understand any Sanskrit. As for how dedication (adhimukti) became faith-understanding, my guess is that - just as the term is explained in Chinese - one is dedicated when one aspires towards understanding with faith. So, in <http://www.nichirenlibrary.org/en/ott/PART-1/4> (although it seems to be a disputed text), we can find an explanation in line with the above explanation:

Volume six of On "The Words and Phrases," commenting on this, says, "Looking at the matter from the viewpoint of the Great Vehicle, we may say that the two words 'belief' and 'understanding' refer to the two paths [of insight and practice]. First one rids oneself of doubt, and therefore this is called belief. Then one proceeds to embark on [the path of practice], and this is called understanding. The term 'belief' applies to both paths, but the term 'understanding' applies only to the path of practice. Therefore the path of practice is termed 'understanding.'"

Queequeg said:

My understanding is that its that point when the dharma first appears in the mind, but before there is any judgment about it - just appearance.

Astus wrote:

It seems to me you refer to some sort of unreflected experience. However, the problem there is is that while theoretically all appearances could be like that in their first instance, following that one integrates it into one's conceptual framework in order to be able to interact with it. In other words, such mindlessness is impractical and pointless. Furthermore, one always needs wisdom to see through appearances and comprehend both conceptually and experientially their emptiness.

Queequeg said:

In the sense that subject and object arise together, there is the implication that the subject IS the object, and so when we "approve" of an object, we are that object.

Astus wrote:

The subject cannot be the object, otherwise there is no distinction, consequently they do not arise at all.

Queequeg said:

The 16th Chapter goes on to the famous exposition of Shakyamuni's life span - dust motes of dust motes of aeons of aeons. In grokking the Buddha's life span, we are thereby instantly integrated with the Buddha's life span, ie. The Buddha. And that, as far as I can tell, is the Sudden Teaching of the Lotus Sutra. That is what is referenced in the formula Namu (I devote/venerate/worship/affirm/aspire to/accept/etc.) the Sublime Dharma of the Lotus Blossom Scripture.

Astus wrote:

What is a sudden teaching in saying that Shakyamuni has an eternal lifespan? How does that bring one to realise the suchness of one's own life?

Queequeg said:

The benefit of Adhimukti the Buddha's life span is then explained in the next chapter where the Buddha explains that if a person can adhimukti the Buddha's life span for a single instant, their benefit is greater than that of all the pre-Lotus bodhisattvas.

Astus wrote:

That's like saying that if one believes the Buddha, there will be great benefits. It's not the same as attaining enlightenment.

So, maybe I'm missing something in your explanation here, but I still don't see any difference in faith besides the object of faith.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 10th, 2016 at 11:45 PM

Title: Re: Thoughts and impulses

Content:

Matylda said:

1. only if realisation contains both at once.. however as I said before it does not come all at once

1.2 in Japan there is clear distinction between selflessness of person and selflessness of object. Realising only no-self of the self itself is not complete yet. To realise both emptiness/selflessness of both one may call complete

2. What is difference in soto? Practice and enlightenment are one, not two.. it is specific for this teaching and also meaning of shikan taza..

2.1 So we may safely say that there is no method in zen...

2.2 Here instruction or method and realisation are not two... to understand it one has to follow realised master...

Astus wrote:

That is, you say:

Realisation doesn't contain both, and there are two stages. At the same time, practice is enlightenment and there is no method. To understand what all it is, one needs to follow a realised master.

Those are three contradictory statements. If there is no method, one cannot move even from unrealised to realised, much less from a lower realisation to a higher one.

Following a realised master is meaningless, because there is nothing at all such a person can say or do, because there is no path at all, no method, nothing to teach or transmit. Even some magical version of handing over enlightenment is impossible, because that would still need a method to do it.

Matylda said:

Generally I just refuted claim that it is about concentration of which Roshi did not talk about

Astus wrote:

So, instead of taking the statement "becoming the sound" as a concentration method, what you propose is an impossibility.

- We both agree that shikantaza does not involve concentration.
- We both agree that shikantaza is practice-enlightenment.
- What we do not agree on is that the quote from Maezumi is an instruction for shikantaza.

As I see it, it cannot be, and one of the reasons is that in shikantaza there are no two stages of realising separately the emptiness of self and the emptiness of phenomena, one has full realisation right from the beginning. It is also not the case that there is no method, since zazen can be described clearly and precisely, just as it's done on <http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/practice/zazen/howto/index.html>, and even on the <http://zen.rinnou.net/zazen/sitting.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 10th, 2016 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Differences between nichiren and pureland

Content:

Yuren said:

That is shinjin as I understand it, it's not "enlightenment" ("getting the money") but it's also not "having buddha-nature" ("having a ticket") instead, it is simultaneously both and neither: it is having the winning ticket but not yet the money, which already has effects on you even though technically, you're still poor. This is figurative.

Astus wrote:

Good point. But I'd add that the buddha-nature teaching is not a mere potentiality, but when one has faith in it, it means that one has the conviction that one can actually attain unsurpassed enlightenment, and such a faith is taught to be a prerequisite in Zen for instance.

Yuren said:

We say that unsurpassed awakening [bodhi] has faith as its cause.

The causes of awakening are innumerable, but if stated as faith, this covers everything
Mahāyāna Mahāparinirvāṇa Sūtra

Astus wrote:

I'd guess that the Nirvana Sutra doesn't mean faith in Amitabha, but rather faith in the sutra and/or buddha-nature.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 11th, 2016 at 1:40 AM

Title: Re: Thoughts and impulses

Content:

Matylda said:

What you may find on general websites of rinzai and soto are very basic instructions how to sit in zazen, how to regulate body breathing and mind.... those are not instructions you may receive from the master.. it is just very outer knowledge of zen for not informed or rather public outer presentation for interested.

Astus wrote:

In that case, even though there is no method in Zen, it sounds quite complicated and layered.

Matylda said:

However when we look at Maezumi's statement it has nothing to do with the method of concentration, simple instructions etc. It is about practice-realisation which are inseparable. Mixing these two presentations makes even more confusion.

Astus wrote:

So, here is a more complete quote, to put the original one in context:

"Sitting and just thinking about all sorts of things, one after another, is not zazen; in fact, it's daydreaming! So when sitting, cast aside all these involvements and affairs; just try to sit well.

Occasionally I say "just sit," but you may find that a little hard to do. So you can do it gradually: First try to make yourself empty. If you are working on koans or on breathing, totally put yourself into your koan or into your breathing. Let it occupy you completely. If you are practicing shikantaza, it's especially hard to do this. In all probability, you are not "just sitting," but "just thinking," "just imagining," or just something else. So in order to get past all that and truly just sit, you must try to cut off clinging to the senses. When you hear a sound, instead of remaining outside of it, and thereby fighting it, just become that sound yourself. ..."

(The Art of Just Sitting, p 83)

That is, he gives the "becoming the sound" section as a preliminary method, not as equivalent to just sitting.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 11th, 2016 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: Differences between nichiren and pureland

Content:

Queequeg said:

When Nichiren refers to faith 信, its not faith in the sense of grasping an object and then willfully putting trust or belief in it. If anything, its a removal of resistance to very simply "hearing the teaching". That is why its a teaching appropriate for even a person with no capacity. What Nichiren is getting at in terms of "faith" is something actually pretty close to... adhimukti.

Astus wrote:

I don't really see the difference you make here. As your quotes and comments said, faith is the initial stage where one accepts the teachings as valid, even though there is no understanding yet, and that trust is what allows one to begin practice and learning. This sounds to me no different from how faith is part of the Buddhist teachings in both Sravakayana and Mahayana.

Queequeg said:

I'm not quite sure where you are going with this.

Astus wrote:

That faith is simply faith in the teachings, the initial stage on the path, and nothing more.

Queequeg said:

Lastly, though, you seem to assume that "emptiness" is the end goal of Lotus Buddhism

Astus wrote:

I meant it in the madhyamika sense and did not consider Tiantai interpretation. That is, in madhyamaka emptiness is dependent origination, and the two together is the middle way itself. But I think this is besides the topic here.

Queequeg said:

Again, not believe, but actually see the Buddha, grok the Buddha, in his full breadth and depth for even a single moment. Isn't that by definition, enlightenment? If you can see the Buddha in full, what do you not see?

Astus wrote:

What I cannot see is how reciting the title of a sutra creates such an insight. I can understand the logic behind the Pure Land doctrine of reciting the name and thus attaining birth in a buddha-land. But how can recitation generate wisdom?

Queequeg said:

Just to criticize your whole approach here

Astus wrote:

I simply try to be as clear as possible with how I understand the topic, in the hope that you can respond with some clarifying statements and arguments.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 11th, 2016 at 9:33 PM

Title: Re: Differences between nichiren and pureland

Content:

Yuren said:

Well. What is Amitabha?

According to Shinran, the Supreme Buddha has no form, but because formlessness is not comprehensible to us, forms are expediently taught, such as "Amida": Infinite Light. The name Amida stresses the aspect of infinite life and infinite light of the Buddha. But what even is a Buddha?

...

He's saying Tathagata equals Buddha-Nature equals Nirvana. This is quite a profound, revolutionary statement.

Astus wrote:

The trikaya theory has been around well before Shinran, and even before the trikaya theory the doctrine of the dharmakaya was formed, so saying that a buddha is nirvana/dharmadhatu doesn't sound revolutionary to me. On the other hand, it seems irrelevant from the perspective of attaining birth in the Pure Land. I'm sure Shinran had his reasons to explain things the way he did, but I don't know who his intended audience was.

Yuren said:

My relationship to my Buddha-Nature is the relationship to my own future Buddhahood. To myself as a (future) Buddha.

Astus wrote:

How could one have a relationship with one's buddha-nature? One may have some ideas about what it is, but that's all. What is the practical value of that on the Pure Land path?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 12th, 2016 at 7:48 PM

Title: Re: Differences between nichiren and pureland

Content:

Queequeg said:

So returning to Verbal Identity, what we find is that it refers to that moment where we have consciousness of words without any understanding of their meaning. There is not anything in that which we might understand as the English word "faith".

Astus wrote:

That is, one simply hears syllables and repeats those syllables without any consideration of meaning, like an audio record, or a parrot. Is that what you mean by Nichiren's interpretation of faith?

Queequeg said:

One of Nichiren's main points throughout his writings is the necessity of persisting in Verbal Identity in the face of obstacles and distractions. Again, though, this is not faith in the sense of holding to something that we don't already know, but rather holding to the Verbal Identity which we know even when doing so is disadvantageous or even dangerous.

Astus wrote:

That is, just keep repeating the words, right?

Queequeg said:

I don't know where you get this idea that chanting the Daimoku "creates" insight. Insight comes as we integrate the Daimoku in our lives. Despite the insistence of some Nichiren Buddhists on the power of mere recitation to lead to enlightenment, they're wrong, at least to the extent that chanting all your waking hours will not lead to enlightenment, not anytime soon, anyway. And contrary to what you seem to think, Nichiren taught much more than reciting the Daimoku. The practices that really lead to enlightenment are the same as in any school of Buddhism – putting the teachings into practice in our moment to moment life.

Astus wrote:

This is somewhat new to me. I thought the recitation of the sutra title is considered enough for buddhahood. If you say there are other practices, I have not yet encountered with them. So, do they teach the Makashikan and such?

Queequeg said:

One thing to keep in mind, we are talking about a Sudden and Perfect teaching, so ordinary ideas about gradual development are not applicable here.

Astus wrote:

As your quote says: "involves taking the true aspects [of reality] as the object from the very beginning". At what point one arrives at the realisation of suchness in Nichiren's teachings?

Queequeg said:

even as we don't understand the symbols. Notwithstanding, the symbols are the reality itself.

Astus wrote:

All beings experience the same way, but they are not free, exactly because they do not understand suchness.

Queequeg said:

At later stages, the True Aspect is contemplated and gradually understanding arises.

Astus wrote:

What is that contemplation practice in Nichiren's school?

Queequeg said:

the difference is that understanding arises subjectively

Astus wrote:

That's what really matters, isn't it?

Queequeg said:

chanting the Daimoku and fully realizing it are not different in fundamental reality

Astus wrote:

That's merely theoretical, and not an actual attainment. How does one go from delusion to enlightenment then?

Queequeg said:

For that matter, there isn't anything that is not a path that leads to enlightenment in the Sudden and Perfect Teaching

Astus wrote:

I don't see how that can be possible. If anything is a path, then all beings are already on the path. Furthermore, talking of a path, it is not sudden anymore. Not to mention what you wrote a paragraph before: "the True Aspect is contemplated and gradually understanding arises".

So, as you might see, this is somewhat confusing to me. Chanting does not lead to enlightenment, but anything can be the path, and while it is sudden there is a gradual development.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 12th, 2016 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: Very clear statements about the Dzogchen path- Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

As far as a meditation instruction? All over the place iirc. I've seen the same instruction in Mahamudra writings I'm certain, heck..I think I even read some Thai Forest people and Zen people with the instruction to observe the observer, know the knower etc. Not saying it's the same thing exactly in those contexts of course...

Astus wrote:

Mahamudra vipasyana instruction starts with first observing the mind, then thoughts, then external phenomena. As for Zen, it is one of the first questions (huatou) given: Who is it?; or in China especially: Who is reciting the name? (i.e. asking this while chanting Namó Amituo Fó). By the way, Neo-Advaita has this method as well, particularly in Ramana's community, since they actually believe in an ultimate observer.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 12th, 2016 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: Differences between nichiren and pureland

Content:

Yuren said:

Not even advanced Bodhisattvas see their own Buddha-Nature clearly. That is something reserved to Buddhas.

So we can only "know" it through hearing (about it), verbally. Through deep listening and in faith.

Astus wrote:

Then I still don't see the practical value here.

Yuren said:

The text called The Odaimoku of the Lotus Sutra by Nichiren seems to suggest the mere repetition without understanding is efficacious: <http://www.nichirenlibrary.org/en/wnd-1/Content/14>

Astus wrote:

It seems to claim two things related to efficacy (not considering all the paragraphs about the superiority of the Lotus Sutra):

Thus faith is the basic requirement for entering the way of the Buddha. In the fifty-two stages of bodhisattva practice, the first ten stages, dealing with faith, are basic, and the first of these ten stages is that of arousing pure faith. Though lacking in knowledge of Buddhism, a person of faith, even if dull-witted, is to be reckoned as a person of correct views. But even though one has some knowledge of Buddhism, if one is without faith, then one is to be considered a slanderer and an icchantika, or person of incorrigible disbelief.

(p 141)

Thus, as we have seen, even those who lack understanding, so long as they chant Nam-myoho-renge-kyo, can avoid the evil paths.

(p 142)

That is, faith is the entrance to the path - but not the whole path -, and one can be saved from the evil paths by it. Now, comparing that to the Pure Land teaching of reciting the name, thereby one gains birth in Sukhavati and consequently attains enlightenment, and additionally it purifies karma (although this has little importance, since one can never be born in any samsaric realms anyway).

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 13th, 2016 at 7:13 PM

Title: Re: Differences between nichiren and pureland

Content:

Queequeg said:

In the Sudden teaching, you are introduced to the Buddha in full. In that instant, you see the Primordial Buddha's timeless, eternal Trikaya. Even without understanding, your mind has been made aware of it in full. Understanding, as you agree, is subjective knowledge, meaning, how "I" relates to Buddha. In relating the subject to the Buddha, alternatively, the True Aspect, the subject is, in that instant, completely integrated with Buddha, and therefore, enlightened, even if that integration is not understood at the grosser levels of consciousness.

Astus wrote:

What I fail to see here is how that is more than rhetoric and theory. Since it has no bearing on the individual, no actual liberation on the personal level, calling it a sudden and perfect teaching amounts to nothing more than nice words. In Zen, that similarly claims to be a sudden teaching, there is necessarily actual realisation of buddha-nature, any if one can merely repeat some words about how zazen is enlightenment, one is promptly sent back to the zafu.

Queequeg said:

Progress in the path is more or less drawing out the full implications and conforming our thoughts, words and deeds with Buddha.

Astus wrote:

And that is where it turns out to be very much a gradual path. Yes, all beings have buddha-nature, and then we can say that the practice is about uncovering that. This is actually a common view all over the Mahayana schools.

Queequeg said:

In the Sudden Teaching, where the gate of entry is the very instant of encounter with reality, there is no subject-object rumination, but rather, immediate immersion into the reality of Buddha which is timeless, without top or bottom, or beginning or end, start or finish.

Astus wrote:

As you say, there has to be an encounter with reality. To say that such an encounter happens on an unconscious level, like the teaching where even if one hears the word buddha one will eventually attain enlightenment, that is not encounter with reality but karma. Suppose we walk towards each other on a street but we do not recognise each other and just pass by, while it might be acceptable to call this meeting on an unconscious level, practically speaking we would not have actually met.

Queequeg said:

It was perfect to begin with - our problem before was that we did not realize it was all Buddhahood to begin with.

Astus wrote:

It makes no difference. All Buddhist schools agree that there is no self, never has been and never will be. To hear the doctrine of anatma is one thing, to understand it is another, and to actually attain the realisation is a third. Still, we can say that no-self is eternal and universal, it makes no practical difference to merely accept those ideas. And no matter how long one believes in it, without practice, there is no realisation.

Queequeg said:

In the Perfect and Sudden Teaching, that repetition of NMRK is the expression of that mind of instant Buddhahood. If you have any question about its efficacy despite it not making sense to your logical mind, I would suggest trying it.

Astus wrote:

There are clear descriptions of the path from delusion to enlightenment in Buddhism, for instance in Tiantai. What I don't see yet is how Nichiren's teachings fit into it. How can one recognise the emptiness of self and dharmas through recitation (or other methods available in it)?

Queequeg said:

In the instant you hear the Sublime Dharma, insight does arise - at the stage of Verbal Identity

Astus wrote:

Why call it insight when one merely hears the teachings? No insight happens, no experience occurs beyond hearing words. That is simply called the first stage of learning that must be followed by understanding and insight in order to gain wisdom, that is, personal encounter with reality.

Queequeg said:

The recitation of the Daimoku is the essential teaching. It is the Sublime Gate that all Buddhas emerge from. But, the Daimoku, the particular string of syllables, is actually arbitrary. In other times and places it is expressed differently. In some places its expression is in 24 characters, or millions of characters, or through fragrances... its expression is unlimited. But here, in these particular circumstances, Nichiren taught it as NMRK.

Astus wrote:

Then what recitation is the essential? Reciting the Lotus Sutra in general? But if expression is unlimited, then what is it actually?

Queequeg said:

to live out the Lotus Sutra itself. To make our own body the expression of the Lotus Sutra. This is done by introducing people to the Sublime Dharma, exposing them to the Buddha in full.

Astus wrote:

The Lotus Sutra is a text, like any other sutra. One can apply the meaning of a text in one's life, but not the text itself. So, how is the Lotus Sutra expressed in other than words?

Queequeg said:

Actually, this is the real practice Nichiren taught.

Astus wrote:

The practice of the Lotus Sutra is to tell/recite/preach the Lotus Sutra to others?

Queequeg said:

When you ask if Nichiren taught Makashikan, what do you mean? Ichinen Sanzen is the contemplation at the heart of the Daimoku. Ichinen Sanzen is the Sudden and Perfect teaching, taking any object for contemplation. If you think Ichinen Sanzen is more than what is described...

Astus wrote:

I mean that hearing and reciting words are not the same as understanding them, and understanding is not the same as realising them, therefore chanting sutras cannot be enough for liberation. Do people contemplate ichinen sanzen? Is there a meditation on it, a specific method, like one can contemplate dependent origination and mind-only?

Queequeg said:

That's Kuanting's famous synopsis of Ichinen Sanzen. There's no double speak or hidden meaning. That is it.

Astus wrote:

As it says: "the true aspects [of reality] as the object from the very beginning". Where does the experience of dharmadhatu, of the middle, of suchness, of quiescent and luminous dharmas occur in recitation? As I have noted before, even though all appearances are without self, one first have to overcome the false view of self to realise it, and it is not enough to just believe that there is no self. So, there is calming and contemplation that leads one to insight, because insight does not happen on its own, nor only by faith.

Queequeg said:

When we completely integrate, that's it. Nothing more to do.

Astus wrote:

What is integrated and how is it done? Do you mean making recitation a 24/7 occupation for the mind/mouth?

Queequeg said:

the teachings that fully explicate this teaching.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean there is more than NMRK? What is fully explicated?

Queequeg said:

NAMU MYOHO RENGE KYO. You're free. Single Mindedly hold that teaching and you'll find the truth of my words, "You're free."

Astus wrote:

Now it sounds like that it's believed to be a magic spell, a mantra. But no matter how long one recites "Gate gate paragata parasamgate svaha", no perfect wisdom will ever come from it.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 14th, 2016 at 2:37 AM

Title: Re: Differences between nichiren and pureland

Content:

Yuren said:

It is my understanding that the Chán Buddhists interpretation of such practices

Astus wrote:

"Good friends, people of this world always recite prajñā with their mouths, but they don't recognize the prajñā of the self-natures. This is like talking about eating, which doesn't satisfy one's hunger. If you just talk about emptiness with your mouths, you won't be able to see the nature for a myriad eons. Ultimately, this is of no benefit at all." (Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK Edition, p 28)

Yuren said:

at least since the time of Hanshan Deqing, but definitely even before that, is that single-minded repetition of any mantra (in truth, they don't really care about the content, one could be repeating "Pizza-hut pizza-hut kentucky fried chicken and a pizza-hut mcdonalds mcdonalds" and get perfect enlightenment from that, in theory - if one becomes one with the repetition so that the split between subject and object is shown to be null in a single thought-moment). Chu-Hung Hanshan, Yin-Yuan Lung-Chi, Xuyun, ... this has been the standard in Chinese Chán for a long time? Correct me if I err?

Astus wrote:

One can certainly use the name or a mantra as an object of concentration, and with that fend off appearances. This is a method accepted in Chan, and in common Buddhist terms it is a fine way to train in calm abiding. But, and this is my general objection, concentration and calm abiding is not enough for enlightenment. The moment one loses one's focus, one is back in the afflicted mind.

Yuren said:

Ippen is completely in line with the Chinese style of Pure Land Zen practice, similar to Xuyun, Hanshan, etc.

Astus wrote:

Yes, it seems so.

Yuren said:

I don't see why you don't allow that single-minded recitation of a phrase would bring one to wisdom? ANYTHING can bring you to wisdom. A Japanese Zen disciple was apparently enlightened by hearing the sound of his piss when he was in the toilet. That's the point of the Lotus Sutra, that each phenomenon is the Middle; each - if viewed properly - is the Buddha-Dharma. And that is the logic behind why the Nembutsu and the NRMK can "work". At least that's how I understand it.

Astus wrote:

Let me highlight it: "each phenomenon is the Middle; each - if viewed properly - is the Buddha-Dharma". The proper view does not come from concentration, from recitation, or from random events. That's why there is a definite need for the teachings, that's why a buddha had to start the wheel of Dharma rolling, and that's why one has to learn the teachings. Recitation and concentration were methods well known even before Shakyamuni, they were (and still are) common practices of Hindu yogis, and found even outside India. That's why one can achieve such supernormal levels of absorptions as the formless dhyanas, and still be bound by birth and death.

Yuren said:

I guess that you only disagree about the DEGREE of wisdom that such single-minded recitation can bestow? You agree it can be efficacious to a certain degree, but not that it can deliver the final result?

Astus wrote:

Yes, like that. Consider the four types of buddha-remembrance (四種念佛). Of them the first one, "<http://eubuddhist.blogspot.hu/2015/10/real-mark-buddha-remembrance.html>" (實相念佛), is what I call proper Chan practice of immediate enlightenment. Recitation helps to calm (samatha) the mind, huatou helps to see (vipasyana) the mind, but both precede realisation of buddha-nature.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 14th, 2016 at 11:41 PM

Title: Re: Eastern-Western Dharma and the "Great Dharma Drum"

Content:

Coëmgenu said:

"The Great Dharma Drum", they seem to be put out from a Chinese Pure Land group

Astus wrote:

<http://www.dharmadrum.org/content/about/about.aspx?sn=110> is not a PL group but rather general Chinese Buddhism that puts emphasis on Humanistic Buddhism, Chan, and studies.

Coëmgenu said:

addresses very different concerns and questions than I often see addressed in Western presentations of Buddhadharma

Astus wrote:

I'm not sure what you mean there. First of all, those videos have English subtitles, intended for a global audience. Furthermore, DDM has several centres worldwide, and translations from Ven. Shengyan are also available. There are other Buddhist groups from Taiwan as well, including <http://www.amtbweb.org/index.html> that is actually focused on Pure Land teachings, that have spread in Western countries, and you can find similar presentations like in that video.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 17th, 2016 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: The continuation between births

Content:

Coëmgenu said:

do you think that any attempt to speculate as to the nature of the continuation between apparent "beings" undergoing rebirth, leads innately wrong-views regarding excessive self-conceptualization, challenging anātman -teachings?

Astus wrote:

There is a continuation because of karma, and the process is described as the 12 links of dependent origination. So, by all means go on and contemplate on it.

Coëmgenu said:

The Buddha often avoided a lot of discourse about "selves that transcend the immediate self", which leads to the famous eternalism/annihilism discourse.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean a true and eternal soul beyond the five aggregates? That has been definitively rejected and refuted.

Coëmgenu said:

Is trying to conceptualize and understand the precise nature of the continuity from one birth to another just an example of most likely falling into a bit of an eternalist manner of thinking, foreign to proper Buddhadharma?

Astus wrote:

Contemplating rebirth is a fine Buddhist practice. Dependent origination is a wonderful and fruitful topic. But you might want to read about those things first, just to clarify what the Buddha's teachings actually are.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2016 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: The Skandhas and the 8 Consciousness's

Content:

Tirisilex said:

It doesn't make sense that the 8 Consciousnesses would be the aggregate of consciousness because the aggregates of senses and or perceptions could be argued to be the exact same of the first 5 consciousnesses of the 8. So how could the 8 consciousnesses fit in the aggregate of consciousness alone?

Astus wrote:

The usual six consciousnesses fall under the aggregate of consciousness. Yogacara simply added two more to the list, so that they can explain in another way how karma works. The other three aggregates of the mental part are not consciousnesses (citta-dharma) but mental elements (caitasika-dharma).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2016 at 4:00 PM

Title: Re: The Skandhas and the 8 Consciousness's

Content:

undefineable said:

Can they take place outside consciousness, semi-/sub-consciousness and awareness altogether, or do they simply amount to a subjective process of dealing with the objects of consciousness?

Astus wrote:

Feelings, perceptions, and formations are mental factors, objects of consciousness. That is, feeling when something is pleasurable or painful, recognising what a perceived thing is, and relating with some form of intention. Consciousness is what is aware of those factors.

undefineable said:

If so, wouldn't consciousness be the first or second of the five skandhas rather than the fifth?

Astus wrote:

I think the reason of the order is how one may identify with those aggregates, where considering the body as the self or relating to the self is the primary, then comes the rest. Consciousness is the last one because usually only philosophers and meditators imagine that their true self is pure awareness.

undefineable said:

If, on the other hand, the former is true, and the untrained are unable to become aware of their perception/feeling/categorisation(insert preferred translation here)

Astus wrote:

What one is not conscious of, that one does not experience at all, it does not occur as a phenomenon, and consequently one cannot identify with it or relate to it. But I believe we all have bodies, feelings, perception, intention, and consciousness; and we interact with them practically every moment, or rather we are them. The main error is of course the mistaken identification that we are the body and the mind, or that we are their owner.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2016 at 4:05 PM

Title: Re: Loch Kelly

Content:

krodha said:

That said, obviously discussing the taste of sugar implies "ideas" regarding that taste, but the taste itself is not an idea.

Astus wrote:

"If a word and its referent are not different,
[The word] fire would burn one's mouth;
If they're different there'll be no comprehension.
This you, the speaker of truth, have stated."

(Nagarjuna: <http://www.tibetanclassics.org/html-assets/WorldTranscendentHym.pdf>, v 7)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2016 at 10:05 PM

Title: Re: The Skandhas and the 8 Consciousness's

Content:

undefineable said:

How can these factors be said to have an existence separate from consciousness?
Before awareness and (often) an aware response, surely it's all just computation

Astus wrote:

Why would they be separate? These categories are tools for practice, to create a general map so that one can distinguish appearances in a skilful way. But if you want further details, I recommend you dig into some abhidharma works.

undefineable said:

Has science shown that consciousness apprehends/arises with objects after the earlier skandhas have run their course? If so, then is this something one can nonetheless become aware of through meditation?

Astus wrote:

I can't follow your question. The skandhas are a Buddhist idea, not scientific. Furthermore, skandhas designate general groups (i.e. aggregates) of experiences/phenomena that we all have. They are not objects of themselves, nobody sees "a skandha".

undefineable said:

If one was born with the habitual tendency to see things this way, then what are the dangers?

Astus wrote:

People normally grasp a form of self. The danger is all the sufferings of samsara.

undefineable said:

If the nature of mind is open and so on, then how can it also be so tightly restricted to the limited contents of very specific computational processes - in a way that so much implies an inability to rise above itself?

Astus wrote:

Open versus tight? Such expressions in Buddhism are figurative, there is no such thing as an actually open or tight consciousness. When it's said that the nature of mind is spacious and open, that is meant to help one let go of all the worries and attachments, but not to be taken literally.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 20th, 2016 at 5:18 PM

Title: Re: The Skandhas and the 8 Consciousness's

Content:

undefineable said:

Right, so one observes mental processes that the Buddha labelled skandhas. The question you couldn't follow was intended to ask whether the other skandhas are consciously experienced or not, but you seem to have answered that _ _

Astus wrote:

Answered <http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=351458#p351458>: "What one is not conscious of, that one does not experience at all, it does not occur as a phenomenon, and consequently one cannot identify with it or relate to it. But I believe we all have bodies, feelings, perception, intention, and consciousness; and we interact with them practically every moment, or rather we are them."

That is, yes, aggregates are what we experience, in fact, that's the whole of our experience. As the 8000 Prajnaparamita Sutra says (XII.2, tr Conze): "The five skandhas have by the Tathagata have declared as 'world' [loka]. Which five? Form, feeling, perceptions, impulses, and consciousness."

undefineable said:

The form of self being grasped defining the suffering risked in so doing, with philosophers presumably liable to experience 'true-self-as-pure-awareness'-type suffering (given your earlier thoughts)

Astus wrote:

Suffering is said to have three types: suffering of pain, suffering of change, suffering of conditioning. It does not matter what appearance one is attached to, those three can occur. Those who strongly identify with a pure awareness may be born in the formless realms at best, but it's still not an escape, even if they believe it to be.

undefineable said:

If you are merely yourself (in the sense of your own habitual patterns) eternally (a couple of samsaric cycles or whatever in temporal terms perhaps), then how is it possible to see things from someone else's point of view? To consider alternative courses of action? To be 'open' rather than "tight" and fully pre-determined?

Astus wrote:

Everyone is merely who they are. Habits are influential, but not the only factors in one's actions. People have intelligence, so they can reconsider things and reflect on their ideas. Such intelligence is practically a basic requirement for life, so that one can effectively react to changing events. Of course, the level of intelligence varies among beings in general and among humans in particular.

undefineable said:

As a teenager I entered a powerful and terrifying 'mystic' state in which I didn't so much feel that I didn't exist (c.f. Depersonalisation Disorder), as that I was lost in a vast cloud of 'potentially anyone and everyone' while at the same time (perhaps because rather than in spite of that) trapped in "no-one". I'm not bothered that this isn't Buddhadharma, just curious as to how it fits with everything else (beyond being). If the Buddha's message is simply "you'd be truer and better to yourself if you just cool it", then teachings like sunyata sound irrelevant.

Astus wrote:

Experiences and their interpretations are two different things. People can have all sorts of experiences, and can come up with a large variety of explanations for those (as shown in <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Gf7YSURReVM>). All experiences can be categorised into the five aggregates, and all ordinary (non-Buddhist) interpretations fall into one of the 62 wrong views or just generally the extremes of eternalism and annihilationism. The Buddhist approach is to recognise that all experiences are impermanent, unsatisfactory, empty, and not self. That's how sunyata is very relevant, at least if one aims for enlightenment. Or, to go with the Yogacara approach, all experiences are mind-made, all conceptualisations are false.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 20th, 2016 at 7:02 PM

Title: Re: Quality of Sanskrit Texts

Content:

jmlee369 said:

The notion that the Pali scriptures somehow capture the original words of the Buddha is a long discredited one in academia.

Astus wrote:

From a historical perspective, the Nikayas are still the closest to the original and the most accurate resource of the earliest teachings, as it has been confirmed through the comparative studies with the Chinese Agamas and fragments in other languages.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 20th, 2016 at 7:23 PM

Title: Re: Eastern-Western Dharma and the "Great Dharma Drum"

Content:

jmlee369 said:

even though he was a Chan master

Astus wrote:

This is more a Western bias to think of Chan as something like what one can read in old texts. Shengyen was famous for his scholarly works, books that have not yet been translated to English, and he did not call himself a Chan master - i.e. chanshi, that is, meditation teacher/instructor - partially because his focus was not on sitting for years in some remote hermitage. Even when he has spent six years in <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=GaY3gmyMkrM>, while he did practice meditation, he also did lots of repentance practices, studied the scriptures, and composed texts.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 21st, 2016 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: Quality of Sanskrit Texts

Content:

heart said:

So you think the academical and the historical perspective are different?

Astus wrote:

No, by historical I meant the academical study of history.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 21st, 2016 at 12:57 AM

Title: Re: The Skandhas and the 8 Consciousness's

Content:

undefineable said:

What about the enlightened?

Astus wrote:

The difference between deluded and enlightened is whether there is identification with the aggregates or not. The five families stand for the pure vision of the five aggregates, that is, when there is no more attachment. But the aggregates don't cease to function when there is no clinging to them.

If any conceptualisations are false, while descriptions of true insights might point to truth, then the question is how to distinguish the valid insights from false conceptualisations, particularly when a teacher has made a (non-literal) statement that must then be interpreted non-conceptually [/ have the insight that inspired it identified] by an unrealised student. Given the vast range of material written in Buddhism's name, going even by the meaning implied by a statement is probably not a good place to start _ The insight is the confirmation of the Dharma, the first hand experience of the teachings received. So it's not that one first has an experience and then an explanation, but first one has a view and then its proof in experience. That's why correct view matters. Another aspect is the decrease of unwholesome factors and the increase of the wholesome, the development of the 37 factors of enlightenment and the bodhisattva qualities.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 21st, 2016 at 6:38 AM

Title: Re: Quality of Sanskrit Texts

Content:

heart said:

So you and jmlee369 are not agreeing, perhaps you have some academical support for your point of view?

Astus wrote:

Bhikkhu Sujato & Bhikkhu Brahmalī: <https://books.google.hu/books?id=fK9zBwAAQBAJ>

Comparative studies:

Mun-keat Choong: https://books.google.hu/books?id=yLU-oZio9_oC

Bhikṣu Thich Minh Chau: <https://www.amazon.com/Chinese-Madhyama-agama-Majjhima-nikaya/dp/8120807944>

Bhikkhu Analayo: <http://www.indologica.de/drupal/?q=node/1700>

Also a great site: <https://suttacentral.net/>

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 21st, 2016 at 7:20 AM

Title: Re: Eastern-Western Dharma and the "Great Dharma Drum"

Content:

davidbrainerd said:

Yet there is a book on Chan he wrote that is available in English. It has a long title: Hoofprint of the Ox: Principles of the Chan Buddhist Path as Taught by a Modern Chinese Master. I've actually been thinking of buying it because of watching his youtube videos.

Astus wrote:

I didn't say he had not taught meditation. That's exactly what I wanted to highlight that he was seen in the West as a Chan master, and not as an educated Dharma teacher.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 21st, 2016 at 7:23 AM

Title: Re: Quality of Sanskrit Texts

Content:

Malcolm said:

Dzogchen teachings are the earliest Buddhist teachings, predating all others by eons and eons.

Astus wrote:

Dzogchen may teach that there was a first buddha. But I think everyone else says that there is no beginning of buddhas. So I guess infinite beats first.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 21st, 2016 at 5:41 PM

Title: Re: Quality of Sanskrit Texts

Content:

jmlee369 said:

My point was made against claims that the nikayas are what the Buddha taught verbatim.

Astus wrote:

That's right. As I <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=351585#p351585>: "the Nikayas are still the closest to the original and the most accurate resource of the earliest teachings".

But as for being a verbatim record, I don't know anyone who actually studied the texts to say that. One can find in the footnotes of Bhikkhu Bodhi's translations how he considers a number of sources and overrules the Theravada commentarial tradition, or occasionally even the text itself. And that is the case with likely all the other studies of Theravada texts in English.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 21st, 2016 at 5:49 PM

Title: Re: Question about agamas

Content:

Astus wrote:

A study of the Chinese, Sanskrit, Tibetan, and Pali versions by Norman Joseph Smith:
<https://archive.org/details/The17VersionsOfTheBuddhasFirstDiscourse>

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 21st, 2016 at 7:35 PM

Title: Re: Eastern-Western Dharma and the "Great Dharma Drum"

Content:

jmlee369 said:

I used the term Chan master more to emphasise that there are no hard distinctions in Chinese Buddhist practice. ... but more because it is part of their teaching and training methods.

Astus wrote:

It is part of the whole of Chinese Buddhism, so in that sense everyone is a Chan teacher. They are also Pure Land teachers, Sutra teachers, Shastra teachers, and Vinaya teachers. And being all of that is what actually being a Dharma teacher is about. So probably there should be different categories to clarify the differences among those groups, if there are any at all beyond personal styles. For instance, Shengyan follows Yinshun in taking emptiness as the ultimate, instead of buddha-nature or mind-only, and he does not agree to sudden enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 21st, 2016 at 7:55 PM

Title: Re: Dependent Origination and the Cosmological Argument

Content:

Wayfarer said:

So in the Western form, the cosmological argument is that every contingent being is dependent on the uncaused cause or first cause, which is God, without which neither they nor anything else would exist.

Astus wrote:

The same argument was made by Hindus and Taoists as well, and it directly opposes the Buddhist teaching of dependent origination. It even contradicts their own idea that everything must have a cause to then assume something without a cause.

Wayfarer said:

Now obviously Buddhism does not argue for the existence of God

Astus wrote:

They actually refute all attempts of establishing an ultimate substratum or originator, because it denies the whole teaching of karma and rebirth.

Wayfarer said:

so the argument from dependent origination points to a different conclusion, which is that 'Everything except Nirvāṇa are the consequence of Pratītyasamutpāda'.

Astus wrote:

In Madhyamaka dependent origination is nirvana. To posit a nirvana outside of samsara is the mistaken view of sravakas.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 21st, 2016 at 11:56 PM

Title: Re: Quality of Sanskrit Texts

Content:

Malcolm said:

Oh, what Dzogchen teachings says concerning this is that in every eon from beginningless time, Dzogchen teachings appear first and disappear last.

Astus wrote:

I think that's the biggest claim I have heard yet in Buddhism. But just to turn it on its head, it could be said, again from a modern historical point of view, that such a claim makes it likely the latest on the list of sets of teachings to appear.

Malcolm said:

So, we have our cake and can eat it too...

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2016 at 2:11 AM

Title: Re: Quality of Sanskrit Texts

Content:

Malcolm said:

Which is relevant to whom, exactly?

Astus wrote:

Good question. I think it matters in case of interschool debates when historicity is brought into the argument. But not when measuring the value of certain views and methods.

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2016 at 3:43 AM
Title: Re: Quality of Sanskrit Texts
Content:
Malcolm said:
Only to westerners.

Astus wrote:
Why would that be? History is not a purely Western field of study. The Japanese are at the top level in Buddhist studies, and most Asian Buddhist countries are catching up. The historical perspective gained currency among Asian Buddhists in the 19th century, and has been found a valid method in researching past events. The Taisho Tripitaka compiled in 1924 is an obvious example. So it might be that only Tibetans have not yet caught up with the rest of the world.

Author: Astus
Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2016 at 7:09 AM
Title: Re: How to believe in rebirth
Content:
Wayfarer said:
So where this karma is acquired, is an open question.

Astus wrote:
Question to whom? There are practically infinite worlds and realms in Buddhism.

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, August 30th, 2016 at 12:21 AM
Title: Re: Even the Buddha couldn't do that Content:
Kim said:
Pointing out instruction by Alan Wallace
But as you cut through to that which is aware, you may cut through to a dimension of awareness that is unborn and unceasing, that never moves, because it is not in time. It is unchanging and you can never wrap your conceptual mind around it. Because this baseline, this ground of awareness, from which all conditioned states of consciousness emerge. Transcends the very parameters of existence and non-existence. It transcends all conceptual categories. It can be known. It is not an ultimate mystery. It can be known directly without mediation, but only by itself. It can know itself. But your conceptual mind cannot grasp it. It is beyond its pay grade, it is beyond its scope.

Astus wrote:
Or we could as well call that the soul, the true self, atman, the witness, etc. How can that even be considered Buddhism? On the other hand, with such a view it is no surprise one can easily fall into extreme simplifications that we see in Neo-Advaita and mindfulness teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 30th, 2016 at 2:32 AM

Title: Re: Even the Buddha couldn't do that

Content:

monktastic said:

What in particular do you take issue with?

Astus wrote:

Positing an independent consciousness is a problematic view, to say the least. Of course, figuratively it's possible to say that the mind is unbound from all appearances when there is no more attachment.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 30th, 2016 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: Even the Buddha couldn't do that

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

As Jigme Lingpa famously quipped:

"Even the Buddha couldn't explain the ground."

I'm paraphrasing here.

Astus wrote:

That's not because there is any fault in the teachings or because of some inability. It simply means there is nothing to explain, as it is the end of grasping at concepts.

"there is no concrete dharma which the Tathagata has spoken. And why? The dharmas spoken by the Tathagata cannot be grasped and cannot be spoken. It is neither dharma nor no dharma. And why? Unconditioned dharma distinguishes worthy sages."

(<http://www.cttbusa.org/vajra/vajrasutra.asp>, ch 7)

"The pacification of all objectification

And the pacification of all fabrication is peace.

No Dharma was taught by the Buddha

At any time, in any place, to any person."

(MMK 25.24, tr Ocean of Reasoning, p 532)

"It is not existent since even the victorious ones do not see it.

...

When looking again and again into the unseen mind,

The fact that there is nothing to see is vividly seen as it is."

(Rangjung Dorje: Aspirational Prayer for Mahamudra, tr Song of Karmapa, RY Pubs, p 13-14)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 30th, 2016 at 5:34 AM

Title: Re: Even the Buddha couldn't do that

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

OK, it seems that people don't get that I was attempting to humorously get back "on topic" by referring to something "even the Buddha couldn't do".

Astus wrote:

And what I intended to point out, and I guess it is on topic, is that this concept of inexplicability is not unique to Dzogchen, and it doesn't mean that the Buddha had some sort of linguistic difficulties, nor is it about a mystical realm beyond language.

“Friend, when you are asked: ‘With the remainderless fading away and cessation of the six bases for contact, is there something else?’ you say: ‘Do not say so, friend.’ And when you are asked: ‘With the remainderless fading away and cessation of the six bases for contact, is there nothing else? . . . Is there both something else and nothing else? . . . Is there neither something else nor nothing else?’ [in each case] you say: ‘Do not say so, friend.’ In what way should the meaning of this statement be understood?”

(1) “Friend, if one says: ‘With the remainderless fading away and cessation of the six bases for contact, there is something else,’ one proliferates that which is not to be proliferated. (2) If one says: ‘Friend, with the remainderless fading away and cessation of the six bases for contact, there is nothing else,’ one proliferates that which is not to be proliferated. (3) If one says: ‘Friend, with the remainderless fading away and cessation of the six bases for contact, there is both something else and nothing else,’ one proliferates that which is not to be proliferated. (4) If one says: ‘Friend, with the remainderless fading away and cessation of the six bases for contact, there is neither something else nor nothing else,’ one proliferates that which is not to be proliferated. Friend, as far as the range of the six bases for contact extends, just so far extends the range of proliferation. As far as the range of proliferation extends, just so far extends the range of the six bases for contact. With the remainderless fading away and cessation of the six bases for contact there is the cessation of proliferation, the subsiding of proliferation.”

(Kotthita Sutta, AN 4.173 / II.161, tr Bhikkhu Bodhi)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 31st, 2016 at 6:57 PM

Title: Re: Even the Buddha couldn't do that

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Interest in Dharma doesn't exist from it's own side; even our interest develops from receiving Buddha's blessings. I'm not saying that Buddhas liberate us with no effort on our part, that's your misunderstanding of what I'm saying. it's a co-operative effort - the Buddhas provide teachings, blessings and emanations and we practise the path.

Astus wrote:

If buddhas can somehow influence people, why not everyone is already enlightened? If you say that it's because beings' minds are deluded and cannot see the blessings and such from the buddhas, then there is no relevance at all whether there are such influences coming from them or not, since in both cases it's up to the beings to develop themselves. So, there seems to be no logical way to claim such influence in any way.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 31st, 2016 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: Even the Buddha couldn't do that

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

I agree. The texts are the only way to separate the teaching from the innovations that creep in to these little semi formal private interviews and intimate instructions.

maybay said:

"The texts" abound with controversy. The error is not in not fact checking teachings, its in drawing your own conclusions about their applicability based on your experience of them alone, a naïveté the Zen school is renowned for.

Astus wrote:

Isn't it the Dalai Lama who urges return to Nalanda style Buddhism when teachers were proficient in engaging with non-Buddhist thinkers? I think the error that seems to be in Garchen Rinpoche's teaching comes from being surrounded only by Buddhists. I see similar teachings in East Asian Buddhism as well that can be easily interpreted as a sort of substance/substratum doctrine. But again, I attribute the development of such terminology to the lack of an opposite party that teaches any type of eternal spirit theory, because without them there is no reason to be careful and strict in how one teaches the Dharma. Apparently in India they had to keep the sword of wisdom sharp to cut off all sorts of wrong views, and there was no place for anything that even resembles an atman.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 31st, 2016 at 11:31 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Dzogchen?

Content:

Astus wrote:

See also an older thread: <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=100&t=6459>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 1st, 2016 at 12:57 AM

Title: Re: Even the Buddha couldn't do that

Content:

maybay said:

That would be institutionalized Buddhism, where students can specialize and develop into authorities on a given subject. What do you think Garchen's speciality is? Surely its not in showing people how groundless their lives are. If they are looking for that aspect of truth they would do better to look in a book.

Astus wrote:

I don't see how institutionalisation applies here. In fact, apologetics is normally part of the doctrine of any religion. For instance, the <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.01.0.bodh.html> is a great example of that, and all the later developments in Buddhist thought contain similar arguments and refutations of incorrect views. However, although there is a growing amount of literature on the finer levels of the Dharma in English, it still seems to be an alien subject to those who identify themselves as practitioners. And that is one of the possible answers to the OP where it raises the question about the possible lack of success in pursuing the Buddhist path. That is, from incorrect view there is only incorrect meditation.

Another error is to take a teaching out of context, and reinterpret a practical instruction into a general doctrinal statement. That is the age old neyārtha-nīṭārtha problem actually.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 1st, 2016 at 6:07 PM

Title: Re: Creation through perception in Buddhism?

Content:

Fortyeightvows said:

Just now tonite found another source for this. Daigan Matsunaga's book Foundation Japanese Buddhism Volume 1.1974. Page 38,39, 260

Astus wrote:

So it is the Sarvastivadin definition of a moment. But if one moment is 0.013 seconds, then a second is little less than 77 moments.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 2nd, 2016 at 11:00 PM

Title: Re: First words of Buddha after enliggthenment

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is a Zen saying. I've done a little search on the topic.

The morning star is mentioned in relation to the time of the Buddha's birth:

T185 太子瑞應本起經 (A.D. 222-228) - 到四月八日夜明星出時，化從右脇生墮地，即行七步，舉右手住而言：『天上天下，唯我為尊。三界皆苦，何可樂者？』 (They arrived on the night of the eighth day of the fourth month when the star comes out, and he was born from the right side and fell to the ground, immediately walked seven steps, raised his right hand and said, "Above and under heaven, only I am honourable. The three worlds are suffering, who can be happy?"

In relation to enlightenment:

T457 彌勒來時經 Maitreyavyākaraṇa(sūtra) (A.D. 317-420) - 彌勒到樹下坐，用四月八日明星出時得佛道。(Maitreya arrives at a tree and sits under it, then on the eighth day of the fourth month when the (morning) star comes out attains the Buddha way.)

Then in the Jingde Chuandeng Lu, the first major collection of Zen stories, simply quotes a text I could not identify, but the star is still only an indicator of time:

T2076 景德傳燈錄 (AD 1004) 故普集經云。菩薩於二月八日明星出時。成佛號天人師。(As the Universal Vinaya Sutra says, "The bodhisattva on the eighth day of the second month when the star comes out became buddha and the teacher of men and gods.)

It is here in Dahui's (1089–1163) writing that a connection is given between seeing the star and enlightenment:

T1998A 大慧普覺禪師語錄 (12th c.) 因見明星忽然悟道。便見自己本來面目。(Because he had seen the star he suddenly awoke to the way. That is, he has seen his own original face.)

There are numerous results for the expression 見明星悟道 (see the star and attain the way), including Dogen's Shobogenzo, but mostly in late texts and those not included in the Taisho Tripitaka, i.e. mainly works of Chinese origin.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 5th, 2016 at 7:05 PM

Title: Re: The 5th Skandha

Content:

Tirisilex said:

I've read that awareness is the only thing that is permanent so awareness

Astus wrote:

Permanent awareness is not consciousness. It is called permanent in the sense that it is without attachment, without anything to identify with. It is eternal in the sense that there has never been any self, and never will be. At the same time, every instance of consciousness is conditioned and impermanent. Might also say that impermanence is permanent. It is a figure of speech, a play with words. As for the awareness aspect, it means that all appearances are what one is aware of, so just as everything is impermanent, they are also aware. It is merely a conceptual category to say that things are objects of awareness.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 7th, 2016 at 11:35 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Dzogchen?

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Those who can draw into everything is that also possible maybe?

Astus wrote:

Why not? On the other hand, Gampopa wrote (JOL, p 251, 252):

"If the meaning of emptiness does not dwell within the mind, we cannot attain liberation by means of the other virtues.

When one is endowed with the meaning of emptiness, there is not a single thing which is not included in this path."

And Lama Zhang (Mahamudra and Related Instructions, p 126):

"In the instant that you realize your own mind,
all good qualities, without exception, are simultaneously completed without having to accomplish them."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 7th, 2016 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Dzogchen?

Content:

BuddhaFollower said:

Mahamudra as a separate system from HYT is a Tibetan invention.

Astus wrote:

It is the unique teaching of Gampopa, founder of all Dakpo Kagyu lineages. Besides that, as Malcolm mentioned, there are studies out there about the origins of the Maitripa lineage.

BuddhaFollower said:

Thread should be "HYT same as Dzogchen?"

Astus wrote:

Dzogchen as a separate method is a Tibetan invention as well, maybe even later than Mahamudra. So the question could be "HYT same as HYT?"

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2016 at 12:04 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Dzogchen?

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, it is clearly an earlier, skeptical movement that can be directly traced back to Śrī Siṃha in India, and we have evidence for this in the work of Mañjuśrīkīrti, who mentions Śrī Siṃha by name, as well as other associates of Padmasambhava such as Bhikṣuṇi

Nandi.

Astus wrote:

I've read some works of Mathes but don't remember any mention of Dzogchen there. Do you know which one it was? Or do you mean that Dzogchen has the same origin as Mahamudra in India?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2016 at 1:02 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Dzogchen?

Content:

Malcolm said:

You can find the reference in Yarnall's translation of the creation stage section of sngags rim chen mo of Tsongkhapa.

Astus wrote:

Alas, I don't have that one (<https://books.google.com/books?id=4cZyNwAACAAJ>).

Malcolm said:

I am quite certain that the reference refers to Śrī Simha.

Astus wrote:

So, was Sri Simha a member of the sahayayogin's group together with Saraha and Maitripa, therefore dzogchen and mahamudra come from the same movement? Was there anyone else who looked into this perhaps, like Sam van Schaik? If not, you might consider coming out with an article yourself.

Malcolm said:

there was push back by the anonymous author of the Hevajra Tantra

Astus wrote:

Ulrich Timme Kragh (Tibetan Yoga and Mysticism, p 70) suggests that Sapan's "view was derived from a stage of Indian Tantrism that was earlier than Bsod nams rinchen's more liberal view", and then writes about Maitripa as a "pertinent watershed in the history of Tantric Buddhism".

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2016 at 3:49 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Dzogchen?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

What differentiates practitioners of Mahamudra or HYT from Dzogchenpa, view, practice, both?

Astus wrote:

That sounds to me too broad a question. Practitioners are individuals, and people can use for practice all sorts of things, and approach the same method in many ways. As for the ideal part, there is creation stage, and there are various forms of completion stage: six yogas, dzogchen, and mahamudra. All four could be combined, all four can be used separately, and in any other setting. Besides that, I guess you are already familiar with the general descriptions of those methods.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2016 at 7:54 PM

Title: Re: Where are the bodhisattvas?

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

It is said that buddhas and bodhisattvas have both compassion and the wisdom to employ this compassion to benefit beings.

Yet one needn't look far to see cruelty heaped on misery heaped on natural disasters and decay in this world.

Some even insist on pursuing the very cause of their misery, while others struggle with all their might to overcome adversity yet fail.

Where is this perfect help from enlightened beings? What forms does it take?

Astus wrote:

The fundamental doctrine of Buddhism is karma, and that means everyone experiences what they are conditioned to experience. Through faith and devotion one can have buddhas and bodhisattvas manifest, but not otherwise. That is also the reason behind Amitabha being unable to simply deliver beings to the Pure Land - people have to intentionally aspire for such a birth, hence the necessity of faith, vow, and practice. What you propose, the problem of evil, does not apply to Buddhism, because not even buddhas can magically make any being's karma change. But we can change our own conditioning through mindfulness of gods, bodhisattvas, and buddhas.

At that time Śāriputra was influenced by the Buddha's numinous charisma to have this thought: "If the bodhisattva's buddha land is pure according to the purity of the bodhisattva's mind, then when our World-honored One was a bodhisattva his mind must have been pure. Nevertheless, this buddha land is so impure!"

The Buddha knew what he was thinking and asked him, "What do you think? Although the blind do not see them, can the sun and moon be anything but pure?"

[Śāriputra] answered, "No, World-honored One! This is the fault of the blind, not that of the sun and moon."

[The Buddha said], "Śāriputra, it is through the transgressions of sentient beings that they do not see the purity of the Tathāgata's (i.e., my) buddha land. This is not the Tathāgata's fault! Śāriputra, this land of mine is pure, but you do not see it."

(Vimalakirti Sutra, ch 1, BDK Ed, p 78)

"Those endowed with unpolluted faith and so forth, having cultivated the qualities of faith and so on,
will see in their own minds the Buddha's appearance, which is perfect and has special signs and marks.

They will see the Buddha while he is walking, while he is standing, sitting, or resting in sleep.
They will see him in manifold forms of conduct:
when explaining the teaching leading to peace,
when silently resting in meditative equipoise, or when displaying various forms of miracles.
Possessed of great splendor and magnificence,
[the Buddha] will be seen by all sentient beings.
Once having seen this, they too will wish to fully join what is named "buddhahood," and adopting its causes in a genuine way they will attain the state they longed for.
These appearances are totally free from ideation and do not involve the slightest movement at all.
There is nothing of this kind, and yet nevertheless they are accompanied by great benefit in the world.
"This is the appearance of my own mind."
Worldly beings do not have such insight.
Yet, their seeing of this visible kaya will become meaningful for these beings.
Relying on gradually beholding this form, all those who follow the [Great] Vehicle will see their genuine inner dharmakaya by means of the eye of primordial wisdom."
(Mahayana Uttaratantra Shastra, p 61-62, tr Fuchs)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2016 at 9:58 PM

Title: Re: Where are the bodhisattvas?

Content:

Footsteps said:

This portion is intriguing...

Do you not have awareness of your own mind, even if that awareness only appears in fleeting glimmers?

Astus wrote:

It means ordinary beings do not realise that all experiences are mental fabrications.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2016 at 11:25 PM

Title: Re: Where are the bodhisattvas?

Content:

Footsteps said:

If they are afforded with the awareness of their own minds, they will be afforded with the seed of awareness of which you speak. Thus, it will dawn on them that there is more to mere mental perception as they come to understand the limitations of mental perception...a natural state of development of the human soul.

Astus wrote:

It seems you have not familiarised yourself yet with the meaning of mind only in Buddhism. Might as well start <http://plato.stanford.edu/entries/vasubandhu/#DefAppOnl>.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2016 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: Patriarchy in Vajrayāna

Content:

conebeckham said:

I suppose the question is whether Vajrayana MUST reflect the power structures and dynamics of the environment, with respect to gender, and perhaps other factors

Astus wrote:

Religious communities adapt in order to survive. They preach what people like to hear, otherwise there will be no income. In Mahayana they call this skilful means.

Malcolm said:

The question is really, are Tibetan Buddhist practitioners in the West, who are otherwise in general pro-feminist, liberal, etc., unconsciously preserving antiquated patriarchal power relations in their attempts to be "good" disciples.

Astus wrote:

Those who like to hear liberal things will receive it. Those who are inclined towards hierarchy will receive that. Now let's think a bit about the common mindset of those who willingly submit themselves to church authority. But as long as Buddhism is not the mainstream, conservatives will normally stick with the culturally established ideologies.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2016 at 1:07 AM

Title: Re: Patriarchy in Vajrayāna

Content:

Malcolm said:

But the situation of patriarchal oppression is pervasive in this world among human beings. It is not skillful to teach patriarchal oppression in the name of "skillful means."

Astus wrote:

Patriarchal oppression does not happen to people, it is what people believe in. There is a difference between cultural bias and a small group of people using various methods to force others to follow their orders. When a guru is believed by the whole group to be superior and thus they allow him to have power over them, it is not that the guru had to force them to submit themselves. It actually takes a very aware teacher to recognise the power invested in him and to handle it appropriately.

Malcolm said:

For example, when it says that there are no women in the buddhafiield of Amitabha or Bhaisajyaguru, how do you think women feel about this? How would you feel if you were devalued based solely on your genitalia?

Astus wrote:

You might know women who say they accept the traditional values of patriarchy. Now consider women in the actual traditional culture. Most of them can only think that that's how the world works and there is nothing to be done about it. Same goes for men of course. I'm not saying it is good. What I'm saying is that if something seems like a universal value then opposing it is nonsense and practically unthinkable. Another example is torture and capital punishment that one can read about in the Nikayas where they are treated as simple karmic consequences. Women's lower status is just another form of karmic consequence, although not in the Nikayas but in the Mahayana scriptures.

To avoid the usual trappings, it is not grand social and political ideas one should come up with, but focus on the personal cultivation of compassion and wisdom. And then based on that it is possible to explain and realise them on a communal level.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2016 at 4:04 AM

Title: Re: Patriarchy in Vajrayāna

Content:

Malcolm said:

Hence the problem of people being unconscious of patriarchal power relations in which they are embedded.

Astus wrote:

That unconscious part is what I referred to above by saying that men and women equally live in it and keep it alive.

Malcolm said:

Yes, and this points to a deficiency in some Mahāyāna teachings which should be openly explored and not defended as Buddhavacana.

Astus wrote:

There are teachings addressing those deficiencies, even if not many.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2016 at 5:09 PM

Title: Re: According to Mahayana, is everything our karma?

Content:

Boomerang said:

For a long time I've had the understanding that in Mahayana Buddhism, absolutely everything we experience in life is the result of our karma, while in Theravada Buddhism there are exceptions. However, I don't really remember where I learned this from. What do you think?

Astus wrote:

All Buddhist schools point to karma as the fundamental force shaping everyone's experiences, Theravada included. Some may misinterpret the <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn36/sn36.021.than.html> as if certain natural factors independently influenced beings, but as it's noted in Thanissaro Bhikkhu's preface, even those factors are results of karma. As one can see in cosmological descriptions, the whole world is generated and sustained by karma. What should be remembered, however, is that not only past but also present actions of body, speech, and mind count.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2016 at 6:06 PM

Title: Re: According to Mahayana, is everything our karma?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

If one acts from compassion, is that the result of karma also? If it is, it is hard to see how liberation is possible at all.

Astus wrote:

There is the description of the 12 links of dependent origination that neatly tells how from ignorance and action comes about. There is also the reverse of the 12 links describing how liberation comes about. Compassion is based on ignorance for ordinary beings, therefore it creates good karma. Only when it is based on wisdom it is not a karmic act. That's why prajnaparamita is the most important for bodhisattvas, and every other paramita depends on that.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2016 at 6:53 PM

Title: Re: According to Mahayana, is everything our karma?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

When you say 'compassion is based on ignorance for ordinary beings', is what you mean that what ordinary beings take to be compassion is not actually compassion, but only attachment?

Astus wrote:

It is compassion, why wouldn't it be? But it goes with attachment, therefore maintains the ideas of subject, action, and object. Based on ignorance it is called compassion (karuna), and based on wisdom it is great compassion (mahakaruna).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2016 at 7:05 PM

Title: Re: Patriarchy in Vajrayāna

Content:

Dan74 said:

It is hard not to form prejudices when consistently subjected to negative experiences with a certain group.

Astus wrote:

The moment we think of a group we work with prejudices. A small group of male friends don't think of each other as "he is a man, therefore he acts in a certain way", because they can take each other to be individuals, and have preconceptions based on their unique history of interactions.

Buddhist wisdom is very much applicable here. One has to recognise that conceptual categories are nothing more than conditioned ideas.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2016 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: Patriarchy in Vajrayāna

Content:

Anders said:

Hilarious though. What are they going to use them for?

Astus wrote:

It's part of having a perfect body. If one doesn't have it, he cannot become a monk. It also has to be functional. More fun stuff about masculinity and Buddhism:

<https://books.google.com/books?id=0lZRt8i7Xq8C>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2016 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: Patriarchy in Vajrayāna

Content:

Kunga Lhadzom said:

maybe having a rational mind that can think logically is what they mean by having a penis?

Astus wrote:

The female body has several drawbacks in Buddhism. First of all, there are the "five obstacles, three subordinations" ( 五障三從), that is, no woman can become brahma, indra, mara, cakravartin, or buddha; and they are subject to their father as a child, their husband as an adult, and their son as an old person. Furthermore, particularly in East Asian Buddhism, they are impure from menstruation (see: <http://www.onmarkproductions.com/menstruation-sutra-michael-kelsey.pdf> and <http://www.reed.edu/hellscrolls/scrolls/Aseries/A06/A06e.html>), and suffer from giving birth (see: <http://www.buddhanet.net/e-learning/filial-sutra.htm>). It is also a regular theme that women are overly passionate.

Here is a famous section from the Nirvana Sutra (tr Yamamoto, ch 16):

"All good men and women desire to be born as a man. Why so? Because females are the nests of evil. Also, it is as in the case of the water of mosquitoes and sawflies, which cannot moisten this great earth. In addition, the sensual appetite of females cannot ever be satisfied."

But eventually the scripture states:

"Any person who does not realise that he has the Buddha-Nature is a woman. If he does so realise, he is a man. If any woman knows that she has the Buddha-Nature, she is a man."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2016 at 11:15 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Dzogchen?

Content:

Malcolm said:

can practice whatever they like or need from the eight lower yānas.

Astus wrote:

Why would they do that if it's complete as it is?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2016 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Dzogchen?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Because people have relative circumstances.

Astus wrote:

What do you mean by that? Is Dzogchen not sufficient, or is it functional only for some people?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2016 at 11:45 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Dzogchen?

Content:

Malcolm said:

let us say you are a Dzogchen practitioner, but you have a problem with alcohol. ... Let us say that you have a clear sign your life force is dwindling, then you might want to resort to various methods of cheating death and prolonging life.

Astus wrote:

Those issues are not related to the bodhisattva path. I wouldn't consider health, financial, or computer problems appropriately solvable with Buddhist methods, nor should they be seen as such.

Malcolm said:

the actual path of Dzogchen is never based on concepts and mind

Astus wrote:

That's great. No ideation, no self, no suffering. And that's why I raised the question about the need for doing anything else.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2016 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Patriarchy in Vajrayāna

Content:

Kunga Lhadzom said:

but maybe what this is really talking about is the mind. It takes a certain amount of intelligence to figure out what exactly Buddha-Nature is.....maybe you have to be a genius

Astus wrote:

I doubt that. Intelligence/rationality is associated with masculinity by modern Westerners, not ancient Asians. The reason I quoted those drawbacks of female birth was to show what can be considered connected with femininity. Rationality has not been seen as a difference between the sexes.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2016 at 12:24 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Dzogchen?

Content:

Malcolm said:

But they are, and are one of the reasons we have many methods of dealing with health, financial and other kinds of obstacles in the Vajrayāna tradition that Dzogchen practitioners can use as they see fit. If you get a Mac, you won't have computer problems, apart from hardware failures.

Astus wrote:

Really? Do you know a mantra perhaps for the problems caused by the current IOS upgrade on Apple devices? Could help a lot of people.

Malcolm said:

Well, when we talk about the path of Dzogchen, it goes beyond this inert kind of emptiness of which you are so fond.

Astus wrote:

That still doesn't answer the question. If it is a method that is sufficient for liberation, why use anything else? If one knows self-liberation, how could that not be enough?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2016 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Dzogchen?

Content:

Malcolm said:

IOS and OS X are not the same thing.

Astus wrote:

That's OK. I'm simply asking about those other special methods that work in all walks of life, like fixing IT problems. Practising patience is of course beneficial, but the machine cares not about your state of mind.

Malcolm said:

That's up to the individual person to decide for themselves.

Astus wrote:

Fair enough, I guess. If I remember correctly, Gampopa was happy to teach Mahamudra to everyone as the swift and efficient path, but reserved deity yoga and tummo to his circle of close disciples.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2016 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Dzogchen?

Content:

Malcolm said:

You will note I excluded IT problems. I also do not know of any mantras that can fix other inert things such as pots, wheels and so on, because they are inert.

Astus wrote:

I'm sorry to hear that. Maybe we have to wait a few more years for computers to become sentient.

Malcolm said:

Practices for healing, prosperity, increasing harvests and so on are abundant and useful since they relate to things that are alive, and not inert.

Astus wrote:

Is it possible to exchange one's 8 hours job for a 30 mins prosperity ritual but maintain the same income level? Might need a new topic for that perhaps.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2016 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Dzogchen?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, but that depends on the power of your siddhi. So I would not give up that day job just yet, Astus.

Astus wrote:

So it's the fault of the user if it doesn't work. How convenient.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2016 at 6:44 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

tiagolps said:

What is the difference between arahantship and buddhahood?

Astus wrote:

Arhats attained liberation from samsara. Buddhas attained everything that can be attained.

tiagolps said:

I know that buddhas attain omniscience, and thus are able to help beings in ways the arahants can not, but what else?

Astus wrote:

http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Buddha#Kayas_.26_Wisdoms, http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Eight_qualities_of_a_buddha, http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Eighteen_unshared_qualities_of_a_buddha.

See also: <https://books.google.hu/books?id=DTWZLMGFFgkC>.

tiagolps said:

And what is the connection between arahantship and buddhahood?

Astus wrote:

Both mean freedom from rebirth.

tiagolps said:

How do arahants progress to the mahayana path after attaining Nirvana?

Astus wrote:

They start on the 6th/7th bhumi.

It should also be remembered that arhats in Mahayana mainly represent those practitioners who think that annihilation is the solution, and they mistake meditative peace for enlightenment. That's why they need to be waken up from their false nirvana to continue the path.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2016 at 3:48 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Dzogchen?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Astus does.

Astus wrote:

What is an inert emptiness? What other emptinesses do you know?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2016 at 4:10 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Dzogchen?

Content:

Malcolm said:

What in fact that Dzogchen tradition rejects is that the two stages are needed at all. They can be used if desired, but they are not necessary.

Astus wrote:

Mahamudra works without them as well.

"Still others just meditate on mandala circles,
Some are fixed in explaining the purport of the fourth,
For some [reality] is conceptually visualized as space,
Still others would have [reality] possess emptiness.
In general they are fixed in contradiction."
(Ornamental Flower for the Dohas, v 45–49, Dreaming the Great Brahmin, p 136)

"No tantra, no mantra, nothing to meditate on, no meditative concentration.
These all are causes which delude your ego.
Do not corrupt your mind, whose nature is pure, with meditative concentrations.
Station the true self in bliss, and cause it no torment.
Basking in eating, drink, and sex
Fills the nodes again and again,

Through such a teaching, the ends of the earth are reached";
Stamp down such deluded defenders of the world and move on.
Those in whom the breath and mind do not move,
And the sun and moon are uninvolved,
Ignorant ones, you must rest your breath.
Saraha has taught all instructions and gone away."
(v 95–106, p 141-142)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2016 at 4:52 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

tiagolps said:

So from the mahayana viewpoint, arahants aren't really free from samsara?

Astus wrote:

They are. That is what makes them arhats. But besides that, there are all sorts of interpretations and opinions about them. For instance, arhats have their own cult in East Asia in the form of 16/18 <http://www.onmarkproductions.com/html/rakan-arhat-lohan.shtml>.

There is no generally applicable definition either, as views are contradictory and diverse, starting with the difference between saying that arhats end their career at parinirvana and those who say they don't, although I've also found an explanation that simply says that some arhats are finished while some continue on the bodhisattva path.

Interestingly, if we compare the early teachings where one has to be free from identification with the aggregates, and teachings on the obscurations in Mahayana that block one from attaining buddhahood, it turns out that there should be no difference at all between arhats and buddhas.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2016 at 4:59 PM

Title: Re: According to Mahayana, is everything our karma?

Content:

muni said:

I think we cannot just say conventional bodhichitta is ignorance.

Astus wrote:

That's not it. The point is that good deeds merely result in good effects, nothing more. In case one aspires for enlightenment, such good circumstances are used to study the Dharma. But in order to engage in the practice of the paramitas, the most important is to establish oneself in prajnaparamita, because that is what makes the other five into paramitas and not simply good deeds.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2016 at 6:58 PM

Title: Re: Patriarchy in Vajrayāna

Content:

daelm said:

patriarchal oppression definitely happens to people.

Astus wrote:

Who are the oppressors?

daelm said:

when a systemic institutional

Astus wrote:

Yes, it is in the whole system, it is not that a few individuals make others obey, but everyone serves a role by believing in the system itself.

daelm said:

if there are institutional misogynies in a system, they will still have effects unless they are addressed.

Astus wrote:

I agree with that. But it's not just a few oppressors one has to inform of being oppressors, but everyone in the whole system must recognise the entire construction. The oppressed has to recognise their own situation and address their own preconceptions that help the system to stay.

daelm said:

if the tenets being taught still embed such biases, the biases will still have the expected outcomes

Astus wrote:

It extends beyond mere tenets. It goes back to the common belief that physical attributes define mental function. Consequently, even talking about male and female deities as if they symbolised certain qualities is sexist.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2016 at 2:33 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

tiagolps said:

That's what makes this question so complicated haven't been able to find a concrete answer, the most confusing explanation is when arahants are called selfish by mahayanists, how can they be free from samsara if they are selfish?

Astus wrote:

In Mahayana arhats are mostly fictional dummies playing the role of dumb practitioners. Plus neither in China nor in Tibet were any strong Hinayana school, so there is nobody behind the term arhat, just as there have been no pratyekabuddhas even in India. Unless one wants to repeat arguments that have lost their meanings more than a thousand years ago, one has to engage in some sort of discussion with the current Theravadins.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2016 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

Of course there is a difference; arhats possess non-afflictive ignorance. Buddha's don't. But if arhats want to realize Mahāyāna buddhahood, they must begin at the beginning, since they lack both accumulations.

Astus wrote:

Arhats cannot have cognitive obscuration, because that would mean attachment to mental aggregates. Saying that they are stuck in the samadhi of cessation of course means that they have been reduced to the level of asamjnisattvas. Then it is quite easy to refute them - or rather the arhats one has made up - as mistaken.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2016 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

maybay said:

I beg your pardon, there were most certainly pratyekabuddhas.

Astus wrote:

Pratyekabuddhas exist when there is no Buddhadharma in the world. That is, no Buddhist has ever met one in the last 2500 years.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2016 at 2:51 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

This does not follow at all.

Astus wrote:

How so? If one grasps at concepts, that is identifying with at least some mental aggregates. If no mental phenomena is attached to, where can be any cognitive obscuration?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2016 at 3:18 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Dzogchen?

Content:

Malcolm said:

Kagyü Mahāmudra, Trekchö, the view of the inseparability of samsara and nirvana, etc., all have the same point: resting in a moment of unfabricated consciousness. Dzogchen goes beyond this point, that's all.

Astus wrote:

In what way does it go beyond? For instance, the seven distinguishing features of thögal (Treasury of Precious Qualities, vol 2, p 269) can be valid for Mahamudra as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2016 at 4:01 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Dzogchen?

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, they cannot be. There is no practice of thögal in any gsar ma system.

Astus wrote:

I didn't say there is thögal. I said that the listed features can be true for Mahamudra as well. Let me quote it then:

First, practitioners on this path are not distinguished by the sharpness or dullness of their faculties, but rather by the intensity of their endeavor, greater or lesser as this may be.

Second, practitioners do not rely on mental analysis because they can see ultimate reality directly.

Third, because they have a direct realization of awareness as it truly is, they do not rely on mere words.

Fourth, since the natural luminosity (of primordial wisdom) is actually present, the ground, path, and result are not chronologically related to each other.

Fifth, since it does not depend on karmic sequences, good or bad, this path is free from the strenuous and discriminative practices of adopting and rejecting.

Sixth, since the self-arisen luminosity manifests from within, there is no difference between young and old practitioners.

Seventh, practitioners enjoy a perfect experience of the three kayas even while they are still on the path. They capture the everlasting kingdom of spontaneously present awareness in the expanse of primordial purity.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2016 at 4:10 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

Absence of attachment does indicate absence of cognitive obscuration.

Astus wrote:

What do you call cognitive obscuration then?

Malcolm said:

For example, one may have no attachment to chocolate, and nevertheless be ignorant of the flavor of coffee.

Astus wrote:

That is not obscuration, that is lack of information. By the way, Shakyamuni tasted neither.

Malcolm said:

Likewise, arhats may be free of gross attachment to the three realms, but they are ignorance of all modes of awakening, among other things.

Astus wrote:

Arhats are free from attachment to the five aggregates. There is nothing more to be attached to. So, either they have knowledge of all modes, or knowledge of all modes does not come from lack of clinging.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2016 at 4:36 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Astus wrote:

...knowledge of all modes does not come from lack of clinging.

Malcolm said:

Yes.

Astus wrote:

Yes it does come from lack of clinging? Or yes, there is a different cause? If the latter, what is it?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2016 at 4:47 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

maybay said:
Knowledge comes from developing your faculties.

Astus wrote:
What faculties? Like sight and taste?

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2016 at 5:12 AM
Title: Re: Difference in attainments
Content:
anjali said:
Here is how it is explained by Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche in As It Is, V2:

Astus wrote:
That is the same definition as in the Uttarat Tantra Shastra, and it can go back further to Yogacara's grasper/subject and grasped/object. An arhat that does not grasp at the aggregates cannot have those subtle concepts either. Primarily, because there is no attachment to concepts. Secondly, because an arhat has realised the lack of self, and without an owner/grasper there can be no owned/grasped either.

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2016 at 5:39 AM
Title: Re: Difference in attainments
Content:
Malcolm said:
Yes, it does not come from a lack of clinging.

Astus wrote:
Mipham seems to disagree:

One may wonder: "Although this does eliminate the cognitive obscuration that obscures the nature as it is, how can it eliminate the cognitive obscuration that obscures all that exists?" All that exists and the nature as it is are no different in the real condition and, when the distorted frame of mind that blindly apprehends contrary to the nature of things is eliminated, the wisdom that correctly realizes this real condition will effortlessly perceive all possible existing things.
(Gateway to Knowledge, vol 3, p 222)

And that agrees with the view that once the two obscurations are gone all knowledge is attained.

Malcolm said:
Arhats realize selfness of the aggregates only, they do not realize the selflessness of all phenomena because the aggregates do not include all phenomena, but only afflicted conditioned phenomena.

Astus wrote:

An arhat has also realised the lack of self in all six areas of perception. Since all appearances that occur are one of the five aggregates and six areas, there cannot be anything an arhat grasps as self or belonging to a self. Furthermore, belief in any kind of substance can occur only in the aggregates, and since no aggregate is grasped, no view can be grasped either.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2016 at 5:47 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

Not so. When we say that "Arhats realize the selfless of the aggregates," in fact they do not realize the selflessness of the aggregates themselves, rather, only the selflessness of the person imputed on the aggregates.

Astus wrote:

That is the usual definition of their attainment, that they take the aggregates real but not any self. Or in other words, they differentiate aggregates with attachment and aggregates without attachment, where the latter is considered the final attainment. Now, if they are not attached to the aggregates, then they cannot be attached to any view, because views are concepts, and concepts are within the aggregates.

If the emptiness of person for arhats means not grasping a self but grasping the aggregates, that is a contradiction, because grasping the aggregates is itself grasping at a self. Eliminating grasping at aggregates is the method taught even in Mahayana as the way to relinquish the attachment to a real self.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 13th, 2016 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

You are referring to upādāna-skandhas? Anupādāna, non-addictive, simple means that these aggregates are not a cause for future rebirth. There is no implication that they are not regarded as being existent and so on. All that is being implied is that śrāvakas recognize that there is no person (pudgala) in the aggregates and therefore the aggregates are no longer addictive (upādāna).

Astus wrote:

Upādāna is the support, the fuel, and without it there is nothing to rely on, no burning. Since the aggregates are still there without clinging, at least until complete extinction, it can be said that they exist. On the other hand, because there is no identification nor appropriation (me, mine), there is no reliance on physical or mental appearances, hence no view clung to (diṭṭhupādāna), no attachment to the extreme of existence or non-existence. What is the basis then for any cognitive obscuration?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 13th, 2016 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

Just because there is no view regarding the person, does not mean that there does not still remain views regarding dharmas. Also, as pointed out, Arhats do not realize emptiness free from all four extremes of proliferation. Why? They realize only the emptiness of the person.

Astus wrote:

You seem to say that arhats merely learn this idea that there is no self but fail to learn that there is no substance of any kind, as if no-self were merely a conceptual view for them. What I say is that realising no-self in case of an arhat means not grasping the aggregates. If no aggregates are grasped, then no concepts are grasped. If no concepts are grasped, there are no views attached to either.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2016 at 5:35 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

That's why I said no bodhisattvas. If there are no sentient beings, what are the bodhisattvas holding back for?

Astus wrote:

Samsara never ends, there are infinite sentient beings, and buddha-nature is permanent. In other words, while Hinayana can be misunderstood as annihilationist, Mahayana can equally be called eternalist. Of course, both can also deny such extremes, and explain how emptiness is neither.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2016 at 10:04 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Rakz said:

But if it did end then Buddhas would too enter into the samadhi of cessation like they already do temporarily after the universe gets destroyed.

Astus wrote:

Nirvana is not nirodhasamapatti (samadhi of cessation). Otherwise yes, that is one of the interpretations, and that's why bodhisattvas are said to delay the attainment of nirvana.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2016 at 7:01 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

Sure it is, the only difference between vajropama-samadhi and nirodhasamapatti is whether one is an ārya or not.

Astus wrote:

http://www.palikanon.com/english/wtb/n_r/nirodha_samaapatti.htm is the 9th dhyana, not nirvana, and it is also called the cessation of perception and feeling. It is not the same as the http://www.palikanon.com/english/pali_names/ay/asannasatta.htm, because of the difference in the cravings eliminated (Samuccaya p 19). They both differ from http://www.palikanon.com/english/wtb/n_r/nibbaana.htm, because that means the complete extinction of defilements, but the faculties remain functional until death, while with death there is no more becoming of any bodily or mental existence (Samuccaya p 137). As for vajropamasamadhi, that is the attainment eliminating all defilements that leads to nirvana (Kosha, vol 3, p 981-3, 1020-1021; Samuccaya p 174), so it is different from nirodhasamapatti that does not necessarily lead to the elimination of all defilements.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2016 at 7:09 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Rakz said:

Just curious, where is it stated in the sutras that samsara never ends and the number of beings are infinite?

Astus wrote:

Check the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bodhisattva_vow#East_Asia themselves.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2016 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

The only difference between the two, as I already said, is whether it belongs to an ārya or not. In the case of an ārya, it leads to the elimination of afflictions, in the case of a commoner, it does not.

Astus wrote:

Both are available only to aryas. However, neither of them are nirvana. And the point is that nirodhasamapatti is not the destination of arhats.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2016 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

Well, technically, nirodhasamapatti and nirvikalpa samadhi are the same, differentiated by whether one is a commoner or a buddha, and the latter is the vajropamasamadhi of a buddha.

Astus wrote:

Nirodhasamapatti means the suspension of perception and feeling. Nirvikalpa means the absence of false discrimination as a lack of substantialist conceptualisation, but both perceptions and feelings are functional. One is a high level absorption, the other is a high level wisdom.

"Non-discrimination in the absence of idle speculation should not be understood as nonthought (amanasikara), or as going beyond thought (manasikarasamatikrama) or as appeasement (vyupasama), or as [*own-]*nature (svabhava), or as a mental construction concerning an object (alambane abhisamskara), but as a mental non-construction concerning an object (alambane anabbisamskara)."
(Samuccaya p 240)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2016 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Cessation of perception is what nirvana is.

Astus wrote:

Then asamjnisattvas are arhats. And how do you rectify that with the meaning of sopadisesanirvana?

Crazywisdom said:

The arya enters and exits this meditation and sees the 12 links in forward and reverse order thereby seeing how there is nothing to be perceived (no self) in any link. So it's all one vision in essence.

Astus wrote:

Seeing no-self is one thing, abiding in the cessation of perception is another, and nirvana is a third.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 17th, 2016 at 4:44 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

It's the seeing w discernment that avoids becoming a mindless being and and connects with signlessness, emptiness, etc... Discerning the three doors and 12 links in every stage.

Astus wrote:

It says nowhere that nirodhasamapatti is nirvana. What it says is that following nirodhasamapatti there is only nirvana that is more pleasant.

Not only arhats can attain nirodhasamapatti, but also non-returners. Therefore, it doesn't equal nirvana.

“Here, bhikkhus, a bhikkhu accomplished in virtuous behavior, concentration, and wisdom might enter and emerge from the cessation of perception and feeling. If he does not reach final knowledge in this very life, then, having been reborn among a certain group of mind-made [deities] that transcend the company of devas that subsist on edible food, he might [again] enter and emerge from the cessation of perception and feeling. There is this possibility.”

(AN 6.166 / III.194, tr B. Bodhi)

Nirvana can be attained without accomplishing the formless absorptions, therefore one may never experience nirodhasamapatti but still be an arhat (SN 12.70). In one sutta (SN 8.7) it is even said that 64% of arhats are like that, that is, liberated by wisdom.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 17th, 2016 at 6:03 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Equating it with nibbana.

Astus wrote:

If it were the same as nirvana, there would be no need to see it with discernment/wisdom. Furthermore, it could not be that one doesn't attain arhatship.

Crazywisdom said:

This is not an either or situation.. Buddha was open to different outcomes. But cessation is a path to nibbana.

Astus wrote:

Following nirodhasamapatti one gains either the state of an arhat, or the state of a non-returner. There is no third option.

"How does the emergence from it come about? The emergence comes about in two ways thus: by means of the fruition of non-return in the case of the nonreturner, or by means of the fruition of Arahantship in the case of the Arahant."

(Vism. XXIII.49, p 741)

Crazywisdom said:

So here entirely different terms are used, but it should be clear "Even this much..." means Nibbana

Astus wrote:

As before, it requires seeing with discernment, and discernment cannot occur while there is no perception.

Crazywisdom said:

You make the mistake of thinking there are logically distinct categories.

Astus wrote:

Why is that a mistake?

Crazywisdom said:

In the Nibbana Sutta it's clearly stated that cessation is Nibbana.

Astus wrote:

It's not stated anywhere. Please provide a quote that explicitly says that.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 17th, 2016 at 4:13 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

I did. Twice. Plus, Buddha is saying there is possibility of discernment in cessation.

Astus wrote:

Both quotes describe a sequential order, that following absorption in cessation there is a reflection on that state. If, as you claim, cessation were equal to nirvana, there would be no need to be followed up by reflection. Furthermore, when there is no perception, how can discernment be performed?

Crazywisdom said:

Discernment is what is causing Nibbana in any case.

Astus wrote:

Since cessation is not discernment, and cessation precedes discernment, cessation cannot be the same as nirvana.

Crazywisdom said:

Or Nibbana is a kind of discernment, with a wide variety of ways to get to it.

Astus wrote:

Nirvana means the complete cessation of defilements. That is neither an absorption, nor a discernment.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 17th, 2016 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

But I contend, the wisdom aspect of mind is never stopped.

Astus wrote:

What is that wisdom aspect? If you assume there is something beyond the five aggregates, that contradicts both Hinayana and Mahayana teachings.

Crazywisdom said:

Cessation of perception and feeling is not the same as a coma.

Astus wrote:

"What is the difference between one who is dead, who has completed his time, and a monk who has attained the cessation of perception & feeling?"

"In the case of the one who is dead, who has completed his time, his bodily fabrications have ceased & subsided, his verbal fabrications ... his mental fabrications have ceased & subsided, his vitality is exhausted, his heat subsided, & his faculties are scattered. But in the case of a monk who has attained the cessation of perception & feeling, his bodily fabrications have ceased & subsided, his verbal fabrications ... his mental fabrications have ceased & subsided, his vitality is not exhausted, his heat has not subsided, & his faculties are exceptionally clear. This is the difference between one who is dead, who has completed his time, and a monk who has attained the cessation of perception & feeling."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.043.than.html>)

Crazywisdom said:

The discerning mind is not included in either of perception or feeling.

Astus wrote:

Perception means the function of identifying things. How do you discern without the ability to identify anything?

Crazywisdom said:

The self-knowing awareness

Astus wrote:

There are only six types of consciousness, they all are dependent on objects, and all of them come under the consciousness aggregate.

"Consciousness, monks, is classified simply by the requisite condition in dependence on which it arises. Consciousness that arises in dependence on the eye & forms is classified simply as eye-consciousness. Consciousness that arises in dependence on the ear & sounds is classified simply as ear-consciousness. Consciousness that arises in dependence on the nose & aromas is classified simply as nose-consciousness. Consciousness that arises in dependence on the tongue & flavors is classified simply as tongue-consciousness. Consciousness that arises in dependence on the body & tactile sensations is classified simply as body-consciousness. Consciousness that arises in dependence on the intellect & ideas is classified simply as intellect-consciousness."

(<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.038.than.html>)

"It would be better for the uninstructed run-of-the-mill person to hold to the body composed of the four great elements, rather than the mind, as the self. Why is that? Because this body composed of the four great elements is seen standing for a year, two years, three, four, five, ten, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, a hundred years or more. But what's called 'mind,' 'intellect,' or 'consciousness' by day and by night arises as one thing and ceases as another. Just as a monkey, swinging through a forest wilderness, grabs a branch. Letting go of it, it grabs another branch. Letting go of that, it grabs another one. Letting go of that, it grabs another one. In the same way, what's called 'mind,' 'intellect,' or 'consciousness' by day and by night arises as one thing and ceases as another."

(<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.061.than.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 17th, 2016 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Five wisdoms, Buddha-nature, hello?

Astus wrote:

Those are Yogacara and Vajrayana ideas, not Hinayana.

Crazywisdom said:

Faculties are exceptionally clear, hello?

Astus wrote:

"mental fabrications have ceased & subsided" - hence no discernment. Faculties (indriya) means only the senses, in other words, one who is in nirodhasamapatti has not lost the ability to sense, but there is nothing that occurs to be sensed.

Crazywisdom said:

Nirodha is identified. He knows, it is stopped, etc.

Astus wrote:

Since there is no perception, there is no possibility of conceiving that "it is stopped".

"The thought does not occur to a monk as he is attaining the cessation of perception & feeling that 'I am about to attain the cessation of perception & feeling' or that 'I am attaining the cessation of perception & feeling' or that 'I have attained the cessation of perception & feeling.' Instead, the way his mind has previously been developed leads him to that state."

...

"The thought does not occur to a monk as he is emerging from the cessation of perception & feeling that 'I am about to emerge from the cessation of perception & feeling' or that 'I am emerging from the cessation of perception & feeling' or that 'I have emerged from the cessation of perception & feeling.' Instead, the way his mind has previously been developed leads him to that state."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn41/sn41.006.than.html>)

Crazywisdom said:

So Nibbana can discern peace, happiness, freedom, etc. many qualities are discerned that do not fall within the above lists. Nibbana is also called a consciousness, pure, clear, luminous all around. So the capacity to know and understand is always available.

Astus wrote:

What do you base those assumptions on? Nirvana is the final cessation of defilements. It is not a consciousness, especially because all six consciousnesses are conditioned. Discernment is a mental function that occurs within the four mental aggregates and it is necessarily the object of the sixth consciousness.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 18th, 2016 at 2:22 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

I addressed your points, but you won't address mine, eg, re cessation and clear faculties

Astus wrote:

I did respond to that, saying that faculties are the basic sensory ability, namely eyes, ears, nose, tongue, skin, mind. However, nothing occurs as physical object, since one is well beyond the rupadhyanas. Nor is there anything to appear for the mind, as both feelings and thoughts have ceased. That's why one of the quoted suttas explicitly say that the bodily, the verbal, and the mental functions have stopped.

Crazywisdom said:
and nirvana as pure consciousness.

Astus wrote:
There are six consciousnesses. They are neither pure nor impure. Positing a seventh consciousness as nirvana is not based on any Buddhist teaching that I'm aware of. Please quote your sources.

Crazywisdom said:
Your use of the indriya and sense bases is non responsive.

Astus wrote:
How so? I have clearly stated what faculties mean. But see what the Princeton Dictionary of Buddhism says:

"In the sutra literature, indriya typically refers to the five or six sense bases: e.g., the visual, auditory, olfactory, gustatory, and tactile faculties associated with the physical sense organs and the mental base associated with the mind; in the case of the physical senses, the indriya are forms of subtle matter located within the organs of the eye, ear, nose, tongue, and body that enable the functioning of the senses. The mind (manas) is typically listed as a sixth, internal sensory faculty."

Crazywisdom said:
It's also contradicted by the passages previously cited.

Astus wrote:
What exactly contradicts what?

Crazywisdom said:
By the way you cited the passages about having clear faculties in cessation.

Astus wrote:
Yes. That's a difference between one who is in absorption and one who is dead, that the one in absorption has functioning senses. It doesn't mean, as you seem to interpret, that there are objects occurring to those faculties.

Crazywisdom said:
Nibbana is a consciousness

Astus wrote:
Which one of the six is it?

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, September 18th, 2016 at 3:31 AM
Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Nibbana is it.

<http://community.dhammaloka.org.au/showthread.php/244-Meaning-of-Vi%C3%B1%C3%B1%C4%81%E1%B9%87a%E1%B9%83-anidassana%E1%B9%83>

Astus wrote:

As Ajahn Brahmali points out there:

"Remember that there is no mind apart from the five khandhas, the aggregates. The mind is nothing apart from the the mental aggregates working together. When consciousness ceases, the mind also ceases. Nibbāna is simply the cessation of suffering, since all these things are suffering."

See also Sujato's (friend of Brahmali) posts:

<https://sujato.wordpress.com/2011/05/13/vinna%E1%B9%87a-is-not-nibbana-really-it-just-isn%E2%80%99t/>

<https://sujato.wordpress.com/2011/05/21/nibbana-remains-not-vinnana/>

<https://sujato.wordpress.com/2011/05/18/nibbana-is-still-not-vinna%E1%B9%87a/>

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 18th, 2016 at 3:34 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

No. I'm saying Nibbana is a discernment and it happens in the cessation, because Nibbana is a consciousness without surface or feature and also because it does not come or go, and because it is luminous whether there are defilements or not

Astus wrote:

In other words, you're positing an unconditioned consciousness. That is a clear case of belief in a self.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 18th, 2016 at 4:46 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

So there's no denying this refers to Nibbana vinnanam annidassanam, anantam sabbatopham.

Astus wrote:

It refers to consciousness without attachment. That is what being liberated means. Nirvana is the end of all attachments. But it doesn't mean there is an unconditioned consciousness. It is simply an unestablished (appatiṭṭha) consciousness.

"But when one doesn't intend, arrange, or obsess [about anything], there is no support for the stationing of consciousness. There being no support, there is no landing of consciousness. When that consciousness doesn't land & grow, there is no production of renewed becoming in the future. When there is no production of renewed becoming in the future, there is no future birth, aging & death, sorrow, lamentation, pain, distress, or despair. Such is the cessation of this entire mass of suffering & stress."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.038.than.html>)

"Where there is no passion for the nutriment of consciousness, where there is no delight, no craving, then consciousness does not land there or increase. Where consciousness does not land or increase, there is no alighting of name-&-form. Where there is no alighting of name-&-form, there is no growth of fabrications. Where there is no growth of fabrications, there is no production of renewed becoming in the future. Where there is no production of renewed becoming in the future, there is no future birth, aging, & death. That, I tell you, has no sorrow, affliction, or despair."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.064.than.html>)

"If a monk abandons passion for the property of consciousness, then owing to the abandonment of passion, the support is cut off, and there is no landing of consciousness. Consciousness, thus not having landed, not increasing, not concocting, is released. Owing to its release, it is steady. Owing to its steadiness, it is contented. Owing to its contentment, it is not agitated. Not agitated, he (the monk) is totally unbound right within. He discerns that 'Birth is ended, the holy life fulfilled, the task done. There is nothing further for this world.'"

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.053.than.html>,

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.054.than.html>,

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.055.than.html>)

"Whatever you're alert to, above, below,
across, in between:
dispelling any delight,
any laying claim
to those things, consciousness should not take a stance in becoming.

The monk who dwells thus — mindful, heedful — letting go of his sense of mine, knowing right here would abandon birth & aging, lamentation & sorrow,
stress & suffering."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/kn/snp/snp.5.04.than.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 18th, 2016 at 5:55 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Now you're speaking out of both sides of your mouth and conceding my point. And you're wrong it is unconditioned and unestablished consciousness. Besides. This is a distinction without a difference, unless one is imputing a difference for pedagogy. But in this case doing so obscures the point that these are the same thing.

Astus wrote:

Unconditioned means that it is without cause, it is permanent. Such a consciousness is impossible. Unestablished is simply another word for lack of attachment, lack of the mistaken concept of a self. In other words, unestablished consciousness (no self) means the exact opposite of unconditioned consciousness (self).

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 18th, 2016 at 6:02 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

Perhaps off topic, but where is the difference between nirvana and annihilation at death if the extent of Dharma ends at the five skandhas?

Astus wrote:

The aggregates cease to occur after parinirvana, that is the Hinayana view. However, it is not annihilation, because there is no self that is destroyed. This is clarified in teachings like the <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.072.than.html>, the <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.085.than.html>, and the <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.086.than.html>.

Monlam Tharchin said:

Does not contact cease with dissolution of the body, therefore the types of consciousnesses no longer have a basis? I have a hard time sussing out the difference between nirvana and ordinary death in the case of a consciousness predicated on bodily senses.

Astus wrote:

There are six consciousnesses, so there is also a mind-consciousness that occurs based on mental objects. That's why there is rebirth. But when there is no more craving, no more attachment, no more self view, then there is no cause for rebirth.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 18th, 2016 at 7:00 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

There is a something not conditioned, if there weren't the path would be impossible.

Astus wrote:

I didn't say there is nothing unconditioned. I said that consciousness cannot be unconditioned. It is nirvana that is unconditioned.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 18th, 2016 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

Abhidharmasammuvaya, pg. 135

Astus wrote:

That talks about nirodha, the third noble truth. I meant there nirodhasamapatti, the 9th dhyana. They are not the same.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 18th, 2016 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

Astus, out of curiosity: what do you mean by "consciousness"? Are you using it in the specific context of the skandhas, dhatus and ayatanas, or in the broadest possible sense, to designate all and any possible types of cognition?

Astus wrote:

As Malcolm said, the fifth aggregate.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 19th, 2016 at 1:03 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

The latter leads to the former.

Astus wrote:

Not necessarily, because one can attain not only arhatship but also the state of the non-returner.

Malcolm said:

The Mahāyāna point is that arhats, when they pass away, enter that equipoise and remain there, since we do not accept that there can be an absolute cessation of the mind.

Astus wrote:

There is no arising, hence no cessation either. It is because all appearances are unborn that they are no different from nirvana. That's why the emptiness of phenomena is emphasised as the unique wisdom of bodhisattvas. However, it is a misinterpretation even in Hinayana to say that an arhat ceases to exist, for the same reason it is a mistake in Mahayana: there is nothing to cease. At the same time, there is nothing to persist either. So, saying that the mind-stream continues on forever is at best a provisional teaching for those afraid of becoming nothing.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 19th, 2016 at 4:25 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, since Sautrantikas assert that Nirvana is a nonexistence, it is definite that the highest Hinayāna view maintains that nirvana is a nonexistence. Other Hinayāna schools maintain that nirvana is some unconditioned phenomena, belonging to cessation due to insight.

Astus wrote:

I assume you're referring to this:

"What is called pratisankhyanirodha or Nirvana is—when both the defilements already produced and the existence already produced are destroyed—the absence of any other defilements or any other existence, and that by reason of the force of the consciousness (pratisamkhyā-prajñā)."

(Kosha II.55d; v 1, p 280-281)

It is not simply non-existence, but the end of defilements and the existence (suffering) that comes from those. This is nothing more than the statement repeated so often with the twelve links of dependent origination, how because of the "remainderless fading & cessation of that very ignorance comes ... the cessation of birth. From the cessation of birth, then aging & death, sorrow, lamentation, pain, distress, & despair all cease. Such is the cessation of this entire mass of stress & suffering."

(<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.002.than.html>)

But would you say that the Sautrantikas or others claimed a definitive negative answer to the question whether the Tathagata exists after death? At the same time, are you of the opinion that the Mahayana answer is a definitive yes?

Malcolm said:

If the purified continuums of buddhas and bodhisattvas do not continue forever, it follows that they must somehow cease.

Astus wrote:

That is simply exchanging "self" for "continuum", and positing the extremes of existence and non-existence.

Malcolm said:

If they must somehow cease, this is an annihilationist position.

Astus wrote:

And if they must persist, it is the eternalist position.

Malcolm said:

If you are argue it is merely a self within that continuum that does not cease because it does not exist, this still leaves us with the purified continuum of buddhas and bodhisattvas persisting forever since there is no condition by which such a continuum should cease given that there is no condition by which the continuums of sentient beings, the object of their compassion, will cease.

Astus wrote:

What is the maintaining force of that continuum? It cannot be ignorance, or defilements, nor can it be wisdom, or compassion. Then what?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 19th, 2016 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

It is not that they must, it is simply that they do.

Astus wrote:

That still makes it an eternalist interpretation. Beings are literally immortal.

Malcolm said:

Aspirations.

Astus wrote:

That is? Ordinary beings have selfish aspirations, while noble beings have selfless aspirations? That sounds like saying that the third noble truth is false and there is only craving.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 19th, 2016 at 5:03 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

tomamundsen said:

which phenomena are not included in the skhandas?

Astus wrote:

The unconditioned dharmas are categorised under the dhatus but not the skandhas in the Kosha.

"All conditioned dharmas are included within the totality of the skandhas (i.7); all of the impure dharmas are included within the totality of the upadanaskandhas (i.8); and all the dharmas are included within the totality of the ayatanas and the dhatus (i.14)."
(Kosha, I.18; vol 1, p 76)

"Unconditioned things are not named with respect to the skandhas, because they do not correspond to the concept."
(Kosha, I.22a-b; vol 1, p 81)

Same in Theravada where nibbana is a mental object, hence include in the 12 ayatanas and 18 dhatus, but it is different from the 8 supramundane minds - they take nibbana as the object - that are within the 5 aggregates.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 19th, 2016 at 5:23 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

their continuums are sustained on infinite causes.

Astus wrote:

Ignorance is taught to be the root cause of birth. Saying that birth can never end means that ignorance cannot be the root cause. What is it then that sustains it?

Malcolm said:

Prañidhāna-pāramitā.

Astus wrote:

For bodhisattvas and buddhas compassion is said to be the driving force so that they don't abandon beings. Such a condition is needed if birth can end. But since birth cannot end, there is no need for such an aspiration, and there is always either a deluded or an enlightened inclination that sustains birth, in which case both types of beings are subjects to birth and death. Thus nirvana is samsara.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 19th, 2016 at 6:39 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

Then you and CW are just talking past each other, are you not?

Astus wrote:

I do not see how. Consciousness, any kind, is necessarily conditioned. Nirvana is not a consciousness, but the final extinction of defilements. CW is of the opinion that somehow there can be an unconditioned consciousness. That I call illogical and impossible, because consciousness is always the awareness of something, and that means change, but change cannot happen to what is unconditioned.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 19th, 2016 at 8:44 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

the cause of the continuity of buddhas is the force of previously made aspirations. This is not controversial. Buddhas are beyond birth and death, as are bodhisattvas on the pure stages.

Astus wrote:

How can they be beyond rebirth when there is no end of birth? Non-abiding nirvana means being present in samsara without being affected by it. That is practically no different from nirvana with remnants, where the arhat has only functional minds (kiriya-citta) that are beyond karma. The only difference lies in the compassion part. If bodhisattvas and buddhas are sustained by their aspirations, since an arhat is without such vows, there should be no reason for the continuity of birth. Saying that they still have to be reborn because of cognitive obscurations leads us <http://dharma-wheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=355583#p355583> in this topic. Not to mention the non-afflictive nature of cognitive obscurations that make them irrelevant regarding rebirth. In other words, what if there were no vows made, and why wouldn't that mean the end of the mind-stream?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 19th, 2016 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

there are no buddhas who made no aspirations

Astus wrote:

Ignorance cannot be what sustains rebirth, because then arhats would be finished, as they are without aspirations. It also cannot be established that arhats grasp at non-existence and that's why they succumb temporarily to an inactive state, since they are without any form of identification with anything. Furthermore, if aspirations are necessary for the buddhas to remain functional, that in itself means that dependent origination is driven by mental effort.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 19th, 2016 at 11:41 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

Not quite. CW is of the opinion that all consciousness (vijñāna) is afflicted, unestablished and conditioned -- but there is also unafflicted cognition (aka as wisdom, jñāna) which is unestablished and unconditioned. Controversial?

Astus wrote:

Any form of consciousness/awareness/cognition is conditioned, because it is dependent on the object that is perceived. A consciousness without anything to be conscious of is unconsciousness. Affliction is the attachment to appearances, believing them to be independent, unconditioned, and thus regarding them as self or the possession of a self. Recognising the empty nature of phenomena means abandoning the false concept of substantiality, of self, and it is brought about by contemplation performed with a conditioned mind. If an unconditioned consciousness were necessary to realise emptiness, then such a realisation could never happen, or it had already been realised, because what is unconditioned does not change.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2016 at 5:00 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

Yes, dependent origination is a mind-driven process. Isn't that plainly obvious?

Astus wrote:

Of course. What is it that drives the mind? The Hinayana position is that it is ignorance, and with the ignorance removed there is no reason for another birth. Mahayana follows that view, that's why it needs to exchange ignorance with aspirations, since that type of understanding comes from the Hinayana version of the bodhisattva path, in other words, all the Mahayana explanations are built to back up an already accepted model. And the problem I see here is that it lacks the explanation for why arhats could not simply end the process, thus questioning the assumption that the mind-stream is unceasing.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2016 at 5:36 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

Would you say that your position is representative of what Chan Buddhism has to say on the matter?

Astus wrote:

No. There is hardly anything that all of Chan followers would universally agree on anyway. What I said regarding the impossibility of an unconditioned mind is more in line with what you find in the Nikayas and Madhyamaka. But to give a Zen example, Dogen was quite serious in attacking the idea that buddha-nature means an independent mind.

treehuggingoctopus said:

Do you consider suchness to be conditioned?

Astus wrote:

As the Samdhinirmocana Sutra explains in its second chapter (BDK ed. p 11): "Good son, in sum, all things are of two kinds, conditioned and unconditioned. Herein conditioned things are neither conditioned nor unconditioned, and unconditioned things are neither unconditioned nor conditioned."

In other words, suchness is a word, a concept, and as such it is conditioned. At the same time, seeing it to be conditioned means it is without any meaning on its own, and that meaninglessness is the unconditioned. Hence suchness is conditioned because it is unconditioned because it is conditioned, and that's how it is simply such.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2016 at 6:11 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

If I am reading you correctly, you are equating suchness with emptiness, right?

Astus wrote:

Emptiness emphasises that there is no substance. Suchness emphasises the illusory appearance.

treehuggingoctopus said:

The logic of the head-spinning second sentence seems to me somewhat dubious.

Astus wrote:

What is the doubt about?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2016 at 7:28 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

Would your reasoning be valid with respect to that nonconceptual merely apparent "something" the word "suchness" points to?

Astus wrote:

What is there to say about silence? It means there is nothing said. Similarly, non-conceptual means nothing conceived. What is there to elaborate, to conceptualise, about the lack of concepts? Then to come up with the view that somehow we can nevertheless perceive something makes it more complicated than necessary. Rather, what makes one's view non-conceptual (nirvikalpa) is not being mindless but not having the wrong view of self/substance, because that is what results in grasping and suffering, not thoughts in general. And that's what it means to see the conditioned as conditioned.

treehuggingoctopus said:

More importantly, does your suchness include the subject side, i.e., the mere knowing of appearances?

Astus wrote:

Mere knowing is an imaginary idea based on the mistaken view that for some reason concepts are bad. And that concept of "mere view" only leads to the wrong sort of meditation where people try to remain thoughtless.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2016 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

what I meant by "mere knowing"

Astus wrote:

I see, so it was the lack of grasper and grasped, in other words: vijñaptimātra.

treehuggingoctopus said:

You did not answer my question, though.

Astus wrote:

Which one?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2016 at 9:29 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

Does what you mean by suchness include the "subject side," the (appearance of) mere knowing?

Astus wrote:

As I see it, everything in Buddhism is about the subjective point of view (skandhas, dhatus). So, as suchness is about the illusory appearances, it fits what is also called mere knowing or mind only.

"The recognition of the one vehicle is obtained when there is no rising of discrimination by doing away with the notion of grasped and grasping and by abiding in the reality of suchness (yathabhuta)."

(Lankavatara Sutra, 2.56, tr Suzuki)

"When the external world is not grasped [as real] there is neither causation nor reality; there is the essence of suchness (tathata), which is the [spiritual] realm of the wise."

(Lankavatara Sutra, 3.62, tr Suzuki)

"Suchness (tathata), emptiness, realm of truth (dharmadhatu), the various forms of the will-body— these I call Mind-only."

(Lankavatara Sutra, 3.64, tr Suzuki)

"When erroneous views based on the dualistic notion of assertion and negation are gotten rid of, and when the Vijñanas cease to rise as regards the objective world of names and appearances, this I call "suchness.""

(Lankavatara Sutra, 6.83, tr Suzuki)

"Whenever, regarding the objective realm,
Knowledge is completely devoid of something obtained,
Then it dwells in consciousness only,
Because it is divorced from characteristics of the twofold grasping."

(Trimsika, v 28, tr Cook, BDK ed. p 383)

"For it has been said by the Tathagata that "the five skandhas are reckoned as the 'world.'" Therefore then, Subhuti, that which is the Suchness of the skandhas, that is the Suchness of the world; that which is the Suchness of the world, that is the Suchness of all dharmas; that which is the Suchness of all dharmas that is the Suchness of the fruit of a Streamwinner, and so on, up to: that is the Suchness of Pratyekabuddhahood, that is the Suchness of the Tathagata. In consequence all this Suchness, -the Suchness of the Tathagata, of the skandhas, of all dharmas, of all holy Disciples and Pratyekabuddhas- is just one single Suchness, is without any trace of the variety of positivity and negativity, as being one, non-different, inextinguishable, unaffected, non-dual, without cause for duality."

(PP8000, XII.3, tr Conze)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2016 at 9:46 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

If ignorance were the ultimate or first cause of the mind (it isn't) than everything you say would make sense. But ignorance is not the ultimate or first cause of the mind, and in fact, ignorance is not inherent to the mind, as your query suggests. In fact, it is affliction in general that drives samsara, but afflictions do not drive the mind.

Astus wrote:

What Mahayana teaching is it that goes beyond the twelve links of dependent origination? The twelve is what establishes ignorance as the root cause, and it is also what is given as the force driving both the mind and the whole of the world.

Malcolm said:

Third, just because one no longer takes rebirth in the three realms does not mean that one's mind has ceased to exist. The mind does not exist in the three realms; the three realms exist in the mind.

Astus wrote:

What is it that drives the mind if not ignorance and the subsequent afflictions?

(If possible please give something else as well, besides Dzogchen sources.)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2016 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

In Chapter 3 of the Kośabhaṣyam, Vasubandhu, representing the Sautrantika point of view, rejects the idea, quite decisively, that ignorance is the first cause of the 12 nidanas.

Astus wrote:

Is this what you're referring to?

"From defilement there arises defilement and action; from whence foundation; from whence a new foundation and defilement: such is the manner of existence of the parts of existence or bhavangas."

(Kosha, III.27; vol 2, p 407)

That simply means that ignorance is not without a cause, and of course there is no "first cause" either. What I said was that ignorance is the root of the defilements.

Malcolm said:

And the Buddha never says anywhere that afflictions are the cause of the mind.

Astus wrote:

A small reminder of the twelve nidanas then: ignorance -> formations -> consciousness -> name and form (name = consciousness) -> six ayatanas (sixth ayatana = consciousness).

"Only the skandhas, conditioned by defilement and action, go reincarnating themselves by means of the series of intermediate existences. As an example: the lamp."
(III.18a-d; vol 2, p 399)

Do you propose a consciousness beyond the five aggregates?

Malcolm said:

We can know from many sources, including the Pabhassara Sutta, that afflictions are not inherent to the mind.

Astus wrote:

Afflictions are not inherent to the mind, and that's not been stated here. What is stated is that ignorance gives rise to birth, and birth includes the birth of consciousness.

Malcolm said:

If the mind arose from affliction, it could never be free of affliction

Astus wrote:

Wheat grows from the soil, but bread should not have soil in it. And there is the well known metaphor of the lotus. The whole world is said to arise from ignorance.

Malcolm said:

If we follow your idea, it would seem that all there is samsara, and ultimately, when the mind ceases, samsara ceases.

Astus wrote:

When there is no more birth there is no more samsara. I have not realised this is my idea.

Malcolm said:

Why?

Astus wrote:

I'm not asking to leave Dzogchen out, but simply to provide others who support it.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2016 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

This does not show that the mind arises because of afflictions. It merely shows that mind is conditioned by afflictions.

Astus wrote:

When there is one, there is the other, when the one is not, then the other is not - that is the basic structure of dependent origination. If it were to say that there are all these 12 elements lying around influencing, but not generating, each other, then it could not even be called origination.

Maybe this is explicit enough then:

"When, friends, a noble disciple understands consciousness, the origin of consciousness, the cessation of consciousness, and the way leading to the cessation of consciousness, in that way he is one of right view... and has arrived at this true Dhamma.

And what is consciousness, what is the origin of consciousness, what is the cessation of consciousness, what is the way leading to the cessation of consciousness? There are these six classes of consciousness: eye-consciousness, ear-consciousness, nose-consciousness, tongue-consciousness, body-consciousness, mind-consciousness. With the arising of formations there is the arising of consciousness. With the cessation of formations there is the cessation of consciousness. The way leading to the cessation of consciousness is just this Noble Eightfold Path; that is, right view... right concentration.

When a noble disciple has thus understood consciousness, the origin of consciousness, the cessation of consciousness, and the way leading to the cessation of consciousness... he here and now makes an end of suffering. In that way too a noble disciple is one of right view... and has arrived at this true Dhamma."

...

"With the arising of ignorance there is the arising of formations. With the cessation of ignorance there is the cessation of formations."

...

"With the arising of the taints there is the arising of ignorance. With the cessation of the taints there is the cessation of ignorance."

...

"With the arising of ignorance there is the arising of the taints. With the cessation of ignorance there is the cessation of the taints."

(<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.009.ntbb.html#vinnana>; see also: <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.035.than.html>, <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.017.than.html>)

"Through the cessation of this and that,
This and that will not be manifest.
That which is only a mass of suffering
Will thus completely cease."
(MMK 26.12, tr Samten-Garfield)

Malcolm said:

Are you also proposing Buddhas are like pieces of wood? Without any consciousness at all?

Astus wrote:

"Buddha-activity is unceasing because it is devoid of conceptualising"

(Uttaratantra 7.284, tr Holmes)

Beings experience buddhas and lands dependent on their perception. Buddhas are beyond thought and intention. What kind of consciousness is there to be for them?

"Any consciousness by which one describing the Tathagata would describe him: That the Tathagata has abandoned, its root destroyed, made like a palmyra stump, deprived of the conditions of development, not destined for future arising. Freed from the classification of consciousness, Vaccha, the Tathagata is deep, boundless, hard to fathom, like the sea. 'Reappears' doesn't apply. 'Does not reappear' doesn't apply. 'Both does & does not reappear' doesn't apply. 'Neither reappears nor does not reappear' doesn't apply."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.072.than.html>)

"One who holds firmly
That the Tathagata exists
Will have to fabricate his nonexistence
After having achieved nirvana.
Since he is essentially empty,
Neither the thought that the Buddha exists
Nor that he does not exist
After having achieved nirvana is tenable."
(MMK 22.13-14)

Malcolm said:

Are you further proposing that afflictions are inherent to the skandhas?

Astus wrote:

No.

Malcolm said:

Likewise, if the cause of the mind is ignorance (wheat seed) it is impossible that a mind could ever be awakened (lotus), since its nature and its continuum is inherently ignorant (wheat), since its cause is ignorance (wheat seed).

Astus wrote:

Is a buddha a consciousness?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2016 at 4:40 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

Therefore, you are asserting that afflictions are a necessary precondition for the arising of the mind, period.

Astus wrote:

And apparently so does everyone else who accept the twelve nidanas as Buddhadharma.

Even the Uttaratantra states:

"It is true happiness, since [even] the aggregates of mental nature and their causes are reversed."
(v 38)

And DJKR comments:

"The dharmakaya has no aggregates, not even the subtlest aggregates, nor the cause of such aggregates, which is ignorance. When there is no ignorance and no result of ignorance, namely the aggregates, there is no suffering. That is transcendental bliss."
(p 46-47)

Malcolm said:

So you think buddhas are pieces of wood, inert, like rocks.

Astus wrote:

As the Uttaratantra states, they make no effort, and all activities are illusory.

"Here the meaning of the chapter is as follows:

The nine aspects of physical display and so on [show] that the Teacher has no birth and death, and yet perfectly manifests without any effort. Something that, similar to Indra, the drum, clouds, Brahma, the sun, the precious king of wish-granting gems, an echo, space, and the earth, effortlessly and as long as existence may last fulfils others' benefit is only conceived of by [supreme] yogis."
(v 363-364)

Malcolm said:

Jñāna. The only difference between dualistic consciousness (vijñāna) and pristine consciousness (jñāna) is the presence and absence of the vi- prefix. They are both a kind of consciousness, however, and they exist on a continuum. With the removal of obscurations of both afflictions and knowledge, vijñāna gradually becomes jñāna.

Astus wrote:

When vijnana loses the two obscurations and only jnana remains, what is it that maintains the continuity? If you say it's the aspirations, then those vows were added to vijnana and the continuity is not the result of the absence of defilements.

Malcolm said:

Buddhahood is a supramundane jñāna.

Astus wrote:

And what does that actually mean? A buddha is without thoughts, lacks the functions of the five aggregates, all activities are automatic, and the effect on beings is solely dependent on the deluded perception defined by their karma. From the perspective of beings, it's always their own conceptualisations they perceive. From the perspective of the buddha, well, a buddha has no perspective at all, and does nothing whatsoever.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2016 at 5:41 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

No one accepts that afflictions are a precondition for the arising of the mind, if one does, it renders the Pabhassara Sutta meaningless.

Astus wrote:

If that were the case, then no school could posit the disperse of the aggregates following parinirvana of the arhat. And that contradicts the accusation of the Hinayana schools' annihilationist view.

Malcolm said:

He just means upadana skandhas. For example, it well known that the mental aggregate transforms into the four pristine consciousness according to the Mahayānasamgraha

Astus wrote:

If aggregates without attachment may continue, then there is no point in their transformation, nor in changing vijñāna into jñāna.

Malcolm said:

And nevertheless the Buddha has five aggregates.

Astus wrote:

Aren't they supposed to change into the four/five wisdoms?

Malcolm said:

In the case of an arhat, what sustains their consciousness until they are aroused from the slumber of the samadhi of cessation is their intention to enter that samadhi.

Astus wrote:

Arhats are supposed to be without all kinds of craving. And craving for existence (bhavatanha) or non-existence (vibhavatanha) are two basic types of desire.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2016 at 5:47 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Sentient Light said:

According to Vasubandhu, jñāna is pure unmediated cognition, empty of conceptions, perceptions, etc. It is stainless, the surface of water after all debris has been cleared away.

Astus wrote:

Where does he write that?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2016 at 4:59 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

Anupadāna-skandhas are the transformed aggregates.

Astus wrote:

That's what arhats have. How is there any difference then between arhats and buddhas in terms of the aggregates?

Malcolm said:

Arhats may be without craving, but they still have cetana.

Astus wrote:

Since even buddhas can be described by aggregates without attachment, they have cetana too. Furthermore, cetana is a universal mental factor, necessary for any mental function.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2016 at 7:26 PM

Title: Re: Flavors of Nationalism... and the wind tossed seas of Open Dharma

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't really see how patriotism/nationalism can sound anything acceptable to those who are not on the right wing side of the political spectrum. It sounds to me a harmful idea used for harmful purposes, both in the past and the present.

Here's a fine example of patriotism/nationalism:

Since the mid 19th century Jews in Austria-Hungary rapidly assimilated into the mainstream culture and accepted the national identity as their own. This reached the point where in the late 1930's Jews actively supported the Hungarian government, despite the anti-Jewish laws already in effect. The last time there was a thanksgiving service for a Hungarian head of state by Jews was for the 76th birthday of the governor and regent https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Mikl%C3%B3s_Horthy in the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Doh%C3%A1ny_Street_Synagogue of Budapest, on 18 June 1944. They had already heard about what happened to Jews in other countries and in other parts of Hungary, but they believed that it could never happen to them, since they are Hungarians. Deportations from Budapest began on 30 June.

And as for collective responsibility:

3.5 million Germans were expelled from Poland by 1950, and the death toll was around 400,000. 2.4 million Germans were expelled from Czechoslovakia between 1945-48, with a death toll around 15,000. 239,000 Germans were expelled from Hungary, the death toll was about 11,000.

See: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Potsdam_Agreement#Expulsions, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bene%C5%A1_decrees#Loss_of_citizenship_and_confiscation_of_property.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2016 at 10:15 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

The aggregates of an arhat are not transformed because they have not realized dharmakāya.

The buddhas do not have cetana, because of the transformation of the samskara skandha.

Astus wrote:

So there are the upadana-skandhas, the anupadana-skandhas, and what is the third version?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2016 at 11:40 PM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

Arhats have an inferior conversion, according to Asanga, because arhats are afraid of transmigration and reject it since their realization of emptiness is confined to the selflessness of the person.

Astus wrote:

The Samgraha says nothing new on the matter, just that arhats know only personal emptiness while bodhisattvas the dual emptiness. It does not really discuss the aggregates in relation to the arhats. So, I don't think that work is of much help here.

"This conversion of support has six varieties: ... 5) inferior conversion— the realization by word-hearers of the non-self of persons, which completely turns away from transmigration and constitutes an eternal rejection of transmigration; 6) extensive conversion—the realization by bodhisattvas of the non-self of things, wherein by understanding the merits of quietude and insight, they both abandon and do not abandon [transmigration]."

(Samgraha 9.2, BDK ed. p 100)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 22nd, 2016 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: Flavors of Nationalism... and the wind tossed seas of Open Dharma

Content:

Queequeg said:

Astus, see the first post in this thread.

I specifically addressed race or culture as basis for national identity and offered the American version as alternative.

Astus wrote:

Jews are not a race, nor are Germans, even if pre-1945 imagined biological traits of every nation were considered real and scientific. National identity of any kind is nationalism - it only takes a nicely tailored historical narrative to make up a nation.

Queequeg said:

This points to American Nationalism being something fundamentally different than say, nationalism in the UK, or Germany, or Ukraine, or Russia, or whatever. Race or culture or religion does not matter to most of us as much as fundamental commitment to certain ideals, to a certain social contract.

The moment American nationalism becomes racial, I think it loses its meaning.

Astus wrote:

That's actually a very good start. One first has to establish why one's nation is unique, special. From that come the concepts of being outstanding and superior. Leader of the free world. Germans, French, Italians, and English each consider their nation better than the other three, and there is no need to add racism here, since all four are traditionally white societies. To give an example how even racism is not that straightforward, look at this: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Honorary_Aryan. It's always "certain ideals" that matter.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 22nd, 2016 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Malcolm said:

This says volumes, then of course there is Sthiramati's commentary on this work.

Astus wrote:

Does it? Sounds like the same argument used before.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 22nd, 2016 at 4:45 AM

Title: Re: Flavors of Nationalism... and the wind tossed seas of Open Dharma

Content:

maybay said:

If someone says sit Japanese style u know what they mean. But if u talking to Japanese people its inappropriate. You should say seiza or whatever.

Astus wrote:

Seiza 正座 literally means correct 正 sitting 座. When a buddha or bodhisattva sits like that, it's called Yamato-suware 大和座, i.e. Japanese sitting.

<http://lapizlazuri.net/yamatosuware.html> are some examples. So, you could actually tell a Japanese to sit in the Japanese style.

The opposite of correct/Japanese sitting is agura 胡座 that means barbarian (foreign) 胡 sitting 座, and it refers to sitting cross-legged, i.e. Indian style.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 22nd, 2016 at 7:00 AM

Title: Re: Difference in attainments

Content:

Astus wrote:

"In brief, the chief thing that sravakas must realize is the selflessness of the person. To understand that, they must eliminate grasping at the aggregates as true [things]. This is because "grasping at truth qua grasping at the truth of the aggregates" is the ever-present power that is the direct cause of the apprehension of the self of the person." (Gorampa: Distinguishing the Views of Emptiness, in Freedom from Extremes, p 225)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 23rd, 2016 at 5:29 PM

Title: Re: Flavors of Nationalism... and the wind tossed seas of Open Dharma

Content:

Virgo said:

People think about nationalism as long as their country is prospering, is lawful, and is a nice place to be in

Astus wrote:

I'd say it's the opposite. When things seem to be in a bad condition it is easy to turn to nationalist ideas and blame "the others" for all the problems. Same goes for religion.

People care little about abstract ideas as long as there is ample source of material comfort and entertainment. Of course, the philosopher (wisdom lover) is a different kind, and like the Buddha, leaves behind vulgar pleasures even when they are available.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 24th, 2016 at 4:14 PM

Title: Re: Why is Amitabha absent in American Zen and TB?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Why should Amitabha appear in Soto Zen at all? He is nowhere included in the <http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/practice/sutra/scriptures.html>. Officially Shakyamuni is the "main image of worship" (honzon 本尊) of the school. Kannon has a special place, as the example of the perfect bodhisattva. As for aiming for birth in Sukhavati, that is meaningless for one who understands that zazen is practice-enlightenment.

"Even if up to now, you have thought that a buddha has excellent characteristics like Shakyamuni or Amitabha, radiates a halo, has the virtue of preaching the dharma and benefiting living beings, you should believe your teacher if he says that buddha is nothing but a toad or an earthworm, and throw your former ideas away. However, if you look for some excellent characteristics, a halo, or other virtues of a buddha on the toad or the earthworm, you still have not reformed your discriminating mind. Just understand what you see right now is buddha. If you continually reform your discriminating mind and fundamental attachment in this way according to your teacher's instruction, you will naturally become one with the Way.

Students today, however, cling to their own discriminating minds. Their thinking is based on their own personal views that buddha must be such and such; if it goes against their ideas, they say that buddha cannot be that way.

Having such an attitude and wandering here and there in delusion, searching after what conforms to their preconceptions, few of them ever make any progress in the Buddha-Way."

(Dogen: http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/common_html/zuimonki/01-13.html)

If you are looking for PL related elements, Chinese and Vietnamese Buddhist communities usually have them.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 24th, 2016 at 5:15 PM

Title: Re: are you someone special?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"What is pride (<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/M%C4%81na>)? It is exaltation of the mind (cittasyonnatih) which rests on the idea of self. Its function consists of giving a basis to the appearance of contempt (agaurava) and suffering."

(Abhidharmasamuccaya, p 12)

"Soṇa, when any ascetics and brahmins, on the basis of form—which is impermanent, suffering, and subject to change—regard themselves thus: 'I am superior,' or 'I am equal,' or 'I am inferior,' what is that due to apart from not seeing things as they really are?

When any ascetics and brahmins, on the basis of feeling ... on the basis of perception ... on the basis of volitional formations ... on the basis of consciousness—which is impermanent, suffering, and subject to change—regard themselves thus: 'I am superior,' or 'I am equal,' or 'I am inferior,' what is that due to apart from not seeing things as they really are?

Soṇa, when any ascetics and brahmins do not, on the basis of form—which is impermanent, suffering, and subject to change—regard themselves thus: 'I am superior,' or 'I am equal,' or 'I am inferior,' what is that due to apart from seeing things as they really are?

When any ascetics and brahmins do not, on the basis of feeling ... on the basis of perception ... on the basis of volitional formations ... on the basis of consciousness—which is impermanent, suffering, and subject to change—regard themselves thus: 'I am superior,' or 'I am equal,' or 'I am inferior,' what is that due to apart from seeing things as they really are?"

(<https://suttacentral.net/en/sn22.49>)

THE NINE CONCEITS

One produces the conceit: "I am superior to others who are superior"; or one produces the conceit: "I am equal to the superior ones"; or one produces the conceit: "I am inferior to the superior ones;" or one produces the conceit: "I am superior to others who are like me;" or one produces the conceit: "I am inferior to others who are like me;" or one produces the conceit: "I am superior to those who are inferior;" or one produces the conceit: "I am equal to those who are inferior;" or one produces the conceit: "I am inferior to others who are inferior". These nine conceits are destroyed through the Path of Saintship.

(Vimuttimaggā, p 317)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 26th, 2016 at 2:34 AM

Title: Re: Why is Amitabha absent in American Zen and TB?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The first major teacher of Pure Land and Chan together was https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Yongming_Yanshou, who was likely the most outstanding Buddhist teacher in early Song China. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Zhongfeng_Mingben, an heir of Gaofeng Yuanmiao (1238-1296) - the one who invented the method of the three essentials of kanhua chan, i.e. faith, determination, doubt - taught Pure Land practices, just as his disciple Tianru Weize (1286-1355) whose work "Doubts and Questions about Pure Land" (淨土或問) has been translated to English and published in "Pure Land Buddhism - Dialogs with Ancient Masters"

(http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/pureland.pdf).

It is a rather mistaken view to call it a combination or syncretism, since they have not really existed separately, and this view of a Zen corrupted by Pure Land is a late Japanese interpretation used against the Obaku school and Chinese teachers in the 18th century, then later taken up by early Western scholars and projected on Chinese Buddhism following Japanese scholarship.

Meido said:

What I have not found, however, is the opposite: Zen teachings interpreted in light of Pure Land teachings e.g. that Zen's "seeing nature/becoming Buddha" really means that one will attain rebirth in Amitabha's Pure Land.

Astus wrote:

Birth is attained through faith, vow, and practice. One may practice Zen and aim for birth in the Pure Land. In fact, it is recommended to aim for birth there, because seeing one's nature is no easy thing, and even after that one can still fall back and encounter numerous hindrances. At the same time, all bodhisattvas are said to aspire towards the Pure Land.

This is often quoted from Yongming:

有禪無淨土 十人九錯路
陰境若現前 瞥爾隨他去
無禪有淨土 萬修萬人去
但得見彌陀 何愁不開悟
有禪有淨土 猶如帶角虎
現世為人師 當來作佛祖
無禪無淨土 鐵床并銅柱
萬劫與千生 沒箇人依怙

"With Ch'an without the Pure Land
Nine people out of ten take the wrong road.
If the skandhic states appear,
Instantly they follow.
Without ch'an but with pure land
Ten thousand cultivate and ten thousand go.
You only need see Amitabha
And what worry is there of no enlightenment?
With Ch'an and with Pure Land
One is like a tiger wearing horns.
In the present acting as people's teacher,
In the future one will be a patriarch.
Without Ch'an and without Pure Land,
It's the iron bed and the brass pillar.
In ten thousand kalpas and a thousand lives,
There is no one you can turn to."

(http://www.drbachinese.org/vbs/1_100/vbs72/72_1.html, see also: Original Teachings of Ch'an Buddhism, p 236)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 26th, 2016 at 4:04 PM

Title: Re: The 5th Skandha

Content:

maybay said:

Awareness never drops away. It just gets clouded over with obscurations. The consciousnesses that we cling to are a confusion.

Astus wrote:

Awareness is never clouded. Awareness is not separate from the skandhas, just as emptiness is not separate from them. Awareness means that skandhas are experienced, and it is a quality that is always true, just as they are always empty.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 26th, 2016 at 8:50 PM

Title: Re: The 5th Skandha

Content:

maybay said:

At some point you're going to have to account for the deluded condition.

Astus wrote:

Delusion is the mistaken view that there is anything stable in the aggregates and thus forming an identification with it.

maybay said:

If pristine awareness is the sky, then it is meaningful to say clouds of confused appearances obscure that awareness.

Astus wrote:

The sky and clouds are merely a metaphor. Ignorance is not separate from the aggregates, just as ignorance is not separate from awareness. Recognising ignorance to be empty awareness is freedom from ignorance.

What is ignorance? Good sons, all sentient beings fall into various inverted views without beginning. Just like a disoriented person who confuses the four directions, they mistakenly take the Four Elements as the attributes of their bodies and the conditioned shadows of the Six Objects as the attributes of their mind. It is just like when our eyes are diseased and we see flowers in the sky, or a second moon. Good sons, the sky actually has no flowers—they are the false attachment of the diseased person. And because of this false attachment, not only are we confused about the self-nature of the sky; we are also mixed up about the place where real flowers come from. From this there is the falsely existent transmigration through life and death. Therefore it is called "ignorance."

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/sutra_of_perfect_enlightenment.html)

maybay said:

The sky is always there. It just becomes unrecognizable.

Astus wrote:

As I have said before, awareness and emptiness are qualities of the aggregates. There is no separate awareness. Is impermanence ever unrecognisable? It is always recognisable. But as long as one keeps to the idea of permanence, it is not recognised.

maybay said:

You seem to be suggesting that the skandhas are always A. Experienced and B. Empty. But it is wrong to say that they are always experienced as empty.

Astus wrote:

I have not said they are always experienced as empty. Whatever experience there is, it is always empty: without essence, without self, without anything to grasp. The question is whether one recognises it or not.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 27th, 2016 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: The 5th Skandha

Content:

maybay said:

Just the way you write this makes me think you believe the aggregates have some reality.

Astus wrote:

As you say, they are categories of experience.

maybay said:

they bear different characteristics, e.g. form has the characteristic of impermanence.

Astus wrote:

All five are impermanent. All five are empty. All five are awareness, i.e. experiences. Those are actually universal characteristics that are true for all five of them.

maybay said:

It's just the way you worded it. Sounds like you're trying to mix together too many systems of thought. In a thread on skandhas we shouldn't really be talking about awareness. We shouldn't need to.

Astus wrote:

That's what this topic is about. As it asks in the OP: "How does consciousness divide from awareness?"

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 27th, 2016 at 12:21 AM

Title: Re: The 5th Skandha

Content:

Malcolm said:

This the basic problem with translated the term "rigpa" as "awareness."
It simply does not work.

Astus wrote:

Doesn't have to be "rigpa". Buddha-nature has been identified as awareness (zhi 知) by some Chan teachers as well. Interestingly, zhi 知 means both "to know" and "to be aware".

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 27th, 2016 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: The 5th Skandha

Content:

Malcolm said:

"Awareness" is a term which is next to useless in a Buddhist context.

Astus wrote:

What do you suggest? <https://books.google.com/books?id=bUgg9aWaAH8C> translated zhi 知 as "knowing".

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 27th, 2016 at 1:34 AM

Title: Re: The 5th Skandha

Content:

maybay said:

Sorry I meant change, not impermanence.

Astus wrote:

What's the difference? What is impermanent changes, what changes is impermanent.
All five aggregates change.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 27th, 2016 at 2:39 AM

Title: Re: The 5th Skandha

Content:

Malcolm said:

What does zhi mean in Sanskrit?

Astus wrote:

It can be a translation of various words. According to the Buddhist Chinese-Sanskrit Great Dictionary (佛教漢梵大辭典):

√jñā, -jñā, jñāna, vi-√jñā, pra-√jñā, √vid, -vid, ava-√budh; ajyate, adhigata, adhi-√gam, adhigamana, anugata, anugama, anujñāpita, anu-pra-√viś, anupraviṣṭa, anu-√budh, anubodha, anumāna, anusāritva, anusmaraṇatā, antara-jñā, abhi-√gam, -abhijñā, abhi-√jñā, abhisambodhanatā, abhisambodhi, ava-√gam, avagama, ava-√gāh, avatāra, avatīrṇa, ava-√tṛ, avadhāraka, avabudhyanatā, avabodha, avabodhana, avê(√i), avêkṣ(√īkṣ), avetya, ā-√jñā, ājñā, ājñākhyā, ājñāta, ājñātāva, ājñāna, ājñēndriya, ājñeya, āsada, ucyate, udaya, upalakṣaṇa, upalakṣyate, upalabdhi, eṣṭavya, kovida, √kṣam, gatiṃ-gata, √gam, gamyate, gāmin, √gāh, √grah, grahaṇa, cetana, jānaka, jñāta, jñāpita, jñeya, dṛśyate, dṛṣṭvā, draṣṭavya, nidhyapti, nidhyāpta, niścaya, parāyaṇa, parikuśala, pari-cchid(√chid), pari-√ñā, parijñā, parijñāta, parijñāna, parijñānatā, parijñāyate, prajāna, prajānat*, prajñā, prajñāna, pratijñāyate, prati-√budh, pratibhāvayati, prativijñapti, prati-vi-√jñā, prativijñāna, pratividdha, prativibhāvayati, prativedha, prati-√vyadh, pratisaṃvidita, pratisaṃvedana, prati(√i), praty-anu-√bhū, pratyabhijñā, pratyabhijñāna, pra-vi-√ci, buddhi, budhyanatā, budhyanā, bodha, bhajana, mata, √man, manas, lakṣyate, labdha, va-√gāh, vicārayati, vi-√ci, vijñapti, vijñā, vijñāta, vijñāpana, vijñāyate, vidita, vidhi-jñā, vibuddhana, vibhāvayati, vibhāvita, vibhāvya, vetṭṛ, veda, veditavya, vedin, saṃ-lakṣaya (den.), saṃ-√jñā, saṃ-anu-√dṛś, saṃ-anu-√paś, saṃ-anv-ā-√hṛ, saṃ-√āp, samudāgama, saṃ-√jñā, saṃ-pra-√dṛś, suniścita, smṛti.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 27th, 2016 at 2:46 AM

Title: Re: The 5th Skandha

Content:

maybay said:

No only form changes. If change was a characteristic of the other aggregates then there would be no (mistaken) sense of permanence. What was a good feeling doesn't turn into a bad feeling. The recognition of blue doesn't change to a recognition of purple. The formation of disgust doesn't morph into the formation of scepticism. The cognition of one thing will not change into another thing. It is only form that changes, and consequently one experiences different feelings, perceptions etc. As form changes so the continuity of experiencing it, the perception of its blueness etc is disrupted.

Astus wrote:

I think you should change your mind about that.

Appearances are momentary, both mental and material.

"It would be better for the uninstructed run-of-the-mill person to hold to the body composed of the four great elements, rather than the mind, as the self. Why is that? Because this body composed of the four great elements is seen standing for a year, two years, three, four, five, ten, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, a hundred years or more. But what's called 'mind,' 'intellect,' or 'consciousness' by day and by night arises as one thing and ceases as another. Just as a monkey, swinging through a forest wilderness, grabs a branch. Letting go of it, it grabs another branch. Letting go of that, it grabs another one. Letting go of that, it grabs another one. In the same way, what's called 'mind,' 'intellect,' or 'consciousness' by day and by night arises as one thing and ceases as another."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.061.than.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 27th, 2016 at 4:50 AM

Title: Re: The 5th Skandha

Content:

maybay said:

This just proves my point Astus.

Astus wrote:

What part? You said that mind does not change. That sutra emphasises specifically that the mind changes rapidly, and we can easily recognise that.

maybay said:

Impermanence is another word for death. But change is another word for alteration.

Astus wrote:

The difference you make between change and impermanence is that with change you imply a persisting substance, and such a view is inadmissible in the Buddhist analysis of the skandhas. I don't even see the point in making up such a distinction.

"there is no form... no feeling... no perception... there are no fabrications... there is no consciousness that is constant, lasting, eternal, not subject to change (<http://dsalrv02.uchicago.edu/cgi-bin/philologic/getobject.pl?c.0:1:2314.pali>), that will stay just as it is as long as eternity."

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.097.than.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 27th, 2016 at 3:19 PM

Title: Re: The 5th Skandha

Content:

Malcolm said:

What is the most common Sanskrit term it represents?

Astus wrote:

No idea.

Here's the DDB's <http://www.buddhism-dict.net/ddb/indexes/term-sa.html> glossary, and for zhi 知 there are 423 results. And as for the possible English translations of zhi 知 it gives:

To know, to realize, to understand, to be aware of.

To appreciate, distinguish, be acquainted with.

To recall, to see.

To inform, to let know.

Knowledge, awareness, consciousness, ability to know. Wisdom.

To find out the "most common" would take some in depth search or a good source.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 27th, 2016 at 3:42 PM

Title: Re: The 5th Skandha

Content:

maybay said:

The sutra speaks only about the arising and ceasing. And certainly it could not mean that one mind will arise and then another different mind will cease, which would be chaos.

Astus wrote:

All four mental aggregates are momentary, just like the body. Even Yogacara accepts the momentariness of mind.

maybay said:

The body on the other hand can arise, change, and cease (as the same body).

Astus wrote:

All composite things are impermanent, both body and mind.

What are the characteristics of Impermanence? In brief, they are of twelve kinds: [1] characteristic of unreality, [2] characteristic of destruction, [3] characteristic of transformation, [4] characteristic of separation, [5] characteristic of presence, [6] characteristic of essential nature (dharma-laksana), [7] characteristic of momentariness, [8] characteristic of continuity, [9] characteristic of disease, etc., [10] characteristic of the varied continuity of the mind, [11] characteristic of good or bad fortune, [12] characteristic of the devolution and evolution of the receptacle-world. (Abhidharmasamuccaya, p 85-86)

maybay said:

So a body obstructs the arising of another body, and instead undergoes deformation. This does not happen with mind and mental states.

Astus wrote:

Is there a body that exists beyond a single moment in your view?

maybay said:

There is no persisting substance, change is merely the characteristic of form.

Astus wrote:

Change is a characteristic of all impermanent phenomena.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 27th, 2016 at 7:29 PM

Title: Re: are you someone special?

Content:

tomschwarz said:

how do you regard yourself as not superior, not inferior, and not equal? we also must not have identity, or? for example, if you have identity x, and another being has identity y, surely they would be regarded as not equal (as well as potentially similar, etc...).

Astus wrote:

As the quoted Sona Sutta says, when the aggregates are seen in terms of "this is not mine, this I am not, this is not my self", then one sees correctly, and there is no basis any more for such comparisons. Conceit is one of the ten https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Fetter_%28Buddhism%29 that eventually one has to be free from.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 28th, 2016 at 7:29 PM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

NoToo said:

Would you please let me know where the following is from.

Astus wrote:

It is there in my signature:

1 Huangbo, T2012Ap381c1

2 Nirvana Sutra, T374p521b3; tr. Yamamoto

3 Mazu, X1321p3b23; tr. J. Jia

4 Yongjia, T2014p395c14; tr. from "The Sword of Wisdom"

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 28th, 2016 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Apparently there is still a misunderstanding of what "transmission" means. There is nothing transmitted, it is merely an expression in the sense that when one attains genuine insight, one carries on the torch of the Buddha's realisation.

"People of the world hear it said that the Buddhas all transmit the Dharma of mind, and they take it that there is a Dharma apart from the mind that can be realized and grasped. They search for the Dharma with the mind, not understanding that the mind is the Dharma and the Dharma is the mind. You cannot search for the mind with the mind—you will pass through a thousand and ten thousand eons [trying] and never get it. [Such useless efforts] are not equal to right now achieving no-mind—this is the fundamental Dharma."

(Huangbo: Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 18)

"You cannot seek the mind with the mind, you cannot seek the Buddha with the Buddha, and you cannot seek the Dharma with the Dharma. Therefore, trainees should achieve no-mind right now. Simply conform with [the mind] in silence—if you try to use the mind you will miss it.

To transmit the mind with the mind—this is the correct view. I warn you, do not look outward and chase after realms but recognize that the realms are the mind. [To commit this error would be] to accept the thief as one's own child."
(Huangbo, p 22)

[The questioner] said: If one is without dependency, how can [the mind of the patriarchs] be transmitted?

The master said: The mind is transmitted with the mind.

[The questioner] said: If the mind is transmitted, how can you say that the mind is also nonexistent?

The master said: To not attain a single dharma is called the transmission of the mind. If you comprehend this mind, then there is no mind and no dharma.

[The questioner] said: If there is no mind and no dharma, why do you call it a transmission?

The master said: You have heard me say "transmission of the mind" and have taken it that there is something that can be attained. It is for this reason that the patriarch said, "When one recognizes the mind-nature, it should be called inconceivable. Clearly and distinctly without anything that is attained, when one attains it one does not speak of it as understanding." If I taught this to you how would you be able to understand it?
(Huangbo, p 36)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 28th, 2016 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Jeff said:

Yes, you are correct. Books are basically useless. Like the proverbial looking at the finger instead of the moon, let alone "becoming the moon".

Astus wrote:

As Huineng, the Sixth Patriarch of Chan instructed (Platform Sutra, ch 10, tr BTTS):

"Since they maintain they have no need of written words, they should not speak either, because written words are merely the marks of spoken language. They also maintain that the direct way cannot be established by written words, and yet these two words, 'not established' are themselves written.

When they hear others speaking, they slander them by saying that they are attached to written words. You should know that to be confused as they are may be permissible, but to slander the Buddha's Sutras is not. Do not slander the Sutras for if you do, your offense will create countless obstacles for you."

Jeff said:

Mind to mind transmission (or connecting mind streams) makes a vast difference. Think of it like you are trapped in your own bubble of sense of self. The transmission of a true master is better described as the master can connect mind streams and get "inside of your bubble". That connection creates sort of a crack in the wall of your bubble of self. The "luminosity" shines through the crack helping you to break down the walls. Authors make money from writing books, but "clarity" can be shared by a master.

Astus wrote:

Where do you get those baseless assertions from? I guess not from any sutras or authentic Buddhist teachings, since you consider them useless.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 29th, 2016 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Soma999 said:

on a relative level, there as been a transmission.

Astus wrote:

On the relative level there is no such mind meld you seem to describe.

Soma999 said:

But you received, relatively, something, that created the experience.

Astus wrote:

What exactly was received?

Soma999 said:

Speaking about those subject is trying to grasp the wind. It has to be lived. Otherwise, it creates confusion.

Astus wrote:

If you say there is a mystical transmission, that is speaking. To say that it cannot be explained is merely excusing oneself from explaining one's own statement.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 29th, 2016 at 10:17 PM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Jeff said:

Hopefully, we can agree that the Lankavatara sutra is pretty universally accepted in Zen. From the second chapter on the point...

Astus wrote:

The quoted section confirms one of the http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Four_reliances, namely "rely on the meaning, not just on the words". That is standard Mahayana. It does not negate the importance of scriptures at all.

Jeff said:

On transmissions themselves, there is some good stuff in the Lotus sutra about them and the turning of the wheel by Buddha that allowed them.

Astus wrote:

What exactly are you referring to?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 30th, 2016 at 2:48 AM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

I found this quote in a book I'm reading, and it seemed germane to the discussion.

Astus wrote:

The paragraphs following what you quoted should also be considered:

"The ancients taught us to approach enlightened teachers, and seek spiritual friends, [that is], men and women of knowledge. But enlightened teachers do not have any means to transmit mind or impart secret methods: all they do for people is release sticking points and remove bonds. This is the esoteric secret. Today we just recite the buddha-name with unified mindfulness without confusion. This formulation is the esoteric method for releasing sticking points and removing bonds. This is the grand highway out of birth and death. Recite the buddha-name morning and night. Recite it when you are walking and when you are sitting. When your mindfulness [of Buddha] is continuous, then it spontaneously becomes a samadhi, that is, a stable state of concentration. Then you will not seek further elsewhere."

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Zhu_Hong here points out that a teacher cannot do more than what one can achieve with the practice of buddha-remembrance.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 30th, 2016 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

the advice applies equally to other modes of Zen practice? My impression is yes, which is why I thought of this thread when I read the passage

Astus wrote:

Since Zen practice is no-thought, and no-thought means being free from all entanglements, it is truer for that than for buddha-remembrance.

As Huineng taught (Platform Sutra, ch 4, BDK ed p 40):

“Good friends, if you wish to cultivate this practice, you may do so either as a householder or in a monastery. Householders who are able to practice this are like those persons of the East whose minds [harbor] good. Those in the monastery who do not cultivate it are like those people of the West whose minds [harbor] evil. It is only that the mind should be pure—then it is the Western [Paradise] of the self-nature!”

And Linji (tr Sasaki, p 15, 16),

"You who today study the Way must have faith in yourselves. Don't seek outside or you'll just go on clambering after the realm of worthless dusts, never distinguishing true from false. [Notions] like 'There are buddhas, there are patriarchs' are no more than matters in the teachings."

...

"Whatever comes along, don't accept it. One thought of doubt, and instantly the demon [māra] enters your mind. Even a bodhisattva, when in doubt, is taken advantage of by the demon of birth-and-death. Just desist from thinking, and never seek outside. If something should come, illumine it. Have faith in your activity revealed now—there isn't a thing to do.

One thought of your mind produces the three realms and, in accordance with causal conditions and influenced by circumstances, the division into the six dusts takes place. What is lacking in your present responsive activity! In an instant you enter the pure, enter the dirty, enter the Tower of Maitreya, enter the Land of the Three Eyes, and everywhere you travel all you see are empty names."

And Dogen

(https://web.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/gongyo_seiten/translations/part_3/fukan_zazengi.html):

"Although they say that there are ten thousand distinctions and a thousand variations, they just wholeheartedly engage the way in zazen. Why leave behind the seat in your own home to wander in vain through the dusty realms of other lands? If you make one misstep, you stumble past what is directly in front of you."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 30th, 2016 at 4:33 PM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Jeff said:

Did you miss this part of the quoted text regarding books...

Mahamati, you and all the Bodhisattvas must seek for this inner self-realisation of Noble Wisdom, and not be captivated by word-teachings.

Astus wrote:

That is the whole point of any teaching, to be used for insight. However, without the teaching there is no direction for insight, hence the need for the teachings, i.e. the scriptures.

Jeff said:

I mean chapter seven where they talk about flying celestial vehicles (transmission to get to people)...

Astus wrote:

You should use some newer translations for the Lotus Sutra. "Brahma-angels" and "aerial cars" make little sense. The chapter talks of brahmas, a type of gods, and their palaces, i.e. their heavenly abodes. Your interpretation as "cars for transmitting the Dharma" does not fit.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 30th, 2016 at 9:38 PM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

muni said:

Regarding directly pointing/direct transmission outside of scriptures, these problems aren't. It is always fresh from the timeless "source". It would sound funny to say give me a newer version.

Astus wrote:

Sutras point to the same emptiness as teachers do. There is not and can not be any difference. And like half-educated teachers who mislead students, wrong translations mislead readers.

It should also be understood that the mind-to-mind transmission is beyond all words. That applies not only to written, but also to spoken words as well. Such transmission is not some secret code or mystical energy, but seeing the truth of the Dharma in one's personal experience. And that truth means that all phenomena are empty, without anything to be grasped.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 30th, 2016 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: Suppose you go to court.

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

Will you agree to swear an oath to tell the truth?

Will you dress up nice and change your speech, using honorifics such as "your honor"?

Astus wrote:

If one is not a monastic, there are 5 precepts and 10 deeds to be mindful of. Neither of those contradict following the mentioned customs.

Dogen, Instructions for the Tenzo said:

I propose that doing either is problematic, and an example of what is spoken against in this quote: A person who is influenced by the quality of a thing, or who changes his speech or manner according to the appearance or position of the people he meets, is not a man working in the Way.

Astus wrote:

Read Vinaya and Rules of Purity works, then you'll see how strict a Buddhist legal environment can be. What seems to be referred to in your quote is duplicitous behaviour.

Dogen, Instructions for the Tenzo said:

Following the customs of intimidation and flattery in courtrooms therefore disrupts cultivation, unless we have highly stabilized our practice.

Astus wrote:

A single fly can disrupt cultivation.

Dogen, Instructions for the Tenzo said:

For those who would stress the ultimate emptiness of things such as legal vows and courtrooms, I enjoin us to keep the conversation in the realm of the run-of-the-mill practitioner whose realization is shallow and easily disturbed by intimidation and seeing/hearing of violence.

Astus wrote:

Since it's a run-of-the-mill practitioner with minimal abilities, such a person should focus on ethical discipline, generosity, and simple forms of rituals, like chanting and bowing. Consequently the problem of mundane activities disrupting one's cultivation is not an issue, unless one is about to break one's fundamental precepts.

Monlam Tharchin said:

Still, "court" is the dream we find ourselves in, and we are expected to follow the rules of the dream to hopefully help one charged with a crime.

So how do we bring our dharma practice fully to bear in such a situation?

That's what I'm wrestling with.

Some in this thread have said it means going with the flow and avoiding causing offense. But what sentient beings call respect is often blameworthy. Gaining title, honor, esteem is delusion.

What sentient beings call disrespect is often praiseworthy, loosening their grip on the same.

Astus wrote:

Such concerns do not actually address Buddhist cultivation. Titles and customs are how societies are built. Even Buddhist monastic communities have them. If one thinks that they are a problem, one should first of all leave home (become a monk/nun), and then reside in some remote monastery. But for lay people their whole life is filled with obstacles, unless they can attain wisdom despite such circumstances, but then we are no longer talking about run-of-the-mill people.

Monlam Tharchin said:

So to the topic, (1) if one knows an oath is being given peremptorily with no regard even to its meaning, does it reflect conduct "as fine as flour" to grunt "yep" while the court officer moves automatically down the line?

Astus wrote:

It is irrelevant as long as it does not fall into the category of wrong speech.

Monlam Tharchin said:

(2) If one feels "there is only the one taste of the great ocean of life," that these lawyers and judge are our mothers, and that we aspire to lift them out of the boiling cauldron of samsara, does it show integrity to avoid any expression of vows which might upset someone?

Astus wrote:

What would upset who?

Knowing universal emptiness means one is not moved by appearances. It doesn't mean one falls into endless worry, quite the opposite actually.

Monlam Tharchin said:

With vows as lofty as those of a bodhisattva, I'm not sure one would remain indistinguishable in speech, behavior, and lifestyle from those utterly lost in confusion.

Astus wrote:

Acting patiently and compassionately does not mean one becomes a social/language reformer.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 30th, 2016 at 11:00 PM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Jeff said:

Such a mind to mind transmission is effectively the bypassing (or removal) of a perceived obstruction by the person receiving the transmission. Effectively since the emptiness is truly "known" by the transmitter, that knowledge can be temporarily extended (or shared).

Astus wrote:

If there were such a thing, buddhas would already have liberated all beings. However, no transmission like that exists, and everyone has to make effort individually.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 1st, 2016 at 3:08 AM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Jeff said:

Sure they do.

Astus wrote:

What canonical sources confirm your assumption about that transmission? And I'm not asking for some symbolic story, but explicit statements in sutras and treatises.

Jeff said:

The problem is that for most it is temporary unless the obstructions are actually let go by the receiver.

Astus wrote:

Buddhas could perform the transmission every moment incessantly.

Jeff said:

Havnt you ever felt the shift just being in the presence of a master? Like the mind shuts down and the fog is lifted just being in his/her presence?

Astus wrote:

That is a common experience of people who are devoted to another person, a place, or some other object of perception. That doesn't mean there are magical forces at work.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 1st, 2016 at 6:20 AM

Title: Re: Suppose you go to court.

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

Yes, exactly. My feeling is the customs I mentioned are duplicitous behavior.

Astus wrote:

Buddhism uses an intention based ethical system. A vow would be considered lying if one actually meant to mislead others. If it's merely following a custom, where one has no intention to cheat others, then there is no precept broken.

Monlam Tharchin said:

One expresses honor towards beings who, while objects of our compassionate vows, do not occupy the status of Honored Ones, which appropriately belongs to the Buddha, Dharma teachers, monastics, and so on.

Astus wrote:

Those are religious values. There are other values in the world as well. Expressing one's respect towards social order is not contrary to Buddhism, particularly in case of lay people.

Monlam Tharchin said:

I propose also that a truth-telling vow supposes there are two standards of truth: daily life, where one is expected to tell small lies to benefit oneself, exaggerate, lie through omission and so on; and the "real" truth where one is expected not to do these things.

Astus wrote:

Such are the drawbacks of the world.

Monlam Tharchin said:

Every thought, word, and act concern Buddhist cultivation, don't they?

Astus wrote:

Yes and no. There are precepts to draw the line. Lay people follow 5 training rules, fairly simple ones actually. There are no huge legal tomes in Buddhism governing every aspect of daily life, unlike in many other religions. Even the 10 unwholesome deeds are not too restricting.

Monlam Tharchin said:

One needn't shave one's head and leave home to attempt to bring every single situation to the path.

Astus wrote:

What path is it? The lay precepts are not in contradiction with most Western customs.

Monlam Tharchin said:

Unmindful speech to me is wrong speech, similar to how alcohol is itself not "wrong" but too easily leads to lapses where unskillful action can creep in.

Astus wrote:

That is a rule that you made up for yourself. What makes something unmindful anyway? One can commit all sorts of evil mindfully.

Monlam Tharchin said:

Many social norms, being rooted in the Three Poisons, have suffering as their fruit.

Astus wrote:

All acts of life are rooted in the three poisons. Of course, there is a difference between good and evil, nevertheless, they are both samsara.

Monlam Tharchin said:

Much of Buddhadharma constitutes going against the grain, which constitutes a wide range of behavior without necessarily getting into capital "A" Activism.

Astus wrote:

Does one go against a custom because it would cause pain to others, or is it merely to enforce some ideological principle on others?

Monlam Tharchin said:

The moment one takes the Bodhisattva Vows above the vows of society, one has become a social and language reformer, in my opinion, on a small or big scale.

Astus wrote:

The primary vow is compassion. One should never mistake that for upholding religious values.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 1st, 2016 at 5:09 PM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

AlexMcLeod said:

As I've said previously, I'm fairly confident that the transmission the masters were referring to is a very advanced form of modeling, which is why they always drove the student to the edge first, and then they were ready to "receive" the teaching. Damo and Huike are the best example of this.

Astus wrote:

Such a model does not fit. What transmission is a model of is the imperial lineage that it was copied from, and it was meant to establish a higher authority of those belonging to the family than those who did not. That is the

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=98542#p98542> of transmission. The religious meaning of mind-to-mind transmission is what I've <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=357558#p357558> from Huangbo, that is, the realisation of no-mind.

Note: the term "special transmission outside teachings" first appeared in the Zutang Ji (952), and was set in the four line stanza first in 1108. It was a slogan used by the emerging Linji faction of the 11th century to boast its claims of orthodoxy and supremacy.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 1st, 2016 at 5:15 PM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

DGA said:

I'm puzzled that Meido sensei's earlier post has been largely ignored, as it sets the table for a reasonable conversation suitable to the Zen forum.

Astus wrote:

He presented his interpretation of the phrases, what I assume fits the current theory about it in the lineage that he belongs to. But it does not seem to match the theories beyond that community nor teachings from past masters. So I don't see those definitions as generally applicable.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 1st, 2016 at 9:39 PM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

AlexMcLeod said:

Actually, I completely agree with his definition, and come from a different lineage.

Astus wrote:

What sources do you base that on?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 1st, 2016 at 10:35 PM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Malcolm said:

At this point, it would be apropos to ask from whom you learned Zen/Chan yourself.

What is your lineage? Are you just going based on things that you have read, or have you actually practiced Zen/Chan under the direction and guidance of a qualified master.

Astus wrote:

It does not seem to be a relevant question to me. What difference does it make in discussing interpretations? But if you want to know.

I have learnt

- Chan from Shi Mingzheng, Shi Minglai, John Crook, Simon Child
- Seon from Antal Dobosy, Wu Bong SSN, Chong An Sunim JDPSN
- Zen from Sozui Zenni, Shodo Harada, Yvon Myoken Bec

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 2nd, 2016 at 4:08 AM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Malcolm said:

I forgot to ask if these teachings included intensive practice under their guidance, or were in the form of academic encounters.

Astus wrote:

None were particularly academic, I have spent various length of time with various teachers. But if you are interested in details, just send me a PM here or on FB.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 2nd, 2016 at 4:32 AM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

AlexMcLeod said:

Because his description of transmission perfectly describes the way my teacher teaches. And the way his certified instructors teach. And although I am only allowed to teach at a much lower level to friends and family, that is how I teach. It's how his teacher taught, and so on and so forth.

Astus wrote:

There is such a thing as training under supervision, however, that is not what the slogan "special transmission outside teachings" means. Receiving instructions from an elder practitioner is a basic requirement for any novice monastic, so there is nothing special about it, nor is it outside the teachings, since it is the teachings that one is instructed in, including methods of meditation. As I have noted before the expression gained currency in the Song era. Here is a short explanation for it:

"In the world of Sung Buddhism, there was no real debate over the substantive issues of sutra study by monks or the chanting of sutras as merit-making devices in Buddhist rites. Nor was there any great controversy over the practice of seated meditation (tso-ch'an), the importance of finding a good teacher, or the idea that every monk should seek the same realization of awakening as that attained by the founder of the order, Sakyamuni. All of those practices and values were taken for granted by all monks and were built into the structure of the Buddhist monastic institution as a whole, with scarcely any differences between the monasteries that were designated as Ch'an establishments and those that were not. The controversies that simmered in the Sung over the status of the Ch'an lineage as a "separate transmission," in short, were more about securing prestige, patronage, and special privileges within the Buddhist order than about practical matters of monkish training or spiritual cultivation. The "separate transmission" slogan was used successfully by proponents of Ch'an to argue that members of their lineage, having inherited the enlightenment of the Buddha in a direct line of "mind-to-mind transmission," were the monks most qualified for positions of leadership within the existing Buddhist monastic institution. The slogan was not used to promote any particular reforms of that institution from within, nor was it associated with any schismatic attempt to establish independent Ch'an monasteries that were "sectarian" in the technical sense of splitting off from an ecclesiastical mainstream." (T. Griffith Foulis: Sung Controversies Concerning the "Separate Transmission" of Ch'an, in Buddhism in the Sung, p 220-221)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 3rd, 2016 at 6:23 AM

Title: Re: Question about Tilopa's Six Advices

Content:

rachmiel said:

What about attention, focus, awareness?

Astus wrote:

Tilopa is talking about Mahamudra, the ultimate state. What you are looking for is gradual training, methods to apply, and that is the problem. You can of course find step by step instructions, Mahamudra teachings are good at that. But Tilopa's six advices are for those who have already covered those stages.

Here is something for you to contemplate:

The past is already gone. The future does not exist yet. The present does not abide. Or as the http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html says in chapter 18: "the past thought is unobtainable, the present thought is unobtainable, and the future thought is unobtainable". When there is no thought to abide in, there is no more effort. But first you need to see for yourself the nature of thoughts.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 3rd, 2016 at 6:57 PM

Title: Re: Question about Tilopa's Six Advices

Content:

rachmiel said:

The reason I have stayed with Tilopa is because it resonates strongly with me and helps me move in what I intuitively know is the right direction.

Astus wrote:

It's good that you have trust in Tilopa's words. Since they are merely six words, it's like the title of a book. Trying to intuit the content of a book from its title seems inconsiderate to me. So, if you want to know the content, you have to start reading. Similarly, if you want to understand those six words, you need to study the teachings and follow the instructions in those teachings. That's why many here recommend you to get in contact with a teacher.

rachmiel said:

I could follow each advice (as I understand them) to the letter and end up in a crystal-clear thusness state ... or a hypnagogic daze ... or trance ... or even asleep! And I'm looking to find out if all of these states are included in what Tilopa is pointing to, or just the first one.

Astus wrote:

You made up your interpretation, and then you try to match that with your experiences. The problem here is that this whole process is only your creation and Tilopa's words are used only as an excuse. What those words say is that grasp no state at all, and do not try to create any state either. What you describe goes in the opposite direction.

For a start, listen to what Lama Shenpen Rinpoche has to say about the first two advices:

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=fwxGL_QCuVk

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 3rd, 2016 at 7:06 PM

Title: Re: Question about Tilopa's Six Advices

Content:

Astus wrote:

Lama Tashi Namgyal: On Tilopa's Six Essential Points of Meditation (excerpt)

The mahasiddha Tilopa's six essential points of meditation contain the basic principles of placement meditation. The first point is not to be distracted by, dwell upon, get involved in, get lost in, nourish, encourage, or follow thoughts about the past. Anything that arises concerning anything that occurred or one thought prior to the current moment, one should simply let go of, and the sooner the better. Ultimately, one should develop the discipline or the automatic habit of letting go of such thoughts instantly, on the spot, and one should learn to remain in such a state of "permanent let-go."

The second point is not to be distracted by, dwell upon, get involved in, get lost in, nourish, encourage, get fixated on, or follow thoughts about the present. In particular, one should not fixate on either outer or inner phenomena.

The third point is not to be distracted by, dwell upon, get involved in, get lost in, nourish, encourage, or speculate about the future or thoughts of the future, but to let go of them instantly as well.

The fourth point is not to meditate. One should resist, or let go of the temptation, which at some point always arises in the experience of beginning meditators, to improve or make better one's meditation by meditating on tranquility, or on the experience of emptiness, or on clarity, or on bliss, or by fabricating or contriving any other strategy to improve one's meditation. All such attempts to improve one's meditation by "meditating" are cul-de-sacs, and, as such, obstacles to meditation.

The fifth point is not to analyze. Although there are other forms of meditation that teach one to analyze one's experience, the ultimate goal of such analysis is to transcend analytical and conceptual impositions on one's experience altogether so that one will finally experience directly the true nature of mind, the true nature of experience, the true nature of reality. So in this approach, according to the fifth point, one should not analyze; one should not engage in the asking of such questions as, "What color is it? Where is it? How is it? Why is it? Does it have any shape or color or location or any other characteristics?" One should let go of all tendencies to analyze one's experience.

So, then, if one is not to be distracted by thoughts of past, present, or future; and if one is not to meditate and not to analyze, then what should one be doing? What is one's mind to hang on to? The answer is "nothing." Tilopa's sixth point is just to "leave it to itself." Whatever arises in the mind, one should neither welcome nor reject, neither encourage nor suppress - nor should one get lost in thoughts. In the words of Bokar Rinpoche there is "nothing to do;" nothing to do beyond resting in the awareness of the freshness of whatever arises.

(Shenpen Ösel, vol 1, no 2, p 36)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 3rd, 2016 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Question about Tilopa's Six Advices

Content:

rachmiel said:

Why not just rest in what arises, rather than in the awareness of what arises? Isn't the latter placing a kind of extra layer of non-directness into the experience? Isn't simply tasting a mango more directly "real" than being aware of tasting a mango?

Astus wrote:

That is still proposing one should do something, that one should abide in a specific state. The point is to not grasp and not reject. Assuming an identity that is the same as what appears is grasping, and an identity that is separate from what appears is rejecting. The error lies in the concept that there is an identity.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2016 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Question about Tilopa's Six Advices

Content:

rachmiel said:

Okay. But doesn't this apply equally to resting in the awareness of what arises? How is "resting in what arises" a specific state whereas "resting in the awareness of what arises" not?

Astus wrote:

Better not take it too literally. It simply expresses where there is no identification present. It does not mean taking the position of a watcher who is above appearances.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2016 at 6:46 PM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

AlexMcLeod said:

This lines up very nicely with the direct pointing that Meido described. This is what a heart-to-heart transmission is in my teacher's school. The, for lack of a better term, initiation of the student into the path, not the fruition of that path.

Astus wrote:

That does not seem to be about Zen Buddhism. As it is quoted <http://shaolin.org/general-2/way-of-master/way49.html>, it's about his own form of martial arts. Furthermore, Zen teachings have practically nothing to do with physical and energy training.

On the other hand, he explains the line about transmission that is the topic in this thread in the following way:

"Transmission beyond the tradition' refers to the methods of Zen cultivation that are different from the traditional ways practised in other schools of Buddhism. Hence, traditional methods like the cultivation of moral purity (as in Theravada), devotional worship of the Buddha and Bodhisattvas (as in many Mahayana schools), and the use of mantras (as in the Vajrayana tradition) are seldom found in Zen Buddhism. Even in the all-important practice of meditation, essential in all schools, is quite different in Zen meditation. Here the meditator focuses on the void, whereas other schools use the traditional method from Indian Buddhism where the meditator trains his mind to be one-pointed."

(Wong Kiew Kit: The Complete Book of Zen, p 185)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2016 at 7:58 PM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

AlexMcLeod said:

It is a teaching methodology.

Astus wrote:

What method is that? See the following definitions.

Bodhidharma (Bloodstream Sermon):

"Buddhas of the past and future only transmit this mind."

"In India the twenty-seven patriarchs only transmitted the imprint of the mind. And the only reason I've come to China is to transmit the instantaneous teaching of the Mahayana This mind is the Buddha."

"Yours is the mind of all Buddhas. Buddhas of the past and future only talk about transmitting the mind."

Huineng (Platform Sutra):

"I transmit only the Dharma of seeing the nature;" (ch 2, p 34)

"Our patriarchs have transmitted only this sudden teaching," (ch 7, p 53)

"I transmit the mind-seal of the Buddha; how could [what I say] differ from the Buddha's sutra?" (ch 8, p 76)

They say nothing at all about methods. If anything, it's the single method of realising the nature of mind directly, and such a realisation is a personal experience.

AlexMcLeod said:

And notice he still is speaking of method in the text you quoted. In our school, heart-to-heart transmission is the prerequisite for correct practice. This means that such methods necessarily involve teacher to student initiation. Hence making it a transmission, as defined above, that is not from the scriptures/tradition.

Astus wrote:

That's all fine. I don't know any martial arts school that does not involve learning it directly from a teacher. So, to call such a common phenomenon a "heart-to-heart transmission" is OK, but actually means very little. In a similar way one could call the method of tying one's shoes received in a "heart-to-heart transmission". But again, this is a topic on a Zen saying, not martial arts or landscape painting.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2016 at 2:36 AM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Meido said:

Zen practice, on the other hand, has everything to do with the body.

Astus wrote:

That depends on what practice you mean.

Why should they? The four lines defining Zen do not discuss methods either. Those quotes point out Zen's approach to the path, they are not practice instructions.

What do you consider practice instructions? Can you give some examples from traditional works?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2016 at 2:38 AM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

AlexMcLeod said:

As for the saying we are discussing means teachings that aren't written down in sutra.

Why would someone writing about such things write them down if they know they can't be written down?

Astus wrote:

What teachings are not found in the sutras? If they are not in the sutras, they could not have been taught by the Buddha, consequently they are not even Buddhist teachings, much less Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2016 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Malcolm said:

Funny thought that, thinking that Buddha's teachings are confined to extant sūtras, since only a tiny fraction of sūtras in toto exist in this world system. Then of course there is the issue of tantras...

Astus wrote:

Tantras are not different from sutras, they are both scriptures (jing 經) of the canon. And what the teachings (jiao 教) refer to are the words of the Buddha.

As Zongmi wrote:

"The sutras are buddha word, while Chan is the intention of the buddhas."
(Zongmi on Chan, p 109)

And as the later tradition, maintained, in the words of Hyujeong:

"The branches of Seon and Doctrine were Kāśyapa and Ānanda. To use no words to reach the wordless is Seon; to use words to reach the wordless is Doctrine. So then the mind is the Seon dharma (method) and language is the Doctrine dharma."
(Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 3, p 59)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2016 at 3:23 AM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Malcolm said:

Then you should understand that there is only a tiny fraction in this world system, and not one of them reaches the meaning of "direct perception."

Astus wrote:

As Linji said,

"Even if, through your seeking, you did find something, that something would be nothing more than fancy descriptions in written words; never would you gain the mind of the living patriarch. Make no mistake, worthy Chan men! If you don't find it here and now, you'll go on transmigrating through the three realms for myriads of kalpas and thousands of lives, and, held in the clutch of captivating circumstances, be born in the wombs of asses or cows."

(Record of Linji, p 8, tr Sasaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2016 at 4:48 AM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Malcolm said:

Contradicts what you write here:

Astus wrote:

Even if we consider buddhas in other worlds, it makes no difference, that was what I intended to point out. Nevertheless, what Shakyamuni taught is what we have in the scriptures.

Malcolm said:

And it implies that knowledge of reality is something pointed out by a master in a student's direct perception.

Astus wrote:

Where does it imply that? Linji talks about the importance of seeing the truth of the Dharma in one's experience. Such instructions are given in the sutras as well.

More from Linji:

"Virtuous monks, time is precious. And yet, hurrying hither and thither, you try to learn meditation, to study the Way, to accept names, to accept phrases, to seek buddha, to seek a patriarch, to seek a good teacher, to think and speculate.

Make no mistake, followers of the Way! After all, you have a father and a mother—what more do you seek? Turn your own light inward upon yourselves!"

(p 10)

"In my view there is no Buddha, no sentient beings, no past, no present. Anything attained was already attained—no time is needed. There is nothing to practice, nothing to realize, nothing to gain, nothing to lose. Throughout all time there is no other dharma than this. 'If one claims there's a dharma surpassing this, I say that it's like a dream, like a phantasm.' This is all I have to teach."

(p 12-13)

"For the Chan school, understanding is not thus—it is instantaneous, now, not a matter of time! All that I teach is just provisional medicine, treatment for a disease. In fact, no real dharma exists. Those who understand this are true renouncers of home, and may spend a million gold coins a day.

Followers of the Way, don't have your face stamped with the seal of sanction by any old master anywhere, then go around saying, 'I understand Chan, I understand the Way.'

Though your eloquence is like a rushing torrent, it is nothing but hell-creating karma."

(p 13)

"As for myself, I haven't a single dharma to give to people. All I can do is to cure illnesses and untie bonds."

(p 22)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2016 at 5:56 PM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, what the Buddha taught can never be captured in words, no more than one can capture the taste of sweet in words.

Astus wrote:

To teach is to communicate information. It happens mostly through verbal means. The carrier of the information (words) are not identical to the information (meaning) itself. Furthermore, once the meaning communicated is understood, it is up to the receiver to apply it. But if the method of communication is taken away, there is no meaning delivered, no understanding of that meaning occurs, and there is no possibility of applying it. If you say that words are incapable of communicating the meaning, then no teaching is possible, and a samyaksambuddha is actually a pratyekabuddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2016 at 7:19 PM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Meido said:

Just about all of them.

Astus wrote:

Which of those instructions discuss physical training? Even the https://web.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/gongyo_seiten/translations/part_3/fukan_zazengi.html says "How could that be limited to sitting or lying down?" And the <http://antaiji.org/archives/eng/zzyk.shtml>: "Zazen is far beyond the form of sitting or lying down." And although "for the study of the path, sitting is the superior posture" (Zhiyi: Essentials of Buddhist Meditation, ch 6) and "of the four forms of conduct, [sitting is the most] peaceful and joyful" (Dogen: Bendowa, BDK ed SBGZ vol 1, p 12), the "essence of cultivating enlightenment" is "the inherently complete and pure mind" (Hongren: Treatise on the Supreme Vehicle), and as Huineng said "the samādhi of the single practice is to always practice the single direct mind in all one's actions, whether walking, standing still, sitting, or lying down" (Platform Sutra, ch 4, BDK ed p 42). My point is no different from what Vimalakirti told Sariputra, and Nanyue told Mazu: the posture is not the essential point. That is not to deny the importance and benefits of corporeal practice, however, when it comes to the direct path, that is not it.

Meido said:

One could start exploring it by considering why Hyakujo's students were tested for suitability to serve as abbot of a new monastery by being ordered, each in turn, to take a few steps forward and clear their throats.

Astus wrote:

I am not familiar with that incident. There is the story in the BCR, cases 70-72, and in the WMG, case 40, and even Baizhang's recorded sayings have nothing more either. I might also add that those events are most likely Song era inventions and not accounts of how abbots were actually selected, a process that was regulated by the Vinaya and often controlled by the local or imperial aristocracy.

on the ground people use myriad methods transmitted in various lines, according to their unique conditions.

And that is the expected way of a good teacher (even outside Buddhism), the application of skilful means. As Fayan wrote in his Ten Guidelines for Zen Schools: "The Zen founder did not come from India to China because there is something to be transmitted. He just pointed directly to the human mind for the perception of its essence and realization of awakening. ... Nevertheless, the provisional teachings devised by the guides to the source had differences and accordingly came to differ from one another."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2016 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Matylda said:

ask Roshi about relation of body, breathing, energy and samadhi in zazen practice.

Astus wrote:

Such a relationship was known in India as well (<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Pranayama>), but as far as I'm aware, only in the late Anuttarayogatantra teachings were such methods incorporated, while the classical practice of Anapanasmrti is not about control but mindfulness of breath. As for how it appeared in modern Rinzai Zen, I think that's something Hakuin introduced. In other words, manipulation of breathing is not a traditional element of East Asian Mahayana, nor of Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2016 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Malcolm said:

You cannot explain "sweet" to anyone.

Astus wrote:

Words are not the meaning, and the meaning is not the experience. Experience is not communicated, it is what one arrives at after understanding what is meant.

Malcolm said:

But when they taste it, they know exactly what you mean by sweet. Buddhahood is something to be shown in one's direct perception.

Astus wrote:

Just as you say, one has to arrive at the experience oneself, it cannot be handed over. What can be received are the words.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 6th, 2016 at 6:34 AM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Meido said:

They do not in the traditional view negate methods at all, however.

Astus wrote:

I agree, there is no negation of methods. Neither I am saying that there is anything wrong with them.

Meido said:

But your concept of a "direct path" seems completely devoid of methods, and therefore is not actually a path.

Astus wrote:

Exactly. That's what makes it direct.

Meido said:

for someone who reads the words of, say, Rinzai in the Rinzaïroku and is not immediately liberated, or is unable to manifest the seamless continuity of recognition which everyone is recommending, what is to be done?

Astus wrote:

Mahayana offers a detailed progressive path.

"[The teaching that one can] cultivate the six perfections and the myriad practices in order to achieve Buddhahood—this is the progressive [approach to Buddhahood]." (Huangbo: Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, in Zen Texts, BDK ed p 14)

"If a trainee does not instantly [attain] no-mind but spends successive eons in cultivation, he will never achieve enlightenment. He will be fettered by the meritorious practices of the three vehicles and will not attain liberation. However, there is fast and slow in realizing this mind: there are those who attain no-mind in a single moment of thought after hearing the Dharma; those who attain no-mind after [passing through] the ten faiths, the ten abodes, the ten practices, and the ten conversions; and those who attain no-mind after [passing through] the ten stages [of the bodhisattva]. In spite of the length of time it takes them to [attain it, once they] reside in no-mind there is nothing else to be cultivated or realized. Truly without anything to be attained, true and not false [is no-mind]. Whether it is attained in a single moment of thought or at the tenth stage [of the bodhisattva], its efficacy is identical." (p 16)

Meido said:

check Transmission of the Lamp for Guishan (though I don't know if that is the earliest reference, but that puts it in early Song).

Astus wrote:

Thanks, I've found it.

頭陀令警欬一聲行數步。 (T51n2076_009)

"The Dhuta ordered him to cough deeply once and pace several steps" (Original Teachings of Chan Buddhism, p 201)

However, Ferguson translates it (i.e. 警欬一聲) differently:

司馬請警欬一聲行數步。 (T47n1989_001)

"Sima asked Hua to speak a few words and walk back and forth." (Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 145)

Meido said:

This anecdote from that time tells us something about Chan as it existed then, and there is a transmitted understanding of what that something is as well as its utility in practice.

Astus wrote:

This Sima, a dhutanga ascetic, called a geomancer by Heine (Opening a Mountain, p 49), is the true judge in the story of who becomes the abbot, so it's not really a question of Chan abilities. It's like the practice of fortune telling used in selecting the abbot.

Meido said:

My personal experience practicing with a modern Chan teacher also included instruction in related things.

Astus wrote:

That seems fairly common, just as certain tantric rituals, and of course a fair amount of Amituofo.

Meido said:

Zen being what it is, it could and should be able to integrate many methods.

Astus wrote:

And that is actually the question: what is Zen? I mean, in Chinese Buddhism almost any meditation practice and anecdote can be called Chan and most, if not all, monasteries are Chan, just as monks and abbots are members of a Chan lineage, so it is actually a synonym for Buddhism.

Meido said:

Yet you seem to be at pains to discount the myriad skillful means which have developed (and not doubt will continue to develop) over the centuries, in favor of what really seems to me to be a rather sterile, literalist approach discounting oral instruction and resting solely upon words in a certain class of Zen texts which - we both must admit - reveal very little about what practitioners were actually doing day to day in terms of practice.

Astus wrote:

And the reason for that is to specify what sort of teaching Zen is. That's why I call it the direct path, as that is what was specified in the primary works of the Zen tradition as the essential element. On the other hand, if it can be a progressive teaching, then it is no different from the common bodhisattvayana, and there is not much left to call Zen but mere literary devices.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 6th, 2016 at 6:40 AM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Matylda said:

actually many methods were transmitted verbally and directly in private instruction form... when zen was in decline more teachers spoke more openly about these things to encourage disciples and general consciousness of practitioners... they did not want the tradition to die out

Astus wrote:

That line of argument is used so many times when someone wants to introduce new ideas, like in the story of the nagas preserving the prajnaparamita scriptures. In any case, why would one need such methods for shikantaza?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 6th, 2016 at 5:26 PM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Matylda said:

shikan taza is unfathomable state, though it has become popular method among modern practitioners, but in fact it is very different from current shallow interpretations.

Astus wrote:

Are you of the opinion that what goes under Soto Zen in the West is a poor imitation of the real thing? That <http://wwzc.org/dharma-text/posture-zazen> is not <http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/practice/zazen/howto/> but something qualitatively different? Can you tell the reason behind all those teachers either hiding or being ignorant about the true teaching?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 6th, 2016 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Malcolm said:

Just as a parent can show a child something sweet, a proper teacher can show you your own state directly, without any words.

Astus wrote:

What good is a mute teacher? The insentient constantly teach the Dharma.

"At this time, everything in the universe in ten directions—soil, earth, grass, and trees; fences, walls, tiles, and pebbles—performs the Buddha's work."

(Dogen: Bendowa, BDK ed SBGZ vol 1, p 6)

"realizing the truth on seeing the peach blossoms, realizing the truth on hearing the sound of a bamboo, and realizing the truth on seeing a bright star, are all examples of the sutras producing good counselors."

(Dogen: Bukkyo, BDK ed SBGZ vol 3, p 140)

"The causes and conditions of eighty-thousand such Dharma aggregates are, in every case, the establishment of the mind. Some [people] have established the mind in a dream and attained the truth; some have established the mind in drunkenness and attained the truth; some establish the mind and attain the truth amid flying flowers and falling leaves; some establish the mind and attain the truth amid peach blossoms and green bamboo; some establish the mind and attain the truth in the heavens above; and some establish the mind and attain the truth in the sea."

(Dogen: Hotsu-mujoshin, BDK ed SBGZ vol 3, p 337)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2016 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Matylda said:

there were fine masters of shikan taza in Japan.. now there are no more then 5...

Astus wrote:

That sounds very bad indeed. Do you consider Menzan Zuiho's description of Jijuyu-zanmai is proper shikantaza?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2016 at 6:09 PM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Malcolm said:

A rock cannot point out to your own state. That is the difference between a rock and guru.

Astus wrote:

Is that so? There are several stories in Zen that show how someone was awakened by natural events.

A monk said, "I've just arrived here and I beg the master to point out a gate whereby I may enter."

Xuansha said, "Do you hear the sound of the water in Yan Creek?"

The monk said, "I hear it."

Xuansha said, "That's the place of your entry."

(Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 300)

Furthermore, can a guru point out one's state unmistakably in any situation? Or does it depend on the disciple? If it takes a good teacher and a good student, such a pointing out is a difficult matter. When a good teacher can educate a dumb student, isn't that what makes one a good teacher? Similarly, if a good student can learn from a dumb teacher, isn't that what makes one a good student?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2016 at 7:17 PM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Matylda said:

yes of course... but do not take it for granted.. to understand this text and its content you need master of jijuyu zanmai, actually thoroughly realised master... nowadays there are many random and shallow interpretations of it...

Astus wrote:

It is a fairly straightforward text: "We just illuminate our thoughts which moment by moment come up and go away, refrain from fabricating adoption or rejection, and hatred or love." That is the standard description not only of Dogen's http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/key_terms/pdf/key_terms08.pdf, or the fundamental <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=145499#p145499>, but the essence of <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn47/sn47.040.than.html>.

So, while it might be so that one needs extensive and proper instructions to be able to practice correctly, it is not because of the lack of clarity in the teachings themselves that people go astray.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 8th, 2016 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Matylda said:

moreover even Dogen before he started shikan taza practice trained seriously for many years. between beginner zazen and true state of shikan taza is very long way... it is what is widely disregarded nowadays, including all instructions which may bring one to shikan taza... and today almost everyone is repeating 'just sitting' or shikan taza however missing the true meaning.. it is sad and childish.

Astus wrote:

"After the initial meeting with a [good] counselor we never again need to burn incense, to do prostrations, to recite Buddha's name, to practice confession, or to read sutras. Just sit and get the state that is free of body and mind."

(Dogen: Bendowa, BDK ed SBGZ vol 1, p 5)

There is no description of preparatory practices, nor any other elements. If we were to add preparatory and auxiliary methods, Zen would be no different from the other schools teaching gradual progression. As Hanshan <http://chancenter.org/cmc/2011/10/13/essentials-of-practice-and-enlightenment-for-beginners/> "to even speak about practice is really like the last alternative", and then of course he goes on about how to practise the phrase-investigation. As I see it, even talking about assuming a seated posture is a concession on the part of Dogen.

Matylda said:

what is final teaching is shikan taza, and where is the rest???

Astus wrote:

As Keizan <http://antaiji.org/archives/eng/zzyk.shtml>: "Zazen is not based upon teaching, practice or realization; instead these three aspects are all contained within it." and "Zazen is also not based upon discipline, practice, or wisdom. These three are all contained within it."

Matylda said:

missing part of instructions is filled by private philosophies and pov. what is the worst situation..

Astus wrote:

That is certainly a sad situation. However, it's not because oral instructions are lost, but because the extensive teachings of Mahayana are neglected.

Matylda said:

if it would be so easy as one may suggest, then reading texts on shikan taza like that of Menzan would be perfectly sufficient.. what for any further instructions?

Astus wrote:

This raises a problem: if the essential teaching of Zen is insufficient, then there is no basis of regarding it as a "separate transmission outside the teachings", because the transmission must be with the teachings. And Dogen seems to agree with this:

"Both the Buddhist sutras and the Patriarch's truth have been authentically transmitted and have spread from Śākyamuni Buddha. The Patriarch's transmission has been received only by rightful successors from rightful successors, but how could [rightful successors] not know, how could they not clarify, and how could they not read and recite the Buddhist sutras?"

(Dogen: Bukkyo, BDK ed SBGZ vol 3, p 148)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 11th, 2016 at 1:06 AM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Anders said:

What defines Zen most primarily is the transmission of awakening - That both teacher and student are able to use the methods at their disposal skilfully in accordance with their particular circumstances in order to engender and mature awakening. What particular methods are used is tertiary to the fact that awakening happens and the 'lineage' thus continues in a living and authentic manner.

Astus wrote:

Up to Zongmi all schools claimed exclusive rights to the transmission, starting with Zongmi it was a matter of higher and lower quality lineages. If, as you say, there is such a thing as "the transmission of awakening" as the hallmark of Zen, then not only all other schools are branded as dysfunctional communities, but even among those who identify as belonging to the lineage of Bodhidharma there are disagreements about authenticity. Such disagreements, however, would be impossible if there were such a genuine awakening transmitted from generation to generation.

Anders said:

What is called "Zen" is the work being done on the ground - The living actualisation of awakening from moment to moment and from one generation to another.

Astus wrote:

Isn't that what every Buddhist community is doing? Isn't that one of the crucial functions of the Sangha?

Anders said:

There is an immeasurable breadth and depth to this body of work that can not be boiled down to adherence to a specific set of scriptures or tenets, particular method(s) or "mere literary devices."

Astus wrote:

What is "this body of work"? Is it the particular activities of an individual teacher, or is it the literary products of the Zen school?

Anders said:

I am not sure what point you are trying to make here?

Astus wrote:

It is like what you wrote: "There is no objective clarity in teachings themselves. Clarity is a function of the person reading it." Similarly, a buddha may appear right in front of one and one can still miss it, while one with the right eyes can see the buddhas everywhere.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 11th, 2016 at 5:17 PM

Title: Re: Flow, mindfulness, nondual awareness

Content:

rachmiel said:

I've come to recognize three key states of "heightened" consciousness: flow, mindfulness, and nondual awareness.

Astus wrote:

What's the use of such states? How do they relate to liberation?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 11th, 2016 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: Flow, mindfulness, nondual awareness

Content:

rachmiel said:

Flow can help us work through a complex teaching, or a tough day at a retreat, etc.

Astus wrote:

"immersion in the current activity ... similar to autopilot in terms of the feeling that things happen "on their own."" - a complex teaching needs complex thinking to understand, so I don't see how that helps. This flow is basically just getting lost in experiences without a shred of reflection.

rachmiel said:

Mindfulness can keep us grounded in the present moment.

Astus wrote:

And that is good for what?

rachmiel said:

And non-dual awareness IS liberation ... or at least a doorway to it.

Astus wrote:

Since it is a conditioned state, it is hardly liberation. And as long as one imagines it to be anything special, it is a doorway only to more attachments.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 11th, 2016 at 10:31 PM

Title: Re: Flow, mindfulness, nondual awareness

Content:

rachmiel said:

When you are so immersed in reading/contemplating a teaching that you forget about time, food, self ... you are in flow.

Astus wrote:

In other words, it is an enjoyable activity. Such activities are what can serve as a good basis for craving.

rachmiel said:

Direct experience of what-is.

Astus wrote:

How is that different from recognising that it is raining?

rachmiel said:

Would all Buddhist and Tibetan Buddhist schools agree that non-dual awareness is a conditioned state? Advaitins would say no, non-dual awareness (brahman) is unconditioned and state-less.

Astus wrote:

Non-duality in Buddhism means the freedom from grasping at the concepts of existence and non-existence. It is not a state to be in.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 12th, 2016 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: Flow, mindfulness, nondual awareness

Content:

rachmiel said:

It's less concept-heavy, more vivid.

Astus wrote:

Are concepts not part of what is?

rachmiel said:

So Buddhism does not have "non-dual awareness" in its vocabulary?

Astus wrote:

Buddhist vocabulary exists in Pali, Sanskrit, Chinese, and Tibetan. What is the term you are looking for? For instance, "non-dual mind" (不二心) or "non-dual awareness" (不二知) are not found in the Chinese Buddhist dictionary, nor "non-dual intellect" (不二意) or "non-dual consciousness" (不二識).

Garfield (Buddhist Philosophy: Essential Readings, p 44) uses it in his translation of Trisvabhavanirdeśa:

"In the same way, through the non-perception of duality
There is the vanishing of duality.
When it vanishes completely,

Non-dual awareness arises."

However, the same stanza by Anacker (Seven Works of Vasubandhu, p 295):

"With the non-apprehension of duality, the appearance of duality vanishes, and with this disappearance, the fulfilled, the non-being of duality, is understood."

And Kochumutton (A Buddhist Doctrine of Experience, p 252):

"By the non-perception of duality
The form of duality disappears;
The non-duality resulting from its disappearance
Is then attained."

And indeed, I don't see any sign of "non-dual awareness" in the <http://www.dsbcproject.org/canon-text/content/338/1391>:

dvayasyānupalambhena dvayākāro vigacchati|
vigamāt tasya niṣpanno dvayābhāvo'dhigamyate||

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 12th, 2016 at 1:22 AM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Anders said:

Historically, I suppose you could say it was distinctive, in the sense that when Zen came to China, it really shifted the onus from exegesis and choice of scripture as the hallmarks of profundity of the various school to embodied awakening and transmitting this awakening in the most practical and expedient way according to circumstances.

Astus wrote:

Except that when it came to China, it was the Lankavatara school, very much scripture based, if we can consider Bodhidharma the source of Zen. Then there was Shenhui and the Diamond Sutra, followed by the first major Zen scripture, the Platform Sutra, that itself became the hallmark of true transmission according to its own claim. And when we arrive at mature Zen of the Song era, when the "outside the teachings" concept was invented, it was all about the production of lamp records. As for teaching according to circumstances, that's the whole point of skilful means, a classical Mahayana element.

Anders said:

Yes indeed. The point of being a 'transmission' school, as opposed to a 'scriptural' school (though I think 'scriptural' schools that carry authentic living lineages of awakening share this trait with Zen)

Astus wrote:

We can know for a fact that Zen does not have an unbroken lineage. How can there be a transmission then?

Anders said:

the profundity of the Zen school is not a matter of a special teaching or method, but a matter of the present profundity of realisation of those within its lineage and their ability to impart this onto students.

Astus wrote:

Can you specify what the realisation is about? What is it that is realised?

Anders said:

Basically, the profundity of Zen varies over time.

Astus wrote:

How could it vary if the same realisation is transmitted?

Anders said:

Hence why Dogen refused to even acknowledge a Zen school as anything other than false classification and stressed that "You must understand that in Buddhism the stress falls on the truth or falsity of the training-not on the excellence or mediocrity of the teaching or the depth or shallowness of the principle."

Astus wrote:

And in the same answer Dogen (Bendowa, BDK ed SBGZ vol 1, p 10-11) specifies his message as: "When we solely sit in zazen ... relying now on exactly the same posture as the Buddha, and letting go of the myriad things, then we go beyond the areas of delusion, realization, emotion, and consideration, and we are not concerned with the ways of the common and the sacred. At once we are roaming outside the [intellectual] frame, receiving and using the great state of bodhi." At the same time, he summarily dismisses every other teaching: "This is something that has never been heard in other lineages." In other words, he does have a specific method, and considers it the only real path.

Anders said:

This is aversive to classification and eludes questions like "what is Zen really"

Astus wrote:

Not at all. Dogen (in Bendowa) is quite straightforward in stating that "Great Master Śākyamuni exactly transmitted, as the authentic tradition, this subtle method of grasping the state of truth, and the tathāgatas of the three times all attained the truth through zazen. Thus the fact that [zazen] is the authentic gate has been transmitted and received. Furthermore, the patriarchs of the Western Heavens and the Eastern Lands all attained the truth through zazen. Therefore I am now preaching [zazen] to human beings and gods as the authentic gate."

Anders said:

It is essentially Samantabhadra - ie, all enlightened and enlightening activities within the stream of Zen practitioners and adepts. Pretty simple and unadorned really, but impossible to overlook, imo.

Astus wrote:

In other words, Zen is what Zen practitioners and adepts do, so "Zen is what Zen does". But why some people are and others are not Zen, that's still a mystery.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 13th, 2016 at 5:05 PM

Title: Re: Taisho translations

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here is a more complete list of existing translations:

<http://mbingenheimer.net/tools/bibls/transbibl.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 14th, 2016 at 12:09 AM

Title: Re: Taisho translations

Content:

pael said:

How many characters you need to know for reading Taisho?

Astus wrote:

It's not just knowing classical Chinese, but add to that a Buddhist vocabulary as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 14th, 2016 at 5:31 PM

Title: Re: Is this wrong?

Content:

Norden said:

since it's a Sutra, Maha Karuna Dharani Sutra to be precise. Did I make a bad kamma since I turned it off with such thought?

...

But that is Sutra's noise not music's sound.

And the "dislike" arose prior turning it off was caused by the Sutra's noise hence the doer with such thought turning it off.

Astus wrote:

You cannot turn off a sutra, nor does a sutra have noise. The only bad thing would be if you rejected the teaching of the sutra, thus abandoning the path. But that is not the case here.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 24th, 2016 at 5:49 PM

Title: Re: Sadhana or Visualization come under what category in Tendai or other Buddhist sects?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Visualisation of a buddha is commonly known as buddha-remembrance (<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Nianfo>), one of the basic remembrance practices (<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Anussati>).

Some sutras on visualisation:

<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra22.html>

<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra24.html>

<http://www.fodian.net/world/0277b.html>

<http://www.fodian.net/world/0450.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 25th, 2016 at 7:53 PM

Title: Re: How do buddhas contact people?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here is some explanation from Kumarajiva on meeting buddhas:

"There are three types of samādhi for seeing the Buddhas (jianfo sanmei 見佛三昧): (1) A Bodhisattva might attain the divine eye or the divine ear, or perhaps fly throughout the ten directions to where the Buddhas reside, see them, ask questions about their difficulties, and have their snare of doubts cut off. (2) Even without supernatural powers, they contemplate (nian 念) Amitābha and all the Buddhas of the present, and with their mind residing in one place, they can attain a vision of the Buddhas and ask about their doubts. (3) They can study and practice nianfo with or without having abandoned their desires. Alternatively, they may gaze at a Buddha image, or contemplate his earthly Buddha-body, or see all of the Buddhas of the past, present, and future. All three of these are called "nianfo samādhi.""

(Charles B. Jones: http://chinesebuddhiststudies.org/previous_issues/chbj2109-New_Jones_CHBJ_V21.pdf)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 25th, 2016 at 7:57 PM

Title: Re: Sadhana or Visualization come under what category in Tendai or other Buddhist sects?

Content:

ShineeSeoul said:

are they under vipassana? the visualization, or they are under different category

Astus wrote:

If one thinks about the qualities of buddhas, that is a good preliminary practice. If one focuses on an image, that can be samatha. If one contemplates that the image is mind made and empty, that is vipasyana. Combining focus and contemplation is the combination of samatha and vipasyana.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 25th, 2016 at 7:59 PM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

Astus wrote:

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=-blp_r2rKOk

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s = document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 25th, 2016 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: Samatha vs Vipassana?

Content:

Astus wrote:

What do you mean by such terms? There are numerous ways to practise calming and insight, and there are methods to prepare oneself to calming. As long as the emotions are too strong to allow sitting peacefully, you might approach from cultivating <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Nianfo> (see: <http://ymba.org/books/taming-monkey-mind-guide-pure-land-practice>), the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Brahmavihara> (see: <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/authors/nyanaponika/wheel006.html>), one of the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ng%C3%B6ndro> s, sutra recitation, or prostration.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 26th, 2016 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

Admin_PC said:

He talks about having a timeline in order to respect the plurality of Buddhist traditions, warning against "Early Buddhist" fundamentalism.

Astus wrote:

It is the historical approach that can logically explain the varieties while at the same time does not devalue the developments.

Admin_PC said:

In real life, his works are absolutely used to establish an "Early Buddhist" fundamentalism

Astus wrote:

His main area is the study of Early Buddhism. If there are some who happen to misuse it for fundamentalist claims, how is that his fault?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 26th, 2016 at 6:06 AM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

tomamundsen said:

But even labeling some teachings (i.e. Mahayana sutras) as "developments" and rejecting them as authentic original teachings of the Buddha is de-valuing them straight out of the gate.

Astus wrote:

Everyone claims that they are the original and the rest are not. Thus the conflicting statements. That is what taking a historical perspective can resolve.

tomamundsen said:

What about the case of Buddhist teachers from traditional Buddhist cultures who teach these things to Westerners?

Astus wrote:

A good number of Asian teachers have been aware of modern historical studies for a while now. Besides that, every tradition has its own version of structuring the teachings according to its own ideas. There is nothing wrong with such structures. However, they are not historical accounts, but theoretical systems meant to establish certain interpretations.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 26th, 2016 at 6:12 AM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

Admin_PC said:

I'm saying he inherently devalues by forcing his narrative without evidence, establishing his own version as historically primary. He did it in that video for sure.

Astus wrote:

Historical studies in Buddhism, that has been going on for 100+ years, are quite clear about the sequence of the appearance of various texts. Are you aware of some research that contradict the generally accepted view?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 26th, 2016 at 5:46 PM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

Admin_PC said:

Let me put it this way, that faction puts a lot of stock in TW Rhys Davids. I happen to put more stock in people like Prof. Charles Willemen.

Astus wrote:

Does Willemen debate the timeline of Buddhist scriptures and schools? Does he claim that Mahayana is traceable to the earliest strata of Buddhism? If not, what is it in particular that makes you say that you prefer that "faction"?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 26th, 2016 at 5:53 PM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Resolve what? What exactly is resolved by these studies? Is it something relevant to the goals of Dharma practice, or is it merely relevant to validating one approach to texts over another?

Astus wrote:

Authenticity based on historical claims is what is investigated and analysed. In other words, if one's claim of authenticity relies on a set of assumptions about past events, then analysing those statements is the logical step. Just as it is so often done about today's teachers that the first thing people want to affirm is whether they are members of an accepted tradition. So, is history relevant to Dharma practice? Many think so, otherwise they would not base their credibility on historical assumptions, and there would not be controversies over lineages, transmissions, etc. But if we remove the historical element, then what we are left with are the doctrinal and practical teachings, so we can actually deal with what is directly relevant to practice, instead of the usual bickering over stories of the past.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 26th, 2016 at 6:00 PM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

tomamundsen said:

I don't really see much being resolved with this method, to be honest. It seems to just create a new statement that conflicts with all of the other ones. I am happy to take traditions on their own terms and accept the cognitive dissonance that follows.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean that you accept history as a matter of sectarian affiliation? If so, then all versions stand on equal grounds, consequently neither of them can actually call itself the true account compared to any other story. In this way the whole topic of historical origin becomes irrelevant in ascertaining authenticity.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 26th, 2016 at 6:08 PM

Title: Re: Sadhana or Visualization come under what category in Tendai or other Buddhist sects?

Content:

LetGo said:

I'm not sure 念佛 is the proper term for visualizing the Buddha.

Astus wrote:

Nianfo simply means buddha-remembrance, from the term buddhanusmrti. The way one recalls a buddha is not specified by the expression.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 26th, 2016 at 7:03 PM

Title: Re: How do buddhas contact people?

Content:

Luke said:

How does one distinguish between actually contacting a buddha mentally and one's own wishful thinking/fantasies/delusions?

Astus wrote:

Everything, the entire realm of experience, is the product of "one's own wishful thinking/fantasies/delusions". If one encounters a buddha or several buddhas in one's meditation, that is actually seeing a buddha. To think that there is a buddha besides one's actual experience, that is assuming an independent self.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 26th, 2016 at 7:40 PM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

Admin_PC said:

You're reframing my argument to say something I'm not saying. You say I'm debating Mahayana timeline, I am not. I never have in this thread.

Astus wrote:

In that case I see nothing to be debated, at least from my side.

Admin_PC said:

he does say it's organic growth of ideas that have seeds starting with very early material. Analayo is quick to throw out any early material that contains the seeds for these later ideas, claiming it's all later material

Astus wrote:

I am not as invested in the topic as you seem to be. Do you have some examples of scriptures he rejects?

Admin_PC said:

That he attempts in that video to claim he is ecumenical is laughable and ironic.

Astus wrote:

I think that is focusing on the person instead of the content. Whether Ven. Analayo lives up to the ideals presented there or not is irrelevant as far as I can tell.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 26th, 2016 at 8:40 PM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

Admin_PC said:

The most egregious is probably his rebuttal of Guang Xing's mention of Buddhas of the Ten Directions appearing in a sutra in the Agamas based entirely off of a CBETA search of a single character.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean <https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/mahayana.pdf>? There, on p19n48 what he writes is that the expression "buddhas of past, present, future" does not mean contemporaneity. Furthermore, Guang Xing writes (p 65) that the idea of contemporaneous buddhas is most likely a Mahasamghika concept that is not accepted by the Sarvastivadins. In other words, if that concept of many buddhas at the same time had been present in the early strata, it would not have been a problematical view, and the MPPS (quoted by Guang Xing as the earliest discussion on the matter) would not have said that contemporaneous buddhas were not a sravaka but a mahayana idea.

So, there is actually no disagreement on the matter between Guang Xing and Analayo that the idea of contemporaneous buddhas is a later concept. Even if the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/%C4%80gama_%28Buddhism%29#Buddhology tries to make this a thing, it isn't really a thing.

Admin_PC said:

when the man has an entire library of sectarian articles

Astus wrote:

Do you call the study of Early Buddhism a sectarian endeavour? I wouldn't.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 26th, 2016 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

Admin_PC said:

One quote from that footnote seems to dispute what you just said:

"EĀ 37.2 is the only one out of these passages that does reflect the notion that Buddhas can exist simultaneously."

Astus wrote:

The whole point of that paper is to show how EA includes several Mahayana elements, so that passage is one more example for it.

Admin_PC said:

Among other things, these guys support Gombrich's idea that no teachings could possibly have been passed down within certain lineages that were not preserved in the Agamas

Astus wrote:

Are you referring to the usual trope of "secret transmission", used so often by those who wanted to establish a new teaching's authenticity?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 26th, 2016 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

Admin_PC said:

How Guang Xing supports Analayo's claim that it's all back-imported into the Agamas from Mahayana, I have no idea.

Astus wrote:

What Analayo shows is the presence of Mahayana notions in the EA, particularly the first part of it, and attributes that to the conditions in 5th century China.

Admin_PC said:

I'm talking about the in-house doctrines of the various 18 early schools, which Guang Xing covers pretty extensively. These in-house doctrines led to fairly early works like the Mahavastu and would've been ideas passed down within particular schools prior to being made formal works.

Astus wrote:

I'm not sure if Analayo debates that Mahayana is the organic development from the northern schools. In fact, his work <https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/genesis-bodhisattva.pdf> concludes (p 130): "A central factor behind these various strands of development that appear to have contributed to the genesis of the bodhisattva ideal seems to be the gradual apotheosis of the Buddha, evident already in the early discourses." and (p 131): "Taking the early discourses as the starting point would also explain quite naturally why the bodhisattva ideal became a pan-Buddhist phenomenon that drew followers from most, if not all, of the Buddhist schools, including the Theravāda tradition."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 27th, 2016 at 12:26 AM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

Admin_PC said:

I'm just positing that attributing the simultaneous Buddhas of the 10 directions to the Mahayana is a bit of a stretch. Certainly Guang Xing is not making this case in his writings, attributing the idea to pre-Mahayana Mahasanghika thought.

Astus wrote:

Analayo attributes it to the Mahasanghikas as well, as you have seen yourself in the footnote.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 27th, 2016 at 2:54 AM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

Admin_PC said:

Maybe I'm missing something, but where are the Mahasanghikas mentioned

Astus wrote:

You're right, it's Guang Xing who writes that the doctrine of contemporaneous buddhas was held by the Mahasanghikas.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 27th, 2016 at 3:06 AM

Title: Re: How do buddhas contact people?

Content:

Luke said:

Even Shakyamuni Buddha who was a historical figure is/was "just a product of my own wishful thinking"??

Astus wrote:

You have not seen nor touched Shakyamuni, you merely think of him. So it is a good example of purely mental existence, that you nevertheless propose as something absolutely real.

Luke said:

And secondly, lumping all ideas proposed by humans as "delusions" completely skips over the fact that some ideas are very useful, beneficial, and accurately predict phenomena; whereas others are not useful, not beneficial, and don't accurately predict phenomena. For example, scientific laws and theories are some of the most useful "delusions" that there are!

Astus wrote:

Visions of buddhas are relevant to the practice of Buddhism, in particular a type of meditation. It is neither a scientific nor an economic doctrine or method. As far as I'm aware, no one has suggested that one should visualise buddhas in order to explain earthquakes or improve internet connection.

Luke said:

It's not clear to me how sophisticated Mahayana Buddhists have recalibrated their "B.S. filters" to let in the minimum amount of essential Mahayana concepts while safely keeping out total nonsense. Saying "all is mind" seems to me to be embracing a world of undifferentiated nonsense, which doesn't seem to me like a very useful view to have...

Astus wrote:

One of the basic tenets of Buddhism is that everything exists in context. So, if one says that there is anything that exists and/or has a meaning regardless of context, that is B.S. All teachings of Buddhism are within the context of perpetuating liberation. Once one forgets that context and tries to interpret the Dharma as something else, it ceases to be in accordance with the teaching of the buddhas.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 27th, 2016 at 5:10 PM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

MiphamFan said:

The differences in paths are due to the differences in karmic proclivities of beings, this is basic Mahayana.

Astus wrote:

This is actually saying that not only someone follows an inferior path, but that the person following it is inferior as well. On the other hand, it is a fine way to strengthen pride and arrogance for those who imagine that because they subscribe to some superior path they are per definition superior people.

MiphamFan said:

Objectively, there are paths that lead more quickly or more slowly to Buddhahood

Astus wrote:

According to what objective criteria?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 27th, 2016 at 6:26 PM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:
MiphamFan said:
How is it pride and arrogance?

Astus wrote:
What else would you call the assumption that oneself is superior (exaltation) and others are inferior (contempt)?

"What is pride (mana)? It is exaltation of the mind (cittasyonnatih) which rests on the idea of self. Its function consists of giving a basis to the appearance of contempt (agaurava) and suffering."
(Abhidharmasamuccaya, p 12)

MiphamFan said:
In the same way, through good circumstances, I somehow met with Dzogchen teachers and have been given teachings. Through no fault of theirs, other beings never managed to do so.

Astus wrote:
All beings are heir to their own deeds. Karma and luck are opposing concepts.

MiphamFan said:
Criteria: rainbow body, all the signs along the path of Vajrayana etc

Astus wrote:
How are those criteria objective when they are accepted only by some Vajrayana followers?

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, October 27th, 2016 at 10:32 PM
Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path
Content:

MiphamFan said:
it's not necessarily MY own deeds that led me to this path as that metaphor suggests

Astus wrote:
If accidental circumstances can affect a being's life, that negates the very meaning of karma.

MiphamFan said:
in any case, I am not proud

Astus wrote:
That is certainly laudable. However, it does not address the problem of the view that some paths and their followers are inferior and some are superior.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 28th, 2016 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

MiphamFan said:

How does the example of the insect negate karma?

Astus wrote:

Karma is intentional action, it is what one does. If a big rock crashes someone, that is not an action but a consequence of a past action.

MiphamFan said:

It's a karmic link created from e.g. Trisong Detsen's link.

Astus wrote:

What is a karmic link? Is there a definition for it? What links what?

MiphamFan said:

The vehicles in themselves are not intrinsically better or worse, whether they are superior or inferior depends on the practitioner.

Astus wrote:

So do you now say that all vehicles are capable to accomplish the same, it only depends on the practitioner?

MiphamFan said:

It is far more foolish to say they are all the same.

Astus wrote:

If not, then it's not a question of the practitioner, but rather that some are better and some are worse.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 28th, 2016 at 4:22 AM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

Malcolm said:

Someone who is not expert in paths will not necessarily be able to distinguish a correct path from an incorrect path, or a superior path from an inferior path. Only some people have the necessary knowledge to make such an evaluation.

Astus wrote:

When the so called expert decides what those paths are, it is quite straightforward to claim to be the upholder of the best of the best and paint everyone else as inferior. It is like the aesthetician who says that Pre-Raphaelites are inferior to Cubists, but Pointillists are truly the best of all.

Malcolm said:

the purpose of evaluating paths is due to the fact that everyone wishes to achieve liberation as rapidly as possible

Astus wrote:

Shravakas may worry about quick liberation, bodhisattvas realise that there is nothing to attain.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 28th, 2016 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

Malcolm said:

This is why, rather than relying on the evaluations of paths made by scholars, we rely on the evaluations of paths made by buddhas.

Astus wrote:

And how do you tell who those buddhas are?

Malcolm said:

Bodhisattvas may realize there is nothing to attain, but they sure spend a long time going about that nonattainment.

Astus wrote:

Long is too mild a word. Not only the number of beings infinite, but their amount never even decrease.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 28th, 2016 at 4:53 PM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

maybay said:

Even the scholars agree who the Buddhas are.

Astus wrote:

The only buddha everyone agrees on is Shakyamuni, and even then it is a matter of affiliation that decides what teachings are attributed to him. At the same time, Garab Dorje is believed to be a buddha mostly by dzogchen followers and not others.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 28th, 2016 at 5:22 PM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

Ayu said:

Mathematicians say, if the world was infinite, then there have to be exact copies of everything in some duplicate worlds. They claim, the variety of forms has to be finite. If you think it through, you'll reach a point where all combinations and possibilities are finished.

Astus wrote:

The infinity and the non-decrease of beings stand for something else. It means that the realm of sentient beings and the realm of buddhas are not two.

"Śāriputra, foolish ordinary beings do not know the one dharma realm in accord with true reality. Because they do not see the one dharma realm in accord with true reality, they elicit wrong views in their minds, saying that the realm of sentient beings increases or decreases."

(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra14.html>)

"as the dharma realm and the domain of space have no beginning and no end, so too does the realm of sentient beings. Therefore, King of Laṅkā, because the realm of sentient beings is indescribable, we know that it neither increases nor decreases. Thus, in the ocean of the Three Realms of Existence, although some sentient beings have crossed it and some will cross it, the realm of sentient beings neither increases nor decreases. King of Laṅkā, as an analogy, the domain of space neither increases nor decreases, and has no beginning, middle, or end. Therefore, it cannot be known. Yet it pervades everywhere, with no hindrance, no shape, no action, and no appearance. Indeed, indeed. King of Laṅkā, one can never find the beginning, middle, or end of the realm of sentient beings. King of Laṅkā, only achieving a clear understanding of the holy teachings can be called ending the realm of sentient beings, though the path of saṃskṛta dharmas never ends. King of Laṅkā, the path of liberation is not apart from the path of saṃskṛta dharmas. Why? Because this is the natural way of the realm of sentient beings. Therefore, it has no beginning, middle, or end."

(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra48a.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 28th, 2016 at 6:40 PM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

maybay said:

It is enough to agree on one omniscient Buddha. So long as a teaching is not in contradiction of his Dharma that teaching is OK.

Astus wrote:

From both the historical and religious perspective, the primary/fundamental basis of the Dharma that everyone agrees on is the collection of teachings in the Nikayas and Agamas.

And as <http://www.geocities.ws/sutrasbudistas/shastras/gran-vehiculo.html> writes:
"one who investigates well this issue realizes that the Great Vehicle is completely in accord with the threefold seal of the dharma. Of course, if one does not well investigate it, then neither the Great Vehicle nor any of the three vehicles is accepted."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 28th, 2016 at 10:35 PM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

Malcolm said:

The Dharma taught by the Buddha in the First Turning is palliative, not fundamental; provisional and not definitive.

Astus wrote:

It is still the only common ground among all Buddhists, regardless of how individual schools interpret it. And that makes it fundamental, the basis for everyone.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 29th, 2016 at 12:23 AM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

Malcolm said:

But it is not a common ground at all. Or, rather, because of the history of Buddhist Studies in the West, there has come to be a mirage of commonality which every one chases, but somehow, no one can quite reach.

Astus wrote:

Even if the Agamas were not particularly popular in East Asia, and they were not transmitted to Tibet, the core doctrines, like the three characteristics, four noble truths, five aggregates, eighteen realms, twelve links and the thirty-seven factors have always been known.

Although if there is no common ground for the various groups, it also means that the paths they distinguish are different, and they actually do not say anything about the others, but rather simply make up their own structure of teachings. For example, the nine vehicles of the Nyingmapas say nothing about the teachings of the Kagyupas or the Theravadins, because those nine are merely their own interpretation of the teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 29th, 2016 at 2:52 AM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

Malcolm said:

These things are not core doctrines at all. They are just taxonomies.

Astus wrote:

Teachings are what provide the description of the path to liberation. Those taxonomies are shorthand for various sets of teachings.

Malcolm said:

The nine yānas are also a taxonomy, a way of presenting distinct kinds of methodologies.

Astus wrote:

And the methodologies distinguished that way are what those who set up the taxonomy assign to it, and not identical to what others might mean by them.

Malcolm said:

So what might be a core teaching of the Buddha, as opposed to a taxonomy?

This ambrosial Dharma I have obtained is deep, peaceful, immaculate, luminous, and unconditioned.

Astus wrote:

A teaching cannot be unconditioned. The result of applying the teaching can be.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 30th, 2016 at 1:02 AM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

If it is a result of applying the teaching then it arises conditionally based on the teaching.
ie The result is conditioned.

Astus wrote:

As long as there is fuel (clinging), the fire (passion) burns. With the fuel removed the fire is extinguished (see:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn35/sn35.028.than.html>). That is how even though there is a conditioned path, the result is unconditioned. Or, to fit this to the tathagatagarbha teaching, appearances have always been empty, it is only by the mistaken view of substantiality that there is suffering. Therefore, when it is pointed out and personally seen that there is nothing to grasp, delusion is gone.

"Their mental stream, beginningless,

Is governed by their false belief that things are real.

All living beings therefore fail

To see the nature of phenomena.

Those who sound the nature of phenomena with reasoning

That cuts through misconception and brings understanding

Know this nature. It is known by powerful yogis also,

Through their clear, direct experience."

(Shantarakshita: The Adornment of the Middle Way, v 74-75, tr Padmakara)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 30th, 2016 at 1:19 AM

Title: Re: comparing paths, uniting paths, and practicing a path

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

The fire going out is conditional on the fuel being removed (or burning out and no extra fuel being added).

Astus wrote:

When the cause is gone, there is no reason for the result to occur. When the root is cut, the tree falls and never grows again. With ignorance eliminated, there is no basis for ignorance to recur, thus no more dissatisfaction. That is how the fire cannot burst into flames again.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 31st, 2016 at 2:40 AM

Title: Re: Ultimate Truth

Content:

Astus wrote:

Relative as ultimate is the relative. Relative as relative is the ultimate.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 31st, 2016 at 3:54 AM

Title: Re: Ultimate Truth

Content:

Vasana said:

not knowing the source of the relative is what keeps the wheel of suffering spinning.

Astus wrote:

If you assume there is a source, it is necessarily relative. What keeps the wheel spinning is the assumption that there is something ultimate to attain.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 31st, 2016 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: Ultimate Truth

Content:

Malcolm said:

Revise that to, "What keeps the wheel spinning is the assumption that there is something ultimate," then it is perfect.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 31st, 2016 at 5:29 AM

Title: Re: Ultimate Truth

Content:

Vasana said:

It depends how you define "source". I'm using source in the sense of both Samsara or Nirvana arising 'from' no where else but one's mind. Not in the sense of an isolatable source.

Astus wrote:

I think saying that there is a source can mislead one into the idea of a substratum. Samsara and nirvana are mental constructs, concepts. To say that there is mind, and then there are samsara and nirvana only complicates things.

Vasana said:

Not being something to attain doesn't negate the ultimate as being something to realize for one's self, not as an 'object' of realization but as a mode of perception.

Astus wrote:

What there is to realise it that there is nothing to attain. Not even a mode of perception.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 31st, 2016 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: Ultimate Truth

Content:

rachmiel said:

Advaita* definitely wins in terms of simplicity:
Ultimately there is brahman, period.

Astus wrote:

Buddhism is simpler: there is not even a brahman.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 31st, 2016 at 6:31 AM

Title: Re: Ultimate Truth

Content:

Wayfarer said:

In the early Buddhist texts, there are many exhortations to 'hasten and strive'. There is a sense that time is limited, 'the enemy' is powerful, and the chance for liberation is slight. That seems hard to reconcile with the idea that there is 'nothing to attain'. What do you make of that?

Astus wrote:

Realising that there is nothing to attain means no more attachment. Beings are very much used to grasping at things, so it is normally not that easy to give up one's emotional and conceptual clinging.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 31st, 2016 at 6:47 AM

Title: Re: Ultimate Truth

Content:

Vasana said:

To realize there is nothing to attain is it's self a mode of perception

Astus wrote:

It is the cessation of the mistaken view of self. It is not another view, state of mind, or mode of perception.

Vasana said:

it wouldn't be possible to conventionally distinguish the position of 'nothing to attain' with any other position.

Astus wrote:

To have any position is still attachment.

Vasana said:

It would then also follow that since ordinary beings have nothing to attain, their perceptions and knowledge are on par with a Buddha's. This would then invalidate the need for Buddhas to teach in the first place.

Astus wrote:

Ordinary beings believe there is something to attain. Buddhas do not. As Dogen (Genjokoan, BDK ed SBGZ vol 1, p 41) put it: "Those who greatly realize delusion are buddhas. Those who are greatly deluded about realization are ordinary beings." Also: "when you know illusion, you will immediately be free" (Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment, ch 2, tr Muller).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 31st, 2016 at 7:22 AM

Title: Re: Ultimate Truth

Content:

Wayfarer said:

So 'nothing to attain' doesn't mean just going along as we have always done, right?

Astus wrote:

We have always imagined that there are states of being to maintain and states of being to attain. That's what samsara is all about. Recognising that all states of being are empty is how there is no more struggle.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 31st, 2016 at 5:16 PM

Title: Re: Ultimate Truth

Content:

Coëmgenu said:

Where is this from? Not that I am implying that it is a fake quote, I just like to read.

Malcolm said:

It is from the heart of dependent origination by Nāgārjuna.

Astus wrote:

<http://www.lotsawahouse.org/indian-masters/nagarjuna/heart-dependent-origination>

Also see Santina: http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/nagarjuna.pdf.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 31st, 2016 at 5:56 PM

Title: Re: Ultimate Truth

Content:

Vasana said:

since mind is not blank and inert like a pebble but clear and lucid I don't think using the word perception is problematic

Astus wrote:

Appearances are apparent, and what is not apparent is not an appearance. It might be called clarity as well, if we add that there is nothing that is not clarity. Perception is not problematic, if no instance of perception is assumed to be anything other than dependently originated.

Vasana said:

when referring to that perception as being free of grasping subject and object, self and other etc. Its not another ordinary perception but bare "yogic perception" or nonconceptual valid cognition.

Astus wrote:

It's fine as long as it's clear that nonconceptual (nirvikalpa) is not the absence of concepts as appearances but the cessation of conceptualisation (nisprapanca).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 1st, 2016 at 5:21 PM

Title: Re: Ultimate Truth

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

The wallet is empty of money and this is not an intellectual idea, it's our actual experience.

Astus wrote:

There is a visual impression that is interpreted as absence of money. In other words, it is as conceptual as the idea that it is filled with money.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 4th, 2016 at 8:15 PM

Title: Re: Are there any Zen schools that teach only soup?

Content:

Dgj said:

if one totally forgot duality and nonduality then one would be practicing Zen.

Astus wrote:

That is an assumption based on what?

Dgj said:

Where there is only the soup and no further teaching or implications?

Astus wrote:

It seems you already know all you want to know. Why look for more?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 5th, 2016 at 3:25 AM

Title: Re: Ultimate Truth

Content:

conebeckham said:

It is ignorance of the appearance's true nature, and not the appearances themselves, which is the problem.

Astus wrote:

"What is this delusion like? It is ignorance, which in this context is an awareness that mistakenly superimposes intrinsic nature; it apprehends internal and external phenomena as existing by way of their own intrinsic character."

(Tsongkhapa: The Great Treatise on the Stages of the Path, vol 3, p 206-207)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 5th, 2016 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: Ultimate Truth

Content:

conebeckham said:

He does not negate appearances. Nor does he claim appearances, as such, "change."

Astus wrote:

"Hence, the ultimate wrong conceptual consciousness that conceives the object of negation is the innate ignorance which is the first of the twelve factors of dependent-arising. Acquired objects of negation are merely superimpositions based on this. Thus, it is not at all the case that reason negates all of the cognitive processes through which non-conceptual consciousnesses - e.g., sensory consciousnesses - apprehend things. Therefore, only conceptual mental consciousnesses have cognitive processes that are negated by reason; more specifically, reason refutes the cognitive processes of the two conceptions of self and the cognitive processes of those conceptual consciousnesses that superimpose further attributes on objects that have been imputed by those two conceptions of self. It is not that reason refutes the cognitive processes of all conceptual consciousnesses of any kind."

(Tsongkhapa: The Great Treatise on the Stages of the Path, vol 3, p 212)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 5th, 2016 at 6:22 AM

Title: Re: Ultimate Truth

Content:

Malcolm said:

But there is nothing in regular sūtra to suggest that a buddha perceives only pure appearances.

Astus wrote:

What makes something pure and something impure?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 5th, 2016 at 7:43 AM

Title: Re: Ultimate Truth

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

When it comes to Buddhism, purity or impurity is defined as the presence or absence of delusion and their imprints perhaps? If minds are deluded, they are impure. If actions are motivated by delusions, they are impure. Only Buddha has a completely pure mind which is free from the two obstructions. The presence of delusions and their imprints distort our perceptions and create mistaken appearances.

Astus wrote:

Delusion is the mistake of substantiality. With the removal of that error, all are seen to be empty, hence there is no more grasping. As for appearances, it changes nothing but one's attitude towards them, where before one viewed them as self or possessions of self, after they are seen without such superimposition.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 7th, 2016 at 7:48 PM

Title: Re: Other examples of stories to be taken as literal or non literal.

Content:

Astus wrote:

No story should be taken literally.

Haut flung the crust of the bread he had been gnawing on into the hearth, but as there was no fire the crust simply fell among the wet sticks and soaked logs. The Jaghut frowned. 'With your vicious and incessant assault upon my natural equanimity, you force upon me the necessity of a tale, and I so dislike telling a tale. Now, hostage, why should that be so?'

'I thought I was the one asking questions.'

Haut waved a hand in dismissal. 'If that conceit comforts you, so be it. I am not altered in my resolve. Now tell me, why do I dislike tales?'

'Because they imply a unity that does not exist. Only rarely does a life have a theme, and even then such themes exist in confusion and uncertainty, and are only described by others once that life has come to an end. A tale is the binding of themes to a past, because no tale can be told as it is happening.'

(Steven Erikson: Forge of Darkness, p 513)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 9th, 2016 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism is medicine, not metaphysics

Content:

Astus wrote:

Buddhism is medicine according to its self-interpretation, and that view is based on a number of metaphysical assumptions, like any view.

Might as well say that it is through accepting the metaphysical view of Buddhism that one cures oneself from all the other views that do not agree with the Buddha's.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2016 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible that Bodhidharma and Buddhahadra's histories are mixed together?

Content:

Dgj said:

Bodhidharma came from India, taught Dhyana (Zen), became the abbot of Shaolin Temple and taught the Shaolin monks some form of calisthenics that lead to the creation of Shaolin Kung Fu.

Astus wrote:

The legends of Bodhidharma are centuries later than his alleged arrival to China. First martial arts book attributed to Bodhidharma was made in 1642. Even the association of martial arts with Shaolin goes back only to the 13th century. See for reference McRae's "Seeing through Zen", p 26.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2016 at 9:56 PM

Title: Re: Does the "Northern School" still exist today?

Content:

Dgj said:

If not, are there any schools that are very similar to it? A school or schools that teach similar to what was taught by Yuquan Shenxiu?

Astus wrote:

Disciples of Shenxiu disappeared by the end of the Tang era - i.e. people who claimed to be descendants of a lineage from him. But as for the doctrinal and practical part, the so called Northern School represent the earliest phase of Chan, consequently it is the ancestor of all later schools. For instance, works like the Breakthrough Sermon of Bodhidharma, and the Essentials of Cultivating the Mind by Hongren are actually teachings of the Northern School.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2016 at 11:57 PM

Title: Re: Does the "Northern School" still exist today?

Content:

Dgj said:

What about Shikantaza? It seems a bit similar to the sitting practiced by the "Northern School".

Astus wrote:

Shikantaza is Dogen's reinterpretation of Changlu Zongze's seated meditation, that goes back to Guifeng Zongmi's description of Zen practice, and that goes back to Heze Shenhui's teachings on no-thought. So it is not Northern school.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 12th, 2016 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible that Bodhidharma and Buddhahadra's histories are mixed together?

Content:

Dgj said:

Do you think I should reword it?

Astus wrote:

No need.

Dgj said:

Buddhabhadra came from India, taught Dhyana (Zen), became the first abbot of Shaolin Temple and some of his first students were martial arts masters.

Astus wrote:

What records are there of that Buddhahadra? Fotuo meditation teacher (<http://authority.ddbc.edu.tw/person/?fromInner=A000441>) appears in the Continued Record of Eminent Monks (vol http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T50n2060_016 & http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/en/T50n2060_021), but there seems to be no mention of martial arts.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 12th, 2016 at 5:34 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible that Bodhidharma and Buddhahadra's histories are mixed together?

Content:

Dgj said:

"The Shaolin Monastery" pages 35-36 tell the story found in a Tang source, about Buddhahadra's disciple Sengchou being a martial artist.

Astus wrote:

Not exactly. Shaolin monks may have engaged in military activities, but that is far from what is today called martial art. Furthermore, the story there only talks of extraordinary strength gained through an encounter with Vajrapani.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 26th, 2016 at 4:07 AM

Title: Re: Does the "Northern School" still exist today?

Content:

Temicco said:

That's surprising to hear about the Breakthrough Sermon; do you know how it was determined that it's actually a Northern School text?

And what book would talk about it? McRae's The Northern School?

Astus wrote:

Yes, it's in McRae's work, p 207-209.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 26th, 2016 at 6:17 AM

Title: Re: Zen teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

"The transmission of the mind by the World Honored One at three sites is the gist of Seon; what was spoken by him over his lifetime⁸⁰ is the gate of Doctrine. Therefore it is said, "Seon is the Buddha mind; Doctrine is the Buddha word.""

(Hyujeong: Seonga gwigam, in Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol 3, p 58)

Koans are literary products of Chinese Buddhist teachers, meant for the educated elite of monastics and literati. In practice, the method of kanna zen is using a phrase to cease conceptualisation and recognise the nature of mind. The literary and the practical sides are related but not identical, hence the differentiation between literary/monji zen (wenzi chan 文字禪) and kanna zen (kanhua chan 看話禪). However, both are meant to deliver the meaning of the Buddha's teaching and nothing else.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 26th, 2016 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: How do buddhas contact people?

Content:

Luke said:

I don't know if I consider Shakyamuni Buddha as "absolutely real" (I am not sure about what the definition of that would be) but I do consider him "as real as Charlemagne was" because there is historical evidence for the existence of both.

Astus wrote:

And those are concepts as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 26th, 2016 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: Zen teachings

Content:

Dgj said:

Okay thank you. What am I thinking of then? What religion or philosophy is said to be beyond literally everything and one-hundred percent impossible to pin down? That absolutely no words or descriptions can hold and that have no grounding or explanation anywhere? Completely and utterly transcendent? I thought it was Zen, being that Buddha is said to be mind in the scriptures and we have Zen masters saying it is not Buddha and not mind, it seemed like this meant they were pointing to something beyond both distinctions. Any ideas?

Astus wrote:

If it is a view (teaching, doctrine, philosophy, religion, etc.), it is a set of concepts. Zen, and Buddhism in general, teaches that concepts are interdependent and insubstantial. Realising that concepts are empty is how one eliminates attachment to views, and, in a manner of speaking, attains no-view, and that is what could be called beyond views.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 27th, 2016 at 2:27 AM

Title: Re: Zen teachings

Content:

Dgj said:

Okay so it is not beyond ALL views, just all non-Buddhist views?

Astus wrote:

There are incorrect views, and there is the correct view. The correct view is the one that leads to freedom from attachments, the first element of the noble eightfold path.

Dgj said:

How is all the insistence on a special transmission outside scriptures and not Buddha not mind stuff explained?

Astus wrote:

Special transmission outside teachings means not to be attached to views. Not Buddha and not mind means not to be attached to views. It is because attachment leads to suffering, and suffering is the problem that needs to be ended.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 27th, 2016 at 7:33 AM

Title: Re: Zen teachings

Content:

Dgj said:

So "not Buddha not mind" means "is Buddha and is mind" but not to be attached to the view of this and "outside scripture" means "inside scripture" but not to be attached to views?

Astus wrote:

Yes, you could say so.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 27th, 2016 at 8:30 AM

Title: Re: Zen teachings

Content:

Dgj said:

How do you think the people who said these things would respond to these explanations that are said to be in spirit in agreement with their statements but literally are exactly the opposite of what they said?

Astus wrote:

Please clarify your question. What explanations agree and/or oppose what?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 27th, 2016 at 6:07 PM

Title: Re: Zen teachings

Content:

Dgj said:

Sorry, without the quoted posts it is too complicated to explain. It is listed in the post between you and I above where everything is quoted. The statements like the one where it was said "not Buddha not mind" and you agreed this actually means "is Buddha and is mind" but not to be attached to the view of this". How would the person who said "not Buddha not mind" respond to this which is said to be, in spirit, in agreement but is literally the exact opposite of what was said?

Astus wrote:

The Diamond Sutra teaches in the mode of "X is not X therefore it is X". So, a buddha is not a buddha, therefore it is called a buddha. The point is to recognise the absence of self in appearances. One should not create a view out of either "not Buddha not mind" nor "is Buddha is mind". As it is often said, the view of existence is one extreme, and the view of annihilation is another extreme - exactly because both supposes a substance, a self.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 28th, 2016 at 1:59 AM

Title: Re: Zen teachings

Content:

Dgj said:

Is this correct?

Astus wrote:

It sounds like to try to find a state or essence as the ultimate meaning, and that approach is the wrong one. The final word is simply that all words are contextual, there is no meaning outside context. Since not one word carries meaning, how could many meaningless concepts create meaning? That's how all meanings, all concepts are illusory and insubstantial. To grasp at affirmation, negation, both, or neither, all four are mistakes.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 28th, 2016 at 6:42 AM

Title: Re: Zen teachings

Content:

Dgj said:

now you are saying all meanings and concepts are illusory. ... Scripture is made up of meanings and concepts. Zen is beyond meanings and concepts.

Astus wrote:

There is nothing beyond meanings and concepts. There are only concepts. The difference is whether one takes concepts to be substantial or sees them to be contextual.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 28th, 2016 at 7:43 AM

Title: Re: Zen teachings

Content:

Dgj said:

So Zen is not beyond meaning and concepts, Zen is meaning and concepts? Otherwise that would mean that Zen is nothing. If there is nothing beyond meaning and concepts and Zen is beyond meaning and concepts then Zen is nothing. But I don't believe that is what you are saying, unless I'm mistaken? Is this the "suchness" or "thusness" spoken of sometimes in Zen?

Astus wrote:

Zen is a word, so it has various meanings. A meaning beyond meaning sounds like a pointless complication. Zen implies a set of teachings, and teachings are necessarily conceptual. And if what you're looking for is a simple and ultimate definition of Zen, that is again necessarily conceptual, even if you assume it to be something beyond concepts.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 29th, 2016 at 8:02 PM

Title: Re: Combining Shingon and Zen Practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

Zen schools have their own set of daily rituals. If you exchange that to those used in a Shingon school, from the Zen point of view at least, there is no problem. However, if you want to follow Shingon on a deeper level, you should probably get in touch with an actual community and study with them. Also you may have noticed this before that the Chinese rituals usually include some tantric elements.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 29th, 2016 at 8:07 PM

Title: Re: Enlightened individuals as impossible to pin down linguistically

Content:

Astus wrote:

Bondage is attachment to and identification with the five aggregates. Liberation is the cessation of attachment and identification. It is in that context that the Tathagata cannot be pinned down. See:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn44/sn44.002.than.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2016 at 1:11 AM

Title: Re: Enlightened individuals as impossible to pin down linguistically

Content:

Dgj said:

Are you implying that there is some way to pin down a Buddha outside of the aggregates?

Astus wrote:

No, I do not imply that. Even assuming that there is something beyond body and mind is unfounded.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2016 at 6:38 AM

Title: Re: Enlightened individuals as impossible to pin down linguistically

Content:

Dgj said:

Could you elaborate on this idea from a Buddhist perspective? There is only body and mind? As in just the immediate body and mind one is experiencing, singular? Or that there are only bodies and minds in general, ie no things or other realities, just many minds and bodies interacting and trees, rocks, houses, etc. are not real?

Astus wrote:

All experiences fall within the six sensory areas: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thoughts. The first five are the physical and the sixth is the mental. There is no experience beyond these six.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2016 at 8:05 AM

Title: Re: Enlightened individuals as impossible to pin down linguistically

Content:

Malcolm said:

And in fact there is no experience beyond mind, given that the other five sense consciousness are totally nonconceptual, and thus not experiences per se.

Astus wrote:

One still experiences sights, sounds, etc. even without a conceptual layer, so I rather differentiate the two.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2016 at 8:06 AM

Title: Re: Enlightened individuals as impossible to pin down linguistically

Content:

Dgj said:

But doesn't dependent origination apply here?

Astus wrote:

It is exactly here that it applies. Note that the six sensory areas are simply an easy categorisation of phenomena experiences, it is not that there are actually areas.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2016 at 7:44 PM

Title: Re: Enlightened individuals as impossible to pin down linguistically

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, actually we don't experience the content of the five sense consciousness without conceptual layer. Experience is always conceptual.

Astus wrote:

What do you call then all the sensory phenomena that occur even while one is focused on a single object, or while one is thinking about something? Are they not experiences? Or do you think that one thinks about them at the same time?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2016 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Enlightened individuals as impossible to pin down linguistically

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I would be interested in interpretations of this Sutta.

Astus wrote:

"the remainderless stopping & fading of the six contact-media" - it refers to parinibbana (as noted by Bhikkhu Bodhi), hence the explanation given there agrees with the answer provided regarding the Tathagata's fate after death. It is different from the remainderless end of ignorance, craving and suffering, whereby the sensory functions are still there.

"How is it, friend Sariputta, is the eye the fetter of forms or are forms the fetter of the eye? Is the ear the fetter of sounds or are sounds the fetter of the ear? ... Is the mind the fetter of mental phenomena or are mental phenomena the fetter of the mind?"

"Friend Kotthita, the eye is not the fetter of forms nor are forms the fetter of the eye, but rather the desire and lust that arise there in dependence on both: that is the fetter there. The ear is not the fetter of sounds nor are sounds the fetter of the ear, but rather the desire and lust that arise there in dependence on both: that is the fetter there ... The mind is not the fetter of mental phenomena nor are mental phenomena the fetter of the mind, but rather the desire and lust that arise there in dependence on both: that is the fetter there.

...

In this way too, friend, it may be understood how that is so: There exists in the Blessed One the eye, the Blessed One sees a form with the eye, yet there is no desire and lust in the Blessed One; the Blessed One is well liberated in mind. There exists in the Blessed One the ear, the Blessed One hears a sound with the ear ... There exists in the Blessed One the nose, the Blessed One smells an odour with the nose . . . There exists in the Blessed One the tongue, the Blessed One savours a taste with the tongue ... There exists in the Blessed One the body, the Blessed One feels a tactile object with the body ... There exists in the Blessed One the mind, the Blessed One cognizes a mental phenomenon with the mind, yet there is no desire and lust in the Blessed One; the Blessed One is well liberated in mind."

(SN 35.232, tr BB)

But we might interpret the sutta as no different from another teaching on the cessation of suffering as well, since there are instances where only the six bases are used:

"Venerable sir, who craves?"

"Not a valid question," the Blessed One replied. "I do not say, 'One craves.' If I should say, 'One craves,' in that case this would be a valid question: 'Venerable sir, who craves?' But I do not speak thus. Since I do not speak thus, if one should ask me, 'Venerable sir, with what as condition does craving [come to be]?' this would be a valid question. To this the valid answer is: 'With feeling as condition, craving [comes to be]; with craving as condition, clinging; with clinging as condition, existence ... Such is the origin of this whole mass of suffering. '

"But, Phaggunā, with the remainderless fading away and cessation of the six bases for contact comes cessation of contact; with the cessation of contact, cessation of feeling; with the cessation of feeling, cessation of craving; with the cessation of craving, cessation of clinging; with the cessation of clinging, cessation of existence; with the cessation of existence, cessation of birth; with the cessation of birth, aging-and-death, sorrow, lamentation, pain, displeasure, and despair cease. Such is the cessation of this whole mass of suffering."

(SN 12.12, tr BB)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2016 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: Enlightened individuals as impossible to pin down linguistically

Content:

Malcolm said:

In order for something to be experienced, it has to be noticed by the mind.

Astus wrote:

Then you're saying that the sensory consciousnesses do not exist, so there is only one sensory area, in which case it makes no sense to list six. But then, you should not have written that the sensory consciousnesses are non-conceptual. Furthermore, then what is the difference between visual perception and thoughts? Even Yogacara accepts the five sensory phenomena as distinct from thoughts.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 1st, 2016 at 6:04 AM

Title: Re: Enlightened individuals as impossible to pin down linguistically

Content:

Wayfarer said:

So in a way, the question 'is there nothing else?', is an unseemly question. I think Ven. Sariputta's answer amounts to: go find out!

Astus wrote:

Not at all. Since the Buddha has no identification with the aggregates, there is nothing left to identify him with. There are four discussions on the matter between Sariputta and Kotthita: SN 44.3-6. Furthermore, the Buddha himself clarified this in the preceding teaching as well (SN 44.2). To assume that there is anything beyond the aggregates, that is one of the four versions of self-view. In other words, there is nothing more to find out.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 1st, 2016 at 6:16 AM

Title: Re: Enlightened individuals as impossible to pin down linguistically

Content:

Malcolm said:

That consciousness is nonconceptual is not even slightly debatable. Conceptuality, and hence, experience, is the function of the caittas. Cittas are nonconceptual.

Astus wrote:

The physical senses and their objects are neither mind nor mental phenomena. In other words, 10 of the 18 realms are not even mental, and the 5 sensory consciousnesses are not mental phenomena, consequently the 15 dhatus related to the form aggregate cannot be conceptual. If you say that the five matter related functions of mind do not occur on their own, then you assume there are two instances of consciousness at the same time.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 1st, 2016 at 6:07 PM

Title: Re: Enlightened individuals as impossible to pin down linguistically

Content:

Malcolm said:

So you have become a substance dualist? Amazing.

Astus wrote:

I am merely curious how you synchronise your idea of all experiences being conceptual with the teachings, where for instance the teachings on the dhatus do not seem to agree with that.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 1st, 2016 at 6:57 PM

Title: Re: Enlightened individuals as impossible to pin down linguistically

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I actually agree that experience is conceptual. That is one of the reasons that 'experience' and 'realisation' are different (as explained by Traleg Kyabgon Rinpoche in Mind at Ease). I think that is why the realised beings are fathomless - because experience never 'sticks' or gets recorded, they live solely in the 'domain of realisation', which is beyond the experiential domain.

Astus wrote:

If realisation is not experienced, it is separate from it, hence the two has no connection and run parallel to each other, and that view cancels the possibility of liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 2nd, 2016 at 6:07 PM

Title: Re: Enlightened individuals as impossible to pin down linguistically

Content:

Wayfarer said:

The point is, if liberation comprises the ending of identification with the sense-gates, then what is there to experience? Thinking that there is an experience to be had is one of the hindrances, isn't it?

Astus wrote:

Right, liberation is not in phenomena, nor is it anywhere else; it's not an experience, but just not grasping any experience.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 2nd, 2016 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: Enlightened individuals as impossible to pin down linguistically

Content:

Malcolm said:

Secondly, direct perceptions are by definition nonconceptual, and are only experienced when they are coordinated through second order conceptual identification such as "this is blue," "this is red," and so on. We have many direct perceptions everyday which we never experience because we never notice them.

Astus wrote:

Do you say that one cannot be aware of one's environment without taking note of each element? That would make life quite difficult.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 2nd, 2016 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: Enlightened individuals as impossible to pin down linguistically

Content:

Malcolm said:

Awareness of our environment is a conceptual picture built up through familiarization.

Astus wrote:

There are several unknown elements even in a familiar environment, and much more in an unfamiliar one. Walking on the street or in a forest does not require one to notice everything that one sees, hears, and smells, still they are present as experiences. Or when one visits a new neighbour's home and sits in their living room there can be unknown objects all around, and even those that are familiar are not paid attention to during a conversation, but at the same time one does see them there, and if one wants to it's possible to recall the room later. Or when for instance one is unexpectedly talked to, and when the words were spoken they were not comprehended, but when they're recalled right after that they become understandable.

Malcolm said:

No one lives in the moment, apart from babies, who have not yet developed the conceptual framework to start organizing their direct perceptions into conceptual patterns and frames of reference.

Astus wrote:

The point is not about living in the moment, but that the sensory consciousness are present in one's experience. One can see the colour and name the colour, and those are two different things, hence the basic set of nama-rupa. In your presentation there is only nama and no rupa.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 4th, 2016 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: Enlightened individuals as impossible to pin down linguistically

Content:

Malcolm said:

This illustrates my point nicely.

Astus wrote:

It does illustrate the role of concepts in experience, but it also shows the presence of experience without conceptualisation.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 4th, 2016 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: Enlightened individuals as impossible to pin down linguistically

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, experience is always conceptual. One has to be conceptually aware of something for to to be one's experience.

Astus wrote:

Consciousness is separated into six types based on its object. Concepts exist only for mental consciousness, not the other five. What is it you call when the five sensory consciousnesses occur if not experience? As for what conceiving is, the Kosha (vol 1, p 72-73) writes:

"Ideas consist of the grasping of characteristics.

The grasping of the diverse natures—perceiving that this is blue, yellow, long, short, male, female, friend, enemy, agreeable, disagreeable, etc. — is samjnaskandha. One can distinguish six types of samjna, according to organ, as for sensation."

Do you have to conceive everything that occurs to your senses, or is it only just a select few that you actually think of when you pay attention to it? If it is the latter, then do those other sensory phenomena occur or not? If they do, then there are instances of sensory consciousnesses present without any concepts. Furthermore, when you actually look at an object, and you even name it, can you still tell the difference between what appears as visual object and what as a name for that object? If yes, then visual consciousness and mental consciousness can work together without being mixed up or collapsed into a single thing.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 5th, 2016 at 8:25 PM

Title: Re: How Madhyamika Philosophy Solves the Mystery of Quantum Physics

Content:

Astus wrote:

"According to Madhyamika philosophy, objects only exist in dependence upon causes and conditions, and in dependence upon the mind that apprehends it."

Because of dependent origination there is no origination of anything, only in a nominal, conventional sense. Furthermore, Madhyamaka is not the one to posit a perceiver.

"The reason that quantum mechanics reinforces the Madhyamaka view is simply the fact that alternative views, like a mind-matter duality, or either the extremes of materialism or solipsism, actually lead to serious interpretation problems."

European philosophy produced some developments beyond Descartes. I recommend you check on Kant's transcendental philosophy and Husserl's phenomenology.

"both mind and matter are empty of inherent existence, both mind and matter have the same ontological status"

Things are defined by their function, not whether they have an inherent existence or not, therefore emptiness does not serve as a sufficient basis to eliminate the difference between mind and matter.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 5th, 2016 at 11:35 PM

Title: Re: How Madhyamika Philosophy Solves the Mystery of Quantum Physics

Content:

Kenneth Chan said:

The only point that I am making, here, is that since both mind and matter have the same ontological status, there is no need to reify one while negating the other. That's all.

Astus wrote:

And my point is that Madhyamaka is not the solution here.

Kenneth Chan said:
into the prevailing view, in Western philosophy, of a mind-matter duality.

Astus wrote:
And my second point, that it is not the prevailing Western philosophical view. This issue has already been addressed by Kant over 200 years ago.

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, December 5th, 2016 at 11:36 PM
Title: Re: How Madhyamika Philosophy Solves the Mystery of Quantum Physics
Content:
Tsongkhapa said:
The essential point is that ultimately there is no difference between mind and matter. Matter is mere appearance to mind.

Astus wrote:
If there were no difference, then mind is a mere appearance to matter, or it's all just matter, or just mind.

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2016 at 12:37 AM
Title: Re: How Madhyamika Philosophy Solves the Mystery of Quantum Physics
Content:
Kenneth Chan said:
You need to explain why you say that Madhyamaka is not the solution here.

Astus wrote:
Because it does not deal with the mechanics of consciousness or perception. Its primary purpose lies in the field of eliminating views, and not in establishing conventional interpretations.

Kenneth Chan said:
in terms of the Prasangika Madhyamaka view

Astus wrote:
Prasanga is a technique of refutation, not affirmation.

Kenneth Chan said:
Nonetheless they are still very different from Madhyamika philosophy.

Astus wrote:
I take them to be better fitted for the whole purpose, first of all because those are philosophies, while Madhyamaka isn't.

Kenneth Chan said:
their thinking is still grounded on the basic mind-matter dualism.

Astus wrote:
One could see the same dualism in Madhyamaka as well, as far as the teaching of nama-rupa is very much accepted in its conventional application. On the other hand, even in the Nikayas the dualism (jiva-sarira) is denied.

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2016 at 7:32 AM
Title: Re: How Madhyamika Philosophy Solves the Mystery of Quantum Physics
Content:
Kenneth Chan said:
based on the Prasangika Madhyamaka view of reality

Astus wrote:
That is the point I am questioning, if it is actually Madhyamaka, or rather a personal reinterpretation that is inspired by elements of Madhyamaka.

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2016 at 7:34 AM
Title: Re: Koan study
Content:
Dgj said:
are there any teachings out there in which one can study koan in a more neutral or even pleasant way?

Astus wrote:
The Blue Cliff Record, the Book of Serenity, and numerous writings of Dogen are like that.

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2016 at 5:48 PM
Title: Re: How Madhyamika Philosophy Solves the Mystery of Quantum Physics
Content:
Kenneth Chan said:
Well, I suggest you actually read my paper, and let me know whether you think it is actually Madhyamaka or just my personal interpretation, and why you think that. I am certainly open to discussing this.

Astus wrote:
I had read your paper before my first post here and responded on it based on that.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2016 at 5:52 PM

Title: Re: How Madhyamika Philosophy Solves the Mystery of Quantum Physics

Content:

Kenneth Chan said:

It is actually this insistence on materialism that has led to the vast array of different interpretations of quantum mechanics, all aimed at negating the role of the conscious observer.

Astus wrote:

Madhyamaka does not posit the necessity of a conscious observer. In fact, you could say that assuming an observer is already falling into false views, as discussed in chapter 3 of the MMK.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2016 at 6:22 PM

Title: Re: Koan study

Content:

Dgj said:

Could you elaborate please?

Astus wrote:

The teaching of kanhua chan, where one uses a phrase to elicit doubt and through doubt a breakthrough, is a technique introduced by Dahui Zonggao (1089–1163) and further elaborated by Gaofeng Yuanmiao (1238-1295). The Blue Cliff Record (Biyanlu) and the Book of Serenity (Congronglu) present the previous state of Chan that was named wenzi (literary) chan. Dogen disagreed with and criticised Dahui's innovation and followed the practice of the older tradition of composing expositions on stories, and such works make up a good part of the Shobogenzo. Therefore those are the sources you may turn to that do not follow the kanhua method.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2016 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: How Madhyamika Philosophy Solves the Mystery of Quantum Physics

Content:

Kenneth Chan said:

So can you kindly let us know now whether you think it is actually Madhyamaka or just my personal interpretation, and why you think that?

Astus wrote:

I think I have answered both already. It does look like your interpretation, and the reason is that it does not follow the Madhyamika teachings, nor does it attempt to follow through with Madhyamika reasoning.

Kenneth Chan said:

Please understand that I am here conveying my meaning along the lines of the conventional truth.

Astus wrote:

Because it is the conventional truth, Madhyamaka, especially its Prasangika form, does not posit anything related to that, because it is not its purpose. Dependent origination and emptiness are not unique teachings of Madhyamaka at all, but practically universal in every Buddhist school.

Kenneth Chan said:

They are certainly not merely trying to say that the role of the conscious observer is empty of inherent existence. They are actually trying to say that the role of the conscious observer does not exist at all.

Astus wrote:

It is irrelevant for a Madhyamika whether they believe in an observer or not. The usual Madhyamika approach is to dissolve whatever view the opponent holds, and not to introduce other views. Or if it introduces other views, those are in line with established Buddhist doctrines and worldly conventions. I see no basis to defend the idea of a conscious observer on merely positing dependent origination and emptiness, since those principles are applicable even in a purely materialist view.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2016 at 11:39 PM

Title: Re: Koan study

Content:

Dgj said:

Is there a book that covers the history of this and are there any that cover how to practice using the older method in addition to the Shobogenzo?

Astus wrote:

Morten Schlutter: How Zen Became Zen - this is a good introduction on early Song era Chan developments.

As for practice, you simply need to study the stories and commentaries. If you want meditation, you do zazen.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 7th, 2016 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Koan study

Content:

DGA said:

if you want to practice Zen generally (inclusive of koan practice), the way to do it is with a competent teacher.

Astus wrote:

I said nothing regarding koan practice, besides that it was initiated by Dahui.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 7th, 2016 at 12:19 AM

Title: Re: How Madhyamika Philosophy Solves the Mystery of Quantum Physics

Content:

Kenneth Chan said:

While this uses the Madhyamaka view of reality, my purpose is not primarily to provide an exposition on Madhyamaka. ... I am arguing that the conscious observer does have a role to play in quantum physics. That's all.

Astus wrote:

You say that Madhyamaka establishes the valid use of the conscious observer. I see no reason for that. In fact, the paper does not provide a reason for it either, only that because both matter and mind are empty they should be considered ontologically identical in the ultimate sense. And that actually contradicts your assumed application of Madhyamaka on a conventional level, since conventionally matter and mind are very much different even in Madhyamaka.

And if we consider this a bit, you want to establish a conscious observer separate from matter, with the argument that they are ontologically identical and dependently related. That is somewhat of a contradiction. If mind and matter are ontologically no different, there is no need to say either of the two are separate, hence both materialism and solipsism should be acceptable. And if they are dependently related, it could be said that mind originates from matter, or vice versa, hence accepted a materialist/idealist perspective. This again shows that merely stating dependent origination and emptiness is insufficient to qualify for a Madhyamika view.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 7th, 2016 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: Koan study

Content:

DGA said:

Dgj was asking for leads on how to practice koan

Astus wrote:

There he asked not on the Dahui method but the other one. And for the practice of kanhua chan, I'd first recommend this:

http://koreanbuddhism.net/bbs/board.php?bo_table=3020.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 7th, 2016 at 6:04 PM

Title: Re: How Madhyamika Philosophy Solves the Mystery of Quantum Physics

Content:

Kenneth Chan said:

What I actually said was that I have to talk about the conscious observer along the lines of the conventional truth because my purpose here is to provide a solution to the mystery of quantum physics. And what I actually said about mind and matter is that they have the same ontological status (not that they are ontologically identical) and because of that, there is no need to reify one while having to negate the other. In other words, there is no need to go to either extremes of materialism or solipsism.

Astus wrote:

"conscious observer along the lines of the conventional truth" - what conventional truth is that? Whose conventional truth? I don't see the connection here to Madhyamaka.

"mind and matter is that they have the same ontological status (not that they are ontologically identical)" - the same ontological status can be "existent" or "non-existent", but "empty" is the absence of both, the absence of ontological status. And since you want both mind and matter to be equally present, it seems to me the same ontological status here is "existent".

Kenneth Chan said:

The Prasangika Madhyamaka view on dependent origination and emptiness is slightly different from the views of the other schools. So all I am doing is to make use of the meaning of dependent origination and emptiness according to the Prasangika Madhyamaka view. Please try to understand me correctly.

Astus wrote:

Could you specify what unique Prasangika doctrine you refer to?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 8th, 2016 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: How Madhyamika Philosophy Solves the Mystery of Quantum Physics

Content:

Kenneth Chan said:

Teachings on the two truths—the conventional truth and the ultimate truth—are actually very important in Madhyamika philosophy.

Astus wrote:

And what conventional truth do you find in Madhyamaka that supports your thesis?

Kenneth Chan said:

No. They have the same ontological status because they are both empty of inherent existence.

Astus wrote:

The mere lack of something is not an ontological status. They are also empty of horns and wheels.

Kenneth Chan said:

It is the Prasangika Madhyamaka according to Chandrakirti, Shantideva, and Lama Tsongkhapa.

Astus wrote:

What is specifically in their teachings that you find uniquely relevant in this case?
Anything in particular about conventional truth?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 8th, 2016 at 5:55 PM

Title: Re: How Madhyamika Philosophy Solves the Mystery of Quantum Physics

Content:

Kenneth Chan said:

For example, if we measure the position of, say, an electron, we will find it as a particle in one particular position. If, however, we do not make an actual measurement, the electron actually does not even “decide” where it is!

Astus wrote:

If there is a cat in a room, unless I look into the room, how could I know where the cat is?

Kenneth Chan said:

That’s where Madhyamika philosophy comes in. If we replace this philosophical framework of a mind-matter duality with the Madhyamaka view of reality, the problem can actually be solved. And it can be solved without having to insert all sorts of additional hypothetical ad hoc conditions (including bizarre ones like infinite parallel universes, and so on) into the basic formulation of quantum mechanics.

Astus wrote:

And this is the questionable part, that what you call "the Madhyamaka view of reality" is not Madhyamaka. Madhyamaka has no problem with the conventional mind-matter duality, while ultimately it shows that neither can be established as real.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 8th, 2016 at 9:06 PM

Title: Re: How Madhyamika Philosophy Solves the Mystery of Quantum Physics

Content:

Kenneth Chan said:

Well, that's exactly it, Astus. Both mind and matter are empty of inherent existence, so there is no need to reify one and negate the other. In other words, there is no need to go to the extremes of either materialism or solipsism.

Astus wrote:

It is not only not falling into the extremes of only matter or only mind, but also not establishing both at the same time.

"If an object exists because of the power of cognition, how does one arrive at the true existence of cognition? If cognition exists because of the power of the object of cognition, how does one arrive at the true existence of the object of cognition? If their existence is due to their mutual power, neither can exist."

(Bodhicaryavatara 9.111-112, tr Wallace)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 9th, 2016 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: How Madhyamika Philosophy Solves the Mystery of Quantum Physics

Content:

Matt J said:

So here's a question: how do we go from stating that I cannot find x, which is an epistemological statement, to there is no x, which is an ontological one? Why isn't it possible for to exist in a way we don't know? It is one thing you say I cannot find x and quite another to say there is no x. It is similar to subjective idealists who say there is only mind because we cannot experience anything apart from mind.

Astus wrote:

The field of analysis/investigation for Buddhism is the five aggregates and six sensory areas, because that is where suffering arises, not to mention that that's all there is in terms of human experience. So, if something is not found in one's perception, it is not there, as an unperceived perception is quite impossible.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 9th, 2016 at 1:16 AM

Title: Re: How Madhyamika Philosophy Solves the Mystery of Quantum Physics

Content:

Kenneth Chan said:

I believe the argument you may be encountering in Madhyamika philosophy is actually this: "all of our possible models that we use to try to explain how things work are at some level broken and flawed" if we consider the things to be fully existent on their own right.

Astus wrote:

It should be noted that things not only do not exist on their own (svabhava) but they also do not exist on another (parabhava). Even saying that things exist at all is wrong.

"Given the nonexistence of intrinsic nature, how will there be extrinsic nature (parabhāva)?

For extrinsic nature is said to be the intrinsic nature of another existent (parabhāva).

Further, without intrinsic nature and extrinsic nature how can there be an existent (bhāva)?

For an existent is established given the existence of either intrinsic nature or extrinsic nature."

(Nagarjuna: Mulamadhyamakakarika 15.3-4, tr Siderits)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 9th, 2016 at 5:08 PM

Title: Re: Koan study

Content:

Meido said:

In any case, Dogen's motivation was fueled by a question very similar to what you asked...a koan of sorts. You might be interested to look into it.

Astus wrote:

That alleged question is not mentioned even in Keizan's Denkoroku, and the story of sudden realisation in Keizan's work is likely his own invention that is nowhere corroborated in Dogen's teachings. Quite the opposite actually, Dogen did not agree with the whole idea of kensho, as it contradicts his version of zazen as practice-enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 9th, 2016 at 5:17 PM

Title: Re: How Madhyamika Philosophy Solves the Mystery of Quantum Physics

Content:

Wayfarer said:

That would seem to rule out scientific discovery, though. Many things that were not at all apparent through the six sense gates have been discovered by a process of conjecture, analysis, observation and experiment.

Astus wrote:

It does not rule it out, as the atomic theory is accepted to some extent, even though neither atoms nor the four great elements are visible. On the other hand, Buddhism does not aim at scientific discovery nor is it considered a liberating path.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 9th, 2016 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: Koan study

Content:

Meido said:

I mentioned it only to show that it is a valid question which others have had, and worth examining within the context of one's own practice.

Astus wrote:

Certainly a good point.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 10th, 2016 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sudden enlightenment is to recognise that there is nothing to grasp, nothing to attain. Such recognition is missed because of chasing all sorts of illusory thoughts instead of taking a look at thoughts and seeing them to be completely unreliable. Thus all the teachings and methods to entertain oneself with in the hope of one day gaining something special. And as long as there is hope there is also delusion.

"Then again, if the bodhisattva refrains from taking up the practice of any particular dharma, because he does not apprehend any dharma whatsoever, he may thereby succeed in realizing prajñāpāramitā."

(Nagarjuna on the Six Perfections, ch 30)

"To simply right now suddenly comprehend that one's own mind is fundamentally Buddha, without there being a single dharma one can attain and without there being a single practice one can cultivate—this is the unsurpassable enlightenment, this is the Buddha of suchness."

(Huangbo, Zen Texts, BDK Edition, p 20)

Q: What is Sudden Enlightenment?

A: "Sudden" means instantly stopping false thought. "Enlightenment" means that one attains nothing.

(Treatise On Entering The Tao of Sudden Enlightenment, tr Lok To)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 10th, 2016 at 3:24 AM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

Dgj said:

but then, what is practice?

Astus wrote:

There is the gradual and there is the sudden path. The gradual practice leading to insight is discipline, meditation, and wisdom, also the six paramitas. The sudden practice is insight itself.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 10th, 2016 at 5:48 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

Dgj said:

How does one do the sudden practice?

Astus wrote:

It is the practice of non-abiding and non-thought. In sitting peacefully, whatever bodily or mental experience occurs, there is neither rejection nor attachment, neither suppression nor obsession, neither important nor unimportant. It is immediately recognised that all phenomena of the six senses do not stay even for a moment, thus there is nothing to do, nothing to attain. This is the essential method of all the buddhas and teachers.

"What is nonthought? If in seeing all the dharmas, the mind is not defiled or attached, this is nonthought. [The mind's] functioning pervades all locations, yet it is not attached to all the locations. Just purify the fundamental mind, causing the six consciousnesses to emerge from the six [sensory] gates, [causing one to be] without defilement or heterogeneity within the six types of sensory data (literally, the "six dusts"), autonomous in the coming and going [of mental phenomena], one's penetrating function without stagnation. This is the samādhi of prajñā, the autonomous emancipation. This is called the practice of nonthought.

If one does not think of the hundred things in order to cause thought to be eradicated, this is bondage within the Dharma. This is called an extreme view.

Good friends, to be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is for the myriad dharmas to be completely penetrated. To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to see the realms of [all] the buddhas. To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to arrive at the stage of buddhahood."

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK Edition, p 33-34)

"Good friends, since the past this teaching of ours has first taken nonthought as its central doctrine, the formless as its essence, and nonabiding as its fundamental. The formless is to transcend characteristics within the context of characteristics.

Nonthought is to be without thought in the context of thoughts. Nonabiding is to consider in one's fundamental nature that all worldly [things] are empty, with no consideration of retaliation—whether good or evil, pleasant or ugly, and enemy or friend, etc., during times of words, fights, and disputation.

Within continuing moments of thought one should not think of the previous [mental] realm. If one thinks of the previous thought, the present thought, and the later thought, one's thoughts will be continuous without cease. This is called 'fettered.' If one's thoughts do not abide in the dharmas, this is to be 'unfettered.' Thus it is that nonabiding is taken as the fundamental.

Good friends, to transcend all the characteristics externally is called the formless. To be able to transcend characteristics is for the essences of the dharmas to be pure. Thus it is that the formless is taken as the essence.

Good friends, for one's mind to remain undefiled within the sensory realms is called nonthought. Within one's own thoughts one should always transcend the realms, one should not generate the mind relative to the realms. If one does not think of the hundred things, then thoughts will be completely eliminated."

(Platform Sutra, ch 4, BDK Edition, p 43-44)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 11th, 2016 at 2:58 AM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

Dgj said:

Sounds paradoxical but clearly that is because I do not understand. How can one practice non thought while there are thoughts present? I am assuming "cause thought to be eradicated" is referencing traditional samadhi where thoughts are suppressed and so without doing this how does one have non thought while thoughts are not suppressed?

Astus wrote:

The point is not to proliferate thoughts (i.e. to grasp on an idea and start thinking about it), not to suppress thoughts (i.e. to enforce a blank mind), but to let whatever thought occurs come and then let it pass away by not following up on it or pushing it away. But trying to remain in a state one imagines to be non-thought, that is already an attachment. Rather, it should be clear that no thought can be manipulated, as they always come and go, just like every other appearance. That is how meditation and insight are not different.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 11th, 2016 at 7:12 AM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

Dgj said:

Does one create a stance of deliberately watching things come and go?

Astus wrote:

Where would that stance be? And why watch them?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 13th, 2016 at 8:43 PM

Title: Re: How Madhyamika Philosophy Solves the Mystery of Quantum Physics

Content:

Anders said:

Is Buddhism really deterministic though? Is it a Buddhist tenet that all future events are already pre ordained?

Astus wrote:

Causal conditionality is completely mechanical, hence deterministic. But since newer factors influence older ones, there is the possibility of enhancing or diminishing the effects of previous causes.

Anders said:

Or perhaps put another way - is there no future event whatsoever that is not knowable to the Buddha's omniscience, on account of not having been fully determined yet?

Astus wrote:

There is no limit to a buddha's knowledge of past and future karma, unlike in the case of bodhisattvas, sravakas, and others.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 13th, 2016 at 10:24 PM

Title: Re: How Madhyamika Philosophy Solves the Mystery of Quantum Physics

Content:

Anders said:

I would expect karma to be presented in a less open-ended fashion, if it were the case that all that we do is pre-ordained. Buddhism seems to operate on the assumption that choices are open-ended to a certain extent.

Astus wrote:

There are two levels to consider. The conventional level (parikalpita) of individuals and the level of dharmas (paratantra). On the personal-conventional level, humans are free to decide. On the level of dharmas, the aggregates, it is all causally conditioned. Choices are based on already existing views and habits. The aggregates operate in a completely conditioned system, so there is no place for any free will, accidents, or uncertainty.

Anders said:

That is not strictly true though, as I recall. The Buddha's all knowledge pertains to all knowable phenomena. It explicitly does not pertain to unknowables. Which begs the question - Are all future events anywhen and anywhere theoretically knowable from this point in time? Or to rephrase - is the future wholly pre-ordained or not.

Astus wrote:

"Question. – What are all these dharmas cognized by omniscience?

Answer. –

...

‘All dharmas’ is also dharmas past (atīta), future (anāgata), present (pratyutpanna), neither past, future nor present ; dharmas belonging to the world of desire (kāmadhātvavacara), belonging to the world of form (rūpadhātvavacara), belonging to the formless world (ārūpyadhātvavacara), not having any membership (anavacara); dharmas coming from a good cause (kuśalahetusamutthāna), coming from a bad (akuśala) cause, coming from an indeterminate (avyākṛta) cause, and coming from a cause that is neither good, bad nor indeterminate; dharmas that are object condition (ālambanapratyaya), that are non-object condition, that are both object and non-object condition, that are neither object nor non-object condition. Innumerable similar groups of four dharmas comprise all the dharmas."

(MPPS, vol 4, p 1438, Gampo Abbey Edition)

PERFECT ACHIEVEMENT WISDOM (Kṛtyanuṣṭhanajñāna)

"This mind has a bearing on all the dharmas of the three periods. In fact, the Buddhabhumi Sutra says that the Perfect Achievement Wisdom (Kṛtyanusthanajñāna) manifests itself as innumerable and varied transformation bodies (Tathāgatanirmanakāyas) and their three varieties of deeds; that it assures itself of the 84,000 states of mind of sentient beings; and that it perceives the past, the future, and the present."

(Cheng Weishi Lun, p 777-779, tr Tat)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 16th, 2016 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

Dgj said:

Mustn't there be some kind of control deliberately exerted over one's meditative awareness? Otherwise meditation could be sitting and going over lists of things to do, planning, day dreaming, or any such thing. Or am I misunderstanding something?

Astus wrote:

You're moving into the gradual method, in which case there are step by step instructions to follow. The only thing to practice on the sudden path is enlightenment itself.

A monk asked, "What is the cultivation of the Way?"

The Patriarch replied, "The Way does not belong to cultivation. If one speaks of any attainment through cultivation, whatever is accomplished in that way is still subject to regress. That is the same as the Sravakas. If one says that there is no need for cultivation, that is the same as the ordinary people."

(Sun Face Buddha, p 63)

Once a Vinaya Master came and asked: "In your practice of the Tao, do you still work hard?"

The Master answered: "Yes, I still work hard."

The Vinaya Master asked: "How hard?"

The Master retorted: "If I'm hungry, I eat. If I'm tired, I sleep. "

The Vinaya Master asked: "Do all other people work hard just as you do?"

The Master answered: "No, not in the same way."

The Vinaya Master asked: "Why not?"

The Master answered: "While they are eating, they are not really eating due to too much thinking. While they are sleeping, they are not really sleeping due to too much mental agitation. Therefore, they do not work in the same way I do."

The Vinaya Master, on hearing this, fell silent.

(<http://ymba.org/books/entering-tao-sudden-enlightenment/tsung-ching-record>)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 17th, 2016 at 7:04 AM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

Dgj said:

I am confused. It seems that any method whatsoever is gradual. The only way to not use a method would be to not practice at all. This is how my OP was formed; it seems the Zen of koans is where masters enlighten students directly with words and deeds, no practice on the student's part. Then today we practice sitting meditation. What am I missing?

Astus wrote:

A method is a means to an end, therefore it is gradual. Zen's teaching of sudden enlightenment stands for the means and the end are not two, hence the Platform Sutra talks about the oneness of samadhi and prajna, and Dogen talks about practice-enlightenment. But the key thing is to attain enlightenment, and with that true practice is attained as well. How can one attain enlightenment? Just by seeing that there is nothing to attain, as all the six sensory phenomena are already without anything to hold on to.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 18th, 2016 at 3:44 AM

Title: Re: How Madhyamika Philosophy Solves the Mystery of Quantum Physics

Content:

Astus wrote:

The defence of conventional existence seems to come from the idea that there are actual objects to define and explain. However, anything that can be discussed are nothing else but concepts, ideas, mere words and letters.

"It has been loudly declared by you that the whole world is only name (nāmamātra); separated from the word (that expresses it), that which is expressed does not exist. Therefore all dharmas have been shown (by you) to be only mental creation (kalpanāmātra); the mental creation itself, by which voidness is conceived, has been proclaimed (by you) to be non-existent."

(Nagarjuna: Acintyastava, v 35-36, tr Tola & Dragonetti)

Similarly, beings are bound by concepts.

"Ordinary beings are bound by conceptions (kalpana);
Since non-conceptualizing yogis will be liberated,
That which will reverse conceptions
Was taught by the wise as the effect of complete analysis."
(Candrakirti: Madhyamakavatara 6.117, tr Tsultrim & Jampa)

And what they need to be liberated from are this grasping at concepts.

"Liberation is attained through the destruction of actions and defilements; actions and defilements arise because of falsifying conceptualizations (vikalpa); those arise from hypostatization (prapañca); but hypostatization is extinguished in emptiness."
(MMK 18.5, tr Siderits)

That is why Madhyamaka is simply about eliminating that grasping.

"Analysis was not made in the treatise because of liking Disputation. Thusness was indicated for complete liberation."
(Madhyamakavatara 6.118ab)

Establishing a valid conventional reality is not in line with this goal, as one can see this from the Vaidalyaprakarana as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 18th, 2016 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

Dgj said:

Thank you. I still see paradox but clearly this is due to my lack of understanding. It always ends up sounding like practicing is getting further away and the only way to really understand would be to not understand and be as far as possible from anything even remotely like practice.

Astus wrote:

The root problem is grasping. To grasp at any idea or explanation as the truth is still attachment. Hence the sudden way is to drop everything by recognising that all phenomena are inessential.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 19th, 2016 at 3:15 AM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

White Lotus said:

how do you understand "no thought"? Do you take it to mean that there is nothing to understand or realise? Or do you take it in Bodhidharma's sense of becoming "unconscious"? In the unconscious there is still some grasping/attachment.

Astus wrote:

No-thought (wunian 無念) means, in the words of the Platform Sutra, "in seeing all the dharmas, the mind is not defiled or attached", "to be without thought in the context of thoughts", and "to remain undefiled within the sensory realms". It is the absence of grasping in the presence of thoughts coming from the recognition that thoughts are baseless.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 19th, 2016 at 6:29 AM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

White Lotus said:

so having thoughts without becoming emotional? i have no experience of mind other than thought and feeling.

Astus wrote:

The point is not to suppress anything, but not to be fettered by whatever occurs. Thoughts and feelings alike come and go. Sticking to an idea or an emotion is where we get carried off and identify with various views and states, forgetting that nothing remains even for a moment.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 19th, 2016 at 8:23 PM

Title: Re: Books on yogācāra

Content:

Astus wrote:

<https://books.google.com/books?id=1C4qAwAAQBAJ>

<http://www.bdkamerica.org/book/scripture-explication-underlying-meaning>

<http://www.bdkamerica.org/book/summary-great-vehicle-revised-second-edition>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=CkChrAwwsvGkC>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=wHHAmVPmrEC>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=ck4BrBqBdYIC>

https://books.google.com/books?id=UC_YAAAAMAAJ

<https://books.google.com/books?id=fQRUAAAAYAAJ>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=z8EKAAAAYAAJ>

<http://www.uhpress.hawaii.edu/p-8624-9780824835736.aspx>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=8yfYAAAAMAAJ>

<http://www.bdkamerica.org/book/three-texts-consciousness-only>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=j0TKAgAAQBAJ>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=aPazBgAAQBAJ>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=9ygVT2FA0h4C>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=ah2XR9be5uwC>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=Myq3AgAAQBAJ>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2016 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

White Lotus said:

Astus, you quote from the BDK Platform Sutra p33-34. Here Hui Neng seems to indicate that the 6 vijñanas must be removed from the 6 sensory gates. Destruction of these six vijñanas occurs when the 6th "discriminating" mano-vijñana consciousness ceases. What is your view on that? Tom.

Astus wrote:

It doesn't exactly say that. Quite the opposite. Let's look at that section.

McRae translation:

"Just purify the fundamental mind, causing the six consciousnesses to emerge from the six [sensory] gates, [causing one to be] without defilement or heterogeneity within the six types of sensory data (literally, the "six dusts"), autonomous in the coming and going [of mental phenomena], one's penetrating function without stagnation."

BTTS translation:

"Merely purify your original mind and cause the six consciousnesses to go out the six gates, to be undefiled and unmixed among the six objects, to come and go freely and to penetrate without obstruction."

但淨本心 - only purify the original mind

使六識出六門 - to cause the six consciousnesses to go out the six gates

於六塵中無染無雜 - by the six dusts not defiled, not mixed with

來去自由 - come and go freely

通用無滯 - penetrate without obstruction

In other words, it says that while one is aware of appearances, one grasps nothing. It actually says to raise the six consciousnesses, not to remove or eradicate them. Also consider these preceding passages from the same chapter:

McRae:

"the ratiocination of the mind is vast and great, permeating the dharmadhātu (i.e., the cosmos). Functioning, it comprehensively and distinctly responds [to things]. Functioning, it knows everything. Everything is the one [mind], the one [mind] is everything. [With mind and dharmas] going and coming of themselves, the essence of the mind is without stagnation. This is 'prajñā.'"

BTTS:

"the capacity of the mind is vast and great, encompassing the Dharma realm. Its function is to understand clearly and distinctly. Its correct function is to know all. All is one; one is all. Coming and going freely, the mind's substance is unobstructed. That is Prajna."

心量廣大 - the ratiocination of the mind is vast and great / the capacity of the mind is vast and great

遍周法界 - permeating the dharmadhātu (i.e., the cosmos) / encompassing the Dharma realm

用即了了分明 - Functioning, it comprehensively and distinctly responds [to things] / Its function is to understand clearly and distinctly

應用便知一切 - Functioning, it knows everything / Its correct function is to know all

一切即一 - Everything is the one [mind] / All is one

一即一切 - the one [mind] is everything. / one is all

去來自由 - [With mind and dharmas] going and coming of themselves / Coming and going freely

心體無滯 - the essence of the mind is without stagnation / the mind's substance is unobstructed

即是般若 - This is prajñā. / That is Prajna

McRae:

"one should not reside within or without, and one's going and coming should be autonomous. One who is able to eradicate the mind of attachment will [attain] penetration unhindered. Those who are able to cultivate this practice are fundamentally no different from [what is described in] the Prajñā Sutra."

BTTs:

"the ability to cultivate the conduct of not dwelling inwardly or outwardly, of coming and going freely, of casting away the grasping mind, and of unobstructed penetration, is basically no different from The Prajna Sutra."

內外不住 - one should not reside within or without / the ability to cultivate the conduct (sentence from fifth line) of not dwelling inwardly or outwardly

去來自由 - and one's going and coming should be autonomous / of coming and going freely

能除執心 - One who is able to eradicate the mind of attachment / of casting away the grasping mind

通達無礙 - will [attain] penetration unhindered / and of unobstructed penetration

能修此行 - Those who are able to cultivate this practice / (sentence in first line)

與般若經本無差別 - are fundamentally no different from [what is described in] the Prajñā Sutra / is basically no different from The Prajna Sutra

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2016 at 4:52 AM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

White Lotus said:

Astus, thank you so much for your thorough reply. Enlightenment as you know is instantaneous. Why is cessation of the Vijñanas not needed to deepen experience? Is it even a distraction?

Astus wrote:

Vijñanas do not only cease every moment, they are actually unborn and unceasing. How could then they cause any problems?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2016 at 10:32 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

White Lotus said:

Would you say that the Buddha's cessation is also instantaneous because there has never been anything that could cease?

Astus wrote:

If there is nothing that ceases, how can its cessation be instantaneous?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2016 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

White Lotus said:

Two understandings of emptiness: in emptiness there is neither attainment nor no attainment; it is thus. Or simply: there is no attainment in emptiness. "Thus" against "No". What would you choose. No thought on this matter? Tom.

Astus wrote:

In emptiness? Emptiness is not a place or a state, it means the absence of substance.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2016 at 5:10 AM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

KarmaOcean said:

is a photon empty ?

Astus wrote:

All phenomena are empty.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2016 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

Tao said:

that kind of zen was totally lost

Astus wrote:

Why would it be lost? First of all, stories in books are mostly fiction, so there is no point in expecting things like that in real life. Secondly, teachers still give teachings, and occasionally it may click something and bring about an insight.

Tao said:

Zen Soto, theoretically comes from sudden school, but it's everything but sudden. We can discuss if it's gradual or none of the two, but it's not sudden for sure.

Astus wrote:

Dogen taught practice-enlightenment, and as such it is very much in line with the sudden teaching. See this essay: <http://journals.ub.uni-heidelberg.de/index.php/jiabs/article/viewFile/8591/2498>. And there was a nice thread about the matter as well: <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=107&t=6498>.

Tao said:

Zen Rinzai, uses koans that are just a pale and frozen reflection of the gold age teachings of Huineng, HuangBo or Linji where every word was fresh, spontaneous and directed only to one target (only to one person in one situation), nothing similar to a koan (even if the words are exactly the same).

Astus wrote:

The teachings of Huineng and Linji are literary works, not actual records. Huangbo's record has been tampered with a bit but it's mostly as was remembered by his direct disciples. As for the stories with witty remarks, that's pure fiction. So, not that fresh after all. As for the practice of investigating the phrase (kanhua/kanna), that is as viable today as it was about 800 years ago. It is a matter of individual dedication to the method, just like in the past centuries.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2016 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

Tao said:

You got it in one second or you didn't... was that simple... nothing to do with koans even sharing every word... In fact is the complete opposite: spontaneity and intuition vs "studying/investigating"...

Astus wrote:

And why wouldn't one get it now then? By the way, get what?

Tao said:

Practice-realization as is Dzogchen are direct vehicles, not sudden. Because of that they implicitly deny "awakening" (sudden approach) as they state that you can be "that" instantaneously, not even awakening is needed. And of course they "lose it" at the same speed, but that's another kind of discussion. But for sure Zen Soto is anything but sudden.

Astus wrote:

"To always practice wisdom in all places, at all times, and in all moments of thought, without stupidity—this is the practice of prajñā. A single moment's stupidity and prajñā is eradicated, a single moment's wisdom and prajñā is generated.

...

To practice in every moment of thought is called the true nature. To be enlightened to this Dharma is the Dharma of prajñā, to cultivate this practice is the practice of prajñā. To not cultivate this is to be an ordinary [unenlightened] person. To cultivate this in a single moment of thought is to be equivalent to the Buddha in one's own body. Good friends, ordinary people are buddhas, and the afflictions are bodhi. With a preceding moment of deluded thought, one was an ordinary person, but with a succeeding moment of enlightened thought, one is a buddha. To be attached to one's sensory realms in a preceding moment of thought is affliction, but to transcend the realms in a succeeding moment of thought is bodhi."
(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK Edition, p 29-30)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2016 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

White Lotus said:

Astus i agree that emptiness is the absence of form/substance; however one can also say that emptiness is form/substance. Two ways of seeing. Do you see emptiness as thus?

Astus wrote:

Substance means an independent essence, svabhava, while form (rupa) is something else. As for saying that emptiness is thus, what do you mean by that?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2016 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

White Lotus said:

Thats my own experience; prajna, not logic.

Astus wrote:

Without logic it is merely senseless wordplay.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2016 at 7:44 AM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

White Lotus said:

Astus, if i said we cant say "self" because all is dependently originated would you object if i add: nor can we say no self because emptiness is pregnant? I dont understand this. Its just what i feel. Tung Shan said. "this now is not me; i now am this." he balances the equation and takes the middle path. We avoid extremes. Just so.

Astus wrote:

Please see: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Argument_to_moderation.

The middle taught in Buddhism means that both existence and annihilation are false. It doesn't mean there is an optimal combination or balance between those two false views. That is why all four elements of the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Catu%E1%B9%A3ko%E1%B9%ADi> are rejected.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2016 at 10:24 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

dreambow said:

Even when the mind is empty....you are still aware. Is awareness beyond or prior to fullness or emptiness? Awareness is the reference point.

Astus wrote:

The mind, just like everything else, is empty as it is. It is not made empty by any method or practice. As for awareness, it is a basic function of the conditioned mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2016 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

White Lotus said:

If i say that it is 'neither' eternal 'nor' annihilated. It is empty/thus. I am still using the fourth element of the tetralemma. Which expresses emptiness. How can we let go of the fourth element and be faithful to the middle path?

Astus wrote:

The reason emptiness is taught is to abandon attachment to appearances. To hang on to any ideological formulation is still taking concepts as essential and real.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2016 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: Nagarjuna and tathagatagarbha

Content:

Astus wrote:

MMK ch 22 discusses the nature of the Tathagata, and it is very much in line with the approach presented in the <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn44/sn44.002.than.html> and other early scriptures.

"The Tathāgata is neither identical with the skandhas nor distinct from the skandhas; the skandhas are not in him nor is he in them; he does not exist possessing the skandhas. What Tathāgata, then, is there?

...

Those who hypostatize the Buddha, who is beyond hypostatization and unwavering, they all, deceived by hypostatization, fail to see the Tathāgata. What is the intrinsic nature of the Tathāgata, that is the intrinsic nature of this world. The Tathāgata is devoid of intrinsic nature; this world is devoid of intrinsic nature."

(MMK 22.1, 15-16, tr Siderits)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 23rd, 2016 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

White Lotus said:

prajna reveals appearances that rise and fall. The appearance of emptiness for example falls away.

Astus wrote:

I think there are some terminological problems here. Emptiness is not an appearance but merely a technical term in Buddhism.

White Lotus said:

Prajna is a gradual unveiling. Where i am now is: seeing "neither emptiness nor form". To identify with this would be an attachment. I dont identify with it. Is the tool of prajna unnecessary, in that it is part of the gradual path? Appearances cease.

Astus wrote:

Wisdom (prajna) has three levels: learning, understanding, confirming. Learning means learning about the words and letters of the Dharma. Understanding means understanding what is learnt. Confirming means confirming the teachings in one's personal experience. Therefore one should begin by the words of the sutras, shastras, and teachers. Without that basis in the authentic teaching there is no further progress.

White Lotus said:

Will i save myself unnecessary trouble if i just stop seeing and just live?

Astus wrote:

Relying on correct sources - sutras and teachers - is how you can save yourself from many unnecessary troubles.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 23rd, 2016 at 3:42 AM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

White Lotus said:

What do you think of Proffessor Suzuki's work? Ive never encountered a clearer exposition of Prajna than in his "Zen Doctrine of No Mind".

Astus wrote:

I haven't had the chance to read that book.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 2nd, 2017 at 2:40 AM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

White Lotus said:

Astus, taking the sudden approach: there is nothing to be seen or realised. Therefore sudden prajna is seeing things just as they are? The gradual unfolding of prajna is unnecessary unless one wants to be in a position to transcend sudden enlightenment - to go beyond emptiness. Thats only possible with the seeing eye of gradually unfolding Prajna. It seems to me that gradual and sudden are mixed nowadays. Rgds, Tom.

Astus wrote:

Ultimate wisdom is seeing things as they are. Getting there suddenly or gradually does not change the result.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 2nd, 2017 at 6:23 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

Tao said:

I'm not claiming that all tradicional zen masters applied the same means. You can find gradual, sudden and directa approaches in different times.

Astus wrote:

Zen is not bound to any particular method, and in that it accords with the basic concept of skilful means.

Tao said:

You're missing nothing, you'r right and that kind of zen was totally lost, probably because of the lack of teachers able to do that...

Astus wrote:

If there were a simple, easy, and quick fix to suffering, wouldn't everyone be using that? The assumption of losing something presupposes there was something in the first place that could have been lost.

Tao said:

Gradual enlightenment: teaching that states that enlightenment is reached by polishing certain qualities on the individual getting closer and closer to buddhahood and finally gets there

Astus wrote:

Every path is gradual, otherwise it's not a path. On the other hand, since buddhahood is not a conditioned state, it cannot be a product of the path.

Tao said:

Sudden enlightenment: teaching that states that enlightenment is reached not by polishing anything, but suddenly recognizing its inherent buddhahood forever (and forever is relevant here).

Astus wrote:

That kind of sudden enlightenment has always been the norm. Even on the sravaka path one does not build or improve the four noble truths but recognises it.

Tao said:

Direct enlightenment: teaching that states that buddhahood is available here and now for anyone. There's no awakening needed. One moment you are an ordinary being and the next you're a Buddha

Astus wrote:

The availability is assured by the doctrine of buddha-nature. That no awakening is needed, that sounds like a naturalist fallacy.

Tao said:

some of their means are totally lost, like HuangBo LinJi and Co. sudden means

Astus wrote:

What means is it that is lost? Such texts are very much part of today's mainstream Chan.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 2nd, 2017 at 7:54 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

dreambow said:

If I'm quiet and can hear the birds, my mind does not need to focus on the sounds. I can hear what is going on around me without labelling, labouring or needing to modify the awareness. It's just so. Nothing needs to be added or taken away from what is. If one appears to be momentarily unaware its because the thoughts/emotions are veiling the awareness but awareness is still there.

Astus wrote:

A piece of rock do not and cannot make any effort. One does not have to nor can one make oneself hungry or thirsty, they occur nevertheless. That doesn't make any of that unconditioned.

Sensing what is going around is not any less illusory without labelling and paying attention. Happening is itself a process, all processes occur in time, and time is found only as a conventional concept. To put special importance on peaceful observation is grasping at an artificially elevated idea of calmness.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 2nd, 2017 at 7:57 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

White Lotus said:

How do you see the mountain Astus?

Astus wrote:

Proverbial.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2017 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

White Lotus said:

In the gradual; unfolding of prajna is "experiential". At different levels the mountain is seen differently. What does the sudden mean by saying the mountain is "proverbial"? Is nothing experienced other than things just as they are? What does the proverb mean?

Astus wrote:

Here is the proverb:

Chan teacher Qingyuan Weixin of Jizhou ascended the hall. "Thirty years ago, before this old monk practised Chan, I saw that mountains are mountains and rivers are rivers. When later I entered this abode and experienced personal knowledge, I saw that mountains are not mountains and rivers are not rivers. Today, as I attained rest in this abode, as before, I saw that mountains are merely mountains and rivers are merely rivers. People take these three views to be the same or to be different. If anyone can attain this, then he can personally see this old monk."
(http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T51n2077_022#0614b29)

Before aiming for liberation one grasps at phenomena, while aiming for liberation one rejects phenomena, and finally one is without grasping or rejection of phenomena. This is very much like the three truths in Tiantai and somewhat like the three natures in Yogacara.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2017 at 8:00 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land teachings from a Zen perspective

Content:

Astus wrote:

https://books.google.com/books?id=_hALAAAAYAAJ,

<https://books.google.com/books?id=58AKAAAAYAAJ>,

<https://books.google.com/books?id=ASfYAAAAMAAJ> are all representatives of mainstream Chinese Buddhism where it makes little sense to talk about PL and Zen as if they were separate traditions. It is more a question of emphasis in one's own practice.

More on that read

<http://buddhiststudies.berkeley.edu/people/faculty/sharf/documents/Sharf2003.%20TP%20Chan%20and%20Pure%20Land.pdf>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2017 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: Dr. Nida Chenagtsang

Content:

Malcolm said:

It is rare anyone achieves Buddhahood in this lifetime. It is very common however for Vajrayāna practitioners to attain buddhahood at the point of death, or even in the bardo. It is even more common for Dzogchen practitioners to achieve buddhahood at the time of the death or in the bardo, and in the case of Dzogchen practitioners, provided they understand the teachings and practice in a precise way, it is certain they will never return to samsara again.

...

I was talking about the instructions for extremely lazy people.

Astus wrote:

If it is that complicated with Dzogchen, why not take the path to Sukhavati instead?

"The optimal case is to become a Buddha in one lifetime and with one body, or else to become a Buddha as a Dharmakaya at death, when the outer breath ceases. The middling case is to recall the meaning of the unified stages of generation and completion of one's present meditation at the time when one's body and mind separate, resulting in becoming a Buddha in the intermediate state as a Sambhogakaya, indivisible from one's chosen deity. There are said to be twenty-one ways to achieve the result of Buddhahood, corresponding to the specific faculties of individuals. The very least of them is called resting in a Nirmanakaya pure realm. It is said that by making prayers to take birth in a Buddha realm, you will be reborn there."

(Spacious Path to Freedom, p 198-199)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2017 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment

Content:

White Lotus said:

I wish to know the truth of the great matter.

Astus wrote:

About the great matter (大事):

"The Buddha Bhagavat appear in this world to cause sentient beings to aspire toward purity and the wisdom and insight of the buddhas. They appear in this world to manifest the wisdom and insight of the buddhas to sentient beings. They appear in this world to cause sentient beings to attain the wisdom and insight of a buddha's enlightenment. They appear in this world in order to cause sentient beings to enter the path of the wisdom and insight of a buddha."

(Lotus Sutra, ch 2, BDK Edition, p 30)

So Huineng explains:

"The one great affair is the perceptual understanding of the buddhas. The people of this world are delusively attached to characteristics externally and delusively attached to emptiness internally. If one is able to transcend characteristics within characteristics and to transcend emptiness within emptiness, this is to be undeluded both externally and internally. If you are enlightened to this teaching, your mind will open up [in enlightenment] in a single moment of thought."

(Platform Sutra, ch 7, BDK Edition, p 56)

White Lotus said:

Prove to me that the sudden way is superior.

Astus wrote:

The sudden way is pointing out that appearances are already empty, and there is no emptiness outside appearances. If one can confirm this immediately in one's personal experience, that is sudden. If one first needs to pursue studies, cultivate meditation, and abide by the precepts, that is gradual. The result is the same liberation from attachment through the realisation of no self, thus there is no point in talking about inferior and superior.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2017 at 11:55 PM

Title: Re: Dr. Nida Chenagtsang

Content:

Malcolm said:

Not according to Dzogchen teachings. Making prayers to be reborn in this or that pure realm is not a guarantee that you will in fact take rebirth in this or that pure land in your next life. The twenty-one capacities that are discussed in your passage refer to the twenty-one types of people who have directly perceived dharmatā. The worst sort of person has this experience but is lazy about developing it.

Astus wrote:

That requirement sounds like a unique one in dzogchen, since according to the sutras buddha-remembrance is enough. But, as you have mentioned, "it is all really a question of whether you trust what the Buddha has said".

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2017 at 1:39 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Nida Chenagtsang

Content:

Malcolm said:

one remains in the natural nirmanakāya buddhafiels for only five hundred human years before attaining buddhahood.

Astus wrote:

What is a natural nirmanakaya buddha field? And how is that relevant, when from Sukhavati one can visit innumerable buddhas and fields?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2017 at 5:51 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land teachings from a Zen perspective

Content:

crazy-man said:

Honen Shonin (Jodo-Shu), Shinran Shonin (Jodo-Shin-Shu), Myōan Eisai (Rinzai-Shu), Dogen Zenji (Soto-Shu) and Nichiren Daishonin (Nichiren-Shu) were former monks of the Tendai-Shu and i think that they took some elements from the teaching of the Tendai-Shu into their own teachings.

Astus wrote:

Honen established and Shinran followed the teaching of exclusive nenbutsu, so they have practically nothing to do with Tendai or Zen. Eisai had no heirs and he led a sort of ecumenical temple. Dogen rejected the Pure Land path, while Nichiren rejected both Pure Land and Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2017 at 5:53 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land teachings from a Zen perspective

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

Thank you for these recommendations. Are there Zen Buddhists in the West who read and put into practice these Pure Land-related materials explained from a Zen perspective? It seems that Zen in the West might not always be in tune with the devotional practices found in Zen as practiced in Asia, even including Japan.

Astus wrote:

Mostly those who follow traditional Chinese and Vietnamese schools.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 6th, 2017 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: Did Mahayana influence Theravada Buddhism?

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

both are true descendants of pre-sectarian Buddhism

Astus wrote:

Sectarians are the true descendants of the pre-sectarians. That is, both are sectarians.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 6th, 2017 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: The essence of the teachings is not different...

Content:

Astus wrote:

What essence? Who of the various schools stated that there is such a shared essence? On the contrary, Buddhists rejected the Vedantins, and Vedantins rejected the Buddhists.

"The conceptions of the Sankhyas, the Kanadas and the Buddhists about them are not tenable according to reason. They should never be accepted. For they are not supported by reason and the scriptures. Hundreds and thousands of errors on their part may be mentioned. As the scriptures other than the Vedas have been condemned (in the ancient sacred tradition) "scriptures other than these," (they should not be accepted). A wise man should give up the teachings of such scriptures and all crookedness, and, with faith and devotion, should have a firm understanding of the true import of the Vedantas accepted by Vyasa."

(Shankara: Upadeshasahasri 16.64-67, tr Jagadananda, p 187-188)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2017 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: Surangama Sutra as an anti-Dzogchen intervention

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Shurangama Sutra existed in China by around 730, if not earlier. Trisong Detsen, who invited Padmasambhava and Vimalamitra to Tibet, began his rule in 755. According to Sam van Schaik Dzogchen did not exist on its own until the 10th century, and Menngagde works date back only to the 11th century. In other words, not only sky gazing and leap over practices were nowhere around when the sutra appeared, but even Dzogchen has not yet formed.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2017 at 6:32 PM

Title: Re: Surangama Sutra as an anti-Dzogchen intervention

Content:

Malcolm said:

Sky gazing can be found in the PP sutras.

Astus wrote:

To take the passage as a reference to any group's practice, we'd need to find such a group.

By the way, are you referring to this often quoted passage, or is it something else?

ākāśa dṛṣṭu iti sattva pravayāharanti nabhadarśanaṃ kutu vimṛśyatha etamartham / tatha dharmadarśanu nidiṣṭa tathāgatena na hi darśanaṃ bhaṇitu śakya nidarśanena // (http://gretil.sub.uni-goettingen.de/gretil/1_sanskr/4_rellit/buddh/bsu028pu.htm)

起虛空見眾生相， 虛空無相不可得，
佛說法法非相應， 不說非有非無相。
(http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T08n0229_002)

A vision in space is a being, so they declare.

A vision like that of space, so should you consider that object!

Thus has the vision of Dharma been expounded by the Tathagata.

But it is not possible to report on that vision by definite statements [that differ from it].
(Ratnaguna ch 12, tr Conze)

Some sentient beings say that they have seen the sky,
Yet how is the sky to be "seen?" Examine the meaning of this.
Likewise, the Tathagata has shown this way to see all phenomena.
(Jewel Ornament of Liberation, p 250)

Malcolm said:

Your statements assumes that yogic practices come from texts, rather than the other way around. Bad assumption.

Astus wrote:

What is the earliest example of sky gazing in a Dzogchen text?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2017 at 6:21 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Shikantaza

Content:

Astus wrote:

So called sutra mahamudra includes calming meditation with and without object, and insight meditation with and without analysis.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2017 at 7:08 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Shikantaza

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Zen being Japanese, Mahamudra being Tibetan

Astus wrote:

That might be relevant in some aspects, like robes, instruments, etc., but not in the basic concept of the path. To find a common denominator between Zen and Mahamudra, it is mainly the prajnaparamita teachings. But then, the prajnaparamita is shared among all Mahayana traditions anyway.

Shikantaza is the immediate recognition of the buddhas' wisdom, there are no steps or stages provided. The Dagpo Kagyu tradition provides a step by step instruction on the stages from the preliminaries to the four yogas. That amounts to more than just a "philosophical attitude".

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2017 at 10:21 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Shikantaza

Content:

Justmeagain said:

Whilst I appreciate they're different traditions I can't help but feel they're so far apart so as to be almost contradictory.

...

The two practices couldn't be further apart in my opinion.

Astus wrote:

Zen practice begins and ends at non-abiding. Mahamudra provides a gradual path to non-abiding. There is no contradiction in that, they are simply different approaches.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2017 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Shikantaza

Content:

Malcolm said:

Mahāmudra is non-gradual, actually.

Astus wrote:

Although one can say that " <http://www.unfetteredmind.org/pith-instructions-on-mahamudra/> " and " <http://keithdowman.net/guestpage/maitripas-essential-mahamudra-verses.html> ", there is still a gradual path employed to train in it.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2017 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Shikantaza

Content:

Justmeagain said:

But I think the process of practice is a given.

One is utterly without form, the other its antithesis.

Do both practices lead to the same end?

Astus wrote:

All Mahayana traditions have buddhahood as their goal. As for any of them being better, quicker, higher, etc., while that can be an entertaining topic to discuss, when it comes to walking the path, the inclinations and opportunities of the individual decide what is fitting.

Justmeagain said:

I guess my concern is that I don't want to waste my time on a practice that is not as effective as another.

Astus wrote:

Effective is always what works for you. As you may have already heard, zazen is good for nothing and in mahamudra there is nothing to do.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2017 at 12:00 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Shikantaza

Content:

Malcolm said:

Mahāmudra and Dzogchen are both paths of self-liberation. There is no gradual training for either.

Astus wrote:

Do you then call the rest what? Preliminaries? Still, they are preliminaries somewhat specific in each tradition.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2017 at 12:01 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Shikantaza

Content:

Malcolm said:
Some have buddhahood as their basis.

Astus wrote:
It is still the goal/fruit as well, isn't it?

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2017 at 12:26 AM
Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Shikantaza
Content:

Malcolm said:
The principle of both mahāmudra and the great perfection is to distinguish the mind from the nature of the mind. That is accomplished on the basis of the intimate instructions of a qualified guru. But in both cases there is no gradual path.

Astus wrote:
"See nature, become buddha" could be called a shared idea of Zen and Mahamudra. But while you don't find much on the topic of gradual instructions in Zen, it seems to me that people like Dagpo Tashi Namgyal and Wangchuk Dorje worked hard on spelling out the details of the preliminary practices, the main practices of calming and insight, and the stages of the four yogas, just as modern teachers of the tradition, like Thrangu Rinpoche, follow in their footsteps. I'm not debating what you say about Mahamudra, but it seems to me that is a somewhat selective presentation. Furthermore, I consider those detailed instructions in the Mahamudra tradition of Gampopa an asset, and I'm not saying that it makes it anything inferior.

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2017 at 12:35 AM
Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Shikantaza
Content:

Malcolm said:
The four yogas in reality are not a means to achieve anything. They are a means to familiarize oneself with the nature of the mind one has already recognized.

Astus wrote:
I think I did not describe the yogas as methods either.

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2017 at 2:02 AM
Title: Re: What is the Zen and/or Chan assertion of how conventional phenomena exists?
Content:

Tenzincharpa said:
A) Exist as Illusion, existing only as a projection of the mind, (literally unreal).
B) Exist as Illusion 'like'; real but existing in an ethereal manner, lacking any inherent true essence; nominally existent.

C) Do Zen and/or Chan deny the existence of conventional phenomena and/or matter?

Astus wrote:

In a dream Kyōzan Oshō went to Maitreya's place and was led in to sit in the third seat. A senior monk struck with a gavel and said, "Today the one in the third seat will speak."

Kyōzan rose and, striking with the gavel, said, "The truth of Mahayana is beyond the four propositions and transcends the hundred negations. Taichō! Taichō!" [Hear the truth!]

(<http://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/zen/mumonkan.htm>)

A monk asked Grand Master Ma, "Please, Teacher, going beyond the permutations of assertion and denial, directly point out to me the meaning of the coming from the West." Master Ma said, "I'm tired today and can't explain for you. Go ask Chih Tsang." When the monk asked Chih Tsang, J Tsang said, "Why didn't you ask the Teacher?" The monk said, "The Teacher had me come here to ask you." Tsang said, "I have a headache today and can't explain for you. Go ask Elder Brother Hai." When the monk asked Elder Brother Hai (Pai Chang), Hai said, "At this point, after all, I don't understand."

When the monk related this to Grand Master Ma, Master Ma said, "Tsang's head is white, Hai's head is black."

(Blue Cliff Record, case 73, tr Cleary & Cleary)

The four propositions (四句) are either existence, non-existence, one, many (有無一異) or the catuskoti (being, non-being, both, neither). The hundred negations (百非) are the permutations of the four as that each contains the four possibilities ($4 \times 4 = 16$), then multiplied by the three times ($16 \times 3 = 48$), then doubled by the options of arisen or about to arise ($48 \times 2 = 96$), and the original four added and thus the hundred negations. These are Chinese Madhyamaka teachings regarding the two truths. See more in Shi Changqing's book: "The Two Truths in Chinese Buddhism".

But, as you can see from the above two stories, Zen is not really a follower of Madhyamaka. Furthermore, Zen was influenced more by Tiantai and especially by Huayan teachings. So, on the subject of two truths, the teaching of the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Four_Dharmadh%C4%81tu seems more appropriate.

Although that's still just background information, the two terms of <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Essence-Function> are often used in the fashion of two truths. You might check on it this essay:

<http://www.acmuller.net/articles/indigenousshermeneutics.htm>.

Finally, there is no such thing as "according to Zen", simply because Zen is not a single church or a unified tradition, but a very generic term for loosely connected groups of people, texts, and traditions. But, to give a straightforward answer finally, I'd say the most common interpretation of conventional phenomena is that they are not different from buddha-nature.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2017 at 2:05 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Shikantaza

Content:

Malcolm said:

With respect to Mahāmudra, it is simply wrong.

Astus wrote:

If that is wrong, then what do you consider all the methods transmitted under the label of Mahamudra, particularly the techniques of calming and insight?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2017 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Shikantaza

Content:

Malcolm said:

Common śamatha and vipaśayāna are engaged in by those who have no experience of the nature of the mind. But in mahāmudra, śamatha and vipaśayāna unified from the beginning since it is simply a means of stabilizing one's knowledge of the nature of the mind pointed out by the guru, as in Dzogchen sems sde or trekchö, or the Lamdre's "inseparability of samsara and nirvana" and so on.

Astus wrote:

The reason calming and insight is practised is to experience the nature of mind. The difference between sudden and gradual according to Tashi Namgyal is that those with supreme intellect do not need to practise calming but can directly gain insight following their familiarity with the teachings. Then, according to Thrangu rinpoche, the difference between common and special practice of calming and insight is that in Mahamudra one begins with insight into the nature of mind instead of insight into the nature of appearances. Finally, systematic instruction in calming and insight is more reliable and efficient according to him than pointing out instructions. So, at least in the Dagpo Kagyu tradition, the gradual practice of calming and insight is cultivated in order to realise the nature of mind. And that is quite logical, since once one is clear about self-liberation, there is no point in engaging in focusing on objects and analysing them.

From Mahamudra the Moonlight:

A Differentiation of Mahamudra Meditation:

"There are, in general, two paths. There is the rapid path, which is designed for a person with a superb intellect, and who is well-disposed to an instantaneous illumination. He has to master, at the outset, the doctrinal views of reality [through analytical insight and] through the clearing away of doubts and distortions. He then concentrates wholly on the vision of reality [established through wisdom]. Then there is the gradual path, which is for a person of an average or inferior intellect who is disposed toward a gradual illumination. He has to master first the meditation on inner tranquility, and then seek to gain analytical insight.

...

The meditational system of the Dakpo Kagyüpa order consists of two systems. The first system, which meets the needs of seekers inclined toward an instantaneous illumination, directs them, at the outset, to master the vision of reality by clearing doubts and distortions concerning the natural foundation of existence, and then settle the mind [in a nondual] state. The second system, which meets the demands of seekers of gradual illumination, directs them first to achieve tranquility of mind and then gradually strive toward insight. The former method would be more suitable for highly intelligent and sensitive persons. Nevertheless, I shall elucidate the latter at this stage because it is widely known in Tibet [the Land of Snow Mountains]."
(p 144, 145-146)

The Reason Why Meditation on Insight Is Necessary:

"the determination of nonselfhood [in one's psychophysical aggregates] through discerning intellect, followed by meditation, will result in attaining permanent peace. No other means can completely eliminate misery and defilement."
(p 178)

From Thrangu rinpoche's An Introduction to Mahamudra Meditation on the difference between sutrayana and mantrayana practice of calming and insight:

"What are these extraordinary instructions of the Vajrayana? Essentially the concept of emptiness in the Vajrayana is the same as that taught by the Buddha in the sutras. The only difference is the method which is used in the Vajrayana. In the Vajrayana method of Mahamudra we do not to worry about external appearances because external appearances, such as mountains and buildings are not our problem, nor do they particularly help us. In fact, they are empty as is logically proven in the sutras, but we don't meditate on them. Nor do we particularly meditate upon the emptiness or insubstantiality of the body.

In the Vajrayana we meditate upon that which is most important, which is the nature of our mind because it is the mind creates pleasure and pain, it is the mind that gives rise to experience, it is the mind that experiences everything. It is the mind that generates disturbing emotions, it is the mind that generates faith and devotion. So the mind is most important. Therefore in Vajrayana, in the practice of Mahamudra, we look at the nature of mind rather than attempting to look at the nature of appearances."

(p 31-32)

And from Thrangu rinpoche's commentary on The Ninth Karmapa's Ocean of Devinitive Meaning:

It is said that you can tell whether or not you have genuinely heard the teachings and understood their point by whether or not you are tame and peaceful in your conduct. And you can tell whether or not your meditation is effective by whether or not your kleshas are diminishing. Ideally, someone should finally have no kleshas whatsoever. But even on the way to that klesha-free state, your kleshas and thoughts should diminish. Therefore, I think that it is of far greater importance than the experience of dramatic instantaneous pointing out that people be taught mahamudra as a full system of instruction that they can implement on their own gradually through diligent application using either one of the three texts by the Ninth Gyalwang Karmapa—The Ocean of Definitive Meaning, Dispelling the Darkness of Ignorance, or Pointing Out the Dharmakaya— or one of the texts by Dakpo Tashi Namgyal—either Moonbeams of Mahamudra or The Clarification of the Natural State.

In short, I think it is of far more importance that people receive this kind of complete and systematic instruction so that they can gradually develop experience on their own, than that some kind of dramatic pointing-out procedure be done. Of course, it is possible to give dramatic pointing-out instruction, and when you do so, some people do recognize their mind's nature. But, if I may say so, I question the stability and, therefore, ultimately the value of that. It certainly is a dramatic experience for those people who achieve it, but I see no evidence of their kleshas diminishing as a result. And furthermore, they then carry away with them the arrogance of the thought, "I have seen my mind's nature." I think it is of far greater importance actually to practice meditation slowly and surely and make all possible use of the resources which this book in particular gives you.

(p 127-128)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2017 at 4:51 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Shikantaza

Content:

Justmeagain said:

So my OP was designed to establish whether there is (in your opinions) a discernable difference between Mahamudra and Shikantaza? Apart from the obvious cultural accoutrements of course.

Just to reiterate, I can't see any parallel at all. But keep hearing that there is?!?

Astus wrote:

When taking Mahamudra to be the practice of non-meditation where appearances liberate themselves, that can be read as identical with the practice of Shikantaza where there is neither grasping nor rejection. However, as you can see, there is more to both traditions than that, even if eventually they both reach the same point.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2017 at 5:57 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Shikantaza

Content:

Malcolm said:

So you apparently agree with my statement, "...in mahāmudra, śamatha and vipaśayāna unified from the beginning since it is simply a means of stabilizing one's knowledge of the nature of the mind pointed out by the guru."

Astus wrote:

No. There are two interpretations of the four yogas I know of, and the more popular one among Kagyupas seems to be the view that one-pointedness is interpreted as the common practice of calming and concentration, while it is during simplicity / non-elaboration that one gains insight into the nature of mind. Accordingly, calming and insight are practised in order to gain knowledge, and only following that can one cultivate their unified form (the third yoga of one taste) based on the realisation.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2017 at 6:14 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Shikantaza

Content:

Matt J said:

You could take it in a number of ways, that is exactly the problem.

Astus wrote:

That seems to be the case with everything.

Matt J said:

We can have a group of people who all claim to practice Shikantaza, and say they are just sitting without grasping or rejection, but really, one person may be sinking into a dull, indeterminate state; one person may be cultivating mindfulness; another may be daydreaming and engaging in mental chatter.

Astus wrote:

So it is with any other inner cultivation. But that has no relevance to what the ideal is.

Matt J said:

It is hard to say without practical and detailed guidance, which is largely missing in Soto Zen (at least as transmitted in the West).

Astus wrote:

Zazen can be described simply and clearly, like <http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/practice/zazen/howto/index.html>. What more should be said?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2017 at 11:10 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Shikantaza

Content:

Malcolm said:

The point is that uncommon śamatha and vipāśyāna is based on knowledge you have. Common śamatha and vipāśyāna is no different than sutrayāna practice. The former is based on direct introduction, and it is basically the same as the four samadhis of Dzogchen Sems sde: calmness (gnas pa), immovability (mi g.yo ba), nonduality (gnyis med) and natural perfection (lhun grub).

Astus wrote:

And what I described was that one practises the common calming and insight followed by the uncommon, and this order can be set into the four yogas where the first two are common calming and insight, and the last two are the uncommon.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2017 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: Surangama Sutra as an anti-Dzogchen intervention

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

In other words, Buddha did not teach Dzogchen. How then can it be a Buddhist practice? Buddha Shakyamuni predicted the appearance of Nagarjuna and Je Tsongkhapa but not Garab Dorje.

Astus wrote:

The question is rather what kind of history or legendary accounts one accepts. If one takes literally every traditions account of itself, then they are all the best and most authentic. If one takes a modern scholarly perspective, then sectarian legends are irrelevant.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2017 at 1:13 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Shikantaza

Content:

Malcolm said:

But it really doesn't work that way. No matter what books you might have read. Mahāmudra is nongradual.

Astus wrote:

It is non-gradual if you limit Mahamudra to the realisation of and familiarisation with the nature of mind. But if you consider the methods used to reach the realisation, then it can be gradual.

"When Gampopa taught sudden realizers he first taught the view and then, from within the view, proceeded into meditation. When he taught gradual realizers he first had them develop experience with meditation and then led them into the view. Among gradual realizers there are two subtypes: those whose mind is extremely wild and those whose mind is extremely unclear. To those with wild mind he taught vipashyana first. To those with extremely unclear mind he first taught shamata. The procedure in Moonlight of Mahamudra begins with shamata and proceeds to vipashyana."
(Thrangu: Essentials of Mahamudra, p 101-102)

"The Mahamudra system contains three approaches: sutra Mahamudra, tantra Mahamudra, and essence Mahamudra. According to sutra Mahamudra, one proceeds gradually through the five paths and ten bodhisattva stages, each practice followed by another. When one has reached a certain point, one continues step by step on to the next practice. One presents one's understanding and the master will check it. The whole procedure is very gradual and quite safe."

(Chokyi Nyima: Union of Mahamudra and Dzogchen, p 57)

"The Sutra Mahamudra approach is seen as a specialty of the Kagyu tradition and was the central emphasis of Gampopa's teachings. Therefore, although it originated in India and was also taught by Marpa and Milarepa, Gampopa is regarded as the main figure responsible for bringing this teaching to its full development and manifestation.

...

Essence Mahamudra is transmitted through a path more profound and more wondrous than the previous two because it leads to the sudden realization of the true nature of mind, which is called thamal8Ji shepa (tha mal8Ji shes pa), or ordinary mind. ... On this path, there is no need for either the elaborate methods of Mantra Mahamudra or the gradual training of Sutra Mahamudra. In Sutra Mahamudra, there are still some forms; for example, the practices of shamatha and vipashyana meditation, as well as the practices of bodhichitta, are retained."

(Dzogchen Ponlop: Wild Awakening p 33, 34-35)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2017 at 1:22 AM

Title: Re: Surangama Sutra as an anti-Dzogchen intervention

Content:

Queequeg said:

That's too far, isn't it?

From a modern scholarly perspective, ie. the Social Sciences, the legends are more raw material for study.

For the modern scholar, all of it is just more stuff to catalog and analyze.

Astus wrote:

If one wants to establish a historical sequence, then it does not matter how old a tradition believes itself to be. What one should look for are datable and verifiable evidences. At the same time, it also means that one cannot say anything more than what the evidence can corroborate. So, for instance the Shurangama Sutra can be believed to be 2500 years old, but historically it is datable only to 8th century China. Similarly, Dzogchen may proclaim itself to go back to India, but the earliest texts are 9th century Tibet. To put it another way, who would believe today a person who claims to be the sole representative of an ancient Buddhist lineage nobody has yet heard of and nothing can back up its existence?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2017 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Shikantaza

Content:

Malcolm said:

That's all Mahāmudra is.

Astus wrote:

Fine. Then let me ask again: what do you call all the other things taught under the label of Mahamudra?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2017 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: Surangama Sutra as an anti-Dzogchen intervention

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

The Heart Sutra is perfectly aligned with the longer Perfection of Wisdom Sutra but when people claim they can attain enlightenment by meditating on the clarity of the mind which is only a conventional truth or that generation stage of HYT is not necessary, these heresies which are clearly contrary to Buddha's teachings in the Perfection of Wisdom and the Tantras are clearly not the word of Buddha.

Astus wrote:

That necessity of HYT, generation stage, etc. might be the opinion of one or two traditions (Gelug, and Sakya?), but nobody else. So it is a bit strong to call most of Mahayana lineages heresies.

Tsongkhapafan said:

Buddha taught a path to enlightenment, either to the small enlightenment of a Hearer, the middling enlightenment of a Solitary Realizer or the great enlightenment of a Buddha - he did not teach sudden enlightenment, a 'non-path' or the abandonment of conceptual minds as a path to enlightenment.

Astus wrote:

According to the whole of East Asian Mahayana and some groups of Tibetan Mahayana the Buddha did teach sudden enlightenment, etc. So it seems that view you represent is rather in the minority.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2017 at 8:44 PM

Title: Re: Surangama Sutra as an anti-Dzogchen intervention

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

there's no enlightenment without HYT. It's not an opinion, it's the teaching of Buddha Vajradhara ... No HYT, no enlightenment.

Astus wrote:

Then let's just say it is not a teaching others accept as definitive, just as you do not accept their teachings as definitive.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 12th, 2017 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra same as Shikantaza

Content:

Justmeagain said:

How about I put my OP this way....are Mahamudra and Shikantaza synonymous?

Astus wrote:

One can find common elements between the Great Seal and Just Sitting. Both are meant as the realisation of the ultimate truth, for instance. Both view the ultimate wisdom as the absence of attachment and detachment. Both see beings as originally enlightened and appearances as originally pure.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 15th, 2017 at 11:05 PM

Title: Re: Consciousness turns back upon itself; it does not extend beyond name-and-form

Content:

Astus wrote:

The recommended sources for study listed here:

<http://www.dhammadownload.com/viewtopic.php?t=12133>

My short response on the question:

Consciousness and name and form practically include each other, as 'name' means the four mental aggregates, also listed as "feeling, perception, intention, contact, & attention" (<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.002.than.html>), i.e. the universal mental factors.

Consciousness could as well be called a state of mind and the factors are the functions or activities of the mind. When one identifies with a thought, a state of mind emerges, and when there is a state of mind, one is identifying with a thought. It's like thinking 'happy' and 'being happy'. When there is no identification, no grasping, then there is no state of mind, nor any factor to cling to.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2017 at 4:00 AM

Title: Re: Differences about Zen Soto, Son and Thien. Searching right for me.

Content:

OneTwoThree said:

Does Zen Soto, Son and Thien different a lot?

Astus wrote:

Mostly, yes, unless it's "Westernised", in which case they reduce things to meditation and not much else.

OneTwoThree said:

I would like to choose that one, which is the closer one with Thich Nhat Hanh's Thien school.

Astus wrote:

What TNH teaches and what Thien looks like in general are two different things. This is applicable to everyone else as well, that specific groups and teachers can have more or less unique elements.

OneTwoThree said:

I feel Son is good idea.

Astus wrote:

If by that you mean the KUSZ - again, not representative of Korean Buddhism in general - it is probably a good idea, since they are accessible in Poland.

OneTwoThree said:

Second question, is it ok to use services of different zen schools at one time? As I am forced to do probably.

Astus wrote:

What you do at home is your business. But when in a group, you do what everyone else.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2017 at 7:34 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra and Theravada practices

Content:

Justmeagain said:

Does this mean that Theravadins achieve Mahamudra too by practicing Vipassana and Samatha?

Astus wrote:

First you might want to specify what calming and insight stand for in Theravada and in Mahamudra.

Also, if you want to study a structural interpretation of doctrines, Ringu Tulku's <https://books.google.hu/books?id=ETAtDQAAQBAJ> is a fine work for that.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2017 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment vs. Liberation vs. Awakening

Content:

Astus wrote:

The common word for bodhi in Chinese is pútí 菩提, i.e. a transliteration. But, another term that may be used for bodhi is dào 道, i.e. way. Now that is a loaded word. So, I think one can stay with whatever English term seems fitting in the context, as long as the usage remains consistent and clear.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2017 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: Schools of Buddhism mind map

Content:

Astus wrote:

That is a fairly misleading map, displaying various schools as if they had emerged independently of each other. Furthermore, some are philosophical systems, some are organisations, some are long dead, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 18th, 2017 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: Schools of Buddhism mind map

Content:

Astus wrote:

Madhyamaka was the first major doctrinal exposition on the concept of emptiness, and serves as the basis for everyone else who came later. Yogacara, as the second major school of Mahayana thought, and arguably the real first Mahayana system, is the second set of doctrines that influenced everyone else. Of course, preceding both one should mention the various abhidharma systems, primarily the Sarvastivadin and the Vaibhasika. So, following the abhidharmikas, madhyamikas, and yogacarins we can skip to Chinese Buddhism, where the newer schools of Tiantai, Huayan, and Chan emerged. Then from Chinese Buddhism developed the Korean, Vietnamese, and Japanese forms. But the question really is the purpose of such a map, and what it is that it wants to describe. If it's the relationship between the various schools - and what schools exactly - then it should consider the historical and geographical changes. Furthermore, Buddhism is more than so called schools, and the sutras and the vinayas are likely even more important.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 18th, 2017 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: The Mind-Only Tradition

Content:

Astus wrote:

In the Mahayana system it has been established that those belonging to the three worlds are mere representations of consciousness. This is clear from the aphorism, 'Oh ! Jinaputra, those belonging to the three worlds are mere mind' . The terms mind [citta] , thought-consciousness, [mano-vijnana] and representation of consciousness [vijñapti] are synonyms. Here mind should be understood along with its associates [samprayoga]. The term 'mere' indicates the exclusion of the [external] objects.

It is all mere representation of consciousness,
Because there is the appearance of non-existent objects.
Just as a man with a cataract
Sees hairs, moons etc.,
Which do not exist in reality.
(Vasubandhu: Vimsatika, tr Kochumuttom)

So the answer to the question: "The term 'mere' indicates the exclusion of the [external] objects." However, it doesn't fit exactly to say that "only mind exists", because, as he writes in the Trimsika:

"When one does not perceive also a supporting consciousness,
For, the graspable objects being absent,
There cannot either be the grasping of that"

In other words, without an object there is no subject either.

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, January 19th, 2017 at 12:43 AM
Title: Re: What is Ignorance (avidya)?
Content:
Astus wrote:
As far as Zen goes on defining the meaning:

"When one is deluded as to the self-nature, one is a sentient being, but when one realizes the self-nature, one is a buddha."
(Platform Sutra, ch 3, BDK Edition, p 39)

"If you depend merely on oral explanations of seeing the nature, [like a] deluded person you will have thoughts relative to the realms and you will even activate false views regarding those thoughts. And from this will be generated all the enervating defilements and false thoughts! There is in the self nature fundamentally not a single dharma that can be perceived. To think that there were any would be a false explanation, a disaster, a false view of enervating defilements."
(ch 4, p 44)

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, January 19th, 2017 at 6:32 PM
Title: Re: The Mind-Only Tradition
Content:
Coëmgenu said:
Which one of these statements about the mind-only tradition is true (or are both right? Are both wrong in their way)?

1) The mind-only tradition, specifically on account of its being a "mind-only" discourse, offers a valid metaphysical and (perhaps) cosmological description of the true nature of the reality we "appear" to inhabit.

or 2) The mind-only perspective establishes no metaphysics or other basis for existence and is properly a methodology, not a worldview, to realize no-self and emptiness. It is a means to an end rather than any sort of establishment or presentation of any reality.

Astus wrote:

First of all, from Vasubandhu's Trimsatika (tr Kochumuttom):

"One does not abide in the realization
Of mere representations of consciousness
Just on account of the [theoretical] perception
That all this is mere representation of consciousness,
If one places [= sees] something before oneself."

That doesn't mean there is no view presented. There is, and it is a view one needs to learn, understand, and take to one's heart. It is based on that correct view that one can then attain realisation beyond mere concepts. But not to take up the view, saying it is just a skilful means, is not understanding the importance of establishing the correct view.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 19th, 2017 at 7:18 PM

Title: Re: What is Ignorance (avidya)?

Content:

Queequeg said:

This is more or less a madhyamika "revelation through utter negation"

Astus wrote:

Yes.

"That there are no names that can be named is to name the self-natures."
(Platform Sutra, ch 8, BDK p 79)

But it has some extras as well.

The self-natures are endowed with the three bodies.
Generating illumination, the four wisdoms are created.
Without transcending the conditions of seeing and hearing,
One transcendentally ascends to the stage of buddhahood.
(Platform Sutra, ch 7, BDK p 60)

Queequeg said:

So ignorance = deluded as to self-nature?

Astus wrote:

Yes.

The suchlike self-nature is the true Buddha;
False views and the three poisons are King Māra.
During false delusion Māra is in one's home;
During correct views the Buddha is in one's hall.

When false views and the three poisons are generated in the nature,
This is for King Māra to come reside in one's home.
When with correct views one eradicates the three poisonous [states of] mind,
Māra is transformed into the Buddha, true and not provisional.

The dharmakāya, saṃbhogakāya, and nirmāṇakāya—
The three bodies are fundamentally a single body.
If one can see it oneself within the nature,
This is the cause of bodhi and the achievement of buddhahood.

...

If you have encountered the sudden teaching in this lifetime,
Become enlightened immediately to the self-nature and see the World-honored One.
If you cultivate by trying to become a buddha,
You'll never know where to seek for the true.

If you are able to see the true in your own mind,
Having the true will be the cause of your achieving buddhahood.
If you do not see the self-nature but seek the Buddha externally,
Every activation of your mind will be that of a big fool.

(Platform Sutra, ch 10, BDK p 90, 91)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 19th, 2017 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: The Mind-Only Tradition

Content:

srivijaya said:

How do we define "mind" in Mind-Only?

Astus wrote:

Wikipedia: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Eight_Consciousnesses

Xuanzang: <http://www.cttbusa.org/8consciousnesses/contents.asp>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 20th, 2017 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: The Mind-Only Tradition

Content:

srivijaya said:

So it makes me wonder why the school is called mind-only when they have no ontological position. As the designation seems to imply existent (if impermanent and changing) mind and non-existent objects of awareness, which is again ontological.

Astus wrote:

If you look at Vasubandhu's verses, he uses the term vijñaptimātra, translated as "mere representation of consciousness" (Kochumuttom), or perception-only (Anacker), or weishi (唯識 - consciousness only / mere consciousness). Then one can think about the matter of what <https://journals.ub.uni-heidelberg.de/index.php/jiabs/article/viewFile/8673/2580> actually means. However, Yogacara is bigger than Asanga and Vasubandhu, and there are of course the misrepresentations by the opponents, so why and who thinks what is quite complicated. The mistake one should not fall into, and this generally applies to the whole of Buddhism as well, is to assume a homogeneous doctrine for a school or tradition.

srivijaya said:

Is "mind" a collective noun here?

Astus wrote:

Mind in Buddhism is always a collective noun, since assuming a unitary consciousness is equal to assuming a self.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 20th, 2017 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: What is Ignorance (avidya)?

Content:

Queequeg said:

I think I can intuit what this means. Can you explain briefly?

Astus wrote:

"Samantabhadra says that connate ignorance is unconscious, unmindful. It is unawareness. The dominating ignorance brings the connate ignorance, which arises simultaneously with our mind. The connate ignorance is together with every moment of our consciousness, with every moment of our awareness. We know it's there, but, each moment, we fail to recognize it. Right now we are saying to ourselves that we must recognize it, but the next moment we miss it again. And the next moment we say that to ourselves again. And then, the next moment, we miss it again. This repetitive failure to recognize the dominating ignorance is the connate ignorance.

The connate ignorance is actually the nature of not recognizing. At the very moment of not being aware, as one's consciousness is totally ignorant, pristine awareness is very much present. At the very moment I have a tremendous sense of emotion, it exists within the basic state of rigpa, the pristine awareness. This is what we call connate. In that very moment of experiencing ignorance, it is already in the nature of alpha-pure wisdom. It's not really arising at the same time; the alphas pure wisdom is its basic nature. The nature of ignorance is the same as the nature of wisdom. It's always there. This nature of ignorance is the unawareness."

(Dzogchen Ponlop: Penetrating Wisdom, p 104-105)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 20th, 2017 at 5:26 AM

Title: Re: What is Ignorance (avidya)?

Content:

Queequeg said:

one of the books on my shelf that will likely not get the attention I want to give it until this dusty household life becomes a little less dusty. If all goes well, another 16.5 years, at the earliest. I need a long life this time around.

Astus wrote:

No need to wait, just see your nature. Then you find the 84,000 sutras in a single atom.

"The unsurpassable bodhi is to be able, at these very words, to recognize your own fundamental mind and to see that your own fundamental nature is neither born nor extinguished. It is to see this naturally in every moment of thought and at all times: the myriad dharmas are without obstruction; the one is true and all are true. The myriad realms are naturally thuslike, and the thuslike mind is the true. If what you see is like this, then it is the self-nature of the unsurpassable bodhisattva."

(Platform Sutra, ch 1, BDK p 21)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 24th, 2017 at 6:33 PM

Title: Re: Mahāyāna Parinirvāṇa

Content:

Fortyeightvows said:

What is it that's never born ?

Astus wrote:

"That which originates dependently
Does not cease and does not arise,
Does not come and does not go,
Is not annihilated and is not permanent,
Is not different and not the same."
(Nagarjuna, MMK, tr from Ornament of Reason)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 24th, 2017 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: Mahāyāna Parinirvāṇa

Content:

Wayfarer said:

You might think that 'that which originates dependently' would normally be said to 'arise and cease'. That is because everything that is subject to dependent origination is 'anicca', impermanent.

Yet Nāgārjuna says here that what originates dependently does not arise and cease.

Astus wrote:

If something is dependently originated, it cannot sustain itself, so it does not have a substance, it is not a thing in itself. Because it is not in itself, it is not anything in particular, it is not something identifiable as this or that. This absence of substance is also called emptiness. Because it is nothing in itself, it cannot be said to become, as there is nothing to become, nor can it be said to perish, as there is nothing to perish. That is how in dependent origination there is nothing that originates, that birth is no birth.

Wayfarer said:

would it be correct to say, that this verse is one of the grounds which differentiates Nāgārjuna from the early schools?

Astus wrote:

Yes, in the sravaka teachings one has to observe how something appears, remains, and disappears. In Mahayana one has to realise that all appearances are unborn and undying. Another important thing here is that in the sravaka teachings the uncompounded is what is called unborn, particularly nirvana, so saying that all dharmas are unborn also means that all dharmas are nirvana.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 24th, 2017 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: Attaining Full Enlightenment During an Empowerment

Content:

DGA said:

is there not at least one major empowerment that includes, in a recognizable if not necessarily named way, direct introduction?

Astus wrote:

That is the 4th, the http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Precious_word_empowerment.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 25th, 2017 at 6:17 AM

Title: Re: Mahāyāna Parinirvāṇa

Content:

Wayfarer said:

There's an interpretation

https://books.google.com.au/books?id=npRVBAAAQBAJ&lpg=PT73&ots=-

WuNqdq3ln&dq=%22That%20which%20originates%20dependently%22&pg=PT74#v=o nepage&q=%22That%20which%20originates%20dependently%22&f=false from Traleg Kyabgon Rinpoche which explains the verse in more detail. The way I think of it is in terms of the interdependence of the transcendent and the immanent.

Astus wrote:

What do you call the transcendent and what the immanent? If you refer to emptiness and appearances, they are not interdependent, as they are not two separate things. The unborn is not interdependent with the born, but the nature of the born is that it is unborn, exactly because it is born. Just as TKR explains in the section you referred to: "In Madhyamaka philosophy, ultimate reality is not seen as something that exists outside of or above the empirical reality with which we are confronted every day. Rather, emptiness is the nature of the very world that we live in, so the nature of the empirical world is ultimate reality." and "In fact, the ultimate is understood only through an understanding of the relative, because ultimate truth is, in fact, the nature of the relative truth."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 25th, 2017 at 6:12 PM

Title: Re: Mahāyāna Parinirvāṇa

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Is that how ordinary people understand it? And if it is, why is there need for a path?

Astus wrote:

If by ordinary you mean those who have not gained personal insight into emptiness, then yes, that is how they should understand it as the correct view. If by ordinary you mean those who do not know the Dharma, then no, because such people have not yet heard such concepts.

As for the need of a path, why wouldn't there be one? First of all, one needs to learn about the Dharma, then understand it, then personally verify it. Following experiential verification comes further practice to completely establish oneself in wisdom and perfect the other paramitas as well, not to mention the liberation of all beings.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 26th, 2017 at 10:15 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism and the zombie theory

Content:

Astus wrote:

The body is like a heap of grass, a mechanical contraption, while consciousness cannot be found or established as anything. We are all zombies, shadows of magically conjured illusions, conceptual mistakes.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2017 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism and the zombie theory

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

Not much room for compassion in or about a mechanical heap of mistakes is there?

Astus wrote:

Only with the realisation of emptiness can there be unbound compassion.

"The bodhisattvas and mahāsattvas should subdue their thoughts like this: All the different types of sentient beings, whether they be born from eggs, born from a womb, born from moisture or born spontaneously; whether or not they have form; whether they abide in perceptions or no perceptions; or without either perceptions or non-perceptions, I save them by causing them to enter nirvana without remainder. And when these immeasurable, countless, infinite number of sentient beings have been liberated, in actuality, no sentient being has attained liberation. Why is this so? Subhūti, If a bodhisattva abides in the signs of self, person, sentient being, or life-span, she or he is not a bodhisattva."

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html, ch 3)

"There is no emptiness meditation not permeated by compassion;
For the practice of compassion is solely [the practice of] emptiness.
As for emptiness, even those seeking tranquil abiding must practice it.
For this vehicle, however, emptiness is compassion;
And the self-nature of this compassion is emptiness.
So understand that compassion is the essential nature."
(Atisha: Advice to Namdak Tsuknor, v 24, in Mind Training, p 267)

"You will reach a point when you see that emptiness and compassion, emptiness and phenomena, and absolute and relative truth, are intrinsically one, rather than being in each case two separate entities like the horns of a goat. The vaster your view of emptiness, the clearer your understanding will be of the infinite ways phenomena can manifest in accordance with the law of cause and effect. And it is from emptiness inseparable from compassion that a bodhisattva manifests.
This is the ultimate fruit of all the different teachings of the Mahayana and Mantrayana, of Madhyamika, Mahamudra and Dzogchen."
(Dilgo Khyentse: The Heart of Compassion, p 156-157)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2017 at 7:46 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism and the zombie theory

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

My question is more what about those who haven't realized this emptiness and, encountering the idea of a mechanical body with no "real" consciousness, equate it to some kind of nihilistic materialism?

Astus wrote:

The idea of a mechanical body fits the modern scientific concept, so I doubt that this would be anyone's first encounter with it. Furthermore, contemplation on the body in terms of its parts, its repulsive nature, its eventual decomposition, and its elements are basic meditation topics, although not particularly popular among the laity. As for falling into the misconception of annihilation, that is a matter to be addressed before one begins meditation and analysis.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2017 at 8:41 PM

Title: Re: How does one learn to practice a Sutra?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Reciting, especially in an unknown language, is recitation practice. If one wants to practice what is taught in the sutra, one needs to understand it. Understanding a sutra can be assisted by commentaries, teachings, and other sutras. Then once it's understood, one can apply it.

And as Huineng said,

"Good friends, people of this world always recite prajñā with their mouths, but they don't recognize the prajñā of the self-natures. This is like talking about eating, which doesn't satisfy one's hunger. If you just talk about emptiness with your mouths, you won't be able to see the nature for a myriad eons. Ultimately, this is of no benefit at all." (Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK Edition p 28)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 29th, 2017 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: Question about processes

Content:

rachmiel said:

Which (if either) of these is Madhyamaka'lly correct:

Conventionally, processes exist.

Ultimately, processes do not exist.

Astus wrote:

Conventionally it makes sense to talk about arising and ceasing, birth and death, coming and going, etc. Ultimately there is nothing to arise and cease, etc. However, to mistake this for the extreme views of existence and non-existence is an error. It is also a mistake to imagine that there are really two kinds of truths.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 29th, 2017 at 5:30 AM

Title: Re: Question about processes

Content:

rachmiel said:

Does the earth circle the sun?

Astus wrote:

Conventional truths are not debated, nor is it the purpose of the Buddhadharma to investigate such matters. But if it's any relevance, one can analyse such concepts as earth, sun, and circling to recognise that they are merely empty labels.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 29th, 2017 at 6:52 PM

Title: Re: Question about processes

Content:

rachmiel said:

Would you say the same thing in response to the question "Are processes real?" That process and real are empty labels?

Is the existence or non-existence of anything asserted in the middle way?

Astus wrote:

This idea that one can assert the existence of processes, of dependent origination, is the concession to conventionality. But when a process is analysed, it cannot be affirmed as anything, or as nothing. The point of the teaching of emptiness is to realise that all concepts are unestablished, because taking concepts to be real is the delusion that results in suffering. This is not a purely theoretical issue, but the very essence of liberating wisdom.

Nagarjuna writes (MMK 21.9-16, tr Siderits):

"Arising and dissolution do not hold with respect to that which is empty.

Arising and dissolution do not hold with respect to that which is non-empty.

It does not hold that arising and dissolution are one.

It does not hold that arising and dissolution are distinct.

If you maintained that arising and dissolution of existents are indeed seen, arising and dissolution are only seen because of delusion.

An existent is not produced from an existent, nor is a nonexistent produced from an existent.

An existent is not produced from a nonexistent, nor is a nonexistent produced from a nonexistent.

Not from itself nor from what is other is an existent produced, and neither is it produced from both itself and what is other; from what, then, is it produced?

For one who acknowledges the existent, there would follow either eternalism or annihilationism, for an existent would be either permanent or impermanent.

[Objection:] For one who acknowledges existents there would be neither annihilation nor eternity, for a state of being is a series consisting of the arising and passing away of effect and cause.

[Reply:] If a state of being is a series consisting of the arising and passing away of effect and cause, then annihilation of the cause follows, for there is no re-arising of what passes away."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 30th, 2017 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: Question about processes

Content:

Khenpo Brothers said:

On the absolute level, phenomena have no substantial existence whatsoever; they are dependently arisen mere appearances, like reflections in a mirror.

Astus wrote:

As you can see in the example of the water moon, the absence of the real moon is the absolute, the presence of the appearance moon is the relative level, while the two levels are a single reality as the water moon. See the unity of the two truths in these passages from <http://read.84000.co/#UT22084-059-014/translation>:

"Whoever understands emptiness well, understands nirvāṇa well. Whoever understands nirvāṇa well has no attachment to any entity, and despite designating conventional things with all sorts of terms—'this is mine,' or 'that is me,' or 'sentient being,' or 'life force,' or 'living being,' or 'man,' or 'person,' or 'born of Manu,' or 'son of Manu,' or 'agent,' or 'inciter of action,' or 'appropriator,' or 'discarder'—he teaches Dharma without attachment to these. He teaches Dharma well. He teaches the final reality. He teaches the final reality well."

And briefly: "Even so phenomena are designated. The learned are not attached to them."

Khenpo Brothers said:

On the conventional level, ... On the absolute level...

Astus wrote:

The conventional level consists of words, concepts, ideas. The absolute level is recognising that concepts are just concepts, they do not have any real referents, they are without any real meaning.

Khenpo Brothers said:

What can be asserted about processes on the ultimate level?

Astus wrote:

Processes are illusions. They are no different from virtual characters in a fictional story. Would you even begin to question the motivations and feelings of such characters as if they had their own mind and senses?

Khenpo Brothers said:

Am I attempting to use concepts/metaphors to grok "that" to which no concepts/metaphors apply?

Astus wrote:

One better not fall for the comfort of assuming some unknowable mystery.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 30th, 2017 at 5:42 PM

Title: Re: Differences between Tibetan and Zen Buddhism other than Vajrayana practices?

Content:

hyperpuppy said:

1. What "liberation from samsara" means

Astus wrote:

As Mahayana schools they both maintain that unestablished (apratisthita) nirvana is the final attainment, including the accomplishment of buddhahood with the three bodies and buddha-qualities.

hyperpuppy said:

2. What "emptiness" means

Astus wrote:

They both maintain that emptiness is the absence of self-nature (svabhava) and that it is not separate from appearances (dharma). One complication in the use of the term can come from the Tiantai doctrine of Three Truths where emptiness signifies only the absence and the term 'middle' refers to the unity of emptiness and appearances.

hyperpuppy said:

What would you say are the major differences between Zen Buddhism and pre-Vajrayana Tibetan Buddhism?

Astus wrote:

Most of the differences come from the separate histories of East Asian and Tibetan Buddhism. Buddhism arrived to China by around the 1st century CE, and unique interpretations started to develop, especially after the 5th century, and Chinese Buddhism became independent from India. Buddhism to Tibet arrived first in the 8th century, and another major transmission happened in the 11th century. In both cases it was a later period of Indian Buddhism that got introduced there that, doctrines that had little to no influence in China. For instance, the interpretation of the Prajnaparamita corpus in China has been based on the Mahaprajnaparamitaupadesha and in Tibet on the Abhisamayalamkara, but those two works have not even been translated to the other language. Also, the teachings of Pramana (Dignaga, Dharmakirti, etc.) and later trends of Madhyamaka and Yogacara (Chandrakirti, Shantarakshita, etc.) have not reached China or had not received much attention. Consequently, what Tibetans call the sutrayana is in fact only their version of Mahayana that is significantly different from the East Asian teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 31st, 2017 at 12:46 AM

Title: Re: Question about processes

Content:

rachmiel said:

So you can affirm something about conventional truth: It is this and that. But you can only disaffirm with ultimate truth: It is not this or that. Quite like emptiness, which is not the presence, rather the absence of (emptiness of) ... yes?

Astus wrote:

Both affirmation and negation are conventional terms. Emptiness is the ultimate truth. But to put it another way: conventional seen as the ultimate is the conventional, the conventional seen as the conventional is the ultimate. Again, in other words: when one grasps at appearances, that is delusion, while not grasping is liberation. However, to turn emptiness and non-attachment into another thing is still being stuck in grasping conventions.

rachmiel said:

So the process of hearing -- air molecules trigger inner ear actions that in turn trigger an electrical signal to travel along auditory nerves to a region of the brain that then transmogrifies the signal to a quale of "heard sound" -- is no different from The Wizard of Oz?

Astus wrote:

If you mean that both are concepts, then yes, no different. Of course, once one compares the meaning of various concepts, within the frame of concepts, there are all sorts of differences. Note again that the point here is not to give a scientific or a literary assessment, but to bring one to the realisation of how attachment occurs.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 31st, 2017 at 1:17 AM

Title: Re: Primordial Buddha: A Reprise

Content:

Queequeg said:

Without primordial buddha, enlightenment is impossible. In this sense, primordial buddha is the single gate, to everything else that is provisional.

Astus wrote:

I'm not sure what primordial buddha that is, but normally in Chan/Zen they talk about buddha-nature most of the time (and its identity with the dharmakaya or all three bodies) and not the primordial buddha usually identified as Vairocana following the Avatamsaka sutra.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 31st, 2017 at 2:36 AM

Title: Re: Primordial Buddha: A Reprise

Content:

Queequeg said:

I think another way to talk about it is buddha-nature.

Astus wrote:

That sounds better to me. Apparently the term "original buddha" (本佛) is not particularly common, although the Fo Guang e-dictionary (佛光電子大辭典) defines it by a quote on the lifespan in the Lotus Sutra with a reference to a Tiantai commentary, and following that it defines its other meaning to be the buddha-nature.

Queequeg said:

Vairocana (Avatamsaka Sutra - though I believe in E. Asia this Vairocana is often described as Sambhogakaya?)

Astus wrote:

It seems that according to Huayanzong he's a sambhogakaya, according to Tiantaizong he's a dharmakaya, and according to Mizong he's the single ultimate dharmakaya.

Queequeg said:

We have these various handles for this Buddha, but its implicit that these words fall short?

Astus wrote:

It's not that they fall short, rather it all becomes symbolic eventually.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 31st, 2017 at 2:51 AM

Title: Re: Question about processes

Content:

rachmiel said:

So Buddhism does not speak of a "level" of reality beyond the conventional? I.e. the only levels spoken of are both firmly in/of the conventional: believing the conventional is reality, and believing the conventional is the conventional.
Or is another level mentioned outside the two truths paradigm?

Astus wrote:

Levels and realities are all what samsara is made of, so there are practically innumerable versions, and each one of them is a fine object of attachment. If there were another reality posited as the final liberation, how would it not be actually just another form of self-identity, another form of existence? At the same time, it is not that one should aim for non-existence either. The source of all problems is in fact one's craving to be somebody (bhavatsna), or not to be somebody (vibhavatsna). The teaching of the middle way eliminates the extreme views of existence and non-existence. What needs to be realised is that appearances are without essence, without self-nature, they are neither one's self or one's possessions. It's not that appearances are good or bad, they are not the one's making us cling to them, so appearances are fine. It is imagining them to be something other, something more than what they are, that is the error.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 31st, 2017 at 2:59 AM

Title: Re: Question about processes

Content:

White Lotus said:

Astus, are you saying that identification with any state or knowledge is grasping/attachment and so we should have no refuge in anything whatsoever. Non abiding, no association. All attachments are futile because all is empty?

Astus wrote:

See what the Buddha says:

"childish ordinary beings construct unreal phenomena, construct erroneous qualities, and have constructed all phenomena, which are in fact insignificant and worthless. And thus they will go to hell, animal states of birth, and to the realm of the Lord of Death. Monk, furthermore, all phenomena are untrue; they have the characteristic that once created they do not remain. Monk, all phenomena are compounded; childish ordinary beings have given rise to attachment, hatred, and delusion. Monk, all phenomena arise from distorted perceptions. Monk, all phenomena lack existence, their very essence is like a mirage. Monk, all phenomena lack a core, they are like space. Monk, as all phenomena are devoid of reality, they are not real entities. Monk, as all phenomena are deep like space, they are deep. Monk, as all phenomena are unperceived, they are wide open. Monk, as all phenomena are utterly void, they are non-abiding. Monk, as all phenomena have no worth for anything at all, they are unreliable. Monk, as all phenomena are without worth whatsoever, they are baseless. ... Monk, as the arising of all phenomena is unperceived, as their arising is insignificant, as their arising is worthless, as their arising is empty, and as their arising is peaceful, they are final nirvāṇa."

(<http://read.84000.co/#UT22084-062-018/translation>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 31st, 2017 at 5:25 PM

Title: Re: Righteous hatred

Content:

Astus wrote:

Hatred with an excuse is what is called righteous hatred. It has no place on the bodhisattva path.

"Upali, when involved in defilements, Bodhisattvas should tolerate the small transgressions which are hard to avoid, but should not tolerate the grave transgressions which are easy to avoid, not even in a dream. For this reason, if a follower of the Mahayana breaks precepts out of desire, I say he is not a transgressor; but if he breaks precepts out of hatred, it is a grave offense, a gross fault, a serious, degenerate act, which causes tremendous hindrances to the Buddha-Dharma."
(The Definitive Vinaya, in Treasury of Mahayana Sutras, p 270)

"The Tathagata, the Enlightened One,
Full of compassion for all beings:
For him there are no transgressions,
For him there is no going astray;
He has not fallen into confusion,
And he is the wise one, ever mindful."
(SN 1.35)

"Do not let anger overpower you;
Do not become angry at those who are angry.
Nonanger and harmlessness always dwell
Within [the hearts of] the noble ones.
Like a mountain avalanche
Anger crushes evil people."
(SN 11.25)

Considerations for the practice of the
http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/N6P_excerpts/N6P_X-Bk4_X-08.pdf:

Then again, the bodhisattva reflects, "Even if people torment me in this present life, bringing ruinous defamation on me, forcefully seizing wealth, slighting me, scolding me, and putting me in bondage, I should nonetheless still maintain patience. If I fail to be patient, I am bound to fall into the hells and undergo countless forms of suffering on their iron-walled hot grounds, enduring roasting and broiling and punishments such as one cannot completely describe."

Additionally, the bodhisattva considers, "When I first brought forth the resolve [to gain bodhi], I vowed to cure the mental diseases of beings. This being has now fallen ill with the fetter of hatred. I should be engaged in curing him. How then could I instead voluntarily make myself sick on this account? I should persevere in the practice of patience."

Additionally, the bodhisattva reflects, "I am a bodhisattva. I desire to be of benefit to beings. If I become unable to maintain patience, then I can't be called a "bodhisattva" at all, but rather should be known as one who is evil."

Moreover, the bodhisattva knows that from long ago on up to the present, it has always been the case that causes and conditions come together and are falsely referred to as a “person” even though in actual fact there is no genuine dharma of a “person” involved at all. Who then is it that could be hated in such circumstances? There exist herein only bones and blood and skin and flesh. This is comparable to something laid up with bricks or to a wooden puppet displaying mechanical movements and manifesting comings and goings.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 31st, 2017 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: Primordial Buddha: A Reprise

Content:

Astus wrote:

Let's take another angle here: if Shakyamuni is an eternal buddha, what then? How is that important or relevant?

Furthermore, in a good number of sutras we find that the true buddha is actually the dharmadhatu/dharmakaya/tathata/etc. that is eternal, unborn, etc., so this points to the true nature of the world and beings, hence it has an important message that is generally accepted in Mahayana. Perhaps the Lotus Sutra is merely saying the same thing.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 1st, 2017 at 2:35 AM

Title: Re: Primordial Buddha: A Reprise

Content:

Queequeg said:

See comment above about Buddha as function.

Astus wrote:

If it stands for the ever present possibility of awakening, it is not much different from buddha-nature, but it sounds like an externalised form of it, in which case it is only good for inspiring people.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 1st, 2017 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: Primordial Buddha: A Reprise

Content:

Queequeg said:

I think it is Buddha Nature. Come to think of it, IIRC, Zhiyi referred to it as Middle Way/Buddhanature, and used these terms interchangeably.

Astus wrote:

Good, then I think this is then settled.

Queequeg said:

Another aspect of Zhiyi's thought is that for each delusion, there is a perfect antidote.

Astus wrote:

Antidotes for delusions is a fairly common idea in Buddhism.

Queequeg said:

The antidote is a function of the delusion. At a subtler level, the antidote to our delusions is their impermanence.

Astus wrote:

That makes little sense to me. Do you mean that delusions remove themselves or just disappear on their own? However, if not, but you mean that:

Goes along with his idea that we can take any object for contemplation and its thorough contemplation will lead to Buddhahood.

That again is a basic doctrine, contemplation of the true nature of any appearance. In fact, Mahayana scriptures often try to improve on this by saying that afflictions and ignorance are themselves awakening, so there is no need for antidotes, although we could call this another linguistic twist and not really an innovation.

Queequeg said:

It also goes along with the idea that enlightenment is a terminal state for everyone.

Astus wrote:

How about enlightenment being the original state?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 1st, 2017 at 4:27 AM

Title: Re: Primordial Buddha: A Reprise

Content:

Minobu said:

how do you get so screwed up from that point in time

Astus wrote:

Original enlightenment does not refer to a point in time but the nature of phenomena being originally pure, i.e. empty, not-self.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 1st, 2017 at 4:33 AM

Title: Re: Primordial Buddha: A Reprise

Content:

Coëmgenu said:

both samsara and nirvana are uncaused and beginningless.

Astus wrote:

As mentioned to Minobu, "original enlightenment" is practically another word for emptiness. It is not about a golden age idea that first there was nirvana, then there was samsara, and finally one needs to return to samsara.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 1st, 2017 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: Primordial Buddha: A Reprise

Content:

Coëmgenu said:

That is so much more convenient than cut/paste.

Queequeg said:

I have a few more Lotus Sutra resources that might help you if you want to get into the Chinese text. Some compendiums of Chinese terms matched up with the sanskrit in the version Kern translated. Its an imperfect resource but can be useful.

Astus wrote:

If I may recommend:

<https://www2.hf.uio.no/polyglotta/index.php?page=volume&vid=483>

https://www.academia.edu/14864159/A_Glossary_of_Dharmarak%E1%B9%A3a_s_Translation_of_the_Lotus_Sutra_%E6%AD%A3%E6%B3%95%E8%8F%AF%E7%B6%93%E8%A9%9E%E5%85%B8

https://www.academia.edu/14864180/A_Glossary_of_Kum%C4%81raj%C4%ABva_s_Translation_of_the_Lotus_Sutra_%E5%A6%99%E6%B3%95%E8%93%AE%E8%8F%AF%E7%B6%93%E8%A9%9E%E5%85%B8

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2017 at 3:10 AM

Title: Re: Primordial Buddha: A Reprise

Content:

Queequeg said:

That thought-moment encompasses the dharmadhatu (as expressed as the 3,000 realms).

Astus wrote:

How is that different from the Huayan idea of interdependence (aside from it narrowing things down to 3000)?

Queequeg said:

The notion of self is the mistake of taking a limited part of the dharmadhatu as the entirety of self. Close examination of that mistaken limitation reveals the error.

Understanding that error completely is liberation from it.

The fact that the 3000 = the thought moment, in reality, means that if examined, everything short of 3000 = the thought moment will ultimately fail. This analysis encompasses both sunyata as well as dependent origination.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean that identifying with the 3000/dharmadhatu as the true "big" self is the solution? How is that not just an exaggerated self-delusion?

Queequeg said:

Zhiyi seems to suggest that the real nature exerts a force against delusion; colloquially, reality has a way of asserting itself whether we like it, or usually, not, and that force is, cast in another light, the Buddha's compassion.

Astus wrote:

The problem with that is its assumption of a natural and necessary liberation. That is contrary to the whole path.

Queequeg said:

The novel approach Zhiyi proposes is the reversing of perspective which is possible because there is no self - no center of the dharmadhatu. That said, anything can thus be taken as the center of the dharmadhatu. Brook Ziporyn calls this "omnicentric holism". Buddhism 101 - frames the issue as its our thirst that keeps the wheel spinning. Cutting the thirst stops the wheel. Zhiyi is suggesting, the dharmadhatu itself is exerting a force against the perpetuation of delusion. Suffering arises from that point of impact, but if we fully embrace that opposition, seek to understand the impact completely, we find that it is also the compassionate force of the Buddha.

Astus wrote:

What is that force exerted by the dharmadhatu against delusion? And if it opposes delusion, then it is not delusion that liberates itself.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2017 at 5:26 AM

Title: Re: Primordial Buddha: A Reprise

Content:

Queequeg said:

Uh, what do you make of the universal prediction of Buddhahood, then? And the Buddha's assertion that he is always leading beings to awakening?

Astus wrote:

It is no different from saying that all beings have buddha-nature. However, having it and realising it are not the same. Since realisation does not happen automatically, there is a need for individual effort. So practically the presence or the absence of a prediction, of a buddha, or of buddha-nature makes no difference.

Queequeg said:

Back to step A. the dharmadhatu=thought-moment. The thing that is acting against the delusion, is actually just part of the thought-moment that has been designated as alien, that part of the dharmadhatu that has been distinguished as other/not self.

Astus wrote:

Delusion is assuming a self. How does the assumption that there are other things besides one's self eliminate the assumption of a self? Also, since distinguishing one thing as self and another thing as not self are mutually dependent, if one half eliminated the other, the whole delusion could never even occur.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2017 at 11:06 PM

Title: Re: Primordial Buddha: A Reprise

Content:

Queequeg said:

1. The prediction does matter... because its actually one of the steps to becoming a Buddha.

Astus wrote:

Yes, it is something that happens for bodhisattvas on the 8th bhumi, not before.

"If one attains deep acceptance of the nonorigination of things,
One will receive the Buddhas' prediction of enlightenment."
(Avatamsaka Sutra, ch 12, p 335, tr Cleary)

Once one gains this patience,
One immediately receives the prediction:
"You will definitely become a buddha."
It is then that one achieves "irreversibility."
(Nagarjuna: http://www.kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/Bsam-Vas_excerpts/Bsam-vas_X-102_X-06.pdf, v 31)

Queequeg said:

This is a declaration that arhats have Buddhanature - a view that is not universally affirmed in Mahayana

Astus wrote:

The last group to challenge universal buddha-nature were those of the <http://www.acmuller.net/yogacara/schools/faxiang.html> school, and that position was not particularly popular even in their best days.

Queequeg said:

If your Buddhanature is not pointed out to you, how do you know you have it and that it is something to develop?

Astus wrote:

Actually, there are sutras that explicitly teach tathagatagarbha, and compared to them, the Lotus Sutra is a rather provisional teaching that may (or may not) imply universal buddha-nature. As it has been mentioned here before, there is a Yogacara commentary on it that explains how the Lotus Sutra is not in favour of tathagatagarbha.

Queequeg said:

2. You're insinuating that I'm talking about Buddhahood without effort. I never made such a statement. That said, Buddhahood is natural and inevitable for all of us. The question is now or later? Or much much later?

Astus wrote:

If it is inevitable, it does not matter what anyone does, and that qualifies for happening without effort, unless the indication is that eventually everybody will want to become a buddha, i.e. gains bodhicitta automatically, again, without effort. Since samsara is without beginning, there had already been a literally infinite time to develop the will for ultimate enlightenment, but apparently it did not happen.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 3rd, 2017 at 1:15 AM

Title: Re: Primordial Buddha: A Reprise

Content:

Queequeg said:

Have you read the Lotus Sutra? The first prediction is Sariputra. Then the rest of the Arhat assembly. Monks, nuns, then Devadatta, the Dragon King's Daughter...

Astus wrote:

And that's how that prediction is in conflict with how prediction of buddhahood is taught elsewhere. If the message is that no matter what, everyone will definitely become a buddha, then that is a view contradicting the meaning of the teaching itself. If it is simply the affirmation that there is the possibility of becoming a buddha, then it is not really a prediction. So, it is more likely just another confirmation of the one vehicle model where sravakas will switch to the bodhisattva path. But that does not mean that everyone possesses a buddha-nature, nor that all beings will necessarily attain buddhahood.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 3rd, 2017 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: Question about processes

Content:

rachmiel said:

Does any process exist independently of mind? Or are all processes -- entities that exist over a period of time rather than in the present moment -- products of human memory/thought connecting dots that aren't connected independently of mind?

I guess this gets into the notion of continuity: Is anything continuous? Does anything flow? Or is continuity/flow an attribute mind adds to actuality? Is reality like a movie: discontinuous frames that appear to run together: this this this this this this? If it is always nothing other than one endless this (now) ... then how can anything actually change, evolve, grow, decay independently of a mind that is imputing these qualities to it?

Astus wrote:

It is good to know a bit of <https://plato.stanford.edu/entries/abhidharma/> first of all, as that defines a number of basic elements of Buddhist teachings. The two relevant concepts here are dharma and moment (kshana). Dharmas are what everything is made of, that is, the seeming reality are all the things and events, while the true reality is only dharmas. One of the elements of the seeming reality is permanence, where something appears to endure for consecutive moments. Therefore, the existence of continuity, of processes, is acceptable only as a worldly view, a mistaken perception of deluded beings. And when we get to Madhyamaka, even the momentary coming and going of dharmas is considered illusory.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 4th, 2017 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Primordial Buddha: A Reprise

Content:

Malcolm said:

Even the afflictions of the mind are naturally pure.

Astus wrote:

"The mind, Mañjuśrī, is empty of a self and what belongs to a self; such is its nature. This is called peace. Thoroughly understanding that the mind is empty, one does not run toward dharmas. Thus it is called utter peace.

Awakening, Mañjuśrī, is by nature luminous, because the mind is by nature luminous; that is why it is said to be luminous by nature. The nature is not afflicted; it is the same as space, it has the nature of space, it goes together with space, it is comparable to space. The nature is utterly luminous."

(<http://read.84000.co/#UT22084-047-002/translation>)

"Where one takes notice, there is defilement, so it has been revealed;

The non-apprehension of I and Mine has been called purification.

But there is herein no one who is defiled or who is cleansed.

Then the Bodhisattva has understood the perfection of wisdom."

(RGSG 22.7, tr Conze)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 4th, 2017 at 5:29 AM

Title: Re: Question about processes

Content:

Wayfarer said:

However, dharmas are the elements or constituents of experience, are they not? That is the sense in which they are different from atoms as conceived by materialists, because atoms are constituents of objects.

Astus wrote:

Yes, dharmas are the elements (or rather categories) of experience, but there are other things (the formations disjunct from mind, i.e. citta-viprayukta-saṃskāra 心不相應行) called dharmas as well, for instance the "sentence/phrase" (padakāya 句身) is a dharma in the Sautrantika and the Yogacara systems, just as "speed/swiftness" (jāva 勢速) and "acquirement/obtainment" (prāpti 得).

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 5th, 2017 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: Differences between Tibetan and Zen Buddhism other than Vajrayana practices?

Content:

hyperpuppy said:

So with these different doctrines making it to different cultures, what would you say are the biggest differences that came out of that that make Tibetan sutrayana significantly different from East Asian teachings?

Astus wrote:

Tibetans focus more on treatises, where the basis are Indian works further explained by Tibetan commentators. E.g. the Chariot of the Dakpo Kagyu Siddhas is the VIII Karmapa commentary on the Madhyamakavatara (part of it translated as <http://www.shambhala.com/the-moon-of-wisdom-2693.html>, and a summary by the IX Karmapa as <http://www.shambhala.com/the-karmapa-s-middle-way.html>). Because of taking Vajrayana as the direct and practical way, it is a common view that sutrayana studies are only a theoretical matter.

East Asian Buddhism focuses more on the sutras and use treatises of East Asian origin. For instance, one of the primary sources of Prajnaparamita study in Korean Buddhism is the <http://www.acmuller.net/articles/ogahae-oxford.html> that contains five commentaries on the Diamond Sutra (by Zongmi, Huineng, Fu Dashi, Yefu Daochuan, and Yuzhang Zongjing) collected and commented on by Gihwa. Reading, reciting, copying, memorising, and contemplating sutras are important and common practices that not only generate merit but also wisdom.

So, the differences between the two are not only exegetical but also substantial. That is, different scriptures studied in different ways.

hyperpuppy said:

When it comes to meditation, I seem to do better focusing on a leaf or doing loving-kindness meditation (Tibetan center) than watching my breath (Korean temple).

Astus wrote:

You can use other objects of meditation in Korean Buddhism as well.

hyperpuppy said:

I do find some of the more mystical-sounding aspects of the Tibetan beliefs difficult. I'm willing to admit that I don't know everything, and willing to be convinced, but at this point I do find some of it pretty difficult to believe.

Astus wrote:

May not have encountered them yet, but East Asian Buddhism has practically as many "mystical-sounding aspects" as Tibetan Buddhism.

hyperpuppy said:

I like the more structured nature of the Tibetan training.

Astus wrote:

That can be an important element, since structured education is usually restricted to Buddhist universities in East Asia (see e.g.

http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/bbs/board.php?bo_table=0010&wr_id=154&page=35, although for instance <http://www.kwanumzen.org/wp-content/uploads/DT-Training-Guide1.pdf> are supposed to be familiar with a number of basic teachings, I don't know if there is actually any form of training there for them.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 8th, 2017 at 6:33 PM

Title: Re: Shikantaza and Mahamudra

Content:

passel said:

I have a strong hunch Kobun Chino practiced some mahamudra, and in China, Garma Chang, CM Chen, Nan-Huai Chin and Yin Shi Zi all did at least a bit. Sheng yen also seems to have had some exposure to it and refers to it a little in his books.

Astus wrote:

John Crook, a disciple of Sheng-yen, did practise and teach Mahamudra. Anzan Hoshin of the WWZC has also published a Mahamudra manual. On the other side, Ken McLeod implemented some Zen teachings into his courses.

passel said:

One real tangible benefit of mahamudra is that it preserves a whole body of very practical, explicit instruction that is hard to come by in western zen contexts. It absolutely exists in non western zen, but it gets lost in translation.

Astus wrote:

Do you have examples? It seems to me Zen - not just Soto - is intentionally without gradual instructions, although this is apparently not understood by many nowadays. One can actually find a good amount of them in the works of Zhiyi and others. It is no accident that one of the first zazen manuals (that was eventually used by Dogen to compose his own) refers one to other works: "as it is explained in the Śūramgama-sūtra, in the Tiantai Practice of Śamatha and Vipāśyanā (Tiantai zhiguanfamen) by Zhiyi (538–597), and in the Manual of Practice and Realization (Xiuzhengyi) by Guifeng (Zongmi, 780–841)." (Baizhang Zen Monastic Regulations, BDK ed, p 257)

passel said:

The mahamudra instructions can really give you something to work with on a sesshin, though, that zen instructions may not.

Astus wrote:

It sounds somewhat misguided to go to a Soto sesshin and try to use Mahamudra teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 8th, 2017 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: Retroactivity of Awakening

Content:

Astus wrote:

Two basic terms would need to be clarified first: what is awakening and what one is awakened to. And the simplest answer seems to be that awakening is the removal of defilements and one is awakened to emptiness. Then the solution to the original question is that there is a point in time when defilements are removed, while the truth of emptiness is valid at any time.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2017 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: Question about processes

Content:

rachmiel said:

the extent to which the process of me that I feel is so real is or is not actually real.

Astus wrote:

Whatever one feels is a feeling, a thought. Both feelings and thoughts are impermanent. One moment it's there, in the next moment one is thinking about breakfast. But what can keep one circling about an idea is this assumption that it is meaningful, it is real, it is important. And this superimposition of existence is the ignorance that results in dissatisfaction. Like in this case of searching for certainty.

rachmiel said:

Do I exist in relation to what has come before and is likely to come after? Am I a slice of a continuous process, evolution? Or am I just this, then this, then this, this, this, this ... and the continuous process I feel just the product of a perfervid imagination connecting dots that are, in actuality, not connected?

Astus wrote:

Even the dot of the present moment is a product of imagination, how much more a whole line connecting millions of illusory dots.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2017 at 7:38 AM

Title: Re: Question about processes

Content:

rachmiel said:

If I drop a glass, and it falls ... am I merely imagining a faux-process of a glass falling? Or am I experiencing a real process as "filtered" through my visual system?

Astus wrote:

Let's analyse this a bit. "If I drop a glass"

if - that is already hypothetical, so it's clearly imagined

I - there is no substantial self to be found, so it is imagined drop - without a self there can be no agent, and without an agent there can be no action, so it is imagined a - no singular entity can be identified, so it is imagined glass - what is called a glass is an assembly of components, but when the components are analysed as well, there is nothing substantial found, so it is imagined

If your question is whether there are real things beyond one's experience or not, that is a question based on an unfounded idea, since it is impossible to relate to anything that is not experienced.

If your question is whether time/process is made of distinct moments or not, then since neither past nor future exists, and the present cannot be identified as anything whatsoever, neither processes nor moments can really exist.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2017 at 6:20 PM

Title: Re: Question about processes

Content:

rachmiel said:

Afaiu this is pretty much what Kant said about phenomena (experience) and noumena (real things). Any talk of noumena is purely speculative. For all we know noumena (if they exist) are in themselves so utterly alien to our sensorium and brains that our wildest imaginations don't come anywhere near close to being able to "envision" them. And, as Magister Ludi said: "Whereof one cannot speak, thereof one must be silent." I guess I'm prone to not taking his advice!

Astus wrote:

However, there is a very important difference here between the philosophies of Kant (and Husserl), and Buddhism. The reason Buddhism focuses on personal experience in the form of the five aggregates and six sensory areas, or simply consciousness, is because that's where attachments occur, that's where the views of I and my occur, and that's where suffering occurs. It is not a question about "what is real?", it is the question about "how to attain liberation from suffering?". In Buddhist doctrine there is nothing else beyond experience, there are no noumena, only phenomena.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2017 at 7:23 PM

Title: Re: Question about processes

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I generally agree with you, and was going to make a similar point, but I'm a bit hesitant about 'nothing else beyond experience'. I would like to think Buddhist terms such as dharmadhatu and dharmakaya denote a higher reality and not simply the 'absence of experience'; not something phenomenal, but also not nothing.

Astus wrote:

A valid issue, since normally nirvana is considered a different category, an uncompounded dharma. The reason I say that there is only experience is twofold. On the one hand, awakening is a temporary experience. On the other, there is no emptiness, no dharmadhatu, no nirvana separate from experiences, since it is the nature of experiences. Positing any reality outside of the realm of experiences means that it cannot be experienced, nor can ever be known or used, consequently it is nothing more than an irrelevant and baseless assumption.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2017 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: Question about processes

Content:

rachmiel said:

Because the doctrine serves the singleminded goal of ending suffering, and going into that which might or might not lie beyond phenomena was thought by the Buddha to work against this goal.

Astus wrote:

Not exactly. Although it is true that one should not lose sight of the goal, it doesn't mean that there is some general aversion towards philosophical questions. In fact, one could say that Buddhism represents the highest philosophy, according to Buddhists of course.

rachmiel said:

if what you're after is "the truth" ... consequences be damned! ... Buddhist doctrine will only take you so far.

Astus wrote:

Buddhism is the truth, the Dharma.

rachmiel said:

Are there Buddhist philosophers who have explored the realm of that which might lie beyond phenomena/experience? If so, are they seen as rebellious upstart delusional hippie kooks by traditional Buddhists?

Astus wrote:

Buddhists debated with almost everyone else all over Asia, so they did argue against such ideas like the creator, the ultimate self, the ultimate matter, fate, etc. In other words, those who assume to know something beyond phenomena are simply wrong, mistaken, and deluded.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2017 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: Question about processes

Content:

rachmiel said:

Hasn't it been argued that by refusing to answer the famed 10/14 metaphysical questions, Buddha was either hiding part of the truth or shutting the door to open inquiry into it ... presumably for soteriological reasons?

Astus wrote:

You might want to read some teachings from the <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/index.html#sn44> where it becomes clear that they are undeclared basically because they are question based on false premises, and such premises are refuted through the teachings of no-self and dependent origination.

In the <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn56/sn56.031.than.html> the Buddha says that he did not teach everything he knows, because he taught only what is conducive to liberation. However, it should not be misinterpreted, as if metaphysics had somehow been excluded, but one should consider all sorts of knowledge here, like agriculture, military, arts, literature, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2017 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Shikantaza and Mahamudra

Content:

Matylda said:

In the past it was done for political reasons as we see the history of Buddhist religious institutions in different countries.. there was much to gain.. power and property. But today it is rather an expression of emotional confusion, it does not reflect understanding dharma...

All, zen, mahamudra, dzogchen, tantra, theravada serve people seeking liberation.. we should respect them highly, and give no ear to any criticism...

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2017 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: Question about processes

Content:

rachmiel said:

this "No-one no-thing is ultimately behind the curtain" view might just turn my cozy little world completely upside down.

Astus wrote:

"Illusion-like are all dharmas,

Yet the illusion itself cannot be found."

(<http://read.84000.co/#UT22084-047-002/translation>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 10th, 2017 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: Question about processes

Content:

rachmiel said:

Is there no solace in Buddhism ... no "happily ever after" ... not even any ground on which to firmly plant your feet?

Astus wrote:

Abiding in any appearance is samsara.

"Not to dwell anywhere or on anything means not to dwell on good or evil, existence or non-existence, within or without or on the middle, nor on concentration nor dispersion, and neither to dwell on the void nor on the non-void. This is the meaning of "not dwelling anywhere or on anything". Just this alone is real abiding. This stage of achievement is also the non-abiding Mind, and the non-abiding Mind is the Buddha Mind."

(<http://ymba.org/books/entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment/treatise-entering- tao-sudden-enlightenment>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 10th, 2017 at 3:48 AM

Title: Re: Question about processes

Content:

rachmiel said:

Astus, what does this mean: "Just this alone is real abiding." ?

Astus wrote:

Preceding the previously quoted section:

Q: Where does the mind dwell in its real abode?

A: Dwelling nowhere is its real abode.

Q: What is dwelling nowhere?

A: It is the mind not dwelling anywhere or on anything.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 10th, 2017 at 5:59 AM

Title: Re: Question about processes

Content:

Wayfarer said:

the notion that 'awakening is a temporary experience' doesn't actually square with the teachings in some important respects

Astus wrote:

In what respects? Awakening happens as a result of the path, and it happens only once.

Wayfarer said:

'Come to the end of craving' is nowhere described in terms of 'a temporary experience'.

Astus wrote:

It can only end once, not any more. That is quite temporary.

Wayfarer said:

How is that different from naturalism or positivism? And where does 'the unborn, the uncreated, the unfabricated' stand in relation to phenomenal domain?

Astus wrote:

Appearances themselves are unborn, uncreated, unfabricated.

"Observing all things

To be without inherent existence,

Whatever their appearances of origin and disappearance,

Being just provisional descriptions ,

All things are unborn,

All things are imperishable:

To one who can understand this

The Buddha will always be manifest.

The nature of things is fundamentally empty and null,

With no grasping and no vision.

The emptiness of inherent nature is Buddha;

It cannot be assessed in thought.

If one knows the inherent nature

Of all things is like this,

This person will not be affected

By any afflictions .

Ordinary people seeing things

Just pursue the forms

And don't realize things are formless:

Because of this they don't see Buddha."

(Flower Ornament Scripture, ch 14, p 373)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 11th, 2017 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: The doctrine of no-self - teaching device or metaphysical truth?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The teaching of no-self is that of the explicit (nitārtha) and ultimate truth (paramarthasatya). So, in terms of teachings, it could not really be clearer that it is a truth of the highest category. At the same time, the reason some might be reluctant to be too affirmative, is because even the correct view, when grasped at, is a hindrance.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 12th, 2017 at 5:41 AM

Title: Re: What are the Difference between Arhats, Pratyekabuddha, Bodhisattvas and Buddhas?

Content:

kirtu said:

Southern School practitioners do however see Arhatship and Praetyakabuddhahood as full buddhhood.

Astus wrote:

Theravada maintains the difference between arhatship and buddhahood in terms of abilities. While Mahayana also agrees that arhats are free from samsara, just like buddhas.

It is more interesting to consider that with the teaching of buddhahood in this life, the difference between arhats and buddhas practically disappears.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 14th, 2017 at 11:37 PM

Title: Re: What are the Difference between Arhats, Pratyekabuddha, Bodhisattvas and Buddhas?

Content:

thecowisflying said:

How so?

Astus wrote:

In brief, the buddha-bodies and abilities are identified with the nature of mind, thus no need for all the magical displays normally attributed to buddhas.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 14th, 2017 at 11:45 PM

Title: Re: zen is hard or easy, for a lot or few ?

Content:

Astus wrote:

One day, while the Layman was meditating in his sitting hut, he suddenly cried out, "It's hard, hard, hard! And I've put ten coats of linseed oil on this platform, too!"

His wife said, "It's easy, easy, easy! Just turn your eyes to the floor, lower your feet to it, and be on your way!"

Ling-chao said, "It's neither hard nor easy! The mind of the Patriarchs is in every blade of grass!"

(The Sayings of Layman P'ang, p 113, tr James Green)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2017 at 2:11 AM

Title: Re: zen is hard or easy, for a lot or few ?

Content:

mansurhirbi87 said:

i guess i should be more precise : do you think is it the best way for everybody. it looks like to me that it's hard and for few people

Astus wrote:

Few people care hard enough to bother to comprehend the very simple teaching of Zen. So the rest remain confused.

The closing paragraph of Huangbo's Essentials of the Transmission of Mind (from Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 42):

Make effort! Make effort! Of the thousand or ten thousand people in this school, only three or five [have really understood Buddhism]. If you do not take this seriously then you will suffer for it eventually (lit., "there will be a day when you experience a calamity"). Therefore it is said, "Be diligent in taking care of this life, and how could you suffer misfortune in eons to come?"

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2017 at 4:23 AM

Title: Re: if we are Buddhas are we the 3 Kayas

Content:

Minobu said:

but is it possible if we are Buddhas our Sambhogakaya body could be guiding us. guiding us....using the Dharma kaya body to aid in Samsara to put things in our path ...thoughts, and such...maybe a new teacher...maybe finding a site online from which to learn from...We are not Nirmana kaya obviously but if Buddhas see only Buddhas what are they seeing in this Samsaric realm.

Astus wrote:

Ignorance is what guides beings, that's how they're stuck in samsara. This is what the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Twelve_Nid%C4%81nas of dependent origination show us.

There is no outer force or entity that can manipulate a being's karma. Accepting such an external influence nullifies the meaning of karma and the path of liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2017 at 4:26 AM

Title: Re: zen is hard or easy, for a lot or few ?

Content:

mansurhirbi87 said:

1 - What means : "The mind of the Patriarchs is in every blade of grass!" in you first quotation ?

Astus wrote:

The truth is ubiquitous, all appearances are already such.

mansurhirbi87 said:

2- be diligent would be a condition to not suffer in the eons to come ? Did i get correctly your second quotation ?

Astus wrote:

Yes. If one is diligent now and gains insight, then the cause of future suffering is removed.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2017 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: if we are Buddhas are we the 3 Kayas

Content:

DGA said:

I'm reminded of the parable of the herbs in the Lotus Sutra, where Buddha Shakyamuni explains that he is always guiding beings to Buddhahood.

Astus wrote:

Supposing that there is such a guidance makes no difference, as it's still up to each person to cultivate the way. In other words, a defiled mind sees only a defiled world.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2017 at 7:46 AM

Title: Re: if we are Buddhas are we the 3 Kayas

Content:

Minobu said:

if we are all Buddhas...can i communicate with my Sambhogakaya Body ?

Astus wrote:

I think the meaning of sambhogakaya is somewhat unclear in that question. Sambhoga means enjoyment, it is the resultant pleasure of the infinite merits accumulated over the bodhisattva path, and it is the form of a buddha that appears for bodhisattvas only, that is, how buddhas are encountered in meditation. As for the other meaning, as the awareness quality of the nature of mind, it is present in every being, so if you want to communicate with it, you can do that the moment you stop pursuing concepts.

Minobu said:

but if we are the Buddha ,Buddha sees us to be...

Astus wrote:

An ordinary object can be seen in many ways by different people, or even by one person. And just because one sees an orange as tasty, it doesn't mean that another sees the same way. A buddha sees beings as buddhas, but beings see a buddha as a being.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 16th, 2017 at 5:16 AM

Title: Re: Shinran Shonin: "There is no Buddha apart from the mind."

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

So far on this forum, I've quoted Shinran and commentators of his work in saying that Amida is the primordial Buddha in the work of Shinran. At this point, would it help if I quoted the Monshu himself?

Astus wrote:

If Amida is the primordial buddha in the works of Shinran, please prove that by a few quotes from the works of Shinran himself.

Dharma Flower said:

Even if Shinran himself doesn't use the term "primordial Buddha," the article from Alfred Bloom that I've quoted above proves everything I've been saying regarding Amida being the Eternal Buddha in Shinran's writings.

Astus wrote:

It does not prove that Shinran taught that, it only shows that there is at least one person who interprets it that way. That is a big difference.

But to give an orthodox answer on the matter, here is what the <http://www.nembutsu.info/standard/amida.htm> has to say on the matter:

"Amida Buddha is a Sambhogakaya; he established forty-eight vows and by his practice, brought them to consummation, and attained Buddhahood."

"Dharmakaya absolutely transcends space and time. It cannot be grasped through man's senses; it exists beyond human conception, words, and intellection. Religion, however, requires something closer to humanity; something more concrete. And that concrete manifestation is the Sambhogakaya known as Amida Buddha in Shinshu."

Dharma Flower said:

I don't expect non-Shinshu Buddhists to agree with the teachings of Shinran or to convert away from their school or sect.

Astus wrote:

Shinran's teaching is very simple and straightforward, not complicated at all: if one has faith, one attains birth. The only arguable matter in that for other Mahayana followers is whether faith is sufficient for that or not.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 17th, 2017 at 6:16 PM

Title: Re: "I am God" sentiments and Sambhogakāya

Content:

Coëmgenu said:

Is it possible that certain ascetics and spiritualists ... are able to perceive a portion of their Buddha-nature

Astus wrote:

No. This is a misinterpretation of what buddha-nature is, thinking of it as if it were some sort of state, entity, or soul.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 17th, 2017 at 7:19 PM

Title: Re: "I am God" sentiments and Sambhogakāya

Content:

Coëmgenu said:

I am assuming an incomplete and imperfect revelation of Buddha-nature, as per DN 1

Astus wrote:

That is not a revelation of buddha-nature, but the delusion of Brahma. Not only outsiders and ordinary beings do not see anything of buddha-nature, but even sravakas and beginner bodhisattvas have nothing to do with it. See what the Nirvana Sutra (tr Yamamoto) says on the matter:

"O good man! Such Bodhisattvas may well reach the stage of the ten soils, and yet they cannot clearly see the Buddha-Nature. How could sravakas and pratyekabuddhas well see [it]?"

(ch 12, p 110)

"O good man! If a Bodhisattva abides in the ninth soil, he sees that a thing has a nature. Because of this view of the world, he does not see the Buddha-Nature. If the Buddha-Nature is seen, there will be no seeing of a nature in any thing. When he practises this samadhi of the All-Void, he does not see any nature in all things. As he does not see this, he sees the Buddha-Nature."

(ch 32, p 361)

"All beings journey along with the 12 links of interdependence, which they do not see or know. Not seeing or knowing, there is no ending and no beginning. The Bodhisattvas of the stage of the ten abodes see only the end, but they do not see the beginning. The All-Buddha-World-Honoured One sees the beginning and the end. Thus do all Buddhas clearly see the Buddha-Nature.

O good man! All beings are unable to see the 12 links of interdependence. Therefore, they ride on the wheel of transmigration. O good man! Just as the silkworm makes a cocoon, gains birth, and dies by itself, so do things proceed with all beings. As they do not see the Buddha-Nature, they generate karma out of defilement and repeat births and deaths, just as a person bounces a ball. O good man! That is why I say in the sutra: "One who sees the 12 links of interdependence sees Dharma; one who sees Dharma sees the Buddha. "The Buddha is none other than the Buddha-Nature." "Why so? Because all Buddhas make this their own nature."

(ch 33, p 369)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 17th, 2017 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: "I am God" sentiments and Sambhogakāya

Content:

Coëmgenu said:

And I am wondering if such an incomplete/lacking realization, as per DN1, or at least my understanding thereof, can be conducive to "Brahma-delusions".

Astus wrote:

Are you asking if believing oneself to be some sort of deity can result in a birth as that deity? Then the answer is likely that belief in itself is insufficient, one needs more than faith to establish the relevant causes (e.g. the four immeasurables, aka. brahma-viharas).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 17th, 2017 at 7:50 PM

Title: Re: "I am God" sentiments and Sambhogakāya

Content:

Coëmgenu said:

No, I am asking if there is precedent in Buddhavacana or oral teachings that an ascetic of high attainment can mistake his own Buddha-nature, or more particularly his latent sambhogakāya, for divinity, and proclaim that his is "God/Brahma", out of delusion.

Astus wrote:

In a sense everyone mistakes buddha-nature for one's self, because the nature of mind is buddha-nature. But as long as one's view of the mind is mistaken, it is not seeing the buddha-nature, but seeing a self. So the sixth song of the <http://keithdowman.net/books/flight-of-the-garuda.html> says:

"Mind", this universal concept, this most significant of words, being no single entity, manifests as the gamut of pleasure and pain in samsara and nirvana. There are as many beliefs about it as there are approaches to Buddhahood. It has innumerable synonyms. In the vernacular it is "I"; some Hindus call it "the Self"; the Disciples say "self-less individual"; the followers of Mind-only call it simply "mind"; some call it "perfect insight"; some call it "Buddha-nature"; some call it "the Magnificent Stance" (Mahamudra); some call it "the Middle Way"; some call it "the cosmic seed"; some call it "the reality-continuum"; some call it "the universal ground"; some call it "ordinary consciousness". Since the synonyms of "mind", the labels we apply to it, are countless, know it for what it really is.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 20th, 2017 at 6:25 PM

Title: Re: Question about processes

Content:

rachmiel said:

The difference is that I, via memory and thought, connect these discontinuous ephemeral objects into a continuous persistent story — I, the world, the flow of time, the process — that I take to be the true nature of reality, whereas the enlightened person doesn't.

Astus wrote:

The difference is in identification, in attachment. If an enlightened person could not comprehend processes that would mean he'd be unable to function as a living being. The contemplation of rise and fall and of momentariness are meant to eliminate the false assumptions of permanence.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 21st, 2017 at 1:28 AM

Title: Re: Question about processes

Content:

rachmiel said:

It pretty much always comes down to attachment (grasping/aversion) doesn't it?

Astus wrote:

"The Supreme Way is difficult

Only for those who pick and choose.

Simply let go of love and hate;

The Way will fully reveal itself."

(http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enUS/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=143&Itemid=57)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 21st, 2017 at 2:15 AM

Title: Re: Quickie on the nature of "I"

Content:

rachmiel said:

Awareness of an experience (i.e. knowing subjectively the "experience" of the experience) rises and falls co-dependently with the experience itself?

Astus wrote:

This answers the question:

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn35/sn35.093.than.html>

Consciousness and its object are mutually dependent, hence the six types of consciousnesses in Buddhism. Also, when there is nothing that one is conscious of, that is the absence of consciousness, and if that were called consciousness, then unconsciousness is consciousness.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 21st, 2017 at 4:32 AM

Title: Re: Quickie on the nature of "I"

Content:

rachmiel said:

Kills it! Exactly what I was looking for.

Astus wrote:

There are quite a few teachings like that from the Buddha, as it's a standard description of the 18 dhatus.

Look at this one too:

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn35/sn35.193.than.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 21st, 2017 at 4:37 AM

Title: Re: Question about processes

Content:

rachmiel said:

It takes 10 seconds to understand the logic behind not getting caught in preferring this vs. that. It takes years, decades, lives to live this understanding.

Astus wrote:

Fortunately there is a path to do that.

As for how attachment is the problem:

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn35/sn35.191.than.html>,

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn35/sn35.115.than.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 21st, 2017 at 6:18 AM

Title: Re: Quickie on the nature of "I"

Content:

Wayfarer said:

To extend the analogy - it's not that there is no heartwood, but that it's not to be found in the six sense spheres, any more than heartwood is to be found in a banana tree.

Astus wrote:

That is an incorrect extension on the analogy. It assumes that there is a seventh sense, but there is no such thing.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 21st, 2017 at 8:01 AM

Title: Re: Quickie on the nature of "I"

Content:

Wayfarer said:

What do you think the import of 'heartwood' is? Why is it part of the analogy?

Astus wrote:

It represents the assumption of a real, solid, inner self that is behind all experiences.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 21st, 2017 at 5:21 PM

Title: Re: Quickie on the nature of "I"

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I don't read it that way, I read it as: 'don't search for what is of value where it's not to be found'. Don't search for the heartwood of a banana tree, as there isn't any. But doesn't mean there isn't heartwood.

Astus wrote:

And where is that heartwood, where is that self, if not in the five aggregates and six sensory realms?

Wayfarer said:

There are negative and positive approaches to Nirvāṇa, and the negative approach is preponderant in many scriptures. But there also are positive descriptions of Nirvāṇa as blissful, at peace, released. But that is not to assert a 'solid inner self behind all experiences', which was the idea of 'eternalism', but what is beyond existence and non-existence.

Astus wrote:

Nirvana means the extinction of craving, the extinction of attachment. One can rightly call it the ultimate peace and happiness. But as long as one conceives that there is a self somewhere, or that there is a special realm of nirvana, craving and attachment remains.

Wayfarer said:

As the Aspiration Prayer of Mahamudra states: It is not existent--even the Victorious Ones do not see it.

It is not nonexistent--it is the basis of all samsara and nirvana.

This is not a contradiction, but the middle path of unity.

Astus wrote:

That is nothing other than "form is emptiness, emptiness is form", that is, the aggregates appear (existent) without self (non-existent). To give a comparison, in Buddhism there are the five aggregates and there is no core, no self to find anywhere, while in Vedanta there are the five sheaths and beyond them there is a self to be found.

As for the Mahamudra view, it does not teach anything different from what is taught in Madhyamaka. And especially it does not teach anything like Vedanta that assumes a core, a self.

Here is Chokyi Nyima's commentary to clarify:

All phenomena are the illusory display of mind.

Mind is devoid of 'mind' - empty of any entity.

Empty and yet unceasing, it manifests as anything whatsoever.

The view is that the essence of mind is empty. What we usually call 'mind' is that which thinks, feels and conceives all different kinds of ideas about everything. In the second line, devoid of mind means that mind is without concreteness; no shape, color or material substance can be found. Saying that the essence of mind is empty means that it cannot be established as existent. However, it is not blank nothingness like space. While empty in essence, it still manifests unceasingly and unobstructedly in multifarious ways.

(Song of Karmapa, p 58)

It is not existent since even the victorious ones do not see it.

It is not nonexistent since it is the basis of samsara and nirvana.

When we try to examine our mind, what do we find? We do not find a 'thing' which we can think of or perceive. Beyond being an object of investigation it is not existent, and therefore lies beyond the extreme of existence, of eternalism. But on the other hand, we have various sorts of feelings and thoughts, as well as our sense organs, which link objects and consciousness together. Different sense perceptions occur; we see forms, hear sounds and so forth. So because of perception, mind is not nonexistent. In this way the extreme of the mind as a complete nothing is also avoided.

Usually we perceive our world as very real and concrete, full of mountains and houses and roads. Our habit of holding on in this way makes the world seem very solid. But if we closely examine our perceptions, we find that experience occurs, yet it is devoid of any selfentity. In other words, the mind is beyond the extremes of both existence and nonexistence.

...

Mind is not existent since even the perfectly enlightened ones, the buddhas who see everything in the three times distinctly and precisely, have not seen it as being a concrete thing of a certain size, color or shape. Therefore we cannot say that the mind exists. But as the basis of samsara and nirvana, in the sense that its nature is to manifest perception, thoughts and feelings, we cannot say it is nonexistent.
(p 65-66)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 21st, 2017 at 8:37 PM

Title: Re: Quickie on the nature of "I"

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I don't think the heartwood is 'a self', but it is 'that which is not subject to arising and ceasing'.

Astus wrote:

Is there such a thing that does not arise and cease?

Wayfarer said:

Phenomena are dependently-arisen, but dependently arisen is not the same as non-existent. That I take to be the 'middle way'.

Astus wrote:

Nobody said that dependent origination is non-existent. Dependent origination is exactly what phenomena arising and ceasing means. In other words, there is no unchanging element anywhere.

Wayfarer said:

What does 'it' refer to?

Astus wrote:

It refers to mind. And mind is dependently originated.

Wayfarer said:

It is not self, but it is also not nothing. No thing \neq nothing.

Astus wrote:

Again, there are the aggregates, there are the six sensory realms, and they are dependently originated. It is not nothing, and nobody said that it is. And just like a banana tree, the aggregates are without a core, without anything independent.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 22nd, 2017 at 5:53 AM

Title: Re: Quickie on the nature of "I"

Content:

Wayfarer said:

But there is 'the unconditioned, the unbornd, the unmade', which doesn't arise and cease. ... the extinction of desire (rāgakkhayo) the extinction of hatred (dosakkhayo), the extinction of illusion (mohakkhayo)

Astus wrote:

It is the extinction of the three poisons that is called the unconditioned. It is not a new state or being, but simply the end of attachment. However, this ending, this absence is no different from other kinds of absences in being unconditioned, hence cessation without analysis (apratisaṃkhyā-nirodha) is counted among unconditioned dharmas.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 22nd, 2017 at 6:40 PM

Title: Re: Quickie on the nature of "I"

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Wayfarer is wary of nihilist readings of Mahāyāna.

Astus wrote:

What readings are those exactly? As I see it, saying that "appearances are empty" is the most positive message ever. That is because it eliminates the duality of conventional and ultimate reality. As long as an ultimate is proposed separately from appearances, one maintains an alienated approach that tries to get rid of everything except one, and that is indeed nihilistic.

Wayfarer said:

I read here on this forum, the saying that 'Samsara has no beginning, but it has an end. Nirvāṇa has no end, but it has a beginning'.
Is that an authentic saying?

Astus wrote:

Yes, in the sense that a being is bound to samsara (no beginning) until liberation is attained (end), and once one is free (beginning) one stays free indefinitely (no end). That is similar to someone who has no children, so the person's ancestors go back in time indefinitely, but once the person is dead there is no more continuation of the lineage any more.

No, in the sense that "The realm of sentient beings is the dharma body; the dharma body is the realm of sentient beings." (<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra14.html>), that is, nirvana and samsara are not two different things, all appearances are originally unborn.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 22nd, 2017 at 8:14 PM

Title: Re: Quickie on the nature of "I"

Content:

Wayfarer said:

your other statements might be interpreted to mean that 'ultimately there is no Nirvāṇa'

Astus wrote:

There is no nirvana, nor samsara. But, as Dushun begins his discussion of the Flower Ornament Meditation:

"So first it is necessary to strike down conceptual attachments; only then can you enter complete illumination. If anyone sees immediately that all things, like material form, come from conditions, this is at once the conditional origination of the universe-it is no longer necessary to use the preceding techniques. But those who are not able to enter this stage directly should start from the beginning and proceed to the end, questioning everything one by one, to bring about the cessation of confusion and the end of delusion, to eliminate things, cut off words, see the essential nature, and bring about understanding-only then can this be considered getting the meaning."

(Entry Into the Inconceivable, p 62)

It is the goal of every Buddhist school to provide a path to liberation, and that path has various stages. And it can be difficult for a while to see how the teachings on emptiness and no-self can be anything but nihilistic. So the Astasahasrika (tr Conze) says:

"A Bodhisattva who does not become afraid when this deep and perfect wisdom is being taught should be recognized as not lacking in perfect wisdom, as standing at the irreversible stage of Bodhisattva, standing firmly, in consequence of not taking his stand anywhere."

(1.2)

and

"The Bodhisattvas who have newly set out in the vehicle should beware of being afraid when they have heard this exposition."

(6.3)

And the http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html:

"You should know that if someone hears the teaching of this scripture and is neither shocked, afraid, or alarmed, this person is extremely rare."

(ch 14)

Wayfarer said:

But, in the absence of that non-dual perspective, declaring that Nirvāṇa and samsara are the same, results in a flattening or collapse of the perspective. It amounts to saying that the ordinary state is the only state there is. That is why I had been told it amounts to 'discarding the ladder before it's been climbed'.

Astus wrote:

One learns the non-dual perspective through contemplating the inseparability of samsara and nirvana. After all, even "non-duality" is still a conventional concept. And you are right in saying that grasping at the idea of aimlessness incorrectly is detrimental to one's progress. But that shouldn't stop one to grasp it correctly.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 23rd, 2017 at 7:56 AM

Title: Re: Quickie on the nature of "I"

Content:

Wayfarer said:

to say there is 'no Nirvāṇa or samsara' seems to reject the whole basis of the path.

Surely the path is no longer needed by those who have crossed it, but just as surely that doesn't apply to most of us.

Astus wrote:

Do you also object to saying that there is no self? Because it is really the same. It could be reasoned that since there is no self, there is nobody to attain anything, so there is no path. However, the teaching of no self is meant to be learnt, understood, and realised, and that is how one can actually walk the path.

"'Buddha,' Bodhisattva,' 'perfect wisdom,' all these are mere words. And what they denote is something uncreated. It is as with the self. Although we speak of a 'self,' yet absolutely the self is something uncreated. Since therefore all dharmas are without ownbeing, what is that form, etc., which cannot be seized, and which is something uncreated? Thus the fact that all dharmas are without own-being is the same as the fact that they are uncreated."

(Astasahasrika 1.6, tr Conze)

Wayfarer said:

I think 'the uncompounded' or 'unfabricated' signifies a reality. When it is said 'there is an unborn, an unconditioned, were there no unborn, there would be no escape from the born, the conditioned' - I take this to be a true statement. Do you think it's not a true statement?

Astus wrote:

Uncompounded means emptiness, the absence of essence, the absence of self. Realising no self is how nirvana is attained, because that is when all attachments are eliminated. And as it is taught everywhere, all dharmas are without self, there has never been a self ever. This absence of self is not something beyond appearances, but appearances themselves are without a self. To propose that there are compounded appearances on one side and uncompounded emptiness on the other side, as if they were two separate realities, is tantamount to saying that compounded objects are self.

Wayfarer said:

What progress is required, if we are already arrived?

Astus wrote:

Has anything ever been permanent? No, things are already impermanent as they are. That doesn't mean one does not need to learn, understand, and realise impermanence.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 23rd, 2017 at 7:01 PM

Title: Re: Quickie on the nature of "I"

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Well, that's what I'm wrestling with! This is why I am having the problem with nihilist interpretations.

Astus wrote:

It's still unclear what you call a nihilist interpretation. Neither conventional reality, nor dependent origination is denied. In fact, the only thing denied is an independent, self-sustaining permanent existence.

Wayfarer said:

I don't believe that 'anatta' means 'there is no self'. It means 'nothing is self'.

Astus wrote:

What is the difference? If nothing is a unicorn, there is no unicorn.

Wayfarer said:

'Emptiness' doesn't mean 'nothing exists'. It means everything exists contingently, or dependently.

Astus wrote:

There is no disagreement on that.

Wayfarer said:

But emptiness is not non-existence. Emptiness means, things (and self) neither exist, nor don't exist.

Astus wrote:

That sounds problematic. Emptiness, as a realisation, is none of the four propositions, because it is non-conceptual, and non-conceptual means not grasping, not identifying with any view as ultimate.

Wayfarer said:

If we deny the reality of self, samsara, Nirvāṇa, and appearances, then nothing is real, which is what 'nihilism' means - 'nihil' means 'nothing'. It is the opposite problem to 'eternalism'.

Astus wrote:

The two extreme views are eternalism (śāśvatavāda) and annihilationism (ucchedavāda). Eternalism stands for the view that something persists from one moment to another. Annihilationism stands for the view that something ceases to exist from one moment to another. The middle way is the teaching of dependent origination, where apparent phenomena lack substance. So, as above, nobody says that there is nothing, hence it is unclear what you call nihilism.

Wayfarer said:

As for 'all attachments being eliminated', that is not just a verbal formulation but an existential reality.

Astus wrote:

So it is.

Wayfarer said:

I have a mortgage, a dog, a wife, house, bills to pay, attachments aplenty. I would imagine that eliminating such attachments would constitute renunciation of those attachments.

Astus wrote:

Attachments are not in the object. And this is where the teaching of the unity of samsara and nirvana becomes a very practical matter.

Wayfarer said:

Now as for myself, I know that I don't perceive from that perspective.

Astus wrote:

You display right there an essential quality of the good practitioner: the honest, straightforward mind.

Wayfarer said:

My stage on the path is 'student' or 'hearer'. Maybe the Mahāyāna path is not for me! But I have to believe that there is a path.

Astus wrote:

There is always a path, it is what all the teachings are. Having doubts, difficulties, etc. is very much part of the path. Mahayana is not about being compassionate and wise, but about aspiring for those qualities.

Wayfarer said:

(Also, I wonder if there is a tendency to assume such a perspective, without necessarily having realised it in practice. Not for one minute that Ven Thubten Chodron would ever do such a thing.)

That's why the straightforward mind, introspection (meditation, mindfulness, reflection), and Dharma education are important, so that we don't mislead ourselves.
a defence of the reality of Nibbana

Astus wrote:

It is the third noble truth, the very goal of the path, the ultimate truth. How could it not be accepted as real? The question is not whether there is or is not nirvana, but the definition of it.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 27th, 2017 at 12:26 AM

Title: Re: Turning the light around (asraya-paravṛtti)

Content:

Astus wrote:

Turning the light to shine back (回光反照) does not really match the conversion of the basis (轉依 āsraya-paravṛtti).

First of all, conversion of the basis is explained in the Mahayanasamgraha as:

"The destruction of defilement by bodhisattvas is their nonabiding cessation. What are its characteristics? It is characterized by a twofold conversion of support whereby they definitively abandon defilement but not transmigration. Herein transmigration refers to the defiled aspect of the other-dependent pattern. Cessation refers to the purified aspect of the other-dependent pattern. The basic support refers to both these aspects of the purified and defiled other-dependent pattern. The conversion of support means that, when its counteragent arises, the other-dependent pattern forever alters its basic nature as the defiled aspect and forever realizes its purified aspect."

(The Summary of the Great Vehicle, BDK Edition, p 99)

As for turning the light around, in the Linjilu we find:

"The master said, "It is because you cannot stop your mind which runs on seeking everywhere that a patriarch said, 'Bah, superior men! Searching for your heads with your heads!' When at these words you turn your own light in upon yourselves and never seek elsewhere, then you'll know that your body and mind are not different from those of the patriarch-buddhas and on the instant have nothing to do—this is called 'obtaining the dharma.'"

(Record of Linji, p 28, tr Sasaki)

And as for the Awakening of Faith in Mahayana, it uses a another word (歸) and is between the two previous views:

為離念歸於真如，以念一切法令心生滅不入實智故。

(http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T32n1666_001#0580b08)

"be free from their deluded thoughts and can return to Suchness; for if anyone thinks of anything [as real and absolute in its own right], he causes his mind to be [trapped] in samsara and consequently he cannot enter [the state filled with] true insight [i.e., enlightenment]."

(AFM, p 78, tr Hakeda)

若人修行一切善法，自然歸順真如法故。

(http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T32n1666_001#0580c12)

"If a man practices all kinds of good deeds, he will naturally return to the principle of Suchness."

(AFM, p 81, tr Hakeda)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 1st, 2017 at 5:19 PM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Konchog1 said:

The first clue is that in the Mahayana, Buddhas are described in positive term. They have this body, this mind, this wisdom, this realm, etc.

Astus wrote:

Most of the qualities describing the buddhas are from Hinayana.

Konchog1 said:

In the Hinayana, Arhats are described in negative terms. They are the burned out fire, they are spent etc.

Astus wrote:

There are also positive terms for them.

Konchog1 said:

When fire burns out it doesn't disappear. It returns to the passive state waiting for activation.

Astus wrote:

Are you proposing some sort of eternal fire hiding in a special realm? That is not the meaning of the metaphor, since once the fuel is burnt you cannot light it again.

Konchog1 said:

In the same way, Arhats free of karma are not reborn. They don't disappear, but abide in a passive state waiting for a cause of rebirth. Namely, Bodhicitta. Whereupon they gain all the positive qualities described in the Mahayana.

Astus wrote:

What state is it exactly where they abide? Arhats are free from all the realms of samsara, so they certainly do not wait for any rebirth, as there is no more cause of rebirth for them.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 1st, 2017 at 8:41 PM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

I understand that they take rebirth in Hinayana Pure Lands.

Astus wrote:

What is that? The pure abodes (suddhavasa) are where non-returners go, but arhats do not and cannot be born anywhere.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 1st, 2017 at 10:00 PM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

Yes, they are born in the Suddhavasa

Astus wrote:

Those are the non-returners, not the arhats, who take birth there. Arhats have no afflictions to bind them to any birth, otherwise the whole existence of arhats is simply denied.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 1st, 2017 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: Can all religions be absorbed into the Buddhism?

Content:

Boomerang said:

Can we do the same thing with Jesus, Mohammad, Mahavira, maybe even any great philosopher or musician? Could we give them the benefit of the doubt and view them as if they were bodhisattvas teaching a non-Buddhist path for the benefit of beings with little faith? Can we believe that Abrahamic god is a bodhisattva, and Moses was one of his emanations?

Astus wrote:

It is called the path of humans and gods. Those religions and views that teach a somewhat ethical behaviour are recognised to be beneficial to some extent. For instance see Zongmi's discussion of accepting on that basis Taoism and Confucianism in his <http://terebess.hu/zen/mesterek/zongmi.html#a>. Note, however, that it does not make those views Buddhist, nor anything conducive to liberation.

Boomerang said:

And viewing world teachers in this manner, could we take refuge in them the same way we take refuge in the traditional sangha of enlightened beings?

Astus wrote:

If one takes refuge in anything else but the Three Gems one is not a Buddhist. That is because taking refuge means upholding something as the ultimate authority and source on the matter of liberation. No god or other being can provide that.

Boomerang said:

Those of us who lack omniscience may never know for sure if these beings were bodhisattvas. But if we choose to be optimistic and view them in this way, is our refuge pure?

Astus wrote:

It does not take omniscience to see if a doctrine accords with the Buddhadharma. As for being optimistic, that sounds rather like confused.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 1st, 2017 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

As I said, Arhats CHOOSE to be reborn there.

Astus wrote:

Why would they choose any birth when the whole point of attaining arhatship is to be free from every forms of birth? If they were still attached to having some form of birth, they would be non-returners, who still could not let go of their clinging to the form and formless realms.

Tsongkhapafan said:

For them it is not the form realm of samsara but nirvana because they have abandoned delusion obstructions and so their subjective experience is completely different to Never-Returners.

Astus wrote:

And you base that on what scripture?

Tsongkhapafan said:

This is like a Buddha choosing to emanate in the human realm to teach Dharma; they are not human and do not have human experiences. Even though they appear to abide in the realms of samsara, it is not samsara for them.

Astus wrote:

Buddhas have non-abiding nirvana, furthermore, both buddhas and bodhisattvas have great compassion. Neither of those apply to arhats. So, why would an arhat do that?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 1st, 2017 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: Can all religions be absorbed into the Buddhism?

Content:

Boomerang said:

The Hindu doctrine is against Buddhadharma, but if we have faith in the sutras, that's only because Hindus aren't aware of what these gods actually believe.

Astus wrote:

The question is whether one believes that a deity is the creator of the world, lives eternally, and faith in said deity can bring oneself perpetual bliss and freedom. If one believes none of those things, then it fits the Buddhist doctrine.

Boomerang said:

But if someone else believes that Jesus understood emptiness, who am I to disagree?

Astus wrote:

It is very much irrelevant whether Jesus understood it or not. The question is whether oneself understands it or not.

Boomerang said:

The thing is, these people are already at my dharma center, so it's not like I can go in there thinking I'm so much smarter than everyone else. That's the type of attitude that sends people to the lower realms, isn't it? What should a dharma teacher do when they meet someone who is inspired by Jesus, and Shakyamuni, and maybe Ramana Maharshi too?

Astus wrote:

Being arrogant is one thing, reinterpreting another person's view is another. One can be aware that there are wrong views and still not make of it a superiority view. But calling a wrong view a correct one is only misleading oneself and others.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 1st, 2017 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

They are not attached to rebirth or any form of rebirth which is why they are able to choose. The only object of abandonment of living beings is contaminated rebirth, not rebirth per se.

Astus wrote:

Rebirth is contaminated, because the root cause is ignorance/three poisons. As long as there is ignorance, there is birth. No ignorance, no birth. This is the basic teaching of the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Twelve_Nid%C4%81nas, also known as dependent origination.

Tsongkhapafan said:

Where do you say they exist?

Astus wrote:

That is the wrong question, as it assumes a self. Please check what the Buddha taught <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn44/sn44.002.than.html> about it.

Tsongkhapafan said:

The Hinayana Arhat's intention is to abide in a place where they can experience uninterrupted solitary peace.

Astus wrote:

The goal of the shravaka path is nirvana, the end of any kind of birth. That is because they recognise that every form of existence, no matter how heavenly, is impermanent, and what is impermanent is suffering.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 2nd, 2017 at 2:26 AM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Rebirth is not contaminated from its own side.

Astus wrote:

What is the cause of rebirth itself then, if not ignorance?

Tsongkhapafan said:

The root cause, according to the 12 dependent-related links, is dependent-related ignorance.

Astus wrote:

OK, so it is ignorance.

Tsongkhapafan said:

No ignorance, no contaminated rebirth but that doesn't mean that one can't have a pure rebirth.

Astus wrote:

What is the cause of rebirth if not ignorance?

Tsongkhapafan said:

Bodhisattva Arhats take rebirth in samsara with complete freedom and control (Tulkus) and beings take rebirth in a Buddha's Pure Land.

Astus wrote:

Tulku - nirmanakaya - illusory body, also called emanation body. That is not rebirth.

Tsongkhapafan said:

There is a self, even after nirvana - a merely imputed self.

Astus wrote:

Has it not been merely imputed before nirvana?

Tsongkhapafan said:

Nirvana is not the extinction of self, it's the abandonment of the deluded view of self. Arhats exist after nirvana is attained, otherwise do they simply cease to exist? If there is no self, there is no existence at all. Buddha's teaching on selflessness is not that there is no self at all.

Astus wrote:

If seeing the self as a mere imputation is the correct view, and not the deluded one, then since being an imputation means that it is imaginary - like when seeing a trunk as a human the human is merely imputed - then there has never actually been a self in any form but as a misconception. However, you seem to say that not only there is really a self - not as a mere imputation - but that it is eternal, since arhats exist forever. But of course arhats do not cease to exist, since there has never been a self to begin with, so there is nothing to cease.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 2nd, 2017 at 7:35 AM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

The cause of the Hinayana Foe Destroyer's rebirth in the Hinayana Pure Lands is the wish to enjoy solitary peace.

Astus wrote:

Why would an arhat have such a wish? While the arhat is alive he is already unaffected by anything and enjoys complete peace, i.e. nirvana, regardless of the circumstances. If there were still the delusion that any environment can provide peace, such a person would not be an arhat.

Tsongkhapafan said:

The idea that there is no self at all is very curious. Even Buddhas have an I - this is the defining characteristic of a person. The problem is imputing an inherently existent I where there is not one; we simply see the I as existing in a way in which it does not, so no-self does not mean no self at all.

Astus wrote:

Of the five aggregates which one is the merely imputed self that necessarily exists in your opinion?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 2nd, 2017 at 7:58 AM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Wayfarer said:

That is because bodhisattvas are able to be voluntarily re-born - as the statement says - out of 'compassion and prayer' rather than being compelled by karma and klesa. But, nowhere does this statement say that Arhats are re-born anywhere, I had understood that the whole condition of the Arhat was 'no further re-birth'.

Astus wrote:

Arya-bodhisattvas have realised the emptiness of all appearances, so they are not bound by them any more. Arhats are also free from clinging to phenomena, so they are not bound by samsara either. The difference in the case of bodhisattvas, as you say, is that they are driven by bodhicitta. Since arhats do not have bodhicitta, there is no cause of birth at all. And that is why it is repeated in Mahayana scriptures that the most important thing is to have compassion for all beings, otherwise a bodhisattva strays to the path of sravakas and ends birth in nirvana.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 2nd, 2017 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

kirtu said:

the text quotes from Buton Rinchen Drup who explicitly states that Arhats are reborn in a pure realm and then later aroused by a Buddha.

Astus wrote:

Chapter 7 of the Lotus Sutra mentions the apparitional/phantom city as a temporary rest for those with insufficient faith as a reference to sravakas.

"Knowing that they have reached nirvana
And attained arhatship, the Buddha immediately
Gathers the great assembly together
And teaches the True Dharma.
All the buddhas explain and teach
The three vehicles through skillful means.
Although there is only the single buddha vehicle,
They teach two in order to provide a place of rest."
(Lotus Sutra, BDK ed, p 138)

Vasubandhu explains the parable as:

"The arrogance [of those who] refer to what is actually nothing as something. Having [attained] mundane meditative trances and meditational attainments, they form the notion [that what they have attained is] nirvana, [though] [what they have] actually [attained] is not nirvana. It should be known that "The Parable of the Phantom City" is given as the antidote to this misconception.

...

[The parable] for the fourth type of person cause him, through expedient means, to enter the city of nirvana. The "city of nirvana" refers to the city of contemplations and meditative trances. Having gone past this city, he is then later made to enter the city of great nirvana."

(The Commentary on the Lotus Sutra, in Tiantai Lotus Texts, BDK ed, p 138-139)

So, what Buton seems to say and what Vasubandhu says is that arhats are not actually arhats, just people stuck within an absorption (dhyana).

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 4th, 2017 at 6:02 PM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Malcolm said:

They are revived by a Buddha from a samadhi of cessation.

Astus wrote:

Do you know where this interpretation began? Nirodhasamapatti is accessible to both non-returners and arhats equally, and arhats are necessarily free from such formless absorptions in every system. Assuming that arhats are stuck in a samadhi of cessation contradicts what being an arhat means.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 5th, 2017 at 7:44 PM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Malcolm said:

The Lanka.

Astus wrote:

Where in the http://lirs.ru/do/lanka_eng/lanka-nondiacritical.htm is that taught? That sutra teaches the five gotras (2.20), and only those of the indeterminate lineage "who are instructed in these three lineages but who enter according to one teaching and succeed according to another." (tr Red Pine). This doctrine is also upheld by Yogacara where those who belong to the sravaka family attain the nirvana without residue and nothing more. Vasubandhu in his Commentary on the Lotus Sutra makes a clear distinction as well:

"This means that those who have produced the thought of enlightenment and who are carrying out bodhisattva practice will plant good roots of merit and be able to realize enlightenment. It is not the case that those who have not originally produced the thought of enlightenment, such as ordinary people and the disciples who are fixed [in the Small Vehicle], are able to attain it."

(Tiantai Lotus Texts, BDK ed, p 135)

and

"Regarding the disciples' attainment of a prediction, [it should be known that] there are four types of disciples: 1) disciples who are fixed [in the path of the Small Vehicle], 2) arrogant disciples, 3) disciples who have retreated from the thought of enlightenment, and 4) transformation disciples.

The two types of disciples who receive a prediction from the tathāgatas are the transformation disciples and the disciples who have retreated from the thought of enlightenment. Since disciples who are fixed [in the path of the Small Vehicle] and arrogant disciples have faculties that are not yet mature, they are not given predictions of enlightenment."

(p 142)

Similarly, the Lankavatara Sutra states regarding the question of prediction given to arhats:

"Mahamati, there are Bodhisattvas practising the work of the Bodhisattva here and in other Buddha-lands, who, however, are desirous of attaining the Nirvana of the Sravakayana. In order to turn their inclination away from the Sravakayana and to make them exert themselves in the course of the Mahayana, the Sravakas in transformation are given assurance [as to their future Buddhahood] by the Body of Transformation" (7.89, tr Suzuki)

And to clarify the meaning of arhat:

"Mahamati said: Now, the Blessed One declares that there are three kinds of Arhats: to which one of the three is this term "Arhat" to be applied? To one who makes straightway for the path of cessation? Or to one who neglects all his accumulated stock of merit for the sake of his vow to enlighten others? Or to one who is a form of the Transformation [Buddha]?"

Replied the Blessed One: Mahamati, [the term "Arhat"] applies to the Sravaka who makes straightway for the path of cessation, and to no others. Mahamati, as for the others, they are those who have finished practising the deeds of a Bodhisattva; they are forms of the Transformation Buddha."

(2.49, tr Suzuki)

While the "sustaining power" of the Buddhas applies only to bodhisattvas and helps them get beyond various forms of absorption:

"What is this twofold power that sustains the Bodhisattvas? The one is the power by which they are sustained to go through the Samadhis and Samapattis; while the other is the power whereby the Buddhas manifest themselves in person before the Bodhisattvas and baptise them with their own hands."

(2.40, tr Suzuki)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 5th, 2017 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

kirtu said:

LVI (56), verses 207-210 : http://lirs.ru/do/lanka_eng/lanka-chapter-2.htm#chap2

Astus wrote:

Thanks. The sravakas described there have not attained arhatship, but mistaken cessation for nirvana. So that applies to those of indeterminate family, not those fixed to the attainment of arhatship.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 5th, 2017 at 11:37 PM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, they are arhats. Jñānavajra's commentary

Astus wrote:

What does he say about the difference between the gotras then? I'm asking because since the Lankavatara was an important text for the Yogacarins, and they (Asanga, Vasubandhu, Xuanzang, etc.) did not accept the idea of a single vehicle, then that interpretation you referred to is not that obvious.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 6th, 2017 at 12:13 AM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Malcolm said:

Both commentaries state that while in reality the Buddha taught one vehicle, he did not teach the ekayāna to everyone. He taught the three vehicle system to śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas.

Astus wrote:

That is what the sutra explicitly says. But the question is whether arhatship can be a final attainment as nirvana without residue or not.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 6th, 2017 at 1:16 AM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Malcolm said:

According to the Lanka, no. Why? because even though arhats have no active or latent afflictions, they still have traces. This also applies to pratyekabuddhas.

Astus wrote:

The Lankavatara Sutra may be interpreted that way, although it does state:

"Having had an insight into their own vehicle, they abide at the fifth or the sixth stage where they do away with the rising of the passions, but not with the habit-energy; they have not yet passed beyond the inconceivable transformation-death, and their lion-roar is, "My life is destroyed, my morality is established, etc."; they will then discipline themselves in the egolessness of persons and finally gain the knowledge of Nirvana."
(2.20)

And the Cheng Weishi Lun explains:

"First question. - If Jneyavarana, assisting the pure deeds, produces existence (i.e., birth and death), the saints of the two Vehicles of the 'fixed' class (who cannot become Bodhisattvas) will never enter Nirupadhisenanirvana (Nirvana-without-residue). The same is true of the Prthagjanas who are fettered by their vexing passions (Klesavarana).

...

Reply to the first question. - The Jneyavarana does not constitute an obstacle to deliverance, because it is not in its power to provoke deeds and 'moisten' reincarnation."

(p 611, 613, tr Wei Tat)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 6th, 2017 at 7:13 PM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

tiagolps said:

Ups, I meant śrāvakas have the realization... "So śrāvakas have the realization of the emptiness of self, but only have a partial realization of the emptiness of phenomena, is that how it should be understood?"

Astus wrote:

Shravakas believe that the skandhas, ayatanas, and dhatus have real existence - i.e. this is the common abhidharma doctrine - and this is why they are said not understand emptiness of dharmas. For more, here is a nice one from the http://lirs.ru/do/lanka_eng/lanka-nondiacritical.htm (2.18):

"Further, Mahamati, those who, afraid of sufferings arising from the discrimination of birth-and-death, seek for Nirvana, do not know that birth-and-death and Nirvana are not to be separated the one from the other; and, seeing that all things subject to discrimination have no reality, imagine that Nirvana consists in the future annihilation of the senses and their fields. They are not aware, Mahamati, of the fact that Nirvana is the Alayavijnana where a revulsion takes place by self-realisation. Therefore, Mahamati, those who are stupid talk of the trinity of vehicles and not of the state of Mind-only where there are no images. Therefore, Mahamati, those who do not understand the teachings of the Tathagatas of the past, present, and future, concerning the external world, which is of Mind itself, cling to the notion that there is a world outside what is seen of the Mind and, Mahamati, go on rolling themselves along the wheel of birth-and-death."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 6th, 2017 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

tiagolps said:

But to realize the emptiness of self you have to have some understanding of the emptiness of aggregates that make up the self, no?

Astus wrote:

The argument is that since in Hinayana the focus is on the method of recognising that there are only the aggregates but no self, they take the aggregates to be substantial. However, if we think about this a bit, this reasoning doesn't hold up, because shravakas need to realise that the aggregates are neither self nor the possessions of a self, so to say that they are regarded as substantial contradicts the teachings. Similarly, as in the Lankavatara Sutra, there is the argument that shravakas do not know that there is no grasping and no grasped, but that is again refutable once we consider that without attachment to the aggregates there is no basis any more for such a duality. Hence what is called the shravakayana in Mahayana scriptures refers practitioners who misunderstood things, and not what is actually found in the Hinayana works.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 6th, 2017 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Malcolm said:

the śrāvakas maintain these dharmas — aggregates, āyatanas, and dhātus — are substantially real

Astus wrote:

Aside from terminology, it is agreed on by both parties that a shravaka does not assume a self and has no clinging to the aggregates. So while the abhidharma style presentation may be criticised as incomplete, not the realisation, as being without attachment toward phenomena is the goal even in Mahayana.

Malcolm said:

But until we come to Madhyamaka, there is no school that can escape the charge of being substantialist, including Yogacara (a form of nondual substantialism).

Astus wrote:

I have seen Madhyamaka interpreted in a similar way, where emptiness is considered some sort of ultimate substratum. Then one might argue that is the wrong interpretation, however, the same could be said about arguments put against abhidharma and yogacara as well.

Malcolm said:

But the emptiness of inherent existence is not the profound Mahāyāna emptiness free from four extremes.

Astus wrote:

Once there is no attachment to the mental aggregates, there can be not grasping at views either.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 7th, 2017 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Malcolm said:

Since skandhas, āyatanas, and dhātus are regarded as ultimate and real, even by arhats, they do not perceive the emptiness of phenomena.

Astus wrote:

Once there is no attachment to the mental aggregates, there can be not grasping at views either.

Malcolm said:

Sure there can.

Astus wrote:

If no mental aggregate is clung to, in what form can there be attachment to any view? Unless concepts are beyond the aggregates, I do not see how that is possible.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 7th, 2017 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Malcolm said:

Your argument is internally incoherent. According your argument, a stream entrant should be Vajradhara.

Astus wrote:

How so? A stream-entrant has correct view, but still very much bound by the aggregates.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 7th, 2017 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Malcolm said:

No, a stream enterer is free from the fetter of attachment to wrong views. Such a person is not bound by the aggregates

Astus wrote:

A stream-enterer is still bound by the three poisons, hence attached to the aggregates. Having correct view is the beginning, not the end, and that's why there is a need for cultivation.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 7th, 2017 at 4:07 AM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Malcolm said:

Arhats and stream entrants have identical views of selflessness.

Astus wrote:

They both have the correct view, but only arhats are free from clinging. It is because arhats are free from clinging to any aggregates that I said above that there is no place left for any attachment. If you claim that arhats are still afflicted by some form of attachment, the object of attachment must lie beyond the aggregates.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 7th, 2017 at 6:00 PM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

smcj said:

Really? Prasangika Madhyamaka? Where? By whom? That is the big no-no.

Astus wrote:

It's not that unusual. I'd say it's a possible stage in one's learning, where the two truths are completely separated, and the ultimate sounds just like concepts that one is already familiar with, like God, oneness, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 7th, 2017 at 10:21 PM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Malcolm said:

Understanding that there is no ghost in the machine is a not a refutation or negation of the machine's substantiality.

Astus wrote:

The machine is not the cause of the problems, it is the illusion of the ghost. Once there is no clinging, how could it matter what the status of something is? Even the concepts about the machine are let go of.

Malcolm said:

Becoming free from the clinging to the aggregates is possible merely through understanding they are impermanent. There is no need for a nondual understanding to attain arhatship, much less stream-entry.

Astus wrote:

Understanding impermanence is the path, abandonment of all attachments is the result. The point is that without attachment there is no basis for any view.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 7th, 2017 at 11:15 PM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Malcolm said:

One may have no attachments, but this still does not preclude one from imputing substantiality to this or that dharma.

Astus wrote:

Even if one free from attachments would have an incorrect assumption about something, it would be an assumption not grasped at.

This reminds me of a Zen story

(http://www.zenguide.com/zenmedia/books/content.cfm?t=the_gateless_gate&chapter=13).

One day Tokusan went down toward the dining room, holding his bowls. Seppo met him and asked, "Where are you off to with your bowls? The bell has not rung, and the drum has not sounded." Tokusan turned and went back to his room.

Seppo mentioned this to Ganto, who remarked, "Tokusan is renowned, but he does not know the last word."

Tokusan heard about this remark and sent his attendant to fetch Ganto. "You do not approve of me?" he asked. Ganto whispered his meaning.

Tokusan said nothing at the time, but the next day he ascended the rostrum, and behold! he was very different from usual!

Ganto, going toward the front of the hall, clapped his hands and laughed loudly, saying, "Congratulations! Our old man has got hold of the last word! From now on, nobody in this whole country can outdo him!"

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 8th, 2017 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Malcolm said:

It is nevertheless incorrect, and therefore, it is not surprising in the least that Arhats have an incomplete understanding of emptiness, which is the point of this whole exchange.

Astus wrote:

If by emptiness you refer to a conceptual explanation, yes, there can be misunderstandings. But if you mean freedom from the four extreme views, then they are necessarily free from those.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 8th, 2017 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Malcolm said:

You have not shown this to be so. In other words, there is a disconnect between your assertion that arhats are free from clinging to their aggregates and your assertion that they realize emptiness free from the four extremes.

Astus wrote:

The four extreme views are concepts. Concepts are within the domain of the aggregates. Arhats do not cling to the aggregates, hence they cannot have the four extreme views. Where is the disconnect here?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 8th, 2017 at 4:28 AM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Malcolm said:

Arhats have the view that aggregates exist. But they do not cling to them. That is your disconnect.

Astus wrote:

If one has a view but does not cling to that view, does one actually have a view? For instance, an arhat has the view that a particular robe is his, still, it is not a view that binds him. Similarly, all teachings are recognised as pointing to liberation, and not something that one should remain attached to.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 8th, 2017 at 6:15 PM

Title: Re: Prasangika, Conventional Analysis, and Wordly Consensus

Content:

Bakmoon said:

How can Prasangikas meaningfully talk about things that are just out of the range of ordinary beings? For example, Karma, the twelve links of dependent origination, and a lot of other teachings are not part of worldly consensus, and yet all Buddhists accept these things.

Astus wrote:

Conventional truth does not mean "popular vote", but rather what is considered reasonable by intelligent people of the society. The teachings of the Buddha are of the highest value among all conventional concepts, as the Buddha was the wisest of all. As for what prasangika stands for, it is merely a method of performing analysis with the intention of rejecting wrong views and gaining insight into emptiness. Or, as some may approach sutrayana, it is only for refuting those holding wrong views.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 9th, 2017 at 6:01 PM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Malcolm said:

The question is not whether they are bound. The question is "what kind of realization is necessary for freedom from rebirth?" The answer is: "Not very deep."

Astus wrote:

How is that the question? What realisation is deeper/higher than what is free from all attachments, hence also free from conceptual proliferation?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 10th, 2017 at 8:55 PM

Title: Re: Resources for Comparison of Buddhist Canons?

Content:

Astus wrote:

CBETA has several canons online: <http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/>

And the complete Taisho Tripitaka: <http://21dzk.l.u-tokyo.ac.jp/SAT/ddb-sat2.php>

Digital Sanskrit Buddhist Canon: <http://www.dsbcproject.org/>

Bibliography of Translations from the Chinese Buddhist Canon into Western Languages:
<http://mbingenheimer.net/tools/bibls/transbibl.html>

Nanjio's Catalogue: <http://www.kanji.zinbun.kyoto-u.ac.jp/~wittern/data/nanjio-catalog.pdf>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 11th, 2017 at 2:17 AM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Malcolm said:

Freedom from attachments does not equal freedom from proliferation.

Astus wrote:

When no concepts grasped, how can there be proliferation?

"There's no trail in space,
no outside contemplative.

People are smitten with objectifications (papanca), but devoid of objectification (nippapanca) are the Tathagatas."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/kn/dhp/dhp.18.than.html.254>)

Malcolm said:

If it did, arhats would be omniscient. They also could not fall back from the state of arhatship, but some do.

Astus wrote:

Those are clearly problematic points, but secondary.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 11th, 2017 at 5:58 PM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Malcolm said:

now you think that arhats are tathāgatas.

Astus wrote:

The problem I'm raising here is that ascribing attachment to arhats is not supported by reason. So far there has been no substantiated argument against that. It is another issue if buddhahood is defined on the basis of the complete absence of attachment.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 12th, 2017 at 6:11 AM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Malcolm said:

Attachment is not the issue, traces are.

Astus wrote:

By traces do you mean anusaya? If yes, the Samuccaya (p 100-101) has the same list as the <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an07/an07.011.than.html>, and they need to be abandoned and destroyed

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an07/an07.012.than.html>), otherwise there is still rebirth

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.038.than.html>). Even though the Srimaladevi Sutra (ch 5, BDK ed p 26-28, cf. Brunnhölzl: When the Clouds part, p 364-365) splits up the list and calls ignorance not removed by arhats, since that ignorance itself means the cognitive obscuration where one still clings to concepts, I still find no basis for assigning that to arhats. So, where do those traces exist in an arhat in your view?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 12th, 2017 at 8:14 AM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

PuerAzelis said:

He just quoted three sutras answering precisely that. What else is he supposed to do?

Astus wrote:

The three quotes merely state that

"Srāvakas and pratyekabuddhas have not abandoned all connection with traces"

"not completely destroyed traces"

"they are confused through the other traces of affliction" and the questions raised are in response to that concept of remaining traces.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 12th, 2017 at 6:42 PM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

PuerAzelis said:

You asked "where" they exist in an arhat.

Where else would they exist other than in the place they always have existed?

It's not like they change places.

Astus wrote:

Where have they always existed then?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 13th, 2017 at 8:05 AM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Malcolm said:

Daṃṣṭrasenam, in his commentary on the 100,000 lines Perfection of Wisdom Sūtra, notes that the result of possessing those traces mentions specifically that arhats can err, gossip, can be unattractive, are forgetful, and so on.

Astus wrote:

Thanks for looking it up. The same traits are mentioned elsewhere regarding arhats as well, aren't they? Still, nice to know.

Malcolm said:

The most important point is that śrāvakayanists in general do not meditate on the view of emptiness. As we will see below, they meditate in the four truths and this is how they attain their awakening. They realize the person as a momentary formation and this is what it means to say that an arhat realizes "the selflessness of persons." But they do not meditate directly on the view of emptiness in anyway. The Goenka Vipassana school is an excellent example of this principle.

Astus wrote:

The part where it is true is that the path described that way is what is found in the abhidharma works, although there can be differences. The part where it is not true is the Nikayas/Agamas and those Theravada teachers who don't follow the abhidhamma. Look at this description for instance: <http://measurelessmind.ca/anattasanna.html>. Also, it is quite common in Mahayana to describe arhats by their realisation of the emptiness of self, and sometimes even by the realisation of the emptiness of phenomena.

Malcolm said:

Thus, it is somewhat inane to speculate about where traces reside in an arhat. It is also somewhat foolish to assert that arhats realize the selflessness of phenomena when it has nothing at all to do with how they achieve their realization since they never even meditate the view of the emptiness of the person let alone emptiness in general.

Astus wrote:

The issue is whether they are attached to the aggregates or not. In order to keep any form of traces, obscurations, or defilements for arhats, they necessarily have to still cling to the aggregates and the areas, and what they attain then as a pseudo-nirvana is nirodha-samapatti, hence as you quote "Through perceiving sensation and perception as flaws, they solely rely on the method of pacifying them and are intoxicated with an intoxicating samadhi that lacks the wisdom that realizes the truth."

Malcolm said:

Thus we can also see there is no place where such arhats "reside" after death, no Hinayāna pure land. After their nirvana, arhats have no location per se, being like "logs floating on the ocean, moved by the waves."

Astus wrote:

Or they could be simply put into the formless realms, as I think some Zen texts do.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 14th, 2017 at 4:17 AM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Malcolm said:

This is only the selflessness of persons, not phenomena, because there is no refutation of characteristics themselves. But, for example, in Mahāyāna, even the characteristics by which phenomena are apprehended are refuted. This is the main difference.

Astus wrote:

Yes, that is a clear difference. On the one side it's rise and fall, birth and death, while on the other it's unarisen and unceasing, unborn and undying.

Malcolm said:

The absence of a self in persons is only mentioned in these Mahāyāna sūtras

Astus wrote:

Did you do a search specifically for pudgala naitratmya? That (人無我) doesn't seem to be a common term in Chinese either, although using synonyms can turn up further results.

Malcolm said:

śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas have trained in characteristics of the aggregate, etc., that lack a self because of being impermanent and so on, rather than in emptiness.

Astus wrote:

Contemplation of the three characteristics are what is said to bring about the realisation of the three gates of liberation, so there is a correlation.

Malcolm said:

It is asserted that they cling to characteristics, not that they cling to the aggregates, etc., per se.

Astus wrote:

An this is something I have difficulty to take literally on a practical level. Sure, most of the usual criticisms of arhats look valid for people obsessed with total cessation and/or systems and lists of dharmas. But I fail to see them as anything but common warnings one can find in all sorts of teachings, and that is likely the reason why Mahayana traditions kept this view of the arhat alive (at the same time, arhats in East Asia are also popular spirit/deity/bodhisattva-like beings). Although looking at the <http://www.vipassanadhura.com/sixteen.html> can give the impression that the criticism is valid, it's also possible to say that as both body and mind are let go of, there can be no hindrances left, nor even clinging to characteristics, since even those are just thoughts.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 14th, 2017 at 5:49 AM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Malcolm said:

Personally, I think you are reading with a Mahāyāna bias, and interpolating your own view on the view of śrāvakas.

Astus wrote:

I'm afraid there is a not so small possibility of that. I got that impression yesterday right when I looked up Mahasi's Manual of Insight.

Malcolm said:

Since there is no evidence that śrāvakas negate characteristics through a vipaśyāna analysis that allows them to see through characteristics, there is also no evidence that they are free from clinging to characteristics.

Astus wrote:

The four noble truths are what is taught to be the definitive insight one needs to gain on the shravaka path. And there what one needs to recognise is how there is suffering, how suffering arises, how it ceases, and how one can bring it to cessation. In short, the goal is not to have or maintain any ideas of what characterises phenomena, but to let go of them, to end one's clinging. So, what I don't see the evidence of is how there can remain anything one keeps being hooked on anything.

Malcolm said:

One assumes that ancient Mahāyānis had ample contact and debate with those who were reputed to be śrāvaka arhats.

Astus wrote:

I'm not so sure. It rather seems to me that what they tend to refute are their own interpretations of abhidharma materials. Have you perhaps encountered this small book:

http://www.dhammatalks.net/Books2/Maha_Boowa_The_Path_to_Arahantship.pdf?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 14th, 2017 at 6:35 PM

Title: Re: The attainment of the Arhats

Content:

Malcolm said:

The point is that arhats suffer from obscurations, and that their wisdom is insufficient to perceive the real nature of phenomena, even though they have a partial realization through which they can claim to be liberated (and liberation in Buddhadharma simply means being free of the afflictions that cause rebirth in samsara).

Astus wrote:

And my question is still the same: how can one be obscured in any way, when no aggregate is grasped at? And aggregates mean all the possible experiences that occur. So there is no physical appearance, no feeling, no thought, no state of consciousness that can delude an arhat. On the other hand, to say that an arhat clings to cessation requires the assumption that he sees the aggregates as enemies, is bound by a specific peaceful state free from appearances, and still has extreme views of existence and annihilation. I see only the latter as the object of criticism, while at the same time that type of flawed arhat is hardly acceptable even for the shravakas, although this is a point where interpretations among them may be different. For instance:

"During fruition absorption, the mind is fully absorbed in its object, nibbāna, the cessation of all conditioned phenomena. It does not perceive anything else. Nibbāna is completely different from the conditioned mental and physical phenomena and conceptual objects that belong to this world or any other. So you cannot perceive or remember this world (i.e., your own body) or any other during fruition absorption, and you are free from all thoughts. Even if there are obvious objects around to see, hear, smell, touch, and so on, you will not be aware of any of them."

(Mahasi Sayadaw: Manual of Insight, p 295)

That description of nirvana sounds very much like the latter type of arhat. On the other hand, looking at Maha Boowa's description:

"When avijjā is extinguished, conditioned phenomena—which give rise to dukkha—are also extinguished. They have disappeared from the knowing nature of the citta. Conditioned phenomena, such as thoughts, which are an integral part of the khandhas, continue to function in their own sphere but they no longer cause dukkha. Uncorrupted by kilesas, they simply give form and direction to mental activity. Consciousness arises in the mind, purely and simply without producing suffering."

(The Path to Arahantship, p 62)

There it's only craving, only clinging that is gone, since it's not the phenomena that constitute the problem, but only attachment. And that I think is a crucial difference. Even though there are suttas where it's stated simple that one has to abandon phenomena (e.g. <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn35/sn35.024.than.html>), but it's clarified that - just the the four noble truths state - it is craving and clinging that need to end (e.g. <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn35/sn35.191.than.html>). In this case, it's the former type of arhat that can have no delusion regarding anything.

Malcolm said:

there is nothing there which is not anticipated by Mahāyāna critiques of the limitations of the śrāvaka teachings

Astus wrote:

No doubt that the shravaka teachings are significantly more limited. But that is not the problem here.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 15th, 2017 at 3:25 AM

Title: Re: Japanese Zen Buddhist Traditions.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Official sites:

<http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/index.html>

<http://zen.rinnou.net/index.html>

Wikipedia:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Japanese_Zen

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/S%C5%8Dt%C5%8D>

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Rinzai_school

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/%C5%8Cbaku>

Books:

<https://books.google.com/books?id=SjfvBQAAQBAJ>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=BnLOFwx1SpUC>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=EPXEoMtND24C>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=kxhiCAAAQBAJ>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=ypIL2wz3IBUC>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=DxvF5XIJpnUC>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=CyV4PaqMzd4C>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=uRfVBAAQBAJ>

<https://books.google.com/books?id=2ZcNsZTH6gAC>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 15th, 2017 at 5:10 PM

Title: Re: Lay Chan Teachers

Content:

Anonymous X said:

Is this the same Pei Xiu that corresponded with Zongmi and compiled Huang Po's records?

Astus wrote:

Yes.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 16th, 2017 at 5:56 AM

Title: Re: The Goal Of Meditation.

Content:

Joka said:

When one meditates, what is its goal for the individual? What is its purpose? What is meditation fulfilling?

Astus wrote:

Zanmai-o-zanmai (SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 3, p 371):

To transcend the whole universe at once, to live a great and valuable life in the house of the Buddhist patriarchs, is to sit in the full lotus posture. To tread over the heads of non-Buddhists and demons; to become, in the inner sanctum of the Buddhist patriarchs, a person in the concrete state, is to sit in the full lotus posture. To transcend the supremacy of the Buddhist patriarchs' supremacy, there is only this one method. Therefore, Buddhist patriarchs practice it solely, having no other practices at all. Remember, the universe in sitting is far different from other universes. Clearly understanding this truth, Buddhist patriarchs pursue and realize the establishment of the will, training, the state of bodhi, and nirvana.

Joka said:

Also, for the poor working class slob like myself that is constantly working seven days a week, can the same kind of attainment be done with just purely mental meditation while working?

Astus wrote:

Bendowa (SBGZ, BDK ed, vol 1, p 16-17):

[Someone] asks, "People who leave home get free of all involvements at once, so they have no hindrances in practicing zazen and pursuing the truth. How can a busy layperson devotedly do training and be at one with the unintentional state of Buddhist truth?"

I say: In general, the Buddhist Patriarch,⁸⁶ overfilled with pity, left open a wide and great gate of compassion so that all living beings could experience and enter [the state of truth]; what human being or god could not want to enter? Thus, when we study the past and the present, there are many confirmations of such [experience and entry]. For instance, Taisō and Junsō were, as emperors, very busy with affairs of state [but] they pursued the truth by sitting in zazen and realized the Buddhist Patriarch's great truth. Both Minister Ri (Ch. Li) and Minister Bō (Ch. Fang), serving as [the emperor's] lieutenants, were the arms and legs of the whole nation [but] they pursued the truth by sitting in zazen and experienced and entered the Buddhist Patriarch's truth. This [practice-and-experience] rests only upon whether or not the will is present; it does not relate to whether the body stays at home or leaves home. Moreover, any person who profoundly discerns the superiority or inferiority of things will naturally have belief. Still more, those who think that worldly affairs hinder the Buddha-Dharma only know that there is no Buddha-Dharma in the world; they do not know that there are no worldly dharmas in the state of Buddha. Recently in great Song [China] there was [a man] called Minister Hyō (Ch. Feng), a high-ranking official who was accomplished in the Patriarch's truth. In his later years he made a poem in which he expressed himself as follows:

When official business allows, I like to sit in zazen.

I have seldom slept with my side touching a bed.

Though I have now become prime minister,

My fame as a veteran practitioner has spread across the four seas.

This was somebody with no time free from official duties but, because his will to the Buddha's truth was deep, he was able to attain the truth. We should reflect on ourselves [in comparison] with him, and we should reflect on the present [in comparison] with those days. In the great kingdom of Song, the present generation of kings and ministers, officials and commoners, men and women, all apply their mind to the Patriarch's truth, without exception. Both the military and literary classes are resolved to practice [za]zen and to learn the truth. Those who resolve it will, in many cases, undoubtedly clarify the mental state. Thus, it can naturally be inferred that worldly affairs do not hinder the Buddha-Dharma. When the real Buddha-Dharma spreads throughout a nation the buddhas and the gods guard [that nation] ceaselessly, so the reign is peaceful. When the imperial reign is peaceful, the Buddha- Dharma comes into its own. Furthermore, when Śākyamuni was in the world, [even] people of heavy sins and wrong views were able to get the truth, and in the orders of the ancestral masters, [even] hunters and old woodcutters entered the state of realization, to say nothing of other people. We need only study the teaching and the state of truth of a true teacher.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 17th, 2017 at 4:09 AM

Title: Re: Zongmi on Chan

Content:

Anonymous X said:

But the other part of commenting on the other schools as he does, could have a political implication that some academics might run with and accuse Zongmi of 'divide and rule' tactics, perhaps for the reason of state funding his school.

Astus wrote:

Zongmi at the time of writing those works on the Chan schools was a teacher living in Chang'an as an honoured master invited by the emperor. It seems he had no monastery or school to get sponsors for. so there appears to be no economical or political reasons behind his presentation of other groups.

Anonymous X said:

Was he considered a supreme master, a manipulator, or both, maybe?

Astus wrote:

He was considered a great teacher, a sophisticated and erudite monastic.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 21st, 2017 at 4:35 AM

Title: Re: Muso Soseki's Direct Pointing

Content:

Astus wrote:

What part do you call the direct pointing in that quite formal speech?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 23rd, 2017 at 7:05 PM

Title: From Impermanence to Buddhahood

Content:

Astus wrote:

Impermanence is the gateway to emptiness.

Emptiness is the gateway to non-birth.

Non-birth is the gateway to Buddhahood.

"What is the Buddha's path? It is the bodhi-mind, the mind of Nirvana. To walk on the Buddha's path is to follow the path of the Great Enlightened One, the one who attained the Great Nirvana, the one who has reached ultimate liberation. Through great enlightenment, one sees all phenomena with pure luminosity. From the perspective of departing from all defilements, the Buddha saw the ultimate truth: the non-arising and non-ceasing of all phenomena. Through complete cessation, he achieved total peace of mind. This complete cessation does not mean that everything is extinguished. It is the cessation of all defilements and habitual tendencies. After achieving cessation, an Enlightened One begins a new life, a life of selfless service to benefit sentient beings. As practitioners, we must understand impermanence. Impermanence is the gateway to emptiness.

Thus to understand emptiness, we must start with an understanding of impermanence. Emptiness, in turn, is the gateway to non-birth. By understanding emptiness, you will not be attached to life. In other words, you will transcend the two extremes and all dualities. In this way, you will be able to enter non-birth. Non-birth is the gateway to Buddhahood. Understanding non-birth, one will no longer be attached to life, one will no longer be afflicted by the miseries of life. One can learn and practice the Dharma in the cycle of birth and death and enter the path to Buddhahood."

(<http://bodhimonastery.org/ven-jen-chun.html>:

<http://ftp.budaedu.org/ebooks/pdf/EN292.pdf>, p 53-54)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 31st, 2017 at 7:01 AM

Title: Re: From Impermanence to Buddhahood

Content:

White Lotus said:

seeing impermanence leading to emptiness is unnatural.

Astus wrote:

Impermanence is easier to see first. It is fairly common sense to know that nothing lasts forever. Then when it's broken down to finding the substance that changes, it turns out to be nowhere, hence empty.

"when a sentient being perceives the birth of a dharma, you should have him discard the view of its nonexistence. When he perceives the death of a dharma, you should have him discard the view of its existence. If he discards these views, he will realize that dharmas are by nature absolutely empty and definitely have no birth" (<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra53a.html>, ch 2)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 31st, 2017 at 8:27 PM

Title: Re: "highest practices" and anti-intellectualism

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

It sometimes feels to me like in our culture this approach risks turning into a Dharmic form of anti-intellectualism, and is often accompanied by "dude you can't learn Dharma from a book" (which while true in many ways, is sort of beside the point, and devalues scholarship and study). Am I just being paranoid, is it just my quirks and pet peeves, or is this a real trend that others have observed?

Astus wrote:

As I see it, the so called simple/direct methods are usually very basic practices with a lot of verbal ornamentation like "sudden enlightenment", "highest teaching", etc. They serve as entry points.

Through learning, one will comprehend dharmas. / 聞已得知法

Through learning, one will not do evil. / 聞已不作惡

Through learning, one will give up harm. / 聞已離無利

Through learning, one will gain nirvāṇa. / 聞已得涅槃

(The Noble Mahāyāna Sūtra of The Absorption That Encapsulates All Merit, tr 84000.co / T382p999a)

Johnny Dangerous said:

I mean, I get that one should not cling to or be conditioned by practices, that intellectual knowledge is provisional etc.. but I seem to run into the opposite sometimes - people who seem to reject "lower" practices altogether in favor of a sometimes rigid, sort of protestant approach where any "lower" practice requiring what is viewed as effort are frowned upon. Sometimes the value of studying or knowing Dharma subjects at all is questioned.

Astus wrote:

Knowledge is not provisional, it is quite essential. Interestingly, what is called the "sudden path" by both Bodhidharma (Two Entrance and Four Practices) and Dakpo Tashi (Mahamudra Moonlight, p 144) are for people established in the Dharma.

But this is really a very old problem with oversimplification. See Zhiyi:

"There is a type of meditation master who exclusively utilizes cessation-type practice and does not allow for the practice of contemplation. ... There is also a type of meditation master who exclusively utilizes the practice of contemplation and does not allow for the practice of cessation. ... Both of these types of teachers follow only one of the methods for realizing [enlightenment], and teach other people on the basis of the benefit they have received from [their one-sided practice]. Those who study [under them] are not aware of their [one-sided] intentions. [It is like the story in the Mahaparinirvana Sutra] "one who exclusively drinks milk will have difficulty getting a drink [of cream], not to mention ghee." If people rely exclusively [on either cessation or contemplation, or on only one teaching or practice] to attain understanding, then what was the reason for the Buddha to offer such a variety of teachings? The heavens are not always clear; a doctor does not rely exclusively on powdered medicine; one does not always eat rice."

(quoted by Paul L. Swanson in <https://nirc.nanzan-u.ac.jp/en/files/2012/11/Chih-i-on-Zen-and-Chih-kuan-8-2003.pdf>, p 8)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 31st, 2017 at 10:37 PM

Title: Re: From Impermanence to Buddhahood

Content:

White Lotus said:

"If i look for the substance that changes it turns out to be nowhere." because everything is dependent and has no self?

Astus wrote:

Because if everything changes, then there cannot be a separate substance that does not change.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 1st, 2017 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: From Impermanence to Buddhahood

Content:

White Lotus said:

i think that to speak of a "substance" that does not change may be unhelpful.

Astus wrote:

Whatever that is the object of attachment is assumed to be an unchanging thing, a substance. To see that such an object is merely the product of conceptual fabrication is recognising emptiness, and thus ending attachment.

White Lotus said:

We know that all language misses the point when we are talking about emptiness as an ultimate: it is nameless, wordless and beyond all concept.

Astus wrote:

Emptiness is the ultimate in that it is the absence of identification, of reification, and therefore of clinging.

White Lotus said:

In the same way 1 which is the focal point of emptiness of emptiness is too simple to say much about. Only that 1 is 1 and independent. I am inclined to think that it is not dependent upon anything. If we say that everything is impermanent we know that there is bound to be an exception to this rule.

Astus wrote:

That is another example of assuming a substance, hence a basis of attachment and suffering.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 3rd, 2017 at 2:36 AM

Title: Re: From Impermanence to Buddhahood

Content:

White Lotus said:

how do you see an interest in 1 harming my practice, is it danger of attachment? Surely 1 is by its nature: non attached.

Astus wrote:

I do not know what your practice is. Upholding the precepts and cultivating calming the mind do not necessarily interfere with such an assumption. When it comes to studying, comprehending, and realising the Dharma, then it is better to be open and attentive about what is actually taught instead of approaching it with the attitude of only confirming one's preexisting views. For instance, the whole of reality can be summed up as the five aggregates, and the realisation of truth can be achieved through recognising that there is no independent entity or thing within or without the aggregates. Focusing on the aggregates, or the six sensory realms, means basing oneself on actual experience, instead of theories disconnected from one's life. As for seeing the complete unreality of oneness/singularity, here is Mipham's summary:

"To begin with, there is an analysis of the essential identity of all conditioned and unconditioned phenomena to determine whether or not there is true singularity. In the case of those conditioned phenomena of the five aggregates possessing physical form, there is a division into above, below, the cardinal and intermediate directions and the centre. Through this, it can be seen that, for something such as a vase, singularity is simply a conceptual notion applied to the various features that are the basis for such an imputation. True singularity is not established, and the same applies in the case of its component parts. The body and the limbs are also divided into parts in the same way.

In short, all that possesses physical form and is composed of material particles may be broken down to its basis, which is the infinitely small particle. And, according to the logic explained before, for that most subtle particle to be surrounded by particles in the various directions, it must have sides, which means it must have parts, and so on, in an infinite regression. If not, then however many subtle particles are gathered together, they could never grow any larger. Thus, all phenomena with material form lack true singularity.

In addition, the eight or the six collections of consciousness can not be established as truly singular since they consist of various cognitive acts and mental states, take various features as their focus, and arise in different forms from the gathering of the four conditions, and then cease.

By analyzing everything that has the nature of arising and ceasing deriving from its own causes, even the subtlest indivisible moment can not be established, and so all phenomena included within mind and matter lack any true singularity. As for non-concurrent formations, they are simply imputations made upon the 'occasion' of mind and matter, and so they lack any essential identity. Unconditioned phenomena are imputations made with regard to the eliminated aspects of objects of negation, and are also lacking in any essential identity.

In short, all conditioned and unconditioned phenomena can not be shown to have any true singularity, and since this is not established, plurality that is made up of what is singular must also remain unestablished. And so, since there is no mode of true existence aside from being truly singular or plural, it must follow that individuals and phenomena are proven to be without inherent identity, just as it is explained more elaborately in The Ornament of the Middle Way."

(Investigation of the Essential Identity: 'Neither One Nor Many' from <http://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/mipham/four-great-logical-arguments>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 3rd, 2017 at 3:58 PM

Title: Re: Zongmi on Chan

Content:

Temicco said:

By who? He seems to have been invisible to the bulk of the Southern lineage teachers, being referenced mainly in Korean Zen lit.

Astus wrote:

He is considered the fifth patriarch of Huayan, and that in itself should be sufficient. He is also the primary commentator of the Perfect Enlightenment Sutra. His most outstanding spiritual heir was Yongming Yanshou, whose works have also been quite influential all over East Asia. As for his marginal role in Song era Chan compilations - on which I assume you base Zongmi's invisibility - that comes from the sectarian nature of such writings, but even in those books they did list him.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 4th, 2017 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: Zongmi on Chan

Content:

Temicco said:

In any event, his own authority as a Zen teacher is nil outside of certain circles.

Astus wrote:

What authority do you mean? His works are still studied by Chinese Buddhists, so I don't know what more could one want.

Temicco said:

I don't mean the Jingde Chuandeng lu or anything, even just the primary and secondary writings of other Southern lineage Zen teachers.

Astus wrote:

Could you be more specific? What writings?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 4th, 2017 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: Zongmi on Chan

Content:

Temicco said:

Huangbo's lectures, Foyan's writings, Dahui's letters, Hongzhi's CTEF, Wumen's Wumenguan, Yuanwu's letters, Yuanwu's Biyan lu, the majority of the sayings records translated thus far

Astus wrote:

Since Huangbo was Zongmi's contemporary, you basically mean Song era texts. The problem with that approach is that the type of Chan that Zongmi and Yongming represented were rejected by the proponents of Song era Linjizong teachers. First good example of that is Shenhui's treatment in the final version of the Platform Sutra where Huineng says to him:

"I told you it was without name or title, but you have called it the fundamental source, the buddha-nature. You've just covered your head with thatch. You've become a follower with only discriminative understanding."
(Platform Sutra, ch 8, BDK ed, p 78)

Dahui criticised Zongmi's views (see Morten Schlütter: How Zen Became Zen. p 120-121), but certainly even Dogen has heard of Zongmi (see Eihei Koroku, p237n78, p403-404).

Temicco said:

I believe some of Wansong's comments in Congrong lu reference him

Astus wrote:

Yes, he quotes him as Guifeng five times: case 1 (referring to his Origin of Humanity), case 42, case 45 (from his commentary on the Perfect Enlightenment Sutra), case 56, case 58 (from his commentary on the Diamond Sutra).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 4th, 2017 at 7:36 PM

Title: Re: Waste of precious time...?

Content:

Justmeagain said:

It feels like I am quite literally just sitting there, on my arse, staring at the floor.

Astus wrote:

What else should be there? That's why it's called just sitting.

Justmeagain said:

How do I get around this feeling of wasting precious time?

Astus wrote:

That is the desire to attain something. But there is nothing to attain.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 4th, 2017 at 10:34 PM

Title: Re: Waste of precious time...?

Content:

Justmeagain said:

why bother and what on earth am I doing leaving that warm bed and woman to sit on a cushion if there's no rationale for it???

Astus wrote:

It is following one's ideas about gain and loss that generates suffering. Shikantaza is the practice of enlightenment, that is, freedom from gain and loss.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 5th, 2017 at 1:34 AM

Title: Re: From Impermanence to Buddhahood

Content:

White Lotus said:

the Buddha said that "One is One", not only one emptiness, but also 1 - 1.

Astus wrote:

Where exactly is that stated by the Buddha?

White Lotus said:

I was amazed by the Mipham quote, but feel he only addresses the samsaric notion of singularity.

Astus wrote:

Are you saying you have a new meaning for the number 1?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 5th, 2017 at 2:22 AM

Title: Re: From Impermanence to Buddhahood

Content:

White Lotus said:

Im sorry Astus my source was: The Book of Angelus Silesius (auth. Frederick Franck), he quotes from the Avatamsaka sutra on page (?).

Astus wrote:

Search gave only this one result, that somewhat contradicts your assumption of oneness:

"The Hwa Yen sutra says: The incalculable aeons are but one moment, and that moment is no moment, thus one sees the Reality of the Universe"

(Messenger of the Heart: The Book of Angelus Silesius with Observations by the Ancient Zen Masters, p 31)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 5th, 2017 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: From Impermanence to Buddhahood

Content:

White Lotus said:

To say that 1 in 1 is self or not self is binary. In ideal 1, Buddha cannot be said to be the selfless self. He cannot be said to be the self that is no self. He is only and simply 1.

Astus wrote:

In what way does that relate to the four noble truths, the six paramitas, and the thirty-seven factors of enlightenment? How is that connected to freedom from attachment to concepts and emotions?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 5th, 2017 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: From Impermanence to Buddhahood

Content:

White Lotus said:

It seems the Buddha did not say 1 in 1; but Kegon have. I wouldn't say that this in any way weakens the proposition: 1 in 1.

Astus wrote:

It is on page 30 in "Messenger of the Heart", and it refers to a basic Huayan/Kegon teaching in relation to the third dharmadhatu, the interpenetration of principle and phenomena. Your version of an "ultimate 1" seems not in accord with Huayan teachings either. Here is Chengguan's explanation:

Take the first point, "one in one": because the first "one" does not lose its characteristics, it has substance, which contains; because it is noumenally not different from the second "one," it can contain the second "one." Meanwhile, since the second "one" is noumenally not different from the first "one," in accord with the contained noumenon it is in the first "one," because there is no phenomenon outside of noumenon.

Second, as for "one in all," because all do not lose their characteristics, they have substance which contains; being noumenally not different from the one, they can contain the one. Because the one is noumenally not different from the all, in accord with the principle of its own oneness the one is in the all.

Third, as for "all in one," because one does not lose its characteristics, it can be that which contains, while because it is noumenally not different from the all it can contain all. The all which is contained is noumenally not different from the one, so in accord with the noumenon inherent in all it is in the one.

Fourth, as for "all in all," because the first "all" do not lose their characteristics they have substance which contains; noumenally not being different from the second "all," they therefore contain the second "all." Because the second "all" noumenally are not different from the first "all," in accord with the noumenon of the second "all" they are in the first "all." Therefore in the conclusion he says each has a reason.

(Entry into the Inconceivable, p 114-115)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 6th, 2017 at 4:21 AM

Title: Re: Zongmi on Chan

Content:

Temicco said:

Why? Which books might talk about this?

Astus wrote:

I recommend the works of Albert Welter, most probably Yongming Yanshou's Conception of Chan in the Zongjing Lu touches on the subject of the emerging Linjizong in early Song.

Temicco said:

Wait, sorry, what's this an example of?

Astus wrote:

Zongmi claimed to be a descendant/follower of Shenhui, just as Yongming followed Zongmi's teachings later. They all use a very positive and assertive language for buddha-nature.

Temicco said:

for those who are interested in the Linji zong teachings

Astus wrote:

Are you aware that in the last couple hundred years the Linjizong has been practically synonymous with Chinese Buddhism? I mean, the term means almost nothing outside of the Song and late Ming era sectarian debates.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 6th, 2017 at 4:59 AM

Title: Re: Zongmi on Chan

Content:

Temicco said:

if modern Chinese Buddhists connected to the Linjizong

Astus wrote:

What I meant to say that being a member of the "Linji lineage" means virtually nothing in terms of what one studies and practices. For instance, Ven. Hsing Yun is a Linji lineage member, and so is every monastic in Fo Guang Shan, while for all intents and purposes that organisation embraces all "eight schools" and propagates Humanistic Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 7th, 2017 at 12:19 AM

Title: Re: From Impermanence to Buddhahood

Content:

White Lotus said:

It may be that Buddha is true 1 hood and emptiness both in an uncompounded unity. Form and emptiness comprise a unity. Ultimately, it is impossible for anything to be a 'compounded' substance because temporal one's do not exist.

Astus wrote:

The 4th and final dharmadhatu in the Huayan teaching is the interpenetration of phenomena with phenomena. In other words, there's just dependent origination. Or as <http://read.84000.co/#UT22084-062-012/translation> says:

"This dependent arising is the dharmakāya of all the tathāgatas. A person who sees dependent arising sees the Tathāgata."

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 8th, 2017 at 1:25 AM

Title: Re: What is the creation of the universe story in Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Buddhist_cosmology#Temporal_cosmology

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 8th, 2017 at 8:36 PM

Title: Re: What is the creation of the universe story in Buddhism?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

It's also important to understand that when the Buddha was quizzed about whether the world was eternal or of finite duration, that this is one of the 'undetermined questions'. They are questions which the Buddha wouldn't answer and suggested that they be put aside.

Astus wrote:

There is a whole samyutta (Anamataggasamyutta - Connected Discourses on Without Discoverable Beginning) on the topic of samsara having no beginning, so it is not at all such a dubious or unanswered issue in Buddhism.

"Bhikkhus, this samsara is without discoverable beginning. A first point is not discerned of beings roaming and wandering on hindered by ignorance and fettered by craving. Suppose, bhikkhus, a man would cut up whatever grass, sticks, branches, and foliage there are in this Jambudipa and collect them together into a single heap. Having done so, he would put them down, saying [for each one]: 'This is my mother, this my mother's mother.' The sequence of that man's mothers and grandmothers would not come to an end, yet the grass, wood, branches, and foliage in this Jambudipa would be used up and exhausted. For what reason? Because, bhikkhus, this samsara is without discoverable beginning. A first point is not discerned of beings roaming and wandering on hindered by ignorance and fettered by craving. For such a long time, bhikkhus, you have experienced suffering, anguish, and disaster, and swelled the cemetery."
(SN 15.1, tr Bhikkhu Bodhi)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 9th, 2017 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: What is the creation of the universe story in Buddhism?

Content:

Pjotr said:

Is the meaning of "without discoverable beginning" the same as "no beginning"? Does that sutta phrase "a first point is not discerned" imply "there is no first point"?

Astus wrote:

In simple terms, yes.

III.19d. In this way the circle of existence is without beginning.

Arising by reason of the defilements and actions; defilements and actions by reason of arising; arising by reason of the defilements and actions: the circle of existences is thus without beginning. In order for it to begin, it would be necessary for the first item to have no cause: and if one dharma arises without a cause, then all dharmas would arise without causes. Now the determination of time and place show that a seed produces a shoot, that a fire produces cooking: hence there is no arising that does not have causes. On the other hand, the theory of a single and permanent cause has been refuted above (ii.65): hence the cycle of existence has no beginning.
(Abhidharmakosabhasyam, vol 2, p 400-401)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 10th, 2017 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: Is Shikantaza a requisite of being a Soto Zennie?

Content:

Justmeagain said:

...or do Soto practitioners also practice Samatha and Vipassana?

Astus wrote:

What would it mean to be a "Soto practitioner" without actually practising it? Sounds like being a fisherman without ever fishing.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 11th, 2017 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: Is Shikantaza a requisite of being a Soto Zennie?

Content:

Justmeagain said:

is Soto Zen synonymous with Shikantaza only?

Astus wrote:

I think that depends on whom you ask. It seems to me that the mainstream answer is yes.

Justmeagain said:

Or to put it another way, does Soto Zen factor in the Four Foundations of Mindfulness, Sattipatana, Jhana etc...I guess not.

Astus wrote:

Shikantaza is supposed to be a "perfect and complete" practice that includes the whole path. After all, it is the practice of enlightenment.

"The zazen I speak of is not meditation practice. It is simply the dharma gate of joyful ease, the practice-realization of totally culminated enlightenment."

(http://web.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/gongyo_seiten/translations/part_3/fukan_zazengi.html)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 11th, 2017 at 5:53 PM

Title: Re: Is Shikantaza a requisite of being a Soto Zennie?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

While I never got much explanation of what is shikantaza when I was involved in Zen, I will say that it basically sounds like what other teachers describe as the union of shamatha and vipassana. If it's not, I'd love to know how/why it's different, other than the nomenclature used.

Astus wrote:

The traditional Zen term is the unity of samadhi and prajna.

"Good friends, our teaching takes meditation and wisdom as its fundamental. Everyone, do not say in your delusion that meditation and wisdom are different."

(Platform Sutra, ch 4, BDK ed, p 41)

Dogen basically says the same by calling zazen practice-enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 11th, 2017 at 8:25 PM

Title: Re: Is Shikantaza a requisite of being a Soto Zennie?

Content:

DGA said:

Dōgen elaborates it in his Shōbōgenzō.

Astus wrote:

Where exactly? Briefly in the Bendowa he rejects the option of using Tendai or other methods for meditation.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 11th, 2017 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: Is Shikantaza a requisite of being a Soto Zennie?

Content:

DGA said:

I remember reading around in book 6, in which zazen is described.

Astus wrote:

Book 6? The BDK edition has 4 volumes.

DGA said:

My point is that Dogen's descriptions of meditation don't really look or feel (if you will) like the teachings of Zhiyi.

Astus wrote:

Chan can be matched with Tiantai's sudden and perfect method of the neither sitting nor walking samadhi. Dogen's works are part of the mature Zen literature, so he uses lots of Chan lingo.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 11th, 2017 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Is Shikantaza a requisite of being a Soto Zennie?

Content:

DGA said:

I think Dogen is writing about something different from shi kan when he describes shikantaza. For starters, he wasn't a fool. If he wanted to discuss shi kan, he would have done so rather than developing a new concept to get his teaching across.

Astus wrote:

The only new thing about Dogen's approach to meditation that I can find is his focus on the physical posture. But as for what is to be done while seated, the matter of neither-thinking (hishiryo) and dropping body and mind (shinjin datsuraku), those are not different from prajnaparamita (non-abiding, no-thought, etc.).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 12th, 2017 at 4:44 AM

Title: Re: Is Shikantaza a requisite of being a Soto Zennie?

Content:

rory said:

Dogen does deny any influence of Tendai shikan in Bendo wa

Astus wrote:

I have not found that part of Bendowa. What he writes there regarding shikan:

"[Someone] asks, "Is there nothing to prevent a person who practices this zazen from also performing mantra and quiet-reflection practices?"

I say: When I was in China, I heard the true essence of the teachings from a true master; he said that he had never heard that any of the patriarchs who received the authentic transmission of the Buddha-seal ever performed such practices additionally, in the Western Heavens or in the Eastern Lands, in the past or in the present. Certainly, unless we devote ourselves to one thing, we will not attain complete wisdom."

(SBGZ, vol 1, p 16)

And the footnote to the question states for "quiet-reflection" (although I do not completely agree with it):

"Shikan, lit., "ceasing and reflecting," representing the Sanskrit words śamatha (quietness) and vipaśyanā (insight, reflection), is a practice of the Tendai sect: the method of practice is almost the same as the practice of zazen explained by Master Dōgen, but in the Tendai sect the practice is not regarded as sufficient in itself." (p28n85)

rory said:

He also mentions the direct connection between shamatha and the attainment of nirvana in Hsaio chih-kuan p. 86

Astus wrote:

That is an exaggeration. The section Bielefeldt refers to is about how one can attain calmness through realising emptiness. In other words, nirvana is perfect samatha.

rory said:

compares Dogen's samadhi of self-fulfilling activity as 'unconditioned freedom' to Shinran's naturalness

Astus wrote:

I consider it a misunderstanding of both Shinran and Dogen to make such comparisons.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 14th, 2017 at 3:24 PM

Title: Re: Is Shikantaza a requisite of being a Soto Zennie?

Content:

rory said:

Fascinating, which translation are you using and whose footnotes?

gassho

Rory

Astus wrote:

It's from the BDK edition (Nishijima & Cross translation) that you can find online on their site. It is also connected to the online Taisho, so you can compare it with the original easily.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 18th, 2017 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: Is Shikantaza a requisite of being a Soto Zennie?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Comparing shikantaza to the unity of samatha and vipasyana is not saying that it is like the gradual path of practising calm and insight, but it is like the accomplishing of both concentration and wisdom. That oneness of samadhi and prajna as the essence of Zen is explicitly stated in the Platform Sutra. It is no different from the inseparability of silence and illumination in Hongzhi's teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 18th, 2017 at 6:10 AM

Title: Re: Is Shikantaza a requisite of being a Soto Zennie?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Zen being subitist, I thought the above kind of goes without saying.

Astus wrote:

I think so far objections were about taking samath-vipasyana to be a step by step method, that is, it doesn't go without saying. As probably with any comparison, the first step is to define the elements compared.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 18th, 2017 at 7:56 PM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Queequeg said:

Shakyamuni did teach it.

Astus wrote:

If it had been taught by him, it should have been found in the sutras.

Queequeg said:

It was just expressed in a different string of sounds.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean he said one thing but meant another? Or do you refer to the general idea of reciting scripture titles?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 18th, 2017 at 8:59 PM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Queequeg said:

So are we debating whether Buddha taught the Lotus Sutra?

Astus wrote:

No, not that. Does the Lotus Sutra teach reciting its own title as a practice?

Queequeg said:

He taught single minded concentration on the real aspect of reality.

Astus wrote:

And that real aspect is a title of a scripture? Shouldn't it be something like suchness, emptiness, dependent origination, etc.?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 18th, 2017 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

DGA said:

The explicit practice--the recitation of those Sino-Japanese characters--Buddha Shakyamuni did not teach that, as you acknowledge. I think that's uncontroversial.

Astus wrote:

This is what I referred to with pointing out the absence of the practice in the scriptures.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 19th, 2017 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Queequeg said:

A teaching that posits emptiness and dependent origination as holistically integrated in a single thought moment is complete. NMRK is a creature of this school of thought and refers to this so-called Threefold Integrated Truth.

Astus wrote:

Tendai has the practice of contemplating the threefold truth, and that is understood to be the vipasyana leading to the wisdom of enlightenment. Repeating merely the title of a text that does not even include explicitly that doctrine seems very far from that. They are further from each other than the difference between riding a bike and repeating the name of a bike.

Queequeg said:

by practicing NMRK, even with the most feeble intent, their mind has oriented to the sublime reality and they are treading the path; in time, they will become increasingly familiar with the Mind of MRK which is the Buddha's mind.)

Astus wrote:

To say that it serves as a basis for later development sounds fine to me, but not anything beyond that.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 19th, 2017 at 12:46 AM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Queequeg said:

Thus declared Astus.

Astus wrote:

I'd rather like to find an explanation for it. As for me declaring anything, here are some passages from Huineng on the matter:

"Good friends, people of this world always recite prajñā with their mouths, but they don't recognize the prajñā of the self-natures. This is like talking about eating, which doesn't satisfy one's hunger. ... To recite it orally without practicing it in the mind is [as unreal] as a phantasm or hallucination, [and as evanescent] as dew or lightning. To recite it orally and practice it mentally is for mind and mouth to correspond."

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 28)

[Fada] said, "I have recited the Lotus Sutra three thousand times."

The master said, "Even if you recite it ten thousand times it won't help you understand the meaning of the scripture."

...

Fada said, "If this is so, then should one just understand the meaning and not bother to recite the sutras?"

The master said, "Can the sutras be in error? How could they impede your mindfulness? It is just that delusion and enlightenment are in the person, that harm and benefit depend on oneself. To recite with the mouth and practice in the mind is to turn the sutra. To recite with the mouth without practicing in the mind is to be turned by the sutra."
(Platform Sutra, ch 7, BDK ed, p 55, 58)

"To learn and recite is the small vehicle, to be enlightened to the Dharma and understand its meaning is the middle vehicle, and to cultivate according to the Dharma is the Great Vehicle. To penetrate all the myriad dharmas and to be equipped with all the myriad dharmas, without any defilement at all; to transcend the characteristics of the various dharmas, without anything that is attained: this is called the Supreme Vehicle."
(Platform Sutra, ch 7, BDK ed, p 63)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 19th, 2017 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Queequeg said:

What response is there to that?

Astus wrote:

Let me rephrase it then as a question: what is the connection between recitation and insight? How does one get from repeating the title to enlightenment?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 19th, 2017 at 8:10 PM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Queequeg said:

Anything and everything is the Middleway Buddha nature. This means any practice, any train of thought fully pursued to it's end, ends in full blown enlightenment.

...

As I've suggested above, why not any other chant. Sure. Why not just Zazen. Sure why not. Any practice will work. The dung beetle attains enlightenment perfecting his craft rolling balls of shit. This is the point of departure where in Japan, craftsmanship became a spiritual pursuit. Crafting the aesthetically perfectly imperfect tea bowl, or the perfection of kata.

Astus wrote:

Seeing that all is buddha-mind comes as the final realisation, so how can that be used to validate any practice? If it were true that anything fully pursued is a liberating path, what is the point of a Buddhist teaching? I mean, there have always been maximalists, hedonists, extremists, etc. This reasoning seems to contradict both ordinary and Dharmic causality where one always needs specific causes and conditions to reach specific results.

Queequeg said:

Chanting is prescribed for the obstacle of a distracted mind. ... It's also a mnemonic sort of theory contemplation by virtue of it having been expounded by Zhiyi as the distillation/complete embodiment of the Buddha's teaching.

Astus wrote:

And in that way chanting is one of the most popular practises everywhere, even beyond Buddhism.

Queequeg said:

It's also, at a level I can only describe as mystic, a melding with the Buddha mind.

Astus wrote:

There are teachings addressing the relation between recitation/chanting and realisation of buddha-mind, for instance it is called the "real mark buddha remembrance" (實相念佛) in the Pure Land school, but there realisation is qualitatively distinct from mere verbal repetition.

Queequeg said:

From the moment you hear the Buddha's name, you've irreversibly entered the Buddha path, just as the poor man is transformed the moment he hears that he is the rich man's son.

Astus wrote:

That is also a generally accepted concept derived from the 17th chapter (The Merit of the Initial Determination for Enlightenment) of the Avatamsaka Sutra, and used to illustrate how the 1st level - raising bodhicitta - of the path is equal to the 52nd level - buddhahood. But that does not mean one can just skip the 50 stages between start and finish.

Queequeg said:

NMRK is at the most basic level, this introduction.

Astus wrote:

So is it that NMRK is meant as the first step that requires all the paramitas and stages to be followed up by? Like buddha remembrance in the Pure Land school that is meant to bring one to Sukhavati where one begins the actual training on the path of sages?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 21st, 2017 at 12:21 AM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Queequeg said:

In the Lotus Sutra traditions, the Perfect and Sudden path starts with being told of your Buddhanature - we don't wait to the final realization. This idea appears throughout Zhiyi's writings, but is perhaps most directly explained in the Zhiyi's Mohozhikuan in the section on the Six Identities. The Six Identities is an outline of Buddhist path from ordinary being to Buddha.

Astus wrote:

The six identities system is a very good example of a gradual path.

Queequeg said:

The Buddha-mind/Buddhanature/tathagatagarbha is given from the start. You can argue against that, but I will not be joining you on that excursion.

Astus wrote:

I do not argue that at all.

Queequeg said:

Since what we are dealing with is reality, it follows that any dharma pursued to its end reveals the real nature of reality. Even if you start with an utterly unfounded dharma, like the horns of a rabbit. Reality is unavoidable.

Astus wrote:

What's the point of a path if it is unavoidable? Just as described in the six identities, one needs first of all to hear about it, then through practice gradually reach complete realisation. If one has not heard about the Dharma, one will not move from the first to the second identity.

Queequeg said:

Since Buddha is innate in reality, of course we encounter Buddha sooner, hopefully, or later.

Astus wrote:

Samsara has been going on without a beginning and apparently we have failed to attain buddhahood so far.

Queequeg said:

Its not a gradual path, which seems to be what you keep trying to relate this to.

Astus wrote:

A sudden path means buddhahood right now, no development, no practice, just perfect enlightenment. Would you say that the moment one utters NMRK one has unbounded wisdom and compassion?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 21st, 2017 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Queequeg said:

Except that it explicitly is not.

Astus wrote:

How so? It lists six identities. Shengyan (Orthodox Chinese Buddhism, p 100-102) sums it up like this:

"The fact that all sentient beings on the earth possess the Tathāgata's wisdom and meritorious characteristics is Buddhahood in Principle.

The second level consists of people who have heard the Dharma and already know they intrinsically possess buddha-nature, the potential to become a Buddha.

People who are practicing the Dharma and can subdue (but not sever) the afflictions occupy the third level.

Those at the fourth level have purified their six sense faculties and are fast approaching entry into the noble stages.

The fifth level comprises noble bodhisattvas who have reached the first abiding stage or beyond.

The sixth level consists of true Buddhas, who have achieved the perfect fruition of unsurpassed, perfect enlightenment."

This is a clear description of the gradual bodhisattva path from the beginning to the end.

Queequeg said:

We're not speaking the same vocabulary.

Astus wrote:

That's possible. In that case, could you clarify please what you mean by such terms as sudden path, etc.?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 21st, 2017 at 4:40 AM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Queequeg said:

We're talking about Lotus Buddhism, and so you need to rely on Lotus Buddhism sources for definitions.

Astus wrote:

Isn't there something from Nichiren on the matter that explains these issues?

Queequeg said:

Zhiyi defines the Sudden and Perfect Path as the path based on Buddhanature. The Perfect teaching can appear as a gradual path, but that doesn't mean it is really is gradual path.

Astus wrote:

Zhiyi taught an extensive system of various practices where the progress from ordinary being to enlightenment is logically explained. How can that be replaced by simple recitation?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 21st, 2017 at 6:57 PM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Queequeg said:

What issues?

Astus wrote:

E.g.:

How the recitation of the title is enlightenment?

If so, what does enlightenment mean?

Or is the recitation an initial step towards further practice?

If so, what are those later practices?

Queequeg said:

Much of what he taught was Gradual and Distinct. He Taught Sudden and Perfect meditation only in the 7th section of Mohezhikuan. That's the Ichinen Sanzen meditation.

Astus wrote:

Here is something relevant by Rev. Kanji Tamura:

"Meanwhile, the existence of the Buddha as the concrete goal for all sentient beings is revealed in the essential section. According to Nichiren Shonin, the ichinen sanzen doctrine of the theoretical section is just a step to the ichinen sanzen of the essential section. When the land of the Eternal Sakyamuni Buddha, the true realm of Buddhas, was revealed for the first time in the essential section, the theory of mutual possession of ten realms integrated by the realm of Buddhas as well as the ichinen sanzen doctrine is truly realized in this world. (referring to "Open Your Eyes to the Lotus Teaching") Comparing both sections, the theoretical section is focused on taking steps upward to the realm of Buddhas while the essential section shows the salvation bestowed downward by Sakyamuni Buddha. Both sections the both upward and downward. However, the theoretical section emphasizes the self-improvement factors of the Lotus Sutra. It plainly says, "May the merits we have accumulated by this offering be distributed among all living beings, and may we and all other living beings attain the enlightenment of the Buddha!" (Chapter 7) On the other hand, the essential section describes Sakyamuni Buddha's vow to save all sentient beings based on His great compassion, saying, "I am always thinking: How shall I cause all living beings to enter into the unsurpassed Way and quickly become Buddha?" (Chapter 16) There, Sakyamuni Buddha's compassion comes down to sentient beings while sentient beings are to go up to the land of Sakyamuni Buddha by their faith. This two-way connection is the basic form of the essential section.

The ichinen sanzen doctrine of the theoretical section begins with observing the transient mind that changes moment by moment. On the other hand, the ichinen sanzen of the essential section begins with unification between the great compassion of Eternal Sakyamuni Buddha and our mind of faith. In other words, to feel Eternal Sakyamuni Buddha through our existences and our faith is the 'actuality' (or realization) of the ichinen sanzen doctrine."

(http://www.nichiren-shu.org/newsletter/nichirenschu_news/nichiren148e.pdf)

From this it seems to me that the practice of calming and contemplation is replaced by the faith that somehow Shakyamuni will transfer his buddhahood to the believers. This "somehow" is explained with the theory of interpenetration and universal buddha-nature. However, I guess because this system is based purely on faith, there is no logical connection provided for the transfer of buddhahood, nor for how realisation could happen by recitation.

Queequeg said:

there is a big chunk of this discussion that is being left out - ichinensanzen, or "Three Thousand Realms in a Single Thought-Moment". Without that, this discussion is pretty much knee capped. You can't understand Daimoku without it. I don't think you can understand Tiantai without it.

Astus wrote:

Ichinen sanzen does not explain how recitation of the title can be equal to enlightenment. Furthermore, there is no connection established between recitation and realising ichinen sanzen. This is what I really feel left out.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 21st, 2017 at 7:08 PM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

rory said:

Tendai Shu of course has the concept endon sho

Astus wrote:

And that description does fit into what a sudden path is, what enlightenment at this very moment stands for.

As Seishin quotes Ven Shoshin Ichishima on the issue of ichinen sanzen and its relation to perfect and sudden enlightenment:

"Our World, the Buddha World, the world of sentient beings, or the five aggregates are all in fact the expressions of Middle Way. You can not avoid sufferings. Ignorance and delusions themselves are the object of Enlightenment. There is not any cause of suffering to be cut off. All of Fundamental Ignorance and distorted mind are involved in the Middle Way. There isn't any special path to be practiced. Our Life and Death are the manifestation of Nirvana."

(<https://tendaiuk.com/2016/05/05/ichinen-sanzen/>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 21st, 2017 at 7:15 PM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Anonymous X said:

I could use the example of Dogen's premise that just sitting is a natural expression of Buddhahood. Does this mean that anyone who sits zazen is a Buddha and is replete with Omniscience?

Astus wrote:

Of course it does.

Anonymous X said:

I don't think your definition of a sudden path is necessarily accurate. A path is an avenue to something, an attainment.

Astus wrote:

If a path meant something necessarily gradual, it cannot be sudden, so that means there is no sudden path.

Anonymous X said:

Spontaneous awakening is something different. Even with a spontaneous awakening, there will be an acclimation to it that could be seen as taking time, ala step by step, but even this is misleading.

Astus wrote:

Sudden enlightenment does not and can not mean some event without cause, or a chance realisation. As for the teaching of "sudden enlightenment, gradual practice", there enlightenment does not mean the attainment of buddhahood, but mostly an initial understanding.

Anonymous X said:

Once the recognition of Buddhanature takes hold, time is not of any importance. Integration is not seen as a time-space activity. It all becomes spontaneous. All dharmas are apprehended in their original nature. Nothing to do, nothing to be understood, nothing to achieve. Have I missed the point?

Astus wrote:

The traditional bodhisattva path is exactly like that, first working on understanding emptiness, then realising emptiness, and then cultivating the realisation of emptiness, until full maturation as a buddha. That is what the gradual path looks like.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 21st, 2017 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Anonymous X said:

I recently came across this website here in Thailand. Have you ever heard of this https://soundcloud.com/maha_barami/disregard-all-views?in=maha_barami/sets/voice-of-dharma-monk? Luangpor Phosrisuriya Khemarato

Astus wrote:

I did not. However, in the talk you linked the context is different, but it's always good to remind oneself that all views are false.

"Through the idea that (something is) agreeable, (the ignorant) become attached (to it); separating themselves from that (idea), (the mediocre) are free from attachment; when (the lofty-minded) see (that everything), as the man created by magic, lacks an own being, they attain nirvana."

(Nagarjuna: <https://journals.ub.uni-heidelberg.de/index.php/jiabs/article/viewFile/8608/251556>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 21st, 2017 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Anonymous X said:

It is a symbolic action.

Astus wrote:

If that were not the case, then it would be just rhetoric to trick people.

Anonymous X said:

One can practice for many years and suddenly awaken. All awakening seems to be sudden to my understanding. That would preclude any step by step.

Astus wrote:

Gradual practice followed by a "sudden" awakening is a different issue.

Anonymous X said:

Step by step always has a division of subject/object unless there is first, an awakening to the Buddhanature.

Astus wrote:

Only buddhas are awakened to the buddha-nature.

Anonymous X said:

I never mentioned enlightenment and rarely use the word. If you mean awakening to Buddhanature, why would you need a cause if it is our intrinsic natural state? It only seems like something causes it. If it is a meditative state of mind, I would agree with you.

Astus wrote:

There is necessarily a path to liberation, otherwise there is no chance of anyone becoming free from samsara. Assuming there is no cause of awakening is considered a wrong view in Buddhism.

Anonymous X said:

In Dzogchen, they call rigpa, self-sprung.

Astus wrote:

I assume you mean rangjung (rang - self; byung - arise).

Anonymous X said:

Who is working on understanding emptiness? Who is realising it? Who is cultivating it?

Astus wrote:

It's called a bodhisattva.

Anonymous X said:

This is all symbolic, not literal.

Astus wrote:

What is the difference between symbolic and literal? Can you give examples to both?

Anonymous X said:

There is a momentum, but it is non dual and you are not in charge.

Astus wrote:

What is viryaparamita for then?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 22nd, 2017 at 4:05 PM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Anonymous X said:

Concept is symbolic, direct experience is literal. Can you show me advaya? No, but you 'know' when it is the case.

Astus wrote:

In other words, all concepts are symbolic, therefore there is no difference between one word and another, as they are equally symbolic. Advaya is another concept, and it can be explained quite adequately. As for direct experience being literal, it can hardly be that, since it is without letters, i.e. words and concepts, therefore without meaning.

Anonymous X said:

This has something to do with 'hero wisdom'. What it is I can't say. I would think this is a word that would be subject to different interpretations. What is yours?

Astus wrote:

Transcendent vigour is intentional effort in cultivating the paramitas. Cultivation does not happen naturally or automatically, and such ideas only result in indolence and laziness, the very opposites of virya.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 22nd, 2017 at 4:10 PM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

rory said:

"Nichiren's thought focuses on realizing Buddhahood at the state of verbal identity, which he understood as the stage of embracing the daimoku of the Lotus sutra and taking faith in it.[/i]

....but "To say that "walking standing, sitting, and lying down are themselves the essence of calming and contemplation" is thus to express the insight of one awakened to original nonduality, not to deny the necessity of practice."

Astus wrote:

If I understand you correctly, you mean that the recitation of the title is an initial method that is meant to introduce people to the Dharma, but following that it requires continued practice of other methods. That being so, how is recitation followed by what practices?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 23rd, 2017 at 2:55 AM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Anonymous X said:

Right, cultivation is not natural or automatic, that is why I originally referred to one's Buddhanature, the nature of one's own mind.

Astus wrote:

Realising buddha-nature is how one becomes a buddha, as only buddhas experience directly buddha-nature.

Anonymous X said:

When that is recognized, there is no cultivation in the sense of a doer or a path. It happens spontaneously. Any effort is a falling back into habit energy. You don't break through habit energy with habit energy. It is a letting go of it because there is nothing that needs to be done to it. This doesn't contradict Chan and other schools and I believe inline with Zongmi.

Astus wrote:

The initial awakening given in Zongmi's system is an intellectual understanding of buddha-nature, and that is why it is equivalent to the level of faith, the first section of the 52 stages of the bodhiattva path. The subsequent gradual training means going through those 52 stages. If such progression could happen automatically or spontaneously, there would be no need to even mention step-by-step training, much less explain it in detail.

"Some say: "One must first all-at-once awaken and then should step-by-step practice." This is in conformity with [intellectual] understanding awakening. (If we speak in conformity with the cutting off of hindrances, this is like the sun's rising all-at-once but the frost's melting step-by-step. If we speak in conformity with the perfecting of attributes, this is like the fact that, upon birth, a child all-at-once possesses four limbs and six senses and as it matures step-by-step perfects its will and functions.) Therefore, the Huayan says: "When one first raises the thought [of awakening], one attains perfect awakening." Only after this are the three worthies and the ten [stages of] the noble one step-by-step cultivated and realized."

(Chan Prolegomenon, in Zongmi on Chan, p 153)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 23rd, 2017 at 6:07 AM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

rory said:

From experience with Nichiren Shu and Kempon Hokke Shu, they advocate study, meditation, sutra chanting, visualization, ascetic practices for the priesthood and rebirth, but they aren't original enlightenment sects...

Astus wrote:

Is there anything available online, or at least in English, on the details of those practices?

rory said:

How SGI, Nichiren Shoshu, get from only chanting to Buddhahood. I simply don't know.

Astus wrote:

That's unfortunate, as that is the big question.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 23rd, 2017 at 6:29 PM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

rory said:

sure here is a link to aragyo:

<http://www.nichiren.or.jp/english/temples/hokkekyoji/page2.php> study: <http://www.nichiren-shu.org/practice.html>

shodaigyo meditation: <http://www.shodaigyo.org/>

SGI: <https://www.sgi.org/about-us/buddhism-in-daily-life/who-is-a-buddha.html>

Astus wrote:

Thank you. Apparently http://www.nichiren.or.jp/english/teachings/teachings_nichiren/ teaches the same:

"Because the Odaimoku embodies the essence of the Lotus Sutra, it contains all of the qualities of Buddhahood. This means that by the merit of the five characters, Myo Ho Ren Ge Kyo, we can attain Buddhahood by reciting the Odaimoku, Namu Myoho Renge Kyo."

Just as in <https://www.sgi.org/about-us/buddhism-in-daily-life/who-is-a-buddha.html>:

"As with gold hidden in a dirty bag, or lotus flowers emerging from a muddy pond, we have first to believe our Buddha nature is there, then awaken and develop or "polish" it. In Nichiren Buddhism this can be done through devotion to the law contained in the Lotus Sutra and the chanting of the phrase "Nam-myoho-renge-kyo."

On the other hand, usually in Buddhism one is taught to directly address the cause(s) of suffering and delusion, and one is given ways to remove ignorance. I do not see how repeating a few syllables could ever achieve the same.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 23rd, 2017 at 6:44 PM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Anonymous X said:

An intellectual understanding is not what I'm talking about. That is what all of the step by step is based on, not the recognition of your own nature. Zongmi often goes much deeper than how you are pigeon-holing him.

Astus wrote:

Could you provide some quotes from Zongmi on the matter? As for what I said before:

"Even after all-at-once-understanding awakening, the habit energy from innumerable past lives is impossible to eliminate all at once, and so one must engage in a step-by-step practice grounded in intellectual-understanding awakening."

(Zongmi on Chan, p 96)

"If one relies on awakening to practice, it is [intellectual] understanding awakening, but, if one relies on practice to awaken, it is [direct] realization awakening."

(Zongmi on Chan, p 153-154)

Anonymous X said:

When I say automatically or spontaneously, it is not a by-pass of step by step. It is a qualitatively different approach to it that is not time-based on dualistic notions of achievement. There still needs to be an accounting of everything, but it happens in a different field than the doer is operating in. That same letting go is in operation and sudden vs gradual loses its meaning. No reference point. Thusness.....

Astus wrote:

What you seem to propose is what Zongmi attributes to the Hongzhou school (and he does not agree with it):

"Once one has gained understanding awakening into this principle, everything [partakes of] the spontaneity of the heavenly real. Therefore, the principle of practice should be in accordance with this, and you should not stir mind to cut off the bad, nor should you stir mind to cultivate the path. The path is mind. You should not use mind to cultivate [the path in] mind. The bad is also mind. You should not use mind to cut off [the bad in] mind. When you neither cut off [bad] nor create [karma], but just give free rein to luck and exist in freedom, then you are to be called a liberated person. There are no dharmas to get caught up in, no buddhas to become. It is like space that neither increases nor decreases. What could you possibly add to it? Why is this so? Outside the mind nature there is not even one dharma to be apprehended. Therefore, "just give free rein to mind" is practice."

(Zongmi on Chan, p 86)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 24th, 2017 at 1:15 AM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Anonymous X said:

'Grounded in substance' is what I was trying to say when I mentioned a qualitatively different approach.

Astus wrote:

Even the standard bodhisattva path is necessarily grounded in substance, because the practice of the paramitas require the realisation of prajnapramita first. Similarly, in the sravakayana a stream-entrant possesses the correct understanding of the view, but needs to cultivate the path to eventually attain nirvana.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 26th, 2017 at 7:33 PM

Title: Diamond Sutra Summary by Hanshan

Content:

Astus wrote:

"As all living things are deluded and upset by their views of forms and since their grasp is very hard to break, the Buddha used the Diamond mind wisdom to demolish these views one by one, in order to enable them to perceive the fundamental wisdom of the Dharma-kaya's body.

At first they clung to the forms of the five aggregates (skandhas) of body and mind and to the six sense data. They were attached to these forms while giving alms (dana) to seek merits in their quest of Buddhahood. The World Honoured One broke up this by the doctrine of non-attachment.

Next, they clung to the form of Bodhi and the Buddha broke it up by the doctrine of gainlessness.

Next, they clung to the form of Buddha lands adorned by almsgiving (dana) and the Buddha broke it up by declaring that there are no lands which can be adorned.

Next, they clung to merits which would result in the appearance of the Reward body (or Sambhoga-kaya) and the Buddha broke it up by stating that it is not in fact the completely perfect form body (Rupa-kaya).

Next, they clung to the appearance of the Trikaya which the Tathagata possessed and the Buddha broke it up by declaring that the Nirmanakaya is not real and that Sambhoga-kaya is beyond forms.

Next, they clung to the view that the Dharma-kaya must have forms, and the Buddha broke this up by declaring that the Dharma-kaya has none.

Next, they clung to the existence of a true ego in the Dharma-kaya and the Buddha broke it up by declaring that all things are egoless.

Next, they clung to the view that the Tathagata possessed the forms of the Trikaya and the Buddha broke up this by declaring that the real is neither monistic nor pluralistic.

Thus all their false views were broken up successively one after the other, and with the elimination of all idea of form and appearance, the mind had nowhere to alight."

(Hanshan Deqing: The Diamond Cutter of Doubts, in Lu K'uan Yü: "Ch'an and Zen Teaching", first series, p 203-204)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 27th, 2017 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Queequeg said:

You guys are caught up in the connection between the forming of sounds with the mouth, as if that is all that is implied by the practice of Daimoku. Nichiren explicitly taught that the Daimoku, more than just contemplated, more than just recited, must be "read with the body." The Daimoku is actually a teaching on taking the moment to moment nature of life, in the most mundane circumstances, and striving to live in accord with Buddhanature moment to moment, no matter how faintly understood.

Astus wrote:

What is the definition of buddha-nature? I'm asking this because there are quite a few ways to define it, and depending on that there can be different approaches to it. If, for instance, it refers to the presence of various buddha qualities, then a sudden path should mean the immediate presence of those qualities.

Queequeg said:

The practical application is the same whether Buddhanature is seen through insight or through faith. I honor you as a Buddha either way. The experience of honoring you as a Buddha has beneficial effects regardless of how my experience is informed. The effects are different - as they say, we hear the same teaching differently - but like the Dharma rain, it falls and nourishes everyone.

Astus wrote:

That description sounds to me as a skilful means to teach people the practice of humility and respect, but not really anything that brings about insight into interdependence.

Queequeg said:

If any practice can be discerned in the Lotus Sutra, its the propagation of the Lotus Sutra - the exhortation to teach even one phrase, and concomitantly describing the immense benefit of even a person who hears of the Lotus through a telephone game of 50 people and reacts with the slightest joy.

Astus wrote:

How is that any different from accumulating worldly merit that may eventually bring one to studying the Dharma? Furthermore, with propagation as the sole practice actually found in that scripture, it is hard to see how that actually covers the whole of Buddhadharma. It is like saying that obtaining faith in the Triple Jewel is the basis of enlightenment, but at the same time that is only the very first step on the path and not the entirety of the path.

Queequeg said:

There is a strong prejudice against what I will call public, engaged practice in favor of contemplation in the Buddhist community that seems distorted and exaggerated in some sense.

Astus wrote:

I have not seen that raised as an objection here.

Queequeg said:

Is it really such a more effective practice to sit in contemplation rather than engage with others, striving to see their buddhahood and try to relieve their suffering?

Astus wrote:

Interpersonal relations have been the subject of practice from the beginning under the topic of ethical discipline. As for Mahayana, the accumulation of merit - the first three paramitas - are very important. However, without wisdom meritorious acts only generate samsaric results.

"With no understanding of the meaning of absence,

But engaging only in mere studies

And failing to engage in meritorious acts-

Such base people are lost."

(Nagarjuna: <http://www.tibetanclassics.org/html-assets/SixtyStanzas.pdf>, v31)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 28th, 2017 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Queequeg said:

Its hard to discern where you're going with your pronouncements, insistence on standards that are foreign to this particular system of thought, and apparent lack of acknowledgment of answers to previous questions.

Astus wrote:

Simply put, I'd like to make sense of what Nichiren's teaching is about. Reciting the title, the sutra, respecting others based on the assumption of inherent buddha-nature - these are clear elements. What I still find unclear is how one gets from delusion to enlightenment. There is a general description of the bodhisattva path in Mahayana, where one needs to remove the twofold obscuration, so unless the cause of samsara (ignorance) is not accepted within the Lotus Tradition, I'm trying to figure out how those practices of recitation and respect can actually address delusion. I did go through the answers you have provided in this thread so far, I also read some explanations available online from Nichiren followers and some of the works of Nichiren as well, but it is simply not clear.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 28th, 2017 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Queequeg said:

If you're really interested, I suggested a book by Brook Ziporyn above. Notwithstanding his style of presenting the subject, I think you're going to be surprised.

Astus wrote:

Thanks. And until I can actually obtain that book, isn't there anything online, like in the works of Nichiren?

Queequeg said:

Enlightenment is realizing the real nature of delusions. Once you understand that, what more is there to do with them? What is there to address?

Astus wrote:

So it is accepted in Mahayana in general.

The thorough understanding of cyclic existence -

This is referred to as "nirvana."

(Nagarjuna: <http://www.tibetanclassics.org/html-assets/SixtyStanzas.pdf>, v6)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 28th, 2017 at 5:43 AM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Queequeg said:

These are 10 important letters identified by Nichiren's direct disciple, Nikko:

Astus wrote:

That is a useful list, thank you.

Queequeg said:

And so you should understand there's nothing to do about delusion.

Astus wrote:

There is a lot to do about delusion, most importantly recognise its empty nature and that way abandon attachment to it. Otherwise it's just samsara-business as usual.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 28th, 2017 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

rory said:

The answer is Nichiren took Medieval Tendai hongaku doctrine as far as it would go. From Original Enlightenment again talking about a Medieval text Shuzenji-ketsu...Thus the achievement of full enlightenment at the stage of verbal identity is presented as a theoretical possibility, but one limited only to the most capable."

Astus wrote:

Didn't Nichiren teach according to the doctrine of Dharma decline where beings have weak faculties? Dogen did call zazen practice-enlightenment, but that seems qualitatively very far from reciting the title.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 29th, 2017 at 4:21 AM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Queequeg said:

You asked what Nichiren is about, so here's what it means to me.

Astus wrote:

Thank you.

I'd like to sum up what I could take from it, and please tell if you agree with it or not.

"the Daimoku is about seeing Buddhature in all beings and things." means that "one enters the wisdom through faith", and "The Daimoku is an expression of this faith, a way to put it into practice." So "NMRK is the practice of seeing Buddhature in all beings and all things", and that "is the theoretical framework." That means "we rely on its expression in our lives, even as we may not understand how it is expressing as us", so to say that "we are aspects of Buddhahood, our activity is Buddha activity" is an article of faith, and that makes the various activities (" striving to be kind, compassionate, caring, supportive", etc.) "consciously framed in the path to Buddhahood."

To make it even shorter: the path taught by Nichiren is to have faith in inherent buddha-nature and the future achievement of buddhahood, and that faith is expressed in the various practices, like the recitation of the title. Is this an accurate summary?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 29th, 2017 at 5:42 PM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Queequeg said:

You keep trying to define it in a certain way.

Astus wrote:

Yes, a clear definition could be useful.

Queequeg said:

A single moment of thought (一念) is by definition "the Total Field of All Phenomena".

The Total Field of All Phenomena is also Buddha. This is what Zhiyi means when he says, all beings are Buddhas in principle.

Astus wrote:

I think it's important here to be precise about what Dharmadhatu (Total Field of All Phenomena) actually stands for. It means emptiness. Because both nirvana and samsara, the realm of buddhas and the realm of sentient beings are equally and completely empty, they are not different in the ultimate sense. And when one has fully realised universal emptiness, that is, one is free from clinging to views, then no phenomena is attached to.

Queequeg said:

To hear of the Buddhanature is to be apprised of this fact. Once you are told, that is how the Total Field of All Phenomena and the single thought moment are understood.

Astus wrote:

Learning of something is the first step, but it needs to be followed by understanding and realisation in order to be of actual use. That's why there are six identities, not just one or two.

Queequeg said:

Faith in Daimoku means "Trust that all phenomena without exception are aspects of Buddhahood." Notice Zhiyi did not refer to some future Buddhahood. Its an immediate insight. Daimoku is the same insight.

Astus wrote:

Here I cannot see the connection between what Zhiyi says and Daimoku. Zhiyi talks about the highest possible level of enlightenment where one is free from all identification and view. The Daimoku is a set of syllables, that may represent buddhahood, but so does the word "buddha" represent it, and while many people know the word "buddha", that does not make them buddhas, and certainly not immediately.

Queequeg said:

The phenomena which make up moment to moment experience are not some theoretical postulate. They are the actual experience from moment to moment. They are you looking at these words on a screen. Observing the Real Aspect of Reality is this moment to moment experience.

Astus wrote:

Everyone already has moment to moment experience. But very few have realised that experiences are unborn and empty. Even momentariness is a rather unknown teaching, and that is still an approach of the shravakayana far from "perfect and sudden". In other words, just because things are already suchness, emptiness, no self, etc., that doesn't automatically make beings buddhas. Just knowing the words is insufficient for awakening, and understanding their meaning is not enough either. How can it be the whole path to just believe in words one does not even comprehend? It sounds like claiming that merely because people recite the Heart Sutra every morning and every evening that makes them sages, while even if one studies every letter of the sutra it is still not enough to be a noble bodhisattva, much less a buddha. But, I'm happy to be wrong about all this.

Queequeg said:

The faith here is adhimukti - the moment immediately following contact between the sense object and sense apparatus, where the dharma appears but before ideation about it has arisen.

Astus wrote:

I'm not sure I understand what you mean here. Why would a thoughtless state be called faith? Perhaps in some sense of "ultimate faith" can be equated with not having thoughts, but what is that good for? On the other hand, if by "before ideation" you mean nirvikalpa or nisrapanica, that is not the moment before a thought arises, but the freedom from grasping concepts through the realisation of their insubstantiality.

Queequeg said:

In the case of the daimoku, it is the approbation that the dharmas are Buddha.

Astus wrote:

How is that any different from knowing that appearances are impermanent? What I mean is that even though people know that nothing lasts forever, they cling to them nevertheless, because impermanence is merely an idea and not something fully understood and realised.

Queequeg said:

The faith you're positing is in something far more complicated and complex. An object that is in the future, and so unreal. You're trying to place this into a linear time frame - your default assumption about a gradual path. Some faith in a future achievement. That fits with your assumption about a linear gradual path, but it's not applicable here. You have to take what you posit as linear and collapse it into a single thought moment.

Astus wrote:

Could you demonstrate how this works? For example, I like chocolate. In order to obtain chocolate, I need to go to the shop and buy it, then take it home and eat the chocolate. This is a gradual, sequential path, that goes from desire, through effort, to the satisfaction of desire. To collapse it into a single thought would mean a thought that is simultaneously desire, effort, and satisfaction, however, that sounds very much like an impossibility, as either one wants something or does not. Similarly, the path from ordinary being to buddhahood means having all sorts of emotional and conceptual afflictions to not having any of them. Even though afflictions have always been empty, that emptiness is not recognised at all, and that is why they are called afflictions. Of course, if one could just immediately be free from the myriad disturbances in a single moment of thought, that would be truly wonderful. But saying that "afflictions are bodhi" does not really help with that. So that's why I fail to see what you mean by collapsing the linear into a single thought moment.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 30th, 2017 at 3:02 AM

Title: Re: If according to Nichiren Buddhism, the Buddha taught people according to their level of understanding or capacity...

Content:

Queequeg said:

Like I said, you're making this more complicated and then we have to deal with the complications you posit. What I'm referring to has nothing to do with all that.

Astus wrote:

I think I see it now, and I can only accept that Nichiren's teaching is what it is:

"Because the Odaimoku embodies the essence of the Lotus Sutra, it contains all of the qualities of Buddhahood. This means that by the merit of the five characters, Myo Ho Ren Ge Kyo, we can attain Buddhahood by reciting the Odaimoku, Namu Myoho Renge Kyo."

(http://www.nichiren.or.jp/english/teachings/teachings_nichiren/)

Thank you for your answers.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 2nd, 2017 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: "Self inquiry" in Zen, Chan, etc

Content:

Astus wrote:

For a thorough treatment of the topic of huatou practice:

http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/bbs/board.php?bo_table=3020

As for "self inquiry", that is a confusing expression. There is no self in Buddhism, so there is nothing to inquire about. Its usual sense of self-inspection, contemplating one's emotional and mental state, that is too generic to be of any use. The four bases of mindfulness (satipatthana/smrtyupasthana) is the closest probably as a methodical approach, and more commonly the practice of confession and repentance. But the Chan approach to repentance is how it's explained in chapter 6 of the Platform Sutra, and that shows how there isn't really any inquiry into anything.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 3rd, 2017 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: "Self inquiry" in Zen, Chan, etc

Content:

aflatun said:

No self yes, however I was guessing that in Chan/Zen/Seon the purpose of the inquiry (assuming the use of a question that asks about a "who," as the practice seems not limited to this) was to come to this realization, i.e. the question is unanswerable, there's nothing to find, etc. Thoughts? (as we know I have much to read and learn here, just putting this out there for conversation)

Astus wrote:

The huatou is used as a meditation object, but it goes beyond the usual path by not only removing conceptualisation through concentration but maintaining focused awareness through doubt. So while initially one keeps trying to come up with an answer, in the next phase one does not simply fall into a thoughtless state but cultivates a watchful attention. Practically this covers the methods of shamatha with and without object. And then there is the so called breakthrough when even this watchful attention is gone.

Another fine introductory book for this technique by Guo Ru (a disciple of Shengyan):

<http://ftp.budaedu.org/ebooks/pdf/EN375.pdf>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 12th, 2017 at 6:57 PM

Title: Re: Has anyone read "Living Yogacara" or "Inside Vasubhandu's Yogacara"?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Living Yogacara is good as a general introduction for https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/East_Asian_Yog%C4%81c%C4%81ra, i.e. the <http://www.acmuller.net/yogacara/schools/faxiang.html> (Faxiangzong/Hossoushuu).

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 13th, 2017 at 3:43 PM

Title: Re: Has anyone read "Living Yogacara" or "Inside Vasubhandu's Yogacara"?

Content:

ItsRaining said:

Does the East Asian Yogacara (Faxiang) School differ from Indian or Tibetan ones?

Astus wrote:

It is based on Indian treatises, primarily the Cheng Weishi Lun, a great summary written by Xuanzang (602–664). It is somewhat different from the Tibetan versions, as for instance neither the Abhisamayalamkara, nor the Dharmadharmatavibhaga has reached China before the 20th century.

ItsRaining said:

Did they receive influence from the Tathgatagharbha thought from texts like the Shurangama Sutra and Awakening of Faith that's popular in East Asia?

Astus wrote:

It is the interpretation of buddha-nature that made the Faxiang school controversial in the eyes of other Chinese traditions, as Xuanzang and his disciples maintained the doctrine of five gotras.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 15th, 2017 at 7:09 AM

Title: Re: Shinran Shonin: "There is no Buddha apart from the mind."

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

All the relevant Shinran quotes for this discussion are cited in this article by Alfred Bloom:

<http://ccbs.ntu.edu.tw/FULLTEXT/JR-ENG/bloom.htm>

Astus wrote:

It provides a quote on the matter of Amida's status:

"Nirvana has innumerable names. It is impossible to give them in detail; I will list only a few. Nirvana is called extinction of passions, the uncreated, peaceful happiness, eternal bliss, true reality, dharmakaya, dharma-nature, suchness, oneness and Buddha-nature. Buddha-nature is none other than Tathagata. This Tathagata pervades the countless worlds; it fills the hearts and minds of the ocean of all beings. Thus plants, trees and land all attain Buddhahood... Dharmakaya-as-suchness has neither color nor form. From this oneness was manifested form, called Dharmakaya-as-compassion. Taking this form, the Buddha proclaimed his name as Bhiksu Dharmakara and established the 48 great Vows.... This Tathagata has fulfilled the Vows which are the cause of his Buddhahood, and is thus called "Tathagata of the fulfilled body." This is none other than Amida Tathagata."

Unfortunately I couldn't find an online version of the original (唯信砂文意), in the translation <http://shinranworks.com/commentaries/notes-on-essentials-of-faith-alone/> the above does not seem to appear. Furthermore, it does not exactly say that Amida is the dharmadhatu.

As for the quote in the last section where it reads:

"Since Amida became a Buddha
Ten kalpas have passed. So (the Sutra) says.
But he seems to be a Buddha
Older than the innumerable mote-dot kalpas."

That is more poetry than a discussion of doctrinal theories.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 15th, 2017 at 6:00 PM

Title: Re: James Ford on kensho, from Pathos

Content:

Astus wrote:

"I suggest if we want Zen to be more than a mindfulness practice that will get us an edge in whatever project we want an edge in, we need to reclaim awakening as the central purpose of the project."

(<http://www.patheos.com/blogs/monkeymind/2017/05/reclaiming-enlightenment-zen-small-meditation.html>)

Reclaiming awakening should start with a definition of what that is. And the one provided in the following article:

"The deepest thing is a collapsing of one's sense of self and other and finding a place of radical openness.

...

What awakening is, is an existential stance of radical openness. It does not mean there are no blind spots. It does not mean one is free of the play of those endlessly arising constellations of grasping, aversion, and death-grasping certainties. But, it does mean some part of the person who has had this experience sees or knows the freedom as well as being fully in the play of life and death. So, yes, once and forever. And, no, not free from karma or even stupid or possibly evil actions."

(http://www.patheos.com/blogs/monkeymind/2017/05/awakening-zen-footnote-reflection-range-awakening-experiences.html?utm_campaign=shareaholic&utm_medium=facebook&utm_source=socialnetwork)

What is "radical openness"? Open for what? Since it apparently does not mean freedom from afflictions and delusions, how is it related to any level of realisation as understood in Mahayana? If it were the cessation of the false assumption of subject and object, that would mean attaining at least the first bhumi according to Asanga (Great Vehicle Summary, ch 3, BDK ed p 65-66), but the qualities of one with "radical openness" falls short of an arya-bodhisattva, consequently it is really far from calling it buddhahood. Then how can this kind of awakening be anything related to the teachings of Bodhidharma, Mazu, Linji, and Hakuin?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 15th, 2017 at 6:28 PM

Title: Re: Modernist Pure Land teachings are not so modern

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

If the Buddha taught 84,000 paths to enlightenment, then there can be multiple interpretations of Amida and the Pure Land, according to the needs and understanding of the myriad of beings. It doesn't need to be either/or.

Astus wrote:

And there are a good number of interpretations in Buddhism about Amitabha, including the approach of considering him a symbol. However, to take Amitabha as a symbol means that there is no Pure Land Path, only the Holy Path, and that negates the possibility of other power, the central element of the teachings of Honen and Shinran.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 15th, 2017 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: Modernist Pure Land teachings are not so modern

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

As one can see, Dharma-body is leading all beings to Nirvana, whether Amida is a literal Buddha or is symbolic of Dharma-body.

Astus wrote:

The universal dharmakaya is usually called the dharmadhatu, and it is another word for emptiness. But just because things are already empty/pure/buddha it doesn't mean all beings can see that. The question is how to get from delusion to enlightenment. Both Honen and Shinran agreed that they were incapable of following the path in their own lives, hence they selected the simplest possible method to attain birth in Sukhavati and cultivate the bodhisattva path there. To say that Amitabha is a mere symbol for emptiness is to say that there is no Sukhavati to attain through relying on the original vow, hence no Pure Land Path either.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 16th, 2017 at 7:09 PM

Title: Re: James Ford on kensho, from Pathos

Content:

anjali said:

one possible understanding is Dogen's comment about forgetting the self and becoming one with the ten thousand things.

Astus wrote:

Dogen doesn't really fit into the whole idea of working for enlightenment, because in his teachings practice is enlightenment itself. ("The thought that practice and experience are not one thing is just the idea of non-Buddhists." - Bendowa, SBGZ vol 1, BDK ed, p 12 / T82n2582p18b26-28)

仏道をならふといふは、自己をならふなり。自己をならふといふは、自己をわするなり。自己をわするといふは、万法に証せらるるなり。万法に証せらるるといふは、自己の身心および他己の身心をして脱落せしむるなり。

(<http://www.sets.ne.jp/~zenhomepage/genzyoukouan.htm> / <http://21dzk.l.u-tokyo.ac.jp/SAT/ddb-sat2.php?mode=detail&mode2=1&num1=2582&num2=&vol=82&page=23>)

"To learn the Buddha's truth is to learn ourselves. To learn ourselves is to forget ourselves. To forget ourselves is to be experienced by the myriad dharmas. To be experienced by the myriad dharmas is to let our own body and mind, and the body and mind of the external world, fall away."
(Genjokoan, SBGZ vol 1, BDK ed, p 42)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 16th, 2017 at 7:14 PM

Title: Re: James Ford on kensho, from Pathos

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I would think 'openness' is another word for 'empty of own-being'.

Astus wrote:

If it were so, then one should qualify for the level of an arya-bodhisattva, hence stop committing evil things. But since that is not how it's defined, it sounds rather like a temporary experience of oneness that is neither wisdom nor compassion, just an elevated state of mind, i.e. dhyana.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 16th, 2017 at 10:28 PM

Title: Re: How is this not Advaita?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"To say that the mind is rattled and the nature is composed is the view of other ways; to say that the nature is clear and deep and the form shifts and moves is the view of other ways. The study of the mind and study of the nature on the way of the buddha are not like this. The practice of the mind and practice of the nature on the way of the buddha are not equivalent to the other ways. The clarification of the mind and the clarification of the nature on the way of the buddha, the other ways have no share in."

(Dogen:

https://web.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/shobogenzo/translations/sesshin_sessho/translation.html)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 16th, 2017 at 11:25 PM

Title: Re: James Ford on kensho, from Pathos

Content:

Meido said:

If indeed "practice is enlightenment itself" accurately captures Dogen's meaning.

Astus wrote:

I think Dogen is quite clear on the matter in his Bendowa, where the matter of "practice-enlightenment" is brought up in the context of the use of zazen after enlightenment. The term goes back to the story of Huairang meeting Huineng (Platform Sutra, ch 7, BDK ed p 67 / http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T48n2008_001#0357b19):

When Huairang arrived and did his obeisance, the master asked "Where have you come from?"

[Huairang] said, "Mount Song."

The master said, "[No matter] what kind of thing, how would it come?"

[Huairang] said, "If you say it's like a single thing, then you're off the mark."

The master said, "Then can it be cultivated and realized (修證)?"

[Huairang] said, "Cultivation and realization (修證) are not nonexistent, but defilement does not occur."

And this is the explanation of the term from the Soto Zen site's "Basic Key Terms of Soto Zen Teaching" (http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/key_terms/pdf/key_terms07.pdf):

"Generally speaking, religious practice aims at improving the practitioner's religious qualities. In that case, the relationship between practice and realization is considered to be that of cause and effect. But shusho itto radically demolishes this generally accepted relationship between practice and realization. It states that they are one and inseparable. This idea is based on the concept of "the self is originally buddha", the philosophical foundation of the southern school of Ch'an which takes all living beings as originally buddha.

Therefore, we should understand that shusho itto is not merely a philosophical idea unique to Dogen Zenji, but a common view in Zen about practice and realization. In fact, although not expressed explicitly, some other Zen masters, contemporaries of Dogen Zenji, also shared the same philosophical background."

And as Dogen defines zazen:

"The zazen I speak of is not meditation practice. It is simply the dharma gate of joyful ease, the practice-realization (修証) of totally culminated enlightenment."

(https://web.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/gongyo_seiten/translations/p art_3/fukan_zazengi.html / <http://www.sets.ne.jp/~zenhomepage/hukanzazenngi.htm>)

So, to put it in a larger context, Dogen's neither-thinking (hishiryō 非思量) is not different from Huineng's non-thought (wúniàn 無念).

"to be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is for the myriad dharmas to be completely penetrated. To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to see the realms of [all] the buddhas. To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to arrive at the stage of buddhahood."

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed p 34 / http://tripitaka.cbeta.org/T48n2008_001#0351a03)

So, even if the use of enlightenment for 證 is somewhat questionable, and actually not used that much by translators, it is not misleading.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 17th, 2017 at 5:12 PM

Title: Re: Turning the light around (asraya-paravrtti)

Content:

鐵觀音 said:

Any suggestion on how to do that?

Astus wrote:

Turning the light around is like self-reflection. Usually the six senses are directed outward, grasping at appearances. Taking a step back to turn the light around means to reflect on the process of perception itself, that is, how the six senses, six objects, and six consciousnesses function. The slipping point here is people conceive turning the light around as if one should find an ultimate watcher/perceiver behind phenomena, and that is why this confusion with Vedanta teachings, even though it is well known that no-self is a fundamental Buddhist doctrine, but apparently people tend to excuse it by contorted and false logic (i.e. there is an "awareness" beyond appearances, and only appearances are not self - and this is exactly the Vedanta argument).

鐵觀音 said:

It's a confirmation that zen practice is a lot more than some glorified relaxation technique.

Astus wrote:

Zen is about direct enlightenment. It has actually more to do with prajna than dhyana.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 17th, 2017 at 5:39 PM

Title: Re: James Ford on kensho, from Pathos

Content:

Wayfarer said:

But that never ought to be taken as the 'end' of anything. That is what I think he's talking about, and it makes sense to me.

Astus wrote:

This "do not stop prematurely" is a common topic in Zen texts. Or might say in Mahayana, after all, the bodhisattva path takes at least three innumerable aeons, and that length is contrasted with the very short (1-7 lives) shravaka path. Dogen scolded the kensho approach exactly because he saw it as a dead end, and in stead of it put the concept of practice-enlightenment (see: <https://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?t=20655>).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 17th, 2017 at 9:22 PM

Title: Re: James Ford on kensho, from Pathos

Content:

Anonymous X said:

none of it touches the core of grasping. This is a wholly different matter, imo. The cutting through is reified as another concept.

Astus wrote:

There are numerous instructions on how grasping arises and how it ceases, starting with the 12 nidanas. And as Baizhang taught, one should first let go, then let go of letting go, and finally let go of the concept of letting go of letting go.

Anonymous X said:

he always insisted that he didn't know and that anyone who tells you that they do know is misleading you. ... He always insisted that it is not what you think it is. In a way, it chooses you.

Astus wrote:

That sounds like the wrong view of naturalism, of denying causality, and consequently denying the fourth noble truth and practically the whole of the Buddhadharma. That attitude denies the use of practice, even more so, it denies the need to understand what the practice is about, and instead turns enlightenment into a divine miracle, a grace of fate, a pure accident. In the kanhua tradition it is the most serious defect of merely waiting for enlightenment to happen on its own.

"Above all, don't consciously await enlightenment. If you consciously await enlightenment, you're saying, "Right now, I'm deluded." If you wait for enlightenment clinging to delusion, though you pass through countless eons, you will still not be able to gain enlightenment."

(Dahui, in Swampland Flowers, p 43)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 18th, 2017 at 3:55 AM

Title: Re: James Ford on kensho, from Pathos

Content:

Anonymous X said:

Huang Po never gave meditative instruction.

Astus wrote:

Huangbo is quite clear on what one should do.

"You trainees should have no doubts. It is the four elements that make up your bodies, but the four elements are without a self and the self is without a master. Therefore you should understand that this [human] body is without self and without master.

It is the five skandhas that make up the mind, but the five skandhas are without a self and without a master. Therefore you should understand that the mind is without self and without master. The six senses, six types of sense objects, and the six consciousnesses, which combine together in generation and extinction, are also like this. These eighteen realms are empty, they are all empty. There is only the fundamental mind, which is expansive and pure."

(Essentials of the Transmission of Mind, in Zen Texts, BDK ed, p 19)

And I quoted the above as it is a very basic Buddhist teaching. But of course most of the teachings known from Huangbo are filled with direct and practical instructions. True, they do not sound like what people assume to be meditation instructions, however, those are often merely basic mindfulness and concentration practices, and do not qualify for even the shravaka level, much less Mahayana.

Anonymous X said:

He told his students that the only instruction was to refrain from conceptual thinking.

Astus wrote:

"Those who are free from all notions are called buddhas."

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html, ch 14)

Anonymous X said:

He constantly reprimanded his students when they brought up the Buddha, Sangha, Dharma.

Astus wrote:

"Someone who tries to discern me in form

Or seek me in sound

Is practicing non-Buddhist methods

And will not discern the Tathāgata"

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html, ch 26)

Anonymous X said:

His was a kind of 'no teaching' that forced the students to deal with their chattering, grasping, minds.

Astus wrote:

How can the absence of instructions make anyone deal with their problems? Beings are already without guidance and they are stuck in samsara.

Anonymous X said:

The one thing that was present was the teacher as a living example of unfettered living.

Astus wrote:

A statue of the Buddha should suffice then.

Anonymous X said:

How many people can you say you've seen who live this way? How many people have you met who have ended grasping? It's not a rhetorical question.

Astus wrote:

"if a person's mind is pure he sees the merits and ornaments of this land."
(Vimalakirti Sutra, ch 1, BDK ed, p 79)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 18th, 2017 at 6:41 PM

Title: Re: James Ford on kensho, from Pathos

Content:

dharmagoat said:

"Radical openness" describes an experience, it serves as a description rather than an explanation. The explanation is found in the experience.

Astus wrote:

An experience is meaningless without an explanation. Since "radical openness" is posited as the very goal and essence of Zen, there is already a lot of explanation surrounding this term. Evading clarification is only a source of confusion, not enlightenment.

Anders said:

if you are asking how words like "radical openness" could relate to traditional teachings, what first springs to mind is Nagarjuna's

To whomever emptiness is possible,

All things are possible.

I'm mostly reminded of Sengzhao's referring to Prajna as "dark knowing".

Astus wrote:

That stanza of the MMK (24.14) is about how the four noble truths, and dependent origination, can be valid only if there is no substance. Based on what I've found in Ford's blog, openness is like "bare attention":

"By bare attention we understand the clear and single-minded awareness of what actually happens to us and in us, at the successive moments of perception. It is called "bare" because it attends to the bare facts of a perception without reacting to them by deed, speech or mental comment."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/lib/authors/nyanaponika/wheel121.html>)

As such, it always remains a specific state of mind, that's why it does not bring about on its own freedom from afflictions, and that's why it needs to be constantly cultivated.

Here I searched his blog and found the following passages relevant:

"Of course the Buddha offers some good news out of this twin observation that nothing is permanent and most hurt comes out of our trying to make things permanent.

That distress, that hurt continues. Until. Unless. We see through it.

Here all sorts of teachers point to a way of transparency, of openness, of finding our larger identity, something much bigger than the little self to which we were clinging as if it were so, so important."

(<http://www.patheos.com/blogs/monkeymind/2008/09/a-couple-of-words-against-souls.html>)

"I believe there is such a thing as awakening. I have experienced it. It is the direct insight into the fact we are two things at once. We are creatures woven out of a constantly moving dynamic of relationships, including genes and our experiences. And we are one. Or, I do like the Buddhist metaphor for this, we are empty. We lack any abiding essence. But that "essencelessness" is actually an openness. My experience of this is that this knowing, or again, the Zen metaphor better describes, there is a not knowing that is permanently a part of who I am. But, but both things are happening at once, the constrained and the open. In fact there is no way to unravel the temporal and conditioned from the boundless and free."

(<http://www.patheos.com/blogs/monkeymind/2009/06/the-scandal-of-the-zen-teacher-and-where-it-takes-me.html>)

"He seems to think the grand language of Zen's pointing is pointing to something outside. It isn't. Rather it is a pointing to the wondrous fact that the whole mess and every individual part is one, or rather, is nondual. And the splendid, magic thing about our human consciousness, in the make up of who we are as we are, is that we can "know" this. Rather, it is a letting go of clinging. It is, in fact, a not knowing. It is a finding of openness, of our boundlessness that exists with our vary limitations, our boundedness... Not one. Not two."

(<http://www.patheos.com/blogs/monkeymind/2011/07/confession-of-a-buddhist-atheist-a-review.html>)

"Here we're invited to surrender to the realities of the flux of events, and out of that to learn the dance of relationships, to see into the reality that we are, all of us, boundless, our essence is no essence at all, just openness, and from there to realize our lives just as they are, when not clung to, are the Dharma, the dharmakaya, the great open itself. No difference."

(<http://www.patheos.com/blogs/monkeymind/2015/02/a-fools-errand-a-small-meditation-on-the-nature-of-the-zen-way.html>)

"And I love that blessing on the pure of heart. It is a call to openness, to letting go our our grasping, to seeing into the matter of self and other and how in the last analysis there is no difference. It is the way of wisdom, it is the way of the wise heart."

(<http://www.patheos.com/blogs/monkeymind/2015/03/the-path-of-mercy-a-meditation-on-the-beatitudes.html>)

"In the Harada/Yasutani koan curriculum, one first explores in some depth the reality of our essential openness, the fact there is no essential, but rather all that is, is. This truth of this is expressed most succinctly in the Heart Sutra and specifically in the phrase "form is emptiness, emptiness is form."" (<http://www.patheos.com/blogs/monkeymind/2016/12/stopping-distant-temple-bell-meditation-traditional-zen-koan.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 18th, 2017 at 7:10 PM

Title: Re: James Ford on kensho, from Pathos

Content:

Anonymous X said:

I didn't say there was no guidance, just formal instructions, a model laid out from point A to point B.

Astus wrote:

But, as you could see yourself in my previous post, there are formal and clear instructions. Furthermore, Huangbo's teachings assume the familiarity with the general Buddhist teachings that cover the extensive discussion of the threefold training.

Anonymous X said:

This seemed to be done away with in favor of the sitting practice and the 'koan' of refraining from conceptual thinking.

Astus wrote:

Huangbo's teachings contain nothing for sitting meditation or reflecting on koans. Sitting meditation is a common practice, just as sutra recitation, repentance, etc., while koan inspection is a practice that occurred centuries after Huangbo.

Anonymous X said:

They also had a living example of a 'fully awakened' being amongst them, living and shitting amongst them.

Astus wrote:

The mere presence of a buddha can be inspiring, but not liberating.

Anonymous X said:

Like I said to Malcolm, if you subscribe to a model/path, you are going to measure everything through this filter. From my perspective, this is the Great Wall, not the one in China.

Astus wrote:

Without correct view there is no liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 18th, 2017 at 7:19 PM

Title: Re: Turning the light around (asraya-paravrtti)

Content:

鐵觀音 said:

It sounds nice, but I was under the impression that this was not a Buddhist teaching, and that awareness ("the knowing mind is the light") was as empty as everything else. Still, I find this view more satisfying as at least it offers a reasonable interpretation of the quote.

Astus wrote:

"It would be better for the uninstructed run-of-the-mill person to hold to the body composed of the four great elements, rather than the mind, as the self. Why is that? Because this body composed of the four great elements is seen standing for a year, two years, three, four, five, ten, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, a hundred years or more. But what's called 'mind,' 'intellect,' or 'consciousness' by day and by night arises as one thing and ceases as another. Just as a monkey, swinging through a forest wilderness, grabs a branch. Letting go of it, it grabs another branch. Letting go of that, it grabs another one. Letting go of that, it grabs another one. In the same way, what's called 'mind,' 'intellect,' or 'consciousness' by day and by night arises as one thing and ceases as another."
(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.061.than.html>)

"According to that non-Buddhist view, there is one spiritual intelligence existing within our body. When this intelligence meets conditions, it can discriminate between pleasant and unpleasant and discriminate between right and wrong, and it can know pain and irritation and know suffering and pleasure—all [these] are abilities of the spiritual intelligence. When this body dies, however, the spirit casts off the skin and is reborn on the other side; so even though it seems to die here it lives on there. Therefore we call it immortal and eternal. The view of that non-Buddhist is like this. But if we learn this view as the Buddha's Dharma, we are even more foolish than the person who grasps a tile or a pebble thinking it to be a golden treasure; the delusion would be too shameful for comparison."

(Dogen: Bendowa, SBGZ vol 1, BDK ed, p 14)

"Hearing the word "buddha-nature," many students have misunderstood it to be like the "self" described by the non-Buddhist Senika. This is because they do not meet people, they do not meet themselves, and they do not meet with a teacher. They vacantly consider mind, will, or consciousness—which is the movement of wind and fire¹³—to be the buddha-nature's enlightened knowing and enlightened understanding. Who has ever said that enlightened knowing and enlightened understanding are present in the buddhanature?"

(Dogen: Bussho, SBGZ vol 2, BDK ed, p 5)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 18th, 2017 at 7:51 PM

Title: Re: James Ford on kensho, from Pathos

Content:

Anders said:

Why don't you write to him and ask him to clarify on fb then?

Astus wrote:

I already did.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 18th, 2017 at 7:51 PM

Title: Re: James Ford on kensho, from Pathos

Content:

dharmagoat said:

But is meaningfulness a necessary pursuit in the case of "radical openness"? Does it add anything useful to the experience, which in itself is very clear?

Astus wrote:

Consider the following from Kamalashila's second manual:

"Those who do not meditate with wisdom by analyzing the entity of things specifically, but merely meditate on the elimination of mental activity, cannot avert conceptual thoughts and also cannot realize identitylessness because they lack the light of wisdom. If the fire of consciousness knowing phenomena as they are is produced from individual analysis of suchness, then like the fire produced by rubbing wood it will burn the wood of conceptual thought. The Buddha has spoken in this way."

(Stages of Meditation, p 134)

It is a critique of what they thought of as the Chan teaching. However, that approach of not thinking has been rebuked by Chan teachers as well:

"If you empty your minds and sit in quietude, this is to become attached to the emptiness of blankness."

(Platform Sutra, ch 2, BDK ed, p 29)

Seeing the nature (kensho) is the essential requirement. To merely abide in a passive state of mind is the root of stupidity. But when it is directly recognised that there is not a single thing to attach to or discard, then one is free from all troubles.

dharmagoat said:

If the experience is one of enlightenment, how can it be confusing?

Astus wrote:

Enlightenment is not an experience, but seeing that all experiences are unestablished.

"Whoever knows that nothing depends on anything has found the Way. And whoever knows that the mind depends on nothing is always at the place of enlightenment."
(Bodhidharma, Wake-up Sermon, in The Zen Teachings of Bodhidharma, p 57)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 18th, 2017 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: James Ford on kensho, from Pathos

Content:

dharmagoat said:

"Seeing", however it is meant metaphorically, still pertains to experience.

Astus wrote:

Not really. The third noble truth is the truth of cessation, the end of craving - that is not an experience. Seeing emptiness, the nature of phenomena, is the end of fabricating a self/substance, the cessation of conceptualisation, so again - that is not an experience.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 18th, 2017 at 9:37 PM

Title: Re: James Ford on kensho, from Pathos

Content:

Anonymous X said:

How would you know what it is like to be in the presence of a Buddha or fully awakened being? There are many stories in Buddhist literature of sudden awakening in the presence of such a one.

Astus wrote:

Could you provide a few quotes from the sutras where people attained enlightenment because of the presence of a buddha?

Anonymous X said:

Do you have the correct view?

Astus wrote:

What constitutes correct view is defined by the sutras and shastras. But it can be summed up as:

all compounded phenomena are impermanent all contaminated phenomena are suffering all phenomena are without self nirvāṇa is peace

(<http://read.84000.co/#UT22084-058-002/translation>)

See also:

https://books.google.com/books/about/What_Makes_You_Not_a_Buddhist.html?id=2gQm0mvsC50C

Anonymous X said:
If you say yes, show us your liberation.

Astus wrote:
"If there are those who say that they see bodhi and have attained it, we should know that they are the ones with exceeding arrogance."
(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra13.html>

Anonymous X said:
Thinking is not going to get us anywhere except down to the corner market for a bottle of milk. The more you rely on the written word, the further you get from any discovery.

Astus wrote:
"World-honored One, what is the cause of this quietude and vision?"
"Good son, it is purified discipline and true insight accomplished through purified hearing and reflection."
(Scripture on the Explication of Underlying Meaning, ch 6, BDK ed, p 68)

"For all bodhisattvas the cause is
The permeation of hearing [scriptural] discourse,
For nonimaginative wisdom is True and correct reflection."
(Asanga: Summary of the Great Vehicle, ch 8, BDK ed, p 92)

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, May 18th, 2017 at 10:13 PM
Title: Re: James Ford on kensho, from Pathos
Content:

Malcolm said:
Should be:
"Could you provide a few quotes from the sutras where people attained enlightenment because of being in the mere presence of a buddha?"

Astus wrote:
Yes, that.

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, May 18th, 2017 at 11:11 PM
Title: Re: James Ford on kensho, from Pathos
Content:

Anonymous X said:
You are the one providing the quotes here.

Astus wrote:

I find it a good way to avoid stating things that are incompatible with the Dharma, furthermore, it allows everyone to cross reference it.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 18th, 2017 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: James Ford on kensho, from Pathos

Content:

Anders said:

Why don't you write to him and ask him to clarify on fb then?

Astus wrote:

He replied that "radical openness" was a term he used nowadays for awakening/enlightenment in Zen where the sense of self and other had fallen away, but he found it difficult and even foolish to attempt to express it verbally. Furthermore, he did not think there was a direct cause of it, rather discipline and practice could make one prone to such an accidental experience/moment/encounter.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 19th, 2017 at 3:43 AM

Title: Re: James Ford on kensho, from Pathos

Content:

Anonymous X said:

Off the top of my head, the Buddha silently holds up a flower amidst a gathering of his followers. Only Kasyapa responds with a knowing smile. Hence, the transmission of the Dharma to Kasyapa, the first patriarch of Chan.

Astus wrote:

Even in that story it's not because of the mere presence of the Buddha.

Anonymous X said:

As I said before, if you believe in things like this, the stories abound.

Astus wrote:

Then it shouldn't be problematic to reference a few here.

Anonymous X said:

You have to remember that much of the early Buddhist teachings is apochryphal and some sutras are heavily disputed.

Astus wrote:

Everything in the Buddhist canons are canonical. Scriptures not found in the canons might be called apocryphal.

Anonymous X said:

Even the famous phrase attributed to Bodhidharma, "A special transmission outside of the scriptures" is believed to have originated first in the Song dyansty.

Astus wrote:

That is not a sutra.

Anonymous X said:

Do you have a teacher, Astus? Or, do you get everything that you speak of from reading and your own meditation? It's not clear if you are involved with a specific Buddhist school or lineage. I know you mentioned you studied Buddhism at a university? Was this mostly academic work?

Astus wrote:

How is that relevant here?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 19th, 2017 at 3:55 AM

Title: Re: James Ford on kensho, from Pathos

Content:

aflatun said:

Could you unpack this some? If they're not experiences what are they?

Astus wrote:

One clings to the aggregates because of the superimposition of self. When the ignorance about the emptiness of the aggregates is eliminated, there is no more superimposition, hence no more clinging.

"What is ignorance? Good sons, all sentient beings fall into various inverted views without beginning. Just like a disoriented person who confuses the four directions, they mistakenly take the Four Elements as the attributes of their bodies and the conditioned shadows of the Six Objects as the attributes of their mind. It is just like when our eyes are diseased and we see flowers in the sky, or a second moon. Good sons, the sky actually has no flowers—they are the false attachment of the diseased person. And because of this false attachment, not only are we confused about the self-nature of the sky; we are also mixed up about the place where real flowers come from. From this there is the falsely existent transmigration through life and death. Therefore it is called "ignorance."

Good sons, this 'ignorance' actually lacks substance. It is like a man who is dreaming. At the time of the dream, there is no non-existence. But when he awakens he finds that there is nothing for him to hold on to. Similarly, when the sky-flowers disappear from the sky, you cannot say that there is a definite point of their disappearance. Why? Because there is no point from which they arose. All sentient beings falsely perceive arising and ceasing within the unarisen. Therefore they say that there is 'transmigration through life-and-death.' "

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/sutra_of_perfect_enlightenment.html#div-1)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 19th, 2017 at 4:35 AM

Title: Re: James Ford on kensho, from Pathos

Content:

aflatun said:

Understood, but everything you've described here is an experience isn't it? Clinging, ignorance, their cessation, the aftermath, all experience is it not?

Astus wrote:

Experiences are what occur in the six sensory areas. Delusion is clinging to them, liberation is not clinging. It is called delusion, because experiences are already empty, without anything that could be clung to. Recognising the delusion of substantiality as unfounded means seeing that there is nothing to see, like when one assumes one's hat is very valuable but turns out to be worthless. Is that recognition an experience? Sounds like one, but isn't, because it means simply the end of an incorrect thought. And to make it a little bit more complicated (a tree that has never grown, sky-flowers, dreams), even that incorrect thought of a self has never been anything else but empty. To take a different approach, experiences have always been pure and the end of delusion means arriving to what has always been there, so it's nothing new, but the original nature of phenomena. So it is not an experience in the sense of something that occurs, also because something occurring is ordinarily conceived as an independent object one can hold on to, while the whole point is that such occurrences have never existed in the first place.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 19th, 2017 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: James Ford on kensho, from Pathos

Content:

Malcolm said:

Astus has studied with a number of Zen teachers, and couple of Kagyu ones too, if I am not mistaken.

Astus wrote:

<https://eubuddhist.blogspot.com/2016/02/my-little-dharma-history.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 20th, 2017 at 2:44 AM

Title: Re: James Ford on kensho, from Pathos

Content:

boda said:

"No buddha can make people enlightened. Everyone has to do it oneself."

If I may ask, how exactly do you know this?

Astus wrote:

"By oneself is evil done; by oneself is one defiled. By oneself is evil left undone; by oneself is one made pure. Purity and impurity depend on oneself; no one can purify another."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/kn/dhp/dhp.12.budd.html.165>)

"You yourselves must strive; the Buddhas only point the way. Those meditative ones who tread the path are released from the bonds of Mara."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/kn/dhp/dhp.20.budd.html.276>)

Question: "Does the Buddha really save or rescue all sentient beings?"

The master said: "There are really no sentient beings to be saved by Tathagata. Since there is, in reality, neither self nor non-self, how then can there be a Buddha to save or sentient beings to be saved?

(Huangbo, <http://ymba.org/books/dharma-mind-transmission/wan-ling-record>)

"Outside mind there's no dharma, nor is there anything to be gained within it. What are you seeking? Everywhere you say, 'There's something to practice, something to obtain.' Make no mistake! Even if there were something to be gained by practice, it would be nothing but birth-and-death karma."

(Record of Linji, p 17, tr Sasaki)

One day, Guishan said to Xiangyan, "I'm not asking you about what's recorded in or what can be learned from the scriptures! You must say something from the time before you were born and before you could distinguish objects. I want to record what you say." Xiangyan was confused and unable to answer. He sat in deep thought for a some time and then mumbled a few words to explain his understanding. But Guishan wouldn't accept this.

Xiangyan said, "Then would the master please explain it?"

Guishan said, "What I might say would merely be my own understanding. How could it benefit your own view?"

Xiangyan returned to the monks' hall and searched through the books he had collected, but he couldn't find a single phrase that could be used to answer Guishan's question.

Xiangyan then sighed and said, "A picture of a cake can't satisfy hunger."

He then burned all his books and said, "During this lifetime I won't study the essential doctrine. I'll just become a common mendicant monk, and I won't apply my mind to this any more."

Xiangyan tearfully left Guishan. He then went traveling and eventually resided at Nanyang, the site of the grave of National Teacher Nanyang Huizhong.

One day as Xiangyan was scything grass, a small piece of tile was knocked through the air and struck a stalk of bamboo. Upon hearing the sound of the tile hitting the bamboo, Xiangyan instantly experienced vast enlightenment.

(Zen's Chinese Heritage, p 191-192)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 20th, 2017 at 5:14 PM

Title: Re: Me too! Me too!

Content:

Malcolm said:

Correct, but indeed, as Machig Labdron says of the dharmadhātu after going through all the yānas, including Dzogchen and Mahāmudra:

The ignorant and confused are deluded because they know and apprehend the dharmadhātu as an object [...]

All of these knowledges (rig pa) are knowledges that know objects.

Those [knowledges that] possess objects are not true.

There is nothing to know in the mind without objects.

Whoever knows is bound by knowledge.

Astus wrote:

Something similar from the Platform Sutra (ch 7, BDK ed, p 62-63):

The master said, “That teacher’s explanation still allows perceptual understanding to exist, which is why you were unable to comprehend. I will now reveal a verse for you:

Not seeing a single dharma but maintaining the view of nonbeing

Is much like floating clouds blocking the face of the sun.

Not knowing a single dharma but maintaining one’s knowledge of emptiness

Is just like the great void generating lightning and thunder.

When such perceptual understanding arises for the slightest instant,

How can mistaken recognition ever understand expedient means?

You should understand the error of this yourself, in a single moment of thought,

And the numinous brilliance of the self will be constantly manifest.

When Zhichang heard this verse, his mind became suddenly expansive [in enlightenment], and he related a verse:

There is no reason to activate perceptual understanding,

To be attached to characteristics and seek for bodhi.

When one’s intelligence harbors a single thought of enlightenment,

How can one transcend the delusions of the past?

The self-nature, enlightened to the essential source,

Illuminates the crazed currents [of awareness].

Without entering the room of the patriarch,

In a daze, going about with two heads.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 21st, 2017 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: Freedom From Buddha Nature by Thanissaro Bhikkhu & Zen Master Dogen

Content:

Astus wrote:

With buddha-nature Dogen does the same thing he does with most of the other concepts and topics he discusses, that is, transforms it into a teaching on suchness as the immediate reality of experience, and indeed, what else could be rightfully called buddha-nature? But that doesn't mean this interpretation is anything new or unique, only that Dogen wanted to correct those (likely the former followers of the so called Daruma school) who falsely take buddha-nature as a self.

In his opening remarks, Dōgen dismisses several of the most common views: that the buddha nature is the potential to become a buddha, that it is the activity of cognition within us, or that it is a universal self pervading the world. Rather, he says, the buddha nature is existence itself — not an abstract principle of being, but the actual occurrence of things, or, as he puts it simply at the end of his essay, “fences, walls, tiles, and pebbles.”

(Bielefeldt:

<https://web.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/shobogenzo/translations/busscho/intro.html> to the translation of Bussho)

It is said that Dogen Zenji denies Buddha-nature as an intrinsic essence, which is implied by the statement that “all have Buddha-nature,” by interpreting that sentence as “all are Buddha-nature.” But that subject was already carefully treated in Mahaparinirvana Sutra by the discussion on the self. We should understand that Dogen Zenji, following the sutra, simply criticized the popular theory of Buddha-nature in those days that interpreted Buddha-nature as some actual substance within sentient beings.

...

Dogen Zenji says that Guishan's view of no Buddha-nature is superior to Yanguan's. Sentient beings and Buddha-nature are not two separate entities which can overlap each other. If we really try to show how sentient beings are Buddha nature, there is no other way than saying, “All sentient beings have no Buddha-nature.”

(Rev. Kenshu Sugawara: http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/key_terms/pdf/key_terms13.pdf, p 3)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 23rd, 2017 at 12:24 AM

Title: Re: How can I be sure its valid

Content:

Zafutales said:

avoiding what the Buddha taught, being indifferent to everything or zoning out

Astus wrote:

Shikantaza is the practice of non-abiding, where one directly experiences the reality of appearances as ungraspable. Avoiding, indifference, and zoning out are all concepts one may be mistakenly attached to, if they are conceived as the correct states to be maintained.

Zafutales said:

due to these feelings of doubt

Astus wrote:

There are three ways you can address doubts. The first method is through learning - both from texts and oral explanations. The second method is through contemplating the teachings that are already learnt, particularly the teaching of dependent origination is recommended for overcoming the hindrance of doubt. The third method is applying the understanding gained through contemplation where one verifies the teaching in direct, personal experience. Shikantaza is this third method of verification practice (i.e. practice-enlightenment).

Zafutales said:

I am sitting to alleviate my suffering and to experience the true nature of my mind

Astus wrote:

Have you already clarified what suffering and the true nature are? If not, you might start there, before attempting to find something you do not know what it is - in other words, when looking for a flower it is good to be clear about what it looks like first.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 23rd, 2017 at 6:58 PM

Title: Re: How can I be sure its valid

Content:

Matylda said:

in many zen manuals it is clearly stated.

Astus wrote:

Like what manuals? For instance, the one published on the official site (<http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/practice/zazen/howto/index.html>) gives a clear description of what and how to do. And in the <http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/practice/zazen/video/index.html> it is said "Anyone can practice it anytime and anywhere." Furthermore, if the instructions are considered, they are very simple and straightforward, especially compared to practices like Tendai's shikan, Theravada's satipatthana, or Vajrayana's deity yoga.

Matylda said:

It is for those of the highest potential.

Astus wrote:

How so? The <http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/practice/zazen/advice/fukanzanzeng.html> states: "intelligence or lack of it is not an issue; make no distinction between the dull and the sharp-witted"

And in the Bendowa:

"When people just practice with right belief, the clever and the stupid alike will attain the truth. Just because our country is not a nation of benevolence or wisdom and the people are dullwitted, do not think that it is impossible for us to grasp the Buddha-Dharma. Still more, all human beings have the right seeds of prajñā in abundance. It may simply be that few of us have experienced the state directly, and so we are immature in receiving and using it."

(SBGZ, vol 1, BDK ed, p 21)

Matylda said:

It takes 20-30 years of strenuous practice without any results

Astus wrote:

Are you of the view that realisation is separate from the practice itself?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 23rd, 2017 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: How can I be sure its valid

Content:

Matylda said:

So do you think that popular instructions for zazen just for common people are all? and the similar way rinzai does it, exhausts entirely the issue?

Astus wrote:

Could you be more specific, like what manuals? The most elaborate meditation instruction from a Soto author that I have seen was Keizan's Yojinki, otherwise it's the same every time, even if it takes up a whole book, talking about the posture and hishiryo.

Matylda said:

It doesn't matter what view I hold... it is just reality for common people, to get used to zazen under master and to continue for long long years.... then one may arrive at the point where practice and realisation are one. Just to talk about it does not enlighten anyone.. about this matter I prefer to base my confidence on words and teachings of genuine masters of soto zen in Japan.

Astus wrote:

Is Dogen considered a genuine master of Soto Zen from Japan? He wrote:

"In the Buddha-Dharma practice and experience are completely the same. [Practice] now is also practice in the state of experience; therefore, a beginner's pursuit of the truth is just the whole body of the original state of experience. This is why [the Buddhist patriarchs] teach, in the practical cautions they have handed down to us, not to expect any experience outside of practice. And the reason may be that [practice itself] is the directly accessible original state of experience."

(Bendowa, SBGZ, vol 1, BDK ed, p 12)

Matylda said:

Anyway even if one is of the view that practice and enlightenment are inseparable, then one has to have great confidence, faith etc. not to say total devotion. It is what in soto is really required.

Astus wrote:

Certainly, those qualities are essential in every Buddhist school.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 24th, 2017 at 5:45 PM

Title: Re: Shinran Shonin: "There is no Buddha apart from the mind."

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

I do not believe in literal flesh and blood Buddhas from eons before the Big Bang, and neither do I accept that the Pure Land sutras were taught by the historical Buddha.

Astus wrote:

Then I do not see how your views could ever harmonise with the teachings of Honen and Shinran.

Dharma Flower said:

If Amida Buddha is really a symbolic expression of Buddha-nature or Dharma-body, then the Nembutsu has immense power as a Buddhist practice for awakening the Buddha within.

Astus wrote:

That is not the immediate goal of a Pure Land Buddhist, nor has the recitation of the name ever been taught as a method to realise the nature of mind. Furthermore, the three minds, that are the requirements for attaining birth, include the realisation that we are incapable of attaining wisdom ourselves, and that's why reliance on the Vows are necessary.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 24th, 2017 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: Shinran Shonin: "There is no Buddha apart from the mind."

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

Please see the doctrinal statement from the Higashi Honganji that I've posted elsewhere on this forum.

Astus wrote:

http://www.higashihonganji.or.jp/wordpress/wp-content/uploads/2016/11/MON_vol.1_s.pdf is a general introduction in a magazine. As for a "doctrinal statement", the <http://www.hongwanji.or.jp/english/teaching/index.html> site states on their teaching:

"Attaining the "entrusting heart"--awakening to the compassion of Amida Tathagata (Buddha) through the working of the Primal Vow--we shall walk the path of life reciting Amida's Name (Nembutsu). At the end of life, we will be born in the Pure Land and attain Buddhahood, returning at once to this delusional world to guide people to awakening."

Dharma Flower said:

Some see the Primal Vow as a literal vow made in history, while other Shinshu scholars see it as symbolic of the compassionate activity of Dharma-body in the world, leading all beings to enlightenment.

Astus wrote:

How could it lead to enlightenment to merely recite a word for a symbol of the dharmakaya? That would be like repeating the name of the mascot of a university and expecting all the knowledge provided there to simply appear in one's mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 25th, 2017 at 5:31 PM

Title: Re: Shinran Shonin: "There is no Buddha apart from the mind."

Content:

Dharma Flower said:

