

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 24th, 2010 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: where to go to seek confirmation of attainment?

Content:

White Lotus said:

thanks, i have a really good teacher, but i have no self, therefore anything that regards attainment is formless, it means nothing to me. i asked this question, because i wanted to be orthodox and if there is any sort of non-attainment, to clarify it. i am told that enlightenment is a certainty with conviction, but i have neither certainty nor doubt. it therefore is logical to say that i am not enlightened.

to be honest i have no conviction, but this could be 'No' Conviction and not convictionless.

Astus wrote:

To have no self is a big issue. Having self and having no self are quite the same, the difference being only in concepts. Until one has something, that is attachment. If one has nothing, that is rejection. Realisation of emptiness lies beyond attachment and rejection. How do you express that?

Ganyo asked Joshu, "What about it when I don't have anything?"

Joshu said, "Throw it away."

Ganyo asked again, "I do not have anything, what is there to throw away?"

Joshu then said, "In that case, take it away with you."

At these words Ganyo was enlightened.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 24th, 2010 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: Notable Zen Masters

Content:

Astus wrote:

Those not yet mentioned: Yongming, Jinul, Bankei and Daehaeng. They're all fun to read.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 25th, 2010 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: where to go to seek confirmation of attainment?

Content:

Astus wrote:

If there's nothing to attain what's the point of the Buddha's teaching? If it is the realisation that there is nothing to attain, actually it is that realisation to attain. If nobody realises it how could it be called an achievement? If it is ending all sorts of attachments there is still the concept of things one could be attached to.

Nagarjuna says, "If nirvana were nothing, how could nirvana possibly be not dependent? There does not exist any nothing which is not dependent." (MMK 25.8)

There are four extreme views:

- something exists
- something doesn't exist
- something exists and doesn't exist
- something neither exists nor doesn't exist

You seem to be stuck at the idea of non-existence, the second extreme view. How to break through? Just understand that this is actually another false concept, nothing more.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 25th, 2010 at 4:12 AM

Title: Re: The Lankavatara Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here are two stanzas I've been messing around with. It'd be good if others could contribute here. Also, generally it would be good to discuss Suzuki's translation and how much it reflects different versions of the sutra.

Suzuki's:

In all things there is no self-nature, words too are devoid of reality; as the ignorant understand not what is meant by emptiness, yes, by emptiness, they wander about. In all things there is no self-nature, they are mere words of people; that which is discriminated has no reality; [even] Nirvana is like a dream; nothing is seen to be in transmigration, nor does anything ever enter into Nirvana.

Lankavatara 2.34

sarvabhāvo'svabhāvo hi sadvacanaṃ tathāpyasat |
śūnyatāśūnyatārthaṃ vā bālo'paśyan vidhāvati || 143 ||
sarvabhāvasvabhāvā ca vacanamapi nṛṇām |
kalpanā sāpi nāsti nirvāṇaṃ svapnatulyam |
bhavaṃ parīkṣeta na saṃsāre nāpi nirvāyāt || 144 ||

(approximate trans. by a friend, English tr. by me)

Certainly every being is without essence, the true speech as well as the false
Not seeing the meaning of the emptiness of emptiness the fool's (mind) becomes confused

And every being's essence is only the words of men, there's not even discrimination Nirvana is like a dream, doesn't investigate existence in samsara and doesn't get extinguished

(my unprofessional trans. of two different versions)

諸法無自性，亦復無言說；

不見空空義，愚夫故流轉。
一切法無性，離語言分別；
諸有如夢化，非生死涅槃。

T672p600c21-24

Appearances are without essence; words are without it too
Not seeing the meaning of emptiness; thus fools wander
No appearance has essence; leaving speech and discrimination
Everything is like a dream, an illusion; neither samsara, nor nirvana

諸性無自性，亦復無言說，
甚深空空義，愚夫不能了。
一切性自性，言說法如影，
自覺聖智子，實際我所說。

T670p490c17-20

Appearances are without essence; words are without it too
The very deep meaning of emptiness; fools cannot understand
Every being is essence; talking about law(s) is like a shadow
The self-awakening of the children of wisdom; is called the limit of reality

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 25th, 2010 at 4:25 AM

Title: Re: where to go to seek confirmation of attainment?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The topic of Buddha-nature is a different one. And in many cases the extreme view of existence.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 25th, 2010 at 6:31 AM

Title: Re: where to go to seek confirmation of attainment?

Content:

Yeshe said:

I disagree. If we are to discuss attainment, then then we should challenge the concept of progressive attainment or progressive revelation. Hence, the revelation of inherent Buddha Nature is actually at the core, since one needs to accept or refute its revelation as attainment.

Astus wrote:

All right then. The only possible way to enlightenment is gradual as far as it means the time and effort it takes for a deluded being to reach the level of complete and perfect enlightenment of a buddha. What has been a subject of debate is the matter of method. For there are direct (so called sudden) and indirect (gradual) methods. Indirect means using steps to train a student in morality, meditation and wisdom, like in a school with progressive grades. Obvious example for this approach is the Tibetan lamrim teaching. Direct means introducing the student immediately at the beginning to emptiness. That is what, for instance, they (supposed to) do in Zen. But a common misunderstanding about direct methods is to take the word "sudden" as a term referring to the time it takes to master it. Even those who were enlightened buddhas since their birth (eg. Shakyamuni, Padmasambhava) practised hard for a long time. What to say about ordinary beings then?

The great problem with direct teachings (primarily Zen, Dzogchen and Mahamudra) is that hardly anybody gets it for the first, second, third or hundredth time. And when there are some who actually can use these methods it is simply because of previous lives. Nevertheless, looking at the history of great Zen teachers of the past we find that they were all well educated and trained for decades. Thus even from a down to earth point of view "sudden enlightenment" doesn't happen so suddenly.

"The Dharma is without sudden and gradual; it is people that are clever or dull, therefore the names sudden and gradual." (Platform Sutra, ch. 8)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 25th, 2010 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: where to go to seek confirmation of attainment?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"i am happier talking about No attainment, which seems to be a state entered when the five skhandas have dissolved."

1. Without skandhas there is not even consciousness to realise anything.
2. Skandhas dissolve every moment anyway.
3. Skandhas are already empty as they are, no point in making them empty.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 27th, 2010 at 5:39 AM

Title: Re: where to go to seek confirmation of attainment?

Content:

Astus wrote:

1. Without consciousness it is like a piece of rock: insentient, dead. If there were no skandhas even understanding there are no skandhas would be impossible, not to mention writing about that here.
2. Skandhas are not about recognising or not recognising a self. All the aggregates are originally without any self, nevertheless there is the delusion of conceiving a view of self. But as I said, without skandhas means one cannot even wipe one's arse.
3. Who doesn't feel a self?

I don't mind if you're saying you attained some sort of enlightenment. But first it is best to understand what the Buddha taught about the nature of life and what nirvana is in Buddhism. You see, there are even grades of enlightenment in the Buddhadharma. When one has realised there is no permanent self it is indeed a good thing, the elimination of self-view (sakkaya-ditthi / sakkaya-ditthi). Then move on, don't say it is enough. The true goal, liberation, is perfect freedom from all forms of insatisfactoriness (dukkha / dukkha) and saving every sentient being.

If you want to understand for yourself what you have enlightened to go and study the teachings of the Buddha and the great masters. For instance, Candrakirti's "Four Illusions" (a commentary on Aryadeva's 400 stanzas) is really good for a start and available in English. And it is not too long either. Or if you're more into Zen like stuff I recommend the Surangama Sutra.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 28th, 2010 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: where to go to seek confirmation of attainment?

Content:

Unknown said:

i am suggesting that even consciousness is extinguished, replaced with emptiness.

Astus wrote:

By this you mean that consciousness and emptiness are two separate things.

Tsongkhapa says,

"So long as the two understandings - of appearance,
Which is undeceiving dependent origination,
And emptiness devoid of all theses - remain separate,
So long you have not realized the intent of the Sage."
(The Three Principal Aspects of the Path, 11.)

Unknown said:

yet pain continues, and colds, toothaches etc.

Astus wrote:

Perception of feelings is the work of skandhas. The very fact of perceiving is what the skandhas are.

Unknown said:

if it were not possible for something to become sunyatman

Astus wrote:

Things don't become empty of self, they're already so. If it were a matter of emptying emptiness itself would be constructed.

Unknown said:

i am questioning whether or not the five skhandas can be dissolved without the appearance of death.

Astus wrote:

Even the buddhas can see, hear, feel and think. These are the aggregates.

Unknown said:

i dont feel a self of any kind ... i have no feeling of mineness about anything

Astus wrote:

I guess when you're leaving the barbershop you can tell which coat is yours. Seeing that something is in one's possession or not requires a discriminating subject. So what kind of self you yourself don't have? Isn't it a poor self who has no self?

I'm just trying to highlight a contradiction in what you say.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 2nd, 2010 at 4:45 AM

Title: Re: where to go to seek confirmation of attainment?

Content:

Astus wrote:

White Lotus,

In brief, my point is that outside of appearances there is no such thing as emptiness. The very fact that all are illusions means that they're dependently originated and without any substance.

Jnanamitra's commentary to the Heart Sutra says (The Heart Sutra Explained, tr. by D.S. Lopez, p. 58),

"Form" is a word that conventionally designates the form that is seen and conceived by those with mistaken minds who have not understood the nature of emptiness. Regarding "emptiness", because emptiness is the nature of form, [form] is without characteristic and unobservable in the past and is without characteristic and unobservable in the present and the future. Therefore, since it does not abide anywhere or in anything, [the sutra*] says "emptiness". "Emptiness is form" conventionally designates with words that even emptiness [has] an unobservable nature [like] form. Because it does not abide apart from that [form], emptiness is form. Regarding "Emptiness is not other than form, form is not other than emptiness," that very thing which is form is the inexpressible emptiness; [when] form is abandoned, emptiness is not to be found. Therefore, it is said that emptiness is not other than form. That very thing which is the inexpressible emptiness does not exist and is not found apart from that which is conventionally designated with the word "form." Therefore, it is said that form is not other than emptiness.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 2nd, 2010 at 6:46 AM

Title: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

I found again the blog of the Amida-ji Retreat Temple Romania written by Josho Adrian Cirlea. What surprised me is that he was the first I saw addressing strange tendencies among Shin believers. He made a collection of articles addressing this issue:

<https://amida-ji-retreat-temple-romania.blogspot.com/search/label/DIVERGENCES%20FROM%20THE%20JODO%20SHINSHU%20TEACHING>

Based on my little experience with modern Shin teachings I think he speaks the truth. I've been perplexed before on how Shin Buddhists don't accept a really existing buddha-land of Amita Buddha. Now it seems clear. But, I'm not specifically a Shin follower myself, so I'd like to hear whatever opinion you have.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 3rd, 2010 at 3:49 AM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think it is a similar case as with rebirth generally. Many cannot move beyond their materialistic ideas and so they want to make Buddhism fit their concepts. In case of Pure Land Buddhism, some like to say that it is only a mental state and there is no such place as an actual buddha-land where beings can be born. And just as without rebirth Buddhism is meaningless, so is the Pure Land path pointless without Amita Buddha escorting beings to his Land of Bliss.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 3rd, 2010 at 5:44 PM

Title: Re: Is there a Mahayana/Vajrayana Equivalent to accesstoinight?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Creating anything similar to ATI in English is quite difficult. First of all there are copyright issues. Mahayana sutras have been translated by a large number of translators and groups. But you can find a lot around the Web if you know where to go. Plus Mahayana is a lot more diverse than Theravada.

On the other hand, you cannot get almost any Abhidhamma material online even though many of them are translated by PTS.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 3rd, 2010 at 8:53 PM

Title: Re: Is there a Mahayana/Vajrayana Equivalent to accesstoinight?

Content:

Astus wrote:

By the way, does anyone know a good source of online (modern) Japanese translations for sutras?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 4th, 2010 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: Is there a Mahayana/Vajrayana Equivalent to accesstoinsight?

Content:

Huseng said:

I find when I look for them online they tend to be links to all the various book merchants who want to sell paper copies of various texts.

I often wonder myself if there are any actual archives...

Astus wrote:

Exactly my experience. Almost every little Japanese temple have their own homepage but no teachings? Really strange. Do you know any reason behind this?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 10th, 2010 at 5:20 PM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism a Religion?

Content:

Astus wrote:

What is missing from other cultures is the separation of philosophy from religion. It was in ancient Greece that men came up with a critical view of reality. Xenophanes (6th c. BCE) even criticised ruling concepts about gods and tradition. Since we have this distinction of philosophy from religion unlike anyone else, it is natural that applying these ideas for other cultures is problematic. If we look at ancient philosophy that had no problem with gods and propagagated a way of life we could say that Buddhism is a philosophy. What makes it not just a "love of wisdom" is that it claims to be "wisdom" itself, thus religion. This brings us to the second fundamental difference between philosophy and religion, in religion there is no space for "free thinking" for one is told what to accept as truth, hence orthodoxy.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 12th, 2010 at 6:02 PM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dear Namu Butsu,

After reading both your writing and that critique first I have to say that it is worth studying Buddhism on a wider level. The idea presented by many that Amita Buddha is one's own pure mind is not new at all. Let's say, as it is presented in Zen, Tendai and Shingon the practice of Amida is like that but in Jodo and Jodo Shin it is different. That is because in Honen's and Shinran's perspective the jodomon (gate of Pure Land is the only available path for deluded guys (bonpu) incapable of any shodomon (gate of wise non-Pure Land) practices. If this point is missed obviously the meaning of the Pure Land teaching of Honen and Shinran are misunderstood. Saving oneself is the path of jiriki (self-power), the Shin path is full tariki (other-power). If Amida is not really a buddha but just my mind there is no way to rely on an other power, and if there is no buddha-land there is only hell to be born in.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 13th, 2010 at 8:06 AM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

Certainly, as it is reported from many sources Japanese Buddhism is in a sad state, not because of an external force oppressing it, but materialism taking over the hearts of people. On the other hand, wasn't that the same before? You read ancient Chinese Buddhist masters complaining about the decline in study and discipline among the monks. The teaching about the Dharma ending age is not new at all. The difference between now and then is while formerly people turned to gods, spirits and magic, now they have science, TV and malls. A change in appearance but not much in attitude. Japan is among the highest developed countries on Earth. And just like in the case of divine beings, people with enough wealth to feed a whole village for a week or more have little interest beyond their own. Since I believe Japan is the closest thing one can get to Western mentality, we better watch and learn how those few who take Buddhadharma seriously live and talk in such a society. When Shinran and other Kamakura reformers lived large Buddhist institutions were at war against each other. Isn't it better now? They could banish Honen, Shinran and Nichiren to dangerous lands only because of their teachings and expel Dogen from Kyoto. Isn't it better now to let everyone preach what they want?

While the idea of Dharma ending age is elemental in the Pure Land schools, historically (a very Western thing) looking at the present there wasn't much change in the past millennia regarding the percentage of people devoting themselves to understanding Buddhism deeply.

"Concerning the difficulty of accepting this Dharma in faith, to transform ordinary people into sages through this Dharma is actually as easy as turning one's palms - so easy that many people with shallow wisdom are skeptical about this. Thus the Larger Sutra, fasc. 2, states, "[The Pure Land] is easy to reach, but very few actually go there." Hence, we know that this Dharma is difficult to accept in faith."
(Yongqin quoted in the Kyogyoshinsho, tr. by H. Inagaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 13th, 2010 at 9:01 AM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

Namu Butsu,

"One doesn't have to believe that Amida is like a Christ-like being somewhere off in heaven."

I understand very much that this is the impression of many Western people who hear about the Pure Land path, especially considering that in the Shin school it is "salvation only by faith". It takes some learning to fully understand the purpose and meaning of this teaching within the Buddhist context. And of course it is difficult to absorb even the basics of Shakyamuni's teachings, not to mention the deeper levels of Mahayana. Without comprehending the reasons for the selection of exclusive nenbutsu as it is described in the Senchakushu (see it outlined <http://www.jsri.jp/English/Honen/TEACHINGS/senchaku/process.html>, also discussed in <http://www12.canvas.ne.jp/horai/kgss-g.htm>) one may confuse the meaning of faith in the Primal Vow.

Ways to see one's true nature "here and now" are abundant in Mahayana, adding teachings on Amita Buddha and the Land of Peace and Bliss to it are quite redundant. On the contrary, it happened that Amita Buddha was already popular when traditions like Tiantai and especially Chan took it up and explained it in their own ways.

Shinran also explained that those who abuse the Dharma are the only persons who cannot attain birth in the Pure Land. Defining the meaning of abusing the Dharma he quotes Vasubandhu: "If one says, "There is no Buddha," "There is no Buddha Dharma," "There is no bodhisattva," or "There is no Dharma for bodhisattvas," such views, held firmly in the mind by one's own reasoning or by listening to others' teachings, are called 'abusing the right Dharma.'" Denying the existence of Amita Buddha clearly cuts away the possibility of birth for then there is neither faith nor aspiration. What's the point of calling it a Pure Land school?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 13th, 2010 at 9:20 AM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

Lazy_eye,

Although the Pure Land teachings can be slightly different from those in Japan, look at what the late patriarch Yin Kuang said:

"Ordinary people generally think that if the Pure Land is Mind-Only, then it does not exist.

This is the understanding of demons and externalists. Such a deluded view, which appears correct but is in reality wrong, affects more than half of all people and causes practitioners to forfeit true benefits."

(Pure-Land Zen, letter 12, p. 57)

And patriarch Tiantai Zhiyi said:

"The dull and ignorant, on the other hand, are caught up in the concept of birth. Upon hearing the term "Birth", they understand it as actual birth; hearing of "Non-Birth", they (cling to its literal meaning) and think that there is no rebirth anywhere. Little do they realize that "Birth is precisely Non-Birth, and Non-Birth does not hinder Birth."

Because they do not understand this principle, they provoke arguments, slandering and deprecating those who seek rebirth in the Western Pure Land. What a great mistake! They are guilty of vilifying the Dharma and belong to the ranks of deluded externalists (non-Buddhists)."

(Ten Doubts about Pure Land)

Finally, here is Shinran's quote of Tanluan's explanation:

"Question: In Mahayana sutras and discourses it is repeatedly explained that sentient beings are, in the final analysis, like space, unborn. Why does Bodhisattva Vasubandhu state that he aspires to be born?

Answer: When it is explained that sentient beings are, like space, unborn, there are two possible meanings. First, sentient beings and their births and deaths conceived as real by ordinary people are, after all, as non-existent as the hair of a tortoise or open space. Second, since all things are produced by causes and conditions, they are as unproduced and as non-existent as open space. The birth that Bodhisattva Vasubandhu desired should be taken in the sense of [produced by] causes and conditions. Because birth takes place depending on causes and conditions, it is only provisionally called 'birth,' not in the sense that there are real sentient beings and real births and deaths as ordinary people imagine.

Question: In what sense do you speak of 'birth'?

Answer: When someone among those who are thus provisionally called 'men' performs the Five Mindful Practices, his thought in the preceding moment becomes the cause of his thought in the following moment. The provisional 'person' in this defiled land and the provisional 'person' in the Pure Land (who he is going to be) are neither exactly the same [593a] nor definitely different. Likewise, the thought of the preceding moment and that of the following moment are neither exactly the same nor definitely different. Why is this so? If they were the same, there would be no causality, and if they were different, there would be no continuity. This principle is explained in detail in the discourses dealing with the problem of 'sameness' and 'difference'."

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 13th, 2010 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

In Mahayana there are uncountable buddhas throughout the infinite worlds. They're as real as this and many other galaxies. Revering many enlightened ones is one of the features of Mahayana. Saying that it is not the teaching of the Buddha is questioning the truth of the Great Vehicle. It is not only the Pure Land sect saying that Amita Buddha and all the others are real but the very sutras themselves accepted in every Mahayana tradition from Tibet to Japan.

Buddhism is not about the present moment but leading sentient beings from suffering to real happiness. Aspiring to be born in any of the buddha-lands is one among the many ways someone could achieve that. And among the myriad buddha-lands the Western Land of Amita Buddha is a special one as far as it is accessible to simple deluded beings and not just enlightened bodhisattvas. The method to be born there is found not only in the so called Pure Land tradition but also in all the other Mahayana schools, including Tibetan ones.

This has nothing whatsoever to do with theistic religions. The Pure Land is not the end but a special environment to attain liberation. Amita Buddha is not a god but a perfectly enlightened being. I recommend you first read this short <http://www.sinc.sunysb.edu/Clubs/buddhism/pureland/inropl.html>. And this is a very succinct introduction to Shin Buddhism: <http://www.nembutsu.info/primshin.htm>.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 13th, 2010 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

I see, so you're saying that even the churches and abbots don't care about the quality of their teaching. That is sad indeed. Then perhaps you should study hard and become a reformer priest!

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 13th, 2010 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

Do you think Honen thought of himself as a reformer to change the face of Japanese Buddhism for ever? But he did. It is a fascinating biography.

Do you know if they already do online ordinations in Japan like for Christians in the USA?
I'd love to get a black robe.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 15th, 2010 at 2:22 AM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

Lazy eye,

What Ouyi, Hanshan and other masters say are all right and I have no problem with it at all. The issue here is not the validity of other forms of the Pure Land tradition but the interpretation of the Shin thought. Neither Honen nor Shinran advocated the so called Mind Only Pure Land (唯心淨土), although I think they were well aware of its existence. It is because they found the Pure Land path the single option for deluded common men of the Dharma ending age. Understanding the meaning of the teaching of Mind Only not being an easy task it seems natural to me that such a teaching cannot be called a universal means saving people of all capacities from high to low.

Reinterpreting the teaching to fit current needs is very good. But the criterion of transformation is on one hand to stay true to the original intention and on the other to bring good results. Now, saying that Amita Buddha is the true nature of mind without providing the necessary methods is misleading. Simple faith doesn't lead to recognising buddha-mind, neither does the sole repetition of any sets of words. Thus it is not enough to change the presentation of Shin Buddhism, one has to give a complete practical path too. Finally, if one reforms not only the explanation but the technique too it becomes a new lineage and it is not to be called Jodo Shinshu any more.

Unknown said:

If one wishes to see the Buddha then one sees him. If one sees him then one asks questions. If one asks then one is answered, one hears the sutras and rejoices greatly. One reflects thus: 'Where did the Buddha come from? Where did I go to?' and one thinks to oneself: 'The Buddha came from nowhere, and I also went nowhere.' One thinks to oneself: The Three Realms—the Realm of Desire, the Realm of Form, and the Realm of the Formless—these Three Realms are simply made by thought. Whatever I think, that I see. The mind creates the Buddha. The mind itself sees him. The mind is the Buddha. The mind is the Tathagata. The mind is my body, the mind sees the Buddha. The mind does not itself know the mind, the mind does not itself see mind. A mind with conceptions is stupidity, a mind without conceptions is nirvana. There is nothing in these dharmas which can be enjoyed; they are all made by thinking. If thinking is nothing but empty, then anything which is thought is also utterly nonexistent.' So it is, Bhadrupala, such is the vision of the bodhisattvas who are established in the meditation."

The Buddha then recited the following verses:

Mind does not know mind;

With mind one cannot see mind.
Mind giving rise to conceptions is stupidity;
Free of conceptions it is nirvana.

There is nothing fixed or firm in these dharmas;
They are forever located in thinking.
When one understands emptiness,
One is altogether free of conceptual thinking.

Astus wrote:

This is what the Buddha said in the Pratyutpanna Samadhi Sutra (ch. 2, tr. by Paul Harrison), which inspired many to practice in order to reach the Western Land of Amita Buddha in China since it was translated in 179 CE by Lokaksema among the very first Mahayana texts to be found in Chinese. However, in the Pure Land tradition this is not considered to be a central scripture unlike the so called Three Pure Land Sutras.

I think that Pure Land Buddhism as it is found in East Asia is far from being attracting for a modern audience full of materialist concepts. But not everyone is like that even in the so called West. And those who tried hard to follow any of the Sage's Path but had to realise his/her failure the easy path of buddha-remembrance provides an escape even for them from the grip of life and death.

Many cannot even live according to the five lay precepts. Isn't it then a massive delusion to hope for enlightenment in this life when even their human birth is far from being assured? Of course, not taking the teaching of karma seriously and being ignorant of the drawbacks of samsara it is no wonder people are short sighted and look for only the present benefits.

Shinran in chapter 4 of the Kyogyoshinsho describes the activities of enlightened beings who dwell in the Pure Land, that is the returning phase. However, until we're still about to go there his words in the Shoshinge apply (stanza 8):

"The Light of All-embracing Compassion always illumines and protects us;
The darkness of ignorance has already been destroyed by it,
But still the clouds and mists of greed, desire, anger and enmity Continually cover the sky of True Faith;"

If it were so that people reached the Pure Land here and now they would be like this (stanza 18):

"Upon reaching the World of Lotus-store,
We will realize True Suchness and attain Dharma-body.
Then, playing in the forests of evil passions, we will display supernatural powers;
Entering Samsaric states, we will manifest accommodative and transformed bodies to save beings."

Do you really think common deluded beings can easily realise Amita Buddha as the self-nature and perform the tasks of an enlightened bodhisattva? If not, it is misleading to tell them so.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 15th, 2010 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

Glad to see you here Andreas. You're right, I'm not a Shin follower as stated in my initial post. I'm not on a crusade either, so if you can reply to what I presented here as my unprofessional understanding of Shinran's thought I'd happily change my mind. My problem has been with Shin Buddhism as described by some that if shinjin equalled attaining non-retrogression - the realisation of no-birth of dharmas - in the here and now instead of meaning an assured birth in the Pure Land and consequently attaining enlightenment, it'd be in direct contradiction with not just Honen but generally Mahayana. But if it is simply an assured birth then a real Amita Buddha and a real Pure Land is necessary. Or it might be that my logic here is faulty somewhere. If so, please point at my mistake.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 15th, 2010 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

Namu Butsu,

What you say I'm all OK with it. That certainly sounds like a faith lived at its full extent. It is wonderful. My argument was only against saying that Amita Buddha is not a real being who reached perfect enlightenment via walking the bodhisattva path for many aeons. To say that Amita Buddha is also a dharmakaya buddha and the true nature of everything is not a contradiction but the application of the three bodies (trikaya) teaching, that is definitely fine with me.

Regarding Dr. Bloom's letter I have a question. How do you get in contact with that ultimate reality? If it is through Amita Buddha's compassion then isn't it the case that actually there is a buddha (sambhogakaya) leading people to it (dharmakaya)? And if that is the case there is no disagreement here as such is the teaching of all Pure Land sects, what he, however, calls a myth (if I get it right).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 15th, 2010 at 7:07 PM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

Namu Butsu,

Thanks for the quote. It seems to me more emotional-poetic than logical-descriptive, so I'd rather not analyse its content.

What I'm asking is a clear technical outline of the method of realising ultimate reality in your interpretation of Shin Buddhism. Otherwise it is difficult for me to understand what you exactly say and where our agreements and disagreements lie.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 16th, 2010 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

Andreas,

Thank you for your kind reply and correction. I'm not trying to tell who is a real Shin follower and who is not. Sorry if my language wasn't appropriate. To me Shin as presented by Adrian sounded sensible and more in line with common (non-Shin) Pure Land thought. And if that is a minority view what he says I'd still like to understand the other version. By understanding I mean to have it explained in agreement with general Mahayana teachings, like transference of merit, buddha-lands, three bodies, dependent origination, etc. My other idea was once that Shinran turned Pure Land teachings into something very lofty, like as you said, dropping all self-centred effort, leaving mental proliferation (calculation) behind, and so on. In that case it resembles Zen a lot, or even more extreme. But that I find so contrary to the emphasis on unenlightened wicked nature and the concept of nenbutsu being a path for all. If it is such a radical no-effort, no-method teaching, I can only imagine that it is a way of very very few people. And thus it would belong to the Path of Sages and not the easy path of Pure Land. See now what I'm perplexed about?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 17th, 2010 at 12:21 AM

Title: Re: The value of non-Buddhist literature?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"As a Bodhisattva always comes to live in this world in order to save the sentient beings, he/she must be proficient in all kinds of worldly knowledge and skills. Thus, he/she should have a good profession for earning a living and serving the other people. Through all these actions, he/she can gather the other sentient beings and show them how to cultivate the Buddhist Way. A Bodhisattva must have a good knowledge of the Five Sciences."

Five sciences (pancavidya):

Language (Sabda)
Craftsmanship (Silpakarmasthana)
Medicine (Cikitsa)
Logic (Hetu)
Philosophy (Adhyatma)

<http://www.buddhistdoor.com/OldWeb/bdoor/archive/nutshell/teach16.htm>

Author: Astus
Date: Wednesday, March 17th, 2010 at 5:22 AM
Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings
Content:
Astus wrote:
Andreas,

Good to read your thoughtful response. What you say appears to me that it is very much connected with the trend of finding "original Buddhism" - well known in Japan. It's similar to Soto people taking up Dogen from the long past and saying he knew it all and that's enough, never mind the past 800 years, or those before him.

Of course, a traditionalist-modernist debate should be avoided. Today's popular thinking raises its own challenges for all schools. Turning back to the "original" and being more socially engaged are well known effects of West meeting East. Maybe something enduring emerges from it, maybe it is just a temporary phase. I cannot tell. What I know is that a comparative study of modern Theravada, Zen and Shin would be really intriguing. I think they show similar changes to fit a modern mindset.

To me, as far as Pure Land soteriology goes - including Shin - the great wonder is giving an option for stupid people to reach liberation. As the Tannisho (§15) says, "This is the effortless practice undertaken by inferior religious practitioners in which the distinction between good and evil is non-existent." To make it anything more complicated than believing that Amita Buddha saves those who trust in his vows is contrary to Amita Buddha's intention as explained in the sutras. Of course, that doesn't mean there can be no difficult to understand explanations and philosophies based on that. And I'm not talking against anyone here.

It seems strange to me to say that Shinran greatly diverged from what Honen and the other patriarchs taught when it is Shinran himself claiming to be a direct follower of their teachings. He not just knew Honen personally but had his magnum opus, the Senchakushu, at hand. In case he didn't agree with that fully he could have said so, don't you think? Nevertheless, that's not to say Shinran didn't have his own perspectives and style of teaching.

Author: Astus
Date: Wednesday, March 17th, 2010 at 5:44 AM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

Lazy eye,

Nice you mentioned that book, it was just last weekend I finished reading it. Personally I found it very eclectic and thus confusing for those who have no knowledge of East-Asian Buddhism. Mixing the Pali scriptures with popular Mahayana sutras seems a not so good idea to me. Plus it is not just a collection of quotes but actually a rewritten version. Fairly readable but not the kind of book one should analyse it on a finer level of meaning. For that the original texts are indispensable, like the Pure Land sutras themselves. If you want a taste of the difficulty of Mind Only teaching try the Mahayanasamgraha by Asanga as an introduction.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 17th, 2010 at 4:28 PM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Amida Buddha which is the Wisdom and Compassion of the cosmos transmits the Light of insight and we see more deeply."

What do you mean by "compassion of the cosmos"? You imply that stars, rocks and gases have compassion? Or there is a separate natural force besides the four elements, similar to gravity?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 17th, 2010 at 7:47 PM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thanks especially for that interview link. It speaks in clear words that here Amida is the same as dependent origination and not an enlightened being in a buddha-land. Thus it symbolises reality, as Bloom said. Shinjin is realising that we're bad people full of karmic delusion, but this is all dependently originated, so it is not really mine. Am I correct?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 18th, 2010 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

Not just because the Pali Canon is not part of any East Asian collection of scriptures, but also looking into Hinayana materials is a 20th century phenomenon not done for more than a millennium. Also it's worth mentioning that one wouldn't find a single reference in it to Amita Buddha, or even buddha-lands.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 18th, 2010 at 6:38 PM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Deity-yoga is at the heart of Mantrayana. Depending on the level one practises different styles of yidam practice is applied. In case of Atiyoga level we could say that the nature of mind becomes the deity. Consulting with one's teacher is for clarifying your personal needs. For general instructions there are many sources one can go for, from live teachings to tantras. Here's one for you:

Lady Tsogyal asks, Guru Rinpoche answers

("The Vajra Master & the Yidam Deity" in Dzogchen Essentials: The Path That Clarifies Confusion)

Why is it important to practice the yidam deity?

It is essential to practice a yidam deity because through that you will attain siddhis, your obstacles will be removed, and you will obtain powers, receive blessings, and give rise to realization. Since all these qualities result from practicing the yidam deity, then without the yidam deity you will be just an ordinary person. By practicing the yidam deity, you attain the siddhis, so the yidam deity is essential.

...

If one's view is high, is it permissible to dispense with the yidam deity?

If you attain confidence in the correct view, then that itself is the yidam deity. Do not regard the yidam deity as a form body. Once you realize the nature of dharmakaya, you will have accomplished the yidam deity.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 18th, 2010 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land as a meditation practice?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Pure Land teaching has always had meditation as the central piece of the tradition. What came to be the Jodo and Jodo Shinshu schools in Japan are quite radicals compared to all the others. If you want a more detailed description of the options check <http://www.ymba.org/BWF/bwf0.htm>. As for buddha-remembrance practice, this is a really nice text: <http://www.ymba.org/monkey/monkeyfrm.htm>.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 19th, 2010 at 4:18 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana and the Dhyanas/Jhanas

Content:

Astus wrote:

Only non-returners (anagami) and arhats are free from the kamaloka. On the other hand, just by mastering dhyanas and samapattis (eight jhanas) one never becomes an arya of any level. These absorptions can result in heavenly births in the rupa and arupalokas, so they're said to be parts of the teaching of men and gods that is before the level of sravakas. Also don't forget that there is a dhyana-paramita for the bodhisattvas.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 20th, 2010 at 2:04 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana and the Dhyanas/Jhanas

Content:

Astus wrote:

BTW, to reply to your question, bodhicitta is fully sufficient for preventing one to get lost in illusory nirvanas.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 22nd, 2010 at 8:30 PM

Title: Re: What should you do when you don't have a Zen teacher yet?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't think Zen specifically requires a teacher compared to other Buddhist schools (except Secret Mantra where they are emphatic about the guru). For instance Dahui came up with the practice of huatou exactly in order to propagate Zen among the laity. In recent times Xuyun also had a fairly large number of lay followers.

While it is true that the majority of "home-stayers" are busy collecting merit by supporting the monks and nuns, that is not the only option. The idea of "Zen in action" is essentially for those who are not in a monastery or a cave. Also it is not a coincidence that one of the most favourite sutras of Zen is about a layman.

What to do to practise Zen? Simple. Abide in the Unborn - as Bankei said, again a popular teacher. Trust in the Empty Doer - aka Juigong as Daehaeng Kunsunim says. It is accessible all the time. What else one would need?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 22nd, 2010 at 11:45 PM

Title: Re: What should you do when you don't have a Zen teacher yet?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think it is no different from questioning whether one meditates on loving-kindness or not. If you're clear about the meaning of the word you can match the experience, just like you can tell if the water is hot or cold.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 23rd, 2010 at 5:41 AM

Title: Re: What should you do when you don't have a Zen teacher yet?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Historical connection to the Buddha, the myth of unbroken lineage, might be true for monastic ordination, even though specific names and dates are unknown (and not important), but certainly not true for the so called Dharma-transmission of Zen. So that form of connection doesn't exist in a literal sense. However, in an ahistorical form there are different levels of connections ranging from hearing about the teaching up to enlightenment.

A teacher is a vessel of the Dharma, a medium. A teacher can transmit the teaching in many ways, like lectures, interviews, books and videos. To have a personal connection with a teacher is like having a good friend. But can we say that great masters who had literally hundreds of students were intimate with all of them? Unlikely. Also monks, following their initial years of training, have to be able to work on their own.

The guide of every Buddhist is the teaching of the Buddha. I go to my bookshelf (or C:\Users\Astus\My Documents\Sutra) and open the Avatamsaka Sutra I can read the very words of the Awakened One. In the Manifestation of Buddha chapter the knowledge of the essence of buddhas is called "teacherless spontaneous knowledge" (tr. Cleary, chapter 37; T10n0279, vol. 52, p0278a06). A couple of pages back it explains what "teacherless" stands for:

"If great enlightening beings accomplish the techniques of this great concentration of knowledge of adornments of buddhas of all worlds, they are teacherless because they can enter all principles and qualities of buddhas by themselves, without depending on another's instruction." (ch. 27; T10n0279, vol. 41, p0218a17-18)

Of course that doesn't mean there are no teachers. It is more like how the Diamond Sutra says Sakyamuni didn't learn anything from Dipamkara. As in the Avatamsaka Sutra:

"though they know things ultimately have no teacher, yet they always respect all teachers and those of experience; though they know true understanding of things does not come from another, yet they always respect skillful guides" (ch. 27; T10n0279, vol. 43, p0225b22-24)

As far as Zen history is concerned here, we can see that already at the beginning there were different factions with differing views. Now if we consider that there are so many factors defining what constitutes authentic teaching and to whom, it is virtually impossible to tell from the outside (ie. not joining any of them) who carries the real flame of transmission. Thus arguing for the necessity of a teacher - an enlightened Zen Master - becomes quite problematic.

I don't say teachers are useless, not at all. Without teachers Buddhism is dead. But this mentality of "ask your guru" is what I see as a deviance. In the words of Linji:

you take the words that come out of the mouths of a bunch of old teachers to be a description of the true Way. You think, 'This is a most wonderful teacher and friend. I have only the mind of a common mortal, I would never dare try to fathom such venerableness.' Blind idiots! You go through life with this kind of understanding, betraying your own two eyes, cringing and faltering like a donkey on an icy road, saying, 'I would never dare speak ill of such a good friend, I'd be afraid of making mouth karma!'" (tr. Watson, ch. 17; T47n1985_p0499b20-24)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 23rd, 2010 at 6:58 AM

Title: Re: How useful are Chan records?

Content:

Astus wrote:

This is a great analysis on Chan texts with a focus on Zhaozhou's Wu:

<http://buddhiststudies.berkeley.edu/people/faculty/sharf/documents/Sharf%202007%20Chan%20Gongan.pdf>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 23rd, 2010 at 4:20 PM

Title: Re: What should you do when you don't have a Zen teacher yet?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

At another place Linji advises his disciples to go and find a teacher for time is short. Also he talks about his career that he studied the Vinaya, sutras, treatises, then started Chan practice and finally met a capable teacher. So perhaps he wasn't that maverick in the end.

Respect for teachers and fellow practitioners is important of course. Even in the Nikaya scriptures the Buddha told Ananda that good friends are not just the half but the whole of holy life. As I said, I'm not arguing for the dismissal of teachers, only against this concept that without a personal contact with a teacher one cannot progress on the path.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 23rd, 2010 at 6:46 PM

Title: Re: What should you do when you don't have a Zen teacher yet?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Personally I have benefitted from "sitting at the foot" of some Zen teachers. It has its own advantages and disadvantages. I am sure, however, that I learnt nothing as far as theory and practice goes that I couldn't from non-personal sources. But that was my case, not everyone's. Nevertheless, as you said, we can access a great amount of information, and if needed talk to teachers and fellows about some problems. On the other hand, if one can join a community IRL, it is very good and so there's one teacher at least (in most cases).

I'm not so sure about the necessity of a Zen teacher in the past. What you say about the limited source of information is true of course. But if we imagine a monk who learnt the basics in a monastery and then goes to the mountains, there were no teachers at hand. He knew what to do, had the training to prepare for solitary practice, then went on and did his best. And when he returned he visited temples, was respected by others for his practice and wisdom and finally established his own temple.

We shouldn't forget either that documents of transmission were used in order to establish one's authority as the abbot of a monastery. It is like joining the prestigious club of elite monks who claimed to be enlightened heirs of Bodhidharma. Certainly it was on one hand a proof of one's expertise but as we can learn from the texts the status of an abbot/Zen teacher was abused as well on a large scale.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 23rd, 2010 at 10:00 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Evolution

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think this brings up an apparent contradiction between scientific and Buddhist view. I mean, according to Buddhist cosmology there have been great empires and highly developed civilizations on Earth before. No scientific evidence for that. In Buddhism karma defines birth, so in case there were no humans here it must have been on a different world humans were born.

Or, it is possible to reinterpret religious cosmology as if it were somewhat metaphoric, for instance about the four continents and Mount Meru. I wonder what could be a solution here.

One simple and easy answer could be that there is a scientific and there is a religious world view, no need to match them. But this is hardly acceptable for those who see science as the source of really real truth about life, the world and everything.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 24th, 2010 at 4:40 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Evolution

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

Thanks for giving a broader explanation of what I called separating scientific from religious. Your description was what I had in mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 24th, 2010 at 9:45 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Evolution

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is a known trick to re-interpret ancient passages in a metaphorical way even if it was meant to be literal back then. However, that is accepting the validity of the other's position thus being forced to change one's own. Every religion did the same to other faiths when they conquered a land, just think about making saints, angels and demons from local spirits and gods in case of Christianity, and in Buddhism turning Indian gods to mortal beings and taming the demons of Tibet. When science can force other views to submit themselves to it, that is its victory, spreading scientific ideas (in this sense it is not a bit different from religions). But we can use instead of this "war" metaphor other forms, like the meme theory, to describe how one view infects another view.

Among the many options to choose from about how to look at the relationship between Buddhism and science, to take a Buddhist position we should rather look at the relevance and effectiveness of scientific ideas on the Way. There are many aspects to investigate for sure.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 25th, 2010 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Evolution

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm not talking about it being an enemy but careful consideration of taking science and especially scientism-physicalism as something compelling for Buddhism. On one hand it was rarely a problem for Buddhists to adopt to different cultures. However, neither in East-Asia nor in Tibet they gave up basic tenets of their cosmology.

I said Way but that has nothing to do with Taoism, it is for the Way to Enlightenment, ie. Marga/Magga in Sanskrit/Pali and Dao in Chinese.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 25th, 2010 at 4:51 AM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here I collected the words of Shinran from the Kyogyoshinsho. I believe these express his understanding honestly and clearly, therefore they can be relied on as definite teachings. This I have done in order to show my confusion openly about the way Shin Buddhism is taught by Bloom et al. I sincerely hope that if I missed something in the writings of Shinran, someone can point out to me where he says otherwise in a similar manner I now quote him and adding my interpretation of those paragraphs.

Shinjin is the heartfelt trust in the vows of Amita buddha. Those vows explicitly contain Dharmakara bodhisattva's intention to bring about a buddha-land where people can be born via buddha-remembrance. In Shinran's words:

"When the Larger Sutra says 'hear' [in the phrase 'having heard the Name'], it means that sentient beings, having heard how the Buddha made and fulfilled the Vow, entertain no doubt. This is what is meant by 'hear.' 'Faith' [in 'rejoice in faith'] refers to Faith endowed by the Primal Vow-Power. 'Rejoice' shows the state of joy in body and mind. 'Even (once)' is the word that comprises both many and few. 'A single thought' means that one's Faith is free of double-mindedness; hence, it is called 'a single thought.' This is what [Vasubandhu] calls 'the One Mind.' The One Mind is the true cause of birth in the Pure Land of Recompense."

(Chapter on Faith)

"When I contemplate 'recompense,' I find that the accomplished land has resulted as the recompense for the Tathagata's ocean-like Vow. Hence, 'recompensed.'"

(Chapter on True Buddha and Land)

He doesn't say it is a metaphor, or an expedient means. Quite the contrary, he writes more than once that Dharmakara bodhisattva's practice was pure and his compassion all-embracing, that's how he could create such a land:

"when the Tathagata awakened compassion for all suffering ocean-like sentient beings and performed the Bodhisattva practices for inconceivable, millions and billions of kalpas, his practices in three modes of action have never been impure or untrue, even for a thought-moment or an instant. With the pure and true mind, the Tathagata perfected the complete, all-merging, unhindered, inconceivable, [604b] indescribable and ineffable supreme virtue. The Tathagata endows his Sincere Mind to the ocean-like multitudes of beings who are full of evil passions, evil karma and perverted wisdom. This is the true mind endowed by him to benefit such beings; hence, it is not mixed with doubt. The basis for the Sincere Mind is the Sacred Name of the supreme virtue."

(Chapter on True Faith)

Shinran also talks about the Pure Land as a real place, compares it with other buddha-lands and makes distinctions, as found in the sutras, about difference in birth in the Pure Land:

"Provisional birth is birth in an embryonic state, and borderland; it is birth beneath the Twin Shala trees. Immediate birth refers to birth by sudden transformation into the Recompensed Land."

(Chapter on Provisional Buddhas and Lands)

Difference because of mixed and auxiliary practices:

"These are all the karmic cause for birth in the borderland, womb-palace and the realm of sloth and pride. Therefore, even though one is born in the Land of Utmost Bliss, one is unable to see the Three Treasures, for the light of the Buddha's mind does not illumine and embrace practitioners of other miscellaneous acts."

(Chapter on Provisional Buddhas and Lands)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 25th, 2010 at 4:22 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Evolution

Content:

Astus wrote:

Problem is that literal and metaphorical reading should be true at the same time. So, like in the case of absorptions and heavens, it is true that different levels of dhyana correspond to different strata of heavens, and it is also true that there are literally those heavens with many gods. The inner and outer worlds are interrelated, thus all is consciousness only (which is not the same as solipsism or idealism). But in science the basic view is a separate objective world independent of mind. From this disagreement comes contradictions between the two views.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 26th, 2010 at 2:53 AM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

To say that Mahayana sutras are not from the Buddha is to deny the Great Vehicle. The misunderstanding comes from not understanding what Buddhavacana (Buddha speech) means. I recommend you reading <http://geocities.ws/sutrasbudistas/shastras/gran-vehiculo.html> that also discusses the question of the Bodhisattva-pitaka, i.e. the Mahayana sutras.

I understand very well when people have problems with believing in beings beyond this physical Earth-realm. But in Buddhism there have always been hells, spirits, heavens and gods. There are infinite realms throughout the cosmos, thus infinite buddhas and bodhisattvas. There is not just the land of Amita Buddha but also the lands of Medicine Buddha, Akshobya Buddha, etc. Even in the Nikayas Shakyamuni talked about buddhas of the past.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 26th, 2010 at 3:45 AM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

I have no idea where he practised, a more educated person might be able to answer that question. But bodhisattvas travel in myriads of buddha-lands, so it may not matter that much.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 26th, 2010 at 7:45 PM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

Andreas,

I've read the O'Neill article and sent a mail to Dr Bloom. What O'Neill said sounded quite like what you talked about here. But as I said, I'd like to see references to Shinran for this, if possible. Actually that's what I asked from Dr Bloom too. For while I accepted already what you've said as one of the interpretation of Shin Buddhism I still don't see it harmonising with Shinran's words. Maybe it is so, maybe not, I don't know yet. Nevertheless, it's OK with me to say that there are different versions of viewing Shin Buddhism.

Please don't take it as a fight. What you and those you refer to say about Shin Buddhism is fine by me on its own. I just want to see how that is connected to what Shinran himself said, and of course to the major picture of Mahayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 26th, 2010 at 8:56 PM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sure, I'll bring his explanation here.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 2nd, 2010 at 3:38 PM

Title: Re: Is there really a "just war"?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Not exactly about war but the relationship between Buddhism (Mahayana-Vajrayana) and Violence: <http://vajrayana.faithweb.com/DGrayCompassionateViolence.pdf> by David Gray. It is a great article in my opinion.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 2nd, 2010 at 7:05 PM

Title: The Silent Master

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't know many teachers from Tibetan schools that's why I ask this question.

Is it common, or normal, that a highly educated lama teaches to his Western community some sadhanas, gives the necessary empowerments, but otherwise gives no lectures on general Mahayana nor on Tantra? What could be a reason for this?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 3rd, 2010 at 1:32 AM

Title: Re: The Silent Master

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm talking about a resident teacher and not just someone who came by, gave an empowerment and went on.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 3rd, 2010 at 4:05 PM

Title: Re: The Silent Master

Content:

Astus wrote:

He has a small group of dedicated practitioners, about 5-6 people I met there, and I asked them about what teachings were given throughout the years.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 3rd, 2010 at 5:54 PM

Title: Re: Lam Rim texts

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'd like to make a note that none of the Lam Rim texts could qualify as a "summary of the Pali Canon". For concise presentation of the Theravada (and not all Hinayana) path of similar quality one should look for Abhidhamma summaries like the Abhidhammattha Sangaha. Lam Rim texts are very distant relatives of such Theravada summaries.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 5th, 2010 at 5:28 AM

Title: How Important Is Transmission?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'd like to bring up four books as major references:

John McRae: Seeing through Zen - Encounter, Transformation, and Genealogy in Chinese Chan Buddhism

John McRae: The Northern School and the Formation of Early Ch'an Buddhism

Morten Schlütter: How Zen Became Zen - The Dispute Over Enlightenment and the Formation of Chan Buddhism in Song-Dynasty China

Jiang Wu: Enlightenment in Dispute - The Reinvention of Chan Buddhism in Seventeenth-Century China

If one were to look into these fine works of modern scholarship covering important eras of Chan history the question of this topic may easily appear. We've been told by Western (and Eastern) Zen teachers how Dharma-transmission is so essential to Zen, and only a teacher with proper credentials can train students. Then it turns out there is no such thing as a proper credential. And it is not just that the 27/28 Indian patriarchs are fake, but the whole Tang "golden age" and the so called "five houses" too. Zen history was not made up only in the Song era but again in the Ming dynasty. And I guess such revival happened again with Xuyun in the 19th-20th century.

What is your reply to the question?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 5th, 2010 at 6:40 PM

Title: Re: How Important Is Transmission?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

Refuge in the Triple Jewel requires no preceptor, it never did. Who would be the preceptor for taking refuge? If only monks then there are no Buddhists in Japan, nor one could get it from any lay teacher. By the way, don't you think if someone happened to find a sutra in a library and read it is karmic connection?

Transmission wasn't emphasised only when texts were rare but also when one could read the whole canon in the same monastery. And here this is not really about teachers generally but Zen masters defined by their lineage.

David,

I don't know if there are similar studies regarding Korean Buddhism. Nevertheless, looking into its recent history Dharma-transmission doesn't seem to play a central role. Master Seongcheol doesn't seem to have received any transmission (see his bio and prof. Hyewon Kang's essay "A Commentary on Venerable Songchul's Method for Seon Practice"), although he was supreme patriarch of the whole Jogye Order several times. Still, if the origin of such a transmission (India and China) is not reliable, there is no basis to claim connection to the Buddha in a form of historical lineage.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 5th, 2010 at 8:36 PM

Title: Re: The Silent Master

Content:

Astus wrote:

I didn't mean there were no teachings for the empowerment for there were. I meant he gives no teachings generally, you know, Dharma speeches.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 5th, 2010 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: How Important Is Transmission?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"As far as the Chan / Zen model goes, transmission has been deemed necessary."

Yes, that is the idea. But as we can see, it is not the reality. Then what's the point of a transmission that has no value as it's lost its historical validity? Actually Chan was attacked on this part by the rival Tiantai school questioning the historicity of its lineage. Now that we can see clearly it is invalid shouldn't it be wise to respond to this situation instead of clinging to an unstable concept?

"The leadership could presumably decide to change that doctrine however."

What leadership?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 6th, 2010 at 3:45 AM

Title: Re: How Important Is Transmission?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The only American Dharma-heir of Ven. Shengyan is Gilbert Gutierrez but he also has four other heirs in Europe (2 in UK, 1 in Switzerland, 1 in Croatia). These are the Western lay heirs, he has others (monks) in Taiwan as far as I know.

I wouldn't call Ven. Shengyan the head of Chinese Chan as a whole. He was the leader of his own community, the DDM, which was in Taiwan. I don't think he had any influence on things going on in the PRC or other Taiwanese groups. Actually it seems to me that Chinese Buddhism doesn't have any single leader (if not the Ministry of Religion, or something like that).

I don't think anyone would suggest to drop the idea of transmission. It has been a central aspect of Chan ever since. Even the term "Patriarchal Chan" bears the significance of the concept. Personally I see no problem with it if handled properly and in light of historical events. But I think that in the West Dharma-transmission has been very much overemphasised, mystified and "misunderstood".

Zen has been advertised ever since as being an unbroken lineage from Shakyamuni Buddha up to the present. Actually it is severely broken in many parts. People claim reliability of Zen teachers based on their transmission (and not sutras or logical explanations of the Dharma for instance), therefore saying the source of such validity is forged must provoke a different view. Here I'm talking about the Western situation.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 6th, 2010 at 3:47 AM

Title: Re: How Important Is Transmission?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"What are your credentials again?"

What credentials are you looking for from me? Please look at the opening post to see what this is about here.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 6th, 2010 at 4:24 AM

Title: Re: How Important Is Transmission?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The weight of my opinion is open for scrutiny and argument.

The "current model" did not produce either Huangbo or Shengyan. What the model created is an imagined link (bloodline) connecting those two people to each other and back to Shakyamuni. My argument is exactly that this connection is non-existent in its historical sense of a teacher-disciple lineage. It's also good to note that Shengyan didn't really follow the Hongzhou school (what Huangbo belonged to) rhetoric of sudden enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 6th, 2010 at 4:48 AM

Title: Re: How Important Is Transmission?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Being a broken lineage means that: no Zen patriarchal lineage was ever recognised in India and even in China it took some time to create it; the concept of transmission was revised a couple of times in the Tang; lineages and so called Zen houses were made up in the Song era; the Song myth of Tang Chan was revived in the Ming era with another forgery of lineages. These are in brief the subjects of those studies I mentioned in the opening post, but of course there are other works by different scholars if you are interested.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 6th, 2010 at 4:18 PM

Title: Re: How Important Is Transmission?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Yes, I know transmission is present in many forms within Buddhism but here I wanted to discuss the Zen version. If others can bring here enough research on Tantric (EA and Tibetan), Vinaya, Tiantai or other forms I would read it with great interest.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 6th, 2010 at 7:49 PM

Title: Re: How Important Is Transmission?

Content:

Astus wrote:

In Soto Zen, dharma-transmission is part of becoming a fully authorised priest called osho (Chinese: heshang; Sanskrit: upadhyaya; i.e. preceptor). Thus it authorises one to be an abbot of a temple (family property). This is of course a result of historical development within Soto Zen as it became an organised church in Japan. I have no objection against that practice at all. What I think is important is to understand transmission not as a "diploma of enlightenment" but as a means to run a church. And that has been the case since the rise of Chan in China since the 11th century. Thus to say that anyone who aspires to be a teacher of Zen must have a paper is not a religious point of view but a bureaucratic one.

Again, that doesn't mean teachers are useless. It's just how we look at people who spread the Dharma. And also it defines our view of Zen. In my opinion Zen is part of Buddhism and has nothing special that could qualify it to be above any other school. It is a form of teaching (actually a large variety of forms) that can be studied and practised just as any other teaching. And some may become great teachers while many others don't regardless of having or not having a transmission from any organisation or lineage.

What the religious meaning of transmission is is the seeing of nature which is identical to the nature of all buddhas. That's how ideally paper transmission is a manifestation of mind-to-mind transmission, i.e. enlightenment. (Here it is also good to note even the meaning of enlightenment is questioned and debated by Zen teachers of the past.) As we can see, however, paper and mind-to-mind is not exactly the same. There are many enlightened people outside the Zen tradition too, so technically they have mind-to-mind transmission. And there are many non-enlightened people within Zen who have paper.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 7th, 2010 at 3:36 AM

Title: Re: How Important Is Transmission?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Just bumped into this book:

https://books.google.com/books?id=x2ZxQk2AfYsC&source=gbs_navlinks_s by Alan Cole. Here's a https://webcache.googleusercontent.com/search?q=cache%3Az_pvDJJV6rsJ%3Awww.equinoxjournals.com%2Ffojs%2Findex.php%2FBFSR%2Farticle%2Fdownload%2F7747%2F5133.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 7th, 2010 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land as a meditation practice?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Keep one eye on what you can do, in the present situation. But keep the other eye on the final goal. If one only looks at the present situation, then one will stagnate, and ultimately never proceed further. If one only looks at the final goal, then one will be intimidated, and never begin. Some teaching focus more on one than the other, and it pays not to confuse the two."

Wow, that was really a good one, Master Huifeng! Sadhu, sadhu!

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 7th, 2010 at 11:15 PM

Title: Re: Who are your Top 5 Mahayana masters of all time?

Content:

Astus wrote:

1. Nagarjuna - for Madhyamaka
2. Dushun - for Huayan
3. Mazu Daoyi - for Hongzhou Chan
4. Guifeng Zongmi - for Heze Chan and Huayan
5. Thrangu Rinpoche - especially for his teachings on Mahamudra

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 9th, 2010 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: What constitutes the word of the Buddha?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Defining what the Buddha's speech is needs a definition of "buddha" and "speech".

Historical: This is the view that there was a buddha very long time ago in Northern India and gave teachings on the way to attain nirvana. It supposes that with archaeological and philological methods it is possible to unearth the Original, the Real.

Religious: This is the view where a buddha is not merely a flesh and blood human but a spiritual entity beyond constraints of physicality. It supposes that with a purified consciousness it is/was (Mahayana/Theravada) possible to see and here such a being.

Transcendental: This is the view where a buddha is the very nature of reality, enlightenment itself. It supposes that actually there is no buddha to meet for it is our true nature.

Indeed, this is simply the teaching of the trikaya. Thus shravakas see the first, (novice) bodhisattvas the first two, and buddhas (and mahasattvas) all three. I think that it doesn't take much effort to see how these there are interdependent and interpenetrating each other. There is no need to doubt either scientific research or traditional teaching. Just remember how in the Avatamsaka Sutra the Buddha was present in infinite universes without moving from his bodhimanda.

To answer the question in an essence-function format: all appearances are the "speech", the nature of such phenomena is the "buddha".

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 12th, 2010 at 3:13 AM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here's my correspondence with Dr. Alfred Bloom on the subject raised here.

Me:

I've leafed through the Kyogyoshinsho to find how Shinran talks about the existence of his buddha-land and Amita Buddha but I could find only that he views it just like other Pure Land thinkers before, as a recompensed land and sambhogakaya buddha resulting from the bodhisattva work and vows. On the other hand, my friend tried to explain to me that Shinran is radically different here saying that Amita Buddha is not somebody "10,000 buddha-lands to the West" (as it is generally understood in Mahayana) but rather - and about this I'm uncertain if I get it right - the nature of reality, an impersonal compassionate force of the universe, thus Other Power is not from a tathagata but the dependent existence of everything and shinjin is realising our co-dependency. Could you please enlighten me about the Shin view, possibly with some reference to Shinran's words?

Dr. Bloom:

Thank you for your inquiry. I hope that I can help you. I must say first that what I present is my personal understanding of Shinran. However, I believe that it has basis in Shinran's writings.

With respect to the meaning of the term “reality”, you must be aware that it has a complex meaning. For some, it means an objective, independent or substantial existence apart from human consciousness. For others, it is the content of one’s consciousness as in the “consciousness only” school in Mahayana Buddhism.

In Mahayana Buddhism ultimate reality is inconceivable, beyond our conception, empty. However, it may manifest in our consciousness through visualization practice or as an awareness of trust that one has been embraced by “reality” imaged as Amida Buddha. Mahayana Buddhism holds that all beings have Buddha-nature, the potential to become Buddha. That is also an aspect of “reality.”

Shinran was trained in Tendai teaching which was greatly influenced by the Kegon teaching that we all exist within the Buddha-mind and all have the potentiality to become Buddha. While Shinran did not expect his followers to get into the complex details of Mahayana philosophy, he held that trust in Amida’s Vows manifests in our consciousness as the assurance that we have been embraced by Amida Buddha and are destined for birth in the Pure Land and Buddhahood. This trust is aroused through the working of Amida’s Vow in our life or karmic history.

Given this background we can try to address your question about the reality of Amida or as I would like to put it, Amida as our reality. In Shinran’s teaching we find three concepts of Amida. First there is the popularly understood Amida that was in the background of his teaching as an aspect of Japanese Buddhism where Pure Land teaching was pervasive in every tradition as an upaya-compassionate means to help people who could not participate in monastic practices. Birth into the Pure Land in this general tradition was through recitation of the name for karmic merit.

The second understanding of Amida is based in the story of Dharmakara in the Larger Pure Land Sutra where after aeons of practice, the Bodhisattva established the Pure Land. For Shinran the story was important because the Amida here is a Reward Body, a Buddha with beginning and no end. The Eighteenth Vow is important for Shinran, establishing the way of faith-trust and recitation of the name as expression of gratitude. According to his teaching (Notes on ‘Faith Alone’ (Yuishinshomin’I, and Jinen honi sho) Amida Buddha is the means for speaking about ultimate reality Dharmakaya, The Body of Truth.

The Buddha in this perspective is on a higher spiritual plane, removed from the necessity to perform karmic acts of merit to secure birth in the Pure Land. Also Amida Buddha in this context is the direct manifestation of the Body of truth. All other Buddhas are manifestations of Amida. He is not just one among many Buddhas that people may resort to for salvation.

This leads to Shinran’s own interpretation where Amida Buddha is Reality itself as the Eternal Buddha who has no beginning and no end. Here you can refer on my web page to the essay on the Ultimacy of Amida, Shinran’s Response to Tendai.

In Mahayana Buddhism there are three levels of Buddha corresponding to the traditional three bodies of the Buddha:

The Level of Manifestation- a Buddha with a beginning and End, as is Sakyamuni and according to some interpreters, Amida who is said in the Sutra to have a lifespan of 42 kalpas before going into Nirvana.

2. The level of Reward Body or in modern terms of myth, the Buddha with a beginning and no End, as when Dharmakara becomes Amida, residing in his Pure Land.

3. The eternal Buddha, Buddha with no beginning and no End. This understanding is rooted in the Lotus sutra, Chapter 16, but Shinran applied it to Amida. Here Amida is the expression or term whereby we can speak of ultimate reality rather than just a discrete Buddha among the host of Buddhas. This was Shinran's contribution to the development of the concept of Amida.

According to Shinran, Ultimate Amida is colorless, formless, inconceivable as the Body of truth. He is the Buddha-nature in all things. Wisdom is in the form of light, the formless form. Consequently as the working of reality, trust is aroused within us, being endowed by Amida. Faith is the realization of Buddha-nature, the goal of all Mahayana practice. All religious action, particularly Nembutsu becomes an expression of gratitude. There is no need for merit.

Thus we do not ask if Amida is real, but rather Amida is the reality of our lives as the motivating force for spiritual activity. As the universal ground of all existence, everything has Buddha-nature and is the manifestation of Amida in its particular form, benefitting our lives and all others.

In essence Amida Buddha is the symbolization of the process of interdependence. He is the reality of all relationships that nurture and promote life. Amida Buddha in the texts and as spoken about provides a focus for understanding the spirituality of all things within our experience and world.

In my personal view, this is the most real of anything real. But it is not literal, objective reality as something apart from my consciousness and life. It is my life. Amida in this view, as I would understand it, is real as an ideal is real. It is a force that influences life. Ideals have a reality though they are not objective, discrete things. They are real in our consciousness as sources of motivation. Similarly there is no such thing as society as a discrete objective reality. Society is the sum total of our relationships as the context for the principles that we live by. Society is the way we relate to others.

I am not sure this will help you in your thinking. As for the discussion on the Internet, it is important to understand that Shinran worked within the context of Mahayana philosophy and his understanding of Amida is shaped by that. I do not believe he was a literalist in the style that many people view the teaching today. Mahayana philosophy teaches the emptiness of all ideas and things, a la Nagarjuna (2nd century). This itself means that things have no reality in themselves but only in relation to other things, again interdependence. Mahayana teaching is not literalist.

The literalist trend among some interpreters of Shin Buddhism is a reflection their American cultural experience where fundamentalist Christianity, a large segment of American religion, is objectivist and literal. They are carrying this over to Buddhism. For those who wish to hold to Amida and the Pure Land as somehow literally real, they should also understand the reality of hells as presented in the tradition. If the Pure Land is a discrete reality so must be the hells also which are the counterpoint or alternative to the Pure Land. If Amida is a discrete reality as they argue, then all the other Buddhas and Bodhisattvas in Buddhist texts have the same reality. Then the question is raised, if Amida Buddha is on the same level with other Buddhas etc, what is the meaning of Shinran's teaching? Shin Buddhism is distinctive because it elevates Amida beyond popular conceptions and changed the definition and meaning of religion not only in Japan but universally. Religious faith is not about what you get (It is all given through the working of the Vow.) Religious faith is about what you give in the embodiment of compassion and wisdom.

Me:

After reading your mail a couple of times and your essay on Shinran's relationship with Tendai teachings I came up with the following question:

Amida Buddha is principally a dharmakaya buddha, equal to Vairocana in the Avatamsaka and Sakyamuni in the Lotus Sutra. At the same time, as a manifestation of mahakaruna Dharmakara Bodhisattva has manifested, attained anuttarasamyaksambodhi and established Sukhavati for saving all sentient beings. It appears to me that this teaching corresponds to the trikaya format, as you have also mentioned it, with the difference of Amida being the designation of both the ultimate and the relative (forming the unity of two truths in the middle way). And please correct me if I misunderstand something here, but then it comes down to the usual Mahayana setting of a buddha being manifest and unmanifest at the same time. Thus sambhogakaya Amida is as real as "earth, tiles and pebbles". Consequently a literal reading of the sutras on the Pure Land is not wrong but only the manifest level and realisation of the unmanifest happens after birth. This matches the Chinese explanation of first practising with mark to reach no-mark.

Does this meet your understanding? If not, please clarify for me at what point I go wrong.

Dr. Bloom:

I do not see any problem with what you state, except that I have problem with the term literal. I don't think ancient people thought in those terms. Literal, as I observe it from Christian fundamentalist thought, means objectively existing apart from one's consciousness, just as God is objectively real as the creator of the universe etc. Thus they read the Bible literally meaning that what it says exists is existing independently. It is kind of naïve realism.

I don't think Buddhism takes any position like that. In fact it is clear from the Consciousness Only school that nothing exists separate from our consciousness of it.

The Pure Land etc can be real within our consciousness as a means (upaya) to reach a deeper level of understanding, moving from form to formless, that is, as Shinran says in the Jinen honi sho, that Amida with form is a means (Ryo) to know the formless, colorless Dharmakaya. It does not exist by itself or for itself. Consequently, though this is wordy, Amida can be a spiritual reality within our consciousness as a spiritual guide and ideal.

Also in the Middle Path school, all concepts are empty and come out of our delusory mind. It avoids substantialism, similarly to the Consciousness Only. These philosophical perspectives underly all Mahayana schools.

There are other considerations, such as whatever interpretation we apply to Amida, must also apply to other Buddhas and descriptions in the many sutras. When it says that the Buddha's tongue reached out to all the universes in the ten directions, is that to be taken literally. What would it mean? I think symbolic and metaphorical thinking as in the Sutras has spiritual meaning not metaphysical.

Me:

I guess I should clarify what I said first. I didn't propose that things are independent of one's perception (consciousness). But just because all things are mental (vijñapti) it doesn't mean they don't exist as individual causal streams. Thus we can say that there are uncountable sentient beings in the six realms just as there are immeasurable bodhisattvas and buddhas. This is not naive realism, neither idealism, nor solipsism. From this point of view I say that Amida Buddha as a sambhogakaya exists in the Pure Land just as you or me exist on Earth (Saha Land). But I'm not sure what you mean by "spiritual". If it is an equivalent of the realms realised by higher perception (abhijñā) such as heavens and buddha-lands I see your point. If you meant something else, please explain.

If I caused a misunderstanding by using the word "literal" and this above clarifies what I meant I'm glad for then I believe we could see each other face to face.

Dr. Bloom:

Perhaps I was responding to the term literal from own background. I guess what I would say that we can consider anything "real" so far as it accords with the basic parameters of Buddhist teaching on the qualified nature of "existence." Certainly whatever status such "reality" has, it has causal impact.

The important thing in Buddhist teaching as I understand it is how it inspires a person to move beyond the present level of insight to deeper levels and understanding and thereby the reduction in our egoism and attachment to our self-concepts, our world, our ideas and beliefs. Buddhism is about the transformation of the mind. Upaya and perhaps provisional beliefs etc can be helps depending on ones mental or spiritual development. Not every one is at the same point and Buddhism is not "one size fits all." People respond to different forms of presentation. If the mythology of Buddhism in its concreteness helps a person in spiritual growth, then it is “real.” It is the role of the “Good Teacher” to draw the person on, moving beyond forms, concepts etc. which all excite the ego and become objects of attachment. Beyond that what would be the point?

Shinran expresses himself in several ways. In human situations of grief, he consoled his followers that he would meet them in the Pure Land. In his more scholarly writings, particularly Kyogyoshinsho, birth in the Pure Land is immediate buddhahood. The attainment of faith is one’s rebirth. Since Amida Buddha as the Eternal Buddha is wisdom in the form of light, he is formless and colorless, but the context or frame in which we understand our lives; hence very “real.” The Pure Land must also be ultimately formless and colorless as Nirvana is formless, beyond conception. The Buddha and the Land are One.

In our unrealized, unenlightened state, we can only talk about things in the dimension of form; consequently we do talk about Pure Land etc but not so much as place but of quality of existence, our spiritual ideal. It has the qualities of freedom, bliss, purity, ultimate fulfillment, joy, continual learning etc.

I do not think we disagree perhaps, though we may have different ways of expressing ourselves. Amida is the real of the real; the reality of all our relations and a motive force in our everyday life as the power of compassion and the light that highlights our own shadows. The brighter the light the sharper the shadows.

As for spirituality, it is a much used and abused term today. I guess for me things are spiritual to the extent that they indicate there is always something more than what our minds can encompass. It is vague because it points to the mystery that surrounds our lives and people become spiritual when they become aware that our lives have a deeper context which we may picture to ourselves, depending on what tradition we follow and how it shapes our attitudes and values. I do not see spirituality as a divisive thing, but the more spiritual we are, the more we find our kinship with all being. For me Amida which means Infinite offers the most comprehensive perspective on the mystery that grounds our lives.

Me:

Thank you for your kind attention. My original confusion was raised by thinking that if Amida Buddha is not a real being and the whole story of Dharmakara never happened there is no basis for an effective vow to save beings and bring them to the Western Realm. Naturally there are many ways to interpret sutras, however, certain doctrines are essential for a coherent system and such a teaching is the enlightenment of Amida Buddha and the creation of Pure Land to fulfil his vows. This seemed to be questioned by your (and others) presentation of Shinran's teachings and that's why I turned to you for elucidation of the matter.

It was today morning I realised our personal approaches to the Shin Dharma are quite different, which I believe is fine. As for its doctrinal aspect it appears we may agree. To give it (hopefully) a final test I have a question regarding the teaching's practical aspect.

You've mentioned Cittamantra and Madhyamaka as essential doctrines in Mahayana. On a personal level the six paramitas are the core of the path from delusion to buddhahood. I Chinese Pure Land and Jodoshu it is understood that one perfects the bodhisattva path after being born there. I'd like to know how the practice of the paramitas explained in Shinshu.

Dr. Bloom:

Thank you for your reply. In interpreting religious documents, I do not believe there is one right and wrong. We have to understand texts according to our background and knowledge at the time. I think it is important to discuss issues and try to find areas of consensus.

There are doctrines which result from religious experience and in this case Shinran. Even in his own day there were differences of opinion. It makes for historical development. Some ideas are better than others and over time become the basic viewpoint. With the shift in cultures from Japan-in this case- to the West, new questions are being asked that were not primary in Japan. That is why scholars differ among themselves in trying to respond to the modern situation. I see myself as just one of those responses for whatever it may be worth. It may help some people but not others. In my study course I tried to develop a more or less coherent approach to Shin Buddhism using contemporary (as far as I understand it) considerations about myth and religious imagery. More than the character of the story itself, the implications and meaning for our lives are the most important aspects. What spiritual insight it offers. Shinran reinterpreted the scripture in some areas to reflect his own experience and for myself, I try to follow his lead in that because it helps me understand my own experience. It can be different for different people-even within the same tradition.

I should respond to your question in this letter on the 6 paramitas which are regarded with high importance in Shin Buddhism. However, they are not advocated as the means to enlightenment, but are inspired by the Buddha's compassion when one realizes that Amida's Vows, which symbolize the compassion that surrounds our lives, are the foundation of our spiritual life. The story of Dharmakara, his Vows and fulfillment offer us a guiding vision in living our lives, and summarized in the six paramitas. They are guiding principles for negotiating life.

In earlier Pure Land teaching and as presented in the Sutras, the Pure Land is a staging area for the completion of the process to become a Buddha. Mahayana Buddhism has an environmental theory implicit in it. That is, one cannot really achieve spiritual goals unless there is something in the environment that makes it possible. We are always involved in social relations and so, depending on our relationships, we progress in fulfilling our lives. That is why often religious teachers suggest that people seek out like-minded people in the practice of their faith. We all need reinforcement. In Buddhist view, as presented in Mahayana, we live in the defiled realm in this world and in later teaching it was the age of the demise of the dharma-mappo when there was only teaching, but no practice or realization. It was a spiritually corrupt age. Hence the Pure Land established by Amida provides the impetus and attraction for people to pursue the ideals of the six paramitas and attain enlightenment and Buddhahood. That is probably held by many people today and is a straightforward reading of the Sutra.

That said, Shinran reinterpreted the tradition and maintained that on reception of true entrusting in this life, we already are reborn in the Pure Land in principle. We are obviously, by our external condition, not there, but in terms of Amida's Vows and compassion, the causes for our birth are set. People are already saved, but not aware of it until faith arises. The moment of death is called birth into the Pure Land but for Shinran, it means the immediate attainment of Buddhahood. There is no process to attainment in the Pure Land. In fact, according to his interpretation of the 22nd vow, rather than remaining in the Pure Land we return to this world as bodhisattvas to work for the salvation of all beings. The ultimate goal is the salvation and Buddhahood of all beings and not simply residence in the Pure Land forever. I think I mentioned to you earlier that just to desire to go to the Pure Land because it is a place of pleasure and bliss, one does not go. That is because egoism is still the motivating factor.

While in our present state in life, we cannot claim to be bodhisattvas, the perception of who is the bodhisattva is the perspective of the other person whose life may be enhanced and assisted through one's efforts—namely aspiring to fulfill the six paramitas in our lives as we are able and inspired by the vision of Amida's unconditional compassion. For Shinran, religion is not about getting-salvation or benefits, but about giving. Dana is the first paramita and highly stressed within the temples—and not only for money for the temple—but as the gift of our lives to help others.

Unfortunately, of course, we are all foolish being-bombu- and so while we aspire to this ideal, we do not always fulfill it. We are filled with contradictions. Shinran's teaching was aimed to reduce as far as he could the egoism that infects religion and all our lives.

This gets back to the paramitas as guides. They are not rules and regulation or requirements for Amida's embrace. They result, to the degree they are realized in our actions, from our awareness of that embrace by life and reality.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 12th, 2010 at 3:33 AM

Title: Re: Seeing Your Nature

Content:

Astus wrote:

White Lotus,

You talk about enlightenment as if it were the simplest thing in the world. Do you also think the great Zen teachers of the past were stupid people who learnt and practised for decades in mountains and monasteries before they claimed understanding? Should we tell the monks and nuns of today they can now go home since they're already buddhas?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 12th, 2010 at 6:00 AM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

As you can see, I asked explicitly the questions raised here in order to avoid ambiguity or misunderstanding. Concluding the results is that (1) Amita Buddha is both a dharmakaya and sambhogakaya, (2) and the Pure Land exists in conformity with the Buddhist definition of reality as a buddha-land. This has been my understanding of Shinshu interpretation before and now and Dr. Bloom had no objection to it as an incorrect view or something contrary to his understanding.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 12th, 2010 at 8:34 PM

Title: Re: Seeing Your Nature

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is not enough to see simplicity, wisdom means seeing simplicity and complexity at the same time. This is the harmony of essence and function.

Unknown said:

Guishan said to the assembly, "People nowadays have great capacity but do not have great function."

Yangshan related this to a temple priest. The temple priest kicked over a stool. Hearing about it, Guishan burst into laughter.

Everywhere, suffering and pain;
everyone, vainly discussing the self.
Though they are buddha,
it's all buried beneath years of conditioning.
(Dogen/Loori: The True Dharma Eye, 279)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 12th, 2010 at 9:02 PM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

Yes, it is impressive how he cares to reply to questions, I really appreciate it. As I've found out it a couple of years back not every teacher is like that.

Also, as you say, his replies focus on the personal and practical aspect. I think there is more difference in terms of language and perspective than philosophy between Adrian and Bloom. Otherwise I'm sure he would have replied in a different way as we've also touched the subject of literal interpretation. But I've informed him about this topic where I published our correspondence. Perhaps he may join us in this discussion.

A couple of days back I thought about the "four reliances" (Catvāri pratiśaraṇāni / 法四依) which says: "rely on nitārtha and not on neyārtha". Thus if Pure Land sutras are to be further explained (neyārtha) they don't express the final meaning. Such is the case if we interpret it as only metaphorical, unlike teachings on emptiness and such. On the other hand, Shinran says the teaching of Amita Buddha's vows was Shakyamuni's true intention and final Dharma. What do you think?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 12th, 2010 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

No contradiction, true. Neither do I think a teaching being metaphorical is such a problem. Lot of sutras are like that, either completely or partially, including the Lotus and Avatamsaka sutras.

Regarding the use of such tools they sound great to me. Nice explanation, really.

I understand the general problem of Western perspective influenced by our idea of history (which is not every cultures' view). This creates a new way of looking at tradition and defines how we can absorb other views. About this I refer to Huseng's topic on buddhavadāna.

I don't think it'd be impossible for European men to have a deeply religious view of life. Even as a Buddhist. But maybe this is easy for me to say because I've been attracted to religions since my childhood. Even after turning to Buddhism it took me a couple of years before I could get over the faith in God - not just on a mental but also on an emotional level. Materialism has never been my cup of tea. So the many worlds and beings throughout the multiverses is now OK with me. And one can even go to those places in Buddhism (also one of the functions of buddha-remembrance).

The crucial shift I think is from "matter only" to "consciousness only" (cittamātra - in its Buddhist sense, not Western misinterpretations). This realm of ours is made of concepts and feelings. Other realms are also like that. This is "thinking of buddha is seeing the buddha" - an idea applied in Vajrayāna too, same as in the Pratyutpannasamadhi Sutra used by early Amita buddha-remembrance practitioners in China.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 13th, 2010 at 1:47 AM

Title: Re: Tantra and the Buddha

Content:

Astus wrote:

Just as Mahāyāna sutras in general, we can say tantras being the words of the Buddha except when stated otherwise (just like there are sutras taught by Shakyamuni's immediate disciples, bodhisattvas and other buddhas).

Early tantric scriptures (called sutras in Chinese) begin with the usual form:

Sūtra of the Buddha-Crown Superb Victory Dhāraṇī:

"Thus I have heard: At one time the Bhagavān was staying in the Anāthapiṇḍika Garden of Jetavana Park in the city kingdom of Śrāvastī, together with a group of 8,000 great bhikṣus."

Buddha Pronounces the Mahāyāna Sūtra of the Holy Infinite-Life Resolute Radiance King Tathāgata Dhāraṇī:

"Thus I have heard: At one time the World-Honored One was dwelling in the Anāthapiṇḍika Garden of Jetavana Park in the city kingdom of Śrāvastī, together with a group of 1,250 great bhikṣus."

Then in later texts we see moving from a common setting into a meditative world. See how the Vairocanabhisambodhi Sutra (also called a tantra in Tibetan Buddhism) begins:

"Thus have I heard. At one time the Bhagavān (Lord) was residing in the vast adamantine palace of the Dharma realm empowered by Tathāgatas, in which all the vajradharas had all assembled; the great pavilion [comparable to] the king of jewels, born of the Tathāgata's faith-and-understanding, play, and supernatural transformations, was lofty, without a center or perimeter, and variously adorned with great and wondrous jewel-kings, and the body of a bodhisattva formed a lion throne."

The Tattvasamgraha Sutra (tantra) beings:

"Thus have I heard, once, the Bhagavat who is endowed with the thunderbolt empowered pledge and distinguished kinds of knowledge of all the Tathagatas; who has received the Dharma Kingdom initiation of the three worlds and the jeweled crown of all the Tathagatas; who is the Lord of great yoga and the all-knowing knowledge of all the Tathagatas; who has realized the equality of all mudras of all the Tathagatas and by every action has fulfilled all desires in all worlds of living beings without exception; who is the great, compassionate Vairocana, forever existing in the three periods of time and who is every body, speech and mind thunderbolt, the Tathagata, dwelt in the palace of the Lord of the Akanistha heaven bedecked with great gems, hung with variously shaped bells, and adorned with crescent moons, laced silk tassels with precious gems, flower wreaths and colored banners that swayed in the breeze, and which was inhabited, praised and extolled by all Tathagatas."

In the latest tantras we see even more "abstract" settings. The Hevajra Tantra:

"Thus have I heard: At one time Bhagavan dwelt in the wombs of the Vajra Lady which are the Body, Speech and Mind of all the Buddhas."

The Guhyagarbha Tantra:

"Thus at the time of this explanation, the Tathagata, genuinely perfect buddha and transcendent lord, was endowed with great rapture which is the identity of the indestructible body, speech and mind of all the tathagatas of the ten directions and four times. This is the nature in which all of them without exception, none excepted and omitting none at all, are indivisible, without distinction or difference. In the abode of Akanistha, without extremes or centre, on the radiant wheel of pristine cognitions that is the limitless ground, there is his celestial palace, blazing forth with jewels of pristine cognition, completely uninterrupted throughout the ten directions of space, fashioned as a square because it is vast in measureless enlightened attributes, and adorned with projecting bays of precious gems which are the superior pristine cognition."

Commentary explains:

"However, the (commonly cited) words I have heard are not uttered on this occasion because there is no dichotomy between self and others. The words have heard indicate that there is a difference between the teacher and the retinue, whereas during the compilation of this (tantra), the teacher himself appears as the Lord of Secrets (Vairapani) and explains in this world at the present time the very teaching which he previously gave in Akanistha."

The Kulayaraja Tantra:

"At a time this sermon was taught in the realm No-Below (Akanishtha) [where] Reality is [like] the sky, and the dimension of Reality itself (dharmadhatu) [like] the vastness [of the sky]. There is the place where the Mind itself (sems nyid) exists. In the untainted mansion of pristine awareness [the All-Creating Sovereign's] own being (rang bzhin), Her actuating essence (ngo bo), Her compassion and pristine awareness became manifest as [various] retinues in the following way:..."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 13th, 2010 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: Seeing Your Nature

Content:

Astus wrote:

In Jiang Wu's "Enlightenment in Dispute" there are some nice stories about Confucian literati playing the Chan master. It is really amusing. Nevertheless, it shows how much Chan is about style rather than content (in appearance). A couple of years back I could still meet people from the Kwan Um School of Zen who actually talked (wrote on forum) like Seung Sahn, although they were native English people. The question is: What would be left of Chan without "Linji's shout (often mistranslated as KATSU/KATZ) and Deshan's stick"?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 14th, 2010 at 3:52 PM

Title: Re: No Proofs of Successful Rebirths?&Are Pure Land sutras real?

Content:

Astus wrote:

One better not look for scientific truths for religious teachings. Not because they're contradictory or against each other but they work with different axioms and talk about different spheres of the world.

To understand, and consequently gain faith in the Pure Land teaching one better starts with basic teachings (summed up in: four noble truths, dependent origination) then move to Mahayana. Actually, I think if one gets clear on realms, buddhas, merit transference and rebirth from the basics it doesn't take much to comprehend the bodhisattva path and the buddha-lands of Mahayana. From this it is not difficult to see how and why can one be born in the Pure Land of Amita Buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 14th, 2010 at 4:24 PM

Title: Re: Nirguna Brahman and Nirvana

Content:

Astus wrote:

Nirguna Brahman - creator god without attributes (a contradictory statement in itself, for it is absurd to say there is a thing but has no qualities).

Nirvana - the end of suffering, elimination of greed, hatred and ignorance. It is neither a being nor a place but an experience.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 16th, 2010 at 3:46 PM

Title: Re: Posture - Really Good Posture

Content:

Astus wrote:

Carl Bielefeldt's "Dogen's Manual of Zen Meditation" is a very good work on the Chinese origins of Soto meditation manuals like the Fukanzazengi.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 16th, 2010 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism for the lay person?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Regarding lay practice it's also good to note that Vajrayana in India and Tibet was and is still strong on lay people, especially as there are certain meditation techniques not allowed for ordained monastics.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 19th, 2010 at 4:55 PM

Title: Re: Stick to "one path"?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think it would be hard to tell what constitutes a single path. I mean, every tradition bases itself on the canon which contains almost everything. Thus one path means just a way of organising the teachings according to a tradition. Thing is, even if one is familiar with more than one hermeneutic system, if one claims to favour none of them it is a rather extra-traditional position of a philosopher, or more likely a personal interpretation. Eventually this is certainly not a black or white thing. Everyone learns about different Buddhist teachings on different levels plus has his own rendering of them all.

Meditation handbooks belong to this or that tradition but contain a variety of methods. So "one path" is not "one book, one technique". From this also comes it is not "many paths" either. There are infinite teachings and if we take that literally it'd take infinite time to master. But even gaining proficiency in a single tradition takes considerable effort, not to mention two or three.

Nagarjuna says in the Twelve Gate Treatise that he teaches Mahayana briefly in that text, because if one comprehends and realises emptiness the six paramitas and all the teachings will be mastered that way. Similar arguments we find in Zen too (see your nature and become a buddha). Fazang's treatise on different gates is a good example of many ways accessing the same truth, and that the one truth contains all the other paths.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 19th, 2010 at 7:41 PM

Title: Re: Stick to "one path"?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thing is, I can very much sympathise with Huseng's question. Simply because I like to put my nose into many Buddhist teachings and I really like a couple of them (at least six lineages). My kind of solution is not a Honen style "select the best" but a Chan-Huayan version of ekayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 19th, 2010 at 8:55 PM

Title: Re: Stick to "one path"?

Content:

Astus wrote:

A sectarian mindset may not be useful in Buddhism. Just see how many Chinese groups say they accept all 8 schools and at the same time they all do similar things and study similar texts. They call Tendai syncretic, but actually even Theravada teaches so many things.

Taking a specific doctrinal position is used in a debate against someone you don't agree with. Think about these terms: sudden-gradual; easy-difficult; final-temporary; direct-indirect; secret-open; great-small; practical-theoretical; etc.

Instead of identifying with this or that one can always say to go on the bodhisattva path. Or just try to find out to which school people like Yunqi Zhuhong, or Ven. Yinshun belonged to.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 19th, 2010 at 10:18 PM

Title: Re: Stick to "one path"?

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://www.chan1.org/ddp/channews/05-1985.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 19th, 2010 at 10:52 PM

Title: Re: Stick to "one path"?

Content:

Astus wrote:

That's the only one I've ever read from him regarding Mantrayana. It seems to me he wasn't much involved in Tibetan teachings.

Regarding the bodhisattva path I'm not sure how it could have been faster in his interpretation than the Pure Land way, especially because he didn't teach sudden enlightenment in the sense that it is attainment of buddhahood but rather the first step on the bodhisattva path (similar to the Zongmi-Yongming view).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 20th, 2010 at 6:44 PM

Title: Re: Stick to "one path"?

Content:

Astus wrote:

If you look at the quoted speech of Ven. Shengyan he mentions mainly Tibetan Buddhism and not Shingon. I think that's because there are more Tibetan groups than Mizong. Also I guess original Chinese mantrayana is viewed in a different way and not necessarily identified with Shingon.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 20th, 2010 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't think one should stick to one extreme or the other. It is common that most of the people don't get much of initiations and pointing out instructions, otherwise we'd all be vajramasters already. Thus practice is necessary, and not just one form of it but many. It shouldn't be forgot either that introduction to the nature of mind happens at the 4 HYT initiations too. Dzogchen in its raw and simple form - as in the three statements of Prahevajra - is for those with the highest capacity. Others can use whatever else Buddhism offers to them as a means to enlightenment. Naturally the majority doesn't belong to the best of the best. Even Milarepa couldn't realise Dzogchen at first.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 20th, 2010 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Am I mistaken in saying that realising rigpa is seeing the buddha-nature? If I'm correct, I can only wonder what else is there to attain beyond buddhahood.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 21st, 2010 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Magnus,

That I am OK with. Do you think it is also possible to take resting itself as the practice without other methods?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 21st, 2010 at 3:43 AM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

It seems to me that such a division of practice would be actually a balance of generation and completion forms. In that case then what is the difference between calling it Dzogchen or Maha- and Anuyoga, ie. deity yoga? Perhaps it'd be possible to make a distinction - similar to Kagyu Mahamudra - between tantric and essential Dzogchen.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 21st, 2010 at 4:51 AM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Nangwa said:

authentic "deity yoga" (with the intent and view of Dzogchen) is not a mind-based practice.

Astus wrote:

Now I'm curious. Are you saying that there is an unintentional meditation on a deity? Or is it that "all appearances are the play of rigpa"; but in that case it'd be togal, wouldn't it? I'm starting to think it's quite impossible then to draw a line between the view of "emptiness is appearances" and "appearances are awareness". Then difference between Dzogchen and Mahayoga is eliminated.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 21st, 2010 at 4:51 PM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Magnus,

Could you clarify - and I believe this is Sönam's point - how sadhanas and a load of practices relate to the following:

"Mahamudra and Dzogchen training means not fabricating anything, just allowing the continuity of our natural state. This is not our habit. We must train in developing a new habit, but this practice is not meditation, but familiarization. When we finally arrive at the dharmakaya throne of nonmeditation, there is nothing more to cultivate; there is not even an atom to meditate upon, and yet we are not distracted for even an instant. We need to train in this. It is also phrased as mental nondoing. ... In the guidance manuals for meditation, it is often phrased like this: Do not alter your present fresh wakefulness. Do not rearrange even as much as a hair tip. Just leave it exactly as it is."

(Chökyi Nyima Rinpoche: "Familiarization" in Quintessential Dzogchen, p. 199)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 21st, 2010 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Magnus,

Nice to hear he's your root master. Once I used a urinal next to him after attending a lecture by him on the different yanas. I feel karmic connection here.

I think I can follow you about integrating Dzogchen view in all the usual practices and also understand the reason behind it. I also see this tendency of simplifying things to a "non-conceptual meditation" not just in Dzogchen but also in Zen and Theravada. Perhaps it is (partially) about how meditation is seen in Western cultures. And then a deity sounds quite supernatural, therefore unreal.

At the same time I think Dzogchen view may go simply with Dzogchen path. Although I agree it may not be good for everyone - just as there's no single teaching good for everyone - but there are people who can use it.

Also I feel that since Dzogchen is advertised as a separate path which deals directly with the nature of mind and does so effortlessly, mixing with tantric methods appears to be contradictory (or counter-intuitive) to the "spirit of Atiyoga".

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 21st, 2010 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: Stick to "one path"?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng, indeed! Dogen liked to talk big.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 21st, 2010 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Magnus,

See ChNN's categorisation of Sutra (detachment), Tantra (transformation) and Dzogchen (self-liberation). Plus it is the 9th yana and not the 8th or the 7th. Not to mention that this is the impression one gets from teachings about Dzogchen and of Dzogchen as they emphasise abiding in rigpa and dropping all efforts, while at the same time don't talk about other meditation forms but only as preliminary and techniques of lower vehicles.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 22nd, 2010 at 2:18 AM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

heart said:

Always ChNN, is that all you got? Maybe you can quote from a tantra or any Dzogchen text except his that use this categorization?

Astus wrote:

I think there was a small misunderstanding here. By separate path I simply meant as a set of teachings and practices on its own. I didn't mean it is not Vajrayana or makes other practices useless. In ChNN's Dzogchen Community they do many other practices besides tregcho and togal. The problem is that seeing the interconnectedness of Dzogchen methods with those of the other inner tantras requires a deeper familiarity with Nyingma teachings and not just those presented as Dzogchen exclusively. But in brief this is summed up in Sam van Schaik's "Approaching the Great Perfection". By talking about Dzogchen as a separate teaching I meant that it seems uncommon to me to have all the nine vehicles touched upon in a single work like in Dudjom Rinpoche's "big red book", which is clearly too much for anyone who is just looking for the meaning of Dzogchen he has heard about somewhere.

See what the Rigpa Wiki says, "Sogyal Rinpoche describes it as "the heart-essence of all spiritual paths and the summit of an individual's spiritual evolution. As a way in which to realize the innermost nature of mind—that which we really are— Dzogchen is the clearest, most effective, and most relevant to the modern world."

What do you make of it that best selling authors on Dzogchen, including HHDL, talks about Atiyoga as an accessible, quite easy and simple method of "resting in the natural state" and there is nothing else to it? And this makes it popular. Even has its own forum.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 22nd, 2010 at 2:40 AM

Title: Re: Stick to "one path"?

Content:

Astus wrote:

And it is not pointless at all to critically examine Dogen's teachings as he has such an influence in Western Buddhism (luckily there are quite a few scholarly work around in English). On one hand he says that it is not really Zen, or Soto Zen he teaches but the Correct Dharma of the Buddhas and Patriarchs, while on the other hand others besides him, Nyojo, Wanshi Shogaku and a select few, everyone else is either completely wrong or below enlightenment. Zazen is the samadhi of samadhis, while nenbutsu is like the croaking of frogs. Finally, Dogen seems quite adamant on exclusive practice of the superior shikantaza. Good example of a "one path" approach.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 22nd, 2010 at 4:09 AM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm talking about available materials on Dzogchen. As in books:

Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche: Natural Great Perfection

Lama Surya Das: Natural Radiance

James Low: Being Right Here

Tsoknyi Rinpoche: Fearless Simplicity

Tenzin Wangyal: Wonders of the Natural Mind

Michael Hookham: Openness, Clarity, Sensitivity

HHDL: Dzogchen - The Heart Essence of the Great Perfection

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 22nd, 2010 at 5:22 AM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Nangwa, that's all right. But it's like when some talk about Buddhism as a therapeutic way to inner peace and all people can practice it, then when they get interested it turns out it is a religion like all the others full of moral commands and supernatural realms. Sounds like advertising a menu that makes you lose weight then adding you should also go to the gym twice a day. Thus confusion and misunderstanding is not surprising.

Although it raises the question: if they're all superficial teachings (contrary to their claim to be highest Vajrayana), they intentionally mislead people, or they're mistaken from the beginning.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 22nd, 2010 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: Free Kalavinka Shastra PDFs

Content:

Astus wrote:

Hail to Ven. Dharmamitra and FREE DHARMA!

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 22nd, 2010 at 3:38 PM

Title: Re: Pirated dharma texts.

Content:

Astus wrote:

As said, copying something is not theft in Buddhist definition. If copying were theft, well, we could as well neither lend nor talk about a book. Copyright is a modern legal term which of course has its use. But what is moral and what is legal may not always be the same. Legally there is no problem with cheating one's spouse, morally there is. Legally it is not an issue to say I'm a buddha/arhat/tulku/..., morally there is. Legally it is a problem to copy texts protected by copyright, or not, depends on local laws, but morally it is not theft. Also see the "Pirate Party" movement.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 22nd, 2010 at 4:02 PM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

So the books are OK. While it would be hard to become a disciple of all those authors, I guess they put their teachings into a written form in order to be known by many, including those who do not even live in the same country, or same continent, or speak the same language. A common thing in those books is that they present Dzogchen in a pretty accessible form and they also explain methods to practice it. Suppose I read one of them, understand it, then practise it - isn't that Dzogchen practice? If not, then what?

I'm bringing this up only to give an example how it is possible people don't necessarily associate Dzogchen with other tantric practices. And that is not because they don't want to but how Dzogchen is presented. Similar to Vipassana and Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 22nd, 2010 at 10:56 PM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Well, a book is not like personal instruction for one cannot ask back. It is more like a lecture, a teaching on something, except that probably it is better composed. And if it is a teaching on Dzogchen one receives a teaching on that, including instructions for meditation. Definitely it has a less wider scope than years of training. But besides monks hardly one has time enough to hang around a teacher all the time, especially if he lives thousands of kilometres away. Therefore it is not negligible to consider materials distributed on Dzogchen - just like in case of any other Dharma teachings. For instance, in my country, there is no resident teacher one could turn to for Dzogchen practice, thus everyone depends on books, Internet and visiting teachers who come occasionally. Not to mention the fact that those few books and texts available are translations from English.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 23rd, 2010 at 1:27 AM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Don't misunderstand me, I have no problem with Dzogchen in any way as I am not really a follower of it. I was only talking about a situation as I see it.

Sönam, if Dzogchen teachers can act and talk from Dharmakaya, can't they not write?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 23rd, 2010 at 4:24 PM

Title: Re: Buddha Nature, Emptiness and Anatman

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is called "buddha-nature" because it somehow (depending on interpretation) bears the qualities a buddha has. For an Indo-Tibetan explanation best go for the Ratnagotravibhaga with available modern commentaries on it. For the East-Asian style you should start with the Mahayana-sraddhotpada shastra (Awakening Mahayana Faith).

Buddha-nature as dependent origination is a possible interpretation, but then where are the buddha-qualities here? If there are none, why call it buddha-nature?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 23rd, 2010 at 4:39 PM

Title: Re: Buddha Nature, Emptiness and Anatman

Content:

Astus wrote:

Well, if I have joy because of others' joy I should also have anger and greed because of others. Or you mean the realisation of interconnectedness is buddha-nature? Because then buddha-nature is not universal but a realisation. I hope you don't my I ask.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 23rd, 2010 at 5:20 PM

Title: Re: Buddha Nature, Emptiness and Anatman

Content:

Astus wrote:

True. However, just the fact of interconnectedness includes no buddha-qualities, otherwise all would have them.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 26th, 2010 at 7:56 PM

Title: Precepts and Shinran

Content:

Astus wrote:

As I've read a couple of times, and again in a recent thread initiated by Rev. Nonin's remarks on renunciation, I'd like to bring up for investigation the case of Shinran who left priesthood and got married. Many think this is a good reference for the modern Japanese situation where ordained men can and do live like lay people. Shinran, as is well known, was a Pure Land follower, a disciple of Honen, who said that for himself (and generally for people who live in this Age of Declining Dharma) it is impossible to walk the Path of Sages (everything else than Pure Land) because he is full of defilements and only Amita Buddha can help who brings even the evil to his Land of Peace and Bliss.

This sounds like an acceptable reason for not maintaining the precepts, for they're not just no longer needed but one is actually incapable of fulfilling them. On the other hand, this argument doesn't stand for any other paths where discipline in moral acts is essential.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 26th, 2010 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Precepts and Shinran

Content:

Astus wrote:

A lay priest is an ambiguous term for me. It can mean one who does the rituals, pastoral duties and teaching (like a Christian priest). It may also mean something less varied, like a lay teacher (could also be a scholar, a meditation teacher, or a Dharma teacher). It could also mean missionary work too, preaching to unbelievers.

Another important point is that a lay priest would either cost double, or triple than a monk. First of all, a priest would need proper education, a university degree in Dharma. Where can you obtain one like that? Not so many places, but not impossible. Also, such a priest may need a home that the laity should pay for. Another option is a part-time priest, in that case the quality of service might suffer it.

Last question I can think of is the advantages-disadvantages of a lay priest vis-a-vis a monk. A monk lives in a community, easier to maintain proper lifestyle, more time for studies and practice are available. A priest is more for the laity than for personal advancement, may not be able to carry on with his own education on a necessary level. On the other hand, a priest can be closer to the community than home leavers.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 27th, 2010 at 5:32 AM

Title: Re: Precepts and Shinran

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't think it is only Pure Land people saying we're in the Age of Decline but even Tibetans (although they use this to say that Vajrayana is the solution to the problem). As for "apparently enlightened beings" I cannot say much. How is it apparent? Regarding the first jhana, if it requires abandonment of sensual craving, only a non-returner can do it, excluding even bodhisattvas. How could then such people as non-Buddhists attain it?

Nevertheless, I didn't say the truth is only with Shinran but wanted to state clearly that while Shinran had good reasons to live a layman's life, other traditions don't. I should also mention that his teacher, Honen remained a monk till the end of his life, and that was the case with every great Pure Land teacher in China too I know of. Fortunately, the Pure Land method works as well for monks as for laymen.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 27th, 2010 at 5:00 PM

Title: Re: Precepts and Shinran

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

While I'm not much of a Dharma Decline proponent I find it a traditional and common view throughout Mahayana lands. I've also heard that those who actually have real attainments are bodhisattvas appearing in this world but no common human really attains anything. This I don't necessarily agree with. You know, I'm more of a Chan-style buddha-nature believer, which guarantees the availability of enlightenment for everyone at any time, and, certain conditions provided, it can be actualised. Still, reliable teachers are few and phony (wild fox) people are many. And while Ven. Shengyan didn't claim to be greatly enlightened, people like Living Buddha Lu Shengyan seems to say so.

If sensual desires has to be left behind temporarily or partially, even married lay people can attain absorption on a retreat or on a peaceful morning.

Dodatsu,

Thanks for dropping in.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 27th, 2010 at 5:20 PM

Title: Re: How do we know?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Awareness is not ever present. Consciousness depends on what it is conscious of. So the Buddha categorised consciousness into six major forms. And the sixth can be examined according to the four aggregates of the name group. But if you look up what the manifold dharma's are in the Abhidharma texts you find that awareness is very far from being always there, more like momentary. And there are even beings in a heavenly realm without consciousness. See <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.061.than.html> discussing why it is a great mistake to identify oneself with the mind as if it were permanent while on the contrary it changes rapidly. Therefore it is empty.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 28th, 2010 at 12:01 AM

Title: Re: Precepts and Shinran

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

I'm sure I don't have months to spend in retreats. I could do that only if I had either the money for it or if I were a monk/yogi somewhere else. My experience with people's capacity for Buddhism is not so good. It is rare to find anyone in a community with an aptitude for deeper levels beyond general instructions for meditation and vague ideas about Dharma. I've taught at a university (<http://tkbf.hu/ENGLISH/index.html>) for three years introductory classes on Zen, Huayan, Pure Land, Buddha-nature teachings and on certain Mahayana sutras, also occasionally gave lectures on Madhyamaka as a guest teacher. The audience was of course made of university students who were there in order to study Buddhism. Still, only one or two could really understand what it was about while a majority never got it. However, there was one exception. People who came to my Pure Land lectures could understand it by the end of the semester, most of them even gained faith (to a certain degree).

I don't know if you're familiar with Ven. Yinguang's teachings (contemporary of Xuyun), considered to be the greatest Pure Land master in China in the last century. His letters explain lucidly the reason for buddha-remembrance practice as the fastest and most secure way to buddhahood for everyone. And unlike Chan - which is (originally) the path of sudden enlightenment - Pure Land can provide everyone with an assurance.

This assurance makes actually Shinran capable to make dropping moral precepts not to be against attainment of buddhahood. (Note: this is not true for all Pure Land schools.) In Chan it is also possible to a certain extent not to be bothered by morality, meditation and wisdom - simply because it is buddhahood right now. In theory at least. But in practice that is rarely the case.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 28th, 2010 at 1:24 AM

Title: Re: Precepts and Shinran

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kirtu,

If enlightenment seems unreachable then the Pure Land path is the optimal choice. That way one can get free from samsara and fulfil the bodhisattva path easily. Otherwise, even if one collected an immense heap of merit throughout a single life, there's no guarantee one won't be born in the lowest hells and stay there for many aeons.

Lazy_eye,

I think that if you can accept the Buddha as the true teacher, the Mahayana as his true teaching and the respected teachers of the Pure Land tradition as valid transmitters of the correct interpretation, it is easy to embrace the Pure Land path. I believe the cardinal point is to trust in the Mahayana sutras, for then one can study even alone what the Buddha taught about the Land of Peace and Bliss and how to get there.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 28th, 2010 at 5:17 PM

Title: Re: Precepts and Shinran

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm not as proficient in Shin teaching as Dodatsu, but based on Chinese Pure Land teachings I may have some answers.

I understand Huseng's question and actually agree with his doubts. Claiming there is any compassionate and omnipotent being leads to the problem of theodicy, and such an argument was used by Buddhist masters several times to refute those who thought there is such a divine being.

Why I don't think it applies to the Pure Land teaching is because Amita Buddha is not the cause of being brought to his land but the condition. That is, as a result of his bodhisattva work through many aeons he created a buddha-land without any suffering on it (Sukhavati, Land of Bliss), and had 48 vows to specify how and upon what conditions can beings reach his land. So it is like he made a contract which has to be fulfilled by beings to receive admission. Those are the house rules. Such is perfectly within common Mahayana teaching on buddha-lands and dependent origination.

Minimal requirement from an applicant to the Western Pure Land is faith, vow and practice. Of this three, faith and vow constitutes the essential determinant of birth while practice is on one hand for cultivating faith and vow, on the other defines what level of birth one can get. Faith and vow stands for: there is a way, I want to go that way. Practice is remembering, recalling the existence of the way and the determination.

This three (faith, vow, practice), which can be summed up as nianfo/nenbutsu, builds a connection with Amita Buddha. Such a connection is necessary for receiving merit from him. This is in accord with the teaching on transference of merit as accepted by all schools; ie. by knowing of the dedicated merit and being happy about it one receives that merit. This works in case of humans, bodhisattvas and buddhas alike.

This way we can establish the requirements for the possibility of the general Pure Land idea within the framework of Mahayana. Now we can look at how it can be possible to attain birth only by faith through other-power.

Those who don't hear about the Pure Land path has no chance to aspire for it. Therefore knowledge comes first. Based on knowledge faith has to appear. Such faith is only possible because there is Amita Buddha's vow to escort beings to his land and there they're assured of enlightenment. So we can say that faith is from him. Such faith must be deep trust where insight into one's own situation, into the way of Pure Land and the determination. This is the three minds (sanjin) within deep trust (shinjin). Also, deep trust means that one keeps not forgetting of Amita Buddha, which has the verbal expression in Namo Amita Buddha. Hence shinjin also includes nenbutsu, and nenbutsu includes shinjin.

This is how faith is the sufficient cause for birth in the Pure Land. Once there is faith birth is assured, in that sense it is equal to non-regression. Since on the Pure Land liberation is guaranteed, birth is enlightenment (similar to bodhicitta being samyaksambodhi in the Avatamsaka Sutra).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 28th, 2010 at 8:24 PM

Title: Re: Precepts and Shinran

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

The idea of "Pure Land on Earth" is indeed a good one. But it has little to do with the Pure Land school itself. If you accept Tiantai Zhiyi and Yongming Yanshou as valid teachers, you should have no problem with birth in the Pure Land. Which of course doesn't mean you have to choose that way.

Lazy_eye,

It seems to me you take it too much to the extreme. Of course buddhas and bodhisattvas work tirelessly for the welfare of all beings. But they cannot make anyone enlightened. Even if one goes to a buddha-land (any of them), they have to attain realisation on their own. The difference is the environment. Thus the Pure Land is said to be like a monastery, an ideal place for the perfection of paramitas. Shinran may simplify all this to saying that attaining birth is equal to enlightenment, but I doubt he wanted to contradict the tenet of the four noble truths, especially the fourth.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 28th, 2010 at 9:00 PM

Title: Re: Precepts and Shinran

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

It is of course not enough to just say it. Anyone can say it without even knowing a thing of its meaning. Faith is the essential part here which makes buddha-remembrance a living connection. Through that connection there is birth in the Land of Bliss. "Namo Amita Buddha" is just summing it up, expressing the whole teaching. Similar (but not the same) to the Mani-mantra in Tibetan Buddhism which is explained in so many ways that it includes the whole Vajrayana. Or to say that the six paramitas or the four noble truths contains the entire teaching of the Buddha. The nianfo/nenbutsu is buddha-awareness (not buddha-mind, except if we go into a Zen explanation), and as the Surangama Sutra explains, just as remembering our father - who never forgets us - it is possible to meet, that's how by remembering Amita Buddha we can meet him at the time of death and be escorted to the Pure Land.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 28th, 2010 at 11:05 PM

Title: Re: Precepts and Shinran

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is an interesting essay relevant to this thread:

<http://www.buddhistethics.org/10/jones021.html>.

Honen and many of his disciples (including Shinran) put themselves into the category of "lowest of the low" where one may actually commit serious offenses but still be saved. Still we should note that neither of them became a serial killer or anything close that.

As for Ven. Shengyan's arguments, attaining buddhahood through birth in the Pure Land may take longer for those born in the lower levels but not for those in the upper levels. At the same time, failing on the bodhisattva path and losing human birth can easily result in aeons of wandering around (see the parable of the blind turtle in the ocean). In that case it would be essential to reach non-regression in this life, hence buddhahood is not far away at all. Or there's the sudden enlightenment of Chan as another option.

I'd also like to refer to the original issue behind starting this topic. It is to show how Shinran had good reasons to say that precepts for him (and many others) are too high, but fortunately the Pure Land path gives him a chance to attain buddhahood in that condition too. Others with better karma still may be able to realise enlightenment on their own. And those others should uphold moral discipline. If they can.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 28th, 2010 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Precepts and Shinran

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

Yes, generally lot of merits are necessary. However, even the sutra says, that Pure Land is available for those who committed the five heinous crimes and ten wrong deeds. This is neither Honen's nor Shinran's invention who both relied on the scriptures and Chinese masters. It is just that they took it to its logical end.

See what the great Ming master Ouyi says (Mind Seal of the Buddhas): "Whether we achieve rebirth in the Pure Land depends entirely on whether or not we have faith and vows. How high we rank in the Pure Land depends entirely on how deeply we recite the Buddha-name."

It is said the Pure Land path is good for those with high, with middle and with low capacity. Honen and Shinran said they're incapable of anything else but relying solely on Amita Buddha's power. That interpretation is still within the boundaries of traditional understanding of the Pure Land scriptures. Thus there is the possibility of attaining birth without being good at precepts. Nevertheless, no Pure Land teacher ever said people should do bad things.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 29th, 2010 at 2:30 AM

Title: Re: Precepts and Shinran

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kirtu,

Yes, bodhisattvas who are in connection with Amita Buddha. Those who have a connection with him could as well be born in his land. Not to mention that arya bodhisattvas can travel between buddha-lands.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 29th, 2010 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Precepts and Shinran

Content:

Andreas Ludwig said:

It has no cause or else it wouldn't be the state of freedom, the realization of it happens naturally. Since the liberation from suffering is a shift in perspective and no specific step on a ladder of magical education and practice there's nothing to do to make it happen. The goal is to be free from causes and conditions so you can not reach that state by creating a certain framework with the idea to 'produce' it.

Astus wrote:

This is naturalism, a denial of causality and the validity of the path to enlightenment. Saying that there are no cause nor conducive conditions for enlightenment necessitates that then people attain liberation randomly. Morality, meditation and wisdom are the three necessary components of the fourth noble truth. That's how the issue of keeping the precepts is important. To say that there is a way where upholding the precepts is unnecessary needs good reasons, for it is the basis of the entire Buddhist path. By claiming that in this life no need for the threefold training (sila, samadhi, prajna) and at the time of death there is enlightenment, well, this is contradictory to the whole thing.

Andreas Ludwig said:

Well, it seems you are still closer to Honen than to Shinran, but Dodatsu already gave Shinrans quote regarding this idea.

Astus wrote:

Can be. I can only understand Shinran based on Honen and the whole Chinese Pure Land teachings as a logical result of that lineage and other factors, mainly from Tendai.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 29th, 2010 at 5:30 AM

Title: Re: Precepts and Shinran

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kirtu,

Honen didn't say one attains enlightenment immediately after birth but there one can engage in the bodhisattva path on full scale. So that agrees with what other traditions say. Also, if you look at these words of Jixing Chenwu (considered the 12th patriarch of Chinese Pure Land) they resemble the way Shinran speaks:

"The very moment of contemplating the buddha (nianfo) is the very moment of seeing the buddha and becoming the buddha. The very moment of seeking rebirth is the very moment of attaining rebirth and the very moment of liberating all beings (du sheng, 渡生). The three margins of time are all a single, identical time; there is no before and after."

However, this is actually a summary of the progress in Pure Land practice, just as the article explains, "Chewu takes this progression so much for granted that he uses it without further elaboration to illustrate another point, knowing that his audience will accept it unquestioningly." (<http://www.buddhistethics.org/10/jones021.html#a31>)

But of course it is up to Shin masters to explain their view of the issue.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 29th, 2010 at 6:13 AM

Title: See Nature, Become Buddha - Can You?

Content:

Astus wrote:

After the couple of threads where I've participated which mainly were about Pure Land I'd like to come up this time with a Zen discussion.

To me Zen is simply the direct way of realising the essence of Buddhism, the nature of mind, ie. buddha-mind. Everything else are empty fists and golden leaves.

For a start let me give here short quotes from two Song dynasty meditation instructions.

"Once you have settled your posture and regulated your breathing, you should relax your abdomen. Do not think of any good or evil whatsoever. Whenever a thought occurs, be aware of it; as soon as you aware of it, it will vanish. If you remain for a long period forgetful of objects, you will naturally become unified. This is the essential art of tso-ch'an. Honestly speaking, tso-ch'an is the dharma gate of ease and joy." (Changlu Zongze, tr. by C. Bielefeldt)

"In quiet concentration, examine clearly with true mindfulness. What is cognizant of sitting is mind, and what introspects is mind. What knows being and nonbeing, center and extremes, inside and outside, is mind. This mind is empty yet perceptive, silent yet aware. Round and bright, perfectly clear, it does not fall into ideas of annihilation or eternity. Spiritual awareness radiantly bright, its discrimination is not false." (Foxin Bencai, tr. by T. Cleary)

Simple and straightforward. This is all there is to seeing nature. By attaining it buddhahood is at hand. So here are two questions to discuss:

1. What hinders one from realising the nature of mind?
2. What stops one who has seen the nature from completing buddhahood?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 29th, 2010 at 4:56 PM

Title: Re: See Nature, Become Buddha - Can You?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

Interestingly enough, these Song dynasty Chan manuals were meant for the laity (too). Monks had their elder teachers around and the whole tradition, so they didn't really need instructions in written form about how to sit and what to do, unlike lay people who didn't sit with the monks. Plus there were tomes with a lot more detailed and complicated instruction (eg. Mohezhiguan). This simplified, basic Chan was meant for everyone, just like Dahui taught Kanhua Chan mainly to his lay followers.

Defilements are certainly behind all our problems. It means we're attached to feelings and concepts taking them as real and solid. That's why in Chan it is told to turn the attention on mind itself, thus realising the true nature. That is called the direct cut instead of eliminating klesa step by step. On the other hand, the sudden path is not for everyone. For instance, the Perfect Enlightenment Sutra advises repentance practice and long retreats.

As m0rl0ck mentioned, there may not be a difference between realising buddha-mind and buddhahood. But as I see, many Chan teachers differentiate between initial insight and complete liberation, even some from the early Hongzhou school. On the other hand, after Shenhui there were no such stages as you describe it. Such steps belong to the gradual and not the sudden path. In Tathagata Chan - the Supreme Vehicle - one goes directly for tathata.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 29th, 2010 at 5:06 PM

Title: Re: See Nature, Become Buddha - Can You?

Content:

Astus wrote:

m0rl0ck,

What you describe as hindrances are what defilements are. And if that obstructs one from seeing nature, isn't it that different methods should be applied? Huangbo also says that while there are a few who can go the sudden way, many has to walk the gradual path.

"Some students attain the state of liberated Mind quickly, some slowly. After listening to a Dharma talk, some reach "no mind" directly. In contrast, some must first pass gradually through the ten grades of Bodhisattva faith, the Dasabhumi of Bodhisattva development, and the ten stages before attaining the Perfectly Awakened Mind."

"Out of thousands and thousands of Dharma students in the Dhyana School, only three or five attain the fruit."

It follows that if one is not enlightened immediately, they must apply the usual Mahayana path of sila, samadhi and prajna.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 29th, 2010 at 5:51 PM

Title: Re: See Nature, Become Buddha - Can You?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Realising tathata, suchness, is seeing how things actually are (yatha bhuta). This is equivalent to say one has realised emptiness. Emptiness is never separate from form, thinking they're different is not really an enlightenment on emptiness. But of course, there are different meanings of emptiness, that's why Huseng said he used tathata.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 29th, 2010 at 6:48 PM

Title: Re: How do we know?

Content:

Astus wrote:

m0rl0ck,

Without concepts there is nothing conditioned and nothing to condition, so it is called the unconditioned, which is emptiness. An empty mind is no-mind (wunian/munen).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 29th, 2010 at 7:29 PM

Title: Re: See Nature, Become Buddha - Can You?

Content:

Astus wrote:

m0rl0ck,

Indeed, there have always been Chan students working with different meditation practices before gaining insight. Huatou is a method devised to expedite seeing nature. As tradition says, it was invented by teachers because the capacity of students became worse than those of the ancients. I don't think this is the case, but that's a historical issue.

However, it tells a lot about Chan if there is hardly anyone who can do it. Talking about sudden enlightenment and 30 years of mountain retreat at the same time is a bit contradictory. One could as well use other methods, like samatha-vipasyana of Tiantai, or Huayan instructions, since they're more step by step and applicable to different circumstances. Seeing nature is supposed to be the pure Chan path which is not even a path but enlightenment. Or that is just rhetoric.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 29th, 2010 at 8:32 PM

Title: Re: See Nature, Become Buddha - Can You?

Content:

Astus wrote:

If sudden enlightenment were purely rhetorical in Chan the whole thing could as well be put aside as a badly set up system and we should get involved in something real. I mean, the whole idea of Chan is about sudden enlightenment, without that it has no raison d'être.

Other methods used are actually usual Mahayana techniques, means of the gradual path. Only exception is the huatou-gongan technique which is an internal development of the Chan tradition, again, based on the sudden enlightenment concept.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 29th, 2010 at 9:33 PM

Title: Re: See Nature, Become Buddha - Can You?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I simply raised to (hopefully provocative) questions. Different perspectives and ideas are very welcome.

m0rl0ck said:

I guess one has to do something while waiting for the lightning to strike tho

Astus wrote:

Maybe it wasn't intentional on your side, but there is actually a view saying that regardless of one's practice enlightenment will come suddenly (and that's what they call sudden enlightenment). It is a wrong idea that denies the meaning of practice. There are people who think that one should just sit and wait for realisation to happen. That way nothing will happen. So there are also people who believe that if nothing happens that's zazen, that's enlightenment. What is that good for?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 30th, 2010 at 4:40 AM

Title: Re: Precepts and Shinran

Content:

Astus wrote:

Lazy_eye,

One of the good things in Buddhism that we all share some common basis. Here we share a lot if we say that we accept all Mahayana sutras as valid, accept the teachings of Nagarjuna, Aryadeva, Asanga, Vasubandhu, etc. And based on that each of us can describe one's position and the arguments for it.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 30th, 2010 at 3:49 PM

Title: Re: See Nature, Become Buddha - Can You?

Content:

Astus wrote:

m0rl0ck,

In Buddhist terms, before enlightenment there are pancopadanaskandha (five aggregates with attachment), after enlightenment pancaskandha (five aggregates). Difference is in the attachment (upadana).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 30th, 2010 at 5:26 PM

Title: Safe Escape - User Friendly Dharma

Content:

Astus wrote:

There has been a nice debate about Shinran and Precepts. Here I'd like to raise the stakes and start a peaceful competition and a silent revolution.

The goal is to show which Buddhist path is the easiest, the fastest and the safest to achieve liberation from samsara, and since this is a Mahayana realm, attainment of buddhahood is worth extra points. Also a reverse is possible where a path is proven to be extremely hard.

Don't take this too seriously, or too lightly. The point is to see what paths there are and which one should one choose.

Here are the categories:

Easy - requires little effort (precepts, meditation, study), people with low capacities can practice it, can be practised with little or no help (teacher, community)

Fast - within three aeons, within one aeon, within 16 lives, within 7 lives, within this life, within 30 years, within 3 years, within 7 months, within a week, within a day

Safe - no birth in the lower realms, birth only in good circumstances, birth only in pure lands, birth at will, no more birth

Example:

Stream-entry in Theravada (based on Piya Tan's explanation) - requires correct view regarding Dhamma (dropping false concepts as in the first three fetters), maintaining the five precepts, guaranteed liberation within 7 lives, no more birth in the lower realms

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 30th, 2010 at 7:05 PM

Title: Re: Science and Siddhis

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think it is among science's silent rules that it is against all supernatural, and whatever seems supernatural brings it down to natural. Paranormal science is like Christian science - doesn't really make sense.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 3rd, 2010 at 1:49 AM

Title: Re: See Nature, Become Buddha - Can You?

Content:

Astus wrote:

White Lotus,

You talk a lot about enlightenment and how that is the same as not being enlightened, saying that everyone is enlightened, while at the same time they're deluded by their egos. Actually, what does all this have to do with Buddhism? Or at least, how does that philosophy make anyone a happier person?

In your evasive manner you not just don't state or deny anything exactly but it appears to be irrelevant to the whole issue raised about Zen tenets.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 3rd, 2010 at 4:04 AM

Title: Re: Safe Escape - User Friendly Dharma

Content:

Astus wrote:

As I see most of you have resorted to the idea that it all depends on one's karma. That I can agree with. On the other hand, when it comes down to defining a tradition in Mahayana somewhere on the road there is a statement how that particular method is the best among all the others.

Theravada has no problem here as it simply disregards everything else as correct

Buddhism, their superiority lies only in a separation of Buddhadhamma from other religions. But Mahayana has from the beginning that it is better than the so called Hinayana, bodhisattvas are beyond arhats. Then it comes to how this Madhyamaka is better than that Madhyamaka, how Zen is better than the others, how Vajrayana is better than the others, etc. One could say it is like in Panshan's "Meat Case",

"Panshan one day at the marketplace saw a man buying meat who said, "Chop me half a kilo of your best." The butcher dropped his knife and said, "Sir, these are all the best." Panshan, hearing it, suddenly had great awakening."
(X87n1614_p0058b04-06)

One can choose only the best way, for they all claim to be that. But if we agree to that, how can we match different traditions? Or we shouldn't?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 3rd, 2010 at 4:23 PM

Title: Re: Difference between Dzogchen and Mahamudra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Semde stresses mind/awareness and Longde stresses emptiness. Dzogchen is the pinnacle in Nyingma and Bön, but not in Kagyu, Sakya and Gelug. Also Mahamudra has different sets of teachings and interpretations, so there's more to keep in mind when comparing them.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 3rd, 2010 at 5:52 PM

Title: Re: Safe Escape - User Friendly Dharma

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think that comparing the many lineages of Mahayana, the (Chinese) Pure Land path could be the one to fit the diverse requirements in most of the categories one can think of.

Generally, it has an easy practice (buddha-remembrance) that even busy laypeople can do. It assures birth and enlightenment only on the basis of faith and not understanding (wisdom) or morality (merit). It is a fast (horizontal) escape from samsara.

At the same time the Pure Land path is good for any kind of practitioner, for while its minimum requirements are low, the scope of the teaching is deep and wide. Both theory (Madhyamaka, Yogacara, Huayan, Tiantai) and practice (paramitas, Chan, Mantra) can be used of any school of Mahayana. Buddha-remembrance can be seen as encompassing all the practices in a single one.

Compared to the long and arduous practice for many aeons in the six realms, in Amita's Pure Land conditions are perfect for swift progress to buddhahood. Compared to Chan's sudden enlightenment, this requires no great wisdom to realise immediately nor long retreats. Compared to Secret Mantra it requires no initiation, no complicated rituals, and cannot result in hellish birth.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 3rd, 2010 at 8:02 PM

Title: Re: Safe Escape - User Friendly Dharma

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

I like to bring up the Pure Land teaching especially as it raises lot of questions in people's minds, unlike Chan. So here's my reply.

Pure Land as an unreliable teaching doesn't play if one accepts Mahayana as a valid path. It is present in many different sutras and traditions in the Far Eastern as well as Tibetan Buddhism. Experiential confirmation of its existence in this life is possible through meditation (like in the Pratyutpanna Samadhi Sutra), what is generally called the buddha-remembrance samadhi.

How long it takes to attain enlightenment in the Pure Land depends on one's karma (see the 9+1 grades). It can be less than a day or many aeons. When one is already there travelling to myriad buddha-lands is possible, nobody is confined to only that place.

By the way, (arya) bodhisattva's compassion doesn't depend on a specific object, thus it is universal compassion. How could then it be influenced by circumstances?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 3rd, 2010 at 8:29 PM

Title: Re: Safe Escape - User Friendly Dharma

Content:

Astus wrote:

That's why I put an "arya" in brackets. So bodhisattvas from the first bhumi on who had insight into emptiness, who can follow what the Diamond Sutra says. If one is even below that it's hard to focus on the path and not be distracted by the pleasures of samsara. Therefore, those without enlightenment are even more advised to aspire for birth in the Pure Land. Such an aspiration is not at all contrary to bodhicitta.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 3rd, 2010 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: Safe Escape - User Friendly Dharma

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

Certainly, this Saha land has many difficulties. But then I'd say Ksitigarbha's practice gains even more merit for any bodhisattva. Also, since the practice of prajnaparamita, seeing of buddha-nature is an attainment encompassing and above all, as one can receive the teaching from a buddha directly, there's hardly any better way.

My primary aspiration is to attain buddhahood. The path I feel the closest to me is Chan. At the same time, Pure Land is an option I'd rather not miss. It's like an insurance, similarly as the name of Amita Buddha is being recited even at the deathbed of Chan masters. Or as Yongming said: Chan with Pure Land together is like a tiger with horns.

But let's look at it how could Chan be the optimal path. Realising the nature of mind is the starting point of Chan. Those who haven't seen it yet can only aspire for entering the gate but they know nothing of what is inside. Thing is, among the many aspirants only a few can pass the barrier. Then those who actually do may or may not perfect it in a single lifetime and become buddhas.

There are many Chan (Zen/Seon) teachers in the west now. A couple of them have been involved in scandals and many lack proper education in Buddhism. While we can see literally hundreds of Dharma-heirs but there might be only a handful of some worth. This is just to show how many are those still outside the gates but claiming they can enlighten students. I think I feel somewhat similar to Ouyi who perceived that there are many false Chan teachers, so people should rather practise buddha-remembrance.

Right now in the west Madhyamaka could be another option. It has enough texts translated to English to have a good basis for study. (Yogacara, Tiantai and Huayan are far from that level.) Madhyamaka is a great choice because textual study and reasoning can help making a clear difference between true and false. Just like Pure Land practice, Madhyamaka theory is a good appandage for Chan. Also, and this I haven't yet heard about, one could actually take up Madhyamaka as a complete path.

Back to the question of Chan, I think faith is as important in Chan as in Pure Land. But here one has to have faith in buddha-nature, to believe that the very nature of mind is buddha and there's no buddha to realise outside of that. Just this sound is the speech of buddha, this smell is the fragrance of buddha, this thought is the mind of buddha. In short, the six senses are the functioning of buddha-mind. While this is something that can be immediately experienced, one cannot even believe it. That's how Pure Land is easier than Chan, and only a few pass the patriarchs' gate but all goes to Amita's land.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 4th, 2010 at 8:01 PM

Title: Re: Safe Escape - User Friendly Dharma

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

Nagarjuna begins his Twelve Great Treatise with some explanation on what and why he will discuss. There it is said (tr. by Hsueh-li Cheng), "One of the profoundest teachings of Mahayana is called emptiness. If one can understand this doctrine, he can understand Mahayana and possess the six paramitas without hindrance. Therefore, I want only to explain emptiness." That's how it encompasses all there is to it. But this is the reason why the buddha-nature teaching goes better with sudden enlightenment (qv. Daosheng) - you have all the buddha qualities ready to be manifested.

What level of enlightenment means insight into nature is indefinite. I mean, there are different people saying different things, no unity as there is no such thing as "Patriarch of Chan" to tell everyone what to think. If we go by the ancient masters of the Hongzhou school it is indeed buddhahood, anuttarasamyaksambodhi. But if we ask those from the Heze school after Zongmi they say it is only the 1st level of faith in the 52 level system. Shengyan says it is 1st bhumi, Xuanhua says it is 8th bhumi, Xuyun says it is buddhahood. But if we could as people like Huangbo or Linji the answer could be like: gradual stages are not Chan, buddhahood is just a word to bind people.

I believe there are dozens of good teachers in Japan, Korea, China and Vietnam too, it is simply a matter of statistics. For instance, I am a huge fan of Daehaeng Kunsunim, she is like Bodhidharma reborn.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 4th, 2010 at 8:20 PM

Title: Re: Safe Escape - User Friendly Dharma

Content:

Astus wrote:

Lazy_eye,

Reaching the non-retrogression is the same as birth in Pure Land there. Of course, the Pure Land path is about being determined to be born in Amita's land, without that it is not possible. Such determination is one's heartfelt wish to be free from samsara and liberate all beings, for which the Land of Bliss is the stepping stone. However, I doubt there's any requirement to realise the falseness of the self-view. The ordinary Shin Buddhists you had the quote about seems to refer to people who go to the temple only because of tradition/habit and not because they actually believe, that's why there is no assurance. It is true that faith may not come easily, but it is not harder than trusting the Triple Jewel, which is the very basic for any Buddhist.

In Theravada it is as you said, dropping the notion of self-view, belief in rituals and doubt in the Dhamma. In Pure Land there is no need to be free from the view of self to have faith in Amita Buddha's vows. And in Chan it is not enough to believe in the buddha-nature, one must realise it personally.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 4th, 2010 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: Safe Escape - User Friendly Dharma

Content:

Astus wrote:

Lazy_eye,

I used the word faith in a common, and not Zen specific sense. Probably you've heard about the Zen poem by Sengcan (3rd Chinese Patriarch) called Faith Mind Inscription (信心銘), in Japanese Shinjinmei. The word "shinjin" is same as in Shin Buddhism. But it has a very different meaning.

Its closing stanza says: 信心不二 不二信心 - Faith mind/shinjin is not two/non-duality; Not two/non-duality is faith mind/shinjin

If it was the same in Shin Buddhism it could be rightly called Zen. But that is hardly so. And if Shin followers abandoned self-view they could do very well on the Path of Sages and wouldn't need help from Amida.

Your quote from Jinul is good: "One does not have faith in any contrived causes or effects; it is only necessary to have faith that the intrinsic self is originally Buddha." The teaching that Amida saves beings is a contrived cause and effect, saying that "I am a deluded person" is against faith in buddha-mind.

I don't really see the point of making the Pure Land path harder than it is. Personally I find its simple and easy quality its advantage. I know less about Shin Buddhism than Chinese but if it is actually a more difficult path than other Pure Land methods it looks strange to me then.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 5th, 2010 at 2:07 AM

Title: Re: Safe Escape - User Friendly Dharma

Content:

Astus wrote:

Lazy_eye,

If actually Shin teaches the same realisation as Zen it is contradictory to say that Shin is easy but Zen is hard. Either Shin is as hard as Zen, in that case the choice between paths is meaningless, or Zen is as easy as Shin, then again a choice based on capacity is meaningless.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 5th, 2010 at 2:13 AM

Title: Re: Safe Escape - User Friendly Dharma

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

You seem to suggest that the majority of existing Mahayana traditions are quite wrong. Pure Land, Chan, Mantra, Nichiren, Tiantai and Huayan all confirm the sudden path, enlightenment in one life, and that's what they aim for in different ways.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 5th, 2010 at 5:35 PM

Title: Re: Safe Escape - User Friendly Dharma

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

One of the many wonderful qualities of sutras is that they like to talk about the reader and their level of attainment as relevant to the subject discussed. In the <http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra13.html>:

"The Buddha told Śāriputra, "If good men or good women, having heard such profound prajñā-pāramitā, can come to resoluteness in their minds, not shocked, not terrified, not baffled, and not regretful, we should know that they stand on the Ground of No-regress. If those who have heard this profound prajñā-pāramitā are not shocked, not terrified, not baffled, and not regretful, but believe, accept, appreciate, and listen tirelessly, they have in effect fulfilled dāna-pāramitā, śīla-pāramitā, kṣānti-pāramitā, vīrya-pāramitā, dhyāna-pāramitā, and prajñā-pāramitā. Moreover, they can reveal and explicate [the teachings] to others and can have them train accordingly."

The Manjusri PP Sutra is a good one that was used by Daoxin for instance to describe Chan practice as the One Act Samadhi. Also in this sutra there is a discussion of merits too.

"If good men or good women aspire to enter the One Action Samādhi, they should sit properly in an open place, facing the direction of a Buddha, abandon distracting thoughts and appearances, focus their minds on that Buddha, and keep saying His name. If they can continue, thought after thought, thinking of one Buddha, they will be able to see, in their thinking, past, future, and present Buddhas. Why? The merit from thinking of one Buddha is immeasurable and boundless, no different from the merit from thinking of innumerable Buddhas or thinking of the inconceivable Buddha Dharma. They all will ride the one suchness and attain the perfect enlightenment, commanding immeasurable merit and eloquence."

"If good men and good women who have heard these words do not become negligent or indolent, we should know that they have already planted their roots of goodness under past Buddhas. Therefore, if bhikṣus and bhikṣuṇīs who have heard this profound prajñā-pāramitā are not shocked or terrified, they have truly renounced family life to follow the Buddha. If upāsakas and upāsikās who have heard this profound prajñā-pāramitā are not shocked or terrified, they have truly taken refuge [in the Buddha]."

This is all very much in harmony with the other Chan-favoured text, the http://acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html:

"If you see all characteristics to be non-characteristics, then you see the Tathāgata."

"Those who are free from all notions are called buddhas."

Regarding merit the sutra repeatedly says how infinite and incalculable it is to read, recite, memorise and teach that sutra, even greater than the sum of Sakyamuni's merit gained by revering billions of buddhas.

Another thing we should remember is that while the teachings say that only a few people can really comprehend all this, out of 6.8 billion people even a million arhats and bodhisattvas would be very few. At the moment this forum has 316 registered members (including bots). As you're in Japan, you can see how many actually take Buddhism seriously. Not so much, right? And even among them not everyone studies (reads, recites, remembers) the Diamond Sutra (which is so popular). So I think it is a privileged situation that we have heard about the Dharma and can actually study it. This itself is a proof of having accumulated good merit in past lives. Then we can try how far we can get in realising the Dharma-realm.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 5th, 2010 at 6:40 PM

Title: Re: Safe Escape - User Friendly Dharma

Content:

Astus wrote:

It actually sounds like a love story. A guy is looking for perfect love in every woman, expects everything to go smoothly from the first moment on but after a month or two it always turns out it is not perfect, so they break up. This is the disappointment in sudden enlightenment. Then the guy thinks he should work on a single relationship, love has to be earned and maintained. He sticks to one lady, they spend decades together until one day the guy realises no matter how hard he works it is never perfect love. This is the disappointment in gradual enlightenment. Then this guy goes to a witch to do some magic and get him perfect love. But perfect love never comes near his door. This is the disappointment in enlightenment by transformation. So our poor fellow is now left with hoping that in the next life things will go better. This is aspiring for a buddha-land.

And this is how I approach this now. The single problem lies in the concept of "perfect love". It is thinking that "when things will be better then I can do it", "when there are no more thoughts about sex I may be a non-returner". That's how seeing the emptiness of self and things, understanding mind only, realising the illusion of concepts is the path of liberation, actually, liberation itself. Not so difficult, not so easy, needs a little training here and there, but understandable, something (theoretically) everyone can do but (actually) only a few does.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 5th, 2010 at 8:04 PM

Title: Re: Safe Escape - User Friendly Dharma

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

I think this lust-dhyana relationship came up before somewhere here. You said it doesn't mean final elimination of lust but temporary. Now, I'm sure there is no person who is always in a lustful state of mind. Lust is rather an emotion that comes up from time to time, and when it happens indeed one is quite busy with looking for satisfaction. However, at other times one could as well sit down and focus his mind. But even in times of strong emotions one can maintain awareness and not be moved. As the Satipatthana Sutta says, "And how does a monk remain focused on the mind in & of itself? There is the case where a monk, when the mind has passion, discerns that the mind has passion. When the mind is without passion, he discerns that the mind is without passion." Nothing impossible here.

Your Nagarjuna quote is very similar to Dhammapada 372.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 5th, 2010 at 8:05 PM

Title: Re: Safe Escape - User Friendly Dharma

Content:

kirtu said:

This in fact is the point with Pure Land practice (at least from a Tibetan Buddhist perspective). If one doesn't attain the bhumi's in this life or the bardo after death we go to the Pure Lands, attain the bhumis eventually, attain enlightenment and then send out emanations to continue bodhisattic activity. Total win-win.

Astus wrote:

Nice.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 5th, 2010 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: Safe Escape - User Friendly Dharma

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

Here's an interesting one from Bodhidharma's Bloodstream Sermon:

"But since married laymen don't give up sex, how can they become Buddhas?
I only talk about seeing your nature. I don't talk about sex simply because you don't see your nature. Once you see your nature, sex is basically immaterial. It ends along with your delight in it. Even if some habits remain', they can't harm you, because your nature is essentially pure. Despite dwelling in a material body of four elements, your nature is basically pure. It can't be corrupted."

(Red Pine translation, X63n1218_p0004c08-12)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 5th, 2010 at 10:54 PM

Title: Re: Safe Escape - User Friendly Dharma

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

Getting laid and enlightened simultaneously is an Anuttarayogatantra speciality, not really my cup of tea. As for Chan, it only says that normal laypeople can do it, that's what Bodhidharma and others said. No wonder they liked to quote the Vimalakirti Sutra so often.

I had a debate with myself on the subject whether Chan can really be a path to enlightenment, within this life, or it is rather Pure Land that is more appropriate. I came to the conclusion that Chan does work, it is a fine path even for a lay man like me. But I'm open for any criticism and advice, especially open for a good debate (just like this here, or more intense). Right now I have no doubts about Chan.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 6th, 2010 at 4:09 AM

Title: Re: Safe Escape - User Friendly Dharma

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

Of course there is no proof that such a text was actually written by Bodhidharma, but it is not a Dunhuang script either (such texts can be found in the "Bodhidharma Anthology" by Jeffrey L. Broughton). Nevertheless, it was preserved in China as a teaching attributed to Bodhidharma, which tells more about its acceptance in the canon rather than its author.

I haven't yet explored this area, but apparently there have always a group of laymen involved in Chan from the early times on. Broughton actually mentions that Huangbo's Wanling record was meant for laymen. And I don't mean such non-monastic people were only interested in theory but enlightenment too.

As in China the literati, so in the west the educated middle-class people are interested in Buddhism the most. And while obviously the Dharma is preserved among the ordained, its practice has never been restricted to them at all, neither its full realisation. An interesting study by Piya Tan based on the Pali Canon:

<http://earlypalisutta.googlepages.com/8.6Laymansaintspiya.pdf>.

Make no mistake, I'm not saying that a lay life would be ideal for the path, nor that ordination is useless. I am only arguing for not excluding lay people. Dahui wrote (Swampland Flowers, p. 33-34): "When has it ever been necessary to leave wife and children, quit one's job, chew on vegetable roots, and cause pain to the body?" He talks exactly about how it is possible to attain enlightenment as a busy layman. As Layman Pang summed up: "Carry water and haul firewood" (運水及搬柴)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 6th, 2010 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: The virgin birth of Gautama.

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't see the "virgin birth" part here. That would presume he had at least a mother. But it says he had no parents at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 6th, 2010 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: The virgin birth of Gautama.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Says he had an illusion body. Nirmanakaya (化身 - 身化). Looked as if it was from father and mother, but wasn't. Half a parent could still be "half real/impure".

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 6th, 2010 at 9:36 PM

Title: Re: The virgin birth of Gautama.

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'd rather vote for the whole conception-birth as an illusion. If only the conception was unreal but birth real, well, tricky causal situation, don't you think? Not to forget that the whole buddha-life story was an illusion. Well, in Mahayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 6th, 2010 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: The virgin birth of Gautama.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

Does Vasubandhu actually affirm that there is a real cause for unreal effects? It is contradictory by the way. No, those are just examples. Vasubandhu doesn't say that mind is real, that's a misinterpretation of mind only.

Causal efficacy works within illusion and not something real creating the illusion. It's more like in the Srimaladevi Sutra, shadowmen killing each other.

But perhaps you could find some other references on the paragraph you quoted.

Catmoon,

Virgin birth has everything to do with liberation from suffering. It is understanding the nature of things, seeing truth. Yoni śo-manaskāra!

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 6th, 2010 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: The virgin birth of Gautama.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Lazy_eye,

Very good questions. The Vimalakirti Sutra says,

"He had a son, a wife, and female attendants, yet always maintained continence. He appeared to be surrounded by servants, yet lived in solitude. He appeared to be adorned with ornaments, yet always was endowed with the auspicious signs and marks. He seemed to eat and drink, yet always took nourishment from the taste of meditation."

And at another place,

"Reverend Ananda, the Tathagatas have the body of the Dharma - not a body that is sustained by material food. ... Ananda, do not be ashamed, and go and get the milk!"

The Diamond Sutra sums up neatly,

"What the Tathāgata calls a perfectly-formed body is not a perfectly-formed body. Hence it is called a perfectly-formed body."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 7th, 2010 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: The virgin birth of Gautama.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Catmoon,

Don't you see the Zen in what Vimalakirti says? First he gives a long speech on how the Buddha's body is beyond concepts and is the diamond-hard dharma-body, then at the end tells Ananda to bring the Buddha the milk he asked for.

There is no illogic in the Diamond Sutra. It is the teaching of emptiness, of prajnaparamita, of the whole deep wisdom of enlightenment. Perhaps you can look around for some explanation on it, or start a topic in the Sutra Studies section, or Mahayana.

Will,

Conception was through the side of Maya but not birth. Such a birth would be really strange!

Here we shouldn't forget the 3 component requirement of a foetus - sperm, egg, mind. So the Bodhisattva "moving in" through the side may not refer to any kind of immaculate conception.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 7th, 2010 at 3:24 PM

Title: Re: The virgin birth of Gautama.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

OK, my bad. I think we can go on with this illusory part and say that even our seemingly ordinary birth is illusory. Vimilakirti looked like a busy layman, but it was all an illusion, for all is illusion. Whether we realise it or not, it is an illusion. But to see it as an illusion, that all is mind made (manomayakaya), is the point of it. Of course, we can still take it on another level how the Buddha had a magical birth unlike ordinary beings.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 7th, 2010 at 3:39 PM

Title: Re: What are your favourite Mahayana Sutras?

Content:

Astus wrote:

At the moment:

- Vimalakirti Sutra
- Perfect Enlightenment Sutra (圓覺經)
- Avatamsaka Sutra

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 7th, 2010 at 4:17 PM

Title: Re: The virgin birth of Gautama.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Master Huifeng,

Are you saying that's what the original sutra talks about?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 7th, 2010 at 8:14 PM

Title: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

I've been reading the commentaries to an analysis on the Samye debate and its circumstances (<http://earlytibet.com/2010/03/31/tibetan-chan-iv/>). And then I thought how interesting it is that while there are so many books and other sources on Chan, people still have the same misunderstandings about it in Tibetan Buddhism.

Chan is not a single school. There is not a single person who could represent everyone. One teacher is responsible for what he teaches personally and represents only his own lineage and monastery/church. Also Chan teachers can be quite independent. In the 7th-8th century, when Chinese teachers were roaming Tibetan land, there were many different groups in China that could be identified as belonging to the Chan movement. I say this in order to avoid simplification of what Chan is.

A reoccurring critique and usual argument to differentiate Chan view from Dzogchen (nb. I don't say they're the same!) is that Chan knows nothing about the aware nature of mind but only the empty. That is of course not so.

Another misconception is that Chan disregards gradual teachings. First of all, within the Chan tradition different meditation techniques have always been used, both common Mahayana methods and special Chan teachings. On the other hand, it is essentially a sudden path - direct realisation of buddha-mind - but that doesn't mean the denial of the efficacy of gradual methods.

Third misconception is about Chan being only (or mostly) a samatha meditation. First of all, as far as its suddenness goes, Chan is direct seeing of buddha-mind, therefore development in meditation is irrelevant. Second, the techniques used for stage by stage progress cover both samatha and vipasyana, plus many other things Mahayana has. Third, just because it is called Chan (a derivative of Sanskrit dhyana) doesn't mean it's all about sitting in meditation and nothing else.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 7th, 2010 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: The virgin birth of Gautama.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Will,

Thanks for the reference. I still sounds strange that a baby came out of a woman's side. Did it make a hole? Or is it a special siddhi to "walk through" bellies? Just trying to imagine what the writers thought...

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 7th, 2010 at 11:15 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

Yes, Chan is Chan, Dzogchen is Vajrayana. They aren't even spelt the same way.

Nevertheless, it is still intriguing to see some common features too. But my aim here is simply to show a clearer picture of Chan - the sudden path to buddha-mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 7th, 2010 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: The virgin birth of Gautama.

Content:

Astus wrote:

OK then, I think it should be renamed from "virgin birth" into "cesarean birth". Or rename cesarean section to buddha section.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 8th, 2010 at 2:54 AM

Title: Re: Eating Meat vs. Drinking Alcohol--Which is worse?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Let's look at the textual part.

The Pratimoksha (monks' rules) forbids alcohol but only certain meats, both are a minor precept.

The five, eight, ten precepts forbid alcohol, say nothing about meat.

The 10 major bodhisattva precepts forbid selling alcohol, the 48 minor precepts forbid both alcohol and meat. (Brahmajala Sutra - Chinese tradition)

Neither the primary (18), nor the secondary (46) bodhisattva vows forbid meat eating, and alcohol only by referring to other precepts (Tibetan tradition)

As for sutras on meat (those I can think of now):

The Lankavatara Sutra forbids eating meat.

The Surangama Sutra forbids eating meat and everything else of animal origin, or contact with animal products.

The Nirvana Sutra forbids eating meat but allows other animal products to be consumed and used.

Conclusion:

Alcohol consumption is against the precepts, however, in itself it is karmically neutral. Meat consumption is against only one version of minor bodhisattva precepts, its karmic negativity is minimum dubious.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 8th, 2010 at 3:44 AM

Title: Re: Eating Meat vs. Drinking Alcohol--Which is worse?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kirt,

Maybe there is some misunderstanding here. I didn't say alcohol is OK for anyone according to any set of precepts mentioned. I've also mentioned how certain kinds of meat are forbidden for monks. I've said nothing about the Brahmajala Sutra itself, only that meat eating is one of the minor precepts in it (the 3rd), just like drinking (the 2nd).

It'd be actually nice of you to outline tantric precepts about meat and alcohol.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 8th, 2010 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: Eating Meat vs. Drinking Alcohol--Which is worse?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Lazy_eye,

It shows perfectly why being a butcher is listed specifically among wrong livelihoods right there in the noble eightfold path.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 8th, 2010 at 7:24 AM

Title: Re: The virgin birth of Gautama.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Will,

No problem with immaculate birth. Still, as the original quote here says, it was an illusion. Physical, bodily birth happens depending on three components, so we have it in the abhidharma teachings. We could say the Buddha was not a womb-born but a spontaneously-born being. But I'm not sure it'd then count as a human birth. So it gets a bit messy if we analyse it a bit. Still, I'm open for explanations.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 8th, 2010 at 3:52 PM

Title: Re: Faith

Content:

Astus wrote:

An interesting read:

http://ftp.buddhism.org/Publications/IABTC/Vol12_Munsun%20Kang_-On%20the%20Meaning%20of%20Faith.pdf by Munsun Kang (Ven. Hyewon)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 8th, 2010 at 4:25 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

Bummer. It is another myth that there is no Chan but in Japan only. Obviously there is Chan in China, some teachers have even come to the West (Ven. Xuanhua [City of Ten Thousand Buddhas], Ven. Shengyan [Dharma Drum Mountain], Ven. Xingyun [Fo Guang Shan]).

There are certain concepts shared by the different lineages (similar to greater groups like Madhyamaka, Mantrayana), like the teaching of sudden enlightenment and buddha-nature. By Chan here I generally referred to (1) common basics of the "Bodhidharma School", (2) the schools present around the 7-8th centuries.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 10th, 2010 at 3:24 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

Regarding transmission in China I had a topic somewhat relevant to the question:
<http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=69&t=1219>.

There are numerous studies (well, not too much) on Chan history covering the time from Bodhidharma to the 20th century, although I haven't yet met (which doesn't mean there isn't) anything substantial on the Yuan era (1271-1368, Mongolian rule) or the Qing (1644-1911, Manchu rule).

Even though historical records show that the internal (religious) history of Chan is far from being accurate, it doesn't mean there were no Chan followers - ie. at some point it stopped being practised - since its rise around the 11th century. Chan became an integral part of Chinese Buddhism, its end would mean the cease of Buddhism. There were of course periods when Chan wasn't popular, nevertheless, popularity is not a requirement for existence.

As for the survival of lineages, just as Dexing says, both Linji and Caodong exist in China.

The Caodong tradition actually has a stronger claim for historical continuity as it was preserved in the world famous Shaolin monastery and spread out from there in the Ming dynasty Chan revival. Although that doesn't mean it is different from what is practised in the Linji lineage. Also, another source of confusion is that people mainly here about Japanese Zen, which is a separate development with its own 800 years of history. Another noteworthy phenomenon is that Ven. Xuyun (1840-1959) - the most well known Chan master of the last century - is said to be a lineage holder of all five schools of Chan, that's how for instance Ven. Xuanhua (founder of the City of Ten Thousand Buddhas) was in the lineage of the Weiyang school (which didn't survive beyond the Song dynasty, so there is a leap/gap in the transmission).

An important thing to understand about East-Asian Buddhism is that there is very little or no sectarianism at all, unlike in Japan (which has its historical reasons of course). Thus you find Chinese teachers passing on many forms of teaching: Chan, Pure Land, Esoteric, Vinaya, Tiantai, Huayan, etc., while at the same time they may be specialist in any of them. If I remember correctly, Hashang Mohoyen is credited not only with teaching Chan in Tibet but also many sutras.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 10th, 2010 at 3:27 AM

Title: Re: Eating Meat vs. Drinking Alcohol--Which is worse?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dexing,

Funny and wise!

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 10th, 2010 at 3:30 AM

Title: Re: Welcome to Astus, Our New Mahayana Administrator

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thanks guys!

May I receive the merits of past Cakravartins for the welfare of all and offer the merits gained for the peace and smashing discussions on DharmaWheel.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 10th, 2010 at 5:31 PM

Title: Re: Eating Meat vs. Drinking Alcohol--Which is worse?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

One shouldn't confuse killing with eating meat. They are not the same. The precept against killing includes asking someone else to do it, includes even telling others that it is OK to kill. But if you don't ask for it, it is not killed for you, there is no harm on one's "precept-body", neither is there intentional act (karma) of killing involved.

If eating meat is a problem because (in most cases) it is a result of someone killing an animal, and by buying meat one indirectly is involved in the meat industry, paying taxes is even more problematical. Or, for instance, I work at an IT company that I know is involved in government and military things too, therefore my work indirectly supports the soldiers on the battlefield.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 10th, 2010 at 6:42 PM

Title: Re: Eating Meat vs. Drinking Alcohol--Which is worse?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

"By eating meat, however, you are basically having someone else do something that you yourself are probably not willing to do."

Please, make a difference between intentional act and interconnectedness. There is neither the karma of killing nor the breaking of the precept against taking lives involved in buying a sausage. There is no moral responsibility in what one hasn't done. I may give some money to a homeless person from what he buys liquor, or meat, or a knife to take lives and rob people. I may buy something on a flea market that was stolen. This is being connected with many bad things, being connected with the entire society.

There are many other products which involve killing of animals, like soaps, shoes, jackets, glue, medicine, make ups, etc. And in case one would use synthesised ingredients, such chemicals may very well harm animals (like fish) when they make contact with it through sewage water, etc. What to do about these things? Am I morally responsible for the death of a cow/pig if I wash my hands? And there was no mention of pesticides used in farming, killing thousands of animals and polluting the air and the soil.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 10th, 2010 at 6:45 PM

Title: Re: Eating Meat vs. Drinking Alcohol--Which is worse?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kirt,

Hungary is a NATO country, not just money but soldiers too go to the war. To make it worse, I work for an American company.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 10th, 2010 at 7:45 PM

Title: Re: Eating Meat vs. Drinking Alcohol--Which is worse?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

I don't question at all that not eating meat is related to some lessening in production. All I've argued for that meat eating is not breaking the precept against killing or taking the karma of killing. On the other hand, it is breaking the precept against meat eating of course, if one has taken that vow.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 11th, 2010 at 2:03 AM

Title: Re: Eating Meat vs. Drinking Alcohol--Which is worse?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dexing,

Compare these two:

"Bodhisattvas and bhikshus who practice purity will not even step on grass in the pathway; even less will they pull it up with their hand. How can one with great compassion pick up the flesh and blood of living beings and proceed to eat his fill? Bhikshus who do not wear silk, leather boots, furs, or down from this country or consume milk, cream, or butter can truly transcend this world. When they have paid back their past debts, they will not have to re-enter the Triple Realm. ... Both physically and mentally one must avoid the bodies and the by-products of living beings, by neither wearing them nor eating them. I say that such people have true liberation."
(Surangama Sutra, ch. 5)

"Kasyapa said again to the Buddha: "If the Tathagata means to prohibit the eating of meat, such things as the five kinds of flavours as milk, cream, fresh butter, clarified butter, and sarpirmanda, all kinds of clothing, silk cloth, horse-shoe shell, hide and leather, bowls of gold and silver should not be received." "O good man! Do not muddle things up with what the Nirgranthas [Jains] say. Each of the prohibitions which the Tathagata lays down has a different meaning. By this, three pure meats are permitted standing on different grounds and the ten kinds of meat are prohibited by different standpoints. By different standpoints, all are prohibited, until the time of one's death. O Kasyapa! "I, from now on, tell my disciples to refrain from eating any kind of meat"
(Nirvana Sutra, ch. 7)

Interestingly enough, what the Surangama Sutra prohibits is called the teaching of Jains in the Nirvana Sutra.

Dexing said:

Being a consumer, paying for the meat you are directly linking yourself to the kill.

Astus wrote:

I understand direct link to mean immediately involved and indirect link to be involved via separate steps. That way being a consumer is an indirect link. But again, I didn't say a meat eater cannot be linked to the killing of animals but that there is no killing, or the intention of killing on his part. Therefore using and consuming animal products is not negative karma. And it shouldn't be forgot that karma is personal and not something that could be produced by someone else.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 11th, 2010 at 2:09 AM

Title: Re: Wu.

Content:

Astus wrote:

This is "wu" from the gongan: 無 - it means "no"

This is "wu" that in Japanese stands for "satori": 悟 - it means "comprehension"

And this is "wu": 五 - which means "5"

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 11th, 2010 at 2:40 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

What do we mean by "school"? In Chinese the word is 宗 (zōng) that can mean a lot of things. I would say it is more like a "school of thought" than an institutional thing. Or, to be truer to the original word, it means "clan" - they are separate separate families (the "five houses" are in fact "five families" 五家) with a common ancestor. Master Huifeng can explain it much better how family relationship terms are used in Chan and Chinese Buddhism. Another interesting term here regarding transmitting the Dharma is that it is called a "blood vessel" (血脈) which passes through generations. But this is not as strict as it appears to be in Tantra - others may disagree. So it is one thing how a group of people wants to look in the eyes of outsiders and history is another thing. It is like with Buddhism and its many traditions. Every tradition likes to look like the original and true teaching of Shakyamuni Buddha, and in some sense they all are. Every Chan group says they're the heirs of Bodhidharma, which is true in a religious and historical sense. It's just that things are not always what they appear to be.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 11th, 2010 at 4:09 AM

Title: Re: Wu.

Content:
Dexing said:
wú 無, wù 悟, and wǔ 五

Astus wrote:
Try the Japanese reading: mu/bu, go, go. No tones, no problem.

Author: Astus
Date: Wednesday, May 12th, 2010 at 1:10 AM
Title: Re: Abhidharmakosa study group?
Content:
Astus wrote:
Sounds fascinating. But I don't promise any participation except for occasionally looking at what is going on.

Author: Astus
Date: Wednesday, May 12th, 2010 at 7:25 PM
Title: Re: Tai Situpa in Tricycle
Content:
Astus wrote:
Looking at the history of Buddhism throughout different lands, great supporters made the Dharma flourish, in most cases the king and local lords. That is hardly possible now as in Western countries the state is secular. But companies (Korea, Japan, Taiwan) can still put lot of money into it.

As for the "enlightened master", I believe that those who is remembered by later generations as great teachers are seen that way thanks for many circumstances. Those who were considered great masters of one era may be forgot in a hundred years. Disciples make teachers great. Disciples can persist because of the tradition being supported. Thus it is an important factor to have enough followers made of people in important and powerful positions.

"History is written by the victors"

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, May 13th, 2010 at 1:42 AM
Title: Re: Tai Situpa in Tricycle
Content:
Astus wrote:
Here's what I meant. Sorry for bringing up a Chinese example but I'm pretty ignorant in Tibetan Buddhism.

The three most famous Zen teachers of all time are Bodhidharma, Huineng (the so called 6th patriarch) and Linji (Rinzai in Japanese). They're considered people who attained sudden enlightenment and reached buddhahood. What do we actually know about them that can be historically attested? Almost nothing. What we know is that their stories and teachings are mostly the products of later ages. For instance, the fame of Huineng (who was illiterate according to the story) is primarily because of a monk called Shenhui, who claimed to be the Dharma-heir of Huineng, and was a controversial figure of his time. While some of Shenhui's teachings could survive, in the last 1300 years nobody really cared about those, unlike things attributed to Huineng which were not taught by him at all.

Waiting for a "greatly enlightened master with a rainbow body" is like waiting for Maitreya to come. Actually, the single person respected by all Western Buddhists and many non-Buddhists is His Holiness the Dalai Lama. Indeed, if we look around in Europe and America, Tibetan Buddhism is thriving. On the other hand, Zen and Theravada is doing quite well too, even if they have no universal celebrity.

It sounds good to name a single person responsible for something awesome like establishing Buddhism in a country. But in fact, even Shakyamuni Buddha couldn't make Buddhism a major religion in India single-handedly, so there were his disciples who he sent out to spread the word, and the disciples of disciples, etc., and there was Ashoka, so on and so forth.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 13th, 2010 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: This is it - This is what its all about

Content:

Astus wrote:

It was entertaining to hear such a strong, masculine Japanese accent. Doumo arigatou!

But let's look at the content too.

- Zen is not a religion, not Buddhism, so Christians and others can do it too
- Sanbo Kyodan focuses on original Buddhism, which is the enlightenment of Shakyamuni
- The essence is selflessness (anatma), ie. people cannot die (amrta), this is seeing nature (nirvana)
- Science is very much compatible with Zen
- Sanbo Kyodan is the only Zen group in Japan focusing on the essential experience
- People really can experience this essence on retreats

This is so modern, a stripped Zen, fit for those who reject everything religion but embrace science.

I have one question, however. If Zen is separate from Buddhism, not a religion at all, then who tells what true nature is? I'm pretty sure Christians have their own ideas about the nature of man's soul, for instance that it is sinful.

And I put down the "essential" part of the speech, about the meaning of Zen, the universe, and everything.

I say, people don't die. More sharply, people cannot die. Even if you want to, you can't die. Why? Because there is no self who's dying. If there is no self, how you can die? This is the discovery. This is the absolute solution. [?] You cant die. Look into it, nobody there, nothing there. There's no self, then how you can die, when there's nothing there? That is the discovery, that's all. That's all. This is all about Buddhism. [...] but you cannot get this nothing at all, really. You cant see anything at all. You can never die because this nothing at all, nothing-at-all-ness, this is your true self.

(24:38 - 25:46)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 13th, 2010 at 3:36 PM

Title: Re: This is it - This is what its all about

Content:

Astus wrote:

I was talking about the speech itself, not Sanbo Kyodan as a whole. But I guess as he is the leader of the group what he says is a representative introduction of their view.

Focusing only on the experience of emptiness might look like the common theme of every Zen teaching. But actually such teachings were for the meditation hall mainly and not for every situation and every stage of training.

It is true that Sanbo Kyodan was the best in spreading Zen to Americans, thanks for those who went to Japan after WW2. It seems very likely that their openness to foreigners and adaptability to modern views helped achieve that.

Also, it is not so minimalist to focus only on enlightenment. First of all, the idea of transmission is carried on as a validating and governing system. Then there is the koan system, rituals, vows, robes, statues. Although they say it is not Buddhism but their name is Three Treasures, which they take refuge in, they originate their teaching from Shakyamuni and the Zen patriarchs, they teach Buddhist teachings, etc.

I think what Ryouin Roshi said was the PR part. Not that I say there is some secret teaching behind it, but the whole teaching does seem like something not at all far from Japanese Buddhism. This is how the Roshi kept referring again and again to Buddhism. It's like holding up a stick and saying it is not a stick.

True, this view that no matter what you believe in you can do Zen is attracting for those with little or no religious background. At the same time, it creates a very narrow path where only the Zen teacher represents anything valid, because he is the embodiment of enlightenment. Looks very much like the Tantric idea of a guru.

This makes Zen "user friendly" for the masses, which looks like their goal actually. So it is fine. But it doesn't provide a complete training in Buddhism, for that one would need to look at other groups.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 13th, 2010 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: Tai Situpa in Tricycle

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Until that happens, Tibetan dharma for Westerners remains inseparable from Tibetan culture and language, Tibetan ways and mentality."

Maybe he meant only Vajrayana transmission? As I can see, there are only a handful of Mantra teachers who are Westerners, unlike in Theravada and Zen. On the other hand, Tibetans have left their homeland so they're here to teach.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 13th, 2010 at 9:15 PM

Title: Re: Tai Situpa in Tricycle

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think there are some really good Theravadin teachers around, same goes for Zen teachers. Of course, not everyone is top class - in my opinion - but people like Bhikkhu Bodhi and the late Daido Looi are admirable teachers. Theravada has already a considerable number of monasteries around with Western monks and some nuns. It appears to me Theravada in quality and ordained members are pretty beyond any other Buddhist tradition - in the West.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 13th, 2010 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Tai Situpa in Tricycle

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

Indeed, as I said, support is very important. Shakyamuni had wealthy friends, no wonder he could obtain some groves and parks already in his life.

I think Vajrayana is quite appropriate for lay people, especially looking at the mahasiddhas. So there shouldn't be too much need for monastics to have Western teachers. There are some who teach, like James Low, Shenpen Hookham, Keith Dowman, Myrdhin Reynolds, Surya Das, the very famous Ole Nydhal, etc. It may not be the whole curriculum, but some essential practice. However, it could be that such people don't look as authentic as Tibetans.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 13th, 2010 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Tai Situpa in Tricycle

Content:

Astus wrote:

What I meant is that not everyone has to be a Geshe or Khenpo level teacher, which means lot of textual and philosophical knowledge. Look at the Zen teachers (in the West), most of them know only a couple of texts but still can teach meditation and the necessary things. Same goes for Tibetan yogis, I believe. You don't have to know everything from Asanga to Zendo (Shandao) to teach hundreds of people how to do bowing and sitting. And if a teachers knows one or two sadhanas, that's OK, that's something people can learn and gain enlightenment with.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 14th, 2010 at 2:22 AM

Title: Re: This is it - This is what its all about

Content:

m0rl0ck said:

Having practiced zen/chan over the better part of two decades, this has not been my experience.

Astus wrote:

What other quality control is there? Do people learn to evaluate their progress on the path or it is always the teacher who tells it? Is the study of the Buddha's teachings encouraged at all? Isn't the teacher a person with the seal of enlightenment? Isn't the teacher required to do the koan practice?

m0rl0ck said:

It does emphasize practice and experience however.

Astus wrote:

Which is fine. However, it is not irrelevant to ask what practice consists of. There is this tendency to regard only formal meditation as practice, which is again I think is a narrow view. Practice can and should include all that are the six paramitas, starting with giving and moral conduct.

m0rl0ck said:

Practice that leads to the same kind of experience that the speaker in my original post in this thread is talking about.

Astus wrote:

It'd be a good idea to compare such koan practice with something more organised practice. With a fine samatha basis one engages in systematic vipasyana, that way insight into no-self is pretty much guaranteed. No surprises, no waiting for enlightenment but gradually progressing on the path. It doesn't sound like sudden enlightenment when one fumbles with a koan for many years to get a sight of emptiness. Make no mistakes, I don't say koan practice is ineffective, it is indeed a very powerful stuff as I see. But I believe systematic progress is more reliable and effective on a large scale, if one is actually clear about the way.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 14th, 2010 at 3:44 AM

Title: Re: This is it - This is what its all about

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm not asking these questions as if I wanted an answer personally for myself but as part of our discussion, questions I raised for you - or whoever is up for a discussion.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 14th, 2010 at 3:28 PM

Title: Re: This is it - This is what its all about

Content:

Astus wrote:

I didn't find his teaching a nihilist one at all. Just because he says nothingness rather than emptiness is not necessarily annihilationist. To say that you find nothing like a self if you search for it is not contrary to the Buddha's teaching.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 14th, 2010 at 4:18 PM

Title: Re: Truly ethical governments: Have there ever been any?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Perhaps the "United Federation of Planets" could be counted among ethical governments, mainly because it is fictional. Another similar idea is the Wheel-Turning King of the golden era - whose heirs inevitably become corrupt by the time. I suppose there is also ethical government in divine societies like the heaven of the brahmas. As for Planet Earth, the Saha Loka, in the present era I can hardly imagine that. I mean, there could have been wonderful governments in a land of peace and prosperity. Maybe there are some. Until some bigger tribe, bigger nation came and conquered the land, enslaved the population and moved in their own sons and daughters to rule.

By the way, it wasn't clear what ethics should be used to define ethical governments. Plato? Macchiavelli? Confucius? Cicero?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 14th, 2010 at 5:34 PM

Title: Re: Nichiren's interpretation of the Pure Land

Content:
Astus wrote:
Looks very much like that.

Author: Astus
Date: Friday, May 14th, 2010 at 5:40 PM
Title: Re: Safe Escape - User Friendly Dharma
Content:
Astus wrote:
Something about the lay path debated here for a little:

"They do not want fame, their hearts are not overcome by anger.
As householders they remain constantly unattached to their entire property.
They do not seek to earn their livelihood in the wrong way,
Through bewitchment-spells, or the spells which are the work of women.

Nor do they [earn a living by] tell[ing] plausible lies to men and women.
Practised in the quite detached wisdom, the best of perfections,
Free from quarrels and disputes, their thoughts firmly friendly,
They want [to see] the all-knowing, their thoughts always inclined towards the religion."

PP8000, ch. 17 said:
When one lives the life of a householder, one has no great love for pleasant things, and one does not want these too much. For, it is realized that it's with fear and disgust one possesses all pleasant things. [fear of the possessed item's loss, and disgust at their decrepitude or lacking being better than what it is]. Situated in a wilderness infested with robbers one would eat one's meals in fear, and with the constant thought [333] of getting away, of getting out of this wilderness, and not with repose.

Just so an irreversible Bodhisattva living the life of a householder, possesses pleasant things simply without caring for too much for them, without eagerness, without attachment. One is not one of these people who care for dear and pleasant forms. These who live the lives of householders and who are involved in the five kinds of sensuous pleasures do not earn their living in an irregular way, but in the right way. Neither do these incur death in a state of sin, nor do these inflict injuries on others. These incite all beings to realize this supreme happiness, -these worthy beings, these great beings, superbeings, excellent beings, splendid beings, powerful of beings, sublime beings, valiant beings, heroes of beings, leaders of beings, waterlilies of beings, lotuses of beings, thoroughbred beings, Nagas of beings, lions of beings, trainers of beings! It is in this spirit which Bodhisattvas live the life of householders, in as much as these are impregnated with the power of perfection of wisdom, and this is another token of their irreversibility.

Author: Astus
Date: Friday, May 14th, 2010 at 8:30 PM

Title: Re: Truly ethical governments: Have there ever been any?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

You're right. The government is there to keep order. In the Aganna Sutta (DN 27) it is outlined how greed resulted in the creation of the position of a judge, from which the position of a king became, and from vices new laws created. So from this point of view, a government is always a way of oppressing disturbing elements of society. But again, we should define what ethics to use. DN 26 gives a nice description of the perfect ruler, a sort of socialist state.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 14th, 2010 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: Safe Escape - User Friendly Dharma

Content:

Astus wrote:

Yes, PrajnaParamita in 8000 lines, but PP8000 sounds better.

The verse is of course from the Ratnagunasamcayagatha's relevant part.

However, the PP8000 is not Conze but Richard Babcock.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 14th, 2010 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: Truly ethical governments: Have there ever been any?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Luke,

I guess the Vatican fits that three requirements. Perhaps other countries like Luxembourg, San Marino, Monaco too.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 15th, 2010 at 2:35 AM

Title: Re: This is it - This is what its all about

Content:

Astus wrote:

catmoon,

I'm not so familiar with HHDL's books but the Gelugpa's Prasangika-Madhyamaka is quite strict to the level of the emptiness of emptiness. Even a relatively real existence of self is denied. There is this concept of self and that's it, nothing beyond that. Just a notion, a false notion. Khedrup Je, the 1st Panchen Lama explains the nature of self in their system,

The fact that if it is searched for in these seven ways (Candrakirti's chariot analysis) no self at all is to be found is what it means for the self to be essenceless. This, however, does not repudiate the fact that, if it is not analyzed, the notion of person is a functional one. It being established by a nominal valid cognition, the person does nominally exist. What is more, when the mind that thinks "I" arises, it does so in dependence on, that is, using as a basis, the five aggregates within one's on continuum [if one is in the form realm or below], and the four, [excluding the form aggregate, if one is a formless being]. Without using [such a basis it would not arise] and that is why it [is said] to be merely labeled in dependence on the aggregates.

(Dose of Emptiness, p. 290)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 15th, 2010 at 2:54 AM

Title: Re: This is it - This is what its all about

Content:

Astus wrote:

Another, more relevant quote from Nitou's "Song of Mind"

(http://www.shambhalasun.com/sunspace/term/fac/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=1307&Itemid=0):

三世無物無心無佛。眾生無心依無心出。

In past, present and future, there is nothing;

No mind, no buddha.

Sentient beings are without mind;

Out of no-mind they manifest.

一切莫顧安心無處。無處安心虛明自露。

Do not concern yourself with anything;

Fix the mind nowhere.

Fixing the mind nowhere,

Limitless brightness shows itself.

From Ven. Shengyan's commentary:

"as a self is present, dharmas cannot be understood." and "We must go beyond one-mind to no-mind. Here the mind truly stops on nothing. Only here can one truly be in accordance with all dharmas."

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 16th, 2010 at 7:33 PM

Title: Re: This is it - This is what its all about

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sheaps,

"Even a relatively real existence of self is denied." - said me. By that I referred to concepts like a pudgala, or that there is actually a self on a relative, but not absolute level, that is understood by beings as a self. Even modern teachers may talk about a "small self" or an "ego" that one has to destroy.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 17th, 2010 at 2:50 AM

Title: Re: Safe Escape - User Friendly Dharma

Content:

Astus wrote:

Lazy_eye,

As I said, I haven't tried yet to search on this subject of Chan lay practice. But what immediately popped up in my mind was this teaching from the Platform Sutra (ch. 3):

The master said, "Good friends, if you wish to cultivate this practice, you may do so either as a householder or in a monastery. Householders who are able to practice this are like those persons of the East whose minds [harbor] good. Those in the monastery who do not cultivate it are like those people of the West whose minds [harbor] evil. It is only that the mind should be pure—then it is the Western [Paradise] of the self-nature!"

Lord Wei asked further, "How can householders cultivate this practice? I hope you will teach us this." The master said, "I will recite a formless verse for this great assembly. Just cultivate according to this, doing exactly as if you were always with me. If you do not cultivate according to this, what benefit would it be to take the tonsure and leave home [to become a monk]?"

The verse goes:

With the mind universally [the same], why labor to maintain the precepts?
With practice direct, what use is it to cultivate dhyāna?
Gratitude is to be filial in supporting one's parents
Righteousness is to have sympathy for those above and below.

Self-subordination is to honor the lowly and the familiar.
Forbearance is not to approve of the various evils.
If one is able to rub sticks to create a fire,
The red lotus blossom will certainly grow from the mud.

That which causes the mouth suffering is good medicine.
That which offends the ears is loyal speech.
By reforming transgressions one will necessarily generate wisdom.
To defend shortcomings within one's mind is not wise.

In one's daily actions one must always practice the dissemination of benefit [for others].

Accomplishing enlightenment does not depend on donating money.
Bodhi should only be sought for in the mind.
Why belabor seeking for the mysterious externally?

If you hear this explanation and practice accordingly,
The Western [Paradise] is right in front of you.

The master said further, "Good friends, you should all practice according to this verse.
See your own natures and directly accomplish the enlightenment of buddhahood!

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 17th, 2010 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: to read or know or learn before ordaining

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://www.fjdh.com/wumin/HTML/82325.html> a summary.

"In the Jogye Order, a future member of the community first seeks out a teacher at a temple, has his head shaved or his hair cut very short, and serves as an aspirant apprentice for a period of at least five months. Once the aspirant is accepted, there is a ceremony of the taking of the novice precepts, or training rules. These consist of refining the ethical standards of the individual. After completing four years of basic training in living in the monastery and attending training college where the aspirant learns philosophy and other necessary subjects, candidates then take prescribed examinations and if successful, they then take the full precepts, becoming a monk, bhikkhu, or nun, bhikkhuni.

Once ordained, a new monk will participate in all the daily activities of the temple, including chanting, maintenance, meditation retreats, text study, and so on. Some may be involved in administrative affairs and the teaching of the laity."

http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/jokb/content_view.asp?cat_seq=69&content_seq=201&page=1

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 17th, 2010 at 3:31 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana vs Theravada aspirations

Content:

Astus wrote:

Chan teachings may give the impression that there is no system in Mahayana but that is far from the truth. Actually in terms of stages on the path it is more complicated than what you see in Theravada. For instance, in East-Asian Mahayana they teach a 52 stages of enlightenment set based on the Avatamsaka Sutra, and I'm sure you have heard about the ten stages of the bodhisattva. But even in Chan you find stages like the five ranks of Dongshan, or in Japan Hakuin's koan curriculum. Meditation manuals are also available, most famous of them is Zhiyi's Mohezhiguan (Maha-Samatha-Vipasyana). You definitely should look around for more.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 17th, 2010 at 2:04 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana vs Theravada aspirations

Content:

Astus wrote:

"there is no self existent entity to which "merit" can be attached."

Neither is there a self which you can attach a body and clothes on, but I guess you don't run around naked on the streets. Merit is simply "positive karma", and while it may sound too intellectual for you, the work of karma and rebirth works perfectly well in Buddhism exactly because there is no permanent self. Plus there is also "immeasurable merit" of the arya bodhisattvas who practice the prajnaparamita.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 17th, 2010 at 2:06 PM

Title: Re: community/compassion etc

Content:

Astus wrote:

I like to use this translation of the http://acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html.

But there are many others online.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 17th, 2010 at 2:09 PM

Title: Re: to read or know or learn before ordaining

Content:

Astus wrote:

You can study Mahayana sutras in a Theravada monastery on your own, if you have internet for instance, or a good library there.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 17th, 2010 at 2:31 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana vs Theravada aspirations

Content:

Astus wrote:

No need to take it on faith. It is an understandable, logical teaching that can be personally observed through meditation.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 17th, 2010 at 9:37 PM

Title: Re: 6 Yogas of Naropa Teaching in Mongolia Aug20-Sep1

Content:

Astus wrote:

It appears prices got a lot higher in Mongolia. I mean, if it costs $2000 there, while in the USA (not exactly the cheapest place on Earth) it is "merely" $625-775 (<http://www.guhyasamaja.org/SixYogas2009.htm>) there certainly must be some quality difference. Or not. Perhaps it is that Glenn Mullin has a higher price than Gyume Khensur Rinpoche. I don't know.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 18th, 2010 at 3:30 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana vs Theravada aspirations

Content:

Astus wrote:

Why should have I found an self or person? There is no need for it. Let me give an example, why a self is unnecessary for karma.

We say that information is carried by electrical signs throughout the globe and it is called the internet. Is information separate from electricity, or it's the same? Of course, there is only the current of electrons, of electric charge moving.

Similarly, there is the mental continuum, the fluctuation of dharmas, arising and falling. That rise and fall is not carried on by a soul, or a container. Dharmas come and go according to causal relations, dependent arising. Karma is one of the governing factors of the mental continuum induced by ignorance.

You can find more detailed explanation of the different processes in abhidharma works, including the process of rebirth.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 18th, 2010 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana vs Theravada aspirations

Content:

Astus wrote:

Is it tortuous? Just look at the periodic table of elements, isn't that too much to describe a simple thing like matter? Using earth, water, fire and wind sounds simpler, easier. But we know that knowing only the list of elements is far from enough to make one a chemist or a pharmacist. It can take even a decade in higher education to get a PhD, and that's nothing unusual, not a Nobel prize. Should Buddhism be easier?

"To what were you referring? Merit? How have you observed that in your practice?"

There is the form of meditation called vipasyana, observing the mind (觀心), also dharmsmrtyupasthana, foundation of mindfulness on dharmas (法念住). In brief: watching thoughts. Seeing how phenomena come and go, looking at the work of internal causality. You can learn this from both a meditation teacher (禪師) and meditation manuals, in case you want to try it out. You can use either Theravada or Mahayana, this is a subject they both like to investigate.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 18th, 2010 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: 6 Yogas of Naropa Teaching in Mongolia Aug20-Sep1

Content:

Astus wrote:

"As for doing something more general, it's not my style. My own belief is that tantra is self secret. Only those with the karma will show up."

I like his style.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 18th, 2010 at 3:01 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana vs Theravada aspirations

Content:

Astus wrote:

m0rl0ck,

I didn't mean to question your path, or practice. But in my view there is more to Buddhism than "drop all concepts" and "see your nature". The Heart Sutra is a brief extract of the prajnaparamita teachings, like a synopsis of a novel, a zip file of thousands of teachings. Not to mention teachings beyond the prajnaparamita cycle. If the Heart Sutra were enough in itself the Buddha could have stopped teaching twenty minutes after his enlightenment.

Of course, I admit I didn't experience sudden realisation after reading my first ever Zen saying, so I'm not with the highest potential. And I also find studying the sutras and treatises a beneficial method to deepen my understanding and practice of Buddhism. May not be so for everyone.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 18th, 2010 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana vs Theravada aspirations

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here are some words from Ven. Shengyan:

"The Bodhisattva Path, the realization of wisdom, can be seen as stages of selflessness and nonattachment, as I have just de-scribed. But enlightenment can also be seen as activity. Enlightenment means that you have come to realize what you didn't realize before. Ch'an recognizes four levels of the activity of enlightenment, and these levels unfold, one after another, over and over again.

At each level you attain a different kind of wisdom. The first level of enlightenment is to hear the Buddhadharma, which gives you the wisdom to answer some of the questions in your life. The second level is to think about the Dharma in order to better understand what you have heard. The wisdom from this level helps you answer questions about the Dharma, and about practice. The third level of enlightenment is to practice what you have learned, both formally in meditations, chanting, prostrations, etc., and in daily life. The wisdom gained from practice is deeper and allows you to better understand questions you may have about life, your self, and the Dharma. Through practice you learn more about your body, mind, and behavior. Eventually you will experience directly what you have learned intellectually. This is the fourth level of enlightenment, when you illuminate your mind and see your intrinsic nature. This is sudden enlightenment. Wisdom becomes visible because vexation and self-centeredness disappear. In that moment, all problems and questions are resolved.

Many practitioners like to focus exclusively on the fourth level of enlightenment, and they neglect the first three stages: listening, studying, and practicing in meditation and daily life. They want to bypass the preliminary activities and instantly illuminate their minds and reveal their wisdom. Such people are naive and have a poor understanding of Ch'an practice.

Even if you experience the fourth level of enlightenment, it doesn't mean that you have attained Buddhahood. In fact, the enlightenment experience may last only a moment. You will go through the four levels over and over again. Each time you will begin at a new place and learn new things. Each time you will have different experiences. By repeating this cycle again and again, eventually you can reach complete enlightenment. But we must all start at the beginning. Now you are learning about Buddhadharma. Please practice and cultivate the Dharma as well. Don't seek the fourth level. Just practice. The fourth level will manifest naturally in its own time."

(<http://ddc.shengyen.org/cgi-bin/ccdd/show.py?s=09-09p0109>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 18th, 2010 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: Tai Situpa in Tricycle

Content:

kirtu said:

In the article HE Tai Situpa basically said that he thought that something closer to mahasiddha practice would be taking place in the West.

Astus wrote:

Didn't notice that part. But that's good news, I guess.

Like, just something I've heard of, Keith Dowman's idea of the "urban yogi".

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 19th, 2010 at 12:46 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana vs Theravada aspirations

Content:

Astus wrote:

m0rl0ck,

I didn't elevate study above practice. Practice is the application of what one has heard, studied and understood. If one only knows to count his breath, well, then that's all Buddhism is for him - no problem.

Actually, I don't know any other famous Chan teacher who was illiterate besides the legendary Huineng. Probably because those who were appointed abbots of monasteries were expected to be well versed in Dharma and Vinaya.

The sutra mentioning 7 days, 7 weeks, etc. is the Sutra on the Four Establishments of Mindfulness (in Pali it is the Satipatthana Sutta).

In the early times they didn't read sacred texts but memorised them. And I'm sure it takes longer to memorise at least the basic sutras (like the Mahavagga) then to read them a couple of times and have the book on the shelf.

In case of busy laypeople it is understandable they have neither the time nor the inclination to learn more about the Dharma beyond a few basic concepts, rather do as much practical thing as possible. In the West instead of lighting incense, chanting texts and doing prostrations people go and do some sitting. Quite similar in mentality actually. Simple ways to obtain spiritual goods. That's how Buddhism can be appropriate for both monks and laymen.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 20th, 2010 at 2:59 AM

Title: Death of the Arhat

Content:

Astus wrote:

What happens to the arhat after death from the traditional Mahayana perspective(s)?

I know of two options:

- Attains parinirvana.
- Becomes a bodhisattva.

If he attains parinirvana, is that the same as of a buddha, or not? If it is the same, do buddhas remain active saving beings or no? If they do, obviously arhats would do the same. Same if they don't stay. If it is different, what is the difference? Can there be higher and lower freedom from samsara?

If he becomes a bodhisattva, what is the cause? If it is the decision of the arhat, did he make that decision before, or after death? If before, he was already on the bodhisattva path before death and not that of the arhat. If after, then what mental factor could cause such a decision considering he has released all reliance on the aggregates and the aggregates dispersed at the time of death since there was no reason for them to be born. But if there were some attachments left, how could he be called someone free from samsara, an arhat? Or if the joining of the path of the bodhisattva was caused by somebody else, like a buddha, where could that influence take its effect? If it happened before death, again, it wasn't a death of an arhat. If after, what was influenced?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 20th, 2010 at 6:10 AM

Title: Re: Death of the Arhat

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kirt,

According to my intention this has nothing to do with Theravada but only the Mahayana view(s) on arhats.

The version you told me is I think the most usual nowadays everywhere. However, it raises a few problems, I think.

What is that parinirvana where an arhat goes to? If it is within samsara, that defies the definition of an arhat. If it is liberation, there is no place or state of mind an arhat could be found. Because it is said an arhat still has some obscurations (jneyavarana), it should mean it is within birth and death. Another option - but I've heard about this only in Tiantai - is that there is a special buddha-realm like dimension where arhats stay. But beyond that I know nothing about such an arhat-realm.

Is there anywhere a clarification of what sort of parinirvana an arhat is exactly in?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 20th, 2010 at 2:00 PM

Title: Re: Death of the Arhat

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is this teaching of arhats becoming bodhisattvas after a stay in, well, where exactly? And then buddhas wake them up from, what? So that bodhicitta arises in their, what?

I see a not so small problem with saying that although arhats ended birth they are still born somewhere. Is there somewhere outside samsara? How?

If it is dependent origination they are in, there is no freedom from birth. Independent origination, however, is not possible.

Kirt,

Regarding Tiantai's view, I've just heard about it but don't know any details.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 20th, 2010 at 4:58 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana vs Theravada aspirations

Content:

Astus wrote:

The first time I've heard about the 52 stage system was from Ven. Mingzheng from Bailin temple whom under I've studied for a while. As it is based on the Huayan Sutra, it seems kind of common system in East-Asia. I'm not sure of the system's origin, maybe Sanlun, or not.

faith

1-10 ten faiths understanding

11-20 ten abidings

practice

21-30 ten practices

31-40 ten returnings

41-50 ten stages (10 bhumis)

51 equal enlightenment

enlightenment

52 marvelous enlightenment

More on the 52 stages: <http://www.simplybuddhist.com/2007/11/detail-of-52-stages-of-bodhisattva.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 20th, 2010 at 11:25 PM

Title: Re: Death of the Arhat

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kirt,

Yes, by bringing the eternal mind-continuum ("soulriver") into the equation it can be solved, saying that there is no such thing as end of rebirth, end of dependent origination, end of samsara. Thus whatever nirvana an arhat imagines is false. Thinking about the possibilities this was the only one which sounded plausible to explain an arhat's ongoing quest for buddhahood.

On the other hand, this eternal mind-continuum sounds, well, like a liquidified atman, with the result that one's mind is eternal, this time a changing, moving, feeling mind, not eternal in components but eternal in continuum. So, like a river and its drops, the river is eternally flowing but the drops keep changing. Funny, it is much like the reverse of the view that there are eternal elements (dharmas) making up an impermanent whole. Is this really an acceptable view?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 21st, 2010 at 1:54 AM

Title: Re: Precepts and Shinran

Content:

Astus wrote:

For the discussion that was started here see:

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=66&t=1459>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 21st, 2010 at 5:12 PM

Title: Re: Celibacy and Health

Content:

Astus wrote:

"if married, didnt uncompassionately deny sex to their spouses."

Is it uncompassionate to deny drugs from an addicted?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 21st, 2010 at 9:27 PM

Title: Re: Celibacy and Health

Content:

Astus wrote:

Lazy_eye,

Among all the quotes you cited didn't say there is "compassionate sex" only in the one by Berzin.

The question is: can lust be realised as empty? Certainly, everything is empty. Emptiness doesn't mean non-existence, just one is not bound by it, one doesn't think it is self-existent. Can we deduce from this that lust may not cause suffering? I don't think so, as there is a causal relationship according to the second noble truth. Can suffering be empty? Of course. Thus lust can be not lust and suffering not suffering. So did Vimalakirti have wife and kids while being alone and celibate. Good stuff, eh? So much for lay people...

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 22nd, 2010 at 4:08 AM

Title: Re: Death of the Arhat

Content:

Astus wrote:

"The mind-continuum is in a sense eternal in that one moment of mind conditions the next moment of mind. Ultimately this is transformed into wisdom and in that sense the mind ends."

Regarding the eternally continuing mind-moments MMK 16:1 has the refutation:

"Suppose compounded phenomena cycle:
If they are permanent, they do not cycle.
Even if they are impermanent, they do not cycle.
The same approach applies to sentient beings."

On the third line of the stanza Tsongkhapa (Ocean of Reasoning, p. 331-333) gives an explanation how the concept of an impermanent, changing mental continuum cannot be the one to go around in samsara.

"As for no end of rebirth - yes there is an end to rebirth. The problem of rebirth for ordinary beings is uncontrolled rebirth driven by karma and obscurations. There is an end to that."

I guess you mean that liberated beings can choose their birth. That would actually suppose a being outside of samsara making a decision about where to be born. And even if it is within samsara, where does the decision originate from? If the decision is caused by former mental factors, it couldn't be called controlled choice. If it is independent of other factors, that is the case of something out of nothing, or a case of an independent self.

"Actually we should look at the Abhidharma teachings on this. Mind is however not a thing or entity but a Dependant arising. Therefore it is not an atman."

What Abhidharma teaching do you think of here? Certainly, mind is dependently arisen. Thus, it can dependently end - with the elimination of ignorance there is no further cause for the arising of consciousness, birth and suffering.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 22nd, 2010 at 5:51 PM

Title: Re: Celibacy and Health

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

It's great you bring some everyday reality here. But, and this is just as normal too, in the Western countries the newly converted people don't choose Buddhism because they're eager to make some merit for better birth, nor do they like much religious rituals. It is meditation that sells Buddhism, and the Dalai Lama. Average middle class people with university degrees have the time and energy to engage in regular practice. It shouldn't be forgot that today those who have a high school level of knowledge would be called panditas a thousand years back. Uneducated, poor laypeople are not the same as educated and relatively wealthy laymen. Praying for more sons and more food comes naturally for those who depend on those things. That's not the situation of modern Buddhists here. Consequently they want something spiritual instead of material, just as the literati didn't visit Buddhist teachers to learn how to receive more ink and paper in their next life. They wanted enlightenment, Chan, realising the true nature of mind - or at least some good philosophical chit-chat.

I think it is easy among all the teachings to forget it is about decreasing suffering and not about living up to some idea. The problem with lay life is that it involves more problem than a monastic life. But if one has the good background for paying more attention to the Dharma than worldly matters, where is the problem? In medieval Europe the monks had the knowledge and they were the philosophers and wise people of the age, very similar to India and China. Then in the 16th century things began to really change, the clergy gradually lost its position, science, philosophy and theology became the matter of educated citizens. Monastic life never again enjoyed its lost popularity, since it wasn't necessary to live like that in order to know how to read and write.

By the way, to attain any level of dhyana you don't have to be celibate, or live a life of a recluse. True, being occupied by desires prevents the mind to settle down. First of all, no man is constantly full of passion. I have no doubt that one can put aside everyday matters even for an hour, or for a week, sometimes for a month or two. While I don't live a celibate life, it is not hard for me to enjoy inner peace for an hour without thinking about sex, food, sleep, fame or wealth. Even when one is sick and has pains can preserve serenity and rise above concerns.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 22nd, 2010 at 7:13 PM

Title: Re: Celibacy and Health

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

And what percent of the population studied in those schools in Shakespeare's times? Very small. And that's what I meant to point out, that the masses were uneducated peasants and craftsmen. Today, who learn Sanskrit, or any foreign language, has to memorise the grammar. Or you could learn Japanese by watching samurai films?

They memorised texts, true. I, on the other hand, have hundreds of books, plus the internet. In terms of information we're way beyond the capacity of Ananda, the whole canon on a single e-book reader with a search option.

The Chinese literati were no monks, sure. And they still could be involved in high level Buddhism, like Peixiu and Li Tongxuan.

As I said, celibate life and putting aside a noisy, desiring mind for a while are not the same. Otherwise teaching meditation to lay people would be quite pointless, don't you think? But they did so in the past and they do it now too.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 23rd, 2010 at 7:28 PM

Title: Re: Celibacy and Health

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

If you interpret the quote in a way that one must have eliminated kama, only non-returners and above attain any absorption. Which would then mean wisdom is available without absorption as those on the first two noble stages still have sensual desire. But I believe this has been already mentioned before.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 24th, 2010 at 2:56 AM

Title: Re: Celibacy and Health

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

So, one forsakes lust but hasn't eliminated lust. It should fit the case when one doesn't even want to drink coffee in the evening, although he might drink one in the morning. Also, after lunch one isn't hungry and until dinner there's no need to think of food. By the way, if temporary non-presence of lust is not good enough, how could a permanent non-presence of lust be fine? As far as the non-presence of lust is concerned, both cases are satisfactory.

Master Huifeng's suggestion should be considered too.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 24th, 2010 at 3:36 AM

Title: Re: Huang Po in context

Content:

Astus wrote:

Master Huifeng,

Actually, the two records of Huangbo assembled by Peixiu and probably some of Huangbo's direct disciples are mainly from that era, with occasional modifications by later ages.

"From the perspective of contemporary Buddhist studies, its importance derives from the fact that this literature is the best example of the state of the Zen tradition in China during what has traditionally been regarded as the "golden age." What is unique about the Huang-po literature is that it is precisely dateable, thus providing a crucial historical marker in the Zen tradition."

(Dale S. Wright: The Huang-po Literature, in Zen Canon, p. 107 - same essay as linked in the OP)

This kind of sudden enlightenment teaching of the Hongzhou school as we find it in Huangbo's records is also attested by Zongmi, also there's Jinhua Jia's work on Mazu's teachings collected from sources as early and reliable as possible. And there are still others, like the Guishan Jingce found in Dunhuang and dated 936.

While it is true that many Tang Chan records are overly edited, or fake, or simply untraceable, there are some sources to look into. And it appears to be that Hongzhou Chan is/was quite radical about sudden enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 24th, 2010 at 4:28 AM

Title: Re: Huang Po in context

Content:

Astus wrote:

A very relevant book on Huangbo and its modern interpretation: Philosophical Meditations on Zen Buddhism by Dale S. Wright

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 24th, 2010 at 4:41 PM

Title: Re: Origins of Amitabha

Content:

Astus wrote:

I've heard this idea a couple of times before. I think it is/was a trend in cultural anthropology to find sources of cultural phenomena in other places, ultimately arriving at the original source (or something like that) - called https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Trans-cultural_diffusion.

But maybe we can actually find internal sources. I think of those gods who are "made of light", or shining (appamanabha deva - Devas of Unbounded Radiance). So it is not at all inconceivable how a Buddha of Infinite Light could be found in Buddhism. We just have to establish that the concepts of infinite and light were present as religious ideas.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 24th, 2010 at 5:47 PM

Title: Re: Origins of Amitabha

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think as for religious psychology - and mythology, gods, types of beliefs - the different levels of existence from hell to the formless realms are a wonderful source and description. It's the whole spectrum from top to bottom. Making it more Buddhist with bodhisattvas and buddhas seems then an internalisation (into Buddhism) of an ancient Indian cosmology.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 24th, 2010 at 9:28 PM

Title: Re: Origins of Amitabha

Content:

Astus wrote:

Nice, Master Huifeng, putting together NDE, psychology and philosophy of religion to show that it is all natural that Amitabha Buddha is associated with both infinite light and transference/birth in a buddha-land. At this point we could as well turn to the Vajrayana teachings on the intermediate state which is full of different lights.

On the other hand, this makes the whole "Amitabha Cult" seem less salvational.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 24th, 2010 at 10:20 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist hells: Real places or just mental states?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think it was in northern Hinayana groups where the idea appeared that the hell realms are mental projections on a certain level, thus explaining the existence of the beings torturing those born there. Then such a view was later took up by Mahayana thinkers. Nevertheless, the hells are (also) physical places just like any other realms. IIRC, it is located somewhere under Jambudvipa, but not sure.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 24th, 2010 at 11:06 PM

Title: Re: Huang Po in context

Content:

Astus wrote:

I read a bit of Huangbo again, and the Lok To translation didn't seem to be exactly like the Chinese, then I looked up the Blofeld version, which is again a unique form of rendering. I guess a re-translation according to modern norms, following a better terminology and not playing with capital letters is really in order. Maybe Dale Wright should do us this little favour, he seems to be the best Huangbo expert around.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 24th, 2010 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist hells: Real places or just mental states?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jambudvīpa is this continent where we live, where Shakyamuni appeared. So the hells are under us (physically), similarly to Christian hell.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 24th, 2010 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist hells: Real places or just mental states?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Well, Buddhist cosmology is a bit outdated with a scientific eye. However, we don't have (yet) the means to dig too deep into the earth.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 26th, 2010 at 3:50 PM

Title: Re: Celibacy and Health

Content:

Astus wrote:

This prison metaphor is so much like https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Allegory_of_the_Cave in a modern " https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Prison_Break " format.

I think meditation on the drawbacks of samsara is essential as a basis for the path, and this appears to be usually missing from Western Buddhism.

I like the metaphor of the film. One watches a film because he thinks it is interesting. It could be a love story or a horror, the point is to glue people to the screen. Samsara here is not a grey prison cell but a world full of entertainment. Honey on the blade. And we're told honey is the meaning of life, and a success story is when you can avoid the blade (lived happily ever after). That is the modern myth of love and money we're told again and again. The soap opera of life.

Also, the TV/film metaphor gives the option of both gradual and sudden awakening.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 26th, 2010 at 5:11 PM

Title: Re: Celibacy and Health

Content:

Astus wrote:

Master Huifeng,

Yes, now that sounds better. Such version then fits Zongmi's vision of combining sudden enlightenment with gradual training. It's just that a new TV series should be made of Sudhana's journey, starting with the cell mate Samantabhadra and ending with the guard tower of infinite connections (like when Neo meets the Architect in Matrix Reloaded).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 26th, 2010 at 6:27 PM

Title: Re: Celibacy and Health

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

What you say resembles very much the message of the Ani Sutta (SN 20.7):

"in the course of the future there will be monks who won't listen when discourses that are words of the Tathagata — deep, deep in their meaning, transcendent, connected with emptiness — are being recited. They won't lend ear, won't set their hearts on knowing them, won't regard these teachings as worth grasping or mastering. But they will listen when discourses that are literary works — the works of poets, elegant in sound, elegant in rhetoric, the work of outsiders, words of disciples — are recited."

Similar warning in SN 16.13 (A Counterfeit of the True Dhamma): "It's worthless people who arise right here [within the Sangha] who make the true Dhamma disappear."

What happens? Even monastic curriculum may contain more "explanation for the commentary of the commentary" than reading the sutra itself. And what they do with the sutras? Bow before them and recite the mantra or the title of it. Magical learning. Could be used in universities too, made things easier.

"As long as the monks neither decree what has been undecreed nor repeal what has been decreed, but practice undertaking the training rules as they have been decreed, their growth can be expected, not their decline." (AN 7.21)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 26th, 2010 at 11:30 PM

Title: Re: Celibacy and Health

Content:

Astus wrote:

This little discussion - which I don't mind at all - feels like elderly women chatting about the good old days over the garden fence.

And there are the buddha-nature and dharmadhatu teachings, how everything is already perfect (says so the Dzogchen master).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 27th, 2010 at 12:50 AM

Title: Re: Essentials of Practice and Enlightenment for Beginners

Content:

Astus wrote:
White Lotus,

I don't know if you've realised it's not m0rl0ck's essay but a writing by Hanshan Deqing, one of the most famous Buddhist teachers of Ming China.

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, May 27th, 2010 at 4:39 AM
Title: Re: What does this Dogen passage mean to you?
Content:

Astus wrote:
A way to say the Tendai teaching of "three thousand worlds in a single thought", which is a way to state interdependence and interpenetration. Or to be less biased, a usual East Asian way of expressing dependent origination.

Or perhaps Dogen obtained a microscope from visiting aliens.

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, May 27th, 2010 at 3:37 PM
Title: Re: What does this Dogen passage mean to you?
Content:

Astus wrote:
"I was hoping we could get more at the experiential sense of it"

It is a form of religious writing that Dogen uses, a kind of literature. This is a forum where what we can use are words. So the question is, what is an "experiential sense" style? Is it perhaps expressing the same thing in our own words? Or composing a short poem as they did in China (qv. koan collections)? Maybe come up with a Zen-style reaction? So many options.

Many lines of words
In a world of lies
Few pointless letters
Tell complete stories

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, May 27th, 2010 at 4:14 PM
Title: Re: What does this Dogen passage mean to you?
Content:
Astus wrote:
Master Huifeng,

The quoted paragraph is <http://21dzk.l.u-tokyo.ac.jp/SAT/ddb-sat2.php?mode=detail&mode2=1&num1=2582&num2=&vol=82&page=66>

(didn't copy-paste because it contains special characters) world: 世界

sentient being: 有情

一莖草中二毛有情世界アリ。 - in a single blade of grass there is a world of sentient beings.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 27th, 2010 at 7:16 PM

Title: Re: What does this Dogen passage mean to you?

Content:

Huifeng said:

Huayan = Kegon. Sums it up.

Astus wrote:

Shortest answer so far. Maybe it's a bit cheating... 華嚴是華嚴

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 27th, 2010 at 8:00 PM

Title: Re: What does this Dogen passage mean to you?

Content:

Huseng said:

Gotta use Japanese kanji for "Kegon".

Astus wrote:

Bummer.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 27th, 2010 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: What does this Dogen passage mean to you?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kirt,

The paragraph is from the <http://hcbss.stanford.edu/research/projects/sztp/translations/shobogenzo/translations/sansuikyo/sansuikyo.translation.html> (Sansuikyo, SBGZ 29). If you look into it for yourself you can see Dogen is not at all interested in miniature beings. A bit long but it's worth the time. Also then you can see Dogen's language in the Shobogenzo is not a normal one but what somebody called "koan language" (just searched on it, it's <https://books.google.com/books?id=qFrhlx2vqOgC&pg=PA54&lpg=PA54&dq=dogen+%22koan+language%22&source=bl&ots=jACMLBuQfd&sig=vxC8TN8Pa6tCsX0OAZR9riG ez4U&hl=en&ei=tYr->

S72WJ4Kclgfnk_zmCQ&sa=X&oi=book_result&ct=result&resnum=1&ved=0CBIQ6AEwA
A#v=onepage&q=dogen%20%22koan%20language%22&f=false).

And as Master Huifeng pointed at it succinctly, this kind of interpretation and speaking is not uniquely Dogen but something peculiarly East Asian Buddhist. The Avatamsaka Sutra bred different views in China than in Tibet.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 28th, 2010 at 3:39 PM

Title: Re: What does this Dogen passage mean to you?

Content:

Dexing said:

众生 is living beings and 界 is world, also used together in eye-world, ear-world, etc., aka the "18 Realms/Worlds" 十八界.

Astus wrote:

I think then we better look at what Dogen wrote:

realms: 世界 (world), 法界 (dharma-realm), 一莖草 (a blade of grass), 一杖 (a staff) elements: 水 (water), 雲 (cloud), 風 (wind), 火 (fire), 地 (earth) beings: 有情 (sentient being), 佛 (buddha), 祖 (ancestor)

Not that this would change the meaning already obtained from the translation.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 28th, 2010 at 9:01 PM

Title: Re: your choice of Mahyana & Vajrayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

When I found Buddhism and started learning about it, it seemed to be a clear, logical religion that can bring one to the depths of reality. In the beginning I fancied Zen koans and teachings but liked studying about Theravada and the Pali Canon too. Vajrayana has always been the one I felt the furthest from me, however, after many years I could amass enough curiosity to learn some basics about it. And while until today my primary affiliation is with Chinese Buddhism, I take the Buddhadharma as my refuge, regardless of lineage, school or tradition.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 28th, 2010 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: What does this Dogen passage mean to you?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here are three other translations of the same paragraph:

Carl Bielefeldt said:

It is not the case simply that there is water in the world; within the world of water there is a world. And this is true not only within water: within clouds as well there is world of sentient beings; within wind there is world of sentient beings; within fire there is world of sentient beings; within earth there is world of sentient beings. Within the dharma realm there is a world of sentient beings; within a single blade of grass there is world of sentient beings; within a single staff there is a world of sentient beings. And wherever there is a world of sentient beings, there, inevitably, is the world of buddhas and ancestors. The reason this so, we should study very carefully.

Shasta Abbey said:

Not only is there water in the world, there is a world within the world of water. Not only is it like this in water, there is also a sentient world in clouds, and a sentient world in wind, and a sentient world in fire, and a sentient world in earth, and a sentient world in the realm of thoughts and things, and a sentient world in a blade of grass, and a sentient world in a monk's traveling staff. Wherever there is a sentient world, there is, of necessity, a world of Buddhas and Ancestors in that place. Such a principle should be well explored indeed!

T. Cleary said:

It is not just that there is water in the world; there are worlds in the realm of water. And this is so not only in water - there are also worlds of sentient beings in clouds, there are worlds of sentient beings in wind, there are worlds of sentient beings in fire, there are worlds of sentient beings in earth, there are worlds of sentient beings in phenomena, there are worlds of sentient beings in a single blade of grass, there are worlds of sentient beings in a single staff. Where there are worlds of sentient beings, there must be the world of Buddhas and Zen adepts - you should meditate on this principle very thoroughly.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 28th, 2010 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: What does this Dogen passage mean to you?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Master Huifeng,

Now consider the case when from English it is translated to still another language. That's because English is the primary Western language and the source of Buddhist texts in many countries. But, I don't know of a case when a text is translated from a translation made from English. Nevertheless, this is very much into the realm of language and the mysteries of translating.

By the way, now that you see the Chinese characters, would you add something to your analysis of the text?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 28th, 2010 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: your choice of Mahyana & Vajrayana

Content:

Huseng said:

Yeah I also fancied those weird Zen stories where legs were being broken and skulls were being beaten with canes, but then I learned about Nagarjuna.

Astus wrote:

Oh yes, Nagarjuna breaks your mind.

Huseng said:

One day [...] Ko Bong visited Tong Do Sah Temple. He stood at the gate and shouted, "Somebody come here and cut my hair, please. I want to become a monk." Many monks were angered by his arrogant behavior. They grabbed some sticks and went out to beat him. Ko Bong only said, "You can hit my body but you cannot hit my mind. If you can hit my mind, I will become your disciple." But none of the monks could hit his mind. Another time, outside Nam Ja Sah Temple, he shouted the same kinds of things, and again all of the monks were very angry and wanted to beat him. Ko Bong again asked if anyone could hit his mind. At that time, Zen Master Hae Bong heard this and came to see Ko Bong. He asked, "How many pounds does your mind weigh?" Ko Bong could not answer, so he cut off all his hair and became a monk.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 29th, 2010 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: your choice of Mahyana & Vajrayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

Gaiamori,

Are you sure you have the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Pali_Canon? That's a lot of books.

I'd recommend you Paul Williams' <https://www.amazon.com/Mahayana-Buddhism-Doctrinal-Foundations-Religious/dp/0415356539/> as a good summary, Ven. Sheng-yen's <https://www.amazon.com/Orthodox-Chinese-Buddhism-Contemporary-Questions/dp/1556436572/> as an introduction, Ven. Dharmamitra's translation of Zhiyi's <https://www.amazon.com/Essentials-Buddhist-Meditation-Shramana-Zhiyi/dp/1935413007/> for practice and Hakeda's translation of Asvaghosa's <https://www.amazon.com/Awakening-Faith-Translations-Asian-Classics/dp/0231131577/> for something to contemplate. These four books will give you a solid understanding of East Asian Mahayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 30th, 2010 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: The Buddha Speaking of Huatou Practice?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't see how much this has to do with huatou. The essential aspect what makes a huatou is the great mass of doubt. On the other hand, meditation on the signless element (animittadhatu) is a gateway to liberation that requires contemplation of impermanence. It is one of the three possible ways to escape samsara, this one being described as:

"to the seeing of all formations as limited and circumscribed and to the entering of consciousness into the signless element ... Herein, as limited and circumscribed [means] both as limited by rise and fall and as circumscribed by them; for contemplation of impermanence limits them thus, 'Formations do not exist previous to their rise', and in seeking their destiny, sees them as circumscribed thus, 'They do not go beyond fall, they vanish there'. ... And here the signless liberation should be understood as the noble path that has occurred by making nibbana its object through the signless aspect. For that path is signless owing to the signless element having arisen, and it is a liberation owing to deliverance from defilements." (Vsm 21.67-71)

In Mahayana both signlessness and wishlessness became summed up in the third: emptiness. Not to mention the meaning got changed too.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 30th, 2010 at 12:58 AM

Title: Re: The Life of the Buddha

Content:

Astus wrote:

Is this the same BBC film?

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=8WiswuYO1cE> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 30th, 2010 at 8:39 PM

Title: Re: The Buddha Speaking of Huatou Practice?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huatou practice is not signless. While it means "before thoughts" it is not even the same as Caodong's before thoughts (Dogen: non-thinking). It is not signless for in that case no question and no doubt could be used. It is not mere "resting in the natural state" or "non-abiding". Huatou practice is maintaining the feeling of doubt until a breakthrough is achieved, such a result then is realising signlessness. That's why I said they're not the same.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 30th, 2010 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: What is the relationship of "The Witness" to Enlightenment?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think the "witness experience" is quite common among meditation practitioners. In certain Hindu teachings (advaita vedanta, sankhya, yoga) this is the true self beyond everything else. In Buddhism this should be understood as one of the basic concepts of self (the experiencer; the other one is the doer). The independent witness, well, that is a concept of the atman.

In terms of practice, it is possible to separate objects from the subject. "I'm watching the thoughts." Then should come the turning of attention from thoughts to the watcher. Is there really something/someone watching? No. There is no witness, no self, anatma. Are there thoughts? Yes. Is there a thinker? No.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 30th, 2010 at 9:28 PM

Title: Re: Knowing Buddhism through non-Buddhist sources?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

If one is a scholar who specialises in one part of Buddhism it is of course expected that such a person is familiar with the everything relevant to a higher degree. So if you were a Fazang expert you'd have to be knowledgeable about practically everything Fazang knew and even beyond that to be able to see the bigger socio-historical picture. On the other hand, if I want to learn and use the Huayan teachings, for me it's enough to read some of his works and that's it, even an acceptable translation may suffice, or a teacher who read Fazang.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 31st, 2010 at 7:03 AM

Title: Re: What is the relationship of "The Witness" to Enlightenment?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

I wasn't making a philosophical but a practical observation. Nevertheless, if you think it's appropriate here to bring that up, there it is:

in the ultimate sense all the truths should be understood as void because of the absence of (i) any experiencer, (ii) any doer, (iii) anyone who is extinguished, and (iv) any goer. Hence this is said:

'For there is suffering, but none who suffers;
Doing exists although there is no doer;
Extinction is but no extinguished person;
Although there is a path, there is no goer'.
(Vsm. XVI. 90.)

Also:

That which is an agent
Does not perform an existent action.
Nor does that which is not an agent
Perform some nonexistent action.
(MMK 8.1)

But the next chapter of the MMK deals better with the "Witness" idea, examining the concept of a perceiver behind things perceived.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 31st, 2010 at 9:06 PM

Title: Re: What is the relationship of "The Witness" to Enlightenment?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"There may not be an absolute self, but there is a person or agent that is neither apart from the aggregates nor is any or all of the aggregates."

Through understanding the work of the aggregates it is easy to see why there is no agent but only the causally determined work of the aggregates. The concepts of being, person, agent is from not understanding the aggregates. The dependent functioning of the dharmas is very much like a machine. Agent and action is nothing but a causal situation, like clouds blown by the wind. The wind has no will of its own but also determined by other factors. Mental dharmas are determined by other dharmas. Thus there is no thinker behind mental dharmas. Then, if we care to go on with the analysis - which is a bit superfluous - even dharmas are conceptually made up things.

Determinism is the idea that there is a person being controlled by other factors. Since there is no such thing as a person, how could it be determined by others? Same mistake when someone thinks there is a self disappearing in nirvana.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 1st, 2010 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: What is the relationship of "The Witness" to Enlightenment?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

OK, I think I see the point of misunderstanding. On an illusory level there is a person deciding things, I didn't mean to question that. Same chapter in the MMK (8.12) says, describing how agent and action exists:

"Agent depends upon action.
Action depends on the agent as well.
Apart from dependent arising
One cannot see any cause for their existence."

This conception of a self serves as the doer of a deed, so there is karma and samsara and its source is ignorance. What happens on the level of dharmas, however, is pure causality, or in other words, dependent origination. This is the difference between parikalpita and paratantra. Sounds like determinism from the view of self but not from no-self.

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, June 1st, 2010 at 4:09 PM
Title: Re: The Life of the Buddha
Content:
Astus wrote:
Could check it from work where I also have a US proxy, it is the same film.

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, June 1st, 2010 at 5:50 PM
Title: Re: What is the relationship of "The Witness" to Enlightenment?
Content:
Astus wrote:
Regarding the Chan view I'd like to mention that the "witness" is a passive, detached, dualistic position (sounds like that to me), while the nature of mind is void and active besides being aware.

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, June 1st, 2010 at 8:09 PM
Title: Re: What is the relationship of "The Witness" to Enlightenment?
Content:
Astus wrote:
It depends on what You mean by "witness". As for me, it is as I said.

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, June 1st, 2010 at 10:15 PM
Title: Re: What is the relationship of "The Witness" to Enlightenment?
Content:
Astus wrote:

The idea of a "witness" is not Chan, if anything at all, a mistake of Chan. As Foyan Qingyuan said,

People nowadays mostly take the immediate mirroring awareness to be the ultimate principle. This is why Xuansha said to people, "Tell me, does it still exist in remote uninhabited places deep in the mountains?" (Instant Zen, p. 107)

I should have put a hyphen or a comma there to make it clearer.

And to answer your question: it is both something I tried to use as a practice and also something I have an opinion about.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 2nd, 2010 at 2:01 AM

Title: Re: A new low in religious scholarship

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't see that much problem here. Just compare it to a Kalachakra initiation:

"The three exalted initiations are as follows: the vase initiation is the gnosis of bliss and emptiness that arises from the disciple touching the consort's breasts. The secret initiation is the gnosis of bliss and emptiness that arises from the disciple savouring the bodhichitta (sperm), the wisdom-gnosis initiation is the experience of connate joy that arises from the disciple and consort themselves engaging in union."
(<http://www.dalailama.com/teachings/kalachakra-initiations>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 2nd, 2010 at 4:53 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm all in for rebirth. But actually it is not necessarily true that without an afterlife there is no morality. It is called (secular) humanism. Socialism and communism are further improvements of materialist philosophy working on the welfare of the society.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 2nd, 2010 at 8:52 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

What stops people from understanding that there is rebirth is that they believe there is only this body made of the four elements and don't look at their mind. When it becomes clear that mind is non-material it comes logically from causality that it doesn't die with the body but takes another birth.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 2nd, 2010 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

m0rl0ck,

Buddhism makes no sense without rebirth as far as its soteriology goes. Without samsara to be free from there is no point in working on liberation. Actually, if there is only this body without a mind bound to be born again and again enlightenment is a religious superstition and nothing more, delusion of the mentally unstable. If there were no rebirth I'd vote for some Nietzschean or Sartrean philosophy for Buddhism - and every other religion - then is just for those without a firm grasp on reality.

It is true that in Buddhism mind is not without a body in this realm (in the formless realm it is). It is like the relationship between meaning and words. The meaning can be expressed with different words, different metaphors, or in different languages, or in a music, a painting, a statue. Is meaning then the same as the word? No. Is it separate? No. A meaning to be communicated depends on a form. So does the mind depend on the body. However, without mind there is no living being, just as there is no word without a meaning (that's the difference between a group of letters and a word).

At the time of the Buddha there were other teachers who had different positions on rebirth:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ajita_Kesakambali said that with death everything is over, no rebirth at all. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sanjaya_Belatthaputta took the position of the agnostic. And https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Purana_Kassapa simply denied the existence of morality and the consequences of one's deeds.

These are not the Buddha's teaching, who taught rebirth and the consequences of one's own deeds that affect one personally. It was because of Shakyamuni's training for many aeons that he attained buddhahood and not something that just happened.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 2nd, 2010 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

Communism was never the state form anywhere on this planet. Communism means a country without money, social classes and government, where people share everything with each other. It is mainly like heaven on earth, a utopia. Should not be confused with dictatorships using only the name.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 3rd, 2010 at 3:19 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

catmoon,

It depends on what view one takes. From a materialist view there can be no rebirth. From a Christian view there is no need for rebirth. From a Buddhist view there is rebirth. So the first member of the noble eightfold path is correct view.

Proving something depends on view because that defines what one takes as proof. From a Buddhist view there is rebirth based on the nature of the world which is made of both material (body) and immaterial (mind) and it's all governed by causality. So from a Buddhist view there is dependent origination but no creator god, while many other views take the existence of a creator granted.

Since Buddhism is not that easy to understand it is all right if someone has doubts about different parts of the teaching. It has to be worked on and that way it is possible to comprehend the relevance of what the Buddha said in different sutras. But to neglect study is to stop progressing on the path. To deny the importance of obtaining a correct view is to abandon the path.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 3rd, 2010 at 4:06 PM

Title: Re: Buddhaguptanatha and the Late Survival of the Siddha Traditi

Content:

Astus wrote:

Amazing!

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 3rd, 2010 at 4:52 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Heart Sutra is hardly a good reference for different Buddhist teachings. It's like saying that the Mani Mantra says nothing about the seven factors of enlightenment. The Lankavatara Sutra, on the other hand, is all about there being only mind and no external things. So it is not just that there is an immaterial mind but actually there is nothing like a physical body.

For this basic teaching of nama-rupa better look at some introductory material, like the book "What Buddhists Believe?". See here the relevant part:

<http://www.buddhanet.net/budsas/ebud/whatbudbeliev/73.htm>

For further study of the subject there are the abhidharma teachings. Here's some intro starting with discussing nama and rupa a bit: <http://www.vipassana.info/nina-abhi-01.htm#chapter1>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 3rd, 2010 at 5:23 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

m0rl0ck,

Let me add here a quote from Jinul whom you're probably familiar with:

"The physical body is the temporary collation of four elements; soil, water, fire and wind. The essence is rigid and insensible. How can each of them in themselves possibly see, hear, feel, or be conscious?" (Golden Teaching of the Mind Cultivation, ch. 4)

Also:

"You should know that what is capable of seeing, hearing, moving, and acting has to be your original mind; it is not your physical body. Furthermore, the four elements which make up the physical body are by nature void; they are like images in a mirror or the moon's reflection in water. How can they be clear and constantly aware, always bright and never obscured— and, upon activation, be able to put into operation sublime functions as numerous as the sands of the Ganges?" (Secrets on Cultivating the Mind, ch. 6)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 4th, 2010 at 4:21 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

m0rl0ck said:

Emptiness is pretty much the core of the mahayana. Where you been dude?

Astus wrote:

Emptiness is dependent origination. Dependent origination also affirms rebirth. Chapter 17 of the Mulamadhyamakakarika is specifically about deeds (karma) and fruits (phala) to show how individual rebirth exists and consequences are experienced by the one who caused it.

Also, the Heart Sutra talks about the five skandhas, the eighteen dhatus, the twelve links of dependent origination and the four noble truths. The five skandhas are divided up to nama and rupa, also the fourth link is nama and rupa. The 18 dhatus lists both objects of consciousness and consciousness separately, where the first five consciousnesses (eye-touch) have the four great elements as their objects but the sixth has dharmas, which are not made of the elements.

Nevertheless, you made no reply about what I referred to you as clear teachings on the existence of mind not being the same as body.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 4th, 2010 at 3:34 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

It seems a fundamental part of the basic teachings of Buddhism is missing, ie. about the skandhas, dhatus and dharmas. So here are some introductory materials:

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Skandha>

<http://viewonbuddhism.org/mind.html>

http://www.berzinarchives.com/web/en/archives/sutra/level4_deepening_understanding_path/types_phenomena/5_factors_12_stimulators_18_sources.html

http://www.berzinarchives.com/web/en/archives/sutra/level4_deepening_understanding_path/types_phenomena/aggregate_forms_physical_phenomena.html

http://www.berzinarchives.com/web/en/archives/sutra/level1_getting_started/general_introductions/basic_question_karma_rebirth.html

http://www.berzinarchives.com/web/en/archives/audio/fundamentals_tibetan_buddhism/level_graded_path_material/intermediate_scope/overview_12_links_dependent_arising/transcript_3.html

http://www.berzinarchives.com/web/x/nav/group.html_50360014.html

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 5th, 2010 at 4:12 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

That's why it happens that in the west Theravada and Vajrayana can produce religious Buddhists while Zen in most of the cases is a weekend therapy session.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 5th, 2010 at 5:10 PM

Title: Re: Origins of Amitabha

Content:

Astus wrote:

But was there any similar description of the antarabhava as in Vajrayana? I've never seen it so far.

It makes the transference to the Pure Land less salvational because it turns the experience and the teaching into a neural phenomenon if it is originated from NDE.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 5th, 2010 at 6:00 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Could be. But from the East Asian section it is thanks for the Japanese that Buddhism came west. Even Seung Sahn and Shengyan was told by the Japanese to go to America. It is a double-edged sword, so to say. It is interesting to note that Shengyan was in contact with the Harada lineage in Japan where <http://sweepingzen.com/2009/12/22/ban-tetsugyu-bio/> told him to go to America.

What could balance the situation is a movement of Dharma teachers who lecture on texts already available in English. While there are dozens of Lotus Sutra and Diamond Sutra translations a good commentary is hard to find. Only Xuanhua produced explanations for those texts but those are more for a Chinese audience than westerners. Or is it just me who find them too long, too boring and superficial?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 5th, 2010 at 6:42 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Master Huifeng,

Yes, I'm sure it is the oral nature that makes the difference. I guess bringing up stories at the time of a speech is a good thing but in writing not necessarily.

By the way, I'm not good in translating things. I may be able to use Chinese texts but very slowly (simply because I've never really studied it systematically neither do I practice). And the main reason is I'm not fond of translating. Plus, I only do it to Hungarian and not English (but rather from it).

Huseng,

I'm fine with traditional commentaries, useful stuff, even those parts that seem unnecessary.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 5th, 2010 at 6:49 PM

Title: Re: A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

Astus wrote:

I have a vision of "Western Buddhism" where the three now separate groups (Theravada, EA Mahayana, Tibetan Vajrayana) merge into one single system and then eventually new schools appear from that amalgamation. For instance a Vipassana group doing Hevajra sadhanas and the teacher lecturing on a koan.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 6th, 2010 at 10:35 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

m0rl0ck,

Those who say that Christians (or from any other religion outside Buddhism) can authentically practice Zen are teaching a therapy, a mental fitness training and not Buddhadharma. And Sanbo Kyodan (the majority of western Zen teachers belong to it) is like that, while Kwan Um Zen is close to it because they accept the idea but they don't have Christian Zen teachers as far as I know. And there are others who believe Zen is something universal rather than something specifically Buddhist.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 7th, 2010 at 2:17 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

m0rl0ck,

Sr. Elaine MacInnes, a Catholic nun and Dharma-heir of Yamada Koun, says the same about the goal of Zen as you do (see: Teaching Zen to Christians, p. 71-80). Robert Kennedy, Jesuit monk and Dharma-heir of Bernie Glassman, confirms the same ideal: "Zen practice helps us to realize our true nature and to liberate our mind from concepts and images." (Zen Spirit, Chirstian Spirit, p. 28).

I didn't mean it is a self-help therapy develop a better personality - although it is a good thing too. But such stripped Zen contains the idea that this true nature to be realised is available without correct view. It is a misunderstanding of the Zen definition that it is outside of teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 7th, 2010 at 5:34 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kirt,

Yes, Daido Looi is an exceptional Zen teacher not just within Sanbo Kyodan but the whole west. But, sadly, he's the exception. Others like Glassman, Merzel or Aitken are not like that. This has relevance to the present discussion as it shows how people can believe there is Buddhism without rebirth.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 7th, 2010 at 5:45 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Shel,

Buddhism, including all the Buddhist traditions, is a path, a system of teachings meant to be used for attaining liberation from suffering. To make a statement requires taking a viewpoint. From the Buddhist point it is of course a universal teaching. From a materialist point Buddhism is a superstition. From a Nietzschean point it is nihilism. And depending on whom you ask, from a Christian point it can be anything between idolatry to ignorant people with good intention.

It is easy to make the mistake of taking an "outsider point", a third party which belongs to none. Objective observation. This is what doesn't exist. It doesn't exist in a sense of independent view, although it exists as a dependent view itself. Of course, this is again a view among other views.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 8th, 2010 at 6:07 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Why would it be superstitious from a materialist point of view? Are you saying that the NEP is not experiential?"

Karma, rebirth, realms, ghosts, gods, transference of merit, protective spells, magical abilities - what about these?

"From a Nietzschean point of view any belief system is exactly NOT nihilism. Nihilism is a loss of meaning. Obviously Buddhism is meaningful to many people."

"Both [Christianity and Buddhism] are to be reckoned among the nihilistic religions—they are both décadence religions—but they are separated from each other in a very remarkable way." (The Antichrist, §20)

"Christian views of Buddhism have a much fuller spectrum than you suggest."

Yes, there are some who associate themselves with Zen, I've even mentioned two of them in a post here not long ago. I better correct myself to refer to mainstream Christian churches' (Catholic, Calvinist, Lutheran, Baptist, etc.) official statements. Then we can see while there are certain monks of the Roman Catholic Church who sympathise with Buddhism, the Vatican has never did so.

"I don't see how this part is relevant."

I was only referring to making Buddhism a universal teaching. Universal to whom?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 8th, 2010 at 3:55 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

shel,

Just because something is experienced doesn't make it either scientific or objective. In the morning I dreamt of a big storm and there was a Tibetan monk who could transform himself. Should we then state there are such monks? There are people, quite a lot, who claim they saw Jesus, Virgin Mary, angels or God himself. Isn't that experience?

Nihilism in Nietzsche's philosophy has its own meaning(s), should not be confused with other views. But it was just an example.

Buddhism is not true for everyone otherwise it'd be the only religion in the world. Thing is, even in Buddhist countries the majority of the followers know little about the Dharma and don't really care (see http://www.thaibuddhism.net/path2_1.htm as an example).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 8th, 2010 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: Speech by Nepalese on his "conversion" to Shin Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is fascinating to see how someone who spent many years as a Himalayan monk finds the Primal Vow to be the way to enlightenment. Although I've heard somewhere before that the Japanese have great interest in Tibet.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 9th, 2010 at 3:10 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

catmoon,

There are many things about Nietzsche and his philosophy to think about, even in relationship to Buddhism. I am not his follower, since I follow the Buddha, but among the many European philosophers he is a really special one in my understanding. Also it should be noted that he lived in the 19th century and didn't have much knowledge about Buddhism. More passages from The Antichrist:

"The things necessary to Buddhism are a very mild climate, customs of great gentleness and liberality, and no militarism; moreover, it must get its start among the higher and better educated classes. Cheerfulness, quiet and the absence of desire are the chief desiderata, and they are attained. Buddhism is not a religion in which perfection is merely an object of aspiration: perfection is actually normal. ... Buddhism is a religion for peoples in a further state of development, for races that have become kind, gentle and over-spiritualized (—Europe is not yet ripe for it—): it is a summons that takes them back to peace and cheerfulness, to a careful rationing of the spirit, to a certain hardening of the body. ... Buddhism is a religion for the closing, over-wearied stages of civilization."

Actually, as we can see, these came true. Buddhism spread in Europe and America in a post-modern age of peace and prosperity among the educated people.

Nietzsche's nihilism, as far as I know (which is really not much), is losing to see the values of this life and instead looking for it somewhere else. That's why Christianity eventually made people nihilist after they lost their faith in God, for there's nothing left to believe in, nothing left to live for. Bringing Buddhism into this situation it is understandable that people like the idea of finding the meaning of life "in this present moment" - which is not much a Buddhist idea actually. The down to earth style Zen is what could inspire many, and this is where my criticism lies. That's why it is important to highlight that Zen is part of Buddhism, of a complex religion, full of "supernatural" and "other-worldly" things like rebirth and fox spirits. Steven Heine wrote two books about the presence of magic and mythology in Zen koans: Shifting Shape, Shaping Text and Opening a Mountain.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 9th, 2010 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

shel,

There is Buddhism, within Buddhism there is Mahayana, within Mahayana there is East Asian Mahayana, within East Asian Mahayana there is Zen, within Zen there are four main regions, within each of those regions there are major schools, within those schools there are sects, within each sect there are lineages and teachers. Thus we go through eight levels to reach a living representative of all of that. Such a person is only within this system. Perhaps a fifth region could be added to count in Western Zen but that would be a bit problematical to see it within East Asian Mahayana. Also, there is no substantial monastic community to serve the basis of any Western Buddhism, perhaps Theravada is the closest to that.

Zen is definitely not effective for everyone. It is one of the myriad expedients. The reason I set up the above categorisation of Zen is because I wanted to show how on one hand Zen is not at all outside of Buddhism, and on the other to point to the fact that even Zen is just a larger category for many different styles and methods.

Then the important task is to define the essentials that make a teaching Buddhism, Mahayana and Zen. Rebirth is an essential part of Buddhism, thus every teaching that claims to be Buddhist must have it. To say that there is Zen without rebirth is to say that there is Zen without Buddhism. Not possible. Therefore those who claim to teach Zen but are not followers of Shakyamuni Buddha are fake. In Zen terms: they didn't receive the transmission, they're not in the family of the ancestors. Without a mind-to-mind transmission how could they have anything to do with Zen? They may have a paper about transmission but that is as good as a painted cake.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 9th, 2010 at 3:54 AM

Title: Re: A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'd like to bring some attention to the teaching that only stream-entrants and bodhisattvas at least on the stages of faith are without doubts about the Buddhadharma. And while such people form the Sangha we all take refuge in, the actual community of Buddhists (the eightfold sangha) at any given place has those still aspiring for eliminating their doubts. However, instead of overcoming those doubts to take up a wrong view and be satisfied with it is simply giving up progressing on the path. Which on one hand we can look at as a good karma that he made contact with the Dharma, on the other hand a bad karma that he made only so far. So it is both a joyful and a sad thing. Because it is sad, it is a wrong idea to treat such a person badly. Because it is joyful, it is a good idea to point out that there is more, even better things to find.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 9th, 2010 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

shel,

There are people who never hear about Zen. There are people who meet Zen but don't care about it. There are people who try to do some Zen and shortly after quit. There are people who do Zen for years, even decades, then quit. And there are those who practice Zen throughout their lives but never realise enlightenment. Zen is not for any of them in a sense that it brought no liberation - even a little liberation - into their lives. And there are others who not just cannot use Zen for good but use it for bad things.

Accepting the essential Buddhist teachings is important, this is called faith, this is called taking refuge. Rebirth is not experiential in an objective, scientific sense, it is not evident for everyone; but it can be confirmed first hand through meditation.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 9th, 2010 at 7:06 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

shel,

I talked about liberation, enlightenment. There are innumerable benefits one can reap even from hearing the word "buddha". It's just that Zen is about sudden enlightenment, seeing the nature. If one cannot see the nature it's only aspiring to reach Zen but not actually obtaining it. The true nature is dependent origination. Confirming dependent origination is perceiving the mechanism of birth and death.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 9th, 2010 at 2:59 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

shel,

Your question was whether Zen is universal or not. I said it is not as far as its effectiveness in liberation goes. It may still be good for helping people in other ways. Let me explain it in a different way.

The bodhisattva path can be divided up to three stages. Before awakening bodhicitta one accumulates merit which results in the optimal circumstances for bringing about the rise of aspiration for enlightenment. After that one works on both merit and wisdom to familiarise with the Dharma and eventually realise emptiness. Then one can practice the prajnaparamita and all the merits will be innumerable. Before being able to use prajnaparamita all the merits and wisdom are worldly things, after that they're causes of buddhahood.

When talking about the sudden path of Zen it is at least about realising emptiness and working with prajnaparamita, at best it is becoming buddha. It is not concerned with anything below that for that would be the gradual approach. That's why I emphasised enlightenment as the criterion for being able to profit from Zen. Also that is the reason it seems as if in Zen people wouldn't need the common Mahayana methods - this is the source of confusion.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 9th, 2010 at 11:30 PM

Title: Re: Repeating the name of Lotus sutra ?

Content:

Perceive Universal Sound said:

AT: In the Heart Sutra it says that the prajna paramita mantra (mantra of transcendental wisdom) is the great mantra. Would you explain this?

ZMSS: Yes. They call it "the transcendental mantra, the great bright mantra, the utmost mantra" and so forth. This means that if one simply tries this mantra, gate gate paragate parasamgate bodhi svaha, with one's whole energy, then it will be the greatest mantra. Actually, of course, any mantra which you try in this way will be "the greatest mantra" for you! That particular mantra is not special, not different from any other. But all sutras which refer to any kind of mantra will say that it is special.

AT: Which means it is special if one believes that it is.

ZMSS: Correct. A student once asked me, "if this is true then even the words 'Coca Cola' can be a mantra?" Yes, if you really believe that "Coca Cola" is the greatest mantra and practice it diligently, it will work for you.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 10th, 2010 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

shel,

I talked about attaining Enlightenment in this life, in this body. Not other benefits nor future benefits. Plus I think that Zen is not at all the best in working for other and future benefits.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 10th, 2010 at 3:11 AM

Title: Re: The Masters' "Words" and the "Right Speech"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Cleary's translation (Buddhist Yoga - A Comprehensive Course, p. 7-8) of the Xuanzang translation (T676, 解深密經) of the Samdhinirmocana Sutra, in chapter 2, says:

"If people are not ignorant, and have seen the holy truths, and have attained the wisdom of sages, and know the true nature of all things beyond words as it really is, when they see or hear of the created and the uncreated they think that there really is no such thing as the created or the uncreated, but there are active forms created by discrimination, which are like magical effects deceiving the intellect into producing notions of created and uncreated, or notions of difference between created and uncreated. They do not cling to what they have seen or heard, or claim it is the only truth. In order to convey this point, they too make verbal explanations. They do not need to examine further.

"In this way, in the midst of these things, sages detach from names and words by knowledge and insight, and therefore realize enlightenment. Then, because they want to make others aware of this real nature which is beyond words, they provisionally set up names and characteristics and call things created or uncreated."

Then, to restate this point, Unlocking the Implicit Intent of the Profound Doctrine said in verse:

Buddha explains the meaning of nonduality beyond words;
It is most profound, beyond the scope of the ignorant.
The ignorant, confused by delusion about this,
Cling to duality and make false descriptions;
They are either unsettled or fixed in error
And revolve forever in the pains of birth and death.
Still repudiating discourse on true knowledge like this,
They will be reborn as goats and sheep.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 10th, 2010 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

shel,

It is specifically Zen, the school of sudden enlightenment, I said and not other teachings or schools.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 10th, 2010 at 6:03 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

shel,

The NEP goes for the entire Buddhadharma. Zen is just one segment, an approach, a style among many as I've already written <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=10905#p10905>. Is there anything particularly that you find incomprehensible about what I've already said in this topic?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 10th, 2010 at 2:47 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

shel,

Even the NEP is not for everyone as far as not all can attain liberation with it in one life. Also it is good to note that the NEP as it is is not often used as a teaching in Mahayana, instead there are the paramitas, although "in spirit" the NEP is there too. But I brought up Zen specifically because it emphasises sudden enlightenment, awakening in this body. Buddhism and Zen not usable for everybody only means that they don't have the good karma for that. There's also a difference between Buddhism and Zen, which is that even if one is fine with Buddhism it may not be that such a person is OK with Zen but can use Theravada, or Vajrayana, or Tendai, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 10th, 2010 at 8:10 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

Certainly, enlightenment in this life may not be so important for many. Still, and not to contradict you but to show what I call the Zen POV, here are two quotes.

Linji said,

"As I see it, there's no Buddha, no living beings, no long ago, no now. If you want to get it, you've already got it - it's not something that requires time. There's no religious practice, no enlightenment, no getting anything, no missing out on anything. At no time is there any other Dharma than this. If anyone claims there is a Dharma superior to this, I say it must be a dream, a phantom. All I have to say to you is simply this."

(tr. B. Watson, p. 33)

Mazu said,

"If you understand the mind and the phenomenal appearance, deluded thought will not originate. If deluded thought does not originate, this is the acceptance of the nonproduction of dharmas. [It] originally existed and exists at present. It does not depend on the cultivation of the Way and seated meditation. Neither cultivation nor seated meditation - this is the pure Chan (dhyana) of Tathagata. If you now understand this reality, you will truly not create any karma. Following your destiny, passing your life, with one cloak or one robe, wherever sitting or standing, it is always with you. Observing the precepts (sila), you accumulate pure karma. If you can be like this, why are you concerned about not understanding?"

(tr. Jinhua Jia, p. 125)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 10th, 2010 at 11:38 PM

Title: Re: A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

Astus wrote:

http://www.shambhalasun.com/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=3025&Itemid=244

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 11th, 2010 at 12:20 AM

Title: Re: Repeating the name of Lotus sutra ?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Aemilius,

The above is Seung Sahn's view of mantras which I partially agree with, but you don't have to.

I say partially because while it is true that "power words" are made by imagination, imagination is governed by many factors. So there is a difference between repeating Coca-Cola, repeating a title of a sutra, and repeating a mantra that you received special teachings and empowerments for. The difference is in that you know Coca-Cola is nothing even related to Buddhism, while a secret mantra is very special so you have lot of faith in it. But, and this is what Seung Sahn says, if you can have the same faith in Coca-Cola it works the same way as the mantra.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 11th, 2010 at 2:47 PM

Title: Re: A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

Astus wrote:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Basic_Points_Unifying_the_Therav%C4%81da_and_the_Mah%C4%81y%C4%81na

Author: Astus
Date: Saturday, June 12th, 2010 at 12:44 AM
Title: Re: A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"
Content:
Huseng said:
You ever actually sit down and read Dogen?

Astus wrote:
Don't you know the popular Zen book's title: "Sit Down and Shut Up" - not "Sit Down and Think" or "Sit Down and Read" or "Sit Down and Study". Just shut up and sit Properly. And this kind of utilitarian/practical attitude makes belief unnecessary, thus people can think whatever they want, until they can sit in the Correct Zazen Posture it is Zen, it is Buddhahood.

Author: Astus
Date: Saturday, June 12th, 2010 at 3:32 AM
Title: Re: A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"
Content:
Astus wrote:
Huseng,

I think that there are already so many books in English to study, starting with the Pali Canon through Madhyamaka and Yogacara, up to Zen and Vajrayana, that if one cares to study them, a thorough understanding of Buddhism is available without learning a second language. Plus translations are coming in a better quality and higher speed. So I don't find language barrier a valid excuse.

At the same time, it is unrealistic to expect the majority of Buddhists and to be Buddhists to go deep into complicated teachings. But those who want to be Dharma teachers should definitely do that. Then those Dharma teachers can come up with a teaching acceptable to a larger audience. This is something already in progress, western teachers educating western students. But education is not so highly valued in Buddhism as in other parts of western society. Silent retreats, empowerments and koan interviews sell a lot better than a Sunday school on the Awakening of Mahayana Faith.

Author: Astus
Date: Saturday, June 12th, 2010 at 3:39 AM
Title: Re: A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"
Content:
Astus wrote:
Yogicfire,

When I first read that by Rev. Shohaku Okumura I was pretty much amazed how can one be a Dharma teacher and in the Zen tradition without being clear about elementary teachings like rebirth and dependent origination. If that is not comprehended how could one ever think of understanding such a highly sophisticated text as the Shobogenzo?

Perhaps I should reconsider my views about the Dharma Ending Age.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 12th, 2010 at 4:14 AM

Title: Re: A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Lazy_eye,

That is a good and timely question. I don't think we should reinvent the wheel. The Buddha taught a gradual path and at that time rebirth was not accepted by everyone in India. Here's a little intro to his <http://www.accesstinsight.org/ptf/dhamma/index.html>. So it has (1) generosity, (2) virtue, (3) heaven, (4) drawbacks, (5) renunciation and (6) the four noble truths. In the Tibetan traditions this approach manifests as the <http://www.kagyu.org/kagyulineage/buddhism/dha/dha00.php>: (1) precious human birth, (2) death and impermanence, (3) causality and karma, (4) drawbacks of samsara; after this may come the four noble truths and awakening the bodhicitta.

I say that the above methods are very well usable today too. But to answer your question specifically, I say it is best to learn vipassana meditation. Because through that one can learn to actually observe the meaning of the above teachings, and of course a lot more. By seeing for himself that the Buddha's teaching is true it is easy to accept even so called supernatural things too.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 15th, 2010 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: What Makes A Real Man?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Actually that post by Ven. Dhammika is a really interesting recension of John Powers' book "A Bull of a Man". Go and read it!

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 22nd, 2010 at 4:16 PM

Title: Re: Sun

Content:

Astus wrote:

Anyone can cover the Sun with just one finger. Is it a miracle? No. Science has its own cosmology which is not the same as Buddhist cosmology. Yogis can snatch away the Sun and turn around the Moon. Scientists can explain to you the Solar wind and build rockets to land on the Moon.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 23rd, 2010 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: Sun

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm saying that there are different views. The question, in my view, is not their truth but their effect, their function.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 23rd, 2010 at 11:10 PM

Title: Re: Precepts and Shinran

Content:

Huseng said:

There are plenty of living examples of bhiksu and bhiksuni who are celibate and mentally stable.

Medical literature can say one thing, but the masses of healthy and perky monks and nuns in the Buddhist world prove that people can be celibate and live fine.

Astus wrote:

And celibacy is nothing new in the Western countries either.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 25th, 2010 at 1:37 AM

Title: Re: Sun

Content:

Astus wrote:

Actually, this kind of doubting normally accepted events is a good example of how even apparently real things are questioned by some. And then people can start arguing about it. But where does that lead to? Nowhere, besides some bad feelings. Believing in the moon landing or not has no effect on one's progress to enlightenment, nor on being a better person. But indulging in rows and generating an angry mind certainly has a negative effect.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 25th, 2010 at 4:42 PM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

I've been reading some Bardo Thodol texts lately and it has a Padmasambhava treasure text about introducing the true nature of mind. It is quite positive about stating that such a realisation is the highest, all inclusive method, so no need for anything else. But that's just something I wanted to mention.

The other thing is that it was brought up how the nature of mind is introduced even before the development stage beings. In the Vairocanabhisambodhi Sutra (in Tibetan tradition: a text of the outer carya tantras) in the first chapter the nature of mind is introduced and then all the mantra-mandala-ritual stuff begins from chapter two. So if Mahamudra/Atiyoga is a special practice on its own right, I guess it can be practised without other practices.

The Buddha said, “Lord of Mysteries, it is in one’s own mind that one seeks bodhi and omniscience. Why? Because its original nature is pure. The mind is neither within nor without, nor can the mind be apprehended between the two. Lord of Mysteries, the Tathāgata, worthy [of worship] and perfectly and fully awakened, is neither blue nor yellow nor red nor white nor crimson nor the color of crystal, neither long nor short nor round nor square, neither bright nor dark, and neither male nor female nor neuter. Lord of Mysteries, the mind is not of the same nature as the realm of desire, nor is it of the same nature as the realm of form, nor is it of the same nature as the realm of non-form, nor is it of the same nature as the destinies of gods, nāgas, yakṣas, gandharvas, asuras, garuḍas, kiṃnaras, mahoragas, humans, or non-humans. Lord of Mysteries, the mind does not reside in the realm of the eyes, nor does it reside in the realms of the ears, nose, tongue, body, or mind, and neither is it visible, nor does it manifest itself.

“Why? [Because] the mind, which has the characteristic of empty space, is free from all differentiation and nondifferentiation. Why is that? That whose nature is the same as empty space is identical to the mind, and that whose nature is the same as the mind is identical to bodhi. In this manner, Lord of Mysteries, the three entities of mind, the realm of empty space, and bodhi are without duality. They have compassion as their root and are fulfilled by the pāramitā of expedient means. For this reason, Lord of Mysteries, I teach the dharmas in this manner so as to make the multitudes of bodhisattvas purify the bodhi-mind and know their mind.

“Lord of Mysteries, if a man of [good] family or a woman of [good] family wishes to know bodhi, they should know their own mind in this manner. Lord of Mysteries, how is one to know one’s own mind? It cannot, namely, be apprehended by seeking it in distinctions, or colors, or shapes, or external objects; or in form or sensation, ideation, volition, or consciousness; or in ‘I’ or ‘mine’; or in the grasper (i.e., subject) or the grasped (i.e., object); or in the pure; or in the [eighteen] elements [of existence] or [the twelve] sense fields; or in any other distinctions.

(Vairocanabhisambodhi Sutra, ch. 1, tr. RW Giebel)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 25th, 2010 at 7:22 PM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thanks Magnus, you're very informative.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 28th, 2010 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: Being a Buddhist in a Christian society

Content:

Astus wrote:

I live in a European country which naturally has a Christian majority and strong historical ties with the Christian religion. (Our anthem's very first word is "God".) But so far nobody cared whether I'm a Christian, a Jew or a Buddhist - mainly because people around me are mostly not religious at all. Even if I lived in a small village where people are naturally more traditional in case I wouldn't go to the church on Sundays it wouldn't really be a social downfall although there might be exceptions.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 30th, 2010 at 9:37 PM

Title: Re: Celibacy and Health

Content:

Astus wrote:

Aemilius,

I'm no historian, but afaik such Victorian morals were created in the 19th century and not before. There is a considerable difference between common people having the idea that sex is sinful and renunciates, who willingly joined a monastic order, not getting involved in sensual passions. Also, I haven't heard of Freud et al analysing monks and nuns. Celibacy is a problem if you don't want to refrain from sex, also the feeling of guilt exists only when one does something he considers sinful. The monastic life was actually quite popular in Europe, also in Buddhist countries. And they were a group of intellectual and religious elite. I don't see how their health could have been affected.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 1st, 2010 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: Dedication to truth

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is a wonder that no one has mentioned prajnaparamita yet. Also truth could be understood as satya, thus we have catvari arya satyani (4NT) and satyadvaya (two truths). But I'd say, unlike in the European tradition, Buddhism works with the personal, rather than the objective aspect, so wisdom instead of truth. ("And ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free.", "I am the way, the truth, and the life")

The Buddhist concept of truth is not an objective, independent thing or knowledge but something to be realised and has relevance only as far as its realisation happens. On the other hand, the truth in the European view is something outside of us, therefore knowable by all and doesn't require any inner achievement. Or, from a Christian perspective, truth is by grace and something people has to believe in.

Another perspective is truth as correct view. It is the beginning of the path in Buddhism to obtain a correct understanding of the teaching and then eventually realise it. In the European tradition truth is something one attains in the end and completes one's journey (holy grail, scientific truth). Also note that Socrates was a philosopher and not a sage.

A similar phenomenon in Buddhism like the European understanding of truth is the teaching of buddha-nature. Because the full knowledge of buddha-nature is buddhahood, also everyone has it and can realise it. But again, buddha-nature is a personal thing and not an independent one.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 1st, 2010 at 7:32 PM

Title: Re: Do you really think rebirth is realistic?

Content:

Astus wrote:

As I've said before on this subject, until people don't realise that there is a mind besides the flesh and blood body it is impossible to comprehend rebirth. While people may go to meditate in different groups it seems to take little effect on actually changing their worldview which would more important than achieving a blissful absorption for a few minutes. Personally I've no doubts about the existence of rebirth.

Here's a little quote:

From the Tsung Ching Record of Hui Hai:

A monk asked, 'since all the myriad phenomena (dharma)s are nonexistent, the nature of mind should also be nonexistent. just as a bubble having burst can never re-form, so can a person once dead never be reborn, for nothing remains of that person. Where will the nature of that person's mind be then?'

M 'Bubbles are composed of water. When a bubble bursts, does the water composing it cease to be? Our bodies proceed from our real nature. When we die, why should you say that our nature is no more?'

A: 'If you maintain there is such a nature, bring it forth and show it to me!'

M: 'Do you believe there will be a morrow?'

A: 'Yes, certainly.'

M: 'Bring it forth and show it to me!'

A: 'There will surely be a morrow, but not just now.' M: 'Yes, but its not being just now does not mean that there will be no morrow. You personally do not perceive your own nature, but this does not mean that your nature does not exist. just now, there is before you that which wears a robe, takes food and walks, stands, sits, or reclines, but you do not recognize it (for what it is). You may well be called a stupid and deluded person. If you discriminate between today and tomorrow that is like using your own nature to search for your own nature; you will not perceive it even after myriads of aeons. Yours is a case of not seeing the sun, not of there being no sun.'

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 1st, 2010 at 7:47 PM

Title: Re: Collected talks of various Chinese Buddhist Masters

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://www.yogichen.org/index.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 1st, 2010 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: Lioncity forum

Content:

Astus wrote:

I find it a bit disrespectful to view E-Sangha as a financial asset, an investment. As Anders said, those few ads on the page hardly covered the cost of maintenance. Leo's vision of E-S was really an honest and beautiful one and it could grow big because of his efforts.

Moderation was criticised there by some, mostly those who cared more about the frame than the content. No doubt, I think there were occasionally some justifiable complaints about threads being closed/deleted. But as a long time member there (since 1 Apr 2004) I've found moderation was going OK. And as a moderator there for years (in the General and East Asian areas) I've found that 90% of the job was removing spam and relocating threads opened at a wrong place. The other 10% was people complaining about other people how what others say to them is not OK.

Some may have not realised it but there were many knowledgeable people who stayed because it was a fairly organised place conducive to peaceful discussions. And if there were some - because there were - who didn't want to play by the rules, they were regularly moderated then. Banning was quite rare, and even that was not for ever in some cases.

Anyway, it's better not to get lost in memories and look forward, working on making Dharma Wheel a lively place with enjoyable threads.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 2nd, 2010 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: Do you really think rebirth is realistic?

Content:

Astus wrote:

While I have no religious background (family&environment) I've been interested in religions since I was 10 and belief in things beyond came naturally. Science and the physicalist view never really touched me although I was certainly influenced through education and culture. Belief in rebirth came to me before I've met Buddhism, so accepting that was no problem.

Another interesting quote from Dazhu Huihai:

有韞光大德問。禪師自知生處否。師曰。未曾死。何用論生。知生即是無生法。無離生法說有無生。祖師云。當生即不生。(X63n1224_p0025b13-15)

Yunguang Dade asked, "Does the Chan master know where he will be born, or not?" The teacher said, "I'm not dead yet. Why discuss birth? Know that birth is in fact the dharma of no birth. Without departing from the birth dharma we state there is no birth. An ancestor teacher said, "Undergoing birth is no birth.""

Ultimately, it's all just words.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 2nd, 2010 at 5:17 PM

Title: Re: Do you really think rebirth is realistic?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

Science is about analysing what the five senses may perceive (theoretically). If anyone called karma, God, miracles or psychic powers scientific, well, that's a misuse of the term, just like people calling things Zen which are definitely not. The problem is to think that science is the only form of truth and take unscientific as a synonym for false (positivism).

BTW, if they just agreed that Maitreya bodhisattva inspired Asanga to write it they would have relinquished all attempts to inquire further. Then it wouldn't be science, not even philosophy but religious/superficial acceptance.

Buddhism has its own way of validating things, even has a system for epistemology and yogic analysis. This is something that is a privilege of certain individuals, just like science. If Buddhism wants to be accepted in this secular world it has to prove itself useful for the people in the right position (celebrities, politicians, scientists, etc.). But if that is only meditation, well, it is not connected enough with Buddhism to create a real boom in believers. Dainin Katagiri says in his book (Returning to Silence) that Zen has to become a religion in the eyes of Westerners for temporary fads like therapeutic, stress relief meditation just come and go.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 5th, 2010 at 3:24 AM

Title: Re: Seeing All Beings as Buddhas.

Content:

Astus wrote:

catmoon,

I can tell you before Master Huifeng appears that throughout the history of Chan there were different interpretations of what buddha-nature stands for. These views and debates were very much interwoven with the general situation in Chinese Buddhism and should not be taken as a strictly and exclusively Chan thing. In Chinese Buddhism from early on the teaching of buddha-nature was taken granted and except for Xuanzang's short-lived attempt to reform that it was accepted in every school. However, that doesn't mean they understood the buddha-nature in the same way, see for instance the debate on whether insentient things are included within buddha-nature or not. Thus I think we can talk about interpretations from "nominal buddha-nature" (as a different expression of emptiness) up to "original enlightenment" (everyone is de facto enlightened). For example, Dogen's problem (Why practice if I'm a buddha?) comes from the original enlightenment view he inherited from the Japanese Tendai school.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 5th, 2010 at 5:52 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think you can find a bit more info on the Tibetan Vinaya than the Chinese.

The Tibetan Vinaya: Guide to Buddhist Conduct by Thrangu Rinpoche

Buddhist Monastic Discipline: the Sanskrit Prātimokṣa Sūtras of the Mahāsāṃghikas and Mūlasarvāstivādins by Charles S. Prebish

The Sound of Two Hands Clapping: The Education of a Tibetan Buddhist Monk by Georges B. J. Dreyfus

A Clear Differentiation of the Three Codes by Sakya Pandita

Also FPMT has extra sources for those wishing to ordain with them:

<http://www.fpmt.org/IMI/firstletter.asp>

May be of interest:

A Survey of Vinaya Literature by Charles S. Prebish

A brief survey of the Vinaya: Its origin, transmission, and arrangement from the Tibetan point of view with comparisons to the Theravada and Dharmagupta traditions by Bhiksuni Jampa Tsedroen

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 6th, 2010 at 5:51 AM

Title: Re: Do you really think rebirth is realistic?

Content:

shel said:

It's not clear what you mean when you say that there is a mind "besides" the body. Are you saying that mind and body are not interdependent?

Astus wrote:

There are the five sensory perceptions based on the five kinds of physical phenomena. Thus it can be said that the eye-, etc. consciousnesses are dependent on forms, etc. But I can also imagine a form, etc. Isn't that eye-, etc. consciousness?

Nama (mind) and rupa (body) dharmas are interrelated in many cases but not always. From arupa-dhyanas to phowa practices we can see in this life for ourselves how there can be mind without body. And a body without mind, well, that is a corpse.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 8th, 2010 at 7:53 PM

Title: Re: Lillian Too's Mahashri Sutra Atrocities

Content:

Astus wrote:

Besides this legal argument about copyright how can the money be any problem? This Mahashri Sutra says, "If anyone should recite this three times, they will be victorious over all disharmonious circumstances. They will become endowed with excellent fortune. They will become endowed with not knowing the exhaustion of wealth." So I guess the translator must have gained a lot more than that. Never exhausting wealth, that could certainly compensate for this trouble with a "stolen" translation.

So, since I'd happily donate millions of dollars to thousands of monasteries, translator groups and charity services, I repeat the mantra three times, just as the Buddha said in the Mahashri Sutra.

SYADYATHEDANA JINIGRINI SARVA ARTHA SADHANI SHASHINA ALAGA SHIMANA
NASHAYA SIDDHANATU MANTRA PADEY SVAHA / OM BIGUNI BARAMASU BHAGE
SVAHA

SYADYATHEDANA JINIGRINI SARVA ARTHA SADHANI SHASHINA ALAGA SHIMANA
NASHAYA SIDDHANATU MANTRA PADEY SVAHA / OM BIGUNI BARAMASU BHAGE
SVAHA

SYADYATHEDANA JINIGRINI SARVA ARTHA SADHANI SHASHINA ALAGA SHIMANA
NASHAYA SIDDHANATU MANTRA PADEY SVAHA / OM BIGUNI BARAMASU BHAGE
SVAHA

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 9th, 2010 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: Inherently immoral actions.

Content:

Astus wrote:

This looks like a kind of return to Hinayana thinking about inherent qualities, which may be fitting for the Vinaya nevertheless, or not. In Theravada there are 12 akusala cittas and 14 akusala cetasikas, although those are mental things and not acts, but dharmas that are definitely wrong. For as it has always been with karma, only intentional acts count, so unintentional killing and stealing cannot be akusala. And from this it is not that difficult to conceive compassion as a driving intention behind any act which brings us to a new bodhisattva ethics. As a further (and final in terms of Indian Buddhism) development there is the Tantric ethics which can include even murder among its practices. And as a criticism of inherently wrong actions the Jains can be mentioned who try to avoid killing all forms of lives taking the act itself as sinful.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 9th, 2010 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: Lillian Too's Mahashri Sutra Atrocities

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dear Eric,

I wish you know further disturbing events and may you have peace in mind and be a prosperous translator for the benefit of us all.

My take on translations and publication of Dharma texts is the following. People working with a translation, including correctors, editors, sellers, etc. put their time and energy into it, therefore if it is viewed as work there should be a due wage. But I doubt that there are many who learn dead languages and an alien religion to produce translations that will never make it even to the top thousand list of best sellers, consequently there is not much money in it. It seems to me that those who make translations are either monks or scholars or they do it as non-professionals, like a hobby. Still, if I want to get a book I don't expect it to be for free. On the other hand I don't expect it to be https://www.amazon.com/Aryadevas-Lamp-Integrates-Practices-Caryamelapakapradipa/dp/0975373455/ref=sr_1_2?ie=UTF8&s=books&qid=1278624174&sr=1-2, https://www.amazon.com/Flower-Ornament-Scripture-Translation-Avatamsaka/dp/0877739404/ref=sr_1_1?ie=UTF8&s=books&qid=1278624241&sr=1-1, <http://search.barnesandnoble.com/An-English-Translation-of-Fa-Tsang's-Commentary-on-the-Awakening-of-Faith/Dirck-Vorenkamp/e/9780773463738/?itm=1> or even more USD.

Lewis Lancaster in his speech on <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=cX2f6QHkU-I> said the reason why he gives his works available online and why others should follow (because they're already paid by the university and through that the state).

Personally, I don't think there are many who could even make a living by translating Buddhist texts. Then why not make it also available freely online? And if people copy it, all the better. While I understand the concern of big companies losing money because people do copy their products copying sutras is actually something advised by the sutras themselves as a meritorious act. And the sutras said that before people came up with the idea of copyright. Everybody has the right to copy the words of the Buddha! And it is not just a right but a practice, even a duty.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 9th, 2010 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: Inherently immoral actions.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Reading Huseng's response to my objections and Master Huifeng's added comments I have to ask: then what's so new about what Daoxuan says? Inherent evil is not that inherent any more, distinction of inherent and hidden is something that has always been there. So, what can we learn here?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 14th, 2010 at 4:45 AM

Title: Re: The Lotus Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Maybe I'm missing the correct sources and commentaries (Zhiyi's writings?) but the Lotus Sutra has always been a big question to me. I mean, what is actually so wonderful about it? The text is overloaded with metaphors explaining the same ideas again and again. It is devoid of theoretical and practical explanations and even those few topics it touches are not really the difficult ones or anything unique to this sutra. My knowledge is superficial so I'd love to here people enlightening this subject for me.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 14th, 2010 at 5:15 AM

Title: Re: Are you able to look through traditions?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think in the following way: the Buddha's teaching can be categorised in three parts: ethics, meditation, insight. Things like dances, rituals, songs, ornaments, etc. fall under the category of ethics. Some of them can be considered bad behaviour and some good behaviour, partially dependent upon precepts and mostly on social norms. This way there is virtually no need to think in terms of culture but rather the Dharma.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 14th, 2010 at 6:55 PM

Title: Re: The Lotus Sutra

Content:

Will said:

Astus,

About half of the commentary of Triptaka Master Hsuan Hua on the Lotus is online, maybe perusing it will give you more appreciation of the Lotus Sutra. In book form all of the commentary is available.

http://cttbusa.org/dfs/dfs_contents.asp " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Astus wrote:

I'm sorry but I haven't met any commentary by Ven. Hsuan Hua that was meaningful to me. Nevertheless, I've just read his commentary for chapter 6 to make sure the situation is the same and it is.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 14th, 2010 at 9:49 PM

Title: Re: Wives of Siddhartha Gautama II

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't think this monogamous Buddha concept is because of Christian background as we get that story from Theravada. Also, what do you mean by "ethnic buddhists" in this context?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 15th, 2010 at 1:56 AM

Title: Re: The Lotus Sutra

Content:

Will said:

Here is an old commentary by Tao Sheng, which I have not read, but I just may do so.

Astus wrote:

Thanks, I have the book next to my copy of the Lotus Sutra. I also have a shortish commentary by a Tendai nun and I've looked into Nikkyo Niwano's guide too. Still, while I understand its popularity as it's full of big colourful scenes, the "deeper meaning" eludes me.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 15th, 2010 at 3:57 PM

Title: Re: Taego Lineage Seminary

Content:

Astus wrote:

Master Huifeng,

Ordination happens in Korea.

Unknown said:

Several times a year a new group of graduates travel to South Korea for a temple training program and full Taego ordination with their Korean counterparts. People are now taking the course from the comfort of their homes in countries throughout Europe and North America. Ordained 'Western' Taego monks travel regularly to stay and train with their brother and sister Taego monks in Korea. They are warmly welcomed as family and as 'the official representatives of the Taego order outside of Korea.'

http://www.taegozen.net/About_the_Taego_Order_21YW.html

Astus wrote:

But the Taego Order ordains only with the bodhisattva precepts and not the pratimoksa, so it's much like Japanese schools, except that they call them "married monks" to show the difference between "celibate monks" of the Jogye Order who take the full monastic precepts.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 15th, 2010 at 4:23 PM

Title: Re: Taego Lineage Seminary

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think this online seminary they provide covers the basics a Western Buddhist should be familiar with. I don't know their level of student support and the options there are for consultation as these where the only extras as the subjects are very much the basics.

Compare it to the official basic training required for ordination in the Jogye Order (Haeinsa Temple Sangha College's curriculum for the 2009 (BE 2553) year, <http://www.fjdh.com/wumin/HTML/82325.html>):

1st Year: The Buddhist Person I, the Buddhist Person II, Vinaya, Hinayana Buddhism, Abhidharma, History of Indian Buddhism, Understanding Western Philosophy II, Literature I, Literature II, English, Japanese

2nd Year: Understanding the Prajnaparamita Sutra (Diamond Sutra, Heart Sutra, Vimalkirtinirdesa Sutra, 8000 Poems of the Prajnaparamita Sutra, Understanding Avatamska Sutra, Introduction to the Avatamska school, History of Chinese Buddhism, Understanding Western Philosophy II, Literature III, Literature IV

3rd Year: "Awakening faith in the Mahayana," Shurangama Sutra, Lotus Sutra, Nirvana Sutra, History of Korean Buddhism, Buddhism Overview I, Buddhism Overview II, Literature V, Buddhist Culture, Buddhist Ceremony

4th Year: Seon Texts (Platform Sutra, Entrance to Sudden Enlightenment, Selected Letters of Master Dahui, Essence of Seon), History of Seon ideology, Buddhism Overview I, Buddhism Overview II, Graduation Thesis

By removing some subjects non-Buddhist subjects it could be a fine training for Westerners interested in Zen as most of the texts used are available in English. It is just a matter of teachers.

An interesting data from BuddhaPia: "As of February 2002, there are thirteen seminaries for bhiksus and five for bhiksunis in which about 350 bhiksus and 631 bhiksunis study, respectively." More

http://eng.buddhapia.com/_Service/_ContentView/ETC_CONTENT_2.ASP?pk=0001388149&sub_pk=&clss_cd=0002204375&top_menu_cd=0000000287

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 15th, 2010 at 5:06 PM

Title: Re: The Lotus Sutra

Content:

Will said:

What would you consider a "deeper meaning"? What existing meaning do you glean from the sutra so far?

What did you think of Tao Sheng's commentary?

Astus wrote:

By deeper meaning I meant for instance an explanation of its scenes if they give any extra information besides the obvious meaning of "the Buddha compassionately teaches according to faculties", "in the end everyone becomes a buddha" and "Buddha's life is immeasurable".

Daosheng's commentary is interesting on its own but it's very short and doesn't write much about most of the chapters.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 15th, 2010 at 11:21 PM

Title: Re: The Lotus Sutra

Content:

Aemilius said:

The deeper meaning is that it has magical properties. You have to approach it differently. Make a wish, perhaps write it on a paper, with a date, and then bow to the Scripture every morning (or every evening if that suits better) and offer flowers to the Sutra when you feel like it. You can also copy the sutra, or a chapter from it, with your own hand, and so on...

Astus wrote:

Look into the final chapter of the Vimalakirti Sutra.

Vimalakirti Sutra said:

This King Ratnacchattra honored the Tathagata Bhaisajjaraja and his retinue with many excellent offerings during five short aeons. At the end of this time, the King Ratnacchattra said to his sons, 'Recognizing that during my reign I have worshiped the Tathagata, in your turn you also should worship him.'

"The thousand princes gave their consent, obeying their father the king, and all together, during another five short aeons, they honored the Tathagata Bhaisajjaraja with all sorts of excellent offerings.

"Among them, there was a prince by the name of Candracchattrā, who retired into solitude and thought to himself, 'Is there not another mode of worship, even better and more noble than this?'

"Then, by the supernatural power of the Buddha Bhaisajjaraja, the gods spoke to him from the heavens: 'Good man, the supreme worship is the Dharma-worship.'

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 16th, 2010 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: Taego Lineage Seminary

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jikan,

They really pay for your trip to Korea? Their seminary costs $1200 for 2 years, so it is not free at all. But if they pay for my trip just to become a Taego priest I'm in. I've always preferred their red kasa (袈裟) instead of Jogye's brown. Do you have some contacts?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 16th, 2010 at 5:32 AM

Title: Re: Taego Lineage Seminary

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jikan, thanks anyway. I guess they'd require some dedication to their teaching which I'm not particularly familiar with (if there's any specifically Taego style). But if they give me a trip to Korea and then give their name so that I start a Buddhist mission in their name. I wouldn't mind doing that.

Kirtu, it is an online seminary so I don't have to by a train ticket, not to mention travelling for 3 hours (which I don't call a short ride) in this hot summer doesn't sound good to me. And I don't really see what new that seminary could teach me.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 16th, 2010 at 3:26 PM

Title: Re: Taego Lineage Seminary

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

While the situation in Japan may be bad, lay teachers (priests?) are not necessarily a bad thing. In Eastern Orthodox churches it is OK for priests to be married but not the bishops. If Japanese priests are lazy in the spirit it isn't the fault of the system, and I think there are some who are active in teaching Dharma. This Taego system looks good for creating Western teachers who then can gather followers.

Kirtu,

Well, credentials are OK, even better if you get some extra support like a Dharma centre with shiny statues and paintings.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 16th, 2010 at 5:05 PM

Title: Re: Wives of Siddhartha Gautama II

Content:

Astus wrote:

Asian Buddhists aiming to destroy Western Buddhism? Are you serious? And all this based on how many wives Siddhartha had?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 16th, 2010 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: Taego Lineage Seminary

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jikan,

I don't know how much this seminary is at the start but I've known about it for years now.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 19th, 2010 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: Taego Lineage Seminary

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't see online seminars, or even university courses as a problem. Besides a monastic education other, common forms of tuition are mastered by the student alone and the presence of teachers are only for convenience's sake. Living as a monk is a change of life form, similar to joining the army or other specific groups who create their own society within a society. But if it is about learning, online materials are as good as books and lectures.

The quality of teachers are not guaranteed by attending a seminary or a university. Moral integrity is not assured by a teacher-student relationship. This culture likes certificates, diplomas and qualifications. Papers to measure one's competence in a field of knowledge. But as we know, test results reflect only a temporary knowledge of answers.

Religious certificates are not beyond this paradigm of competence. Jorn Borup's "Japanese Rinzai Zen Buddhism - Myoshinji, a living religion" gives a good look of an elaborate church hierarchy codified in a "big book of rules". Just to give an example, to become a "second grade teacher" (held by 44.9% of priests) requires: 1) have graduated from the Buddhist studies department at Hanazono University and spent two years in the sōdō, or 2) hold a Ph.D. degree (from any university) and have spent two years in the sōdō, or 3) have graduated from high school and spent seven years in the sōdō, or 4) have graduated from junior high school and spent ten years in the sōdō etc.

We may think that hierarchy is really a "holy order" but that's pretty naive. If it is knowledge and practice that counts, an online course can be as good as attending a seminary. There isn't much control over who can become a school teacher even though they are responsible for educating future generations - not to mention the total lack of criteria for becoming a parent. A Buddhist teacher in the West deals with grown ups most of the time who are supposed to be capable of making their own choices and they have to decide what kind of teacher they want to listen to. Of course, such view of adult men and women are just as idealistic as that of the enlightened masters.

This online seminary gives the basics of Buddhism and looks kosher. I think it produces more people who actively spread the Dharma and that is already wonderful.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 19th, 2010 at 8:01 PM

Title: Re: Taego Lineage Seminary

Content:

Unknown said:

to what extent have you lived in a monastery?

Astus wrote:

None, as you know. And I've excluded monastic training from what I said because its of a different nature.

Unknown said:

That's just typical pedantic ways of thinking in Japan where seniority and certificates neatly configure the hierarchy.

Astus wrote:

You know the Vinaya rule about hierarchy in the monastic community, it's based on seniority and moral integrity.

Unknown said:

If someone told me they had a MA Degree in Vajrayana from an online tantra course I'd assume they'd been had by a scam.

Astus wrote:

Hm, so you don't believe in the internet but it's OK if somebody had the teachings (or terma) from Vajrapani/Manjusri/Avalokita/etc.?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 20th, 2010 at 3:05 AM

Title: Re: Taego Lineage Seminary

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

I've raised no question about the validity or importance of monastic training. Being a renunciate is different from being a lay person in certain aspects that's why I made no comparison between them. The Taego Order provides a way for interested people to learn some Dharma and be certified by that organisation as a teacher. Suppose the Nalanda University is finished and one gets a certificate from there it will be another kind of authentication by another organisation. Most probably a Nalanda degree will be more prestigious than one from IBS-Austria.

Still, I think that online education should not be looked down. It has its purpose and function. Definitely it is not a monastic training, not even a retreat. But if the materials taught are well organised it can be pretty high class which results in educated teachers.

First there was the oral tradition, then came writing and printing, now we have the internet. Gradually the spreading of information became easier and easier. This results in open source and zero control. Quite similar to freedom of religion. Everyone has the legal right to start a Buddhist church and do it in whatever way they like it. No king, no emperor to control it. There are already so many Buddhist organisations from very old to very new. We may take any side, join any group. The so called Chan Sect was a marginal group of different people that could eventually rise to prominence through lot of scheming and political connections so that today we say Chan is traditional and orthodox. A virtual academy today, a world religion tomorrow.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 21st, 2010 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: The Lotus Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Aemilius,

Ven. Shengyan did the same.

Getting the Buddha Mind said:

The first half year of my retreat, I emphasized repentance prostration to undo my heavy karma. First I prostrated through the Lotus Sutra; later, the Avatamsaka Sutra. After reading a character, I would recite a mantra and then prostrate. The mantras were "Na mo fa-hua hui-shang fo p'u-'sa" for the Lotus Sutra, ("Homage to the Buddhas and Bodhisattvas of the Lotus Assembly") and "Na mo hua-yen hai-hui fo p'u-sa" for the Avatamsaka Sutra. ("Homage to the Buddhas and Bodhisattvas of the ocean of wisdom of the Avatamsaka Sutra.") This I did through the whole sutra.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 21st, 2010 at 6:02 AM

Title: Re: Silk in Vajrayana, and the bodhisattva practice.

Content:

heart said:

So please offer synthetic katas, dress in synthetic cloths and eat food that cause as little misery to other sentient beings as possible. Tell others why you do it but keep your mind free from judgment.

Astus wrote:

Synthetic textiles are usually made of polyester which is made of PET. So if we say that silk is not OK because worms died for it, what about environmental impact? Just to show how hard - practically impossible - to remove the disadvantages without producing other side effects. But if we keep thinking like this we eventually realise that through breathing we kill tiny animals and then end up like the Jains.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 21st, 2010 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: Taego Lineage Seminary

Content:

Astus wrote:

Aemilius,

Nobody forced monks to get married. They did it themselves. There are still some in Japan who are not married and keep at least the bodhisattva precepts as in the Brahmajala Sutra.

And about discussing another's failure to maintain the precepts, the 5th minor bodhisattva precept says:

5. On Not Teaching Repentance

If a disciple of the Buddha should see any being violate the Five Precepts, the Eight Precepts, the Ten Precepts, other prohibitions, or commit any of the Seven Cardinal Sins or any offense which leads to the Eight Adversities -- any violations of the precepts whatever -- he should counsel the offender to repent and reform.

Hence, if a Bodhisattva does not do so and furthermore continues to live together in the assembly with the offender, share in the offerings of the laity, participate in the same Uposatha ceremony and recite the precepts -- while failing to bring up that person's offense, enjoining him to repent -- the disciple commits a secondary offense.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 2nd, 2010 at 7:38 PM

Title: Re: Pure lands....why?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are many buddha-lands around but I guess this is about Sukhavati as it is the most popular. So why go to there instead of, well, what? If you are enlightened on the level of a non-regressing bodhisattva and above it is of course not an issue where you are going to be born. Otherwise this life can be the last in the next 100 asankhyeya kalpas that you spend above the three lower realms. And this is just one reason. Another is to ponder for a bit on the fact that you've spent uncountable lives in samsara already and couldn't get free.

The Pure Land teachings don't deny the validity of other teachings. What they say is that while other methods are difficult this is easy. Other teachings need people of high abilities while the Pure Land path works for everyone. The Pure Land teaching is a skilful means of the compassionate buddhas because there is nobody excluded while other ways usually are for monks. Also with the Pure Land method one is assured of perfect enlightenment while on other paths it is easy to go astray. In Sukhavati it is easy to practice, one has buddhas and bodhisattvas as his teacher and there is no suffering at all. Compare that to this place where it is hard to find a teacher and almost impossible to tell who is enlightened and who is not.

These are some of the reasons that so many aspire for birth in the Pure Land of Amita Buddha in many Mahayana schools from Tibet to Japan.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 3rd, 2010 at 2:08 AM

Title: Re: Pure lands....why?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Ron,

Consider the followings:

1. After birth in Sukhavati enlightenment is 100% sure.
2. Birth there depends only on buddha-remembrance, with that as a condition birth is assured.
3. This human world is full of distractions and false teachings, in Sukhavati there's none of that.
4. In this world it is very difficult to find even a good teacher, in Sukhavati there is a living buddha and access to innumerable others.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 3rd, 2010 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: Pure lands....why?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Ron,

I haven't studied what Tibetan teachers say of the Pure Land path but I did some learning on the East Asian part where this is a central form of practice and masters throughout more than a thousand years have engaged in interpreting the relevant sutras and treatises. What I told you about it reflects the Pure Land School's teaching of East Asia and all can be backed up by the appropriate sutras and commentaries. But if you doubt the words of the Buddha it's your own business.

"Again, Shariputra, all sentient beings born in the Land of Utmost Bliss dwell in the Stage of Non-retrogression. Many of them are in the Stage of Becoming a Buddha after One More Life. Their number is so great that it is beyond reckoning; it can only be described as innumerable, unlimited and incalculable.

"Shariputra, those sentient beings who hear of that land should aspire to be born there. Why? Because they will be able to meet such sages of supreme virtue. Shariputra, one cannot attain birth in that land with few roots of goodness or a small stock of merit. Shariputra, if a good man or woman who hears of Amida Buddha holds fast to his Name even for one day, two days, three, four, five, six or seven days with a concentrated and undistracted mind, then, at the hour of death, Amida Buddha will appear before them with a host of holy ones. Consequently, when their life comes to an end, the aspirants' minds will not fall into confusion and so they will be born immediately in the Land of Utmost Bliss of Amida Buddha. Shariputra, perceiving these benefits, I say: All sentient beings who hear this teaching should aspire to birth in that land."

(<http://www12.canvas.ne.jp/horai/amida-sutra.htm>

"You say that the Stage of Non-retrogression is extremely difficult to enter, requiring a long period of practice, and ask me if there is a path of easy practice whereby you can attain this stage quickly. These are words of a cowardly and contemptible man, and not those of a brave man with a strong aspiration. If, however, you insist on hearing from me about this method of practice, I will explain it to you.

There are innumerable modes of entry into the Buddha's teaching. Just as there are in the world difficult and easy paths - travelling on foot by land is full of hardship and travelling in a boat by sea is pleasant - so it is among the paths of the bodhisattvas. Some exert themselves diligently, while others quickly enter Non-retrogression by the easy practice based on faith." (<http://www12.canvas.ne.jp/horai/igyohon.htm>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 3rd, 2010 at 5:28 PM

Title: Re: Pure lands....why?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Ron,

Yes, that sutra says one day, the Larger Amita Sutra says 10 times reciting the name is enough, and the Contemplation Sutra says that even if one has committed the five grave sins but recites only 10 times that person will be born in Sukhavati.

Your question is about the reason for choosing the Pure Land path above all. The reasons for that are what I've given already. Here are some quotes for you from two important masters.

http://www.jodo.org/about_hs/ho_life.html, founder of the Japanese Pure Land School wrote,

"Reciting the nembutsu does not come from studying and understanding its meaning. There is no other reason or cause by which we can utterly believe in attaining birth in the Pure Land than the nembutsu itself. Reciting the nembutsu and believing in birth in the Pure Land naturally gives rise to the three minds (sanjin) and the four modes of practice (shishu). If I am withholding any deeper knowledge beyond simple recitation of the nembutsu, then may I lose sight of the compassion of Shakyamuni and Amida Buddha and slip through the embrace of Amida's original vow. Even if those who believe in the nembutsu study the teaching which Shakyamuni taught his whole life, they should not put on any airs and should sincerely practice the nembutsu, just as an illiterate fool, a nun or one who is ignorant of Buddhism."

(<http://www.jodo.org/teachings/teachings02.html>)

<http://www.answers.com/topic/yin-kuang>, considered to be the 13th Chinese patriarch of the Pure Land School wrote,

"Rebirth in the Western Land thus requires, first of all, deep Faith and fervent Vows. Without these conditions, even if you were to cultivate, you could not obtain a response from Amitabha Buddha. You would merely reap the blessings of the human and celestial realms and sow the seeds of liberation in the future. Anyone who fulfills the conditions of Faith and Vows is assured of rebirth in the Pure Land. When Elder Master Yung Ming stated that "out of ten thousand who cultivate Pure Land, ten thousand will achieve rebirth," he was referring to those with full Faith and Vows." (Pure Land Zen, p. 37)

"It does not matter that you have not read the sutras widely. Without fully understanding Pure Land teachings, even if you deeply understand the entire Buddhist canon and have awakened completely to Self-Mind, it will take you untold eons to fulfill your original Vow to escape the cycle of Birth and Death. Buddha Recitation is the panacea for all diseases." (Pure Land Zen, p. 43)

"You should know that even the Dharma Body Bodhisattvas [i.e., the higher level Bodhisattvas] must rely on the power of the Buddhas – not to mention ordinary beings such as ourselves, who are full of karmic obstructions. Who are we to keep weighing the pros and cons of our own strength, while failing to seek the Buddhas' help? Our words may be lofty, but upon reflection, the accompanying actions are low and wanting! The difference between other-power and self-power is as great as the heavens and the abyss!" (Pure Land Zen, p. 61)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 4th, 2010 at 2:09 AM

Title: Re: Pure lands....why?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't see how it is possible to investigate something when there's already a prejudice against it. The attractiveness of the Pure Land path has always been in its easiness compared to other methods. Notable teachers in China, like Huiyuan (6th c.) and Shandao (7th c.), argued that even a prthagjana can attain birth in the Pure Land. It is understandable that Westerners confuse this long standing and orthodox Buddhist tradition with theism, but actually it tells more about their cultural background rather than the understanding of this teaching. No wonder that while it is the most popular in East Asia those of the Western cultures show little interest in it.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 4th, 2010 at 3:17 AM

Title: Bankei vs Hakuin

Content:

Astus wrote:

To this day all of Rinzai Zen is an heir of Hakuin's understanding of the path to liberation, while the Zen of Bankei has ended with the master's death who left no descendants. In the West the image of Zen is substantially formed by Hakuin's teachings thanks to DT Suzuki, the Sanbo Kyodan teachers, and others. Even in the Kwan Um School of Zen, nominally a Korean lineage, they use a koan curriculum.

The teachings of Bankei and Hakuin look very much the opposite of each other. Bankei focused only on the Unborn Buddha Mind and regarded everything else secondary, including precepts and meditation. Hakuin set up a rigorous training program with many levels that requires extreme discipline and endurance. According to Bankei it is quite easy to realise the true nature and apply it to everyday life. Hakuin set up high standards where students are pushed deeper and deeper into investigating the stories of former masters. Bankei talks in an open way about the buddha-mind and its use while Hakuin practically avoids spelling it out and he uses "koan language".

While both Zen teachers experienced hardships in strenuous zazen they came up with contradictory solutions. In brief, for Bankei it is about remaining buddha, for Hakuin it is about becoming buddha again and again.

What do you think:

Is Bankei's "Fushou Zen" (不生禪 - Unborn Zen) too easy to be true?

Is Hakuin's "Koan Zen" too systematic to be called Zen?

Which one would you call traditional?

What could be the reason for Bankei's demise and Hakuin's success in terms of their teachings' spread?

Can these be viewed as complementary forms of Zen?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 5th, 2010 at 3:20 PM

Title: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I hear in arguments for the superiority of Dzogchen that it includes the possibility of attaining the rainbow body. Frankly, besides that it sounds cool, I don't see the point of it at all. It might be a great miracle to see someone's body vaporise with colourful lights, but beyond that what? Realisation of the 3/4 bodies are inherent in awareness so it is not the case that buddhahood is at stake. Then why the fuss?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 5th, 2010 at 6:43 PM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kalden,

As Heart said, it's something else I've raised here as a question.

Narraboth,

You say with a rainbow body it's easier to help many beings. But if one dies the flesh and bones are left behind and there is not limit for emanation bodies whether one has a human body here or not. That's why I ask what extra rainbow body has.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 6th, 2010 at 3:47 AM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Maybe I've missed something here in Narraboth's answer but I still don't see the use of dissolving the physical body into rainbow lights besides its obvious miraculous nature that can inspire faith. Also, if we go into the land of wonders, bodhisattvas are capable of all kinds of magic transforming themselves into virtually anything, including buddhas. And that ability is available to a large number of gods, demons and yogis too. So, again, what is so special about the rainbow body that it can be an argument for the superiority of dzogchen?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 6th, 2010 at 5:01 PM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kirtu,

Thanks, liked your reply.

"The realized dzogchen practitioner, no longer deluded by apparent substantiality or dualisms such as mind and matter, releases the energy of the elements that compose the physical body at the time of death."

To me from this it would follow that all who are enlightened, realised emptiness, attains a rainbow body. Thus either nobody else is enlightened or the manifestation of rainbow body depends on something else. Maybe tögal practice creates this habit to in the end dissolve the body - just guessing.

Pema Rigdzin,

"tögal which explain how wisdom and the 5 elements have yet to be totally liberated in clear light before the fruition of that level of practice"

If it is necessary to dissolve the physical body (except hair and nails, for whatever reason) to attain maximum buddhahood it looks like to me that then being bound by the body can be overcome only through the elimination of the body (arupaloka is a strange thing then to mention).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 6th, 2010 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Pema Rigdzin,

Oh, so the rainbow body at death and in life are different. Or is it the case that jalu phowa chenpo is a name for the 4th vision's result?

Found this (Longchen Nyingthig of the Ancient Ones Tradition by Ven. Khenpo Namdrol Rinpoche):

"There are two kinds of rainbow body: the general rainbow body, where the body dissolves completely into light, and the 'Rainbow Body of the Great Transference', Jalu Phowa Chenpo, where the ordinary body is transformed into a rainbow-like body and the individual lives for centuries for as long as they can benefit beings, appearing to them from time to time. Such was the case with both Vimalamitra and Guru Rinpoche."

So it is a change of body then from physical to light in order that they can stay here longer. An interesting note here is for instance what we find in the Mahaparinibbana Sutta that the Buddha could have stayed for more than a kalpa if asked so. Again, this phenomenon that one could stay as a quasi-immortal by changing the nature of the body is a bit strange to me for the reasons that a buddha has no limit of emanation bodies and transforming a body to something else sounds pointless then. I'm just trying to make some sense of its importance...

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 8th, 2010 at 3:36 AM

Title: Re: Movie - Zen - The Life of Dogen Zenji

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is a great film, I recommend it to everyone.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 9th, 2010 at 6:12 PM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dear Kalden,

I've been reading through this discussion and while the double meaning of rainbow body was pointed to by Pema Rigdzin the reason behind the importance of attaining jalu phowa chenpo was not clarified to me. Like, one can tell the difference between the attributes and abilities of an arhat and a buddha according to different traditions, or the different results of practices like the four immeasurables and breath awareness.

So, it is an option that one just admits not knowing the answer which has been stated here a few times worded as "we're small, this is difficult". But I assume those who care to argue against other methods know a lot more than that about rainbow body and how actually it is an unsurpassed attainment.

I'm not a Dzogchen follower, it is simply my interest in Dzogchen teachings that made me bring up this question here. Also, I think, it is good to know what actually is meant by the different schools when they claim to have the best of the best method, for sure I want to know the best method too.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 10th, 2010 at 4:49 PM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Narraboth,

"If you don't think rainbow body is better, it doesn't matter; but you can't deny it's a special thing which other methods can't do, can you?"

If it is about dissolving the body into rainbow light, well, I suppose it is covered by the magical techniques yogis, spirits and gods have. If it is realising the emptiness of the form aggregate that is found in the fundamental teachings. But as it is a combination of the two certainly it is a unique Dzogchen thing.

"Now you are saying it's special, but what's the good of it? What kind of answer do you expect from people who are obviously not rainbow bodies? At best we can only tell you things from tantra, from commentaries, from great masters' words, right? If you are not satisfied about that, what else can we offer??"

Maybe I've missed it but saw only a couple of quotes from teachers and nothing from tantras or commentaries. Also, it is not irrelevant what one quotes. If I cited the Cakrasamvara or the Vairocanabhisambodhi Tantra how would that help? Even the Kulayaraja Tantra would be useless here as it doesn't discuss the rainbow body, iirc.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 10th, 2010 at 5:11 PM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sherab,

"Dzogchen explains that the nature of reality is beyond the physical and the mental and how the physical and mental phenomena appear from ignorance. The practice of Dzogchen is the reversal of that process. Other systems of Buddhist practice are based on a different take on the appearing of the physical and mental phenomena and that is reflected in their system of practice. Since the bases of practice are different, the results will be different."

I recognise the difference between Vajrayana's subtle body teaching and the common Mahayana lacking that. But to say that according to Dzogchen everything appears from ignorance while others say differently, well, what about dependent origination then? If Dzogchen were so radically different from general Buddhism that it had a different basis with different result it'd mean it is not even Buddhism. But to me it seems that all the Buddhist schools say that "from ignorance appears formations". But this has little to do with the rainbow body's actual relevance, I think. It's enough to compare Dzogchen with the other Vajrayana systems where they don't take the rainbow body as the ultimate achievement.

"Hence, I don't see why there could not be subtle differences within the supreme enlightenment of a Buddha as explained in Dzogchen."

It's not a question about the superiority of Dzogchen itself that I've asked but the reason for rainbow body being more special than perfect enlightenment understood by any other tradition, like Mahamudra.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 11th, 2010 at 3:34 PM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sherab,

I didn't equate subtle body with rainbow body. Regarding ignorance what you said was what we have everywhere in Buddhism, so why say Dzogchen is any different on this point? And while there are many traditions they share the view of what to be free from and to attain liberation. I brought up other Vajrayana schools only as a convenient reference point for comparison. And again, it is quite a specific and not a general question I'd like to investigate here, ie. the rainbow body's significance and its uniqueness.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 11th, 2010 at 5:04 PM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sherab,

It was clear you had replied to that.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 11th, 2010 at 6:17 PM

Title: Re: Pure lands....why?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Ron,

"Can we reach enlightenment solely through that means without as is mentioned earlier in sutra quoted..without concentration focus and certain qualities developed, just by saying some words, being faithful and devoted and expecting to become enlightened."

It is true, one doesn't become enlightened simply by repeating Amita Buddha's name and having faith in his vows. And it is not enlightenment that is the immediate consequence of that but birth in Sukhavati. Then it is in Sukhavati that one practices the paramitas etc. and attains enlightenment. This compared to going to the monastery.

Before being within the monastery one wishes to go there and so requests his admission. After obtaining access one can practice in better circumstances than in a lay life. Is this so difficult to comprehend?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 12th, 2010 at 3:32 PM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sherab,

Yes, good point. And explains why I ask the importance of doing that with the body made of the four elements. It rots away after death anyway if not cremated or eaten by animals.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 17th, 2010 at 2:46 PM

Title: Re: Pure lands....why?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Nenbutsu itself is not the cause of enlightenment per se but the cause of birth. These are two different things. It's like bodhicitta is not the cause of buddhahood but the cause to enter the path to buddhahood. Although in some sense, as you can find in the Avatamsaka Sutra, bodhicitta can be called even equal to enlightenment. Also, you may not accept that there is a Pure Land which is in fact a perfect place, a perfect environment conducive to enlightenment, but that is not so in the sutras.

Here you can find Honen's outline of the Pure Land path, where first one has to get a firm establishment in the nenbutsu and after that may take up auxiliary practices:

<http://www.jsri.jp/English/Honen/TEACHINGS/senchaku/process.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 17th, 2010 at 8:13 PM

Title: Re: Is there any rule to prostrations?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here you can learn the Chinese form:

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=asjdzpCARXk> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;
https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=YYaxJj_opt4 "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 17th, 2010 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: Pure lands....why?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Hi Huseng,

1. It is not just the scriptures themselves but also the Pure Land tradition's many outstanding teachers that should be noted here. And while I may be inclined to agree that Shinran's is an extreme position (but not unorthodox), others (from Zhiyi to Honen) are unequivocal in viewing the Pure Land as a place where people can attain enlightenment certainly. The sutras discussing Sukhavati can be considered neyartha, which makes little difference nevertheless, as it is obviously another of the skilful means. Some call even the prajnaparamita sutras neyartha anyway.

2. It is not the person's karma that is important, that's what other-power is about, being escorted to the Pure Land by Amita Buddha, saved by the vow, even if one has hellish karma. It is self-power where the karma matters in getting to a buddha-land.

3. Guanyin resides in Sukhavati, isn't her the best master in compassion? Also, one can move freely to millions of other lands. Two other reasons can be how wisdom is inseparable from compassion and the way practices like the immeasurables and lojong work.

4. Power is ascribed only to Amita Buddha himself and his vows, and as far as I know, buddhas having powers is not against the law of causality. Also, the whole concept of being born through buddha-remembrance is affirming causality and not denying or contradicting it.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 18th, 2010 at 4:32 PM

Title: Re: Pure lands....why?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"There is a kind of theodicy in what you propose: if a Buddha has the ability to pluck someone out of our shitty world and transport them to a Pure Land, why wait until the death of the individual? Why does it not happen now?"

That problem would occur if (1) buddhas could save anyone only on their own and if (2) there were no conditions for attaining birth. But none of that is found here. Angulimala could attain enlightenment even though he was a serial killer - you have no objections here I guess. It could happen because of the Buddha's work and that Angulimala changed his mind. Attaining birth in the Pure Land is possible because of Amita Buddha's work and because one changes his mind. This turning from samsara toward the Pure Land is the essential component called faith. In concept it is no different from the story of the dog ascetic. It is not about being taken out of samsara, it is not a theistic salvation like what many mistakes it for, but it is about harmonising the mind with the conditions brought to reality by Amita Buddha. So the metaphor of meeting one's parent after many years.

"It also potentially eradicates the basis of morality because even if you're a horrible wretched person who has murdered and raped thousands you still get away from your karma by virtue of Amitabha's vow. I think it was Shinran who proposed that even evil wicked people get saved just by uttering Namu Amida Butsu."

It's never been the idea that Pure Land is for the morally wicked people - this is again mistaking it for Christian salvation. The big thing here is that it is available for prthagjanas, non-enlightened beings. The morality part comes in only as a secondary aspect, saying that non-enlightened beings don't have the perfect moral conduct as aryas do. Therefore some Pure Land teachers said it's not a big problem if one cannot abide by the precepts in every situation. Like what Honen says here:

Q: Is it a sin to drink sake (Japanese rice wine)?

A: Definitely you shouldn't drink, but, you know, it's the way of the world.

Morally base people usually don't care at all about religion so it's not a common thing if somebody truly considers enlightenment. Because it shouldn't be forgot that the Pure Land is a way to enlightenment, to buddhahood, and nothing else. So yes, whatever person one might be, it is possible to attain birth, just as it is possible to attain sudden enlightenment. This doesn't undermine the meaning of morality but rather it is a skilful means that can be used by those in unfortunate circumstances.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 18th, 2010 at 7:35 PM

Title: Re: International Order of Buddhist Ministers

Content:

Astus wrote:

Well, as Yonten says, there is this hindrance that those who are somewhat familiar with Tibetan or Zen teachings think that teachers must be from a lineage of (enlightened) masters and that Buddhism is not something one can simply study and practice but that meditation is the essential way and to teach it there's a need for authorisation by a guru. This is a strong preconception indeed.

I, personally, like the idea of training Dharma teachers. There is a need for people who actually know what the sutras and shastras contain and share it with those who find it difficult to spend time studying. Also it is a good way to make Buddhism more accessible to a larger audience. My question is only of the quality of the training.

A good book with a trans-traditional view is Joseph Goldstein's "One Dharma", even if it is a rather introductory level.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 18th, 2010 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: Pure lands....why?

Content:

Aemilius said:

"Getting away from your karma", is not so at all. As has been said earlier depending on your mass of virtue or your mass of evil you may have to spend 500 years or 3000 years in isolation in Sukhavati. All this time you will hear only the Dharma. Only after this period of solitary meditation will you be granted the full citizenship in the Land of Bliss. What prison on earth can equal with that ???!

Astus wrote:

Actually, the Contemplation Sutra says that on the middle lowest birth one spends six kalpas in the lotus, on the lowest lowest it is twelve great kalpas.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 20th, 2010 at 4:42 PM

Title: Re: Pure lands....why?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

Sure, but he was a disciple of Shakyamuni and did not wait to be reborn in a Pure Land post-mortem. He received teachings directly from the Buddha and did not put his faith in being reborn in somewhere else where conditions would be more pleasant (such as somewhere where people would not treat him as the murderer that he was).

The story of Angulimala was only for giving an example for the event of changing mind and its effects. As for faith in being born somewhere, well, that is another common thing, starting from birth in the upper levels of samsara up to the ways of going to different buddha-lands. I think you're well aware of sutras giving instructions on how to gain birth in the lands of Akshobhya and Bhaishajyaguru. It's just that Amita Buddha became the favourite among all the others.

If I'm not mistaken, the Pure Land is still samsara, no?

It is not, the Tiantai 10 realms is an explanation for it. But of course one could argue for saying that the world is always some buddha's land, and there are different views about buddha-lands.

I don't trust the scriptures enough to put my money so to speak on such a gamble. If I can't verify it or find it reasonable (for example I find Shakyamuni's teachings verifiable in many instances and reasonable, or for that matter Nagarjuna or Asanga), then I'm reluctant to pursue something purely on faith.

Well, to argue for Amita Buddha's vows and land without relying on scripture looks quite impossible, just like taking refuge in the Triple Gem without ever knowing about it. But if you consider that the teaching on the easy access to Sukhavati is known and accepted in every Mahayana regions and most of the schools it can be considered as orthodox as consciousness-only, except that unlike Yogacara the Pure Land teaching is still alive everywhere.

Tell that to Shinran who probably never heard of Christianity.

Was Shinran a criminal? Or his followers? He talked about realising that one is a prthagjana, a common person, nothing special. Yes, on one hand it is questionable to tell morally unstable people can gain a definitely high birth and be assured of enlightenment. But on the other side, from the point of saving sentient beings unlimitedly, the system of buddha-lands allows the possibility of Amita's land and vows, therefore it is natural to exist for everyone.

There are three trainings: ethics (in Chinese literally precepts), samadhi and wisdom. They form a tripod. There is no wisdom without samadhi and no samadhi without ethics/precepts. Anyone who tells you otherwise is suspect.

This is not questioned at all in the Pure Land teachings. And just like in the case of seeing how Zen is related to the Agamas, so one has to study the development of Pure Land thought from visualisation practices to recitation. Also note that it is on in Japan, because of Honen, that they stick to recitation. In other lineages there's no exclusiveness.

I still stand by my original assertion that our shitty Saha world here is the optimal place to attain enlightenment as the Vimalakirti-sutra outlines.

The Vimalakirti Sutra also says that monks with parajika offenses are OK to stay in the sangha, that doing meditation is not sitting at the root of a tree, that a buddha needs no food, etc. And I'm not questioning the Vimalakirti Sutra here, it has been quoted regularly by those who think there is only a mental buddha-land to be realised and no such thing as outer buddha-land, so it is actually a usual source of dispute.

On the other hand, the later Chan thinkers who spoke of cultivating the Pure Land within make some sense to me. I just don't like this idea of putting your liberation on the line and waiting until you drop dead in the hopes of having someone else save you from suffering.

No need to wait, Chan goes fine with Pure Land, so you can attain buddhahood even today, if you want, but the thing is, people usually don't just become buddhas immediately. So if you can't actually do Chan, why not go to the Pure Land to finish the path in an easier and safer way? The Pure Land school itself has many different practices one can use and attain different levels of samadhis, etc. But at the same time it is a path for those too who have trouble spending three months on a retreat, or avoiding breaking certain precepts.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 20th, 2010 at 6:47 PM

Title: Re: International Order of Buddhist Ministers

Content:

Astus wrote:

That kind of lineage as seen in Zen for instance is not a universal part of Buddhism. Actually, the whole transmission lineage concept is restricted to a few traditions and others don't use it. And in the case of Zen lineage served mainly a political purpose rather than a spiritual/religious one. Transmission is a means of marginal groups to show how special they are. The major Indian schools had no use of that kind of authorisation because they were already authentic on their own. Lineage is not a proof of realisation or even correct view. The proof of realisation is one's life, and one's mind that can hardly be scrutinised by anyone else. The proof of correct view is being able to prove it through the use of scriptures and reasoning. What kind of proof is it if a person claims authority on secret transmission? Yes, it is a level of security if people are authorised by an accepted teacher, but even that is not 100%, just check out Shunryu Suzuki and his descendants.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 21st, 2010 at 6:08 AM

Title: Re: International Order of Buddhist Ministers

Content:

Astus wrote:

"With consideration to Jodo shu and Nichiren, every other lineage in Buddhism which exists has a lineage of qualified instructors which is in place to assure the quality of the teaching."

The only lineage that actually traces itself back to Shakyamuni Buddha (and beyond) is Zen - and that lineage is not at all a historical fact. Vajrayana lineages go back as far as teachers like Tilopa and Padmasambhava, who all lived long after Shakyamuni. The Tiantai school also had a lineage where Zhiyi, de facto founder, was claimed to be the third patriarch, but transmission of any secret doctrine was not a requirement for every practitioner, it was rather the ruling patriarch that they traced a lineage for. No other Buddhist school had this kind of lineage based on direct transmission from teacher to student, and that means everyone else from all the early Indian schools up to Yogacara and Huayan.

So if you want to claim that true Buddhism exists only within Zen and possibly Vajrayana, OK. On the other hand, if you think that such masters like Nagarjuna, Asanga, Candrakirti, Dignaga and many others deserve some credit in making Mahayana what it is, you may also accept that lineage is not a requirement for authentic Dharma.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 23rd, 2010 at 5:12 AM

Title: Re: Suggestions please

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think this answers your question:

All causes and effects
Are consciousness alone.
And all that this establishes
Abides in consciousness.

On the basis of the Mind Alone,
We should know that outer things do not exist.
On the basis of the method set forth here,
We should know that mind is utterly devoid of self.

Those who ride the chariot of the two approaches,
Who grasp the reins of reasoned thought,
Will thus be adepts of the Mahayana
According to the sense and meaning of the word.

Vishnu, Ishvara, and others do not taste
The cause of the abiding in the measureless.
And also those who are the crowns of all the world
Are thoroughly without a taste of it.

This perfect state, this pure ambrosia,
Alone enjoyed by Buddhas, those Thus Gone,
Who are themselves results of pure compassion,
None but they can taste of it.

Those who have the mind to follow this tradition
Will strongly feel intense compassion
For those who have the mind to trust
To tenets of mistaken teachings.

Those rich in wisdom, who perceive
To what extent all other doctrines lack essential pith,
To that extent will feel intense devotion
For the Buddha, who is their Protector.

(Madhyamakalankara, verses 91-97)

This is from the text called "Adornment of the Middle Way" by Shantarakshita, which addresses how all appearances are only mental in nature, and how consciousness is actually empty. It is available with a commentary by Jamgon Mipham, a 19th century

Tibetan master of great renown.

As for some instant practical advice, you may take a look at this Dzogchen teaching:
<http://www.purifymind.com/DiscoverNatureMind.htm>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 23rd, 2010 at 3:46 PM

Title: Re: Natural disasters and collective morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Indeed, it's this ancient belief that if one lives according to whatever rules (morals) the god(s) came up with the nation will be in peace and prosper. Although in many cases this "morality" included certain rituals from grain to human sacrifice. The very concept that rules and rituals have soteriological relevance is a wrong view - unlike in Brahmanism and others. To say that what I do can in fact change the weather, well, I'd love to see this explained either from the physical-scientific, or the Abhidharmic side. Which mental factor is the condition for water particles in the sky? And how do millions of minds (not counting the animals, but we could) living in a single city define the wind currents? Isn't it the case that we cannot even control our own bodies even if we like to believe that it is "me, mine, my self"?

So, I see no reason why it should be that there is such a group karma causing disasters.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 24th, 2010 at 11:42 PM

Title: Re: Hoshin Tendai Mikkyo? No.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Is there already a Tendai group called Hoshin Tendai Mikkyo? Just because then it can indeed be confusing. Otherwise, it is not a trademark or something like that. And if one feels like it, why not create a martial arts group with some extras called Tendai Mikkyo? In China there was not just one Tiantai group but at least two that I know of, and they didn't like each other for sure. People can call so many things Zen, Tantra and what not. Why Tendai is an exception? And Mikkyo, well, that is just "secret teaching", not even something restricted to a sect.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 26th, 2010 at 12:50 AM

Title: Buddhahood in This Life

Content:

Astus wrote:

In the major Mahayana traditions that we have today all teach, except one, that Buddhahood is possible in a single lifetime. There are different names given to this concept but what seems to cover all is "this body becomes buddha" (即身成佛), i.e.

becoming buddha in this body, which has been singled out by Kukai as the term summing up the essence of Shingon (see: <http://www12.canvas.ne.jp/horai/sokushingi.htm>), but actually can be traced back to the case with the dragon princess in the http://www2.fodian.net/world/0262_12.html who turned into a buddha in no time.

This idea of sudden enlightenment (頓悟) - first advocated by Daosheng (355-434), a disciple of Kumarajiva - is taken to be an improvement, a higher teaching compared to the gradual path of the bodhisattva going through kalpas of training. But it is possible to see it not as an improvement but actually a return to being an arhat.

What I mean is that there's hardly any difference between the attainment taught in these sudden methods from one we can find in Theravada and other Mahayana teachings. The basic concept is, as always has been, to eliminate attachment to the six kinds of experiences. That is what an arhat achieves. Then compared to an arhat a buddha is supposed to have some extras starting with the bodily signs, so comes in the accumulation of merits through aeons. Finally, with the appearance of the tathagatagarbha teachings the possibility of a short cut came up, since buddha-nature contains all the buddha qualities. That's how sudden enlightenment became possible, that's what the Zen axiom of "this mind is buddha" (即心是佛) stands for.

Then if there is this inherent enlightenment (本覺), which is not different from the mind free from attachments, how could it be different from an arhat but in name only?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 26th, 2010 at 5:45 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in This Life

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

Maybe I should have put up a note that I'm going here cross-traditional using references to Southern, Northern and Eastern traditions. So it is not a question how one school, one lineage or one teacher defines these terms for in that case it'd be quite straightforward. I'm trying to explore the "One Dharma" perspective, to use Goldstein's terminology, or a Western Ekayana.

"I don't think all but a very small minority of people realistically think they'll achieve attainment of the dharmakāya within their lifetime."

Well, it depends on what you take to be dharmakaya. Either I take a Zen or a Vajrayana approach, it is nothing but the nature of mind one realises at the very beginning. Not that difficult.

"I wouldn't take symbolism in religious literature as absolutely literal."

While that case in the Lotus Sutra has been actually used in Zen texts for reference, I mentioned it actually because the Fo Guang Shan dictionary uses it in the definition of "this body becoming buddha". By the way, what else would it symbolise than what it apparently looks like?

"You can be enlightened and not be a Buddha."

Intended no confusion here. I took the easier path where sudden enlightenment equals attaining buddhahood, so it doesn't matter whether it's 悟, or 覺, or 成佛, or anything else.

"In some Mahayana thought the idea is that the Arhat only achieves nirvana with remainder"

Yes, there are many versions of interpreting arhathood in Mahayana. Here I refer to only Theravada interpretations, where actually a living arhat attains nirvana with remainder. But that simply stands for the presence of aggregates without attachment.

"Tathāgatagarbha is not single unified system."

Certainly. But I rather take the Awakening Mahayana Faith Treatise as it has been a lot more popular than the Buddha-Nature Treatise and had influence on Zen and other schools. On the Tibetan side it's the Shentong form of interpretation that could be the matching one here.

"a product of East Asian thought and has no direct ancestor in Indic thought"

Being Indic or non-Indic has little relevance in today's Buddhism. And perhaps if we looked into the latest forms of Indic Buddhism we could find the teachings like Anuttarayogatantra and the Sahajiyas talking about inherent purity and original buddha-mandala.

So, just to make it really clear, I'm not looking for definitions within a single tradition or how an ancient master argued against even older masters. This whole thing I bring up from today's perspective, or at least I'm trying, with having three major Buddhist traditions in one place. That's the point of the "One Dharma Project".

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 27th, 2010 at 5:57 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in This Life

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

There can't be a unifying vision. It is possible to synthesise, a classic method, but that necessarily results in something new. In China they created different schools based on structuring available Buddhist materials, so they did in India and Tibet. Now we have a growing corpus of English Buddhist teachings which is already quite big, especially if put together. It is possible that one simply delves into a single tradition, a single practice. But then actually a single tradition means that some have already sorted out, interpreted and structured the Buddhist teaching so they can present it as one, whole and complete. It is all fine, we have Theravada, we have Tiantai, we have Nyingma. However, what they summed up in those traditions are from different sources that we have now. Zhiyi could use the MPPU while Yinshun could use the Lamrim Chenmo for instance. If I had to single out one sutra, or one shastra as the best, I couldn't do so. Sure, I have some favourites, but that doesn't mean to me that the others are inferior in any sense. It is true that there were hardly any Mahayana teacher in China or Tibet who cared to use the Agamas but today many quote the Pali Canon, while Theravada teachers cite some Zen stories. In sum, there is a merging going on on some levels. Fine examples are Yogi Chen, Yinshun and Ajahn Amaro. This, in my opinion, doesn't make Buddhism less or worse but rather fresh and alive, capable of transformation.

"No, there is much more to the dharmakāya than that. It includes omniscience and complete eradication of all defilements without exception among other features."

Well, the nature of mind is naturally without any obstruction to comprehension and there's no defilement to be found in it. The whole point of the buddha-mind is that it is not different from the mind of the buddhas. But of course this is not everyone's view of the buddha-mind. Also, an interesting extra from Huangbo: "Buddha-nature is emptiness. Even if adorned by immeasurable wisdom and merit, in the end those cannot remain." (T51n2076_p0272a11-12)

"I'm hesitant about any claims that one can completely bypass the Bodhisattva stages. Whether you interpret such statements in sutra as meaning that or not is up to you and the commentaries you favour."

And this is actually a key thing in what I've brought up originally about sudden/direct paths since they say they in fact by pass the bodhisattva stages. So the promise of becoming a buddha in this life is about avoiding the long bodhisattva path. Therefore it may be - at least this sounds like a fine argument against those ideas - that they actually teach a sravakayana.

"I'll believe it when I see it or meet a reliable authority who can demonstrate the validity of such claims."

I can quote a dozen famous Zen masters if that's good enough for you. But actually everyone else who teach sudden enlightenment talk about becoming buddha and not something below that.

"Sure, but then you have to explain why if the enlightenment of an Arhat and a Buddha is the same why does the former completely remove themselves from the conditioned world at death, thus being unable to help others while the latter does indeed remain."

I hope that by now you see what kind of buddhahood I talk about here, that kind of buddha one can become in this body.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 27th, 2010 at 6:16 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in This Life

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

"Unfortunately not all of it is from reliable authorities."

One has to be able to sort it out and don't put the books by Rajneesh on the same shelf as those by Jamgon Kongtrul.

"Buddhism is still in its infancy."

I thought it was the oldest world religion. Buddhism has been known longer in the west than linguistics or psychology were invented. It may be that today we count Buddhism's presence in the West from the 50s, but actually it's been here on some level centuries before, the 20th century brought the rapid spread of the religion, but not its appearance. What makes it an infant actually? A man has only 60-70 years maximum to study it, many renown masters had only 20-30. Dogen was 28 when he returned to Japan and started to teach Zen, then died 25 years later. Could we say that was OK he established a new school because there was Buddhism in Japan for a few centuries by then? Or because Zen in China was well established? Or Zhiyi could form his novel ideas because he was a monk and there was already a corpus he could work from?

"attempting to combine the doctrines of Pure Land in Japan with Theravada in Sri Lanka is not going to work."

Doesn't sound impossible. For instance, one could use their Abhidhamma to outline the work of Amita Buddha, or use satipatthana to meditate on the Pure Land.

"I have problems with statements that the mind is naturally without any obstruction."

It's fine with me if you don't like buddha-mind teachings. That doesn't mean it is not an important part of a couple of Mahayana traditions.

"Or they're talking about having achieved Arhatship or Pratyekabuddhahood, neither of which is attainment of the dharmakaya. Or maybe they were speaking figuratively when they used the two characters 成佛 (becoming Buddha)."

I think both are unlikely, especially the first one.

"As I said above in the case of Master Shengyan he wrote that one has a brief vision of the realm of the Buddhas which would be a life changing event, but would not actually be permanent Buddhahood."

That is Ven. Shengyan's view of it, which is fine in itself, but there are other interpretations. For instance, in Vajrayana it is "working with the result", ie. buddha-mind. Same applies for Zen, training with the buddha-mind.

"The problem with famous Zen masters is that they like to talk in riddles and use figurative language. If you sit down and read those Chan stories in particular they're interesting fiction and not to be taken literally. They employ many many metaphors to convey ideas not apparent on the surface."

I understand Zen stories are like that but those are only one form of teachings, actually a literary style created in the 10th century, after the Tang era, and became popular in the Song. Still, what they gave as teachings either in Tang or after were all in usual Buddhist parlance and nothing incomprehensible. These you can read in the "recorded sayings" of different masters. However, there are some exceptions here, especially the records of Linji and Yunmen as those were seriously reworked in later times, so a large portion of them are like koans. But try the works of Dazhu Huihai or Huangbo Xiyun, both early masters in the Hongzhou school, and they're not mystical at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 30th, 2010 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in This Life

Content:

Astus wrote:

It was a good point Anders that the Awakening Mahayana Faith Treatise says explicitly that bodhisattvas have to go through three aeons. What to do with that then if actually Tiantai, Huayan, Chan and Zhenyan talks about sudden enlightenment, ie. not going through the ten stages? In the "Netbreaking Commentary to the Awakening Mahayana Faith Treatise" (T44n1850, vol. 5) Ouyi Zhixu first explains that passage with "Time is not real dharma. It depends only on false thinking." (455c12) and then gives usual examples for that (what feels long for one is short for others). In the second part then he speculates about the actual meaning of this arduous task of a bodhisattva and what the Buddha meant by it. It seems to me he takes no definitive position but goes by the line of the Platform Sutra saying that sudden and gradual is dependent on one's faculties.

Huangbo Xiyun says (T48n2012A, p380b), "Some hearing the Dharma easily attain no mind in one moment. Some reach the ten faiths, ten abodes, ten practices, ten dedications, then attain no mind. Long or short, when no mind is obtained it remains. There can be nothing more to cultivate or realise. ... Since there's nothing more beyond buddhahood, they (long and short path practitioners) attain the same. When [the one who went through long practice] looks back on kalpas of practices, it's all as if he was acting deluded in a dream."

This whole problem can be enlightened by this simple dialogue (X63n1224, p27a8-9):

Yuan precept master said, "Must go through three great asankhyeya-kalpas, only then attains it."

Huihai said, "Asankhyeya-kalpas can be counted, or not?"

Dazhu Huihai himself says (X63n1224, p26c6) of this issue: "Deluded people hope to realise it in a distant kalpa. Enlightened people suddenly see it." This rhymes well with what Huseng heard from that teacher. But I think Huihai's point was rather that only those without knowledge think there is an immeasurably long path ahead, but those who know better understand that "this mind is buddha" and there's nowhere else to go for it. So he defined (X63n1223, p22c5) the essential Chan teaching this way: "Sudden enlightenment is attaining liberation without leaving this life."

It should not be forgot here that these sudden teachings redefine the three buddha bodies from majestic external phenomena to attributes of buddha-mind. And as the buddha-mind becomes the cardinal tenet of these systems, there are quite a big number of sutras discussing the tathagatagarbha they can rely on. And if we add the tantras there's no way to call it simply a fiction of some Chinese monks. But contrary to what Mantrayana people claim, buddhahood in this life is not just a tantric teaching.

So I think first it would be good to settle this sudden path first, if it is what it claims to be, then go on with investigating whether it has anything to do with sravakayana or not.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 30th, 2010 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in This Life

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

Good quote. See, what it says, actually goes perfectly fine with the sudden teachings: "The realization that Mind is eternal is called the final enlightenment." So if one, instead of gradually working on myriad defilements, just "see nature", then the whole thing is immediately solved. And this direct insight is what Zen and others teach. Although they also say it is for people with high capacity. So karma is definitely a factor. The Perfect Enlightenment Sutra is a good example for this as it goes from sudden to gradual, from simple to complicated, from higher to lower methods, starting with "there's nothing to do" and finishing with repentance practice. Then another issue, that makes sudden enlightenment (theoretically) accessible to everyone is the teaching of universal buddha-nature. So if we all have it right here, this mind, then if it is actually pointed out, what could stop one to realise it?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 31st, 2010 at 3:04 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in This Life

Content:

Astus wrote:

"This assumes one is actually capable of such an insight before having mastered the previous insights."

Indeed. But that is not necessarily the case in my view. It is how we see those stages and their realisation. The essence of Zen meditation is seeing thoughts arise and leave without getting involved. That is one common definition summing up all the Buddhist meditation techniques. There is more to it before and after. Before it is what Shenhui criticised as gradual teaching, the usual contemplation on the skandhas and six sensory area, etc. After it is the direct pointing to mind being the buddha. In real life practice there are no limits of varieties how a practitioner may progress.

The essence will always be to "see beyond thoughts" (觀無念), whether one is meditating on the body, on emotions, on appearances, or on thoughts, it's always realising its emptiness, relinquishing it, and going on without attachment to it. It is called the sudden path because it goes immediately to the root of all the problems: mind. To see that the mind is empty - which cannot be any more difficult than seeing a piece of paper empty, but actually even easier as we have the mind right here and there's no need for any special explanation and understanding to investigate it directly - is to see the emptiness of everything. When that is realised, what else could be left? That's why it is "seeing nature, becoming buddha".

So, I now look at my mind. Sure, it is empty, clear, aware, unborn, undying. What else could it be but buddha? Anyone can see it for himself. But am I now perfectly enlightened, free from all defilements, never to arise any more? No. It is the nature of the mind that is buddha. It's always been like that. The sole difference a single insight makes is that I can attest it is true, I have a solid faith in it. Dongshan says (T47n1986B, p526a1-2) in his famous poem: "It's like before a jewelled mirror, form and reflection see each other; you are not it, but it is you." This is the same what he says in his enlightenment verse (520a22). Yangshan Huiji once helped a monk by first making him think of his home town then asking if those things in his home town exist in his mind, pointing out that "What is thinking is the mind, what is thought of is the environment (from Schloegl's translation of 境)." (T47n1990, p587b5) This teaching resembles Yangshan's enlightenment story (582b8-11):

Yangshan asked, "What is the abode of the real buddha?" Guishan said, "Without thinking think of the mysterious. Return your thinking to the boundlessness of the spiritual flame, until thinking exhausts in the source, where nature and characteristics always dwell and phenomena and principle are not two. The real buddha is like that." Upon these words Yangshan suddenly enlightened.

Guishan once explained (T47n1989, p577c4-7) that there might be people who, though enlightened suddenly, still have karma from the beginningless past, so that has to be purified, but now from the view of realisation. This actually happens to match what Zongmi and his followers taught about sudden enlightenment followed by gradual cultivation, which was used as a way to bring together Chan and Huayan views. The same approach is found in Mahamudra and Dzogchen too. Nevertheless, there's no negation of buddhahood in this life.

"The problem is mental fitness. This is where having an intellectual understanding and actually having penetrating insight and their difference must be stressed."

Of course, as you may well know, it is stressed heavily in Zen, so far as it's done even excessively by abandoning the teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 31st, 2010 at 4:23 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in This Life

Content:

Astus wrote:

Maybe I've used the wrong word. Only those who misunderstand Zen abandon the teachings. In my understanding "Zen and Kyo" is a false separation.

I don't see how it's a futile attempt to practise non-attachment.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 31st, 2010 at 6:45 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in This Life

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

It seems I've presented my position here poorly that this kind of interpretation could have occurred. Not being attached is not the same as becoming nothing, or eliminating everything, and I didn't mean so. Attachment (upadana) is defined as fourfold: attachment to sensuality, to false views, to rules and rituals, and to self-view. But getting into this level of defining basic concepts feels a bit of a sidetrack. Also, the term "beyond thoughts", or "no thoughts" (無念) is not about not having thoughts and becoming a piece of stone. Rather it is a central teaching of Zen.

Here's what the Platform Sutra says:

McRae translation, p. 33 / 351b said:

"What is nonthought? If in seeing all the dharmas, the mind is not defiled or attached, this is nonthought. [The mind's] functioning pervades all locations, yet it is not attached to all the locations. Just purify the fundamental mind, causing the six consciousnesses to emerge from the six [sensory] gates, [causing one to be] without defilement or heterogeneity within the six types of sensory data (literally, the "six dusts"), autonomous in the coming and going [of mental phenomena], one's penetrating function without stagnation. This is the samādhi of prajñā, the autonomous emancipation. This is called the practice of nonthought.

"If one does not think of the hundred things in order to cause thought to be eradicated, this is bondage within the Dharma. This is called an extreme view.

"Good friends, to be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is for the myriad dharmas to be completely penetrated. To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to see the realms of [all] the buddhas. To be enlightened to the Dharma of nonthought is to arrive at the stage of buddhahood.

Astus wrote:

But I believe the true champion of the no thought teaching is Wuzhu of the Baotang school:

Adamek translation, p. 364-365 / T51n2075, p0189c8-17 said:

"All beings are fundamentally pure and fundamentally complete. From the Buddhas at the upper end down to sentient beings, all are of the same pure nature. However, with a single thought [produced by] the deluded mind of beings, the Three Worlds are dyed. It is because beings have thought that one provisionally teaches no-thought, but if there is no presence of thought, then no-thought itself is not. No thought is thus no-birth, no-thought is thus no-extinction. No-thought is thus no-love, no-thought is thus no-hate. No-thought is thus no-grasping, no-thought is thus no-abandoning. No-thought is thus no-high, no thought is thus no-low. No-thought is thus no-male, no-thought is thus no-female. No-thought is thus no-true, no-thought is thus no-false. At the time of true no-thought, no-thought itself is not. 'When the mind is produced then the various dharmas are produced, when the mind is extinguished then the various dharmas are extinguished.' 'As one's mind is, so also are the stains of wrongdoing, so also are all dharmas.' At the time of true no-thought, 'all dharmas are the Buddha-Dharma,' there is not a single dharma separate from bodhi."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 31st, 2010 at 6:37 PM

Title: Re: Question about arguments against Mahayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

When one has to prove his orthodoxy, his authenticity, it is the case that such position is not an evidence. Theravada, or for that matter, other early schools, had no such problem - except for certain doctrines they argued about with each other - as they and their canon was accepted as Buddhism. So all the Mahayana works, like sutras, shastras, and other teachings had to argue for their authenticity and supremacy while calling everyone else inferiors. Then the same happened with Vajrayana and Zen, both had to fight its way to become accepted and eventually the ruling teaching. They were all building up from a disorganised movement, like Christianity in the Roman times.

However, times have changed. Mahayana is very well established with hundreds of millions of followers and a long history throughout Asia. It was only because of fortunate events that Theravada could survive at all in countries like Sri Lanka and Thailand. One monk arguing on YouTube about how Theravada is the only real Buddhism makes no difference, especially that it is not the opinion of every Theravada monk. So I don't see the need for defending Mahayana (which is actually quite a vague word) against any Theravada attacks. That is because it is now evident that Chinese, Tibetan and other forms of Buddhism are Buddhism. If the Dalai Lama and Thich Nhat Hanh are not Buddhists then what are they?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 31st, 2010 at 9:36 PM

Title: Re: Question about arguments against Mahayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

We can look at it from another perspective. Theravada's point of argument is that it is the original teaching. As Huseng has pointed to it briefly, that is not the case as far as modern historical research is concerned. Theravada is one of the end results of the developments going on in India after the death of the Buddha and actually Theravada, as a living tradition, is still subject to change, including their canon. Mahayana, if we don't mind summing it up under this one title, is another natural development of Buddhism in India. Many of the Mahayana teachings are actually from established schools like Vaibhasika, Sautrantika and Dharmagupta. Even the Bodhisattva-pitaka was not a new Mahayana idea. So either looking from the past or from the present, Mahayana is not a bit less Buddhist than Theravada. And as far as the doctrines of these two traditions are concerned, what we can find in the Nikayas are mostly common teachings, including the teaching of the intermediate state, of which Bhikkhu Bodhi says, "Though the Theravada Abhidhamma and the commentaries argue against the existence of an antarabhava, a number of canonical texts seem to support this notion." (footnote 53 of SN 35.87 in Connected Discourses of the Buddha, Wisdom Pub., 2000. p. 1406).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 1st, 2010 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: Huayen Globalization Forum to be held in Taipei

Content:

Astus wrote:

I find it sort of unfortunate when a group of Buddhists gather to discuss something outside of their field of expertise, like ecology in this case, or the <http://www.icundv.com/vesak2010/node/42>, or they just talk about <http://www.dharmawomen.org/2010/schedule.aspx>, like "Hawaiian Sacred Dance of Hula", "Zen of Knitting" and "Tai Chi". Why is it that almost exclusively <http://www.international.ucla.edu/buddhist/article.asp?parentid=87398> something relevant to Buddhism? Is it that Buddhists want to impress people how they can touch on newspaper topics, or <http://www.wbc.my/prog.php>, while academics don't mind talking about whatever they prefer to research, even if nobody else comes to listen outside of that area of knowledge?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 1st, 2010 at 7:41 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan madhyamaka

Content:

Astus wrote:

Madhyamaka is the understanding that emptiness is dependent origination. This was sufficiently established by Nagarjuna and Aryadeva, but even their works are only elaboration on this one thing. Beyond them are only skilful means to understand it. Either one prefers one argument or the other doesn't make much difference. The point is to actually understand it. So to me Chandrakirti is as good as Shantarakshita or Taranatha.

Sorry for being so simple.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 1st, 2010 at 8:39 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan madhyamaka

Content:

Astus wrote:

Mariusz,

Would that make any actual difference if you use common Madhyamaka terminology or bring in Dzogchen terms? I mean, it may help in connecting different teachings, or explaining this one, but otherwise you arrive at the same understanding that there is dependence between phenomena and thus there's nothing to be furious about.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 3rd, 2010 at 10:54 PM

Title: Re: What group is this?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Master Xuyun is regarded a major teacher in modern Chinese Buddhism so it is simply natural that a large number of teachers claim to be descendants of him. Master Xuanhua was just one of the many. I don't know if Jy Din Shakya's (or the ZBOHY's) claims are true or not. Actually, how could I affirm or deny anyone's claim without having direct access to Xuyun's notes (if there are any), or using other reliable methods for historical investigation? But this part is not really a problem I think, people and groups like to establish their authority and orthodoxy in whatever ways they see appropriate.

As for the nature of that community, it looks like a group of Western people who practice a form of Buddhism, but in a not so traditional way. Their idea of being a "married monk" or "lay monk" is very much like in Japanese Buddhism, probably there's a relationship between them, at least in concept.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 4th, 2010 at 4:35 AM

Title: Re: What group is this?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dear Remm,

No need to scan anything, on <http://longbeachmonastery.org/NEWSanghaJewel.htm> everyone can see the whole thing. But then, would you say that Ven. Xuyun's transmission of the Linji lineage that have been received eventually through two masters by Ven. Shengyan is fake? Also, an interesting thing about Ven. Xuanhua's lineage of the Guiyang school is that it is a broken lineage, simply because the Guiyang transmission has died out about a thousand years ago. The transmission paper featured on that site shows it very well too. On the other hand, Ven. Shengyan's Linji lineage (<http://www.westernchanfellowship.org/lineage-chart.html>) looks unbroken - even if it is historically very much questionable at a couple of points, just as every Chan lineage. By the way, just because Ven. Xuanhua's transmission line is broken doesn't mean it's fake or anything like that, I don't mean to question any of the involved teachers' integrity. But then, weren't you trying to find out the nature of the ZBOHY group? Sorry if I've caused any distraction with my chit-chat about lineages and stuff. Although the whole concept of transmission might be relevant in evaluating groups and claims of orthodoxy.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 5th, 2010 at 4:58 AM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Perhaps a change of focus from what the tradition says to why it says that could help. Here's what I mean. Dzogchen essentially is simply awareness itself. Everybody who wants to use the Dzogchen teachings have to know that and be familiar with awareness. But with only that how many can actually complete the path to buddhahood? Not so many. Since the teachers of Dzogchen want to help people there are different methods used to let people walk the path of Dzogchen and not just know about it. That's where all the practices come in. And even that is nothing complicated, nothing difficult to make it easy for everyone.

Let me give an example. When a teacher has to teach a class the alphabet he may simply recite it from A to Z and tell them to start reading and writing. Or he may also write the alphabet on the board and show the children the letters one by one. Is that enough for kids to know how to read and write? Unlikely. So they practice reading and writing, starting with the letters themselves. And then they will learn in years to follow the correct spelling, punctuation, composition, styles of literature, etc. What every English poet needs are only the 26 letters. But just knowing the alphabet is not enough.

So, while every Dzogchenpa knows rigpa, it has never been enough to make them even a simple Buddhist yogi, not to mention a guru - which is still not the attainment of buddhahood. Yes, no doubt awareness is the single essence of the whole Buddhist teaching. But just think about yourself. Have you attained buddhahood already to be content with your understanding and realisation?

No one can be forced to practise anything. It is a personal choice. And if somebody feels that focusing only on awareness and not tiring oneself with other techniques, how could that person be pursued to try something else?

On the other hand, arguing about what actually a teaching is about is a theoretical question. Arguments like that has its rules, like basing one's statements on valid sources, which are direct experience, logic and authentic sources. Interestingly enough, there are actually whole books about Dzogchen ngöndro like "Great Perfection: Outer and Inner Preliminaries" by the Third Dzogchen Rinpoche. So I suppose these teachings are meant to be used if those outstanding teachers of this tradition of Great Perfection cared to commit it to writing. Even if they're all just the letters of the alphabet put after each other.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 6th, 2010 at 4:14 PM

Title: Re: Everything we experience

Content:

Astus wrote:

Experience, Zen, birds, there you go:

One day Baizhang accompanied Mazu on a walk. A flock of wild ducks flew by them.

Mazu said, "What's that?"

Baizhang said, "Wild ducks."

Mazu said, "Where'd they go?"

Baizhang said, "They flew away."

Mazu then twisted Baizhang's nose so hard that he cried out.

Mazu said, "So you say they've flown away!"

Upon hearing these words Baizhang attained enlightenment.

(from: Zen's Chinese Heritage by A.E. Ferguson, p. 77)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 7th, 2010 at 3:24 PM

Title: Re: awakening myth?

Content:

Astus wrote:

How could it be a myth? It is an essential part of Buddhism, the Third Noble Truth.

Without enlightenment Buddhism is meaningless. Having faith in the attainability of liberation is part of taking refuge in the Triple Jewel. So, I don't know where you got those ideas, but they're mistaken.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 10th, 2010 at 5:59 PM

Title: Re: Natural disasters and collective morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

OK, so let's work within Yogacara premises. It accepts the existence of rupadharma, so there is a causal reality of them. We can agree that whatever we could name as existent must be a mental existence. So if there's a volcano that erupted 2000 years ago and today we learn about it what we see are the effects. Then through reasoning we are able to state that there must have been an eruption. But we could bring here any geological research going back to tens of thousands of years.

If we say all those phenomena were a result of collective karma, well, whose collective karma? Dinosaurs'? Also, should we count all sentient beings or only humans?

So there are big problems here if one insists that it is only karma that causes everything.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 10th, 2010 at 7:02 PM

Title: Re: Natural disasters and collective morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sure, that is a valid point and a view found everywhere, starting with the Buddha saying in the Nikayas that the whole world is the six sensory fields. But then, it doesn't mean everything can be reduced to karma since not even our own deeds are karmic all the time. And to say all our experiences are directly the results of our karma is another major simplification. It is another problem to connect different karmas and minds and say that they produce a common experience to all involved.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 10th, 2010 at 7:06 PM

Title: Re: Rev. Jason Carter

Content:

Astus wrote:

The whole thing looks too bad to be true.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 10th, 2010 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: Rev. Jason Carter

Content:

Astus wrote:

Well, as for the Buddhist side, no harm is a principle and there are teachings against even possessing weapons, not to mention teaching people how to use them. All this energy put in punching and kicking could be used to perhaps print some Dharma materials, or translating sutras (if he knows any relevant languages), or perhaps just organising a zendo instead of a dojo.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 10th, 2010 at 9:49 PM

Title: Re: Natural disasters and collective morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

There's no disagreement here then at all. Still, the original question was if natural disasters are the results of people's bad deeds or not. How do you relate to that?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 10th, 2010 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism view on talking with dead people

Content:

Astus wrote:

People can be reborn as spirits, it's called the realm of hungry ghosts. Not a good birth.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 11th, 2010 at 1:29 AM

Title: Re: Natural disasters and collective morality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kirt,

Karma is not a universal creating force but a modifier of one's perception. And here we can apply the reasoning used to establish a mental continuum separate from matter, only in a reverse fashion. If material dharmas cannot cause mental dharmas, how can mental dharmas cause material dharmas? However, it is not entirely true that material dharmas don't cause mental dharmas, since a single perception of an object can trigger lot of different mental dharmas. Still, this whole field of Buddhism seems entirely unresearched. As far as I know, there is no clear description of the dharmic process of a consciousness defining the body and environment of a new birth. And if it were really the karma forming the environment, isn't it strange that nobody ever experienced that throughout the process of delivering a baby not much changes in the surroundings? Should we then say that it is about the outer conditions matching the inner causes, without there being a karma modifying the place? Also, it doesn't seem likely that a consciousness could foresee the events that will happen in one's life, therefore if it happens that a tornado blows away one's house later it's hardly one's karma causing it.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 11th, 2010 at 5:46 PM

Title: Re: Panpsychism and the Dharmakaya.

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is not difficult to show how matter is aware. Whatever matter there is there is an awareness perceiving it - in terms of common language. In other words all there are are nothing but perceptions without anything being beyond (independent matter) or before (independent mind) perceptions. This is actually saying that matter is aware since there's nothing that could be without awareness. But panpsychism is not like this as it conceives the world in dualistic ways which is contrary to the Buddhist understanding.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 13th, 2010 at 4:22 PM

Title: Re: Panpsychism and the Dharmakaya.

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is quite difficult to demonstrate that matter is aware.

Only if we conceive a matter, as in science, as something independent. If matter is simply the rupaskandha, as in the Buddhist view, there's an easy way to establish aware matter. See Robert Sharf's essay: http://kr.buddhism.org/zen/koan/Robert_Sharf-e.htm

"It assumes that matter and mind are of the same quality."

True, monism fits it better as a designation and we can put it next to advaita and other such views.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 13th, 2010 at 5:20 PM

Title: Re: Adaptation: 'Buddhism' in the West

Content:

Astus wrote:

I find it a mistaken route to argue for Buddhism's agreement with physicalism, as it is obviously not. Natural science itself is a set of axioms and rules to observe and analyse matter. Analysing Buddhism can be done on many levels, starting with archaeology and philology, up to sociology and philosophy of religion. Mostly these are not natural sciences, simply because Buddhism is a human mental construct and not a natural phenomenon.

It is a biased view to claim that the West and Western people are totally materialists. It is a view similar to Christians saying that that is the traditional religion and the fundamental source of spirituality. True, materialism and science has been the government sponsored orthodoxy in the West for more than a hundred years now, simply because it could provide the usual magical requirements of healing and weaponry. But as we can see in many "religious" countries, the use of products of scientific achievements does not necessitate a materialist view. And looking at Europe, Christianity still has a strong base while the so called New Age movement - without a better name to cover all the diverse views - is growing in its number of followers.

Physicalism demonises non-materialist views just like Christianity does so with other religions. There's no point in trying to prove that Buddhism is OK with any matter based view. Rather, teachers should state clearly that physicalism is a very low level view as it is restricted to the four elements and can't see beyond that, even Christianity beats that, while both of them are outer paths (外道), tirthikas, just like Carvaka and Vedanta.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 13th, 2010 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: Adaptation: 'Buddhism' in the West

Content:

Astus wrote:

"The really interesting issue is the nature of consciousness. If consciousness is non-material, or has a non-material aspect, then rebirth is not at all implausible -- it's actually the more likely possibility. So the root argument is over whether, in fact, "mind" is distinct from "brain"."

The idealist-materialist argument doesn't fit here. The Buddha did address the question of the difference or sameness of the body and soul, see:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.035.than.html>. That's how Buddhism is a Middle Way position.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 13th, 2010 at 10:54 PM

Title: Re: Adaptation: 'Buddhism' in the West

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think it is important to clarify the actual Buddhist view and don't just let it be watered down to an easier interpretation. It is not specifically difficult to understand the middle way view, it's just unfamiliar.

The mind-matter dichotomy doesn't exist in Buddhism simply because it is not a view based on independent elements but rather on conditioned phenomena. And it is possible to say that in Buddhism there is a consciousness separate from matter but that is a highly superficial statement only good for letting people comprehend some basics about rebirth. But if it is about debating on a deeper level such a position has to be dropped and the correct, explicit teaching has to be taken up.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 14th, 2010 at 5:37 PM

Title: Re: Adaptation: 'Buddhism' in the West

Content:

Astus wrote:

Buddhism is a religion. I understand that religion sounds anti-scientific for many but actually that is not necessarily so. All the older European universities were established by the Church herself and even today there are Christian schools with a high standard of education. Of course, I'm talking about the European situation where the American style evangelical Christianity is a minority and doesn't have much impact beyond the level of the plebs. Just an example, the current governing party in Germany is the "Christian Democratic Union", they have a female president, and it is still a normal Western-European liberal democratic country, where prostitution and gambling is legal, personal drug use is not a criminal act, and symbols and compulsory practices of religion (cross, prayer, etc.) are banned from state schools. This is just to show that religion and Christianity is not necessarily anti-scientific and anti-modern. At the same time, it seems to me that a large portion of traditional western Christians (mainly Roman Catholics, Lutherans and Calvinists) are quite secular and materialist in thinking, as Huseng said, they take "religious beliefs" separately from "scientific facts".

I personally have never really been fond of the idea that science is the source of true knowledge. Yes, science is good for certain things, just like the skills needed for shoemaking and housebuilding. But that's all, it is a craftsmanship, a technique, but neither philosophy, nor spirituality. But what happened is that there were people, philosophers (like the positivists), who tried to prove that true, factual and real knowledge comes only through science, anything beyond that is superstition. And this is where the fight between science and religion starts. A simple engineer who knows how to build bridges has little to argue with theological concepts, they're two different areas. But if you say that true knowledge comes only from the knowledge of building bridges, therefore theology is nonsense, the problem is born.

The very idea that there's anything to be proved scientifically in a religion is nonsense. It's like using chemistry to analyse a poem. And just as literature is not for or against science, why should the situation with Buddhism be different?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 15th, 2010 at 11:15 PM

Title: Origin and Development of Vajrayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm looking for sources on the history of Vajrayana, including its origins and development in India and Tibet. I'm not familiar with the area, so anything may come. I already know of Sam van Schaik's EarlyTibet blog and I have Ronald M. Davidson's book "Indian Esoteric Buddhism: A Social History of the Tantric Movement", but basically that's all. I'd especially appreciate good summaries and enlightening essays, but as I've said, any good text is OK.

Note: it is not the religious history I'm interested in but the latest academic research.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 16th, 2010 at 5:15 PM

Title: Re: Is Tibetan Buddhism more logical?

Content:

Astus wrote:

This is a really good argument in this era to say that one's tradition is more logical than the others. But if we actually look at them I don't think we could definitely claim logic more to one than the other. Actually, the whole tantric system is not too logical, except if there's such thing as "sympathetic logic" as used in magical thinking. One positive argument on the side of the Tibetan tradition is that they've kept alive the epistemology of Dignaga and Dharmakirti unlike in East-Asia. On the other hand, there's Tiantai and Huayan developed in China while the Tibetans worked on madhyamaka a bit further and that's all.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 16th, 2010 at 6:00 PM

Title: Re: Adaptation: 'Buddhism' in the West

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think it is not exactly correct to confuse scientific development with economic situation. Europe became rich because of looting and colonising a large percent of Earth, not because they invented the steam engine. And so there are poor countries, even a poor continent, Africa (which otherwise is very rich in natural resources), and rich countries. It is convenient to think that technological development can solve things like hunger, but partially it was technological development that helped the Western countries rob and enslave everyone else (to a certain level). But I think this has little to do with Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 16th, 2010 at 6:06 PM

Title: Re: Origin and Development of Vajrayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

It indeed has a good summary, thanks for the tip, but only a really short one.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 16th, 2010 at 7:29 PM

Title: Re: Is Tibetan Buddhism more logical?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Mudra,

The gradual path is present in every Buddhist tradition, not a Tibetan speciality at all. BTW, I wouldn't say that karma is a faith thing, except for those who lack understanding.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 16th, 2010 at 9:00 PM

Title: Re: Adaptation: 'Buddhism' in the West

Content:

Astus wrote:

"people should be taught philosophy as well as science"

Very unlikely to happen. Real study of philosophy requires intelligent, thinking people, without being restricted to thinking in a small box - this is not something many could study or teach. Also, education seems to be more and more under the attack from the god of money, and all subjected to the concept of productivity. A philosophy class is clearly useless for that.

"liberation from suffering ... science cannot achieve"

It needs the Buddhist definition of suffering to say that. There are other ways to look at what men need, like fast food, healthcare and plasma TV.

"Buddha did not teach a "belief system" but a path of practice."

This utilitarian approach is the common excuse of those who're looking only for stress relief but nothing more. It is not Buddhism, as they take no refuge.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 16th, 2010 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: Adaptation: 'Buddhism' in the West

Content:

Astus wrote:

Lazy_eye,

I meant was that the basis for the path is right view. Wrong view makes the path impossible and it is also a fundamental source of bad karma. What is right and what is wrong is hardly negotiable, at least in Buddhism. To sacrifice that for relativism and pragmatism is an unfortunate way to think, simply because it presupposes that the Buddha is wrong and the teaching is faulty. Who would want to learn Russian from a teacher one thinks has bad grammar?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 16th, 2010 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: Adaptation: 'Buddhism' in the West

Content:

Astus wrote:

Lazy_eye,

It is so. And the first things the Buddha taught were: giving, virtue and heaven. So the be good, do good parts. Then came the drawbacks of sensual passions and samsara and the rewards of renunciation. Finally the four noble truths.

If we want to use that example for the Western spreading of Buddhism it should be first establishing that good karma leads to good birth, and that people should give abundantly and live a virtuous and moral life. So this is the basics of ethics. Only after that we can talk about how samsara is full of suffering, even heavens are painful and they should give up their greedy and sensuous lifestyle. Finally we can get into details about the four noble truths, like dependent origination, nirvana, meditation, selflessness, etc.

What currently happens is that some become interested in meditation and fancy foreign mystical masters, then do some sitting and don't really care about other things. A couple of them becomes more interested and eventually learn something about Buddhism.

To me it seems that the so far successfully used teachings are simple meditation techniques and methods that promise fast attainments. Moral lessons are not what people come to Buddhism for. But I may be wrong.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 16th, 2010 at 10:42 PM

Title: Re: Adaptation: 'Buddhism' in the West

Content:

catmoon said:

Hooooold da bus. Your target audience is composed of people who believe ... that Buddha taught them as such

Astus wrote:

This is what I've made my reply on: "Pragmatism is often mentioned as a distinctive characteristic of the Buddha's teaching."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 17th, 2010 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Human Need.

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think the reply could be the five desires: drink-food, sleep, sex, fame, wealth.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 21st, 2010 at 3:11 PM

Title: Re: Adaptation: 'Buddhism' in the West

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is a nice summary on this subject from Ven. Jian Hu:

http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enUS/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=132&Itemid=59

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 24th, 2010 at 6:36 PM

Title: Re: Are there esoteric schools of Mahayana in Chinese tradition?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"I like to focus on the internal a lot."

I don't see exactly how Buddhist tantra is related to that, as it has a lot of rituals and visual practices, not that it doesn't have its depths. In China certain tantric elements have remained, like dharanis and ceremonies, but it is not a separate school. In fact, it's hard to talk about separate schools in Chinese Buddhism, unlike in Japan. Currently there are some tantric groups, of which there are three versions: 1, imported from Shingon 2, imported from Tibet/Mongolia 3, Chinese concoction, mainly from the other two. If you're looking for magic in China you better look around Taoist traditions, actually they've incorporated a lot from Buddhist tantra.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 24th, 2010 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: Are there esoteric schools of Mahayana in Chinese tradition?

Content:

plwk said:

http://www.tangmi.com/asd/English_TDES.htm

Astus wrote:

That is a good example of Shingon imported back to China.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 25th, 2010 at 4:05 PM

Title: Re: Tripitaka Container, or Sutra Container

Content:

Astus wrote:

Interesting, although I don't quite understand how one can "experience" something that happened more than two thousand years ago. I'd be interested in some evidence too.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 26th, 2010 at 8:05 PM

Title: Re: Khyentse Rinpoche quote and Soto view

Content:

Astus wrote:

The concept of "practice is enlightenment" is not specifically Soto. The idea that the original nature is enlightened and all deeds are the manifestation of that is generally Zen. The important point is the view of "buddha-nature" which is shared by both Dzogchen and Zen. But if we compare Dilgo Khyentse's description with a modern Zen intro to practice we can find how many of those guides include regular formal practice and other things. But it can be very similar too - a lot depends on who you ask.

Let's look at what http://wwzc.org/?operation=about_zen, "Zen is entering into things as they are, beyond concept and cosmology, beyond separation and duality, beyond personality, and into the intimacy and richness of this whole moment. It is a radical questioning into whatever arises as our experiences and true entry into the nature of experiencing. Zen is the day to day and moment to moment practice of this moment."

But if you actually ask how to do that we find something

<http://www.wwzc.org/teisho/beginners.htm>: "As well as sitting, we have walking practices called kinhin; we have movement practices called kata; for eating we have something called oryoki practice. There are also sleeping practices, dreaming practices, because in Zen we want to work with each aspect of our experience, completely. So then, none of these things are themselves Zen. Sitting is not Zen, kinhin is not Zen, oryoki is not Zen. The entire continuum of the training is Zen. ... You are not going to learn Zen in a week or a year or fifteen years."

Zen - in its rhetoric - is rarely so carefree as they like to present Dzogchen. On the other hand, Dzogchen doesn't stand alone but rather as a part of the nine vehicle training of the Nyingma school. Comparison then is very difficult. Especially because when it comes to the practical matters Zen doesn't say you're enlightened just like that, so simply be open and rest. Although "just sitting" sounds like that, but then, why only sit, or why sit at all?

Another important difference is how actual explanation and pointing out of the nature of mind is so hard to find in the Zen teachings while in Dzogchen it's right there. In Zen they like to say you have to do this and that and then you may find the nature of mind. In Dzogchen they try to show it right at the very beginning and then keep working with that. The way Dogen teaches is quite far from how Longchenpa elucidates the meaning. To read Dogen one needs to be able to decode the whole thing, and even then it's hard to gain much from it. Longchenpa is a lot more "user friendly".

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 29th, 2010 at 6:10 AM

Title: Re: Are there esoteric schools of Mahayana in Chinese tradition?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Robert Sharf, summing up his ideas outlined in "Coming to Terms with Chinese Buddhism" (p. 263-278), says in his essay "On Pure Land Buddhism and Ch'an/Pure Land Syncretism in Medieval China":

"The historiography of Chinese Pure Land turns out to run parallel in many respects to the historiography of Chinese Tantra or Esoterism (mi-chiao 密教). As I have argued elsewhere, there is little evidence that the Chinese conceived of an independent Tantric "school" during the T'ang when Esoterism was supposedly at its height. Moreover, there is simply no evidence that the so-called patriarchs of Chinese Tantric Buddhism—Subhakarasiṃha (Shan-wu-wei 善無畏, 637- 735), Vajrabodhi (Chin-kang-chih 金剛智, 671-741), Amoghavajra (Pu-k'ung 不空, 705-774), and so on—conceived of themselves as such. The category "Esoteric Buddhism" arose in the tenth and eleventh centuries, long after these masters had passed from the scene, and even then the Sung understanding of the term bears little resemblance to how the term is used by religious historians today. As in the case of Chinese Pure Land Buddhism, our contemporary understanding of Chinese Tantric Buddhism is inordinately influenced by developments in Japan. In both instances, scholars have come to view the Chinese materials through the long lens of Japanese Buddhist sectarian history."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 29th, 2010 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: The difference between Humanistic and Orthodox Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

Are you changing an attack against an imaginary Humanistic Buddhism into a criticism of a watered down Chinese/Pure Land Buddhism?

The majority of the laity is naturally not interested in abstract ideas like the four noble truths. There are exceptions of course and they're called the literati, the intelligentsia, but they're still the minority. There has never been and never will be a large group of householders being serious about enlightenment and liberation from samsara. Even in Pure Land teaching it is a basic part that one really wants to be free from the world of suffering and attain buddhahood, for which there's bodhicitta developed.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 29th, 2010 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: The difference between Humanistic and Orthodox Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

No, I don't give much credit to the majority even if they can read and write. They weren't less clever in older times just because there was no education. Still, people who go to university and study economics or science are not interested in going deeper into any religious teaching any more than those who could never finish secondary school. And it's not the potential but the willingness I doubt.

People are serious about liberation but not in this life? Well, it is this life, this world one tries to escape and never repeat again. If I say it's OK to go on with this once more then start working on getting out it's almost the same as never stopping.

In the gradual teachings the Buddha taught about virtues and heaven first. Pure Land is the Buddhist paradise where you can get enlightened. So it comes as a good teaching for everyone.

But as you can see for yourself in the West, where such "high teachings" as Zen, Vipassana and Dzogchen are widespread, people don't necessarily take them seriously. And even those interested in it are mostly middle class, well to do, well educated people.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 30th, 2010 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: Gays and East Asian Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

"male-female polarity is screwed up by homosexual acts"

What does this mean? I know there are two specific dharmas within rupa-dharmas in the Theravada abhidharma for masculinity and femininity but such is not found in Vasubandhu's Hundred Dharmas Treatise. I don't see what kind of polarity can there be established in Buddhism for males and females, so it'd be good if you could point it out.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 30th, 2010 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Gays and East Asian Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Does not one wonder why all the Tibetan tankas & statues show only male & female in sexual union?"

Is this a gay thing then, all three man, two with long hairs?

But I'm unsure how much it is appropriate to bring in tantric concepts.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 2nd, 2010 at 3:23 AM

Title: Re: Authorized Buddhist Books

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Only monks are allowed to teach the official positions of Buddhism."

I wonder what would Vimalakirti say about that. Or Sakya Trizin.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 2nd, 2010 at 10:51 PM

Title: Re: Authorized Buddhist Books

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Only monks are allowed to teach the official positions of Buddhism."

I wonder what would Vimalakirti say about that. Or Sakya Trizin.

Huseng said:

What would Astus say about it who teaches Buddhist courses IRL?

Astus wrote:

I think it was Ajahn Brahm who https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=owq_ougaikU that fortunately Buddhism is not owned by anyone. There is no such thing as "orthodox Buddhism" as there is no single person or a group to tell what is official and what is heretic. That's why there are different schools.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 3rd, 2010 at 3:35 AM

Title: Re: Authorized Buddhist Books

Content:

Astus wrote:

Ron,

You argue that instead of higher ordination (that of a bhiksu/ni) it is lineage that qualifies somebody to be an authority on anything Buddhist. But what lineage would that be? Certainly no sutra claims the existence of any lineage. Since the Buddha's time the only lineage has been is the lineage of higher ordination, which is a matter of precepts and not doctrine. Beyond that in China they created the idea of the Zen lineage and later in India there was the Tantric lineage. But certainly Zen and Mantrayana are just two later schools within Buddhism. What about everyone else from Theravada to Huayan?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 3rd, 2010 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: Authorized Buddhist Books

Content:

Astus wrote:

"We should note that in modern times, the eight Chinese Mahayana Buddhist schools have been reclassified into three schools, and that the boundaries among these schools should no longer be maintained. Even the boundary between Mahayana and Nikaya Buddhism should be eradicated to restore Buddhism to a whole. If someone still wants to fight against the times and call himself the nth patriarch of this school or that sect, he is advised to forget it. As a matter of fact, the eminent monks throughout history were not necessarily patriarchs of any school. Conversely, the official "Dharma heirs" of a school, who held a certificate of succession, were not always enlightened, eminent monks."

(Ven. Shengyan: Orthodox Chinese Buddhism, p. 138)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 3rd, 2010 at 9:29 PM

Title: Re: Contradiction on Original Nature - Question

Content:

Astus wrote:

Nirvana being the original nature doesn't mean that in the beginning everything was nirvana which then turned into samsara. It means that without attachment there is nirvana and nirvana is not something created by practice, rather practice is removing hindrances. It's like saying that the original nature of the floor is clean, so if you clear up you get it in its original nature.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 4th, 2010 at 4:58 AM

Title: Re: Contradiction on Original Nature - Question

Content:

Astus wrote:

Depends on what you're looking for. Is it buddha-nature you're interested in? If so, there are translations with commentaries of the Mahayana Uttaratantra Shastra, aka Ratnagotravibhaga which is a long treatise in verse form on buddha-nature. You can find sutras on it, like the Nirvana Sutra and the Srimaladevi Sutra. There are teachings on it from specific traditions like Mahamudra and Zen. The topic is really vast. If it is totally new to you I recommend Paul Williams' book "Mahayana Buddhism: The Doctrinal Foundations" and it has a whole chapter on Tathagatagarbha, among other things. Perhaps you better go through the whole book.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 4th, 2010 at 3:33 PM

Title: Re: Contradiction on Original Nature - Question

Content:

Astus wrote:
SonamZangpo,

The buddha-nature teaching is one of the many teachings in Mahayana but not a teaching universally accepted by all Mahayana traditions. Also, we all start as deluded beings on the path. If that were not the case there would be no need for a path.

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, October 5th, 2010 at 5:04 AM
Title: Re: Sexual energy
Content:

Astus wrote:
Sensual lust is not in the body but the mind. It is your mind you should train if you want to gain some control over your passion. Starting meditation practice itself is good for calming the mind which in itself is efficient in decreasing disturbing impulses. Also, through meditation you can eventually gain insight into the nature of sensual craving. So the best thing you can do is to look around in your area and join a Buddhist group where you can learn the basics of meditation practice.

Specifically for sensual lust the antidote used is meditation on impurity (asubha bhavana). Note that it is better if you already know the basics of how to calm your mind, which is the fundamental for any meditation practice in Buddhism. Here you can find a comprehensive introduction to meditation on impurity:
<https://sites.google.com/site/dhammagroupweb/pubs/asubhaparts>. Here you can find it with pictures: <http://www.wakeupsmart.com/Asubha.html>.

And for some food for thought, here's the relevant chapter from Aryadeva's Four Hundred Stanzas:

Regardless of the amount of time,
Concerning objects there is no limit.
Your exertion for the body's sake
Is, like a bad physician's, useless.

Just as the craving for earth
Does not stop in those that subsist on it,
Similarly, longing for sensual pleasure
Grows in people as they indulge.

Among all women there is not the least
Difference in sexual intercourse.
When others, too, enjoy her appearance,
What use is this perfect woman to you?

Whoever sees her as appealing
Thinks himself satisfied with her.

Since even dogs and the like share this,
Why, fool, are you attracted?

This woman, every part of whom is Lovely to you, was common to all before.
Finding her is not as Astonishing as it is for you.

If those with good qualities seem attractive
And their opposite the reverse,
Which is true, former or latter?
For neither alone persists.

A fool's desire does not arise
Only for those with good qualities.
How can reason prevent
Those involved in it without reason?

As long as she knows no other
She will remain with you.
As with disease, woman should always be Kept from opportunity.

In old age one dislikes
What one did during youth.
Why would the liberated not
Be extremely saddened by it?

Those without desire have no pleasure,
Nor do those not foolish have it.
How can there be pleasure for one
Whose mind constantly strays?

You cannot have intercourse constantly
With a woman to match your attentiveness to her.
Why keep her possessively with the thought,
"She is mine and no one else's."

If desire were pleasurable
There would be no need for women.
Pleasure is not regarded as Something to get rid of.

Even in intercourse with a woman
Pleasure arises from other [factors].
What sensible person would say
It is caused just by his lover?

Blinded by desire they do not see
Sensuality's fault, like a leper scratching.
Those free from desire see the infatuated
As suffering like the leper.

During a famine the destitute,
Tormented by hunger, [bear] what occurs.
This is how all the infatuated
Behave when they are with women.

Through arrogance one may be Attached even to one's privy.
Anyone infatuated with
A woman will be jealous of others.

It is reasonable for confusion
And anger about the unclean to occur;
It is not at all reasonable
For desire to occur.

If, except to some people,
A pot of filth is objectionable,
Why would one not think objectionable
That from which the filth comes?

Clean things are looked upon
As the most worthless of all.
What intelligent person
Would say that it is clean?

Whoever has lived in a privy
And without it would not have survived,
In such a dung-worm, arrogance
Arises only through stupidity.

No means whatsoever will purify
The inside of the body.
The efforts you make toward the outside
Do not match those toward the inside.

If, like leprosy, being full of Urine were not common to all,
Those full of urine, just like lepers,
Would be shunned by everyone.

Just as someone lacking a part

Is delighted with a substitute nose,
Desire holds that impurity is Remedied by flowers and so forth.

It is inappropriate to call clean that
Toward which freedom from desire arises.
Nor is there anything which is
A definitive cause of desire.

In summary, all four, that is Impermanence, uncleanness, suffering
And selflessness are possible
With regard to a single [thing].

Understanding that sentient beings are also bound
Like oneself in this unclean prison,
With energy generate compassion observing transmigrators,
And make effort to accomplish highest enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 5th, 2010 at 7:29 AM

Title: Re: My Spiritual history and a plea to young Buddhists

Content:

Astus wrote:

Wow, it was a good read! I hope the best for you and with this enthusiasm and literary skills you should make a fine monk.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 5th, 2010 at 4:07 PM

Title: Re: Contradiction on Original Nature - Question

Content:

Astus wrote:

Nosta,

The teaching of original nature (benxing 本性) is not the same as the teaching of nirvana. First, nirvana is one of the core teachings of Buddhism while original nature is itself a Chinese term we can connect to the teaching of tathagatagarbha, and tathagatagarbha is something we find only in specific Mahayana sutras. Understandably, non-Mahayana schools never even had the concept of original nature and even in Mahayana it was something only a few traditions took up. And here is the second reason, that original nature doesn't necessarily fit into the teachings of a tradition. For instance, both Madhyamaka and Yogacara - the two main systems of Mahayana - has teachings contradicting the idea of an original nature. Or, even when in some cases teachers of those schools accepted tathagatagarbha, they came up with their own interpretation of it. It was in Chinese Buddhism that because of these reasons they actually said that besides Madhyamaka and Yogacara there is a third major Mahayana thought, Tathagatagarbhavada, i.e. those who take original nature as a fundamental teaching.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 5th, 2010 at 4:15 PM

Title: Re: Contradiction on Original Nature - Question

Content:

SonamZangpo said:

What I meant is that the Buddha consciousness is universal, primordial. Our consciousness is made of the stuffs of that, but then deluded by karmic perception. In this way I mean we are already Enlightened, but made ignorant by our perceptions and must realize it.

Astus wrote:

Let's say I have a load of money in the bank. But first I have to work for years in order to earn the money and be able to use it. Isn't that the same as if I had no money but got a regular salary from someone else? That's how the idea that there is a buddha-nature hidden somewhere is redundant and good only for giving hope to those full of fears. This is called expedient means in Buddhism. You can find a similar explanation in the Lankavatara Sutra, how buddha-nature teaching is for those who fear losing their selves. I'm not saying that there is no other use of the buddha-nature teaching, but on the level that "it is there, you just have to polish it" is nothing but a good sounding promise without any practical relevance.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 5th, 2010 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: Contradiction on Original Nature - Question

Content:

Nosta said:

Astus, it seems that you don't see such teaching (O.Nature) as very useful.

Also, I would say that's a shame that some teachings may not be real Buddha teachings (like that one from O.Nature and maybe Amithabha existence) because they just appeared after Buddha death.

Astus wrote:

The teaching of original nature has many uses and an important part of Mahayana. But it is important to understand it according to its different meanings in different traditions. Saying generally that there is some essential enlightenment in all of us can be very misleading. Personally, as someone who takes Chan as his primary school, I regard buddha-nature as the crucial doctrine of Buddhism. Nevertheless, one should be first clear about the elementary teachings before making hasty interpretations of what original nature means. By the way, history and religious doctrine are two separate areas of study. If you want to take Mahayana as your path you will see how Amita Buddha is absolutely real.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 7th, 2010 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: Lack of knowledge about world religions in the US

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Not to mention the fact that religion has probably been the number one cause of war since the Dinosaurs went bye-bye."

What an enlightened article. I'd rather ponder whether religion has been ever the cause of any war. But OK, this is just another stereotypical concept about religion and why people don't even want to know about it. Also, ignorance about religion simply means that it is irrelevant in people's lives. How would it ever matter for a bloke in Minnesota what unknown people in a never heard of country believe in? It is false premise that reflective and critical thinking is every human being's domain. Who would expect that at least the majority of citizens can paint, sing and dance on a fairly enjoyable level? Higher intelligence is just like artistic skills: not everybody has it, and they don't need it either.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 10th, 2010 at 1:25 AM

Title: Re: Lack of knowledge about world religions in the US

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Are you saying that the Crusades were not a result of any religious motivations?"

It is easy to simplify historic events to single causes. It is also easy to understand how such a thinking is naive and mistaken. Religion - if defined as a set of doctrines accepted by a group of people - is hardly ever the direct cause of violence except if it is explicitly about killing, like in the case of human sacrifices. War is a big enterprise for any country and it takes lot of planning and organising to measure what a nation can profit from such a costly event. Religion in many cases can be a good ideology to justify violent acts. But to say that religion is the cause is confusing things. We'd be a bit closer to the truth to say that it is politics causing violence, since it is politics that actually govern a country and its army. However, politics is a product of many people with different agendas, so blaming "politics" is still quite a deluded opinion.

As for the Crusades, on <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Crusades> you can read a summary. It says, the initiating cause was the Byzantine Empire's request to the Pope to send soldiers against threatening Turks. And as the circumstances were appropriate the Pope agreed, just like many rulers of European countries.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 10th, 2010 at 4:44 AM

Title: Re: Lack of knowledge about world religions in the US

Content:

Astus wrote:

What I argue against is the concept that religion is behind most of the wars ever happened as the article claimed. But I'm OK with reducing that to a position that religion doesn't cause war except when it is a religion about causing war. I don't see Christianity generally (Roman Catholicism included) as a warring religion. By this I don't deny that just as Christianity has played an important role in European history it was used on several occasions to justify wars. But justifying a war and inducing a war is not the same. And even if I was proved wrong in the case of Christianity - which would require proving that Christianity is essentially a doctrine making people kill each other in wars - there are still hundreds of other religions both extinct and living.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 10th, 2010 at 6:33 AM

Title: Re: The benefits of studying Theravada for Mahayana?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Tibetan tradition uses primarily the study of abhidharma texts as providing the basis in fundamental teachings, which for them they are the Sarvastivada and Sautrantika teachings. Also, the Nikayas found in the Pali Canon have no exact correspondents in the Tibetan Canon - unlike in the Chinese Canon -, although some parts of it can be found here and there in Tibetan.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 10th, 2010 at 5:32 PM

Title: Re: Lack of knowledge about world religions in the US

Content:

Astus wrote:

Luke,

The use of Romanus Pontifex to justify slavery is a good example of people using religion to justify their acts. If you read this essay by Fr. Joel S. Panzer, <http://www.ewtn.com/library/ANSWERS/POPSLAVE.htm>, you find that even before the said decree slavery has been condemned, just as not long after the colonisation of America, in 1537 Pope Paul III issued an encyclical against the injustice done to the natives in America. It should also be noted that the United States has never been under the rule of the Pope.

Seeing others as non/sub-humans is not a specifically religious but a general human attitude. In fact it is a basic Christian idea that all humans are capable of being saved, thus it was naturally the position of the Roman Catholic Church that the people of foreign lands are humans and can be converted. Nevertheless, this is not even the case of a religion causing war.

From a Buddhist perspective, violence is from greed, hatred and ignorance. Greed for others' possessions, hatred against those we don't know and ignorance about the law of karma. Christianity, as a religion, teaches contentment, love and divine punishment. Same can be said about Islam. So to me it seems to be a more complex issue here than just saying religion causes war.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 10th, 2010 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: Lack of knowledge about world religions in the US

Content:

Astus wrote:

Luke,

I'm simply against demonising the concept of religion. Naturally every religion that has grown influential enough for a larger group of people, which is true especially in the case of the three largest religions (Buddhism, Christianity, Islam), wars and other forms of bad things have been part of its history. But it's a different thing to say that religion is the reason for a war or that a religion has been involved in some ways in military conflicts. To blame the conquer of North American natives on Christianity is quite absurd. Isn't it that certain European kingdoms wanted to rule the whole place? Priests were neither military leaders nor government officials to eliminate the local population.

And let me repeat, I'm putting forth here an argument against the preconception that religion is something that creates wars. This is a view, a philosophical idea, and not a historical event. Religion includes all the religions, even the religions of Native Americans. It is not the same as saying there are religious militant groups and terrorists who use a religion as their ideology. Should we conclude that Buddhism causes wars because there were Buddhists warring? Is Buddhism as a religion faulty at slavery because there were Buddhists keeping slaves?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 11th, 2010 at 3:11 AM

Title: Re: Lack of knowledge about world religions in the US

Content:

Astus wrote:

"I guess what I should have said earlier is that the misuse of religion has been one of the most negative forces in history."

That's what I was talking about. Also, it should be reduced mainly to the people involved with Christianity and Islam. And that is not because those religions are specifically more evil than the others. It's just that they have been integrated into the government of nations to the level that no other religion has been so they could become state ideology. Buddhism could reach that level of penetration of a society only in a few countries and not always for a long time. So actually it is a sign of success for those religions that they could become the leading force. And while there are certain bad results from such a high level of acceptance of a doctrine, there are also good things that could be attributed to their influence.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 12th, 2010 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: What needs to be done to create new Nalandas in the west?

Content:

Astus wrote:

University with educated monks first of all requires monasteries with monks. But since there are only a handful of operational monasteries in the West it is unlikely that any time in the near future such a university will be established. The original idea of the bhikshu lifestyle is that they should be self-sufficient mendicants. Monasteries receive their funding from the local laity. So the starting point is to have lay Buddhists. Obviously, if there are no Buddhists there can't be monasteries nor monastic universities. The question is then how to spread Buddhism in the West. And I mean active spreading, not just waiting for people to decide that they're Buddhist just because they find HHDL, or TNH charming. And by Buddhist I mean religious people and not those who are simply fond of meditation as a hobby. Then there's a good chance for a real growth in the number of monasteries since people will realise the importance of accumulating merit, etc.

If there are some who want to be educated beyond a basic level there are a couple of options. First one is to go east, become a monk and study. Second is to go to a university, study religion/eastern languages and focus on Buddhist materials. Third is to just start studying.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 13th, 2010 at 7:44 PM

Title: Re: Interviews with Bhikkhu Nanananda

Content:

Astus wrote:

Nice. It's always been the view of Candrakirti and Tsongkhapa that sravakas realise the same emptiness as bodhisattvas. If they'd add some bodhicitta to it we could actually call it Mahayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 13th, 2010 at 11:18 PM

Title: The Origin of "Not Finding"

Content:

Astus wrote:

In Zhiyi's Little Samatha-Vipasyana we find "即當反觀行心，不見相貌。當知行者及行中一切法，畢竟空寂，是名修觀。" which in Ven. Dharmamitra's translation is "One should then immediately turn back the attention and contemplate the mind which is engaged in walking. One then fails to perceive any characteristic appearance associated with it. One should then realize that the one who walks as well as all dharmas involved in walking are both ultimately empty and still. It is this which constitutes the cultivation of [insight] contemplation."

In Tibetan meditation instructions it is a regular theme that one should look for the self/mind and find nothing, and this finding nothing is emptiness. What I'd like to know is the precedents of this kind of instruction. I haven't yet looked up in Nagarjuna's upadesa, perhaps there's something. But any other early quote is appreciated too.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 14th, 2010 at 5:47 AM

Title: Re: The Origin of "Not Finding"

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm looking specifically for meditation instructions applying the mentioned method and pointing out that not finding anything as the essence of mind, or mind itself is the whole point.

Something similar can be found in this classic Zen story, but even this is not exactly it:

Bodhidharma sat facing the wall. The Second Patriarch stood in the snow. He cut off his arm and presented it to Bodhidharma, crying, "My mind has no peace as yet! I beg you, master, please pacify my mind!" "Bring your mind here and I will pacify it for you," replied Bodhidharma. "I have searched for my mind, and I cannot take hold of it," said the Second Patriarch. "Now your mind is pacified," said Bodhidharma. (Gateless Gate, case 41, tr. by Katsuki Sekida)

Also a passage that comes close to it from the MPPU (chapter on the Mahayana form of smṛtyupasthāna, mindfulness of mind):

智者雖觀是心生滅相，亦不得實生滅法，不分別垢淨而得心清淨。以是心清淨故，不為客煩惱所染。(T25n1509_p0204a07-09)

"And although the wise person considers the characteristics of birth (utpāda) and cessation (nirodha) of this mind, he will find no true birth, no true cessation. Not finding any defilement (saṃkleśa) or purification (vyāvaḍāna) in it, he discovers this luminosity of the mind (cittasya prabhāsvara), a luminosity by virtue of which the mind is not defiled by the adventitious passions (na khale āgantukair upakleśair upakliṣyate)." (tr. by Gelongma Karma Migme Chodron of Lamotte's translation, vol. 3, p. 979 / PDF p. 118)

What I'm looking for actually fits the "emptiness of non-perception":

何以故名不可得空？為智力少故不可得？為實無故不可得？ 答曰： 諸法實無故不可得，非智力少也。(T25n1509_p0295c13)

"Why do you assert this emptiness of non-perception? If dharmas are not perceived, is this due to weakness of knowledge (jñānadaurbalya) or because they do not truly exist? Answer. – It is because dharmas really do not exist that they are not perceived, and not due to weakness of knowledge." (vol. 4, p. 1762 / PDF p. 358)

However, the 18 emptinesses are used more as theoretical teachings rather than practical ones.

"What is unascertainable emptiness? Those dharmas which are past, future, and present, are not got at. And why? In a past (dharma) the future (dharmas) cannot be got at: nor in a future the past; nor in a present (dharma) can the past and future (dharmas) be got at: nor in the past and future (dharmas) the present ones. The unascertainable emptiness is the non-apprehension of these, because they are pure from the very beginning, on account of their being neither unmoved nor destroyed. For such is their essential nature." (Large PP Sutra, I. 9, 12, §15. PDF p. 184)

"As soon as this present moment appears, at that very moment it will exhaust or cease to exist. The past is gone; the future has not yet come, so they are not entities. This is what we call 'not apprehended'. But there is no such phenomenon about which you can conclude that it is an unapprehended phenomenon, because 'unapprehended' itself is empty. This is 'emptiness of unapprehended'." (Dzongsar Khyentse Rinpoche's commentary to Madhyamakavatara 6:216-217 in "Introduction to the Middle Way", PDF p. 334)

It is not exactly like how Thrangu Rinpoche puts it:

"it has been resolved that objects of mind and mind itself are not to be found, and that the not-finding-anything when you look for the mind is not because you have failed to find it; nor is it because the mind exists but is somehow too subtle to be found in that way; nor is it because it is too far away from you, too distant to be seen after all it is your mind. The reason that you do not find anything is that in not finding anything you are finding what the mind is, which is emptiness, and this is a matter of direct experience." (Ocean of Definitive Meaning, p. 75)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 14th, 2010 at 7:56 PM

Title: Re: The Origin of "Not Finding"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Master Huifeng, thanks for that. Very resourceful. So you just looked up 不可得? Would that be correct for "not finding"? Maybe the Tibetan term could be helpful too. Well, it seems that is the original idea behind the meditation instruction. But is there any meditation advice connected to it, or I should be content with the fact that different sutras describe that there is nothing to be found which is emptiness itself?

For the English translations, here are two.

For the first quote (SA 262, corresponds to <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.090.than.html>) there is a translation http://tipitaka.wikia.com/wiki/SA_262:

Respectfully saluting by joining palms, he said to the venerable Ānanda:

"It is just so! As it is the noble life of wisdom, a good friend teaches the discipline and the dharma.

"Now, I have heard the dharma from the venerable Ānanda thus: All activities are empty, tranquil, not to be grasped at; and the destruction of craving, the fading away of desire, cessation, is nirvāṇa.

"The mind is joyful, one dwells rightly in liberation, and there is no returning, no more seeing self; one sees only the true dharma."

The quote from the Sutra of the Collection of the Original Acts of the Buddha (佛本行集經 - second poem) in my crappy translation:

"Look for it in all directions
But you don't find any dharma.
Because of conditions
The saṃskāras are born.
Examining yourself
Empty observation meets suchness.
Skandhas enter all the objects
Within and without all is peaceful."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 15th, 2010 at 4:58 AM

Title: Re: The Origin of "Not Finding"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Master Huifeng,

Thanks, I'm trying. How do you search like that? Is that Google search for CBETA? Don't you think suttacentral is fine? That's what I use, plus it's online.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 18th, 2010 at 5:37 PM

Title: Re: The Ten Bhūmis

Content:

Astus wrote:

Locked as Requested by OP.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 18th, 2010 at 7:01 PM

Title: Re: What needs to be done to create new Nalandas in the west?

Content:

Astus wrote:

To gather all the different traditions and make the university "non-denominational" seems like a huge challenge. Modernisation of Buddhism would require a view beyond sects, and not just small sects but the whole "hinayana-mahayana-vajrayana" concept. Because if that remains it just results in different groups at the university all saying they're the "true and original Buddhism" - not a good environment for anyone who actually wants to study there. Or it can be led by lay scholars, making the academic view the standard and not allowing any sectarian position on the part of the governing body.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 18th, 2010 at 10:37 PM

Title: Re: What needs to be done to create new Nalandas in the west?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't see how adding natural science to Buddhism could modernise it. It simply complicates things by irrelevant data. Natural science is restricted to the study of the four elements. What use is there of a huge load of information on how the elements work? Other fields, like philosophy, comparative religious studies, history, philology, linguistics and psychology can be used as secondary studies. Still, that is not exactly what would mean modernisation. It should be actually making changes in the Buddhist teachings themselves, creating new forms, new ways of transmitting the Dharma. Just like it's happened throughout history with the introduction of the different Abhidharma texts, Prajnaparamita, Madhyamaka, Yogacara, Pramana, and all the others up to Tiantai, Chan, Vajrayana, Burmese Vipassana, Thai Forest Sangha, etc. And not even a university is needed for that.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 19th, 2010 at 3:44 PM

Title: Re: What needs to be done to create new Nalandas in the west?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"But still, I think the ongoing dialogue between scientists and Buddhists which the Dalai Lama and others have promoted is an important one and is something which should be continued at a world-class Buddhist university. By discontinuing it, I think modern Buddhists would lose more than they would gain."

It's fine to do and continue the dialogue. It's like the dialogue between religions. It's not with the purpose of "integrating Jesus into the Noble Eightfold Path" but just sharing ideas. My main point is that simply using natural science to analyse certain Buddhist phenomena doesn't make Buddhism modern but only the subject of some researchers.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 19th, 2010 at 4:17 PM

Title: Re: The real truth behind Zen masters' self-mutilation?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Those are just stories without historical reliability, just like most of the stories about the early Zen masters.

On the other hand, self-mutilation on some level has been part of Chinese Buddhism for a long time. There's a larger study related to this, Burning for the Buddha: Self-Immolation in Chinese Buddhism by James A. Benn. Also, Paul Williams in his "Mahayana Buddhism: The Doctrinal Foundations" gives a little insight into this Chinese tradition in the chapter on the Lotus Sutra and its influences, with extra info in the notes. He quotes Benn, "self-immolation was a practice that cut across the whole of the samgha in China. From Chan monks, to scholars, to Pure Land believers, all kinds of monks and nuns found valid reasons for offering their bodies".

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 19th, 2010 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: What needs to be done to create new Nalandas in the west?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Science proves things which are empirically verifiable"

A very questionable statement, both from a Western philosophical and a Buddhist point of view. But this is not the main issue. Rather it is that science includes no morality, it's rather a technology, a skill, like architecture and shoemaking.

"we hold Buddhist teachings in a higher regard than the teachings of other religions"

Just as it should be done with every other philosophies too, including science.

"If science has clearly proven something, such as gravity, then a modern Buddhist has to accept that."

It is a

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Philosophy_of_science#Grounds_of_validity_of_scientific_reasoning what constitutes "clear proof". The closest to that kind of investigation is Buddhist epistemology started by Dignaga and Dharmakirti and studied mainly within Tibetan Buddhism. However, when teachings talk about a mind (karma) created world, the basis for objective observation becomes quite unstable.

"Science has a special status because it is as close as a person who is a materialist can ever get to absolute truth."

Science is not the only way to be materialist. Why is it the best then?

More importantly, why should science be the main/sole representative of modernity? It was not just science that made its impact, or rather, not just the scientific way of investigation, since science itself is quite diverse and in constant change. Modernity includes many other things, like social changes and art movements. And by modernity I simply mean the time after WW2, or perhaps we should count it from the invention of the Internet.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 20th, 2010 at 5:35 PM

Title: Re: What needs to be done to create new Nalandas in the west?

Content:

Luke said:

Sure, people can study other aspects of modernity if they wish, but I would argue that science is one of the most powerful forces of modernity. For example, I would say that quantum physics has had a greater impact on people's lives than Cubism or atonal music.

Astus wrote:

Definitely, through science we have now clear tap water (polluted rivers), internet (power plants) and plastic bags. Life has become a lot more convenient, at least for those living in the richer areas of the planet. For others, science gave them job at a factory, machine guns and trucks.

But that is just outer change, change in things we use. In case of Buddhism, I think we better look at the inner parts, the ruling mentality, like consumerism, idolisation of the body, feminism, relationship and family models, physicalism and scientism, new age and neopagan beliefs, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 20th, 2010 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: What needs to be done to create new Nalandas in the west?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think TMingyur's argument is to the point. If somebody wants to study there are different options present. Even if someone is not rich enough to spend even three months in the mountains doing a retreat, there are teachers in the West and quite a lot of translations both online and offline, plus the teachings given by modern teachers. Also, one can choose to become a monk, and there are no application fees.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 21st, 2010 at 3:58 PM

Title: Re: What needs to be done to create new Nalandas in the west?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Good post Huseng!

I think there are things to learn from our Christian brethren we live among. They actually know how to spread a religion and do it quite effectively in countries where Jesus is as foreign as Buddha in the West. And even in a mainly Buddhist country like Thailand (0.8% Christian according to the latest (2000) census) there are four Christian universities of different churches. But unlike with the Christian teaching, Buddhism's core teachings are not propagated, or even described by many teachers. I find that mainly Theravada teachers, like Walpola Rahula and K. Sri Dhammananda, published books with the attempt to sum the teachings up in an easily accessible form for a Western audience. I think that is because when teaching Mahayana (Chinese or Tibetan) it is either simplified into a specific teaching and practice (eg. Zen, Dzogchen, Pure Land, Chod) or it gets very complicated, trying to present the whole thing from Abhidharma to Prasangika Madhyamaka. And even if "general Mahayana" is explained - mainly from the Tibetan tradition - it is taught as something actually inferior to Vajrayana which they don't talk about there. So a primary issue - to actually make Buddhism something consumable by a larger audience - is to develop the appropriate presentation of it accepted by the majority of Western Buddhists and not get lost in the differences and varieties of lineages. Again, such thing was attempted only by Theravadin teachers, like Joseph Goldstein, Ajahn Sujato and Ajahn Amaro.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 21st, 2010 at 4:45 PM

Title: Re: What needs to be done to create new Nalandas in the west?

Content:

Astus wrote:

That's assuming that the descendants of immigrants will keep the religion and not decide to be assimilated into the non-religious or Christian local community.

One of my Zen teachers (non-Asian) said that what he regretted about retreats was that there was no opportunity to get to know the others he spent the time with there. So on his retreats there are quite a lot of community programs, discussions, in a not so organised format. It is not a formal retreat at all and hardly about doing a lot of meditation. However, it is not advertised for outsiders, but everyone is welcome.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 21st, 2010 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: What needs to be done to create new Nalandas in the west?

Content:

Astus wrote:

It's unlikely that monks and teachers will take the initiative. I'm saying that because from Buddhist history it seems to me that usually it was the laity that started things and the monastic sangha eventually reacted on it. That is understandable as far as it is the monks duty to maintain the tradition, so they're supposed to be the conservative force. There are exceptions of course.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 22nd, 2010 at 3:21 PM

Title: Re: Zen Centre's in Japan

Content:

Astus wrote:

Shodo Harada's monastery, Sogenji is also a host of international students from all over the world.

<http://www.onedropzendo.org/onedrops.php>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 22nd, 2010 at 3:32 PM

Title: Re: What needs to be done to create new Nalandas in the west?

Content:

Huifeng said:

Maybe just learn that dana comes before sila, samadhi and prajna on the path?

Astus wrote:

Are you suggesting that the "Buddhist Law of Attraction" is that "the more you give the more you get"? So, Buddhists should give more money/effort and more teaching which results in more followers who're willing to pay for monasteries. Logical.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 25th, 2010 at 5:26 PM

Title: Re: Buddha-nature

Content:

Astus wrote:

It's good to have faith in one's inherent buddha-nature. But that should be for supporting one's motivation on the path and not as an excuse for avoiding the path. Also, there are vague, undefined terms in the OP, which even suggest certain misunderstandings about buddha-nature and other things.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 28th, 2010 at 4:18 PM

Title: Re: Buddha-nature

Content:

Astus wrote:

In the Tiantai/Tendai system you find the six identities, which is the beings relation to buddha-nature. See, Sheng-yen: Orthodox Chinese Buddhism, p. 100-103.

1. Identity to Buddhahood in Principle
2. Identity to Buddhahood in Name

3. Identity to Buddhahood in Contemplative Practice
4. Identity to Buddhahood in Semblance
5. Identity to Buddhahood in Partial Realization
6. Absolute Identity to Buddhahood

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 29th, 2010 at 7:41 PM

Title: Re: Buddha-nature

Content:

Astus wrote:

Individual,

You can read Shengyan's book online:

<http://www.shengyen.org.tw/big5/book/orthodox.pdf> (PDF)

Go to the given chapter and read what the six identities stand for.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 30th, 2010 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

"What troubles me is that, living in such a utopia, what motive would anyone have for attaining enlightenment?"

You find it in the sutras, the Pure Land is all about the Dharma, teaching is happening all the time everywhere. Even the wind, blowing through the leaves of the Bodhi-tree, when heard by beings everywhere, gives them insight into the dharmas and they attain the stage of non-regression. Also, even before being born there, the initial motive, shinjin, is for the attainment of buddhahood and not about being born into a heavenly realm.

"Another thing that just doesn't tally is the claim that life in Amida's Pure Land is eternal."

You agree that nirvana is eternal. Buddhas are always "in nirvana" and there's no time limit in buddhahood. A buddha-land is a creation, an extension of a buddha. How couldn't it be eternal? Still, it is not eternal in the sense of constant but that its continuity has no end.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 3rd, 2010 at 12:23 AM

Title: Re: Was Shakyamuni Chinese?

Content:

Astus wrote:

What about <https://sites.google.com/site/nyugatibuddhismus/home/bevezets/modern-buddha-brzolsok>? Nevertheless, the way we picture buddha is a romantic form and have little to do with "real", though we might call it the real buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 3rd, 2010 at 4:35 PM

Title: Re: What is the role of Shakyamuni Buddha in Pure Land?

Content:

Huseng said:

Is there any way to empirically verify such a claim besides dying and seeing if you end up in the Pure Land?

Astus wrote:

Once you reach a higher bodhisattva level you'll have no problem seeing buddha-lands far far away. Or perhaps even on the 1st bhumi you can converse with buddhas. Also, the Pratyutpannasamadhi Sutra gives you a technique to meet Amita Buddha face to face. And maybe you can try phowa too. There's also an attainment called nenbutsu-sanmei which for instance Honen could achieve. So many ways, you just have to choose the one you like.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 3rd, 2010 at 6:38 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism & Desire

Content:

Astus wrote:

What you talk about as desire is put under "kama-trsna/tanha", ie. sensual desire. There's a study discovering desire in the Pali Canon: The Philosophy of Desire in the Buddhist Pali Canon by David Webster. You might want to take a look at it. There's also a short summary of this topic: <http://www.buddhanet.net/4noble12.htm>.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 3rd, 2010 at 9:18 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism & Desire

Content:

Astus wrote:

Shinchan,

Your question was raised long before by a certain brahmana:

"If that's so, Master Ananda, then it's an endless path, and not one with an end, for it's impossible that one could abandon desire by means of desire."

Read the whole story:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn51/sn51.015.than.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 13th, 2010 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: Heavy Metal goes tantric

Content:

Astus wrote:

Very nice, I've been looking for a Buddhist metal band for a while now. Are there others like The Firstborn who actually play Buddhist metal?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 13th, 2010 at 6:51 AM

Title: Re: The Eastern Music Thread!

Content:

Astus wrote:

The essence of Japanese music:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s = document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Vietnamese pop:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Vietnamese rock:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Vietnamese hip hop:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Burmese hip hop:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Indian pop:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Indian metal:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Did you know that the second song on this list (Vietnamese pop) is originally a https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dragostea_din_tei?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 14th, 2010 at 1:39 AM

Title: Re: How do monks put up with celibacy?

Content:

from Dahui Zonggao's letter to Hsu Tun-chi, Swampland Flowers p. 33-35 said:
When has it ever been necessary to leave wife and children, quit one's job, chew on vegetable roots, and cause pain to the body? Those of inferior aspiration shun clamor and seek quietude: thense they enter the ghost cave of "dead tree Ch'an" entertaining false ideas that only thus can they awaken to the Path. ... If you can manage not to forget the matter of birth and death while in the midst of the passions of the world, then even though you do not immediately smash the lacquer bucket (of ignorance), nevertheless you will have planted deep the seed-wisdom of transcendental knowledge (prajna). In another lifetime you will appear and save your mental power. You won't fall into evil dispositions: you'll overcome that sinking down into the defilement of passion. As a gentleman of affairs, your study of the Path differs greatly from mine as a homeleaver. Leavers of home do not serve their parents, and abandon all their relatives for good. With one jug and one bowl, in daily activities according to circumstances, there are not so many enemies to obstruct the Path. With one mind and one intent (homeleavers) just investigate this affair thoroughly. But when a gentleman of affairs opens his eyes and is mindful of what he sees, there is nothing that is not an enemy spirit blocking the Path. If he has wisdom, he makes his meditational effort right there. As Vimalakirti said, "The companions of passion are the progenitors of the Tathagatas: I fear that people will destroy the worldly aspect to seek the real aspect." He also made a comparison: "It's like the high plateau not producing lotus flowers: it is the mud of the low-lying marshlands that produces these flowers."

If you can penetrate through right there ... your power will surpass that of us leavers of home by twentyfold. What's the reason? We leavers of home are on the outside breaking in; gentlemen of affairs are on the inside breaking out. The power of one on the outside breaking in is weak; the power of one on the inside breaking out is strong.

"Strong" means that what is opposed is heavy, so in overturning it there is power.

"Weak" means what is opposed is light, so in overturning it there is little power. Though there is strong and weak in terms of power, what is opposed is the same.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 15th, 2010 at 7:14 PM

Title: Re: How do monks put up with celibacy?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Ven. Seung Sahn in his "The Compass of Zen" talks about sex as "not good, not bad" (p. 72). He refers to the 36th teacher of Sudhana in the Avatamsaka Sutra who was a prostitute liberating people through sex. However, I've looked it up in the text but found nothing like that except for general "skilful means" teaching. Any idea what he could be referring to?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 16th, 2010 at 7:11 PM

Title: Re: How do monks put up with celibacy?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Could finally identify the bodhisattva Ven. Seung Sahn might have been talking about. It's teacher 25, called Vasumitra and she liberates people from passion through passion. It is also a recurring teaching there to be in the world without being affected by the world, which is the concept of non-attachment to anything while acting for the welfare of all. Also noteworthy is the large amount of lay and female teachers present in Sudhana's journey.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 17th, 2010 at 6:33 PM

Title: Re: Kaliyuga

Content:

Astus wrote:

There's an important note at the end of the Wikipedia article on life expectancy:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Life_expectancy#Life_expectancy_vs._life_span. Same article says that life expectancy in the early 20th century was 30-45 which means that our grandparents and greatgrandparents should have never known us.

There's an interesting argument in Tai Situpa's <http://www.ncf.net/mahamudra.htm>: But there is another side: if you have faith in the Buddha, if you have faith in the Buddha's teaching, and if you have faith in the practice of dharma then you don't have to know anything. If you practice with faith then everything works. You don't have to know ground, path and fruition. Whether you know it or not, it is there. When you know, nothing new appears, and when you don't know, nothing is disappearing. So you really don't have to know, but these days it is important to know. Why? Because this is a degenerating time.

I am not a negative person. I don't consider myself a pessimistic person. Actually I consider myself having some weakness of optimism [laughter], you know? So maybe my problem is optimism, not pessimism. But the fact of the matter is that this is a degenerating time; so, many things are getting worse, and many things are getting better. But it is those things that make us worse that are getting better, and those things that make us better that are getting worse. In that way, it's getting better for worse. That's true, I think. I could be wrong; I have the right to be wrong (right?), but I think that's true.

One thing that really proves this to me is that, these days, anything that is sacred and divine needs a lot of explanation, and people don't believe it, but anything that is not sacred and not divine doesn't need any explanation, and everybody believes it. For example, many wars are being fought right now, all over the world, and most of the people that are fighting there don't know why. Only the ones who instigated the wars know, but the other people don't know. They just believe; so they follow and get themselves killed, or they kill other people and destroy so many things. Then think about making money: it's good that people make money, but lots of the ways that people make money are really other people's plans, and other people's ideas that they just follow. Many people just follow, and sometimes they get lucky, and they make some money, but many people are actually just donating a lot of money to those people who plan those things. They lose money, but they just go on, one loss after another. So in that way, they really don't need a lot of explanation. Also, with taking drugs, and all these kind of things: even if somebody explains so hard they still don't believe that person. They can see themselves getting crazy. They see themselves dying, and they see their brain becoming like a scrambled egg: it's not working anymore, not connected anymore, all separate, you know? One part of the brain doesn't function with another part; so two and two doesn't make four anymore Two and two is maybe five or three or six. They see that they are confused, but still they go for it. They don't need explanation, and they don't need clarification. Then also with politics: many of the politicians, I think, don't even know what they are doing. They just believe, and they go for it. Of course all politicians are not bad; many of them are very good. If there was no policy, then of course, the world would be in chaos, but what I am saying is that nothing requires more explanation than dharma. So when it comes to dharma, everybody wants all the detailed explanations. Not only once, but two, three or four times, you know? But everything else doesn't need explanation, and people just follow. For example, with fashion: today you see a funny hat, which I think is a terrible hat, but tomorrow so many people are buying it and going crazy for it. So that way, everybody believes in things without having to know, except when it comes to something that is sacred and divine. This proves that this is a degenerating time. If it was not a degenerating time it would be the other way around, so that the things that are less meaningful, and even harmful, such as war, should need more explanation. People would find it very difficult to accept and very hard to participate. Something that is divine and profound, like dharma, would be easy for people to follow and easy to believe. If that happens then it shows that it is not a degenerating time but a generating time or a good time. So in this degenerating time, the clear understanding of ground, path and fruition will help us all, and will also equip us to help others. Because, after all, the basis of the mahamudra is Mahayana, and the purpose of mahayana is to help sentient beings. This is the foundation of all the highest teaching of Lord Buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 18th, 2010 at 7:44 AM

Title: Re: How do monks put up with celibacy?

Content:

Huifeng said:

They state pretty much that found in all Buddhist literature of the first 1000 yrs or so: Sexual activity is an obstruction to rebirth even in the heavens, how much more so is it an obstruction to liberation and / or full awakening.

Astus wrote:

How do you compare that to what the Kosa (vol 2, p. 465) says? Just happened to read this section and thought about your comment.

Huifeng said:

69b-d. There are six gods who taste pleasure; they unite through coupling, an embrace, the touch of hands, a smile, and a look.

The Caturmaharajakayikas, Trayastrimsas, Yamas, Tusitas, Nirmanaratis and Paranirmitavasavartins are the gods of Kamadhatu. The higher gods are not in Kamadhatu.

The Caturmaharajakayikas and the TrayastrimSas live on the ground; thus they unite by coupling, like humans; but they appease the fire of their desire through the emission of wind, since they do not have any semea The Yamas appease the fire of their desire by embracing, the Tusitas by the touch of hands, the Nirmanaratis by smiling, and the Paranirmitavasavartins by looking at each other. Such is the doctrine of the Prajñāpti. According to the Vaibhasikas (Vibhasd, TD 27, p. 585b27), these expressions of the Prajñāpti, "embracing," "touching of the hands," etc., do not indicate the mode of union—for all the gods couple—but the duration of the act. The more ardent the desire by reason of the more pleasurable object, so much shorter is the duration of the union.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 18th, 2010 at 5:18 PM

Title: Re: How do monks put up with celibacy?

Content:

Ogyen said:

Do you have a sutra or reference material handy? This has sparked my curiosity.

Astus wrote:

Avatamsaka Sutra - Flower Ornament Scripture in Cleary's translation - last chapter, also exists stand alone as the Gandavyuha Sutra.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 21st, 2010 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: Guy disturbs Zen monk's meditation (video)

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think it's funny. No harm done. By the way, there's a Zen story similar to this (<http://www.kwanumzen.com/pzc/newsletter/v08n02-1995-nov.html>).

Chin Ming-Hu was a powerful Chinese defense minister who lived toward the end of the Ming Dynasty. Although much of his life was devoted to military matters he also had a strong interest in Ch'an Buddhism. He would regularly invite Zen Master Hsin-Hueh Ta-Hsing to his place for dharma talks. One day when the Master was about to drink the usual cup of tea at the end of the talk there was suddenly a loud explosion. At the order of Chin a cannon had been fired at his signal to scare the Master. Many people were indeed frightened, but the Master continued to calmly drink his tea as if nothing had happened.

When he had finished his tea, the Master asked Chin, "That sounded like a cannon. Is there something wrong?" "I beg your pardon. I'm sure there is no problem." replied Chin evasively. "Cannon fire is such a routine occurrence in a military encampment that....."

After a while, a second round of tea was served. Just as Chin raised his cup to drink the Master gave a loud shout, creating quite a mess. Chin protested, "Master! Why did you do that?" Master Hsin-Hueh just laughed and said, "What's the matter? Don't you know that shouting is a routine occurrence in a Zen community?" Struck by the Master's calm and dignified manner, Chin offered his apology.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 22nd, 2010 at 8:49 PM

Title: Re: Online Sutras & Shastras

Content:

Astus wrote:

I collect links on this page: <http://mahajana.lap.hu>. Under "Mahayana Resources" you find many different collections of sutras and such.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 23rd, 2010 at 5:56 PM

Title: Re: How do monks put up with celibacy?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Aemilius,

In Buddhist cosmology at the beginning of an aeon it is not from cells to humans and definitely not from insentient to sentient but from gods to hell beings and only from sentient to sentient. Beings are born, live and die because of karma and not natural selection. So it is quite opposite to the scientific evolution.

If you want to discuss this further I recommend to open a thread for it.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 24th, 2010 at 1:08 AM

Title: Re: How evolution relates to dependent origination?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dependent origination is on one hand a principle, on the other a description of psycho-physical processes, while Buddhist cosmology applies dependent origination on a macrocosmic level. Evolution is a scientific concept based on different principles and established on different methods. Putting them into a single system is minimum unscientific and irrelevant to Buddhism. Just as there is no need to synthesise Buddhism and Hegelianism, so it's meaningless to bring together evolution and Buddhist cosmology.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 24th, 2010 at 3:19 AM

Title: Re: How evolution relates to dependent origination?

Content:

Individual said:

- 1) As psycho-physical processes; the subjective, phenomenological world.
- 2) Buddhist cosmology; the "macrocosmic level".

I'd relate the above to <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn56/sn56.031.than.html>.

For now, my question is: Why is the second doctrine put forth when understanding the first doctrine is sufficient to attain liberation?

Astus wrote:

What I said was that dependent origination is:

1. a universal principle
2. a description of psycho-physical processes

No word about either being subjective or a cosmology in itself.

The cosmological part is an extension of the teaching of dependent origination where other teachings are also involved, especially karma, rebirth and the different realms. Buddhist spatial cosmology means the three worlds and the many realms from the lowest hells up to the immaterial heavens. Temporal cosmology describes the lifespan of beings in the realms and also the time a realm may come to existence, remain and dissolve. This whole cosmology is used both to describe how rebirth works and also applied to the career of noble beings. That's how it is an integral part of Buddhism.

If evolution was used in Buddhism one would have to explain its relation to karma, to the realms and how one can attain liberation in that system. That is, it'd involve a major reorganisation and rewriting of Buddhism, simply because the teachings are co-dependent on each other. There are, of course, parts of cosmology that can be changed without messing up the whole system - here I mean basically how the world is described with its four continents and Meru in the middle. But even that can be left as it is. I say that because the Buddhist cosmology is a religious one, something spiritual, from a different perspective than science uses.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 24th, 2010 at 4:01 AM

Title: Re: How evolution relates to dependent origination?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Well, if you can come up with a consistent application of evolution without contradicting the Buddha's words I might reconsider my views about this subject. But you should note that Mahayana is not based on implementing other philosophies into Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 24th, 2010 at 7:07 AM

Title: Re: How evolution relates to dependent origination?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Buddhism's goal is to liberate beings from suffering. Science's goal is to understand natural phenomena in a systematic way. This difference in attitude separates them and gives distinct meanings to these creations of the mind. Consequently Buddhist cosmology is not the same as scientific cosmology, and there are many other cosmologies. Then if we want to evaluate these cosmologies there's a need for a measurement. From a Buddhist point of view scientific cosmology doesn't help liberating beings, therefore it has little or no value. From a scientific perspective the Buddhist cosmology is a religious fiction and can be used only within certain social sciences but tells little about our physical environment. But suppose we view them from a Christian or a Neoplatonic system they're both incorrect. However, if we're looking for The Real Cosmology, well, I call that naivety.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 25th, 2010 at 11:47 PM

Title: Re: How evolution relates to dependent origination?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Urgyen Chodron,

What I meant was that in Buddhist cosmology at the beginning of an era first gods are born and last hell beings. Also, only from a sentient being can become a new sentient being, ie. rebirth.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 26th, 2010 at 5:41 PM

Title: Re: How evolution relates to dependent origination?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Urgyen,

Here's a summary for you on Wikipedia:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Buddhist_cosmology

As for the order of the reemerging of life in the different realms see the temporal part https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Buddhist_cosmology#Vivartakalpa.

Sentient being means a being with a mind-stream. Insentient things have no mind-stream.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 27th, 2010 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: Differences in Jodo practices

Content:

Jikan said:

I think you have it right there, Tatsuo.

It's a bit dated, but the volume _Traditions in Chinese Meditation_ (ed Gregory) collects some interesting scholarship on this question, particularly on the tension between Ch'an and Pure Land practices early on and how Chih-i resolved that tension doctrinally. If this is of interest to you.

Astus wrote:

I assume you're referring to David W. Chappell's "From Dispute to Dual Cultivation: Pure Land Responses to Ch'an Critics" in that anthology. Note that the book itself is dated 1986 and probably that essay is even earlier. The whole concept that in the Tang Dynasty there were "Chan" and "Pure Land" sects is left behind by now and there's no reason to think such non-existent entities were fighting each other. See more on this: <http://buddhiststudies.berkeley.edu/people/faculty/sharf/documents/Sharf2003.%20TP%20Chan%20and%20Pure%20Land.pdf> by Robert Sharf. By the way, Zhiyi lived before the emergence of Chan.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 27th, 2010 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: So, how about "Western" Buddhism?

Content:

Yeshe said:

I also have difficulty with the concept of 'Western Buddhism' - we Europeans have spent most of our history fighting each other and, much as they try to arrange one, I see no prospect of a shared European culture, much less one shared with those across the pond.

Astus wrote:

Indeed a good point. When the concept of "Western" is raised people from America first of all think of the U.S. of A. and maybe the UK, France and Germany, or simply "Europe". But who thought about Estonian, Italian or Polish Buddhism where people speak quite different languages and have distinct cultures? Nevertheless, there are a lot on common about how "Westerners" view things so it is not pointless to talk about a Western Buddhism just as we do about Indian and East-Asian Buddhism.

Another note here is that there are different world views in any Western country and it is not irrelevant to consider if one is from a Roman Catholic or a Protestant country, and other facets of one's personal background about Christianity, Judaism, New Age and Materialism, etc. The whole "Western Buddhism" seems to be restricted to a "typical" modern materialist middle class person with Protestant influence, that is: American or maybe British.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 28th, 2010 at 4:53 AM

Title: Re: So, how about "Western" Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Yeshe,

The problem with the question is that just because a country is mainly Catholic doesn't mean that those who get involved with Buddhism were Catholics themselves. It can very well be that they see Catholicism as something they don't want at all so they have a very secular and materialistic approach which goes better with modern Zen and Theravada. Statistics are unreliable in case of religion and Buddhism in the West. I'd rather measure the presence of a religion in terms of official data, like the number of temples, clergy, annual income, social activities, media presence, etc. However, these kinds of information are not always available and can be hard to obtain.

Another thing is that one should make a difference between a country being historically Catholic or Protestant and the current situation. All EU countries are secular by nature and while for instance according to the Eurobarometer Poll 2005 81% in Portugal believes in God (one of the largest percentage in the EU) same-sex marriage is legal. In Poland the percentage was 80% and in 2007 88.4% were member of the Catholic Church, however, only 41% of the population attended regularly to churches in 2009. (stats from Wiki) Counting Buddhists is a lot more difficult as there are quite a lot of ignorance and misunderstandings about who is a Buddhist. Like, those who go to mass every Sunday are considered Christians but those who do meditation in a centre do not always (quite rarely) think of themselves as Buddhists.

We can discuss the Western phenomena related to Buddhism and we can also ponder on its future. To me personally what is actually interesting are doctrinal matters and their presentation. That's something more concrete and more important than clothes and rituals.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 28th, 2010 at 7:06 AM

Title: Re: How do monks put up with celibacy?

Content:

Tilopa said:

Mahasiddhas like Guru Rinpoche are very special beings who have already achieved a high level of realization before taking a consort and we shouldn't mistakenly think their practice is in any way ordinary sexual intercourse. But we should ask 'how did they become such great yogis' and more importantly 'how can we become like them' and it's not by being sexually active that's for sure. We might not need monastic vows but to develop the levels of meditative concentration and subsequent attainment that will qualify us for higher tantric practice then at some point celibacy will definitely be necessary.

Astus wrote:

It appears to me from the mahasiddha stories that lot of them were ordinary people and not as special as Padmasambhava. In the book "Masters of Mahamudra" we find people from all ways of life, including kings, artists, peasants, craftsmen and renunciates. They all had their own obsessions. On the other hand, these too are about being free from desire. What these stories point out is that emptiness and the realisation of emptiness are all pervasive and not restricted to outer forms, so it is not a necessity to take up a certain way of life. I'd say this is a colourful way of expressing the saying "defilements are bodhi". Also this partially answers the original question about dealing with celibacy and leaving behind sexual desire.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 1st, 2010 at 5:48 PM

Title: Re: How do monks put up with celibacy?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think it should be pointed out here that although people attain different levels of samadhi it doesn't mean they're free from desire. A good meditation retreat (Buddhist or not) can be like a week on holiday but then back to everyday life. Even on the initial levels of realisation one is not free from lust. Then there's the sravaka style view that one have to get rid of all to be liberated, then there's no more desire. And there's the mahayana path where one has to attain no-birth and then desire is not a hindrance any more, one doesn't take it up or put it down.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 2nd, 2010 at 6:45 AM

Title: Re: How do monks put up with celibacy?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Just to add a bit to the discussion on lay style, I've been browsing through the PP8K and stumbled upon a section about the signs of an irreversible bodhisattva living a household life (XVII.3). As it is not surprising, the PP25K has a similar section which the Abhisamayalankara summarises in three points (IV 8, 2, 6-8.) (Chinese from Ven. Fazun's 法尊法師 translation):

巧便行諸欲 - skilful use of all desirables (Conze: circumspect in the use of pleasant things (which he possesses and enjoys without caring for them, without eagerness or attachment).)

常修淨梵行 - always cultivating pure chastity (Conze: at all times (in all his lives) he leads a chaste life,)

善清淨正命 - good and pure in correct livelihood (Conze: he is pure in the manner of earning his livelihood, (and provides for it in the right way).)

The relevant line is the second one about brahmacarya, i.e. celibacy. However, it's interesting to note that PP8K doesn't mention this part only that "an irreversible Bodhisattva who lives the life of a householder, possesses any pleasant things he may have simply without caring for them, without eagerness, without attachment. He is not one of those people who care for dear and pleasant forms." (tr. Conze)

Another thing to note is that in the Abhisamayalankara's divisions this is about the 1st bhumi while the Avatamsaka Sutra says about 2nd bhumi bodhisattvas: "They are satisfied with their own spouses and do not desire the spouses of others." (tr. Cleary) Nevertheless, the Avatamsaka Sutra has ample paragraphs talking about relinquishing the householder life and leaving behind all forms of desire. So the sutra says,

"They have no attachment to anything, but just firmly uphold pure conduct, thinking, 'As I maintain pure discipline, I shall surely get rid of all bondage, the torment of craving, oppression, slander, and disturbance, and will attain the impartial truth praised by the Buddhas.' ... Therefore they do not conceive even a single thought of lust; their minds are as pure as Buddha. The only exception is in terms of expedient means to teach and transform sentient beings — yet they still do not relinquish the determination for omniscience. ... After enlightening beings have gotten to see the Buddha, they never arouse a single thought of desire, much less act upon desire."

This single exception explains my former reference to another part in this sutra about a teacher who uses different forms of desires to help beings become free from desire.

Then it is clear from all of this that renunciation is a prerequisite of getting to higher levels of practice meaning that the only safe and sure way for a householder is aspiring for birth in the Pure Land. In the PP8K (X.9, tr. Conze) the Buddha says,

"And when I had surveyed their thought with my thought, I rejoiced in those sons and daughters of good family who belong to the vehicle of the Bodhisattvas and who had made this vow. In consequence they will become so much confirmed in their faith that they will seek rebirth in other Buddha-fields, and also they will come face to face with the Tathagatas there, who demonstrate dharma, and from whom they will hear in detail just this deep perfection of wisdom. In those Buddha-fields also they will set countless living beings going on their way to the supreme enlightenment, and will help them in their quest for full enlightenment."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 2nd, 2010 at 8:49 PM

Title: Re: How do monks put up with celibacy?

Content:

kirtu said:

Right but strong samadhi suppresses desire at least for a time.

Astus wrote:

This could also be said about satisfying a desire, after eating one is not hungry for a while. On the other hand, one could as well be attached to different meditative states, so there's birth in the form and formless realms attained by Buddhists as well as non-Buddhists.

And as I've said in my last post, if the case is as many of you have agreed upon, there's no point in lay people engaging in so many complicated and difficult practices unless they become like hermits. So either one is fine with working on accumulating good karma for a better birth or becomes a renunciate. Third option being only aspiring for birth in the Pure Land. This view makes most of current Western Buddhism pointless and mistaken and also cries for establishing a widespread monastic order.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 3rd, 2010 at 8:16 AM

Title: Re: How do monks put up with celibacy?

Content:

TMingyur said:

Meditation is not necessarily a "complicated and difficult practice". However what is complicated in the context of housholders is Vajrayana.

Astus wrote:

But why bother if one can simply stick to buddha-remembrance and thus be assured of liberation in the next life?

By the way, Zen is neither complicated nor difficult whatever life one may live.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 6th, 2010 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: Dharma Transmission Verses of the 42 Hands and Eyes

Content:

Astus wrote:

This page gives the pictures of the different mudras plus the relevant info:

http://www.vuonlam.us/01_NAM2009/03_PhatGiao/A2_TaiLieu/3A2a_KinhLuotLuan/01_KINH/QuanAm42ThuNhan_01/PhapMonQuanAm_42ThuNhan.htm "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Ben,

There's a whole Esoteric Teachings Section (密教部) in the Taisho canon (volumes 18-21, texts 848-1420). Outside of the Japanese Shingon school there's no separate lineage for tantra but it's simply a part of general Buddhism. No initiations or anything like that.

Here's a list of Guanyin related mantras with some audio files:

http://www.siddham.org/yuan1/main_guanyin.html "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 7th, 2010 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: Dharma Transmission Verses of the 42 Hands and Eyes

Content:

Astus wrote:

Ben,

I'm no expert on this so don't expect much from me.

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Vajrabodhi> and <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Amoghavajra> are the two famous masters who propagated mantrayana in China, both in the 8th century, and they've translated lot of works. One of the texts associated with the 42 hands and eyes practice (T1064) are by Amoghavarja for instance. The <https://ja.wikipedia.org/wiki/%E5%AF%86%E6%95%99#.E4.B8.AD.E5.9B.BD.E3.81.AE.E5.AF.86.E6.95.99> says, if that's reliable, that as early as the Southern and Northern Dynasties (420-589) there were translations of esoteric texts and later masters like <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Subhakarasiṃha> and https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Yi_Xing were well known teachers (and performers) of it.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 9th, 2010 at 6:45 AM

Title: Re: Kaliyuga

Content:

Astus wrote:

As a side note, the age of Dharma decline should not be confused with the social and samsaric periods. Buddhas may appear in different periods of social ups and downs and the Dharma may be absent even in golden ages.

Also, here's a fascinating TED talk about our dark age:

http://www.ted.com/talks/lang/eng/steven_pinker_on_the_myth_of_violence.html

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 10th, 2010 at 1:33 AM

Title: Re: Zen meditation and pain

Content:

Astus wrote:

These kinds of news are good only for advertising Zen a bit but nothing else. 13 unknown people compared to 13 other unknown people and it happens that some of one group manage pain better than others. Very informative. We don't even know which Zen they were practising and how.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 11th, 2010 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: Sakya Trizin talking about the unity of Buddhist views

Content:

Astus wrote:

Indeed, as Pero pointed it out, it seems he meant the unity of Tibetan Buddhist Schools, especially the oneness of Madhyamaka, Dzogchen and Mahamudra, which has been stated long before by former Tibetan masters, like the 3rd Karmapa in his Aspiration Prayer:

"Free from mental fabrication, it is the great seal, mahamudra.

Free from extremes, it is the great middle way, madhyamika.

The consummation of everything, it is also called the great perfection, dzogchen.

May there be confidence that by understanding one,

the essential meaning of all is realised."

Interestingly, it was Sakya Pandita who criticised Dzogchen and (Gampopa's) Mahamudra, also separating Madhyamaka meditation from Mantrayana. Like here:

Even if they meditate the Great Seal, they cultivate in meditation only a restriction of conceptual thought, while they do not understand the Great Seal to be Gnosis derived from the two processes.

The Great Seal meditation of the ignorant, it is taught, usually becomes a cause of animal birth.
If not that, then they are born in the realm lacking even fine matter (arupadhatu), or else they fall into the Disciples' cessation.

Even if that meditation may be excellent,
it is no more than a Madhyamaka meditation.
The latter meditation, while very good in itself, is nevertheless extremely difficult to accomplish.

As long as the two accumulations have not been brought to completion, that meditation will not be perfected.
To complete the two accomplishments for this,
it is taught that "innumerable aeons" are needed.

Our own Great Seal consists of Gnosis risen from initiation and the self-sprung Gnosis that ensues from the meditations of the two processes.

Its realization will be attained in this very life
if one is skilled in the techniques of Mantra.
Besides this, the Buddha did not teach the realization of the Great Seal otherwise.

Thus if one is interested in the Great Seal, one should practice in accord with Mantra Vehicle texts. No substantial difference exists between the present-day Great Seal and the Great Perfection (rDzogs-chen) of the Chinese tradition, other than a change in names from "descent from above" and "ascent from below" to "Simultaneist" and "Gradualist." The appearance of this kind of religious tradition came about just as the Bodhisattva Santaraksita foretold to King Trisong Detsan.

Listen, as I shall explain that prophecy. He said,
"O king, no Indian non-Buddhist doctrine will appear here in your kingdom of Tibet because master Padmasambhava has entrusted it into the protection of the twelve protecting goddesses.

Nevertheless, a schism into two systems of doctrine will occur because of certain interrelated circumstances and omens.

At first, after I myself have passed away, a Chinese monk will appear and teach a path of simultaneous enlightenment called the White Self-Sufficient Remedy.

At that time, invite my disciple,
the great scholar Kamalasila, from India.
He will refute that.

Then let all the faithful practice according to this system of doctrine."
Later, everything came to pass just as he had predicted.

After the Chinese tradition was suppressed, that of the gradualists was made to flourish.
Still later, the royal rule itself vanished, and some, who based themselves solely on texts of the Chinese master's tradition, changed the name of his system secretly to Great Seal (mahamudra). The present-day Great Seal is virtually [the same as] the Chinese religious system.

The Great Seal that Naro and Maitripa espoused is held to consist precisely of the seals of Action, Dharma, and Pledge, and of the Great Seal as expounded in tantras of the Mantra system.

In his Caturmudra, Exalted Nagarjuna himself also asserts this:
"If, through not having known the Action seal,
one is also ignorant of the seal of Dharma, it is impossible that one might understand even the name of the Great Seal."

King-of-tantra texts and major commentarial treatises also prohibit the Great Seal to one who is unconnected with initiation.

If one realizes the Great Seal that is Gnosis risen from initiation, only then does one no longer depend on all signful efforts.

A Clear Differentiation of the Three Codes, p. 117-119

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 11th, 2010 at 7:32 AM

Title: Re: So, how about "Western" Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Aemilius,

Excuse me, but where do you get these ideas from?

What connection do you see between Afghanistan and Europe? Yes, Alexander the Great conquered the land and left some Greek settlements around, then many others came and conquered it too. It doesn't mean that there was great cultural exchange between that land and Europe, especially considering that the Roman Empire was cut off from it by the Parthian Empire, then the Sassanid Empire after which the whole place turned to Islamic land with what the Christian Europe hadn't had much friendly relations.

It is not exactly true that everyone uses the Roman calendar, by which you could at best mean the Julian calendar what was changed in the Western part of Europe to the Gregorian calendar from 1582 on. The Roman Empire was not at all a secular society as you've perhaps heard of the Imperial Cult. They had not unified any castes but built an empire on slave labour and there were different classes of society. Finding connection between Jupiter and Pasupati is not really proper as one is a sky and weather god like Indra while the other one an animal god like Faunus, Jupiter is related to Dyaus Pita etymologically and functionally in the Vedic religion just as it is to Zeus. What you define as a modern city is not really clear, but on one hand the Romans used knowledge from other cultures like the Greek, also there were other quite developed lands throughout the world, like in Han Dynasty China; and in the same era the Gupta Empire is another example of a great civilization.

This conspiracy against Buddhism, well, can't say much of that. You know, even Freemasons and Jehova's Witnesses had to wear different badges in concentrations camps, but no badge for Buddhists (could have been of orange colour). Guess what, Nazis and Fascists were quite interested in Buddhist things. Would you say then that other evil Western forces worked against the poor Buddha followers?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 12th, 2010 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: So, how about "Western" Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Aemilius,

We know of Jews and Christians in ancient India and China and these are not some hidden obscure ideas but open facts. Yes, it is known that there were trade routes between India and the Roman Empire. But can you show any Buddhist monastery or at least a community in Europe before the 19th century? Although Europeans heard about Buddhism through Christian missionaries and travellers as early as the 16th century, it doesn't mean they turned to that religion. Until you can come up with some ancient Latin sutra translation or the ruins of a stupa I see no reason to assume Buddhism was any way present as a religion practised in Europe.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 12th, 2010 at 6:04 AM

Title: Re: Is Buddhist art needed to spread Dharma in the west?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Luke, have you missed the last 6 decades in Western art? From the Beat generation on Buddhism spread quite well. Sure, it's not mainstream but it's there.

Did you know that Richard Wagner planned an opera in 1856 with the title <http://www.myspace.com/wagneroperas/blog/249165398> based on Buddhist stories? And that Hermann Hesse published his novel https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Siddhartha_%28novel%29 in 1922?

And there's also Lisa in The Simpsons as a Buddhist for all to see.

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 12th, 2010 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: Is Buddhist art needed to spread Dharma in the west?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Some examples for Western Buddhist art:

<http://www.boeddhistischeomroep.nl/generalinfo.aspx?lntEntityId=136>

<http://gonkargyatso.com/>

<http://www.tashinorbu.be/index.htm>

<http://sutozsolt.egologo.transindex.ro/>

<http://www.johndaidoolori.org/>

<http://www.narthaki.com/info/intervw/intrvw40.html>

<http://artsites.ucsc.edu/faculty/lieberman/zen.html#Zen%20Contemporary>

<http://www.france24.com/en/20100318-buddhist-founder-siddhartha-inspires-paris-opera-ballet>

<https://fwbo-news.blogspot.com/2008/06/major-exhibition-of-western-buddhist.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 16th, 2010 at 7:35 PM

Title: Re: Dharma Transmission Verses of the 42 Hands and Eyes

Content:

Astus wrote:

How fascinating. I wonder on what basis does the CTTB claim this to be restricted to them. Or is it just the translation they worry about but not the Chinese and other translations?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 17th, 2010 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: Dharma Transmission Verses of the 42 Hands and Eyes

Content:

Astus wrote:

Remm,

I see. So Ven. Xuanhua created an extended version of it. Still, I don't understand why it's kept hidden when many other teachings are available for everyone.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 23rd, 2010 at 8:50 PM

Title: Re: What's the definition of a Buddhist?

Content:

Astus wrote:

An interesting point from http://www.shambhalasun.com/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=3025&Itemid=0 by Dzongsar Jamyang Khyentse:

"So, what makes you a Buddhist? You may not have been born in a Buddhist country or to a Buddhist family, you may not wear robes or shave your head, you may eat meat and idolize Eminem and Paris Hilton. That doesn't mean you cannot be a Buddhist. In order to be a Buddhist, you must accept that all compounded phenomena are impermanent, all emotions are pain, all things have no inherent existence, and enlightenment is beyond concepts.

It's not necessary to be constantly and endlessly mindful of these four truths. But they must reside in your mind. You don't walk around persistently remembering your own name, but when someone asks your name, you remember it instantly. There is no doubt. Anyone who accepts these four seals, even independently of Buddha's teachings, even never having heard the name Shakyamuni Buddha, can be considered to be on the same path as he."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 23rd, 2010 at 9:07 PM

Title: Training of Beginner Bodhisattvas

Content:

Astus wrote:

An interesting teaching on how a bodhisattva should be trained:

"One should speak like this – do not give up your passion, do not fight your aversion, do not clear away your bewilderment, do not liberate yourself from your body, practise the bad things, do not hold back your views, do not be conscious of the bonds [to the worldly things], grasp for the parts of the personality (skandha), amass the spheres of sense-perception, move about among the fields of sense-perception (āyatana), do not leave the stage of fools, frequent the bad (akuśala), give up the good (kuśala), do not think of the Buddha, do not reflect on religious teachings (dharma), do not give offerings to the congregation of monks, do not take the training (śikṣā) upon yourself, do not seek the peacefulness of existence, do not cross over the river [of existence]. This kind of instructions one should teach and give to the bodhisattva in the beginning of his development. Why? Because this state of the moments of existence (dharma) and nothing else is their [true] state. Foolish people explain things in accordance with moments of existence of arising (utpādadharma) and moments of existence of disappearance (nirodhadharma). But this sphere of all moments of existence (dharmadhātu) distinguishes itself by being beyond thought-constructions, and understanding the essential character of all these moments of existence in this way is awakening. If he is taught in this way and does not become afraid, scared or terrified, then he is a bodhisattva not turning back in his development, one who has a part in the stage of never turning back. By means of this instruction one should carry on a pleasant conversation at length."

<https://www2.hf.uio.no/polyglotta/index.php?page=fulltext&bid=2&vid=30&entity=30&kid=30&cid=47385>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 23rd, 2010 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: Training of Beginner Bodhisattvas

Content:
Astus wrote:
It is a canonical sutra indeed!

Full text view can be selected at the top. Here's the <https://www2.hf.uio.no/polyglotta/index.php?page=fulltext&view=fulltext&vid=30>. The teacher in the sutra, who also says the quoted text to Manjusri, is a three-year old boy called Ratnadatta. Quite amusing as he lectures both Maudgalyayana, Sariputra and Manjusri too. Almost like an extra chapter from the Vimalakirti Sutra.

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, December 23rd, 2010 at 11:47 PM
Title: Re: Training of Beginner Bodhisattvas
Content:

Astus wrote:
Individual, after the quoted speech 8 monks died as they were leaving because of disbelief and they were born in hell. The following discourse happened:

"Then Mañjuśrīkumārabhūta addressed the Lord: Lord, did you see the great harm that appeared when these monks had heard this exposition of religion? The Lord said: Do not say that, Mañjuśrī. If these monks had not heard this exposition of religion, they would never have been born in the good places of the universe in a million kalpas, and so, how could they meet and please a Buddha? Now they will, even though they heard this exposition of religion with doubt, be born in the Tuṣita heaven after they have died in the great hell Raurava. Then, in sixty-eight kalpas, they will please ten times hundred thousand millions of Tathāgatas, and they will by miraculous birth be born as universal kings. And during one kalpa, they will be born as Tathāgatas, Arhats, Perfect Buddhas with the name Vimalaprabha."

Author: Astus
Date: Friday, December 24th, 2010 at 12:39 AM
Title: Re: Training of Beginner Bodhisattvas
Content:

Astus wrote:
Kirt,

I've just tried a quick search on CBETA with the sutra title but found only a summary of the contents of it, no commentary. If you find one, let us know.

Author: Astus
Date: Friday, December 24th, 2010 at 5:25 AM
Title: Re: Training of Beginner Bodhisattvas
Content:
Individual said:

Sounds like a bad discourse.

I rather like the Lotus Sutra -- that anyone who just reads it once is guaranteed rebirth in a Pure Land.

Astus wrote:

"When he said this, five thousand monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen in the assembly immediately got up from their seats, bowed to the Buddha, and left. What was the reason for this? Because the roots of error among this group had been deeply planted and they were arrogant, thinking they had attained what they had not attained and had realized what they had not realized. Because of such defects they did not stay. And the Bhagavat remained silent and did not stop them."

(Lotus Sutra, ch. 2)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 24th, 2010 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: Training of Beginner Bodhisattvas

Content:

Astus wrote:

The section quoted is the answer to this question:

妙吉祥言。爲初地菩薩。當何所說令云何學。

"Mañjuśrī said: But what kind of instruction will you teach, how will you instruct the bodhisattva in the beginning of his development."

That's why I gave the title that it is for beginner bodhisattvas.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 25th, 2010 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: Training of Beginner Bodhisattvas

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kirt,

Is it any help that the Polyglotta site has the Tibetan version too of this sutra?

In the question it mentions a beginner level, which means the 1st bhumi. In the 52 levels classification the bhumis are from 41 to 50. The mentioned non-returner level is the 8th bhumi. Or, if we don't insist on using that system, the sutra simply says that one teaches this at the start which results in establishing one firmly in enlightenment never to fall back again.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 25th, 2010 at 8:03 PM

Title: Re: Training of Beginner Bodhisattvas

Content:

Astus wrote:

In the Vimalakīrti Sutra (ch. 8: Path to Buddhahood) we read:

"Mañjuśrī then asked Vimalakīrti, "How should the bodhisattva penetrate the path of buddhahood?" Vimalakīrti said, "If a bodhisattva traverses the unacceptable paths, this is to penetrate the path of buddhahood." [Mañjuśrī] also asked, "How does the bodhisattva traverse the unacceptable paths?" [Vimalakīrti] answered, "The bodhisattva practices the five [deeds of] interminable [retribution] without becoming distraught. ... He manifests acting out of lust ... He manifests the practicing of flattery and deception ... He manifests acting out of the afflictions ... He manifests becoming old and sick ... if a bodhisattva can traverse the unacceptable paths in this way, this is to penetrate the path of buddhahood ... Therefore, you should understand that all the afflictions constitute the seed of the Tathāgata. It is like not being able to attain the priceless jewelpearl without entering the ocean. Therefore, if one does not enter the great sea of the afflictions, one will not be able to attain the jewel of omniscience."

There's also Linji's saying (ch. 21, reference to Lankavatara Sutra 3.58), "Virtuous monks, by creating the karma of the five heinous crimes, you attain emancipation." And this (ch. 22), "Followers of the Way, don't take the Buddha to be the ultimate. As I see it, he is just like a privy hole. Both bodhisattvahood and arhatship are cages and chains that bind one. This is why Mañjuśrī tried to kill Gautama with his sword, and why Aṅgulimāla attempted to slay Śākyamuni with his dagger."

As I see it, these Mahayana teachings take the prajnaparamita as the essential realisation of a bodhisattva. Unlike those teachings where they focus on taming the minds of uneducated people (prthagjana), these are meant for those on the bodhisattva vehicle. I find this aspect of the Dharma to be neglected, so many think that Mahayana is without deeper teachings and put aside the studying of the sutras only to read the systematised and summarising treatises. That I take as a natural progress just as it's happened with the agamas put aside for abhidharma, and it gives the proper reason for eventually making direct meditation instructions (Vipassana, Pure Land, Zen, Tantra) the living core of the path, while the sutras, in their times, were such instructions too.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 26th, 2010 at 8:59 PM

Title: Re: Training of Beginner Bodhisattvas

Content:

Huifeng said:

There is also the very cool story of Manjusri's past life in the Prajnaparamita Upadesa, which not only gives the same teaching, but also some interesting results of attitudes towards it.

Astus wrote:

Could you paste it here? Or is it only in Chinese?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 27th, 2010 at 5:42 AM

Title: Re: Should individuals be married and be monk?

Content:

Hae Min said:

Clarification: None of the orders in Japan carry the pratimoksha vows anymore. All priests receive ordination via the bodhisattva precepts, thus no vows of celibacy are taken.

Astus wrote:

They have been taking the bodhisattva precepts only since the 9th century (custom spreading gradually to all schools from Tendai) but marriage was not allowed until the 19th century Meiji reform. Just saying that it wasn't the bodhisattva precepts that made Japanese monks non-celibate.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 27th, 2010 at 6:51 PM

Title: Re: Training of Beginner Bodhisattvas

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thank you Master Huifeng for posting it. These kinds of instructions are good examples for the presence of seemingly newer styles of teachings, like Zen, within fundamental Mahayana texts. As for the question of "beginnerhood", these teachings fit into the category of meditation practice, so there's a direct connection with the method of observing the three states of dharmas and insight into the three gates of liberation. It also rhymes with the Tibetan teaching on having the view of a buddha (emptiness), practice of a bodhisattva (compassion) and conduct of a sravaka (morality).

Here's one from a contemporary Zen master (mistress?),

<http://wakeupandlaugh.wordpress.com/daehaeng-kun-sunim/>:

"As the sea and the waves are not separate, enlightenment and deluded thoughts are not two. So don't spend your time trying to figure out which thoughts are deluded and which are not - just let go of everything. When you do this, thoughts of "I," discriminations, and deluded thoughts will naturally disappear. ... Because even deluded thoughts arise from Juigong, entrust everything to Juigong, completely let go of it. When you return defilements and delusions inside, to your fundamental mind, its evolutionary power can shine forth. Lotus flowers bloom in mud, and the Buddha-Dharma blooms in the midst of defilements. I've never said that you shouldn't possess money, fall in love, or be upset when angry. Do all of this as you need to. But it is important to know that all of this is being done by your foundation. Watch and see if you are doing things from attachments to "I" or "mine." If you live harmoniously, knowing that there is nothing that is not yourself, you will be able to take everything in the world as material for your spiritual practice."

(No River to Cross, p. 45-46.)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 28th, 2010 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: Training of Beginner Bodhisattvas

Content:

catmoon said:

This teaching is causing me considerable difficulty. Perhaps I should just ignore it completely?

Astus wrote:

There are different teachings exactly because some are easy for one but difficult for the other. If it is confusing there are two options. Either you try to figure it out on your own or asking people, or you just put it aside. It's really up to you.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 28th, 2010 at 2:11 AM

Title: Re: The real truth behind Zen masters' self-mutilation?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I really recommend the book I've already mentioned on this subject: Burning for the Buddha: Self-Immolation in Chinese Buddhism by James A. Benn. It gets into the details very well. By the way, self-mutilation is in authentic Mahayana sutras, not to mention well known Jataka stories.

The Lotus Sutra (ch. 23) says, "If there is anyone who sets forth and wishes to attain highest, complete enlightenment, he should pay homage to the stupas of the Buddha by burning either a finger or a toe. He is superior to those who pay homage by giving their countries and cities, their wives and children, or the mountains, forests, rivers, ponds, and many other rare treasures."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 28th, 2010 at 4:32 AM

Title: Re: So, how about "Western" Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Aemilius,

Sepultura means burial in Latin, it is "sepulcrum" that means grave, related to the English sepulchre, all from the root "sepelire", i.e. to bury. Clocher-tour simply means a stand alone bell-tower (The page itself defines it as: "un clocher en forme de tour qui n'est pas rattaché au corps principal d'une église" - a bell-tower in the form of a tower that is not attached to the main body of a church) and I don't see how that could be related any way to stupas.

As for Shakyamuni teaching a king to establish a republic, well, sounds strange in itself, as far as republics are not kingdoms. There was a Roman Kingdom until 503 b.c.e. that was then changed into a republic. Even if Gautama lived around that time - which by the latest researches is at least questionable - I don't see how he ended up on the Apennine Peninsula and where that is recorded.

Finally, on the word pagan please read this easily accessible and always useful <http://www.etymonline.com/index.php?term=pagan>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 28th, 2010 at 4:46 AM

Title: Re: So, how about "Western" Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kirt,

Kalmyks are Mongols (in a broader sense), so it is not the case that Buddhism spread to the West but Asians moved and brought their religion with themselves. On the other hand, when Mongols and Tatars, aka the Golden Horde ruled over a large part of Eastern Europe for about 250 years they haven't converted them to Buddhism but Christianity just lived on.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 28th, 2010 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: So, how about "Western" Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Aemilius,

Just because a bell-tower, or any other building for that matter, resembles a stupa it doesn't make it related to a stupa. As you may well know, there are different styles of stupa throughout Asia, but it is their function that makes them a Buddhist building. A bell-tower has just a bell in it to warn people, no relics, no religious rites, no concept of enlightenment at all.

Saying "somewhere" and "some older books" are not references. It takes historical and archeological records to establish a theory. Does the Kalachakra tradition say anything about the Roman empire? If so, where?

You may think as you please, just don't expect me to take it seriously when it lacks proper foundation in reliable sources.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 28th, 2010 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: So, how about "Western" Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Putting aside the historical issues, what does Buddhism have that can attract people to it compared to Christianity and Islam?

I think the approach presented on <http://www.justbegood.net/> is noteworthy because it addresses common issues raised about religions. Unlike the majority of Buddhist books published in the West, the teachings of the "vehicle of men and gods" are rarely addressed properly although it is clearly the faith of the majority of Buddhist laity throughout Asia. It sounds very base compared to lofty ideas about "sudden enlightenment" and "rainbow body" but that's why it is the teaching that can make a real difference in the number of people who can feel connected to the Buddhadharma.

Whether it is Christianity, Islam or New Age, they all propagete some sort of heaven that the faithful can obtain. Buddhism can show how those heavens are obtainable for anyone with a more sensible teaching.

What do you think?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 29th, 2010 at 5:40 PM

Title: Re: Training of Beginner Bodhisattvas

Content:

Astus wrote:

Four siddhantas (catuh-siddhanta, 四悉檀):

(1 loka-siddhanta) shijiexitan 世界悉檀 Worldly siddhānta. Preaching which accords to the conventional understanding of the world.

(2 prthagjana-siddhanta) gegeweirenxitan 各各為人悉檀 Siddhānta for each individual. Preaching according to the abilities and levels of understanding of the people listening.

(3 pratipaksa-siddhanta) duizhixitan 對治悉檀 Special application siddhānta. Preaching aimed at destroying strong defilement or evil karma of certain beings.

(4 paramartha-siddhanta) diyiixitan 第一義悉檀 Siddhānta of supreme truth. Preaching of reality as understood by the Buddha himself.

also here (Tiantai): <http://www.tiantai.net/glossary/4siddhanta.htm>

Nagarjuna on the four siddhantas:

<http://www.drbackinese.org/vbs/publish/319/vbs319p022.htm>

<http://www.drbackinese.org/vbs/publish/320/vbs320p031.htm>

<http://www.drbackinese.org/vbs/publish/321/vbs321p024.htm>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 29th, 2010 at 6:45 PM

Title: Re: So, how about "Western" Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

[quote="Huifeng"]It has been stated by several knowledgeable western Buddhist leaders, however, that while the high end practices bring types of insight, they feel that Buddhism needs to be supplemented. Usually the supplement is something along the lines of psychotherapy, or maybe integral theory, or whatever.[/quote]

It is the phenomenon that when a teaching shows gaps - i.e. lacks relevant answers to questions of its followers - those empty places will be inevitably filled up in one way or the other. That's how local spirits and gods could become part of Buddhism, while with the many bodhisattvas, dharmapalas, etc. the role of gods could have been taken over by Buddhist (or "Buddhicised") deities. For long there wasn't really any Buddhist form of magic (pre-modern science) but then with tantra it was resolved. Sanitised Buddhism sounds good for those think only of its immediate acceptibility into a view full of preconceptions, while in fact Buddhism should be able to answer not only the needs of educated people with stress problems but also those spiritual seekers who are looking for the meaning of life. Until that happens there's little chance for Buddhism to have a large number of followers from all walks of life and traditional/local beliefs (Christianity, New Age, Scientism) will fill those seekers' minds.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 29th, 2010 at 10:20 PM

Title: Re: Training of Beginner Bodhisattvas

Content:

Astus wrote:

Master Huifeng,

You talk about a complete course in the MPPU but that may not be necessary. A single introductory book (eg. Yinshun's Way to Buddhahood, Shengyan's Orthodox Chinese Buddhism, Gampopa's Jewel Ornament of Liberation) should suffice to provide enough basis for approaching more complicated teachings. But so far Buddhist communities rarely provide the necessary fundamentals, like in the form of Sunday schools. However, this is a discussion rather for the Western Buddhism part than sutra analysis.

What could be looked into here is catmoon's question about what to do with teachings one can't put anywhere. That's one thing. Another thing is the nature of reactions and what difference it makes if this text is from a sutra, from a Zen teacher, from a tantra or somewhere else. Many have read the Vimalakirti sutra and the relevant part hasn't been raised as far as I can recall as a controversial teaching here or on other forums (where I've been). Calling it a teaching for beginner bodhisattvas might have added to the edge of it. But then, no problems with Zen teachings about directly getting at buddha-mind. How strange!

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 29th, 2010 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: Training of Beginner Bodhisattvas

Content:

Astus wrote:

Geoff,

Can you think of a treatise that is easily obtainable - afaik Siksasamuccaya wasn't reprinted and is impossible to buy - and readable? I mean, the Bodhicaryavatara is good but too terse, not really explaining things.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 30th, 2010 at 7:27 AM

Title: Re: The mind without objects

Content:

Astus wrote:

Mind in Buddhism is defined by its object, so there are six consciousnesses: eye-, ear-, nose-, tongue-, body- and mind-consciousness. Yogacara added to this two, and in some versions three other consciousnesses but these I'd rather call possible extras and this categorisation is not in all Buddhist schools. Nevertheless, all kinds of consciousnesses are empty, without inherent existence and dependently arisen.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 30th, 2010 at 7:39 PM

Title: Re: The mind without objects

Content:

Astus wrote:

Talking of mind as a thing in itself is what reification means, conceiving it as independent. For conventional speech that is fine, that's what being not analysed means. But if we want to know what mind is we find that there are simply instances of mental perception, thus on the first level we arrive at the teaching of mental dharmas. Analysing further even dharmas are found to be without inherent essence, without arising and disappearing, i.e. empty. To say there's a continuum of mental events is good as far as it is clear that calling it a "continuum" is simply a concept and that there's nothing actually eternal, just like in the case of matter, etc.

The <http://www.stephenbatchelor.org/verses2.htm> deals with perception and forms of consciousnesses in chapter 3. The concept of prior existence is discussed in chapter 9.

"It would be better for the uninstructed run-of-the-mill person to hold to the body composed of the four great elements, rather than the mind, as the self. Why is that? Because this body composed of the four great elements is seen standing for a year, two years, three, four, five, ten, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, a hundred years or more. But what's called 'mind,' 'intellect,' or 'consciousness' by day and by night arises as one thing and ceases as another."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.061.than.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 2nd, 2011 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: Modern Day Pure Land Masters

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Old Venerable Guangqin (Guang Qin Lao He Shang - 廣欽老和尚, 1892-1986) was an illiterate monk who spent many years in retreat and taught in the fashion of "Chan - Pure Land" as common in China.

A selection of his teachings are available in English:

<https://vajrasword.blogspot.com/p/analects-of-master-kuang-chin.html>

Here's the famous photo of his funeral, the light generally understood to be a special sign:

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 3rd, 2011 at 1:20 AM

Title: Re: Modern Day Pure Land Masters

Content:

mr. gordo said:

Hi Astus,

I think I used a different spelling in my first post, but yes, I have that book and liked it. He was definitely an amazing teacher and practitioner.

Astus wrote:

Yinguang (印光) and Guangqin (廣欽) are two different teachers, not the same age and not exactly the same type of background and teaching. The teachings of Yinguang in English are in the book "Pure-Land Zen, Zen Pure-Land: Letters from patriarch Yin Kuang". Yinguang is more of the faith and other-power approach, Guangqin is more of meditation and self-power.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 4th, 2011 at 12:13 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood and Sexy Women

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think Individual has a valid point with quoting the Alagaddupama Sutta.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Five_hindrances are not restricted to vows but they're valid for every being, so sensual desire is an obstruction no matter whether it's a lay or a monastic practitioner. Well, that is the "sravaka view" at least. Padmasambhava adds (in <http://www.tibetanclassics.org/pdfs/GarlandofViews.pdf> PDF) for the bodhisattva vehicle: "So if it is sustained by great compassion, regardless of whatever acts one might engage in, be it virtuous or non-virtuous, one's vows will not degenerate. For the bodhisattva vow is, in brief, to act with taking great compassion as its ground." Finally, on the ultimate Buddha vehicle (identified with Dzogchen in the Padmasambhava text) even engaging in the five sensual desires causes no problem.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 4th, 2011 at 2:17 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood and Sexy Women

Content:

Astus wrote:

"It depends on the context."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 4th, 2011 at 3:32 AM

Title: Re: Are plants sentient?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Plants are non-sentient from a Buddhist point of view as they have no mind-stream, unlike animals, humans, spirits, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 4th, 2011 at 6:48 AM

Title: Re: Are plants sentient?

Content:

JeffC said:

How do you know?

What is the difference between a Jellyfish and a Venus Fly Trap? Neither have brains. Both have survival instinct.

Astus wrote:

I've referred simply to the Buddhist point of view. Others may have different concepts.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 4th, 2011 at 11:47 PM

Title: Re: There is a problem with Buddhism after all

Content:

Astus wrote:

Good point. This is what the great master Honen (法然), founder of the first independent

Pure Land school (jodoshu 浄土宗), realised after he had gone through decades of monastic training. There is the path of the saints (shodomon 聖道門) and there is the Pure Land way (jodomon 浄土門). The saints' teachings include the whole of Buddhism working with self-power (jiriki 自力), i.e. one's own efforts, except the Pure Land teaching that works with other-power (tariki 他力), which is through the power of Amita Buddha's past vows (hongan 本願). The Pure Land path is the accessible way of enlightenment for ordinary beings (bonpu 凡夫) through which one can gain birth (ojo 往生) into the land of peace and bliss (anraku 安樂), a.k.a. Sukhavati. And as for the way itself, it's simply using buddha-remembrance, in the form of reciting the name (shomyonenbutsu 称名念仏) as Namo Amita Buddha (namuamidabutsu 南無阿弥陀仏), and nothing else (senjunenbutsu 専修念仏).

That is a summary of the basic idea of Honen which was used by Shinran to say that the Pure Land path is the final teaching that Shakyamuni wanted to teach. That's because it is the easy path for everyone to liberation, even those whose view are veiled by heavy karma.

Nevertheless, there might be another option. Looking at teachings from the Zen, Mahamudra and Dzogchen traditions we find instructions given to ordinary people who could attain liberation. In fact, it is quite a central legend of Zen as we find it in the story of the 6th ancestor Caoxi Huineng. Gampopa taught without restriction his one sufficient path and Padmasambhava liberated many from all walks of life with a single pointing out instruction. Sure, it is true that in all three schools there were masters who spent decades in retreat and such, but they all supposed to have the means for common people. In the book Treasures from Juniper Ridge there is a very fitting terma on this, translated as Instruction for Women on Attaining Enlightenment Without Abandoning Daily Activities. But as it's happened with every teaching, religious history makes the ordinary in the present holy in the past. Once the bodhisattva was contrasted to the arhat in terms of not being worried about the outer discipline but the inner realisation, so it has happened with Zen and Vajrayana contrasted to the general Mahayana. Obviously, after a thousand years Zen and Tantra are the mainstream, like once "hinayana" was, while the alternatives, a new wave, might be hidden now. Or not.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 5th, 2011 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: "Free Belief Buddhism"

Content:

Jikan said:

Some of the questions that came up for me while reading this:

Are "the once-human Buddhas and Bodhisattvas" usually presented as "the decisive agents of salvation" in Zen generally and the Taego school in particular?

If so, and also assuming that Batchelor's position is as the author describes it, does an atheistic attitude on the part of a student negate or preclude or make impossible the beneficent activities of the bodhisattvas in their lives? That is: do you need to believe in the Vows of the Cry Regarder in order to be helped in any way by her, or do bodhisattvas just meet beings where they are and help where they can regardless of their adherence or doctrine?

Astus wrote:

Buddhas and bodhisattvas are not decisive agents in so far as their relevance for Zen stands only in the form of teachers, guides, examples, etc.

Ear Bodhisattva (Avalokita) is there for those who call her/him - so there is a prerequisite for knowledge and faith. As for the nature of help she/he can provide is limited to the capacity of the person being helped.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 5th, 2011 at 12:53 AM

Title: Re: Defining Buddhism - Theravada/Mahayana/Varayana

Content:

mr. gordo said:

I mean, "the Buddha" has a religion named and after him called "Buddhism" where we have statements of his defining what his positions are. But hey, forget that, let's just take what we like, and discard what we don't, but still have the arrogance to call it Buddhism.

Yeshe D. said:

Interesting in that this is precisely what the Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna have done.

All the best,

Geoff

Astus wrote:

Wow.

Jikan, if we take the Mahayana arguments for the authenticity of its teachings, well, that already shows how even in India they were very well aware of the fact that the Mahayana texts were not part of the canon then.

History was not invented by Europeans. Both in China and Tibet scholars tried to get the original texts, the correct translations and the real teachings while at the same time attacked texts that seemed dubious and forged. It is not "Buddhist Protestantism" to say that in any Buddhist canon there are layers of texts from different eras but an easily understandable fact. All the attempts in Mahayana and Vajrayana teachings to prove their authenticity superiority above the other shows very well how they came later and fought for becoming accepted. But you don't find in the agamas/nikayas a debate whether the seven factors of enlightenment or the four arhats are better as it would have been quite ridiculous if the Buddha had argued with his own teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 5th, 2011 at 1:11 AM

Title: Re: Defining Buddhism - Theravada/Mahayana/Varayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm not talking about returning to any original Buddhism but only the perceptible historical evolution of texts and traditions within Buddhism. What is tradition today was heresy a thousand years ago. So in a sense it is possible to approximately outline the teachings that are most probably taught by the Buddha and the early community.

As for the returning to the original teachings of Buddha, that's been used a couple of times as an argument, just think of the Sautrantikas, or when Mahayana followers say that Nagarjuna showed the truth against the false ideas of "abhidharmikas".

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 5th, 2011 at 5:19 PM

Title: Re: Defining Buddhism - Theravada/Mahayana/Varayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

In Zen (no matter which version) they teach that there is a transmission lineage coming from Shakyamuni and even beyond that from the previous buddhas up to the current generation of so called Zen patriarchs. This concept of transmission is especially cherished in the West as something central to Zen. Its importance is clearer if we understand that what is transmitted is the buddha-mind, the enlightenment of the buddha, consequently those receiving this transmission are equals of a buddha.

But if we put aside the religious idea and look at it historically it turns out the whole transmission is made up and has no factual basis. While the notion of this special transmission has a meaning in the context of Zen it is at the same time a device used by monks of the past to gain authority and prestige. Those who firmly believe in the importance of a "Zen Master" (with capitals) might find these scholarly things insulting and offensive towards Zen (although it seems to me that those scholars who research Zen's history do that not because it is such a good business but because they are interested in it, might as well be followers of the religion).

The situation with other schools is similar. There is an internal, mythological legend of the history of Buddhism and there is an external, scientific version. It is noteworthy that neither the internal nor the external view are finished or stable. An important difference in the two versions is in their purpose as one takes religious preferences while the other takes scientific ones. Thus one should see things for what they are and understand the different categories of views and statements. This is not a bad practice for being free from attachments to concepts that - as we can see from this very thread too - can cause emotional disturbances.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 6th, 2011 at 1:17 AM

Title: Re: Defining Buddhism - Theravada/Mahayana/Varayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

Just because Mahayana and Vajrayana were not taught by Gautama doesn't mean they're wrong or anything like that. A very good example is Bön which has many teachings from the Prajnaparamita up to Dzogchen, still, it accepts no connection to Gautama. Does that mean that the Bön Prajnaparamita is incorrect while the Kagyu Prajnaparamita is correct? And I'm not talking about the quality of the translations.

I take the position similar to Huseng's: it is possible to see the basic ideas in the agamas/nikayas of what has become Mahayana. But that doesn't mean Gautama himself literally taught Mahayana. Which again doesn't mean it is not correct Buddhism, in the meaning and content.

Let me copy this text from Sthiramati that once existed on Anders' website (Leaves from the Buddha's Grove) but now it's hard to obtain (found <http://sutras.iespana.es/shastras/gran-vehiculo.html>:

Sthiramati Bodhisattva

Entering the Great Vehicle [Mahayana]

[Q] Now we may desire to penetrate the meaning of 'Entering the Great Vehicle [Great Vehicle]'. What is the meaning of 'Entering the Great Vehicle'?

[A] I wrote this text for those who want to get rid of the cause of suffering. But you must also know that there might be those who approach a lax spiritual friend and take up a wrong and partial opinion as the Dharma. Then the newcomer might formulate a heretical view and, because of wrong mental application, be unable to penetrate to the True Meaning, unable to know the Enlightenment of the Buddha, and have doubt about his sayings. One who disparages the (Buddha's) holy sayings will then destroy the True Dharma, and have a great deal of evil retribution. As the Blessed One said, "the result of disparaging the Dharma is more heavy than the five grievous transgressions (killing mother, father, arhat, causing dissension in the Sangha or making Buddha bleed), and will bring immediate retribution. Because life in the downward paths is a long duration, the ripening of suffering will be experienced for a long while." And as the Sutra verses say:

"One who slanders the Dharma of the Great Vehicle goes to the lower states of being. This person experiences the ripening of his action and its true nature should be told. He's born deep in hell, and his body burns in great flames; the great torture of his incineration is always the result of sinful action. A blazing iron plow - for five hundred lives - rolls on the top of his tongue while the remainder of his body is struck with pain. If he manages to escape hell, he will still experience other forms of evil retribution and all his senses will be continually non-functioning and polluted; he'll never hear the sound of Dharma. In the exceptional case of one who happens to hear the Dharma, it will again be that he will slander the Holy Dharma, and because of this he will go back to hell."

So all those defaming the Dharma should listen here. You should maintain an attitude of doubt toward the Great Vehicle. Just like Aryadeva says in verse:

"One who has little merit will not even feel doubt about the Dharma. But existence is shredded by the mere presence of doubt." - Catusataka 8.5

If one has doubt having heard all the fundamental teachings of the Great Vehicle, one's intellect will penetrate the subjects and be open to Enlightenment. One who has become open to Enlightenment will [then] simply bring about trust in the teaching, which will lead to further joy and happiness. One who brings about this joy and happiness will obtain the insight brought about by listening, pondering and meditating on the Dharma. One will then progress all the way to total understanding of the Awareness of all States [of being], just like the Buddha.

Thus, we have those who denigrate the Great Vehicle and will fall into the lower realms of being, and those who generate all good actions because of the Great Vehicle. One will thus decay or grow depending on their association [with Great Vehicle]. If one's desire is for Insight, one will travel the path to Enlightenment. It is the same with all beings, since they all have this ability equally. If Enlightenment were separate from the capacity of sentient beings, then the path to Enlightenment would be unobtainable. But, from the realm of all beings comes the Enlightenment of All Buddhas. The Ven. Nagarjuna, in verse, says:

"It doesn't descend from space, nor does it arise from the ground. Rather, the direct perception of Total Enlightenment only happens in those having [first] encountered unskillful emotional states." - Suhrillekha 116

Now this treatise is about entering the Great Vehicle. But what sort of entity is this thing called the Great Vehicle? The collection of scripture known as the "bodhisattva basket" is the Great Vehicle.

One may object that the Buddha spoke of neither the three vehicles nor of the Great Vehicle. However, both of these were identified by the Buddha with the term "three baskets of the doctrine" (tripitaka). As it is said in the Bodhisattva-pitaka-sutra:

"The Buddha addressed Ajaatasatru, 'Son of good family. There are three kinds of baskets. Which are these? There is the disciple's basket, the private buddha's basket, and the bodhisattvas' basket. Son of good family, we identify the term "three baskets" only by means of the Great Vehicle to be studied by all the bodhisattvas, not by means of the vehicles of the disciples or of the private Buddhas. Thus we call it the "three baskets". Why? The expression of the dharma concerns all of the three vehicles, and this is why it is called the "three baskets", yet only the dharma spoken to the bodhisattvas reflects the capacity to the practice of the three vehicles, so it is terms the "three baskets."'

“Son of good family, there are individuals who have the capability to train in one of three ways: those undertaking the disciples’ training, the private buddhas’ training, or the bodhisattvas’ training. Disciples do not study in the vehicle of the private buddhas since they are unable to penetrate its meaning. Likewise, private buddhas cannot penetrate the bodhisattva vehicle. Only the bodhisattvas are capable of studying others’ vehicles, yet they do not obtain realization in these paths but by means of the bodhisattva vehicle. Thus, theirs is the profound enlightenment of the Dharma to be practiced by the bodhisattvas. Because it has this significance, the bodhisattva vehicle is termed the “three baskets” and not the other’s vehicles.”

Other scriptures also elaborate the following exhaustive distinctions, which I am now going to summarize, so please listen. You may think that the Great Vehicle is not part of the three baskets. Then, the three baskets consist of: the Enumerated Discourses, the Middle-length Discourses, the Long Discourses, and the Scattered Discourses, constituting the one hundred thousand plus verses of the first basket; the discipline and the higher dharma, composing the two hundred thousand verses of the second basket; and the complete cultivations composing the third basket. This, in fact, is not to be identified with the three baskets. Why? Because many other scriptures would not be considered the word of the Buddha. Yet there are still other scriptures than those included in the discourses, the discipline, and the higher dharma. There are the works of the “scattered basket”, the Tiger Scripture, the Womb Scripture, the Advice to Kings, Prior Births of the Buddha, the Dependent Origination for Private Buddhas -- altogether eighty-four thousand baskets of doctrine. If only the three baskets are the word of the Buddha, then we would have the problem that not everything collected by the venerable Ananda would be considered the word of the Buddha. Thus, we should identify all of them with the term “basket”, and conclude that there are over one hundred thousand baskets of the dharma.

One may object that the Blessed One has previously said, “After my Nirvana, in the future there will come many who will sit around and argue, ‘This is the word of the Buddha, this is not the word of the Buddha.’” In response to this anticipated circumstance, the Tathagata has sealed his doctrine with the seal of the dharma. “If the meaning of a scripture is in harmony with the discourses, if it is in accord with the discipline, and if it does not contradict the nature of reality [dependent origination], then that scripture may be termed the word of the Buddha.”

Our response to this objection is that the Buddha certainly did not apply these criteria to the bodhisattva vehicle while exempting the disciple’s vehicle. The Buddha’s word is not dissimilar in either case but indicates a single nature to be sealed by the seal of the dharma. Now, as to your means of comparison between a scripture proposed as the word of the Buddha and the three baskets, is it done by means of the letter of the texts or by the significance? If it is by the letter, then it is impossible that any of the twelve sections of scripture should be the word of the Buddha, since they all have different verses, sections, and sentences. But if the comparison is performed by examining the meaning through reason which does not contradict the nature of reality, then a meaning which harmonizes with the significance of discourses and is characterized by reality accordingly demonstrates its own significance. So those discourses which demonstrate the significance of the disciple's dharma belong to the disciples' vehicle. Those discourses which demonstrate the significance of the private buddhas' dharma belong to the private buddhas vehicle, and those discourses which demonstrate the significance of the bodhisattvas' dharma belong to the bodhisattvas' vehicle. . . Now the inquiry into the perspective equal for all the buddhas in the universe (as many as are particles of dust) is also the dharma to be received from an excellent spiritual friend. It is thus the complete Great Vehicle and termed the expanded discourses - immeasurable, unlimited, and not part of the disciples' dharma. Its meaning is very profound, and accordingly all the dharma to be cultivated by the disciples is found minutely included into the path of the Great Vehicle. It is great blessedness and this is what is meant by "in harmony with the discourses."

Now we should discuss the phrase, "in accord with the discipline." The holy path of all the three vehicles equally destroys desire, anger and hatred, which is the reason it is identified as discipline. Now the discourses discriminate cause and results, whereas the higher dharma discriminates the characteristics of real events, yet they both destroy the mental and emotional defilements. The Great Vehicle also speaks of the elimination of all evil events, the defilements of desire, anger, and ignorance. The Buddha taught the disciples to purify their own three varieties of action - body, speech, and mind - and called that the discipline. To the bodhisattvas, he taught them to purify their own three varieties of action - even going as far as the accomplishments of Buddha - by grasping and completing the perfection of virtue. Morality itself is to be grasped by the bodhisattvas. By generating the thought of awakening for all beings they are able to obtain the fruit called absolute truth. Thus the Great Vehicle is in accord with the discipline.

Finally, it does not contradict reality. As none of the three vehicles speaks of the contradiction of the twelve parts of dependent origination, neither does the Great Vehicle.

So, one who investigates well this issue realizes that the Great Vehicle is completely in accord with the threefold seal of the dharma. Of course, if one does not well investigate it, then neither the Great Vehicle nor any of the three vehicles is accepted. And one deprecating the Great Vehicle then commits the gravest of faults.

If you now maintain the Great Vehicle to be the word of Mara, and not that of the Buddha, then we must reply that in none of the discourses do we truly find the pronouncement that the Great Vehicle is Mara's word. So, this objection cannot be trusted. If you believe that to call the Great Vehicle the word of the Buddha is like a worm in the body of the Teacher that still feeds on his corpse, then all of the vehicles feed off the dharma body of the Buddha, not just the Great Vehicle. By just this token, it cannot be the word of Mara since only the Buddha is able to express it.

Bodhisattvas have immeasurable, unlimited, incalculable qualities that reach as far as the very hells. Facing Nirvana directly, they still return to the cycle of birth and death through their sympathy for living beings. Here they remain for an incalculable eon and experience for a very long time heroic suffering. You see, the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, the great beings (mahasattvas), is actually the Great Suffering Vehicle. Their search for the highest fruit is inconceivable. They have left behind all the disciples and private buddhas, surpassing their efforts. Fulfilling all the qualities of enlightenment, they transcend the stage of the facile “knowable.”

How is the bodhisattvas’ vehicle the Great Suffering Vehicle? Suppose that a person might take a ship across the ocean. On the high seas, an evil wind arises, making the waves appear like mountains. Other countless calamities like this occur at the same time. All of his companions are anxious and develop an overwhelming fear, but the captain has long experience in handling the sails and has the merit of the ability to overcome difficulties. Transcending his troubles, he seizes the great precious gem in the ocean.

The bodhisattva, the great being, is at rest in the sea of birth and death. He does not trust the troubles that are entertained by going down the evil path on account of listening to a poor spiritual friend. During the first incalculable eon, the bodhisattva cultivates the practices associated with the stage of purity and seeks pure liberation. During the second incalculable eon, the bodhisattva cultivates the practices of pure contemplation. During the third incalculable eon, the bodhisattva cultivates the practices of pure gnosis and overcomes the obscurities of the stage of the facile knowable. Therefore, the bodhisattvas’ vehicle is termed the Suffering Vehicle. Completing all the ten stages, he obtains them certainly and clearly. Because of the completion of all practices, he obtains the highest, complete, perfect awakening. Through his cognition of final gnosis, he accomplishes the great accomplishment.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 6th, 2011 at 7:38 PM

Title: Re: Defining Buddhism - Theravada/Mahayana/Varayana

Content:

Huseng said:

Likewise, some might have seen Shakyamuni as a wise man and others something transcendental. The texts that later generations relied on allow for either interpretation. For example how do you interpret Shakyamuni complaining about a sore back? Was it skilful means? Or did he really have a sore back? Did the Buddha not eradicate all his negative karma -- why would he still suffer from a sore back if he had?

Astus wrote:

There's the funny story in the Vimalakirti Sutra about the Buddha asking for milk because he's sick, Ananada goes to get milk, Vimalakirti rebukes him harshly saying that the Buddha's body is the dharmakaya which can't be sick and finally a heavenly voice tells the poor fellow he should nevertheless take the milk to the Tathagata. So, the buddha is perfect but still gets sick and needs some milk.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 6th, 2011 at 8:36 PM

Title: Re: 信心 and how to develop it

Content:

Astus wrote:

"When I carefully consider the matter, my birth in the Pure land is settled without doubt for the very reason that I do not rejoice about that which I should be bursting with joy. ... If our hearts were filled with joyful happiness and we desired to go swiftly to the Pure Land, we might be misled to think that perhaps we are free of blind passion." (Tannisho, IX.)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 8th, 2011 at 9:20 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Reginald Ray

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is fascinating how nobody actually tried to look up in Dr. Ray's many publications what he says about rebirth. He had a two part article on it in Shambhala Sun (not bad ones either):

"Karma's central place in the tradition is shown by the Buddha's own enlightenment, which consisted of nothing but seeing the full range and extent of karma-that nothing in the universe stands outside karma's domain."

http://www.shambhalasun.com/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=2232

http://www.shambhalasun.com/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=2236&Itemid=0

One extra:

http://www.shambhalasun.com/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=2377&Itemid=243

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 11th, 2011 at 8:32 PM

Title: Re: 信心 and how to develop it

Content:

Astus wrote:

Nosta,

They're not opposing views but different approaches. As you may well know, in PL there's made a separation of self-power and other-power. They basically mean attitudes. Self-power PL practices include visualisation and recitation when they're done with the intent of attaining birth through the taming of the mind. Other-power practice means that you rely on Amita Buddha's vow-power to attain birth. In practice it comes down to the recitation of the name with the intent of being mindful of the Buddha (nianfo - buddha-mindfulness) not necessarily to attain any special mind-state but to nurture faith. Thus recitation and faith are not really two but a single path. Honen affirms this in his <http://www.jsri.jp/English/Honen/WRITINGS/ichimai.html>: "Reciting the nembutsu does not come from studying and understanding its meaning. There is no other reason or cause by which we can utterly believe in attaining birth in the Pure Land than the nembutsu itself. Reciting the nembutsu and believing in birth in the Pure Land naturally gives rise to the three minds and the four modes of practice."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 12th, 2011 at 6:10 AM

Title: Re: Krishnamurti and Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

All quotes from the text in the OP:

"In Krishnamurti's view enlightenment comes by its own accord where and when it chooses, and there is little that we can do about it."

The clearly denies the whole point of the fourth noble truth, without which there is no Buddhism. It is a form of view of no causality.

"Enlightenment is a state that is timeless which means that its chief attribute is one of no-time, meaning no involvement with ego or ego-created time."

Enlightenment being timeless against thoughts being of time is pretty much a dualistic concept unlike those of Mahayana teachers.

The only thing remaining sacred in Krishnamurti's view is that which thought is incapable of capturing or the unknowable. All thoughts are mere human creations of the human brain stem and are forever incapable of capturing that which is infinite and unknowable.

First, this is disregarding the function of methods. Second, it doesn't show any knowledge of wisdom.

I don't know JK's teachings, haven't read a single book from him. But if these represent his views I fail to see how it resembles the teachings of the Buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 12th, 2011 at 8:43 AM

Title: Re: Krishnamurti and Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dexing's question moved to new topic:

<http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=69&t=3037>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 12th, 2011 at 8:47 AM

Title: Re: Krishnamurti and Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Is there any summary of JK's teachings? To have something definitive to compare.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 12th, 2011 at 6:11 PM

Title: Re: Pre-Buddhist Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here is a list of works, just to show how the "legend of Chan" is not really the "history of Chan":

John R. McRae

The Northern School and the formation of early Ch'an Buddhism

Seeing through Zen: encounter, transformation, and genealogy in Chinese Chan Buddhism

Wendi Leigh Adamek

The mystique of transmission: on an early Chan history and its contexts

Jinhua Jia

The Hongzhou School of Chan Buddhism in Eighth- Through Tenth-Century China

Mario Poceski

Ordinary mind as the way: the Hongzhou school and the growth of Chan Buddhism

Albert Welter

The Linji lu and the creation of Chan orthodoxy: the development of Chan's records of sayings literature

Morten Schlutter

How Zen Became Zen: The Dispute Over Enlightenment and the Formation of Chan Buddhism in Song-Dynasty China

Jiang Wu

Enlightenment in dispute: the reinvention of Chan Buddhism in seventeenth-century China

There are other books, like the series edited by Steven Heine and Dale Stuart Wright, also a couple of works by Bernard Faure. But I think just reading McRae's "Seeing through Zen" is a very good introduction.

The point is, there is not just any pre-Buddhist Chan but there isn't even a clear cut Chan as represented by the tradition. Frankly, there isn't such Chan even now.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 12th, 2011 at 6:14 PM

Title: Re: Krishnamurti and Buddhism

Content:

Dharmakara said:

I recall coming across a critical examination of JK that seemed to cover such, though I'm going to have to look around and see if I can find it again.

Sorry, my mistake... it's actually the official repository of Krishnatrui's teachings, which includes search text feature:

<http://www.jkrishnamurti.org/krishnamurti-teachings/index.php> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Astus wrote:

I was hoping you've got something of 1-5 pages size.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 12th, 2011 at 7:19 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and endless time

Content:

Sherab said:

Huseng's argument is valid if we confined ourselves to just to the realm of experience of the five senses.

But Norman has a point too because in my view, an argument of infinite regress means that there cannot be a complete explanation. There will always be something missing.

In reading the so-called "Mind Only" sutras, I get the sense that there is an implicate order from which explicate orders of sentience and matter arises. Within that implicate order, past, present and future are not distinct.

Dzogchen seemed to me to be a little more explicit about this implicate order, which it termed as rigpa. From rigpa, our world of phenomena, including both sentience and non-sentience things, arises. Within the sentience that arose is an innate ignorance which the source of all our deluded actions (karma) and which resulted in our endless cycling in existence.

In rigpa (implicate order), the phenomenon of the flow of time is not there. When our world of phenomena (explicate order) arose, past, present and future all arose together.

Astus wrote:

Huseng's argument applies to the mind-stream too, as the pinpointing of a beginning raises the mentioned problems. Also, if you affirm that defiled beings arose from a pure mind (rigpa) means that either defilement came from nowhere or that the mind wasn't pure. On the other hand, supposing an eternal mind is also problematical, that's why eventually people came up with the concept of the mind-stream, which is an application of the teaching of dependent origination.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 12th, 2011 at 7:48 PM

Title: Re: Pre-Buddhist Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dharmakara,

First of all, it'd be good to identify what kind of Chan one means as it has never been a single set of doctrines but rather diverse, especially in the early period (7-10th century). Saying that Chan is "without words and from mind to mind" sounds inappropriate for the me, the reasons being: (1) "wordlessness" is a concept found often in the Prajnaparamita teachings and thus in every Mahayana school; (2) the concept of a transmission lineage of patriarchs was gradually developed throughout the centuries starting with the disciples of Shenxiu and the so called Lankavatara school, their text found in Dunhuang and translated by JC Cleary in Zen Dawn as "Records of the Teachers and Students of the Lanka". The whole idea of Huineng and that he was the real 6th patriarch came a bit later, just like the many stories of Bodhidharma. The complete transmission lineage solidified in the 11th century with the publication of the first collection of such a record, the Jingde(-era 1004-8) Lamp Transmission Record (Jingde Chuandeng Lu 景德傳燈錄) in 1004 after which only minor changes occurred.

In my opinion there is hard to find any doctrine within Chan that is not from Buddhist teachings but other sources. Also, Chan teachers of the early period were keen on establishing their teachings on the different sutras to make clear it to others their authenticity.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 12th, 2011 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: Pre-Buddhist Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dharmakara,

Besides there being <http://www.purifymind.com/BuildingBlocks.htm> with the text you quoted, it shows no author or source. Also, it displays a few misunderstandings, like there being any kind of "Universal Mind" to return to, or that of a "philosophical Daoism" (which is itself non-existent but a creation of orientalist) confused with Buddhist teachings. So I doubt it has any relevance to this discussion.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 12th, 2011 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: Krishnamurti and Buddhism

Content:

Dharmakara said:

Came across a PDF entitled "An Instance of Dependent Origination"... it's described as a terse summary of Krishnamurti's teachings, though not sure how many pages as I don't have a PDF reader on this computer:

<http://www.shin-ibs.edu/documents/pwj3-9/06Rodrigues39.pdf> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

Astus wrote:

Perhaps it'd be the best if you could sum up in a few points what JK says.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 13th, 2011 at 4:19 AM

Title: Re: Pre-Buddhist Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

What you say, that Chan developed from the mixture of Chinese culture and Buddhism, presupposes that it was more of an unconscious, natural progress rather than the work of highly educated elite Buddhist monks. But as we can see from the historical sources - both internal and external to the tradition - Chan was the domain of high ranking monks, i.e. they were the primary authorities and transmitters of the teaching. Being a Chan master who is a member of the lineage (n.b. this is from the Song dynasty on when an actual Chan school was conceived) was a matter of prestige rather than a purely religious thing (meaning that it wasn't about "if you're enlightened you're a master"). By all this I want to say that Chan is not some inconceivable, mystical tradition but a product of outstanding Buddhist monks who were trained in both worldly and religious teachings who could tell very well the difference between Buddhism and other views. A good example is Guifeng Zongmi's Inquiry into the Origin of Humanity (translated by Peter N. Gregory) where he explains how Confucianism and Taoism are on one part equals of Buddhist moral teachings while on the other they are only provisional and mistaken doctrines that don't lead to liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 13th, 2011 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: Krishnamurti and Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dharmakara,

I've seen that discussion with Walpola Rahula before. That is obviously Rahula's take of JK's views, so it'd be difficult to discuss how JK actually relates to Buddhism when there's hardly anything from Krishnamurti himself. What is apparent is JK's refutation of all forms of organised doctrine and practice, quite opposing perspective to the Buddha's Dharma and Vinaya.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 13th, 2011 at 5:39 AM

Title: Re: Pre-Buddhist Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

Do you mean that 1000 years of Chinese Buddhism was struggling? Not to mention that Chan did not bring about any new institution in the monastic system except for the spread of "house rules" as an extra for the Pratimoksha and bodhisattva precepts and the "patriarchal lineage" as a metaphoric family organisation tool.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 13th, 2011 at 4:56 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and endless time

Content:

norman said:

A conceptual, abstract "beginning" is always implied whenever we consider rebirth. It provides the contextual background of our present assumed birth. That is, thinking of ourselves as having been reborn into this period of time is inconceivable unless it is put into relation to what is past – and if you perceive the past as being endless you'd find it hard to motivate the (assumed) karma that we're supposed to suffer from. I say supposed, because when should we begin to measure it (karma) in time, if there is no limit to it? It's like trying to measure the quantity of water in a bottomless well. I'd appreciate it's about 5 litres.

Astus wrote:

Problem 1: if every effect have to have a cause, as cause is an effect too, there can't be a causeless cause, thus a first cause is not possible.

Problem 2: understanding birth as a becoming of an entity supposes that such an entity was non-existent but now exists, which is saying that from nothing comes something, or that something becomes without cause.

Problem 1 is to show how a beginning point is fallacious from a causal point of view.

Problem 2 points to the mistake of conceiving fixed beings (atman) instead of mind-streams.

Nagarjuna says

(<http://www.stephenbatchelor.org/verses2.htm#Investigation%20of%20Extremes%20of%20Before%20and%20After>):

"When asked, "is a before-extreme evident?" the great Muni said, "it is not." Samsara has no beginning, no end; it has no before, no after. For that without beginning [and] end, where can a middle be in that? Therefore, it is not possible for it to have before, after, and simultaneous phases."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 13th, 2011 at 5:36 PM

Title: Re: Pre-Buddhist Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

As elements distinguishing Chan, a good comparison could be with Tiantai as it was its rival school for a couple of centuries. Tiantai has methods of both gradual and sudden type and has a patriarchal lineage - both from the time before the emergence of Chan. In fact, Chan has profited from teachings found in Tiantai, including its meditation techniques.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 15th, 2011 at 9:11 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth and endless time

Content:

Astus wrote:

Norman,

The analysis of time in the MMK is in the 19th chapter. This chapter (11) is mainly about samsara, and generally about the concepts of beginning, middle and end. As none of the three can be established as truly existent samsara is not truly existent. Not being truly existent is its inconceivability. Saying that samsara is eternal is of course equally wrong as it'd mean it is truly existent but this time from an eternalist point of view.

Here's Tsongkhapa's commentary to verse 1:

Ocean of Reasoning p. 266-268 said:

If cyclic existence existed inherently, then like such things as a pot, it would also have a beginning and an end. But it is said that cyclic existence does not have a beginning or end, in that the cycle of birth, aging, and death does not have an origin or a terminus. Various non-Buddhist teachers, including Purana a, held a discussion and decided to ask the Buddha whether he knew that this cyclic existence has a beginning or end. They said that if he says that he does, this would contradict the many statements that there is no creator and that nothing arises without a cause, but if he says that he does not, he would contradict his statement that he is omniscient. Then they asked him "Hey, Gautama! Do you know that this cyclic existence has a beginning?" The great sage replied, "There is no knowledge of a beginning." Thus, having said that cyclic existence has no beginning or end, he said clearly that it does not exist essentially. Therefore, since the origin and terminus are not seen, cyclic existence does not exist essentially; cyclic existence is like the circle made by swinging a glowing ember.

Someone might say, "The statement that cyclic existence has no origin demonstrates that there is no specific point from which it arises, nor any point after which it does not continue. How could it be tenable that to say that neither of these exists is to say explicitly that cyclic existence does not exist essentially?” But here we reply that the statement, “Cyclic existence has neither origin nor terminus,” does not mean what you say it does, but instead means that he has also said that there is neither a beginning nor an end. This means that they do not exist ultimately. Buddhapalita also says in the same vein,

In accordance with the presentation of the ultimate, the Buddha has said “there is neither beginning nor end.”

Thus, this does not contradict Prasannapada’s earlier explanation. Suppose someone thought as follows: Responding “I don’t know” to the question, “Do you know that there is a beginning?” is a conventional statement. How could this be a premise for the assertion that cyclic existence is essenceless?

Here, consider the similar argument in Yuktisastika:

If through the elimination of afflictions monks depart from cyclic existence,
Why have the buddhas not Explained the beginning?

If there were an end of cyclic existence—and of aggregates that exist through their own characteristics—then there would be no reason for saying that there is no initial beginning.

Suppose someone argued as follows: If the teacher had denied that there is a beginning and end of cyclic existence, then this would contradict the following statement in sutra that there is elimination at the end:

Therefore, oh monks, one should make strenuous effort to eliminate cyclic existence. Thinking that, you should begin training immediately. [Samyuttanikaya XV Anamataggasamyuttam, IX Dandasuttam, Vol. II, 616]

There is no contradiction here, because this quotation from sutra presents only the cyclic existence of those “sentient beings who are ignorant” as having no end, but for those who have completely eliminated the afflictions, there is an end.

Suppose one thought, would it not be contradictory for that which lacks an origin to have a terminus? There is no contradiction, because, as Catuhṣataka says,

Just as the terminus of the seed is seen,
But the origin is not seen,
Without completing all of the causes,
Nor does birth occur. [VIII: 25]

Just as even though the seed does not have an origin, there is a terminus when it is burned by fire, although birth does not have a beginning for those who have not completed the causes through the exhaustion of the afflictions, it is said that there is a terminus—the exhaustion of that birth which occurs due the afflictions. Here, although the origin and terminus are equally nonexistent with respect to the way things really are, conventionally, the origin and terminus are not similar with respect to their existence and nonexistence.

Suppose someone says that although it has neither origin nor terminus essentially it must have a middle essentially, since that has not been refuted.

Astus wrote:

And another explanation by http://www.ktgrinpoche.org/Q8_samsara_does_not_truly_exist.pdf:

If samsara actually existed, it would have to have a beginning, an end, and some span of time in the middle. Analysis, however, cannot find any beginning to samsara. Whatever our current situation in samsara, it had to have its own causes, and those causes had to have their own causes, and so on—nothing in the cycle of existence occurs without causes to bring it into being. We can therefore never find an “original cause” that would constitute the beginning of cyclic existence, because if there were one, it would have arisen without a cause itself, which is impossible. Thus, there was no point when samsara began, and how could something that never began ever end? Without a beginning or an end, how could there be any period of time in the middle? Since it has neither beginning, middle, nor end, samsara does not truly exist.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 16th, 2011 at 3:04 AM

Title: Re: Amitabha Sutra commentary

Content:

Astus wrote:

Ouyi Zhixu's (1599-1655) commentary to the Amitabha Sutra:

http://www.ymba.org/freebooks_main.html

Xingyun: <http://www.abuddhistlibrary.com/Buddhism/D%20-%20Chinese%20Mahayana%20Buddhism/Authors/Hsing%20Yun/The%20Amitabha%20Sutra/14%20Amitabha%20Sutra.htm>

Reading the Amitabha Sutra in Sanskrit line by line with vocabulary and commentary http://buddhism.lib.ntu.edu.tw/BDLM/en/lesson/fan/lesson_fan2.htm#1.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 17th, 2011 at 6:04 AM

Title: Re: Lure of Bhutanese happiness index

Content:

Astus wrote:

It certainly sounds more challenging to make people happy than to get them a proper salary. Not that any of that are generally achieved by most countries.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 17th, 2011 at 6:10 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth and endless time

Content:

Astus wrote:

Norman,

Yes, that goes for the empty part of samsara and time and all concepts. But as for the conventional side, we can very well say that there was never a starting point of samsara, there was never a first cause (i.e. God). Buddhist cosmology talks about the periods of arising and destruction, a never stopping cycle of events.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 17th, 2011 at 7:11 AM

Title: Re: "Free Belief Buddhism"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Guifeng Zongmi - an influential Chan and Huayan master whose teachings are still taught in Korea where Batchelor learned his Zen things - categorised the teachings into five levels of which the first is the path of humans and gods. Generally the path of humans and gods covers the teachings that are good for gaining one a rebirth as a human or a god, i.e. the ethical and certain meditative practices. Removing the doctrine of karma and rebirth from a teaching makes it obviously outside of any teaching that is considered Buddhist in any sense. So from this perspective Buddhism without belief in rebirth means not Buddhism but an outer path that doesn't lead to any kind of liberation but at best to a higher birth if ethical teachings are kept.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 17th, 2011 at 4:38 PM

Title: Re: "Free Belief Buddhism"

Content:

Chaz said:

It's been my understanding that "Right View" involves a correct perspective on the 4 Noble truths. Rebirth, for one thing, isn't present in that understanding.

Unless I'm missing something really important, your statement sounds more like trying to maintain a doctrinal status quo than trying to promote or preserve "right view".

Seems to be a common thread Buddhist boards these day.

Astus wrote:

In the list of ten unwholesome actions the last one is "wrong views". It is defined in the Saleyyaka Sutta (MN 41) in the following way:

Or he has wrong view, distorted vision, thus: 'There is nothing given, nothing offered, nothing sacrificed, no fruit and ripening of good and bad karmas, no this world, no other world, no mother, no father, no spontaneously (born) beings, no good and virtuous monks and brahmans that have themselves realized by direct knowledge and declare this world and the other world.'

Also see this teaching by Ven. Ledi Sayadaw: <http://www.bps.lk/olib/wh/wh245-p.html> where under right view he gives a detailed explanation of what it actually consists of.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 17th, 2011 at 4:55 PM

Title: Re: "Free Belief Buddhism"

Content:

TMingyur said:

Considering that the "don't know mind" is a practice approach agnosticism appears to comply.

There is however a subtle bolderline between agnosticism and rejection. What is what in a given case may only be decided based on textual analysis.

Astus wrote:

It is a great mistake to confuse Seung Sahn's "don't know mind" with agnosticism. In <http://www.kwanumzen.org/zen.html> it is a term equal to <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=77&t=3057>. Agnosticism is being hindered by doubt, the fifth of the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Five_hindrances.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 17th, 2011 at 10:00 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and endless time

Content:

Astus wrote:

We are then back to the problem of beginningless causality-chain.

Why would a beginningless causality be a problem? There is samsara without a beginning, consciousness without beginning, ignorance without beginning. That is, there has never been a first moment of delusion, a creation, a start of existence, a source.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 17th, 2011 at 11:15 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and endless time

Content:

Astus wrote:

Norman,

What do you mean dharmas are not in time? What about their basic description of them being momentary and in that momentariness they have the phases of arising and disappearing?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 18th, 2011 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: "Free Belief Buddhism"

Content:

Chaz said:

In light of this thread becoming an exercise in stating who is qualified to teach the Dharma and who isn't, please tell me what qualifies Ven Ledi to teach on the subject?

I imagine you find Venerable's teaching most acceptable seeing as you're recommending him, but to be fair, simply agreeing with a teacher isn't sufficient credential (although disagreement seems to be in other ways).

Astus wrote:

I have not addressed the issue whether anyone is qualified or not qualified to teach. In my view it is the teaching that matters and not the teacher. To tell if a person is really a great teacher takes first of all personal contact and long term relationship. Sure this is a bit extreme but a measure I like to keep in mind.

For instance, when Batchelor was in Budapest my friend met him and I've heard many good things about him. I've also found certain positive things about Batchelor and what he does. But that is not the same as agreeing with him in all things. And just because I can't agree with the concept that Buddhism can be fully comprehended and practised without rebirth doesn't mean I have to have bad feelings about anyone who teaches just that.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 18th, 2011 at 4:20 AM

Title: Re: "Free Belief Buddhism"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Little extra on karma, rebirth and speech.

"Harsh speech — when indulged in, developed, & pursued — is something that leads to hell, leads to rebirth as a common animal, leads to the realm of the hungry shades. The slightest of all the results coming from harsh speech is that, when one becomes a human being, it leads to unappealing sounds."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an08/an08.040.than.html>)

"Those who with body and mouth curse at people, after death fall into the Tongue Ripping Hell." (Karma of Good and Evil Sutra T85n2881_p1381c19) More:
<http://www.cttbusa.org/esscommentary/earthstore5.htm>.

For further contemplation:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/kn/snp/snp.3.03.than.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 18th, 2011 at 6:54 AM

Title: Re: "Free Belief Buddhism"

Content:

Astus wrote:

As you're discussing some Tibetan teachers, here's one I read yesterday,

"Some people find comfort in thinking that death is just like a fire that was put out or water that dried up. But death isn't at all like that. According to the words of the fully enlightened Buddha and the many texts of the bodhisattvas, the mind doesn't die. When the body dies, the mind remains under the power of habitual patterns and karma. Thus, those who trust the Buddha and the tradition he inspired will believe in birth, death, and the cause and effect of karmic actions."

(Tulku Ugyen Rinpoche - Repeating the Words of the Buddha, Rangjung Yeshe Pub., 1992. p. 95)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 18th, 2011 at 5:19 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and endless time

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Such explanations by its very nature, can never be a complete explanation."

Sorry, but this is just repeating that it is a problem and not answering why it is a problem.

"If you agree with Nagarjuna's argument, then there can be no real moments and no real momentariness, since the same argument about the impossibility of a before, after and simultaneous phase is applicable to moments as well."

Ultimately not even dharmas exist, so they can't be outside of time. Conventionally, however, the Abhidharma system is not at fault. An important difference between Madhyamaka and Abhidharma teachings is how the two truths are defined. In Abhidharma the dharmas are ultimate, in Madhyamaka dharmas are conventional only. However, being conventional doesn't mean it is non-existent or not true at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 19th, 2011 at 12:42 AM

Title: Re: Share Your Favorite Buddhist Blogs

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://wakeupandlaugh.wordpress.com/> - group blog of followers and admirers of Daehaeng Kunsunim.

<http://sujato.wordpress.com/> - the title says it.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 19th, 2011 at 7:04 AM

Title: Re: The so-called emptiness of objects

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Mahāyāna doctrines stop before asserting any sort of external phenomena."

Prasangika Madhyamaka specifically affirms external phenomena, it's even listed among their "unique tenets".

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 19th, 2011 at 4:18 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and endless time

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sherab,

This is not a series of questions about what was before or after but a system of dependent origination which is simply a universal law stating that things arise dependently and not without a cause, from which comes there is no first cause existing without a cause of its own, consequently mind-streams are eternal.

Ultimately dharmas don't exist, just like anything else, but then, there is the conventional existence of the dharmas. It is exactly because of being conventional that ultimately they're not established and empty.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 21st, 2011 at 4:43 PM

Title: Re: Why danger of Elder teachings for Mahayana follower?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Just to re-emphasise what Swampflower said, the paths (sravaka, pratyeka, bodhisattva) are primarily about motivation and not doctrine. Compared to the sravaka way the extra what a bodhisattva does is the accumulation of merits. In terms of wisdom sravaka and bodhisattva are equal. Also, the whole concept of a bodhisattvayana is not a "Mahayana" product but has existed in schools like the Sarvastivada and Dharmagupta - and many of their interpretations became mainstream in Mahayana - just as it does in Theravada now.

I find it a mistaken concept to believe that there is a clear border between "Hinayana" and "Mahayana" teachings. Keep in mind that there has never been a school or group of schools called Hinayana, it's just a convenient term to call most of Indian Buddhist schools. Thus what one may consider Mahayana teachings are in many cases found word by word in earlier "Hinayana" texts and schools, including the idea that a bodhisattva has to practise through many aeons and go through the five paths (accumulation, preparation, insight, meditation, no more learning). So a "Mahayana follower" is the one who focuses on walking to bodhisattva path instead of the sravaka way but it is no way a rejection of any of the teachings of Buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 21st, 2011 at 8:15 PM

Title: Re: The so-called emptiness of objects

Content:

Astus wrote:

"How can there be an origin to anything which is empty?"

Emptiness means impermanence, impermanence is arising, remaining and disappearing. Only empty things can have an origin and an end. But exactly because there is an origin there is no real (eternal and independent) origin, because there is cause there is no real cause.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 21st, 2011 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: Why danger of Elder teachings for Mahayana follower?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Hanzze,

None of the four defeats in your quote may come from studying the Pali Canon but rather the opposites of them. Also, on of the essential practices of bodhisattvas, the four immeasurables, are articulated in quite a few suttas of the Pali Canon.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 22nd, 2011 at 3:27 AM

Title: Re: Why danger of Elder teachings for Mahayana follower?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Hanzze,

Teachings to reach human and heavenly birth are very much present in Mahayana, not to mention methods to attain earthly welfare (e.g. mantras and rituals). An important point is that whatever Mahayana teaching you may find, they're all built upon the earlier teachings, in this case represented by the Pali Canon (although Mahayana has used the Sanskrit texts and not the Pali). Thus we could say that Mahayana includes the teachings found in the Nikayas and accepts them as valid Buddha-speech.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 22nd, 2011 at 11:42 PM

Title: Re: Why danger of Elder teachings for Mahayana follower?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is no danger in losing bodhicitta because one studies the very teachings of the Buddha. In fact, bodhicitta is not a thing one can lose, but an attitude and view one has to develop and maintain. Shakyamuni was a perfect teacher and he had no problem at all with teaching so many things. How on earth could it be in any way dangerous to study them?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 23rd, 2011 at 2:40 AM

Title: Re: Why danger of Elder teachings for Mahayana follower?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Hanzze,

How does this not answer your original question?

Unknown said:

There is no danger in losing bodhicitta because one studies the very teachings of the Buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 23rd, 2011 at 5:46 AM

Title: Re: Why danger of Elder teachings for Mahayana follower?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"However there are teachings about bodhicitta in the sutras and commentaries of the Mahayana."

There are also a couple of Mahayana sutras and other texts not dealing with bodhicitta. There are also other texts within Mahayana teaching about an even higher path than the bodhisattvayana.

The Abhidharmakosabhasyam (vol. 2, chapter 4., section VI., verses 108-112, p. 690-694), containing both Vaibhasika and Sautrantika teachings, elaborates on what a bodhisattva is and what such a being practices to achieve buddhahood. Naturally it mentions both bodhicitta and the paramitas.

Here's an analysis of the paramitas and the bodhisattva path within Theravada by Acariya Dhammaphala:
<http://www.accesstoinight.org/lib/authors/bodhi/wheel409.html>

See this very fine essay by Ven. Bhikkhu Bodhi that clarifies certain points about common misunderstandings:
<http://www.accesstoinight.org/lib/authors/bodhi/arahantsbodhisattvas.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 23rd, 2011 at 6:03 AM

Title: Re: Why danger of Elder teachings for Mahayana follower?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think you are mixing up "bodhisattvayana" and "sutrayana".

Not exactly. Vajrayana does have the attitude of putting itself higher than what was generally understood as the bodhisattva path, but that is a debate or discussion for a different thread. But I can point to East-Asian Mahayana teachings about the Ultimate Path, the Tathagata Vehicle, the sudden and perfect teaching found within Tiantai, Huayan and Chan.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 24th, 2011 at 7:26 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Buddhism (Vajrayana) : Will it stick ?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"After observing this movement for 30 years, my conclusion is that Vajrayana is not really suitable for most people in both the West and in Asia, including Tibet. You cannot generalize, of course. There are certainly exceptions, but in most cases it is not suitable."

Shamar Rinpoche in "An Answer to a Question Raised about Bodhi Path - Why the Bodhi Path Centers I organized are not Vajrayana?", 06.07.10 - <http://www.shamarpa.org> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

It is a valid point to make a distinction between Tibetan Buddhism and Vajrayana. I think there are lot of publications on Tibetan Buddhism, and it is still developing and growing, that generally speaking Tibetan Buddhism is now an important and significant part of Western Buddhism. How much of that is Vajrayana is a good question. For instance, I don't see tantras getting translated, only a few are available (not counting short 1-10 pages texts used internally by communities). And even those major ones translated (can think of only 3 now - Hevajra, Guhyagarbha, Cakrasamvara) they're done mainly with scholarly purposes (which is not a problem in itself, imo). So, while teachers are happy to share Dharma with the people, who spreads Vajrayana on all levels? Are there Western Vajra-masters?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 24th, 2011 at 8:27 PM

Title: Re: Why danger of Elder teachings for Mahayana follower?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I believe there's enough said about the Pali Canon and bodhicitta, plus that discussion has stopped. Now the thread is locked.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 25th, 2011 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Buddhism (Vajrayana) : Will it stick ?

Content:

Pero said:

Probably because it's not so easy to translate tantras.

Astus wrote:

I don't know anything about that. But since some have managed to translate them, it can't be impossible. Also, there is a growing number of tantric texts, like those made by the http://www.tibetanclassics.org/list_of_volumes.html or the <http://www.aibs.columbia.edu/?q=node/8>. Personally I find it strange that while many Tibetan teachers have given mass Kalacakra initiations, the text itself is only in Tibetan (and perhaps some other Asian languages).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 25th, 2011 at 5:23 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Buddhism (Vajrayana) : Will it stick ?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Many lineages have a quite large body of texts, which in practical terms are much more necessary for practice than the Indian root tantras."

That is a practical perspective and sure most of the practitioners would not ever study those root texts. But if we consider having monks with higher studies it'd be important to provide the more complicated parts beyond the minimal requirements.

"A more important problem is funding monastics and lay practitioners who are ready for advanced, long term retreat."

It is then the same as in every other Buddhist group, proper monetary support and large enough lay base for that. To reach that there's a great demand for marketing and preaching, not just to the small community. And this points to the same thing, the need for monasteries. No matter how easy or hard it is for laymen to follow the path, only monastics (or paid clergy) are qualified to maintain the tradition. Thus to have Vajrayana / Tibetan Buddhism stay around, it needs people willing to pay for it and take the concept of giving and merit to heart.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 26th, 2011 at 2:08 AM

Title: Re: Erik Pema Kunzang offically a Dharma teacher now.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sadhu! Sadhu!

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 26th, 2011 at 3:49 AM

Title: Re: Levels of enlightenment

Content:

Astus wrote:

Well, first of all, there are the 52 levels of enlightenment

(<https://zh.wikipedia.org/zh/%E4%BA%94%E5%8D%81%E4%BA%8C%E4%BD%8D>:

ten faiths 十信, ten abodes 十住, ten practices 十行, ten transferences 十迴向, ten grounds 十地, ultimate enlightenment 等覺, wonderful enlightenment 妙覺). There are also other divisions, like the http://ctzen.org/sunnyvale/enUS/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=150&Itemid=57 (六即佛), and other common levels used in Mahayana (http://www.lotsawahouse.org/patru/stages_and_paths.html).

Specifically Zen levels are the so called "five ranks" (五位), and the "four (positions) of host and guest" (四主賓), and there can be a few others, depending on how we take it.

But there are two important things to be clear about. First, that the doctrines you find generally in Mahayana are accepted by Zen too, and in most of the cases there is no need for any "Zen teaching" on them. Second, Zen is a quite diverse school for a couple of reasons, therefore different teachers and lineages use different doctrines. What I find a common pattern that goes back to the early masters like Baizhang Huaihai is a three-level setting that corresponds quite well to certain Sanlun and Tiantai doctrines and can be seen in this teaching by Ven. Shengyan:

http://www.dharmadrum.org/content/chan_garden/chan_garden3.aspx?sn=48.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 26th, 2011 at 4:50 PM

Title: Re: Sooner or Later: Yogacara

Content:

Astus wrote:

Depending on what we take as the Yogacara position, either it is hardly used by anyone or it's mostly accepted. If Yogacara means their sophisticated teachings with that Abhidharmic style, not many. If it's just accepting the teachings of consciousness-only, 8 consciousnesses and three svabhavas, it's accepted in most of East-Asian doctrines and in the Kagyu, Nyingma and Jonang schools. But this second kind is rather called the Tathagatagarbhavada, imo.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 27th, 2011 at 5:42 AM

Title: Re: Kyerim and Dzogrim by HE Sangye Nyenpa Rinpoche

Content:

Astus wrote:

I've found it a very neat summary of different aspects of Vajrayana. Thanks for the link.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 27th, 2011 at 4:37 PM

Title: Re: Sooner or Later: Yogacara

Content:

TMingyur said:

The OP stated "consciousness only" in context of "Yogacara". And this is what I am referring to.

Astus wrote:

I don't follow you. Cittamatra and Yogacara are almost the same words.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 28th, 2011 at 4:47 PM

Title: Questioning Height

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Agama/Nikaya teachings can be taken under two categories: early teachings (historically) and fundamental/basic teachings (doctrinally). On them were built the Abhidharma, Madhyamaka, Yogacara, Tathagatagarbha and Vajrayana teachings. What the many developments brought about for Buddhism were a large number of skilful means and a more sophisticated view. Now, my question is if there's any validity for stating that one teaching is higher than the other. There are two perspectives: the teaching and the practitioner. From the point of the teaching, the more forms and methods it has the better. From the point of the practitioner, the stronger one's obstructions are more skilful means are needed to be applied. Thus the most varied teaching fits the largest number of people, while the simplest teaching is for the smallest number. This makes the later teachings lower doctrinally and higher applicably. What do you think?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 28th, 2011 at 8:32 PM

Title: Re: Questioning Height

Content:

Astus wrote:

They're doctrinally lower in the sense that there are more skilful means applied, more "smoke and mirrors" to help beings. It's like the Buddha showing Nanda the heavenly maidens who eventually achieves Nirvana.

Well, calling teachings higher and lower is very much part of Mahayana, so I find it important to address it.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 29th, 2011 at 4:27 AM

Title: Re: Questioning Height

Content:

Rael said:

If a teaching is all about Love and compassion then it is a product of the turning of the Dharma Wheel.

Astus wrote:

In Buddhism only love and compassion doesn't lead to liberation but rather to the brahma-heavens.

TMingyur said:

The sravaka teachings cannot be compared to the Mahayana teachings because their intended audience is different.

Astus wrote:

What teaching is it meant only for sravakas but not for others? Even the five dhyani buddhas are equated to the different skandhas and the threefold training is used by everyone within Buddhism. Mahayana teachings are based upon the basics without what it couldn't stand at all. What I'm saying is that what came after the core speeches are further elaborations and embellishments on those basic tenets for the sake of helping beings.

Pero said:

Why do you think varied != simple?

Astus wrote:

By simply I didn't mean easy but less complicated. Like the difference between a piece of clay and a thousand-armed Avalokita statue.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 29th, 2011 at 8:07 AM

Title: Re: Questioning Height

Content:

Pero said:

To what are you referring too with "later" here?

Astus wrote:

Teachings that followed those before them. That is, Madhyamaka is later than Abhidharma but earlier than Yogacara, while Yogacara is earlier than Vajrayana. Historically earlier and later, which also reflects how one teaching is built upon another.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 29th, 2011 at 6:34 PM

Title: Re: Questioning Height

Content:

tobes said:

singular in its assertion of truth and meaning?

Astus wrote:

What I mean is that to accord with different inclinations you transform the teaching to look more attractive, thus setting up more steps before the end. It's what the Lotus Sutra's chapters on skilful means and the three parables are about. The difference in what I say here is that unlike that sutra's positioning a later teaching as the final intention and greater revelation, the argument here is that all the different teachings lead within themselves to the same realisation (not three but one vehicle) and there are no successive attainments (arhat, bodhisattva, buddha).

tobes said:

But maybe I would say that any genealogy has twists and turns, tensions and ambiguities.

Astus wrote:

Certainly it is good to see how different teachings emerged and come to dominate depending on its environment.

TMingyur said:

So the question as to "height of teachings" can be validly asked only in the context of either Mahayana or sravakayana, but it is not valid across sravakayana and Mahayana.

Astus wrote:

The differentiation of inferior and great vehicle is only within a Mahayana context which makes comparison valid even according to your argument.

Rael said:

a Tulku once told me once one experiences Sunyata and combine it with love and compassion your enlightened.

Astus wrote:

Adding prajna to the equation makes the difference indeed.

Rael said:
which isn't exactly what i was talking about.

Astus wrote:
Excuse me for the mistake.

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, January 30th, 2011 at 12:04 AM
Title: Re: Questioning Height
Content:

Huseng said:
Another example to consider is the Mahāyānasūtrālamkārikā which while nominally penned by Asanga is said to have actually been composed by Maitreya and transmitted to Asanga.

Astus wrote:
The Sutralamkara starts with arguing for the authenticity of Mahayana and lists quite a lot of reasons. One of that is that the Buddha hasn't warned about Mahayana, so it is authentic. Putting it in another way, if it is "contemporary" with the Agamas (as the text claims), what did not the Buddha simply state that there is a Mahayana (and others) after? Really, it is not necessary to go to the scholars and wonder why it is that Mahayana teachings keep referring back to those in the Agamas. But even if we put aside historicity, in theory and practice the Agama teachings form the basics of Mahayana.

Yeshe D. said: including the classical Theravāda

Astus wrote:
It is with purpose I don't say Theravada, as that itself is a development from earlier teachings. Also, I'm not arguing for any sort of "protestant Buddhism".

Here's a fine phrasing of the meaning of skilful means:

"If someone comes and asks about seeking buddha, I immediately appear in conformity with the state of purity; if someone asks about bodhisattvahood, I immediately appear in conformity with the state of compassion; if someone asks me about bodhi, I immediately appear in conformity with the state of pure mystery; if someone asks me about nirvana, I immediately appear in conformity with the state of serene stillness. Though there be ten thousand different states, the person does not differ. Therefore,

According with things he manifests a form,
Like the moon [reflecting] on the water."
(Record of Linji, p. 16, tr. RF Sasaki)

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, January 30th, 2011 at 2:24 AM
Title: Re: Questioning Height
Content:
Astus wrote:
Geoff,

Sure, I can agree with those. But I'm not sure if it addresses the issue raised.

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, January 30th, 2011 at 4:53 AM
Title: Re: Questioning Height
Content:
Rael said:
It is weird that today we question the Mahayana and some ridicule the superstitious..... for the ancient masters seemed to believe the Mahayana as words of the Buddha or transmitted through the Dharma Kaya Body...

Astus wrote:
People questioned quite a lot of things before too. Just when you say "ancient masters", who do you mean? Like, Xuanzang and Fazang are both ancient masters, just as Dolpopa and Tsongkhapa. There has never been "The Mahayana" but quite a lot of views on it, even within the sutras themselves. I'm not sure it's appropriate at all to polarise between "modern" and "traditional" in this topic.

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, January 30th, 2011 at 9:07 AM
Title: Re: Sooner or Later: Yogacara
Content:
Astus wrote:
It's one thing to say there are no phenomena except mental ones. But what I haven't seen described yet is how mind-streams can actually communicate with each other.
How minds are connected without being the same? I think this is quite an important question especially in Yogacara. Any answers?

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, January 30th, 2011 at 7:58 PM
Title: Re: Sooner or Later: Yogacara
Content:
Astus wrote:
Geoff,

Thanks for the quote. However, while it explains a bit of the emergence of samsara OK, it doesn't answer how a common ground can actually be established in the sense of the interaction between mind-streams. Because even if minds have common factors it doesn't explain a connection between them. In an everyday situation there are speech and other forms of expressions conveying a meaning, so there is a seemingly external space between minds to make contact. But when all external phenomena are mental factors of a single mind-stream it requires some form of connection between different minds to share a common view. Maybe it's me not understanding Mipham's explanation, so please clarify.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 30th, 2011 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Sooner or Later: Yogacara

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't see the difference then in the common version of a world originating from the beings karma and consciousness only. But then it isn't exactly so that the world as commonly perceived is not at all external, since it can't establish connection between mind-streams directly.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 31st, 2011 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: Sooner or Later: Yogacara

Content:

Astus wrote:

No need to establish a material basis when: 1. in both cases the origin of the world is karmic; 2. it results in a world of four elements. The only difference I see is that Yogacara is explicit about the ultimately mental nature of the world.

Calling it either common or external makes little difference when the world is not taken to be a mental thing compared to emotions and thoughts, also there is a distinction made between the world and beings.

Looking at it this way there's little new in calling it consciousness only or realist. Or, again, it still requires an explanation for direct mental connection between beings. Such an explanation could be also good for other teachings, like certain siddhis and meditations.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 31st, 2011 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: Sooner or Later: Yogacara

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dexing,

"This is a matter of different consciousnesses (or minds) influencing the direction of one another"

And my question is how exactly such an interaction can happen between one mind-stream and another, and I mean direct interaction as there are only mind-streams that do not merge. It is possible to say they're interrelated but that requires a description how they can do that without confusing up individuals mental streams.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 31st, 2011 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: Sooner or Later: Yogacara

Content:

Astus wrote:

Yes, the whole connection between mind-streams is in the realm of samvrttisatya, as obviously on a final level there is neither one nor many and even the concept of a single mind-stream is meaningless. But it is also in the realm of conventionality to say appearances are only mental and that there are individual mind-streams. Now, to say that one mind produces a cause which matches a condition in another mind-stream doesn't mean anything beyond saying that there is a causal relationship, however, that doesn't explain the actual thing of mind-streams connected to each other. I mean, on the conventional level mind-streams are separate and as Yogacara claims, on an ordinary level there is no such thing as perceiving another's mind, which would result in a contradiction of the premise of consciousness only. That's why I ask if there is any description of communication, of inter-relationship between minds.

One way out of this problem that I see is to say that the teaching of consciousness only is not meant to explain the working of the illusory world in a cittamatra way, as mind-streams and beings exist only in the form of parikalpita, consequently it goes along with the common terms of internal and external, one and many, so no need to describe the connection of mind-streams, since from the point on one contemplates how all is a creation of the mind one is moving away from the conventional view out of which no communication exists. But then we are at an almost identical view as the Madhyamaka and others except for the terminology and the approach.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 31st, 2011 at 6:22 AM

Title: Re: Sooner or Later: Yogacara

Content:

Astus wrote:

It'd be a contradiction because if one could perceive another's mind it'd mean it is not just the creation of one's own mind that is perceived but something else too.

I find no problem with different Mahayana schools and sutras meaning the same thing, it's kind of my understanding too. Nevertheless, it's besides the point here.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 31st, 2011 at 4:32 PM

Title: Re: Sooner or Later: Yogacara

Content:

Astus wrote:

I try to clarify the problem I see. If we say there's a common perception it means that two people share the same thought (vijnapti), or that their thoughts are similar. It could be that that thought was given from one person to the other or it came from a third mind. Both for sharing and causing-receiving there's a need for some sort of connection between minds. That connection, however, is problematical because the identity of the mind-stream has to be maintained. If it is possible to directly influence another's mind there's a chance of mixing karma for instance, so it'd become possible for buddhas to liberate beings instantly.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 31st, 2011 at 7:06 PM

Title: Re: Sooner or Later: Yogacara

Content:

Astus wrote:

Geoff,

Then it seems what I thought as the resolution agrees with what Mipham (and others before) have said. Well, it is sad.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 31st, 2011 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: Sooner or Later: Yogacara

Content:

Astus wrote:

Because I was looking for a new explanation, a new view, a different method to solve the question.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 1st, 2011 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: Intellectualism, Right View and Awakening

Content:

Astus wrote:

What is intellectualising? My answer for this is that it is solely for the purpose of defining concepts to elaborate on ideas. Is that something wrong? I don't think so. Is that relevant to Buddhism? Not really. There are lot of sutras with dozens of commentaries and even more treatises written about those texts. Is that just intellectualising, a "l'art pour l'art" thing? Hardly ever. Studying, analysing and contemplating are common practices of Buddhism. And they're not just good for the one cultivating it but also helpful for letting people learn and understand the Dharma. And in the end, pondering about the uselessness of intellectualising is intellectualising.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 1st, 2011 at 6:07 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Buddhism (Vajrayana) : Will it stick ?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Why the worry about Vajrayana becoming a mass movement? I mean, it has been out for a large number of people for more than a thousand years, not just in Tibet but in India, China and other countries. I understand that people can have strong feelings for their own religious tradition - so excuse me for this - but Vajrayana is as much a form of (non-tribal) religion as any other and so one of its features is converting as many people as possible. So, with growing numbers, it becomes stratified and there are then a majority of initiates who are the laity and those few who are the zealots. In this sense, initiation (empowerment, baptism, anointment, etc.) is in fact a ritual for accepting new members. Sure, one can understand and see lot more in an initiation, and that is indeed where the difference lies between those who just want to hang around and those who aim high. We can already see a small number of authentic Vajrayana masters teaching through the internet, where practically anyone can join in. And naturally there are people who feel this is desecralisation and blasphemy but others at the same time see the opportunity for introducing people to essential teachings. To keep Vajrayana around it is important to spread it. When HHDL gives a Kalacakra empowerment thousands show up, they make a connection. If an unknown lama does that only a dozen people come. Is it really better to keep it on a family level? I don't think that will make it stay for long.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 2nd, 2011 at 2:24 AM

Title: Re: Should individuals be married and be monk?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thread split to <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=53&t=3200>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 2nd, 2011 at 6:52 PM

Title: Re: State of Japanese Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't know exactly when Rinzai Zen left the Pratimoksha, but it has nothing to do with Eisai whose lineage did not live long and there were a 23 other Zen lineages established later but only one survived after the 19th century. The surviving lineage is of course that of Hakuin, who can be traced back to

<https://ja.wikipedia.org/wiki/%E5%8D%97%E6%B5%A6%E7%B4%B9%E6%98%8E> (南浦紹明, 1235 – 1308)) who studied under Lanxi Daolong (蘭溪道隆) in Japan but later went to China and (allegedly) was transmitted by Xutang Zhiyu (虚堂智愚). As he had two Chinese masters I assume he received the threefold ordination (full precepts) and not just the bodhisattva one.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 2nd, 2011 at 10:03 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Buddhism (Vajrayana) : Will it stick ?

Content:

mr. gordo said:

I know it seems like a shallow statement, but it seems dead on. Tibetan Buddhism is alien enough to tap the interest of those brought up in a Judeo-Christian background to the ardent atheist. Also the Dalai Lama embraces the use of technology like Social Media to provide Buddhist teachings, and it seems like this could be further implemented by the Karmapa.

Astus wrote:

Being alien is not enough and can be even counter-productive. It should not be forgot that Tibet has been a part of Western esotericism since the 19th century or even before as a mystical land. There is also the recent history of Tibet that a large number of the population fled from the country and now they are oppressed by the Communists - this whole brings up Western concepts of freedom and the evil enemy of that. There's also the image of Tibetans being a spiritual, peaceful people living close to nature which again resonates with old Western ideas. It's just another thing how neo-pagan movements are growing in numbers and that goes quite well with the magical features of Vajrayana. Thus it is an already existing mythology that Tibetan Buddhism can build on. How Tibetan Studies is a common part of oriental curricula in universities is another positive factor.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 4th, 2011 at 6:23 PM

Title: Re: State of Japanese Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

In the Myoshin-ji school of Rinzai Zen to be a head of the meditation hall (i.e. an actual Zen teacher who trains others) one is required to be unmarried and live pretty much like a monk in other countries. Just another example.

"The shike (師家) is the teacher (師) in the monastic household (家). He is the "true" shukke who has - ideally, but not necessarily - gone through all the koan of the particular monastic koan-system, and who stays permanently in monastic life leading the monastery and guiding the monks, thus also referred to as the "elder teacher in the monk's hall" (sōdō rōshi). He has received the certificate of enlightenment (inka shōmei) just as he himself can transmit this to his successor. Unless returning to lay life, or taking up a position as priest in a temple, a shike within the Myōshinji sect is not allowed to marry but must keep the strict rules of renouncement. As such he has the prestige and generally owns the respect of being a true Zen master, a living symbol of the Zen monastic tradition, the quintessence of zen virtues ideally incarnating wisdom, spirituality, strict discipline, individuality, and yet gentle social personality. He is, in a certain sense, the religious main figure."

(Jørn Borup: Japanese Rinzai Zen Buddhism: Myōshinji, a Living Religion, p. 60)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 4th, 2011 at 10:31 PM

Title: Re: Paradox of Buddhahood in Mahayana (newbie's questions)

Content:

Sāvaka said:

After reading further I've come across a wiki quote that there is a Zen perspective takes the trikāya non-literally, if true that adds an alternative look.

Astus wrote:

The only difference there is is that in Zen buddha-mind contains all three bodies thus realising the buddha-mind one is a buddha - this is the concept behind sudden enlightenment. Although there are other interpretations too but not as popular as this one.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 5th, 2011 at 7:33 AM

Title: Re: The Law of NonContradiction and the BuddhaDharma

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is no contradiction in the tetralemma as it is used to negate extreme concepts. Nagarjuna explains in the following stanzas the reason for the teaching of emptiness, how buddhas have used different teachings, why language has to be transcended, that there are conventional and ultimate truths, how dependent origination is emptiness and that it is the essential teaching of the buddhas.

Through the elimination of karma and affliction there is nirvana.

Karma and affliction come from conceptual thought.

These come from mental fabrication.

Fabrication ceases through emptiness.

The Buddhas have designated a self;

And have taught that there is no self;

And also have taught that

There is neither self nor selflessness.

What language expresses is repudiated because

The domain of thought is repudiated.

Unarisen and unceased:

Reality is just like nirvana.

Everything is real; and is not real;
Both real and unreal;
Neither unreal nor real.
This is the Lord Buddha's teaching.

Not dependent on another, peaceful and
Not fabricated by fabrications,
Not conceptualized, without distinctions:
That is the characteristic of things as they really are.

Whatever comes into being dependent on another
Is neither identical to that thing
Nor different from it.
Therefore it is neither annihilated nor permanent.

This is nectar—the doctrine of
The Buddhas, patrons of the world.
Without identity, without distinction,
Not annihilated, not permanent.

(MMK 18.5-11, tr. from Ocean of Reasoning)

We find the following story in the Gateless Gate collection
(<http://www.mro.org/zmm/teachings/daido/teisho38.php>),

Master Yangshan had a dream: He went to Maitreya's place and was given the third seat. A venerable monastic there struck the table with a gavel and announced, "Today, the talk will be given by the monastic of the third seat." Yangshan struck the table with the gavel and said, "The Dharma of Mahayana goes beyond the Four Propositions and transcends the One Hundred Negations. Listen carefully!"

The four propositions (四句) are the tetralemma (being, non-being, being and non-being, nor being neither non-being) and the hundred negations (百非) are either an expression for the complete refutation of all statements or a way of multiplying the tetralemma (the four propositions applied to each proposition (16), multiplied by the three times of past, present and future (48) and also by the two possible states of arisen and not yet arisen (96) to which we add the original four propositions (100) - from the short summary by Zixuan [T44n1848, p318b08-12]). But the real teaching is not even this four propositions and hundred negations but beyond it, that is, non-conceptual which is neither conceptual (grasping concepts) nor not conceptual (refusing concepts) thus realising that all appearances are empty, only ideas, thoughts, names.

Wansong's commentary to case six of the Book of Serenity says,

"The Mahayanasamgraha says, "'Existence' is slander by exaggeration, 'nonexistence' is slander by underestimation; 'both existence and nonexistence' is slander by contradiction, and 'neither existence nor nonexistence' is slander by intellectual fabrication." If you abandon these four propositions, the hundred negations are spontaneously wiped out. Huangbo said, "If you want to understand directly and immediately, everything is not it." I say, "If you understand clearly and thoroughly, nothing is not it."

The point is that while the laws of logic one may describe certain conventional truths and there is no denial of that. This is where one can say that something is, or something isn't, or something sometimes is and sometimes isn't, or that something is never is or isn't. But from the ultimate point all views of existence and non-existence are extremes and illusions leading only to suffering when clung to.

The law of identity is another fundamental concept. But if we take it from the Buddhist perspective it is impossible to find an identity in anything and this identitylessness is also known as selflessness and emptiness. From this comes that further statements about any "being" is senseless as well since there is no such "being" in the first place. So comes the first part of the tetralemma that one can't say there is a being. Also, it isn't true either to say that there is nothing at all, since there is a "being" on a conventional, conceptual level. Concluding that there is and there isn't a "being" is wrong again, for it is a mental fabrication produced only to maintain one's grasping of something being both like this and that. However, even saying that then it is neither is nor isn't is incorrect as well for similar reasons as before. This is an example of the use of the tetralemma which is a method to eliminate false ideas.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 6th, 2011 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Favorite Sutra?

Content:

Astus wrote:

http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/sutra_of_perfect_enlightenment.html,

<http://www.fodian.net/world/0842/0842.htm>, i.e.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sutra_of_Perfect_Enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 7th, 2011 at 6:23 PM

Title: Re: not a thing, but there is.

Content:

Astus wrote:

From the Perfect Enlightenment Sutra (two different translations):

"Virtuous man, one who practices Complete Enlightenment of the causal ground of the Tathagata realizes that [birth and extinction] are like an illusory flower in the sky. Thus there is no continuance of birth and death and no body or mind that is subject to birth and death. This nonexistence of [birth and death and body and mind] is so not as a consequence of contrived effort. It is so by its intrinsic nature. The awareness [of their nonexistence] is like empty space. That which is aware of the empty space is like the appearance of the illusory flower. However, one cannot say that the nature of this awareness is nonexistent. Eliminating both existence and nonexistence is in accordance with pure enlightenment."

"Good sons, in the practice of Perfect Enlightenment of the causal stage of the Tathāgata one understands these 'sky-flowers,' thus there is no transmigration, nor body/mind to undergo life-and-death. But they are not caused to be non-existent. It is because they lack original nature. Now, this [prior] awareness is in itself void, like empty space. Yet since this awareness that perceives it to be like empty space is none other than the appearance of sky-flowers, you also cannot say that there is no nature of awareness. Existence and non-existence both being dispelled is called 'according with pure enlightenment.'"

It is also like what Huairang said to the sixth patriarch: "To say that it is like a thing is to miss the point." - which applies to believing that there is something (or there isn't).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 7th, 2011 at 6:52 PM

Title: Re: Why use mantras?

Content:

Astus wrote:

As little I know, mantras have two uses: as mnemonic devices and as magical words. But the Heart Sutra itself is a short reminder of the prajnaparamita teachings. Thus the dharanis and mantras in a sutra are said to be equivalent of reciting the whole text, just like in the Nichiren school they say that Namu Myoho Renge Kyo is same as reciting the complete Lotus Sutra.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 8th, 2011 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: Why use mantras?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"but as a request to Avalokiteshvara rather than an expression of my own magical power."

Magical use of mantras is quite apparent in Buddhism just as well as throughout India. And using an external being to affect things is still within the realm of magic, although it can be very well within the boundaries of religion (in many cases it's hard to make a distinction).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 16th, 2011 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: What should you do when you don't have a Zen teacher yet?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is no record of an Indian lineage, there are records from China showing the development of both the concept and the actual descriptions of the lineages. The book "Seeing through Zen: encounter, transformation, and genealogy in Chinese Chan Buddhism" gives you a short introduction to the historical study of it. You may also find a couple of relevant essays on http://thezensite.com/MainPages/historical_zen.html.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 16th, 2011 at 11:40 PM

Title: Re: Dennis Genpo Merzel disrobes as a Zen priest

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think he gives a different example when a wrongdoing has been displayed in public compared to the other recent case of Eido Shimano. It looks positive to me.

The other issue that should be considered is the Buddhist rhetoric compared to reality. One's wisdom is supposed to reflect in one's deeds. Being ethical is theoretically a prerequisite to higher achievements, that's one of the reasons why monastics are the bearers of the tradition and not laymen. Zen is said to be the direct path to perfect enlightenment. It's just that it doesn't exactly show in its living form. What can we make of that?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 17th, 2011 at 12:09 AM

Title: Re: Divergences from the Jodo Shinshu Teachings

Content:

Astus wrote:

"You won't find the sentence 'Amida Buddha is a metaphor and the story of the Pure Land is a myth' in any of Shinrans writings. It wasn't part of Shinrans 'language' so to say."

Symbolical interpretation of Pure Land has been long before known in EA Buddhism and Shinran was quite an educated monk. Also, those who teach mind-only pure land refer to the Vimalakirti Sutra's "when the mind is pure the land is pure", consequently advocate a clearly self-power approach very much in contradiction with total reliance on other-power.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 17th, 2011 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: Sooner or Later: Yogacara

Content:

mr. gordo said:

I don't have this particular book:

https://www.amazon.com/Living-Yogacara-Introduction-Consciousness-Only-Buddhism/dp/0861715896/ref=sr_1_1?ie=UTF8&qid=1297800142&sr=8-1

Is it worth picking up?

Astus wrote:

Certainly it is. Very good intro.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 17th, 2011 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: Dennis Genpo Merzel disrobes as a Zen priest

Content:

Astus wrote:

https://hardcorezen.blogspot.com/2011/02/disrobing-genpo_11.html

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 17th, 2011 at 11:39 PM

Title: Re: Dennis Genpo Merzel disrobes as a Zen priest

Content:

Astus wrote:

Fascinating. So many Zen teachers who believe that it is therapy to solve the problems and not Zen. Then what is Zen good for, really?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 18th, 2011 at 6:07 AM

Title: Re: Dennis Genpo Merzel disrobes as a Zen priest

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think that as Genpo roshi is supposed to be a long term practitioner who is proficient in Zen (at least on some levels) he should be able to use Buddhism in correcting whatever unwholesome habits he may have. I don't doubt the usefulness of therapy, it's just that I believe Buddhism has the proper methods for building up beneficial mental habits and fighting the harmful ones. In fact, that's what correct effort (samyag-vyāyāma) is about.

We should also remember that Genpo's primary teacher, Maezumi roshi, was an alcoholic and also had sexual affairs of his own. So, is it possible to separate personal from professional life in case of Buddhism? Unlikely.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 18th, 2011 at 4:16 PM

Title: Re: Dennis Genpo Merzel disrobes as a Zen priest

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is another point that should be considered. That is when the teaching is more important than the teacher. Sheng-yen says in "Zen Wisdom":

"The most important thing in recognizing masters is to be able to judge whether they have a correct view of Buddhadharma. If their views of the Dharma are correct, then even if their behavior reveals some weaknesses, they should not be considered false masters. On the other hand, if teachers do not have a correct view of the Dharma, they cannot be considered authentic or virtuous masters. ... These, then, are the marks of virtuous masters: they have a correct view of the Dharma, their actions reveal no attachment and they have a clear sense of responsibility."

"It's not serious if masters sometimes demonstrate some bad habits, as long as they are aware of their actions. After all, they are still ordinary sentient beings. But if a master were to say, "This is the way of a Ch'an master," or, "I'm a bodhisattva, so I can act this way in order to help others, but you as ordinary people should not imitate me," then that's a different story. That's a sign of a bad master."

And that's where Brad Warner - who obviously doesn't agree with "Big Mind" at all - was pointing to in this case.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 21st, 2011 at 6:55 AM

Title: Re: Dennis Genpo Merzel disrobes as a Zen priest

Content:

Unknown said:

Morality does need to be enforced among priests.

Astus wrote:

Well, it is possible when there are monks living in a community and any immoral act has consequences there. But when priests live on their own and are financially independent such forcing is not possible except by the law of the state. Also, there's hardly any special moral code upheld by such priesthood generally. No community, no leadership, no control. Monastic communities are quite different from that, especially when they're dependent on lay support so a good reputation is crucial.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 21st, 2011 at 7:32 PM

Title: Re: Completion of the path of Tögal

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't see how it is related to Togal (circles - beads? maybe). Visions are not restricted even to Buddhism, and this Earth-loving attitude is a bit strange too. There are not enough info on the page either.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 21st, 2011 at 8:45 PM

Title: Re: Lineage Delusions: Eido Shimano Roshi, Dharma Transmission..

Content:

kirtu said:

Well in the Buddhist Channel article the author says that deconstruction of lineage is a solution to the problem. However that is guaranteed to destroy Buddhism. We cannot throw the baby out with the bathwater.

Astus wrote:

Such an importance of Dharma transmission in Zen is a Western idea. I can't speak for Vietnam as I have little information on that area but in China, Korea and Japan the monastic ("church" in Japan's case) order has always come first and the possession of a paper of transmission is mostly irrelevant to one's position and reputation, partially because of its availability and partially because its importance has been downplayed a few times in history. Also, giving such a transmission to a lay person is not a normal thing at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 22nd, 2011 at 4:22 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism isn't whatever you want it to be!

Content:

Astus wrote:

I see no problem telling people if they misunderstood something about Buddhism, especially on a forum like this or at a friendly conversation. Another beneficial thing is to point people to the proper sources of information. It is obviously not easy to tell the difference between correct and incorrect websites/books/teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 22nd, 2011 at 4:39 PM

Title: Re: Bodhisattva precepts in the tradition of Nagarjuna

Content:

Astus wrote:

The 10+48 is from the <http://www.ymba.org/bns/bnsframe.htm> used in East Asia. The http://www.berzinarchives.com/web/en/archives/practice_material/vows/bodhisattva/root_bodhisattva_pledges.html+http://www.berzinarchives.com/web/en/archives/practice_material/vows/bodhisattva/secondary_bodhisattva_pledges.html version is used in Tibet. The <http://www.mro.org/zmm/training/jukai.php> version is used in modern Soto Zen but it's just a derivation from the Tendai presentation of the Brahma Net Sutra's precepts.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 22nd, 2011 at 5:24 PM

Title: Re: Bodhisattva precepts in the tradition of Nagarjuna

Content:

Astus wrote:

Madhyamaka is not an order but a method. Methods don't have precepts as far as I know. What the "tradition of Nagarjuna" is is a question to me but I doubt he could have heard about the above mentioned sets of precepts.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 22nd, 2011 at 6:14 PM

Title: Re: Bodhisattva precepts in the tradition of Nagarjuna

Content:

Astus wrote:

The book itself explains what it means (on p. 64):

Gambhiradarsanaparampara (Tradition of the Profound View), compiled by Manjusri, elaborated by Nagarjuna et al., propagated by Santideva

Udaracaryaparampara (Tradition of Extremely Vast Conduct) compiled by Maitreya, elaborated by Asanga and his brother, propagated by Atisa tradition of Padmasambhava follows that of Nagarjuna

Later it says that the 80 auxiliary vows are in the Siksasamuccaya (Compendium of Precepts), which is by Santideva thus the "tradition of Nagarjuna". The mentioned 18+46 set is in the "tradition of Asanga".

The text itself is a Nyingmapa Dzogchen work that was commented upon by Dudjom Rinpoche.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 22nd, 2011 at 8:15 PM

Title: Re: Laughter and the Buddha

Content:

Astus wrote:

One of the rootless functional consciousnesses (ahetukakiriya-cittani) in Abhidhamma is the smile-producing consciousness (hasituppadacitta) that exists only for arahants (incl. buddhas and paccekabuddhas). Its function is to cause arahants to smile about sense-sphere phenomena. (A comprehensive manual of Abhidhamma, p. 45)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 22nd, 2011 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: Bodhisattva precepts in the tradition of Nagarjuna

Content:

Inge said:

Yes, so does this mean that the vows presented in the links given by you and Will is from the tradition of Asanga?

I have tried searching for an english translation of the Siksasamuccaya but have not found one yet. Do you know if such translation is available?

Astus wrote:

Yes, the 18+46 is the Asanga version. There is an old translation, also available somewhere online (don't have the link now, was in a thread a while ago).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 23rd, 2011 at 4:40 PM

Title: Re: Laughter and the Buddha

Content:

TMingyur said:

This is not comprehensible for me and it appears as if an inherent contradiction.

Why is there this "burst out laughing"? Who is it who laughs? And about what is this laughter?

If there is no "I" who appropriates a discrepancy between illusion and non-illusion then why is there laughter?

But if there is an "I" who appropriates this discrepancy then this laughter is a manifestation of delusion.

Who could there be to compare illusion and non-illusion and burst out laughing about that?

Isn't this actually differentiating "good" and "bad" and "acceptance" and "rejection" in that it discerns that which is laughable?

Astus wrote:

With this concept you could argue that a buddha can't talk and eat either for then there should be an "I" to conceive an other and make distinction between food and non-food (not to mention acceptable and unacceptable food). It is a buddha who can't even breathe.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 24th, 2011 at 3:46 AM

Title: Re: The Problem of Modern Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

What Bhante Punnaji presents is modern Buddhism itself, in a sense. It is the concept of returning to the original teachings by putting aside the layers of interpretations created by different traditions. This is not at all defending Theravada against Mahayana, that is clear from what he says, but trying to establish what the Buddha really taught and putting aside the myriad views about the Dharma as they're not the Dharma itself. It is also noteworthy when he defines the Buddha's teaching as a problem and a solution to that problem, and whatever solves the problem is the Buddha's teaching. That is hardly sectarianism but rather pragmatism. Identifying the original teachings with the sutras preserved in the Theravada tradition is not his idea but rather a conclusion of many scholars comparing the different texts we have. Of course, one could as well add here that the agamas found in other languages are representatives of the same original teaching, however, none of them as complete as it is in the Pali language.

Whether diversity in Buddhism is a problem or not is a good question indeed. When those unfamiliar with Buddhism ask "What is Buddhism?" it is not easy to answer unless one wants to present only a single tradition. And every tradition is an attempt to unify the different teachings, especially in case of Mahayana schools. Then we can see how there are many takes on a teaching that is said to be taught by a single person. And as it has happened in different Asian cultures there are ought to be new forms of unifications of the diverse teachings of which one example is the Triratna Buddhist Community (formerly FWBO), another one is Joseph Goldstein's book "One Dharma".

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 24th, 2011 at 4:58 AM

Title: Re: The Problem of Modern Buddhism

Content:

Unknown said:

Theravada practitioners may scorn the Mahayana scriptures as not being the Buddha's teachings.

Mayayana and Vajrayana may scorn the Theravada as 'Hinayana' and merely a brief prelude to the superior Mahayana.

It's time both accepted that there is no monopoly.

The problem of modern Buddhism, IMHO, is that there is too much analysis of the scriptures and too little practice.

Astus wrote:

There is no monopoly, i.e. everyone goes on their own way and leave each other alone. That is easy to say but I don't think it's fitting the situation. It is avoiding the problem, giving up. Same with emphasising practice over discussion, it is just saying to shut up and mind your own business. Sure, there won't be a universal solution, but there are different ways of dealing with it, one of them being what you suggest. But there are people who feel the need for thinking things over, getting involved in not so mundane issues. Of course there are only a few who care about philosophy and it's normal to go along with an already existing tradition. But since the problem has been raised it might be worth the try to actually discuss it rather than to kill it with a slogan. Sure, it may involve stepping on traditional toes but there's nothing new in that.

By the way, the concept of "returning to original Buddhism" is not restricted to Theravada. Yinshun, famous Buddhist thinker of the 20th century, did just the same but based on the Chinese agamas and prajnaparamita texts. Ven. Huifeng could tell a lot about him.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 24th, 2011 at 7:16 AM

Title: Re: The Problem of Modern Buddhism

Content:

Yeshe said:

It also requires acceptance that returning to 'original Buddhism' means that of Shakyamuni. Therefore this negates any previous Buddhas. I would assert, somewhat tenuously, that this may encourage a belief that Dharma also only began with Shakyamuni, which would be a conclusion some may draw, as if Shakyamuni somehow invented a new truth rather than revealed a path.

Astus wrote:

I don't think there is disagreement on Shakyamuni being the buddha of this age and that before him any previous buddha's teaching was gone. Consequently whatever Buddhism one may talk about today started with Siddhartha Gautama and nobody else, a reason why he is called the original teacher (benshi 本師). It doesn't negate previous buddhas at all, also because Shakyamuni was the first who talked about those before him. Again, it was Siddhartha who said that he did not invent anything but rediscovered it. This makes Shakyamuni the primary common factor among all the different Buddhist traditions. As for the historical validity of any teaching, that's another matter. But again, even if we look at the different Mahayana schools what they definitely agree on as the fundamental teachings are generally what we find in the nikayas and agamas upon which all the other doctrines are built upon. So if we want to find the very basics of Buddhism, the root, the origin, we arrive at such essential tenets like the four noble truths, the noble eightfold path and dependent origination. And that is irrelevant of our view on academical research.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 24th, 2011 at 6:03 PM

Title: Re: Help with chinese characters

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://cojak.org/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false; has that feature, although not for every character.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 24th, 2011 at 7:44 PM

Title: Re: Pop Heart Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Hatsune_Miku is a so called vocaloid, i.e. a computer program anyone can use to create music and song with it.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 25th, 2011 at 5:41 PM

Title: Re: Don't understand Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Don't know mind is buddha-mind, keeping a don't know mind in zazen is seeing buddha, seeing buddha is enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 25th, 2011 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Images in the Workplace

Content:

Astus wrote:

I put calligraphy on my cubicle's walls. It doesn't necessarily appear as Buddhist unless one reads Chinese. I usually use some Buddhist image as my background picture, although even I don't see it often because of the different windows open.

Baizhang's saying is very good for workplaces:

(one day without work, one day without eating).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 25th, 2011 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: Don't understand Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

It was simply my explanation using a fusion of terminology. The teaching of don't know mind (不知心) is very much Seung Sahn's way of teaching and the expression itself is not a traditional one. Nevertheless, the meaning is the same (going beyond/before thinking). You can read that in The Compass of Zen on Methods of Meditation.

Also here's a quote from a

<http://www.thezensite.com/ZenTeachings/augusto/GoingBeyondBuddha.htm> where he uses the term "don't know" (from the story of Bodhidharma meeting the emperor):

So practice is the path itself, rather than the attainment of a so-called goal. There we meet Shitou's mind: not to attain, not to know; returning once again to the "don't know" mind, in which every single koan is understood, seen and presented with the eyes and dance of primal innocence. So here the path is the Tao, is what moment by moment inspires our lives, rather than the goal itself. The path, the koan, shikantaza is not ahead, there; but right here, right now, breathing through our very body. You see, if not like this, if not now, then when and where,?

Thus in the Buddha Tao, in the Buddha way, there is no goal at all; just that dropping off of body and mind. And this happens when the 10,000 dharmas advance to the very bottom of oneself, to the very bottom of the universe. And then that self, (if you wish to call it that), that innermost part of the universe and ourself, comes forward and saves the many beings.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 25th, 2011 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: What should you do when you don't have a Zen teacher yet?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

So it is. But that connection is a lot more complex than a single line of male monks.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 26th, 2011 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: Don't understand Zen

Content:

KwanSeum said:

But again that is Seon and not Zen which I asked about.

Astus wrote:

If you cared to look it up you'd find that it discusses Soto, Rinzai and Jogye Seon. Seung Sahn spent some time in Japan.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 26th, 2011 at 5:14 AM

Title: Re: What should you do when you don't have a Zen teacher yet?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

So it is. But that connection is a lot more complex than a single line of male monks.

tomamundsen said:

Right. Which is exactly how it is presented with each and every teacher that has received shiho. There is a long list of names with a line going through each one, starting from the Buddha (not sure if it goes six buddhas before Shakyamuni or not) all the way down to the teacher himself. I've seen a few of these (Kechimyaku, I believe is the term), and every teacher that had one definitely believed it to be true.

Astus wrote:

I think you mean this:

It is exactly a single line of male monks.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 26th, 2011 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: Meditation/Contemplation/Visualisation Sutra practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

Recitation of the name is easier than visualisation and other such methods and this is a common understanding in Chinese PL too. That doesn't mean one shouldn't do them it's just one has to be clear about one's situation and willingness. Honen puts recitation to the front so that people can grow strong in faith after which it's fine to get busy with so call auxiliary practices.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 26th, 2011 at 9:05 PM

Title: Re: Don't understand Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

As for the view of buddha-nature and interdependence, here are some thoughts (mine, not an official point of any organisation).

Dogen emphasises interdependence a lot which is also apparent in his use of terms including his repeated statements on the enlightenment of insentient beings. Also, in his writing on <http://hcbss.stanford.edu/research/projects/sztp/translations/shobogenzo/translations/bussho/title.html> he criticises those who take it as a self (atman) or as a perceiver and knower. He also puts the view of buddha-nature as a seed to the level of ordinary beings (prthagjana).

Korean Zen can be traced back to the works of Yongming and Dahui where buddha-nature is knowing (teaching originally from Heze Shenhui and Guifeng Zongmi). This is quite a different approach compared to Dogen's. To use a common tool here, Dogen is more on the side of emptiness teachings while Jinul on the side of existence. So Dogen disintegrates views to show emptiness (although this is a simplification) while Jinul points to the mind being without views.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 26th, 2011 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: Meditation/Contemplation/Visualisation Sutra practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

No disagreement here.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 26th, 2011 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: Poverty in the UK

Content:

Astus wrote:

Maybe poverty is not about salary and work, just as the article says. I mean, there are thousands and thousands going to the UK to do some work for a couple of years and bring it home eventually (this is from poorer EU countries, mainly Poland). And most of them do simple jobs like on construction sites.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 27th, 2011 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: Use inner stillness as meditation object & Patriarchal Chan?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Patriarch Chan and Tathagata Chan are two different terms and they're not used as equals. In the Platform Sutra there's only talk of Tathagata Chan and no mention of Patriarch Chan (first mentioned in a story involving Yangshan Huiji and Xiangyan Zhixian - according to Jiang Wu). As for their meaning, it depends on where you look, so let's just put that aside.

If you want to focus on an inner stillness to attain stillness, well, it is a bit confusing. If there is stillness you don't have to achieve it. If there is no stillness you can't focus on it. Being free from attachments is the goal of the path which can be practised very well by cultivating samadhi and prajna. As for how, I assume that's what you're asking about. If it is Chan you want to do you should learn the huatou method so then you can carry around your question as a point of focus. What seems closer to your intentions is the mozhao (silent illumination) of which you can read <http://www.westernchanfellowship.org/silent-illumination-may2005-day1.html> a bit.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 28th, 2011 at 4:12 AM

Title: Re: What was the last film you watched?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Star Trek - Generations

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 28th, 2011 at 8:17 PM

Title: Re: Don't understand Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

An interesting point from http://www.ancientdragon.org/dharma/articles/zazen_as_enactment_ritual by Taigen Dan Leighton in Zen Ritual, p. 168.

Unknown said:

Zazen as Tantra

Before focusing on teachings by Dogen, we may briefly note that such enactment practice is usually associated with the Vajrayana branch of Buddhism, in which practitioners are initiated into ritual practices of identification with specific buddha or bodhisattva figures. Although Vajrayana is often considered the province of Tibetan Buddhism, increasing attention is being given to the crucial role of the Japanese forms of Vajrayana (J. mikkyo). In the Heian period, this mikkyo, also known as “esoteric” or tantric practice, was prevalent not only in Shingon (True Word), the main Japanese Vajrayana school, but also in the comprehensive Tendai school in which were first trained not only Japanese Zen founders like Dogen and Eisai (1141–1215) but also Pure Land founders Honen (1133–1212) and Shinran (1173–1262), as well as Nichiren (1222–1282). Thanks to this mikkyo heritage that permeated all of medieval Japanese Buddhism, in many inexplicit ways mikkyo or tantric practice can be seen as underlying all subsequent forms of Japanese Buddhism. Further studies exploring the direct and indirect influences of mikkyo on Japanese Zen promise to be especially instructive.

For Dogen and others, Zen shares with the Vajrayana tradition the heart of spiritual activity and praxis as the enactment of buddha awareness and physical presence, rather than aiming at developing a perfected, formulated understanding. In the context of Tibetan Buddhism, Robert Thurman speaks of the main thrust of Vajrayana practice as physical rather than solely mental. “When we think of the goal of Buddhism as enlightenment, we think of it mainly as an attainment of some kind of higher understanding. But Buddhahood is a physical transformation as much as a mental transcendence.”

The Japanese Vajrayana teacher Kukai (774–835), the founder of Shingon, emphasized the effects of teachings over their literal meaning. As explicated by Thomas Kasulis, “Kukai was more interested in the teachings’ aims than in their content, or perhaps better stated, he saw the aims as inseparable from their content. He saw no sharp distinction between theory and practice.” The understanding of a teaching was not privileged independently from its practical effects. “The truth of a statement depends not on the status of its referent, but on how it affects us.” For Kukai, physical postures, utterances, and mental imagery are expressions of ultimate reality, and by intentionally engaging in them, practitioners are led to realization of that reality. The performance of the ritual practice helps effect an expressive realization deeper than mere cognition.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 28th, 2011 at 8:50 PM

Title: Practice and Faith

Content:

Astus wrote:

Ven. Shengyan says in <http://immersor.com/cmc/wp-content/uploads/2010/09/ChanPracticeandFaith.pdf>:

People interested in Chan practice often find it difficult to have religious faith. As faith is intrinsically emotional, and Chan practitioners emphasize personal cultivation to gain physical and mental benefits or the experience of Chan, they find it hard to accept religious faith. This is actually a great mistake.

Many people think that Chan practice depends solely on their own efforts, requiring self-reliance, while those who practice by reciting the Buddha's name depend solely on external help. Both of these views are incorrect. In reality, Chan practice also requires external help, and the practice of reciting the Buddha's name also requires one's own effort. One can hardly become an accomplished Chan practitioner through one's own efforts. In India, China and Tibet, all meditators need the support and assistance of teachers, Dharma-protecting deities, and the Buddhas and bodhisattvas. That is why Chan monasteries in China erect and worship the statues of Dharma-protecting deities such as the eight divisions of divinities and the four deva kings.

In the past, eminent masters often encouraged Chan practitioners to "entrust their bodies to the monastery and their lives to the Dharma-protecting deities" during Chan meditation. You don't need to be concerned about your body since it will be taken care of by the masters on duty. You simply follow the monastery's routines. However, to achieve good results in your practice, you need the support of Dharma-protecting deities. Without such assistance, one may face physical and mental obstructions, which may turn into demonic hindrances. Practicing Chan depending solely on one's own efforts without believing in the power of the Buddhas, bodhisattvas, and Dharma-protecting deities cannot be considered practicing Buddhism at all.

I think I'm not far from the truth if I say that hardly any Western Zen (Chan, Seon, Thien, however you prefer) teacher talks about the presence and meaning of such religious faith in their respective communities and publications. They might have some rituals they preserved that were originally expressions of belief in different entities but those ceremonies are explained only as a nice tradition and nothing more.

Is there any change in this attitude in the West in recent years? Will it ever change? Or is it important not to mention anything resembling a religion when advertising Zen (Buddhism) to Westerners?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 28th, 2011 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: The Proper Meaning of Dedicating Merit

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dedication of merit is the intention of giving the good results coming from a good act one has done. Transference of merit occurs if others learn about one's good deeds and rejoice over it.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 1st, 2011 at 4:12 AM

Title: Re: The Proper Meaning of Dedicating Merit

Content:

Astus wrote:

Rael,

Merit is not transferred as money. Karma (individual causality) cannot be given or taken. Merit transference means that if you give food to a homeless and you tell me about it and I feel good about such an act agreeing with it because of my mental attitude I experience similar causes as if I gave food myself. Same happens with wrong deeds, that's how "group karma" is possible.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 2nd, 2011 at 6:40 PM

Title: Re: ok i gotta ask/when did Buddha first attain enlightenment

Content:

Astus wrote:

Anders said it well, this teaching of eternal buddhas is about affirming the presence of them within people's lives. It's also possible to see the Lotus Sutra as an apology for Sakyamuni. That's because first there was the concept that there are other buddhas still alive in other realms and they can be reached, then some thought about making Sakyamuni a central figure again, thus the idea of the act of Siddhartha. Or, another way to look at it, the story is just an expression of the teaching of buddha-nature and is not about any kind of historical issue. Indeed, the full concept of the trikaya includes all the different versions.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 3rd, 2011 at 4:32 AM

Title: Re: ok i gotta ask/when did Buddha first attain enlightenment

Content:

Astus wrote:

Rael,

It is two different things to ask about the different views on the life and nature of Shakyamuni and starting to dismiss Mahayana sutras on whatever basis. It is all right if you don't accept the Lotus Sutra but it's a confusing thing to first ask a question about the content then say you don't care about the whole thing. Perhaps you should tidy things up for yourself to see what you actually want.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 3rd, 2011 at 5:09 PM

Title: Re: ok i gotta ask/when did Buddha first attain enlightenment

Content:

Astus wrote:

Rael,

What I meant is that first you asked about the content of the Lotus Sutra and then exclaimed how the Lotus Sutra is an unreliable fabrication of later generations and thus you can't accept it. So I thought, if you don't accept the whole thing why bother about details. But I can very well be wrong.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 4th, 2011 at 7:38 AM

Title: Re: ok i gotta ask/when did Buddha first attain enlightenment

Content:

Luke said:

But was Shakyamuni always "predestined" to be the Nirmanakaya Buddha of this kalpa, or was there some time in the past when it was uncertain whether it would be him or some other person? I'm not sure if karma allows for things to be "predestined"...

Astus wrote:

If it is a buddha it can't be a person and karma has nothing to do with it. See, if you put things into a Mahayana context it usually means a transcendental level, a kind of abstract and spiritual perspective. Nirmanakaya than can either mean how ordinary people see a buddha (thus history has relevance) or it means an expression of the ultimate truth (generally you can put both meanings into that same word).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 8th, 2011 at 4:52 PM

Title: Re: Chinese Pure Land Death Stories

Content:

Astus wrote:

I doubt there is a clear cut system in it. Being able to foretell one's time of death may not necessarily be a sign of one's birth in the Pure Land.

Nianfo-sanmei is not a requirement to be able to foresee one's death as it can happen to very ordinary people without special abilities. I don't know how it relates to rainbow body. There are possible miraculous signs around the dead but the corpse never dissolves.

Perhaps in Pure Land schools based on Honen's ideas they don't see it important to spread around stories with miracles. Or they have not yet been translated.

The different Mahayana samadhis rarely have equivalents in the 8-level dhyana system. It also depends on what one means by nianfo-sanmei.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 8th, 2011 at 5:39 PM

Title: Re: Chinese Pure Land Death Stories

Content:

Unknown said:

One day Puhua went about the streets asking people he met for a one-piece gown. They all offered him one, but Puhua declined them all.

Linji had the steward of the temple buy a coffin, and when Puhua came back the master said, "I've fixed up a one-piece gown for you."

Puhua put the coffin on his shoulders and went around the streets calling out, "Linji fixed me up a one-piece gown. I'm going to the East Gate to depart this life." All the townspeople scrambled after him to watch.

"No, not today," said Puhua, "but tomorrow I'll go to the South Gate to depart this life." After he had done the same thing for three days no one believed him anymore.

On the fourth day not a single person followed him to watch. He went outside the town walls all by himself, got into the coffin, and asked a passerby to nail it up. The news immediately got about. The townspeople all came scrambling; upon opening the coffin, they saw he had vanished, body and all. Only the sound of his bell could be heard in the sky, receding away: tinkle... tinkle.. tinkle...

(The Record of Linji, tr. by. RF Sasaki, ch. 24, p. 41)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 8th, 2011 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: Vows of Manjushri

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is in Chang's collection.

chapter 10: The Prediction of Manjusri's Attainment of Buddhahood

Sutra 15, Taisho 310, pp. 336-350. translated into Chinese by Siksanda

The land equal to Manjusri's:

"In the east, there is a Buddha-land named Abiding in the Uncexcelled Vow, which is so far away that to get there one must pass worlds as innumerable as the sands of ten billion Ganges Rivers. There is a Buddha there named King of Universal, Eternal Light and Meritorious Ocean. The life span of that Buddha is immeasurable and infinite. He always teaches the Dharma to Bodhisattvas. Good man, the merits and magnificence of that Buddha-land are exactly like those of Universal Sight's Buddha-land."

Some words of wisdom from the text:

Bodhisattva Lion of Thundering Voice asked, "Virtuous One, do you not seek enlightenment?"

Manjusri answered, "No. Why not? Because Manjusri is no other than enlightenment and vice versa. Why? because 'Manjusri' is only an arbitrary name and so is 'supreme enlightenment.' Furthermore, the name is nonexistent and cannot act; therefore, it is empty. The nature of emptiness is no other than enlightenment."

...

Good man, the Buddha-Dharma is neither a dharma nor a nondharma. Why? Because the Buddha-Dharma arises from nowhere. If a novice Bodhisattva hears this statement and becomes frightened, he will eventually attain enlightenment. Observing this, one may think, "I must first bring forth bodhicitta and abide in [deep] realization; then I can attain Buddhahood. Otherwise, if I do not bring forth bodhicitta, I can never attain Buddhahood." [However, actually one should not even] harbor this kind of discrimination, because both bodhicitta and Buddhahood are inapprehensible. If they are inapprehensible, how can they be observed? If they cannot be observed, the realization will not be possible. Why not? Because without observation, realization would have no [germinating] cause.

Good man, what do you think? Can empty space attain enlightenment?

Bodhisattva Lion of Thundering Voice answered, "No."

Manjusri asked, "Good man, has the Tathagata realized that all dharmas are the same as empty space?"

Bodhisattva Lion of Thundering Voice answered, "Yes, he has."

Manjusri said, "Good man, enlightenment is like empty space and empty space is like enlightenment. Enlightenment and empty space are neither two nor different. If a Bodhisattva knows this equality, then there will be neither that which he knows [and sees] nor that which he does not know or see."

...

To achieve perfection in the Buddha-Dharmas is to achieve perfection in suchness. To achieve perfection in suchness is to achieve perfection in empty space. Thus, the Buddha-Dharmas, suchness, and empty space are [all] one and the same. Good man, you ask, 'How can one achieve perfection in all Buddha-Dharmas?' Just as a person can achieve perfection in form, feeling, conception, impulse, and consciousness, so he can achieve perfection in all Buddha-Dharmas."

Bodhisattva Lion of Thundering Voice asked, "What does it mean to achieve perfection in form and other dharmas?"

Manjusri asked in turn, "Good man, what do you think? Is the form you see permanent of impermanent?"

Bodhisattva Lion of Thundering Voice said, "It is neither."

Manjusri asked, "Good man, if something is neither permanent nor impermanent, does it increase or decrease?"

Bodhisattva Lion of Thundering Voice answered, "No."

Manjusri said, "Good man, if you realize that things do not increase or decrease, you are said to achieve perfection in them. Why so? If you do not thoroughly understand things, you will make discriminations among them. If you thoroughly understand things, you will not make discriminations among them. If things are not discriminated, they do not increase or decrease. If they do not increase or decrease, they are equal. Good man, if you see equality in form, you achieve perfection in form. The same is true with feeling, conception, impulse, consciousness, and all other dharmas."

Then, Bodhisattva Lion of Thundering Voice asked Manjusri, "Virtuous One, since you achieved the Realization of the Nonarising of Dharmas, you have never harbored a notion [in your mind] of attaining supreme enlightenment. Why do you now urge others to progress toward enlightenment?"

Manjusri answered, "I really do not urge any sentient beings to progress toward enlightenment. Why? because sentient beings are nonexistent and devoid of self-entity. If sentient beings were apprehensible, I would cause them to progress toward enlightenment, but since they are inapprehensible, I do not urge them to do so. Why? Because enlightenment and sentient beings are equal and not different from each other. Equality cannot be sought by equality. In equality, nothing originates. Therefore, I often say that one should observe all phenomena as coming from nowhere and going nowhere, which is called equality, that is, emptiness. In emptiness, there is nothing to seek. Good man, you said, 'Since you achieved the Realization of the Nonarising of Dharmas, you have never harbored a notion [in your mind] of attaining supreme enlightenment.' Good man, do you see the mind? Do you rely on the mind to attain enlightenment?"

Bodhisattva Lion of Thundering Voice said, "No, Manjusri. Why not? because the mind, unlike form, is invisible, and so is enlightenment. They are arbitrary names only. The names 'mind' and 'enlightenment' do not exist."

Manjusri said, Good man, there is an esoteric implication in your statement that I have never harbored a notion [in my mind] of attaining enlightenment. Why? because the mind has never come into being, what can it apprehend or realize?"

Bodhisattva Lion of Thundering Voice asked, "What does it mean to realize equality?"

Manjusri answered, "To be detached from all dharmas is to realize equality. The so-called realization means the subtle wisdom, which neither arises nor ceases, is identical with suchness, and cannot be discriminated. If a Dharma-cultivator with right view comprehends the truth that in equality there is nothing to be attained, and does not attach himself either to multiplicity or to oneness, then he realizes equality. If a person realizes that all dharmas are signless, comprehends that signlessness is their sign, and does not cling to his body or mind, then he has perfectly realized equality."

Bodhisattva Lion of Thundering Voice asked, "What is 'attainment'?"

Manjusri answered, "'Attainment' is a conventional expression, In fact, what saints attain is inexpressible. Why? Because the Dharma rests upon nothing and is beyond speech. Furthermore, good man, to regard nonattainment as attainment, and as neither attainment nor nonattainment, is called [the true] attainment."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 9th, 2011 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen teaching of Tsongkhapa

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'd say that for Dzogchen to work it should be based on non-conceptual wisdom.

Mipham, Tsongkhapa, Gorampa, Nagarjuna - these great teachers gave conceptual methods, which is all right as far as they are applied.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 9th, 2011 at 4:56 PM

Title: Re: Chinese Pure Land Death Stories

Content:

Unknown said:

Do you think the stories represented in Chinese Pure Land are just that...stories? I mean they're aren't really comparable stories in Japanese or even Tibetan Pure Land. Though there are stories of maha siddhas being whisked away by Vajrayogini.

Astus wrote:

Well, what we definitely have are stories. From a scholarly point of view the only possible thing to analyse is related to the story and not the truth of the content. There are of course religious themes in such stories that many accept just as they are.

Personally, I can view them as expressions of something that certain people have experienced, as it so often happens in religious, magical, spiritual and other such environments (miracles are clearly not restricted to Buddhists). Such experience are real as personal, communal and traditional happenings. Same can be said about many things we take real generally in the West. And so when you ask if they're just stories the implied meaning is that it's all fiction created by writers similarly to novels and films, i.e. lies. I don't believe they're lies - although it is possible that a couple of them were just made up - but as I said, religious experience of some people. Obviously it couldn't be the dead describing what they saw. Also, such collections of stories are probably based on what the writers heard from others, including events that could have happened generations ago. But I haven't studied this area of Buddhist literature thus I can't say anything for sure about their origin and such. What is the common purpose of stories within Buddhism is to educate, and in Pure Land stories that education means generating faith in the power of the vow of Amita Buddha. A side note, explanations in forms of logical arguments also are for education and rousing faith. Not that different, but people usually prefer one over the other. Cultural conditioning is not negligible either.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 9th, 2011 at 5:17 PM

Title: Re: Ask A Teacher

Content:

Astus wrote:

ZFI can have Zen teachers, Dhammawheel can have bhikkhus (or not). But who qualifies as a Mahayana teacher? Either we can set up a standard or it just doesn't work that way. The bodhisattva spirit says one learns from whomever one can and sees the buddha in all beings.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 9th, 2011 at 5:40 PM

Title: Re: Vows of Manjushri

Content:

Will said:

although my edition of Chang has the sutra on pp. 164ff.

Astus wrote:

That pp. 336-350 is in the Taisho not Chang. Starts from here:

http://cbeta.org/result/normal/T11/0310_058.htm.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 9th, 2011 at 8:56 PM

Title: Re: William Bodri and Nan Huai-Chin

Content:

Astus wrote:

Looked into a couple of articles, mainly in the <http://www.meditationexpert.com/zen-buddhism-tao/index.htm> section, and it looked OK to me. Sure, this mixture of different teachings is unusual, but he also clarifies http://www.meditationexpert.com/zen-buddhism-tao/z_whats_so_special_about_Buddhism.html.

By this I don't mean anyone should buy things from there.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 10th, 2011 at 5:14 AM

Title: Re: Chinese Pure Land Death Stories

Content:

Astus wrote:

Of course it's possible to be sure. That's what is called faith, the very essence of the Pure Land path.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 10th, 2011 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: Vows of Manjushri

Content:

Astus wrote:

From the sutra translated by Chang from the Maharatnakuta collection, the vows of Manjusri: If all the [future] Tathagatas in countless Buddha-lands in the ten directions, whom I see with my unhindered deva-eye, are not persuaded by me to engender bodhicitta or taught by me to cultivate giving, discipline, patience, vigor, meditation, and wisdom and to attain supreme enlightenment, I shall not attain bodhi. Only after the fulfillment of this vow shall I attain supreme enlightenment.

I have vowed to combine the worlds of Buddhas as innumerable as the sands of the Ganges into a single Buddha-land and to adorn it with incalculable, intermingled, exquisite jewels. If I cannot do this, I shall never attain supreme enlightenment.

I have vowed to cause my land to have a bodhi-tree as big as ten billion-world universes; that tree will shed a light all over my Buddha-land.

I have vowed not to rise from my seat under the bodhi-tree from the time I sit down upon the seat until I attain supreme enlightenment and enter nirvana, [and during that time] to teach the Dharma by magically produced bodies to sentient beings in incalculable, numberless Buddha-lands in the ten directions.

I have vowed to cause my land to lack the name 'woman,' and to be inhabited by numerous Bodhisattvas who are free from the filth of afflictions, who cultivate pure conduct, and who are spontaneously born dressed in monastic robes and seated with crossed legs. have no Sravakas or Pratyekabuddhas, even in name, except those magically produced by the Tathagata to explain the doctrines of the three vehicles to sentient beings [of other Buddha-lands] in the ten directions.

I have vowed that, just as the inhabitants of Amitabha Buddha's land have joy in the Dharma for food, in my land the Bodhisattvas will all have in their right hands a bowl full of delicacies as soon as they think of food. After a moment, they will think, 'Under no circumstances will I eat any of this myself before I have offered it to the Buddhas in the ten directions and given it to poor, suffering sentient beings, such as hungry ghosts, until they are satiated.' After thinking this, they will obtain the five miraculous powers, enabling them to fly in space without hindrance; and then will go to offer the delicacies to the Buddhas, Tathagatas, and Sravakas in numberless Buddha-lands in the ten directions. The Bodhisattvas from my land will give the food to all the poor, distressed sentient beings in all those Buddha-lands and will explain the Dharma to them so as to free them from the thirst of desire. It will take the Bodhisattvas only an instant to accomplish all this and come back to their land.

I have vowed that when they are just born, all the Bodhisattvas in my land will obtain at will in their hands whatever kind of precious clothes they need, clean and fit for sramanas. Then they will think, 'I shall not use these myself until I have offered them to the Buddhas in the ten directions.' Thereupon, they will go to offer their precious clothes to the Buddhas of countless Buddha-lands in the ten directions and then return to their own land, all in a moment. Only after this will they enjoy the clothing themselves.

I have vowed that the Bodhisattvas in my land will offer their wealth, treasures, and necessities of life to Buddhas and Sravakas before they themselves enjoy them.

my land will be free from the eight adversities, unwholesome dharmas, wrongdoings and prohibitions, pain, annoyance, and unhappiness.

I have vowed that my Buddha-land will be formed of incalculable amounts of wonderful jewels and adorned with innumerable, interlaced, exquisite pearls. These pearls will be exceptionally rare and difficult to find in the ten directions; their names will be so numerous that no one could finish recounting them, even in millions of years. My land will appear to be made of gold to the Bodhisattvas who wish it to be made of gold, and will appear to be made of silver to the Bodhisattvas who wish it to be made of silver, without affecting its golden appearance to those who wish it to be made of gold. According to the Bodhisattvas' wishes, it will appear to be made of crystal, lapis lazuli, agate, pearls, or any other treasure without affecting its appearance to others. It will also appear to be made of fragrant sandalwood, of fragrant aloewood, of red sandalwood, or of any other kind of wood, all according to the Bodhisattvas' wishes.

My land will not be illuminated by the brilliance of suns, moons, pearls, stars, fire, and so forth. All the Bodhisattvas there will illuminate hundreds of billions of myriads of Buddha-lands with their own lights. In my land, it will be daytime when flowers open and night when flowers close, and the seasons will change according to the Bodhisattvas' wishes. There will be no cold, heat, old age, illness, or death.

If they wish, Bodhisattvas in my land may go to any other land to attain [supreme] enlightenment; they will attain it after descending from the Tusita Heaven when their lives come to an end there. No one in my Buddha-land will enter nirvana.

Though they will not appear in the sky, hundreds of thousands of musical instruments will be heard; their music will not be the sounds of greedy desire, but the sounds of the paramitas, the Buddha, the Dharma, the Samgha, and the doctrines of the Bodhisattva canon. The Bodhisattvas will be able to hear the wonderful Dharma in proportion to their understanding. If they wish to see the Buddha, they will see Universal Sight Tathagata sitting under the bodhi-tree as soon as they think of seeing him, wherever they are, whether walking, sitting, or standing. Bodhisattvas who have doubts about the Dharma will break the net of their doubts and comprehend the import of the Dharma at the sight of that Buddha, without receiving any explanation.

I have vowed to fill my Buddha-land with all the merits and magnificence of the lands of the hundreds of thousands of [millions of] billions of myriads of Buddhas, World-Honored Ones, whom I have seen before. However, my land will lack the two vehicles, the five depravities, and so forth. World-Honored One, if I myself enumerate the merits and magnificence of my Buddha-land, I cannot finish doing so even in kalpas as innumerable as the sands of the Ganges. Only the Buddha knows the scope of my vow.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 10th, 2011 at 7:00 AM

Title: Re: dharma protectors in Zen?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The topic <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=69&t=3435> was intended exactly for this aspect of Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 10th, 2011 at 4:16 PM

Title: Re: Do you really think existence is an illusion

Content:

Astus wrote:

The error is in the question. To ask "Is this illusion?" implies there is something that is an illusion. So even if one believes it is an illusion he still maintains the view that there is something existent that has the quality of illusion. Of course, this is how language works. But the point of the metaphor of illusion and such is to make beings less attached to their experience. So this investigation of the illusory nature of things is indeed a dream in a dream. There is quite a difference between illusion and suchness, i.e. the things as they are, in terminology. But the meaning of both is simply not to get so hooked on like and dislike.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 10th, 2011 at 8:47 PM

Title: Re: Karma (vipaka) should be fair.

Content:

Astus wrote:

"There is the case where a trifling evil deed done by a certain individual takes him to hell. There is the case where the very same sort of trifling deed done by another individual is experienced in the here & now, and for the most part barely appears for a moment."

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/an/an03/an03.099.than.html>

This concept of purifying an unknown amount of past karma resembles the story of Buddha meeting a group of ascetic Jainas working for their purification. See:

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.101.than.html>.

"And what is the path of practice leading to the cessation of kamma? Just this noble eightfold path"

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn35/sn35.145.than.html>

On the complexity of karma:

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn42/sn42.008.than.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 11th, 2011 at 12:11 AM

Title: Re: Practice and Faith

Content:

Astus wrote:

"When I started to see how this physical world really could be all but a manifestation of mental activity, the reality of deva, deva-loka, arupa-loka and transcendental dharma guardians became apparent."

Happened in a similar way to me, it's just that I was reading "Pure Land Buddhism: Dialogs with Ancient Masters" (http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/pureland.pdf) when the implications of mind only and its relation to buddha-lands and such started to be clear to me, IIRC.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 11th, 2011 at 7:38 PM

Title: Re: Practice and Faith

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think it is all right to have Buddhism as a hobby. Isn't that a great entertainment? I think this has been like this ever since, a number of higher class lay people (and possibly monastics too) used Buddhism simply for their intellectual and spiritual amusement without any religious fervour. We could even call this an entry stage. The question is if this hobby form is something that may lead some to get really involved and take refuge in their heart or not? I believe the answer is positive thus it is fine to spread some kind of "Zen Lite" among the masses, i.e. the path of men and gods (same as the Zen of outsiders and ordinary people).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 11th, 2011 at 7:45 PM

Title: Re: Practice and Faith

Content:

Astus wrote:

If there are no teachers of hobby Buddhism how could anyone learn about it? Or, you could simply say that it is just normal that it's hard to find a teacher with high qualities.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 12th, 2011 at 5:53 AM

Title: Re: How do you pronounce Kshitigarbha?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kṣitigarbha in https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/International_Phonetic_Alphabet:
kṣiṭṭ̪igərbʱə (based on https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Wikipedia:IPA_for_Sanskrit; another one at <http://www.omniglot.com/writing/sanskrit.htm>)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 13th, 2011 at 9:30 AM

Title: Re: Animal products in just about everything :cry:

Content:

Astus wrote:

Where does that list come from? There are a couple of things in it I doubt has any organic component.

Plywood: besides the wood it includes glue that could be produced from animals, however, most of them are now synthetic.

Refrigerator: what part is exactly organic, besides the food content one puts into it? It's all plastic and metal as far as I can see.

Freon: it is chlorofluorocarbon containing carbon, chlorine, and fluorine produced as a volatile derivative of methane and ethane. Also, biologically synthesized organofluorines have been found in microorganisms and plants, but not animals.

Credit card: I thought it's plastic and some metallic parts. I don't know much about these things but I thought plastic is very much non-organic.

Asphalt: it is crude petroleum or crude bitumen, similar to oil. Bitumen can preserve animal fossils but that's not the same as using living beings to produce roads, besides the road workers.

Concrete: made of cement (made from limestone), fly ash (made from coal) and slag cement (a by-product of iron and steel making).

Steel: it's an alloy of different metallic elements, primarily iron and carbon, possibly also manganese, chromium, vanadium, and tungsten. No rabbits, horses or mice included.

I'm no chemist and all the data above are simply collected from Wikipedia. However, before making things sound so dire some background work and fact checking would be useful.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 14th, 2011 at 6:20 AM

Title: Sects and Sectarianism

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is this reoccurring topic of "Theravada vs Mahayana" and it's usually the same thing repeated over and over. There's also quite strong sectarianism within Mahayana itself. However, there are a few Buddhist teachers who have more to say about this. Please add further more valuable sources on this subject, if you know. And if you're up for a debate, first look into at lease some of the teachings I list here.

<http://www.abhayagiri.org/main/article/1503/> by Ajahn Amaro

<https://sites.google.com/site/sectsandsectarianism/>, in depth analysis by Bhikkhu Sujato

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=owq_ougaikU, video Dharma speech by Ajahn Brahm

My take on the subject in brief: <https://eubuddhist.blogspot.com/2010/10/single-taste.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 14th, 2011 at 4:21 PM

Title: Re: Sects and Sectarianism

Content:

Astus wrote:

"There is the irreconcilable difference between Arhatship and Bodhisattvahood."

I don't think there is any problem there. Theravada accepts the bodhisattva path, even if they have a bit different set of 10 paramis. You shouldn't forget either that they were the so called Hinayana schools where the whole bodhisattva concept was developed in the first place. On the other hand, I've read somewhere the idea that in those Mahayana communities where they teach "buddhahood in this life" it is in fact reaching arhatship it's just that they had to change the terminology. Anyway, I believe this is a marginal matter compared to actually looking at the very teachings and practices different schools use. It is there to find the singular nature of the path consisting of morality (harmlessness and kindness), meditation (samatha and vipasyana) and wisdom (selflessness and dependent origination).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 14th, 2011 at 4:28 PM

Title: Re: Hsuan Hua on the secret school and OM MANI PADME HUM

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think what he says about the Secret School is something opposing to the common view of Vajrayana among a large number of its followers. Would be good to see some reaction to that from mantrins.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 14th, 2011 at 5:41 PM

Title: Re: What is precept substance?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here's a discussion partially involving the precept substance (戒體) at H-Buddhism:

<http://h-net.msu.edu/cgi-bin/logbrowse.pl?trx=vx&list=h-buddhism&month=0606&week=b&msg=bQcV7NhvRAe1/SPvB2oNjQ&user=&pw=> and look for the same subject <http://h-net.msu.edu/cgi-bin/logbrowse.pl?trx=lx&list=h-buddhism&user=&pw=&month=0606>. It elucidates a few things about it for sure, including its origin and some later developments.

The very useful series

<http://www.buddhistdoor.com/oldweb/bdoor/archive/nutshell/teach58.htm>

summarises it as "those 'not-to-do' precepts". You can find a modern description in Zhenhua's https://books.google.com/books?id=NslSjSJDkV8C&pg=PA258&dq=precept+substance&hl=en&ei=b9J9TdqUNMmgtgf67KS6BQ&sa=X&oi=book_result&ct=result&resnum=1&ved=0CCkQ6AEwAA#v=onepage&q=precept%20substance&f=false.

<http://www.drbachinese.org/vbs/publish/370/vbs370p029.htm> the precept-substance as an actual thing, which appears to me as the common view in modern EA Buddhism:

"The Handbook of Bodhisattva Precepts for the Laity speaks of the unconditioned substance of precepts. The Dharma Master for the Bodhisattva Precepts will say: "All disciples of the Buddha, since all of you can bring forth these fourteen deep, vast vows, I now ascend the seat and bow on behalf of all of you, to respectfully invite the Buddhas and Bodhisattvas of the ten directions to transmit to you the perfect substance of the precepts." That is known as the precept substance. This is the most important time for you during the precept transmission. It's when you receive the substance of the precepts.

Everyone should read this section, so that when the time comes you can contemplate accordingly to receive this superior precept substance.

After producing faith and understanding, when we receive the precepts, we have to truly and sincerely place the six major and twenty-eight minor precepts in our minds, so that we can stop evil and avoid wrongdoing. We should put into practice the dharma of the precepts. We should not do what we are not supposed to do. Even when we dream, we should tell ourselves that it's not permissible to do such and such a thing. That power comes from the precept substance. We have that power if we have truly received the substance of the precepts. Once we have the precept substance, we will gain a kind of strength in our body, mouth and mind. There is a change in our conduct and demeanor. Even when we are dreaming, our thoughts and our behavior are not the same as before; this is known as the precept conduct. " http://www.drbachinese.org/online_reading/dharma_talks/5Precepts/5Precepts.b.htm,

"Lay people who like to receive precepts must request them from an ordained monk. To transmit precepts means to give the precept substance to the preceptees. The person who transmits the precept substance to you must be a Bhikshu. In the Vinaya, a Bhikshuni is not permitted to transmit precepts."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 14th, 2011 at 6:50 PM

Title: Re: Sects and Sectarianism

Content:

Astus wrote:

"If we all need to use the ferry to reach the other side, the more people who row the better."

Two things here. There is this common Mahayana idea (misconception) that arhats are either just selfish or simply they don't care at all. This is addressed in Amaro's essay. Second, the way to liberation has to be walked alone and there's nobody who can actually make free others, so "rowing together" sounds good for community harmony but it doesn't really make sense in terms of the path to nirvana.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 14th, 2011 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: Sects and Sectarianism

Content:

Astus wrote:

"If one isn't inspired by Bodhicitta but by a preliminary mind of love for all it doesn't have the same effect."

What distinguishes kindness on the part of a bodhisattva and a sravaka in your understanding? What makes all the bodhisattva practices special is the realisation of prajnaparamita which is the awakening to emptiness, Arya sravakas have awakened to emptiness, so they practice "unattached love" as well as the bodhisattvas. Bodhicitta is aspiring for buddhahood and in that sravakas and bodhisattvas are different.

"the avowed aspiration of the Bodhisattva is different and formalised as inherently altruistic, as opposed to Arhats who as far as I know don't formally take a vow in such a manner."

Sure, there is no such formal vow for sravakas. But such a vow doesn't create altruism neither it is a condition for it. Arhats are per definition free from all self-attachment, so I don't know how it could not be perfect altruism.

"I place sectarianism partially at the door of such teachers."

Good point. The other half are the disciples of said teachers.

"And how many have done that I can only count one and he was a Buddha as well."

The canon was set up and preserved by the disciples, also there are teachings in it from the disciples. So it was not a one man job.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 14th, 2011 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: Sects and Sectarianism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

"The Mahāyāna generally accepts the Arhat path as legitimate, but Theravāda will generally reject the Mahāyāna vision of Buddhahood."

True, it is a very apparent difference. But I also see a matching point. When it comes to identifying what a buddha is Mahayana agrees with Theravada that it is not something graspable, it is beyond identification and concepts. Thus it could be said that the "transcendental buddhas" are upaya - this view is in line with the Pratyutpannasamadhi-sutra (which is important because it is one of the main sources of meditation on Amitabha) and others.

"The difference between a Bodhisattva and Arhat is quite simple"

I said "buddhahood in this life" and not bodhisattvahood. In fact, those who teach buddhahood in this life categorise the long term bodhisattva carrier as something inferior.

"If you wish to aid in the liberation of all sentient beings, even if it means you have to take rebirth for immeasurable kalpas, you adopt the Bodhisattva path. If you want freedom from your suffering and cessation of rebirth, you take the Arhat path."

This much is taught by Theravada too, no difference on this point.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 14th, 2011 at 9:11 PM

Title: Re: Sects and Sectarianism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Caz,

I said, "Bodhicitta is aspiring for buddhahood and in that sravakas and bodhisattvas are different."

You said, "So it is the cultivation of Bodhichitta that is the defining point."

There's little disagreement here in defining bodhisattvas. But, to say they have a more special kindness?

"A Bodhisattva would seek out others to help them because of the intention can the same be said of a Sravakayanist?"

Yes, the same can be said of a sravaka. Also, just a reminder, that from a Theravada POV a buddha is a "perfect arhat", thus spreading the Dharma and liberating beings are things sravakas do as well. If that were not the case the whole Theravada should have died out long ago as there was nobody who wanted to teach it.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 14th, 2011 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: Sects and Sectarianism

Content:

Astus wrote:

"The two traditions define themselves in a way which necessarily excludes or marginalizes the other."

That could be said about East-Asian and Tibetan Buddhism too, or Nichiren-shu and Jodo-shu. Thing is, both Mahayana and Theravada are names for huge categories for the sake of convenience. There are Theravada people today who have little problem accepting Mahayana teachings as valid methods and consider it Buddhism just as their own tradition, which makes their view a non-exclusive one. Also, it might appear that the Theravada canon is a fixed and closed thing but in reality there are even modern texts, like those of Mahasi Sayadaw, canonised. Technically it is not an unimaginable thing to integrate both Theravada and Mahayana things, and it has happened already several times. like <http://www.dhammadownload.com/viewtopic.php?f=13&t=6599>, or even more widespread teachings, like bhavangacitta. Perhaps sectarianism is less present in the different teachings than in the very concept that there are opposing Buddhisms.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 15th, 2011 at 6:46 AM

Title: Re: Sects and Sectarianism

Content:

Astus wrote:

"The important point is not to enter cessation for the sake of living beings."

In Amaro's article there's a good point about this, "So if we're hanging onto the Southern idea of "me going", and "others being left behind" then that idea, by definition, is missing the mark. Similarly, if we cling to the Northern view and think, "this individual being will persist through infinite time for the sake of all beings," that has also fallen drastically into wrong view." That is, the concept that there is a cessation is one extreme, the concept that there is remaining around is another extreme. In the Pali Canon the Buddha doesn't give a definition of what happens after parinirvana as it doesn't make sense even in this life to pinpoint someone in nirvana (as an arhat, as the Tathagata). In the Prajnaparamita texts it is emphasised again and again that a bodhisattva actually is not a bodhisattva, doesn't go anywhere, etc. Sure, there's then where the sutras got all systematised and the arhats just puff away and bodhisattvas and buddhas are eternal beings - well, this is actually how it all gets simplified and becomes easy to oppose non-existence with existence. Thus reconciling one extreme with the other is impossible, unless we point out that those extremes are wrong views.

"if you can point out to me where a Srvakayanist would develop the intention to free all living beings"

Does a bodhisattva have the concept, "I will free all living beings"? I doubt that. Does a bodhisattva actually free all living beings? Obviously not. Then what is bodhicitta and the vow?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 15th, 2011 at 6:47 PM

Title: Re: Sects and Sectarianism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Bodhicitta and the Arhat

Bodhicitta is 1. the intention to liberate all beings and attain buddhahood; 2. the true nature of mind, compassionate emptiness

"when one sees that form is Voidness, he accomplishes the great Wisdom, and he abides no more in samsara. When one sees that the Voidness is form, he attains the great compassion and will no more remain in Nirvana. Because form and Voidness, Wisdom and compassion, have all become non-differentiated, he is able to practice the non-abiding acts."

(An Excerpt from the Commentary on the Heart Sutra by Master Fa Tsang, The Buddhist Teaching of Totality: The Philosophy of Hwa Yen Buddhism by Garma C. C. Chang, p. 204.)

"There is no emptiness meditation not permeated by compassion;
For the practice of compassion is solely [the practice of] emptiness.
As for emptiness, even those seeking tranquil abiding must practice it,

For this vehicle, however, emptiness is compassion;
And the self-nature of this compassion is emptiness.
So understand that compassion is the essential nature."

(Atisa: Advice to Namdak Tsuknor, Mind Training: The Great Collection by Thupten Jinpa, p. 267.)

"The practice of "clear observation" will cure the followers of the Hinayana of the fault of having narrow and inferior minds which bring forth no great compassion, and will free ordinary men from their failure to cultivate the capacity for goodness. For these reasons, both "cessation" and "clear observation" are complementary and inseparable. If the two are not practiced together, then one cannot enter the path to enlightenment."

(The Awakening of Faith: Attributed to Asvaghosa, tr. by Y. S. Hakeda, p. 95)

The practice of "clear observation", i.e. vipasyana is described as contemplating suffering and impermanence. Indeed, the common four bodhisattva vows are very much the other side of the four noble truths. In Mahayana it is understood that emptiness and compassion go hand in hand, in fact, they're inseparably and ultimately the same. Consequently, if an arhat realises the four noble truths (of which the third is claimed to be the final meaning and equal to buddha-nature in the Srimaladevisutra) he also accomplishes great compassion, fulfilling the requirements of ultimate bodhicitta.

Something interesting to read:

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/authors/bodhi/arahantsbodhisattvas.html> by Ven. Bhikkhu Bodhi

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 16th, 2011 at 2:46 AM

Title: Re: Sects and Sectarianism

Content:

Astus wrote:

The article "View from the Center" starts with these two quotes:

"Don't be an arahant, don't be a bodhisattva, don't be anything at all – if you are anything at all you will suffer"

Ajahn Chah

A student of Buddhism asked, "Which do you think is the best path: that of the arahant or that of the bodhisattva?"

"That kind of question is asked by people who understand absolutely nothing about Buddhism!"

Ajahn Sumedho

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 16th, 2011 at 5:01 PM

Title: Re: Sects and Sectarianism

Content:

Tilopa said:

So there's no path that leads to Nirvana and no path that leads to Enlightenment?

Astus wrote:

Another way to say the same thing:

"Followers of the Way, make no mistake! All the dharmas of this world and of the worlds beyond are without self-nature. Also, they are without produced nature. They are just empty names, and these names are also empty.

All you are doing is taking these worthless names to be real. That's all wrong! Even if they do exist, they are nothing but states of dependent transformation, such as the dependent transformations of bodhi, nirvana, emancipation, the threefold body, the [objective] surroundings and the [subjective] mind, bodhisattvahood and buddhahood. What are you looking for in these lands of dependent transformations! All of these, up to and including the Three Vehicles' twelve divisions of teachings, are just so much waste paper to wipe off privy filth. The buddha is just a phantom body, the patriarchs just old monks."

(Record of Linji, 2.18, tr. by RF Sasaki, p. 221-222)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 16th, 2011 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: Sects and Sectarianism

Content:

Astus wrote:

OK, here's another one, perhaps this will be clearer:

"In cultivating the Dharma, you may cultivate Dhyana, the teachings, the precepts, the secret school or the Pure Land, but it is all in order to bring your thoughts to a halt so that you do not produce a single thought."

(http://www.drbachinese.org/vbs/1_100/vbs70/70_4.html by Hsuan Hua)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 16th, 2011 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: Sects and Sectarianism

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are three views regarding the trikaya in Mahayana. 1. there is no trikaya mentioned in the early Mahayana; 2. the dharmakaya is developed by wisdom and the rupakaya is developed by merits; 3. the rupakaya is inherent in dharmakaya, i.e. the buddha-nature is both empty and non-empty. Therefore the difference between Mahayana and Theravada regarding the trikaya occurs only in case of the second view.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 16th, 2011 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Sects and Sectarianism

Content:

Nangwa said:

A vacuous state of mind is not Buddhahood.

Astus wrote:

"Far from a mind blank of all thoughts, the "thoughtless" mind is able to see and to know all dharmas free from attachment. It pervades everywhere, functioning freely and smoothly without any fixation, attachment or hindrance. The crucial difference between the wunien state and the ordinary person's mind is that the thoughts in wunien no longer produce defilement nor attachment in the process of cognition. Huineng emphatically pointed out that suppressing all thoughts and refraining from thinking of anything is a misunderstanding of the dharma, and indeed one who did that was being tied up by the dharma, instead of being liberated by it."

<http://www.thebuddhadharma.com/web-archive/2004/6/1/does-no-thought-mean-no-thought.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 17th, 2011 at 5:50 PM

Title: Re: Sects and Sectarianism

Content:

Astus wrote:

The point is that regardless of what method one uses their aim is the same in eliminating conceptual fabrications as that is the cause of ignorance. That is true for Theravada too.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 18th, 2011 at 4:10 PM

Title: Re: Finding and leaving the teacher ...

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't even see how the whole teacher issue makes sense in this context. I mean, lay people are generally not bound to any teacher or community and they're free to do as they please. Of course, it is for the benefit of every lay people to listen to Dharma teachings and support the sangha. But when there is talk of a teacher in a Buddhist text - whether sutra or something else - it is primarily from the view of the monastic community where every novice is under the guidance of both a disciplinary teacher and a Dharma teacher, plus the abbot of the monastery where s/he is ordained. For at least five years a newly ordained monk can't move from the teacher s/he receives instructions from (except in special cases). After the first five years are gone a monastic may move to a different monastery if s/he wants to. However, in case of lay people these rules do not exist. So what is the whole point of finding and leaving a teacher? What teacher?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 19th, 2011 at 3:04 AM

Title: Re: Finding and leaving the teacher ...

Content:

Astus wrote:

Indeed, every Buddhist has a teacher in Sakyamuni himself. What is not mentioned is the category of pratyekabuddhas who attain liberation when the Dharma is not present in a world, so they aren't just without a personal teacher looking after everything they do but they don't even have any other resources available. It is also quite confusing in this discussion that a "teacher" is a quite big category. For instance, in Chinese Buddhism colloquially all monks are called Dharma-teachers (fashi).

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 19th, 2011 at 4:43 AM

Title: Re: Finding and leaving the teacher ...

Content:

Yeshe said:

Would that be the equivalent of 'Sensei' in Japan ?

'Sensei' was translated to me as 'one who has gone before' and is then in a position to help us.

Astus wrote:

That is a rather literal translation of 先生 (Chinese: xiansheng; Japanese: sensei) which is made up of 先 - first, former, previous and 生 - life, birth. One who is born before me is older, therefore more experienced, more knowledgeable, and of course an elder is to be respected. 法師 (Chinese: fashi; Japanese: houshi) is 法 - law (i.e. Dharma) and 師 - teacher. The difference is that in Chinese fashi is used for monks only while in Japanese sensei is used for any kind of teacher. I think the Chinese equivalent of sensei is shifu (師傅/師父) as a general form of addressing a master (of something) while in Japanese it is oshou(-sama) (和尚; Chinese: heshang) that is a respectful form of calling a monk. However, my knowledge is limited and uncertain, others may point out some errors here.

My point is that it is a limited view to think that a Buddhist teacher is an enlightened master to whom one is loyal until liberation. I'd rather say it is not much different from a school teacher, or a teacher of some sort of art. One may study the Lankavatara Sutra from one teacher and then do meditation with another. It is like a university where students learn different things from a group of teachers and then specialise in a single subject under one professor. However, it is not compulsory to specialise in one thing. A solid understanding of the basics should be perfectly enough to serve as the foundation of one's training. When reading some history of Buddhism we learn about extraordinary people who for some reason remained important for the later generations. But those are only a couple of people. And there were tens and hundreds of thousands who didn't make it to the collections of outstanding masters, which doesn't mean they were lazy good-for-nothing men (and women - who are hardly ever mentioned anyway). And besides all those monastic people there were many times more lay people, just like us on this forum, who are again non-existent in Buddhist histories except a few kings and such.

Finding a teacher, leaving a teacher, really, that sounds to me like a secondary or tertiary issue. There is this myth that teachers are magical beings bestowing blessings that make everyone enlightened, like Jesus healing the crippled. But Jesus is not coming. On the other hand, there are so many teachers doing their best to make the Dharma available to everyone who wants to learn. Teachings are given in communities, video records of the teachings are obtainable for those who couldn't be there or just want to listen to it again, there are also so many books that it's impossible to read them all. It's like in a restaurant, one only has to choose from the menu and eat. How pointless it is to complain that the chef doesn't come to your table and spoon feed you? And then this idea of finding and leaving a teacher, well, doesn't make sense to me.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 19th, 2011 at 4:54 AM

Title: Re: Looking for Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

A recommended reading list at the <http://mro.org/zmm/training/readinglist.php>. That is for a modern American Zen community. If you want to study for Chinese, Korean or some other forms of Zen the list can change significantly.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 19th, 2011 at 5:47 PM

Title: Re: Meat Eating

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Surangama Sutra, a primary Chan text, has some interesting passages. Quotes from the BTTS translation.

"A person eats a sheep. The sheep dies and becomes a person. The person dies and becomes a sheep, and it goes on that way through ten births and more. Through death after death and birth after birth, they come back to eat one another. The evil karma becomes innate and exhausts the bounds of the future. And the basis for all of this is stealing and greed."

"Bodhisattvas and bhikshus who practice purity will not even step on grass in the pathway; even less will they pull it up with their hand. How can one with great compassion pick up the flesh and blood of living beings and proceed to eat his fill? Bhikshus who do not wear silk, leather boots, furs, or down from this country or consume milk, cream, or butter can truly transcend this world. When they have paid back their past debts, they will not have to re-enter the Triple Realm. Why? It is because when one wears something taken from a living creature, one creates conditions with it, just as when people eat the hundred grains, their feet cannot leave the earth. Both physically and mentally one must avoid the bodies and the by-products of living beings, by neither wearing them nor eating them. I say that such people have true liberation. What I have said here is the Buddha's teaching. Any explanation counter to it is the teaching of Papiyan."

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 20th, 2011 at 6:03 PM

Title: Re: Hsuan Hua on the secret school and OM MANI PADME HUM

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://www.kwanumzen.org/1996/ko-bongs-try-mind/>:

Only keep a try mind, only one mind: do it mind. When chanting, sitting or bowing, only do it. Practicing will not help if you are attached to your thinking, if your mind is moving. Taoist chanting, Confucian chanting, Christian chanting, Buddhist chanting: it doesn't matter. Even chanting, "Coca Cola, Coca Cola, Coca Cola. . ." can be just as good if you keep a clear mind. But, if you don't keep a clear mind, even Buddha cannot help you. The most important thing is, only do it. When you only do something one hundred percent, then there is no subject, no object. There's no inside or outside. Inside and outside are already one. That means you and the whole universe are one and never separate.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 20th, 2011 at 6:05 PM

Title: Re: Sects and Sectarianism

Content:

Astus wrote:

I recommend discussing group karma in the topic

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=39&t=1649> as it's not related to this thread.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 21st, 2011 at 11:27 PM

Title: Re: The height of the Treasure tower (Lotus Sutra)

Content:

Astus wrote:

The http://www.bdkamerica.org/digital/dBET_T0262_LotusSutra_2007.pdf by Tsugunari Kubo & Akira Yuyama is another translation not mentioned.

It's not difficult to make up different interpretations of 500, especially because 5 is a popular number in Buddhism (e.g.

http://viewonbuddhism.org/5_dhyani_buddhas.html), but it isn't integral to the text itself.

Case 35 in the Blue Cliff Record is an interesting one.

Unknown said:

Manjusri asked Wuzhuo, "Where did you just come from?"

"From the south," replied Wuzhuo.

"And how does the buddhadharma fare in the south?" asked Manjusri.

Wuzhuo answered, "There are but few monks in the Final Age of the Law who maintain the precepts."

Manjusri asked, "How many monks are there?"

Wuzhuo replied, "Some are three hundred, some are five hundred."

Wuzhuo then asked Manjusri, "How does the buddhadharma fare here?"

Manjusri said, "Worldly people and sages live together; dragons and snakes intermingle."

"How many monks are there?" asked Wuzhuo.

Manjusri answered, "Front, three and three, back, three and three."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 22nd, 2011 at 10:00 PM

Title: Re: Hui-Neng Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

It's just that "jing" (經), which generally means scripture and classic work, is the translation for sutra in Buddhist context, so the Liu zu tan jing (六祖壇經) in English becomes Sixth Patriarch's Platform Sutra. Calling it a sutra is also a sign for its great importance in East-Asian Buddhism. By the way, the text has nothing to do with the historical Huineng and the whole text is pretty much a later creation which also went through some alterations before it became what we have now.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 22nd, 2011 at 10:05 PM

Title: Re: What is a tantric teaching in Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

But what is the definitive attribute of tantra that makes it separate from sutra? Like, for instance, according to Kukai it is that exoteric teachings were taught by rupakaya buddha and they're all upaya, while the esoteric teachings are from the dharmakaya buddha and they convey the truth as it is. Although it's possible to argue with that but I guess that's a start.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 22nd, 2011 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: Meat Eating

Content:

Unknown said:

The Buddha (in the Pali Canon) never specifically stated that: if you kill then you will have this outcome, if you steal then you will have this outcome,

Astus wrote:

Actually, he did: <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.135.than.html>

Also, here's a great study guide on the matter of <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/study/kamma.html> made of suttas only.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 22nd, 2011 at 10:46 PM

Title: Re: What is a tantric teaching in Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Superior and passionate. I don't think it could help distinguishing one text/method from the other. Also, I don't see passion emphasised in EA mantrayana at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 22nd, 2011 at 11:27 PM

Title: Re: What is a tantric teaching in Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"That which abides in the class of being distinguished by [1] being Mahayana and [2] having cultivation of a path according in aspect with the form body (rupakaya) of a buddha is the definition of the Vajra Vehicle. This is established by texts of Highest Mantra as well as the lower tantras."

(Jeffrey Hopkins: Tantric Techniques, p. 373)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 23rd, 2011 at 2:44 AM

Title: Re: Hui-Neng Sutra

Content:

Kare said:

Interesting. So if the Chinese called it a 'jing', who then did attach the sanskrit word 'sutra' to it? And when did that happen?

Astus wrote:

As I said, jing in Buddhist context means sutra. In English both could be scripture that some translators have used (e.g. Flower Ornament Scripture). Calling it a sutra also promotes the Zen concept that patriarchs, zen masters are equal to a buddha. But even the word sutra is said to be a mistranslation as it rather should be sukta. Nevertheless, the point of calling it a sutra is to make its content absolutely authentic and equal to the teachings of the Buddha. And indeed, that's what has happened in East-Asian Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 23rd, 2011 at 6:26 AM

Title: Re: Hui-Neng Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

I see your point. 經, which is jing in Mandarin Chinese, carries the same meaning in Japanese (kyou), Korean (kyeng) and Vietnamese (kinh), simply because they all took writing and many other cultural things (including Buddhism) from China. The first English translation of the text made in 1930 was called Sutra of Wei Lang (<http://www.sinc.sunysb.edu/clubs/buddhism/huineng/foreword.html#forword>), but since even before that there were translations made from Chinese to Western languages by that time the rendering of 經 to sutra must have been the common practice. Also, 經 is the translation in Chinese for sutra, so giving it that status in the Chinese Canon was intentional long before any European knew about the text's existence.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 23rd, 2011 at 7:42 AM

Title: Re: Hui-Neng Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

四書五經 [sì shū wǔ jīng] - https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Four_Books_and_Five_Classics

十三經 [shí sān jīng] - the Thirteen Confucian Classics

易經 [yì jīng] - The Book of Changes ("I Ching")

道德經 [dào dé jīng] - Tao Te Ching

黃帝內經 [huáng dì nèi jīng] - Yellow Emperor's internal canon, medical text c. 300 BC

聖經 [shèng jīng] - Holy Bible / the Confucian classics

古蘭經 [gǔ lán jīng] - Koran

摩門經 [mó mén jīng] - Book of Mormon etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 23rd, 2011 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: What is a tantric teaching in Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Aemilius,

Could you brush up your sources? I mean, when you refer to a text as a source you should have access to it and be able to give an exact citation. First you say Wayman said the Avatamsaka Sutra is among the tantras, now that Conze was unaware of the large number of meditation texts. Both are unlikely statements.

"As a more or less public system of thought, the Tantra gathered momentum after 500 or 600 A.D. Its beginnings do, however, go back to the dawn of human history, when an agricultural society was pervaded by magic and witchcraft, human sacrifice and the cult of the mother goddess, fertility rites and chthonic deities. The Tantra is not really a new creation, but the result of an absorption of primitive beliefs by the literary tradition, and their blending with Buddhist philosophy."

(Edward Conze: Buddhism - Its Essence and Development, p. 176-177)

Later he lists three practices specific to Tantra:

1. the recitation of spells
2. the performance of ritual gestures and dances
3. the identification with deities by means of a special kind of meditation

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 25th, 2011 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: Korean Pure Land Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Cheontae is Korean for Tiantai/Tendai (天台), and <http://www.cheontae.org/>. As far as I know there is no separate school for Pure Land in Korea either (just as there isn't in anywhere else except Japan), nevertheless, the practice of the yeombul (nianfo/nenbutsu) is widespread.

http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/master/priest_view.asp?cat_seq=10&priest_seq=27&page=3 was a Korean monk in the 20th century who propagated yeombul practice combined with Seon. To me it seems that the mainstream view of the majority of the elite monastics and teachers is about the combined Seon and yeombul method where it is more about attaining a pure mind rather than birth in the Pure Land. This is emphasised by Hanam for instance, one of the most influential Seon monks in the 20th century, who sanctioned the abolishment of a yeombul recitation association from the Manil-hermitage in 1921 (see: Makers of Modern Korean Buddhism, p 177ff). As for other levels of Buddhism, I have no information.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 25th, 2011 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: Korean Pure Land Buddhism

Content:

KwanSeum said:

Seon is the mind of the Buddha and Kyo is the practice.

Zen and Pureland are not two but one.

Astus wrote:

Pure Land is not a Kyo/Teaching school.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, March 27th, 2011 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: Korean Pure Land Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

What qualifies as a Pure Land path is when one's aim is to be born in the Pure Land. If one chants Namu Amita Buddha only for the sake of purifying the mind, gaining concentration and such, that is not a Pure Land method. But if one does bows and pilgrimages for attaining birth, it is a Pure Land practice then. So it is not the matter whether one uses recitation, visualisation or something else but if one has the faith and vow (to be born in the Pure Land) or not. Using the recitation of the name is just the simplest and easiest method in the Pure Land school but not the only one. Also, if one works on purifying one's mind in order to gain birth in the Pure Land, that is a valid method. Even reciting other buddhas' name can be a way to the Pure Land. Or it can be something else. It depends primarily on faith and vow. Without faith in Amita Buddha and the Pure Land it's meaningless to call it anything close to the teachings of the Pure Land school.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 28th, 2011 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: Korean Pure Land Buddhism

Content:

KwanSeum said:

Are you assuming that the Pure Land is way over yonder and Amitabul is far removed from us?

Astus wrote:

Do I assume that America is on the other side of the Atlantic Ocean? Do I get there if I understand that all phenomena are only mental dharmas, or should I get a plane ticket? I can also say that Barack Obama is the true nature of my mind, however, that doesn't make me the president of the U.S. of A. Thus it is that there is not just emptiness but also causes and conditions.

"Ordinary people generally think that if the Pure Land is Mind-Only, then it does not exist. This is the understanding of demons and externalists. Such a deluded view, which appears correct but is in reality wrong, affects more than half of all people and causes practitioners to forfeit true benefits.

It is precisely because of the Self-Nature Amitabha that the practitioner must recite the name of Buddha Amitabha of the West seeking rebirth in the Pure Land – so as to achieve the Self-Nature Amitabha through gradual cultivation. If he merely grasps at the Buddha Amitabha of the West, he cannot achieve immediate escape from Birth and Death – not even if he is truly awakened, much less if (like most people who ask this question) he is pretentious and just indulges in empty talk without engaging in practice.

Thus, the answer to your question [are the Mind-Only Pure Land and the Self-Nature Amitabha the same as or different from the Western Pure Land and Amitabha in the Pure Land?] is that they are one yet two before Buddhahood is attained, two yet one after Buddhahood is attained."

(Yin Kuang: Pure-Land Zen, Zen Pure-Land, p. 57)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 28th, 2011 at 5:06 AM

Title: Re: William Bodri and Nan Huai-Chin

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thanks Longjie, very informative. I hope to see you around.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 28th, 2011 at 5:14 AM

Title: Re: Article: Evolution doesn't bother Buddhists

Content:

Astus wrote:

A good example of how when people don't know enough fill out the blank areas with their own ideas. Or it's more than just that. There is this argument, this myth, that the Buddha said nothing about "metaphysical questions" so people like to use it to adjust things to their ideas whether they believe there is a God - of whom the Buddha said nothing about according to them - or it is evolution. In fact, if we look at Buddhist cosmology we find that there humans devolved from higher, heavenly beings into their current state, and this is quite contrary to the evolutionary concept of evolving from lower beings. Even the idea of natural selection is questioned by the teaching of karma where it is not the environment forming beings but the other way around, beings creating the world. So those who take evolution as if it were in agreement with the Buddha's teachings should take an elementary course in Buddhism. Although it might happen that this part of the Dharma is missing from many teachers' curriculum.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 28th, 2011 at 5:47 AM

Title: Community in Western Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

This piece by James Ishmael Ford made me think:

"The thing that mostly concerned me, however, wasn't doctrinal. The issue of whether there is rebirth or if each breath presents a new life leads to the same disciplines. The issue was that there just wasn't much attention given to community in contemporary Western Zen. Oh, a tip of the hat here and there. But, if a Western Buddhist wanted a spiritual home for their kids, everyone I knew ended up in a UU church. If someone wanted a spiritual community as something more than a place to do the discipline, sort of like going to a spiritual gym, and then home, pretty much the only place where I could go that didn't contradict the parts of Zen I found useful and true, turned out to be at the local UU church. Bottom line I wanted full spiritual community, and there was precious little at the local Zen center. I found it instead at the UU church. My goodness, I did. But, I also got something more. In fact much more."

<https://monkeymindonline.blogspot.com/2011/03/religion-for-our-times-case-for.html>

What do you think? What is your experience?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 28th, 2011 at 3:47 PM

Title: Re: Article: Evolution doesn't bother Buddhists

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is more the usefulness in terms of education in Buddhism of the traditional view of the becoming and destruction of the worlds that should be considered when comparing it with modern views. When it's said that karma defines environment the way of acts and results is quite evident. On the other hand, if we take the evolutionary view, it teaches that there is valid basis for oppressing others and living for wealth, power and enjoyments. In that sense it's similar to the teaching of a Creator who can simply take the responsibility for everything that happens to someone and for the whole state of the world.

As for being bothered by evolution, that's another thing. It's a well known way to categorise different views into a gradual scheme. Evolution is a materialism-based concept with little or no moral value, consequently it doesn't guarantee birth into the human or heavenly realms, in fact, it's quite animal-centred. Other teachings, like Humanism, involve a moral perspective that can provide a good birth. So from a Buddhist perspective evolution is a view below what is called the path of humans and gods. Note that I'm not talking about truths but views.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 28th, 2011 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: Hui-Neng Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Aemilius,

Do I believe that there was a Caoxi Huineng with hundreds of disciples who attained enlightenment? No, it is very unlikely as Huineng was very much unknown for his contemporaries. It was Heze Shenhui who attributed patriarchy to Huineng after the death of Shenxiu - who was actually a famous master in his time revered by empress Wu Zetian and many others - so he could claim to be the 7th patriarch and single rightful heir. It was also Shenhui who invented the transmission of robe and bowl. As a matter of fact, Hongren had a couple of disciples who (or rather their disciples) claimed authenticity to themselves. And there were other Chan groups not directly related to Hongren. That's for the historical part. Otherwise the Platform Sutra is a fine Zen work and it's worth studying as it has been done by many others throughout the centuries.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 28th, 2011 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: What is a tantric teaching in Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Although in the Kumarajiva version it only says that the Buddha sat down, in Bodhiruci's translation it goes: sat peacefully in lotus-position straightening his body and posture (跏趺安坐, 端身而住), or in Red Pine's translation "crossing his legs and adjusting his body". Although the Diamond Sutra is not an instruction on meditation, it does refer to proper sitting posture, and even more.

The Lankavatara Sutra 2.24, DT Suzuki translation:

"When a definite acquisition is obtained regarding the aspect of the stages [of Bodhisattvahood], the Bodhisattva will experience joy, and, gradually and successively going up the scale, will reach the ninth stage where his insight is perfected, and [finally the tenth stage known as] Great Dharmamegha. Establishing himself here, (70) he will be seated in the great jewel palace known as "Great Lotus Throne" which is in the shape of a lotus and is adorned with various sorts of jewels and pearls; he will then acquire and complete a world of Maya-nature; surrounded by Bodhisattvas of the same character and anointed like the son of the Cakravarti by the hands of the Buddhas coming from all the Buddha-lands, he will go beyond the last stage of Bodhisattvahood, attain the noble truth of self-realisation, and become a Tathagata endowed with the perfect freedom of the Dharmakaya, because of his insight into the egolessness of things."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 29th, 2011 at 3:58 PM

Title: Re: Hui-Neng Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

plwk,

How does a mummy prove it? Even if it were the actual corpse of Huineng it doesn't mean that all the legends and stories - created by later generations - are true.

"Thus the 'cast' or 'mummy' of Hui-neng may date back to T'ang times, and may just conceivably be that of the historical Hui-neng. It was seen by the monk Chien-chen circa 748 to 750, and was probably manufactured to provide a source of cohesion among the followers of Pao-lin Monastery, and to associate Hui-neng with Kuan-yin and indicate that he may even be considered a buddha. This production may have borrowed from precedents like those of Seng-Ch'ieh in the North, for his was not the first case of 'mummification' and coating with lacquer. However, it may also have been influenced by funerary practices peculiar to the locality of Shao-chou or Ling-nan. In any case, this sarira of the 'true body' was to become a most significant relic for Ch'an Buddhism and an object of widespread local veneration and supplications for this-worldly benefits. It formed the core of a cult of the relics to oppose the cult of the book and aided in the propagation of Ch'an among the common people. Whether it is real or not, what is certain is that the earliest extant record of the mummy of Hui-neng in any Ch'an source is in the Ts'ao-ch'i Ta-shih chuan, which wrote briefly of the circumstances of its production. Later Ch'an sources elaborated on this considerably, demonstrating yet again the use of invention in the hagiographical afterlife of Hui-neng."

(John J. Jørgensen: Inventing Hui-neng, the sixth Patriarch: Hagiography and biography in early Ch'an, p. 273)

Other works recommended:

online essays:

http://www.thezensite.com/ZenEssays/HistoricalZen/PlatformSutra_Bielefeldt.htm (note it's from 1975)

http://www.thezensite.com/ZenEssays/HistoricalZen/Legends_in_Chan.html

books:

Philip B. Yampolsky: The platform sutra of the sixth patriarch: the text of the Tun-huang manuscript with translation, introduction, and notes

John R. McRae: The Northern School and the formation of early Ch'an Buddhism

Bernard Faure: The will to orthodoxy: a critical genealogy of Northern Chan Buddhism

Wendi Leigh Adamek: The mystique of transmission: on an early Chan history and its contexts

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 29th, 2011 at 4:05 PM

Title: Re: William Bodri and Nan Huai-Chin

Content:

Astus wrote:

"he is too obscure in the West"

Haven't read much from him but from that little Nan reads quite like Hsuan Hua. Not pleasant to me.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 29th, 2011 at 6:12 PM

Title: Translating the Words of the Buddha

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://www.viewmagazine.org/articles/tibet/106-returning-to-the-source.html>

Their website: <http://84000.co/>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 29th, 2011 at 8:03 PM

Title: Re: Translating the Words of the Buddha

Content:

Astus wrote:

It depends on how you count. For instance, $250 is more than three times the amount of average Indian monthly income. Also, for this money, you could get about 20 normal pages translated in Hungary (for instance a contract, but it's unlikely that they could do Buddhist texts from Tibetan, or anything from Tibetan). At an http://www.clarktranslations.com/price_list.htm they do Tibetan to English for $0.22 per word, which means approximately 1136 Tibetan words for $250 (not counting other fees). But I suppose they collect money for the whole enterprise and not just getting a page translated.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 29th, 2011 at 8:38 PM

Title: Re: What is a tantric teaching in Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Aemilius,

A couple of sutras that give instructions in meditation (they're translated, you can check it for yourself):

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.010.than.html>

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.118.than.html>

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.119.than.html>

<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra13.html>

<http://www.fodian.net/world/0273.html>

<http://www.fodian.net/world/0277.html>

http://www.fodian.net/world/Contemplation_Sutra.htm

<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra22.html>

http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/sutra_of_perfect_enlightenment.html

etc. etc. etc.

Not about meditation:

<http://www.fodian.net/world/0692.html>

<http://www.fodian.net/world/0698.html>

You also shouldn't forget that meditation manuals written not by Vajrayana people (Visuddhimagga, Mohezhiguan, etc.) have nothing to do with tantra and they have been available even before the advent of tantra.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 29th, 2011 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: What is a tantric teaching in Buddhism?

Content:

Unknown said:

Vajrayāna is different than sūtra teachings because the methods of deity yoga, prāṇayāma, etc., are never taught in sūtra. No cakras, no ṇāḍīs, etc. None of that newage hippy Vajrayāna stuff is found in the sūtras, nor explained by sūtra masters -- not in India, not in China, not in Japan.

We Vajrayānists assert that all of our hippy methods, deity yoga, and so on, cause our path to be faster than the pure Mahāyāna sūtra route. These criteria did not evolve in Tibet, they evolved in India.

Astus wrote:

Now this is a clear cut explanation of the difference.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 30th, 2011 at 3:17 AM

Title: Re: Korean Pure Land Buddhism

Content:

KwanSeum said:

What is the ' me ' you talk of?

Astus wrote:

Don't derail the discussion with questions about linguistics.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 30th, 2011 at 11:41 PM

Title: Re: Practice and Faith

Content:

Astus wrote:

Ven. Sheng-yen on Prayer

Sakyamuni did not teach his disciples to pray to a deity, to God, or even to the Buddha himself or another, for help or salvation. He encouraged sentient beings to help themselves as well as others. ... When people sincerely pray to deities, bodhisattvas, or even God, they will be helped or appeased. But the response to the prayers does not come from the deities, bodhisattvas or God. It comes in part from the mental power of the person seeking help, and it also comes from the collective power of all the people seeking help from a particular deity or bodhisattva. When a sufficient number of people sincerely seek help from a bodhisattva or deity, power will manifest, whether or not the bodhisattva or deity exists. It happens. People seek help, and their prayers and answered.

(Zen Wisdom: Knowing and Doing, p. 215, 217)

When someone prays, his faith engenders a mental state of supernormal, unified concentration, by which he can stimulate or arouse the compassionate vow-energy of the beings (such as Buddhas or bodhisattvas) to whom he prays, and thereby receive a response. That is, the mental energy resulting from the supplicant's concentration tallies and interacts with the energy of a Buddha's or bodhisattva's vows. This interaction, in turn, gives rise to an inconceivable, extraordinary power, which produces the special experiences and efficacious results of prayer.

(Orthodox Chinese Buddhism, p. 51)

Recitation, or prayer, is another element of the Chan practice that I teach. The power of prayer cannot be explained by psychology or science. When we pray, we generate power. In Buddhism, we say the relationship between the person who prays and the object of prayer is like the relationship between a bell and the person who rings the bell, or a mirror and the person standing in front of the mirror. Then bell won't ring without someone to ring it. The mirror does not make a reflection without someone standing in front of it. The being - the object of prayer - can only have power if people have faith in it. It's the same as in Christianity. You are saved only if you have faith. On this level, the faith in Buddhism is no different from that in Western religion. Faith is what gives prayer its power.

(Footprints in the Snow: The Autobiography of a Chinese Buddhist Monk, p. 182)

Ch'an practitioners do not deny the existence of bodhisattvas. They believe strongly in bodhisattvas, Buddhas, and patriarchs, but they do not pray to them as people would pray to a deity or God. They recognize that patriarchs and bodhisattvas are beings at different levels of practice. They revere bodhisattvas and seek to emulate them, but they do not typically ask for their help. In a humble, sober manner, Ch'an followers practice on their own, or under the guidance of a master.

(Dharma drum: the life and heart of Ch'an practice, p. 281)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 31st, 2011 at 4:45 AM

Title: Re: What is a tantric teaching in Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Do they have the same Vajrasamadhi Sutra in Tibet as in East Asia? I mean, the one commented by Wohyo and translated by Robert E. Buswell Jr.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 31st, 2011 at 3:35 PM

Title: Other Buddhas

Content:

Astus wrote:

What is the traditional explanation for the lack of other buddhas in the agamas? It doesn't seem valid to say that teaching about other buddhas is only a bodhisattva matter since in Mahayana texts it is all fine for sravakas to learn about them and even to aspire for other buddha-realms. So why are there no other buddhas mentioned in the Hinayana teachings, only some buddhas of the past and the next future buddha? Again, it is not the modern historical explanation what I'm looking for here but the addressing of it from a traditional Mahayana perspective.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 31st, 2011 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: Other Buddhas

Content:

Astus wrote:

Pema Rigdzin,

What you mean is the Yogacara teaching of the five gotras, and it is not relevant to the question here.

Namdrol,

Yes, there were some Hinayana schools, the Mahasamghikas for instance, who had some concept of other buddhas. So maybe this problem never occurred in India or anywhere else. Still, in the agamas/nikayas there is no sign of other buddhas and those are the texts said to be preached for the sravakas. Consequently, since in the Mahayana sutras sravakas are also present, they should have known about other buddhas.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 31st, 2011 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: Other Buddhas

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Well, what sort of text critical conclusion can you draw from that, Astus?"

I'm not looking for text critical conclusions, for that there are some fine scholarly works like "The concept of the Buddha: its evolution from early Buddhism to the trikāya theory" by Guang Xing. Also it's possible to go for a conspiracy theory that the sravakas deleted all the other buddhas but that's just non-sense to me. That's why I'm looking for another perspective on this. Of course, there's always the option to say that buddhas are upaya and such, but that doesn't answer a few things.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 1st, 2011 at 3:46 AM

Title: Re: Other Buddhas

Content:

Astus wrote:

Namdrol,

Sure, and that is exactly the historical point. But since, just as you said, Mahayana followers in the past (and present) think that the sutras were spoken directly by the Buddha, thus I was wondering whether there is an explanation from their side on the lack of other buddhas in the agamas. Although it is possible there isn't such an answer.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 1st, 2011 at 6:10 AM

Title: Re: Other Buddhas

Content:

Astus wrote:

Anders,

Not all teachings within Mahayana sutras are intended only for a bodhisattva audience. Sravakas are sometimes invited explicitly, not to mention when they take major parts in the stories (Ananda, Sariputra, Subhuti, etc.).

14th vow of Amitabha:

"If, when I attain buddhahood, the number of the śrāvakas in my land could be known, even if all the beings and pratyekabuddhas living in this universe of a thousand million worlds should count them during a hundred thousand kalpas, may I not attain perfect enlightenment."

Also from the Larger PL Sutra:

"The light of Amitāyus shines brilliantly, illuminating all the buddha lands of the ten directions. There is no place where it is not perceived. I am not the only one who now praises his light. All the buddhas, śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas, and bodhisattvas praise and glorify it in the same way. If sentient beings, having heard of the majestic virtue of his light, glorify it continually, day and night, with sincerity of heart, they will be able to attain birth in his land as they wish. Then the multitudes of bodhisattvas and śrāvakas will praise their excellent virtue."

From this comes that sravakas could aspire for birth in the Pure Land and in the sutra itself the sravakas gain some attainments from hearing it and rejoice in the teaching. This happens in many other sutras where there were sravakas present. So it is not true that those teachings were meant only for bodhisattvas, while of course there are other sutras meant only for bodhisattvas of which the Avatamsaka Sutra is the most famous. Therefore knowledge about other buddhas is not a restricted doctrine, just as in the agamas buddhas of the past are indeed mentioned.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 1st, 2011 at 6:15 AM

Title: Re: What Are You Reading? What Did You Just Order to Read?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Great Perfection by Samten Gyaltsen Karmay

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 1st, 2011 at 3:34 PM

Title: Re: Other Buddhas

Content:

Astus wrote:

"First, I'm assuming those Arhats in attendance during the Buddha's supposedly historical Mahayana teachings conceived the mind for enlightenment. Might not they have nonetheless recognized that some future beings would also have an affinity for the Bodhisattva vehicle, while others would only be attracted to the individual liberation vehicle? If that were the case, wouldn't they have been selective in who they passed either vehicle on to once they began to teach after the Buddha's death?"

You can find both ideas in Mahayana, either that the sravakas present in such sutras were bodhisattvas in disguise or that they were just sravakas and nothing more. Yes, it is recognised that there are people with different inclinations thus the three vehicles as gotra/upaya theories. Being selective about the teachings, that's an unlikely option, especially if we conceive the sravaka as a disciple who relies on the Buddha therefore whatever the Buddha teaches is important to them.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 1st, 2011 at 5:21 PM

Title: Re: Other Buddhas

Content:

Astus wrote:

"With that in mind... It was my understanding that the PP sutras were rediscovered by Nagarjuna, and Maitreya's five treatises were kind of like pure vision teachings received by Asanga, etc., but are all of the Mahayana sutras said to have come to us in a similar way? Were none said to have come to us in a long lineage from the Buddha (a la kama)?"

Mahayana sutras were not preserved orally but in written form only. That is apparent from the texts themselves. If you read some suttas in the Pali Canon you recognise the large amount of repetitions and templates used in them (although in translations they're regularly left out with references and dots). That is how they were memorised.

Mahayana sutras are generally longer and more complex, just look at the prajnaparamita sutras that have thousands of stanzas, and they are the earlier

Mahayana texts. So from a historical perspective Mahayana sutras are definitely later works. And that lateness is in fact backed up by the surrounding stories of origin as Namdrol mentioned. If you want to look into it deeper there are books on the history and development of Buddhism.

Here are some on Indian Buddhism:

Bodhisattvas of the forest and the formation of the Mahāyāna: a study and translation of the Rāṣṭrapālāparipṛcchā-sūtra by Daniel Boucher

A few good men: the Bodhisattva path according to the Inquiry of Ugra (Ugraparipṛcchā) : a study and translation by Jan Nattier

Nāgārjuna in context: Mahāyāna Buddhism and early Indian culture by Joseph Walser

Figments and fragments of Mahāyāna Buddhism in India: more collected papers by Gregory Schopen

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 1st, 2011 at 9:06 PM

Title: Re: Other Buddhas

Content:

Astus wrote:

"I am a firm believer in evolution. I personally think that Buddhism is a religion that underwent and is undergoing significant evolution, reaching its high point in the teachings of the great perfection, and adapting itself to various cultures in an evolutionary manner according to the environment in which it found itself.

The reason Buddhism was able to undergo this evolution without it's core being destroyed, but rather revealed and expressed with greater and greater clarity as successive generations of buddhas refined its essential message, is that the essence of the dharma is dependent origination."

To add another view, it is not evolving I believe in but simply adapting (related terms nonetheless). That is, the Dharma is transmitted by those with enlightenment as this has been stated regularly from the Pali Canon on, it is just the form of the teaching that changes according to circumstances but not the meaning. This is how in Chan and generally in East Asia there is little problem in saying that the 8 teachings (classical 8 schools of Chinese Buddhism: Madhyamaka, Yogacara, Vinaya, Mantra, Tiantai, Huayan, Pure Land, Chan) are one.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 1st, 2011 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: Other Buddhas

Content:

Astus wrote:

Namdrol,

Yes, I can agree with that. But it's still not like a living being's evolution as certain teachings can not just go extinct but resurrect too, not to mentioned cases when one teaching is integrated into another and thus lives on as part of a bigger organism from what later it can break off. So much for applying biology to Buddhism. Whether dependent origination is what to be identified as the core, well, if that equals for instance the "tolerance of no-birth", "seeing the nature" and "unity of samsara and nirvana" than sure.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 1st, 2011 at 11:10 PM

Title: Re: Other Buddhas

Content:

Astus wrote:

So we can say that the teaching is dependently originated too, just as the teachings are taught dependent on circumstances. This is a nice explanation for the absence and presence of other buddhas.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 2nd, 2011 at 3:33 AM

Title: Re: Other Buddhas

Content:

Astus wrote:

That kind of wager was used even before Nagarjuna by Gautama himself:

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.060.than.html>.

"The Nyingmapa tradition never closed their canon."

I don't know if there is actually any Buddhist canon that is closed. Just in the 20th century new, revised versions of both East Asian and Theravada canons were published. In fact, in East Asia there is no ultimate canon only groups of texts published at different times.

"The Mahāprājñā-pāramitōpadeśa by Nāgārjuna briefly addresses this by explaining that one can infer the existence of other Buddhas."

Inferring the existence of other buddhas and reporting on individual buddhas in neighbouring realms are not exactly the same thing. Just like it sounds a generally acceptable supposition that because there is life on this planet there are other planets with intelligent beings on them, but reporting on the life of the Queen of Naboo is a quite different matter.

"it's not a matter of whether there are Buddhas mentioned or not but rather perhaps more confined to whose list of Buddhas are more 'authentic'"

While there was considerable efforts made for the propagation of worshipping this and that buddha I find that it was hardly a sectarian issue. Although there could have been incidents.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 2nd, 2011 at 5:26 AM

Title: Re: Other Buddhas

Content:

Namdrol said:

In the case of the Pali canon, did they add new texts?

Astus wrote:

I thought I remembered where I had read that the works of Mahasi Sayadaw was published in the latest edition of the Burmese canon but now I can't find it. Although I've read that about a year ago. But as I was searching for it I've found a study by Ven. Analayo - who is one of the few monks focusing the early scriptures (all canons included) - written on http://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/fileadmin/pdf/publikationen/HamburgUP_HBS01_Analayo.pdf, a valuable extra to the works already mentioned.

An article by Ven. Sujato addresses the issue of history and myth:

"It's time. We need a new paradigm. Buddhism is suffering from schizo-phrenia; there is a split in consciousness between the historical and the mythic concep-tions of the origin of the Dhamma. For 2500 years Buddhism has been constantly changing, adapting, evolving; yet the myths of the schools insist that the Dhamma remains the same. All existing schools of Buddhism justify their idiosyn-cratic doctrines mytho-lo-gically; this is what all religions do. Thus the Theravada insists that the Abhid-hamma was taught by the Buddha in Tāvātimsa heaven during his seventh rains retreat. The Mahayana claims that the Mahayana sutras were written down in the time of the Buddha, preserved in the dragon world under the sea, then retrieved by Nagarjuna 500 years later. Zen claims authority from an esoteric oral trans-mission outside the scrip-tures descended from Maha Kassapa, symbolized by the smile of Maha Kassapa when the Buddha held up a lotus. All of these are myths, and do not deserve serious consid-er-ation as explan-a-tions of historical truth. Their purpose, as myths, is not to elucidate facts, but to authorize religious convictions."
<http://santifm.org/santipada/2010/its-time/>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 2nd, 2011 at 5:44 AM

Title: Re: Dennis Genpo Merzel disrobes as a Zen priest

Content:

Astus wrote:

Since Western Zen doesn't address all the emotional and communal aspects present thus generating cults and gurus again and again there can hardly be any rules laid down - especially in a not institutionalised and individualistic environment - that will force the necessary changes. Meditation clubs are not temples - much less monasteries - and meditation trainers are not Buddhist teachers.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 4th, 2011 at 3:11 AM

Title: Re: William Bodri and Nan Huai-Chin

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huangbo (Wanling Record) answers the questions on the trikaya and the different practices necessary:

佛真法身猶若虛空。不用別求。有求皆苦。設使恒沙劫行六度萬行得佛菩提。亦非究竟。何以故。為屬因緣造作故。因緣若盡還歸無常。所以云。報化非真佛。亦非說法者。但識自心。無我無人本來是佛。(T48n2012Bp0384b04-08)

"Therefore, the real Dharmakaya is just voidness. It is not necessary to seek anything whatsoever, and all who do continue to seek for something only prolong their suffering in samsara. Even if they were to practice the Six Paramitas for as many numberless kalpas as there are sandgrains in the Ganges River, they would still not reach the Supreme Stage. And why not? Just because such practice depends on primary and secondary causes, and when these causes separate, the practitioner of this path will still have only reached a stage of impermanence. Therefore, even the Sambhogakaya and the Nirmanakaya are not the real Buddha. Also, the one who spreads Dharma is not the real Buddha. In reality, therefore, everybody should recognize that only one's own Mind is the Original Buddha."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 4th, 2011 at 3:30 AM

Title: Re: The Problem With Buddhist Philosophy

Content:

Astus wrote:

1. Don't you think it is through studying the Buddhist heritage that it can be gradually understood? Simply by translating a text to another language is a major part of the process and when a term like dukkha is rendered into suffering/stress/unsatisfactoriness/dis-ease/pain/etc. it is already an acculturation and transformation.

2. When it comes to the point that something has to be explained to an audience (written or oral) that explanation must fit the time and place otherwise hardly anyone could actually understand it. In fact, it is quite impossible to present Buddhism as if it were a frozen object.

(3.) It is a Western concept that it is possible at all to have a fixed history and museums can show and preserve the past for the present. The very act of displaying something in a museum transforms the object. But this is just a side note.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 4th, 2011 at 4:11 AM

Title: Re: The Problem With Buddhist Philosophy

Content:

Astus wrote:

Another thing about how Buddhism has changed already through Western influence. The way Theravada is understood today not just in the West but in Asia too is partially because of Western presence in the region. This influence is also true in Japan, plus the development Western Zen communities. Chinese Buddhism got its new impetus in the 19th century from Taixu (whose disciple was the other great master Yinshun) who thought of modernising Buddhism based on his experience of European culture. And I think Tibetan Buddhism had to make its changes since the monks started preaching to a growing number of Westerners, although they seem to be the most traditionalist of all, or it's just that their culture and story is part of the attraction.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 4th, 2011 at 6:36 AM

Title: Re: The Problem With Buddhist Philosophy

Content:

Namdrol said:

I am suggesting that there is a constant danger of "Dharma ossification".

On the contrary, Tibetans have managed to do so with spectacular success. There has not been a new idea in Tibetan Buddhism since about 15th century. Tibetan Buddhism is intellectually frozen. I would venture it is the same with all forms of Buddhism.

Astus wrote:

My view of Buddhist history is that Gautama presented the essentials to his disciples (early scriptures) from which came a gradual explanation of the many aspects until around the 13th century, the time when Buddhism established itself throughout Asia and practically disappeared in India. Then on there were no significantly new teachings but only continuing the tradition. In terms of Dharma-age - in my interpretation - the pre-sectarian period was the True Dharma, the sectarian period was the Semblance Dharma and from the 13th century on it is the Declining Dharma age; however, this carries too bad connotations to take it seriously.

I'm not sure if philosophical creativity is necessarily the measure of a living tradition. Hakuin's reform in Japanese and Gyeongheo's reform in Korean Zen didn't mean new ideas but rather a restoration - or reinvention - of old teachings. But it was a reform nevertheless. Same could be said of Theravada monks starting dhutanga communities in Thailand.

In the Mahaparinibbana Sutta the Buddha said,

"But in any doctrine & discipline where the noble eightfold path is found, contemplatives of the first... second... third... fourth order are found. The noble eightfold path is found in this doctrine & discipline, and right here there are contemplatives of the first... second... third... fourth order. Other teachings are empty of knowledgeable contemplatives. And if the monks dwell rightly, this world will not be empty of arahants."

It is the guarding and practising the path that keeps the teaching alive. There is also a series of talks on the future dangers (AN 5.77-80), later selected by King Asoka into his edicts, that address matters monks should take heed of in order to develop on the path. Another sutta (SN 20.7) warns about the dangers of not listening to the very teachings of the Buddha but instead to "discourses that are literary works — the works of poets, elegant in sound, elegant in rhetoric, the work of outsiders, words of disciples" thus causing the disappearance of the Buddha's teachings. And if we look at Nagarjuna's works their aim is not to establish some new thought but to turn people back to the path itself, this is the expression of the very practical spirit of the prajnaparamita sutras. The same sentiment is found in other teachings that were later regarded as new schools, the attempt to return to the original teachings: not the words themselves but the insight. Isn't that what the upadesha teaching is about in Tibet, a direct discourse? But of course no teaching can avoid formalisation and eventual rigor mortis. That is impermanence. What keeps the Dharma alive is enlightenment, it is revived every time a person gains insight into the truth of the teaching.

So, what is intellectual liveliness? Does the pure citta of Ajahn Chah, the Juigong of Daehaeng Sunim or the Humanistic Buddhism of Yinshun qualify as such? I can't really tell. What do you say?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 4th, 2011 at 6:00 PM

Title: Re: William Bodri and Nan Huai-Chin

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is the gradual path of developing wisdom for dharmakaya and accumulating merits for rupakaya. However, Zen is the direct path of sudden enlightenment, seeing nature is becoming buddha as there is no buddha outside the mind. These are the fundamental doctrines of Zen, and while teaching different methods and paths is not incorrect they are part of the gradual teachings that ultimately lead to seeing nature and becoming buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 5th, 2011 at 2:48 AM

Title: Re: Cosmology

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think they meant their cosmology quite literally. This is easy to understand from the Abhidharmakosa where it gives both real and unreal places and relates them to each other in terms of distance and direction. Of course, it is always possible to come up with a psychologised, symbolic re-interpretation. The question is, is it worth it? Is it important in any way?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 5th, 2011 at 2:53 AM

Title: Re: Hui-Neng Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Aemilius,

If you rather rely on Wikipedia than decades of in depth scholarly studies it's up to you.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 5th, 2011 at 4:29 PM

Title: Re: The Problem With Buddhist Philosophy

Content:

Astus wrote:

Buddhist Philosophy - the wisdom part - is about the correct view and liberating insight. It is the final practice so to say since precepts and meditation is about reaching wisdom. Its liveliness is a matter of understanding and application. For instance saying that there are five aggregates is a philosophical concept. If one sees those five as they are within the realm of personal experience it can bring about liberation. If it's left on the level of ideas, well, than it's just an idea. But it's up to the student to use it.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 5th, 2011 at 6:17 PM

Title: Re: The Problem With Buddhist Philosophy

Content:

Astus wrote:

"the Buddha saw the existence of the five aggregates"

There are no such things as the five aggregates but they're arbitrary categories for human experience probably based on current soul/mind concepts of that era. That's why I say it is a philosophical concept. There are other such categories known in the early scriptures, like the 6 indriya, 12 ayatana, 18 dhatu set; or when the Buddha uses the "seen, heard, sensed, cognised" (diṭṭha, suta, muta, viññāta) series what could also be used for meditation (e.g. SN 35.95).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 5th, 2011 at 6:42 PM

Title: Re: Ordination

Content:

Astus wrote:

Even in this Suggestion Box the debate on who is an ordained person appeared immediately. Perhaps the discussion can go on in another topic.

As for an ordination forum, since there is little discussion of such matters I see no need for a whole separate place for it. We're also short of both ordained members and Vinaya professionals to give authentic information. Maybe later.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 5th, 2011 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: The Problem With Buddhist Philosophy

Content:

Astus wrote:

See the definition(s) of aggregates. All the different aggregates are made of different sensory data, thus they're simply terms to encompass lot of experience but there is no form, etc. aggregate in and of itself to be experienced. The diversity is most apparent in the different dharmas put under samskara in abhidharma texts. Another major difference is in vijñāna when there can be 6, 8 or even 9 of them in Mahayana although it is still called a single aggregate. Thus the aggregates are only names even in the early texts.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 5th, 2011 at 9:34 PM

Title: Re: William Bodri and Nan Huai-Chin

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here's a http://www.meditationexpert.com/zen-buddhism-tao/z_dharmakaya_sambhogakaya_nirmanakaya_three_buddha_bodies.htm from the Bodri website. Quote from there,

"Buddhism, Taoism, Hinduism and Christianity speak openly of this trio of principles or "bodies" that must be mastered for complete spiritual attainment. Whether we call this trio Father-Son-Holy Ghost, dharmakaya-sambhogakaya-nirmanakaya, essence-appearance-function, or Brahman-Vishnu-Shiva, they are all synonymous with the same set of principles."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 5th, 2011 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: The Problem With Buddhist Philosophy

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Hi Astus, perhaps I'm misunderstanding, but when speaking of the material aggregate, it is composed of the 5 sense organs and 5 sense objects. So for example the sense organ of smell is composed of a patch of atoms that detects the different odors. The sensory data would be the sense object of odor."

That is all right. The disagreement is simply on the nature of the aggregates whether they're things to be experienced or philosophical concepts.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 6th, 2011 at 3:11 PM

Title: Re: How to approach Sutras

Content:

Astus wrote:

While what you say is a possible way to read texts I doubt that's the only one. Such concentrated and repetitive reading sounds good for memorising, one could as well recite the text to make it easier. However, understanding a text requires thinking and analysing too. If it is only concentration one is looking for practically anything can do. If it is understanding the sutras while concentration is beneficial there is a need for making effort in gaining insight through pondering and in depth study that can include beyond the text commentaries and even linguistics and cultural things.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 6th, 2011 at 3:22 PM

Title: Re: How to approach Sutras

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Experience beyond words" is a philosophy, an idea, a concept. So "beyond words" is not beyond words at all. Therefore it is through words one can go beyond words, through study one can go beyond all learnings. Although a map is not the place our path is guided by the map.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 6th, 2011 at 3:49 PM

Title: Re: Reconsiderations on Not-Really-Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

What separates Buddhism from non-Buddhism? On one hand there are criteria for the teaching, on the other for the intention. The teaching can be external and internal, external can be in agreement or disagreement with Buddhism. If it disagrees with Buddhism it should be refuted, if it agrees it should be submitted as an external teaching not leading to liberation. However, if intention is considered, it can be that even if one is interested in internal doctrines many don't care about liberation on any level. So there isn't much to distinguish external in agreement teachings from internal ones. This is called the path of humans and gods.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 6th, 2011 at 4:00 PM

Title: Re: How to approach Sutras

Content:

LastLegend said:

Philosophy to you because you are philosophizing, playing with words. This is why you need to practice to experience. And approaching the Sutras is a practice.

Astus wrote:

It is a practice to recite the sutras, yes, a very old one indeed. What I'm saying is that there is more to it than concentrated reading without thinking about it. Thus when one has a clear and focused mind it is good to study the sutra on a verbal, analytical level too. This is integrating both concentration and insight into practising with sutras.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 6th, 2011 at 7:47 PM

Title: Re: Restricted books

Content:

Astus wrote:

"According to the Tibetan tradition, true vipashyana is to see the natural state while being free of dualistic clinging. Traditionally, this natural state is introduced after the practitioner has gone through the ngöndro, the 'preliminary practices of the four or five times hundred thousand', as well as the yidam practice with its detailed recitations. After completing these, the student is given the pointing-out instruction according to the tradition of Dzogchen or Mahamudra or one of the other traditions of ultimate wisdom. That is the general way, but times have changed somewhat in the sense that many people these days are earnestly drawn to the essential teachings from the beginning. My late father, Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche, used to give the pointing-out instruction to whomever was sincerely interested, whether that person was a long-term practitioner or a beginner. he also gave me the mandate to do so."

(Chokyi Nyima: Present Fresh Wakefulness, p. 39-40)

IIRC, the BWM book is advertised on the back cover as an initiatory book that can generate insight simply by reading. Then why the need for being introduced before being introduced?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 6th, 2011 at 8:05 PM

Title: Re: The Problem With Buddhist Philosophy

Content:

Astus wrote:

Yes, even fire is an arbitrary category. Buddhists in ancient India when categorised fire knew nothing about chemical burning and nuclear fusion, nor did they thought of the fire element in terms of thermodynamics. But if we use fire element in the Buddhist sense all that could be included. And yes, it is true, everything is an arbitrary category, a conceptual thing. A good example is how different languages categorise the world in different ways.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 6th, 2011 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: Reconsiderations on Not-Really-Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think the straight way is to point out what is actually taught within Buddhism and explain what that is the Buddhist teaching. It is rarely necessary to criticise other teachings except when they are harmful, but not being Buddhist, well, that's not a sin. Just see how many non-Buddhist rituals and concepts could hang around Buddhism in Asia. Until they don't hurt there's little to worry about. The important thing is to make clear what is the path to nirvana and what is not.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 6th, 2011 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: Restricted books

Content:

Astus wrote:

The quote and my comment on the book is not strictly related.

"This text belongs to the category of atiyoga, the highest of the nine vehicles that constitute the Buddhist path. Moreover, it is from the short lineage of Dudjom Lingpa, a direct transmission of the Great Perfection approach so powerful that even hearing it read aloud ensures that the listener will eventually escape the suffering of samsara. It should be remembered, however, that to benefit fully from the Nang-jang, one must receive empowerment, oral transmission, and teachings from a qualified Dzogchen master."

(BWM, page v)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 7th, 2011 at 2:34 AM

Title: Re: understanding of favourite gongans/Koans that youve heard

Content:

Jikan said:

This is an interesting topic, but might it be better to discuss it with your teacher, in person?

...off to quality-test the cat chow

Astus wrote:

There is no need to mystify koans. True, there is meditation practice with koans called kanna/kanhua (看話 observing the phrase) where one investigates a wato/huatou (話頭 phrase head). But that is just one specific use of koans. Both before and after such practice was invented by Daie/Dahui (1089-1163) they were used for instructing disciples in the meaning of Zen. Although such instructions were generally given by the abbot (i.e. the Zen master) the discussion of them has never been restricted as if it were a private matter. It's another thing that it takes considerable amount of study (!) and training to be able to converse on koans in a meaningful way.

"To begin with, you should study day and night the verbal teachings of the Buddha and patriarchs so that you can penetrate the principles of things in their infinite variety. Ascertain and analyze, one by one, the profundities of the five houses and the seven schools of Zen and the wondrous doctrines of the eight teachings given in the five periods of Buddha's teaching career.

If you have any energy left over, you should clarify the deep principles of the various different philosophies. However, if this and that get to be too much trouble, it will just waste your energy to no avail. If you thoroughly investigate the sayings of the Buddhas and patriarchs that are difficult to pass through, and clearly arrive at their essential meaning, perfect understanding will shine forth and the principles of all things should naturally be completely clear. This is called the eye to read the sutras.

Now, the verbal teachings of the Buddhas and the patriarchs are extremely deep, and one should not consider that one has mastered them completely after one has gone through them once or twice. When you climb a mountain, the higher you climb, the higher they are; when you go into the ocean, the farther you go, the deeper it is. It is the same in this case. It is also like forging iron to make a sword; it is considered best to put it into the forge over and over, refining it again and again. Though it is always the same forge, unless you put the sword in over and over and refine it a hundred times, it can hardly turn out to be a fine sword.

Penetrating study is also like this; unless you enter the great forge of the Buddha and patriarchs, difficult to pass through, and make repeated efforts at refinement, through suffering and pain, total and independent knowing cannot come forth. Penetrating through the barriers of the Buddha and patriarchs over and over again, responding to beings' potential everywhere with mastery and freedom of technique, is called subtle, observing, discerning knowing."

(Hakuin on Kensho: the four ways of knowing, tr. by Albert Low, p. 35-36)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 7th, 2011 at 3:06 AM

Title: Re: understanding of favourite gongans/Koans that youve heard

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think it is possible to have a meaningful discussion on koans here as well as face to face. It is not a matter of communication form but what one can communicate and that depends on the qualities of the people involved.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 7th, 2011 at 4:28 AM

Title: Re: understanding of favourite gongans/Koans that youve heard

Content:

Astus wrote:

OK, let's see the case of the hundred-foot pole.

Sekisō Oshō asked, "How can you proceed on further from the top of a hundred-foot pole?"

Another eminent teacher of old said, "You, who sit on the top of a hundred-foot pole, although you have entered the Way you are not yet genuine. Proceed on from the top of the pole, and you will show your whole body in the ten directions."

(<http://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/zen/mumonkan.htm>, Case 46)

Here's a small collection of commentaries for a start.

See T'aego Pou chip, 91: "Beneath this great doubt, one must let go of both body and mind." Hakuin later reified this experience as a specific stage in practice; see Kasulis, Zen Action/Zen Person, 112-116. Dogen (1235-1237) relates this "casting off of body and mind" to the final leap off the hundred foot pole; see A Primer of Soto zen: A Translation of Dogen's Shobogenzo, trans. Reiho Masunaga (Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1971), 93-94.

(Robert E. Buswell, Jr.: The "Short-cut" Approach of K'an-hua Meditation in Sudden and Gradual: Approaches to Enlightenment in Chinese Thought, p. 374: note 137 to a paragraph on p. 355 that is about the explosion of great doubt resulting in "his own personal destruction")

What does "the top of a hundred-foot pole" mean? Figuratively, it is the stage of complete emptiness. When you attain self-realization, your eye will open first to the state of consciousness where there is absolutely nothing. That stage is called the "great death." It is a stage where there is no dualistic opposition such as subject and object, good and bad, saints and ordinary people and so on. There is neither one who sees nor anything seen. Zen usually expresses this stage with the words, "There is not a speck of cloud in the spacious sky."

Anyone who wants to attain the true Zen experience must pass through this stage once. If you remain there, however, you will be unable to attain true emancipation from deep attachment to this emptiness. This stage is often referred to as the pitfall of emptiness. It becomes a kind of Zen sickness.

When we attain kensho, we come to the top of the high pole where most of us are seized with this malady. It is said that even Shakyamuni succumbed to it for two or three weeks after his great enlightenment. The Zen master in this koan warns not to linger at this point when he says, "Take a step forward from this stage and you will be able to manifest your whole body throughout the world in ten directions." That means that you must become completely free from all kinds of attachments.

Look at this stick, this kotsu. See, it is lying horizontally at first. This position represents our ordinary life. With the practice of zazen, working on Mu or counting our breath, one end of the stick will gradually come up, while the other is fixed at the original point. When the stick stands perfectly vertical, that is the state of complete emptiness. There you become completely one with Mu, and there is no concept of thought whatever in your mind. This is the great death. It is also the entrance to perfect enlightenment. This stage is void of mental activity. But you must not stop there. You must press on even harder. Then the top of the stick will move forward, and suddenly a whole new world will manifest itself! This is true enlightenment. Perhaps now you understand what this warning means.

...

In our present koan, the last phrase of the case reads: "...to manifest this whole body throughout the world in ten directions." This means you will realize that you are one and alone in and with the whole universe and that you should be able to do anything in an extremely free and positive way. That is the state of true enlightenment.

(Kōun Yamada: The gateless gate - the classic book of Zen koans, p. 217-218)

This state beyond hope, where "there is no place to put one's hands and feet," Ta-hui remarks, "is really a good place." It is a "good place" because it is there that conceptualization is brought to an end: "Without debate and ratiocination they are at a loss, with no place to put their hands and feet." Only then can the student make the all-important transition from the conditioned to the unconditioned, which is likened to a death-defying "leap off a hundred-foot pole." One need only recall the role of no-thought as the access to final realization-awakening to see how thoroughly that earlier account of meditation has been subsumed by the hua-t'ou technique.

The leap off the hundred-foot pole from the conditioned to the unconditioned is perhaps the quintessential expression of what Ch'an means by a sudden style of cultivation and meditation. Sudden cultivation demands that there be no hint of any sequence of practices that would lead the student from one stage to another, progressively abandoning defilements and cultivating wholesome actions, until he achieves perfect purity of mind. The jump off the hundred-foot pole suggests the radical nonattachment, even to one's own body and mind, that Buddhism has always expected as a prerequisite to enlightenment. Ch'an does not deny that it might take time for one to build up the courage necessary to take that ultimate plunge. But its lack of sequence at least freed it from charges of being gradualistic.

(Robert E. Buswell, Jr.: The "Short-cut" Approach of K'an-hua Meditation in Sitting with Koans: Essential Writings on Zen Koan Introspection, ed. John Daido Looi, p. 83)

The top of the hundred-foot pole is the isolation of Hui in a selfless condition. He has experienced one side of the complementarity of form and emptiness, but he has not integrated the two aspects of reality for himself, as himself. Even after meeting the great Nan-ch'üan, he is still stuck in the void.

"Take a step from the top of the pole." This is the test point of the case, which students through the centuries since Ch'ang-sha have presented to their teachers. For our purposes, we can see how Ch'ang-sha is emphasizing the importance of moving on from simple awareness of the unsubstantial nature of the self and all things. With that step, "worlds of the ten directions will be your entire body." That is, you will find mountains, rivers, the great Earth itself, the sun, the moon, the stars, people, animals, plants, streets, and towers to be your own great self.

(Robert Aitken: Original Dwelling Place - Zen Buddhist Essays, p. 91)

The need to go beyond the way of knowing of the Great Perfect Mirror is also emphasized in many koans. For example, in koan number 46 of the Mumonkan, Zen master Sekiso asked, "How will you step from the top of a hundred-foot pole?" And another eminent master of old said, "You, who sit on the top of a hundred-foot pole, although you have come to realization, you are not yet real. Go forward from the top of the pole and you will manifest your whole body in the ten directions." Manifesting your whole body in the ten directions is this second awakening. It is seeing that all things in the six fields of sense - seeing, hearing, discernment, and knowledge - are your own awakened nature.

(Albert Low: Hakuin on Kensho, p. 59)

This "backward step," at once the casting off of body-mind and presencing of the original face, is fundamentally the same as advancing a step further from the top of a hundred-foot pole. When one takes one more step from the top of a hundred-foot pole and jumps into empty space, one immediately realizes that the boundless empty space is oneself, one's true Self that is nondual with others. It is precisely "the Self prior to the universe's sprouting any sign of itself" (chinchō mibō no jiko).

(Masao Abe: A study of Dōgen - his philosophy and religion, p. 144)

Dogen instructed:

Students, cast aside your bodies and minds and enter fully into Buddhism.

An old Master has said: "You've climbed to the top of a hundred-foot pole. Now keep on going." Most people, when they reach the top, are afraid they will lose their footing and fall to their deaths. Thus they hang on all the more tightly. To advance another step means to discard all thoughts of everything, from your functions as a savior of other beings to the means of your own livelihood, even if it requires casting away your own life. If you do not do this and even if you study the Way as earnestly as though you were trying to put out flames in your own hair, you will not be able to attain the Way. Resolve to cast aside both body and mind.

(A primer of Sōtō Zen: a translation of Dōgen's Shōbōgenzō zuimonki, 3.1, p. 49)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 7th, 2011 at 8:17 PM

Title: Re: The Problem With Buddhist Philosophy

Content:

Anders Honore said:

ok, so a problem with Buddhist philosophy has been diagnosed, so what is to be prescribed for it?

Are people like Reginald Ray and Ken McLeod the way forward for 21st century Buddhism?

Astus wrote:

I'd think people like Charles Muller, Thomas & JC Cleary, R.E. Buswell, Jeffrey Hopkins, Erik Kunsang, etc.; and Ven. Amaro, Brahmavamso, Sujato, etc., also Dzongsar Jamyang Khyentse, Dzogchen Ponlop, HHDL, etc. are the outstanding and influential figures of current Western Buddhism. And I emphasise Buddhism here because those who teach only some form of meditation and don't get engaged in philosophical issues, well, they're not significant in developing Buddhist philosophy.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 8th, 2011 at 4:16 PM

Title: Re: Are plants sentient?

Content:

Hanzze said:

Who told that? Many?

Astus wrote:

Is it possible to be born as a plant? Not in Buddhism. Is it killing to uproot plants? Not in Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 8th, 2011 at 4:58 PM

Title: Re: The Problem With Buddhist Philosophy

Content:

Astus wrote:

"It would be like those old self-sufficient Chan monasteries where the residents all went to work growing food for themselves."

That's a Chan legend. Although monks did some basic works around the monastery (even in Theravada countries they do that) but monasteries were far from being self-sufficient. Also don't forget that monasteries owned large amount of lands where whole villages cultivated the fields and they still required the support of the local government. It's another thing that monastic rules forbid work for renunciates, plus they could earn lot more in a office than on the fields. And if monks and nuns would be self-sufficient what would be the role of laity? It would isolate monasteries even more.

I think the key to the growth of Buddhism is first in transforming it to a philosophy understandable and acceptable to the "literati" and then based on that develop a Buddhism that is good for average people. This is going from wisdom approach to faith approach. Although it could happen that this model is not applicable in the current situation.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 8th, 2011 at 7:00 PM

Title: Re: The Problem With Buddhist Philosophy

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Nagarjuna, indeed just about any teaching predicated on Hinayana critique, is not that."

Well said!

This requirement of prior knowledge is also a reason why teachings from the Nikayas are doing so well in popularity while Mahayana sutras don't really. Also it explains how practical and meditation oriented teachings are well received while a lecture series on the <http://www.bdkamerica.org/default.aspx?mpid=30&productid=28&languageid=2> (Cheng weishi lun) could hardly find an audience beyond a couple of scholars.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 8th, 2011 at 7:15 PM

Title: Re: The Problem With Buddhist Philosophy

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

For me personally it is easier to turn to the Abhidharma texts to find some factual answer to a practice issue than to try and find a specific sutra that deals with the specific issue. From there an Abhidharma text normally directs/refers you to the source of the information (normally a sutra/sutta) so that you can get a fuller picture.

Astus wrote:

Extracts are how certain people want to present a teaching. Treatises seem easier to study but they're presentations of specific views. Abhidharma texts are not "sutras in brief" but philosophical works by people who imparted their ideas through such medium.

"While the abhidhamma is presented as being based on the Buddha's ultimate discernment of 'mind & matter', in reality the classical Theravādin abhidhamma is a scholastic philosophy which is little understood, and which, if examined critically, is full of incoherencies. Within Buddhist tradition, however, the abhidhamma is perhaps more significant for its purely religious or mystical significance, rather than as a guide for practice or understanding."

(<http://santifm.org/santipada/2010/the-mystique-of-the-abhidhamma/>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 8th, 2011 at 9:23 PM

Title: Re: The Problem With Buddhist Philosophy

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

What does that leave us with? Rejection of all texts as mere personal philosophical expounding?

Astus wrote:

There is no need to go to extremes. Critical examination of texts is not the same as abandoning everything. Also, while the majority of sutras in the early scriptures, similarly to monastic rules, are accepted by all the different traditions that is not true in case of the different abhidharma texts that were used to distinguish one sect from the other.

When new schools appeared in China it was partially because of the change of focus from shastras to sutras. If there is a need to refresh Buddhist philosophy it should be done based on proper foundation in the Buddha's teachings. When it is done based on others' interpretations that is already following a lineage, a school.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 8th, 2011 at 11:56 PM

Title: Re: The Problem With Buddhist Philosophy

Content:

Namdrol said:

The problem with Buddhist Philosophy is Buddhist Philosophy. There is only one way to "refresh" the teachings -- realization.

Astus wrote:

But I assume you don't mean that since the 15th century there has been no enlightened being in Tibetan Buddhism, do you?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 11th, 2011 at 6:58 PM

Title: Re: See Nature, Become Buddha - Can You?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Nature of mind/mind nature is citta-prakrti in Sanskrit, 心性 in Chinese. The Ratnagotra/Uttaratantra shastra is the main source of the doctrine of buddha-nature and it exists both in Chinese and in Tibetan besides the Sanskrit original.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 12th, 2011 at 12:05 AM

Title: Re: Bodhidharma & Padampa Sangye. Same person?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Why not say that Bodhidharma was later known as Padmasambhava and then Padampa Sangye? Or Luke Skywalker for that matter. Why not?

But if we want to go with the known facts, Bodhidharma lived hundreds of years before that mahasiddha, he is supposed to have taught some Lankavatara Sutra teachings, practically Bodhidharma's whole life is a legend created centuries later and there is no definitive information of who Bodhidharma was (if he was at all).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 12th, 2011 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: See Nature, Become Buddha - Can You?

Content:

TMingyur said:

Ah thanks ... does that mean that "citta-prakrti" is equated with "buddha-nature" or that the term is found exclusively in sutras or shastras belonging to the third turning?

Astus wrote:

I don't know if the term is exclusive to teachings on tathagatagarbha but in that context it is indeed buddha-nature, the originally pure essence.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 12th, 2011 at 9:29 PM

Title: Re: Shinran Shonin's 750th Grand Memorial at Nishi Hongwanji

Content:

mr. gordo said:

Beautiful pictures.

This is my favorite:

Astus wrote:

First I thought that was the funny version of Shinran Shonin.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 13th, 2011 at 2:16 AM

Title: Re: Is the Lotus Sutra just fiction

Content:

Astus wrote:

"At that time the Buddha Candrasūryapradīpa, having emerged from samādhi, remained sitting for sixty intermediate kalpas and revealed to Bodhisattva Varaprabha the Mahayana sutra called Saddharmapuṇḍarīka, the White Lotus of the Marvelous Law, which was the instruction for bodhisattvas and the treasured lore of the buddhas. The assembly also sat there undisturbed in body and mind listening to the Buddha's exposition for sixty intermediate kalpas as if only a single mealtime had passed; during that time not a single person among them experienced fatigue of body or mind."

What is the Lotus Sutra?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 13th, 2011 at 3:31 PM

Title: Re: Pre-Buddhist Chan

Content:

Jikan said:

This is something I'd like to know more about--the back-and-forth between TienTai and Ch'an in this period. I haven't studied it systematically. Any pointers?

Astus wrote:

I don't know of any study analysing this relationship. There are pieces and bits in different Zen studies, like in "Seeing through Zen" on p. 142ff "Intersubjectivity in Song-Dynasty Tiantai Practice" and in "The Will to Orthodoxy" on p. 38-39 "The Tiantai Influence". You may find other similar chapters in different works.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 13th, 2011 at 4:07 PM

Title: Re: Patrul Rinpoche - Advice from Me to Myself

Content:

Astus wrote:

The poem reminds me this classic Zen koan (Gateless gate, case 12):

Zuigan Gen Oshō called to himself every day,

"Master!"

and answered, "Yes, sir!"

Then he would say, "Be wide awake!"

and answer, "Yes, sir!"

"Henceforward, never be deceived by others!"

"No, I won't!"

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 14th, 2011 at 4:35 AM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body Misconception

Content:

Astus wrote:

I haven't heard that the so called common Mahayana schools admitted they're incapable of producing buddhas. But if you have references for that please show them.

My question in that topic was about the meaning of rainbow body. In your post you just seem to take it as something so obvious that it needs no explanation is if there were no other concepts of buddhahood anywhere else in Buddhism.

As a side note, Samten Gyaltsen Karmay in "The Great Perfection" (p. 190ff) points out that the idea of the dissolution of the body, a concept attested from the 11th century on in Tibet, derives from the reinterpretation of the teaching of nirvana without residue while the rainbow body itself can be connected to tantric views of body and certain Bön beliefs.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 14th, 2011 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body Misconception

Content:

Astus wrote:

Enochian,

No other Buddhist tradition holds the idea that those who become buddhas on this physical earth or any other physical earth (or did you mean Earth the planet - for if you did, well, that is a very much modern Western concept not known in Buddhism until recently) display rainbow body. On the other hand, even non-Vajrayana schools teach buddhahood in this life.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 14th, 2011 at 3:49 PM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body Misconception

Content:

Enochian said:

Which non-Vajrayana school teaches that the COMMON Mahayana Trikaya with the ability to emanate 1 billion emanations in 1 billion world systems can be obtained in this life?

Astus wrote:

A bodhisattva on the fourth stage can "manifest a billion bodies, each surrounded by a billion enlightening beings" (Flower Ornament Scripture, p. 733). Also, the view you represent of buddhahood is not necessarily the same everybody else has.

"What are the hundred thousand myriad Transformation bodies of the Buddha? If you are free of any thought of the ten thousand dharmas, then your nature is basically like emptiness, but in one thought of calculation, transformation occurs. Evil thoughts are transformed into hell-beings and good thoughts into heavenly beings. Viciousness is transformed into dragons and snakes, and compassion into Bodhisattvas. Wisdom is transformed into the upper realms, and delusion into the lower realms. The transformations of the self-nature are extremely many, and yet the confused person, unawakened to that truth, continually gives rise to evil and walks evil paths. Turn a single thought back to goodness, and wisdom is produced. That is the Transformation-body of the Buddha within your self-nature.

Good Knowing Advisors, the Dharma body of the Buddha is basically complete. To see your own nature in every thought is the Reward body of the Buddha. When the Reward body thinks and calculates, it is the Transformation Body of the Buddha. Awaken and cultivate by your own efforts the merit and virtue of your self-nature. That is truly taking refuge." (Platform Sutra, ch. 6)

But this is not discussing the importance and meaning of rainbow body but questioning the teachings of other Buddhist schools. And I don't see the relevance of that.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 14th, 2011 at 6:07 PM

Title: Where are the Gods?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Traditionally it is described that gods live on mount Meru and above in the sky. There are actual distances given and so on. But where are the gods now that we have no mount Meru and even the sky ends at one point and there is just empty space left? This is also a question because gods below the formless realm have some kind of physical body thus they're supposed to be somewhere. But where is it?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 14th, 2011 at 7:36 PM

Title: Re: Buddhacarita

Content:

Astus wrote:

Not too long ago I've read a partial (some later chapters were missing) Hungarian translation made from the Sanskrit. The whole text is as kitschy and Bollywood-Indian as it can be. It wasn't a pleasure to read. Although the chapter on Kantaka (the Buddha's horse) was so absurd that it was funny. Well, I guess Kantaka is my favourite character in the entire story.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 14th, 2011 at 8:05 PM

Title: Re: Where are the Gods?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think it is a legitimate inquiry. The gods within Buddhism are often forgotten although they're integral part of the religion. Since our current view of the world is radically different from those of ancient India and who came after them the traditional Buddhist cosmology is put aside as irrelevant. But cosmology forms the basis of a couple of other doctrines, especially the six worlds. Of course, it could have been possible to ask where the hells are but I assume - based on my own limited knowledge - that we're more familiar with the sky above than the earth below and their modern understanding.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 14th, 2011 at 8:37 PM

Title: Re: Where are the Gods?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Well, it doesn't look like thousands of yojanas high and there are no surrounding mountains of different metals plus the inner oceans, etc. So it is mount Meru in name only.

Being all metaphorical, well, no, I don't think it was all intended as a big over-complicated metaphor. And metaphor for what?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 14th, 2011 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: Where are the Gods?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'd say that there is no Mt. Meru on Earth because none can fit the description. It makes little difference if we identify any ordinary mountain as the "real Meru" since there are no terraces on it where gods live their lives, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 15th, 2011 at 3:08 AM

Title: Re: Where are the Gods?

Content:

Astus wrote:

A being cannot see those who live in a higher realm except by magic or other aid, says the Kosha in reference to gods of different heavens. This is actually the answer for not being able to see them normally.

But my question touches upon the issue of the relationship between cosmology and theology (god-lore). As we have a different view of the world where can we position the beings of other realms?

As for the literal nature of the teachings on the realms of gods, in vol. 2 p. 463-464 of the Kosha, Vasubandhu discusses at length the spread of the fragrance of the flowers of a certain magnolia tree situated in the world of the Thirty-Three Gods.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 15th, 2011 at 3:11 AM

Title: Re: William Bodri and Nan Huai-Chin

Content:

mr. gordo said:

Those are some real SEO rich posts.

erdweir said:

SEO?

Astus wrote:

Yes, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Search_engine_optimization. A load of ads you guys have produced here without much contribution.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 15th, 2011 at 6:21 AM

Title: Re: Where are the Gods?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Right, but this chapter three of the Kosha, and we know that the kosha's cosmology cannot be taken literally as written.

Astus wrote:

Yes, that's my point too, that we can't take traditional view literally. So the question, what is it that we can accept?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 15th, 2011 at 4:04 PM

Title: Re: Where are the Gods?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Meditative experience.

Astus wrote:

Does that mean you don't think there could be a common understanding about them? It appears to me that the Buddhist system of the different realms and beings is a good template to be used when analysing different religious-spiritual teachings. But since monotheists lack the diversity (except perhaps with Catholics' saints and angels) and materialists have no understanding of other worldly entities I presume there should be some general system in Buddhism to be accepted and taught beyond simple statements like "there are different realms".

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 15th, 2011 at 4:16 PM

Title: Re: Where are the Gods?

Content:

Will said:

On a related thread I expressed that traditional Buddhist or Hindu or Greek etc. cosmogonies & cosmologies must have had some hidden meaning or function. But so far most responses ignore what that is. Instead the attitude is "just drop the goofy notions and move on." Understandable from the modern viewpoint.

But why are they the way they are? Some of these spiritual folk had powers and insight far beyond our ken. So why present these cosmic patterns as they did?

Astus wrote:

Is there any hidden meaning behind the plethora of creation myths and legends of gods and heroes? Is there a hidden meaning behind modern urban legends?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 15th, 2011 at 4:40 PM

Title: Re: Where are the Gods?

Content:

Will said:

To the former, yes; to the latter, who cares.

Astus wrote:

Urban legends are modern myths. If you read some studies on the development of different myths, like that of Bodhidharma or Guanyin in China, you find that it was through centuries that different ideas, tales, theories and rituals eventually amalgamated into a somewhat complete mythology what now is presented to modern readers as if it has always been like that.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 15th, 2011 at 11:37 PM

Title: Re: Modern Day Pure Land Masters

Content:

Astus wrote:

Recently the master and I were talking about his revolutionary change from Ch'an practice to totally practising the Pureland path of Master ShanDao, unable to maintain my curiosity I blurted out"

"But don't you miss your Ch'an practice? You spent so many years and so much effort doing it, don't you regret giving it up as completely as you have?"

He looked at me sideways, with that really mischievous smile of his and said:

"You don't understand. There's nothing to give up, nothing to lose. Everything I do is Ch'an. Ch'an is all around us. Could you possible let go of the space you're sitting in now? Could you be anything but sitting here in this space? Of course not! Ch'an is in anything and everything I do. I just don't talk about it like I used to anymore. I don't sit and think about it and discuss it and teach it."

"I looked at the people in this world. I saw how much they suffer, how difficult it is for them to understand, to practice, so I started teaching about Amitabha Buddha instead. And I'm the kind of person who only teaches what he practices, so I had to start practicing Pureland, and had to practice it properly, or I wouldn't be able to teach it."

<https://dharmaafrica.blogspot.com/2007/10/giving-up-chan.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 15th, 2011 at 11:47 PM

Title: Re: Where are the Gods?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Will,

There's the practice of devanasmṛti (god-remembrance) but I don't know any related to cosmology itself. If you think there is a deeper sense of traditional Buddhist (i.e. ancient Indian) world view there should be somebody of the old masters actually mentioning that, don't you think? If they were symbols there has been so many commentators and abhidharma teachers that at least some of them could have explained that. On the other hand, it's never too late to start a new interpretation.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 16th, 2011 at 9:02 PM

Title: Re: The ground of empty appearances

Content:

Astus wrote:

As there is no mind without function and mind is eternal emptiness it's all easier to say there is dependent existence from which comes neither being nor non-being.

Dependent existence itself doesn't rule out the relative reality of phenomena. Or let's just say that Buddhism is not for substituting philosophy and science because that simply results in inconsistencies and nonsense.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 17th, 2011 at 6:23 PM

Title: Re: William Bodri and Nan Huai-Chin

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm sorry if any of you was offended by my accusation. Frankly, certain posts really look like ads. But that might be just my suspicious mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 18th, 2011 at 5:03 PM

Title: Re: Where are the Gods?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Will,

Thanks for the quote. I'm not trying to fit it into any scientific view but the view of modern humans what is influenced by science and other factors. But I could simply ask: what is it that you believe? It is obvious from Buddhism in different lands that Indian gods easily got out of currency to be replaced by local ones. What local deities would replace them in the West, if that happened at all? Or, since bodhisattvas and buddhas are not that much bound by culture, for Mahayana followers there is no dealing with gods?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 19th, 2011 at 4:03 PM

Title: Re: Favorite Pure Land Quotes

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Even the good person is born in the Pure Land, so without question is the person who is evil"

(Tannisho, ch. 3)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 19th, 2011 at 7:30 PM

Title: Tibetan Interest in EA Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Why is it that Tibetan Buddhists are hardly ever care about East Asian Buddhism? We can see that in China, Korea and Japan there are newer groups appearing in the name of a Tibetan school just like in Western countries. Even before the 50s there were Chinese and Japanese Buddhists and scholars studying Tibetan Buddhism, some of them becoming Vajra masters (e.g. Yogi Chen, Nan Huaijin). Also large number of Tibetan texts have been translated to Chinese and Japanese. And if we look at the Western situation, those who follow a Tibetan lineage show little interest in understanding East Asian Buddhism, perhaps because they simply identify it with Zen just as they did in Tibet a thousand years ago (and do today without considering time as in Namkhai Norbu's "Dzogchen and Zen" essay). In China the Mantrayana (both EA and Tibetan forms) are considered part of general Buddhism that one may study. On the other hand, it seems that within Tibetan Buddhism the existence of East Asian Buddhism is completely ignored. Why?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 20th, 2011 at 12:01 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Interest in EA Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kyosan,

I don't think they should convert to any EA school, that's not really the question I think. But rather the interest in other forms of Buddhism. For instance I've heard about a plan that they translated the Pali Canon to Tibetan. That's great. However, I don't see Tibetan teachers addressing the issue of other Buddhist schools outside of the Tibetan ones. They are good to discuss Hinayana, Mahayana, Kagyu, Sakya, etc. but no mention of Pure Land, Chan, Tiantai or Shingon. Maybe they haven't heard about them? I doubt that, especially as many know English and even Chinese. To give an example, it is not expected at all from a Nyingma master to become a Gelug or Kagyu lama but definitely he should be somewhat familiar with their teachings, especially when they do some comparisons between the teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 20th, 2011 at 1:37 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Interest in EA Buddhism

Content:

Namdrol said:

Pure Land, Chan, and Tientai are sutrayana.

Shingon is Vajrayana up to yogatantra.

Astus wrote:

Is that a problem? Don't they study sutras? Indeed, the Tibetan understanding of sutrayana (and vajrayana) doesn't match exactly the different EA interpretations, plus the difference in taxonomy. But I don't see why that is a hindrance. Actually, because of the differences it might be worth understanding.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 20th, 2011 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Interest in EA Buddhism

Content:

Will said:

So Chan is Dzogchen lite? or a needed (or helpful) preliminary to DZ?

Astus wrote:

In that text it is said that there is gradual sutrayana, sudden sutrayana (i.e. Zen) and then there is vajrayana. So in that view Zen comes above all other sutrayana but below the lowest mantrayana. Dzogchen is of course the top of all tantra. This is what that text says in brief.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 20th, 2011 at 3:01 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Interest in EA Buddhism

Content:

Kyosan said:

Perhaps the Tibetan teachers don't know much about forms of Buddhism outside of Tibet because they don't need to know. For them to teach the dharma they don't need to know about every form of Buddhism that exists. But, if they have students from other schools inside of Tibet, I think they'll be able to communicate better with them if they are knowledgeable about those schools. They'll have a better idea what experiences the students have had and what terminology they are familiar with.

The belief that Tibetan Buddhism is superior could be a part of it, but it's not necessary always the case.

Astus wrote:

I don't think the reason that they don't need to know it is sufficient to neglect other forms of Buddhism. They learn about many forms of Hindu doctrines including those that are not relevant today any more. They study Vaibhasika and Sautrantika teachings that have no followers today. They study Yogacara and Pramana that are in the end serve only to culminate in Madhyamaka what is also put aside as a theoretical thing compared to the practical Vajrayana. They also learn the lower tantric doctrines to be ultimately overthrown by Anuttarayoga.

Chokyi Nyima Rinpoche explains (<http://ccbs.ntu.edu.tw/FULLTEXT/JR-BH/bh117479.htm>):

"About 100 volumes of what the Buddha, himself, taught, the extensive sutras and the profound tantras, are in print. The commentaries on these, written by the panditas and great masters of the past, also have commentaries written about these commentaries. Some of the commentaries on the sutras, the tantras, and the different sciences and philosophies have innumerable commentaries. In this way, there is a tremendous amount of literature composed by the masters of India and Tibet. It is best if one is able to study all of these and get a complete understanding through learning, personal experience, and practice. The scriptures have great beneficial effects and great blessings. If one is to become a great teacher in a monastic college, one should possess the nine attributes of a noble person or sublime being. For example, one should be skilled in compassion, debate, and elaboration, in study, contemplation, in practice, in wisdom and noble character, and have a pure and excellent attitude. In order to become a great teacher able to expound all these different philosophies, or if one is studying in a Buddhist college, it is indispensable to learn all these things. But, if one is a householder with a family and no time to devote one's entire life to these studies, then a vast theoretical understanding should not be emphasized. On the contrary, the experience through practice is more beneficial. In such a case it is unimportant to go through this vastly detailed learning, but rather more important to condense all the teachings into a very short and precise one. If one stayed alone in a cave and practiced one-pointedly, then all this vast learning would be inconsequential. Therefore, the pointing out instruction of the old lady means that all the teachings have been condensed into just a few essential lines of text which contain the vital point, the secret or key point, or how the mind is. If one can take such an instruction to heart, then it is more beneficial for one's mind than all the scriptures."

So it is possible to restrict one's knowledge to just the essentials. But those who have the time and energy should learn a lot more.

It should also be noted that in the Yuan (1271–1368) and Qing (1644–1911) dynasties the "official" (imperial) religion in China was Tibetan Buddhism (mainly Sakya and Gelug).

Also today the different Buddhist schools come close to each other (esp. in California).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 20th, 2011 at 4:17 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Interest in EA Buddhism

Content:

Pero said:

A lot more doesn't necessarily mean learn EA Buddhism. I don't know why you think it should. Tibetan Buddhism is vast. A life time is perhaps not sufficient to learn everything there is in it (nor is it necessary), so why would people bother learning other forms of Buddhism? It's a different matter if you have some intellectual curiosity or some other special reason but in general I think there is no need. Better to study one thing and study that well.

Astus wrote:

I'm not trying to make a policy here that everybody has to learn EA Buddhism. Indeed, EA Buddhism is such a vast subject that there's hardly anyone who is familiar with all of it even on a medium level. What is raised here as a question is the apparent ignoring of it even by modern teachers. A general, introductory level is not a big thing. Of course, it could mess up some traditional ideas about what sutrayana is.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 20th, 2011 at 6:06 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Interest in EA Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

DN,

There is a split in EA Buddhism. On one hand there are those who focus on practice only and rely heavily on a teacher. And there are the scholars who may or may not be Buddhists, can read in one or more canonical languages and study scriptures. Indeed, I find that while there are many translations from Tibetan works there is little publication of scholarly studies of Tibetan Buddhism unlike in the case of EA Buddhism where translations come in smaller quantity but studies (of good quality) come in pretty high numbers. And while translations of Tsongkhapa or Longchenpa are interesting for students of TB there are only a handful of EAB followers who would read a 500 p. study on the evolution of Guanyin or on early Chan. There is also significant lack of important works of EAB in English, for instance the most popular sutras are available but there are no commentaries; there are almost no translations of Tiantai, Huayan, Sanlun and Faxian treatises that formed the intellectual basis of EAB. Also, you can't really find any Buddhist teacher giving lectures on them in English. On the other hand, TB teachers do lecture on shastras. It is interesting how intellectual power is arranged in different ways in TB and EAB; in this I think Theravada has the middle ground. This is of course the Western situation. However, for instance in Hungary where translations are rare, both TB and Zen followers are focused only on practice and they have little knowledge even of their own traditions.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 20th, 2011 at 6:26 PM

Title: Re: Metaphysical tendency in Mahayanists

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is justified in many cases.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 20th, 2011 at 7:24 PM

Title: Re: Metaphysical tendency in Mahayanists

Content:

Astus wrote:

There's actually a whole movement called https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Critical_Buddhism based on refuting what they call dhatu-vada where dhatu stands for an underlying absolute as the source and basis of all (like the dharmadhatu).

I wouldn't say it's just the less talented students who misunderstand certain teachings. In Zen the mind is regarded as the source of all, in Huayan it is the Dharmadhatu, in Mind Only it is the alayavijnana, etc. Vajrayana also has some similar concepts with Primordial Buddha and nature of mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 20th, 2011 at 7:39 PM

Title: Re: Metaphysical tendency in Mahayanists

Content:

Astus wrote:

Greg,

Surely there are further explanations about those terms that makes them fit for a middle way view. However, if we apply a strict criticism of them we find them refuted as skilful means only because they are apparently reifying concepts that objectify nirvana. The same could be said about Abhidhamma with its nibbana-dhamma/dhatu and they too say it is anatta. On the other hand it is similar to misunderstanding selflessness and emptiness as nihilism.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 20th, 2011 at 7:43 PM

Title: Re: Metaphysical tendency in Mahayanists

Content:

Anders Honore said:

The key is whether they fundamentally hold to this though.

ie, in Zen "all things return to the one, yet do not even hold to the one." Madhymika is elegant in the sense that the structure of its own arguments quite logically undermines itself as being any kind of ultimate or fundamentally true position as well. Other methods of presentation may not have quite the same intellectual elegance, but the same pattern can be found.

Astus wrote:

True. However, Zen is not a unified teaching but a group of different teachings. Some teachers teach this, others teach that. And even when it is said that no nature is true nature it makes no difference when it comes to the concept that all phenomena are manifestations of buddha-mind and that original enlightenment is the true characteristic of mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 20th, 2011 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Metaphysical tendency in Mahayanists

Content:

Astus wrote:

What I mean is that when ultimate reality is talked about as a thing, or more than that even as a living being, it is hardly different from any atmavadin or substantialist view. Buddha-nature/mind is described as original purity (never defiled in sentient beings), as original source (from what all arises and returns to), as the final subject (who experiences everything), as the true doer (what makes a body alive). These are views that appear as universal and personal bases of existence.

By strict criticism I meant analysis based on any classical Buddhist system (abhidharma, madhyamaka, yogacara).

"Long ago, before the split between samsara and nirvana occurred, within the basic spaciousness that is the natural state of everything, exactly as it was since the beginning, glorious Samantabhadra, the self-existing buddha of natural awareness, awakened to true enlightenment in the nature of equality - the very state within which both samsara and nirvana first arise and then again subside. This is why he is known as the primordial buddha, original protector, and as the universal forefather of all samsara and nirvana."

(Wellsprings of the Great Perfection, p. 13)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 20th, 2011 at 11:40 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Interest in EA Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Counter-literature to the common-Zen:

Yongming Yanshou's Conception of Chan in the Zongjing lu: A Special Transmission Within the Scriptures

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 21st, 2011 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Interest in EA Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Meeting of Minds - A Dialogue on Tibetan and Chinese Buddhism

From May 1st through the 3rd, 1998, His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama and Venerable Chan Master Sheng Yen presented In the Spirit of Manjushri: the Wisdom Teachings of Buddhism at the Roseland in New York. Sponsored by Tibet House New York and the Dharma Drum Mountain Buddhist Association, this event drew some 2,500 people from all Buddhist traditions, as well as scholars of medicine, psychology, education, and comparative religion from around the world.

Full Text:

http://www.dharmadrum.org/content/chan_garden/chan_garden2.aspx?sn=38

<http://www.shengyen.org/UpFile/FlashBookENFile/E-1%20Meeting%20of%20Minds.pdf>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 21st, 2011 at 3:53 AM

Title: Re: Metaphysical tendency in Mahayanists

Content:

Astus wrote:

Greg, don't misunderstand me, I'm not attacking tathagatagarbha teachings but actually subscribe to them as a follower of the Buddha-mind School (i.e. Zen). Nevertheless, the concepts of Buddha-mind, original purity, etc. are literally substantialist teachings. Here is something to ponder in that regard (Platform Sutra, ch. 8, tr. by John R. McRae):

[Xingchang] said, "Your disciple has been reading the Nirvana Sutra constantly, but I do not understand its doctrines of permanence and impermanence. I beg Your Reverence, in your compassion, to explain these for me briefly."

The master said, "That which is impermanent is the buddha-nature. That which has permanence is all the good and evil dharmas and the mind of discrimination."

[Xingchang] said, "What Your Reverence has said is quite different from the text of the sutra. ... The sutra teaches that the buddha-nature is permanent, but Your Reverence says it is impermanent. [The sutra says that] the good and evil dharmas and the mind of bodhi are all impermanent, but Your Reverence says they are permanent. This difference has made this student even more confused!”

The master said, “Do you understand? If the buddha-nature were permanent, then no matter what good and evil dharmas one explained, not a single person throughout the entire eon would generate bodhicitta. Therefore, I preach that it is impermanent. This is precisely the Way of true permanence preached by the Buddha. Furthermore, if all the dharmas were impermanent, then everything would have its own self-nature that would experience birth and death, and those true and permanent natures would not be omnipresent. Therefore, I preach that they are permanent, which is precisely the true doctrine of impermanence preached by the Buddha. Because ordinary people and heretics are attached to false permanence and those of the two vehicles consider permanence to be impermanence, together forming the eight confusions, the Buddha in the authoritative teaching of the Nirvana [Sutra] destroyed their prejudices and revealed his explanation of true permanence, the true bliss, the true self, and true purity. You are now relying on the words but going against the meaning. With an annihilationist impermanence and a deterministic permanence, you have misunderstood the Buddha’s last words.”

As for the mystical and esoteric, they might have some value in being cryptic, but I find that the case is rather that integrating a contradictory teaching requires only the right amount of explanation. Like, the sutra says one thing but actually it means another thing. This is creative exegesis.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 21st, 2011 at 4:12 AM

Title: Re: Metaphysical tendency in Mahayanists

Content:

Nangwa said:

Primordial Buddha's, buddha nature, etc. are symbolic and should in no way be interpreted as asserting an identity.

Astus wrote:

Do you take the view that the doctrine of buddha-nature is provisional and a skilful means only similarly to those who follow the so called second turning? Still, there are others who think that tathagatagarbha is a definitive teaching, and those are not just students.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 21st, 2011 at 5:31 AM

Title: Re: Metaphysical tendency in Mahayanists

Content:

Nangwa said:

Not really. I actually think Buddha-nature is emptiness. That it is in no way an entity or phenomena at all.

Astus wrote:

Have you heard that buddha-nature is also "not empty, but is endowed with numberless excellent qualities"? You might also be familiar with the Zhentong teachings where "naturally radiant self-cognizant pristine awareness that is not divided from the expanse is known as ultimate reality". Also from the Nyingmapas, "It is wrong to refer to the mere emptiness, which is nothing at all, as the ultimate truth. Thus, absolute reality is the pristine cognition of the non-dual nature of just what is. It is indicated by the words buddha-body of reality or essential buddha-body which genuinely transcends the phenomena of consciousness." (Dudjom Rinpoche: The Nyingma School of Tibetan Buddhism, p. 185)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 21st, 2011 at 5:12 PM

Title: Re: Metaphysical tendency in Mahayanists

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

I don't see how the presented interpretation of buddha-nature as only a capacity and a skilful teaching against icchantika views takes into account that tathagatagarbha is said to be inherently complete with the buddha qualities and such and from that view came all the teachings about the possibility of sudden realisation of buddhahood. But it is not just the buddha-nature teaching that has this metaphysical-ontological scent but the emptiness teachings too fall into it when everything is reduced to emptiness, dependent origination, conceptual proliferation, illusion. In fact the no-substance becomes the sole substance it keeps putting on everything or putting everything in it. We could also say that emptiness is the atheist position within metaphysics (against monists/monotheists and pluralists/politheists) that is the position of "not one, not many".

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 21st, 2011 at 8:18 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Interest in EA Buddhism

Content:

Unknown said:

But my point is I don't think there are any scorecards of happiness or path to measure beings progress against. If there are beings who aspire to Buddhahood and/or liberation and making good work towards that, well that's wonderful. For where they are in life. If there are people who used this life make just a seed of goodness worth of progress, that is really wonderful too. For where they are in life.

Astus wrote:

"You should speak appropriately about the affairs of your own life, for each matter you encounter constitutes the meaning of your existence, and your actions are without hindrance. The fruit of the bodhisattva way is just thus, born of mind, taking names to be forms. Because of the knowledge of the emptiness of forms, birth is nonbirth. Comprehending this, one acts in the fashion of one's time, just wearing clothes, eating food, constantly upholding the practices of a bodhisattva, and passing time according to circumstances. If one practices in this manner is there anything more to be done?" (Mazu Daoyi in Zen's Chinese Heritage, p. 67)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 22nd, 2011 at 12:21 AM

Title: Tibetan Buddhist View of Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Based on the " <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=53&t=3863> " I thought it's better to get a new topic for the subject. For a start here are a few quotes.

We have already said that the primordial state contains in potentiality the manifestation of enlightenment. The sun, for example, naturally has light and rays, but when the sky is cloudy, we don't see them. The clouds in this case represent our obstacles that are a result of dualism and conditioning: when they are overcome, the state of self-perfection shines with all its manifestations of energy, without ever having been altered or improved. This is the characteristic principle of Dzogchen. Not understanding this may lead one to think that Dzogchen is the same as Zen or Ch'an. At heart, Zen, which without any doubt is a high and direct Buddhist teaching, is based on the principle of emptiness as explained in sutras such as the Prajnaparamita. Even though in this regard, in substance it is no different from Dzogchen, the particularity of Dzogchen lies in the direct introduction to the primordial state not as "pure emptiness" but rather as endowed with all the aspects of the self-perfection of energy. It is through applying these that one attains realization.

(N. Norbu & A. Clemente: The Supreme Source, p. 88)

The Zen tradition is the actual application of shunyata, or emptiness, practice, the heart of the mahayana teaching. Historically, the zen method is based on dialectical principles - you engage in continual dialogues with yourself, asking questions constantly. By doing that, in the end you begin to discover that questions don't apply anymore in relationship to the answer. That is a way of using up dualistic mind, based on the logic of Nagarjuna. The interesting point is that the practice of traditional Indian logic used by Hindu and Buddhist scholars is turned into experiential logic rather than just ordinary debate or intellectual argument. Logic becomes experiential.

...

These two practices are not polarities. You have to go through Zen practice before you get to mahamudra practice, because if you don't realize that asking questions is the way to learn something, that the questioning process is a learning process, then the whole idea of study becomes distorted. So one must learn to see that trying to struggle for some achievement or goal is useless; you have to start from the Zen or mahayana tradition. And after that, you realize that asking questions is not the only way, but being a fool is the only way. If you see the foolishness of asking questions, then you begin to learn something. Foolishness begins to become wisdom. At that point, you transform yourself into another dimension, a completely other dimension. You thought you had achieved a sudden glimpse of nonduality, but that nonduality also contains relationship. You still need to relate yourself to that sudden glimpse of beyond question. That's when you begin to become mahamudra experience. In other words, the Zen tradition seems to be based on the shunyata principle, which is a kind of emptiness and openness, absence of duality. The mahamudra experience is a way of wiping out the consciousness of the absence: you begin to develop clear perceptions beyond being conscious of the absence. ,, I suppose you could say that Zen and mahamudra are complementary to one another. Without the one, the other couldn't exist.

(The Collected Works of Chögyam Trungpa, vol. 6, p. 43, 44)

You see, an interesting point is that once you begin to get into big mind - as the Yogacharins or Zen call it, the BIG mind [laughter] - it extends your vision. But then, once you begin to get into VAST mind, even BIG mind is so small.
(ibid., p. 471)

Dzogchen teaches that all we have to do to become enlightened is to recognize and rest in this natural state of mind. In Zen they call this original mind. This is raw, naked awareness, not something we've learned or fabricated. This is the Buddha within - the perfect presence that we can all rely on. Waking up to this natural mind, this Buddha-nature, is what meditation is all about.
(Surya Das: Awakening the Buddha Within, p. 316)

The Zen practice of shikantaza, the Tibetan practices of mahamudra and dzogchen, and the Theravadan practice of full mindfulness of breathing are all examples of the practice of presence.
(Ken McLeod: Wake Up Your Life, p. 419)

Many people are more accustomed to doing practice in the Sutra style, and when they speak of meditation, for example, they always consider it to be sitting with crossed legs and closed eyes. In the Sutra teachings, there are gradual and nongradual methods. The origins of latter methods are to be found in the history of all the present day schools of Zen.

Zen methods are nowadays very developed; and since many methods from different sources have been integrated with them, they no longer exist exactly as they did in ancient times. Nevertheless, even if they have been altered over time, they are still based on the Sutra teachings. This is why, in Zen, it is believed that the main point of practice is to get into the state of shunyata, or voidness, and to remain in it. That is what meditation is considered to be in Zen.

In any kind of Sutra teaching, meditation involves sitting silently in a quiet place. Many people are attached to that form of practice, and some people have an aversion to Tantrism because they feel that it requires too many things to recite and construct, and the use of many ritual instruments for doing rites and pujas and so on. Such people prefer to simply meditate in silence.

(Namkhai Norbu: Dzogchen Teachings, p. 25)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 22nd, 2011 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Interest in EA Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

To avoid off topic posts: <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=69&t=3886>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 22nd, 2011 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Buddhist View of Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Enochian, it is the Tibetan view of Zen, not How Zen is not Vajrayana (as it is obviously not Tantra). Should have emphasised that I guess.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 22nd, 2011 at 4:31 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Buddhist View of Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

It seems to me, as it appears in the Namkhai Norbu and Chögyam Trungpa quotes, that they take Zen to be only about emptiness and based on prajnaparamita. It is actually a strange interpretation to me since one of the most fundamental tenets of Zen is "mind is Buddha" and it is actually based on tathagatagarbha teachings. Why they still think that Zen is only about emptiness is a mystery to me.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 22nd, 2011 at 5:23 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Buddhist View of Zen

Content:

Namdrol said:

It is an interpretation based on Chan as it was presented to Tibetans by a number of Chinese masters of the Northern school. There are a few Chan texts authored by Tibetans in Dunhuang corpus. One of them is by Trisong De'utsan.

Astus wrote:

And you think that while both Trungpa and ChNN are modern teachers who can actually read and hear of Zen, not to mention knowing Zen teachers, they still base their interpretation on 1000-year-old Tibetan texts? In the Namkhai Norbu quote he actually says that there were "developments" in Zen since then so at least he must be aware on some level that there's more to it than what they have in Tibetan from ancient times. On the other hand, Western teachers of the TB tradition seem to be more sympathetic to Zen, like Surya Das who regularly makes references to it in his books.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 23rd, 2011 at 5:11 AM

Title: Re: Good Translation of Saddharma-Lankavatara-Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Not in English. Strangely enough nobody yet tried to translate it again while we have half a dozen Lotus Sutra. So much for content vs. popularity.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 23rd, 2011 at 8:06 PM

Title: Nonmental Indestructible Element

Content:

Astus wrote:

In "Ocean of Reasoning" (p. 355) Tsongkhapa says in the commentary to MMK 17:14,

"Although all virtuous and nonvirtuous actions cease immediately upon their completion, they are not without effects, because when the karma arises, a nonmental compound called an indestructible element associated with karma arises in the continuum of the agent like a promissory note."

What is this nonmental element associated with karma? It sounds like an abhidharmic teaching, however, from the text it appears to me that Tsongkhapa actually accepts the existence of such an element. Could anyone explain please?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 24th, 2011 at 1:18 AM

Title: Re: Nonmental Indestructible Element

Content:

Astus wrote:

I might be mistaken here but it wasn't Nagarjuna who mentioned that element but Tsongkhapa. Also, it seems quite unnecessary to explain the efficacy of karma. Third, it is not explained in the text itself nor does it sound really convincing how such an element exists.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 24th, 2011 at 3:58 AM

Title: Re: Nonmental Indestructible Element

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thanks Namdrol, you're of great help. Also explains why simply avipraṇāśa is translated in Chinese as 不失法 (avipraṇāśa-dharma).

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 24th, 2011 at 7:42 AM

Title: Reasons for Rebirth

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here is the best straightforward explanation of rebirth I've met so far. From the book The Center of the Sunlit Sky: Madhyamaka in the Kagyü Tradition by Karl Brunnhölzl, p. 183-185.

"Result reasons are used to establish the functioning of cause and result in general. This refers not only to outer or material causes but, more important, to the inner level of causality, which is the operation of karmic causes and results. Karma means that all our physical, verbal, and mental actions or impulses are causes that have effects in the same way any other causes do. In Buddhism, this principle of causality is also employed to establish the continuity of former and later lifetimes. In any case, result reasons infer prior material or mental causes from the observation of certain material or mental conditioned phenomena in the present that are the results of these causes. Basically, Buddhism says that the functioning of cause and effect means both that something cannot come from nothing and that something cannot become nothing. Otherwise, anything could randomly happen at any time or nothing would ever happen. Moreover, without cause and effect, all intentional actions, such as farming to produce the result of a harvest, would be completely unpredictable or pointless. Therefore, in Buddhism, it is not really a question of just believing or not believing in the law of karma or former and later lifetimes. Rather, if we generally accept the process of cause and effect, we must acknowledge that it does not make sense to arbitrarily exclude some causal phenomena—that is, certain or all of our physical, verbal, and mental actions—from this general principle. This holds true even if we do not see an immediate result of these actions and hope to have avoided their consequences. In fact, we generally do experience the effects of our impulses, emotions, and thoughts, since our physical and verbal actions are constantly driven by them. When we plan a project or do our work, we do not think at all that our mental activities have no results; we take it for granted that our thoughts and imagination will result in visible actions and products. Also, we know very well the strong and possibly devastating effects of certain mental impulses, such as falling in love or declaring war. That it might take a long time for the effect of some action to ripen cannot be a basis for claiming that this action has no effect. Otherwise, it would equally follow that the movements of the original continents on earth are not the causes for the location and shape of the present continents, since the beings at that time did not experience the effect at present, nor do we at present observe these causes.

It would be highly inconsistent to say that some things or experiences have causes while others do not. This would also imply that there are some causes that have results and others that have no results. How could we reasonably define and distinguish between such phenomena? (In addition, for those phenomena that do not have causes, all the above absurd consequences would apply.) Whenever someone discovers the cause of something that was previously considered a random event—as has happened and continues to happen in science—the entire notion of causelessness or randomness is fundamentally questioned. Moreover, how could uncaused phenomena interact with phenomena that do have causes? If they interacted in a purely random way, even phenomena within an established causal continuum would become random phenomena. And if they interacted in a way that is determined by causes, random phenomena would enter the realm of causality. If there were, however, two entirely separate realms of phenomena, they could not interact at all.

As for the classical proof for the existence of past and future lives, we must first realize that if we accept the principle of causality as functioning in an all-encompassing way, then there have to be infinite chains of specific causes and results. For example, a tree that we see now has a beginningless “case history” of causes and conditions, each of which again entails its own causes and conditions. Likewise, according to Buddhism, the present moment of our mind does not come out of nowhere but arises from the immediately preceding moment of this mind. In other words, mind does not depend on anything other than mind as its specific substantial cause.⁴⁵⁵ By extending this backward and ahead in time, we naturally arrive at a mental continuum without beginning or end, which manifests as what is called the different lifetimes of cyclic existence. To arbitrarily postulate any starting point or a total extinction of this continuum—such as the beginning or the end of this life—amounts to nothing more than saying that something can come from nothing or something can become nothing. Yet this openly contradicts the notion of cause and result as such in the first place. Further indications that are adduced for the existence of other lifetimes include facts such as newborn mammals immediately knowing without learning where and how to drink milk from their mothers.⁴⁵⁶ Furthermore, what would account for the immense range of differences just among human beings even at birth, such as being born healthy or with a severe disease, being intelligent or dumb, being born rich or in a slum, in a loving family or a violent one? How else could one explain that some people “have success” or get rich almost without any effort and others always “have bad luck” or stay poor even if they work hard? Why is it that some children can play complex pieces of classical music at an early age without training or excel at sports, while others are never able to do nearly as well even with a lot of training? Even conventionally, none of these facts can be sufficiently explained by causes that can be found in this present life, but this usually just leads to subsuming them under rubrics such as “fortune,” “fate,” or “talent.” The most fashionable category these days seems to be that “it’s all in the genes.” This is not the place to discuss this issue in detail, but if we just consider how little the genetic code of human beings differs from that of chimpanzees and some primitive worms—by just 1 percent and about 30 percent respectively— it is quite amazing to assume that the genes alone can serve as an explanation for all the differences between humans and other beings. To be sure, these differences do not consist of only physical features, but include the entire range of the human mind and its expressions, such as culture, science, philosophy, and religion, not to mention all the mental and behavioral diversity of human beings themselves, who have even less genetic variance from one another.”

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, April 24th, 2011 at 5:30 PM

Title: Re: Reasons for Rebirth

Content:

Astus wrote:

If anyone knows something better I'm really open to it. If possible please copy it here.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 25th, 2011 at 3:23 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Rebirth

Content:

Astus wrote:

Namdrol,

You say that in Vajrayana they add a third - not known before component, vayu, what makes a dualist view monist? I'm not sure if monism is really a better concept than dualism when both are pretty much substantialist. Also, if dharmas are understood not as ultimate realities but provisional categories of multifunctions within the realm of experience there is neither dualism nor monism.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 25th, 2011 at 3:54 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Rebirth

Content:

Namdrol said:

Vāyu is the material element of air (part of the rūpaskandha). Specifically, the mind and the prana vāyu are merged and inseparable.

In sutrayāna mind and matter are different substances.

Astus wrote:

If it is just the wind element that is material, does Vajrayana take mind to be immaterial or material? If it is immaterial the same problem stands that you said about sutrayana. If it is material, well, then it is an interesting form of materialism.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 25th, 2011 at 5:39 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Rebirth

Content:

Astus wrote:

I find the view I've already mentioned briefly above that if we understand dharmas as instances of experience without trying to imagine behind them any self, self-nature or substance, the whole issue of mind-body is solved. In fact, the question of the sameness and difference of body and mind is among the unanswered questions, that were actually answered by the Buddha (SN 44.7-8) by saying that only those have such concepts who think of the six entrances and five aggregates as self or pertaining to a self.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 25th, 2011 at 3:17 PM

Title: Re: Good Translation of Saddharma-Lankavatara-Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Why would the 4 fascicle translation be better for being translated when it is not even a good Chinese translation? Just because it's supposed to be the text of a school that has almost zero relevance to Zen? The so called Lankavatara School was attached "posthumously" to the East Mountain School ("northern school") lineage. Also it was Gunabhadra who was first attributed with the position of the number one patriarch and Bodhidharma came only after him. Nevertheless, if there were translations of all the different editions it would be useful.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 25th, 2011 at 7:12 PM

Title: Throw Out Buddhist Philosophy / Phenomenology / Psychology

Content:

LastLegend said:

Throw away philosophical jibberish and your problem will be solved.

Astus wrote:

That is the "throw away philosophy" philosophy. Doesn't lead far, or anywhere for that matter.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 25th, 2011 at 8:02 PM

Title: Buddhist Origin of Easter

Content:

Astus wrote:

We know that "once upon a time when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as a young hare and lived in a wood." (<http://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/j3/j3017.htm>) He was then a very charitable bunny who offered even his own body. What is not mentioned then is that Sakka gave the hare some special powers by putting his image on the moon. This power the rabbit attained was a magical way of giving gifts. Those gifts materialised in the grass everywhere in the world in the form of colourful eggs. These egg-like presents are what one can still see on paintings like this one, right in front of the Buddha:

This is also the reason for the Easter Bunny to lay eggs, an ancient tale preserving the story of a former life of Shakyamuni. Such is the Buddhist origin of Easter.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 25th, 2011 at 8:32 PM

Title: Belief in Reincarnation Strongest in Hungary

Content:

Unknown said:

The belief in reincarnation was strongest in Hungary.

Of people who believed in reincarnation 13 percent were from Hungary, while Swedes made up the biggest proportion of people who said they don't know what happens after death. South Korea and Spain had the highest percentage of people who thought "you simply cease to exist."

Astus wrote:

Source: <http://in.reuters.com/article/2011/04/25/us-beliefs-poll-idINTRE73O24K20110425>

Countries that participated in the poll: Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, China, France, Germany, Great Britain, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Italy, Japan, Mexico, Poland, Russia, Saudi Arabia, South Africa, South Korea, Spain, Sweden and the United States

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 26th, 2011 at 3:16 AM

Title: Re: Good Translation of Saddharma-Lankavatara-Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Hongren's "Treatise on the Supreme Vehicle" (T48n2011) doesn't mention the Lankavatara Sutra at all, Daoxin's "The Fundamental Expedient Teachings for Calming the Mind Which Attains Enlightenment" (in T85n2837, i.e. Records of the Teachers and Students of the Lanka) only mentions the sutra once but doesn't quote from it (unlike from other scriptures), the complete Record of Lanka teachers, including preface, quotes the sutra 5x (compared to: Avatamsaka 8x, Lotus 5x, Vimalakirti 4x, Nirvana 3x, Dharmapada 2x) and refers to it 9x. In the Bodhidharma Anthology's translation part the Lankavatara Sutra is quoted only once. McRae explains it this way,

"Note, for example, the shift from Lankavatara Sutra to Diamond Sutra implied in the account (i.e., in the cancellation of the painting commission and Hongren's teaching to Huineng), which parallels the two texts' changes in popularity over the course of the eighth century. The position of the Lankavatara within Chan was always ambiguous, since the text was more revered in the abstract than actually studied. However, it was generally associated with "Northern school" teachers. Shenhui was one of the first monks of his day, but by no means the only one, to favor the Diamond, which was becoming more widely popular throughout the Chinese tradition at the time. Hence, in the Platform Sutra the two texts roughly symbolize the Northern and Southern schools." (Seeing Through Zen, p. 62)

Also, if you take the Records of Lanka Teachers, it lists Gunabhadra as the first and Bodhidharma as the second patriarch and Shenxiu is the sixth patriarch while Huineng is just a mediocre student of Hongren (among those who are "fit to be people's teachers, but will only be local figures"). It's just another thing that Daoxuan's story of Huike in his collection of biographies of eminent monks (T50n2060), where he is a Lankavatara teacher just as his students, has little connection to the later Zen tradition. Thus it is understood that it was Faru and other disciples in the "northern school" who made the connection between Bodhidharma and Huineng to Daoxin and Hongren. It also explains the lack of any reliable information on Sengcan.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 26th, 2011 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: Tendai and Pretend-ai

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is simply using a known name to propagete one's goods. Trade mark works in commerce but not in religion. It reminds me somewhat of off- and on-mountain Tiantai, although that involved monks. Just think about the many uses of Buddha, Buddhism, Zen and Tantra. Perhaps it means Tendai is gaining some popularity.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 26th, 2011 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: Tendai and Pretend-ai

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is not difficult either to sell something as Buddhism, Zen or Tantra. Why so much worry about some Tendai imitators? Have you tried to tell them they should include some actual Tendai teachings too?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 27th, 2011 at 12:01 AM

Title: Re: Tendai and Pretend-ai

Content:

Seishin said:

All we can do is practice and practice well. Our actions should speak louder than our words.

Astus wrote:

From Zen history it appears to me that it is the words that matter. Nobody cares if you are a buddha lost in the mountains and you'll be soon forgotten by the people and history. So a proper tactic would be to set up quality Tendai places, publish books and spread the Dharma.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 27th, 2011 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: Tendai and Pretend-ai

Content:

Unknown said:

Rather than trying to peddle bits of Dharma like so many commodities, Tendai-shu has focused on building institutions, sanghas, leaders. It's slow and difficult work. It's also expensive.

Astus wrote:

What about translations and other publications? There isn't much of them. Not even some comprehensive introductory book, perhaps besides Numata's edition of the "Collected Teachings of the Tendai Lotus School". Online sources are minimal too. Couldn't by a DVD even if I wanted to.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 27th, 2011 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: Gardening and non-killing

Content:

Astus wrote:

The monks would have had nothing to eat if all the many lay people stopped cultivating the fields. To paraphrase an advice from Mazu Daoyi, if you work in the garden you can reap the fruits of your work, if you avoid killing even small insects you reap your good karma.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 28th, 2011 at 9:41 PM

Title: Meditation for Beginners by Nyogen Senzaki

Content:

Astus wrote:

Nyogen Senzaki (Like a Dream, Like a Fantasy, p. 73-74)

A Lecture on Meditation: For Beginners

"Quietness is an element in meditation, but merely striving to attain quietness leads nowhere. It is like putting a paper bag over a cat's head: It will walk backward but will never be able to advance. A cranky old man who scolds children for making noise violates with his loud voice the very quietness he upholds. The same thing happens when one forces oneself to enter quietness. It is only when one forgets both the world of noise and the realm of quietness that one is able to enter into the kingdom of true silence. This, however is not what we are gathered here for, either. Watching movies or resting in the park is just as good as sitting in a zendo, if what you want is quietness. Strangers to a zendo usually are unable to see anything more than its atmosphere of quietness; the vastness lying beyond can only be detected by those who know what real

Zen practice is all about.

You should never for a moment think that you are dwelling in quietness. You are students of nonthinking—what right have you to tarry in tranquillity! Just march on bravely, regulating your breath or working on your kōan. Zen meditation is the most simple method in the world for mind-training. Meditation is complicated and difficult only when one becomes more interested in one's own opinions and ideas than in disentangling oneself from all traces of dualistic thinking. As Zen Master Nanin once said: "Unless you empty your teacup, I cannot fill it."

In the beginning, you aim to empty your mind and try to drive all thoughts away. But aiming and trying are also thoughts! So aiming and trying keep you from your goal, of becoming emptiness itself. When you think you are in emptiness, you are not in emptiness. When you think you have discovered your Buddha-nature, you are far away from it. When no thought arises, there is no need to drive thoughts away. When nothing is born, nothing dies. When nothing is good, nothing is bad. What you never had, you will never miss. What you do not see does not disappear. What cannot increase cannot decrease. This is true emptiness. This is samādhi. "When you enter into this condition, then you are walking in the Palace of Realization. Never to think—even for a moment—that you are enlightened: This is the ideal of Zen meditation."

Some points to ponder about this text:

You don't work on attaining quietness but you have to regulate your breath.

Students of nonthinking has to work bravely on their koans.

No aiming, no trying - a student has to cultivate zazen to attain it.

When there is no thought they don't have to be driven away, but if there are thoughts of emptiness and buddha-nature it is bad.

True emptiness is that non-existent things are non-existent.

If you don't think you're enlightened you've attained Zen meditation.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 28th, 2011 at 10:11 PM

Title: Brain Surgery in Ancient Tibet

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://www.buddhistchannel.tv/index.php?id=7,10079,0,0,1,0>

"Brain surgery was practiced by doctors at least 2,900 years ago, a specialist on Tibetan culture and literature said Wednesday after four decades of research on the Tibetan Tripitaka, an ancient encyclopedia."

Does anyone have some background information about the reliability of this claim?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 29th, 2011 at 6:59 AM

Title: Re: Tendai and Pretend-ai

Content:

Unknown said:

My position is that persons who are interested in practicing Buddhism of any form will do well to avoid the products Mr Lepine is marketing, and instead to find an authentic teacher in a normal, boring lineage instead of this too-good-to-be-true appeal to magic in your mailbox (and now by skype, of course).

Astus wrote:

The four empowerments imparts the complete teaching and you realise the four bodies of buddha, through pointing out transmission you awake to the true nature of mind, no guru no buddhahood, etc. When Tantra did this in India it was no less dubious for monks in orthodox monasteries than it is today for you. Authenticity comes with sustained popularity.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 29th, 2011 at 6:10 PM

Title: Re: Tendai and Pretend-ai

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is not just Vajrayana that gains authenticity from sustained popularity but every tradition. Usually it also involves some meddling with history.

He may call himself this and that, it is simply imitating others in use of special titles. And by others it is not necessarily meant Buddhist clergy but also Christian, like the term bishop. It is the expectation that a teacher himself has to bear special features (starting with the 32+80 marks) and other kinds of legitimating stuff. That's why bodhisattvas should care about the Dharma and not the person. It's emphasised exactly because the majority cares a lot more about who is teaching instead of what he's teaching. It was clearly wise on the part of the Buddha to establish a community instead of a hierarchy. But then we see how Buddhism got into establishing positions and titles.

The quality of any teaching lies in its content, I think we're very much in agreement on this. They might call it Tendai, Zen or whatever, until it is Saddharma it carries little significance. The Pretendai people you've introduced has hardly anything to show up as Buddhism, so they're agents of Mara.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 30th, 2011 at 12:54 AM

Title: Re: Meditation for Beginners by Nyogen Senzaki

Content:

Astus wrote:

Not much interest in discussing Zen, is there, DN?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 30th, 2011 at 3:13 AM

Title: Re: Meditation for Beginners by Nyogen Senzaki

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jikan,

Look at this text quoted in the original post. Read it like any normal English text and add your knowledge of Buddhism. What can you make of it then? Zen teaching is not more difficult than any other Buddhist doctrine. Its way of expressing itself, yes, that can get pretty messed up.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 30th, 2011 at 7:30 AM

Title: Re: Meditation for Beginners by Nyogen Senzaki

Content:

Astus wrote:

I hear you, DN. Scholars believe it is one of the long lasting effects of <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Shenhui> 's (684?-758?) arguments against gradualist teachings that later teachers adopted a <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Subitism> rhetoric. Putting aside the whole Zen history, it is indeed the lack of common Mahayana knowledge that is missed by the Western non-Buddhist lay audience. On the other hand, just as Senzaki says, "Zen meditation is the most simple method in the world for mind-training". It's just that while TNH can use a straightforward everyday language in teaching mindfulness for some reason most of the Zen teachers are stuck with technical lingo. I wonder when the Western Zen community will realise that one of the main attractions of Zen in China was its ordinary language (later that has changed of course).

As for the quality and moral integrity of Japanese Zen I'm sure there are a couple of people who know more about it than me to compose proper critiques. The style of the quoted instruction for beginners obviously suffers from negligent wording that lacks consideration of its audience. On the other hand, if we care to make an interpretation of it, it's in line with common teachings of meditation similar to Dogen's (Fukan)Zazengi, what is also full of old platitudes. What I mean is that there is some level of validity in it and does represent Zen, but not in an original and user friendly manner.

If you consider those points I've mentioned after the quote they show how the text appears to be radical while it in fact advises ordinary practice of samatha (breath meditation) and vipasyana (koan introspection).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 2nd, 2011 at 5:03 AM

Title: Re: Meditation for Beginners by Nyogen Senzaki

Content:

Astus wrote:

"A firm understanding of the Buddhist teachings is assumed prior to entry to a sodo."

I seriously doubt people who go to any Western Zen group have studied Buddhism to the point they can understand clearly what the Awakening Mahayana Faith, as a primary text of East Asian Buddhism, talks about. On the other hand, in Japan monks first have to study Buddhism at a university and then they can go to practice meditation. Such systematic education for monks also exists in Korea and Taiwan too. Of course, after years of studying texts and passing exams it is normal for a meditation instructor to go straight to the point.

But we do get clear instruction on it, and it is corrected and adjusted at the regular interviews because in traditional Zen the teacher only has to look at you to know what your problem is.

Certainly there is difference between a short text and regular training under a teacher. On the other hand, if one relies solely on a single person who he believes to be a living buddha, that is very much like blind faith. Being educated has the same advantages in Buddhism as in any other areas of life. Exchanging knowledge for relying on a person is like illiterate people asking for a bank loan.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 2nd, 2011 at 6:35 AM

Title: Re: The real truth behind Zen masters' self-mutilation?

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://myweb.fsu.edu/jyu2/pdf/Bodies%20of%20Sanctity1-JY.pdf> (PDF)

Also there's a short topic on similar subject

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=39&t=174>.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 2nd, 2011 at 5:39 PM

Title: Re: Meditation for Beginners by Nyogen Senzaki

Content:

James418 said:

Hello Astus, Zen stresses the limits of intellectual thought. Knowledge of the basics of Buddhism is necessary, but in the Zen tradition the sixth patriarch was illiterate.

The Buddha likened his teaching to a raft. Once you reach the other shore, it should be put down, not carried around. This is because its not ultimate truth. It is not ultimate truth because it is intellectual knowledge - and the intellect is a useful tool, but is limited and deals in opposites - yes, no, this, that. This is the problem of the beginner, and that is why the zen teacher mentions the opposites in the text. The fact that you take the text and start analysing them further, breaking them down, and further analysing them is probably not what he intended lol

The intellect is a useful tool - as you say - but there are a few other tools in the tool box that can only be developed when the discriminating intellect is cut off, and that is why Zen can appear baffling at times.

Astus wrote:

Yes, in the Platform Sutra we are told that Huineng was illiterate. Those who made up the story were obviously literate people, not to mention that the Platform Sutra itself warns people in chapter 10: "You must not revile the sutras, which is a transgression immeasurable." Also, considering that to become a monk one first had to pass examinations (it was imperial law for quite a few centuries), it was practically impossible for any monk to be totally unfamiliar with writing and some common Buddhist texts. Plus Zen was elite Buddhism in China and East Asia (few Westerners realise that those who have received dharma transmission and became recognised Zen teachers were abbots of monasteries, that's why the so called Zen monastic rules of Baizhang talk a lot about the abbot but there's little mention of any Zen master per se) that thrived in literary production, you just have to check out the number of Zen related texts in the Buddhist canon that exceeds the works of any other Buddhist school.

The Buddha has certainly told the simile of the raft. It means that once you're on the other shore you don't need the vehicle. However, it is nonsense to talk about letting go of the raft before we even have one. Here is a good example of completely misunderstanding both Zen and the simile.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 2nd, 2011 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: Bothering things about Vajrayana and Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

A short explanation for using conditioned phenomena to reach the unconditioned:

"It is like making a fire with two sticks. The fire blazes and the wood is consumed; the ashes fly away and the smoke vanishes. Using illusion to remedy illusion is exactly like this."

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/sutra_of_perfect_enlightenment.html, ch. 2)

And commentary by Kihwa,

"That which is cured is like original wood, it represents the personality that is transformed. The ability to cure is like the ignition of the wood, it represents the remedy that is able to transform. The "remedy" is actually "compassion and wisdom." The fire is the enlightenment that is actualized, this is "actualized enlightenment." The emergence of actualized enlightenment depends on compassion and wisdom. The arousal of compassion and wisdom depends on being sensitive to the actual circumstances of individual people. That which the actual circumstances of individual people follow is the karma of all sentient beings. That which all sentient beings follow depends upon Great Enlightenment. Apart from Great Enlightenment there are no sentient beings; apart from sentient beings there is no application to the actual circumstances of individual people; apart from application to the actual circumstances of individual people there is neither compassion nor wisdom; and apart from compassion and wisdom there is no actualized enlightenment."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 3rd, 2011 at 5:41 PM

Title: Re: God in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

From the Jonang Foundation website:

"Since their existence cannot be established externally or separately,
The realization is that creators such as Brahmā and other such creator gods do not exist."

(http://www.jonangfoundation.org/pdf/jf_rangjung_1.pdf)

A summary of Buddhist refutations of theist ideas:

<http://ccbs.ntu.edu.tw/FULLTEXT/JR-PHIL/jackson.htm>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 3rd, 2011 at 7:51 PM

Title: Re: Emptiness within Yogacara...

Content:

Astus wrote:

In Yogacara, according to the Mahayanasamgraha and others, the first step is realising that all phenomena are only consciousness and the next step is realising that "only consciousness" is illusion too. Chan is not strictly bound by tathagatagarbha teachings as it is clearly presented by the Niutou school (disappeared long ago) that based itself purely on madhyamaka doctrines. Also, "seeing nature" doesn't mean finding something existent or non-existent. Here are two cases from the Platform Sutra:

On Shenhui (ch. 8)

One day the Master addressed the assembly as follows: "I have a thing. It has no head or tail, no name or label, no back or front. Do you all know what it is?"

Shen Hui stepped forward and said, "It is the root source of all Buddhas, Shen Hui's Buddha nature!"

The Master said, "I just told you that it had no name or label, and you immediately call it the root-source of all Buddhas. Go and build a thatched hut over your head! You're nothing but a follower who pursues knowledge and interpretation."

On Huai Jang (ch. 7)

Dhyana Master Huai Jang was the son of the Tu family in Chin Chou. He first visited National Master An of Sung Mountain, who told him to go to Ts'ao Hsi to pay homage. When he arrived, he bowed, and the Master asked him, "What has come?"

He replied, "Sung Shan."

The Master said, "What thing is it and how does it come?"

He replied, "To say that it is like a thing is to miss the point."

The Master said, "Then can there still be that which is cultivated and certified?"

He replied, "Cultivation and certification are not absent, but there can be no defilement."

The Master said, "It is just the lack of defilement of which all Buddhas are mindful and protective. You are like that, and I am like that, too."

And two koans:

Mazu's story

A monk asked: "Why do you teach that Mind is no other than Buddha?"

"In order to make a child stop its crying."

"When the crying is stopped, what would you say?"

"Neither Mind nor Buddha."

"What teaching would you give to him who is not in these two groups?"

"I will say, 'It is not a something.'"

"If you unexpectedly interview a person who is in it what would you do?" finally, asked the monk.

"I will let him realize the great Tao."

Nanquan's (Nansen) story:

A monk asked Nansen, "Is there any Dharma that has not been preached to the people?"

Nansen answered, "There is."

"What is the truth that has not been taught?" asked the monk.

Nansen said, "It is not mind; it is not Buddha; it is not things."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 3rd, 2011 at 9:14 PM

Title: Re: God in Buddhism

Content:

Keshin said:

Once again: I don't believe in a creator god.

I can't believe I keep having to say this.

Astus wrote:

I had actually read your post about it before I posted that quote. The Buddhist point is that there can't be any ultimate being/substratum. It is a common mistake to take alayavijnana/tathagatagarbha/dharmadhatu as something behind/beyond the world as the origin of everything. Also, if "God" (with a capital) is not a creator and/or a ruler the word itself has practically no meaning.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 3rd, 2011 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: God in Buddhism

Content:

Unknown said:

(God is in all and beyond all) and transpersonal (does not intervene and make prophets and stuff, but is not an unfeeling, personality-less, non-sapient entity)

Regarding Soul: Effectively, it's our "True Selves", free some skandhic-ness

Astus wrote:

Let's clarify here then. The five skandhas are all there is and you can't have a self/soul/X beyond them. The difference between samsara and nirvana in Buddhism relies on whether one is attached to the skandhas or not. Thus any entity, thing or being outside (or inside, for that matter) the skandhas is practically impossible. Thus there is no self/soul in Buddhism, neither an absolute God.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 3rd, 2011 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: God in Buddhism

Content:

Keshin said:

I disagree; the story of the turtle and the fish comes to mind.

Astus wrote:

Could you elaborate?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 3rd, 2011 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: God in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

I see. Well, the Buddha was clear about the nature of skandhas and dhatus. Nagarjuna also have some nice arguments against a soul outside the skandhas, if you're interested. It is all right to do some speculations about far away lands and never seen entities, however, if the point is to establish it as something acceptable to Buddhism, it's better supported by the teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 4th, 2011 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: God in Buddhism

Content:

Keshin said:

That doesn't make sense to me.

Astus wrote:

Here are some useful teachings by Thrangu Rinpoche:

"Thus we can conclude from the foregoing analysis that there is no way for there to be any particular single real nature or essence to anything. And if there is no single real nature, there also could not be any multiple real nature, because multiplicity is based on single units. If there is no single unit, there can be no multiplicity. These being the only possible modes that a real nature or quality might exist, we can see from this one method of examination that there is no self in any appearance, no self in any dharma, no essential nature to anything at all."

<http://www.rinpoche.com/teachings/madhyamaka.htm>

<http://www.rinpoche.com/teachings/buddhanature.htm>

<http://www.rinpoche.com/teachings/Open%20Door%20to%20Emptiness/opendoor1.htm>,

<http://www.rinpoche.com/teachings/Open%20Door%20to%20Emptiness/opendoor2.htm>,

<http://www.rinpoche.com/teachings/Open%20Door%20to%20Emptiness/opendoor3.htm>,

<http://www.rinpoche.com/teachings/Open%20Door%20to%20Emptiness/opendoor4.htm>

http://archive.thebuddhadharma.com/issues/2003/winter/thrangu_rinpoche.html

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 4th, 2011 at 2:33 AM

Title: Re: God in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Keshin,

You have certain views you cherish and you label those views to be in accordance with the Buddhadharma. It may not have occurred to you before that Buddhism, regardless of what school we're talking about, has some fundamental tenets that form the very basis of what can be called the teaching of the Buddha. The question is whether you prefer your own views above the Dharma or the other way around. And if it happens you take the Buddhadharma above your own current views, that is you take refuge in the Triple Jewel and not something else, you put your faith in the Dharma at least on the level to be open toward it and be ready to learn and contemplate it. Now I don't mean that you should just accept whatever people here tell you. What I'm saying is that you should study the teachings. Studying the teachings means that you look into the words of the Buddha, that is the sutras, and may also read the explanations of teachers who are widely accepted within the Buddhist community as reliable. For instance, if you prefer Dzogchen, you should first learn about the general doctrines present in Tibetan Buddhism, and it doesn't even need any special transmission.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 4th, 2011 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Interest in EA Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

"The attitudes of the Tibetan Lamas from the eleventh century until today toward Chan have been, by and large, exceedingly negative, except for certain Nyingmapas like Longchenpa and Urgyan Lingpa. The Tibetan Lamas are content with their Indian-derived traditions as representing the authentic corpus of the Buddha's teachings. They have had absolutely no interest in the post-eighth-century developments of Buddhism in China, including Chan, and have had little or no contact personally with the Chinese teachers of Chan and the Japanese teachers of Zen. ... This Olympian disinterest, if not disdain, for non-Tibetan manifestations of Buddhism clearly represents a feeling on the part of Tibetans of their cultural superiority more than anything else. "

(John Myrdhin Reynolds: The Golden Letters, p. 223)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 4th, 2011 at 6:51 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Interest in EA Buddhism

Content:

remm said:

One thing I took into consideration was the Samye debate between Kamalaśīla and Héshang Móhēyǎn. The fact that Móhēyǎn lost and ultimately "suicided" showed how inferior the Northern Ch`an school was compared to the lineage of Indian Buddhism. I mean, this could be a major reason as to why Tibet seems to have disinterest in Buddhism in China.

Astus wrote:

"I won't go into the question of whether the debate actually happened, although the very different version in the Chinese text certainly suggests that we might be better off thinking of a series of discussions, mostly by exchanges of letters, rather than a debate. And the author of 10th century Lamp for the Eyes of Meditation, which is all about how to rank the simultaneous and gradual methods, fails to mention any debate. And many, if not all, of the Tibetan Chan manuscripts from Dunhuang date from after the Tibetan empire, and thus well after when the debate was supposed to have happened, suggesting that the decline of Chan in Tibet happened slowly, and for other reasons."

<http://earlytibet.com/2010/03/31/tibetan-chan-iv/>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 4th, 2011 at 5:50 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Interest in EA Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Remm,

The thing with scholarship is similar to science, you should look at the latest developments and not at those that are 20 or 30 years old (that study you refer to, written by Jeffrey Broughton, was published in 1983 - but that in itself doesn't invalidate his study of course). For instance, about the schools to which Hashang belonged to we now know a lot more. Also, if you look into the history of different Buddhist schools, abolishing a lineage or teaching from an area is a political and not a religious decision and this is exactly what Sam van Schaik refers to with the involvement of different Tibetan clans. So I would say that the debate and Hashang losing to Kamalasila is pretty much a cover story to ridicule those Tibetans who then found Chan interesting. Nevertheless, even if the debate have happened it doesn't explain why Tibetans had no interest in EA Buddhism when there was communication between the two nations, like under the Mongol and Manchu rulers.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 4th, 2011 at 7:13 PM

Title: Re: Emptiness within Yogacara...

Content:

remm said:

According to the Śrī-mālādevī Siṃhanāda sūtra, the Tathāgatagarbha is void of all defilement stores, which are apart from knowledge which does not lead to liberation. The Tathāgatagarbha is said to be a substratum which is permanent, steadfast, and eternal. This consciousness is intrinsically pure, never defiled, and yet its apparent defilement is the cause of samsara and bondage.

Doesn't this mean that there is something in 'existence' that needs to be actualized?

Astus wrote:

'Existence' is grasping a thought, 'non-existence' is rejecting a thought. Neither grasping nor rejecting, that is buddha-nature. Then we can also find instructions in Chan that say there's nothing to find and all is empty, also instructions saying that the one knowing and acting is the true mind. They're all pointers to attain realisation. Realisation simply means being free from attachment to thoughts and emotions. The nature of mind is originally pure because it is empty, it displays perfect function so it is complete with the powers of a buddha. It is possible to talk like that in Zen but that's only for entertainment. That's why there isn't a clear philosophical system in Zen, so the maxim

"separate transmission outside scriptures, not based on words and letters, directly points to one's mind, to become buddha by seeing nature" (教外別傳 不立文字 直指人心 見性成佛). Thus you can use virtually any teaching to explain Zen. It is embodying the bodhisattva ideal of using whatever skilful means that is necessary to liberate beings. Of course, if we look into the teachings of a single school or a teacher we are able to pinpoint their doctrines.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 5th, 2011 at 5:54 AM

Title: Re: buddhist hinduism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The difference in brief. Those who believe there is an actor behind action think there is a self/soul. Those who realise that the mind is empty, without a self, understand that it is buddha-nature.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 5th, 2011 at 5:09 PM

Title: Re: buddhist hinduism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The saying that "it gives rise to phenomena" means that everything is conceived by the mind and the mind is empty. It is the same as dependent origination where ignorance gives rise to formations, etc. When ignorance is eliminated, the nature of mind is realised, ignorance is transformed into wisdom - it is explained in detail in Yogacara with 4 wisdoms, in Vajrayana with 5 wisdoms. In Zen it is summed up as if you're aware you are a buddha, if deluded you are a common being. This is not the case that there is an absolute substance behind everything but it's like as it's explained in the early texts as the difference between skandhas with and without attachment.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 5th, 2011 at 7:41 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism & Sanatan Dharma?

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=39&t=4056>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 5th, 2011 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: Meditation practices for the layfolk

Content:

Astus wrote:

On the Japanese side Bankei comes to mind, he was quite a popular teacher then among the laity. Also Kodo Sawaki, I think, taught meditation to householders, just like the teachers in the Sanbo Kyodan group. Hakuin, on the other hand, taught some mantra and recitation practices to the laity. In Korea Gyeongheo, the reviver of modern Seon, had lay students too, currently Daehaeng kunsunim has a large number of lay followers. In China Dahui Zonggao, inventor of the koan-huatou meditation, taught huatou practice to many householders (in fact, it appears that he meant huatou for the laity rather than monks). Same with Caodong teachers like Hongzhi and others who taught silent illumination to many lay people and they were quite popular. In modern times Xuyun taught Chan to both monks and lay people. Ven. Shengyan had a number of lay students in the West who practice Chan. Since all those mentioned are famous teachers you can easily search on their names.

Theoretically Zen makes no difference between lay and monastic, sudden enlightenment is available for everyone. In reality only a few dedicated householder took it seriously. It should also be noted that meditation is for monks. Fortunately, Zen is not about meditation or other practices but seeing the nature of mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 6th, 2011 at 5:25 PM

Title: Re: buddhist hinduism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The two Surangama sutras:

Taisho 642 (section of Collected Sutras): 佛說首楞嚴三昧經 (Buddha Speaks the Śūraṅgama Samādhi Sutra), translated into English by John McRae as "The Śūraṅgama Samādhi Sutra", published at Numata. Also translated by Lamotte.

Taisho 945 (section of Secret Teachings): 大佛頂如來密因修證了義諸菩薩萬行首楞嚴經 (The Sūtra on the Mantra Spoken from above the Crown of the Great Buddha's Head, and on the Hidden Basis of the Tathagata's Myriad Bodhisattva Practices Leading to Their Verification of the Ultimate Truth), translated into English by Charles Luk & BTTS.

T642 exists in Tibetan, T945 doesn't. T642 is an Indian text, T945 is Chinese.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 6th, 2011 at 7:42 PM

Title: Re: A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

Astus wrote:

The wind was flapping a temple flag, and two monks started an argument. One said the flag moved, the other said the wind moved; they argued back and forth but could not reach a conclusion.

The Sixth Patriarch said, "It is not the wind that moves, it is not the flag that moves; it is your mind that moves."

The two monks were awe-struck.

From one's personal point of view there is necessarily a mind that perceives and understands experienced phenomena. From an objective point of view everything has to be without subjective biases, in fact, what is objective can't possess any trace of mental signs. Thus subjective and objective are exclusive to each other. Therefore mind, as it is accessible only to the mind itself, can't be within the realm of objective phenomena. On the other hand, it is only mind that conceives of both subjective and objective, they are points of view made up "within" the mind. In one's actual experience both mental and material phenomena appear and display different attributes, from what comes that a keyboard doesn't call itself a keyboard but we call it that way, so matter is unaware and mind is aware. But there can be no duality within the realm of experience itself for we perceive matter without any problem. However, when we try to think about it in a roundabout way so that the perceived has to be without perception so when the perceiver is perceived it is also without perception, thus mind becomes matter. Still, believing there is an independent mind is another extreme. Both are based on substantialist self-views. None can serve as logical bases of rebirth. The Buddhist understanding, however, has rebirth as a logical consequence of the way things are.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 6th, 2011 at 11:46 PM

Title: Re: buddhist hinduism?

Content:

conebeckham said:

I.E., T945 has no antecedent Indian text, correct? It is purely Chinese?

Astus wrote:

Yes. That made it to rise among the most popular texts in East Asia.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 7th, 2011 at 3:57 PM

Title: Re: what is Zen?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Zen is a form of Buddhism in East Asia consisting of different schools. It has nothing to do with chakras. "Dhammachakkha" means "Dhamma Wheel" and it is a symbol of Buddhism, has nothing to do with chakras.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 8th, 2011 at 2:47 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Interest in EA Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

From "Approaching the Great Perfection":

p212

You have made the assertion that the view of Hashang was like this, based on refutations like the similarity of nonmentation to an egg. Yet scriptures such as the Buddhavatamsaka were known to Hashang. During the debate, Kamalasila asked what was the cause of samsara by the symbolic action of whirling his staff around his head. [Hashang] answered that it was the apprehender and apprehended by the symbolic action of shaking his robe out twice. It is undeniable that such a teacher was of the sharpest faculties. If the nonrecollection and nonmentation entail the offense of rejecting the wisdom of differentiating analysis, then the Prajnaparamita sutras of the Conqueror also entail this fault. Therefore what the view of Hashang actually is can be known by a perfect buddha, and no one else.

p339n220

Jigme Lingpa's insistence on this distinction between the two methods makes the note he attaches to this passage, in which he suggests that the common understanding of Hashang's erroneous method is a misinterpretation, quite surprising. There is a precedent for this statement in the works of Longchenpa however. In his Desum Nyingpo (pp. 155-56), Longchenpa writes on the subject of the transcendence of the consequences of positive and negative actions. There is a famous statement attributed to Hashang Mahayana on this same subject, that virtue and sin are like black and white clouds, in that both cover up the sun. Rather than distancing himself from this, Longchenpa uses the same metaphor and then goes on to say:

The great master Hashang said this, and although those of lesser intellects could not comprehend it, he was in accordance with the [ultimate] truth.

Longchenpa himself was also following a precedent set by the twelfth-century Nyingmapa Nyangral Nyima Özer (1124-92), who state that there is no difference in [ultimate] truth (don) between the two paths, but that for those of the best faculties, there is the simultaneous method of Hashang, and for those of medium and below there is the graduated path (Chos 'byung me tog snying po p. 435b). I discuss Jigme Lingpa's use of this distinction between the faculties of trainees with regard to the simultaneous aspect of the Great Perfection in chapter 7. Perhaps Jigme Lingpa's really original contribution in this note is to point out that there is a scriptural basis for the simultaneist method as much as for the gradualist method in the Prajnaparamita sutras, an insight that appears to be based on comparative readings of texts rather than the standardized rubrics of Tibetan scholarship.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 8th, 2011 at 7:15 AM

Title: Re: what is Zen?

Content:

Astus wrote:

A "video reply" on Zen.

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 8th, 2011 at 5:34 PM

Title: Re: what is Zen?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Naite,

It is all right to make up your own interpretations about whatever you like, until you recognise it is a conceptualisation based on your ideas. To be aware of dependent conceptualisation and not to take them real, that awareness is what the circle expresses in Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 8th, 2011 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: Time Magazine "Bad Buddhists"

Content:

Astus wrote:

The article is a nice representation of the difference between the realities of books and actual humans. Such a discrepancy makes many confused even today.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 9th, 2011 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: Time Magazine "Bad Buddhists"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

Are you saying that cheap practices like fortune telling and house blessings were/are not everyday practices in Theravada countries? I think they generally are. And even today many conceive Buddhism as something pure and otherworldly thus seeing such things can be shocking.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 9th, 2011 at 3:29 PM

Title: Re: Introduction to Zen Buddhism Books

Content:

Astus wrote:

Also highly recommended:

Mahāyāna Buddhism: the doctrinal foundations by Paul Williams

The Awakening of Faith: attributed to Aśvaghoṣa by Yoshito S. Hakeda

The Surangama Sutra: A New Translation by Hsüan Hua OR Surangama Sutra by Lu-Kuan-Yu

Cultivating Original Enlightenment: Wonhyo's Exposition of the Vajrasamādhi-sūtra by Robert E. Buswell

The Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment: Korean Buddhism's Guide to Meditation (with commentary by the Sŏn Monk Kihwa) by A. Charles Muller

Zongmi on Chan by Jeffrey L. Broughton

Tracing Back the Radiance: Chinul's Korean way of Zen by Robert E. Buswell

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 9th, 2011 at 4:38 PM

Title: Re: Abhidharmakośa, Longevity and Mantras.

Content:

Will said:

If there is no evidence against these Arhats, only modern suspicions, and there are many sadhanas, texts, statues etc. that do support their existence and function, I will support the tradition. Where there is smoke, there once was fire. Perhaps the names and/or numbers of Arhats and the length of time Buddha asked them to watch over his Dharma are off. It seems more odd to me that Buddha would have no competent Arhat disciples to carry on his Dharma for many eons in the future - only the "Dhamma-Vinaya" to rely on. The Mahayana also mentions Ksitigarbha Mahasattva as the guardian of the Dharma until Maitreya.

Astus wrote:

If there were such Dharma heirs to live infinitely Buddhism would look very differently with a hierarchy and such. Since that's not what the Buddha has established we can correctly assume that there are no Dharma heirs, especially not virtually immortal ones.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 9th, 2011 at 5:59 PM

Title: Re: Introduction to Zen Buddhism Books

Content:

Astus wrote:

Anders, you're right, too much info kills the message.

A list of introductory essays and speeches on the <http://www.westernchanfellowship.org/first-reading.html>, which has Ven. Shengyan's classic <http://www.westernchanfellowship.org/what-is-chan-shengyen.html> and more importantly Xuyun's <http://www.westernchanfellowship.org/chan-practice.html> and <http://www.westernchanfellowship.org/methods-in-chan-hall.html> that are really good introductions to Chinese Chan practices, also short and easy to read.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 10th, 2011 at 5:06 AM

Title: Re: Abhidharmakośa, Longevity and Mantras.

Content:

pueraeternus said:

The impression I get when reading the accounts of long-lasting Arhats, is that the Buddha meant them to guard the Dharma from behind the scenes, rather than outwardly as lineage holders.

Astus wrote:

Quite a conspiracy theory I say. It's like Anne Rice's children of the millennia and the Theosophist's ascended masters. There are also the so called Taoist immortals and Zen stories about Bodhidharma returning to India after his death. Not to mention Manjushri living on Wutai Mountain.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 10th, 2011 at 3:19 PM

Title: Re: Abhidharmakośa, Longevity and Mantras.

Content:

Astus wrote:

The two favourite disciples of the Buddha, Shariputra (Sariputta) and Maudgalyayana (Moggallana), who had superb attainments, died before Gautama. Maudgalyayana's death is especially noteworthy here because he died a violent death as a result of previous karma. And he was not the only arhat who died like that.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 10th, 2011 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: Mutated...

Content:

Astus wrote:

This book explains it neatly:

Buddhist Thought: A Complete Introduction to the Indian Tradition by Paul Williams

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 10th, 2011 at 7:34 PM

Title: Re: Karma

Content:

Astus wrote:

If everything were me I wouldn't need to pay myself for the lunch.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 10th, 2011 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: Mutated...

Content:

beautiful breath said:

...don't have that one...what does it say

Astus wrote:

The reason why a whole book is recommended because the development of Buddhism from the earliest texts to Tibetan Buddhism covers about 1500 years, actually the time Buddhism existed in India. Just think about summing up the history of European poetry from Virgil to Shakespeare. Too many details to cover in a single post. Perhaps if you can make the question more specific...

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 10th, 2011 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: Mutated...

Content:

Astus wrote:

Or <https://buddhisttorrents.blogspot.com/2009/02/buddhist-thought-complete-introduction.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 11th, 2011 at 1:48 AM

Title: Re: Giving: you have to pay to learn Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Giving Dharma books freely exists in the West, primarily among Theravada communities where monks have no trouble giving out their writings without charge. Obviously monks don't need extra income since they're already covered. However, it explains why only a few books are for free: the writers do need the income. Well, perhaps those scholars who are employed full time by a university are not in need of money, but then they may not believe that their academic products should be free. Thing is, the economy of donations don't work very well in most Western communities, like when there are fees on retreats and even for being a member. Again, it can be explained by the lack of significant lay support that exists in Asia. Note also that many Westerners who practice Buddhism don't think of it as a religion but more as a hobby/training/lifestyle, unlike in case of Christianity and such. And when you refer to karma, you might have noticed this, many don't believe in that at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 11th, 2011 at 2:47 AM

Title: Re: Giving: you have to pay to learn Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Good idea. We should make Dharma free instead of expecting others to do so.

Mahayana sutras repeat regularly that we should keep, read, recite, copy and teach them.

By the way, this very forum is a gift in itself.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 12th, 2011 at 3:08 PM

Title: Re: Attainment of Buddhahood is impossible

Content:

Astus wrote:

The fault lies in the original idea itself that there is such thing as nature (svabhava/dhatu). It is no different from the view of self.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 12th, 2011 at 3:26 PM

Title: Re: Attainment of Buddhahood is impossible

Content:

Sherab said:

So if there is no nature, does it mean that there is completely nothing?

Astus wrote:

I think the most detailed and logical explanation of the attainment of buddhahood is what you find in yogacara's transformation of mind from the eight consciousnesses to the four wisdoms, or an upgraded vajrayana version with 5 wisdoms and four bodies. In brief, the mind-stream contains defilements and if those are eliminated, thus have no more effect, the mind-stream becomes pure, so from a sentient being we get a buddha. Also, it can't be polluted again because defilement was sustained by the mind itself therefore once the corrupting factors are removed they're forever gone.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 12th, 2011 at 3:45 PM

Title: Re: Attainment of Buddhahood is impossible

Content:

Sherab said:

So are you saying that something that is previously conditioned by various factors can become something that can no longer become conditioned again, ie., something previously conditionable can become something unconditionable?

Astus wrote:

No. A mind-stream is not a single thing but the causal continuum of mental factors.

Among those factors we find the three roots of samsara. If they're removed the functioning of the mind-stream changes from defiled to pure, from ignorance to wisdom. It doesn't mean it becomes unchanging per se since there is wisdom. But it doesn't become defiled again because there is no cause for defilements any more.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 12th, 2011 at 4:48 PM

Title: Re: Attainment of Buddhahood is impossible

Content:

Sherab said:

"the three roots of samsara" - do these have a changeable nature or unchangeable nature?

Astus wrote:

All composite things (samskara) are impermanent and dependently arisen. Because they're dependently arisen they're empty of nature (nih-svabhava). Also, if by changeable you mean disappearing and by unchangeable you mean eternal, these are the extremes of annihilation and permanence.

Sherab said:

"It doesn't mean it becomes unchanging per se since there is wisdom" - so the mind-stream is changeable because there is wisdom?

Astus wrote:

No, the mind-stream is a stream of causal continua similarly to a river where you find no permanent component.

Sherab said:

"But it doesn't become defiled again because there is no cause for defilements any more." - So no ignorance implies wisdom just as no apple implies orange?

Astus wrote:

Lack of inhibiting factors means freedom, from the freedom of perception comes insight into dependent origination and that is wisdom.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 12th, 2011 at 5:23 PM

Title: Re: What is a tantric teaching in Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Urgyen Chodron,

You might find these works interesting:

<http://vajrayana.faithweb.com/DGrayCompassionateViolence.pdf> (PDF)

<http://vajrayana.faithweb.com/female%20energy.pdf> (PDF)

<http://vajrayana.faithweb.com/consort.pdf> (PDF)

All from: <http://vajrayana.faithweb.com>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 12th, 2011 at 5:39 PM

Title: Re: Attainment of Buddhahood is impossible

Content:

Sherab said:

So composite things have no nature and are therefore unreal/untrue but there are real/true connections between them?

Astus wrote:

Like true love between imagined lovers? Unlikely, don't you think?

Sherab said:

So there is a permanent continua even though the components are impermanent? If so, is it not possible for all components to cease and therefore a cessation of the permanent continua?

Astus wrote:

To suppose a continuum besides components is like saying that there is a body besides the arms, legs, torso and head.

Sherab said:

What is it that previously has no such insight but now has this insight?

Astus wrote:

Insight is a direct understanding just like one understands how to ride a bike. To conceive there is a separate self understanding it is, again, falls under the concept of self-view, about which you may read in general Buddhist books.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 12th, 2011 at 7:38 PM

Title: Re: Theravadans That Believe in the Bardo

Content:

Astus wrote:

An insightful work by Ven. Sujato: <http://santifm.org/santipada/2010/rebirth-and-the-in-between-state-in-early-buddhism/>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 13th, 2011 at 3:17 PM

Title: Re: Attainment of Buddhahood is impossible

Content:
Sherab said:
So dependent arising does not truly exist, you agree?

No such supposition. The point is when the components ceased, then there is no continua. Hence, no point using continua as an argument.

The point is that there is still a change.

Astus wrote:
Dependent arising means that phenomena appear based on causes and conditions. There is no separate dependent arising just as there is no separate emptiness. Where could you establish "dependent arising" itself as truly existent?

Components come and go but not without cause and effect. The idea of total cessation is the view of annihilation.

Again, such concepts as "change" and "permanence" are expressions only. Without understanding that change refers to impermanent phenomena it is easy to draw inaccurate conclusions.

Author: Astus
Date: Saturday, May 14th, 2011 at 5:28 PM
Title: Re: Approaches taken in the contemporary discourse on Buddhism
Content:
Astus wrote:
Too vague, too many categories.

Author: Astus
Date: Saturday, May 14th, 2011 at 8:48 PM
Title: Re: Approaches taken in the contemporary discourse on Buddhism
Content:
Anders Honore said:
aren't the tow usually exclusive of each other?

Astus wrote:
A group of vague categories. Not exclusive then. As Tobes said, it can depend very well on context. I can use any of those approaches to Buddhism.

Author: Astus
Date: Saturday, May 14th, 2011 at 9:02 PM
Title: Dechan Jueren and Hanmi Buddhism
Content:
Astus wrote:

A fascinating new Chinese derived Esoteric and Zen group: <http://www.dari-rulai-temple.org/index.html> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;
Historically, Chinese Esoteric Buddhism, or the Hanmi Mystery School, was thought to be lost when Emperor Tang Wuzong banned the teaching. Huiguo, the last known disciple of Amoghavajra, had left China and went with Kukai to Japan to establish the Japanese Esoteric school of Buddhism, later known as the Shingon sect. Unknown to history, Amoghavajra had another disciple, Huisu, who received all the religious instruments and dharma transmission. He then became the Dharma Lineage Bearer. Since then, Hanmi has been underground for over twelve centuries.

The Hanmi lineage has been passed on through one master per generation. Master Yu Tian Jian is the highest and only living master of Hanmi, the Honorable Abbot of the 1000-year old LongQuan Temple in Chifeng, Inner Mongolia, a doctor of Chinese medicine, and acknowledged as a Living Buddha in China.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 14th, 2011 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: Dechan Jueren and Hanmi Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

How is it remarkable? Mahayana sutras hidden for half a millennium, tantric texts unknown for a thousand years, what is new about it? By the way, he is not alone in being an heir to the so far hidden Chinese Esoteric school, so his claim of being the only representative of it is even more bold but not a new phenomenon either (just think of the Huineng story).

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 14th, 2011 at 11:00 PM

Title: Re: Dechan Jueren and Hanmi Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

It doesn't take much to make up a lineage. One can also just say that it was a transmission from one of the buddhas, bodhisattvas or vajrasattvas.

But I'm not trying to defend them just point to the phenomenon of legitimising oneself through claims of lineage and tradition. This exists not just in Buddhism but in so many other forms of doctrines (教 - can't think of a better word that covers religions, schools of thoughts and such) like neo-paganism, Western esotericism, Hinduism, etc. And all these traditions most of the time lack the kind of historical background they want people believe in. It seems to me that either a tradition dies out at some point and then it's later revived or it becomes established enough to stay alive but because of its institutionalisation lineage becomes meaningless, a mere formality and paperwork.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 15th, 2011 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: Dechan Jueren and Hanmi Buddhism

Content:

Namdrol said:

I know several people that have had a very bad experience with this person.

Astus wrote:

It was <http://www.cambridgenetwork.co.uk/news/article/default.aspx?objid=53721> of a programme that caught my attention and made me think it'd be advisable to provide views of this group beyond what is on their sites. They call him there "Top international Zen Master Dechan Jueren".

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 15th, 2011 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: Dechan Jueren and Hanmi Buddhism

Content:

Huseng said:

This sounds suspicious:

Earlier this year, Dechan Jueren, already the 49th Master of the Esoteric School, became the New Master of the Chinese Linji school of Zen Buddhism, the most authentic and recognised Zen school in China.

As most people know, Chinese Linji is Chan, not Zen. Moreover, who nominated him as the New Master of Linji? The Linji isn't even a school anymore, but rather just a ordination lineage without any institution behind it.

Again, Linji is an ordination lineage, not an institution. Claiming to be a master of the "Esoteric School" and a master of the "Linji school of Zen" should alarm people.

Astus wrote:

Linji is not just an ordination but a Dharma-transmission lineage too and the two exists separately, for instance check out Ven. Shengyan's lineage. On Youtube you can actually find Dechan's transmission ceremony, <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=UAoVqA-n78Q>.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 15th, 2011 at 3:33 AM

Title: Re: Dechan Jueren and Hanmi Buddhism

Content:

Huseng said:

The fact that it is presented on youtube the way it is raises more suspicions.

You might be sympathetic to him, but his story strikes me as suspect.

Astus wrote:

Nah, it's not sympathy but a good example when the focus is on legitimacy instead of authenticity, on lineage instead of doctrine. There is a lesson to learn here for Western Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 16th, 2011 at 3:15 AM

Title: Re: Dechan Jueren and Hanmi Buddhism

Content:

Huseng said:

Legitimacy and lineage are essential in the case of Vajrayana.

Astus wrote:

So it is said about Zen. Perhaps there aren't enough scholars in Tibetology to look at history with a critical eye.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 16th, 2011 at 9:38 PM

Title: Re: Dechan Jueren and Hanmi Buddhism

Content:

Seishin said:

Nuff said

Astus wrote:

It's magic. You have to use the right mantra (spell) to generate the required karma (spiritual energy) that will result in the desired effect. Logical.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 16th, 2011 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: Dechan Jueren and Hanmi Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Yes, I've read some of the testimonials, although my favourite is their warning at the start.

Have you noticed that the mask is $150 for disciples? You can also get buddha statues (enlivened - like a golem?) for mere $360.

But what about relics, blessed rosaries and scarves, mummies, statues, etc.? They're said to be powerful things.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 16th, 2011 at 11:40 PM

Title: Re: Dechan Jueren and Hanmi Buddhism

Content:

Jikan said:

I think I'm less skeptical about the claims of institutional Vajrayana lineages than Astus is. I don't think it's possible to put projects like this, or Aro gTer, or the Mahajyra people, in the same category as Shingon or Nyingma for instance.

Astus wrote:

I think the emphasis is on institutional. These small (or not so small) groups lack the institutional system that the "old churches" have. But besides that I find their ways of presentation and spreading similar to those groups (not necessarily Vajrayana related) that are now the great institutions. Just think how many schools started as unorthodox sects with questionable practices from India to Japan.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 16th, 2011 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: My rant on Hui Neng's poem

Content:

LastLegend said:

Shen Hsui spoke of what we need to do to keep our mind empty or pure. So we have to practice to get there. And I am more interested in discussing about our attachments to this life such as wealth, lust, fame, food, and sleep for examples as these attachments need to be gone in order to help with meditation.

Astus wrote:

A practical and understandable position of course. However, I don't understand then why you would choose a text like the Platform Sutra that is very much about the sudden path instead of gradual cultivation. There are so many other texts on gradual methods explaining everything in detail. In fact, the Platform Sutra (just like most of the Zen texts) are quite useless in giving instructions at length.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 17th, 2011 at 5:41 AM

Title: Re: Dechan Jueren and Hanmi Buddhism

Content:

Namdrol said:

I know a whole crew of people who know this guy personally, who were his students for quite a long period of time. He is not a scrupulous person.

Astus wrote:

Could you share some stories or other information for those who are searching on this teacher and his group on the web?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 17th, 2011 at 7:14 PM

Title: Re: Buddhists in America get political

Content:

Unknown said:

6) Drug usage - We as members of the Buddhist Party, in keeping with the Precept of No Intoxicants, do not support Drug usage.

7) Alcohol usage - We as members of the Buddhist Party, in keeping with the Precept of No Intoxicants, do not support Alcohol usage.

8) Tobacco usage - We as members of the Buddhist Party, in keeping with the Precept of No Intoxicants, do not support Tobacco usage.

9) Gambling - We as members of the Buddhist Party, do not support Gambling.

10) Prostitution - We as members of the Buddhist Party, in keeping with the Precept of No Inappropriate Sex, do not support Prostitution.

11) LGBTQ - We as members of the Buddhist Party, in keeping with the Precept of No Inappropriate Sex, do not support LGBTQ.

Astus wrote:

Then who would support this Buddhist Party?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 17th, 2011 at 8:15 PM

Title: Re: Buddhists in America get political

Content:

Seishin said:

Exactly. So they're not going to get very far, but it makes the rest of us look bad.

Astus wrote:

Why would it make other Buddhists look bad? There are many organisations supposedly representing different groups of people. But representatives are never those who are being represented. Or you agree with your governor/senator/MP/PM?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 17th, 2011 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: Lama Ole Nydahl, what do you think?

Content:

Astus wrote:

This topic has been about Ole against Islam, Ole's title(s), Ole and the karmapas. What about Ole and his Buddhism? If there is a teacher to be checked on his status as a teacher, shouldn't it be his teachings investigated first of all? No wonder that it's easy to mislead people when nobody gives a damn about what is actually being taught.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 17th, 2011 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Buddhists in America get political

Content:

Seishin said:

Myself and my teacher have had emails and conversations with people who believe Buddhism is something that it's not due to inaccurate webpages/blogs/groups/literature that they have found. Quite often these people with misconceptions can be very intimidating.

Although, most well educated, well read people understand this, there are still those that believe what they read on the net or hear on TV as if it's gospel truth. Think about how many people think that all Muslims are terrorists. I'm not trying to link these Buddhists with the Taliban, I'm just using that as an example.

Astus wrote:

I'm with you on this, there's a lot of misinformation about Buddhism including school textbooks and pop-science magazines. But since Buddhism is without a single authority - while many believe it's the Dalai Lama - the only thing we can do is to raise the banner of the correct teaching (what is accepted universally as the fundamentals) as high as we can. This actually requires constant reference to the basics (4NT, DO) and moving a bit away from Asian traditions in that regard. On the other hand, Buddhist involvement in politics is almost as old as Buddhism itself, this includes dark events too.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 17th, 2011 at 10:04 PM

Title: Re: Buddhists in America get political

Content:

Seishin said:

What do you mean by the highlighted? I don't follow.

Astus wrote:

Mahayana schools don't keep referring back to doctrines like the noble eightfold path but rather to teachings of pure lands, buddha-nature, etc. that superficially separate Buddhists and are easily misunderstood without proper studies. Thus to take a clear stance on where is the line between Buddhism and non-Buddhism there's a need to establish the common ground and let everyone know about them so they can actually discern fake from real.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 17th, 2011 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: Lama Ole Nydahl, what do you think?

Content:

Pero said:

Like I said before, when I looked at a few videos of his teachings on youtube it seemed to me that he doesn't really know what he's talking about. Also he seems like he's on kind of a "trip". For more details I'd have to watch him again and frankly I don't want to spend my time on it.

Astus wrote:

They have quote a lot of books, mainly authored by Ole himself. I haven't read any of them that's why I'm particularly interested if anyone actually knows his teachings and not just his biography.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 17th, 2011 at 10:56 PM

Title: Re: Buddhists in America get political

Content:

Seishin said:

I still don't understand how this relates to what you said; "moving away from Asian traditions" ? But, as we are now off topic, would you mind taking this up in a new topic?

Astus wrote:

Never mind then, it's not that important. Take it as an underdeveloped thought appearing unexpectedly.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 18th, 2011 at 4:35 AM

Title: Re: Lama Ole Nydahl, what do you think?

Content:

Astus wrote:

My personal interest in this thread lies in not my connection to Ole and his group (since I have none) but that in Hungary (and some other European countries) they are the largest Buddhist organisation and there's not one even close to their popularity and number of centres. Their website actually says they have the largest city centre in the Western hemisphere in Budapest. It was mentioned that there are so many other authentic lamas around and lot of translations - but that is not the case everywhere in Europe, nor does everybody know English.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 18th, 2011 at 4:58 AM

Title: Re: Lankavatara Sutra

Content:

Will said:

What is this Sagathakam that is not included?

Astus wrote:

This: http://lirs.ru/do/lanka_eng/lanka-sagathakam.htm#sagathakam

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 19th, 2011 at 4:48 PM

Title: Online Nenbutsu Retreat, 21 May 2011

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://www.ne.jp/asahi/sakura/fuji/sinsei/event/24fudan/Untitled6.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 19th, 2011 at 4:54 PM

Title: Supermonk - A Buddhist Comic

Content:

Astus wrote:

The writer was inspired by Ajahn Brahm's advice of creating a Buddhist hero who doesn't beat up people but turns them to the right path.

Just click on the pictures and enjoy:

<https://zarthelyiosztaly.blogspot.com/2011/05/vesak.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 19th, 2011 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Conventions contrary to scripture.

Content:

Astus wrote:

S. Dhammika's book <http://www.buddhistische-gesellschaft-berlin.de/downloads/brokenbuddhanew.pdf> (PDF) addresses this issue in detail within the Theravada tradition.

There are precepts against magic and all sorts of rituals but at the same time it is found everywhere in Buddhism. There are precepts against music, dancing, working and games while monks may do all that in East Asia.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 20th, 2011 at 12:04 AM

Title: Re: Conventions contrary to scripture.

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is a difference between occasionally breaking a precept for compassion's sake and having a whole tradition not following certain rules that they took at the time of ordination, and that includes bodhisattva precepts too.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 20th, 2011 at 5:18 PM

Title: Re: understanding of favourite gongans/Koans that youve heard

Content:

Astus wrote:

From the koan it becomes easier to see the meaning of "wu/mu".

趙州和尚因僧問。A monk asked master Zhaozhou.

狗子還有佛性。也無。Do dogs also have buddha-nature, or not?

州云無。- Zhou said no.

The words in the question are 有 and 無 and they are like yes-no, existence-emptiness, thing-nothing, positive-negative. And that's why Wumen emphasises not to make of this a nihilistic (虛無) or a thing-nothing (有無) issue.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 20th, 2011 at 6:00 PM

Title: Re: Conventions contrary to scripture.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Without a monastic community there are priests/ministers/brahmanas. Japan is an example in general, Jodo Shinshu in particular. Are priests better than monks to preserve and spread the Dharma?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 20th, 2011 at 6:15 PM

Title: Re: Conventions contrary to scripture.

Content:

Huseng said:

I don't think a hereditary priesthood works all that well. It becomes a profession rather than a calling.

The same thing happens in communities with monks, though not as much.

Astus wrote:

It doesn't have to be hereditary. Could be like Catholic priests (western or eastern), or Protestant ministers, or any other form. There could be universities to qualify who can be a priest, but then it would also mean that those who lack the financial background will have no chance (a reason for monasticism, or scholarship).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 20th, 2011 at 6:55 PM

Title: Re: Where are the Gods?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Well, Tibetan Buddhism tends to import its Gods. That said, I personally know of one instance of a realised teacher "discovering" a local God and adding it into the mandala (pantheon) of a traditional protector practice.

Also, and I don't know where you live, but here in the "West" where I live there are many local deities and guardians worshipped by the locals within the confines of their Judeo-Christian faith. Like Padmasambhava oath bound local gods to protect and uphold the Dharma so Greek Orthodox Christianity incorporates local "saints" and "spirits" (it baptises them as angels) into its pantheon. Unless of course you don't consider Greece as "the West".

Astus wrote:

Geographically Greece is "the South" as I live in Hungary, religiously it is "the East" because it is Orthodox instead of Roman, but all this is just European politics. I know that the cult of angels is quite popular and they could be fine materials for deities, however, they're very Christian in my view and I'm unaware if they have anything to do with local spirits (if there are any...) since angels are common Christian deities and also servants of a higher god. But I find this dualistic view of good and evil, upper world and lower world a bit difficult to match with Buddhist cosmology.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 20th, 2011 at 11:32 PM

Title: Re: Don't understand Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Awareness of delusion is enlightenment. One might have to first follow the path of ethical conduct (!), meditation and wisdom, or simply gain insight immediately. Zen is supposed to be the second one.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 21st, 2011 at 3:30 AM

Title: Re: Conventions contrary to scripture.

Content:

Astus wrote:

This line of reasoning for the futility of monasticism and that we are in the final days make me think of Shinran who realised his utterly evil, totally deluded situation and put his faith solely in Amitabha's vow as the only way to escape samsara and attain buddhahood. That argument makes all other teachings totally pointless.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 21st, 2011 at 4:40 AM

Title: Re: Faith and Letting Go

Content:

Astus wrote:

What you describe is one form of Pure Land practice. Shinran's teaching is that because we can't let go we have to rely on the vow. If we could let go there would be little need of other power since we could manage on our own. That's how Amitabha's Pure Land is available for everyone.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 21st, 2011 at 4:27 PM

Title: Re: What should you do when you don't have a Zen teacher yet?

Content:

Jinzang said:

Practicing without a teacher is stumbling around in the dark.

Astus wrote:

What is it specifically that only a living teacher can tell but not scriptures? Also, what makes a teacher? Suppose my friend's brother learnt sitting meditation in an Austrian zendo and then from him my friend learnt it from him and from my friend I. Is my friend a Zen teacher then? And what if I just watched a video on meditation? Would I be stumbling in the dark?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 21st, 2011 at 4:39 PM

Title: Re: What should you do when you don't have a Zen teacher yet?

Content:

LastLegend said:

In advanced levels of meditation, one can easily become possessed with no guidance from a teacher.

Astus wrote:

Possessed? Like, possessed by demons? And what kind of advanced levels are there in Zen that you are referring to here?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 21st, 2011 at 5:47 PM

Title: Re: What should you do when you don't have a Zen teacher yet?

Content:

LastLegend said:

I know not much about this for I am not a practitioner of Chan. But there are stages that you go through. And sometimes when images appear in your meditation, you have to know how to deal with them. Things can harm you when you don't recognize what they are. Having a teacher is to guide you through meditation.

If you are still thinking about sudden enlightenment, then I am sure there are no stages or levels. I mean if you practice, of course you will make progress. So I am talking about progress.

Astus wrote:

Yes, there can be progress and there are hindrances occurring in meditation. That's why from the sutras through abhidharma texts up to meditation manuals they are discussed. A teacher who is familiar with them both in theory and practice is of course a great help. Problem is, among Western Zen teachers you hardly find anyone who actually has such in depth knowledge. And if one is not too lazy to occasionally grab a book all the necessary information is available. Even if one is still confused about something after looking through the teachings he may come to this forum and ask. At the same time it is very good to be part of a community and talk to good friends. A community can give the right milieu for personally knowing each other and a forum like this one with hundreds of members can be a wonderful source of information.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, May 22nd, 2011 at 5:31 PM

Title: Re: What should you do when you don't have a Zen teacher yet?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jinzang,

If what you said were true about teachers making sure everyone got it right there couldn't exist any schools within Buddhism as all would agree. But there are not just many traditions generally but within Zen you find quite a lot of disagreements between groups and teachers. If it is a matter of making sure somebody properly understands the teaching there should be exams, tests and diplomas, but that is only a modern phenomenon in East Asian Buddhism that people study at universities. Also, if understanding can be measured one could even take online tests. Then again a personal instructor would not be necessary.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 23rd, 2011 at 3:36 PM

Title: Re: Chan Texts: Translations & Studies

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'd add a few others, mostly studies.

Cultivating original enlightenment: Wonhyo's Exposition of the Vajrasamādhi-sūtra by Robert E. Buswell Jr.

Seeing through Zen: encounter, transformation, and genealogy in Chinese Chan Buddhism by John R. McRae

The Northern School and the formation of early Ch'an Buddhism by John R. McRae

The mystique of transmission: on an early Chan history and its contexts by Wendi Leigh Adamek

Inventing Hui-neng, the sixth Patriarch: Hagiography and biography in early Ch'an by John J. Jørgensen

The Hongzhou School of Chan Buddhism in Eighth- Through Tenth-Century China by Jinhua Jia (a good complementary to Poceski's work)

The Linji lu and the creation of Chan orthodoxy: the development of Chan's records of sayings literature by Albert Welter

How Zen Became Zen: The Dispute Over Enlightenment and the Formation of Chan Buddhism in Song-Dynasty China by Morten Schlutter

The Power of Patriarchs: Qisong and Lineage in Chinese Buddhism by Elizabeth Morrison

Monks, rulers, and literati: the political ascendancy of Chan Buddhism by Albert Welter

Enlightenment in dispute: the reinvention of Chan Buddhism in seventeenth-century China by Jiang Wu

Eminent nuns: women Chan masters of seventeenth-century China by Beata Grant

The origins of Buddhist monastic codes in China: an annotated translation and study of the Chanyuan qinggui by Yifa, Zongze

Sōtō Zen in medieval Japan by William M. Bodiford

Five Mountains: the Rinzai Zen monastic institution in medieval Japan by Martin Collcutt

Japanese Rinzai Zen Buddhism: Myōshinji, a living religion by Jørn Borup

Works by Bernard Faure:

The will to orthodoxy: a critical genealogy of Northern Chan Buddhism

Chan Insights and Oversights: An Epistemological Critique of the Chan Tradition

The rhetoric of immediacy: a cultural critique of Chan/Zen Buddhism

Visions of Power: Imagining Medieval Japanese Buddhism

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 23rd, 2011 at 3:36 PM

Title: Re: Chan Texts: Translations & Studies

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'd add a few others, mostly studies.

Cultivating original enlightenment: Wonhyo's Exposition of the Vajrasamādhi-sūtra by Robert E. Buswell Jr.

Seeing through Zen: encounter, transformation, and genealogy in Chinese Chan Buddhism by John R. McRae

The Northern School and the formation of early Ch'an Buddhism by John R. McRae

The mystique of transmission: on an early Chan history and its contexts by Wendi Leigh Adamek

Inventing Hui-neng, the sixth Patriarch: Hagiography and biography in early Ch'an by John J. Jørgensen

The Hongzhou School of Chan Buddhism in Eighth- Through Tenth-Century China by Jinhua Jia (a good complementary to Poceski's work)

The Linji lu and the creation of Chan orthodoxy: the development of Chan's records of sayings literature by Albert Welter

How Zen Became Zen: The Dispute Over Enlightenment and the Formation of Chan Buddhism in Song-Dynasty China by Morten Schlutter

The Power of Patriarchs: Qisong and Lineage in Chinese Buddhism by Elizabeth Morrison

Monks, rulers, and literati: the political ascendancy of Chan Buddhism by Albert Welter

Enlightenment in dispute: the reinvention of Chan Buddhism in seventeenth-century China by Jiang Wu

Eminent nuns: women Chan masters of seventeenth-century China by Beata Grant

The origins of Buddhist monastic codes in China: an annotated translation and study of the Chanyuan qinggui by Yifa, Zongze

Sōtō Zen in medieval Japan by William M. Bodiford

Five Mountains: the Rinzai Zen monastic institution in medieval Japan by Martin Collcutt

Japanese Rinzai Zen Buddhism: Myōshinji, a living religion by Jørn Borup

Works by Bernard Faure:

The will to orthodoxy: a critical genealogy of Northern Chan Buddhism

Chan Insights and Oversights: An Epistemological Critique of the Chan Tradition

The rhetoric of immediacy: a cultural critique of Chan/Zen Buddhism

Visions of Power: Imagining Medieval Japanese Buddhism

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 23rd, 2011 at 5:17 PM

Title: Re: What should you do when you don't have a Zen teacher yet?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jinzang,

There is not so much doctrinal variation in Buddhism as you are saying.

No, not that much. But even if you just look at Zen in China you find how there were different factions and how the interpretation of certain teachings differed. But you can do the same with Korean and Japanese Zen too, not to mention comparing these Zen forms. Also, there were not just debates about doctrine but political and economical issues too - likely to be more often the subject of arguments than teachings.

I think Buddhist teachers function more like sports coaches or art teachers than academic professors.

I think there are different Buddhist teachers depending on what they focus on but what is common in them is that they are all teachers of religion. They teach (or supposed to teach) faith, morality, doctrine and practice (where practice means not just yogic/meditation stuff but many other things). From the time of Dahui Zonggao the practice of huatou was assigned to many lay men and women who were to maintain the big doubt throughout their daily activities. The book "Swampland Flowers" is actually a selection of Dahui's correspondence with his lay students who may or may not have visited him in person. And it's enough to consider when one is an abbot of hundreds of monks and has a high reputation the schedule is pretty full for the following years. Even among the monks it was a privilege to meet the abbot (i.e. the Zen master) besides formal encounters. The position that would fit best your definition of a coach is the monk in charge of the meditation hall to supervise regular sessions, technically that person is the meditation (but not Zen) master.

"A special transmission, outside of the scriptures," remember?

That is a Zen slogan misunderstood and misused too often. Special transmission is no transmission because there is nothing to transmit, it simply means seeing the nature is the transmission of mind, thus it is not within the scriptures, that is verbal explanations and concepts. But to think that there are actually people who dispense enlightenment, that is absurd.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 23rd, 2011 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: Chan Texts: Translations & Studies

Content:

Astus wrote:

A few more:

Integrating Chinese Buddhism: A Study of Yongming Yanshou's Guanxin Xuanshu by Yi-hsung Huang

Inquiry into the origin of humanity: an annotated translation of Tsung-mi's Yüan jen lun with a modern commentary by Peter N. Gregory

Tsung-mi and the sinification of Buddhism by Peter N. Gregory

Coming to terms with Chinese Buddhism: a reading of the Treasure store treatise by Robert H. Sharf

Sudden and Gradual: Approaches to Enlightenment in Chinese Thought by Peter N. Gregory

Buddhism in the Sung by Peter N. Gregory, Daniel Aaron Getz

Steven Heine, Dale Stuart Wright:

Zen ritual: studies of Zen Buddhist theory in practice

Zen classics: formative texts in the history of Zen Buddhism

The Zen canon: understanding the classic texts

The Kōan: texts and contexts in Zen Buddhism

Zen Masters

Philosophical Meditations on Zen Buddhism by Dale S. Wright

Steven Heine:

Opening a mountain: kōans of the Zen Masters

Shifting shape, shaping text: philosophy and folklore in the Fox kōan
Zen skin, Zen marrow: will the real Zen Buddhism please stand up?
Did Dōgen go to China?: what he wrote and when he wrote it
Dōgen and the Kōan tradition: a tale of two Shōbōgenzō texts

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 23rd, 2011 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: Chan Texts: Translations & Studies

Content:

Astus wrote:

A few more:

Integrating Chinese Buddhism: A Study of Yongming Yanshou's Guanxin Xuanshu by Yi-hsung Huang

Inquiry into the origin of humanity: an annotated translation of Tsung-mi's Yüan jen lun with a modern commentary by Peter N. Gregory

Tsung-mi and the sinification of Buddhism by Peter N. Gregory

Coming to terms with Chinese Buddhism: a reading of the Treasure store treatise by Robert H. Sharf

Sudden and Gradual: Approaches to Enlightenment in Chinese Thought by Peter N. Gregory

Buddhism in the Sung by Peter N. Gregory, Daniel Aaron Getz

Steven Heine, Dale Stuart Wright:

Zen ritual: studies of Zen Buddhist theory in practice

Zen classics: formative texts in the history of Zen Buddhism

The Zen canon: understanding the classic texts

The Kōan: texts and contexts in Zen Buddhism

Zen Masters

Philosophical Meditations on Zen Buddhism by Dale S. Wright

Steven Heine:

Opening a mountain: kōans of the Zen Masters

Shifting shape, shaping text: philosophy and folklore in the Fox kōan

Zen skin, Zen marrow: will the real Zen Buddhism please stand up?

Did Dōgen go to China?: what he wrote and when he wrote it

Dōgen and the Kōan tradition: a tale of two Shōbōgenzō texts

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 24th, 2011 at 5:18 AM

Title: Re: Chan Texts: Translations & Studies

Content:

Astus wrote:

Seeing through Zen by McRae I think is the best for starters in the topic, and it is in quite an enjoyable style. Zongmi on Chan, The Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment, Cultivating Original Enlightenment and Tracing Back the Radiance are wonderful and comprehensive works on Zen doctrine and practice I can recommend for everyone who is serious about understanding this kind of Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 24th, 2011 at 5:18 AM

Title: Re: Chan Texts: Translations & Studies

Content:

Astus wrote:

Seeing through Zen by McRae I think is the best for starters in the topic, and it is in quite an enjoyable style. Zongmi on Chan, The Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment, Cultivating Original Enlightenment and Tracing Back the Radiance are wonderful and comprehensive works on Zen doctrine and practice I can recommend for everyone who is serious about understanding this kind of Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 24th, 2011 at 6:04 PM

Title: Re: Should we teach our children to be Buddhists?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't think teaching Buddhism to children means explaining impermanence, selflessness, emptiness or even death. Wisdom teachings are OK only in small amounts in wrapped in digestible stories. Otherwise it should be more of moral teachings and different practices of good deeds. And in case it is Mahayana teaching about bodhisattvas and buddhas plus some recitation is also good.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 25th, 2011 at 5:00 AM

Title: Re: Spreading the Dharma in Africa?

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://blog.biz/node/47>

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Category:Buddhism_in_Africa

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 26th, 2011 at 8:19 PM

Title: Re: Spreading the Dharma in Africa?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't remember if there were any country where immigrants could actually spread

Buddhism. That's for two reasons: 1. immigrants either form a closed community or assimilate; 2. immigrants lack the social position to be listened to by the hosting population. Christianity and Islam didn't spread in Africa because of immigrating Europeans and Arabs. And if Ethiopia doesn't allow other religions then Buddhism is not a religion.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 27th, 2011 at 3:32 AM

Title: Re: Spreading the Dharma in Africa?

Content:

Luke said:

But religions do have a history of inspiring prophets and saints who spread their religions, such as Guru Rinpoche and Bodhidharma (who were Indian foreigners in Tibet and China respectively). The locals became inspired to convert after meeting such amazing teachers.

Does anyone know if the Dalai Lama has ever visited Africa?

Astus wrote:

Good point, there are outstanding teachers, although the two you mentioned are mostly legendary figures (Chan definitely didn't become famous because of Bodhidharma). There are well known and widely respected teachers in the West among whom the Dalai Lama is the number one. However, we shouldn't forget the optimal conditions for such teachers to appear. The Dalai Lama is famous because he was the leader of Tibet, D. T. Suzuki became famous because there were people hungry for knowledge about the mystical East, and so on with other notable masters. If there are some groups in Africa looking for inner changes instead of outer rituals Buddhism has a chance of spreading.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 27th, 2011 at 4:04 AM

Title: Re: Why is Buddhism so appealing to educated Caucasians?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't think this should be a racial question, simply because I doubt it has much to do with it. Education and social situation on the other hand are important factors. It is also a question what kind of Buddhism one talks about. As I've heard Nichiren Buddhism is quite popular among working class people in America.

There is an important misconception about Buddhism among Westerners. That it is all about inner peace, meditation, philosophy and enlightenment. Quite far from the day to day reality of the majority of Buddhists. However, it would be nearly impossible at the moment to make people believe in the Pure Land instead of Jesus. That's why Buddhism first spread among the literati, the intellectuals who found foreign views inspiring. Even among the Buddha's immediate disciples many were from higher castes who lived in cities while the laity, who supported the Buddhist monks and nuns, kept their gods and rituals according to tradition.

The primary message of Buddhism to the common people is about alms giving, morality, merits and rebirth. The very part that Westerners rarely take notice of. But if one could choose between higher salary and a month long retreat it'd be the money in 9 out of 10 cases. So the Buddha says that if you want more money, a faithful spouse, a loving family and perhaps a good next life you should be generous and keep some precepts. However, if you are stingy and do bad things you'll be poor, sick and might even spend a few aeons in hell. This is easy to understand and makes sense, unlike talks about no-self, five aggregates, sitting on a cushion doing nothing and such. I don't know if there are teachers who try to spread this as Buddhism among people in the West. That's why those who are less interested in material gains - i.e. those who already have more than enough - want to learn Buddhism and not those who prefer a good meal over a good book.

As for Hungarian gypsies and Buddhism check out the <http://www.jaibhim.hu/>. They also have a school for gypsies: <http://www.ambedkar.eu/>.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 28th, 2011 at 5:01 PM

Title: Re: Dechan Jueren and Hanmi Buddhism

Content:

remm said:

The guy calls himself a "Living Buddha". This has fraud written all over it.

Astus wrote:

"Living buddha" is the same as "tulku".

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 28th, 2011 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: Master Sheng-yen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Very good interview, touches many important points.

I can only wish that the word "ego" eventually gets lost from being associated with Buddhism or used in that context.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 30th, 2011 at 7:37 PM

Title: Re: Treaders of the Path, why are you not liberated?

Content:

Astus wrote:

One day on the mountain Master Huike met a lay practitioner who had a skin disease.

The layman asked the master, "This disciple's body is bound up in illness. Master, please help me repent for my sins."

The master said, "Bring me your sins and I will absolve them for you."

After a pause the layman said, "Looking for my sins, I can't find them anywhere."

The ancestor said, "There, I have absolved your sins. From now on live in reliance on your true nature, on practice, and on spiritual community."

Master Huike ordained the layman and gave him the name Sengcan.

(<http://touchingearth.info/dregs/>)

Daoxin said, "I ask for the Master's compassion. Please tell me of the gate of emancipation."

Sengcan said, "Who has bound you?"

Daoxin said, "No one has bound me."

Sengcan said, "They why are you seeking emancipation?"

Upon hearing these words, Daoxin experienced great enlightenment.

(Zen's Chinese Heritage, p. 24)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 30th, 2011 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: Master Sheng-yen

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

Is Mahayana more restrictive in its view of what can be accomplished?

Astus wrote:

As always, it depends on whom you ask and what texts you cite.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 30th, 2011 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

How does a live webcast differs from a record, if at all?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 30th, 2011 at 10:02 PM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Namdrol,

So technically it is OK to have a recorded teaching, right? Then books are practically the same.

DN,

Intention is quite an internal thing, I don't see how its simultaneity has any relevance. Plus there is always a delay in transmission, even if just a few seconds.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 30th, 2011 at 10:17 PM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Namdrol said:

You can have a recorded teaching -- but you cannot receive transmission from a recording.

Astus wrote:

That's why I ask what the difference is between a live webcast and its record. If no transmission is possible through a record what makes the live one special? IIRC there were video cassettes used before online transmission. But even if the teacher simultaneously takes part without being seen or heard by the student, how is that relevant to those sitting in front of a screen?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 31st, 2011 at 4:35 AM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

My question basically was/is that since it is all right not to have a teacher there in person but it is enough to hear his voice and see his form via TV/computer, why would not a record of it be the same? And if digitally there is no difference at all between recorded and live - there isn't - whatever is communicated is either what is seen and heard or it is not. If it is communicated through perceptible means a record is as good as live. If it is not communicated through anything perceptible then what and how is it?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 31st, 2011 at 6:34 AM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

What does synchronicity stand for in this case? If the teacher is in a particular state that in fact nobody else can sense or touch in any way how does that influence those who attempt to be in the same state? Or even if both teacher and students are in the same state how is that related to each other? What is the connection between the state of the teacher and the students if not anything perceptible?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 31st, 2011 at 4:54 PM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

username said:

Apart from the session's pithy instructions which are secondary to intending and achieving instant presence anyway, conceptualizing or worrying about unnecessary temporal (synchronous/asynchronous) & causal clockworks are obstacles.

Astus wrote:

Since that is presented as an explanation of the mechanism I am actually interested what that really means. I don't see how that is bad.

Vajrahridaya said:

Basically, it was deeply felt, beyond the intellect, through the transmission due to the energy of intuitive synchronicity, like a grid of positive intention sweeping the globe.

"Snap"...

Astus wrote:

"energy of intuitive synchronicity" - very poetic expression. But it seems to me only a concept with little actual meaning. Is it that you're explaining an experience with a theory or that you are aware of a causal relation behind the events?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 31st, 2011 at 5:22 PM

Title: James Low & Simply Being

Content:

Astus wrote:

He is one of the less known teachers as he tours only in Europe. I find his style very modern and appropriate for the audience. There are transcripts and videos on the website, there are also books you can buy.

http://simplybeing.co.uk/simply/Simply_Being_Dzogchen.html

"Simply being is the ground, path and fruition of all existence. The teaching of this is known as dzogchen or the natural perfection of all experience.

This is not an abstract idea but is the vital presence which we embody and engage with as the world around us. Dzogchen teaching recalls us to the open nature of all things, the natural state we have never left, yet have somehow forgotten."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 31st, 2011 at 5:43 PM

Title: Re: What should you do when you don't have a Zen teacher yet?

Content:

James418 said:

Without a teacher the training cuts no ice. You just cannot get around it. Meditation doesn't mean jack unless you are being confronted with your fears and put through the wringer on a daily basis. Sure, life puts you on the precipice a couple of times, but a good teacher will put you through it far more frequently. Even in the more sedate traditions, they can be extremely rough - I know the Thai forest monks are very hard on the new monks for a few years until they get "softened up". In Zen there are the "fearful shouts and blows". In a traditional training they have a thousand or so years experience in knowing just how far they can push an individual before they crack - and a person on their own just can't recreate that.

Astus wrote:

You talk about a brainwashing camp, not Buddhism, as far as I can tell. I understand there are people who imagine Zen to be like the marine corps but I don't think it is. Have you heard of the Buddha beating monks? Or shouting at them? Unlikely. Zen stories are not the reality but religious tales, nobody should take those literally.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 31st, 2011 at 7:26 PM

Title: Re: Zen Training

Content:

Astus wrote:

OK, lets then clarify things here. What monastic training you mean? Japanese, Korean, Chinese or Western? If Japanese, what school? If it is Western Buddhist, which monastery? Generalisation would be very misleading here. I know that some Japanese Zen temples do it in a very tough fashion, but those are primarily the so called training monasteries where most of the people send only a little time and it is intensified like that because it is meant to be an intensive training. Such concept doesn't exist in other Buddhist countries where monasteries are just monasteries and monks won't leave to take over the family temple. Also, an intensive retreat is like Christmas, a special time of the year and not the normal way of daily activities. Such "pressure cooking" and "boot camp" is hardly the everyday experience of a common monastery where monks and nuns are busy with their daily activities - where sitting meditation is part of the morning and evening ceremony but otherwise optional.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 31st, 2011 at 9:29 PM

Title: Re: Zen Training

Content:

James418 said:

If you live with 10 people at close quarters for 6 months with few distractions, you will see some real fireworks. Like I said, it is a pressure cooker - all monasteries are.

Astus wrote:

And there are monasteries with hundreds of monks, a range of departments to organise publications, ceremonies, charities and many other programmes. Just check out <http://www.fgs.org.tw/english/>, <http://www.ctworld.org/english-96/html/index.htm>, http://www.hanmaum.org/eng/2007new/seon_center/history.html, etc.

You can also read Robert Buswell's brief summary of monastic life in Korea:

http://eng.buddhapia.com/_Service/_ContentView/ETC_CONTENT_2.ASP?pk=0000594076&sub_pk=&clss_cd=0002183611&top_menu_cd=0000000871

"But the importance of the meditation hall to Korean monasteries should not be overemphasized. While it is true that the meditation hall and the monks practicing there are the focus of much of the large monastery's activities, the majority of its residents spend no time in meditation and many have no intention of ever undertaking such training. Son monastic life therefore is broad enough to accommodate people of a variety of temperaments and interests—administrators, scholars, workers—offering them many different kinds of viable religious vocations."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 1st, 2011 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: What should you do when you don't have a Zen teacher yet?

Content:

Huseng said:

Actually the idealistic view of Zen monasteries in the west would have them as brainwashing camps.

The reality is much different.

Astus wrote:

A fertile soil for abusive "masters". I don't even understand this fascination with military style. Monasteries are not about training "Soldiers of Buddha". And fighting (inner and outer) doesn't lead to peace. In that short article Buswell has another good point in that short article quoted before (BTW, he also has a book on Korean Zen monasticism):

"Finally, many Western works on Zen describe the school as attempting to develop forms of Buddhist praxis that would appeal to the special religious needs of the laity. But the realities of modern Son training in Korea testify that it is only within the specialized practice institution of the meditation hall that anyone has much of a chance to succeed at meditation practice. Even monks in the support division of the Korean monastery are presumed to be so busy with their sundry duties that they are not meditating. But if the demands of meditation practice are considered to be beyond the ability of even the support monks to fulfill, what reasonable hope would there be for laypeople? The protestations of past masters to the contrary, Son monastic life suggest that Zen meditative techniques were never seriously intended for the laity, but targeted those few monks with the fortitude to endure many years of ascetic training in the meditation hall."

Here I'd like to add that Zen has never really been about rigorous meditation practice and asceticism (dhutanga), something that existed in Buddhism from the very beginning but cultivated only by a minority of monks.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 1st, 2011 at 3:03 AM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

username,

Of course I didn't mean to ponder about these things when one is attending a transmission. I'm asking about this here on the forum. Could you then explain, please?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 1st, 2011 at 4:37 PM

Title: Re: Zen Training

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think I've already made clear my point that Samurai Zen is a phenomenon limited to certain monasteries and not at all a general thing, especially not among fully ordained monks (and nuns!) in other countries.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 1st, 2011 at 5:31 PM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

username,

Thanks for the long response. Unfortunately, and this may be my fault, I don't see how it explains what I'm asking about. What I'm asking is simply the connection. It's like there are two computers and I'm asking how they are connected. I can't find in your answer that connecting relation. This I assume is important because that's why a live transmission is OK but not its recorded version. So it is the connection, not other parts I'm asking about.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 1st, 2011 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

username,

If it is beyond time-space it is always "at the same time" of no-time, so there's no difference between live and recorded.

Namdrol,

Of course not. However, a transmission is not a two-way communication but there is one speaker/transmitter and many listeners/receivers, like a radio/TV programme where whether the show is live or recorded makes no difference.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 1st, 2011 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: "Integral Zen"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Merzel has been involved with the Integral thingy for a while now, no surprise they create a One Big Integral Enlightenment Week.

OTOH, Zen has always been an open "school" ready to integrate different Buddhist and not so Buddhist teachings and practices in China, Korea and Vietnam, as it served as the organising system for the whole sangha.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 1st, 2011 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Pero said:

And that's the core of it. Who said transmission is a one-way thing?

I suppose you could say something like this. There can be only one person talking on the phone while the other just listens, but he still had to pick up the call. If he hadn't, the other person would not be talking and/or there would be no chance of hearing.

But, I think this changes with the type of transmission. I'm actually in the camp of people who believe that receiving a lung transmission should be possible through recordings. Dodrupchen used to send his students lungs on CDs. But you have to respect that teachers' idea from whom you're receiving teachings, so if he says it's a no go then it's a no go.

Astus wrote:

Well, transmission, pointing out instruction, they can be both one-way and two-way. In the form a webcast is done or when large number of people take part in it it is a one-way thing since it'd be quite impossible to involve even 50 people into a single event personally, not to mention hundreds. A two-way version is when there is communication between teacher and student and they personally know each other. If there is a visiting teacher from far away and gives whatever initiation/empowerment/teaching/etc. to a local group or audience, that's a one-way event, a one man show. Being part of a small community and having a close relationship with a teacher, that's a two-way thing.

I raised the question about communication exactly because I see no reason why it shouldn't be the same in a recorded form as in live. But since there were people who said there is a difference I wanted to know what it is. But I still have no definite answer.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 1st, 2011 at 10:17 PM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Pero said:

Intention is the difference. Above you're talking about relationship, not transmission. Transmission doesn't have anything to do with it. (though even for relationship you don't have to be together with the teacher physically)

The teacher has to have the intention to transmit or there is no transmitting. The person on the receiving end has to have the intention to receive, otherwise there can be no receiving. So it's like someone calls you and you don't pick the phone or you pick up the phone. The moment you picked up the phone it's no longer a one-way communication.

Astus wrote:

The intention on the part of the teacher can be in writing, painting, speaking, moving, etc. A record is made with the intention to bring it to others. Others listen to the teaching - live or recorded - with the intention to receive something. Thus there is no apparent need for a live event.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 1st, 2011 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Nangwa said:

The need is based on time.

The intentions have to be simultaneous for the connection to occur at its full potential.

Astus wrote:

What connection occurs? Connection between teacher and student through what?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 1st, 2011 at 10:52 PM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Pero said:

That could only be true for a lung transmission. For an empowerment I don't think so, since how can you record someone's inner dimension? If the teacher manifests as a deity to give an empowerment for example, how are you going to record that? There is no technology in existence that is capable of doing that.

Astus wrote:

If there is a personal contact (physical) required it is understandable that no record - or digital transmission - can substitute that (unless perhaps if we invent a holo-room like in Star Trek). My intention wasn't about going into other areas besides Dzogchen but only the discussion of this specific webcast format.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 1st, 2011 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Nangwa said:

Its hard to explain or describe.

Its easy for us to say romantic things about mind to mind transmission or karmic ripening etc. but the reality of the situation is more personal and I dont think the experience is uniform among students.

The only thing we can really talk about in the context of what "connects" is based on our own experience.

For me it has been a strong experience of clarity with some other odd occurrences. Both via webcast and in person.

Astus wrote:

Thanks for your reply, what you say is so intimate. I understand it is this emotional-magical aspect that can make a lot of difference, when one thinks there are others doing the same and the teacher is doing the transmission. But once the magic (the personal attitude toward the event) is taken out of the context what remains, well, is just the video record.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 1st, 2011 at 11:46 PM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Pero said:

I don't think it's really any different. For a direct introduction the teacher has to be in the state of Dzogchen. When he is giving transmission he is in that state for sure. If you just have a recording, there is no way of telling whether he is in that state or not, and that state cannot be recorded.

Astus wrote:

Direct introduction is said to happen when Phat cuts all conceptual elaborations. The teacher being in the state of Dzogchen, that's what I don't see how it affects those who receive the transmission. It should be a personal and direct experience on the part of the students who are to be introduced. Some realises it, some don't. But another being's state of mind, that is not accessible to the students, they don't see it or experience it any way. The teacher can't directly influence the minds of the listeners either, otherwise all should attain enlightenment right there.

Nangwa said:

Its not particularly magical.

All it really is is the Three Statements of Garab Dorje making sense in ones experience.

Its actually quite practical and what remains are the second and third statements.

Astus wrote:

That is quite a different thing in my interpretation. What you say doesn't explain the first statement itself as an interaction between teacher and student.

DN said:

What are you searching Astus? Some physical medium that allows the connection, like air conducting sound or the electromagnetic fields conducting information allowing the teacher, student connection? I don't understand what are you looking for.

Astus wrote:

Exactly. If there is an qualitative difference between a live and recorded transmission I'd like to have defined that quality.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 2nd, 2011 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Nangwa said:

How is it different?

The teacher has completely integrated into the state of the third statement and uses many methods (not just phat) to introduce the students to that state via the first statement/direct introduction.

Direct introduction works from a distance because the principles of the base are not constrained by space or time. What is constrained by time is the current condition of the students. Therefore, they must have the intention of receiving transmission at the time it is given and the teacher must give it simultaneously via a means by which he or she feels will be most conducive for students.

Its not very complicated. But it is highly experiential and the students have various different experiences based upon their prior training and connection to the teachings.

Astus wrote:

The base is unconditioned, the student is conditioned. The method of introduction is conditioned as it has to be on the level of the student. The teacher abiding in the base have an unconditioned mind, so it is not a method being communicated and not something a student perceives. What is perceived is the method and that method can be recorded and replayed since it is perceptible to the physical senses. That again is the reason I ask for the difference between the live and recorded transmission.

Am I repeating myself? Is it something I'm not getting?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 2nd, 2011 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Nangwa said:

The method is just a symbol to transmit the introduction.

It can be perceived or experienced if the student goes beyond the symbol of the method of introduction. And thats the rub. It IS a shared experience/connection that occurs at that very moment between the teacher and students. A recording just wont cut the mustard because the moment has passed.

Thats kind of the whole point. You are sharing an experience with the teacher via the methods he or she employs for the introduction.

Like I said before, its difficult to explain. Its up to the student and teacher to make that connection and work with it directly.

Astus wrote:

Letters are symbols to represent language, language is also a set of symbols to communicate thoughts. I don't see your thoughts and you don't see my thoughts. If I say the words you can't hear since you are not near me but as I write it down my thoughts eventually reach you in some form. Same goes on with symbols meant to convey the experience of realisation. The realisation itself is not communicated without some sort of expressions, and just as in case of words, the expressions don't lose their conveying nature if they are preserved in some way. To say that there is something is actually communicated without expressions means that there is actually no need for any form of communication, so the point of organising an event for transmission is meaningless. We can share an idea because we communicate in words or other means. Without words we don't share any idea neither can we decide if we share it or not. How is that different with realisation? Just because you have realised something - Dzogchen or anything else - if you don't tell me about it I won't be able to share it with you.

The Samdhinirmocana Sutra says, "Thus, good son, the saints, being freed from language through their holy wisdom and insight in this regard, realize the perfect awakening that reality is truly apart from language. It is because they desire to lead others to realize perfect awakening that they provisionally establish names and concepts and call things conditioned or unconditioned." This points clearly to the relationship between the ultimate and the conventional and how it is the conventional that teaches the path to the ultimate. Same what Nagarjuna said. How then can the Dzogchen transmission communicate something without conventional means? I know you said it's difficult to explain, but perhaps it's not impossible.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 2nd, 2011 at 1:54 AM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Namdrol said:
Yes.

Astus wrote:
What?

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, June 2nd, 2011 at 3:31 AM
Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen
Content:
Namdrol said:
Who said that Dzogchen is not communicated through conventional means?

Astus wrote:
Webcast happens in a video format. If it must be live and can't happen through a record there must be some extra beyond conventional means. That's what I'm inquiring about, that non-conventional part.

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, June 2nd, 2011 at 3:48 AM
Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen
Content:
Namdrol said:
No, it just means that two people have to be in a process of communication with each other.

Astus wrote:
In response to this (phone call) I said that at the time of a webcast (or even in a live session) the audience listens to the teacher and does not talk to him/her, so there is no communication between two people but communication from one person to the others. Of course, there is a room later for a Q&A part.

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, June 2nd, 2011 at 3:55 AM
Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen
Content:
Namdrol said:
That is communication between two people, a speaker and a listener.

Astus wrote:
OK, I feel we're getting somewhere now. The question then is: why is it important that the teacher is in the same state at the same time as the student? Isn't the point of the whole thing that the student realises it? How does it make a difference if somebody else is also in that realisation?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 2nd, 2011 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Nangwa said:

The student is not in the same state.

The teacher shows it to the student.

The student has a moment or two of recognition of that state.

It is then up to the student to continue to work with it.

Astus wrote:

But the state is not shown by the teacher being in it. It is not even a state that can be grasped, how could then the experience itself be shown?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 2nd, 2011 at 6:51 AM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Sönam said:

You try to use the dualistic mind environment to catch precisely a non-dual experience.

If the experience is non-dual, how can a difference between teacher and practitioner mind be perceived?. synchronization does not need to be in the same geographical space ... it would not need to be in the same time either, but then then experience is of a much more higher level ...

Astus wrote:

The question was/is about the difference between live and recorded forms. If neither time nor space matters that means there is no difference. Also, as Pero mentioned, oral and symbolic forms convey the direct one, since both oral and symbolic can be recorded without any problem, again, a recorded Dzogchen transmission is as good as a live one.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 2nd, 2011 at 4:58 PM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Pero said:

This is an incorrect conclusion. The direct transmission cannot be recorded at all, so how is a recording as good as a live one? A recording cannot give you a direct transmission, only a live teacher can.

Astus wrote:

Now we're going in circles. Direct transmission is that both student and teacher are in the same state and the same time. To bring a student to that state oral and symbolic methods are used and just because a teacher is in the state doesn't make the student attain in. Also, the state itself is not bound by space nor time, so being synchronous doesn't make sense. As you say, it is not "direct transmission" that is recorded but the methods that bring students to the realisation and that realisation is essentially the transmission. Based on these I ask why would a live teacher be necessary. The main point is the distinction of realisation and method where the method is perceivable but the realisation is not. If you say there is still a need for a live teacher there must be some error in the above reasoning.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 2nd, 2011 at 5:44 PM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Pero said:

The teacher is not necessarily in that state all the time. So if you listen to a recording, who knows what the teacher is doing. Without the teacher there cannot be a direct transmission. I'm repeating myself but I'm not sure how to explain it otherwise to you.

Astus wrote:

OK, the teacher has to be in the state for the transmission. Why? What difference does it make from the perspective of the student who either gets it there or not, perhaps realises it months later without the presence of any teacher. Why is a teacher needed there? Is there no explanation? Just because?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 2nd, 2011 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Pero said:

I already told you, every student gets it. They just might not be able to "understand" it at that time.

Astus wrote:

What do they get if they don't know about it? How is that different from saying that everybody has buddha-nature it's just they don't realise it? Getting something means there was something missing - but buddha-nature is already perfect so they can't be missing that. What people don't have is realisation and introduction to rigpa is supposed to be that, seeing original awareness. If they don't see it there what is it they still get?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 2nd, 2011 at 9:14 PM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

mindyourmind said:

But surely that question is valid regardless of whether the transmission or event is an electronic one or not. That scenario you sketch can, and no doubt does, happen in a more regular "face-to-face" meeting? I'm not sure that the question takes the discussion on the electronic transmissions any further.

Astus wrote:

Might be, still, the question is about the electronic form because it can be both live and recorded and it shows no difference from the perspective of the viewer.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 2nd, 2011 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: Master Sheng-yen

Content:

Huseng said:

Incidentally, the whole works of Master Sheng Yen are online now. Mostly Chinese, but click number 9 on the left-hand side for his writings in English.

<http://ddc.shengyen.org/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Astus wrote:

Unfortunately those are not all of his English books. More free literature here:

<http://chancenter.org/cmc/publications/free-literature/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 2nd, 2011 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Pero said:

That does happen, but it's like a flash. You might not realize it or even if you do it doesn't last. Soon after mind arises again and then you're left in doubt.

Astus wrote:

How does that qualify for transmission? People get shocked naturally in their daily lives. Also, there are the so called gaps between thoughts one could realise any time. But there is no recognition, no awareness of awareness on its own, so no realisation.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 2nd, 2011 at 9:38 PM

Title: Re: Layman Pang and me/us

Content:

Astus wrote:

The story of Pang Yun is just a story, take it as that. Renunciation of possessions can happen mainly in two ways: you become a monk or you remain a lay person but learn not to be (too) hung up by the things you have. Throwing out things for the sake of not having them, sure you can do that, but how would it help anyone? The problem doesn't lie in the things you have but your relationship with them. Ultimately you don't need anything beyond the four things needed by a monk (food, clothes, abode, medicine). Practically, as you're living in a developed country and you're not a monk hidden in a remote monastery, there are many things you use from spoon to central heating. And as I've heard UK is not the best place for spending your life in the shade of a tree.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 2nd, 2011 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

mindyourmind said:

In a face-t-face situation, can you really say that the viewer will always be able to pick up everything? My point about the lesson about "reality" remains. We treat a face-to-face meeting as "real", and an electronic one as seemingly less "real". Is that justified?

Astus wrote:

A good topic but I don't see yet how it pertains to this discussion on transmission. Perhaps if we take into account the possibility of visionary and dream transmissions. But then we just have lot of different settings without defining the relationship between teacher and student. It could be also added that infinite buddhas transmit the complete teaching all the time.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 2nd, 2011 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Namdrol said:

Astus:

You are wasting everyone's time with this question.

Dzogchen is a Vajrayana system. The Guru is indispensable.

If you want transmission, you must get it from a Guru. Live.

N

Astus wrote:

Is it a waste of time to investigate the nature of transmission? What you're saying is that "that's how it is, that's the tradition". Actually, that is an answer too and if that's all then I'm fine with it.

I've participated in Dzogchen transmission both face to face and DC's webcast, but I don't think it is relevant.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 2nd, 2011 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Namdrol said:

You don't think what is relevant?

Astus wrote:

My personal relationship with Dzogchen.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 2nd, 2011 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: Layman Pang and me/us

Content:

KwanSeum said:

So I should keep my car and Tag Heuer watch because otherwise I'd have to live in a field?

Astus wrote:

Keep it or leave it - these are extremes. You should find your priorities and see what use you can find for the things you have. If you want some extra cash you can sell your watch, if you don't need money now you can just keep it in a drawer. Or you can throw it out the window or give it to someone, whatever. Pang threw out his stuff because he didn't want them and thought that they'd only cause trouble to others. What do you think? If you gave your watch to a poor man, is that good for him or bad? If you keep it, is that good for you or bad? What makes something good or bad?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 2nd, 2011 at 11:23 PM

Title: Re: Layman Pang and me/us

Content:

LastLegend said:

Astus is right. If we are deluded, everything can be really bad. If we are not deluded, bad and good can not really bother us.

Astus wrote:

I'd rather say that we should be clear about causes and results while also aware of our mental state.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 2nd, 2011 at 11:32 PM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Namdrol said:

Plugging it in makes it work. Transmission is like the plugging in a device. Here you are plugging in your continuum to the living continuum of realization which comes from Samantabhadra to you.

Astus wrote:

Very plastic metaphor, and lineage is central in Vajrayana, I understand that. I was looking for a different kind of explanation but I can accept that it is something that doesn't exist. Thanks for the help.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 2nd, 2011 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Nangwa said:

Its not for everybody.

People have tried to give you a wide variety of explanations and metaphors etc. throughout this thread. At this point its repetitious and a bit silly.

Its starting to look like you have an aversion, rather than interest.

Astus wrote:

No aversion, I was simply looking a different kind of explanation. From the repetition it is clear there isn't such. No result is still a result.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 3rd, 2011 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: Electronic Dzogchen

Content:

Namdrol said:

ChNN also uses example of tuning in a radio or a TV to proper station.

Astus wrote:

And if we use that example it's the radiowave I don't really see.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 3rd, 2011 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: are all observations delusions?

Content:

Astus wrote:

All our observations are delusions because we maintain a subject-object duality, this is our fundamental ignorance. Shinran's deluded person is prthagjana in sanskrit, that is an ordinary being without insight into the true nature of reality. Since it is practically impossible to attain enlightenment in the Dharma-ending age, says Shinran, the only realistic option is to rely on Amida's vow. That is a religious-soteriological statement. It doesn't mean if you see a cat it is not a cat.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 3rd, 2011 at 4:52 PM

Title: Re: are all observations delusions?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

If all of our observations are delusions, then how do we know we are deluded? Wouldn't that observation be a delusion?

Astus wrote:

Delusion in Buddhism is not some sort of Matrix-like concept where everything is fake. Delusion means that in our experience we imagine into an inherent self and we reify concepts. In the Pure Land teaching what matters is that we are bound by karma - as a result of ignorance - and to attain freedom the best choice is to be born in the Pure Land of Amitabha. Being bound by karma means that our acts are based on the view of a self, whether we do good or bad, consequently we keep being reborn in the six realms of samsara. This is not about our ability to comprehend our situation but about liberating ourselves from karma. In terms of the four noble truths, the Pure Land teaching means that we can understand that samsara is suffering, our desires cause the suffering, desire can be eliminated, but since we have low capacity to liberate ourselves we rely on the vow of Amitabha to be born in the Pure Land and there attain enlightenment and liberate all beings.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 3rd, 2011 at 7:41 PM

Title: Re: are all observations delusions?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

But that's what I am talking about. "we imagine into an inherent self and we reify concepts" is the setting in which we experience the senses, suffering, pleasure, etc. and the means by which we establish for ourselves the validity of the Buddha's teachings. But because "we imagine into an inherent self and we reify concepts" doesn't that make what we experience also a delusion? And if we observe that they are delusions, then isn't that observation a delusion as well?

Astus wrote:

Then please clarify what you mean by delusion. In my understanding the chair I'm sitting on is a chair for any other human being and it has the function of a chair. This is its conventional reality, something that people call real, so calling it a chair and perceiving it as a chair is correct comprehension, not mistaken.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 3rd, 2011 at 11:31 PM

Title: Re: Zen Training

Content:

Astus wrote:

"I'd been working, or attending to something, or in the midst of the eternal wait (for phones, for guests, for orders or requests from senior nuns, for work, for anything) that typifies temple life for young nuns. Maybe it typifies it for senior nuns, too; but young or old, we're rarely found in an attitude of formal meditation if we live in an average temple. We're usually found in a state of mild anxiety, trying to anticipate what might happen or need to happen next. Do we cultivate patience? Yes. Generosity? Yes. Attention to the moment? Yes: but not by sitting on cushions, not by scheduling in practice, not by having "space," not by having "down time." Would I like to see practice more formally structured and addressed among the young monastic community? Yes, but that's not the present situation we have to live with."

<http://fromthisshore.wordpress.com/2011/04/26/the-chance-to-not-do-morning-walk-4-23/>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 4th, 2011 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: are all observations delusions?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Master Yüan-chao states:

In breaking through delusion and realizing true reality in this world, one employs self-power; hence, [self-power practices] are taught in various Mahayana and Hinayana sutras. In going to the other world to listen to the dharma and realize enlightenment, one must rely on Other Power; hence, birth in the Pure Land is taught. Although these two ways differ, they are both means [provided by Sakyamuni] for leading one to realization of one's mind.

(http://www.shinranworks.com/majorexpositions/kgssII-81_83.htm)

Shinran:

"I know nothing at all of good or evil. For if I could know thoroughly, as Amida Tathagata knows, that an act was good, then I would know good. If I could know thoroughly, as the Tathagata knows, that an act was evil, then I would know evil. But with a foolish being full of blind passions, in this fleeting world- this burning house- all matters without exception are empty and false, totally without truth and sincerity. The nembutsu alone is true and real."

<http://www.shinranworks.com/relatedworks/tannisho3.htm>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 7th, 2011 at 4:41 AM

Title: Re: James Low & Simply Being

Content:

Astus wrote:

In other words, the primordial state of enlightenment is discovered. Mind-essence was pre-enlightened; our original ground is already enlightened. In the Dzogchen approach, this discovery is called being re-enlightened. Mahamudra does not use these terms re-enlightened and pre-enlightened, but at the fourth stage of nonmeditation the meaning is basically the same. ... Third is awareness-rigpa reaching fullness, and the fourth stage is called the exhaustion or depletion of all concepts and dualistic phenomena. This stage is equivalent of the stage of nonmeditation in Mahamudra. The ultimate state of enlightenment is being re-enlightened in the pre-enlightened original ground, as mentioned above.

(Adeu Rinpoche: Correlating Mahamudra & Dzogchen in Quintessential Dzogchen, p. 210-211)

The best situation would be if we had never strayed into the deluded way of perceiving to begin with. But somehow it seems that we missed the opportunity to be primordially enlightened, and now we are deep in confusion. ... Even though we missed the chance to be primordially enlightened - "pre-enlightened," if you will - we can still attain stability in the natural freedom of our essence and become "re-enlightened."

(Drubwang Rinpoche: Fearless Simplicity, p. 95)

We possess an enlightened essence, but having temporarily lost that connection we are deluded. Continuously missing the opportunity to awaken, we fall under the power of our ordinary experience, governed by habits so strenuous to maintain such a clinging to a self. ... The loosening of our grasping untangles a knot in our heart; we do not need to stay bound and strangled by it. Likewise, from our confused state, we can be reprogrammed because we are primordially enlightened and we have the potential to return to that state as re-enlightened. Best to leave this for now and conclude by using Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche's words: ... The dirt has to be removed to re-establish the purity of the jewel.

(Marcia Dechen Wangmo: Confessions of a Gypsy Yogini, p. 15-16)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 7th, 2011 at 5:12 AM

Title: Re: James Low & Simply Being

Content:

Namdrol said:

There is no term or concept in Dzogchen as being "re-enlightened". Does not exist and does not make sense.

Astus wrote:

Nevertheless, the above authors did use it with the same meaning in a Dzogchen context. If it is not a traditional term it might be a new one.

Tulku Urgyen's "Repeating the Words of the Buddha" has a whole chapter entitled "Re-enlightenment".

At the second movement, the delusions are dispelled and the (perfection) of primordial wisdom develops. That is the development of the basis (itself) as the result (of enlightenment). It is called the re-enlightenment (or self-liberation) through the realization of the essence, the primordial Buddhahood.

(Longchen Rabjam: The Practice of Dzogchen, p. 207)

Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche said, "The confusion that arose in ... the path can be cleared away. When we remove the temporary stains from primordially awakened rigpa, we become re-enlightened instead of primordially enlightened. This is accomplished by following the oral instructions of a fully qualified master."

(Nyoshul Khenpo: Natural Great Perfection, p. 71)

We should train in the state of rigpa that is originally pure. Although the essence is primordially enlightened, the yogi has to be re-enlightened. We have fallen into delusion. Attaining stability in non-delusion is called re-enlightenment.

(Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche: As It Is, vol. 2, p. 67)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 7th, 2011 at 3:13 PM

Title: Re: James Low & Simply Being

Content:

Astus wrote:

Magnus,

As the quotes themselves explain, "re-enlightenment" is meant within the context of Samantabhadra as the primordially enlightened buddha and the teaching of original wakefulness. Nobody said that it implies we were all once buddhas then became ordinary beings even if the explanation is given again and again how one keeps straying from buddha-mind every moment.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 7th, 2011 at 3:55 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist fundamentalists?

Content:

Astus wrote:

You won't get rid of sectarianism ever. I see a good chance for the merging of different teachings because of the varied sources one can find now, however, even then there are differing interpretations.

"the Buddha was not a fundamentalist because he invited people to test and debate his Dharma, something a fundamentalist would normally not allow."

It's not that so called fundamentalists don't invite you for a debate but it is how they debate. Debates in most cases are about personal emotions and not the subject of the debate especially when the goal is to convert somebody. Debating for the sake of learning is a different matter, but then fundamentalism is not an issue.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 7th, 2011 at 6:10 PM

Title: Re: Authority in dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Wouldn't it be surprising to find a group of people where everybody agrees on everything? Sounds unnatural, isn't it? Or like brainwashed cultists. There are teachers, groups, lineages, traditions so different people can follow the idea they prefer. One might believe that "ultimately everything is one" but relatively there is an obvious diversity. However, once there is authority, orthodoxy, then there are heretics and enemies of the true faith.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 8th, 2011 at 1:12 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist fundamentalists?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Considering that there are quite a few Vinayas and pratimokshas it is a bit naive to think that all of them are directly from Shakyamuni himself. Understanding the history of Buddhism can actually facilitate the weakening of sectarianism, like <https://sites.google.com/site/sectsandsectarianism/> by Bhikkhu Sujato. This crossing the barriers I think is a major task of 21st century global Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 8th, 2011 at 3:47 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist fundamentalists?

Content:

Namdrol said:

All the vows come from the Buddha, they are just different transmissions.

Astus wrote:

Since the vows are different the transmissions are corrupted - although the different pratimokshas are like 95% identical. We could say that since the Dharmaguptaka vows only have a few extra and minor rules compared to Theravada it is no big thing to make Dharmaguptaka a Theravada version. The idea of a transcendent "spirit of transmission", well, I better leave that to abhidharmikas.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 8th, 2011 at 4:26 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist fundamentalists?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Geeez, and here was me, dumb ass that I am, thinking that enlightenment is enlightenment until a bunch of academics came along and proved me wrong. Now ordination is not ordination and somebody is gonna come along and say to me that Buddhism is not Buddhism.

Can somebody please remind me again exactly how many angels can dance on the head of a pin?

While I agree that there must be some kind of continuity in the ordination lineages isn't it enough to just get three or more precept holders, regardless of lineage, to bestow the vows? What would happen if you got two precept holders from one lineage and one from another lineage together to give you the vows (for lack of three plus from a single lineage)? Would that mean your vows are not valid? I know it's highly hypothetical (or maybe it isn't really) but I am interested in what the answer is.

Astus wrote:

It isn't hypothetical since that's what happened at nun ordinations for Theravada and Tibetan groups. You can also see now how Vinaya can be not much different from the Canon Law of the Catholic Church and how fundamentalism - or https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Legalism_%28theology%29 - is very much present in the debate over ordaining nuns. But I think it's not difficult to find other incidents similar to that.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 8th, 2011 at 9:56 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist fundamentalists?

Content:

Namdrol said:

The key point is this: the Mūlasatvastivadas, the Theravadins and the Dharmaguptakas all have their own Vinaya tradition. They are not interchangeable, though some wish it were so.

Traditionally, each vinaya tradition came from one of Buddha's arhat disciples. So for example, Mulasarvastivada came from Rahula; Thervada from Upali, and so on.

Each vinaya has its own oral tradition and explanations of the vows, as well as procedures for ordination. They are not interchangeable.

Astus wrote:

That can be said supposing that there is something more to those precepts besides what is actually written down. But there isn't.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 8th, 2011 at 10:22 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist fundamentalists?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Based on this statement, and your confusion about Dzogchen in the other thread, one thing is clear: you do not understand the concept of transmission. You cannot get transmission from a book.

Astus wrote:

Indeed. I was thinking about starting a separate topic on transmission.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 8th, 2011 at 11:24 PM

Title: What is Transmission?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Based on two previous topics I'd like here to discuss the notion and meaning of transmission within Buddhism. By transmission there are three versions I can think of now: transmission of precepts (ordination), transmission of Dharma (as in Zen), transmission of empowerment (as in Tantra). The concept of transmission always involves a lineage behind it that goes back to Shakyamuni or some other major figure (human or non-human). My problem and cause of disbelief in the concept of transmission is based on two points: lack of historical basis and lack of anything perceptible that could be transmitted beyond the apparent texts and rituals. But, there are those who believe transmission is real and important. How so?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 8th, 2011 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: Zen the Literary Movement

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is called 文字禪 (wenzi chan), Literary Chan. While literacy and culture has a lot to do with Chan that is not the only thing there is to it. Besides those of high status who composed many works you should consider the hermits and forest monks too - who of course seldom left anything to future generations. One exceptional person is Miyun Yuanwu from 17th century who was from a lowly family and had minimal education. But then his simplistic "hit and shout" Chan was ridiculed and attacked by Hanshan Deqing and many others while at the same time he revived Chan throughout China.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 8th, 2011 at 11:39 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Knowledge is conceivable and perceivable by mind. It can also be spoken of and written down. Transmission beyond the six senses, that is the mystical part I was talking about.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 9th, 2011 at 4:29 AM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Greg,

I find the eight-consciousness model a provisional one. Same for tathagatagarbha. I've never taken part in a Tantric initiation in order to be empowered to practice it - it would require faith in it on my part to do that. Curiosity is a different matter.

Nangwa,

Sharing directly, in my understanding that would require something like telepathy. It is another thing that one generates the appropriate mental state, that is the work of the faithful within the context of a religious event.

Kyosan,

We might share the experience of eating apple. Still, you have no direct access to my taste-consciousness to compare it to your taste-consciousness. Same goes with other kinds of experience. It is also because of the impossibility of accessing others' experiences directly that I find transmission a rhetorical means only.

Adinatha,

You can't transmit your karma to me and I can't transmit my karma to you. Of course, if such thing were possible fulfilling the bodhisattva vows would be pretty simple.

Will,

Yes, one can have the feeling and the idea that one has received blessings, transmissions or curses as well. But do you feel blessed when sprinkled by holy water? Do you feel ecstatic when meeting XY celebrity? Do you feel moved when hearing the national anthem? Even if you don't, many do. And some others feel and think the very opposite. Should we then say that the holy water is truly holy, the celebrity is charismatic and the national anthem is beautiful?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 9th, 2011 at 4:58 AM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

Will said:

True enough, but you are shifting your query. The question was not, was X objectively holy etc, but if the alleged source of the transmission was extra-sensory or mystical how could that source affect one? I pointed out that our mind is beyond the 5 regular senses and thus mystical & extra-sensory itself. Are thoughts, feelings, ideas, imagination etc. confined to the 5 senses - no.

If you think the mind is identical with the brain, then say so; if not, then it appears to me that the non-physical mind is ideal for knowing the extra-sensory.

Astus wrote:

I said six senses not five. The mind is not extrasensory since it is something I am very much aware of, how could it be otherwise? I'm not talking about physical or non-physical. However, one can't just implant a thought or feeling into another being's mind directly, without the use of the other sensory perceptions.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 9th, 2011 at 6:04 AM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

adinatha said:

There is both individual and common karma, right?

Astus wrote:

Only beings can have karma. A group has no karma of its own only its members, since a group is not a being to have a will.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 9th, 2011 at 3:23 PM

Title: Re: Zen the Literary Movement

Content:

Astus wrote:

I agree very well that Zen is a "literary movement", meaning that it's full of rhetorical methods and relies heavily on written materials. Also, as you mentioned, lineage and Zen masters were/are the matter of leadership, the abbots of monasteries who are busy with obtaining lay support and organising the community. There are now a couple of studies investigating in depth the development of the Zen school throughout the centuries in terms of socio-political events.

Geoff, what you mention in Korea is their system of dividing the year into three months periods where summer and winter are for retreats, spring and autumn are for wandering. But retreat doesn't necessarily mean one has to sit in the hall, it is just one of the options a monk/nun can choose.

But besides that Zen has little to do with rigorous meditation, meditation retreats are usually done once in a while by many monastics as part of their training. Although there's not much specifically Zen in that.

I think there are three important factors in Zen that made it the most successful form of Buddhism in East Asia: sudden enlightenment, dharma lineage and literary style. These three proved to be useful in organising monasteries and involving the literati to give ample support for the Zen people instead of others when they had to vote for the new abbot in a public monastery.

side note: the "dharma lineage" idea that created the Zen family (禪家) - besides its resonance with EA culture - makes it look like a mafia group...

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 9th, 2011 at 3:33 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

Kyosan said:

But you know that the fundamental doctrine of Buddhism says that people are deluded and don't experience the world as it really is. And through practicing Buddhism one is able to overcome the delusion. Suppose that both of us became enlightened. Don't you think that your experiencing the world as it really is would be the same as my experiencing the world as it really is? And don't you think that we would agree on what the true nature of the world is? I think we would.

Astus wrote:

Do you find that Buddhists throughout the world agree on what ultimate reality consists of? I don't.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 9th, 2011 at 4:46 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Adinatha,

So you would establish transmission based on the existence of a group karma? We can try that way, of course. Then it first needs to be established what is group karma. Does group karma exist within each member's mental continuum or is it somewhere else? If it is within the members' mind and people can't share their minds to make a single consciousness it turns out that group karma means nothing but common features among individuals. So we can say that we're all humans, that's a group karma. We have either black, brown, blonde or red hair (or perhaps white), another group karma. We can have blue, brown, green or grey eyes, still, you don't see what I see. Another question is, if there is group karma, what creates it and what suffers it? If a member of the group does something, does that affect everyone even if they don't know about it? If one Ukrainian gives a dollar to a beggar does the whole nation share the merit? If a Belgian beats a French in Amsterdam will the Belgians share the demerit and the French the pain? If one member's acts have no consequences for the group than how can anyone's act affect the group? By the way, what makes somebody a German or Austrian? Citizenship? Birth? Culture? Language? Personal choice? And there are a few other problems I can find with it.

But this still doesn't address what transmission actually is.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 9th, 2011 at 4:51 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Greg,

He said enlightened people, and enlightened people exist and existed in the different Buddhist schools. And those enlightened people could even debate with each other.

Whether alayavijnana exists or not, and how, I'd rather put that aside for a different thread to discuss it.

What I meant this topic for is to clarify transmission. Unfortunately, most of the posts here talked about something else. I assume that is because there is just this word "transmission" but nothing more to put our finger on.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 9th, 2011 at 5:47 PM

Title: Re: Zen the Literary Movement

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm sure there were Zen teachers (abbots) without insight into the depths of Buddhism, however, that I would rather not generalise. Many of them were monks for one or two decades already when got into the position of Zen teacher, so technically they were elders. Also they were supposed to be outstanding people within the community and that's why they were chosen to serve as leaders. They had the necessary education and understanding to maintain the quality of the monastic training. Of course, when we think of thousands of temples and convents where each of them needed an abbot (member of the Zen family) it is natural that some Zen teachers were better than the others.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 9th, 2011 at 6:29 PM

Title: Re: Zen the Literary Movement

Content:

Jñāna said:

Yes, and some do choose it. And some also choose to enter into longer solitary retreat.

Astus wrote:

And that is all right. But there are two things to see here I believe: 1. Zen is not mainly about meditation practice, 2. meditation practice (up to its ascetic form) is not restricted to Zen but is present in all traditions (including Pure Land).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 9th, 2011 at 9:12 PM

Title: Re: Zen the Literary Movement

Content:

Huseng said:

To borrow a term from Jan Nattier it is the "spiritual elite" that engage in those yogic endeavors that result in realization.

Astus wrote:

Sudden enlightenment is a teaching that makes yogic/ascetic practices also unnecessary, an important feature of Zen. The huatou practice is an obvious combination of literary works and meditation in daily activities.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 9th, 2011 at 9:28 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Since you have not "perceived" transmission so how can you understand it? Through metaphor of course! Everybody here is using metaphors to try to explain to you what transmission is otherwise the conversation will be kind of like this:

Astus: What's an apple?

Everybody else: It's an apple!

Kinda stoopid, huh?...

Astus wrote:

So you say that it can't be explained what is being transmitted because "you have to experience it"? Even about <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Apple> there is quite a lot to say, and this is just Wikipedia. If somebody asks about selflessness it would be a weak and dismissive answer to say "you have to experience it" or give a few metaphors as if one were talking about human reproduction to little children. Fortunately there are many teachings on selflessness to provide a clear and lucid explanation to anyone interested. Anything even close to that on transmission?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 9th, 2011 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

Namdrol said:

A common example is a seal and its impression.

Astus wrote:

Would that mean that the teacher/preceptor directly inputs certain mental patterns from his mind to the receiver of the transmission? That would be like reprogramming somebody's mind. That sounds to me contrary to common sense and karmic integrity.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 9th, 2011 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

adinatha said:

Group karma is similar results from similar causes. Each individual has its own continuum, suffering alone. It is like a mirroring effect. The nature of awareness is mirror-like. If I hold up a mirror, and you hold up a mirror while standing nearby one another, we will reflect one another. And so it goes on down the line through space and time. The master/disciple dynamic is just this with regard to body, speech and mind of Buddha.

Astus wrote:

The nature of awareness being mirror-like doesn't mean that we keep reflecting everything we see. Reflecting to whom, anyway? But this is just a metaphor and it may not necessarily be about the reflective attributes of mirrors. If I sit in front of a person that person's body won't appear as my body, nor will that happen with speech or mind. Where is the mirroring effect then?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 9th, 2011 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Notice how nowhere in this apple is there a discussion about the taste of an apple? Why? Because it cannot be defined through concepts, it has to be experienced. So does that mean that there is no such thing as the taste of an apple? Just because it cannot be defined?

Astus wrote:

A large number of words refer directly or indirectly to sensory experience without which we would have little to talk about. But if you're up to some apples, try this https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/List_of_apple_cultivars where they give some hint on the taste of different varieties. And I assume those who are really into the apple business can go on and on about the different tastes and textures of apples. Think about those wine and cheese experts.

gregkavarnos said:

Really? So a lecture on ethics that makes you decide to follow a certain code of conduct is contrary to common sense and karmic integrity? I mean really the lecture is just sounds, ideas and visual images, it is nothing really substantial yet it causes you to change your whole way of seeing...

Astus wrote:

A lecture on ethics may transform people, yes. But that doesn't mean it was because the lecturer had a special aura, was part of a lineage thousand years old, was initiated and anointed by a group of ethics lecturer, not even because the lecturer lives and ethical life. It is simply through being able to conceive the words said and through understanding them puts it into practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 9th, 2011 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Padma,

Your analogy is all right, it is the meaning of tradition and how customs are passed down the ages - although never without modification. Cultivating apples can be learned from the old apple farmer, sure. It can also be learned at university where you study things from a scientific point of view and learn not just a few things a single farmer may tell you but knowledge collected, tested and proved by large number of people. That does make a difference between medieval and modern agriculture. And the old farmer and a university are not the only two possible sources of how to manage an apple orchard. Compared to that, insisting on a personal transmission is saying that all who want to learn cultivating apples must find an apple farmer whose father, grandfather, great-grandfather, etc. were also apple farmers; or that the apple farmer was a disciple of another apple farmer who was also a disciple of an apple farmer all the way back to the inventor of apple farming.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 9th, 2011 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

adinatha said:

Your body is not the mirror. Your mind is exactly a mirror. There are even "mirror neurons." This is why when you see someone experience a sensation, you also experience it to a degree; your brain will light up as if it were in first person. You can google "mirror neurons."

Astus wrote:

Mind is also said to be like: space, light, water/ocean, monkey, sky, sun, tree, etc. I wouldn't rely so heavily on a metaphor for mind to explain something else. And even if you got it with a metaphor, how do you explain in terms of actual events?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 9th, 2011 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Compared to that, insisting on a personal transmission

Namdrol said:

Without personal transmission, you will never practice Vajrayana or Dzogchen. Ever. Instead, you will lead yourself and your students into hell.

N

Astus wrote:

I neither practise nor teach any of that.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 9th, 2011 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

I am not saying that you need a transmission. But if you want a transmission, then this is what it is. That's just the route you take. "Transmission" suggests something that is passed from one to another. In this case, it isn't something that you don't already have. It's just that the person who is transmitting to you (notice I didn't say 'transmitting IT ' to you) had the transmission to them, so they know how and when.

Maybe, instead, you will be walking along, deeply absorbed in the meditation of all the dharma you have ever learned and then a truck drives by and honks its horn and BOOM! You are enlightened. It's not very likely to happen, but if it slices your apple open, why not?

Astus wrote:

What you described fits any kind of discipleship, Buddhism or not. Transmission, when understood as something occurring on a ceremony, is not really that. And I'm asking about this second form, whether it's the transmission of precepts (as in the Fundamentalists? topic) or the transmission of something Tantric.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 10th, 2011 at 5:17 AM

Title: Re: Zen the Literary Movement

Content:

Astus wrote:

The following quotes show how Chan Buddhism was reinvented in 17th century China - Japan's Obaku school comes from this phenomenon - through the strong influence of the literati and based solely on texts. A summary of it is found in the last quote.

"In particular, the literati were deeply immersed in reading and writing Buddhist texts. In their religious reading and writing, the literati displayed a unique spiritual orientation that shaped their understanding of Buddhism. For most of them, reading and writing Buddhist, especially Chan Buddhist, literature was one of the many cultural pastimes in which they dabbled during their leisure time. Because their entry into Buddhism did not begin with faith in the Buddhist belief system, they tended to emphasize the supreme and most sophisticated expressions of philosophical wisdom rather than precepts and devotional activities. Many of them simply dismissed the Buddhist teaching of retribution and reincarnation because for them this coarse reasoning of punishment and reward was obviously designed for the unsophisticated minds. Even in their meditation practice, the literati preferred to use Dahui Zonggao's method of meditating on the key phrases (huatou), a spiritual exercise transformed from the attentive contemplation on doubts that have been aroused from intensive koan study. This practice has a clear trace in their habit of religious reading because of its origins in textual study. Because their spiritual experience was largely generated and fostered during the process of reading, writing, and discussing, without leaving a carefully constructed textual realm, I tend to call such a religious experience "textual spirituality" to distinguish it from a more devotion-based religious experience. Exploring the characteristics of textual spirituality is important in this study because, through reading and writing, a shared mentality took form in some literati's communities, in which Chan monks were members and were deeply influenced by such a text-based spiritual orientation."

"In this sense, the textual authority generated from a kind of textual spirituality would invest the literati and the literati-turned-monks with a particularly advantageous position in the Buddhist world, especially in Chan Buddhism, which is largely textually constructed."

"Here, the issue of religious reading looms large because the literati's understanding of Chan was largely a romantic imagining based on their leisure reading of Chan texts. Some of these Confucian literati, without serious interest in everyday monastic routines, such as liturgical services, observance of precepts, and ordination, envisioned Chan as iconoclastic and antinomian, exactly as the authors of numerous Chan texts wanted their readers to believe. Evidence shows that some members of Wang Yangming's movement played pivotal roles in nurturing Chan ideals in monastic communities. I tend to call the religious experience generated purely from reading and writing religious texts “textual spirituality” to distinguish it from a more devotion-oriented type of religiosity.”

"As I have pointed out, Chan texts served as the source of new interpretations and inventions for Chan monks and the literati. Their religiosity is therefore a type of textual spirituality, as I called it in chapter 2, because it is largely textually based and nourished by activities such as reading and writing. Along with the rise of such textual spirituality was a conscious search for a new hermeneutic strategy to approaching texts.

Depending on the hermeneutic strategy that was chosen, the meanings of these texts could be understood in different ways: A metaphorical reading could regard all occurrences recorded in Chan texts as if “real” or, in other words, as “pedagogical devices” to induce enlightenment experiences for students of these texts. Or, as Bernard Faure suggests, Chan texts are basically products of a “writing-act,” which follows the rule of textual production and thus must “be read as [a] self-referential literary work” (Faure’s emphasis).⁸ A more literal understanding, however, could lead one to the belief that the events, or textual precedents, created in Chan texts were distinctively “real.” The implication of this reading is that the idealized events are considered performable and realizable.

This literal hermeneutic strategy became the way that Chan masters recreated reality. The fact that Chan Buddhism in the seventeenth century lacked any spiritual innovations comparable to those in early periods shows exactly that Chan Buddhism intended to be loyal to Chan’s past as reflected in Chan texts. The controversies reveal that, in the seventeenth century, Chan monks advocated exactly this literal mode of interpretation, which considered the events recorded in Chan literature to be real and practical. For example, encounter dialogue, a seemingly real occurrence, was imitated and repeated; a strict definition of dharma transmission, based on the principle of face-to-face instruction and authentication by evidence, was put into practice. In short, the Chan monks read Chan texts literally and intended to revive an imagined past in the present.”

source: Jiang Wu: Enlightenment in Dispute, p. 53-54; 67; 82; 248

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 10th, 2011 at 5:46 AM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

Namdrol said:

This has been explained already a hundred time: a teachers talks from his experience and realization using words and similes. You actively listen and understand.

That is all there is to transmission. It's not telepathic, it is not a substantial "something" you can put in a box.

Transmission means direct communication from one person who has some knowledge

(in this case, creation and completion stage, dzogchen, etc) to someone who wants to develop that knowledge themselves. There are different methods for giving transmission. But they all share one thing in common -- a realized teacher communicates using words and similes and a student listens and understands at the same time. This is really not so fricking hard to understand. So I don't see why you are wasting people's time with this inane question anymore.

N

Astus wrote:

If that was it all I wouldn't raise the issue at all. But then there's exactly what Cone said about an unbroken lineage. I'm not so familiar with other kinds of Buddhism as with Chan, and while the common rhetoric is that there is an unbroken lineage from Shakyamuni to the present masters, historically speaking that is just simply wrong and nothing more than a religious concept. There was no unbroken lineage in the 9th, 13th, 17th or 20th century, there wasn't even an unbroken lineage between these eras. And with all the messing around with ordination it is not at all unfounded to consider that precept lineages are not unbroken either. It might be that in other countries politicians and kings were all pious Buddhists, that monks were all holy people, but in China it was not unusual to sell ordinations, make the nobleman's son the abbot, and sometimes exile, disrobe or even execute monks just because somebody didn't like them. Also, the common practice of mass ordination - as it has been in practice for a thousand years - is against Vinaya IIRC.

The other, not historical part is that I see no special benefits and sanctity in a lineage. This extra importance of a lineage is what makes me ask: what is transmission then? It is obviously not just receiving teachings from educated and experienced people. It is not just comprehending the words and symbols but receiving The Lineage, the transmission. What is that lineage then? Is that just a list of names people should believe in as their spiritual ancestors? It is this kind of transmission that I don't see as something so important and essential.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 10th, 2011 at 3:51 PM

Title: Re: Zen the Literary Movement

Content:

Astus wrote:

Zen being a literary movement should be understood as something that makes Zen special among other forms of Buddhism is their literature and language. That means that Zen doesn't really have its own philosophy but has a way of speaking about common Buddhist teachings in a special way. Besides this literary part Zen monks do practically same as any other monk does. It might also be considered that almost every monastery in China and Korea is nominally a Zen monastery, thus being a Zen monk means nothing more than being an ordinary monk. And then there were times when Zen became especially popular and that resulted in new Zen texts in large numbers, texts that later became the classics. In that sense Zen is largely a literary thing, because outside of such literature there is nothing specifically Zen one may find.

As for the emphasis on meditation practice, it'd be interesting to enumerate the actual number of meditation handbooks. In the Song dynasty there were only two written, both of them quite brief. Compare that to other schools' manuals and it'd appear that Zen people never even meditated - which is of course not true. But meditation itself, just like all the other common monastic practices, were nothing "Zen specific".

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 10th, 2011 at 4:13 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Correct. There is an unbroken lineage. In Vajrayāna is goes Dharmakāya, Sambhogakāya -- then some mahāsiddha, etc.

All these lineages are unbroken. Chan did not invent the idea of "lineage" until they were put in competition with Vajrayāna in the late seventh century.

N

Astus wrote:

As for Vajrayana, I don't know if there is evidence for such lineage or not. Chan didn't invent the idea of lineage, true. It first appeared in Chinese Buddhism in the Tiantai school. Connection to any Vajrayana lineage idea can't be established. That is, if we look at the Buddhist context. Otherwise ancestor worship and such existed in China long before Buddhism arrived there.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 10th, 2011 at 4:14 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

Sherab said:

If all that is involved in a transmission is that the teacher speaks and one listen and understand, then as Astus mentioned previously, one should be able to get transmission from a recording.

If the presence of the teacher is required in a transmission, something else (other than the teacher speaking and the students listening and understanding) must be happening that cannot happen in a recording.

Therefore to say that a transmission is that a teacher speaks and the students listen and understand and then to insist that a transmission can only be a transmission when the teacher is present just does not gel.

Astus wrote:

Thanks. Somebody who understood my point.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 10th, 2011 at 4:58 PM

Title: Re: Zen the Literary Movement

Content:

Fu Ri Shin said:

So if every other tradition has as little emphasis on meditation as Zen, what are they a tradition of then?

Astus wrote:

I think the point is that Zen is not The Meditation School. Meditation does not even define Zen. Meditation is one of the many religious practices in Buddhism and it is practised in all traditions. However, just as prayer doesn't define a theist or a denomination, so meditation doesn't define any particular school.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 10th, 2011 at 5:36 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Somebody who understood or somebody that agreed with your point?

Astus wrote:

I didn't propose a point but asked a question that few seemed to even understand so far, not to mention answering.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 10th, 2011 at 5:49 PM

Title: Re: God in Buddhism

Content:

Serenity509 said:

What do you think of this video's idea of God?

Pandeism

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=GQRCsbO_rk4 "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

I think that many people are opposed to the idea of God because of the image that's been given them from Abrahamic faiths, not because of personal experience.

Astus wrote:

Buddhism first spread in India. When the Buddha and later Indian teachers talk about rejecting the existence of an Absolute God they refer to Hindu gods primarily. Christian and Muslim contact with Buddhism happened later.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 10th, 2011 at 6:18 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

I think you'll find you got a lot of answers, just that you don't want to agree with any of them!

Astus wrote:

True, because I don't see them as answering the question, but rather avoiding it.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 10th, 2011 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

Astus wrote:

For a review here are the answers to "What is Transmission?" so far in this thread. As far as I can see, none of them specifies what it is that makes transmission qualitatively different from any other kind of study.

Nangwa:

The transmission/introduction to this state is a state of knowledge that one receives from another being. Its direct, applicable, and perceivable.

The transmission is like guru yoga in the sense that you enter into that state by being introduced to it by someone who has the capacity to share it with you directly.

Zerwe:

transmission is something that plants the seeds that will later ripen in our own understand at deeper and deeper levels. Thus, transmission becomes essential for removing obstacles to understanding and the achievement of realization. So, transmission could be thought of as essential to our realizing the dharma on the ultimate level.

Kyosan:

I think of transmission as actualization of the dharma and acknowledgement by the teacher that the student has actualized it. That's what it means in Zen.

PadmaVonSamba:

Transmission is love. It goes by the same rules.

adinatha:

If I hold up a mirror, and you hold up a mirror while standing nearby one another, we will reflect one another. And so it goes on down the line through space and time. The master/disciple dynamic is just this with regard to body, speech and mind of Buddha.

Namdrol:

A common example is a seal and its impression.

transmission means a teacher speaks, in words and similes according to his realization. You actively listen and understand. That is transmission. This why, for example, at the end of transmitting vows, the officiating upadhyaya asks you "Are you happy"? This means, "did you really participate in this ritual of transmitting the precepts?"

This is all there is to transmission. It cannot be gained from a book. It must be gained from another living, breathing human being.

Will & adinatha:

If you have ever been in presence of someone you did not know at all, yet you were irritated or inspired far beyond anything said by them; that is their aura affecting yours. Did you think all those paintings with discs of light around buddhas & bodhisattvas are just artistic flourishes? The best proof is being in the silent atmosphere of someone and recalling later that one's racing, worrisome mind was calmed.

Yes. This is right. Part of transmission of ultimate realization involves this.

Namdrol:

There is no magical "transmission" fairy dust.

PadmaVonSamba & Namdrol:

So, are you saying that anyone who ever went to any sort of teaching or public talk by a lama received a transmission?

Yes. Listening to a recording however has no transmission.

Namdrol:

No. Recorded words are not the same. They are a recording of an act of speech, but not the act of speech itself. Teaching and bestowing transmission are acts.

The words recorded are divorced from the act of speech. They are relics, not alive.

It is the act of speaking and the act of listening happening together at the same time that constitutes a transmission.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 10th, 2011 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

This is why direct personal contact is needed and not just a book or a record, because a book or record doesn't know if you are ready or not. "Ready" means that at that moment it is the right time, just as planting a seed must be done when the soil is receptive, when the conditions are right for growing and so forth. You can read a book or hear a recording about the "evils of alcohol" but if you are not ready, it won't stop you from drinking.

That is the 'something else' mentioned above.

Astus wrote:

If it is only that a teacher gives the teaching when the student is ready the teachers who give different kinds of transmissions should personally know the students. That can't really be true when the Dalai Lama gives a Kalachakra empowerment to thousands of people, or when dozens (maybe hundreds) of monks receive ordination together (in case of ordination the idea of "ready" is strange a bit anyway). One could also say that those who go to lectures, retreats and study from books - i.e. continue training themselves - may understand something deep at any time, and there are a couple of Zen stories where people got enlightened reading/hearing a sutra, or just experiencing something ordinary. So the teacher knowing the situation of the student's mind doesn't sound like the thing that explains the need of face-to-face transmission.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 10th, 2011 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

Nangwa said:

The question has been clearly answered in this thread and others over and over again. Its not others avoiding the question, its your strong aversion to the answer.

Astus wrote:

What has been said again and again is that transmission happens within a personal contact between master a student where the student "receives the transmission" (tautology). But what makes personal contact special is not answered. What makes something a transmission and not just learning something about Buddhism, again, not answered. If you think it was already answered, please point to the post. I have collected all the answers the best I could from this thread.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 10th, 2011 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

What do you prefer: being told by somebody face-to-face that they love you or hearing a recording of it on your cell phone message service? Which of the two do you reckon gets the point across more clearly?

Astus wrote:

Both get the point across clearly. Or an e-mail, a video, a postcard, a piece of paper on the fridge, etc. Both tell the same thing and I understand the same thing. There are of course possibilities to make it sound/look more emotional, aesthetic, passionate, and so on, but the message remains the same. For some unknown reasons that can't be done with a few specific (but obviously not all) Buddhist teachings. If I read the 5 precepts and keep them is not the same if I hear and then keep them - no reason why. But if I watch a video about the Diamond Sutra is just as good as if I were present at the teaching.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 10th, 2011 at 11:30 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Zerwe,

What you say is very understandable. However, such enthusiasm and connection with a teacher is not restricted to any school or even to Buddhism. That doesn't mean it is not great or anything like that. And perhaps one may feel similarly toward certain teachings too regardless of the source.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 11th, 2011 at 8:43 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Namdrol,

Thanks for <http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=66&p=43958#p43958>, I think it has all the answers for the question of transmission. I may not be as strict about living communication since there were and are people who realised the Dharma without direct contact, but those instances are the exception rather than the rule. Buddhism, just like any other religion, exists within a community and as such can live as long as the community does. And sometimes there are revivals of a dead tradition, another known phenomenon within Buddhism, religions and other philosophies and traditions. I consider such revivals just as legitimate as the continued lineage, not to mention the creation of new schools and appearances of new teachings. That's how I see no problems in accepting modern historical views about Buddhism where most of the living traditions have little basis to claim Shakyamuni as the founding teacher of the doctrine and practice as it exists now.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 13th, 2011 at 4:01 AM

Title: Re: Psychedelic Buddhist Dharani on Electric Guitar

Content:

Astus wrote:

I really liked this one:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 13th, 2011 at 7:15 PM

Title: Re: Monks can't get full enlightenment?

Content:

Astus wrote:

For those unaware of the nature of everything,
Great bliss is attained in sexual union;
As if thirst-ridden, chasing after water in mirage,
They die from thirst, and do they ever drink the sky-water?
Whoever frolics in this bliss,
Living between vajra and lotus,
What for? This has no capacity for truth,
So {where} in the three worlds will you be complete?
The bliss of means is the moment,
And this itself becomes both;
Through the kindness of the master,
A handful in a hundred will understand.

(Saraha in Dreaming the Great Brahmin, p. 166)

The Kalachakra-tantra states:

Out of critical determination, one dissociates from the female consort (karmamudra)

And abstains from the inner consort of manifest awareness (jnanamudra).

By concentrating on that which is supreme and immutable,

One meditates on Mahamudra.

Padmavajra in the Guhyasiddhi advises:

The female consort of transformation is tumultuous and devious.

So is the inner consort of manifest awareness.

Abandon these, which are replete with discrimination,

And meditate on Mahamudra.

Manjusri, in his Tawai Döpa Dortenpa, says,
Crazy and malignant is the female consort;
The inner consort of manifest awareness is the same.
Abandon these in the dualistic realm
And practice Mahamudra.

(Mahamudra: The Moonlight, p. 98)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 13th, 2011 at 10:05 PM

Title: Re: God in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

From the Jodoshu website (http://www.jodo.org/about_plb/what_plb.html "onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;):

"On the other hand the Christian God has a different nature from Buddha. God is the creator of the universe, the absolute existence, the highest being, etc. God is quite different from man. He is the creator and man is the created. God is perfect good and man is a sinner. Man cannot become God however hard he may try. God and man are totally different from each other by nature, different ontologically. While God is perfect truth, man cannot attain the perfect truth of God. God is far from us. He is beyond our apprehension. God and man differ from each other epistemologically. Thus the difference between God and Buddha in relation to man would be as follows: God is different from man epistemologically and ontologically, whereas Buddha is different from man epistemologically but not ontologically."

And what you've quoted already from there: "Amida Buddha is not the creator or ground of all being."

Buddhas are not like any Absolute God other religions and philosophies have. That is because: 1. any being can achieve buddhahood and buddhas all went through such a path, i.e. no beings are born buddhas 2. buddhas are not the substrata of the universe, they are not omnipotent nor omnipresent 3. the sole purpose of buddhas is to help beings become free from samsara 4. there are infinite number of buddhas with different attributes 5. when buddhas are talked about in an ultimate sense what is meant is the true nature of all beings and not a single being or even a being or a thing.

Here is a collection of different forms of refutations:

<http://ccbs.ntu.edu.tw/FULLTEXT/JR-PHIL/jackson.htm>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 14th, 2011 at 2:37 AM

Title: Re: God in Buddhism

Content:

Serenity509 said:

"God became man so that man could become God." - Athanasius of Alexandria

In the ancient Christian church, it was taught that God became man in Christ so that humans could attain Christhood. That's somewhat similar to the view that the eternal Buddha became man in Siddhartha Gautama so that we could attain Buddhahood.

Astus wrote:

Certain similarities doesn't make two things the same, like ducks have two legs just as humans do. In case of your example, they don't really match in many aspects. From the perspective of three bodies the Buddha never became human, it is not some sort of incarnation but only an illusory display that appears because of sentient beings' karma, while the birth and death of Christ was part of the divine plan of God to sacrifice himself in exchange for the sins of mankind. Shakyamuni taught the Dharma but the birth and death of the Buddha is not in itself the solution of men's problems. If you take things out of context and give them a new interpretation it is easy to make bold statements about religions being the same. It is being able to think within the appropriate context that can show the actual meaning of a teaching. Even in case of Amita Buddha, he simply provides the optimal environment for completing the bodhisattva path, that is hardly the same as bestowing liberation upon beings.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 14th, 2011 at 3:36 AM

Title: Re: God in Buddhism

Content:

Serenity509 said:

In the doctrine of theosis, Christ provides the grace for the path, but he doesn't do all the work either.

Astus wrote:

In theists religions men are completely in the hands of God. That is not the case in Buddhism, including Pure Land Buddhism. That is quite an important difference. The idea of grace itself relies on the concept that it is God who has to be merciful. Saying that Amita Buddha provides a grace toward deluded beings is nothing but a Westernised simplification of the idea that Amita Buddha gives the opportunity because of his vows to beings to relatively easily attain birth in his buddha-land. Buddhas have nothing but compassion toward beings, God can be just as loving as wrathful. In theist religions one's salvation depends on God, in Buddhism enlightenment is available both with and without buddhas.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 14th, 2011 at 4:57 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sherab,

What I've found as the answer to the question is that transmission is defined as a live connection between teacher and student. It is like saying that swimming is moving in the water by the movement of one's body. It is a matter of definition and that's all, nothing more.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 14th, 2011 at 6:15 PM

Title: Re: What is Transmission?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sherab,

The

http://www.buddhistdoor.com/oldweb/resources/sutras/6_Patriarch_Platform/sources/platform_sutra_10.htm has an answer, "Those who grasp at emptiness slander the Sutras by maintaining that written words have no use. Since they maintain they have no need of written words, they should not speak either, because written words are merely the marks of spoken language. They also maintain that the direct way cannot be established by written words, and yet these two words, 'not established' are themselves written."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 15th, 2011 at 4:34 PM

Title: Re: Defining Buddhism - Theravada/Mahayana/Varayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

Looking for evidence? Should try some reading first.

A history of Indian Buddhism: from Śākyamuni to early Mahāyāna by Akira Hirakawa, Paul Groner

Introduction to the History of Indian Buddhism by Eugène Burnouf, Katia Buffetrille, Donald S. Lopez

Indian Buddhism by A. K. Warder

Figments and fragments of Mahāyāna Buddhism in India: more collected papers by Gregory Schopen

Bones, stones, and Buddhist monks: collected papers on the archaeology, epigraphy, and texts of monastic Buddhism in India by Gregory Schopen

Bodhisattvas of the forest and the formation of the Mahāyāna: a study and translation of the Rāṣṭrapālāparipṛcchā-sūtra by Daniel Boucher

Indian esoteric Buddhism: a social history of the Tantric movement by Ronald M. Davidson

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 15th, 2011 at 4:40 PM

Title: Re: Defining Buddhism - Theravada/Mahayana/Varayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

The idea that the proof lies simply in personal testing is a bit risky. Followers of every other religion have loads of testimonies how God, gods, angels, saints, etc. helped the faithful in myriad ways. Also, as the Buddha explained in different texts, like the Brahmajala Sutta, followers of other doctrines base their views on what they have experienced.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 15th, 2011 at 5:13 PM

Title: Re: Defining Buddhism - Theravada/Mahayana/Varayana

Content:

muni said:

No practice without guidance of "those who understand", or without teachings.

Astus wrote:

Thus the reason for investigating what the correct teaching is, that may include historical validity too.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 15th, 2011 at 7:33 PM

Title: Re: Shin Buddhism a 'spiritual path for busy people'

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't really see yet how Shin Buddhism could become even the most popular among Buddhist schools, not to mention in a whole country. That's because of three reasons: 1. requires faith not just in rebirth but in external buddhas too, 2. has no meditation practices that are so popular today and promises no immediate results, 3. reminds many people of Christianity.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 15th, 2011 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: Are you a buddhist when...

Content:

Astus wrote:

Do you often think about being human? Nevertheless, it is a good question you made. Without establishing a concept there's no identification with it.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 16th, 2011 at 3:35 AM

Title: Re: Shin Buddhism a 'spiritual path for busy people'

Content:

Astus wrote:

I believe Shin Buddhism has a profound message, however, it is to be understood strictly within the Mahayana context and no other way. Unlike most of the other Buddhist school, Shin Buddhism doesn't have a practice to offer to non-believers. It is also interesting to note how Shinran and his followers were against non-Buddhist practices like worshipping gods.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 16th, 2011 at 4:14 PM

Title: Re: Defining Buddhism - Theravada/Mahayana/Varayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

This argument on that the Mahayana sutras and tantras were taught by the Buddha because the omniscient lama says so is very much like "The Bible says it, I believe it, that settles it." That isn't an argument at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 17th, 2011 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: God in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is a bit funny that God can be seen in the Shin school of Buddhism. What I mean is that Shinshu is a very, if not the most simplified form of Buddhism where the primary goal is to attain birth through faith. Now, this whole God concept is a load of misguided interpretation that has nothing to do with attaining birth in the Pure Land of Amita Buddha. Since it has nothing to do with it there is no point in assuming any relevance to Jodo Shinshu. The Pure Land sutras don't talk about any God, neither do the seven patriarchs. What basis is there of this abstract conceptual proliferation within the Pure Land context? Nothing.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 17th, 2011 at 10:45 PM

Title: Re: God in Buddhism

Content:

Namdrol said:

There is pretty clear indications that Amitabha literature and modes of conceiving and writing Amitabha's pure land are very influenced by Persian culture.

Astus wrote:

The most important parts are the vow and the buddha-land as a safe place for liberation because these are the essentials for attaining enlightenment in that way. Other details make little or no difference at all. And the Pure Land school with focus on recitation and the 18th vow is quite an East Asian thing.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 18th, 2011 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: Karmamudra-the reality, the myth

Content:

Astus wrote:

An interesting case of karmamudra:

There is another reason vetalas were so important. Sexual practice ("karmamudra") was central in Indian Tantra. It was said to be the swiftest and surest Tantric method, for those capable of it. A difficulty was finding someone willing to do engage in it with you—since the early forms of karmamudra were considered utterly disgusting. The usual approach, for men, was to hire a low-caste prostitute. Not everyone was able to do this, due to lack of funds or other practical problems. If you were a monk, there were also tiresome issues of vinaya—the monastic vows, which prohibit sex with women.

An alternative was to raise a vetali (female vetala). At a certain point, an official ruling was made that for a monk to practice karmamudra with a vetali was not a violation of vinaya. This made the practice extremely popular. Or, at any rate, there was considerable demand for information on how to raise vetalis.

Authentic sexual practice necessarily benefits both parties. You wouldn't know that from reading some of the male-oriented literature on the topic; but any attempt to "use" a prostitute, slave, or corpse for karmamudra, in a one-sided way, is entirely self-defeating. Clueful Tantrikas understand this, and practice accordingly. Vetalas and vetalis are often malevolent—like humans—but can be transformed by Tantric practice—just as we can. All sentient beings have Buddha-nature; the undead are no exception. Mainly due to karmamudra, it seems that there were many highly-realized vetalis in India at the time of the Mahasiddhas. No doubt some were famed as teachers as well as consorts.

In fact, at the dawn of Tantra, at least one vetali became fully enlightened in this way. She is Vajra Vetali, Queen of the Vampires, who attained Buddhahood as the consort of Yamantaka. Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche wrote a hair-raising invocation of her that is regularly practiced in his Shambhala centers: "You enjoy drinking the blood of ego . . . As night falls, you cut the aortas of the perverters of the teachings."

<http://buddhism-for-vampires.com/the-tibetan-book-of-the-undead>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 18th, 2011 at 6:10 AM

Title: Re: God in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

From the opening page of the site most of the quotes are from:

"Imagine a religion without original sin, judgment, a wrathful God, a multitude of gods and saints, an eternal hell, Satan, a sense of guilt, a personality cult, idolizing a book, a blood sacrifice for atonement, a rejection of personal experience, holy wars, hypocritical rules, sexism, a cultish mindset, and money and power obsessions. Luckily, a religion without all of this negative core baggage does exist and it is called Shin Buddhism."

<http://buddhistfaith.tripod.com/beliefs/index.html>

And you still maintain that Shinshu and Christianity are "ultimately" the same. It's just that apparently they are not.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 18th, 2011 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: God in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Serenity,

Explain this to me. If all religions and spiritual traditions teach ultimately the same why is it that no prophet, philosopher or enlightened master who were founders and outstanding teachers of a particular doctrine never said that the others before them and contemporary with them teach the same? Shakyamuni Buddha did not agree with any of the other religions whether it was the Jains, brahmins or other sorts but rather refuted their views? Abraham could have just say that those of other faiths are fine, Moses could have accept the Egyptian religion, Jesus could have praised the Pharisees and Samaritans, Mohamed could have get along fine with the Jews and Christians, etc. But none of them did that. Shankara and other Hindu masters were eager to refute the Buddhists and vice versa. When Chinese Buddhists met Christian priests they composed treatises to refute their faith and correct their understanding of Buddhism while the priests were eager to convert the misguided idol worshippers they saw in Buddhists. And then today when we have those who claim all religions are the same in essence are not accepted in the organised religions and they don't agree with the orthodox doctrines of any religion. It is rather that those who believe in the unity of religions simply form another, although very loose group of people among all the others. So, why is it that Buddha, Jesus and Mohamed, instead of going along with the existing religions, started new ones and refuted the others as mistaken? At least they should have known that it's all the same truth everywhere.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 19th, 2011 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: God in Buddhism

Content:

Serenity509 said:

Jesus told his disciples to follow the teachings of the Pharisees but not their example. There are New Testament scholars today who contend that Jesus himself was a Pharisee. Muhammad recognized Jews and Christians as "people of the book." Hinduism regarded the Buddha as an Avatar of Vishnu. Buddhism incorporated the folk beliefs and practices of the different areas where it spread. Jainism recognized the multifaceted nature of truth as part of its philosophy. The appreciation for different religious viewpoints has existed among the world's religions for centuries.

Astus wrote:

You seem to mistake subjugation of other religions' elements to accepting their teachings. Sure, you can find ancient Indian gods in Buddhism, but in the position of being mortal and incapable of any assistance to attain enlightenment. Buddha is an avatar in Hinduism but only in the form of being a trap for non-believers and a preacher of ahimsa. Saying that, for instance, Jesus was a teacher of moral discipline from a Buddhist perspective does not equate him even to a stream-enterer, not to mention a bodhisattva.

Guifeng Zongmi - Chan and Huayan master of Tang dynasty China - writes this of Confucianism and Taoism:

"the essential meaning of the outer teachings merely lies in establishing [virtuous] conduct based on this bodily existence and does not lie in thoroughly investigating the ultimate source of this bodily existence. The myriad things that they talk about do not have to do with that which is beyond tangible form. Even though they point to the great Way as the origin, they still do not fully illuminate the pure and impure causes and conditions of conforming to and going against [the flow of] origination and extinction. Thus, those who study [the outer teachings] do not realize that they are provisional and cling to them as ultimate."

(Inquiry into the Origin of Humanity, tr. Peter Gregory)

From Ven. Sheng-yen:

Do Buddhists Believe in the Existence of God?

The word God or god has many definitions. There is the God of religionists and the God of philosophers. In fact, there are many different "Gods" in religion, and many different "Gods" in philosophy. Depending on the standpoint taken while viewing God, God changes according to the requirements of that standpoint.

Some Christians say the Confucian tian or shangdi is the same as the Christian God. But in fact, the supreme Confucian God is only a philosophical, pantheistic god loved by humans but without the capacity to reciprocate. It is similar to the God of the agnostics. In contrast, the Christian God has a human personality, and he is the Creator, existing separately from the cosmos he created; he is the omnipotent sovereign of everything that exists.

...

The Daoist supreme deity is the Jade Emperor, who is a different God from those of Confucianism, Christianity, and Hinduism. From the Buddhist cosmological perspective, God in both Daoism and Islam is equivalent to the Lord of Trayastrimsa Heaven, the Heaven of the Thirty-three Gods. The Christian God (from Moses, Jesus, St. Paul, to St. Augustine, the status of God was elevated several steps) is equivalent to the Lord of the Great Brahma Heaven. And the Hindu God is equivalent to Mahesvara, the ruler of the Heaven of Ultimate Form. The Heaven of the Thirty-three Gods is the second heaven in the realm of sense desire, so it is very close to the human world. The Great Brahma Heaven is in the First Dhyana Heavens in the realm of form. The Heaven of Ultimate Form is the highest heaven in the realm of form. ... Anybody interested in gaining a thorough understanding of this issue is urged to compare the concept of God in different religions to the twenty-eight heavens of the three realms in Buddhist literature. ...

The ruler in each heaven has some propensity to arrogance, and likes to tell his ministers and subjects that he is the one and only creator or sovereign god. This is similar to an earthly monarch [in ancient China] who, despite calling himself "this person of little virtue" (guaren), nevertheless thinks he is the greatest king on the earth second to none. ... The same attitude motivates the lords in various heavens to call themselves the one and only sovereign-creator. Some of them even bragged to the Buddha. Is any one of these gods really the creator of our universe? Hardly so - it is impossible for a single god to have the power to create the universe. Rather, the universe is engendered by the karmic energies of sentient beings and takes its form according to multiple conditions.

From what is written above, we can see that Buddhists do recognize the existence of Gods, but not as the creators or rulers of our cosmos. As for the Gods of philosophers, Buddhists do not believe in their existence, because such Gods are only theoretical constructions based on suppositions and inferences without empirical verification.

...

Buddhists do not believe that God is the creator, nor do they think any God has the authority to control the fortunes of sentient beings. To Buddhists, a God is merely one kind of being within the six destinies.

(Orthodox Chinese Buddhism, p. 41-43)

Also see:

Venerable K. Sri Dhammananda Maha Thera:

<http://www.buddhanet.net/budsas/ebud/whatbudbeliev/259.htm>

Access to Insight: <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/index-subject.html#comparative>,

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/index-subject.html#god>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 22nd, 2011 at 2:11 AM

Title: Re: Was the Buddha "FULLY" enlightened?

Content:

caveman said:

Can you or anyone address the REAL LIFE ACTIONS of the Buddha.

Astus wrote:

Real life actions must go along with real life teachings, I assume. From such teachings one understands that desire is an affliction and the root of samsara. Those who have attained nirvana have no sensual desire but see that it is only pain, then why live in marriage at all?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 22nd, 2011 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: Was the Buddha "FULLY" enlightened?

Content:

caveman said:

Sir, the teaching state that nirvana is just as much an illusion as is samsara.

"But see that it is only pain". DUALITY, DUALITY.

No PAIN no PLEASURE you are talking DUALITY ().

"Then way live in marriage at all" .

You are joking aren't you.

Astus wrote:

Which teaching state that nirvana and samsara are both illusions? Mahayana, of course. Mahayana teachings also say that the whole life story of the Buddha was only for the education of beings. Mahayana also has the teaching that the Buddha is never born and never begotten a son.

The Buddha says in the Nirvana Sutra (ch. 7),

"Everybody says that Rahula is my son, that Suddhodana was my father and Maya my mother, that I carried on a secular career in my life, that I enjoyed peace and happiness [as a young prince], and that I abandoned all such things and sought the Way. People further say: "The prince of this king, of the great clan of Gautama, renounced worldly pleasures and sought the supramundane." But I had long since been away from worldly love and desire. I merely displayed all such things. Everybody says that I am a man. But truth to tell, I am not. O good man! I manifest myself in Jambudvipa and often enter Nirvana. But in truth I do not enter Nirvana at all. Yet all people say that the Tathagata is now dying. But the nature of the Tathagata, truth to tell, eternally does not die out. So you should know that I am one Eternal and Unchanging."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 23rd, 2011 at 6:15 PM

Title: Re: Trying to find a Buddha or enlightenment

Content:

Astus wrote:

So, Buddha is the product of mind. The mind is the product of what?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 23rd, 2011 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: Trying to find a Buddha or enlightenment

Content:

LastLegend said:

The mind is empty.

Astus wrote:

Then how can it produce anything?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 24th, 2011 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: Is Pure Land beyond Samsara?

Content:

Astus wrote:

1. Pure Land is beyond samsara as it is a realm created by a buddha and not by deluded sentient beings' karma.
 2. Direction is understood in our normal everyday understanding. Even today when we say west we don't think about its cosmological relativity, how much less thousands of years ago.
 3. We could say it is a planet, however, that would be mixing our current cosmology with a traditional one. Also, planets and such are modern human concepts and not the views of those outside of this paradigm.
 4. Understanding Nirvana as total extinction is not the Mahayana understanding.
 5. The Pure Land is only mind and it is as real as our realm which is also only mind. There is no disagreement between Chan and Pure Land on this, only people who can't see how these are not contradictory at all.
 6. I assume your question was why Shakyamuni isn't as honoured as other Buddhas. That is not actually true, Shakyamuni's statues and paintings are found in many temples and there are Mahayana schools where he is the main buddha.
 7. Saha world is a reference to this human world we now live in. If we happened to colonise the whole solar system then that'd be the Saha world.
- +1 Recitation itself can have a positive effect on one's mind. That is not the criterion of being a Pure Land Buddhist. The definitive thing is the intention, i.e. having faith in Amita Buddha's vow and wishing to be born in his Pure Land. To reinforce that attitude and maintain the right view is what practices are for. Also, when recitation (and possibly visualisation) is used to purify the mind, it is the thought of Amita Buddha that takes over the thoughts of samsara, thus forming a connection between us, the Buddha and the Pure Land.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 24th, 2011 at 4:33 AM

Title: Re: Trying to find a Buddha or enlightenment

Content:

LastLegend said:

Because it is empty, it can and not at the same time.

Astus wrote:

If it can produce something from nothing, that is a violation of causality. If it can't produce anything it is not true that the Buddha is made by mind. If both are true then both faults apply.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 24th, 2011 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: Is Pure Land beyond Samsara?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sönam,

East Asian Buddhism uses the Ten Realms (十界) system. In brief:

The lowest six realms are known as the Six Paths or Six Realms. These six states of existence are subjected to birth and death, and then rebirth for many lives. One's state of existence depends on one's karmic activities. With evil karmic power, one will be born in the lowest three realms, known as Three Evil Path (of transmigration). With good and kind karma, one will be born in the upper three realms, known as Three Good Paths (of transmigration).

The upper four realms are known as the Four Holy Realms. These four states of existence are beyond birth and death and liberated from the Samara.

<http://www.buddhistdoor.com/oldweb/bdoor/archive/nutshell/teach4.htm>

More info: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ten_spiritual_realms,

<http://web.singnet.com.sg/~alankhoo/DharmaRealm.htm>,

<http://ronaldc.wordpress.com/2007/11/29/buddhism%E2%80%99s-ten-spiritual-realms-in-simple-terms/>, <http://www.cttbusa.org/dharmataalks/10drealms.htm>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 24th, 2011 at 3:10 PM

Title: Re: Trying to find a Buddha or enlightenment

Content:

LastLegend said:

How can there be truth and false when it is empty?

How can there be caused or not caused if it is empty?

Astus wrote:

So with calling it empty you can avoid actually verbalising it. That's sneaky.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 24th, 2011 at 3:13 PM

Title: Re: Trying to find a Buddha or enlightenment

Content:

Jinzang said:

Emptiness and cause and effect are not contradictory. It is only because phenomena are empty that cause and effect are possible.

Astus wrote:

Then is mind within the realm of causality or not? And buddhas? Emptiness is equated with dependent origination by Nagarjuna. Could we say then that mind is a result of causes and conditions just as any common thing? If so, buddhas are nothing but cheap tales for kids.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 24th, 2011 at 3:36 PM

Title: Re: Is Pure Land beyond Samsara?

Content:

Astus wrote:

In the Pure Land there is no suffering, no compulsory birth and death (生死 "birth-death" is a synonym of samsara), guaranteed enlightenment, created by a buddha. That's why it is not considered samsara. Also, as mentioned, the four holy realms are above samsara.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 24th, 2011 at 5:08 PM

Title: Re: Is Pure Land beyond Samsara?

Content:

Sönam said:

This is not vajrayana pov ...

Astus wrote:

I meant it as an explanation not as a representation of Vajrayana. Pure Land is not a Vajrayana school anyway.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 25th, 2011 at 12:40 AM

Title: Nirvana Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

I've been reading the Nirvana Sutra this week and now I finished about 20% of it. So far one of the things I've been wondering about is that how could this text could gain such a fame. It keeps repeating its only message that the Tathagata is eternal but otherwise nothing of importance. I'd like to ask those who have found this sutra deep and interesting what exactly it is that caught their attention. Because so far it is pretty boring in my view.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 25th, 2011 at 7:07 AM

Title: Re: Is Pure Land beyond Samsara?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Rory,

Nice to see you add new perspectives here.

A few things. The teaching of "mind only" is very much in line with Huayan as well as Chan, Tiantai and Chinese Pure Land. Yogacara, i.e. Faxiang is understood as the "consciousness-only" (vijñaptimātra, 唯識) school while the others are "mind-only" (cittamātra, 唯心). More on this: <http://ccbs.ntu.edu.tw/FULLTEXT/JR-PHIL/lai4.htm>, <http://buddhism.lib.ntu.edu.tw/FULLTEXT/JR-JOCP/lai.htm>.

It is useful to see how in China there has never been any separate Pure Land School, that was something Honen created/started for the first time in history. In China (+ Korea and Vietnam) Pure Land and Chan are not separate schools but only different practices that are used together most of the time. More on this:

<http://buddhiststudies.berkeley.edu/people/faculty/sharf/documents/Sharf2003.%20T%20Chan%20and%20Pure%20Land.pdf>.

It was PadmaVasambha who brought up intellectuals and recitation as a remedy.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 26th, 2011 at 7:19 PM

Title: Re: Trying to find a Buddha or enlightenment

Content:

Astus wrote:

Could we say then that mind is a result of causes and conditions just as any common thing? If so, buddhas are nothing but cheap tales for kids.

kirtu said:

Really? Bodhisattvas are cheap tales for kids? Paul Rusesabagina, Irena Sendler, Dr. Martin Luther King, Cheif Joseph, Thich Nhat Hahn - these are cheap tales for kids?

Pure mind, perfect mind, holding the precepts purely - these are cheap tales for kids?

Kirt

Astus wrote:

Check again the reasoning. Buddha-mind being only a conditional phenomenon invalidates buddhahood.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 26th, 2011 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: Is Pure Land beyond Samsara?

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is a matter of making difference between consciousness (識) and mind (心). In the Faxiang/Hosso school of Xuanzang there is no buddha-nature but only the eight consciousnesses and everything arises from the defiled alayavijnana. In other schools (like Huayan) they accept universal buddha-nature and ultimately everything arises from the pure dharmadhatu, i.e. buddha-mind. So there are consciousness-only and mind-only.

No Pure Land dedicated community in Hungary except for Chinese groups where it is a major part of their Buddhism. The closest one is Adrian Cirlea's Shinshu temple in Bucharest that I know of.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 27th, 2011 at 5:11 PM

Title: Re: Trying to find a Buddha or enlightenment

Content:

kirtu said:

Check again the reasoning - we have visible manifestations of bodhisattvas even if they aren't Buddhist and their actions come from their minds and their intentions.

Thought is a conditioned phenomena, Buddha activity (conditioned) comes from Buddha-mind which can be seen in Huayen and Cittamatrīn thought as possessing reality (or as being real).

Bodhisattva activity and Buddhahood are real because they ease or eliminate the real experience of ultimately illusory suffering of apparently real sentient beings who also don't truly exist and just abide in the mode of sentient beings. But such verbiage does not cool their thirst.

Astus wrote:

Manifestations are the work of the deluded minds of sentient beings grasping at forms and sounds. What activity is there then? So it turns out that whether it is conditioned or unconditioned, buddhas and bodhisattvas are illusions. If the real buddha is the mind what is there to conceive as buddha or mind? Nothing really. Free from ideas all words and phrases can be used at one's will. That is buddha activity. Conditioned and unconditioned are labels to assist the readers. This is not negating the conditioned but saying that if buddha-mind is understood as something conditioned it will be just another concept. And if we understand it is unconditioned it reveals that all forms of ideas are still within the realm of conditioned. Then it is not logical to say that any activity of a buddha is conditioned.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 27th, 2011 at 7:31 PM

Title: Women in Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

It seems to be a common idea that there are no women in Sukhavati because they have to change sex. In the three primary sutras I have found no such statement, unlike in the Medicine Buddha Sutra where it is explicitly stated there are no women. In commentary literature it is indeed said that no women exist in the Pure Land (see: Visions of Sukhavati, p. 299). At other places it is understood that while the doctrinal position was that there are only males, women often believed they need no sex change to be born there.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 27th, 2011 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: Women in Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

Aemilius,

Only the 35th vow addresses the issue of women and doesn't state anywhere there are no females there. Also, the vow gives only the option of changing sex, it doesn't say women have to do that.

"If, when I attain Buddhahood, women in the immeasurable and inconceivable Buddha-lands of the ten quarters who, having heard my Name, rejoice in faith, awaken aspiration for Enlightenment and wish to renounce womanhood, should after death be reborn again as women, may I not attain perfect Enlightenment."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 27th, 2011 at 10:56 PM

Title: Re: Women in Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

A source of the concept that there are no women in the Pure Land:

"Women, the disabled, and those of the two vehicles
Are never born in the Pure Land of happiness as they are;
The sages of the Tathagata's pure lotus
Are born transformed from Dharmakara's lotus of perfect enlightenment."
(<http://www.shinranworks.com/shorterworks/gateways1.htm> by Vasubandhu)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 28th, 2011 at 7:57 PM

Title: Re: Women in Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

Aemilius,

That 35th vow says that if women want to be born as men it can be done. It doesn't say sexless nor does it talk about attaining birth in the Pure Land. On what do you base your interpretation?

Gods are also born through transformation and they still have their genitals all right.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 28th, 2011 at 9:06 PM

Title: Re: Women in Pure Land

Content:

Aemilius said:

What would they need them for ?

Astus wrote:

No eunuch or hermaphrodite can take the higher ordination. Even if there is no use of such organs within the sangha. Also, only gods of the lowest heavens use their sexual organs but none above. I assume it is not about the use of them but the integrity of the body.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 29th, 2011 at 4:20 PM

Title: Re: Women in Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sukhavati is advertised in the sutra with incredibly luxurious features from food and clothing to baths and music. Pretty heavenly. Then how could there be no sex?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 29th, 2011 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: Women in Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

Quotes from the Larger Sutra:

Vow 38: "If, when I attain buddhahood, humans and devas in my land should not obtain clothing as soon as such a desire arises in their minds, and if fine robes as prescribed and praised by the buddhas should not be spontaneously provided for them to wear, and if these clothes should need sewing, bleaching, dyeing, or washing, may I not attain perfect enlightenment."

"those born in that buddha land are endowed with such bodies of purity and provided with various exquisite sounds, supernatural powers, and virtues. The palaces in which they dwell; their clothing, food, and drink; the wonderful flowers; and the various kinds of incense and adornments are like those naturally provided in the sixth heaven of the world of desire."

"The śrāvakas, bodhisattvas, heavenly beings, and humans there have lofty and brilliant wisdom and are masters of the supernatural powers. They are all of one form, without any differences, but are called 'heavenly beings' and 'humans' simply by analogy with states of existence in other worlds. They are of noble and majestic countenance, unequaled in all the worlds, and their appearance is superb, unmatched by any being, heavenly or human. They are all endowed with bodies of naturalness, emptiness, and infinity."

"Devas and humans in the land of Amitāyus are each provided with robes, food and drink, flowers, perfume, ornaments, silken canopies, and banners, and are surrounded by exquisite sounds. Their abodes, palaces, and pavilions are exactly in accordance with the size of their bodies. One, two, or even innumerable jewels appear before them, as soon as they wish. In addition, beautiful jeweled fabric covers the ground where all the devas and humans walk."

So, from this sutra we learn that the beings there have uniform bodies but at the same time their sizes are different. They have no desire but at the same time wish for food, clothes, water temperature, music, etc. They have brilliant wisdom and supernatural powers while at the same time they have to spend aeons to attain any sort of enlightenment.

If we think about it a bit then we can come to the conclusion that the Pure Land appears to those who are there according to their individual needs and perspectives to eventually help them attain liberation. That makes any fixed interpretation of the Pure Land impossible and contrary to the intention of Amita Buddha to accept all kinds of beings with all kinds of karmas.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 30th, 2011 at 5:49 PM

Title: Re: Women in Pure Land

Content:

Madhyama Pratipada said:

The doctrine that a woman must be reborn as a man in order to attain Buddhahood - 変生男子之説 (Japanese: henjo nanshi setsu; Chinese: biàn shēng nánzǐ zhī shuō) - is not at all unfamiliar to Pureland Buddhism. To dwell in Sukhāvatī, the female form must be shed and transformed into male form. In the Saddharma Puṇḍarīka Sūtra, the Buddha refers to the Pureland as being devoid of women, but there is no mention of it being devoid of men. Why is this so?

Astus wrote:

The Lotus Sutra says,

If there is any woman who hears and holds to this chapter 'Ancient Accounts of Bodhisattva Bhaiṣajyarāja,' she will never be reborn with a female body. If there is any woman five hundred years after the pari nirvāṇa of the Tathāgata who hears this sutra and practices according to the teaching, she will immediately reach the dwelling of the Buddha Amitāyus in the Sukhāvatī world, surrounded by great bodhisattvas, and will be born on a jeweled seat in a lotus flower. Never again troubled by the [three poisons] of greed, anger, or ignorance, by arrogance or jealousy, he will attain the bodhisattva's transcendent powers and the acceptance of the nonorigination of all dharmas.

First of all, there is no need to take the Lotus Sutra as definitive from a Pure Land perspective. In fact, it isn't. There are some other sutras that have no problem with female buddhas, not to mention tantras (that are also part of the Chinese Canon). Also, Guanyin is female.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 30th, 2011 at 6:00 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana Mantras

Content:

Astus wrote:

Mantra sources:

<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/mantra0.html>

<http://www.visiblemantra.org/>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 30th, 2011 at 8:49 PM

Title: Re: Women in Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think there is an important point that some have missed. The path of Pure Land is not only for those who can detach from the body and say that there are no sexes and this body is just a momentary conglomeration of the four elements. This path is also (or as Shinran would say: especially) for those who are fully loaded with attachments and karma and so identifying with our present sex is nothing extraordinary at all. Indeed, if we didn't do that we would be free from all our lust toward others. So to say that no women but only men are born there is explicit chauvinism - not that it doesn't exist in many Buddhist texts - and it is also a projection into the three essential Pure Land sutras as they don't exclude women at all, not to mention the part of Vaidehi in the propagation of this teaching by the Buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 1st, 2011 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: Women in Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

Aemelius,

Tell me, if gender doesn't matter, why is it that Amitabha is male and Guanyin is female?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 1st, 2011 at 4:52 PM

Title: Re: Women in Pure Land

Content:

rory said:

in the Lotus Sutra, the dragon king's daughter attains buddhahood in her female form.

Astus wrote:

Actually the dragon princess had to change first into male, a classical case.

Śāriputra spoke to the daughter of the nāga king, saying:

“You say that you will soon attain the highest path. This is difficult to believe. Why is this? The female body is polluted; it is not a fit vessel for the Dharma. How can you attain highest enlightenment?

“The buddha path is long. One can only attain it after diligently carrying out severe practices, and completely practicing the perfections over immeasurable kalpas. Moreover, the female body has five obstructions. The first is the inability to become a great Brahma. The second is the inability to become Śakra. The third is the inability to become Māra, and the fourth is the inability to become a universal monarch (cakravartin). The fifth is the inability to become a buddha. How can you with your female body quickly become a buddha?”

...

Then the assembly there all saw the daughter of the nāga king instantly transform into a man, perfect the bodhisattva practices, go to the vimalā world in the south, sit on a jeweled lotus flower, and attain highest, complete enlightenment, become endowed with the thirty-two marks and eighty excellent characteristics, and expound the True Dharma universally for the sake of all sentient beings in the ten directions.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 1st, 2011 at 6:08 PM

Title: Re: The fate of Arhats?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Question 1: Is there an end of samsara or there is existence beyond that?

Hinayana and some Mahayana teachings say there is an end, other Mahayana says there isn't. If there is an end there is parinirvana from what there is no return. If there is no end nobody can finish existence only change a samsaric to a nirvanic existence.

Question 2: Without an end what is non-samsaric existence?

The four kinds of lands of nobles (arhat, pratyekabuddha, bodhisattva, buddha) is an option. What exactly those are and how they differ from the usual six realms is something I have no definite information on besides the usual descriptions of specific buddha-lands. Or, as some sutras suggest, it is this realm we are in now with the difference being in the perspective of the beings thus it is very much like the case of nirvana-with-residue in Hinayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 1st, 2011 at 11:42 PM

Title: Re: Women in Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

MP,

Indeed, more reasons why people have thought that there can be no women in Pure Land.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 3rd, 2011 at 1:13 AM

Title: Re: The fate of Arhats?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The small problem with an eternal world is that we practically arrive at a sort of dynamic Hindu philosophy where the ultimate aim is to arrive at the universal dharmadhatu - the realm of the eternal buddha. Thus we arrive at the problem of eternalism that was avoided by the early teachings.

"However far the six contact-media go, that is how far objectification goes. However far objectification goes, that is how far the six contact media go. With the remainderless fading & stopping of the six contact-media, there comes to be the stopping, the allaying of objectification."

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an04/an04.174.than.html>

Whatever samsaric or non-samsaric realm we would conceive falls within the domain of the six sense media. That's why I said that the Mahayana conception of the non-abiding nirvana - the basis for eternal buddhas - is virtually the nirvana-with-remainder.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 4th, 2011 at 3:34 PM

Title: Re: Women in Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

Rory,

Arhats and bodhisattvas can be either males or females but not buddhas, it is because of the mentioned hindrances (五障 - pañca āvaranāni) of women that they can't become Brahmā-kings, Indras, Māra-kings, Cakravarti-kings, or Buddhas. Later Mahayana (especially Vajrayana) did overwrite that theoretically.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 4th, 2011 at 4:52 PM

Title: Re: Is Pure Land "Buddhism" contradictory to Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Buddhism as something that matches with science and rationalism is a modern myth, a way of presenting Buddhism to those conditioned by such thoughts. But as you have noticed yourself, there is lot of "religion" going on in this religion too.

There are people who have difficulty conceiving an actual Pure Land and so they say it is symbolic. It is a similar argument when some think rebirth, gods, spirits and buddhas are only symbolic and not real at all. Of course, many teachings do have a symbolic value but that is just one level. Reducing seemingly irrational elements into comfortable theories is on one hand a creative way of adapting, on the other it is being blind to the different facets and layers.

Why no sex is mentioned in the Pure Land while other delicacies are there? Basically because monks live in celibacy and it might be counter-productive if they meditated on lustful acts. That is because meditation and most of the Buddhist teachings are primarily/originally for monastics.

The teaching of Pure Land, just like all the other teachings, are expedient means to guide people to liberation. Until liberation is attained the practitioner should hold on tightly to the method just like one would grasp firmly on the raft in the middle of a dangerous river. Only after one has left behind the perilous waters it is wise to let go of the vessel.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 4th, 2011 at 8:48 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana Mantras

Content:

Astus wrote:

The <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=43&t=235> used commonly in Chinese Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 4th, 2011 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: Women in Pure Land

Content:

Aemilius said:

People here seem to think that attaining enlightenment is like acquiring a car or a new house or an estate, they themselves remain the same, they only get a new thing added to their identity, a thing that is called "liberation" or "enlightenment".

This is contrary to the actual truth of the matter.

If you become a new being, a higher being, your previous identity as a man or a woman dissolves and dies.

Astus wrote:

So, are you on the position that beings in the Pure Land are without gender, they have a non-human body?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 4th, 2011 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: "On White Women and Buddhism"

Content:

Astus wrote:

daelm,

That is news to me. Is there a policy change in FGS?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 4th, 2011 at 10:56 PM

Title: Re: Is Pure Land "Buddhism" contradictory to Buddhism?

Content:

Ryoto said:

Monks also don't live in mansions, get to eat whatever food they want whenever they want etc. According to Buddhist teachings this may also be counter productive so I don't think this is a very good argument for no sex.

Astus wrote:

The beauty/purity of the Pure Land is something one may contemplate without much emotional disturbance. The beauty of the body is, on the other hand, the opposite of meditating on the impurity/ugliness of the body.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 5th, 2011 at 2:33 AM

Title: Re: Is Pure Land "Buddhism" contradictory to Buddhism?

Content:

Will said:

The Pure Lands are ideal places for further practice, not pleasure palaces.

Astus wrote:

Well, in a sense it is the penultimate pleasure palace, the Land of Pleasure (Sukhavati).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 5th, 2011 at 3:59 AM

Title: Re: Is Pure Land "Buddhism" contradictory to Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Belincia, so it is!

"The working of blind passion also causes us not to want to go to the Pure land and makes us feel uneasy worrying about death when we become even slightly ill. Impossible it seems to leave this old house of agitation where we have wandered aimlessly since the beginning of time, nor can we long for the Pure Land of peace which we have yet to know. This is due to blind passion so truly powerful and overwhelming. But no matter how reluctant we may be, when our life in this world comes to an end, beyond our control, then for the first time we go to the land of Fulfillment. Those who do not want to go immediately are the special concern of true compassion. For this very reason the Vow of true compassion is completely dependable, and our birth in the Pure Land is absolutely certain.

If our hearts were filled with joyful happiness and we desired to go swiftly to the Pure Land, we might be misled to think that perhaps we are free of blind passion."

(<http://www.livingdharma.org/Tannisho/TannishoChaptersI-X.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 5th, 2011 at 5:53 AM

Title: Re: Women in Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thanks Rory, great job.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 5th, 2011 at 5:56 AM

Title: Re: Is Pure Land "Buddhism" contradictory to Buddhism?

Content:

rory said:

Oops I posted in the wrong thread. Anyway, Pure Land is older than either Tibetan or Ch'an schools. The Pure Land sutras are some of the oldest in the Mahayana canon.

Astus wrote:

It is a bit strange to say the Pure Land "school" since while the practices and teachings were present for long there was no specific organisation until Honen called themselves such a school. Indeed, even today it is only in Japan we see such churches.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 5th, 2011 at 8:50 PM

Title: Re: Directory of European Dharma magazines?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm not familiar with the topic but here are one French and one German magazine:

<http://www.bouddhisme-actu.net/>

<http://www.buddhismus-aktuell.de/>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 6th, 2011 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: Women in Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

Nosta,

1) Sexism can be applied to both sexes.

3) Fortunately there is no such thing as "Buddhism's eyes" but a large variety of teachings and interpretations.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 7th, 2011 at 5:50 PM

Title: Re: Agganna Sutta - human origins

Content:

Astus wrote:

Will,

An expression is defined by context. Birth in heavens is always spontaneous, mind-made birth. Generating a mind-made body in meditation is a different context. The word connects them in the sense that both are mentally generated, one by ignorance, one by conscious effort.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 11th, 2011 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: Women in Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

So, are you on the position that beings in the Pure Land are without gender, they have a non-human body?

Aemilius said:

One obvious thing that is forgotten these days is the tantric visualisation process where you start with lotus & moon seat, then seed syllable and so on... this describes birth through transformation.

Birth through transformation is present in Theravada and the Mahayana, it is described in detail in tantras, and in the sadhanas. There are some variations in birth through transformation as it is visualised in different classes of tantra.

According to a tantric teaching of the 12 links of dependent origination, the process of visualisation transforms the 12 links, it transforms the links of your present life, and your future life; in the 11th link you attain the birth through transformation and you become a Sambhogakaya.

Astus wrote:

What does all that have to do with Pure Land teachings? I see no connection. People who are born in the PL are not sambhogakaya buddhas and they don't do any tantric techniques beforehand.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 11th, 2011 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: Expulsion for raped Buddhist nun ?!?

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://www.thefreelibrary.com/What+is+a+position+of+a+bhikkhuni+being+raped%3F-a0158093981>

"The Vinaya, a voluminous collection of rules for the monks and nuns first written down in the fifth or sixth century CE, says she [Uppalavanna] was raped, completely disregarding the foregoing poem and her power of iddhi. (31) This story is told to make the point that if a nun is not willing to have sex and is raped, there is no fault on her part, and she has not broken the rule of celibacy. The same story is told in the commentary on the Dhammapada, which says she was raped while meditating alone in the forest, adding that as a consequence nuns were thereafter required to live together."
(<http://www.highbeam.com/doc/1G1-169176308.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 12th, 2011 at 9:26 PM

Title: Re: Women in Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

Aemilius,

The Pure Land practices as understood in East-Asia does not involve Tibetan phowa, while phowa is not restricted to birth in Amita Buddha's land. The general view of the Pure Land school in East Asia is that it is the optimal path for deluded sentient beings who have little time and capacity to engage in complicated practices. This is the difference made by Shandao about the Path of Sages and the Path of Pure Land. Tantric methods are clearly within the Path of Sages. And all this confusion of different traditions have little to do with the original topic.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 12th, 2011 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Tantric sexual bliss vs. dhyanic bliss

Content:

Astus wrote:

Vitarka and vicāra don't exist in the 2nd dhyāna already, how could then it be called conceptual? Nirvikalpa-jñāna also exists in common Mahayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 13th, 2011 at 12:50 AM

Title: Re: Tantric sexual bliss vs. dhyanic bliss

Content:

Huseng said:

The claim, though, that I'm trying to understand is that the nirvikalpa samādhi achieved in tantra is superior to the one achieved through conventional dhyāna.

Astus wrote:

If it is non-conceptual (nirvikalpa), how could it be in any form higher or lower? They agree in Vajrayana that the emptiness of Madhyamaka and Tantra are not different, the paths/methods are distinct however.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 13th, 2011 at 5:14 PM

Title: Re: James Low & Simply Being

Content:

Astus wrote:

How strange that self-aware wisdom is originally not self-aware.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 15th, 2011 at 6:04 AM

Title: Re: Women in Pure Land

Content:

rory said:

As to my keeping a woman's body, why not? Why would there be hang-ups in Sukhavati? Kannon has a female body.

Astus wrote:

Also, how does a neither male nor female body look? Like a small child or a very old person?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 15th, 2011 at 4:43 PM

Title: Re: Women in Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

Besides the Buddha's male genitals he also has half of his chest out of the robe.

A guess it is possible to tell the difference between who's male and who's female:

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 15th, 2011 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: Women in Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jikan,

An important point of the Pure Land teaching - as it has developed in East Asia, especially by Honen - is that it is for deluded beings who are profoundly attached to their samsaric existence. The difference between being a PL follower or a non-Buddhist here is that one is very much aware of one's existence as a deluded being and that samsara is the place of suffering. The land of Amita Buddha itself thus is meant to be understood as simply as one can, a wonderful place without any pain where one can eventually attain enlightenment and liberate all beings. In order to conform with common people it is absolutely all right to say that one reappears there in the body one took refuge in Amita Buddha's vow. Whether it actually happens like that or not, how could anyone tell? And that's an important point here. Neither Honen, nor Shinran, nor most of the Pure Land teachers claimed to be enlightened, they had no direct knowledge of the Pure Land itself. They have simply relied on the teachings that say anyone can attain birth through relying on Amita Buddha's vows. It is an inclusive doctrine where sinners and saints can both attain enlightenment.

It is no big problem to come up with different theories about how and why there would or would not be genders. But it's losing the primary goal of the teaching itself, that is, to comply with the karmic inclinations of ordinary humans. This is part of the skill in means of the teaching of Pure Land. Therefore it seems appropriate to say that men and women can be born there in a perfect body, whatever they think a perfect body is. What difference does this faith means? That they have less worries about what is the Pure Land like and if it is really what they want or not.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 19th, 2011 at 6:39 PM

Title: Re: Chinese Buddhist canon

Content:

Astus wrote:

Another book to look into:

The fundamental teachings of early Buddhism: A comparative study based on the Sutranga portion of the Pali Samyutta-Nikaya and the Chinese Samyuktagama by Mun-keat Choong

Also interesting:

Metaphor and Literalism in Buddhism The Doctrinal History of Nirvana by Soon-Il Hwang

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 19th, 2011 at 8:32 PM

Title: Re: Use of the term 'Hinayāna'

Content:

Astus wrote:

Hinayana is an illusory teaching attributed to deluded ascetics who pretend to be the true Buddhists. In reality such Hinayana has never existed but served well to conceive a Mahayana and build arrogance in those who felt insecure. Based on a certain Madhyamaka teaching if we agree that arhats realise the same emptiness as bodhisattvas and buddhas and that emptiness is inseparable from compassion, the self-absorbed lowly sravaka is clearly a fantasy monster only.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 19th, 2011 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: Use of the term 'Hinayāna'

Content:

Namdrol said:

We don't agree that a certain Madhyamaka teaching teaches this.

Astus wrote:

Didn't Tsongkhapa argue that even sravakas realise the emptiness of both personality and phenomena?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 20th, 2011 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: Use of the term 'Hinayāna'

Content:

Namdrol said:

He did, but he was corrected on this point by Gorampa.

Tsongkhpa is not Candrakirti.

Astus wrote:

OK, so it is not that there isn't such form of Madhyamaka but rather that you take a view that doesn't accept it just like many others don't agree with the Gelug interpretation (not to mention those who have never even heard of it). No big deal really, there are many views in Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 20th, 2011 at 2:35 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Military Sangha (U.S.)

Content:

Astus wrote:

I see little problem with having a Buddhist chaplain and community in any military until it is meant to represent the Three Treasures. It seems contrary to Western ideas about Buddhism that it is all about peace and serenity but as a major religion it is no different in its cultural and political presence from Christianity and Islam. When emperors, dictators and warlords took/take Buddhism as their preferred state religion the military is obviously included. Even gangsters can be Buddhists! And if those who commit evil acts understand that there are serious consequences in this life and the subsequent ones they may eventually reform themselves. If they realise that samsara is the place of suffering they might even turn their minds toward higher goals.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 20th, 2011 at 3:17 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Military Sangha (U.S.)

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm not in the US but I seriously doubt that young men can chose only between the military or crime. What about young women first of all? They could join the military too but for some reason most of them don't make such a choice. Also, if for poor people the military is a good option then poorer countries would have lot bigger armies than the US, especially when they have a higher population. It is also an interesting phenomenon compared to the option of a military career that in many Buddhist countries poor families send a few children to the monasteries to ease their financial burden; this practice was also common in Europe before the materialist era. It would be a lot nicer if all those desperate young people joined the community of Buddha instead of a group meant for killing and conquer.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 20th, 2011 at 3:38 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Military Sangha (U.S.)

Content:
Astus wrote:
Greg,

Indeed. A story of a man I personally know who was conscripted (conscription was abolished in Hungary about 9 years ago) but didn't want to leave his wife and baby daughter for years because they needed the money he earned went to the dentist and had most of his teeth pulled out because then he was not eligible for service. So yes, there is always a way out.

Author: Astus
Date: Wednesday, July 20th, 2011 at 4:06 AM
Title: Re: Chinese Buddhist canon
Content:

some1 said:
However, English translations (e.g. <http://www.fodian.net/world/sutras.html>) from the Chinese canon are still far less extensive or complete compared to the Pali canon. I think that is partly due the bigger difference between Chinese and Indo-European languages, and the larger volume of Mahayana text in general.

Astus wrote:
I think there are significantly more people who speak Chinese, Korean or Japanese than those who know Pali. However, there are lot more Western monks within Theravada than those in East Asian traditions and also more Western followers of Theravada generally than those of Chinese or Korean Buddhism. So it is the number of followers that makes the real difference. (Zen followers don't really count as only a handful of them consider themselves Buddhists.)

Author: Astus
Date: Wednesday, July 20th, 2011 at 3:22 PM
Title: Re: Chinese Buddhist canon
Content:

Jnana said:
Doctrinally, all of the early texts are very similar. The only major differences are in word choice and how the basic pericopes are strung together to form larger units, and then how these larger units of sūtras are arranged into Āgamas/Nikāyas.

Astus wrote:
And that similarity led people to conclude it is the Theravada school that could preserve the best the original teachings, or the closest to the original ones, as a living tradition.

Author: Astus
Date: Wednesday, July 20th, 2011 at 4:05 PM
Title: Re: Use of the term 'Hīnayāna'

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Recently, many diverse Theravada practices were brought to Spirit Rock through the visit of Achaan Jumtien, a sixty-year-old monk from the jungles of Southern Thailand. In the course of nine days he taught thirty different practices. These included chakra practices (opening of the wisdom-eye and the heart center), skeleton practices (on the nature of the body), and meditations with the elements of earth, air, fire, water and space. He trained people to understand emptiness by resting in what he called the "Original Mind" or the "Natural State" and he offered practices unifying participants' consciousnesses with his own. He also performed many kinds of blessings, described exorcisms, taught chants, and offered protection rituals, visualizations and vows (including bodhisattva vows, practice vows and refuge vows). Throughout, he emphasized that freedom and emptiness and joy can be found in all circumstances. And this in only one week from one Theravada teacher!

It is essential to understand that "Theravada Buddhism" has no fixed definition. If we claim that the only true and complete locus for the tradition is the monastic sangha, then it is all too easy to undervalue the religious expression and practices of the "Theravada" laity. Regardless of how we choose to define Theravada Buddhism, we do not want to accept the label "Hinayana" for the tradition. The term itself is even more pejorative than the usual English translations of "the Small Vehicle" or the "the Lesser Vehicle." Hinayana could more literally be translated as the "crummy or lousy vehicle." (The Monier-Williams Sanskrit-English Dictionary gives "inferior" and "defective" as translations for Hina.) When the word "Hinayana" was first used in Buddhist India it did not refer to any particular school of Buddhism, but rather to a selfish and arrogant attitude of particular practitioners. It is mostly through the quirks of history that it became a label used to contrast the Theravada with the Mahayana tradition.

It is also commonly assumed that the Theravada has different goals from the Mahayana. That is, the Theravada teaches the path to arhathood (a path to full enlightenment which neither develops all the qualities of a Buddha nor cultivates a vow to save all beings), while the Mahayana teaches the bodhisattva path to buddhahood that involves the altruistic vow to save all beings. Though often overlooked by writers on Theravada Buddhism the bodhisattva path has remained available within the Theravada tradition from before the rise of the Mahayana down to the present time. A small but significant number of Theravadan monks and teachers, some of whom were popularly considered to be arhats, have chosen this difficult option as their own."

<http://www.insightmeditationcenter.org/books-articles/articles/the-treasures-of-the-theravada/>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 21st, 2011 at 3:10 PM

Title: Re: Trying to find a Buddha or enlightenment

Content:

LastLegend said:

You are trying to verbalize the mind?

Astus wrote:

That's what is called "teaching" and "studying" in Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 22nd, 2011 at 4:43 AM

Title: The Passing of Chan Master John Crook

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is with great sadness and sense of loss that we announce that Chan Master Dr John Crook has died suddenly at his home at Winterhead Hill Farm in Somerset, UK.

John was the first Western Dharma Heir of the late Chan Master Sheng-yen. He was the founding Teacher of the Western Chan Fellowship which is a lay Chan Buddhist community with members and associates in UK and Europe. He was a pioneer who brought great wisdom and creativity to the translation of Chinese Chan Buddhism into a Western context. Through the establishment of the WCF and the training of its leaders he has ensured that this work will continue.

(<http://www.westernchanfellowship.org/news-item+M5b5ed9f8ce5.html>)

<http://www.westernchanfellowship.org/news-item+M5a90884dfd4.html>

<http://www.westernchanfellowship.org/news-item+M52557a6a91f.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 22nd, 2011 at 5:23 AM

Title: Re: Trying to find a Buddha or enlightenment

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't think that Buddhism is much different from any other field of knowledge. You learn about it, you understand it, you put it into practice. Trying to put something into practice what one has no or minimal information of is simply ineffective. So when it is said, "do meditation", it has to be clear what that meditation actually means and what the process of it is. If one knows only as much as to count the inhalation and exhalation that it is that much one can develop and attain. If one knows how to go from counting breath to eventually gaining insight into emptiness then that path one can go through. Ignorance is the root of suffering, on every level.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 22nd, 2011 at 3:20 PM

Title: Re: Use of the term 'Hīnayāna'

Content:

pueraeternus said:

Actually, many of these practices are probably remnants of ancient Mahayana practices, which existed in the region before the advent of Theravada as a state religion. Some of these practices are in no way endorsed by Theravadin orthodoxy, which stems from the Mahaviharin commentarial tradition. Hence, I am not sure if it is correct to assert all of these teachings under the rubric of Theravada.

Astus wrote:

I think it should be noted that there was a "purification" of Theravada in the 19th century. So when people think of Theravada as a "pure Buddhism" it is because of a modern development, a bias generated also by Western influence.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 23rd, 2011 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: Use of the term 'Hīnayāna'

Content:

Nangwa said:

His translations are all agenda based.

Astus wrote:

Show me one he has no agenda. You can't. From the point of deciding to translate, in the process of choosing what to translate up to the point of polishing that translation is all influenced by the views of that translator. And if you say there is an "orthodox" and an "unorthodox" view, it just means you have your chosen agenda.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 24th, 2011 at 7:18 AM

Title: Re: Doubt about Pure Land and Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think it highly misleading to conceive Chan and Pure Land as separate sects (except in Japan). Chan and Pure Land are merely different practices. It is meaningless to distinguish practitioners' views based on whether they prefer walking, sitting or bowing as primary meditation practice. Why is it said that Chan is superior than Pure Land? It's because using the name of Amitabha as the focus of attention to calm the mind is generally easier than not having any particular point of focus as in Chan. It is easier to conceive an ideal realm where one can attain liberation than to understand how one can already be a buddha. The real proof of this is apparent in the West too when you see all the phony crazy speaking Zen followers and those who could choose the Pure Land path with all sincerity.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 25th, 2011 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: and again ... Jesus is a bodhisattva

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jesus was a bodhisattva, that is definite. Why? Because Amaterasu is an emanation of Vairocana, etc. It is common Buddhist practice to "tame the local spirits". How is that a problem from a Buddhist perspective?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 25th, 2011 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: and again ... Jesus is a bodhisattva

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

The story of Jesus tells the story of a person whose behavior was that of a bodhisattva. But that doesn't mean that any person(s) on whom the stories of Jesus may be based was a bodhisattva.

Astus wrote:

And I think it is totally irrelevant. Saying that "Jesus was a bodhisattva" is subordinating the figure of Jesus - as the most popular Western deity - to a Buddhist order of the universe. It is a way of religious conquer to change the view of people and emphasise aspects that agree with Buddhism (kindness, non-harming, self-sacrifice, patience, etc.) and downplay those that are important in Christianity (son of God, forgiveness of sins, sacrifice for God, resurrection, etc.).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 25th, 2011 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: Did the Lotus Sutra render all previous sutras invalid

Content:

Astus wrote:

Many other sutras claim to be the ultimate and final teaching of the Buddha. In the end it is one's personal choice which text one should take the highest of all, as the source of distinguishing the true from the provisional. There is also no rule in Buddhism that one has to take only one sutra above others or that there must be an ultimate teaching. In fact, it is possible to interpret the Lotus Sutra in a way to say that every teaching is a skilful means to conform with sentient beings and there is no such thing as the "one true doctrine".

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 25th, 2011 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: Did the Lotus Sutra render all previous sutras invalid

Content:

Astus wrote:

You may not be aware of it that Nichiren followed the Tendai chronological order where the Lotus Sutra is said to be preached in the last 8 years of the Buddha's life and then finally he taught the Nirvana Sutra just before his passing. This of course has nothing to do with actual history as we understand it today but a sectarian classification of the teachings made originally in China. Nichiren tried to create a purified Tendai with his own modifications added. Other, non-Tendai based schools provide their own reasons how a different sutra or teaching is superior. Zen - in its radical form - says that relying on an scripture is an inferior view. The Jodo school says that the only way to reach liberation in the final age of Dharma is relying on Amida Buddha's power. The Shingon school differentiates between the exoteric and esoteric teaching, esoteric being superior and definitive. And if you look outside of Japan you find that the distinction between sects is almost non-existent. You should also see how Nichiren was fighting against every other established Buddhist school in order to be recognised and accepted by the ruling class of the country. The Lotus Sutra is similar in spirit to the struggles of Nichiren in the sense how it repeatedly praises itself without much deeper content compared to other more philosophical and meditative texts. This naturally made the Lotus Sutra a good choice for Zhiyi - the original founder of the Tiantai school, known in Japan as Tendai - to use it as the organising principle of the Buddha's teachings and a way of authenticating his own ideas that he projected into the sutra.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 26th, 2011 at 4:06 AM

Title: Re: Doubt about Pure Land and Chan

Content:

rory said:

So you will find critiques. Pure Landers will say 99 out of 100 who practice Pure Land succeed, 1 out of 100 who practice Ch'an succeed.

Astus wrote:

That saying is attributed to Yongming Yanshou - well, he actually wrote it - who was a great master and wrote extensively on Chan and how Chan is in harmony with the other teachings. I'm mentioning this only to point again to the fact that while there are practices used widely by all sorts of Mahayana practitioners there is no such thing as a Pure Land school outside of the Japanese tradition. That means that the opposition between Pure Land and Chan followers is virtually a myth. Chinese Buddhists greet each other with "Amitufo" (Amita Buddha) - I think it says a lot.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 26th, 2011 at 5:38 PM

Title: Re: Doubt about Pure Land and Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

As Yinguang said, these are methods. When I say there was and is no Pure Land school outside of Japan I mean that in the sense of an institution, a separate church, organisation. Monks follow the same precepts, get ordination in the same way. The differences are between local rules of a monastery. But there is hardly any monastic community dedicated solely to one form of practice or doctrine. Focus on a single method exists on an individual level so there are teachers emphasising their favourite way. But that is really an individual thing and not institutional. In a monastery some monks study sutras, some do recitations, some do meditation, some do administrative tasks, etc. They are all monks living in the same monastery under the same rules and doing the same ritual procedures.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 30th, 2011 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: Tantra of the Tachikawa-Ryu

Content:

Astus wrote:

Yuukai (1345-1416) also played an important role in purging what was known as the Tachikawa school. ... The Tachikawa teachings were extirpated by orthodox Shingon: Yuukai burned all the writings of the Tachikawa school at his temple on Kouya-san, saving only a list of the texts destroyed.

(Taikou Yamasaki: Shingon - Japanese Esoteric Buddhism, p. 44)

The Tachikawa school appears to have indulged in the sexual rites practiced by the somewhat similar Shaktist sects of Tibet. In 1335, as the result of a memorial submitted by the Mount Kouya mongs against the Tachikawa school, its leader was exiled and books expounding its principles were ordered to be burned. Traces of its doctrines still survive, however, in existing Buddhist sects.

(Yoshiko Kurata Dykstra: Sources of Japanese Tradition, p. 180)

This Tachikawa school later spread to the province of Etchuu. In successive generations, two teachers, Kakumei and kakuin, lived on Mount Kouya [and taught Tachikawa doctrine there]. At this time, many secret manuals and texts of this heretical school were in circulation, often called "oral transmission of the secrets of esoteric doctrine." To this day, there are ignorant people who study such works and believe them to possess the loftiest thoughts. In truth, they are neither exoteric nor esoteric but merely so many stones wrapped in jade. ... Many people studied these teachings, but they did not meet with divine favor, and for the most part, both the teachings and the men have perished. A few are left, but i do not know how many.

(Sources of Japanese Tradition, quotes from Yuukai's Houkyoushou: "TD 77, no. 2456:847-849", quote on p. 189)

It is in Shingon and Tendai Buddhism that we find for the first time two movements that have been commonly labeled "heresies" (jakyō). For all its radical criticism of established Buddhism, even the Nichiren school was not disqualified by this label, and it remained a powerful trend within Buddhism. The Shingon and Tendai traditions, however, tried for centuries to assert a rather problematic distinction between "esoteric Buddhism", or "pure esotericism," and Tantrism (or "mixed esotericism"), that is, a form of Tantrism unexpurgated of its darker magical (and in particular sexual) elements. The Tachikawa branch is said to have emerged during the Kamakura period, with the teachings of Ninkan (d.u.) and Monkan (1281-1357). It advocated sexual union as the fusion of the two mandalas and as the technique leading to the apotheosis called sokushin joubutsu ("becoming a buddha in this very body"). Certain aspects of the Vajrayana, which were considered if not entirely orthodox at least acceptable in Tibetan Buddhism, came to provoke strong reactions on the part of conventional Japanese Buddhists. Consequently, the Tachikawa movement was forbidden during the Muromachi period. Despite its formal disappearance, however, its influence lingered and was felt in many places, in the imperial house as well as in Shingon and Zen monasteries.

(Bernard Faure: The Red Thread, p. 126-127)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 30th, 2011 at 12:38 AM

Title: Re: James Low & Simply Being

Content:

Namdrol said:

Natural state is not rigpa. Rigpa is one's knowledge, or recognition, of the natural state.

Astus wrote:

That makes sense.

There is a problem then with the use of the word.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 30th, 2011 at 1:11 AM

Title: Re: Tantra of the Tachikawa-Ryu

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jikan,

All the sources I've quoted above maintains that it has disappeared as a school. The practices themselves, since the texts are still available, maybe done by a few, but that doesn't make it a tradition.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 30th, 2011 at 8:13 PM

Title: Re: Rocky Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Zen is not a single doctrine, both interpretations of buddha-nature exist.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 30th, 2011 at 8:17 PM

Title: Re: Tantra of the Tachikawa-Ryu

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think you should contact Stevens to provide his sources.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 30th, 2011 at 10:34 PM

Title: Re: Categories in Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

The lists by numbers are used to sum up the teachings of the Buddha. It is an ancient method that also appears in one of the primary collections of the Buddha's teachings, the Anguttara Nikaya.

A useful picture of the essential teachings:

http://www.leighb.com/mid_way.htm

A very basic list:

<http://www.leighb.com/listlist.htm>

Improved list:

http://www.thezensite.com/ZenEssays/Miscellaneous/Buddhism_by_Numbers.html

Huge list:

<http://www.thedhamma.com/buddhaslists.pdf> by David N. Snyder, Ph.D. (founder of this forum)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 30th, 2011 at 10:42 PM

Title: Re: Tantra of the Tachikawa-Ryu

Content:

Namdrol said:

It also does not make it "tantric".

Astus wrote:

Depends on definition. When it has the characteristics of tantric teachings it could be called that, even if from the perspective of traditional(ist) Vajrayana they are heretics.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 31st, 2011 at 6:55 PM

Title: Re: Rocky Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dogen's explanation:

In "all living beings" spoken of here on the way of the buddha, those with minds are "all living beings"; for the mind is living beings. Those without minds are similarly living beings; for living beings are mind. Therefore, all minds are living beings, and living beings all "have the buddha nature." The grasses, trees and lands are mind; because they are mind, they are living beings; because they are living beings, they "have the buddha nature." The sun, moon, and stars are mind; because they are mind, they are living beings; because they are living beings, they "have the buddha nature."
(<http://hcbss.stanford.edu/research/projects/sztp/translations/shobogenzo/translations/bussho/translation.html>)

A classical story:

Dongshan asked Yunyan, "Who can hear the teachings of the insentient?"
Yunyan said, "It can be heard by the insentient." Dongshan asked, "Do you hear it, Master?" Yunyan said, "If I heard it, then you would not hear my teaching." Dongshan answered, "That being the case, then I do not hear your teaching." Yunyan replied, "You don't even hear my teaching, how could you hear the teachings of the insentient?"
Dongshan was enlightened on hearing this and responded in verse:

Wondrous! Marvelous!
The teachings of the insentient are inconceivable.
If you listen with the ears, you won't understand.
When you hear with the eyes, then you will know.

http://hcbss.stanford.edu/research/projects/sztp/translations/shobogenzo/translations/mujo_seppo/translation.html
<http://www.mro.org/zmm/teachings/daido/teisho11.php>

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, July 31st, 2011 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: Rocky Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

The reasoning is quite simple. All is mind - mind is buddha - rocks and trees are buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 1st, 2011 at 3:54 AM

Title: Re: Rocky Zen

Content:

Namdrol said:

Piss poor reasoning.

Astus wrote:

That is not a reasoning at all.

Besides the one already mentioned it is possible to relate it to the teachings of the Tedai school's "ichinen sanzen" and the Huayan school's Dharmadhatu of unhindered interpenetration of phenomena. But as I said, not all agreed with the idea that buddha-nature is universal on that level, for instance the teachers within the Hongzhou (Zen) school.

"The Dharmakaya (Dharma-Body) has no form, but it assumes different forms according to the needs of sentient beings. Thus, some say that green bamboo is the Dharmakaya and that the fragrance of yellow flowers is Prajna. If green bamboo really were the Dharmakaya, then the Dharmakaya would merely be like wood or grass. Thus, a person eating bamboo shoots could say that he was eating the Dharmakaya. If one talked like this, would there be any possible benefit for anyone in recording it? Such a person is really quite confused about the Buddha, who is right before him, as well as about his substance, which permeates all things; and so he seeks him elsewhere, outside, in error, kalpa after kalpa."

(<http://www.ymba.org/TaChu/tachu3.htm>)

An essay by Robert Sharf discussing the whole issue:
http://kr.buddhism.org/zen/koan/Robert_Sharf-e.htm

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 1st, 2011 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: Introductory Texts

Content:

Will said:

Most of these downloadable 10 Kalavinka Press PDFs are good introductions to the Mahayana:

<http://ifile.it/t3aqukl/MahayanaPDFs.zip> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Astus wrote:

Unfortunately that file is gone. If anyone could upload it it would be a great help.

Will said:

This title has been around since the 1920s, but it is free from BDK:

<https://www.bdkamerica.org/default.aspx?MPID=53> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Astus wrote:

It presents a Japanese perspective of what constitutes the Buddha's teachings. I'm not sure if it really fits for the category of introduction since it contains many different levels of teachings without explaining the connection.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 1st, 2011 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism & Guns?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Technically having a weapon is forbidden in Buddhism only to ordained people and those who have taken all the bodhisattva precepts in the Brahmajala Sutra that has a precept against possessing any kind of weaponry. What is to be avoided is killing, the ultimate expression of anger. That is the minimum for lay people who want to train on the path and become free from the pains of the three lower realms.

On the mental side it is as Master Yoda said to young Anakin, "Fear is the path to the dark side. Fear leads to anger. Anger leads to hate. Hate leads to suffering." I don't know what form of Buddhism you practice but there are many methods in all traditions to use in order to alleviate fear. This means that instead of acting upon the feeling (more defence, more power, stronger walls, etc.) you face it within yourself. Perhaps the easiest step halfway between outer and inner is to get protection from the beings of non-material realms like different gods, protectors, bodhisattvas, buddhas. On the inner level you can look up meditation techniques of your choice. A selection of texts is found in " In the Face of Fear: Buddhist Wisdom for Challenging Times " by Barry Boyce. Also you may like this book by Tsoknyi Rinpoche, " Fearless Simplicity: The Dzogchen Way of Living Freely in a Complex World ". And one by Thich Nhat Hanh, " No Death, No Fear: Comforting Wisdom for Life ".

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 2nd, 2011 at 2:39 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism & Guns?

Content:

Astus wrote:

As I have mentioned before, there is generally no problem in Buddhism with ordinary lay people owning weapons. Even more, we could cite here the involvement of Buddhism in military culture - where that is relevant, of course, in Asia. There are different levels of practitioners. As you may well know from European history, religious views don't necessarily make people morally better. One can be a serial killer and a Buddhist, that's because in that case being a Buddhist is only a weak idea. Also, one can be a living saint without being a Buddhist.

About the levels of practitioners, it is up to each and every one's commitment to the Dharma. Many think only about the benefit in this life so they use Buddhism to get some peace - this is the most common Western view. Many think about the immense suffering in the lower realms (hell realm, ghosts' realm, animals' realm) and about the benefits and pleasures of the higher realms (humans, gods), so they try to avoid the lower and gain birth in the higher - this is the most common among culturally Buddhists. Then there are those who understand that samsara is a big waste of time and effort where there is no lasting peace ever. So the three important levels are those living for this life, those living with the perspective of past and future lives, and those who want to go beyond all kinds of births.

In the case of those who think only of the present life, owning a gun is no big deal. It could be even positive. That's because it makes little difference. Such people only consider if they feel all right or not. From the Buddha's teachings they may understand the benefits of harmlessness and how it relates to mental calm, so it is possible to say that since a weapon is a source of violence one should avoid such things. Just think about how the USA and the USSR raced against each other in creating nuclear bombs, all because of fear. Fear is "what if something bad happens?", so they "prepared for the worst".

In view of past and future lives, the present one is the result of past deeds and the future is formed by the present decisions. If I am robbed, harmed, beaten or killed, those are all the consequences of my past actions. On the other hand, my violence brings harm to me in the future. This is understanding the causal relationships between my acts and my experiences. In order to avoid harm I have to be harmless myself.

"Whoever takes a rod to harm living beings desiring ease, when he himself is looking for ease, will meet with no ease after death.

Whoever doesn't take a rod to harm living beings desiring ease, when he himself is looking for ease, will meet with ease after death."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/kn/dhp/dhp.10.than.html>)

To attain ultimate peace, nirvana, one has to practice peace. It is actually one of the http://www.shantideva.net/guide_ch6.htm. It is not just a matter of avoiding the extreme pains of the lower realms, it is developing perfect inner peace. Because here one understands that true peace doesn't exist in samsara. Here is a short discussion between Punna and Buddha.

"Well then, Punna. Now that I have instructed you with a brief instruction, in which country are you going to live?"

"Lord, there is a country called Sunaparanta. I am going to live there."

"Punna, the Sunaparanta people are fierce. They are rough. If they insult and ridicule you, what will you think?"

"If they insult and ridicule me, I will think, 'These Sunaparanta people are civilized, very civilized, in that they don't hit me with their hands.' That is what I will think, O Blessed One. That is what I will think, O One Well-gone."

"But if they hit you with their hands, what will you think?"

"...I will think, 'These Sunaparanta people are civilized, very civilized, in that they don't hit me with a clod!...'"

"But if they hit you with a clod...?"

"...I will think, 'These Sunaparanta people are civilized, very civilized, in that they don't hit me with a stick!...'"

"But if they hit you with a stick...?"

"...I will think, 'These Sunaparanta people are civilized, very civilized, in that they don't hit me with a knife!...'"

"But if they hit you with a knife...?"

"...I will think, 'These Sunaparanta people are civilized, very civilized, in that they don't take my life with a sharp knife!...'"

"But if they take your life with a sharp knife...?"

"If they take my life with a sharp knife, I will think, 'There are disciples of the Blessed One who — horrified, humiliated, and disgusted by the body and by life — have sought for an assassin, but here I have met my assassin without searching for him.' That is what I will think, O Blessed One. That is what I will think, O One Well-gone."

"Good, Punna, very good. Possessing such calm and self-control you are fit to dwell among the Sunaparantans. Now it is time to do as you see fit."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn35/sn35.088.than.html#sunaparanta>)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 2nd, 2011 at 5:27 AM

Title: Re: Why is possible to achieve Buddhahood?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are many texts describing systematically the stages how buddhahood can be attained. Some of them are available in English. One example is Ven. Yinshun's "https://books.google.com/books/about/The_way_to_Buddhahood.html?id=W2RSDTGGQJEC" (<http://wisdom.buddhistdoor.com/huifeng/2011/07/27/yinshun-the-way-to-buddhahood-verses-%E6%88%90%E4%BD%9B%E4%B9%8B%E9%81%93-%E9%A0%8C-english-chinese/>). Other works, like Gampopa's "Jewel Ornament of Liberation" and Tsongkhapa's "The Great Treatise On The Stages Of The Path To Enlightenment" are great and you can also get modern commentaries on them.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 2nd, 2011 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: The "Indian" Mahayana Tradition

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are studies you can look into (although it may not be what you were looking for):

Buddhist thought: a complete introduction to the Indian tradition by Paul Williams

Figments and fragments of Mahāyāna Buddhism in India: more collected papers by Gregory Schopen

Nāgārjuna in context: Mahāyāna Buddhism and early Indian culture by Joseph Walser
Power, wealth and women in Indian Mahāyāna Buddhism: the Gaṇḍavyūha-sūtra by Douglas Osto

A history of Indian Buddhism: from Śākyamuni to early Mahāyāna by Akira Hirakawa
Indian Buddhism by A. K. Warder

The continuity of madhyamaka and yogācāra in Indian Mahāyāna Buddhism by Ian Charles Harris

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 4th, 2011 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism & Guns?

Content:

Sönam said:

From a non-American point of view it's simply unbelievable ... even the interpretation of the dharma to justify that cow-boy culture. Sorry David, but something is certainly wrong in the empire of the United States.

Sönam

Astus wrote:

Indeed there is a big difference here between how American's view guns and how others where guns are not something just anybody can buy in a supermarket. That is a reason why I'm not really in the position of telling if it is OK to own a gun for self-defence in that particular case. Generally speaking, when one has to think of defending him/herself it is about fear, and fear is a source of lot of bad stuff.

"If even a hundred-thousand rapists came across me like this, I wouldn't stir a hair.

I'd feel no terror, and I'm not afraid of you, Mara, even alone like this.

Here — I disappear. I slip into your belly or stand between your eyebrows, and you don't see me.

I have mastery over the mind, have well-developed the bases of power.

I'm released from all bonds, and not afraid of you, my friend.

Then Mara the Evil One — sad & dejected at realizing, "Uppalavanna the nun knows me" — vanished right there."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn05/sn05.005.than.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 6th, 2011 at 1:33 AM

Title: Re: Book of Bodhisattva Precepts

Content:

Astus wrote:

Very interesting. Thanks for the notification Will.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 6th, 2011 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: My Spiritual history and a plea to young Buddhists

Content:

Astus wrote:

Topic Split: <http://dharmafire.net/viewtopic.php?f=34&t=4935>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 6th, 2011 at 8:39 PM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Because the power of afflictions is too strong.

Astus wrote:

What exactly is it that made afflictions any stronger than a hundred years back? Or is it geographical, or cultural perhaps? I don't see any apparent reason why living as a renunciate now would be more difficult than any time before. True, Buddhism doesn't have the same level of support as in Asian countries, however, that is a different matter that can change with time.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 6th, 2011 at 10:22 PM

Title: Re: Do any ancient Tibetan Buddhist texts give practical advice?

Content:

Astus wrote:

How about "Ordinary wisdom: Sakya Pandita's treasury of good advice"? There are also numerous works on ethics, like Tsongkhapa's "Tantric Ethics", Sakya Pandita's "A Clear Differentiation of the Three Codes", Ngari Panchen's "Perfect Conduct: Ascertaining the Three Vows" and the not so ancient Jamgön Kongtrul's "The Treasury of Knowledge: Buddhist Ethics". One should also look into Indian texts like Nagarjuna's Ratnavali and Suhrillekha, or Shantideva's Bodhicaryavatara and Siksasamuccaya.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 7th, 2011 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: Do any ancient Tibetan Buddhist texts give practical advice?

Content:

Luke said:

No, that statement is very beneficial, and in the long run, practical because of its benefits. What is not practical is "You are forbidden to ever kill any sentient being in any situation ever, and if violently attacked, you must throw yourself down and let yourself get massacred like a Buddhist saint." Such a statement is more like Jainism.

Interesting. I guess this is another problem of Tibetan Buddhism first being spread by only the elites in a new country.

Astus wrote:

No one forbids anything in Buddhism. They just tell you if you kill you'll end up in hell or in some other bad situation.

The whole of Buddhism is spread by the elite to the elite. Buddhism is still a foreign, exotic and strange religion/philosophy/therapy/psychology/WTF in the West. Simple people has all the different Christian sects, or New Age, or Physicalism if they want to believe in something. Buddhism will remain an elite religion until you see villagers praying for health to Medicine Buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 8th, 2011 at 6:48 PM

Title: Re: Dorje Chang Buddha III

Content:

Astus wrote:

"living buddha" is the Chinese equivalent of Tibetan tulku. It should be based on the teachings that a group is rejected or accepted and not subjective lists of "Buddhist Cults".

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 8th, 2011 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Astus wrote:

This is like saying that it's impossible to learn Sanskrit. Just because only few people have the motivation and perseverance to actually master the language. There are thousands of Buddhist monks who live every day by the precepts. There are even hermits living in remote mountains. To say that these are the ending days of the Dharma and the only path to salvation is Vajrayana and the others are pointless is pretty radical. Well, even Honen were a bit more sophisticated in claiming almost the same thing. But this is very much in the area of "praising oneself and criticizing others".

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 8th, 2011 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Namdrol said:

For example, even in Theravadin countries, most of the monks do not actually practice renunciation -- they have property, cars, money, debit cards, etc.

Astus wrote:

But that is not a new development. It's not that monks got lax in the last centuries only.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 8th, 2011 at 11:10 PM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Namdrol said:

More evidence for my case -- did I say this was a 21st century problem? It has been true since the 5th century C.E.

Astus wrote:

I doubt there was such a start date.

"What is the cause, lord, what is the reason, why before there were fewer training rules and yet more monks established in final gnosis, whereas now there are more training rules and yet fewer monks established in final gnosis?"

"That's the way it is, Kassapa. When beings are degenerating and the true Dhamma is disappearing, there are more training rules and yet fewer monks established in final gnosis."

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn16/sn16.013.than.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 9th, 2011 at 12:14 AM

Title: Re: Renunciation not Impossible

Content:

Will said:

Why not? Since oodles of tantric Geluk adepts have followed the vajrayana (based in renunciation) with success up to the present, they would have dropped teaching renunciation by now if they agreed with Namdrol.

Astus wrote:

Indeed, why the huge monastic order in Tibet if it's pointless. They could have done better building economy and such.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 9th, 2011 at 12:17 AM

Title: Re: Renunciation not Impossible

Content:

Nangwa said:

The monasteries were the economy.

Astus wrote:

You mean they served as manufactures, etc. to produce goods? Or they were commercial centres and stock markets? I thought Tibet had a very feudal economy.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 9th, 2011 at 12:34 AM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I see. Thanks for the info. Then in Tibet Vajrayana was truly the only viable teaching for the majority.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 9th, 2011 at 3:16 AM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

mr. gordo said:

Hi Astus, can you clarify? I thought Honen also believed all practices were ineffective except for Pure Land in his day. Granted, he didn't support the withdrawal of funds from other Buddhist schools or believed in a proactive type of conversion.

Astus wrote:

There is difficult and there is easy, but not impossible and possible. Honen emphasised that the exclusive Nenbutsu is a valid and easy way, not that all the others are wrong. Honen also recognised the validity of auxiliary practices for Pure Land followers. Indeed, how could the Buddha's teaching be false? The attitude is shown here very clearly,

"Supposing that followers of other schools ridicule us by saying that the Name is meant for those of low intelligence and that this teaching is shallow and inferior, we should avoid any dispute and reply: "As we are convinced that the ignorant who are poorly gifted and illiterate like ourselves will be delivered by faith, for us this is the supreme doctrine, even though it may seem contemptible to those of higher ability. Although other teachings may be superior, we cannot practice them because they are beyond our powers. Since the original intention of all the buddhas is to free everyone from birth and death, we request those of other views not to interfere with us." If we treat them without malice, who then will harm us?"

(Tannisho, 12)

And here the problem is addressed in detail,

"To attain buddhahood while still in this body is the essence of the secret teachings of Shingon and is the result of the three esoteric practices. The purification of the six senses is taught by the One Vehicle of the Lotus Sutra, and this is attained by practicing the four peaceful observances. But these are all stages along the difficult path, which can be followed only by those specially endowed and belong to the enlightenment attainable only by meditational methods. The basic principle of the other-power teachings of the Pure Land school is to gain enlightenment in the next life, since it follows the path of the assurance of faith. Besides, it is the easy way that can be followed by those of poor ability and is a teaching that does not discriminate between good and evil adherents.

Because, moreover, it is almost impossible to eliminate defilements and hindrances during this lifetime, even the holy monks who practice Shingon and Tendai methods still look forward to reaching enlightenment in the next life. How much truer is this of those of us who lack in discipline and wisdom! Yet even we can cross over the painful ocean of birth and death on board the ship of Amida's Vow. As soon as we have reached the shore of the Pure Land, the dark clouds of the defilements will instantly be cleared away and the enlightening moon of buddhahood will at once appear."

(Tannisho, 15)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 9th, 2011 at 4:45 PM

Title: Taoist Origin of Tantric Energy System

Content:

Astus wrote:

In the introduction of Peter Alan Roberts' new book "Mahamudra and Related Instructions" it says that the energy system as it appeared in India with the chakras and nadis originates from Central Asia and it has a Taoist source. Anyone to provide more information on this?

The text says,

"The candali practice also involves the physiology of sexuality, generally described from a male perspective. It corresponds with far more ancient Taoist practices, which have a greater number of pressure points in breath control, called jade locks, and a specific female morphology that has the retention of menstruation as the parallel to the male retention of ejaculation. Candali and the cakra system appeared in the Buddhist tradition subsequent to a period of Buddhist and Taoist coexistence in Central Asia. The cakras, literally "wheels," are the points where subsidiary channels branch off into the body, but they were unknown in India before the latter centuries of the first millennium, when they first appeared in both Saivism and Buddhism."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 9th, 2011 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: Taoist Origin of Tantric Energy System

Content:

Astus wrote:

What you say is one of the reasons that such Chinese connection surprised me. Perhaps I will contact him for clarification.

update: Except that I couldn't find any contact info for him...

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 9th, 2011 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: Nirvana Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

So you say it will eventually become a deep analysis with wide ranging arguments? Perhaps I skip then the boring stuff...

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 10th, 2011 at 6:58 PM

Title: Re: An independent Mahamudra forum?

Content:

Astus wrote:

As Greg said, the Kagyu section could be used for discussion on Mahamudra. It is unfortunate that there is rarely any discussion here on it, especially as I'm quite fond of this wonderful teaching. But if there are special reasons why a separate Mahamudra forum would be worth a try I have no objections against it.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 10th, 2011 at 8:08 PM

Title: Re: An independent Mahamudra forum?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There it is. Use it well.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 10th, 2011 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: An independent Mahamudra forum?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Some of us were given Mahamudra pointing out instructions before we even took refuge let alone started ngondro!

Astus wrote:

So much for karma.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 10th, 2011 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra - The Moonlight

Content:

Astus wrote:

Yesterday I was re-reading the http://www.dharma-media.org/media/kagyu/drigung/garchen/mamamudra-trans_khenchen/mahamudra.pdf by Garchen Rinpoche.

"Regarding the manner of imparting the profound path [of Mahamudra], the venerable Gampopa considered it to be an independent path of tantra. So he did not make the esoteric empowerment a prerequisite for receiving the Mahamudra teachings. He spoke about the method of directly guiding the disciple toward the intrinsic reality of the mind." (Mahamudra: The Moonlight, p. 123)

connected to that statement, from Shenpen Ösel:

<http://www.abuddhistlibrary.com/Buddhism/A%20-%20Tibetan%20Buddhism/Authors/Gampopa/Mahamudra%20->

%20The%20Very%20Essence%20of%20Mind/Mahamudra%20-%20The%20Very%20Essence%20Of%20Mind%20-%20By%20Gampopa.htm

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 12th, 2011 at 6:13 AM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Astus wrote:

One thing that doesn't seem to have occurred here is to question what renunciation stands for. It's used here like something very bad and painful, a great struggle against the sins of the flesh. But as I see in the Buddha's teachings, renunciations is because one realises the futile and harmful nature of indulging in different worldly pleasures. So renunciation is not about "I have to be good, although I feel bad" but "I'm fed up with this crap, I better just leave it". Renunciation is not forcing yourself to leave your family but realising that family life is so much senseless trouble. Therefore, when it is said that one chooses "fun and pleasures" instead of renunciation, well, that is the confusion of seeing something painful as blissful; while of course, calling renunciation hard and tiresome and impossible is conceiving what is blissful as painful. So Sthiramati said, "You see, the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, the great beings (mahasattvas), is actually the Great Suffering Vehicle."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 12th, 2011 at 6:43 AM

Title: Zazen Ron by Enni

Content:

Astus wrote:

Zazen Ron -

"Discussion of Zazen"

by Zen Master Enni (1202-1280)

The Zazen school is the way of great freedom. All myriad things come from this gate. All myriad practices are mastered in this way. The mysterious workings of prajna and psychic powers are born from within it; the world of gods and men have also come from this. Thus, the Buddhas live in this gate, and the Bodhisattvas practice to enter into this way. Even the Hinayana and infidels practice it, but are not yet in harmony with the true way. All the outer and inner (esoteric) schools have their validation by attaining to this way. Thus, the Patriarch says "All the wise ones in the 10 directions enter this school."

Q: Why is it that you say this Zen gate is the source of all the teachings?

A: Zen is [just] the Buddha mind. Precepts are its outward characteristics, the teachings are its elucidation, and the recitation of the Name is the tool. These 3 religious practices all come from the Buddha mind. Thus, I say this school represents the source [of all the teachings].

Q: The Dharma of Zen has a signless essence. How does it account for the manifestation of spiritual qualities, and by what does one take as a verification of seeing one's nature?

A: Your own mind is Buddha. What spiritual qualities are there beyond that? And what verification should we look for beyond the recognition of the mind?

Q: When we cultivate the mind, this is only one practice. But if we cultivate many practices and meritorious deeds, how could the merit from these be inferior to that of the one practice?

A: An ancient said, "At the time you suddenly see the Tathagata Zen, the six paramitas and the different [spiritual] practices are complete in your own body." So, the one Dharma of Zen includes all things. Even in the world they have the saying, "Many talents are not as good as One Mind." So, even though we cultivate different practices, if we cannot end the delusion of our One Mind, we will not be Enlightened. And, not being Enlightened, how could we become a Buddha?

Q: Why should we cultivate the Buddha-mind school? We cannot be certain we will be Enlightened even if we do, and if we can't be certain what use is there in cultivating it?

A: As this school is the way of incomprehensible freedom, the one who lends ear to [it's teaching] gives rise to an exceedingly [good] cause of Enlightenment, and if he then cultivates the school it will represent the ultimate Buddha Mind. The Buddha Mind is fundamentally free from ignorance and enlightenment; the mysterious practice of six years of sitting erect in the Snow-covered Mountains [Buddha's practice] is evident in this school. Although you may not have attained the way, when you do Zazen for even as little as one sitting, you are a one-sitting Buddha. If you do Zazen for a day, you are a one-day Buddha. And if you do Zazen for a lifetime you are a one-lifetime Buddha. To possess such faith is to have very keen faculties, and to be a great vessel of Dharma.

Q: When we practice this way, what do we do with our minds?

A: The Buddha Mind is signless and free from attachments. The Diamond Sutra says that Buddhas are free from all characteristics. So, when we have no-mind and no-thought while walking, standing, sitting and lying down, this is what should be done with the mind, and is the true concentrated effort.

Q: It is hard to believe this type of cultivation and it is very hard to practice. What if I were to seek merit by reading sutras and reciting dharanis, keeping precepts and being mindful of Buddha by calling his name?

A: The sutras and dharanis are not words, but are the Primordial Mind of all beings. Though they are speech, they are intended only for those who have lost [sight of] the Primordial Mind, and teach us in different ways so as to bring about Enlightenment to this Primordial Mind and end the cycle of birth-and-death which is caused by delusion. If we just recite words with the mouth and say this is the highest, does it not also follow that we should get warm by saying “fire” or cool off by saying “wind”? When we are hungry, would we just say the name of the food we want and get it? So, even though we may say “fire” all day, we will not get warm. Even though we say “water” all night, our thirst will not be quenched. Words and speech are like the picture of a rice cake: though we say them with our mouths our whole life, our hunger will not be satisfied. It is a true pity that the ordinary person, having ignorant ideas of birth and death running very deep, is constantly thinking of attainment in regard to the Dharma. This is very foolish! To practice all things without thinking of attainment is called the Prajna of Mahayana. This is the Buddha Wisdom, pure and without thoughts. Because this wisdom cuts away the source of birth and death, it is called the Prajna-sword.

Q: But if we don’t gain merits and plant good spiritual roots, how can we arrive at Buddhahood which is endowed perfectly with the various virtues?

A: He who seeks Buddhahood by gaining merit and planting good spiritual roots might become a Buddha after 3 kalpas, but one who cultivates the direct pointing at one’s own mind, seeing into one’s nature and becoming a Buddha, knows that one is a Buddha from the very beginning. It is not that he attains the fruit of Buddhahood.

Q: Then do those who cultivate Zen reject the value of merits and good roots?

A: Even though such a one cultivates good roots to help others, because such a one has no aspirations one doesn’t seek any merits at all. He has no-mind at all times.

Q: If no-mind is represents the ultimate, who is it that knows the seeing of his nature and Enlightenment to the way?

A: The ultimate no-mind means to put a stop to all false knowledge and wrong views - all the discriminating activity of thought. As it does not give rise to a view of cultivation, it does not does want to become a Buddha. As it does not give rise to a view social engagement, it does not delight in praise and high standing; as it produces no such view of love or hate, it does not discriminate between closeness or aloofness between self and other. Don’t think of good & evil - such a one is called the one on the no-thought path. This path is not something that the ordinary person knows about, or even those of the two Vehicles.

Q: In the teachings (sutras), the merit derived from various good deeds and practices are explained many times; why then is the merit of no-mind not explained directly?

A: Because the Bodhisattvas of the Original Enlightenment already hold it in high esteem and understand it [directly], isn’t explained. This is why the Lotus Sutra says, “Do not preach this sutra to those lacking wisdom.” Even though the teachings contain 84,000 dharma gates, if we trace them back to their source [we find] they do not go beyond the two things of form and emptiness. “Form” means the substance of the four great elements and five aggregates; “emptiness” is the true nature of affliction and enlightenment. Since this body has shape, it is called “form”; because mind has no shape, it is called “emptiness.” In all the worlds, there is nothing to be spoken of beyond this very body and mind.

Q: Are the shape & substance of the four great elements originally deluded or enlightened?

A: From the beginning there is no distinction between ignorance and enlightenment in body or mind. All things appear conditionally, like a dreams and hallucinations. Have no thought concerning the myriad things.

Q: The two-Vehicles also teach no-mind, along with enlightenment and Nirvana. How is the Mahayana different from them?

A: Originally, the Arhats of the sravaka and pratyekabuddha vehicles consider body and mind as an affliction and have aversion for them. They desire to extinguish body and mind and become like dead trees, bricks and rocks. Even though they practice like this, in the end they only become gods of the formless realms. This isn't the true Dharma, but is rather the fruit of Hinayana. The no-mind of the Mahayana is not the same.

Q: Do Bodhisattvas of the Mahayana also have this way of no-mind?

A: Bodhisattvas have many defiling and obscuring obstacles in their consciousness and do not yet accord with no-mind until they reach the tenth Bhumi. These “defiling obstacles” means that, until the tenth bhumi, they still desire to seek the Dharma, and they do not accord with their original way. It's only when they arrive at the tenth Bhumi and the virtual enlightenment that they arrive at the way of no-mind.

Q: If it is so difficult for even a Bodhisattva to accord with, how then could beginners so easily accord with this way?

A: True Dharma is inconceivable. The setting up of the Bodhisattva path is for those of dim spiritual vision. Those who are clear-sighted realize the true enlightenment of no-mind when they first give rise to the aspiration.

Q: One who see's one's true nature and awakens to the Buddha way is called a Buddha. Why then do they no also have psychic powers, show radiant lights, or perform the mystic feats of the Buddha which would distinguish him from a regular person?

A: Since this body has been built from ignorant thoughts from the past, even though we see our nature it does not show off the psychic power and radiance. Yet, is it not psychic power to be master over the six dusts of the senses and deluded thoughts? Without resorting to hard & painful practice, without passing through the 3 great incalculable eons, to cut off birth and death, see straight into one's nature and become a Buddha - this are the mystic feats [of a Buddha]. And to employ the light of prajna that is the pure Dharmakaya to save all beings from the darkness of delusion - what other kind of radiant light do we need? To desire psychic powers other than great wisdom and understanding is the way of Mara and the infidels. Even foxes have these psychic powers and ability to transform themselves - but should we pay homage to them? Just cultivating no-mind, we can extinguish at once the three incalculable eons and suddenly see our nature, becoming Buddhas.

Q: What kind of wisdom should we use to awaken to the true meaning of “Seeing one’s true nature, becoming Buddha.”?

A: Knowledge you gain by studying sutras and shastras is called the knowledge of the senses. This might be considered knowledge to the ordinary, ignorant person, but it is not true knowledge. To recognize this inherent Buddha-nature by turning the light around and shining it back is called the Eye of Prajna. We use this prajna eye to see our natures and become Buddhas.

Q: What is this inherent Buddha-nature? And what is meant by “turning the light around and shining it back.”?

A: All beings have self-nature (svabhava). This nature is intrinsically non-arising and non-ceasing; it always abides without change. Thus it is called the inherent self-nature. Both the Buddhas of the past, present and future and all beings have this same nature as the Dharmakaya of the Original Ground. The radiance of this Dharmakaya fills the entire Dharma realm, turning the light and shining it back on the darkness of delusion of all beings. Where this light does not reach is called Mara’s realm of ignorance. In this realm of Mara dwells the spirit of the afflictions, seeking to devour the Dharma nature. Those beings who are damaged by this spirit, taking their deluded thoughts as their Original Mind and enjoying the seeds of desire, constantly spin in the four kinds of birth and three evil destinies. When will they ever cut off birth and death?

Q: Since birth and death arise from deluded thoughts, when one awakens to the source from which these deluded thoughts arise, will birth and death naturally stop?

A: Throughout all hours of the day, beings are tainted by deluded thoughts, and their Original Buddha Nature is buried by afflictions. It can be compared to the bright moon hidden behind clouds. Once they have awakened to the source of these thoughts, it is like the bright moon emerging from out the clouds. It is like a mirror that, once cleaned, clearly reflects the myriad images. It has full mastery over all things and, though facing myriad objects, suffers not even a hair’s breadth of defilement. This is because the Original Buddha Nature has the freedom of psychic power.

Q: What does it mean that, while directing our mind in Zazen, we “should not think of good or evil.”?

A: This saying will directly cut off the root source of birth and death. Do not imagine that it is limited only to Zazen! One who arrives at this saying is a Buddha without beginning or end, and is practicing Zazen whether walking, standing, sitting or lying down.

Q: What are big and small thoughts?

A: Small thoughts are thoughts which arise from conditions, whereas big thoughts are desire, hatred and delusion since beginningless births and deaths. One who only puts an end to these thoughts while in Zazen - big or small - is one who lacks the true mind of the way, does not discern the root source of beginningless birth and death, and does not exhaust the consciousness characterized by desire, hatred and delusion. But when one has discerned this root source, afflictions are Bodhi, the three poisons are the three precepts, birth and death become Nirvana without beginning, and the six dusts become the six psychic powers.

Q: The mind of one who has long practiced Zazen will clearly be pure, but how does a beginner practice to put an end to the taint of deluded thoughts?

A: Don't feel repulsed by the taint of deluded thoughts; just discern the mind's nature. Because we are confused about the One Mind, we think that there is the taint of deluded thoughts when, in fact, it is originally pure. For instance, when sleeping we see various things in our dreams, but when we wake up from the dream all these are recognized as simple deluded thoughts. When we awaken to the One Mind, everything is empty, with nothing remaining.

Q: What does it mean to say, "affliction is Bodhi, birth and death is Nirvana."?

A: Afflictions are foolishness and ignorance; Bodhi is the Buddha-nature of everything. Beings, not recognizing their own Buddha-nature, look for it outside themselves; they look at good and evil outside themselves and give rise to attachment to the aspects of these things. This is great foolishness! And then when those who manage to leave these things behind and seek out their own Buddha-nature give rise to some view of this awakening, distinguishing themselves from ordinary people, they will become proud of themselves and fall back into Mara's way. This is ignorance! Unaware that the One Mind is originally no-mind, we rouse the mind to seek the mind and, in doing so, give rise to the present taints. This is the seed of birth and death. But once we have awakened to the truth that from the beginning the One Mind neither arises nor ceases, then there is no difference between self and other, good and evil, love and hate; we are completely with no-thought and no-mind. This is what is meant by "birth and death is Nirvana." Failing to awaken to the root source of the One Mind, we lose our permanent self and obscure our true Buddha nature. If we look back to the source of afflictions, they are like dreams, illusions, bubbles and shadows. Realizing the truth that the One Mind is originally pure is what is meant by "the afflictions are Bodhi." And when we arrive at the source of the One Mind, the radiance of our inherent wisdom will be manifest to us. At that time, the myriad things will be at rest, and we will attain the ultimate emptiness of all Buddhas. For instance, suppose there is a dark cave, into which the light of the sun and moon does not go; yet when we take a lamp into it, the darkness of many years is naturally illuminated. In the same way, when the dark night is touched by the light of the moon, space naturally becomes bright without changing its substance. The mind's things are like this; when beings, lost in the darkness of ignorance and afflictions, encounter the light of wisdom, they are naturally purified without changing body and mind. This is what is meant by "the afflictions are Bodhi, birth and death is Nirvana."

Q: Even though the nature of mind constantly abides changelessly, and Buddhas are sentient beings are one and the same, sentient beings who have yet to master and realize this truth cannot avoid suffering and, because of this, must cultivate the way. But once they have seen their nature, should they still cultivate?

A: That Buddhas and sentient beings are one and the same is what is pointed out by wisdom. The teachings of the sutras are but fingers pointing to the moon. If we don't see the moon, you should rely on the finger; after you've seen the moon, the finger is useless. When we have yet to awaken to the Buddha Mind, we should rely on the teachings; when we recognize the Buddha Mind, the eighty thousand dharma gates are all clearly apparent in one mind. After we have awakened to the one mind, there isn't use for even a single teaching. The words of the Patriarchs are like a brick used to knock on a gate. Before you enter the gate, you take up the brick; once you've entered the gate, what still hold the brick? Thus, so long as we have yet to awaken to the original meaning of the Buddhas and Patriarchs, we should take up and investigate the phrase, "see your nature and become a Buddha." But once we've already opened the gate of the great liberation and completely awakened to the original meaning of the Buddhas and Patriarchs, seeing one's nature is nothing special and become a Buddha can't be grasped. There is no Buddha, no sentient beings; from the beginning there is not a single thing, and the three worlds can't be grasped.

Q: When we face the end of our lives not having clarified the important point of "seeing our nature and becoming a Buddha," how should we direct the mind at the last?

A: When one mind arises, there is birth and death; when there is no-mind, there is no body that is born, and when there is no-thought, there is no mind that ceases. When there is no-thought and no-mind, there is no birth and death whatsoever. This body is like the dew that forms on grass; the dew is originally without a self. When we stop the mind that thinks we have a body and turn toward the truth that from the beginning there is not a single thing, when we no longer think that there is either birth and death and have no-mind and no-thought, this is equivalent to the Great Nirvana of the Buddhas of the past, present and future. Although the good and evil attributes of things appear to us in their variety, we should take no notice of them. If we give rise to even a hair's breadth of mind, it is seed of Samsara. If we just cultivate no-mind and don't forget it, whether walking, standing, sitting or lying down, there is no special way to direct the mind at the last. When we truly abide in no-mind, we depart like blossoms that fall and leaves that scatter in the wind; like frost which melts in the morning sun. What is there that directs the mind in such events as these? When we truly arrive at no-mind, there are no three realms of being or six paths of rebirth, no pure or defiled lands, no Buddhas, no beings - not a single thing.

Of this mind that abides in the path of no-mind and makes an end of birth and death, the Buddha said at his death (in the Nirvana Sutra), "All compound things are impermanent; their nature is to rise and fall. When both rising and falling cease, their calm cessation is joy." The phrase "all compound things are impermanent" refers to the conditioned things of all beings; they are like dreams, illusions, reflections, like the moon in a puddle. "Their nature is to rise and fall" means that, from sentient beings to plants, all things that are born must necessarily die. The mountains, rivers and great earth of this world will break down and disappear in the end. All things, wherever they may be, are things that arise and cease. This is merely birth and death from the continual transformations of one thought; none of it is real. "When rising and falling cease" means that when, because the true state of all beings is pure and signless, we reach the source of our signlessness, the beginningless, endless birth and death, coming and going, cease all at once, and the openness of the mind is like empty space. "Their calm cessation is joy" refers to the truth that Buddhas are no-mind, sentient beings are no-mind, mountains and rivers and the great earth, all the different phenomena arrayed are no-mind. When all beings are no-mind, hell is no-mind, heaven is no-mind; there is neither joy nor sadness. Trusting in the way like this, we see all things without seeing them in mind, and we hear all things without hearing them in the mind, and so too with the minds of tasting, smelling, etcetera. Just have no-mind in all circumstances. The mind of no-mind is the original teacher of all the Buddhas of the past, present and future. It is the fundamental Buddha. The realization of this original Buddha of no-thought is what is called the Supreme Perfect Enlightenment of the Buddhas. To wake up to the meaning of this is what is called "their calm cessation is joy." Trusting in the Dharma like this and leaving the body behind, we should not think of anything for a single thought.

With all respect.

(A discussion of Zazen intimately revealed to the Prime Minister Kujo by the National Teacher Shoichi)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 12th, 2011 at 6:44 AM

Title: Re: Zazen Ron by Enni

Content:

Astus wrote:

Because I've found no Google link to this text and I find it a very interesting piece of work I posted it here. If anybody happens to know the actual source of this translation it'd be appreciated. Discussion on it is also welcome.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 12th, 2011 at 6:52 AM

Title: Re: Meditation practices for the layfolk

Content:

Astus wrote:

"In this there are no distinctions between the sharp and the dull, the rich and the poor, mendicants and lay people, Easterners or Westerners, ancients or moderns. It only depends upon whether or not the will for enlightenment is there, and whether instruction and guidance are mistaken or accurate."

(An Elementary Talk on Zen by Man-an)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 12th, 2011 at 4:13 PM

Title: Re: Zazen Ron by Enni

Content:

LastLegend said:

So how do Zen beginners practice?

Astus wrote:

It is not a gradual practice where you can have beginners and advanced students. See you nature, that's the single essential point.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 12th, 2011 at 4:30 PM

Title: Re: Zazen Ron by Enni

Content:

mindyourmind said:

I remember reading it somewhere in some Soto booklets I received from a friend many years ago. I still have the teachings, I will have a look over the weekend.

Or maybe the old memory is incorrect as to where I saw it

Astus wrote:

Enni was a Rinzai teacher, contemporary of Dogen.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 12th, 2011 at 6:15 PM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Astus wrote:

PadmaVonSamba,

What I meant is simply the life of renunciation, the life of a sramana, not any special mental training in that.

DN,

I think I don't have many illusions about monastic life, not because I've ever lived like one but because I like reading about history of Buddhism. What I see as the great appeal of a monastic lifestyle is the relatively more freedom it provides compared to a family or even a lay life without marriage and children. Not that monastics can't be busy with their different duties and other things, but it's still less than working all day and other necessities that most worldly person has to do. I don't think in the way that renunciation is about struggling with the longing for all the pleasures of life but as a conscious choice to dedicate one's time to the Dharma. Yes, this is idealistic in a sense and there were and are monastics who live like that not for the Dharma but for other reasons. Still, if you think about it, if the many Vajrayana teachers that travel around had to sit in an office 8 or more hours a day they would hardly be going from a lecture in Germany to a retreat in California. Having a job, doing work, this is not the result of modern society. Actually, because there is a middle class there are more people who have the freedom to think about the Dharma and occasionally go to a retreat.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 12th, 2011 at 6:26 PM

Title: Re: Classic Kagyü Mahāmudrā Texts

Content:

Chaz said:

It should be noted that it's a restricted text.

Astus wrote:

While at the same time you can get a couple of to the point and in depth explanations without any problem. Strange thinking, perhaps it's a marketing thing to make it look more important and more esoteric.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 12th, 2011 at 6:26 PM

Title: Re: Classic Kagyü Mahāmudrā Texts

Content:

Chaz said:

It should be noted that it's a restricted text.

Astus wrote:

While at the same time you can get a couple of to the point and in depth explanations without any problem. Strange thinking, perhaps it's a marketing thing to make it look more important and more esoteric.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 12th, 2011 at 10:52 PM

Title: Re: Classic Kagyü Mahāmudrā Texts

Content:

heart said:

I got the book, some part of it contains remarks that makes it more in to a teachers manual rather than a disciples manual. Such as what the student is supposed to answer to certain questions if they got it and if they didn't get it. Apart from that it cover the same things as his shorter texts. I

/magnus

Astus wrote:

Isn't that supposed to be the part of the pointing out instructions, as a next point after analysing, just like in Wangchuk Dorje's other two manuals? Clarifying the Natural State also has the "correct answers".

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 12th, 2011 at 10:52 PM

Title: Re: Classic Kagyü Mahāmudrā Texts

Content:

heart said:

I got the book, some part of it contains remarks that makes it more in to a teachers manual rather than a disciples manual. Such as what the student is supposed to answer to certain questions if they got it and if they didn't get it. Apart from that it cover the same things as his shorter texts. I

/magnus

Astus wrote:

Isn't that supposed to be the part of the pointing out instructions, as a next point after analysing, just like in Wangchuk Dorje's other two manuals? Clarifying the Natural State also has the "correct answers".

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 12th, 2011 at 11:23 PM

Title: Re: Self-Ordained Monks

Content:

Huseng said:

This just goes to show you how some crazies signed up for the early sangha and as a result many many rules had to be laid down as a result.

Astus wrote:

Many such cases in the Vinaya were invented by the writers rather than actual cases remembered by tradition. See on this Bernard Faure's "The Red Thread", first few chapters where he discusses Vinaya.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 12th, 2011 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Classic Kagyü Mahāmudrā Texts

Content:

heart said:

Not really. During the pointing-out instructions there is outlined a number of instructions and questions that the teacher should ask the student and also a number of possible answers and what the further instructions should be for a student answering this or that. Never seen anything similar in any other text.

Astus wrote:

I see, so it's more elaborated there, just as you said: a teacher's manual.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 12th, 2011 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Classic Kagyü Mahāmudrā Texts

Content:

heart said:

Not really. During the pointing-out instructions there is outlined a number of instructions and questions that the teacher should ask the student and also a number of possible answers and what the further instructions should be for a student answering this or that. Never seen anything similar in any other text.

Astus wrote:

I see, so it's more elaborated there, just as you said: a teacher's manual.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 13th, 2011 at 1:58 AM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Astus wrote:

DN,

If Vajrayana is preferred because it is easier than the "path of renunciation", and that is its primary advantage, why not then choose the "path of Pure Land"? That is the easiest of all even in Tibetan Buddhism. Then there is no need to renounce, no need to transform, no need to study, no need to meditate, no need to avoid anything an ordinary modern citizen would do. And at the same time it guarantees perfect enlightenment in one lifetime, unlike virtually any other path.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 13th, 2011 at 3:30 PM

Title: Re: Zazen Ron by Enni

Content:

Astus wrote:

To see nature means just the non-grasping awareness as the original essence of mind, the mind that does not rest on any thought, idea or emotion, therefore it doesn't generate a whole world, the samsara. To practically see nature one has to "make a step back", that is, see how thoughts arise and cease, see how when any thought (dharma, mental phenomenon) is grasped further thoughts arise and one creates a world - so it is taught that the world is created by the mind. Seeing that thoughts arise and cease, what they come from and where they return to is the nature of mind. In fact, even where thoughts abide is the nature of mind.

The teaching on this of the Zazen Ron is summed up like this:

When asked how one is to use the mind (youjin) in Zen spiritual practice, the author of the Zazen ron replies that the true use of the mind is no-mind and no-thought (munen) (5; 412-413). Since all things appear only provisionally, we should not consider (shiryou) them (11; 415); if we do not consider them - if we have "the ultimate [practice of] no-mind" - we put a stop to all false views and discriminations of thinking (akuchi akuken shiryou funbetsu) (9; 414). This way of no-thought, or no-mind, "does not consider any good or evil" (9; 414); hence it has no aspiration for merit (kudoku) (8; 414) or even for the buddhadharma itself (13; 415). It simply "sees all things without seeing them in the mind and hears all things without hearing them in the mind" (24; 421). This is by no means a Hinayana practice of stilling the mind (12; 415) and eliminates the three aeons of the path (15; 416). One who "does not consider any good or evil" directly cuts off "the root source of sa.msaara"; he is "a buddha without beginning or end and is [practicing] Zen whether walking, standing, sitting or reclining" (19; 417). (No-Mind and Sudden Awakening: Thoughts on the Soteriology of a Kamakura Zen Text by Carl Bielefeldt in Paths to Liberation: the Mārga and its Transformations in Buddhist Thought, p. 492)

Also, I could find out that the Zazen Ron quoted in the OP is only a selection (translator still unknown to me), the full translation of the same text's Chinese version is found in Thomas Cleary's "The Original Face" under the title "Zen Master Daikaku's Treatise on Sitting Meditation" (大覺禪師坐禪論), in simplified Chinese transcription found here: http://blog.sina.com.cn/s/blog_4d3f203e0100ftpj.html.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 15th, 2011 at 4:59 AM

Title: Re: Zazen Ron by Enni

Content:

LastLegend said:

Interestingly, all the meditative Mahayana sutras (such as Diamond and Shurangama) talk about just that—non-grasping. That says one should not rely on the discriminating consciousnesses but the original essence of mind. If one is able to do this, then he/she will realize enlightenment. In other words, if one is not attached or reacting when the 6 consciousnesses contact with the external, he/she is said to have samadhi.

But nowadays this can be hard.

Astus wrote:

I don't think it'd be harder now than any time before. Although there are many new things around us in terms of technology and culture, the way human mind works is pretty much the same as at the time of the Buddha. But seeing the nature of mind and abiding in that mind is indeed not that easy, so one should practice all the six paramitas and follow a gradual training until things become clear.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 15th, 2011 at 6:00 AM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Jnana said:

The same can basically be said of Chan.

Dechen Norbu said:

Can you substantiate that, please? Are you saying Chan is not a path of renunciation then, right? If so, I would like you to develop a little further if you don't mind. I would like to know if they don't consider the five aggregates something to be given up and don't practice under such perspective.

Astus wrote:

"The buddha-nature is not the good and not the nongood. This is called nondual. The skandhas and sensory realms are seen as two by ordinary people, but the wise comprehend their natures to be nondual. The nondual nature is none other than the buddha-nature." (Platform Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch, ch. 1)

When ever was it in Buddhism that the skandhas had to be given up? It is attachment to the aggregates that generates suffering, it is to view the skandhas as self that creates ignorance.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 15th, 2011 at 3:48 PM

Title: Re: Zazen Ron by Enni

Content:

Astus wrote:

You can say that Zen teaching is not specifically something you choose for personal reasons. Generally claiming that the times are worse than before, in my opinion, is a concept that has been repeated over and over for more than thousand years in Buddhism. Therefore I believe it is not that everything is getting worse every minute but that it is easy to believe in some golden age when everything was perfect and compared to that we are in a truly bad situation. The "masters of old time" are hardly some historical fact but rather a view of history, an interpretation, that is heavily coloured by the imagination of the people who came later. Just consider that at the time the Zazen Ron was composed there were people like Honen and Shinran who preached that because this is the age of Dharma-decline and the difficult practices are too hard for the majority while there were also Zen masters like Eisai and Dogen teaching sudden enlightenment. And although now Dogen is recognised as a very important Zen teacher, in his time he was very much unknown. So now you may say that there are only few great masters but a few hundred years later people might as well say that the 21st century was an optimal time of great masters and great achievements while the 24th century is so bad that there is no hope at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 15th, 2011 at 5:32 PM

Title: Re: Zazen Ron by Enni

Content:

Astus wrote:

What masters are you missing now? I don't know your criteria for who counts as a proper Buddhist teacher, but if you simply look at the amount of published teachings it is surprisingly large, at least in English. Probably the amount is a lot higher in Buddhist countries. So it comes down to the question whom you judge as "correct" and as "incorrect, as "enlightened" and as "non-enlightened". And that will be your personal judgement based on your own view of Buddhism. Others do have different interpretations of course.

Since you mentioned the list of masters, in Zen there is the concept of transmission, and until this day many such transmissions are alive. Consequently the heirs of the old masters are here among us.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 16th, 2011 at 2:53 AM

Title: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Astus wrote:

Caring about those who suffer is compassion. To think of not only those animals that are killed for their meat but also those that suffer because of the way they are treated is a larger circle of compassion. This way the final conclusion will be to live like a Jain monk. But if you add some wisdom and not just get lost in the deep emotions it becomes obvious that beings live on other beings, and even plants - that are not considered sentient beings - live on not just sunlight and water but organic elements coming also from animals. Diet itself is rarely a matter in Buddhism except for a few texts, including those that say animal products, including dairy, are impure. What does matter is intention because that is what actually affects oneself and eventually others. This is an important difference between how Buddhists and how other religions, like Jainism, understand karma.

Rory,

I presume you've been in Budapest downtown where obviously you find a large variety of restaurants. But even if you just look around outside of that area in the city, you hardly find any place where you can order purely vegetarian food, unless you want to eat only vegetable soup or pasta (although pasta usually contains egg). This is a country where you spread liver-cream on bread (https://1.bp.blogspot.com/-ooP4gqeVIBw/TWNQDk9mFQI/AAAAAAAAA1c/GNzoZqTAoso/s1600/DSCF3423_resize.JPG) for breakfast. So Luke is indeed not in an easy situation to keep a vegetarian diet.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 16th, 2011 at 4:28 PM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Astus wrote:

From Dogen's Zuimonki, "A Primer of Soto Zen",

"If you say that this is a degenerate age and do not arouse the mind that seeks the Way in this life, in what life do you expect to gain it? Even if you are not a person such as Subhuti or Mahakasyapa, you should study the Way in accordance with your capacity."
(p. 18)

"Did not even the Buddha offer twenty years of his life for our benefit in this degenerate age! Because of this, offerings by men and devas are still being made to Zen monasteries. Even though the Tathagata possessed supernatural powers of the greatest merit, he had to eat grain meant for horses and get through one rainy season. How can disciples in this degenerate age want things easier?"
(p. 19)

On another occasion Dogen said:

Most people in this world say: "I have the desire to study Buddhism; yet the world is degenerate, and man, inferior. The training Buddhism requires is too strenuous for me. I will follow the easy way and merely strengthen my links with Buddhism and put off enlightenment until another life."

The attitude these words express is completely wrong. In Buddhism, the setting-up of the three periods of Law was merely a temporary expedient. In the Buddha's time, the monks were not necessarily all outstanding; there were some who were extraordinarily depraved and of low character. It was for such evil and inferior persons that the Buddha drew up the precepts. All people inherently have the capacity to awaken to Buddhism. Don't think that they do not possess it. If you practice in accordance with the teachings, you will gain enlightenment without fail.

As long as you have a mind, you can distinguish between good and evil. As long as you have hands and feet, you have the ability to join your palms together and to walk about. There fore, there is no such thing as not having the equipment to practice Buddhism. All human beings are born with this potential; this is not so of those born in the animal world. Students of the Way, do not wait until tomorrow. This very day, this very moment, practice in accordance with the teaching of the Buddha.

(p. 72)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 17th, 2011 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: Rocky Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

"When self dissolves, everything is already awakened. Trees are awakened, rocks are awakened, birds are enlightened, and the clouds in the sky are enlightened. When the Buddha had this moment of complete realization, he discovered that this whole universe is already enlightened. More than that, he realized that every particle on the ground is enlightened. He saw that every particle is a Buddha paradise. In each particle there are billions and trillions of Buddha paradises. In each of those particles there are billions of buddhas residing. This whole universe becomes suddenly enlightened and perfect just as it is."

(Anam Thubten: No Self, No Problem, p. 46)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 17th, 2011 at 5:09 AM

Title: Re: Rocky Zen

Content:

Namdrol said:

Don't mistake poetry and rhetoric, like the above, for what is actual.

It simply means that all objects of knowledge are the display of one's own jñāna. It does not mean that rocks, trees, and such are independently awakened.

Astus wrote:

That's the same point as in Zen, Huayan, etc., it's just that they might call it dharmadhatu or mind or something similar.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 17th, 2011 at 5:23 AM

Title: The Rinpoche's Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Today I've been reading the book "No Self, No Problem" and although it is by a Nyingmapa teacher of the Tibetan tradition, I recommend it to every Buddhist who feel attracted by the teachings of the Zen tradition.

"If we want to realize the truth, the first thing to remember is that we don't have to do anything. No sacred dances. No secret mantras. No religious conversion. We just sit quietly wherever we find ourselves and simply don't do anything. This is most important. Don't do anything. We look directly and see what is true in that moment without labeling or judging anything. Now we see the truth which is beyond our fantasies. We also see that our mind is a conglomeration of mental events, fleeting and insubstantial. At that moment it's impossible to become attached to any personal story line. This is a perfect moment. It lacks nothing. That recognition brings about a sense of inexhaustible joy. We might feel like we want to get up and dance wildly. If so, do it and call it sacred dance."

(Anam Thubten: No Self, No Problem, p. 84-85)

One day Yaoshan was sitting on a stone. Shitou asked what he was doing. Yaoshan said he wasn't doing anything. Shitou said, "You're just sitting here?" Yaoshan said, "Just sitting doing nothing is doing something." Shitou asked, "What exactly do you mean by 'doing nothing'?" Yaoshan said, "If you asked all the sages, they wouldnt be able to tell you." Then Shitou recited a poem:

A person doesn't know how it works,
Just goes along with it naturally.
All the sages in history can't explain it,
And ordinary people don't understand it either.

(Soto Zen Ancestors in China, p. 60)

One day after Yaoshan had sat down, a monk came and asked, "What are you thinking about here by yourself?" "I'm thinking about not-thinking." "How do you think about not-thinking?" "By not thinking."

(p. 63)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 17th, 2011 at 5:29 AM

Title: Re: Rocky Zen

Content:

Namdrol said:

Mind is not jñāna.

Astus wrote:

You may have noticed by now that terminology is not universal even within Buddhism. Mind (xin 心 - citta) in Zen is used not just for the deluded but the enlightened mind too, while other words like consciousness (shi 識 - vijñāna) or intelligence (yi 意 - manas) are not used in both senses.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 17th, 2011 at 3:15 PM

Title: Re: Rocky Zen

Content:

Namdrol said:

Nevertheless, Dzogchen and Zen are different and are in no way equivalent, even when one is confronted by very similar statements. The difference in these statements hinges on very subtle points. You need to seek out a teacher who can explain them to you.

Astus wrote:

I'm not arguing that - at least not here - since the work quoted makes no mention of Dzogchen, and it doesn't have to. The topic of this thread is something else anyway.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 8:17 PM

Title: Re: An independent Mahamudra forum?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Some of us were given Mahamudra pointing out instructions before we even took refuge let alone started ngondro!

Astus wrote:

So much for karma.

Pero said:

What do you mean?

Astus wrote:

That it depends on karma what one meets, hears, studies and understands.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 9:18 PM

Title: Re: The Rinpoche's Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

"The awakening has nothing to do with our background. It has nothing to do with whether we have been meditating for a long time or not. It has nothing to do with meeting impressive teachers or gurus. It is simply dependent on whether or not we are open to it."

(No Self, No Problem, p. 4)

"In the same way, when we pay attention to our breath, body sensations, and to the awareness that arises, then all the illusions, suffering, confusion, sorrow, and personal issues, all of this begins to dissipate. We see that all of these experiences are born of delusion. This is the sense of "I." "I am real. I am truly existent." Everything is gone except this "I," this sense of self. Then, when we continue meditating, the sense of self also goes away. When we just keep meditating, when we just remain in that present awareness and observe, then the self dissolves too. When the self dissolves there is just pure awareness. When the self completely collapses, there is this inexpressible, simple yet profound and ecstatic, compassionate awareness. Nobody is there. "I" is completely nonexistent in that place. There is no separation between samsara, bad circumstances, and nirvana, good circumstances, and there is nobody pursuing the path or chasing after enlightenment. In that moment we realize the essence of the Buddha's teaching."

(p. 41)

"Suddenly, when we stop producing concepts and ideas, when we stop feeding that illusory reality, when we stop associating with ego, it is very simple. It is simple to stop associating with ego. However there are no twelve step programs in transcendent wisdom. There is only the one-step program and that is to not associate with the ego. The moment we stop associating with ego it just immediately ceases right there."

(p. 128)

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 10:18 PM
Title: Re: The Rinpoche's Zen
Content:
Namdrol said:
The following is not Dzogchen.

Astus wrote:
Indeed, there is no mention of Dzogchen. As I've found, Anam Thubten talks of Prajnaparamita in his own way but associates with no specific teaching beyond that. Was it claimed otherwise somewhere?

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 11:21 PM
Title: Re: Introducing the practice of Daimoku to friends and relatives
Content:
Namdrol said:
Chanting Nam-myoho-renge-kyo during the physical union of man and woman is indeed what is called "earthly desires are enlightenment," and "the sufferings of birth and death are nirvana."

I wonder if this applies to chanting Nam-myoho-renge-kyo while watching porn.

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 11:24 PM
Title: Re: Classic Kagyü Mahāmudrā Texts
Content:
Greg said:
I'd also like to put a plug in for Pointing Out the Great Way: The Stages of Meditation in Mahamudra by Daniel P. Brown (<http://www.wisdompubs.org/Pages/display.lasso?-KeyValue=32808&-Token.Action=&image=1> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;)

It's academically rigorous yet oriented toward the practitioner, a survey of all of the important texts of the tradition. Really an impressive and very useful piece of work.

Astus wrote:
I've pondered on buying it but his relationship with Ken Wilber eventually deterred me.

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 11:24 PM
Title: Re: Classic Kagyü Mahāmudrā Texts
Content:
Greg said:

I'd also like to put a plug in for Pointing Out the Great Way: The Stages of Meditation in Mahamudra by Daniel P. Brown (<http://www.wisdompubs.org/Pages/display.lasso?-KeyValue=32808&-Token.Action=&image=1> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;)

It's academically rigorous yet oriented toward the practitioner, a survey of all of the important texts of the tradition. Really an impressive and very useful piece of work.

Astus wrote:

I've pondered on buying it but his relationship with Ken Wilber eventually deterred me.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 4:11 AM

Title: Re: Conservation Efforts

Content:

Astus wrote:

Who owns the resources? The rich.

Who protects the resources? The soldiers.

Who produces the resources? The workers.

Who organises the production? The managers.

Who distributes the products? The merchants.

etc. etc.

The idea of equal distribution is great. Communism, however, didn't work out so far. The Buddha's recipe for the perfect world is the five precepts. How do you convince everybody to abide by it?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 4:37 AM

Title: Re: Conservation Efforts

Content:

Namdrol said:

Screw the proletariat, the consumers must seize the means of production, and create a dictatorship of consumption...!

(oh wait...that won't work...)

Astus wrote:

It won't work only because consumers have no idea where those "means of production" are. Never even heard of them.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 6:03 AM

Title: Re: The Rinpoche's Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Dogma seems to be one of the biggest obstacles in many spiritual traditions. It is often disguised as the wisdom of an infallible lineage, while sometimes it is simply ego's creation for the purpose of postponing the true realization of oneness. As long as such spiritual teachings are based on dogma, they are dead wisdom, full of superstition. ... What is transcendent wisdom? Let's inquire into that. Actually you can call it by many names, whatever name you prefer. It is a direct momentary process of dissolving all illusion right now, in this very moment. It is dissolving the illusion of pain, sorrow, and hatred. It is dissolving the illusion of self. There is a fire of awareness ignited in our consciousness which ruthlessly burns everything, without any exception. Sometimes it burns everything in a single moment and sometimes it burns one illusion after another. That burning process is transcendent wisdom. You can call it "transcendent wisdom" or you don't have to call it anything. It is really awareness, not conceptualization. It is momentary. It is direct experience. It is a realization of losing everything, losing all of our cherished ideas and concepts, sometimes even without any resistance. It is a beautiful way of losing everything, not a painful way."

(No Self, No Problem, p. 125-126)

"In the Son approach, all these true teachings deriving from the faith and understanding of the complete and sudden school which are as numerous as the sands of the Ganges are called dead words because they induce people to create the obstacle of understanding. Nevertheless, with complete descriptions which accord with the nature they do instruct beginning students who are not yet able to investigate the live word of the shortcut approach, and they help to ensure that they have nonretrogressive faith and understanding. But if there is a person of superior faculties-one fit for the secret transmission who abandons all stereotyping as soon as he hears the tasteless word of the shortcut approach-that person does not stagnate in the defects of knowledge and conceptual understanding but, rather, comes to know his abiding place. This is called "to hear once, have a thousand awakenings, and attain great dharanis.""

(Collected Works of Chinul, p. 240)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 3:38 PM

Title: Re: A thought

Content:

Astus wrote:

Mahamudra is more than a single meditation technique, while "vipashyana" covers a very big area. That's why I don't think so.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 4:07 PM

Title: Re: Conservation Efforts

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Infinite source of energy" does not exist, especially not on Earth. Keeping population low (it's already too high) and living in a rural environment would mean a sustainable livelihood where small communities can live on locally produced food and move regularly to arable land until the used land regenerates. That's quite medieval and would require a global catastrophe to reduce humanity into such a culture. Another option - if we want to believe in the salvational nature of science - is to reach a higher technical development, like in the Star Trek universe, that brings with itself the cultural change and so even money disappears. Religions, however, have already proven to be ineffective as social forces, same with other ideological systems, the reason for that is probably in the diversity of humans and opinions.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: Hua Tou and Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Shattering the great doubt means becoming free from attachment to concepts. That is seeing the nature of mind, entering the gate of no-gate, experiencing non-conceptual mind. This is the equivalent of pointing out instruction. How one continues to practice is another question.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 8:39 PM

Title: Re: Hua Tou and Dzogchen

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Some questions:

- Free from attachment to concepts does mean?
- Seeing the Nature of Mind will be with the eyes?
- Are there also more ways to see the Nature of the Mind?
- Which mind would be here meant?
- What are pointing out instructions ?
- Where is this shattering of the great doubt explained?
- What is doubt and about what is one doubtful?

Astus wrote:

I think you better look into this yourself as your questions are far beyond a simple post. And when you have some questions left you can go to the Zen forum section to start a topic for it.

Online:

<http://www.purifymind.com/PracticeBegin.htm> by Master Hanshan Deqing

<http://hsuyun.budismo.net/en/dharma/index.html>

http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/hwadu/cat.asp?cat_seq=5

Books to read by Ven. Sheng-yen:

Shattering the Great Doubt: The Chan Practice of Huatou

Hoofprint of the Ox: Principles of the Chan Buddhist Path as Taught by a Modern Chinese Master

Illuminating silence: the practice of Chinese Zen

Attaining the way: a guide to the practice of Chan Buddhism

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: Conservation Efforts

Content:

Astus wrote:

LastLegend,

"efficient and sustainable energy source" in my understanding - and I can be wrong of course - is the same as an infinite source of energy. Not realistic. But my knowledge is very limited here.

You may call it giving, compassion, enlightenment, etc. - these are ideas. You can't make people give - unless you start a so called "proletariat dictatorship". Since you can't make them give, can't convert them to new views either, the plan fails. That's what I was saying with the failure of religions and ideologies. Therefore, either we go medieval or new technologies. Both are mostly external (i.e. easier to recognise and accept by the majority) forces that make people follow new rules.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Conservation Efforts

Content:

Unknown said:

rural does not equal feudal, though perhaps for Europeans this is the only equation they are familiar with. You have to bear in mind that during the 19th century, literacy rates in the United States was the highest in the world

Astus wrote:

I don't find the perspective of a peasant civilisation that enticing, even if it's sustainable. And when you keep yourself busy on the farm and you are isolated from other areas, literacy disappears as it is useless. Also, don't forget that the 19th century was already the modern age with steam power and gun powder.

Unknown said:

You are talking ahead of yourself. We are not advocating revolutionary or change of government or system. Why people have to bring this in every time?. We are only discussing ideas. But I think there are organizations out there that have people who come from different backgrounds, working on world peace. We can all sit and think it won't work-how is it gonna work? It will not work because that's what we think. Why don't we think that we can at least try?

Astus wrote:

I am discussing such ideas and I'm not marching on the streets or anything like that. But I don't find much to discuss about "how nice it would be if the world was a utopia", but rather considering ways that can be actually effective. Leaving change to those who are already in power, well, why would they want to make any changes? They already have it all, except they want more. Rich people are not less greedy than the poor.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 20th, 2011 at 2:33 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & bhūmis

Content:

Astus wrote:

"The great seal is the very essence of reality and the all-in-one path. The essence of reality being nondifferentiable, its division into the grounds and paths cannot be acceptable from the ultimate standpoint."

(Tashi Namgyal)

Tsele Natsok Rangdrol (Lamp of Mahamudra):

general preliminaries - lesser path of accumulation special preliminaries - medium path of accumulation guru yoga - greater path of accumulation

3 stages of one-pointedness - path of joining some say: 3 stages of simplicity and arriving at one taste - first bhumi and path of cultivation most say: post-meditation after attaining simplicity - first bhumi / path of seeing first stage of simplicity - 1-3 bhumi medium stage of simplicity - 4-5 bhumi greater simplicity - sixth bhumi

first stage of one taste - seventh bhumi medium one taste - eighth bhumi higher stage of one taste - ninth bhumi lesser and medium stages of nonmeditation - tenth bhumi greater nonmeditation - buddhahood/vajradhara, 11-13 bhumi

Dakpo Tashi Namgyal (Mahamudra: The Moonlight):

based on Drelpa Dönsal:

[path of virtuous absorption - one-pointed yoga path of insight - non-discrimination yoga] path of meditation (bhumi 2-10) - one taste yoga buddhahood - nonmeditation yoga

based on Je Gyare:

path of spiritual merit - preparatory practices
path of virtuous absorption - one-pointed yoga
path of insight - nondiscrimination yoga path of meditation - one flavor yoga
9-10 bhumi - lower-middle nonmeditation buddhadhood - greater nonmeditation

Tashi Namgyal's own:

path of spiritual merits and first ground - preparatory practices and three levels of one-pointed yoga path of virtuous absorption and ground of joy - three levels of nondiscriminatory yoga path of insight and meditation, 1-10 grounds - 1-3 levels of one flavor and 1-2 levels of nonmeditation buddhahood - greater nonmeditation

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 20th, 2011 at 4:11 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Buddhist View of Zen

Content:

mzaur said:

So from a Tibetan pov, Zen does not lead to the same realization as Vajrayana?

Astus wrote:

It does lead to buddhahood since it is Mahayana, so they simply put it into their interpretation of sutrayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 20th, 2011 at 5:01 PM

Title: Re: Haiku for Mahayana Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

this life is a dream
nothing can be grasped or seen where do you wake up?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2011 at 5:46 PM

Title: Re: Saichō's Monastic Reforms

Content:

Astus wrote:

A side note:

In Japanese schools they possess the proper doctrinal-practical transmission of the different schools, like in the case of Zen, but because they not necessarily live up to it, they're false. Again, even if they live up to the moral standards because they don't have the right set of rules and transmission they are false. So we could say that neither transmission nor the reality of practice makes one proper Dharma follower. Or it is that if we want we can view it as all right, if we want we can view it as totally wrong. That's because we can argue on the side of either ideal purity or practical situation. But I think what should be asked is the purpose of the whole training and whether a training used can generate the desired results.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2011 at 9:25 PM

Title: Seon Master Jinje

Content:

Astus wrote:

First time I've seen an ad on the Shambhala website that brought me to this page:

<http://www.jinje.us/Jinje.us/Home.html>

Here we read: "Enlightened Seon (Zen) Master Jinje, the 79th Patriarch in the Korean lineage of the Buddha" And also: "The greatest living master of Ganhwa Seon (Korean Zen), he practices a distinctive questioning style of meditation that traces its roots back to the Buddha and remains virtually unknown in the US."

On his <http://jinje.kr/eng/> it's simply stated, "He is the spiritual leader of the Korean Buddhist."

His https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Jinje_Seonsa plainly says: "Seon Master Jinje(1934~) is the greatest living master of Seon Buddhism secluded in Korea."

His

http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/master/priest_view.asp?cat_seq=7&priest_seq=118&page=1 says, "He is currently the spiritual patriarch (joshil) of Donghwasa Temple. He became a member of Jogye Order's Council of Elders in 2003. He also received the prestigious designation of Great Master (Daejongsa) from the Jogye Order in 2004."

Is he really the leader of all Korean Buddhists? Is he the head of the Jogye Order? Neither of that seems accurate to me. Does he have an impressive campaign for his visit to the US? Sure he does. By the way, he is an elder teacher, so it is a programme worth visiting by anyone who can.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 23rd, 2011 at 5:09 AM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Those speaking the rhetoric of decline are "more interested in establishing a particular orthodoxy of "true teaching" than in voicing historical predictions of actual decline, prophetic warnings of moral failings, or existential statements about humankind's capacity for realization. In fact, the beginnings of the Buddhist tradition of decline are best understood as a rhetoric of orthodoxy that marks the appearance of doctrinal differentiation in the Buddhist community. The elements of this argument can be found throughout the various canons, but always in the sense of an exhortation to adhere to the true teachings lest the predicted decline actually come to pass. It was also in China that we first encounter individuals convinced that the predicted demise had actually arrived, due in part to a preexisting and pervasive indigenous discourse of decline. In an interesting twist, the dominant use in China of the Buddhist polemic of orthodoxy was to legitimize new teachings, of which the Three Levels is one example. An important reason for this was that the decline came to be seen in terms of a decline in human nature, a claim about the corrupt existential condition of living beings rather than a decline of time or doctrine."

(Jamie Hubbard: Absolute delusion, perfect Buddhahood : the rise and fall of a Chinese heresy, p. 35)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 23rd, 2011 at 5:00 PM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Adamantine said:

academic gibberish. why are you quoting it?

Astus wrote:

It fits well the situation. Those arguing for a decline also posit their form of Buddhism as appropriate for this rotten age. So it is more a rhetorical device than anything else, as it has been used as such for a long time now in Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 23rd, 2011 at 6:29 PM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Adamantine,

Examples from this thread is in the OP itself: this is the age of decline, therefore renunciation is impossible as a path, the path all can use is Vajrayana. This is practically negating the validity of all the other Buddhist teachings and selecting Vajrayana as the sole option. The book the quote is from is about a long ago extinct Chinese school that first propagated the presence of the age of decline. We can also find similar arguments in sutras, most prominently those that are associated with the Pure Land practice as the Pure Land school itself claims that in the age of decline it is the best path to choose.

You may disregard the careful study of Buddhism and put aside other teachings than those you like the most. But I think it is understandable for you that not everyone shares your view regarding Padmasambhava and other Tibetan Buddhist concepts.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 2:29 AM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Not really, since if you examine things carefully, Mantrayāna is the only Indian Buddhist tradition that asserts full Buddhahood in one lifetime is actually a possibility.

All other Indian Buddhist traditions of which we have knowledge, Mahāyāna or not, assert that at minimum full awakening is impossible in less than three incalculable eons.

Astus wrote:

Renunciation is a key element in attaining arhatship, the goal of the majority of Indian Buddhist traditions. However, Buddhism in India died out long ago so it's not something I include in "other Buddhist teachings" simply because there is no such living religion. On the other hand, we have East Asian and South Asian Buddhism, neither of them defined as particularly Vajrayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 3:45 AM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Outside of Tibeta Buddhism/Vajrayāna, Chan alone proposes that it is possible to attain fullbuddhahood in a single lifetime. But it seems that in Chan, "buddhahood" is a generally a euphemism for attaining the bodhisattva stages, and no Indian Mahāyāna tradition denies that it is impossible for someone to attain the path of seeing and so on. However, they would have done so based on past accumulations. So even here, Vajrayāna remain unique in asserting that one can attain full awakening 11 bhumi + in a single lifetime, soup to nuts.

Astus wrote:

It is not only Chan but also Huayan and Tiantai teach sudden enlightenment - interestingly Huayan puts "sudden enlightenment" one level below its own "complete teaching of the one vehicle". As for the difference between the entry to the bodhisattva stages and full buddhahood, in Chan it is clarified with the distinction of gradual and sudden paths. Gradual means the bodhisattva stages, sudden means immediate buddhahood. Of course, not everyone among the Chan teachers agreed with this view.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 7:16 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is all right to not accept that Chan teaches the sudden gateway to buddhahood. Just as Huseng quoted, Zongmi is one of the few outstanding teachers who did not accept that view. But a large number of teachers did accept.

The fourth principle of Chan is "see nature, become buddha" (jianxing chengfo / kensho jobutsu 見性成佛). As it's said in the Platform Sutra, "If you recognize your own mind and see the nature, you will definitely accomplish the enlightenment of buddhahood." (T48n2008, p351a, 12)

To make it clear how it was understood in the Hongzhou school:

"The deluded man seeks to obtain or attain something, while the enlightened man neither seeks, obtains nor attains anything whatsoever. The deluded man yearns for attainment in some distant kalpa in the future, while the enlightened man perceives the nature of all things suddenly and instantaneously."
(Huihai's "Tsong-Ching Record" tr. by Lok To, X63n1224, p26c, 5-6)

"Some students attain the state of liberated Mind quickly, some slowly. After listening to a Dharma talk, some reach "no mind" directly. In contrast, some must first pass gradually through the ten grades of Bodhisattva faith, the Dasabhumi of Bodhisattva development, and the ten stages before attaining the Perfectly Awakened Mind. Whether one takes a long or a short time, however, once attained, "no mind" can never be lost. With nothing further to cultivate and nothing more to attain, one realizes that this "no mind" is true, not false, Mind. Whether reaching this stage quickly or after passing through the various stages of Bodhisattva development gradually, the attainment of "no mind" cannot be characterized in terms of shallow or deep."
(Huangbo's "Chung-Ling Record" tr. by Lok To, T48n2012A, p380b, 5-9)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 4:58 PM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Astus wrote:

topic split: <http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=69&t=5102>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 5:33 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

Awakening in Chan means realising the nature of mind, i.e. the buddha-mind. Since the buddha-mind is perfect in qualities and omniscience, how could that awakening be limited? It is free from the emotional (klesa) and conceptual (jneya) obscurations, how could it be bound by anything at all? Teachers of Chan were well aware of the gradual stages and aeons of bodhisattva practice when they talked about buddhahood and claimed that Chan is a sudden path. Those who viewed it in a different way did say so.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Huseng said:

Mantrayāna was introduced in the 8th century into China and seems to have become somewhat popular, perhaps because of the mysterious theatrical appeal of it to the common people, but it was effectively doomed in 845 when Wuzong crushed all Buddhist institutions. Any sort of urban Buddhism with state sponsorship received a deep, and sometimes fatal, blow.

Astus wrote:

That is a bit of an exaggeration. Vajrayana was available in China in later ages too, including translation of tantras, and enjoyed state sponsorship under the Mongols and Manchus. But I think it's that since the Taoists already satisfied those who were looking for yogic and magical practices, there was little need for a new one.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 9:04 PM

Title: Devices Zen and the Direct Path

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Generally speaking, Zen teachers nowadays instruct people by setting up rules or using devices. believing that without devices they can't manage, behaving as if without them it's impossible to instruct anyone, they're unable to teach by simply pointing things out directly. To teach people [this way], unable to manage without devices, is 'devices Zen.' "Others tell students pursuing this teaching that it's no good unless they rouse a great ball of doubt and succeed in breaking through it. 'No matter what,' they tell them, 'you've got to rouse a ball of doubt!' They don't teach, 'Abide in the Unborn Buddha Mind!' [but instead] cause people without any ball of doubt to saddle themselves with one, making them exchange the Buddha Mind for a ball of doubt. A mistaken business, isn't it!"

(Bankei Yotaku, tr. Peter Haskel)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 11:37 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

The difference lies in equipoise and post-equipoise.

Frankly, it is obvious that realizing the nature of the mind does not make one a buddha. That is why I stated that "buddhahood" in Chan is a euphemism for awakening, but it does not mean that one who has awakened is a Samyaksambuddha, though I imagine there are some deluded Chan practitioners even today who think it is so.

Astus wrote:

Equipoise and post-equipoise matters when there is a specific state of mind to cultivate. Zen is not about creating any mind. So it is called no-mind.

Realising the nature of mind doesn't make one a buddha, the mind is buddha, so there's nothing to be transformed. This is the teaching of buddha-mind - not just as a possibility of becoming buddha but that the qualities of a buddha are inherent. There is no buddha outside the mind, this is a fundamental Zen teaching. Of course this is not like as in the doctrinal teachings where the buddha is far away out there and reaching that level is almost impossible.

"Anuttara-samyak-sambodhi is a name for the realization that the Buddhas of the whole universe do not in fact possess the smallest perceptible attribute. There exists just the One Mind." (Huangbo, tr. Blofeld, T48n2012B, p384c, 21)

"All you are doing is taking these worthless names to be real. That's all wrong! Even if they do exist, they are nothing but states of dependent transformation, such as the dependent transformations of bodhi, nirvana, emancipation, the threefold body, the [objective] surroundings and the [subjective] mind, bodhisattvahood, and buddhahood. What are you looking for in these lands of dependent transformations! All of these, up to and including the Three Vehicles' twelve divisions of teachings, are just so much waste paper to wipe off privy filth. The buddha is just a phantom body, the patriarchs just old monks."

"But you, weren't you born of a mother? If you seek buddha, you'll be held in the grip of Buddha-Mara. If you seek the patriarchs, you'll be bound by the ropes of Patriarch-Mara. If you engage in any seeking, it will all be pain. Much better to do nothing.

There are a bunch of shavepate monks who say to students, 'The Buddha is the Ultimate; he attained buddhahood only after he came to the fruition of practices carried on through three great asamkhyeya kalpas.' Followers of the Way, if you say that the Buddha is the ultimate, how is it that after eighty years of life the Buddha lay down on his side between the twin sala trees at Kusinagara and died? Where is the Buddha now? We clearly know that his birth and death were not different from ours."

(The Record of Linji, tr. Sasaki, p. 222-223)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: Devices Zen and the Direct Path

Content:

LastLegend said:

If the teachers are not enlightened, they cannot teach direct path.

Astus wrote:

Neither can they teach Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 12:19 AM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Huseng said:

However, none of that was really part of Han/Chinese Buddhism 漢傳.

Tibetan Vajrayāna in China was for Mongol and later Manchurian aristocracy.

Astus wrote:

Primarily, yes. But that doesn't mean monks - especially close to the higher circles - didn't know about it. For instance, Hanshan Deqing did practice some Vajrayana techniques.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 3:36 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

the mind is buddha...

Namdrol said:

Nice, a conditioned, impermanent, afflicted buddha.

N

Astus wrote:

"Good sons, all hindrances are none other than ultimate enlightenment. Whether you attain mindfulness or lose mindfulness, there is no non-liberation. Establishing the Dharma and refuting the Dharma are both called nirvana; wisdom and folly are equally prajna; the method that is perfected by bodhisattvas and false teachers is the same bodhi; ignorance and suchness are not different realms; morality, concentration and wisdom, as well as desire, hatred and ignorance are all divine practices; sentient beings and lands share the same dharma nature; hell and heaven are both the Pure Land; those having Buddha-nature and those not having it equally accomplish the Buddha's enlightenment. All defilements are ultimately liberation. The reality-realms's ocean-like wisdom completely illumines all marks to be just like empty space. This is called 'the Tathāgata's accordance with the nature of enlightenment.' "

(Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment, ch. 6, tr. C. Muller)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 3:53 AM

Title: Re: Devices Zen and the Direct Path

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is not that there is a problem with expedients. But Zen - unlike the other paths - is about directly seeing the nature of mind. Using methods and techniques to gradually come to realisation and instantly accessing the buddha-mind are both valid. Bankei was among those few who kept alive that tradition of Bodhidharma, Huineng, Mazu and Linji to teach the immediate way. On the other hand, Hakuin - who lived a bit later - established a gradual practice of training with koans.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 4:27 AM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Huseng said:

Whatever influence there might have been I have never noticed it either in terms of text or in modern Chinese Buddhism.

Astus wrote:

I don't know much about Chinese ritual practices, but you may have noticed the large number of dharanis present in monks' daily rituals and their general popularity. There are also rites like "Liberating the Flaming-Mouths" (fang yankou 放焰口) based on a Tantric text by Amoghavajra, and the grand ceremony of "Liberation Rite of Water and Land" (shuiliu fahui 水陸法會).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 4:35 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Kyosan said:

We can have some idea of what Buddhahood is and there is nothing wrong with that, but we should realize our limitations and not think that we know what Buddhahood is. Of course we don't, only Buddhas know what Buddhahood is. We are just deluded sentient beings.

Astus wrote:

"Buddhahood" is our own idea that we already have. Whether you say we can analyse this idea of Buddhahood or not doesn't touch the immediate truth that it is a concept we have in our minds. The reason it is said that Buddhahood cannot be figured out is exactly because we just have to drop these ideas and there it is.

"habituated discursive thought arises from the conditioned mind. The six data- fields, false conceptualization and conditioned energies are not the true essence of mind—indeed, they are like sky-flowers. But using discursive thought to discern the Buddha-state is like the sky-flowers further producing 'sky-fruits.' Circular false thoughts are useless here."

(Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment, ch. 4, tr. C. Muller)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 5:05 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

LastLegend said:

Don't talk practice. When we have realized enlightenment we can come back and talk about all the paths not just the path we have employed.

Astus wrote:

Is there some taboo on discussions? This is a Buddhist Forum. Is it that the purpose of such a board as this is unclear? It is meant for talking about Buddhism, about Zen, etc. Questions like "why talk about this?" is saying that we should just shut down this section or even the whole forum. I doubt that's what you or those who make similar comments actually mean. But such meta-discussions like this is disrupting and very much off topic.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 6:24 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

Indeed, this discussion was started based on the different interpretations of Buddhahood in Chan. So it is a "debate topic". And unless it deteriorates into personal attacks I find it a very fruitful form of interaction.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 10:17 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

Actually, I am questioning the entire basis of certain Chan claims to buddhahood because they broadly contradict Indian Mahāyāna.

Astus wrote:

That was Xuanzang's view too, he wanted to "correct" Chinese Buddhism - and he didn't really mean Chan since at that time it was still marginal. However, his doctrines were soon forgotten and the Huayan-Tiantai interpretations conquered the land on which Chan was built. Therefore, to connect Chan to Indian Mahayana one has to go back in time a bit, to around the 4th century when things started to take shape. That means that the primary treatises of Chinese Buddhism are not those that are used in Tibet to understand Mahayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

I didn't mean they knew nothing about those works from India but they rather developed on their own way. The Maha-Prajnaparamita-Upadesa is one example, it was used heavily by both Sanlun and Tiantai, the Mahayana-Sraddhotpada-Sastra is another classic example used often by Huayan teachers.

Consider these works studied in the Korean Jogye Order's curriculum for novices (<http://longquanzs.org/articledetail.php?id=4743>): Diamond Sutra, Heart Sutra, Vimalakirti Sutra, PP8000 Sutra, Avatamsaka Sutra, Shurangama Sutra, Lotus Sutra, Nirvana Sutra, Awakening Faith in Mahayana, Abhidharma teachings, Huayan teachings, Seon teachings. And if that sounds a very broad range, the texts studied in depth are (<http://www.acmuller.net/articles/ogahae-oxford.html>): Flower Adornment Sutra, Awakening of Mahāyāna Faith, Sutra of the Heroic March Concentration, Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment, Platform Sutra, Diamond Sutra. They are all related to Chan/Seon and Huayan/Hwaeom in different ways. No Nagarjuna, no Vasubandhu, no Haribhadra.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

As I said, they tended to ignore Indian Mahāyāna masters, preferring their own interpretations. The only text of clear Indian origin in the short list given here is the first. The rest are native Chinese compositions.

Astus wrote:

Plus the Diamond Sutra. But yes, that is part of the difficulty of simply putting Chan under "sutrāyana" and expecting it to conform with Tibetan views what it should be like. Therefore, if we don't count Indian Mahayana, perfect enlightenment in this life can be as valid a claim as in Vajrayana.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 4:20 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

Carl Bielefeldt in his "Dogen's Manual of Zen Meditation" discusses nicely (p. 87ff) that the Tiantai meditation system (the Mohezhi guan) that included both gradual and sudden methods (where the sudden part was the culmination of the practices) served as a model for Chan that took out only the sudden part - that is the Tathagata Dhyana (based on which it's called Tathagata/Rulai Chan), the vajropamasamadhi, the very state of buddhahood - and left behind the gradual stages. (Bielefeldt there also explains other important developments that are not relevant here but it's a good source to understand how Zen became like it is in Dogen's teachings and even today.) This shows that Zen is not at all without reasoning or doctrinal bases but what people see are teachings that were well established by that time and needed no apologetics - this is what is also called Patriarchal Chan, where the patriarchs are equal to living buddhas expressing the Teaching of the Unsurpassed Vehicle.

Zongmi, who emphasised the sudden enlightenment followed by gradual practice model, argued primarily against the Hongzhou and Baotang schools who taught instant liberation. In the end, however, the Hongzhou style won and from that appeared the Linji and Caodong schools to be the orthodox lineages then on.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

Some quotes on the view of Mahayana and the three kalpas long practice from different Chan works.

But the Buddha said, "Only after undergoing innumerable hardships for three asankhya kalpas did I achieve enlightenment," Why do you now say that simply beholding the mind and over-coming the three poisons is liberation?

The words of the Buddha are true. But the three-asankhya kalpas refer to the three poisoned states of mind. What we call asankhya in Sanskrit you call countless. Within these three poisoned states of mind are countless evil thoughts, And every thought lasts a kalpa. Such an infinity is what the Buddha meant by the three asankhya kalpas, Once the three poisons obscure your real self, how can you be called liberated until you overcome their countless evil thoughts? People who can transform the three poisons of greed, anger, and delusion into the three releases are said to pass through the three-sankhya kalpas. But people of this final age are the densest of fools. They don't understand what the Tathagata really meant by the three-asankhya kalpas. They say enlightenment is only achieved after endless kalpas and thereby mislead disciples to retreat on the path to Buddhahood.

(Breakthrough Sermon)

Q: What is the difference between the Mahayana and the Supreme Vehicle?

A: The Mahayana is the Bodhisattva's vehicle, and the Supreme Yana is the Buddha's vehicle.

Q: How can one practice to attain these vehicles?

A: To practice the Bodhisattva's vehicle is simply Mahayana practice. After attaining the Bodhisattva stage, where there is no longer any need to practice, one arrives at the stage of no-practice, which is permanently still and deep and where there is neither increase nor decrease. This is called the Supreme Vehicle or the Buddha's Vehicle.

(Entering the Tao of Sudden Enlightenment)

The monk asked: How can one suddenly attain the Tao through practice?

The master said: If one really has some good reason and is very sincere, with no trace of falseness, there is, for him, no need to spend endless Asankhyeya-Kalpas in practice. The Mahaparinirvana Sutra says, "A man who sails a boat on the ocean can move very far in a short time in a favorable wind." If there were not a favorable wind, the boat would only stay in the same place for many years. Also, if the boat were to leak, it would submerge and the man would die. The situation of all sentient beings can be compared quite closely to this one. The Surangama Sutra says, "There is Samadhi of seeing all things as illusion, which, in a finger-snap, leads to the state beyond all study." Therefore, in this case, it is not necessary to understand the Three Vehicles nor to attain the Ten Stages of a Bodhisattva's Progress to become Buddha in one thought, thereby transcending Kalpas of practice suddenly.

(Practice and Attain Enlightenment After Understanding the Principles)

"Followers of the Way, if you take my viewpoint you'll cut off the heads of the sambhogakāya and nirmāṇakāya buddhas; a bodhisattva who has attained the completed mind of the tenth stage will be like a mere hireling; a bodhisattva of equivalent enlightenment or a bodhisattva of marvelous enlightenment will be like pilloried prisoners; an arhat and a pratyekabuddha will be like privy fi lth; bodhi and nirvana will be like hitching posts for asses. Why is this so? Followers of the Way, it is only because you haven't yet realized the emptiness of the three asamkhyeya kalpas that you have such obstacles."

(Record of Linji)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 6:23 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

Yes, these are often trotted out, but they do not prove anything other than that Chan Buddhists had a view of buddhahood that does not correspond to mainstream Buddhist thinking on the subject.

Astus wrote:

What "mainstream" actually means is debatable since Chan has been the primary doctrine of elite Buddhism in East Asia for a thousand years now.

Proving that Chan, and particularly sudden enlightenment, is a valid Buddhist teaching is the real issue then. For that we would need a couple of terms defined, especially buddhahood and buddha-mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 4:44 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

"Mainstream" means "rest of the Buddhist world..."

Astus wrote:

That means a few of millions in Tibet, Mongolia and Bhutan, and the many Theravadins. In terms of the number of followers Vajrayana is not mainstream at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 8:02 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

"Mainstream" means "rest of the Buddhist world..."

Astus wrote:

That means a few of millions in Tibet, Mongolia and Bhutan, and the many Theravadins. In terms of the number of followers Vajrayana is not mainstream at all.

Namdrol said:

Mainstream means Buddhism in India.

N

Astus wrote:

Hm, the current Buddhism in India or sometimes in the past? And what time? Why only India and why that time? Among the Indian schools which is mainstream and which is marginal? This is getting messy...

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

Because India is the source of the Dharma, the place where Mahāyāna developed, etc., and the site of Vajrāsana.

Astus wrote:

Do you deny the possibility that authentic Buddhism is not bound by geographical location? You defined a "mainstream Buddhism" as all Indian Buddhists while we both know that Buddhism there was neither unified nor static. Vajrayana claims buddhahood within one lifetime, so it is not exactly true that all agreed on the time it has to take to achieve it. The concept of sudden enlightenment was first taught by Daosheng (360?-434), a disciple of Kumarajiva. Because he was a Chinese master and not Indian, his view of Buddhism must be wrong? Saying that Indian Buddhism is the definitive because that's where it first appeared is very much an argument based on an irrelevant fact. Buddhism developed pretty much independently in China after Buddhism established itself. Why would then it be inferior only because of geographical reasons? Just as in India so it was in China that there were different traditions and interpretations of the Buddhadharma. Sudden enlightenment might be inconceivable for the Theravada and early Mahayana followers, but not so for the Vajrayana. Vajrayana developed in India and Chan developed in China. Neither of them are something you could find in such mainstream schools as the Sarvastivadins or the Dharmaguptakas. But then it comes down to the spatial distance between India and China. Do you find that an important point? In my view, the source of Dharma is the Buddha and not a place, nationality, ethnicity, political system or climate.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 11:37 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

I see. So the problem is the lack of the two accumulations. But even in the Prajnaparamita teachings we find that one paramita includes all the other paramitas.

In the Mahaprajnaparamitasastra (30.5.3; vol. 2, p. 859, tr. Lamotte-Migme) we find even the concept of abstaining for all kinds of practices, "Furthermore, the bodhisattva acquires the Prajñāpāramitā without practicing any dharma and without acquiring any dharma. Why? All practices (caryā) are erroneous and futile: from near or far, they present faults. In fact, bad dharmas (akuśaladharma) are faulty from close up; as for good dharmas, they are transformed and modified from far away; those who become attached to them will end up by experiencing pain and sorrow; thus they show defects from far off. [Good and bad practices] are like an appetizing food and a disgusting food both of which have been poisoned."

There is also the story of Prasannendriya and Agramati (MPPS, vol. 1, p. 323ff) where the first only taught insight into the true nature of reality without renouncing the world and the other all the many practices and ascetic methods. Prasannendriya became a buddha eventually and Agramati had to undergo lot of suffering later on.

Adding the buddha-mind teachings, the nature of mind has perfect function, the functioning of a buddha, and this is the display of all the qualities. What is there to accumulate for it?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

Regarding the dana-paramita (although the quoted MPPS section does not mentioned it) here is a little explanation from Dazhu Huihai:

Q: Where can one enter the doorway to this understanding?

A: Through the perfection of charity (dana-paramita).

Q: Buddha has said that the six paramitas are the action of the Bodhisattva path, so how can we enter the doorway to this understanding by practicing, as you have said, only the dana-paramita?

A: People who are confused or deluded do not understand that the other five paramitas all evolve from the dana-paramita. Therefore, in practicing the dana-paramita, one also fulfills the practice of the other five paramitas.

Q: For what reason is it called the dana-paramita?

A: "Dana" means the perfection of charity.

Q: What things can be given up in the name of charity?

A: Clinging to thoughts of duality can be given up.

Q: Just what does this mean?

A: It means to give up clinging, in the name of charity, to thoughts of good and evil, existence and non-existence, love and hate, emptiness and fullness, concentration and non-concentration, pure and impure, etc. In the name of charity, give up all of them. Then, and only then, can you attain the stage of the voidness of duality, while, at the same time, letting neither a thought about the voidness of opposites nor about charity arise. This is the genuine practice of the dana-paramita, which is also known as absolute detachment from all phenomena. This is only the voidness of all dharma-nature, which means that always and everywhere is just no-mind. If one can attain the stage of no-mind everywhere, no form will be perceived, because our self-nature is void, containing no form. This, then, is true Reality, which is also called the wonderful form or body of the Tathagata. The Diamond Sutra says: "Those who have abandoned all forms are called Buddhas."

The two accumulations of merit and wisdom are present in the mind. Emptiness is wisdom, function is compassion. Zen affirms that the trikaya is present in the nature of mind, so it is not that one has to develop wisdom for the dharmakaya and merit for rupakaya, but the buddha-mind is already perfect in all aspects. Still, that doesn't deny that there is also a gradual path of the bodhisattva, however, the gradual path doesn't deny the existence of a sudden path. Thrangu Rinpoche says that on the sutrayana it takes a long time to achieve buddhahood because they use analytical-conceptual meditation but Mahamudra uses an experiential method of directly looking at the nature of mind. A similar argument could be made in the case of Zen too.

This might help better understanding, here is Zongmi's differentiation between the five dhyanas, that is, the levels of practice:

1. With ulterior motives, one appreciates what is above, and rejects what is below, in order to cultivate. This is the dhyana of non-Buddhists.
2. Correct faith in cause and effect, one uses appreciation and revulsion, in order to cultivate.* This is the dhyana of unenlightened beings.
3. Ending rebirth through emptiness, fully realizing the true path, in order to cultivate. This is lower vehicle dhyana.
4. Comprehending the two forms of emptiness, that of the person and that of dharmas, in order to cultivate. This is Mahayana dhyana.
5. Direct (sudden) realization of the essential purity of ones own mind, originally without defilements, itself endowed with the influx-free (non-afflicted) gnosis - this mind is Buddha, ultimate with nothing else beyond - cultivating in this manner, is the Supreme Vehicle Dhyana. It is also known as the Pure Dhyana of the Tathagatas.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

"What then is the difference between a Buddha and first stage bodhisattva?"

It depends on how the first stage and how a buddha is interpreted. Here's one interpretation from Wonhyo's commentary to the Vajrasamadhi Sutra that is based on the Huayan view,

"the first bhûmi in fact encompasses all ten bhûmis, for in one moment one may suddenly access the ten types of dharmadharmatâ. The ten bhûmis are in fact the first bhûmi, for all [ten] may instantly be completely fulfilled at this initial gate [of the first bhûmi]. Owing to the fact that the ten bhûmis are in fact the first bhûmi, [the first bhûmi] is called the "one." But because the first bhûmi is in fact the ten bhûmis, it is also "many." Consequently, [the first bhûmi] is called the "one-and-many bhûmi."

In a similar fashion it is discussed by those who follow (Zongmi, Jinul) who attempted to connect Chan with the doctrinal teachings, mainly Huayan. So it is not much different from what you say, however, they called sudden enlightenment not the entry to the first bhumi but the entry to the level of faith which is the first of the 52 levels. That makes your interpretation of Chan's sudden enlightenment a lot more positive than theirs. On the other hand, their interpretation is a bit more complex, as it is briefly explained by Buswell in a footnote:

"The "Brahmacarya" chapter of the Avatamsaka Sutra states that the initial arising of the bodhicitta-the thought of enlightenment-which occurs at the entrance to the bodhisattva path at the first abiding stage is equivalent to the final achievement of Buddhahood (HYCb, p. 449c). This is the hallmark of the complete teachings, the fifth of the five divisions of the teachings recognized by the early Huayen patriarchs. With the awakening to the Buddha-wisdom which is inherent in his own self-nature, the bodhisattva is fully endowed with all the qualities of Buddhahood in their potential form. Only his habitual patterns of thought and behavior must be adjusted through gradual cultivation until Buddhahood is finally actualized. Nevertheless, as the bodhisattva has understood through his initial awakening that these residual habits are essentially void, no cultivation is actually done throughout that period. Therefore, once the innate Buddha-wisdom is recognized at the beginning of the bodhisattva path, Buddhahood has already been achieved."

Thus it is explained in a doctrine oriented way the achievement of complete enlightenment at the moment of realising the nature of mind. From a more common Chan perspective all the stages and classifications are so much hot air and entangling views. Hongren - who lived before Chan turned totally to the doctrine of subitism - wrote in his treatise, "The foregoing dialogues could be expanded endlessly, my hope for now is that you will become conscious that your own basic mind is Buddha. This is why I exhort you so earnestly, nothing in the thousands of scriptures and myriads of treatises surpasses preserving the basic true mind - this is essential." Later, now in the developed Zen form, we find the following story expressing the same view, "Tokusan brought his notes on the Diamond Sutra to the front of the hall, pointed to them with a torch, and said, "Even though you have exhausted the abstruse doctrines, it is like placing a hair in a vast space. Even though you have learned all the secrets of the world, it is like a drop of water dripped on the great ocean." And he burned all his notes. Then, making bows, he took his leave of his teacher."

Zhaozhou, when once instructing the assembly, said, "I do not enjoy hearing the word 'Buddha'". It's that "buddhahood" is still strongly connected to doctrines and ideas. Dahui quoted one of Pang-yun's poems,

"Mind is Thus and objects are also Thus:
There is no true and also no false.
Existence doesn't concern me,
Nor does nonexistence hold me:
I'm not a holy sage,
But an ordinary fellow who understands things."

So, even if it sounds a lot of "sophistry" and "sleight of hand", Chan focuses on immediate experience of the ultimate and so there aren't many discussions on bodhisattva stages, because having "stages", "levels" and "grades" of enlightenment are all ideas of "how it could be", while directly attaining no-thought and maintaining it in all situations - that's why I protested against the distinction of equipoise and post-equipoise - is the essential teaching and realisation.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 7:08 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

"This is just intellectual contrivance."

Yes, so is the whole stages system. No, it is a summary of the Huayan view of the first bhumi.

"The first of the 52 bhumis is not anywhere near the path of seeing, so there is no immediate experience of the ultimate that can even be discussed."

You make the mistake of identifying one interpretation of the bodhisattva stages with another.

"You protested, but did not answer my observation concerning the identity of the content of a first bodhisattvas realization and a buddha's realization.

In the end, all you have succeeded in showing is that Chan is systematically incoherent."

What I showed is that both "first stage" and "buddhahood" are relative terms that depend on interpretation. Unless you give a definition you want to base the comparison on your question can't be answered, or it can be answered in any way.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 4:00 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Unknown said:

No, it is a Huayan view of the initial production of bodhicitta, which is the entrance to the path of accumulation.

Astus wrote:

It says first bhumi and it means the first bhumi. However, the five paths system is not used but the 52 stages. That means, for instance, that the buddha-nature is realised on the level of faith (first ten of the 52) in Zongmi's interpretation, or on the level of dwelling (second ten) in Li Tongxuan's version. A description of the arousal of bodhicitta, following Zongmi's teachings, is explained in Peixiu's "Exhortation to Resolve on Buddhahood" translated by Ven. Dharmamitra and is available on his website.

Unknown said:

No, since the ten stages are treated the same way. In Chinese Buddhism they are merely encased within an alternate scheme, but when I say first bhumi, I mean the first bodhisattva bhumi as described in the Dasabhumika sutra.

Astus wrote:

That's the point, it is not treated the same way. Here's Buswell's summary based on Tongxuan's work:

"The ten bhumis are the original foundation of all dharmas. Here the bodhisattva pervades all dharmas, all directions, and all positions simultaneously. Development before this stage involved some measure of effort and entailed as well the progressive development of meritorious practices. By the time the bodhisattva has reached the ten bhumis, however, he has nothing left to practice and nothing left to achieve. It is a kind of "firming-up" stage at which all the qualities and achievements attained throughout the previous levels are matured and allowed to infuse his entire being. He merges with all dharmas without, however, losing his own identity in the process. This is the stage of the unimpeded interpenetration of all phenomena- the highest expression of spiritual attainment in the Avatamsaka Sutra and, by implication, in all the Buddhist scriptures."

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 10:22 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Which first bhumi?"

Only the usual ten bodhisattva stages are the bhumis, the others are faith, dwelling, conduct, transference, then the stages/bhumis.

"As I said, it is treated in the same way. When a bodhisattva realizes the first bhumi, there is no more emptiness to realize, all that is left to do is to complete the two accumulations, as I told you, the ten stages only map qualities, not realization."

As the quote said, there is no realisation on any of those bhumis. The realisation happened on the 11th level, the first level of dwelling, and the 1st bhumi is the 41st level.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Since Chan, Huayen, and so on do not add any new insights into the nature of reality, nor do they add any revolutionary new methods, any claims they make to sudden buddhahood are merely rhetoric and philosophical trickery."

On one hand, Chan can be deduced from the sutras, so it is in no contradiction with the Buddha's teachings. On the other, the interpretation they make of the Dharma is unique in content, method and style. In content it teaches the sudden enlightenment that accomplishes buddhahood directly. In method it uses immediate insight into the true nature of mind. In style it has developed a language of enlightened action, most apparent in koans.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 29th, 2011 at 2:12 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

What I do know is that certain Chan claims have no basis in Mahāyāna sutra.

Astus wrote:

The classical definition of Chan:

教外別傳 - Separate transmission outside doctrines

不立文字 - Doesn't rely on words and letters

直指人心 - Directly points to human mind

見性成佛 - To see nature and become buddha

So indeed, Chan is not based on sutras, shastras, or any doctrine. That is, of course, not the same as denying them. Also, those who wanted to match Chan with Jiao (doctrinal teachings), happened to do that using primarily Huayan teachings, which again does not fit Indian Mahayana interpretations in every aspect. You may call that "plain wrong" and such, but that doesn't make things any clearer. Chan is a practical tradition, calling it buddhahood, bodhisattvahood, enlightenment, awakening, etc. are all rhetoric, names and words.

Record of Linji, tr. Sasaki said:

"According to the masters of the sutras and śāstras, the threefold body is regarded as the ultimate norm. But in my view this is not so. The threefold body is merely a name; moreover, it is a threefold dependency. ... you must recognize the one who manipulates these reflections. 'He is the primal source of all the buddhas,' and the place to which every follower of the Way returns."

"There is only the man of the Way who depends upon nothing, here listening to my discourse—it is he who is the mother of all buddhas. Therefore buddhas are born from nondependence. Awaken to nondependence, then there is no buddha to be obtained. Insight such as this is true insight."

"Seeking buddha and seeking dharma are only making hell-karma. Seeking bodhisattvahood is also making karma; reading the sutras and studying the teachings are also making karma. Buddhas and patriarchs are people with nothing to do. Therefore, [for them] activity and the defiling passions and also nonactivity and passionlessness are 'pure' karma."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 29th, 2011 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

deepbluehum said:

Let's just say Chan's method of introducing is equivalent to this. I don't think so. I think such an introduction is special to Vajrayana, but it could be in theory.

Astus wrote:

Here's Zichang's conversation with Huineng from the Platform Sutra (tr. McRae).

[Zhichang] said, "After arriving there I received no teaching for three months. Because of the importance of the Dharma, one night I entered [Shenxiu's] quarters alone to inquire of him, 'What is my fundamental mind, my fundamental nature?' Shenxiu then said, 'Do you see space?' I said, 'I see.' He said, 'When you see space, does it have characteristics or not?' I answered, 'Space is without form. What characteristics could it have?' He said, 'Your fundamental nature is like space in that there is not a single thing at all that can be seen. This is called correct seeing. For there to be not a single thing that can be known is called true knowing. There are no blue and yellow, long and short. Just see that the fundamental source is pure, the essence of enlightenment is perfect and bright: this is called seeing the nature and achieving buddhahood. It is also called the perceptual understanding of the Tathāgata.' Even though this student heard this explanation, I was still not certain, and I beg Your Reverence to teach me." The master said, "That teacher's explanation still allows perceptual understanding to exist, which is why you were unable to comprehend. I will now reveal a verse for you:

Not seeing a single dharma but maintaining the view of nonbeing
Is much like floating clouds blocking the face of the sun.
Not knowing a single dharma but maintaining one's knowledge of emptiness
Is just like the great void generating lightning and thunder.

When such perceptual understanding arises for the slightest instant,
How can mistaken recognition ever understand expedient means?
You should understand the error of this yourself, in a single moment of thought,
And the numinous brilliance of the self will be constantly manifest.

When Zhichang heard this verse, his mind became suddenly expansive [in enlightenment], and he related a verse:

There is no reason to activate perceptual understanding,
To be attached to characteristics and seek for bodhi.
When one's intelligence harbors a single thought of enlightenment,
How can one transcend the delusions of the past?

The self-nature, enlightened to the essential source,
Illuminates the crazed currents [of awareness].
Without entering the room of the patriarch,

In a daze, going about with two heads.

One day Zhichang asked the master, "The Buddha preached the three vehicles, and he also spoke of the Supreme Vehicle. I don't understand these doctrines and would like you to explain them for me."

The master said, "When you contemplate your own fundamental mind, do not be attached to the external characteristics of dharmas. There are no four vehicles in the Dharma; it is only that peoples' minds vary. To learn and recite is the small vehicle, to be enlightened to the Dharma and understand its meaning is the middle vehicle, and to cultivate according to the Dharma is the Great Vehicle. To penetrate all the myriad dharmas and to be equipped with all the myriad dharmas, without any defilement at all; to transcend the characteristics of the various dharmas, without anything that is attained: this is called the Supreme Vehicle. 'Vehicle' has the meaning of practice and cannot be argued about orally. You must cultivate yourself, not ask me about it. At all times the self-nature is itself suchlike."

Zhichang thanked [Huineng] and served the master until the end of his years.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 29th, 2011 at 2:40 AM

Title: Re: Enlightenment

Content:

Astus wrote:

(my version of answers)

1)What is the process for a normal person who just started zen/chan to reach full enlightenment, anuttara samyak sambodhi?

Study, practise, realise. Then study, practise, realise. Then... for innumerable lives. This is dedication and effort, the two important things to keep on walking the path. As for the specifics, it depends on under whom and in what tradition you practise.

2)Are there different levels of enlightenment?How to "climb" the levels?

Yes and no. Levels in Zen can be many or few, from 3 to 52. Stages are only weak explanations, you are either enlightened or not.

3)What is the difference between a zen practitioner who has reached enlightenment(any level) and an Arhat?

"Subhūti, what do you think? Does the arhat think, 'I have attained the realization of the arhat?' "

"No, World Honored One. And why not? There is, in reality, no such a thing called 'arhat.' World Honored One, if an arhat should give rise to the thought, 'I have attained the realization of the arhat, this would mean that he is attached to the notions of self, person, sentient being, and life span.' "

(Diamond Sutra, ch. 9)

4)What are the difference & similarities in zen schools on the view of enlightenment?

Clinging to any view is non-enlightenment. This is agreed on by all Buddhist schools.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 29th, 2011 at 2:59 AM

Title: Re: The virgin birth of Gautama.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Ultimately no birth, no death. Conventionally, it should serve the understanding of the ultimate. So it can be normal birth, c-section, virgin birth, magical appearance, beaming down from a spaceship...

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 29th, 2011 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

You missed my point -- certain Chan claims seem to be based on nothing more than the personal fabrications of those who make those claims.

Astus wrote:

The sudden teaching - compared to the gradual bodhisattva path - occurred with the appearance of Chan itself, it's been one of its fundamental doctrines since about the 7th century. You may call that the personal fabrication of all these people, but that is practically making the tradition a mistaken idea. Could it be that this claim of immediate liberation is wrong simply because the Indian Mahayana interpreted in a particular way can't accept it, very much like the legendary debate between Hashang and Kamalashila. On the other hand, when it came to (Gampopa's) Mahamudra - accused to be Hashang's teaching - they could say without much trouble how it is present even in different Mahayana sutras, like the Samadhiraja and the Lankavatara Sutra. I'm not saying here that Mahamudra would be identical to Chan, it's just that because you split up teachings as sutrayana and mantrayana Chan becomes predefined as necessarily a teaching that must fit into a specific interpretation of Mahayana, while the fact is that - as you have said before - Chinese Buddhism took its own course in interpreting the Mahayana teachings. Of course, not all in China agreed that there could be such a thing as sudden perfect enlightenment, although it has become the dominant view long ago.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 29th, 2011 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

kirtu said:

This was not always the case. Chan evolved in this direction over time.

Astus wrote:

The first line about being outside of doctrines (jiao) was added in the 10th century when Chan was gaining popularity and posited itself against other schools. The other three are, however, were there before. So we can say that this definition is the hallmark of mature Chan as it's appeared in the Song dynasty.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 29th, 2011 at 10:45 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

What I do know is that certain Chan claims have no basis in Mahāyāna sutra.

Astus wrote:

"The use of the Buddha-nature idea, the sun of enlightenment within all human beings (indeed, within all sentient beings), the quality of non-discriminatory wisdom that is the sine qua non of buddhahood itself, is a profound innovation that separates proto-Chan and early Chan from early Indian Buddhism."

(John McRae: Seeing Through Zen, p. 42-43)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 30th, 2011 at 5:54 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

klqv said:

hi,

i think this is a silly question - but i like it ha.

doesn't zongmi survey the prominent chan houses of his day - including hongchou - and decide that hongchou teaches sudden sudden enlightenment?

the thing about that being that for him, i am pretty sure though confused because you must know this already, sudden sudden means enlightenment into the abodes?

i would guess that either he distorted their teachings or they did indeed state that none of them were, quite, identical to the buddha.

Astus wrote:

Zongmi had his own unique interpretation of Chan. Others had their own. Jinul, following Zongmi, taught sudden enlightenment and gradual practice. Seongcheol, a former head of the Jogye Order, said that Jinul is wrong and Zen is sudden enlightenment and sudden practice. In Soto Zen they say that practice is enlightenment, in Rinzai Zen they have many levels of enlightenment. In Chan, well, you can find them all.

klqv said:

A monk asked, "What is the Buddha right before my eyes?"

The master said, "The one inside the Buddha Hall is."

The monk said, "That is an image of Buddha. What is Buddha?"

The master said, "Mind is."

The monk said, "Mind is still something limited. What is Buddha?"

The master said, "Not mind is."

The monk said, "Mind or not mind, do you allow me to choose between them?"

The master said, "Mind or not mind, you can choose as you wish, and, if you can, tell me which one it is and it will be all right."

(The Recorded Sayings of Zen Master Joshu, tr. James Green, p. 57-58)

"Buddha said, if you want to know the realm of buddhahood, you must make your mind as clear as empty space and leave false thinking and all grasping far behind, causing your mind to be unobstructed wherever it may turn. The realm of buddhahood is not some external world where there is a formal "Buddha": it's the realm of the wisdom of a self-awakened sage."

(Dahui's letter in "Swampland Flowers", p. 1, tr. Cleary & Cleary)

"To become a buddha, one must definitely pass through three asamkhyā (immeasurable) great kalpas; or must definitely pass through incalculable, countless, unthinkable kalpas; or else must definitely pass through one moment of thought. Although these three [time periods] are not the same, [fulfilling buddhahood] is neither difficult nor easy, and is neither a far distant time nor a sudden instant of time. Some fulfill buddhahood within a fist; some fulfill buddhahood at the top of a monk's staff; some fulfill buddhahood on the headtop of a patch-robed monk; and some fulfill buddhahood within the eyeball of a patch-robed monk."

(Dogen's Extensive Record, 6.446, tr. Leighton & Okamura, p. 402-403)

What you all have from your parents innately is the Unborn Buddha Mind alone and nothing else, so instead of trying to realize buddhahood, always abide in that Unborn Buddha Mind. Then, when you're asleep, you're sleeping in the Buddha Mind, and when you're awake, you're awake in the Buddha Mind; you're always a living buddha, and there's no time when you don't remain a buddha. Since you're a buddha all the time, there's no other special buddhahood for you to realize. Rather than trying to become a buddha, nothing could be simpler than taking the shortcut of remaining a buddha!

(Bankei Zen, tr. Peter Haskel, p. 22)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 30th, 2011 at 5:36 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

klqv said:

bbbut i wasn't talking about zongmi's interpretation of chan, i was talking about his understanding of other people's interpretation of chan. Elsewhere he [shenhui] claims for himself the tenth bhumi, something that is only possible in the most demythologized interpretation of the bhumi theory.

Peter Gregory.

edit more to the point it's fine quoting ancient sources but i think to make your point you've got to do more than you have done - because there's always the possibility of adding "but" to them; the caveat that one is not [in all senses of whatever] as close to buddhahood as that.

what you need is something that say but absolutely no buts, or says that some particular buts are not the case.

i find the idea that there are 100s or 1000s of buddhas running round, a strange one. e.g., wasn't maitreya the next buddha? that kind of thing...

Astus wrote:

Zongmi had a double presentation. On one hand, he affirmed that all Chan schools ultimately teach the same thing, on the other hand, he listed the Heze teaching (again, his interpretation, doesn't have much to do with Shenhui himself) as the superior one. He differentiated between talking to outsiders and insiders. I think he was biased a bit since he wanted to make the point that schools like the Baotang and Hongzhou are wrong and even immoral - a reasoning similar to the Tibetan view of Hashang.

Talking about a "demythologised view", one of the great innovations of early Chan (Hongren, Shenxiu) was to interpret common teachings in the light of buddha-mind, and not as a theoretical buddha-mind but as direct experience. And this is really an important point, that it's not a doctrinal idea they taught but wisdom unbound by fixed tenets.

Maitreya is the next buddha, yes. But the real buddha is the buddha-mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 30th, 2011 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

klqv,

I believe there are quite a few enlightened beings among us, some are openly spreading the Dharma, some are hidden. However, I don't think that the presence of sages would mean global or even local revolution. This issue is addressed in the Vimalakirti Sutra's first chapter regarding the buddha-fields and its perception. Creating a "better world" is up to each individual, not some outer beings, otherwise even a single buddha could have liberated all beings instantly.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 30th, 2011 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Tenzin1 said:

Is it really possible to paint all Chan traditions with one brush? Chan has an esoteric side that borrows heavily from Tibetan tantra. I would think the attainments in that tradition would be similar to those in TB. And for that matter, is the level of attainment of advanced practitioners in TB all identical? Do they all reach the same level? It sounds like to some extent, this discussion is dealing in oversimplifications.

Astus wrote:

Chan is certainly not uniform. However, "esoteric side" is something new to me. Any references?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 30th, 2011 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

Daelm,

The nature of the mind is the dharmakaya, to realise the dharmakaya is to realise buddhahood, that's why "seeing nature" is becoming buddha. Or rather, it is realising that the nature of the mind has always been the buddha. It's been taught like this since the early times, based on the Nirvana Sutra and others. This is one end of the possibilities of viewing it. The other end is what Zongmi propagated, that seeing nature is the first step that will eventually complete in buddhahood, although even in his interpretation it is not a matter of kalpas.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 30th, 2011 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: Buddhafield or Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

The term "pure land" has appeared in Chinese Buddhism, first as a term for Amitabha's buddha-land, then it's become the common term for any buddha-land. So I'd say it's simply a matter of language.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 31st, 2011 at 3:03 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:
Astus wrote:
klqv,

I didn't intend to make a huge gap between "scholastic Buddhism" and "Chan" since there isn't much. Whether enlightened beings they would change the world or not, I leave that to another discussion. But it's an interesting question for sure.

I searched in that book for "Chan" and found no connection. One can find certain rituals of tantric origin in Chan, but that's all I know of.

This little part seems relevant here a bit (also noteworthy how Kukai couldn't accept that not only esoteric Buddhism has all the cool stuff):

"The theory of quick attainment of Buddhahood, it must be added, is not peculiar to esoteric Buddhism. The Tendai and Kegon schools have a similar doctrine, and Zen advocates instant realization of enlightenment. Kukai's contemporary and the founder of the Japanese Tendai sect, Saicho (767-822), in fact, promulgated the teaching of quick realization of buddhahood based on the Lotus Sutra against the Hosso teaching that expounds gradual progress toward enlightenment over a period of three incalculable aeons. In Kukai's view, Tendai and Kegon talk only about theoretical possibilities of attaining buddhahood quickly and lack an actual experience of realization."
(Tantric Buddhism in East Asia, p. 100)

Author: Astus
Date: Wednesday, August 31st, 2011 at 3:14 AM
Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan
Content:
Astus wrote:
daelm,

I've used "seeing" and "realising" as synonyms, both mean the experience vis-a-vis theory.

There was no such transition from gradualist Chan to subitist. Well, not in the sense of "long bodhisattva path" to "sudden buddhahood". Chan advocated from the beginning direct attainment. Zongmi was an exceptional teacher who wanted to merge Chan suddenness and experiential attitude with the elaborate teachings of Huayan. And although he had an outstanding follower in Yongming, the Hongzhou style came out as winner in the Song dynasty and became the orthodox interpretation.

Author: Astus
Date: Wednesday, August 31st, 2011 at 3:18 PM
Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan
Content:

Astus wrote:

Tenzin1,

That site is quite a modern form of teaching. Not that it's a problem, but this kind of mixture of Tibetan and Chinese Buddhism is a recent phenomenon.

kirtu,

Of course, there are mantras and dharanis, they have been present for a long time. However, the presence of such practices only makes Chinese Buddhism more varied. I mean, there is no fixed line between Chan and other practices, no strong distinction between imaginary schools. Nonetheless, if we look at texts attributed to Chan teachers it's hard to find any tantric practices recommended or used. Also note that like in the case of Seung Sahn, mantras are only used as objects for meditation without any extra value, unlike in tantric teachings where mantras have a meaning.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 31st, 2011 at 3:46 PM

Title: Re: "The Tulku System Could Ruin Buddhism..."

Content:

Astus wrote:

"You must see the difference between Dharma and tradition. When problems occur, understand that they do not come from the enlightened ones, but from the administrators. Even the Chinese communists who do not believe at all in religion nevertheless use it from time to time for their own political ends. This is because the administration system is so well established and is so powerful." (The Shamarpa, <http://www.shamarpa.org/index.php?id=57>)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 31st, 2011 at 5:22 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

daelm,

I see. I can't clearly describe its development generally in Chinese Buddhism as I'm not familiar with all the details. Daosheng was the first to conceive and teach it to a wider audience. But I think there are a couple of other factors that I'm unaware of until we get to the Tiantai teaching of sudden enlightenment.

I don't have it, but there is a book: "Sudden and Gradual: Approaches to Enlightenment in Chinese Thought" by Peter N. Gregory, it has some essays on the subject.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 31st, 2011 at 8:43 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

Quote from Dan Lusthaus: Buddhist Phenomenology, (p. 256-257; 263-264):

We are now ready to return to the question: Should prajñā-paramita be understood as connoting an essentialistic understanding of tathatā or should it be understood as connoting an epistemic process? Both positions have had their adherents within the Buddhist tradition. Since this controversy stands at the heart of the East Asian appropriation of Buddhist thought, and has determined many important parameters for doctrinal developments in China, Korea and Japan, closer examination of its features is in order. Yogacāra, in particular as disseminated in China, polarized around this opposition, and in part Hsüantsang's project can be seen as a systematic refutation of the essentialist position as advocated by Paramārtha and others.

If Awakening, at least provisionally, is considered to be a goal, and sheer knowing is that goal's necessary (and perhaps sufficient) condition, the question arises: Is the goal something essentially existent, such that the epistemic method (jñāna-mārga) uncovers it; or, does the method subsume the goal, such that the goal's provisionality is exposed, revealing not an essential truth, but rather an insight into the epistemic process itself? In the first case, knowledge (jñāna) will be considered the means or agent for attaining some -thing which in itself is impervious to or indifferent to the vicissitudes of epistemological approaches, though made accessible through such approaches. In the second case, nothing relevant exists outside or apart from the dynamic, progressive sphere of knowledge; Awakening here would mean that knowing (prajñā, jñāna) becomes transparent to itself. Again, the former implies an absolute, objective Truth, while the latter implies a progressional unfolding that never posits anything apart from the process itself.

In Buddhist terminology, the former (the Essentialist) posits Buddhahood as a distinct realm, distinct precisely because it is accessible only to Buddhas, and hence somehow essentially other than the realms accessible to the remainder of sentient beings. At best, non-Buddhas might contain a germ or seed (tathāgatagarbha) that offers the potential of entry into the distinct Buddha-realm, but they are considered non-Buddhas precisely because they have not yet actualized this potential. Here, as in other philosophical contexts, essentialism inscribes itself through the discourse of 'potential /actual.' Buddhahood and its corollaries tathatā, sambodhi, etc. would signify an ultimate, transcendental Reality.

The latter (the Progressionalist) would argue that the process of Awakening can never be separable from the Bodhisattva path, and that (i) the pre-Awakening striving, (ii) the Awakening realization and (iii) the post-Awakening aid offered to other sentient beings can never be seen apart from the samsāric process in which that path occurs; moreover, samsāra is able to proceed only in virtue of its emptiness (iünyata).²⁶ The full career of the Bodhisattva is nothing other than this process. During (i), the Bodhisattva's progress is largely determined by samsāric and samskaric conditions, though efforts are made to overcome these determinants through theory and practice. During (ii), theory and practice converge, such that the inseparability of samsāra and nirvana, or process (pratitya-samutpāda) and emptiness, infuse the whole of the Bodhisattva's life-world. The remedied process continues and disseminates in (iii).

Practical considerations also arise from this problem. If Awakening unfolds through a process, then to some extent this unfolding is temporal. These temporal aspects necessitate that practice towards Awakening be gradual. If, on the other hand, a ready-made transcendental realm already exists, then what is essential about Awakening remains entirely separate from temporal considerations, and entry into it may be 'sudden,' i.e., nondependent on any temporal considerations.

...

As Mahayana Buddhism developed, the essentialist vs. progressionalist controversy peaked. One text which preserves the tensions is the Lotus Sutra. The first half deals with upaya, the provisional, deceptive character of Buddhist doctrine and practice. The 'truths' of Buddhism are mere provisional ploys designed to bring one to a place where ploys are no longer necessary nor possible. The second half presents the 'True Buddha,' an ahistorical, unborn, undying, mythologically omniscient and omnipresent Power or Being. Centuries later East Asian schools, such as Tendai and Nichiren, rightly asked and debated which of these two visions of Buddhism contextualized which? If the first half gives the 'truth,' then the second half should be seen as an elaborate upayic ploy. If the second half gives the 'truth,' then the ploys of the first half are merely indirect, pedagogical instruments for reaching this truth, for reaching this ontological realization. Beyond the Lotus Sutra the essentialist vs. progressionalist opposition is found shaping Buddhist methodology, which is to say, the marga, the Path. Those taking Buddhism to hold an ontological nature as its essence, who conceive of Buddhism as grounded in Being, develop their essentialism by understanding prajna-paramita as 'perfect-ion,' and posit that perfection as an ontologically primal and definitive 'tathata'; i.e., a thing. Suchness 'suchness' which is the universal, sacred, perfected nature of all becomes a cosmic essence, the primal, originary scene. Buddha is no longer a teacher who perfected himself, but the universal essence of all things, the potential perfection ontologically concealed behind a veil of transmigratory appearance. And yet, the veil and what it veils are united in essence. It is this interpretation which reads Nagarjuna's statement that not an iota of distinction can be drawn between samsara and nirvana (an epistemic observation) as if it were an ontological claim, a statement of essentialistic identity: sarpsdra is nirvana."

On the other hand, those who take the progressionalist stance displace the notions of nature and essence with a theory of perdurance, of continuity which, precisely because it is grounded in neither identity nor difference, can engender progress and betterment (or worsening). Prajñā-paramita here means 'perfecting,' as that which perdures becomes that which it is not, without ever being totally other than itself. The path is tread, and as with Heraclitus' river, the foot never truly stands on the same ground twice. The doctrines of the four gatis (stream-enterer, once returner, etc.), the bodhisattva career of ten or eighteen or fifty-two stages (bhūmī), etc., all exemplify the progressionalist attitude.

But like the Lotus Sūtra, one way of dissipating the tension is to accept and attempt to harmonize both extremes. Thus hybrids arose: progressive essentialists claimed that one progresses toward the essence, and that the progress itself was grounded in the essence (tathāgatagarbha); essentialistic progressives mounted elaborate schema in which one ultimately progressed beyond essentialisms by working through them (tattva, vastu, bhūta, dharma svalaksana, svarūpa, svabhāva, etc.). Yogācāra was a case of this last type of hybrid.

Finally, is tathatā, 'indexicality,' indicative of liberating universals, or repetitive, reiterative particulars? Given the incompatibility of essentialist universals and sūnyatā, tathatā must remain ontologically open. It is entirely without conceptual (kalpita, vikalpa, kalpanā, etc.) ontological commitments. For the Ch'eng wei-shih lun, tathatā is a mere prajñapti.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 1st, 2011 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Matching evolution with Buddhism, doesn't work. Different axioms, different views.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 2nd, 2011 at 2:58 AM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Buddhism teaches that the primary driving force of the world is karma. That is reflected in Buddhist cosmology. The sequence of the becoming of the world is from top to bottom. That means that humans existed before animals. The view of evolution is from bottom to top, humans evolved from animals. The diversity of beings in Buddhism is explained by karmic dispositions, in evolution by selection and adaptation. In terms of society, the Buddhist view is the cycle of golden age toward a bad age and from then to a golden age. Evolutionary view of the society teaches a progress from hunters-gatherers to modern cities. Buddhism explains that the true goal of every being is happiness and they are confused by the three poisons. Evolution says that the primary instincts and the meaning of all life forms are self-preservation and reproduction. Buddhism says that it is consciousness that makes one a sentient being. Evolution derives living organisms from molecules. These are the reasons why I say that Buddhism is not compatible with evolution.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 2nd, 2011 at 6:10 AM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Acchantika said:

Therefore, I respectfully object to the notion that evolution is not compatible with Buddhism.

Astus wrote:

You've changed the meaning of evolution and specified it in a way that might fit into certain Buddhist concepts. That is not objection in my view, but coming up with a whole different argument.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 2nd, 2011 at 4:46 PM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Buddhism teaches that the primary driving force of the world is karma. That is reflected in Buddhist cosmology. The sequence of the becoming of the world is from top to bottom. That means that humans existed before animals.

Pero said:

Wow really? Can you give a link or something, I'd like to read a bit about it.

Astus wrote:

See the Aggañña Sutta: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Agga%C3%B1%C3%B1a_Sutta, http://tipitaka.wikia.com/wiki/Agganna_Sutta

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 2nd, 2011 at 5:01 PM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Dechen Norbu said:

So unless one restricts our birth to this planet and forget that the fact that animals were here first doesn't mean we were those animals and couldn't take rebirth as humans (or equivalent) somewhere else, I see no problem in accepting the theory of evolution. I even think that the fact that there is an evolution (why not some sort of staticism instead, a different model of life and environment) goes pretty well with the theory of karma.

Now, is the theory of evolution in accord with Buddhist cosmology? No. Do I think Buddhist cosmology is more than expedient means? No. To me, it's just an ornament to the finger, perfectly changeable, not the direction it points. That's how I see it. I never bought that Mount Meru stuff anyway.

There's a story Chogyal Namkhai Norbu tells about a Gelugpa teacher that wanted to write a book insisting on this cosmology in spite of his advice for not doing so, since we now knew things weren't like that. If memory doesn't fail me, he was translating this book. It didn't fly, I guess. Funny story that goes to show how Buddhist cosmology is not such a big deal in terms of Path or View. Perhaps someone can tell you this story better. I found it quite amusing.

Astus wrote:

Sure, there are many realms and many "planets". Still, if we go with the sequence of lives there is still a problem. Also, many jatakas and stories about former buddhas are placed in India, including cities from the Buddha's time. We can put all this into the category of "myths", nevertheless, these are the traditional views. Just like anything, this can change too. But it's a good reminder how ANY teaching may be reviewed and changed or forgot for ever.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 2nd, 2011 at 5:10 PM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Acchantika said:

In genetics, evolution is defined as a change in the frequency and distribution of alleles at a given locus.

Astus wrote:

OK, that's evolution in genetics. Then what was mentioned under "evolution" is mainly the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Evolution#Evolutionary_history_of_life.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 3rd, 2011 at 4:32 AM

Title: Ven. Guo Cheen's Works

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't know how many of you have heard of

<https://www.facebook.com/profile.php?id=100000090044883>, who runs

<https://www.thecompassionnetwork.blogspot.com/>. She's dedicated to translating sutras and commentaries to English. She has also uploaded useful works onto http://www.scribd.com/Guo_Cheen_5750.

<http://www.scribd.com/doc/49134211/List-of-Mahayana-Tripitaka-Titles>

<http://www.scribd.com/doc/39077716/The-Sutra-of-Sitting-Dhyana-Samadhi>

<http://www.scribd.com/doc/39077692/On-Human-Origins>

<http://www.scribd.com/doc/39077648/Advice-for-Monastics>

<http://www.scribd.com/doc/32987507/Avatamsaka-Matrix-on-Entering-the-Dharma-Realm-Chapter>

<http://www.scribd.com/doc/32987336/A-Matrix-on-the-Essentials-of-the-Avatamsaka>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 5th, 2011 at 2:03 AM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'd argue that "small beings" and microorganisms are not the same thing. Tiny insects are one thing, bacteria are another, and the second type of beings are not filtered by a simple cloth. It's also problematic to call bacteria "sentient beings" from a Buddhist point of view.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 5th, 2011 at 5:59 AM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Namdrol said:

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Microorganism>

Small animals, so called "micro-animals, are included within the category of microorganism.

N

Astus wrote:

I guess I should have listened better on biology classes...

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 5th, 2011 at 4:58 PM

Title: Re: Seon Master Jinje

Content:

Astus wrote:

Good advice, Ven. Huifeng.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 6th, 2011 at 6:04 AM

Title: Re: "Mahamudra and Related Instructions," Peter Roberts

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is explicitly in the book that the texts were selected based on the recommendation of Thrangu Rinpoche, who is a Karma Kagyu teacher. So it is not really a surprise that it contains mostly Karma Kagyu texts.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 6th, 2011 at 6:41 AM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think revising Buddhist geographical understanding is one thing, while revising the order of the birth and destruction of the world is quite another. Even with the geographical modifications there can be some problems (see:

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=77&t=3803>), how much so with larger changes. Of course, I believe it is possible to turn the classical Buddhist cosmology into an updated sci-fi universe.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 1:56 AM

Title: Re: Is Pure Land "Buddhism" contradictory to Buddhism?

Content:

Andreas Ludwig said:

I don't know how many times I have tried to explain to others that Pure Land Buddhism is not a monolithic block, there are sub-traditions so to say. In Shinshu the Pure Land is NOT a means (which is what you meant in your post I suppose?) but indeed the end - because the Pure Land is a way to talk about Nirvana in positive terms that we can relate to, rather than in denials (like Theravada does).

Astus wrote:

And I have to add to this that the Shinshu interpretation is not monolithic either. There are people who view it as you said and others who view it in a different way where the Pure Land is an actual buddha-land and not a metaphor.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2011 at 5:06 PM

Title: Re: Is Pure Land "Buddhism" contradictory to Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

From the interdependent self-nature
Comes discrimination arising from conditions;
The perfection of the fruit comes from
Always being apart from the former nature.
(Trimsika, 21)

The imagined nature is the elephant;
The other-dependent nature is the visual percept;
The non-existence of the elephant therein
Is explained to be the consummate.
(Trisvabhava nirveda, 28)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2011 at 6:25 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

klqv,

There are many different interpretations. In Zen the buddhahood of magical features has been put aside/refuted/rejected by several teachers, as something one should aspire for. Let's call that the practical side. On the other hand, the common Mahayana view of buddhas around us in different buddha-lands has not been neglected or removed from daily practice, even if the "true pure land is the pure mind". While the real buddha is the mind-nature, provisionally there are many buddhas. Maitreya is the next buddha to turn the wheel of Dharma after a period of no Dharma. But while in early Buddhism the buddhas were primarily identified as the initiators of the teaching, later it stopped being the main criterion, therefore there can be infinite buddhas even at the same place.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2011 at 12:04 AM

Title: Rigsum Gonpo

Content:

Astus wrote:

Could someone give me a general information on the level and form of practice related to this trinity of bodhisattvas? Also, if there is some info on what it has to do with the Sakyapas is also appreciated, just as an extra.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 1:03 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

klqv,

See how there are different perspectives and levels of the teaching. For an enemy of Buddhism a teacher is a charlatan deluding people. For a non-Buddhist a teacher is just an old fellow. For a king the head of a monastery is an influential figure. For a lay person full of devotion the master is a holy embodiment of the buddhas. For an educated lay person the abbot is a wise man. For a novice the preceptor is the strict but kind leader. For an aged monastic the master is a fellow practitioner. A good teacher addresses all these people accordingly. So a Chan teacher can be anything from a deluded ordinary person to a living buddha. So Linji said (same concept as Vimalakirti Sutra's inconceivable liberation):

"If someone comes and asks about seeking buddha, I immediately appear in conformity with the state of purity; if someone asks about bodhisattvahood, I immediately appear in conformity with the state of compassion; if someone asks me about bodhi, I immediately appear in conformity with the state of pure mystery; if someone asks me about nirvana, I immediately appear in conformity with the state of serene stillness. Though there be ten thousand different states, the person does not differ. Therefore, According with things he manifests a form, Like the moon [reflecting] on the water."

and

"Virtuous monks, don't acknowledge robes. Robes cannot move of themselves, but people can put them on. There is the robe of purity, the robe of birthlessness, the robe of bodhi, the robe of nirvana, the patriarch-robe, and the buddha-robe. Virtuous monks, these spoken words and written phrases are all nothing but changes of robes."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 1:09 AM

Title: Re: Longquan Temple

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sadhu!

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 1:20 AM

Title: Re: What are some "must have" books?

Content:

Astus wrote:

For East Asian Buddhism (after reading Paul Williams' Mahayana Buddhism):

Orthodox Chinese Buddhism by Ven. Sheng-yen

The Way to Buddhahood by Ven. Yinshun

Coming to Terms with Chinese Buddhism by Robert H. Sharf

Entry into the Inconceivable by Thomas Cleary

The Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment by Charles Muller

Tracing Back the Radiance by Robert Buswell

Dogen's Manuals of Zen Meditation by Carl Bielefeldt

Buddhism of Wisdom and Faith by Thich Thien Tam

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 5:58 PM

Title: Re: Images of descending Amida

Content:

Astus wrote:

It's Amita Buddha greeting the deceased to escort them to the Pure Land. I guess.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 7:25 PM

Title: Re: Images of descending Amida

Content:

Astus wrote:

"When an aspirant is about to be born in that land through dedicated and undaunted practices, the Tathagata Amitayus arrives together with Avalokiteshvara, Mahasthamaprapta, innumerable transformed Buddhas, a great assembly of a hundred thousand monks and shravakas and innumerable devas in seven-jewelled palaces. The Bodhisattva Avalokiteshvara, carrying a vajra-seat, together with the Bodhisattva Mahasthamaprapta, approaches the aspirant. Amitayus releases a great flood of light which illuminates the aspirant's body and, along with the bodhisattvas, extends his hands in welcome. Avalokiteshvara and Mahasthamaprapta, together with innumerable bodhisattvas, praise and encourage the aspirant. Seeing this, the aspirant rejoices so greatly as to dance. Then he sees himself sitting on the vajra-seat, and following the Buddha, is born into that land in the time it takes to snap one's fingers."
(Contemplation Sutra, tr. H. Inagaki)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 13th, 2011 at 5:43 AM

Title: Re: tendai and zen

Content:

Jikan said:

The Rinzai and Soto schools did not exist in the time of Zhiyi.

Astus wrote:

Even in the time of Saicho they did not exist.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 13th, 2011 at 5:47 AM

Title: Varieties of Ganhwa Seon Teachings in Contemporary Korea

Content:

Astus wrote:

An essay by Ryan Bongseok Joo:

"Western Buddhists, who were introduced to Korean Seon (Jp. Zen, Ch. Chan 禪) Buddhism through Seung Sahn sunim (1927-2004), might find it surprising that gong'an (Jp. kōan 公案) meditation practice is taught quite differently in Korea from the way Seung Sahn sunim trained his disciples in the West. For instance, Seon masters in Korea generally do not ask their student to resolve a series of different gong'an gates like the way Seung Sahn sunim did. Instead, meditating on a single gong'an is considered sufficient in itself to bring the student to full awakening. It is also not a common practice to allot one-on-one private interview (Jp. dokusan 独参) time with a Seon master as part of the daily training schedule in a Korean monastery; although students can certainly meet with their teacher after having a breakthrough experience or when facing a difficult internal obstacle outside the regular monastic schedule. For native Korean Buddhists, it has been an open secret that Seung Sahn sunim heavily adopted the Japanese Rinzai Zen style in his teaching of gong'an practice, which was familiar to his Western disciples, but foreign to most Korean Buddhists. In this paper, I would like to introduce the other side, the teachings of gong'an practices by contemporary Korean Seon masters in Korea, which would be familiar to Korean Buddhists, but probably new to many Western readers."

<http://international.uiowa.edu/centers/caps/documents/RyanJooAAS2011.pdf>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 13th, 2011 at 3:17 PM

Title: Re: Varieties of Ganhwa Seon Teachings in Contemporary Korea

Content:

Astus wrote:

I would assume it is a "borrowed" practice because it was Hakuin who organised the Rinzai curriculum in the way it is today with many levels of koans.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 13th, 2011 at 5:14 PM

Title: Re: Mahakala as your 1st empowerment?

Content:

Astus wrote:

What if it is looked in a different way? He goes to that specific empowerment because he already has a connection with it. It does no harm to participate but can create imprints that will, in the near or far future, urge the person to know more and get involved.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 13th, 2011 at 7:33 PM

Title: Re: Mahakala as your 1st empowerment?

Content:

Tilopa said:

What connection? He's not even a Buddhist.

But sure if the lama tells him it's ok to attend and take it as a blessing without binding commitments then it can only be beneficial.

Astus wrote:

Everybody has to start somewhere. If it's an empowerment, then so it be. Even hearing the name "Buddha" is a proof of connection and a source of enlightenment.

These empowerments are open for anybody. There are no bodyguards standing at the entrance asking you questions, there are no registration forms where one has to prove one's competence for being there. Either you are there or not. What level of understanding one can make of it is another question and that's where things like being a Buddhist, etc. matter.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2011 at 2:31 AM

Title: Re: Rocky Zen

Content:

kirtu said:

The two Buddha's (Dogen and Daido Roshi) did not IMV intend this literally but as an expression of intimacy with all things. From Dogen's perspective it may have been specifically from this perception of the interpenetration of all phenomena. It could also have been from a serious expression of Mind Only.

Astus wrote:

The buddha-nature of all is an expression of universal dharmadhatu, which includes both the view of interpenetration, mind only and buddha-nature.

I don't think it has anything to do with "animism".

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2011 at 4:45 PM

Title: Re: Rocky Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

booker,

This is not a koan that is discussed here, neither any other practice, but a view, an interpretation of the Dharma, that exists in Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2011 at 8:56 PM

Title: Re: What are some "must have" books?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think one should see the difference between essential books and auxiliary ones. There are also introductory books and in depth works. Just before this becomes a list of all the books people like.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 18th, 2011 at 8:25 PM

Title: Re: Is Pure Land "Buddhism" contradictory to Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

This topic of the interpretation of Pure Land in Shinshu has been discussed here: <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=60&t=1084>, that involved Andreas and Al Bloom too.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 19th, 2011 at 5:48 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen Rational?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Is being rational Zen? Is being irrational Zen? Of course not. Can Zen be rationalised or "irrationalised"? Definitely. So it is not something but can be made into anything, such is the magic of mind. Zen can be presented in any way it is needed, that's the primary approach Zen has. That is quite a rational attitude that understands dependent origination and how to assist people in seeing the nature of mind, i.e. perceiving that ideas such as rationality and irrationality depend on each other without any real basis.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2011 at 1:48 AM

Title: Re: Is Pure Land "Buddhism" contradictory to Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Andreas,

There are two problems with a symbolic interpretation: it makes Shinshu a path of salvation without any need for personal enlightenment, since in this life there is no effort, no development, and in the next there is no place to practice but instant liberation. The second problem is the lack of actual sources for this interpretation in the written teachings of Shinran.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2011 at 4:39 PM

Title: Pointing Out / Systematic Instruction

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is said that you can tell whether or not you have genuinely heard the teachings and understood their point by whether or not you are tame and peaceful in your conduct. And you can tell whether or not your meditation is effective by whether or not your kleshas are diminishing. Ideally, someone should finally have no kleshas whatsoever. But even on the way to that klesha-free state, your kleshas and thoughts should diminish. Therefore, I think that it is of far greater importance than the experience of dramatic instantaneous pointing out that people be taught mahamudra as a full system of instruction that they can implement on their own gradually through diligent application using either one of the three texts by the Ninth Gyalwang Karmapa—The Ocean of Definitive Meaning, Dispelling the Darkness of Ignorance, or Pointing Out the Dharmakaya— or one of the texts by Dakpo Tashi Namgyal—either Moonbeams of Mahamudra or The Clarification of the Natural State.

In short, I think it is of far more importance that people receive this kind of complete and systematic instruction so that they can gradually develop experience on their own, than that some kind of dramatic pointing-out procedure be done. Of course, it is possible to give dramatic pointing-out instruction, and when you do so, some people do recognize their mind's nature. But, if I may say so, I question the stability and, therefore, ultimately the value of that. It certainly is a dramatic experience for those people who achieve it, but I see no evidence of their kleshas diminishing as a result. And furthermore, they then carry away with them the arrogance of the thought, "I have seen my mind's nature." I think it is of far greater importance actually to practice meditation slowly and surely and make all possible use of the resources which this book in particular gives you.

(Thrangu Rinpoche: The Ninth Karmapa's Ocean of Devinitive Meaning, p. 127-128)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2011 at 6:47 PM

Title: Re: Pointing Out / Systematic Instruction

Content:

Astus wrote:

What I really admire in his approach - and Kagyu Mahamudra generally - is the detailed methodology they apply in this training.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2011 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: Pointing Out / Systematic Instruction

Content:

Namdrol said:

Dzogchen etc., also have very detailed methodologies. They are just less sutra oriented.

Astus wrote:

Sure they do. It's just that I've never found those so clear, not that I've seen it all.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2011 at 1:45 AM

Title: Re: Religion or family

Content:

Astus wrote:

If one is a householder it is likely one has a family. Because there are several duties one has to perform because of one's responsibility towards one's family there is little motivation to practice the Dharma. And even if there is some motivation it is usually a low level goal one wants to achieve. Rarely, if one does have great determination toward the Dharma, family then can appear as a major obstacle. Only a few fortunate people can manage having family and being deeply involved in the Dharma. That's why most of those who aspire for liberation leave the family behind and become renunciates, just like Siddhartha. Thus in Buddhism family is rather a symbol of attachment and samsara rather than something sacred, primarily because the Buddhist tradition is preserved and transmitted by monastics.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2011 at 2:29 AM

Title: Re: "On White Women and Buddhism"

Content:

rory said:

So in all conscience as a feminist how can I promote Buddhism when it has done zero for women? I turned East as I found a philosophy that explained the world to me in a rational way. But years later I've read Greek philosophy: Heraclitus everything is flux Democritus, Pythagoras, Epicurus etc & I've found everything in Buddhism there. It's better for women, I don't have to deal with male hierarchical institutions or the hypocrisy.

Astus wrote:

Ancient Greece and Rome were fine patriarchal societies. In Athens women were simply confined to their homes just like in the Chinese Empire; in Rome, although they had lot of freedom until Christianity took over, were not allowed any political position. Also, the philosophers you listed were all men, just like all the others who are considered outstanding. So it seems to me that there's nothing special about ancient Western cultures and philosophies compared to the Eastern ones regarding the role of women. It shouldn't be forgotten either that Buddhism is not a culture but a religion, and as such its philosophy may not be - and cannot be - adequately mirrored in its socio-historical appearance.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2011 at 2:34 AM

Title: Re: "On White Women and Buddhism"

Content:

deepbluehum said:

No. I would have to say dharma is sexist, homophobic and racist. From the earliest suttas the superiority of men and inferiority of women has been reiterated many times. That Buddha is always a man is standard. Vajrayana changes this and gives women Buddha status. However, it is explained in Vajrayana that you have to have a "precious human body" meaning it has certain endowments (for practicing tantra). For example, being a hermaphrodite is not a "precious human body." So homosexual bodies are not invited to the karmamudra. Being blind or deaf or missing any of the sense faculties is also not a "precious human body." Being mentally disabled is not "precious." You also have to be born in a "central country" where dharma is taught. So being in a tribal culture in some distant island is not a "precious human body" either. That country must be mostly peaceful with high institutions. So most of Africa is excluded. You can see how dharma is a rather exclusive club and is not all inclusive. In a sense it is justified because achieving Buddhahood is something winning a gold medal in the Olympics (if meditation were a sport). You would have to be world class.

Astus wrote:

This is a distorted interpretation of such terms. Talks of precious human body and fortunate birth is about motivating people who hear and learn about the Dharma, not about talking against those who are outside of such disciples. It is absolutely not a "hate speech" but a "motivational speech". And yes, being able to learn about the Dharma and practice it is a privilege, an elite club in samsara.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2011 at 3:04 PM

Title: Re: Wall Gazing

Content:

Astus wrote:

What do you mean by "wall gazing"?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2011 at 3:27 PM

Title: Re: Religion or family

Content:

Astus wrote:

Epistemes,

If you look closely at my post I talk about motivation and goals, not about specific teachings. Also, most of the teachings are meant for monastics, although many of those can be used by lay people.

Bhikkhu Cintita has a series on Lay life:

<http://bhikkhucintita.wordpress.com/2011/07/07/lay-buddhist-practice-1/>

<http://bhikkhucintita.wordpress.com/2011/07/14/the-art-of-lay-life-2/>

<http://bhikkhucintita.wordpress.com/2011/07/22/the-art-of-lay-life-3-selecting-elements/>

<http://bhikkhucintita.wordpress.com/2011/07/29/the-art-of-lay-life-4-selecting-elements-cont/>

<http://bhikkhucintita.wordpress.com/2011/08/06/the-art-of-lay-life-4-rejecting-elements/>

<http://bhikkhucintita.wordpress.com/2011/08/13/the-art-of-lay-life-6-rejecting-elements-cont/>

<http://bhikkhucintita.wordpress.com/2011/08/22/the-art-of-lay-life-7-balancing-elements/>

<http://bhikkhucintita.wordpress.com/2011/08/27/the-art-of-lay-life-8-balancing-elements-cont/>

<http://bhikkhucintita.wordpress.com/2011/09/05/the-art-of-lay-life-9-simplifying/>

<http://bhikkhucintita.wordpress.com/2011/09/12/the-art-of-lay-life-10-lay-and-monastic/>

<http://bhikkhucintita.wordpress.com/2011/09/19/the-art-of-lay-life-11-lay-and-> monastic-cont/

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2011 at 3:44 PM

Title: Re: Wall Gazing

Content:

Astus wrote:

In Bodhidharma's case "wall gazing" likely meant not a physical posture but maintaining the mind like a wall, that is, without discrimination or attachment to emotions and ideas.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2011 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: "On White Women and Buddhism"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Rory,

"Show me something similar in China, Tibet, Vietnam, Korea? "

Nothing similar to that that I know of, and I know little. Beata Grant has some interesting studies on women and Chan, and there's Faure of course. However, if you look at it, it's not Buddhism itself that had a campaign against women. Sure, there was no big social liberation because of Buddhism, but that was never its purpose anyway.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 22nd, 2011 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: Wall Gazing

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is "wall contemplation" (biguan 壁觀) and there is "facing the wall" (mianbi 面壁). In Bodhidharma's story the two becomes the same eventually. As for why in Soto Zen they rather sit facing the wall and how they call it, I do not know.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 22nd, 2011 at 3:02 AM

Title: Re: Gelugpa View Overshadowing Madhyamaka

Content:

Astus wrote:

It could be added how the Tibetan view overshadows other forms of Madhyamaka. However, since it is primarily the Gelug school that upholds Madhyamaka as its central doctrine, and in Tibetan Buddhism they have generally a stronger emphasis on Madhyamaka than anywhere else, it is quite a natural outcome.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 22nd, 2011 at 3:30 AM

Title: Re: Religion or family

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Not to take away from what Astus has said but why does it have to be either/or? Awareness is awareness whether you're aware of other monks or of other family members. As long as that awareness is undistracted why try to change where we already are?

Astus wrote:

Being aware of doing something wrong is not enough to change such acts. Being aware of suffering is not enough to eliminate suffering.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 22nd, 2011 at 6:07 AM

Title: Re: Religion or family

Content:

Astus wrote:

Both monastics and lay people are humans, so there is no difference here. A major difference is in the environment. A householder life with job and family has limited freedom and there are binding duties one can't really avoid, including family dinners and earning enough to pay the children's education, plus all the other emotional baggage. A renunciant has a lot more freedom, not bound by family relationships, has nobody else to take care of while at the same time being taken care of through donations. Of course, one can be a householder bodhisattva and a renunciant worldly person, so one's spiritual qualities are not determined by one's social situation.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 27th, 2011 at 10:52 PM

Title: Re: The first precept / upasaka vow ...?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Not killing in terms of lay vows primarily means only killing other humans. This is usually extended to all sentient beings as killing in any form involves negative karma. But full karma exists only when there is intention, act and result. Without result (somebody dying) it is not killing, neither it is without intention. Killing includes any method to kill other beings from direct murder to convincing someone to commit suicide. However, killing oneself is not always included as the precept is interpreted as always in relationship with others. If you keep looking even into this single precept, you can find many different interpretations.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 29th, 2011 at 2:31 AM

Title: Re: Pointing Out / Systematic Instruction

Content:

Astus wrote:

Greg,

It uses the practices of shamatha to tame the mind, then vipashyana to guide one to the insight of the nature of mind. Then on, of course, all actions can be based on the realisation of the nature of mind, and that is continuous practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 1st, 2011 at 4:37 AM

Title: Re: Pointing Out / Systematic Instruction

Content:

Astus wrote:

Greg,

Not necessarily. It goes through different forms of shamatha with and without object. Insight into ordinary mind comes through vipashyana. That is, in the systematic works like those by the 9th Karmapa, Tashi Namgyal and Natsok Rangdrol.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 10th, 2011 at 5:36 AM

Title: Re: If Mahakashyapa was first Zen/Chan patriarch..

Content:

Astus wrote:

Besides that the whole succession of patriarchs, especially the Indian part, is a fiction, one of the Mahayana interpretation of the major disciples of the Buddha is that they were actually bodhisattvas under cover.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 10th, 2011 at 3:30 PM

Title: Re: What's wrong with Buddha's 6th sense?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are a couple of implications of that story.

1. The Dharma is not easy to understand.
2. At that time only Siddhartha understood it.
3. The great Brahma implored the Buddha to teach, acknowledging him as superior and as a buddha.

From a Mahayana perspective the whole thing was a show, a skilful means only, as the Buddha was enlightened aeons ago. That is another way of saying that one should not get lost in verbal details but see the purpose of a story.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 10th, 2011 at 3:34 PM

Title: Re: Intelligent design

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Scientists have calculated that the chance of anything so patently absurd actually existing are millions to one. But magicians have calculated that million-to-one chances crop up nine times out of ten."

(Terry Pratchett: Mort, p. 1)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 10th, 2011 at 7:39 PM

Title: Re: Vietnamese Pure Land compared to Jodo Shinshu?

Content:

kirtu said:

Also there is no notion of Shinran's (or was it Honen's) Self-Power/Other-Power view. Kirt

Astus wrote:

Self- and other-power were conceived by Shandao, so it's present in other Pure Land schools.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 12th, 2011 at 1:58 AM

Title: Re: Jogye head vows to further globalization of Korean Buddhism

Content:

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 12th, 2011 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: Vietnamese Pure Land compared to Jodo Shinshu?

Content:

Dodatsu said:

Actually self and other power were conceived by Tanluan (Donran), and inherited by Daozuo (Doshaku) and Shandao (Zendo).

Astus wrote:

Thanks.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 14th, 2011 at 4:15 PM

Title: Re: Mystical Experience in Jodo Shinshu?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Shin is a school of Buddhism, sounds evident but it's quite important not to forget. Therefore to comprehend its doctrine to the fullest requires some understanding of Mahayana. "Mystical union" is quite a theist concept. In Buddhism there is no "Self" that unites with a divine being. Also, Buddhism has a sophisticated meditation tradition, so all those "experiences" one may have are very well studied and explained there. If you're looking for something similar to union, in other schools' teachings you find that Amida is identified with buddha-nature that is the original nature of mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 15th, 2011 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: Mystical Experience in Jodo Shinshu?

Content:

Astus wrote:

If mystical union is interpreted as seeing one's buddha-nature then it's not something one would experience as a deluded being who has no hope but the vow of Amita Buddha. Shinjin - as I understand it - is the unwavering faith in being assured of birth in the Pure Land. It also includes the understanding that one is an ignorant human while Amita is a perfectly enlightened buddha. Although without doubt there are people who like to interpret Shinshu in quite a different way to the point of equating shinjin with enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 19th, 2011 at 3:37 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

Zen teachers being equal to buddhas, only in the sense that mind is buddha and there is no buddha outside the mind. But it should be understood in the way that only those are true teachers of Zen who are enlightened to the buddha-mind, not the other way around that people bearing different titles are buddhas because of that.

Mind to mind transmission is the same as seeing nature, because Zen is not in words or concepts but enlightenment itself. Thus there is nothing transmitted. It is an organisational matter that official papers are also called mind to mind transmission while in fact they are not.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 20th, 2011 at 6:58 PM

Title: Seosan's Argument for Pure Land Practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

"The worthies in the above passages all directly point at the Original Mind. There is no other method. This holds true at the level of ultimate reality; however, in the phenomenal realm, paradise and Amitabha Buddha with his forty-eight vows, really exist. So anyone who recites Amitabha's name just ten times will ascend with the power of Amitabha's vows and be reborn on a lotus leaf. In this realm, he will soon break free from the wheel of transmigration. All the Buddhas of the Three Dimensions of time say that this is so. The Bodhisattvas of the Ten Directions⁸⁵ all vow to be reborn there. In addition, the records describing all of those who have been reborn there in the past or present have been transmitted accurately. All of you practitioners who have made a vow to be reborn there should beware of mistaken views. You must be diligent!

The Sanskrit "Amita" means "unlimited life-span" or "unlimited brilliance." It is the name of the most excellent Buddha throughout the Ten Directions and the Three Dimensions⁸⁶ of time. When this Buddha was practicing, he was called Dharmakara. He made forty-eight vows in front of Lokeshvararaja Buddha. He said, "When I become a Buddha, if any deva or human being — or even the smallest insect — residing in any of the myriad worlds in any of the Ten Directions chants my name just ten times, I will cause that being to be reborn in my realm. For, until I am able to fulfill my vow, I will not enter Buddhahood." The sages of the past used to say, "Each time one praises the Buddha, the demons lose their courage. In addition, one's name is removed from the register in hell, as a lotus flower⁸⁷ blooms in a golden pond." It has also been said in the Dharma of Repentance, "There is your own power and the power of others. The former is slow, whereas the latter is fast. It is like a man who wants to cross the sea. If he plants trees for timber to make a boat, it will take a long time. This is like using your own power. But if he borrows someone else's boat and crosses the sea, he will get there fast. This is like the power of the Buddha." It has also been said, "If a child approaches water or fire and then yells, his parents, hearing his shout, come quickly to save him from danger. It is the same with a man on his death bed who shouts the Buddha's name. The Buddha, who is in possession of mysterious powers, will definitely come and greet such a person. In this sense, the compassion of the great sages surpasses that of parents. Moreover, sentient beings' birth and death is much more dangerous than water and fire."

There are those who say, "The mind is the Pure Land. You cannot be 'born' in the Pure Land. Your Self Nature is Amitabha Buddha. There is no other Amitabha to meet with." These words seem to be correct, but in fact they are not. Amitabha Buddha has no desire or hatred. Do we likewise have no desire and hatred? The Buddha transforms hell into lotus flowers as easily as you might turn your hand over. Yet, we are constantly afraid of falling into hell through the force of our own karma; we certainly could not even consider transforming hell into lotus flowers. Amitabha Buddha observes infinite worlds as if they were right in front of his eyes. For us, even the things happening right outside our wall cannot be seen, let alone the worlds in all the Ten Directions. Therefore, man's nature may be Buddha but his actions are characteristic of a sentient being. If we discuss both character and function, they are as far from each other as the sky and the earth.

Master Kuei-feng once said, "Even though you actually awaken suddenly; in the end, you must cultivate gradually." These words are true indeed!

Then, what could we say to someone who insists that this Self Nature is Amitabha Buddha? How is it that Sakyamuni was born with his fine endowments? How is it that one like Amitabha Buddha appeared through spontaneous birth? If you think about it, you cannot help but understand. When you are on your death bed, suffering and on the verge of death, are you confident that you will be completely free? If you aren't, then you should do something to avoid falling into some long-lasting torment as a result of a moment's pride.

Even Asvaghosa and Nagarjuna, both of them patriarchs, clearly bestowed upon us their words and teachings which strongly advocated working for a good incarnation in the next life. Who am I to say that one should not concern oneself with the next life? Even the Buddha himself said, "The Western Paradise is far from here. One must pass through 180,000 worlds to get there." This is an explanation of characteristics for the sake of those with dull faculties. "The Western Paradise is not far from here. This very mind/sentient being is the Buddha/Amitabha Buddha." This is an explanation of the Self Nature for the sake of those with "sharp faculties." The teachings consist of both the provisional and the actual. Speech has an exoteric and an esoteric aspect. One whose understanding and actions are in agreement can penetrate both what is near and what is far. Consequently, the School of the Patriarchs has those, like Hui-yuan, who called out to the Amitabha Buddha and those, like Jui-yen, who called out to his own self."

(Seosan Daesa:

http://www.koreanbuddhism.net/master/dharma_talk_view.asp?cat_seq=32&content_seq=133&priest_seq=0&page=1; Mirror of Zen, 52)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 21st, 2011 at 4:31 PM

Title: Re: Seosan's Argument for Pure Land Practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

Lip service is quite useless. As mentioned by Ryoto, the minimal requirement is to have faith. Without intention and reliance on Amita Buddha there is no birth. Without mindfulness of the practice there is no meditation.

Seosan says in the Mirror of Seon (52):

Chanting with the mouth is called "recitation," while chanting with the mind is called "reflecting on the Buddha. To merely recite a chant without awareness does not benefit one's practice. The Dharma Gate of the six syllables "Na-mu-a-mi-ta-bul" is a short-cut approach that can definitely lead you out of the cycle of transmigration. When you chant, your mind should be directed towards the realm of the Buddha. In your thoughts, you should maintain the chanting without falling into forgetfulness. With your mouth, you should chant the Buddha's name distinctly and not let your voice become sloppy. If you do this, your mind and your voice will come together. This is the meaning of "chanting the Buddha's name."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 21st, 2011 at 4:43 PM

Title: Re: The Complete Path...by the Seventh Dalai Lama

Content:

Astus wrote:

Wonderful summary. Can you give an exact source?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 22nd, 2011 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: Seosan's Argument for Pure Land Practice

Content:

plwk said:

Sometimes I wonder how is it that a 'simple' practice can be turned into such a mountain of views...

Astus wrote:

There's never been even a "simple thought", only naive philosophies and superficial views. That's why through analysis one finds both inter-dependency and emptiness at the same time, one thought including all thoughts and at the same time being without true basis.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 23rd, 2011 at 7:33 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are two approaches regarding the status of Zen teachers. One is that there is a bodhisattva path one takes on, you can find this view in the teachings of Zongmi, Jinul and Shengyan. The other is to point out that concepts of bodhisattvas and buddhahood are just concepts, it is mistaken to take them too seriously and one's better be a man of no affairs.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 23rd, 2011 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen Buddhism...

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Buddhist path is about putting the teachings of the Buddha and teachers into practice within our life. In that sense Zen is no different at all from any other "school".

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 24th, 2011 at 3:37 PM

Title: Re: Seosan's Argument for Pure Land Practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

Simplicity doesn't necessarily mean it is for people of low capacity. In fact, one may need lot of explanations to reach an understanding. I think it is quite rare that one just accepts a foreign religion based only on faith. And the original quote I brought here addresses a common view that the Pure Land and Amita Buddha are just symbols and not real at all. That is, in my view, a shallow understanding of the Pure Land teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 24th, 2011 at 3:39 PM

Title: Re: The Complete Path...by the Seventh Dalai Lama

Content:

Astus wrote:

Is there anywhere on their website or in a book? I'm asking because a Google search did not help me to find it. I just want to get the references clear if I happen to translate or quote it.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 24th, 2011 at 5:16 PM

Title: Re: The Complete Path...by the Seventh Dalai Lama

Content:

Astus wrote:

OK. Where do you have it from?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 25th, 2011 at 7:37 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

Do you mean Toeong Seongcheol and his view of sudden enlightenment, sudden practice? If so, while I have only minimal information on his teachings, he seems actually more like a teacher of gradual training to sudden enlightenment.

The two views mentioned can be merged into a single interpretation, and that's what Zongmi and Jinul did in their own ways. There is no need to take them as distant extremes or opposites. But it should still be recognised that it is possible to work only with one or the other, or create a hierarchical structure of them. Also, views emphasising a narrow path are usually more rhetoric than practical, while very diverse and complex interpretations tend to be rather theoretical than applicable.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 25th, 2011 at 8:18 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

klqv said:

i don't follow.... from a merely analytic point of view, if even those that teach that there is no path don't practice as if there were none, then they are working with both.

more generally, the rhetoric of there being no path i thought was found in all chan. and if it is rhetoric for those that teach the most stringent sudden enlightenment [that's what we're talking about - right] then how can they be differentiated from the other camp. or, even, why would it be necessary to work with only one approach and not the other?

Astus wrote:

OK, let me explain a bit of the distinctions.

Gradual path: doing different practices (e.g. six paramitas) that eventually result in liberation.

Gradual enlightenment: different levels of enlightenment (e.g. 52 stages).

Sudden enlightenment: direct realisation of buddhahood.

Sudden path: immediate insight into buddha-mind without any further methods.

You can come up with any combination of the above four and find some school or teacher who advocated that. The Complete Enlightenment Sutra is a great example where the sequence goes from a subitist (sudden-ist) approach to a gradualist, each to match the different capacities.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 26th, 2011 at 5:44 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

I lined up those four options in an attempt to show that these are different approaches to practice. They are not really opposites but aspects one can bring up according to situation. There are different advances and drawbacks for each point, so it's better to see them all. It's very similar to the two truths teaching.

The gradualist views are true because there is hardly anyone who could understand the Dharma from just a few words, much less realise it immediately. The subitist views are also true because everybody has the ability to see the nature of mind right now and that buddha-mind needs neither perfecting nor manifesting. And there are students who like a systematic step by step approach, others like to focus only on the essential.

In the subitist way there is no path, no practice. Just being natural and ordinary. But usually this naturalness has to be practised for a while before it starts to actually become natural. This is practising not practising.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 27th, 2011 at 2:47 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

klqv,

I think I've lost you. What is your question exactly?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 29th, 2011 at 4:48 PM

Title: Re: John R. McRae Dead

Content:

Astus wrote:

Very sad news. He was a true pioneer in East Asian Buddhist studies.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 30th, 2011 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: Dharmakaya of Amitabha sanskrit naming?

Content:

Astus wrote:

That is not a definite distinction accepted by all. Amita Buddha (without dividing it to Amitabha and Amitayus) was thought of by different authors in East Asia as any of the three buddha-bodies.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 31st, 2011 at 5:49 PM

Title: Re: Dharmakaya of Amitabha sanskrit naming?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dharmakaya Amitabha,
Sambhogakaya Avalokitesvara,
Nirmanakaya Padmasambhava -
I bow before the divine Trikaya!

(Nyang-ral Nyi-ma-'od-zer quoted in Approaching the Land of Bliss, p. 24)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 31st, 2011 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: The Lotus Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kyosan,

There is no point of a teaching that only buddhas can understand as they have no need of teachings.

Food_Eatah,

Authenticity and quality are not the same.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 1st, 2011 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: The Lotus Sutra

Content:

cdpatton said:

Overall, I personally think at the time of its composition, the Saddharma-pundarika was not so much a text for teaching praxis but rather a text advocating the Mahayana and attempting to convert the non-Mahayanists to the Mahayana teaching with the arguments against the three vehicles, recasting the bodhisattvas as the new exemplars, etc.

Astus wrote:

Do you know about the magnitude of the Lotus Sutra's success among Indian Mahayana followers? Are there Indian commentaries?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 2nd, 2011 at 1:40 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist ethics and BDSM?

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is possible - and perhaps advisable at a later stage - to get into details of Buddhist ethics. But in brief, the precepts are meant to regulate social behaviour. It is not about enlightenment or no enlightenment, but good karma and bad karma, higher and lower birth. Harmlessness in terms of avoiding inflicting pain (physical or mental) on others is a fundamental principle in Buddhism. Since BDSM is about giving and receiving joy - although in an unusual way - it is not harmful. While it is a form of sensual attachment, the precepts are not meant to eliminate such desires but only to regulate them. So until whatever one does remains within the boundaries of not harming others intentionally, it is not against the precepts generally. That's how I see it.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 2nd, 2011 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist ethics and BDSM?

Content:

mint said:

Doesn't the latent harm beg some consideration, though? While I agree that BDSM situations may not (and should not) entail intentional harm, as others in this thread have pointed out, accidents happen. This doesn't really affect the karmic element much; however, it is like toying with a loaded weapon which is falsely regarded as having been emptied. What happens when the weapon misfires? Wouldn't responsible thing be to minimize the potential for such harm?

Astus wrote:

I'm no expert in BDSM but I assume most of its practices are not dangerous at all. Weapons can do serious injuries while hot wax or even needles are hardly threatening. No doubt there are accidents, just like in the bathroom. But if you consider that people practice this form of entertainment with those they care about, it is hard to think of it as morally wrong, not to mention that even "common sex" has some potential dangers, from physical injuries to STIs.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 2nd, 2011 at 5:30 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist ethics and BDSM?

Content:

mint said:

I guess I was thinking more along the lines of erotic asphyxiation or even fantasy rape scenarios. I can imagine the rape scenario getting out of hand with the right balance of hormones and aggression. It's what mother called "horsing around."

Astus wrote:

There are extreme cases, but just as well I can think of extreme cases of other activities, like certain sports. Still, exactly because they are extreme, only very few people pursue them, therefore it should not be projected on what the majority does. And as Keith mentioned before, every case deserves its own analysis. Generally speaking, BDSM is not about strangling each other or fantasising about crimes.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 2nd, 2011 at 5:34 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist ethics and BDSM?

Content:

Food_Eatah said:

It's one thing to be tolerant to other people's actions, but another thing for disciples of the Buddha to condone behaviours that are harmful and clearly against the precepts!

Astus wrote:

Two questions then:

1. How is it harmful?
2. Exactly what precepts are those?

Food_Eatah said:

This domination crap is harmful for the sprititual practice.

Astus wrote:

BDSM is not intended to be a spiritual practice. But how and what kind of spirituality it harms is another question.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 3rd, 2011 at 4:00 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist ethics and BDSM?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Please return to the topic of this thread. Other discussions should be brought to another place.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 3rd, 2011 at 7:28 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist ethics and BDSM?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Wisdom,

There are a range of impulses that drive one to practice some form of BDSM. I consider none to be part of the path of a bodhisattva. However, the question is about ethics, and within Buddhism there are different levels of ethics. Any form of sexual practice can only be considered within the ethics of an ordinary lay person - neither ordained, nor enlightened - very much within samsara. The ethics of an ordinary lay person are meant to protect from the lower realms, to avoid excessive hatred, lust and torpor. BDSM, just as any other form of sensual pleasure, exists on different levels of intensity. In extreme forms it is as inadvisable as over indulgence in food, sleep, etc.

The "minimalist" definition of the relevant precept is:

"He is given over to misconduct in sexual desires: he has intercourse with such (women) as are protected by the mother, father, (mother and father), brother, sister, relatives, as have a husband, as entail a penalty, and also with those that are garlanded in token of betrothal." (MN 41.8)

This means not to disrupt the boundaries of family and social law. Quite sensible.

"Sexual misconduct is much censured in the world because it is the corruption of another's wife, and because it leads to retribution in a painful realm of rebirth."

(Abhidharmakosabhasyam, 4.I.J.9.b.i, vol 2, p. 604)

If we get deep into the commentaries, we find under the third category (protected by the Dharma) of sexual misconduct the form of improper behaviour - something that is not found as a category in the Abhidharmakosabhasyam (4.L.III.F.3, vol. 2, p. 651) - that is:

"Improper behavior refers to beating..." (Jewel Ornament of Liberation, 6.II.A.3.a, p. 113)

In this case beating might cover certain forms of BDSM. But that is quite a weak point and nothing generally regarded as definitive.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 3rd, 2011 at 7:33 AM

Title: New Administrator

Content:

Astus wrote:

Tara has become our very new administrator of Dharma Wheel. Please welcome her.

I'd also like to thank Ngawang Drolma's wonderful service she had done here since the beginning.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 3rd, 2011 at 8:10 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist ethics and BDSM?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Wisdom,

I can agree that BDSM mixes lust with anger, fear, pride, inferiority-superiority ideas and other disturbing impulses. At the same time, you can find the same emotions in common relationships, whether sexual or otherwise. And when one creates an identity of BDSM practices it can go very deep. From this a lot of pain and suffering may come eventually. It is clearly negative to reinforce a mental conditioning for hurting others. But at the same time, BDSM puts different levels of violence into a more lust than anger based context. While lust is a primary factor here, the second strongest emotion seems to be pride. It is about pride whether one takes the role of being superior or inferior, ruler or servant. However, pride is a rather subtle affliction and it's not really addressed by common precepts, because it is not an act in itself or necessarily a source of harmful actions.

Buddhist morality or ethics is not something that is prescribed to all who follow the religion but these are so called training rules. One is a lay Buddhist from the point refuge is taken in the Three Jewels. Taking up the five precepts is the next step, but one can take any amount from 1-5, or even more. To make BDSM in itself a sexual (or rather sensual) misconduct would require it to be consuming the person who practices it, while if it were wrong because it is physically harmful it'd fall under the first precept. We can make a distinction between "healthy" and "unhealthy" sensuality, as there are abusive and nourishing relationships in many forms. BDSM in itself is not abusive, but it can become detrimental. So it is with marriage, etc. In case of sexual/sensual misconduct the important questions are whether it is socially disruptive and if it is obsessive. Both are harmful for one's mental state and create big troubles through conflict with others and extreme emotional attachments. In this sense, identifying with BDSM as a life form is equivalent of taking refuge in BDSM, so one better avoids that.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 4th, 2011 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: Purelands

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is said that Amita Buddha's land is the easiest to reach, that's why it is the one emphasised and taught primarily and not any other.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 4th, 2011 at 4:41 AM

Title: Re: Purelands

Content:

Astus wrote:

But you should look at the criteria of birth for those different buddha-lands. They are rarely available for just any ordinary being.

In case of Abhirati, "one with passion or attachment cannot be born in that Buddha-land. Only those who have planted good roots and cultivated pure conduct can be born there." (Treasury of Mahayana Sutras, p. 323) Also, answering Shariputra's question, Shakyamuni says that only those who follow the same practices as Akshobhya can be born there, plus other practices. (p. 332ff) It is definitely not an easy task.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 4th, 2011 at 7:47 AM

Title: Re: Purelands

Content:

Astus wrote:

Then what do you make of the other passages in the sutra that lists all the different practices one should perform in order to attain birth in Abhirati? It says that one should follow the same vows as Akshobhya plus aspire to be born in his land. It doesn't add that it's all right to do without everything else but faith. Or you see it otherwise?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 4th, 2011 at 5:57 PM

Title: Re: Purelands

Content:

Astus wrote:

gingercatni,

It is not a matter of Akshobhya denying access nor Amitabha accepting people. Every buddha has the universal vows to liberate all beings and they have unbounded compassion toward all. At the same time there are specific vows that make buddhas and buddha-lands different. Thus conditions of getting to a buddha-land differ.

Historically speaking, it was quite a long process that Amitabha's practice became reduced to recitation and spread among lay people. Akshobhya's practice died out long ago, it wasn't competitive enough to survive on the religious market unlike other buddhas and bodhisattvas. If you prefer Abhirati I'm sure it is no problem to do practices related to that based on the sutras available. You might even find others who fancy

Akshobhya above all the others.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 6th, 2011 at 6:33 AM

Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?

Content:

KevinSolway said:

You must be aware that there are other interpretations of rebirth than your own, and that your own interpretation may not be the correct one.

Astus wrote:

Truth can be established only on defining principles. A correct interpretation exists only as far as one has the means to measure correctness. Truth on its own does not exist. Such is the teaching of dependent origination and emptiness. Therefore one may try to understand rebirth based on Buddhism or based on something else. This way the conclusions are already determined by one's preconceptions. Only when one becomes open to the Dharma it is possible to begin comprehending the teaching of the Buddha. How to be open and trusting toward this teaching of liberation? There are several ways depending on one's mental habits and ways of thinking. Debates like in this thread may serve such purpose, to assist in generating faith. But again, before openness there are only repetitive thought patterns coming from old mental conditioning. To eventually have insight into such a conditioned and narrow state of mind and see how that mentality could not yield happiness so far is the very first step on the path to enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 12:09 AM

Title: Re: Dogen translation in English

Content:

Astus wrote:

As an intro to Dogen I'd recommend the Shobogenzo-Zuimonki, then the Shobogenzo, and only after that the Eihei Koroku.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 4:40 AM

Title: Re: Dogen translation in English

Content:

Astus wrote:

As I'm not a Dogen scholar or Japanese expert, my best advice is to check the different translations and choose the one you like. The Zuimonki was also translated by Thomas Cleary. As for the Shobogenzo, the Nishijima translation seems to be more literal while the Shasta Abbey's try to be more of an explaining translation (thus a bit easier to read first). You can get both online actually, the Nishijima tr. is on the Numata's website: <http://www.bdkamerica.org/default.aspx?MPID=81>

In my opinion, however, if you want a fine introduction to Dogen, I recommend Carl Bielefeldt's "Dogen's Manuals of Zen Meditation".
The <http://hcbss.stanford.edu/research/projects/sztp/index.html> is another valuable source for alternative translations.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 7:20 PM

Title: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Astus wrote:

Madhyamaka and other Buddhist thoughts have sophisticated and detailed methods to prove ultimate reality. What about establishing the correct view of conventional reality? Are there lists of arguments? Is it possible to logically argue for the Buddhist view of conventional reality?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 10:02 PM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Astus wrote:

The correct (i.e. Buddhist) view of conventional reality can be summed up as dependent origination. That includes the general law of causality, the teachings on morality, karma, realms, beings, mundane samadhis, and from a Mahayana POV the dharmas, five aggregates, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think this is going to an unintended direction. My question is if there are arguments to establish correct view on the conventional level. To give an example that is quite an important point here, is to differentiate mind from matter, as that is essential for the system of rebirth, morality and even liberation. Again, I'm looking for arguments to establish correct view of the conventional realm, not anything else.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 15th, 2011 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Astus wrote:

Namdrol,

I'm looking for convincing reasons to validate the Buddhist view, obviously for non-Buddhists who want to get a grasp of it. I assume there are reports of how different teachers spread the Dharma among new converts who were not familiar with such concepts as samsara, morality and karma, mostly non-Indians. I'm also curious because Madhyamika, Yogacarín and other teachers went on and on to prove their understanding of ultimate reality, but that is a later step.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 15th, 2011 at 1:38 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Paul said:

It is just for the sake of refuting non-Buddhist opponents

That the learned ones have promoted them

Astus wrote:

And for this purpose I'd like to see all the many reasons for the validity of the Buddhist view vis-a-vis non-Buddhist views.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 15th, 2011 at 4:40 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are a couple of points where all Buddhists agree to some level, for instance that there are 5/6 realms of existence, and not 7 or 4. That stealing is conducive to lower birth and giving is conducive to higher birth. That there are magical powers, curses, healing spells, etc. That there are distinct cyclic eras on both social and cosmological levels. That there are five aggregates and six senses. These and other basic teachings are taken as facts and evident attributes of the conventional reality. However, in this culture in our time it is not that easy to just accept them. But this is not a unique situation. Such realms, deities, afterlife, they were not normal in many other cultures where Buddhism spread throughout the centuries, and that includes the time and land of Shakyamuni too. So when Buddhists had to debate with brahmins, warriors, merchants, shamans, yogis, zoroastrians, taoists, confucianists, etc. they didn't just have to say that "all phenomena are empty" but also that Indra is a mighty god but doesn't really help humanity, that it is wrong to sacrifice animals and monks should not bow before kings.

So defining conventional reality as just something that are commonly accepted doesn't really fit here. Even if we go into epistemology.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 15th, 2011 at 5:45 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jnana,

Thanks, I'll look into it.

https://www.google.hu/url?sa=t&rct=j&q=tattvasamgraha%20santaraksita&source=web&cd=3&sqi=2&ved=0CCIQFjAC&url=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.scribd.com%2Fdoc%2F61415472%2FGanganatha-Jha-tr-Santaraksita-Kamalashila-Tattvasangraha-of-Santaraksita-With-the-Commentary-of-Kamalasila-Vol-I-1937&ei=b43BTrDXAsbQ4QTE78STBA&usg=AFQjCNEtuxDx7GVwcBV_3WRoDuXikUI9_g&cad=rja (Very big file on Scribd!)
<http://www.archive.org/details/tattvasangrahaof015823mbp> (on Archive)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 15th, 2011 at 5:17 PM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Astus wrote:

Chapter 17 of MMK is a fine example of conventional reality in the Buddhist interpretation.

The point of arguments are, however, not to debate others but to serve as logical reasons for the Buddhist world view. So if one were to investigate why one should believe in the Buddhist understanding of conventional reality instead of others, there are clear explanations.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 15th, 2011 at 8:15 PM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

edearl said:

That the Buddhist world view is superior seemed obvious to me, as I began to read about Buddhism. Unfortunately, logical arguments have little effect on people who memorize and emotive rather than learn and think; otherwise, the world would be filled with Buddhists and people similar to Buddhists.

Astus wrote:

Logical arguments do have an impact, at least among those who value rational thinking. However, I still have to see those arguments to be able to apply them.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 12:11 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

edearl said:

There is nothing wrong with your logic.

I would like to be able to convince those who emote, but have had no success, because they think so differently than I do. A conversation might go like this: They say, "I believe my brother and I communicate telepathically." Whereupon, I say something like, "There is no scientific basis for telepathy, and experiments have not demonstrated it works." Then they say something like, "I don't care. Once my brother was struck by lightning, and I got the feeling something bad had happened. I called him from around the world, and sure enough he had been struck by lightning." Frustrated, I say something like, "IT IS MERELY COINCIDENCE. SCIENCE HAS DISPROVED TELEPATHY." And, they say, "Why are you yelling? I don't care what science says."

I have given up trying. My communication skills are inadequate.

Astus wrote:

You think in terms of debating, but all I'm looking for are sensible arguments for the Buddhist view of the world on the conventional level (and not arguments for emptiness, two truths, etc.). Reasons set up systematically to explain the ordinary realm of experience and fundamental teachings on the path of humans and gods (not above).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

conebeckham said:

..and Astus, sorry for derailing the thread. I'm not sure that there are "good" Buddhist arguments for a certain view of conventional reality, as compared to other sorts of arguments. Karma, D.O., these things should appeal to those with a scientific mind, I think.

Astus wrote:

Maybe there are no such arguments. I've been looking into the Tattvasamgraha's arguments, but one of the major difficulties when it argues against materialists is that the modern view of the body is quite different from those in ancient India. But even if we put that aside, it is difficult to accept its explanations for instance for the body not being the basis for the mind when it falls to a reasoning applied to any sort of causal relation (one-many argument on p. 898).

Just to show how easily certain basic concepts are viewed as evident:

"The other aspect of looking at the relationship between appearances and mind is whether the body and mind are the same or different. Normally, we tend to think of them as different. Most people have a vague idea that their body is like the dwelling place of their mind—as though the body were the house and their mind were someone living in that house. In fact, they are indivisible, because the mind pervades the body." (Thrangu Rinpoche: Ocean of Definitive Meaning, p. 110)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 4:32 PM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Sherab said:

Here's how I see it:

Buddhist view of conventional reality is the same as the ordinary man's view of conventional reality. It is what is generally accepted by ordinary people. Why? How can there be any other type of conventional reality given the meaning of convention.

Things like the five elements, skandhas etc are conventional reality in the past in India. Given the progress in science, no one who has undergone a "modern" education would really hold that fire is an element or water is an element and so forth. So conventional reality changes with time.

So is there a need to establish a correct view of conventional reality, Buddhist or otherwise? No, conventional reality is what is generally agreed upon i.e. the convention. It is accepted as such without proof. It is accepted as such because it is what is commonly accepted.

What happens if you try to talk to a modern man of science using conventions prevalent at the time of the Buddha, using terms like the five elements as if they are the current convention? The man will probably think that you are caught in a time warp, and rightly so.

Astus wrote:

Good point, it is conventional without the need to be proved. However, many believe that there is only body (materialism - annihilationism), that there is an eternal soul (eternalism), a creator god (theism), etc., that are contrary to the Buddhist view but could be called conventional. Thus there is correct and incorrect view of conventional reality, and having right or wrong view is karmically important. It is also important in order to make any sense of the path to liberation, since it relies on several concepts of conventional truth.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 5:45 PM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sherab,

If in your interpretation conventional reality is only defined by agreement between people and nothing else, even causality can't be established, not to mention morality and karma. Those are the very bases of all Buddhist practice without which there can be neither sravakas nor bodhisattvas. Madhyamaka reasoning is great once the fundamental doctrines are clarified, but before that it's pointless to discuss emptiness. So instead of quotes and arguments about Buddhist sophisms one should first of all investigate the crude basics.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 6:40 PM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

zangskar said:

Trying to understand what your aim is, is it: how are the conventional truths associated with Buddhism 'proved' or argued for (regardless of the fact that they are ultimately held to be 'wrong')? I.e. what methodology (if any) is used in Buddhist doctrine to arrive at these conventional truths?

Is what you are looking for some explicit, written down philosophy of the conventional? Or is it what one could call the actual and perhaps tacit methodology, that would have to be discovered and elucidated through hermeneutic study of the texts?

Astus wrote:

Yes, you understand the question correctly. The second part, not necessarily needed.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Namdrol said:

A view is a position concerning either existence or non-existence, that is the basis of all views. Madhyamakas do not have views concerning either.

Astus wrote:

Should add that it's independent existence and total annihilation. But to say that "there is no self" is not a position of non-existence, i.e. annihilation, and to say that "phenomena are inter-dependent" is not a position of existence, i.e. eternal self-sufficient being.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 5:52 PM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Sherab said:

I thought that agreement between people automatically means that whatever is agreed is "established" for them individually. Method of establishment could be different for each individual but there has to be "establishment" before agreement takes place.

Astus wrote:

By established I meant a logical system. That is rarely something people care to contemplate.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 6:10 PM

Title: Re: Best Language to Learn First?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Chinese has the largest number of Buddhist texts (including tantras and modern translations). Sanskrit only has fragments and incomplete canons. So I think the question is whether you want to be a scholar-linguist or just want to read and study texts.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 4:46 AM

Title: Re: Why is Vajrayana Better?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Vajrayana is better than what? Obviously, it is better than those teachings it posits as other teachings. But as for those who actually know and follow other paths, it has no knowledge of, so comparison is not possible, unless someone would actually care to learn about those other paths. But so far I haven't met a Vajrayana follower who knows in depth about at least one East Asian or Theravada school.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 5:02 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

conebeckham said:

Perhaps we need to define what a "view" is.

Astus wrote:

Apparently there is a major linguistic chaos generating unclear reactions here.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 5:09 AM

Title: Re: Why is Vajrayana Better?

Content:

Nangwa said:

Vajrayana includes the methods of Theravada and East Asian Buddhism plus many more.

The other paths are limited in scope and method.

Astus wrote:

Hardly. It has no four dharmadhatus, no three truths, no three minds, no five ranks, no three mysteries, no fifty-two stages, etc. It doesn't even have many of the sutras, treatises and other texts that are in the East Asian canons, neither does it have the Theravada canon or later works.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: Why is Vajrayana Better?

Content:

Nangwa said:

Maybe not by the same name but the Vajrayana scholastic tradition certainly accounts for these things.

Canons are not the same as traditions.

Astus wrote:

So you are claiming this based purely on faith in Vajrayana, not on actually knowing anything about them. That is when the all-inclusiveness of Vajrayana becomes a matter of another belief next to it being faster, better, etc., and not something even close to an established fact. Of course, this is not a problem at all, since all the other non-Vajrayana schools like to say that same things about themselves.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 5:30 AM

Title: Re: Best Language to Learn First?

Content:

Food_Eatah said:

It's probably also easier to learn Chinese since those slitty eye homeboys are everywhere!!! You certainly wouldn't have trouble finding teachers and sources.

Astus wrote:

Modern Mandarin/Cantonese/etc. are not the same as literary Chinese (the language of the majority of Buddhist texts) and there is also the matter of Buddhist terminology. Similarly, spoken Tibetan is not the same as the language of the sutras and tantras.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 6:00 AM

Title: Re: Why is Vajrayana Better?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Nangwa,

A well known practice of Japanese Rinzai Zen is the koan practice. What is that in Vajrayana?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Sherab said:

I don't know about others, but I do try to establish for myself the reasonableness of various aspects of Buddhist teachings (e.g. cause and effect, impermanence) and practices (e.g. rationale for yidam visualisation) through logical arguments/reasonings. But these logical arguments/reasonings cannot establish the validity of the teachings or practices.

In addition, the logical arguments/reasonings that I use for myself may not suit others because there are always assumptions upon which an argument/reasoning has to rest upon, and these assumptions may not make sense to or may not be accepted by others.

You may wish to ask yourself, how you yourself come to accept various aspects of Buddhist teachings.

Astus wrote:

It is possible to say that since ultimately nothing is established, one can come up practically anything and call it illusory conventional reality. However, there is a huge amount of "shared reality" that allows us to think there is a system in all this. In Buddhism the basis of everyday experience is karma, from karma arises the whole universe, and karma is based on the work of the mind. Mind also has its own organised functioning that is explained mainly in abhidharma and yogacara works. Now here is a problem that divides Buddhist thinkers, whether there is an outer reality independent of mind or not. Either case, it is difficult to explain the relationship either between a separate mind and outer things, or between personal and shared reality.

However, saying that nothing is ultimately established is not exactly correct because of dependent origination as the organising law of phenomena. But that is not enough to explain the mind-continuum as separate from the body, thus dependent origination is insufficient to be the basis of the Buddhist view of conventional reality. But perhaps if to this we add the existence of a mind-continuum we could be set.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 8:14 PM

Title: Re: Continuity / Discontinuity; Eternalism / Annihilationism

Content:

Astus wrote:

We can say that there is continuity in a middle way interpretation. It only requires understanding that:

1. there are no separate instances that follow each other (e.g., moments of time)
2. the term "continuity" is not a thing in itself but an expression

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 28th, 2011 at 10:51 PM

Title: Re: Diamond Sutra in latin

Content:

Astus wrote:

Very nice.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, November 29th, 2011 at 6:51 PM

Title: Re: Diamond Sutra in latin

Content:

Astus wrote:

What is the use of translating the Diamond Sutra at all? The content is too difficult for anyone without prior education to make sense of, so any translation of it should be done with commentary. Not to mention there are dozens of English translations. A Latin version, well, it's fun, that's all.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2011 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: Diamond Sutra in latin

Content:

Dharma Atma said:

But why to translate them in the dead languages...

Astus wrote:

Buddhist sutras were translated into literary Chinese, a dead language by that time. Same can be said about Sanskrit. Latin, of course, is not that popular now as those were in their respective cultural spheres. Still, there is some beauty in Latin. Even two volumes of Harry Potter were translated to Latin (and one volume to ancient Greek).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2011 at 1:24 AM

Title: Re: Karma and the Ten Powers

Content:

Astus wrote:

Strict causality requires that every effect has definite causes and conditions, and those causes and conditions are also conditioned by previous factors. So it goes on and on. Consequently, if we knew all conditions at a single point of time and the rules how they go on, we could tell all past and future. This is not nihilism but determinism. Mental factors are subject to causality as well as material things. Whatever thought one has now is then a necessary consequence of the development of the entire world, or at least the chain of causes and conditions from past unknown.

As for whether buddhas are meant to be omniscient in this particular form or it means something else, I think it's debatable.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2011 at 5:21 PM

Title: Re: Karma and the Ten Powers

Content:

Astus wrote:

Emptiness is not an unconditioned reality opposite to conditioned reality. It is because all is conditioned that it's empty, it's actually the same thing.

As for free will, the mind is a series of conditioned factors that interacts with other conditioned experiences. It doesn't mean that there is some external force ruling over people. In fact, this idea that there is a "free self" is an illusion. Without such self, it is also pointless to conceive oneself being controlled by anything. Thinking itself is a series of conditioned factors. But, this basic causality should not be confused with karma because it is a special case.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 1st, 2011 at 5:14 PM

Title: Re: Karma and the Ten Powers

Content:

Acchantika said:

In fact, this idea that there is a "free self" is an illusion. Without such self, it is also pointless to conceive oneself being controlled by anything.

Selves, karma, emptiness, liberation are all illusions. Everything is already empty, so why strive for enlightenment when both the striving and the enlightenment are empty? Because sentient beings perceive their suffering as real, there is no other reason.

Astus wrote:

From a simple conventional perspective, beings have free will and can act as they please then bear the consequences. From the same point of view, ten powers and such are magical and inconceivable. Also, on this level you either believe it or not all these things.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 1st, 2011 at 5:42 PM

Title: Re: Karma and the Ten Powers

Content:

Astus wrote:

As for free will, the mind is a series of conditioned factors that interacts with other conditioned experiences. It doesn't mean that there is some external force ruling over people. In fact, this idea that there is a "free self" is an illusion. Without such self, it is also pointless to conceive oneself being controlled by anything. Thinking itself is a series of conditioned factors. But, this basic causality should not be confused with karma because it is a special case.

mint said:

How does this relate to the so-called Ten Powers?

Astus wrote:

If we suppose that from a single point of time all past and future can be known, buddhas with omniscience are aware of it all. This is of course very much a theoretical assumption, not something based on traditional Buddhist explanations.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 1st, 2011 at 10:22 PM

Title: Re: Why not teach buddhism, instead of your mind?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Do you care to elaborate?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 2nd, 2011 at 6:01 PM

Title: Re: Why not teach buddhism, instead of your mind?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Mazu generally taught that mind is buddha. Then there was neither mind, nor buddha. Dazhu Huihai was quite satisfied with the first teaching, others preferred the latter. But without understanding the meaning it's pointless to debate the words. The meaning obviously is to see mind's true nature, what else is there? Then look at the different teaching methods used.

A monk asked, "Master, Why do you say that Mind is Buddha?" Mazu said, "To stop babies from crying." The monk said, "What do you say when they stop crying?" Mazu said, "Neither Mind, nor Buddha." The monk asked, "Without using either of these statements, how would you instruct someone?" Mazu said, "I would say to him that it's not a thing." The monk asked, "If suddenly you met someone who was in the midst of it, then what?" Mazu said, "I would teach them to realize the great Way."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 2nd, 2011 at 8:17 PM

Title: Re: A Question for Abhidharma analysts

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sounds (sound-consciousness) associated with pleasurable (or painful, or neutral) feelings generating attachment (or aversion, or disinterest).

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 3rd, 2011 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: Do Arhats have to become Buddhas?

Content:

Mr. G said:

Outside the three realms? A Pure land?

Astus wrote:

It isn't really pure if it's within the three realms, is it?

Anyway, after early Buddhism first the idea of arhatship was raised to very high, then gradually in Mahayana they made it into a very low level of attainment, something dangerous and more detrimental than committing the 5 worst crimes. I find it better to view it as a religious concept and how it changed through the ages if one is looking for the big picture. Otherwise, there are different traditions and interpretations within Buddhism, including the view (in Mahayana) that arhats simply attain nirvana and that's all.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 3rd, 2011 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: Why not teach buddhism, instead of your mind?

Content:

Astus wrote:

MalaBeads,

Getting lost in content is wondering whether "mind is buddha" or "neither mind, nor buddha" is the better. There are no "best methods", only working methods that one can understand and use. The majority of old Zen teachings in that sense are very much useless as they speak in a foreign language using unknown ideas. If one wants to uphold the principle that Zen is only about pointing to the nature of mind, one must use intelligible language and not dead Chinese rhetoric. So how could we translate this saying, "neither mind, nor buddha", into something sensible? I'd say, it is not intelligence, emotion or awareness, neither it is anything supernatural or beyond current existence.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 3rd, 2011 at 8:27 PM

Title: Re: A Question for Abhidharma analysts

Content:

Astus wrote:

Music is not an ultimate truth (in the abhidharmic sense) but an interpretation of the mind of specified series of sounds, a conventional truth. What you identify as music is conditioned by the culture and one's aesthetic taste.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 5th, 2011 at 6:02 PM

Title: Re: Do Arhats have to become Buddhas?

Content:

Huseng said:

Such a view is easily refuted with scripture and reasoning, just like holding that icchantikas can never attain liberation.

Astus wrote:

As always, it depends on what scriptures you consider definitive and how you interpret things.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 5th, 2011 at 7:38 PM

Title: Re: Karma and the Ten Powers

Content:

Astus wrote:

Agents acting and deciding is OK, that is our normal reality. But if you go to a "deeper level" then decisions and choices can't come from nothing but must be conditioned, otherwise it's very much a violation of dependent origination and causality in general. So in one sense there are free agents, in another the agents themselves are conditioned beings with conditioned minds.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 5th, 2011 at 7:44 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

That all comes, abides and returns to the buddha-mind is found in Chan. And the classic definition of Chan explicitly says direct pointing to the nature of mind as the hallmark of the tradition.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 5th, 2011 at 8:09 PM

Title: Re: Karma and the Ten Powers

Content:

tobes said:

No doubt about that - the range of possible choices are determined by the range of samskarahs which have been previously accumulated.

So, you're right in pointing out that agency in Buddhism is not akin to a completely free agency; but neither is it wholly determined by past accumulations - there is always the possibility of creating new intentions and undertaking new actions.

Astus wrote:

There are always new actions, decisions, and such. However, they're based on the conditions present in the mind, including of course external circumstances that influence the mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 5th, 2011 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

The first is not lhun grub, and the second is not direct introduction.

Astus wrote:

Could you define the difference?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 5th, 2011 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

MalaBeads said:

I have heard the phrase 'the chan school' often and have understood the phrase being used to distinguish it as "the meditation school" and not "the ritual school" (ie Vajrayana).

...

Chan, and it's Japanese descendent, Zen, are full of esoteric methods that are not available in the common literature.

Astus wrote:

Chanzong/Zenshu is incorrectly translated as "meditation school" as meditation itself is not unique to it, neither is there any special emphasis of it (not counting modern interpreters).

Esoteric practices, like what? Chinese Buddhism has several rituals that can be called "esoteric" but then its no point calling it Chan, unless as a reference to the entirety of Chinese Buddhism. Japanese Zen has different sources, like Tendai and Shingon. But this is not really the topic here. For discussion I recommend a separate thread.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 5th, 2011 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

it would be better for you to properly learn Dzogchen and find out for yourself what the difference is.

Astus wrote:

As you seem to already know that difference, it would be beneficial for all reading this thread if you could explain it. General statements like "that is sutra, this is tantra" and "ask your guru" doesn't help.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 1:32 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

Does Buddhamind have color?

Astus wrote:

Essentially no, functionally yes.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 5:29 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

How so? You mean you can see it with your eyes?

Astus wrote:

I can see colours with my eyes, also perceive and imagine colours in my mind. That is functioning.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 7:07 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

I see, those colors are conditioned or unconditioned?

You can see where this is going, right? lhun grub is not conditioned. But your "function" is. So they are completely different.

Astus wrote:

Is rupakaya conditioned or unconditioned? Are the qualities of buddha-mind conditioned or unconditioned? Are the wisdoms conditioned or unconditioned? It is possible to argue for both actually. Still, since the conditioned is in fact unconditioned, such extremes are only pedagogic.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 6:22 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

The main point behind lhundrup is practical, it is not theoretical or abstract. It has to do with how Dzogchen is practiced.

Astus wrote:

Then it'd good if you could give it a definition. As a start, I bring here one.

Spontaneous presence/accomplishment is an inherent aspect of buddha-mind, and means the aware side and the buddha qualities.

As such, the same teaching is found not only in Chan but in all East Asian schools following the buddha-mind teachings as found in the treatise "Awakening Mahayana Faith" and other works.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Chan fails to understand cleaning or not cleaning the mirror so we have here 2 aspects or point of view. Even without cleaning the mirror, i never heard the practice or Tantra about the Bardo States in Zen, which are unique only to the Dzogchen Traditions.

Astus wrote:

This is a valid point here, as far as Chan is not concerned with specific practices related to the intermediate state, however, such is not unique to Dzogchen but found in other Vajrayana traditions too. Nevertheless, that is not relevant to seeing the nature of mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 7th, 2011 at 6:04 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

I really suggest you learn Tibetan and learn Dzogchen teachings in a proper way. Otherwise, you are just spinning empty words.

Astus wrote:

Thanks Namdrol, I appreciate your concern and I can only agree that knowing the canonical language and doing extensive studies with intensive practice is a proper way. At the same time, it seems that either you think that Dzogchen can be discussed only by those who have gone through rigorous training of some sort, or that discussion means to continuously avoid addressing the topic by disparaging remarks.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 7th, 2011 at 4:16 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Jinzang said:

I can't claim to be expert in dzogchen (far from it.) But the way I remember Khandro Rinpoche explaining the issue is that while other paths (she specifically said mahamudra) teach that buddha nature is inherent in all beings, dzogchen teaches that the buddha qualities (such as omniscience) are inherent in all beings.

Astus wrote:

Buddha-nature includes the buddha qualities as explained in detail in the Ratnagotravibhaga and other works.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 7th, 2011 at 5:20 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

LastLegend said:

Both will lead to Buddhahood. The only difference is the time it takes to become Buddha.

Astus wrote:

How so? Chan is the school of sudden enlightenment (not gradual development on the bodhisattva path), and the Pure Land path has 100% guaranteed buddhahood in one lifetime.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 7th, 2011 at 5:31 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

LastLegend said:

If I remember correctly, in Mahayana teachings, Bodhisattvas have to go to Pure Lands to become Buddhas. Or they might be "stucked" just like Arahants are stucked in Nirvana until they wish to go to Pure Lands.

Astus wrote:

There is no such necessity for bodhisattvas, they even work on building their own buddha-lands. What stops them from getting stuck is great compassion and the proper understanding of prajnaparamita.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 7th, 2011 at 6:39 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

LastLegend said:

But Bodhisattvas might not have the necessary Wisdom like Buddhas do to build Buddha lands.

Astus wrote:

Buddha-lands are created/completed once they become buddhas. If you want to carry on with this topic I recommend a separate thread.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 8th, 2011 at 5:30 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is no such thing as a Pure Land lineage, although in China and in Jodoshinshu they like to talk about certain patriarchs. There are several sutras talking about different buddha-lands, including the land of Amita Buddha. They are the primary sources of the teaching.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 8th, 2011 at 5:34 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

Separate discussion of <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=39&t=6158> moved.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 8th, 2011 at 7:30 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land and Bodhisattvas

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are different interpretations and presentations of Chan, however, those who fully embrace the teaching of sudden enlightenment, don't aspire to aeons of bodhisattva practice but complete attainment in this life. As for Amita Buddha's Pure Land, it is a path with assurance of attainment, but that doesn't mean it skips the common stages of the bodhisattva path. That's why many teach the combined practice of Chan and Pure Land.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 8th, 2011 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land and Bodhisattvas

Content:

LastLegend said:

How do you explain this?

Astus wrote:

It is as often said in Chan: see nature, become buddha. The mind is buddha, realising this you become buddha. What else remains?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 9th, 2011 at 2:15 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Caz said:

Sudden Enlightenment or Sudden Liberation ? Full enlightenment isnt sudden.

Liberation could be though...

Astus wrote:

There are different views about this ranging from minimal (entry to the level of faith, roughly identical to entry to the path of accumulation) to maximal (perfect buddhahood). It depends on what teacher/lineage/school you ask.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 9th, 2011 at 5:06 AM

Title: Re: Pure Land and Bodhisattvas

Content:

LastLegend said:

Eventually will become Buddha?

There is no really past, present, and future right? Only to sentient beings there is.

Astus wrote:

Not eventually, but it is what becoming buddha is, seeing the true nature of mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 9th, 2011 at 5:29 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

That is from a different version than those three that exist in Chinese as far as I know. Tibetans like this "foretold by XY sutra/tantra" thing.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 9th, 2011 at 8:20 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land and Bodhisattvas

Content:

LastLegend said:

Ok becoming Buddha.

But at that moment become the fully enlightened Buddha?

Astus wrote:

Exactly.

"To practice in every moment of thought is called the true nature. To be enlightened to this Dharma is the Dharma of prajñā, to cultivate this practice is the practice of prajñā. To not cultivate this is to be an ordinary [unenlightened] person. To cultivate this in a single moment of thought is to be equivalent to the Buddha in one's own body. Good friends, ordinary people are buddhas, and the afflictions are bodhi. With a preceding moment of deluded thought, one was an ordinary person, but with a succeeding moment of enlightened thought, one is a buddha. To be attached to one's sensory realms in a preceding moment of thought is affliction, but to transcend the realms in a succeeding moment of thought is bodhi." (Platform Sutra, ch. 2, tr. McRae)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 9th, 2011 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Mariusz said:

I don't think Zen has the similar practical jargon related to Lhundrub (Spontaneous presence). As I know Zen has not even the concept of the Bardo of Dharmata (Chönyid bardo), let alone instructions how actualise its spontaneously accomplished "visions" (the 4 visions; wylie: snang ba bzhi). Nevertheless, it is very easy to take carelessly sentences from Madhyamaka/Yogacara as a Zen "slang" or even as a Dzogchen "slang" for the practice.

Astus wrote:

It doesn't. I haven't seen any Zen work dealing with intermediate state practices, nor similar practice with lights, sounds, deities, etc. And while there is the understanding that buddha-mind has the perfect qualities inherently, it is not conceived of in tantric images.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 9th, 2011 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Caz said:

I could understand Sudden Liberation in cutting the bonds of Samsara once Emptiness is realized but Buddhahood is progressive even Bodhisattvas still have subtle imprints of delusion and it takes time after they're liberation to wipe these from the mind. So how would it be possible to have sudden Enlightenment? Liberation and Enlightenment aren't interchangeable yet I've seen a fair few people mistake them for being so, How is this distinction made in the Chan school?

Astus wrote:

Bodhisattvas go through stages, yes. But according to Chan that is a lower understanding, and Chan teaches the Sudden and Perfect Vehicle where there is sudden enlightenment to buddhahood.

Here are Zongmi's categories: 1) the teaching of men and gods, 2) the teachings of the Hinayana, 3) the teaching of phenomenal appearances, 4) the teaching of the negation of phenomenal appearances and 5) the teaching that reveals the true nature of phenomena (intrinsic enlightenment)

But Zongmi was not really the advocate of sudden complete enlightenment, and those who were did not really care about setting up elaborate scholastic systems.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 9th, 2011 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

The buddha qualities in Zen is put under the term of function that is the perfect functioning of the six sense spheres in general. There are a few detailed discussions of these functions but it is not really important as one can use them spontaneously once the nature is realised, and such functioning is exemplified in many Zen stories.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, December 11th, 2011 at 11:37 PM

Title: Re: Taego Order: 2011 Bikkhu Ordination

Content:

rory said:

Or who knows maybe they are gay, it's a tradition and cliché that Kukai who brought Shingon to Japan 'introduced' homosexuality to the Japanese.

Huseng said:
What is your source for this?

Astus wrote:
Faure mentions this legend (or not just legend) of Kukai's part in introducing "male love" (but not lesbianism!) in his book "Red Thread".

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, December 12th, 2011 at 2:52 AM
Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan
Content:

Caz said:
But wouldn't one need to first progress through the Bodhisattva stages to reach sudden enlightenment of Buddha? One cannot be a Buddha without first developing Bodhicitta. This is a prerequisite to enlightenment so how can this just suddenly perfectly develop in one's mind stream? What method is it that is used. It was often said that Dzogchen was Ch'an in disguise so could you please elaborate the 5th category of teaching?

Astus wrote:
Here are two brief explanations by Zongmi (tr. by Ven. Huifeng):

"If one suddenly realizes that the essence of one's own mind is originally pure, solitary and without defilements, itself originally endowed with the nature of undefiled wisdom, that this very mind is Buddha, absolutely no difference, and thus cultivates based on that, this is the supreme unsurpassed Chan, also named the pure Chan of the Tathagatas, also named the Single Act Samadhi, also named the Suchness Samadhi. This is the fundament of all samadhis."
(CBETA, T48, no. 2015, p. 399, b16-20)

"Direct (sudden) realization of the essential purity of one's own mind, originally without defilements, itself endowed with the influx-free (non-afflicted) gnosis - this mind is Buddha, ultimate with nothing else beyond - cultivating in this manner, is the Supreme Vehicle Dhyana. It is also known as the Pure Dhyana of the Tathagatas."
(CBETA, X64, no. 1276, p. 808, c9-15 // Z 2:18, p. 494, c7-13 // R113, p. 988, a7-13)

And a fancy explanation from the Linji-lu (tr. Sasaki, p. 17):

"Outside mind there's no dharma, nor is there anything to be gained within it. What are you seeking? Everywhere you say, 'There's something to practice, something to obtain.' Make no mistake! Even if there were something to be gained by practice, it would be nothing but birth-and-death karma. You say, 'The six pāramitās and the ten thousand [virtuous] actions are all to be practiced.' As I see it, all this is just making karma. Seeking Buddha and seeking dharma are only making hell-karma. Seeking bodhisattvahood is also making karma; reading the sutras and studying the teachings are also making karma. Buddhas and patriarchs are people with nothing to do."

Therefore, [for them] activity and the defiling passions and also nonactivity and passionlessness are 'pure' karma.

There are a bunch of blind shavepates who, having stuffed themselves with food, sit down to meditate and practice contemplation. Arresting the flow of thought they don't let it rise; they hate noise and seek stillness. This is the method of the heretics. A patriarch said, 'If you stop the mind to look at stillness, arouse the mind to illumine outside, control the mind to clarify inside, concentrate the mind to enter samādhi—all such [practices] as these are artificial striving.'

This very you, the man who right now is thus listening to my discourse, how is he to be cultivated, to be enlightened, to be adorned? He is not one to be cultivated, he is not one to be adorned. But if you let him do the adorning, then everything would be adorned. Don't be mistaken!

Followers of the Way, you seize upon words from the mouths of those old masters and take them to be the true Way. You think, 'These good teachers are wonderful, and I, simple-minded fellow that I am, don't dare measure such old worthies.' Blind idiots! You go through your entire life holding such views, betraying your own two eyes. Trembling with fright, like donkeys on an icy path, [you say to yourselves,] 'I don't dare disparage these good teachers for fear of making karma with my mouth!'"

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 12th, 2011 at 7:25 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

zangskar said:

Astus, as I was surfing for more books to shell out on I stumbled on this one

Moonshadows: Conventional Truth in Buddhist Philosophy [Paperback]

The Cowherds (Author)

Oxford University Press 2011

https://www.amazon.co.uk/Moonshadows-Conventional-Truth-Buddhist-Philosophy/dp/0199751439/ref=pd_sim_b_10 " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

In case it would be of interest to you

Astus wrote:

Thank you, great recommendation!

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 12th, 2011 at 5:39 PM

Title: Re: Taego Order: 2011 Bikkhu Ordination

Content:

Huseng said:

I've never heard of this in Japanese sources.

Astus wrote:

You can start here:

Kukai and the Tradition of Male Love in Japanese Buddhism by Paul Gordon Schalow, in Buddhism, Sexuality, and Gender, p. 215ff

The Great Mirror of Male Love by Ihara Saikaku (tr. P. G. Schalow)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 12th, 2011 at 6:29 PM

Title: Re: commonalities and divergences between traditions...

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are a few things missed here about the Pure Land teaching.

Mahayana is not just about being full of compassion to save beings, but also about a whole pantheon of bodhisattvas and buddhas who can save beings. Actually the two comes in a single package. The Lotus Sutra is famous for describing how Guanyin saves anyone from all sorts of troubles, it also explains that she does that via a large amount of good karma being transferred. Same happens in case of Amita, anyone who has the faith and intention creates a connection because of that and receives the merits from Amita, thus it is guaranteed that one attains birth in his Pure Land.

Compassion is not developed by being subjected to suffering. Bodhisattvas and buddhas do not suffer, they have already transcended all the mundane concerns and troubles of people. Compassion emerges with wisdom, they are not separate. It is exactly because they have realised emptiness of all that they have unconditioned compassion for all.

Amita's Pure Land is not a simple heaven where people enjoy themselves ad nauseam. It was created with the sole intention of accepting all and establishing them in the path of buddhas and bodhisattvas. It is for those who want to attain enlightenment. Bodhicitta exists in the very intention of being born in the Pure Land.

People have doubts about the Pure Land path because it seems too easy, but if one has faith in the teachings of other Mahayana schools, the method of Amita is also there, as well as it is mentioned in several sutras.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 12th, 2011 at 7:10 PM

Title: Re: Simple question about Pure Lands

Content:

Astus wrote:

Buddha-lands exist because of the buddhas who created them, just as the world exist because of people's karma. Now the questions are whether buddhas live eternally or not, and sentient beings are infinite or not. But is there a definitive answer?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 14th, 2011 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: commonalities and divergences between traditions...

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

I don't think it will lead to dhyāna as there is an active willed intention ongoing throughout recitation.

Active will exists on all levels of dhyana, otherwise it would not be maintained, except during the 9th, but even then it's decided beforehand when the practitioner would exit from it.

It is a practice whose purpose is to achieve rebirth in a paradise, as I have explained above, hence I think it is escapism.

In the Pure Land there is minimal suffering and the work of salvation is left to Amitabha.

Paradises are the realms of gods, the Pure Land is a realm of a buddha. It is not minimal suffering but zero suffering, so it is called the Land of Bliss. Salvation is not left to Amita Buddha, he only provides the environment, the work is left to the individual.

Serious bodhisattva aspirants stick it out in this world and foster compassion, whereas in a paradise with minimal suffering there is little need to foster compassion.

Beings in the Western Pure Land have access to billions of worlds where they can carry out bodhisattva work. Being stuck in a single world doesn't really compare to that. Plus, talking about saving beings without being at least a 1st level arya bodhisattva is pretty deluded.

The Pure Land is still technically samsara as it is within the three realms and arises due to causes and conditions.

It is beyond samsara as it is not created by deluded beings' karma. See Tiantai's ten world teaching on this.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 15th, 2011 at 1:25 AM

Title: Re: commonalities and divergences between traditions...

Content:

Huseng said:

This is not so. Even Ajahn Brahm teaches that in the first jhāna there is no active will. I am speaking of the four jhānas as one finds in the Nikayas.

Astus wrote:

Ajahn Brahm has his own specific view of the jhanas (I'm not saying it's good or bad, just that it's quite unique). Since to achieve successive absorptions one has to maintain a focal point (see the system of 40 kammattana), there are sustained mindfulness, intention and effort involved.

Huseng said:

Technically this Earth of ours is a buddha-realm and this is not a land of bliss for all but liberated beings.

Astus wrote:

This was not created by a buddha, unlike Sukhavati and others.

Huseng said:

You can still aid beings despite not being a realized arya.

Astus wrote:

Sure, but not actually liberate them. Plus, without prajnaparamita all merits are mundane merits.

Huseng said:

Sentient beings reside there, and they exist by virtue of defilements, hence it is samsara.

Astus wrote:

Beings exist there because of Amita Buddha's power - this is the so called other-power, that is a form of merit transference. Otherwise only arya bodhisattvas are capable of going there on their own.

In fact, the basic principles of the Pure Land school rely on the doctrine of merit transference, because that is what makes it possible for buddhas and bodhisattvas to assist beings in many ways. Merit transference requires the recognition of the offered merit, that's why buddha-mindfulness is the essential practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 15th, 2011 at 9:58 PM

Title: Re: commonalities and divergences between traditions...

Content:

Huseng said:

I understand it well enough. I just think much of it is incompatible with older lines of Buddhist thought.

I just don't think Amitabha is omnipotent and capable of bypassing karmic law.

Astus wrote:

What older lines do you mean? Teachings about different means to attain birth in buddha-lands has been part of Indian Mahayana and of East Asian Mahayana as well. The land of Amitabha was emphasised by the Tiantai school and then on by others. It is older than the whole Vajrayana.

No buddha is omnipotent and in interaction with beings they can't overwrite karma. As I said before, merit transference is what allows the assistance of buddhas and bodhisattvas, and that is a doctrine found even in the Nikayas.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 16th, 2011 at 12:46 AM

Title: Re: commonalities and divergences between traditions...

Content:

Huseng said:

You can be Buddhist and disagree with the tenets of other schools. This is to be encouraged, otherwise you'll end up accepting everything as equal without acknowledging all the contradictions.

Well, Shinran had a rather notable position in that even evil people get into the Pure Land by virtue of the grace of Amitabha. That overrides karmic theory big time.

Astus wrote:

No problem with disagreeing, but the reasons you give in order to refute the Pure Land teachings don't actually address the proper doctrines themselves.

Shinran's "evil person" is simply a prthagjana, and the possibility of ordinary beings being born in the Pure Land was argued and accepted long before him by Jingying Huiyuan (523-592, see: The Dawn of Chinese Pure Land Buddhist Doctrine, p. 109). It doesn't negate karma but shows that via merit transference evil karma is overridden by good karma, as it is explained in the Lotus Sutra's Guanyin chapter.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 16th, 2011 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: Taego Order: 2011 Bikkhu Ordination

Content:

Jikan said:

Hi Anders,

It's unclear to me if the Taego order's vinaya lineage comes from Japan as I think you are saying, or not. When would it have been transmitted from Japan? or am I misunderstanding you?

Astus wrote:

Korea was under Japanese rule from 1910 to 1945

(https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Korea_under_Japanese_rule). However, it is said that the idea of married clergy was started not because of the Japanese but because of Manhae (<http://sonbuddhism.org/history.html#marriage>).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 16th, 2011 at 8:01 AM

Title: Re: commonalities and divergences between traditions...

Content:

Dechen Norbu said:

Can you explain me then why do we have to do anything at all if such rebirth depends on merit transference, Astus? Why is it only transferred to those who do this or that recitation instead of everyone, not mattering what they do? What does the doctrine says about it?

Astus wrote:

This requires understanding what merit transference is, which is quite simple actually. One receives another's merit when one rejoices in another's merit. The same is true of demerit of course. So the name "transference" is a bit misleading because there is no "merit energy" transferred from one person to another, but what happens is the identification with another's deeds. That is the reason why no buddha can just simply save the beings but beings must save themselves. That is why one has to create a connection between himself and a buddha. It is explained with the following analogy in the Shurangama Sutra:

"Those Buddhas taught me the Buddha-recitation Samadhi: Suppose there are two people, one of whom always remembers the other, while the other has entirely forgotten about the first one. Even if these two people were to meet or see each other, it would be the same as not meeting or seeing each other. On the other hand, if two people develop intense memories for one another, then in life after life, they will be together like an object and its shadow, and they will never be separated. The Tathagatas of the ten directions are tenderly mindful of living beings just like a mother remembering her son. But if the son runs away, of what use is the mother's concern? However, if the son remembers his mother in the same way that the mother remembers her son, then in life after life mother and son will never be far apart. If living beings remember the Buddha and are mindful of the Buddha, they will certainly see the Buddha now and in the future. Being close to the Buddha, even without the aid of expedients, their hearts will open of themselves."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 16th, 2011 at 7:17 PM

Title: Re: Diamond Sutra in latin

Content:

Huifeng said:

"Buddhist sutras were translated into literary Chinese, a dead language by that time."

If you mean that literary Chinese was dead at the time the Buddhist sutras were translated, I would have to disagree with you very strongly.

Even to this day, a fair percentage of Chinese Buddhists can still read these translations without too much difficulty.

Classical Chinese is still taught at most levels of education in Taiwan, for example, and plenty of people can read and recite some classics from memory.

It's not dead today, let alone 1500 years ago.

Astus wrote:

Dead language in the sense that it is not a spoken, everyday language. Latin is also preserved in its written, literary form, and in the USA it's the 8th most popular language learned by university students (http://www.vistawide.com/languages/us_languages.htm).

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 17th, 2011 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: commonalities and divergences between traditions...

Content:

Astus wrote:

DN,

There is no failure on the Pure Land path. Those who have faith and determination in the vow of Amita Buddha are guaranteed to attain birth in the Land of Peace and Bliss. This is the general understanding of this teaching, some may add other requirements. If one is not born in the Pure Land, well, it's just like with anyone else. However, the practices of buddha-remembrance, prostrations, visualisations, recitations, etc. are all beneficial on other levels too. Also, the Pure Land path is for all kinds of practitioners from low to superb. That is why I consider it the apex of the Mahayana teaching that can universally liberate everybody.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, December 19th, 2011 at 10:51 PM

Title: Re: what is the cause of Avidyā(ignorance)?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Ignorance is not realising the empty, impermanent nature of mental formations, thus there is habituation that maintains ignorance. Avidya generates samskara, samskara generates vijnana, vijnana reinforces samskara, samskara reinforces avidya. Ignorance is not a thing that is created or not created by something, but a condition of being that is constantly maintained by habits, or we can say that being attached to habits is ignorance itself. There is no beginning as conditions come from former conditions and result in further conditions. This conditioning can be ended any moment by not creating it again. It is not simply a theory but our own mind and its functioning right now.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2011 at 9:07 AM

Title: Re: Is ecumenical Buddhism realistic?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There has never been a uniform tradition but a diversity of teachers and teachings with differing levels of mutual understanding. It is also a false impression to conceive of existing traditions as things that survived centuries intact, unchanged and continuous. Naturally some think in terms of "preserving the old" and others in "adapting to the new situation". Pure lineages and teachings exist only in the realm of theories, and that's also the place of arguments about superior and inferior, original and corrupt, etc.

Institutionally speaking, universities are institutions where students learn about not only the local forms of Buddhism but others too. The Nikayas have been translated to Chinese and Japanese to serve as sources of knowledge and more, while at the same time different Mahayana works are available in Thai and other languages. I think that today there are people who want to believe in preserving and upholding only what they see as their own tradition, others think about reforming traditions in different ways, and there are those who just want to learn useful and interesting teachings regardless of labels.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2011 at 12:23 AM

Title: Re: Is ecumenical Buddhism realistic?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Indeed, there must be a respect and appreciation toward different forms of Buddhism. I often see how teachers of different traditions simplify and misinterpret other Buddhist teachings. A very common example is when people from Mahayana view Theravada simply as if it were the Hinayana doctrine they learnt a little about from their own traditions, or even worse, when they call Theravada what should be called Hinayana. This simplification and misinterpretation is a usual source of not understanding different Buddhist teachings. It would be enough to start with an open mind and hear what others actually teach. Calling others' faiths "hinayana", "sutrayana", "deviation", "superstition", etc. is the sign of closed minds. As it should be obvious for all Buddhists, it is ignorance that keeps us in the dark.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2011 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: what is the cause of Avidyā(ignorance)?

Content:

Astus wrote:

To add to the above post, ignorance is not a thing in itself but the lack of something, namely knowledge (jnana).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2011 at 2:41 AM

Title: Re: what is the cause of Avidyā(ignorance)?

Content:

Anders Honore said:

Nah. Ignorance is a dharma. It is not so much a lack of knowledge as it is actively looking at things wrongly.

Things couldn't arise in dependence on ignorance if it weren't a dharma.

Astus wrote:

Desirelessness (alobha), non-harmfulness (ahimsa), impermanence (anityata), space (akasa) and even suchness (tathata) are all dharmas. But "dharma" does not mean a "thing" but rather a category as used in abhidharma works, a mere linguistic term.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 1:18 AM

Title: Re: Is ecumenical Buddhism realistic?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sönam,

That is one common interpretation of the one vehicle doctrine. It seems it provides an explanation for the diversity of the teachings and traditions. What it actually always does and always used for that, is a justification for whatever the highest vehicle is imagined to be. It seems tolerant, but in fact it is simply arrogant. And I'm not saying here that you personally are arrogant, but this argument, known throughout Mahayana, is nothing more than an attempt to explain the superiority of a doctrine above others, based not on proper knowledge, but on fabricated karmic deficiency. A similar argument is used for the caste system.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 2:31 AM

Title: Re: Is ecumenical Buddhism realistic?

Content:

Astus wrote:

You identified the levels of practitioners with distinct teachings, that are again put into a hierarchical system. So those who follow sravakayana are necessarily low level practitioners, who follow sutrayana are medium level practitioners, who follow vajrayana are higher level practitioners, and who follow dzogchen are the best of all. This, I think, is a faulty identification on many levels.

First, these so called yanas are not real vehicles or traditions, but only one school's categorisation of the teachings as they understand them. Other schools have different interpretations of those teachings, just as they have different categorisations. However, the Nyingma categorisation does not and cannot include any other school's view of those teachings, otherwise they would actually be the same school. So it is with any other school. Thus there is no basis here to differentiate between existing schools, only a theoretical categorisation of certain teachings within a single school.

Second, the level of practitioners does not depend on what teaching they claim or seem to follow, but it is an inner quality others can hardly judge. There are beginners and advanced practitioners everywhere in every profession, just as there are students who learn slow and who learn fast. If students master French faster and German slower, does that mean those who study German are students of lower, and students of French are of higher ability? Or is it that French is simpler, easier and so inferior, while German is more complicated, harder and therefore superior? Does it make sense at all to call those students and languages superior or inferior? I don't think so.

Finally, to call things inferior and superior requires a value system, a measuring tool. But such values and measures are necessarily arbitrary. From a Nyingma point of view others are inferior, from a Zen point of view others are inferior. That's why I said that that kind of interpretation of the one vehicle doctrine is nothing more than arrogance. And arrogance is a very self-absorbed and closed-minded attitude.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: Sex in pureland?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here's Ven. Yinshun's view of the pure lands of Amitabha and Bhaisajyaguru. He says basically that the western land is for those with renunciation, and the eastern land is for those with a more worldly attitude.

Those who are timid and inferior,
Wish to have an easy path to practice.

The Buddha has special skillful means
To embrace and protect these beginners.

Of these, one of the most special
Is to be reborn in the Most Blissful Land.
Blessed by the Power of Amitabha Buddha,
They will not retreat from attaining enlightenment.

For those who cannot renounce worldly pleasures
But wish to attain enlightenment,
The Medicine Buddha vowed compassionately
To provide a Pure Land in the east.
(Yinshun: The Way to Buddhahood, Taking the Easy Path, v. 139-142)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 4:17 AM

Title: Re: Is ecumenical Buddhism realistic?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I prefer to follow a more historical view on the development of different Buddhist teachings. I add to that that in different times, places and circumstances the Dharma was adapted both intentionally and naturally. Thus all texts and teachings are to be understood in its own context and not in a misplaced or anachronistic manner. This leaves us the option to see all forms of teachings as many ways to express the same truth, same Dharma. This is evolution, not in the sense of progression to a higher level - since there is no higher truth than the Dharma - but in the sense of adapting in order to stay alive and relevant. In China they could come to the view, but of course not all agree with this, that the eight schools are one (i.e. all the major views are valid). And although this interpretation can also be used to create a "more equal than others" situation, I believe that this view generates a less biased and more open perspective on all the Buddhist traditions.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 23rd, 2011 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: Happiness, suffering and the Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

Happiness means the lack of suffering. It is not the common happiness of worldly people that is filled with desire and attachment, but the peaceful contentment of liberated beings.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, December 28th, 2011 at 4:53 PM

Title: Re: Is ecumenical Buddhism realistic?

Content:

Astus wrote:

An ecumenical approach is found in several Chinese masters' teachings, among whom one of the most prominent is Yongming Yanshou. Just as he could personally connect to and comprehend the major teachings of his time, it is also possible today to do the same with diverse traditions.

"The term zong is problematic owing to its different meanings. It can refer to a doctrinal interpretation, particularly the underlying theme or essential doctrine of a text, or to a "school," which in Chinese Buddhism often refers to a tradition tracing its origin back to its founder. In this case, Yanshou is clearly closer to the first meaning, suggesting a unified underlying theme or essential doctrine of Buddhist teaching as a whole, and clearly countering narrower interpretations favored by sectarian lineage. The means to accomplish this aim are also made clear: using the question-and-answer method to dispel doubts and citing writings that make true principle—the central, unifying source (zhengzong 正宗) of Buddhist teaching—explicit. The suggestion that such a unifying doctrine underlies all Buddhist teaching is essentially antithetical to sectarian concerns.

According to Yanshou, the citation of authoritative scriptures, the teachings of the Buddhas and patriarchs, makes clear that the one, all-encompassing, universal mind (yixin 一心) is the zong , the central, unifying source of Buddhist teaching. The myriad dharmas of phenomenal existence (wanfa 萬法) are the mirror, or reflections (jing 鏡) of the mind. Hence, the title of the work, Zongjing lu , refers to a record (lu 錄) of sources that reflect or mirror (jing) the essential, underlying doctrine of Buddhist teaching (zong)."

(Albert Welter: Yongming Yanshou's Conception of Chan, p. 24-25)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 4:15 PM

Title: Re: Metta in Theravada Vs Bodhicitta in Mahayana

Content:

Namdrol said:

The former does not have the capacity to bring you to liberation, since it is a mundane meditation.

Astus wrote:

Metta and the other three can lead to liberation.

Namdrol said:

"Then again, a monk keeps pervading the first direction with an awareness imbued with good will, likewise the second, likewise the third, likewise the fourth. Thus above, below, & all around, everywhere, in its entirety, he keeps pervading the all-encompassing cosmos with an awareness imbued with good will — abundant, expansive, immeasurable, without hostility, without ill will. He reflects on this and discerns, 'This awareness-release through good will is fabricated & intended. Now whatever is fabricated & intended is inconstant & subject to cessation.' Staying right there, he reaches the ending of the mental fermentations. Or, if not, then — through this very Dhamma-passion, this Dhamma-delight, and from the total wasting away of the first five Fetters — he is due to be reborn [in the Pure Abodes], there to be totally unbound, never again to return from that world.

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.052.than.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 8:24 PM

Title: Re: Is ecumenical Buddhism realistic?

Content:

Astus wrote:

An interesting source for an ecumenical outlook of Buddhism is Yogi Chen who studied both Chinese and Tibetan Buddhism. Another could be the Tendai type of ecumenism as it includes so many different practices, although within a single frame of theory.

As for this Greek part, this could be interesting for some:

<http://ccbs.ntu.edu.tw/FULLTEXT/JR-PHIL/mcev.htm>

<http://enlight.lib.ntu.edu.tw/FULLTEXT/JR-PHIL/phil371973.pdf> (PDF)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 11:15 PM

Title: Re: Metta in Theravada Vs Bodhicitta in Mahayana

Content:

Namdrol said:

It is actually the opposite, this passage shows that metta cannot lead to liberation since it is "is fabricated & intended".

Astus wrote:

Metta is not the direct cause of liberation but it leads to liberation, just as meditation and morality leads to liberation. Bodhicitta is not the direct cause of liberation either but it leads to that. The quoted sutta lists 11 different practices to attain liberation with, among them are the immeasurables.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 31st, 2011 at 4:32 AM

Title: Re: Metta in Theravada Vs Bodhicitta in Mahayana

Content:

Namdrol said:

Bodhicitta is the direct cause of buddhahood.

By itself, metta has no force to lead to liberation, as Dharmakirti points out.

Astus wrote:

Bodhicitta is the intention to become a buddha, but there is a path to be followed and without that path there is no buddhahood. If bodhicitta were the direct cause of it there would be no need of a path. However, from the practice of metta there is only one more step to liberation. But I agree, by itself metta does not cause liberation, only birth in the heavens.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 31st, 2011 at 5:36 AM

Title: Re: Metta in Theravada Vs Bodhicitta in Mahayana

Content:

Namdrol said:

For a bodhisattva, bodhicitta is an intention and the path as well.

This is why, in terms of relative bodhicitta, there is both aspiration and engaged bodhicitta.

In terms of ultimate bodhicitta, there is śamatha and vipaśyāna.

Astus wrote:

I see your point. I had a narrower meaning of bodhicitta in mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, December 31st, 2011 at 5:39 AM

Title: Re: Metta in Theravada Vs Bodhicitta in Mahayana

Content:

Virgo said:

So as far as beliefs go, Theravada has no criteria whatsoever?

Jnana said:

The Theravāda has never been a monolithic entity or institution beyond the various monastic ordination nikāyas.

And not only doctrinally, but in terms of practice as well.

Astus wrote:

And Mahayana is even more diverse. So "Theravada vs Mahayana" is a pretty obscure thing.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 3:42 AM

Title: Re: The Aro gTér: some answers and questions

Content:

Astus wrote:

Lineage is one thing. But another important thing is proving one's doctrine based on the teachings of canonical scriptures. How is that in Aro gTér's case?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 4:12 AM

Title: Re: The Aro gTér: some answers and questions

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thanks David, I appreciate your approach to the matter. My question, however, was primarily for those who question the Aro gTér's validity. I am merely a curious bystander waiting for the outcome of this thread.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 4:34 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen Buddhism...

Content:

Beatzen said:

I don't know what kind of sanghas here in the states you guys are familiar with, but my sangha refers to sutras all the time. Especially the Heart Sutra, which i am quite fond of as my favorite.

Astus wrote:

The Heart Sutra is a tricky one. It is like a 1.5 minute trailer to a 4 hour film, or a half page note to a 10 volume encyclopaedia. And because of its brevity it is easy to interpret it in many different ways. If you're for short and comprehensive texts, I recommend Ashvaghosha's "Awakening Faith in Mahayana" as a fundamental treatise of East Asian Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 4:51 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Doesn't a statement like this leave the whole deal open to tantras that do not have an Indian origin (or at least a lineage to back them up), like the English language tantra of the Aro mob?

Astus wrote:

Very good question. History clashes with myth. Were the Mahayana sutras spoken by Shakyamuni? And the tantras? Are these sutras and tantras from India, Central Asia, China or Tibet? Could there be treasure texts in an e-mail attachment?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 5:07 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen Buddhism...

Content:

Beatzen said:

I don't see how you can interpret the heart sutra in many different ways... could you give me an example of that?

Astus wrote:

Read commentaries of the Heart Sutra by different people and you'll find how many things can be found in it.

For example:

The Heart Sūtra explained: Indian and Tibetan commentaries by Donald S. Lopez

Essence of the Heart Sutra: The Dalai Lama's Heart of Wisdom Teachings by Mark Epstein

Heart Sutra: Ancient Buddhist Wisdom in the Light of Quantum Reality by Mu Soeng

The Heart sutra: an oral teaching by Sonam Rinchen

The Heart of Understanding: Commentaries on the Prajnaparamita Heart Sutra by Thich Nhat Hanh

There is no suffering: a commentary on the Heart Sutra by Ven. Shengyan

An Arrow to the Heart: A Commentary on the Heart Sutra by Ken McLeod

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 6:16 PM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

Astus wrote:

Let's turn the things around a bit and look at Mahamudra and Dzogchen from a Zen perspective. For the sake of argument, I take up the classical Zen definition as a special transmission outside teachings, not established on words and letters, but points directly to the mind, so by seeing its nature one reaches buddhahood.

Mahamudra and Dzogchen are full of expedient means, they require devotion and transmission, then extensive training. There are also many teachers who say that besides Mahamudra/Dzogchen one should also do different ritual practices, analytical meditation, deity yoga, etc. Beyond all those practices, one should also familiarise oneself with many levels of doctrines appropriate to the tradition where one studies, as preliminary requirements.

Zen doesn't require anything special, there are no transmissions, no guru devotion, no deities to pray to, no recitations and secret mantras, no long texts to learn. One is instructed from day one how to realise buddha-mind right there without anything else left to achieve. No hidden teachings, no obscure symbolism, just the essence of the Dharma from which all other teachings come. There are no fixed methods to follow but one is free to utilise whatever one wants to.

So there are quite a few differences here.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 8:09 PM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

Mahamudra can be combined with this energy stuff, such as 6 yoga Naropa, but I think that one is the enhancement.

The core teaching is free from that.

Correct me if I am wrong here.

Astus wrote:

Unlike certain (theoretical) forms of Zen that has been reduced to the bare minimum, both Mahamudra and Dzogchen are generally understood as integral parts of a more complex teaching of Vajrayana. Also, unlike Zen, neither of those existed as independent traditions but only within the frames of the many schools of Vajrayana. Besides a very few modern teachers you won't find Vajrayana masters who cut off these practices from the others. Although Gampopa and some later Kagyü teachers taught about a stand alone Mahamudra, it is more of an exception than the rule.

Note that Zen hasn't really existed in its minimalistic form either in real life, nor as a strictly separate teaching. That's why Dogen said that it is wrong to call his teaching Soto or even Zen, as what he actually imported from China was a large curriculum of Buddhism in general (from temple design to koan collections).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 8:19 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen Buddhism...

Content:

Huseng said:

A lot of people outside of Japan have completely mistaken ideas of what Zen is, and this I guess is to be expected given that most literature available on the subject in the English speaking world is either academic or written by complete fools who make up most of what they write.

Astus wrote:

I have to correct this a bit. It was those few Japanese teachers who implemented the current view of Zen in the West. DT Suzuki was the first, but many others followed.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

Namdrol said:

This is the main different between Zen on the one hand, and (Kagyu) Mahāmudra and Dzogchen on the other. It is also the main difference between sutra and tantra i.e. the presence or absence of direct introduction. Mahāmudra and Dzogchen are based on direct introduction. This does not exist in any school of Zen, much less sutra.

Astus wrote:

I really want to add here the whole guru concept (and related yoga) as an outstanding difference - although some confuse it with blind worship of authority that exists everywhere. Zen has no such direct introduction partially because there is no such person to introduce one, and also because there is no such system one would have to adhere to in order to call it a feature of Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 11:21 PM

Title: Re: Is Zen Buddhism...

Content:

Huseng said:

A lot of time has passed since DT Suzuki.

Type "Zen" into Amazon and you'll see all kinds of books on the subject with questionable titles and even more silly content.

Astus wrote:

By Zen I meant the religious part, not the mp3 player stuff, neither the books "Zen and the Art of..."

As for Amazon, among the first twelve items are (in order of appearance):

An Introduction to Zen Buddhism by D. T. Suzuki and Carl Jung

Zen Mind, Beginner's Mind by Shunryu Suzuki and David Chadwick

The Religion of the Samurai A Study of Zen Philosophy and Discipline in China and Japan by Kaiten Nukariya

The Three Pillars of Zen: Teaching, Practice, and Enlightenment by Roshi Philip Kapleau

Everyday Zen: Love and Work (Plus) by Charlotte J. Beck

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: Is Zen Buddhism...

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huseng,

As I see it from the history of Zen (in any country), it takes outstanding teachers (or rather appropriate circumstances) to enliven the tradition. This reform recently happened in China through Xuyun, in Korea through Gyeongheo, but in Japan the last big impact teachers were Menzan and Hakuin more than 300 years ago. Western Zen (and Ven. Shengyan for instance) was influenced mostly by Sanbo Kyodan, a modern, 20th century school, but it had little influence in Japan itself. Buddhism in Taiwan is very fresh and new, most of the founders are still alive.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 3:09 AM

Title: Re: Is Zen Buddhism...

Content:

kirtu said:

I haven't read the McLeod book or the Mu Soeng book but the others are essentially pointing to or teaching the Prajnaparamita (I was going to say they are essentially the same).

Astus wrote:

Since the Heart Sutra is brief, one can explain it in as many different ways as emptiness can be explained in different ways. Same with the concept of prajnaparamita. You can go with Madhyamaka, Yogacara, Tiantai, Huayan, Chan, Tantra, Mahamudra, or something new.

For instance, Ven. Seung Sahn distinguished three forms of Zen (theoretical, tathagata, patriarchal) based only on "form is emptiness, emptiness is form" (Compass of Zen, p.

229f). Dushun's Mirror of the Mysteries of the Universe of the Huayan (tr. by Cleary in Entry Into the Inconceivable) sets up the whole discussion based on a fourfold relationship between form and emptiness. There is also a Heart Sutra commentary by Fazang translated in Francis H. Cook's "Mahayana Buddhist Meditation" that follows Huayan exegesis and differentiates three meanings of the relationship between form and emptiness (mutual opposition, not mutual opposition, mutual creativity), then gives the four meanings of true emptiness, after which he lists another fourfold relation from the viewpoint of form, following in essence Dushun's analysis. Shunryu Suzuki, in Zen Mind, Beginner's mind (p. 25f) makes difference only between two views of form and emptiness, where the view of "form is emptiness, emptiness is form" is a dualistic view. These were only Buddhist interpretations. But if we look into other sources, like "The Eye Aware: Zen Lessons for Christians" by Jeroen Witkam, we may find even more interesting explanations. That's why I say that studying the Heart Sutra is far from simple and straightforward.

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=tqJ9qC2DRFc> (video)

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=uDD_UUGMp2c

Finally, here's a bit of Dogen (SBGZ: Bussho), just for its nice wording.

(tr. C. Bielefeldt):

This "emptiness" is not the "emptiness" of "form is itself emptiness." "Form is itself emptiness" does not mean that "form" is forced into "emptiness"; it does not mean that "emptiness" has been divided up to author "form": it is the "emptiness" of "emptiness is emptiness." The "emptiness" of "emptiness is emptiness" is "a single stone in space."

(tr. Nishijima & Cross):

This emptiness is beyond the emptiness of "matter is just emptiness." [At the same time,] "matter is just emptiness" describes neither matter being forcibly made into emptiness nor emptiness being divided up to produce matter. It may describe emptiness in which emptiness is just emptiness. "Emptiness in which emptiness is just emptiness" describes "one stone in space."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 4:10 AM

Title: Re: Is Zen Buddhism...

Content:

Astus wrote:

And anyway the reason for the difference in expositions and view is that the Heart Sutra is vast and profound and is a pith summary of the direct experience of the Prajnaparamita. That it is brief is not a real factor.

Its shortness is a factor in my opinion, because it doesn't explain the meaning, therefore leaves the rest to one's imagination/previous study. Not unlike a Zen koan.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 4:34 AM

Title: Re: Whose Buddhism is Truest?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Chinese Canon - in fact, several canons edited in China - contains thousands of texts, including multiple translations of the same work, but they did not start any movement saying that "nobody and everybody is correct". Since Buddhism never had a uniform and single Holy Scripture, the diversity of texts has been always present. At the end of the day, it is naturally MY (teacher's) BUDDHISM is the truest.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 4:18 PM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

Soto is a gradual enlightenment school of zen

Rinzai is a sudden enlightenment school of Zen

Astus wrote:

What an absurd idea. If anything, Rinzai could be labeled as gradual because of their koan curriculum. But as all lineages originating from Huineng is per definition sudden, you can't find any "gradual Zen". Plus, there's nothing gradual about shikantaza.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 5:38 PM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

Astus wrote:

SPLIT TOPIC: <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=66&t=6498>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 5:54 PM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

No time to argue based on personal idea.

It is better showing fact, fact, and fact.

Astus wrote:

Good, let's see facts. The Caodong tradition was created in the Song dynasty (see: Morten Schlütter: How Zen Became Zen). Their teachings were mostly the conservative form of Chan, compared to Dahui's innovation of kanhua practice. The teachers considered Caodong in the Tang dynasty were likely related to the Hongzhou school anyway (see: Jinhua Jia: The Hongzhou School of Chan Buddhism in Eighth- Through Tenth-Century China). So it is clear that Caodong masters did not conceive anything like a gradual practice.

Dogen himself was an advocate of inherent buddhahood, very much in line with current Japanese Buddhist thought. He taught no enlightenment to be achieved but zazen itself became buddhahood for him.

Sudden enlightenment was accepted by the early Japanese Soto masters as well. Dogen praised Hui-neng because "once he was suddenly enlightened, he left his mother and sought a teacher."
(Kenneth Kraft: Eloquent Zen, p. 92)

Where Dogen identifies the "right thought" of the nondeluded mind with nonthinking, a classical author like Hui-hai prefers to call it no-thought. To this extent the essential art of zazen seems to have become, in the vulgate Fukuan zazen gi, nothing more (nor less) than fixed sitting in sudden enlightenment.
(Carl Bielefeldt: Dogen's Manuals of Zen Meditation, p. 148)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

Astus wrote:

Dogen... taught no enlightenment to be achieved but zazen itself became buddhahood for him.

tomamundsen said:

A common misunderstanding of Dogen.

Mr. G said:

I always thought this too:

From Dogen's Bendowa:

...

I thought Dogen's Zen was a completely different animal. Definitely not gradual though. How is it classified?

Astus wrote:

The quote itself shows Dogen's view of inherent buddhahood and the unity of zazen and enlightenment. That is because in shikantaza one "abides in the buddha-mind".

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 6th, 2012 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: Is Soto Zen Gradual?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Another great source is Keizan's Zazenyojinki.

"Although we speak of realization, this realization does not hold to itself as being "realization". This is practice of the supreme samadhi which is the knowing of unborn, unobstructed, and spontaneously arising Awareness. It is the door of luminosity which opens out onto the realization of Those Who Come Thus, born through the practice of the great ease. This goes beyond the patterns of holy and profane, goes beyond confusion and wisdom. This is the realization of unsurpassed enlightenment as our own nature."

(<http://www.wwzc.org/translations/zazenYojinki.htm>)

"And although we talk about enlightenment, we become enlightened without enlightenment. This is the king of samadhi. This is the samadhi that gives rise to the eternal wisdom of the Buddha. It is the samadhi from which all wisdom arises. It is the samadhi that gives rise to natural wisdom. It is the clear gate that opens into the compassion of the Tathagata. It is the place that gives rise to the teaching of the great comfortable conduct (zazen) - It transcends the distinction between sage and commoner; it is beyond dualistic judgment that separates delusion and enlightenment. Isn't this the enlightenment that expresses one's original face?"

(<http://terebess.hu/zen/szoto/zazen.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 6th, 2012 at 3:42 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Universities/Buddhist Studies

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't think there's much point in translating the entire Chinese canon (which one exactly, BTW?). Also, I find it a bit presumptuous to think that all who translated texts to Chinese were like living professor bodhisattvas. Let's say a few people translate Xuanzang's prajnaparamita collection. How many will want to read it? How many who could read it today in Chinese reads it? On the other hand, we have a dozen translations of the Lotus Sutra and at least four translations of the Shobogenzo, just to mention the bigger works that have fairly little use, and people love to read them. Why? Because they believe it's important. However, until the scriptures are the interest of only a handful of scholars and even less Buddhists, translations will come slowly. Compare that to the Pali Tipitaka that was translated first by the BTS and then again it's being translated by others. Because they care about it. But who cares about Xuanzang's Great Prajnaparamita Sutra? So the situation is not that bad at all. Most of the popular works in East Asian Buddhism have already been translated, many of them more than once, some even have commentary. Realistically speaking, there are so many scriptures in Chinese that it'd take a few lifespans to read them all, and most of them have not been actually studied by anyone for hundreds of years.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 6th, 2012 at 3:44 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Universities/Buddhist Studies

Content:

Astus wrote:

SPLIT TOPIC: <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=102&t=6506&p=77069>

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 6th, 2012 at 5:07 AM

Title: Re: Translating the Tripitaka

Content:

Will said:

Astus: most of them have not been actually studied by anyone for hundreds of years. An embarrassment of riches is no excuse for indifference, now or in the past. If Buddhists long ago and now ignored many texts it is their and our loss.

By the way, I recall there are 5100 or so texts in the Chinese canon. If one subtracts the overlap of many scriptures being translated more than once, how many actual different titles are there; 3000 or...??

Astus wrote:

I think more of it as textual evolution. Those that are not found useful enough are left alone, the useful ones survive. Of course, usefulness in this context is quite difficult to determine, perhaps something along the line of religious and cultural trends.

I can't tell. But different translations are important sources actually as they were usually done in different eras from different sources, or even perhaps languages. Also, don't forget that a single text can be quite long, sometimes hundreds of fascicles.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 6th, 2012 at 5:09 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Universities/Buddhist Studies

Content:

Mr. G said:

Perhaps Honen was the last determined one to do so? It's said he read the Tripitaka 5 times.

Astus wrote:

I think you know the difference between hagiography and history. It is also a matter of what Honen had as the canon.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 6th, 2012 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: Is Soto Zen Gradual?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'd add an important aspect regarding Dogen's career in his later years, the Daruma-shu disciples.

"A number of Daruma-shū adepts, following Ejō (1198-1280) had collectively joined Dōgen's community, and this new audience strongly affected Dōgen's teachings and sectarian identity as a Sōtō patriarch. The change is drastically reflected in Shōbōgenzō and its increasing criticism of Ta-hui, Nonin's alleged master, extending gradually to the entire Rinzai tradition."

(http://www.thezensite.com/ZenEssays/DogenStudies/DarumaShu_Dogen_Soto.html)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 6th, 2012 at 6:26 AM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

Beatzen said:

All this technical stuff makes my eyes hurt.

Astus wrote:

Bang... simple English killed the sophistry.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 6th, 2012 at 6:45 AM

Title: Re: Is Soto Zen Gradual?

Content:

Anders Honore said:

It's been a while since I read on it, but from what I recall, Daruma shu read almost like a caricature of the pop Zen clichés of the day.

Astus wrote:

In a sense it sounds like "pop Zen". You could say the same about a couple of other Zen groups, like Baotang, Hongzhou and Linji. However, I think that is just the surface. If you read a bit of what Faure says, Daruma-shu actually became mainstream under Soto label.

The more intellectual type of Zen with elaborate teachings, like those of Zongmi and Yongming, naturally could not obtain true popularity, and even those who knew about them and used their teachings, like Jinul and in the modern days Shengyan, used the methods of the more radical kanhua Chan. So it is rather a matter of balance between theory, rhetoric and practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 6th, 2012 at 4:29 PM

Title: Re: Is Soto Zen Gradual?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Regarding this "sudden" issue, I'd like to remind you all what Anders mentioned before, that it is more like "immediate", and the temporal meaning is just a small part of it. It is an immediate teaching because it is directly about the buddha-mind without any extra practices, and it is immediate compared to other Buddhist methods. How fast one actually attains liberation, that is a matter of personal abilities and not the teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 6th, 2012 at 5:04 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Universities/Buddhist Studies

Content:

Huseng said:

No, people won't read a lot of it cover to cover, but on the other hand many people would make use of parts of major texts. Just as now people don't normally read the whole translation of the Pali canon cover to cover, but make use of sections of it for citations and research.

Astus wrote:

I see your point and concur. We are fortunate at least in the sense that even if we don't have the canon in English, we have search engines to do the searching.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 4:36 AM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

Namdrol said:

One of the funny things that people say is that lower tantra is more suitable for general public. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Actually, in lower tantra there are many rites for attracting and seducing human and non-human woman, killing enemies, and so on.

The model for the four activities, pacifying, enrichment, power, and destructive rites, etc., come directly from kriya tantra. Kriya tantra is practiced for these siddhis specifically.

Astus wrote:

What do you make of the similar magic techniques described in HYT like the Cakrasamvara Tantra? It becomes symbolic suddenly?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: Whose Buddhism is Truest?

Content:

Will said:

This will (hopefully) lead to the dying of sectarianism and the accepting of the plausibility that many Dharma heresies of the "lower" "mistaken" schools may have been genuine Dharma teachings direct from Buddha.

Astus wrote:

Historically, the winning sectarian arguments were not really based on texts. Chan took over in East Asia with the rhetoric of an outside scriptures lineage, Vajrayana is also organised around personal contacts. Social control of religious organisations requires social networking, those who care about books remain hidden in the libraries. Neither political rulers nor common people (lay or monastic) care much about philological and theoretical issues. Miracle making and big words, these work.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 11:15 PM

Title: Orthodoxy in Vajrayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

What constitutes orthodoxy (including orthopraxy) in Vajrayana? What is its definition? Or is it that there are several definitions? What are they?

I find that faith is emphasised as an essential key to Vajrayana practice. However, is it based on pure faith in the tantras, the lineage and the guru, or there are objective criteria for what makes a teaching Vajrayana? What are the requirements of a lineage, transmission, treasure text? Is it possible at all to separate transmission from the teaching, or they implicitly require each other? What is the guarantee for a transmission to be true?

What would be good to have here are actual references in answer for the above questions, and then some extra discussion of them.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 11:30 PM

Title: Re: Japanese creating management model to attract Buddhists

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is no guarantee for what will actually work in the long run. So they have to try. Chan Buddhism started as a marginal movement of a handful of monastics. 700 years later it was the dominant Buddhist school. Nobody could have foretold that, neither the changes it needed to become the ruling doctrine.

Japanese Buddhism is still a living religion with diverse sects and communities. Maybe some schools will disappear in a few hundred years while new sects turn out to be major institutions eventually. The so called widespread "corruption of the Sangha" is not a new phenomenon at all but a necessary consequence of large churches.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 11:41 PM

Title: Re: Orthodoxy in Vajrayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thanks Namdrol for the initial input. You listed the major differences between sutra and tantra, but what are the fundamental doctrines that tantras have to accord with in order to be considered authentic? I think of something similar to the four seals and such.

You say the transmission is valid if the teacher is realised or if s/he has an unbroken lineage. I assume there are no verifiable proofs for either of that, are there? Is a lineage authentic as long as it originates from a realised master - like if Jigme Lingpa was realised, then he is the primary originator of a new lineage, and those following him are members of an authentic transmission?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2012 at 5:05 PM

Title: Re: Japanese creating management model to attract Buddhists

Content:

pueraeternus said:

It's rather difficult for Japanese Buddhism to flourish without reviving the Vinaya. Without it, the foundational base for a proper Sangha is missing. I am surprised it lasted that long and that there are powerful lines of transmission still alive. But it might not last another 2-3 generations.

Astus wrote:

I don't find it a definitive source of problems. Shinshu survived just fine throughout the centuries to become the biggest school in Japan. Japanese Zen could spread in the West quite well. It looks like that while there are parish priests everywhere who serve the community, there are a couple of monasteries with strict rules and training. Thus it became more stratified than a single group of ordained monks.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2012 at 8:03 PM

Title: Re: Energy from Buddhist perspective

Content:

Astus wrote:

Two questions:

1. What is energy in Buddhism?
2. How could there be anything constant when all is impermanent?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2012 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: Energy from Buddhist perspective

Content:

Astus wrote:

A "closed system" is only a hypothetical thing. It does not exist in reality. It'd mean an independent realm, a substance, a self.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2012 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: Shobogenzo & Commentary

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think those translations on the Soto Zen Text Project page are the best in English. (However, for some reason the website seems to be hidden in the last few weeks.)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 12th, 2012 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: Orthodoxy in Vajrayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

Anyone else with some further info?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 14th, 2012 at 7:32 AM

Title: Re: Energy from Buddhist perspective

Content:

catmoon said:

1. I'm using the definition of energy as one-half mass times velocity squared, and it's various equivalents.

Astus wrote:

My question was: "What is energy in Buddhism?" and not in modern physics, or anything else. I think that if this turns out to be a discussion on natural science, well, it's irrelevant to Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2012 at 1:32 AM

Title: Re: You know you're...

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here's a thorough one from Yongming Yanshou's Zongjinglu (tr. by Albert Welter):
I now present ten questions in order to form a framework [to test your understanding].

[1] Do you thoroughly understand seeing [one's] nature, as if delineating and contemplating phenomenal forms similar to someone like Mañjuśrī?

[2] In everything you do—whether encountering situations or dealing with externals, seeing phenomenal forms or listening to sounds, raising a foot or lowering a foot, opening the eyes or closing the eyes—do you illuminate the implicit truth [zong] and comply with Buddhism?

[3] Do you read the teachings of each age and the statements of former patriarchs and masters, listening deeply and unafraid, completely understanding the truth in all of their teachings and not doubting it?

[4] In response to different [types of] difficult questions and all manner of trivial queries, are you able to provide [answers] according to the four kinds of eloquent responses and completely resolve the doubts that others have?

[5] At all times and in all situations, does wisdom shine forth unhindered and does thought after thought pass perfectly, without encountering a single dharma that is able to cause obstruction, or being interrupted for even a single instant?

[6] In all the occasions that present themselves to you in the external realm, whether contrary or agreeable, good or bad, do you resist [the desire to] elude them [on the one hand] and are you always conscious of destroying [any attachment to] them [on the other]?

[7] Within the realm of the mind and its objects comprised of a series of one hundred dharmas, do you get to see the extremely subtle essence-nature and the original point of rising of each and every [dharma], without confusing them with the circumstances of birth and death and the organs of sense and their objects?

[8] Regarding the four types of behavior—walking, standing, sitting, and lying—do you address others respectfully and exercise restraint when replying? And when wearing clothes and eating food, performing and carrying out [tasks], do you understand the true reality of each and every grade [in rank]?

[9] When listening to claims that there are Buddhas or there are no Buddhas, there are sentient beings or there are no sentient beings, do you sometimes applaud them and sometimes refute them, sometimes agree and sometime disagree, with a firm unwavering mind?

[10] When you hear about how all the different kinds of wisdom are able to clearly fathom how nature and form complement each other, how li and shi are unhindered, how nonexistence and existence are one and the same phenomena and do not reflect the origin [of phenomena] itself, and how the thousand sages appear in the world, can you avoid doubting it?

Even if you have not actually attained merits like these, you will never conceive the inclination to trespass or deceive, or form ideas of self-indulgence or satisfaction in one's knowledge.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2012 at 4:45 AM

Title: Re: Western Buddhists, modernity and the European enlightenment

Content:

Beatzen said:

There is nothing wrong with modernity. It has nothing to do with zazen practice though.

If you sat zazen, all these opinions you hold about zen would exhaust themselves.

But, I take it you don't have any interest in zazen practice. And like any other philosophically sophisticated (compliment) Buddhist, the groundlessness of zen and its flexibility in terms of expression must seem inferior, incredulous or something. You're only looking at the patina of zen though.

Astus wrote:

This simplification of Zen to sitting meditation could be a modern phenomenon. It is right next to the concept of Zen as something mystical, ineffable and beyond comprehension (thank you DT Suzuki). By turning Buddhism to a secular-looking minimalist practice(!), it becomes a consumable product, even something scientists can research by putting wires onto people's head. But while it is true that Dogen confirmed zazen is the essence of Zen, following the tradition he learnt in China, overemphasising sitting meditation, or the practice of meditation itself, is turning a blind eye to all the works of Dogen, to the fact that Dogen's works was practically unknown until the 17th century in Soto Zen, to the fact that no Buddhist school has ever - not even today - consisted only of sitting meditation (actually, the practice of meditation is quite a neglected think even among monastics), and to the fact that the whole utilitarian-consumerist thinking is a modern idea.

Unmasking Buddhism by Bernard Faure is a must for all who want to think a bit about modern Western Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2012 at 7:30 PM

Title: Re: FPMT

Content:

Astus wrote:

What Ven. Huifeng has recommended is a good start. One should be familiar with general Mahayana before getting deeper into Chan. DDM's website has some free literature that you could read: <http://chancenter.org/cmc/publications/free-literature/>.

Then as some better introductions to Chan and Chinese Buddhism, you should also try these works:

Paul Williams: Mahāyāna Buddhism: The Doctrinal Foundations

Robert H. Sharf: Coming to Terms with Chinese Buddhism

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 19th, 2012 at 7:09 PM

Title: Re: You know you're...

Content:

Huseng said:

You should visit Komazawa University. There is a lot of modernism and self-identifying Zen Buddhists there and not so much zazen going on.

Astus wrote:

It might sound strange, but seated meditation hasn't been the focus of Zen in most of its lineages and teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 19th, 2012 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: Bodhisattva Hsuan Hua

Content:

Will said:

I am a monk from the Changbai (Eternally White) Mountains, a Chan cultivator from the Black Waters.

Astus wrote:

Then if we consider what Hsuan Hua meant as Chan practice, it's not that difficult. Although even this interpretation is still quite inclusive.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 20th, 2012 at 4:32 AM

Title: Re: James Low & Simply Being

Content:

Astus wrote:

Indeed, it is his straightforward manner of teaching that grabbed me in the first place. It is difficult to find teachers who don't just repeat the common terminology all the time. Perhaps it is also an advantage that he can teach directly in his native tongue, thus breaking down those cultural and linguistic difficulties.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 20th, 2012 at 5:55 PM

Title: Re: You know you're...

Content:

Huseng said:

Well, as I've said here before, I think Zen has largely been a literary movement.

Astus wrote:

Actually, if you think about, there's lot more to Zen than its literature. It has unique ritualistic aspects, organisational forms, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 20th, 2012 at 5:56 PM

Title: Re: Western Buddhists, modernity and the European enlightenment

Content:

Thug4lyfe said:

Isn't that the same thing what most other Mahayana schools are teaching? If all Dharma gates are equal, why does it sound like your trying to say Dzogchen is da best au? Know wat im sayin?

Astus wrote:

Sectarian thinking never becomes outdated.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 20th, 2012 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: The Sole Practice of Avalokitesvara For Liberation?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The idea of "exclusive practice" occurred with Honen and only in Japan. As you may know, in other countries, Pure Land practice involves many different methods. Guanyin is indeed a popular bodhisattva and there are practices with her, but it'd be strange to find an exclusivist branch.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 21st, 2012 at 12:19 AM

Title: Re: Big Mind, Big Money, Big Scam

Content:

Astus wrote:

I can't totally disagree with charging money for such sessions. In China (any practically everywhere else) monks had to go to kings, princes and officials to get appropriate support for entire monasteries and such. Today that is not the situation, but things still cost money. In the old times religious things were covered by the taxes paid to the state or directly to the church. In many countries today that is not even an option, or only a couple of locally important churches (Catholic, Calvinist, Lutheran, Paroslav, etc.) recieve such money from the state. Another historical example, Genpo roshi may have a Harley, in the old times (and in traditional countries) they have silk-brocade robes, golden statues, etc. It is a big illusion to believe that Buddhist organisations can miraculously function without material wealth, and with wealth comes corruption and other such things.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2012 at 3:46 AM

Title: Re: Ajahn Amaro tells a story about Venerable Master Hsü Yün

Content:

Astus wrote:

I assume there are quite a few (miracle) stories about Ven. Xuyun and the Communists. He's become a legendary figure.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, January 24th, 2012 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: Nikujiku Saitai Law (肉食妻帶)

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think it should be viewed as a matter of progress instead of "corrupting the Sangha". They simply removed legal punishment of monks who did not abide by ecclesiastical rules.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 26th, 2012 at 8:38 PM

Title: Re: Ajahn Amaro tells a story about Venerable Master Hsü Yün

Content:

Astus wrote:

These "schools" existed mostly on paper only and not in real life. It also begs the question, how a "school" is defined. Those "schools" which had actual organisational structure and governed monasteries (although never as the exclusive teaching being taught at such a monastery, but the leader(s) of the monastery belonged to that group) were the Tiantai (Tang, Five Dynasties, Song) and Chan (Hongzhou in Tang, Linji (and Caodong) since the Song); Huayan and Vinaya existed to a small extent, but only a few monasteries in the Song. But even these had no main patriarch, no "head of the school", as none of them were that organised. The only actual leader of any Buddhist school one could find in China is the emperor, and other political rulers around the many regions.

So, Ven. Xuyun was hardly a leader of anything, even if he was an outstanding figure in 20th century Chinese Buddhism, but there were others too, like Ven. Taixu and Ven. Yinguang.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, January 26th, 2012 at 9:23 PM

Title: Re: Ajahn Amaro tells a story about Venerable Master Hsü Yün

Content:

plwk said:

So Astus, besides the Emperor, what was the role and purpose of the National Master other than advising His Majesty on Buddhist related stuff or was it another puppet role?

Astus wrote:

Being a National Teacher/Preceptor is a rank, a recognition of one's achievement by the government. It doesn't mean that all National Teachers were remembered by history, actually, most of them were not.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 1:07 AM

Title: Re: A question of faith

Content:

Astus wrote:

As Mr. G said, compassion is essential to the bodhisattva path, buddhahood is perfect unbounded compassion. Indeed, not only buddhas care about your freedom from suffering, but all bodhisattvas and even many who have not yet become bodhisattvas, or Buddhists.

plwk,

Zen's "great doubt" is quite different from doubting Buddhist teachings, it is more like doubting one's illusory preconceptions and this conceptual reality.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 2:10 AM

Title: Re: Evidence for Design?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is no evidence of design. There is evidence of intelligence conceiving rules and a mystical designer.

Seriously, why not all these theists mention parasites, plagues, viruses and all the rest among the grand creations of an almighty benevolent god? "And God said, 'Let there be flesh-eating disease', and God saw that it was good."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 8:00 PM

Title: Re: The Original Doctrine and Discipline

Content:

Astus wrote:

Stories can be different as they are mostly irrelevant and in many cases could be simply made up to make a point regarding a rule or a teaching. The cardinal teachings are found in the same way in both the Nikaya and Agama collections. The rest is speculation.

https://books.google.hu/books/about/The_fundamental_teachings_of_early_Buddh.html?id=yLU-oZio9_oC&redir_esc=y

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: Matchmaking service gives Buddhist monks a boost...

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is a form of natural selection in religion too. Institutions that are not viable eventually die out.

In Europe one is free to join a Christian monastery or become a priest. But only few wants to, and not because it is expensive (it's mostly free).

BTW, are women allowed in Shingon to be heads of temple?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, January 28th, 2012 at 5:38 PM

Title: Re: Evidence for Design?

Content:

Astus wrote:

An unconscious intelligence? That is a bit absurd.

Taoist or any other mono-causal system is refuted by dependent origination.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, January 29th, 2012 at 8:38 PM

Title: Re: Ajahn Amaro tells a story about Venerable Master Hsü Yün

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm not clear on why Ven. Xuyun recognised Ven. Xuanhua as a teacher in the Guiyang school, but it is certain that the Guiyang lineage existed only for a short period of time between the 9th and 10th century. In the list of Xuanhua's transmission record we find Sanjiao Zhiqian (<http://authority.ddbc.edu.tw/person/search.php?aid=A019850>) from the Tang era. The one following him, Xingyang Ciduo (<http://authority.ddbc.edu.tw/person/search.php?aid=A019852>) in the <http://authority.ddbc.edu.tw/person/> is listed as a disciple of Baoci Deshao, who was the teacher of Sanjiao. Nevertheless, they all lived in the Tang era, while Xuyun lived a thousand years later. This kind of remote transmission (遙嗣) is not unheard of, but it's hardly person to person.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 1st, 2012 at 11:56 PM

Title: Re: Which is the biggest teaching?

Content:

Astus wrote:

You'll find the statement that "this is the best/highest/foremost sutra" in many Mahayana sutras. We could say that there is a strong inferiority complex within these texts. We can also say that different sutras were written/collected by different factions who tried to propagate their own teachings. We can do what later theorists did in Buddhism, categorise the sutras according to our taste and thus create a taxonomy, that way decide what sutras are to be taken symbolically and what literally. We can also say that all the sutras ultimately talk about the same thing - of course, we decide what that same thing is - and handle them accordingly. It is also an option to say what has been said before here, that people choose different sutras according to their own inclinations. These, and possibly even more, are existing and working ways of looking at the large variety of Mahayana sutras.

"Outside the mind there is no Lotus Sutra and outside the Lotus Sutra there is no mind."
(<http://terebeess.hu/zen/hakuin1.html#8>)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2012 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: Which is the biggest teaching?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is one major problem with the idea that "the teaching fits the mind" is that then one has to conclude that only stupid people believe in low level teachings while the smart ones follow the highest teachings. So, if you believe that X sutra/teaching is the best, you are stupid, because it is Z sutra/teaching that is the best and that's what I follow.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2012 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: Which is the biggest teaching?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Will, what I meant is that matching the teachings to the recipients' minds it becomes not just claiming that X doctrine is the best, but it adds a personal insult to it.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2012 at 4:44 AM

Title: Re: Which is the biggest teaching?

Content:

Will said:

Do you really think that the IQ scale or intelligence is the main factor that leads Buddha to target his teachings to "recipients' minds"? Does high intelligence = wisdom?

Astus wrote:

First, I don't equate IQ with intelligence, nor intelligence with wisdom. Second, being open to higher teachings is usually defined by one's karmic disposition, and only on a second level by one's wisdom and thirdly by intelligence. On the other hand, it is unlikely that somebody with a lower than average intelligence could study the Dharma in depth.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2012 at 6:51 PM

Title: Re: Uncontrived

Content:

Beatzen said:

But in zazen, we aren't doing such things. Steadying the mind on the breath in the tanden region, we empty our mind of its contents and relax into glimpsing our original face.

Astus wrote:

Where is this kind of seated meditation from? What text, which teacher?

Sitting down, focusing on breath, in the tanden region, emptying the mind of its contents, relaxing, glimpsing the original face.

Well, that's quite a complicated and restrictive practice with several steps to go through, not to mention understanding many foreign and obscure concepts. No doubt this is a possible form of seated meditation, but it's hardly uncontrived or unique/universal in Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 3rd, 2012 at 5:31 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

klqv,

I'm not sure what you're getting to. As a Mahayana path, those who follow the Zen methods aspire to be bodhisattvas and buddhas who liberate sentient beings. It is not the path of the small minded who want only to escape from the cycle of birth and death, but the way of those who realise the inseparability of samsara and nirvana.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 3rd, 2012 at 10:31 PM

Title: Re: What are 84000 teachings?

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://www.dhammadawheel.com/viewtopic.php?f=29&t=8813#p137154>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 4th, 2012 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: What are 84000 teachings?

Content:

Astus wrote:

DarwidHalim,

You are looking for something that does not exist. I gave the link because the very first post by Ven. Gavesako explains this. "Dhammakhandha" means simply "groups of teachings", like a stanza, or a sutta, however you like it. If you work really hard, you might come up with a unit that makes the Pali Canon (whichever version you use) to make 84000 such groups. But it's really pointless.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 4th, 2012 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: Evidence for Design?

Content:

Beatzen said:

There are many examples of unconscious intelligence. Take the cells of your body and the way they naturally intuit life-sustaining action.

The cells are not conscious of themselves, yet they "know" - similarly, a Buddha does not consciously think "I have attained enlightenment".

Astus wrote:

You call a biological function intelligence. In that sense, everything has intelligence as far as they have some function, and because whatever exists has a function, everything has intelligence. That makes the word "intelligence" pretty meaningless.

If the Buddha doesn't know that he is a perfectly enlightened being - although according to the scriptures he actually says he is one several times - he would be simply stupid and not enlightened.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 5th, 2012 at 5:59 AM

Title: Re: Which is the biggest teaching?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I specifically said "study the Dharma in depth", and I really meant study. There are of course many practices that does not require one to know anything about the teachings, or only the bare essentials related to that specific practice. It is no coincidence that devotional methods are what generally taught to the masses, because it is something easy to follow. And I'm not saying here that such practices are pointless or misguided. There are also many stories where people who followed simple devotional methods displayed miraculous things in their lives or even after their deaths. But if we consider those who transmitted the teachings to the next generation and had long term influence within a school or an area, they were people of great intelligence and solid education, and usually advantageous social background. Of course, realisation does not require studying the scriptures, nor does it require practising meditation, nevertheless, besides legendary saints, outstanding teachers always had both knowledge and experience. And that includes even Pure Land teachers.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 5th, 2012 at 6:41 AM

Title: Re: Uncontrived

Content:

Astus wrote:

In many Zen centres they carefully explain to you how to sit, how to walk, how to eat, how to bow, etc. And when it comes to what to do actually when you're supposed to meditate, that is, what to do with the mind, they can only say a few words like "just let it go", "only don't know", and such. I call this super-ritualistic and quite uninformative.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 11th, 2012 at 3:23 AM

Title: Zen Master Subul

Content:

Astus wrote:

A famous living Korean teacher, not so known outside his homeland.

Website with teachings and poems:

<http://www.angukzen.org/English/Introductions.html>

DON'T SEEK NO-MIND

You will feel as if the heavy load were off your shoulders and cast off your skin
all of a sudden like a thunderbolt from the blue sky.
Who could express this joy of dharma you feel through the whole body?

However,
you should neither indulge in the feeling nor be dragged about by arising thoughts.

Don't wander in search of something in vain.
Time will be ripe enough of itself for everything to reveal itself as it is if you pass time like this.

On acquaintance
you are no-mind itself from the beginning.
Don't seek no-mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 12th, 2012 at 7:44 AM

Title: Re: Way to Buddhahood

Content:

Astus wrote:

It's called the "panjiao" 判教, classification of doctrines. Different schools had different versions of course.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 12th, 2012 at 10:22 PM

Title: Re: Way to Buddhahood

Content:

Will said:

Thanks Astus. Although I am interested in stages of practice, not so much "classification of doctrines". Any influential examples before 900CE; any translated into English?

Astus wrote:

There is Dushun's meditation manual, translated by T. Cleary in Entry into the Inconceivable. It uses stages of meditation practice in line with the classification of doctrines. Actually, the classification itself can be understood as what follows what, just as in lamrim.

Dharma Atma said:

Guys, is there any difference between words Buddhahood and Buddhahood? Or it's the same?

Astus wrote:

It's easy to tell the difference.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 13th, 2012 at 9:00 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist response to Jesuits in China

Content:

Huseng said:

Interesting analysis of Ouyi Zhixu's polemic against them. It is funny how he accused them of theft.

Astus wrote:

Interestingly enough, repentance is not something people associate with Buddhism here.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 16th, 2012 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: The Lotus Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Noah,

"It can be seen as an "energy" that is at work for the sole propose of producing Buddhas and Bodhisattvas."

Enlightenment is someone personally realising the ultimate nature of phenomena. It is hard to say that a very subjective experience should be imagined as an im/personal and separate energy creating beings.

In this sutra, the Buddha all but abandons skillful means to preach the truth of Ultimate Reality.

What is that "Ultimate Reality" he preaches about? The sutra doesn't really give an answer.

"It is meant to speak to the heart and be read aloud by like minded individuals to inspire the mind and heart of ultimate practice."

No argument here. It is an inspirational text, much like popular entertainment films with a religious concept.

"the fact that the process of Enlightenment, on a cosmic scale, is something we all are taking part in right now in our practice and, one "day" many millions of "years" from now we may be part of such an assembly"

It sounds very much like that one doesn't have to actually do anything but we are all automatically participants in this massive liberating event which we know practically nothing about.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 17th, 2012 at 7:42 PM

Title: Re: The Lotus Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Noah,

What you say, is this how you interpret the Lotus Sutra, or is it based on somebody else's teachings? I'm asking this because while you talk about compassion and buddhahood, the concepts in the end don't really match with what I understand as the basics of the bodhisattva path or Mahayana. For instance, how could it be a meaningful truth that there is only one vehicle? How does that make a difference? What is that vehicle about? And I could go on.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 18th, 2012 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: Are some Buddhists more equal than others?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The majority of the laity care only about the basic religious services, for them the monks function as clergy. Just as in society in general, men are preferred over women, this is reflected in the monastic community. Inequality is generated by the laity, by the society. The few who seek actual spirituality and are rather intellectual people don't take all forms of apparent sanctity at face value. The concept of equality is another thing, mostly a legal matter and such.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 18th, 2012 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: Are some Buddhists more equal than others?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Therefore a bhikkhu ... should not present himself as equal to, nor imagine himself to be inferior, nor better than, another."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/kn/snp/snp.4.05.irel.html>)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 18th, 2012 at 1:28 AM

Title: GigaPedia/Library.nu Shut Down

Content:

Astus wrote:

News on:

http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2012/02/15/librarynu-book-downloading-injunction_n_1280383.html

<http://torrentfreak.com/book-publishers-shut-down-library-nu-and-ifile-it-120215/>

<http://www.theverge.com/2012/2/16/2802060/library-nu-ifile-it-ebook-piracy-site-shut-down>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 18th, 2012 at 3:38 AM

Title: Re: Are some Buddhists more equal than others?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Equality requires a mind that sees all as equals. However, "equality" itself is meaningless. It should be defined the equality of what one talks about. Human relations go to different directions and considering some more important than others comes naturally from that. In secular life there are financial differences, in religious life there are spiritual differences, and in both forms of communities there are political differences. It is an immensely difficult thing to make a community functioning and harmonious. For such functioning humans generally use a hierarchical system where only people in specific positions have the power to make decisions about the community. Leadership could be changed to rules, however, rules require interpreters, and the need of interpretations create again a hierarchy of judges, lawyers, law enforcement, etc. It is an impossible idea to believe that the leaders are enlightened and saintly people.

A possible solution is perhaps a network of small egalitarian communities with properly trained members. Movement between communities is free, but the number of a single community is maximised. This is actually not much different from how Buddhist monasteries developed without any centralised power.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 18th, 2012 at 7:19 AM

Title: Re: The Lotus Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

I've been intrigued by the Lotus Sutra ever since I heard of it. For that reason I've read it several times in case I missed something. This was all because of its reputation in East Asian Buddhism. However, on its own I could not find anything that really came through as extraordinary. Basically that is the reason I asked what you and others find in it fascinating. But then we can just say it is not my type of teaching.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, February 18th, 2012 at 7:51 AM

Title: Re: Natural Ch'an

Content:

Astus wrote:

If we look at the actual Recorded Sayings of Layman Pang the story is a bit different.

居士一日在茅廬裡坐。驀忽云。難。難。難。十碩油麻樹上攤。龐婆云。易。易。易。如下眠床腳踏地。靈照云。也不難。也不易。百草頭上祖師意。
(X69n1336_p0134a18-20)

The Layman was sitting in his thatched cottage one day [studying the sūtras]. "Difficult, difficult," he said; "like trying to scatter ten measures of sesame seed all over a tree." "Easy, easy," Mrs. Pang said; "like touching your feet to the ground when you get out of bed." "Neither difficult nor easy," Ling Zhao said; "on the hundred grass tips, the great Masters' meaning." (https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Layman_Pang#cite_note-0)

"Natural Chan", well, a strange concept indeed. But the words "when I'm tired, I eat..." are more like what is in the Records of Linji, and it's a way of expressing the unconcerned and unattached mind, ordinary mind, which is another term for liberation and enlightenment. Nothing to do with "naturalistic" and unrestrained behaviour.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 19th, 2012 at 8:57 PM

Title: Re: Natural Ch'an

Content:

pung S said:

Astus, thanks for the differing translation. I am not sure if the translation I posted was the one that I read, but it was similar. The one you provided clears things up a little bit at least. So, if you know, would it be safe to say that Ven. Hsu Yun changed it when he gave this teaching; or that the translator of the book changed it when it was published? I was not sure if it had anything to do with "naturalistic" or unrestrained behaviour. I was thinking more along the lines of what is commonly referred to as "natural talent." In other words, in this story, was Ling Zhao the Ch'an equivalent of a violin prodigy or a child-athlete? I am thinking this is not the case.

Astus wrote:

Stories change easily by retelling and occasionally by translating it. Of course, it'd be good to see Xuyun's Chinese original too, if there is any.

No natural talent, only good or bad karma (almost the same). But Zen can be realised by anyone regardless of age. It is only a matter of attitude and circumstances.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 19th, 2012 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: The Lotus Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Noah,

"Not being critical and letting this sutra just communicate to your heart is the way to take this one, I think."

This could be said about any sutra. One can be devoted to any text, statue, idea, whatever. And it happened and happens quite often. Such faith requires no reason, no arguments, and usually it has none. But that attitude leaves no space to discussion, to criticism, to analysis, thus it is not something debatable on a forum. Of course, debate is only one form of communication, and sharing information does not require it. But, as you are well aware of this, every sutra has a wide range of interpretations. Telling which one is useful or valid needs some comparing and reasoning. The question is whether it remains a calm discussion on confrontation of views, or a heated and even violent repetition of personal remarks. Obviously, the second one leads to nothing good.

"It is a text that spearheaded the transformation of entire societies and cultures of people that had no previous experience with the Dharma."

I can recall no occasion in the history of Buddhism where the Lotus Sutra was the first Buddhist text to be introduced to a culture or that it had a significantly larger influence on a culture than other Buddhist teachings. As a matter of fact, only Nichiren Buddhism emphasises the Lotus Sutra to the level of exclusiveness, while Tiantai and Tendai are more rounded doctrines where they use certain concepts from the Lotus Sutra itself to classify the other teachings. Nichiren Buddhism, however, is only one of the smaller traditions in Japan making it less influential than several other schools.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 19th, 2012 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: The Lotus Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Rory,

"In general, all the Dharmas of the Thus Come One, all the sovereign spiritual powers of the Thus Come One, all the secret storehouses of the Thus Come One, all the extremely profound deeds of the Thus Come One are all proclaimed and revealed in this Sutra."

While the sutra says so, it does not actually lists and explains all those things. Also, there are quite a few other Mahayana sutras stating practically the same thing about themselves, to the level that we can say it is a common Mahayana theme.

"The Sutra proclaims that Shakyamuni Buddha is eternal, that the other buddhas are his replica bodies, that all previous paths are replaced by the One Vehicle, that all things are essentially equal, that beings can attain buddhahood."

The idea that all buddhas are eternal are said in other sutras, although it is true that the Lotus Sutra stands out as a major text to re-emphasise the importance of Shakyamuni. The teaching of one vehicle are also found in other sutras, and the universality of buddha-nature is more prominent in the Nirvana Sutra.

"Not just people, animals and even grasses and trees."

The idea of enlightenment of insentient beings is very much a Chinese concept that is unknown to Indian and other Mahayana schools, also not found stated in the sutras, while at the same time it is proclaimed that only sentient beings possess buddha-nature. A longer discussion of this by Robert H. Sharf:
http://kr.buddhism.org/zen/koan/Robert_Sharf-e.htm.

"Also it contains the buddhahood of a female, the Dragon King's daughter, so important."

As a matter of fact, before the attainment of buddhahood there happens a transformation into a male bodhisattva. Thus it is not easy to argue from the Lotus Sutra that there can be woman buddhas.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, February 19th, 2012 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: The Lotus Sutra

Content:

Will said:

They clarify that "proclaiming and revealing" mean only to one who "upholds" the sutra, through their diligent practices. The lines above do not mean there is a printed list in the sutra.

Astus wrote:

Good point. Another instance of the repeated statement that the Lotus Sutra is the best sutra. I actually find it interesting how a whole sutra can be mainly about its own praising.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 20th, 2012 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: The Lotus Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Noah,

Good. Now we can then turn back to the sutra itself instead of discussing personal matters.

"Then the assembly there all saw the daughter of the nāga king instantly transform into a man, perfect the bodhisattva practices, go to the vimalā world in the south, sit on a jeweled lotus flower, and attain highest, complete enlightenment, become endowed with the thirty-two marks and eighty excellent characteristics, and expound the True Dharma universally for the sake of all sentient beings in the ten directions."

Even before the perfection of the bodhisattva path the naga princess turned into a man. Why? As Shariputra reiterates the five hindrances, "Moreover, the female body has five obstructions. The first is the inability to become a great Brahma. The second is the inability to become Śakra. The third is the inability to become Māra, and the fourth is the inability to become a universal monarch (cakravartin). The fifth is the inability to become a buddha. How can you with your female body quickly become a buddha?" Although it seems that the intention of the sutra is to refute this as a lower view, actually it explicitly says that the naga princess transformed into a man. So it actually confirms it.

In the 23rd chapter it is also said, "If there is any woman who hears and holds to this chapter 'Ancient Accounts of Bodhisattva Bhaiṣajyarāja,' she will never be reborn with a female body." Why? Because it considers male body to be better.

On the other hand, in the Vimalakīrti Sutra the essentialist view of sex is clearly refuted. "The goddess said, "Śāriputra, if you were able to transform this female body, then all females would also be able to transform themselves. Just as Śāriputra is not female but is manifesting a female body, so are all females likewise. Although they manifest female bodies, they are not female. Therefore, the Buddha has explained that all dharmas are neither male nor female."

The Nirvana Sutra actually talks about how Shakyamuni was also a female buddha, "I also manifest myself in Jambudvīpa as a female Buddha. People see this and say that it is strange that a female should attain unsurpassed Enlightenment. The Tathagata, after all, has never once been a female. In order to subdue people, I manifested as a female." And the Nirvana Sutra also points to a transcendental meaning of male and female (after a series of degrading remarks on females), "If one does not know the Buddha-Nature, one cannot be called a man. Why not? Because one does not realise that one has the Buddha-Nature within. Any person who does not realise that he has the Buddha-Nature is a woman. If he does so realise, he is a man. If any woman knows that she has the Buddha-Nature, she is a man."

It is true that the Lotus Sutra promises the attainment of buddhahood to practically everybody. However, it is neither a clear statement of universal buddha-nature, nor is it a proclamation that there are actually buddhas in female form.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 20th, 2012 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama's Solution to Overpopulation

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Globally, the growth rate of the human population has been declining since peaking in 1962 and 1963 at 2.20% per annum."

(https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Population_growth#Human_population_growth_rate)

It seems that the largest growth rate is in underdeveloped countries

(https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/File:Population_growth_rate_world_2011.svg). So the solution is not really in some form of forced childlessness but proper development both economically and culturally.

BTW, China's "one child policy" results in excessive number of male children, which is not a good thing at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 20th, 2012 at 5:34 PM

Title: Re: The Lotus Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

"How can you say that the Lotus Sutra is "not a clear statement of universal Buddha-nature"? This kind of statement can only come from not understanding the text. The fact of Buddhahood as the "final goal" of the Bodhisattva path, which is available to anyone to tread, is THE POINT of the Lotus Sutra. Why it is so important that ALL vehicles are in essence the 1 vehicle is....this makes the whole idea of being a Buddha (Buddha-nature) accessible to all beings."

Do you know a single passage in the sutra where it says that all beings without exception has buddha-nature?

The teaching of the one vehicle means that whoever started practice, whether as a sravaka, pratyekabuddha or bodhisattva, will all eventually attain finally buddhahood. But, this does not include those who have not started on any of the paths, the so called icchantikas, who are without any root of goodness. And this is the difference between saying that there is only one vehicle or every being has buddha-nature.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 20th, 2012 at 11:30 PM

Title: Re: The Lotus Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Good points Jikan. It is for those reasons that it is often quoted by a large number of teachers in different schools.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, February 21st, 2012 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: GigaPedia/Library.nu Shut Down

Content:

Astus wrote:

Copying sutras and other texts have been a major merit making activity among Buddhists. Digital media simply makes it easier to gain merit by spreading the teaching.

You can even roll a prayer wheel from home (Hungarian site, no English, button is at the bottom of the homepage, you can also leave a message above it):

<http://www.imamalom.hu/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 22nd, 2012 at 7:27 AM

Title: Re: Natural Ch'an

Content:

Astus wrote:

Never just read. Read with wisdom.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 22nd, 2012 at 5:15 PM

Title: Re: The Lotus Sutra

Content:

rory said:

so let's see: ichinen sanzen, somoku jobutsu, sokushin jobutsu all derived from the Lotus Sutra.

Astus wrote:

It is important to make a difference between what are actually stated in the sutra itself, and what are the creations of commentators. For instance, the idea of buddhahood in this body became prominent in Japan and it was argued from two different perspectives using different scriptural sources. Since the Lotus Sutra was already well known in China and the concept of buddhahood in this body was not really used, it's hard to say that it is in the Lotus Sutra, but rather Saicho used the Lotus Sutra to back up this idea.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 22nd, 2012 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: The Lotus Sutra

Content:

Tatsuo said:

Where did you get the idea, that Nichiren Buddhism is one of the smaller traditions in Japan?

Astus wrote:

What I meant is that it is among the smaller ones among the big traditional churches. I didn't mean it's like some new religion with a few thousand followers.

Here's some statistics (<http://kaimyo.net/butu/>):

Shingonshu has 12,000 temples and 13.8 millions followers.

Shinshu has about 20,000 temples and 13.3 million followers.

Sotoshu has 15,000 temples and 6.9 million followers.

Tendaishu has 4,200 temples and 6.9 million followers.

Jodoshu has 8,000 temples and 6.5 million followers.

Nichirensu has 5,200 temples and 3.3 million followers.

More statistics with all the sub-schools: <http://www.kohzansha.com/datalink.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 22nd, 2012 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: The Lotus Sutra

Content:

Aemilius said:

I am astonished, are the Zen schools then a small minority ?!

Astus wrote:

Zen schools (Soto + Rinzai + Obaku) have about 20,000 temples throughout Japan and 8.7 million followers. But of course, if you compare that to the 128 million population of Japan, it is not so big, only 6.8%. Not to mention that these official numbers don't say much of actual religious practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 23rd, 2012 at 4:03 AM

Title: Re: Thich Nhat Hanh: Reading Suggestions?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm not TNH expert, but in his "The Heart of the Buddha's Teaching" he teaches on many basic Buddhist concepts and shows his way of looking at them.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 23rd, 2012 at 5:03 AM

Title: Re: Thich Nhat Hanh: Reading Suggestions?

Content:

Astus wrote:

He also has a commentary on the teachings of Linji Yixuan: "Nothing to Do, Nowhere to Go", if you want to look at his way of interpreting Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 23rd, 2012 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: The Lotus Sutra

Content:

Tatsuo said:

So together with Tendai, which has also high regards for the Lotus Sutra, more 1/3 of the traditional Buddhist schools consider the Lotus Sutra as their central text. And this without counting in the various Nichiren related "new religions"! So the Lotus Sutra was and still is enormously popular in Japan.

Astus wrote:

It is very interesting how these statistics turned out. Well, so it is then.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, February 23rd, 2012 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: The myth of the eight-hour sleep

Content:

Astus wrote:

This idea of sleeping in two sets makes sense of midnight prayers/meditations at least.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, February 24th, 2012 at 1:22 AM

Title: Re: Thich Nhat Hanh: Reading Suggestions?

Content:

pung S said:

Astus, have you read this? Would you say that this is not only TNH's interpretation of Zen, but also a good look at Vietnamese Zen in general?

Astus wrote:

I have read chapters, but never grasped my attention enough to finish it, so it stays on the shelf. But others may like it very much.

I wouldn't call a single man a good source of looking at a whole country's Buddhism, not to mention that TNH is a very creative and innovative teacher (this is not criticism).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 27th, 2012 at 5:28 AM

Title: Re: How Germany Became Europe's Richest Country

Content:

Astus wrote:

An interesting discussion how people see their and others' country. From my limited perspective, Germany achieved its status through its own people's will to work. I don't really know how it was in Hungary before the second half of the 20th century, but in the Socialist era people learnt how best to evade doing their job and get the highest benefits from the state/government. Tax evasion today is normal, only those few who work for larger (multinational) companies pay the full extent of income tax. Cheating is "normal" in this culture on every level, from school exams to governmental macroeconomic statistics. There is a significant number of the population who turned pensioners at an early age (around their 40s) based on false medical papers, while the full number of pensioners is one third of the whole population (not an unknown problem in Europe of course).

What is the most fascinating of all is that no matter where one lives, there are problems one sees there. And certain other countries always look lot better than one's own. Perhaps about a month ago there was a BBC report on Italian young people wanting to move abroad for better opportunities. I'm sure for those Italians their country is not a wonderful place. On the other hand, for the Romanians who go to Italy for menial jobs and the refugees from Africa it is the land of their dreams.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, February 27th, 2012 at 6:44 PM

Title: Re: Understanding SHINJIN by Paul Roberts

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here's a short correspondence with Al Bloom on this issue:

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=60&t=1084&start=60#p8252> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, February 29th, 2012 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: A "Christology" of Amida Buddha

Content:

Astus wrote:

The issue has been resolved by the doctrine of the three bodies (trikaya) long ago.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 5th, 2012 at 10:20 PM

Title: Re: Complete Works of Sheng Yen

Content:

Astus wrote:

No new translations there in the last few years. Unfortunately, there are quite a few books that are not uploaded there, like those about huatou and mozhao practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 8th, 2012 at 8:20 PM

Title: What is the Point of Tegal?

Content:

Astus wrote:

What are the reasons for Tegal practice? What does it help in? How is it better than, or complement, Trekcho?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 8th, 2012 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: What is the Point of Tegal?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thanks Jax, it's a great summary. So Tegal is a (group of) special method(s) to enhance the presence of rigpa, thus strengthening Trekcho?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 8th, 2012 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: What is the Point of Tegal?

Content:

Jax said:

All Dzogchen "methods" have only one goal: to enhance and stabilize the presence of Rigpa in experiential consciousness.

Astus wrote:

Then why the methods? Shouldn't abiding in non-dual awareness be sufficient? Just as Garab Dorje's three statements say.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 10th, 2012 at 1:37 AM

Title: Re: What is the Point of Tegal?

Content:

Jinzang said:

Because of our strong habituation, it is difficult to see through dualism and abide in non-dual awareness. This is true even after the initial opening. So one uses special methods, like the Six Yogas to complement mahamudra or Tegal to complement Trekcho. This is why tantra is considered a fast path, because it speeds up the process. Otherwise mahamudra/trekcho would be more or less the same as sutra practice.

Astus wrote:

Interesting. They explain the nature of mind as complete with the three bodies and needs no improvement. Of course, that doesn't mean there is no need for practice. But what is strange to me is that compared to "By not altering it from being as it is, The state of buddhahood is now spontaneously present." and "The conduct is nondoing and the fruition beyond adopting and discarding.", I find that, however natural those visions are, all the techniques and instructions are extraneous. Comparing this to Mahamudra teachings, the Six Yogas can be complementary, but they are not necessary nor are they the next step.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 10th, 2012 at 7:04 AM

Title: Re: Uncontrived

Content:

LastLegend said:

I watched a video yesterday that explained to me Zen is one mind if you sit, eat, or walk without being distracted then that is Zen. Zen is meditation in this sense. Meditation is to abandon grasping.

Astus wrote:

Must have been a good video.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 10th, 2012 at 6:05 PM

Title: Re: What is the Point of Tegal?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thanks for the replies, it was very helpful.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 12th, 2012 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: Sutra's

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are many kinds of sutras and different Zen traditions take different sutras as their source. Here is a non-definitive list of those that are available in English.

The common sutras among the different lineages: Vimalakirti Sutra, Diamond Sutra, Lotus Sutra, Avatamsaka Sutra, Nirvana Sutra

Sutras that are important mostly in China and Korea: Perfect Enlightenment Sutra, Shurangama Sutra, Vajrasamadhi Sutra

Treatises of great importance: Mahayana Sraddhotpada Shastra, Mahaprajnaparamita Shastra (partially translated)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 14th, 2012 at 12:19 AM

Title: Re: Why the Buddha banned booze.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Buddhism is not exempt for the religious and purist zealots. When someone teaches about how alcohol/meat/etc. is evil and impure on its own, because of being what it is, that is a substantialist and extremist argument. It is another thing that people who care little about the details - i.e. the majority - tend to simplify everything, and it's easier to say not to drink at all and alcohol is bad than allowing alcohol but warning about the bad effects of intoxication. Also it should be noted that drinking is not included in the 10 wrong deeds.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 14th, 2012 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: Why the Buddha banned booze.

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Okay, if the whole frackin' assembly, including the Buddhas closest students and aids, Arhats, once returners, etc... were incapable of deciding which precepts should go and which should remain on what basis do us ignoramuses decide?

Astus wrote:

It is quite an assumption that every rule existed right at the death of the Buddha. Rather, there was some development over time, although the basics are pretty uniform in the different Vinayas. By the way, the Pratimoksha explicitly says what are the major and the minor rules.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 14th, 2012 at 1:45 AM

Title: Re: Why the Buddha banned booze.

Content:

Huseng said:

Maybe what I'm suggesting is only suitable for bodhisattvas with knowledge of skilful means.

It isn't really suitable for śrāvakas who abide by rules for the sake of personal liberation above all else.

Breaking the rules to help others is something bodhisattvas can and often should do. A lot of the literature points to this.

Astus wrote:

I find that sravakas in Mahayana are mostly caricatures of religiously/spiritually immature people. But yes, the Bodhisattva Vinaya Sutra does say what you do.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, March 14th, 2012 at 7:59 AM

Title: Re: Self-immolation is not against religious tradition

Content:

Astus wrote:

Self-immolators were listed in collections about outstanding monks in China. It is a very old practice in Buddhism.

Book review: <http://www.h-net.org/reviews/showrev.php?id=24572>

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 15th, 2012 at 6:20 PM

Title: Re: Simple question about Pure Lands

Content:

Last Legend said:

Exist and not exist at the same time that's when one has become a complete Buddha.

qweqwe said:

Of course Buddhas live forever!

Astus wrote:

There are four extreme views:

the view of " existence "

the view of " non-existence "

the view of " existence and non-existence "

the view of " neither existence nor non-existence "

However, in common language we use all four, and for the sake of simplicity we can say that the buddhas exist, the pure lands exist, just as humans, animals and others exist. But it's beneficial to understand that the teachings are not meant to be clung to like dead statements but used for the benefit of oneself and others. And when they are not conducive to peace and kindness we know we are doing something wrong.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 16th, 2012 at 5:28 PM

Title: Re: Taego Lineage Seminary

Content:

Haemin said:

This is incorrect. I've just confirmed this with the Bishop, Venerable Dr. Jongmae Kenneth Park. The Taego and Jogye orders follow the same pratimoksa (Caturvagga Vinaya of the Dharmaguptaka--which is in use in the Chinese and Vietnamese traditions as well). However, celibacy is optional for men in the Taego Order. There are 250 bhikkhu precepts, 348 bhikkhuni precepts, and 10 samanera precepts. Also, both schools adopted the Indraraja Sutra that contains 10 bodhisattva vows and 48 lesser precepts. Contrary to some misconceptions, the Taego Order does not use bodhisattva vows as the basis of its monastic ordinations. So there's just that one difference: celibacy.

Astus wrote:

Then it is strange how they can explain committing a parajika offence being acceptable. Although considering that monks can even act as soldiers it is not that outstanding.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 17th, 2012 at 6:41 PM

Title: Re: "Location" of mind in Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Certain late rNying ma pa tantras even go further in localizing the sems and ye shes in the body. Ye shes resides in the heart whereas sems is in the lung."
("The Primordial Basis as Having a Physical Presentation" in The Great Perfection by S.G. Karmay, p 185ff)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 19th, 2012 at 2:52 AM

Title: Re: Taego Lineage Seminary

Content:

Haemin said:

It isn't a parajika because male Taego clergy aren't required to take a vow of celibacy to begin with. It's only a parajika if you take a vow of celibacy and then break it. Of course, more traditional orders would most likely not recognize non-celibate Taego clergy as bhikkhu.

Astus wrote:

It is more than just a single vow involved in being non-celibate, like the first four sanghadisesa precepts. It is quite a heavy change in the common Pratimoksha of 250 vows. Also, if we consider that many precepts of the minor vows are not observed because they are outdated, celibacy is one of the few things that can still be upheld. On the other hand, it can be argued that since there are precepts that are irrelevant and generally has not been observed for a long time (e.g. eating only before noon), one could as well say that celibacy is not that important. However, I'm not sure if the laity is OK to support not just a monastic with minimal needs but a whole family or even families who make little contribution to the community.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 19th, 2012 at 6:37 AM

Title: Re: Taego Lineage Seminary

Content:

Haemin said:

For centuries throughout the Buddhist world, the official pratimoksha has not been the list of rules actually observed by the sangha. Each tradition, and sometimes individual monasteries, have had their own rules that have actually governed monastic behavior. I've heard this from monks and nuns from more than one tradition and from scholars as well. It has also been my own observation over the years.

Astus wrote:

Ordination is about taking up the precepts, and those precepts are the sramanera, bhikshu and bodhisattva vows in the triple ordination system. Thus technically those who participate actually vow to uphold them. Local monastic rules and further vows are only extra. It is OK to say that ordination is mere formality and the reality is different, however, that is the same as saying being a monk is a mere formality too. So perhaps some other definitions are required then.

Haemin said:

How are you defining "contribution to the community"? Personally, I feel that teaching the Dharma and providing for the spiritual needs of the community (through leading communal holidays, funerals, memorial services, etc...) contributes a great deal to the community.

Astus wrote:

What I meant is that while the cleric does serve the community, his family does not and thus they are a burden on the supporters. Self-supporting monks are a different matter. But again, if a monk earns a living, what makes him a bhikshu, a beggar? It's not that I don't understand the difficulties involved in Western Buddhism, but making money (not to mention having a family) is quite the opposite of renouncing the world and living on donations. It is not true that one can't live on donations in the West, since many unfortunate homeless people do exactly that.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 19th, 2012 at 5:35 PM

Title: Re: Taego Lineage Seminary

Content:

Haemin said:

Based on what do you assert this? I've seen no such problems as this. I'm a celibate monk and I don't feel jealous toward my non-celibate brothers and sisters in my own order or any other.

Astus wrote:

I assume you know about the incident when the Jogye Order monks took back temples by force from the married clergy after the Japanese left Korea.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, March 20th, 2012 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: essential texts

Content:

Astus wrote:

Generally for Zen you can read classical Zen works (Bodhidharma, Huineng, Mazu, Huangbo, Zongmi, etc.) and basic Mahayana sutras of the tradition like the Vimalakirti, Diamond, Perfect Enlightenment, Shurangama, any of the Prajnaparamita, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 22nd, 2012 at 6:59 AM

Title: Re: Zen meditation and Right Concentration

Content:

Astus wrote:

Developing concentration is very beneficial in both inside and outside of Buddhism. That's Right Concentration if you do it in a Buddhist context following the relevant instructions. Zen, while a Buddhist tradition, is a direct path of what is called prajnaparamita, or buddha-nature. In Zen there are no gradual stages - well, there are differences between lineages and teachers within Zen, but let's not go into that right now - but it is about immediately realising the enlightened mind. One can of course, and is advised, to use techniques to develop a certain level of mental peace within Zen, however, that is more of a preliminary practice before one can actually come to the point of doing Zen practice, which is no-practice. So, the two can be related, but they are not the same.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, March 24th, 2012 at 8:22 PM

Title: Re: The Big Fix - Official Trailer

Content:

Astus wrote:

These films always make me think that it's only a conspiracy theory drama and nothing more. I guess it's my prejudice against films versus books.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 26th, 2012 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Five Mountain Zen Order & Paul Lynch

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm not saying that the FMZO or Lynch is OK or not OK. But questioning their validity on the basis of personal relationships within a Buddhist community is pretty much bureaucratic. Why not ask and analyse if what they actually teach is correct or not? Isn't that what should matter?

A good point by Ven. Chong Go:

<http://wakeupandlaugh.wordpress.com/2010/08/23/authority-and-transmission/>

In the comments, where Lynch mentions the transmission between Ko Bong and Seung Sahn, he replies, "This type of transmission was almost never heard of before the era of the Japanese occupation, and has since basically disappeared."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, March 26th, 2012 at 2:23 AM

Title: Re: zen daily life

Content:

Astus wrote:

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Zhiyi>, the actual founder of the <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tiantai>, taught meditation in the form of Four Samadhis (<http://www.buddhistdoor.com/oldweb/bdoor/archive/nutshell/teach73.htm#t733>, <http://www.tientai.net/lit/mksk/v2outline.htm>) that consists of sitting, walking, sitting and walking, neither sitting nor walking. The fourth of this means practice without restrains, practising in all circumstances. Zen is very much like this fourth samadhi, while other methods - not just sitting and walking meditation, but sutra recitation, prostrations, confession, etc. - are preliminaries, gradual and even unnecessary (or rather optional).

What does Zen practice mean? It is simply abiding nowhere, not grasping concepts and emotions, but also not rejecting them. It is working and functioning without attachment, so it is the prajnaparamita of every bodhisattva. It is the manifestation of buddha-mind, the true nature of this very mind reading now, without being hooked up on ideas of self and other. Zen is no different from life itself, it simply drops all illusions about what life should and should not be.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, March 29th, 2012 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: Incest

Content:

Astus wrote:

Incest is an immoral act in Buddhism, and it is part of the third lay vow that one does not engages in such an act.

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "There are these two bright qualities that safeguard the world. Which two? Conscience & concern (for the results of unskillful actions). If these two bright qualities did not guard the world, there would be no recognition of 'mother' here, no recognition of 'mother's sister,' 'uncle's wife,' 'teacher's wife,' or 'wife of those who deserve respect.' The world would be immersed in promiscuity, like rams with goats, roosters with pigs, or dogs with jackals. But because these two bright qualities guard the world, there is recognition of 'mother,' 'mother's sister,' 'uncle's wife,' 'teacher's wife,' & 'wife of those who deserve respect.'"

Those in whom concern & conscience are not always found have strayed from the bright root, are headed to birth & death. But those in whom concern & conscience are rightly established always, who are mature in the holy life: they are calm, their further becoming ended.

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/kn/iti/iti.2.028-049.than.html#iti-042>)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 30th, 2012 at 7:11 AM

Title: Re: Is My Job Wrong Livelihood?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Two explicitly mentioned business among the others in the list of forms of wrong livelihood are dealing with weapons and poisons. Both are meant to harm beings. So, even if one is not a butcher or murderer himself, creating and selling means of murder is a type of wrong livelihood. That makes the case of training soldiers for battle another form of wrong livelihood. Note, however, that wrong livelihood is not equal to actually doing something evil, it is not the same as generating bad karma, especially as long as one does not condone and agree with evil acts.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 30th, 2012 at 7:57 PM

Title: Re: Is My Job Wrong Livelihood?

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

In any situation, there is no absolute right and absolute wrong.

Astus wrote:

Buddhism has quite clear ethical standards, with its basis in non-violence and compassion. Karma is not negotiable nor avoidable. Excuses only strengthen ignorance about it.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, March 30th, 2012 at 11:30 PM

Title: Re: Is My Job Wrong Livelihood?

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

Everything is relative. Relative to your motivation.

Astus wrote:

Not exactly. Murder does not have good motivation, neither does war, theft, etc. So you get the ten wrong deeds of body, speech and mind. And it is quite misleading to say that enlightened beings are not affected by karma. It is intentional act that generates merits, with wisdom one makes infinite merits and so the form-body becomes. While it is stated by some texts that all the events in Shakyamuni's life were a teaching, a display, it was the show of causality regarding the illusion-body of a perfectly enlightened one, not to mention bodhisattvas and arhats.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 2nd, 2012 at 5:03 PM

Title: Re: Question: Errors on Buddhist Scriptures

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Bible has an immensely larger importance in Christianity than a single sutra in Buddhism. If you look at any of the canons - and there are many - you find many teachings of different sorts. Also, besides the Theravada claim for Pali, there are no sutras in the language of the Buddha, but different translations. And when it comes to English, it's another translation. However, while translators can make mistakes, it's not really the point. Buddhism is more than just texts. Plus, if you have doubts about a certain scripture, you can investigate it, once you have the necessary knowledge for that of course.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 2nd, 2012 at 7:55 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism and space

Content:

Astus wrote:

Nagarjuna says it all.

Know therefore that space
Is neither existent nor non-existent
Neither a characteristic nor characterisable
And that the other five are the same as space.
(MMK 5.7, tr. B.C. Bocking)

Therefore, space is not a thing;
it is not a non-thing;
it is not something characterized;
it is not a characteristic.
The other five elements too are similar to space.
(MMK 5.7, tr. S. Batchelor)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 3rd, 2012 at 4:08 AM

Title: Two Books by Ven Jian Liao

Content:

Astus wrote:

The basic purpose of meditation is to help one to recognize the nature of the Mind, to master the Mind and to become cognizant of the clarity of the Mind. A Mind that is not mastered is a Mind full of worries. Worries are created by an untamed Mind—thinking of what should not be thought of, or, vice-versa, not thinking of what should be thought of. Consequently, life cannot be lived to the fullest unless the Mind is tamed and mastered.

PDF's:

<http://www.vzmla.org/file/Chan.pdf>

http://www.vzmla.org/file/Essence_of_Life.pdf

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 3rd, 2012 at 6:46 PM

Title: Re: Two Books by Ven Jian Liao

Content:

Astus wrote:

"What is pure Mind? The Master says: "I am speaking to you, and you are listening to me. The capability to listen without discriminating, without the intervention of interpretation or judgment, is a capability of pure Mind."

If the Mind is judgmental and discriminating, then it can no longer be called pure Mind. It is the Mind of the ordinary person because it is controlled by attachments. Take for example the phenomenon of hearing. Some can hear sound and some cannot. The deaf are aware that they do not hear sound. This knowing is an immutable characteristic of Mind. The ability to be aware of the absence of sound in the deaf is no different from the ability to be aware of the presence of sound in normal people. This ability is inherent in all human beings. Adults as well as children have it. This Mind is formless, non-discriminative and it has neither beginning nor end. It can neither be created nor annihilated. All possess the same Mind, yet, due to distortion, the oneness of Reality fragments into duality. Therefore, different things are heard. This means that even though the same words are heard, the discriminating Mind interprets the words differently. Therefore, each one forms different notions and concepts based upon these very same words because of conditioning to a certain way of thinking. What is manifested by pure Mind (Truth) is compared to what has been altered by personal judgment or interpretation (subjective reality)."

(Jian Liao: Chan)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 3rd, 2012 at 10:52 PM

Title: Re: Zen meditation and Right Concentration

Content:

Astus wrote:

Right concentration is "samyak samadhi", in Chinese 正定 (zheng ding), while it is in the different dhyanas where "chan" is used (1st dhyana, 2nd dhyana, etc. - 初禪、二禪), however, this is not the meaning of the word as it is used for the Chan/Zen school, but only a common misunderstanding. In fact, Zen doesn't have much to do with meditation practice itself.

See the fourth chapter of the Platform Sutra on the subject of concentration (samadhi 定) and wisdom (prajna 智): http://www2.fodian.net/world/2008_04.html.

"Good Knowing Advisors, there are those who teach people to sit looking at the mind and contemplating stillness, without moving or arising. They claim that it has merit. Confused men, not understanding, easily become attached and go insane. There are many such people. Therefore you should know that teaching of this kind is a great error."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 4th, 2012 at 4:35 PM

Title: Re: Zen meditation and Right Concentration

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is the common practice of concentration where one focuses on a single thing, that is not what Huineng talks about. The meaning of concentration in the Platform Sutra is being free from phenomena. It says in the fifth chapter: "Not being confused inwardly is 'concentration.' --- The original nature is naturally pure, in a natural state of concentration. Confusion arises merely because states are seen and attended to. If the mind remains unconfused when any state is encountered, that is true concentration." This kind of concentration is not developed by any means but it is the natural state of buddha-mind. So in the fourth chapter Huineng says, "this Dharma-door of mine, from the past onwards, has been established from the first with no-thought as its doctrine, no-mark as its substance, and no-dwelling as its basis." Obviously, the common practice of concentration is a form of dwelling on a mark with a maintained thought.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 4th, 2012 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: Zen meditation and Right Concentration

Content:

Astus wrote:

seeker242,

I'm not saying that concentration in its common form is pointless. But it is not the concentration taught within the context of (high class) Zen, like the Platform Sutra. There are meditation teachers who even go in details about dhyanas, like Rev. Cheng Kuan's http://www.buddhistlibrary.org/en/displayimage.php?album=102&pid=85#top_display_media. And if you look at my first post here, I've referred to all the different methods there are. But, and this I find important, the Chan way is about seeing the nature of mind and not the myriad practices. It doesn't mean they can't complement each other, or that one has to choose between them. However, unless it is about directly realising the nature of mind, it is not specifically Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 5th, 2012 at 4:58 PM

Title: Re: Zen meditation and Right Concentration

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is a good question. What makes one see the nature of mind? The so called myriad practices are useful for sure in this case. The direct cause, however, is vipashyana meditation, as far as the gradual path is concerned. But in the case of Zen, there is directly pointing to the nature of mind, immediately severing conceptual attachments. Even what appears to be meditation is nothing but abiding not on a single thought, that is non-dwelling and no-thought. But, to put it back into the normal gradual context, this is simply the final level of vipashyana, prajnaparamita itself.

Still, it is not easy to find a teacher who actually instructs in seeing the nature. Most of them are just lost in techniques like sitting, bowing, contemplating a phrase, etc.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 6th, 2012 at 4:43 AM

Title: Re: Five Mountain Zen Order & Paul Lynch

Content:

jisahn108 said:

But if someone says they teach "Zen", then they should have credentials to allow them to do this. These will vary school to school, teacher to teacher. But generally its not unreasonable to expect them to have at least 15 years of practice experience, and certainly unequivocal authorization of their teacher or teachers. This isn't just "bureaucracy." This is the nature of the entire Zen and Buddhist system going back millenia. And this is true for many other spiritual and esoteric traditions. It's master to pupil.

If a person LIES about what there credentials are - well that's it, game over. I don't care what they say - it's based in manipulation and deceit. frak it. Go somewhere else. Next, please.

Also, there are a lot of Zen stories about how two students give the same response and one has "it" and one doesn't. "The tongue has no bone." Nor do a few words on a page. You have to know people by their deeds, their presence, and the patterns of behavior they leave in their wake. I say Lynch's are not very orderly, wise, or clear.

Astus wrote:

Credentials going back to millennia, that is no more than a myth. The whole lineage idea started with the goal to convince others of one's superior position, and lineages were forged again and again according to one's personal needs. Also, even if a new lineage starts up, there is zero guaranty that it will be maintained according to the founder's intentions even in the second generation, not to mention the third and those coming after it. On the other hand, it gives a fine excuse to abuse power, as it did happen again and again. It also doesn't stop anyone to spread adharma. So what is its worth?

There are Zen stories, sure. But first of all, stories are just what they are, neither facts nor proofs. And when there is something mystical beyond the comprehension of those poor uninitiated people, that is the point where it starts to stink. What qualifies people are their words and deeds, I agree. And there is not much room left then for ambiguous tales on who has one eye and who hasn't.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 6th, 2012 at 5:17 AM

Title: Re: Five Mountain Zen Order & Paul Lynch

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jikan,

I agree that that part could go on the negative side regarding Lynch. But what I am asking for is that before rejecting the whole person and his school, it would be only fair and sensible to actually look at what he talks about. It does not refute the Buddha that he was not from the brahmin caste, nor does it refute Lynch that there was a disagreement between him and his teacher. It is nothing more really than clinging to a mostly irrelevant point. Buddhist teachers - whatever lineage or tradition it is - should be measured by their Dharma, since that is what actually matters. So if people feel like criticising or defending Lynch, they should do that based on the right arguments. And not because it makes a difference for Lynch, since I assume it does not, but it makes this topic and this discussion board a lot more sensible, sane, and transparent place, not to mention that for refuting or proving a teaching requires some effort on the part of the members.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 6th, 2012 at 11:21 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist cosmology and the problem of the infinite task

Content:

Astus wrote:

If such reasoning held any sense, it would be actually true that https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Achilles_and_the_Tortoise#Achilles_and_the_tortoise.

However, in the above argument I see the flaw that it assumes one should go from an infinitely far away time to the present one, while actually where one is is indeed the present time, and it took no effort to reach it, since it was never away.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 10th, 2012 at 4:36 AM

Title: Re: Thich Nhat Hanh, Pure Land, & Zen practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

I find that the view of a mind only Pure Land is either for non-believers who cannot accept anything beyond their current world view, or for those with faith who can also understand the connection between mind and phenomena. But in the first case, there is little meaning of calling it a Pure Land practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 11th, 2012 at 4:10 AM

Title: Re: Thich Nhat Hanh, Pure Land, & Zen practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

The meaning of the mind only teaching is that all phenomena are mental phenomena, thus the concepts of inside and outside are mere terms. So speaking of Pure Land being inside or outside of the mind is pointless. That's it in brief.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 11th, 2012 at 6:29 AM

Title: Re: Five Mountain Zen Order & Paul Lynch

Content:

Astus wrote:

jisahn108,

This is the history of Zen lineages repeating all over again. Seung Sahn's lineage is only a little less problematic since he was a monk and came from Korea. Seongcheol, former head of the Jogye Order, had no lineage of his own, and it was not a problem.

Gyeongheo, reformer of Korean Zen from whom modern teachers claim succession, did not state a transmission for himself, so others came up with one later. Now that the situation is a lot closer and the sources are in English, faults with a transmission history can be more obvious. But, for instance, can you check in any way Master Jinje's lineage (Gyeongheo 경허 (鏡虛), Hyewol 혜월 (慧月), Unbong 운봉 (雲峰), Hyanggok 향곡 (香谷)), who is the current head of Jogye? Unless you know Korean and have access to the relevant sources, it's not really possible. So, as I said before, it is not the lineage that defines a teacher, but the teaching. Lineage is used not to guarantee any kind of quality, but to promote oneself. And that's what happens in Lynch's case.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 11th, 2012 at 4:44 PM

Title: Re: zen daily life

Content:

Astus wrote:

Taking the "awareness of the present" as the meaning of Zen is a common mistake. The present is no more relevant than the past or the future. What one should realise and keep is the buddha-mind, the mind without grasping, without self. This is no different from what is called the wisdom of selflessness and emptiness.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 11th, 2012 at 7:54 PM

Title: Re: Five Mountain Zen Order & Paul Lynch

Content:

Astus wrote:

jisahn108,

OK, we can say that while Lynch believes lineage is important, he doesn't have any solid support for his claim of transmission. From this we could infer that he tries to deceive people, or he simply makes use of the lineage idea to make his teachings more attractive. The view that Lynch is suspicious or wrong is based on at least two preconceptions: lineage qualifies a teacher, and Lynch has evil intentions by creating a lineage for himself. As McRae's second Rule of Zen Studies says, "Statements of lineage identity and "history" were polemical tools of self-assertion, not critical evaluations of chronological fact".

So if we put aside lineage as relevant and don't assume Lynch has sinister goals in being a teacher, what is left is to look at the teachings he actually spreads.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 12th, 2012 at 6:58 AM

Title: Re: Thich Nhat Hanh, Pure Land, & Zen practice

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

I think this question has been asked somewhere before -- but isn't rebirth in the Pure Land more or less analogous to the non-returner stage? That might give some added weight to TNH's interpretation, since being a non-returner (anagami) is defined in terms of mind state and not by some set of external circumstances. I mean, ultimately the task at hand has nothing to do with being in this place or that; it's about purification of mind.

Astus wrote:

It is not like an anagami for two reasons. Anagamis are sravakas and not bodhisattvas.

Those who are born in the Pure Land don't automatically possess any attainment beyond what they have already achieved before their birth, but they have to practise themselves there on the path of the bodhisattva in order to reach full liberation.

What is meant by being similar to a bodhisattva on the level of irreversibility (avaivartika) is that those born in the Pure Land will definitely attain buddhahood without any chance of falling back from the bodhisattva path.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 12th, 2012 at 7:09 AM

Title: Re: Thich Nhat Hanh, Pure Land, & Zen practice

Content:

Huseng said:

In my experience it is mostly Chan practitioners who hold such views. Many Chan practitioners also simultaneously do Nianfo practices as well, though they may not see it as a means to being reborn in the pure land.

This is actually necessary, otherwise if you believe that post-mortem Amitabha saves you from all your suffering, then there is no point to sitting on a meditation cushion for years attempting to achieve liberation. Better to just recite the Nianfo and feel content in having a saviour.

I suspect that is part of the reason why in Chinese Buddhism not many people seriously meditate or only do so sporadically (or not at all). If you believe Amitabha will save you, then there is little pressing need to cultivate yourself in meditation.

Thich Nhat Hanh's idea is appropriate to Chan practice as it encourages realistic practice rather than discouraging it. Pure Land practice as it is normally advocated (rebirth in the Pure Land due to Amitabha's grace) negates all need for meditation and yogic attainment.

Astus wrote:

The Pure Land doctrines were never against to meditative practices as far as I know. In fact, there are a great number of methods within the area of Pure Land praxis. The wish to be born in the Western Land of Peace and Bliss is not contrary to working on the bodhisattva path in this life, but they are actually the very same path. There are differences between teachers and groups in terms of what they emphasise, but under the banner of the Pure Land school you can find both hermits with unshakeable samadhi and common men with little understanding. And this is fulfilling the Mahayana idea of saving all sentient beings, regardless of their capacity for wisdom, meditation and meritorious deeds, as the Pure Land teachings address both high and low.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 12th, 2012 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: Thich Nhat Hanh, Pure Land, & Zen practice

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Pure Land doctrines were never against to meditative practices as far as I know.

Huseng said:

I'm not saying this.

I'm saying Pure Land ideology discourages meditation. It is unnecessary if you believe post-mortem Amitabha plucks you out of the sea of suffering. In that case, why bother trying to master the fourth jhana?

Astus wrote:

Most of the Pure Land teachers, especially outside Honen's heirs, teach the combined use of self-power and other-power. One works on oneself in order to gain a higher birth within the Pure Land, since there are 9 different levels explained by the sutras. Please check this topic: <http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=53&t=5650> (Seosan was an outstanding Zen teacher of 16th century Korea).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 13th, 2012 at 5:42 AM

Title: Re: Five Mountain Zen Order & Paul Lynch

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jisahn108,

Anyone can call him/herself a Zen teacher and claim whatever lineage they like. And if you say that he has lied about being an heir to this and that master, OK, that is bad. Unless, as I said before, you look at it as a skilful means to attract students to Buddhism.

"But real insight, call it zen or otherwise, has a literal gut aspect, and neither lynch, his heirs, or his ever changing series of orders, titles, colleges, seminaries, centers, monks or teachers seem totally digestable."

So what is that "real insight" you are missing?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 13th, 2012 at 6:43 AM

Title: Re: zen daily life

Content:

seeker242 said:

What exactly is the "buddha mind"? Does "Buddha mind" have a need to go trudging through past and projecting into the future? Why does the mind go trudging into the past and projecting into the future to begin with? Is it not grasping that causes that very activity to begin with? Why would a mind with no grasping need to conjure up the past or make some ideas about the future?

Astus wrote:

Buddha-mind is the fundamental knowing awareness that is empty of all substances but full of all functions. Thoughts about past, present and future things are all workings of normal thinking, otherwise one cannot either eat or shit, not to mention more complex deeds. What makes the difference between freedom and bondage is whether there is attachment to reified views about self and objects or not.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 13th, 2012 at 4:25 PM

Title: Re: zen daily life

Content:

Astus wrote:

Hope and fear, wish and worry, these are emotional troubles. But thinking about past and future events are just thoughts. Walking down the street, if one has no knowledge and perception of the direction, it's called being lost.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 16th, 2012 at 4:42 PM

Title: Re: Question about Zen School

Content:

Huifeng said:

But, as is probably well known on this Forum already, my perspective on "Zen" is not the usual Western (American?) one.

Astus wrote:

Things get changed in translation, like the word Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 16th, 2012 at 7:42 PM

Title: Who is the True Master?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Ultimately, Buddha is the pure Mind that resides in each individual. The true master is the Mind that allows one to listen, for example, to a lecture. Mind is the master of existence. Without Mind, nothing can exist.

(Chan (Chinese Zen), p 24)

So, it is said, "Once we reach our Pure Mind, there we are." When we finally find our home, we meet our Source, the true Master, and the generator of our life. By finding and living from our Pure Mind, we are no longer lost and cease to exist in the world of ego and delusion. We can finally begin to live from our own free will. This is what we mean when we speak of being "liberated."

(Essence of Life, p 6)

To really make progress in Zen or spiritually, we need to find and operate from our true Master, the Pure Mind. By finding our Master, we become the conscious maker of our thoughts and life conditions. Until we meet our Master, we never really know who we are and thus, will continually fail to recognize that we are entirely responsible for the conditions and quality of our life.

(Essence of Life, p 13)

For this reason, practitioners need to learn that thoughts and emotions are merely tools—servants of the Mind. The Mind is our true Master. This is a very important Zen principle.

(Essence of Life, p 17)

When we know and learn to follow our true Master, we are on the road to enlightenment. We no longer follow faulty thoughts, circumstances, or negative emotions because we know that such things are fleeting—they come and they go. When we understand this, then we are the true Master. As the Master, we know that every aspect of daily life is nothing more than a product of the Mind. By practicing Zen, we learn to use thoughts as the servants of the Mind. Thoughts should be trained to arise and respond only as we, the Master, dictates. Hence, we are the true Masters of our Mind, thoughts, and life. (Essence of Life, p 60)

Quotes from <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=69&t=7757>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 18th, 2012 at 2:35 AM

Title: Re: Innovation in North American Zen

Content:

kirtu said:

This is what happens when you have people deemed leaders who have shallow realization.

Astus wrote:

Not really. It is a religious hubris to believe that just because one has strong faith/deep realisation, that makes the person superhuman and perfect in everything.

Enlightenment doesn't qualify anyone to drive a train or govern an organisation.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 18th, 2012 at 6:45 AM

Title: Re: Who is the True Master?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The true master is not somebody or something who leads to awakening. It is the awakened mind itself.

http://eng.buddhapia.com/_Service/_ContentView/ETC_CONTENT_2.ASP?pk=0001354172&sub_pk=&clss_cd=0002200682&top_menu_cd=0000000057&menu_cd=&menu_ode=0000008421,

"It is mind that can free mind. It is also mind that hinders itself, saying, "This can't be done." What tells you this are the thoughts that were input in the past. It's these thoughts, which over eons have accumulated within you, that are the source of what is sometimes called defilements and delusions. These thoughts have accumulated within you one after another and will eventually manifest one by one, according to circumstances. How, then, can you free yourself from these thoughts? If your mind can leap over these thoughts, everything will be fine. You have the ability to do this, but most people don't make the effort to use it."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 19th, 2012 at 5:19 AM

Title: Re: Who is the True Master?

Content:

Wesley1982 said:

What the quote is saying that the mind must overcome its own hurdles? . .

Astus wrote:

It's saying that it's one's own decision to dwell on thoughts or not. That's what makes the difference between host and guest, master and slave.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 19th, 2012 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: The permanence of enlightenment

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here is a Chan story discussing impermanence and permanence of enlightenment.

Unknown said:

A monk asked Dasui: "When the great fire at the end of the aeon rages through, and the whole universe is destroyed, is this destroyed or not?" Dasui said: "Destroyed." The monk asked: "Then it goes along with that?" And Dasui said: "It goes along with that." Later, a monk asked Longji the same question: "When the great fire at the end of the aeon rages through, and the whole universe is destroyed, is this destroyed or not?" Longji said: "Not destroyed." The monk asked: "Well, why is it not destroyed?" Longji said: "Because it's the same as the universe."

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, April 20th, 2012 at 5:54 PM

Title: Re: does shikantaza lead to equanimity and insight

Content:

Astus wrote:

Shikantaza is not a meditation practice as generally understood in Buddhism, it is not about developing concentration nor about gaining insight. It is being buddha. Practically, however, it takes time to reach the point where one can actually manage for even a short time doing just sitting, so there are preliminary practices taught in most communities, like counting and watching breath.

This teaching by Keizan is a good guide for Soto style zazen:

<http://www.wwzc.org/translations/zazenYojinki.htm>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 23rd, 2012 at 4:34 AM

Title: Re: Who was this Bodhidharma character?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Historically there is nothing certain about Bodhidharma himself, except that we can be quite sure he is not the founder of any Chan lineage nor even Chan teachings. Based on what could be found about Huike and related Buddhist teachers, that there was a Lankavatara school where they lectured on that sutra. The connection between the group of Bodhidharma and Huike to the teachers of East Mountain - Daoxin and Hongren, the first originators of Chan - was made later, after the death of Shenxiu (who was the first famous Chan teacher in China, but not yet identified as "Chan"). Practically, Bodhidharma became a mythological figure with many stories created throughout the centuries, until it reached the form as we have it today around the 10th century.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 23rd, 2012 at 2:56 PM

Title: Re: Who was this Bodhidharma character?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Bodhidharma film (English in subtitles):

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=2kOvLb4YnRI> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 23rd, 2012 at 7:52 PM

Title: Re: Who was this Bodhidharma character?

Content:

Astus wrote:

One of the greatest questions:

或庵曰、西天胡子、因甚無髭。

Wakuan said, "Why has the Western Barbarian no beard?"

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 24th, 2012 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: "Applied" Zen: Ginny Whitelaw on Leadership

Content:

Astus wrote:

With the Zen of "go beyond yourself", "be in the moment", "big mind", "focus on one thing", "be one with it" and such slogans, they could train kamikaze pilots. How is this relevant to the bodhisattva spirit? A fake emptiness is nihilism. Nihilist leaders, well, what is that good for? They should learn compassion and love, not samurai attitude.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 24th, 2012 at 4:38 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist opinions about the Historical Jesus

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jesus (historical or not) is important for two kinds of people: Christians and anti-Christians. Buddhists are none of the two.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 24th, 2012 at 3:19 PM

Title: Re: "Applied" Zen: Ginny Whitelaw on Leadership

Content:

Wesley1982 said:

Zen should have a practical application to everyday life.

Astus wrote:

Buddhism has all the practical applications with moral guidance, meditation training, and wisdom. But, one can use it in everyday life when and if one has the experience and understanding of the Dharma. It's not like applied chemistry where people can simply moisturise their face as a result of extensive research. The teaching of the Buddha changes people, and that change in one's views and acts is the application. More compassion, more peace, less frustration, less anger. More giving, less greed.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, April 24th, 2012 at 4:33 PM

Title: Re: Suggest Ch'an Reading

Content:

Astus wrote:

As mentioned before and can't be emphasised enough, it's important to have an understanding of Mahayana first to see the appropriate context for Chan teachings. "Mahayana Buddhism: The Doctorial Foundations" by Paul Williams should cover the basics. But there is a distinct teaching called Chan, although this becomes very confusing since in China (and Korea, and Vietnam) almost everyone is a Chan monk/teacher in a Chan temple/monastery. It's become a common name for anything Buddhism there. So, to find out what Chan actually stands for, can be tricky, as different teachers say different things. Hsuan-hua's Chan is not exactly like Sheng-yen's Chan, and the Chan of Hsing-yun (Fo Guang Shan) and Wei-chueh (Chung Tai Shan) are also different.

For an introduction to Chan, however strange it may sound, is Robert Buswell's translation of the works of Bojo Jinul (a Korean master), who combined the teachings of Zongmi (in English on his teachings of Chan see "Zongmi on Chan"), Yongming ("Yongming Yanshou's Conception of Chan in the Zongjing Lu"), Dahui ("Swampland Flowers: The Letters And Lectures of Zen Master Ta Hui"), and the teachings of the Huayan school (Entry Into the Inconceivable: An Introduction to Hua-Yen Buddhism) in the book "Tracing back the radiance: Chinul's Korean way of Zen".

Or, if you are not yet up for intensive studying, and want to go to the essential things, there is this online book <http://www.vzmla.org/file/Chan.pdf> (PDF) by Ven. Jian Liao. Another highly recommended and short reading are the <http://hsuyun.budismo.net/en/dharma/index.html> from Ven. Hsu Yun, especially his http://hsuyun.budismo.net/en/dharma/chan_sessions1.html and http://hsuyun.budismo.net/en/dharma/chan_sessions2.html.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 25th, 2012 at 5:41 AM

Title: Re: Enlightenment/Knowing What You Are

Content:

Astus wrote:

Following the logic of the Brahmajala Sutta, these teachings - just like most of the other spiritual and religious doctrines - come from certain meditative experiences. So, instead of the common mindset people follow, some find for themselves an alternative consciousness to identify with. The eight dhyanas and the many heavens of the three worlds are all fine descriptions of these possible points of self-view. So we find that she talks about a playful god imagining everything. Well, there are such gods who just play around creating things for their own pleasure in Buddhist cosmology, they live on the second highest heaven of the desire-realm. A lot more serene and splendid than this human world. But it's not as good as the first dhyana and related heavens. And then, of course, nirvana is not like any heaven at all. Because as long as one finds a "perfect mind", a "divine consciousness", or anything similar, that is still attachment, that is still impermanent, the realm of samsara.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 25th, 2012 at 3:48 PM

Title: Re: Waitress asked to prostitute her self or loose bennetits

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is legal to be a prostitute in Germany. That means if they have an official job they are entitled to certain benefits. What it doesn't mean is that anyone has to be a prostitute. It's only one option. And unlike in many other countries, it is an option within an appropriate legal frame. Not so many countries count prostitution among acceptable jobs.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, April 25th, 2012 at 6:38 PM

Title: Re: "Myth busting" the Bodhisattvas

Content:

Astus wrote:

We believe in past events, although they don't exist. The reason we think there is a past is our memory, which is only a matter of mental functioning. We also find explanation in "past events" for our present situation.

The same works with any "uncommon" beings. We don't see them out there as we do people, but there are other forms of experience we have. We can also identify effects to relate to those beings. And then we can also ask why it is Guanyin and not Jesus, why Vairocana and not Allah? From a Buddhist perspective, all of them exists, but in different realms and with different functions. Bodhisattvas are enlightened beings, gods are not.

Materialists like to say that it's all in people's minds. But aren't interpretations and explanations are all mental creations? Why some people get better and some don't? Materialists believe it's all about biology, but the scientists have not discovered the cause yet. That's a big faith in research, and they can show many results of research to prove their point. So, should we try to prove that there are invisible beings throughout the galaxy? Absurd.

What the difficulty is for modern people is that they have little idea of the existence of the mind and the mental realms. They are taught that there is only matter and everything is made of matter. So they become ignorant of their own mind and their own perception of the world. Meditation teaches people to become aware of it. However, old views and old habits die hard.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, April 26th, 2012 at 3:13 PM

Title: Re: Enlightenment/Knowing What You Are

Content:

Kunga Lhadzom said:

Have you read The Precious Treasury of the Basic Space of Phenomena by Longchenpa Rabjam ?

I'm starting to feel a real need for direction and a teacher that can help me. I put off looking for any other teacher other than the one I've had all these years....even though he doesn't teach anything...only when I ask him a question.....but I don't care about empowerments, initiations, ritual, etc anymore.....I rarely practice anything....I feel like a misfit.

Can Longchenpa be my teacher or do I need a living Dzogchen teacher ? Or can my Sakya teacher do the same thing for me that ChNN can ?

Astus wrote:

Vajrayana is more than just a single book or a single teacher. While you may stick to one Living master and follow his programme of training, if you first or at the same time want to study the written teachings, you better do it in a circumspect way. That is, familiarise yourself with the different Buddhist doctrines (Abhidharma, sutras, Madhyamaka, Yogacara, Tantra) in a gradual and systematic fashion. You may only want Dzogchen, but without an established knowledge of Buddhism in general, people are prone to misunderstand many things, because they don't have the appropriate frame of reference, so they just read the teachings according to their own mundane views.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, April 28th, 2012 at 7:52 PM

Title: Re: Are some Buddhists more equal than others?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is no need to talk about the rise of nations and countries if it were simply a matter of warfare. We could say as well that those who waged war were criminals with heightened greed for power and little care for others beyond themselves and their clan, family and friends. The ruling class is a minority living on others, with the idea that they protect the people from other such parasites. We can also say that a king comes in exchange for smaller thugs, thus "peace" is achieved on a larger territory. But it's simply not true that there are nations born from such power struggles. The actual people, the majority, stays at the same place, while rulers and dynasties change. A king unifies people, gradually spreading a single culture and language within the conquered territory. Such events are not necessary at all. People can continue living without others pretending to be their protectors. Why? Because it's not the protectors feeding and housing them but the other way around.

Buddhism could spread fine throughout India, Central and South Asia, and the Far East without any single ruler forcing it on others. Other large religions have different history as we all know. If there is anything good to be learnt from the history of Europe is that it's a lot better to stop fighting each other and start to cooperate without forcing your values on others. That's the idea of the Union. It is a new turn after all the Julius Caesars, Napoleons and Hitlers. It is also a reason why death penalty is banned in the whole EU.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 30th, 2012 at 4:26 AM

Title: Re: Online Zen Buddhist Temple

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't know how you imagine an online Zen temple. What should be clear, is that a temple is a place of religious service. People go there to get something. Most of the time rituals. Even in a Zen temple. It can also be a place of worship, as it usually houses a buddha statue, sutras, and occasionally relics. Temples also have at least one priest to do the services. Question is then, are you a priest, or do you know one to serve in the online temple? Another function of temples is community life. The online form of community life is found in forums, chatrooms and networking sites. Are you planning to have that too?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, April 30th, 2012 at 5:13 PM

Title: Re: Are some Buddhists more equal than others?

Content:

Aemilius said:

It is not like that, understanding of history is important, it is valuable for understanding the Dharma.

Astus wrote:

History is not an easy concept. You propose "history" as the exploits of different ruler classes, and not as the history of all humans. Of course, it would be a lot more complicated to consider the day to day lives of peasants, artisans, scholars, monks and everyone else. In China there were several monasteries established and supported by the local people, and separately there were special state sponsored monasteries. The proportion of local and state monasteries changed throughout the history of Chinese Buddhism based on the strength of the central government and its willingness to take control of religious life. It is very much an exaggeration to say that Buddhism could flourish only with strong state support. In fact, those who were dependent on the dynasty could also fall with them. Buddhism in the West spread so far since the 19th century without state support and exists without it quite well.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 4th, 2012 at 11:11 PM

Title: Dzogchen Seminar and Rushen in Hungary

Content:

Astus wrote:

HUNGARY: BUDAPEST & BAKONY

Dzogchen Seminar

Friday May 11 - Sunday 13th evenings

Sambhala Centre: Neduwa

Outer Rushen Retreat

Ráktanya Cottage near Hárskút in the Bakony mountain area

Monday May 14th -Thursday May 24th

This Rushen has become the best opportunity for Dzogchen practise scheduled in Europe. For those who have neither the experience nor the fortitude for the outer, the inner rushen can be practised. But the Bakony mountains with their deciduous forest provide an unexcelled sun-filled user-friendly environment for the outer rushen retreat. Everyone who attends will have had the Dzogchen pointing out instruction.

Contact:

Tibor Hendry

email: <mailto:sambhala@elender.hu>

website: <http://www.tibet.hu> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Tibetet Segítő Társaság Sambhala Tibet Központ

Tibet Support Association Sambhala Tibet Center

source: <http://www.keithdowman.net/diary/index.htm> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 5th, 2012 at 5:28 AM

Title: Re: Reading suggestions about the history of Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

It might sound strange, but the books you have listed at the start are practically all there is. Or, at least I could not find anything more, although I did not do a very thorough search. There are surely some essays here and there.

As for the book Wellsprings of the Great Perfection, it's a nice collection of legendary history, but that's all it is. Not many teachings in it either.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 7th, 2012 at 4:13 AM

Title: Re: Reading suggestions about the history of Dzogchen

Content:

pensum said:

I suggest you check the contents of Wellsprings yourself and make your own personal decision as to whether the contents are of interest to you or not

Astus wrote:

I have had it on my shelf for a while now. I usually don't talk about books that I have not looked at myself. But, as always, I present only my view of it.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 8th, 2012 at 3:16 PM

Title: Re: zen/chan practices and the pali canon

Content:

Astus wrote:

Chan is about sudden enlightenment. The concept itself can exist because there is the teaching of buddha-mind. From this, in practical terms, comes the method/instruction to see one's nature. From this arises the practice of no-thought, the mind without abiding on anything - a derivative of Prajnaparamita teachings. This can be likened to the Theravada teaching on the three gates (emptiness, signlessness, desirelessness) which is also in the Prajnaparamita sutras. Huatou practice is meant as a gateway to no-thought.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 8th, 2012 at 3:21 PM

Title: Re: use of mala in zen/chan

Content:

Astus wrote:

A common practice with mala is nianfo, usually reciting the name of Amita Buddha.

Here is a book for you on that practice: <http://www.ymba.org/monkey/monkeyfrm.htm>

But it's not very complicated at all, I mean, using a mala. You recite, you count, or just hold it in your hands, and that's it. You might find special practices taught by some teachers, but that's likely to be a larger area where differences are abundant.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 8th, 2012 at 3:50 PM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Astus wrote:

That four-line verse says nothing about teachers, telepathy, and papers of enlightenment.

First, note that all monastics are also teachers of the Dharma. So there is no point in saying that you are now a special teacher. Of course, there are specific roles in a monastery monks can take up, among which the highest is the abbot, who is the primary organiser of life there. The so called lineage was and is used (to a minimal extent) to relate the abbots of different monasteries.

In the West it is obviously different. Zen came here first from Japan, and also it is not practised in a monastic environment. This resulted in the idea that the only proper teachers are those who have been recognised as such by other teachers. Then you can add to this the legend of recognition lineage going back to Shakyamuni. Since in the West everyone is a lay person, the only obvious way to make a difference between teachers and students is using this paper transmission like a diploma to authenticate people to teach.

This can be detailed on and on, but I can assure you, there is no telepathy involved, neither is anyone actually enlightened by being handed down a piece of fancy writing.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 9th, 2012 at 1:28 AM

Title: Re: "transmission outside the scriptures"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Or if you want to know about the formation of the idea of "transmission outside the scriptures", you should read "How Zen Became Zen: The Dispute Over Enlightenment and the Formation of Chan Buddhism in Song-Dynasty China" by Morten Schlütter.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 14th, 2012 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: Issues with deficient teaching masked by the illogic of Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

When something is read in English it's easy to forget that it's a translation from long ago and from a foreign sub-culture. Those who today actually talk like the people in koans, well, they're just lost in language. Zen is not illogical, nor is it about being illogical. If something doesn't make sense, one should ask, investigate and study. There is no use of believing that just because a guy in robes said something it must be some mystical revelation.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 14th, 2012 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: Sheng Yen's "Footprints in the Snow"

Content:

Astus wrote:

Stuart Lachs is well known for criticising modern Zen and its teachers. He usually has some good points, but as always, one should be careful about the sources. Religious biographies are famous for exaggerating and creating an otherworldly picture of whoever is the subject of the writing, but that's not necessarily intentional, just the way the writer conceives it. What to make of all this? Not much, I think. Let the teaching and the precepts be one's guide, not superstitions, personal cults, historical claims, angry criticism, or anything else.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 14th, 2012 at 1:12 AM

Title: Re: Issues with deficient teaching masked by the illogic of Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is a bodhisattva's mission to help people suffer less, ultimately leading them to complete liberation. A teacher of Zen should embody that aspiration by all means possible.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 14th, 2012 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: Any regular Mahamudra webcasts?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Mahamudra is not as bound to transmissions as Dzogchen, when it is understood to be separate from the path of sutra and tantra. So it is very much acceptable to have books, DVD's and all the other forms spreading the teachings made available. It is, after all, a liberating instruction.

The Quintessence of Mahamudra says in the chapter "The Description of the Preparatory Exercises for This Meditative Path" (p. 123f)

"Regarding the manner of imparting the profound path [of mahamudra], the venerable Gampopa considered it to be an independent path of tantra. So he did not make the esoteric empowerment a prerequisite for receiving the mahamudra teachings. He spoke about the method of directly guiding the disciple toward the intrinsic reality of the mind."

and

"On the other hand, if one follows venerable Gampopa's system in elucidating mahamudra alone, it is not necessary to bestow the empowerment upon devotees. In keeping with his system one should adhere to the preparatory exercises he prescribed without incorporating the tantric meditation of Vajrasattva, the utterance of mantra, the transformation of oneself into yidam, and the visualization of one's guru in the form of Buddha Vajradhara, the source of the mystic empowerment."

And Thrangu Rinpoche's view related to this:

"I think that it is of far greater importance than the experience of dramatic instantaneous pointing out that people be taught mahamudra as a full system of instruction that they can implement on their own gradually through diligent application using either one of the three texts by the Ninth Gyalwang Karmapa—The Ocean of Definitive Meaning, Dispelling the Darkness of Ignorance, or Pointing Out the Dharmakaya— or one of the texts by Dakpo Tashi Namgyal—either Moonbeams of Mahamudra or The Clarification of the Natural State.

In short, I think it is of far more importance that people receive this kind of complete and systematic instruction so that they can gradually develop experience on their own, than that some kind of dramatic pointing-out procedure be done. Of course, it is possible to give dramatic pointing-out instruction, and when you do so, some people do recognize their mind's nature. But, if I may say so, I question the stability and, therefore, ultimately the value of that. It certainly is a dramatic experience for those people who achieve it, but I see no evidence of their kleshas diminishing as a result. And furthermore, they then carry away with them the arrogance of the thought, "I have seen my mind's nature." I think it is of far greater importance actually to practice meditation slowly and surely and make all possible use of the resources which this book in particular gives you. It is after all a big book and contains within it much instruction, much guidance, and a lot of questions that can help you to question and therefore refine your own experience."

(Ocean of Definitive Meaning, p. 127-128)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 14th, 2012 at 2:02 AM

Title: Re: Issues with deficient teaching masked by the illogic of Zen

Content:

shel said:

It's not clear what you are saying, Astus. Are you suggesting that Zen teachers should get medical training, for example, to "embody" the aspiration to help "by all means possible"?

Astus wrote:

Some do have medical or therapeutic training too. But that's not the point. If somebody comes with a problem with their relationship or their boss, the teacher can give some useful instructions on how to make the mind more peaceful and compassionate. Since problems exist in the mind, it is in the mind where they can be handled in the first place. Then, if it is needed, the student can take further steps, but with more wisdom and kindness.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 14th, 2012 at 2:31 AM

Title: Re: Sheng Yen's "Footprints in the Snow"

Content:

Astus wrote:

I did not read the whole article, but Lachs says at the beginning that the book was not written by Ven. Shengyan but an American reporter who does not even speak Chinese. That's one thing. Another is that no biography contains every details. If someone would actually want to investigate the life of Ven. Shengyan and the truth of and biographical detail, it would take lot more effort than simply going through one book written by a person without actual connection to the events. To conclude from this that Ven. Shengyan lied, that is quite a big leap.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 14th, 2012 at 2:37 AM

Title: Re: Any regular Mahamudra webcasts?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Chökyi Nyima Rinpoche also gives regular teachings made available online, but it's not only Mahamudra of course.

I think that since hardly any teacher restricts the teachings to Mahamudra, it is unlikely that there will be anything more than perhaps a series of teachings on this subject. But, with some growth in interest, this might eventually change.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 15th, 2012 at 3:54 AM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

Astus wrote:

Quite simple. Don't grasp whatever occurs in the mind - the complete field of experience - but just let it come and let it go. Then you add to this all the formalities of a Soto Zen temple, if you want to.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 15th, 2012 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't know what mixed teachings of Dogen you refer to. Without thoughts how can you make an analysis?

Jhana is a Pali term used to denote some level of absorption, vipassana can have several meanings. Please specify.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 15th, 2012 at 5:35 PM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

Frank said:

I know the jhanas forwards and backwards (on paper, not in practice. i'm no jhana master... maybe the first one once or twice, but that's probably all, i'm wondering which jhana, if any, shikantaza correlates with and whether or not practicing shikantaza will take one through all four and then through the further formless jhanas? Dogen taught both thoughtless shikantaza and taught to analyze the mind while in that state. It is a confusing topic. Vipassana is a term used with such great ambiguity that I don't even know where to begin.

Astus wrote:

Jhanas are from samatha practice, different stages of the calmness of the mind and gradually subtler points of focus. Whether one experiences any of the jhanas in zazen or not is mostly irrelevant. On the other hand, the actual meditation requires a calm state, therefore at least the first jhana, optimally the fourth jhana is similar to what one has. As shikantaza is understood is mostly just sitting without attaching to any state. It doesn't mean that's the only possible practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 15th, 2012 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://mro.org/zmm/teachings/daido/teisho20.php> by Daido Roshi.

"Abide in neither thinking nor not thinking. Thinking is linear and sequential, a separation from the reality that is the subject of thought, and thus is an abstraction rather than the reality itself. Not thinking is suppressive. It cuts away thoughts the moment they arise, making the mind into a great impenetrable mountain—dead, unresponsive. Non-thinking has no such edges. It is the boundless mind of samadhi that neither holds on to, nor lets go of, thoughts. It is the manifestation of the buddha mind in which the dualism of self and other, thinking and not thinking, dissolve. This is the dharma of thusness that is the right thought of all the buddhas in the ten directions."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 16th, 2012 at 12:11 AM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

Frank said:

Interesting, could you explain why it's irrelevant? It seems like you either will go through them with said practice or not.

Astus wrote:

So, I think it has been made clear already what kind of attitude shikantaza has. Samatha meditation is about focusing on one thing, and that develops jhana in the form realms. Not focusing on a solid thing but extending the view to infinity and beyond, one maintains the calmness of the fourth jhana. Shikantaza is not about focusing or extending one's mind, but not attaching to any phenomenon. Since that non-attachment results in a calm mind, it can be compared to the gradual cooling within samatha. Nevertheless, it is irrelevant because all these mental states just come and go, and the goal is not to make it some graspable state, but to learn to be aware without attachment.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 16th, 2012 at 3:28 AM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

Frank said:

So I get really calm and near the first jhana by focusing on my breathing, then I drop my meditation object and just abide in calm awareness. Does that sound like shikantaza?

Astus wrote:

Not exactly. What you describe is more like samatha without object, or a more subtle object. Shikantaza is about not grasping any state, any thought, any feeling, no matter what comes up.

Frank said:

The question now then I suppose is: where does shikantaza stand in the great scheme? Jhana meditation can (allegedly) lead to enlightenment when combined with insight. Where can shikantaza lead? Are there stages one goes through? Or is it just that pure awareness for as long as you can hold it?

Astus wrote:

Shikantaza has no stages, it is not something to develop, maintain or master. That's why it is called practice-realisation, it is buddhahood itself. If you want to put it into a scheme, check out Zhiyi's "The Six Dharma Gates to the Sublime", where in the first chapter under the first gate the different jhanas (hinayana dhyana) are covered, while Shikantaza is the perfect contemplation in chapter 9. I recommend you read the whole treatise to get a full picture. Also, "The Essentials of Buddhist Meditation" by Zhiyi is another important work that can greatly help understanding the position of Zen. As you may notice, Zhiyi was the founder of the Tiantai school before the emergence of Chan. However, you won't really find such detailed meditation manuals in Zen, and monks have relied on Tiantai instructions everywhere.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 16th, 2012 at 5:06 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Buddhism

Content:

Namdrol said:

Dzogchen is the heart of all paths, whether of samsara or nirvana, and is the truth that everyone is trying to discover. What is Dzogchen? We all know the answer to that question -- it is our real condition.

Everyone, no matter what religion they belong to, is trying to discover the truth. That truth exists in the heart of every single sentient being. So when you discover that truth, there is no need to remain locked in the limitations of "Buddhist" and "non-Buddhist".

...

If we ground ourselves in the deep natural transformation that comes from recognizing and integrating with our primordial potentiality, then we can go beyond the limitations of religion, ideology, nation, class, race and tribe. By going beyond these limitations (as well as the limitations of conceptuality, imputation, paths, stages, realizations, attainments, buddhas and sentient beings) through recognizing our own innate state that is originally pure and naturally formed, we can move freely through the world and meet everyone and everything from the authentic space of recognition of great original purity of all that is.

Astus wrote:

I don't know how much you wander in Buddhism, but this is a topic others have also thought about and wrote of. Just a few examples:

One Dharma: The Emerging Western Buddhism by Joseph Goldstein

Rebel Buddha: A Guide to a Revolution of Mind by Dzogchen Ponlop Rinpoche

Just Use This Mind: Follow the Universal Truth to Oneness of Mind, Body and Spirit by

Ven. Miao Tsan

And don't forget the modern movements of Vipassana and Zen that detached themselves from cultural and religious limitations and started to focus on personally experiencing the true nature of mind. This is basically the recipe of their success among Westerners.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 16th, 2012 at 5:09 AM

Title: Re: "Applied" Zen: Ginny Whitelaw on Leadership

Content:

Matylda said:

What do you mean by this? do you think that in Japanese zen there is no teaching on compassion and that they exercise nihilism? How this idea came to your mind?

Astus wrote:

I meant a limited understanding of Zen. Its not related to any specific nation, but only the human tendency of grasping at words without seeing the context.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 16th, 2012 at 6:45 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Buddhism

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Since Direct Introduction from the Guru is the foundation of Dzogchen, it follows that the only way that Vipassana or Zen could be integrated with the Natural State of the Great Perfection as pointed out by a Guru, would be if the Vipassana or Zen student or teacher has received the Direct Introduction him or herself; whether in this physical dimension or in a Dream Yoga state.

Astus wrote:

That was not my point. I talked about the attitude Namdrol presented how Dzogchen can be taught to all humans regardless of race, country, creed, etc. is an idea took up by other people too. And there the teaching is also presented as something that can be experienced by all and not as a doctrine, thus it universally applies to everybody.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 16th, 2012 at 6:58 AM

Title: Re: "Applied" Zen: Ginny Whitelaw on Leadership

Content:

Matylda said:

Well if you speak of samurai or kamikaze that is pointing out certain connotation. Just this...

Astus wrote:

There is a quite strong idea in the West that Zen and martial arts are closely connected, if not inseparable.

A good example for this is Ginny Whitelaw herself who is both a Zen master and 5th degree black belt Aikido master, who studied in the Chozen-ji Rinzai line where they practice both sitting meditation and martial arts together.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 16th, 2012 at 5:10 PM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

Astus wrote:

Matylda,

Where is shikantaza taught the way you talk about? Is it a specific teacher, temple or lineage of Soto Zen? Or more of a philosophical branch?

There were clear instructions quoted and referred to here, and there are many more available. For instance, from the Soto church's official website:

"Do not concentrate on any particular object or control your thought. When you maintain a proper posture and your breathing settles down, your mind will naturally become tranquil.

When various thoughts arise in your mind, do not become caught up by them or struggle with them; neither pursue nor try to escape from them. Just leave thoughts alone, allowing them to come up and go away freely. The essential thing in doing zazen is to awaken (kakusoku) from distraction and dullness, and return to the right posture moment by moment."

Before and after this it gives all the ritual and physical acts one should be aware of, pictures included. What else could be there to it? Gives the same instructions one finds everywhere. That's why I ask where all those other extras you mention come from.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 16th, 2012 at 5:40 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Buddhism

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

But this could get into a debate about whether or not non-Dzogchen traditions in themselves could introduce to people that which is introduced (the Nature of Mind) in Dzogchen (a debate which has been done to death).

asunthatneversets said:

I think bottom line is most of them only go as far as the ālaya (interpreted in the context of their own traditions of course). That coupled with being severed from the lineage makes it quite difficult. Most traditions reify a ground as a true existent. No other tradition does direct introduction, and not sure if they could given their self-inflicted shortcomings in that respect. Doesn't mean they cannot receive introduction and practice/benefit from it though.

Dechen Norbu said:
That's the point.

Astus wrote:

Interesting. Although the nature of mind in all different schools are understood to be universal, and it is something quite easy to see, there is this idea that only one specific school/lineage has the actual methods to comprehend it, while obviously the teachings are known to so many. It is all right that there is an independent group of Dzogchen practitioners who don't want to identify with Nyingma, Bon, or any other school. But this ignorance of other teachings can easily result in arrogance that there is not a single Buddhist outside the Dzogchen group who has a proper understanding of the teachings that are actually found in their own sutras, tantras and treatises.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 16th, 2012 at 6:23 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Buddhism

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Are there then "Buddhists", who have understanding or are willing to understand Dzogchen?

Forgot to ask you, what do you understand under:"can easily result in arrogance" ?

Astus wrote:

I think it is quite simple that those who are interested in Buddhism and those who consider themselves Buddhists have contact with Dzogchen. In fact, it is quite easy to get both teachers and books on Dzogchen in English and other Western languages, unlike several other Buddhist teachings, like Yogacara and Abhidharma.

What I meant is that people hear about hinayana, sutrayana, lower and higher tantras, but without actually studying them they are just told that those are limited teachings, theoretical teachings without practical application, and they don't lead to real enlightenment. So, without proper understanding, people will disregard them in contempt that whoever follows those are people of mediocre karma and intellect.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 16th, 2012 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

Astus wrote:

Matylda,

As you said, most of those practices you have mentioned are not really transmitted to the West, for a couple of reasons. You may also know that most of the Soto Zen groups in the West are not associated with the Soto church in Japan. These are differences that should be recognised, and handled separately. So what you write about is all very interesting. Perhaps you could organise these information a bit and create a website or blog about it in English, to show how things are currently done in Japan. You might also make some comparisons with the teachings and methods spread among Western Zen students.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 16th, 2012 at 9:18 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Good points Jnana.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 16th, 2012 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: Any regular Mahamudra webcasts?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sutra Mahamudra is just what Mahamudra as a gradual path is understood. Tantra Mahamudra is what is found in completion stage. Essence Mahamudra is the nature of mind and it being pointed out as the method. But this is just one way to explain the different forms of Mahamudra.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 17th, 2012 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

This is a nice summary in your signature Magnus. The truth, the real condition being beyond concepts is not difficult for any student of Madhyamaka (or Yogacara, Mahamudra, Chan, etc) to comprehend and even experience. As Jnana mentioned, cutting up space is nothing but proliferation (prapanca) that even the old suttas teach not to do. Dzogchen can be the essence of all vehicles, because all have the same essence, i.e. non-conceptual wisdom. Arguing about which method, doctrine, lineage is superior or inferior has already been discussed, and everyone sticks to their chosen path as the best, so let's just put that aside for now. If we accept that non-conceptual wisdom is the essence of the teachings, and that Dzogchen leads one to just that, it is only natural that it works as a path on its own without any other requirements, and that way it perfects whatever there is to accomplish on the path of all nine vehicles.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 18th, 2012 at 4:37 PM

Title: Re: What is the end all be all manual on chan/zen or buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are lot of manuals on Buddhism, lot of books, lot of explanations. Theravada is good, Mahayana is good, Vajrayana is good. But none of them is Chan. Chan is just this mind reading and thinking, searching for something to hold on to. Have you found it yet?

As for a Chan meditation manual, the most comprehensive in English is "Dogen's Manuals of Zen Meditation" by Carl Bielefeldt.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 19th, 2012 at 5:27 AM

Title: Re: What is the end all be all manual on chan/zen or buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The problem is that Chan is not an organised doctrine. There are a few basic concepts and practices that are favoured in Chan, but nothing exclusive, unique or definitive. Even more, there are different trends that can all be categorised under Chan. It is a common practice to distinguish Chan from Jiao, i.e. the doctrines, but only since the early Song dynasty when Chan emerged as a separate school. Therefore the saying "separate transmission outside doctrines" (jiao wai bie chuan 教外別傳). What is transmitted is the buddha-mind, enlightenment itself, and not specific teachings, methods or anything like that. Some misunderstand this as a rejection of scriptures, or that this is some hidden transmission between master and student. But that is not the case. Still, it explains the nature of this tradition. That's why there are no manuals like the Visuddhimagga or the Mohezhiguan in Chan. It's not about stages, practices, doctrines or methods. It also does not reject them, but uses freely whatever is required. That's how it can encompass the whole Mahayana without being bound by specific texts. Chan is the essence of all the teachings of the Buddha, so whatever manual you pick it eventually leads to Chan. Or you can just directly enter the gateless gate yourself, and that is the ultimate Chan way.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 19th, 2012 at 8:47 PM

Title: Being in the Present

Content:

Astus wrote:

We speak of the three times - past, present and future - as an expression of the insight that nothing lasts but everything is characterized by impermanence. Our impression of time passing is brought about by the continual movement of our mind, with its incessantly changing world of experiences. Intellectually, this is easy for us to understand, but we find it difficult to apply this insight to our daily lives, in which we often have the tendency to want to stop time and prevent certain situations from developing.

It is precisely our wish to want to halt the continual change of things that causes us to suffer. When we deeply accept becoming and ceasing as something inevitable, then there is no longer any cause for suffering. If we live impermanence and deeply understand it, then it becomes a friend who helps us settle in the dimension of the present moment and experience the unity of mind and its projections.

If our mind did not project appearances, would there be past, present and future? Surely not. There would be no feeling of time passing, as the impression of time is solely caused by the changing projections of our mind. If we wish to achieve certainty about this, we must look directly into our mind in meditation again and again; words and intellectual understanding are not adequate for this. Only through repeated investigation of our own mind can we truly grasp that the world that surrounds us is nothing but a projection of our mind - its dynamic expression, its luminosity.

Our mind is a succession of moments of awareness - and these moments of present awareness cannot be extended. We cannot say: "Thoughts, please stop for a moment, so that I may look at you and understand you." Trying to stop the movements of our mind, in order to look at a thought or insight more carefully, blocks the natural, spontaneous dynamics of the mind. There is no point in trying to seize an insight so that we can look at it closely. In true insight, there is nothing that could be looked at or understood.

As long as we cherish the desire to understand something, to define and explain it, we miss the real point of our practice and continue in our ordinary mental fixation. If we wish to appropriate an insight, there needs to be someone who wants to understand something - and immediately we recreate the 'I', the thinker. In reality, there is nobody who understands and no object that is to be understood - there simply is only seeing. As soon as we cling to an 'I', there is no more seeing.

If we are dissatisfied with the prospect of not being able to understand, that is because we wish to have something for ourselves. We hope to be able to control and master things. But in truth we cannot control or understand anything. If we wish to arrive at a true understanding, we must let go of all personal desire. We should search for the thinker who wants to understand and control. Then we will see that we cannot find them, since they do not exist as such. If there is no thinker, then it is only natural that there is no understanding of thought processes and the mind.

Thinker and thoughts are empty, without true existence. This fundamental emptiness is the truth body. The luminosity, or dynamics, of this empty mind, its capacity to create thoughts, is the enjoyment body. The manifold expression of the mind, its capacity to assume a myriad forms in a continual change, is the emanation body.

When we allow our mind to engage in its natural, spontaneous activity, we will recognize its three fundamental qualities: emptiness, luminosity and unobstructed manifestation.

We will not, as we may have feared, find ourselves in an empty, blank state. Rather, we will discover that our thoughts are the treasure of the three bodies of enlightenment, the inexhaustible source of wealth of qualities.

What can we do to gain insight into the nature of mind? We should meditate and allow our mind to rest in the awareness of the present moment. The true nature of mind is nothing other than this moment of open awareness. In this sense of presence, there is nothing that could be grasped by thought, described or seen. This does not mean, however, that there is nothing at all, but only that no awareness as such is seen. When we rest in this immediate awareness that is the nature of mind, we understand that all appearances are created through the habitual tendencies of our confused mind. The goal of Mahamudra meditation is to see directly the nature of this confusion. This happens when the mind merges with the awareness of the present moment which is its basic nature. In that moment, it is freed of all the negativity and obscurations of all our lifetimes. To penetrate to this experience, we must meditate again and again, over a long period of time, and use all situations for the meditation on the true nature of mind. If we do this, one day we will attain realization and with it complete certainty. We will see directly what the mind is and how it works. From that day on, all our doubts will have been resolved completely.

In Mahamudra meditation, we simply allow body and mind to relax and rest in openness. To relax completely does not mean to slump in a lazy way. Rather, it entails maintaining a clear, vivid awareness that perceives all impulses of the mind to hold on to something and lets go of it immediately. Without getting annoyed about our attachment, we simply perceive it and allow it to free itself. Attachment is the sole thing we must abandon, and that is why the teachings speak so insistently of the need for complete relaxation of the mind.

In the view of Mahamudra, in which we make no distinction between good thoughts and bad thoughts but allow all appearances equally to dissolve in their true nature, there is one danger. We may regard ourselves as great yogis and think that with this view that is as expansive as the sky, we no longer need to pay attention to the small details of life and of our actions. This erroneous view is rooted in a pride that is as big as a mountain. To think that everything in its nature is emptiness and, therefore, it is no longer necessary to perform wholesome actions and to avoid unwholesome ones, leads to arrogant, inconsiderate behavior. A "great yogi" of that persuasion would entangle themselves more and more in the worldly thinking and acting. Their disturbing emotions would increase, and they would move further and further away from awakening.

In order not to fall into this error, we should cultivate the flawless behavior of a bodhisattva and constantly check whether our body, speech and mind conform to the teachings of the Buddha. Even with the very expansive view of Mahamudra, a view that is all-embracing as the universe, we have to be very sensitive and exact in our actions. As soon as we have developed the correct view and actually apply it in practice, we are able to recognize the ultimate reality in ourselves, without having to undertake any great effort to accomplish this. The recognition of the nature of mind is the only thing that we actually need - it has the power to liberate us from everything and to liberate all beings in the universe, too.

All phenomena of the external world are only the manifestations of the luminosity of our own mind and ultimately have no reality. When we allow our mind to rest in the recognition that everything that it experiences is its own projection, the separation between subject and object comes to an end. Then there is no longer anyone who grasps at something and nothing that is being grasped at - subject and object are recognized to be unreal.

In order to experience this, we allow our mind to remain in its ordinary consciousness, the awareness of the present moment, which is the deep, unchanging nature of mind itself and which is also called "timeless awareness." That is the natural insight that arises spontaneously when in every moment we look directly at the true nature of mind.

In seeing the nature of mind, there is nothing to "see" since it is not an object of perception. We see it without seeing anything. We know it without knowing anything.

The mind recognizes itself spontaneously, in a way beyond all duality. The path that leads to this is the awareness of the present moment, free of all interference. It is an error to think that the ultimate truth is difficult to recognize. The meditation on the nature of mind is actually very easy, as we do not have to go anywhere to find this nature. No work needs to be done to produce it; no effort is required to find it. It is sufficient for us to sit down, allow our mind to rest in itself and directly look at the one who thinks that it is difficult to find the nature of mind. In that moment, we discover it directly, as it is very close and always within easy reach.

It would be absurd to worry that we might not succeed in discovering the nature of mind, as it is already present in us. It is sufficient to look into ourselves. When our mind directs its gaze upon itself, it finds itself and understands that the seeker and the sought are not two different things. At the moment, we cannot see the nature of our mind because we do not know how we must look. The problem is not that we do not possess the capacity for doing this but that we do not look in the right way.

To become capable of recognizing the nature of mind in the way described, we have to work at relaxing deeply and letting go of all wanting, so that the natural state of mind can reveal itself. This work is the exact opposite of worldly effort, in which we strive to obtain concrete things and put ourselves into a state of strain. In the practice of Dharma, we must "strain without effort." This does not mean that we do nothing at all and simply remain as we are, because then we would continue to reproduce the same behavior patterns that have existed in us since beginningless time. We must make an effort to purify our ego-centered tendencies and become aware of our intentions.

(Gendun Rinpoche in "Heart Advice from a Mahamudra Master", p. 144-149)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 21st, 2012 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: Need info regarding Zen and Pratityasamutpada

Content:

Astus wrote:

Besides Nagarjuna - as the primary master on dependent origination in Mahayana - you should as well look at the Shalistamba Sutra

(<http://www.scribd.com/doc/29421082/Salistamba-Sutra>), the Yogacara teaching of the eight consciousnesses (https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Eight_Consciousnesses), and the Huayan teaching of interpenetration

(https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Huayan_school#Interpenetration) and the metaphor of Indra's net (https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Indra%27s_net). These teachings provide the basis of East Asian Mahayana's view of dependent origination, and Dogen relied on them implicitly.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 21st, 2012 at 12:13 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Lhug-Pa,

The basis of Mahamudra (whether sutra or tantra) is the ground Mahamudra, and that is nothing else but buddha-nature. Alaya-vijnana, the storehouse consciousness, is simply our habits. There is no Buddhist practice founded on habits, since it would not lead to liberation. Thus the foundation is always wisdom, ordinary consciousness, or whatever name you prefer.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 21st, 2012 at 6:45 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Lhug-Pa,

Why don't you simply look at the actual instructions of Mahamudra and Dzogchen where the nature of mind is being pointed out/at? Terminology can be very different, and without the necessary definitions very confusing.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 22nd, 2012 at 12:23 AM

Title: Re: Need info regarding Zen and Pratityasamutpada

Content:

Astus wrote:

And, as Anders said before, East Asian Buddhism is not the same as Indian or Tibetan Buddhism. Even Madhyamaka was forgotten after the 7th century, and the leading views of Buddhism are found in the works of Tiantai, Huayan and Chan masters.

Another thing to mention is that dependent origination outside of Theravada is rarely associated with the 12 nidanas, it is more of a general understanding about all phenomena.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 22nd, 2012 at 7:45 PM

Title: Re: Does the precept of no drugs or alcohol mean no coffee?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The meaning of the fifth lay precept is to avoid a state of mind where one could easily break the first four precepts. Drinking alcohol and consuming drugs have no karmic effect in and of themselves as far as the ten good/bad deeds are concerned. Coffee, tea, different medicines, etc. don't make it any more likely to break the first four precepts, thus using or avoiding them is irrelevant to Buddhist ethics.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 23rd, 2012 at 2:48 AM

Title: Re: Being in the Present

Content:

Astus wrote:

Mahamudra meditation means nothing other than just being there, being within the simplest state of ourselves. Most of you will have heard of the meditation technique in which one does not heed any thoughts of the past or future. One neither dwells upon memories nor speculates about future plans. One just rests in complete nowness. This is what is meant here. When we do not follow thoughts of the past and do not anticipate future events, but are just here, in tune with the present moment, we are in a state of newness and freshness. The text describes this as the essence of whatever thought arises being ever new.

This means that we let things arise and do not stop or manipulate them. We just sit there totally open and unblocked, completely fresh and alert. We hear things, see things, sense and feel things, but do not react in anyway. We just are in the precision and newness of the very moment itself. This is the uncontrived state of being in which we are completely natural and fresh, totally uninvolved, not speculating or manipulating or making up images. We are just then and there, conscious, alert, and clear.

If we are able to remain in that state and look at our present mind, completely leaving what is there at this moment, without interfering with anything, just relaxing and being in that very moment, this is the meditation of Mahamudra beyond preparatory stages.

Being in the present moment does not mean being stuck there. It means being in the stream of passing moments, leaving ourselves to the flux. Whatever arises, let it arise.

Do not label it, just let it be. Let it arise and arise, and do not react no matter how good or bad it may seem. Do not fall to evaluations and concepts about it. When we are able to do that, we will be in a state that is free from contrivance. In this state there is no distraction, as one does not follow or react to anything.

Being distracted means pursuing a thought that comes up. For instance, when we hear the sound of a car passing by, this in itself is not a distraction. But the moment we think, "There is a car," we have labeled what we heard as being the sound of a car. Then, we build up a chain reaction: "This place is noisy. I shouldn't be distracted, but now I am. There are too many cars in this city." In this way we become more and more angry, thinking, "This is terrible! I am disturbed. I cannot meditate in this place." This is distraction. When a car passes by, let it pass by. Then, it is finished, it is all right; there is nothing wrong with it. The problem is not the sound of the car, but our reaction to it.

(Ringu Tulku in "Daring Steps Toward Fearlessness", p. 197-198)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 23rd, 2012 at 5:29 AM

Title: Re: Being in the Present

Content:

Konchog1 said:

Serious Question. Isn't this Eckhart Tolle's core teaching? To remain in the present instant at all times, waiting for the next thought like a cat waiting for a mouse to appear?

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/The_Power_of_Now#The_ego_and_the_deeper_Presence "onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

Astus wrote:

Student: When I just watch my thoughts without following them, is that meditation as it is meant here?

RTR: What I was trying to say is that you do not watch your thoughts. You just are, and let your thoughts come and go. Can you understand that?

(Daring Steps, p. 200)

One method he recommends is simply to listen to the voice in the head without judging it in any way or getting caught up in its contents. Just by 'watching the thinker' in the head, he says, "You'll soon realise: there is the voice, and here I am listening to it." That I am realisation is "a sense of your own presence ... (arising) from beyond the mind." And as one becomes aware of this deeper self as a conscious presence, so the involuntary thinking begins to subside, giving way to stillness, peace and what he calls "the joy of Being."

(from the above linked Wikipedia article)

"At this time, you may have an experience of bliss, from which you feel you cannot bear to be parted. Do not cling to it. There may be an experience of clarity. Do not hold onto it, getting the conceited idea, 'This is the flow of my innermost nature, which is clear and distinct.' You may be in total absence of thought, resembling all remembrance and scheming being cut. Do not get attached to this either. Within the notion, 'This is freedom from conceptual mind,' remain beyond. You should turn toward the one who perceives and creates all these things. Get to the top of that itself and settle right there. Then you will remain in meditative equipoise with nothing to settle upon. The nature of everything is apparent. There is no reason for thought or conceptual grasping. When you are meditating, there is no inner onlooker present. When you are not meditating, the cause of distraction is lost. Mindfulness being self-liberated, the knot of hope and apprehension is untied within the sphere of openness and relaxation. The chains of doubt are severed. There is ever-present purity, beyond bondage and liberation. This is primordial wisdom, freed from the need of applying an antidote. It is dharmata, in which everything to be abandoned is exhausted. From this alone we realize our nature, the mind of the primordial protector."

(Daring Steps, p. 170 - emphasis added)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 23rd, 2012 at 5:56 AM

Title: Re: finding a teacher.

Content:

Astus wrote:

You might also think a bit about what kind of guidance you want. It is a bit unrealistic to keep wondering about another's inner qualities without actually knowing them. In fact, anyone who has studied Buddhism for a couple of years and practised meditation can give sensible advice. You just have to open your ears for it.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 23rd, 2012 at 7:38 PM

Title: Re: Being in the Present

Content:

Konchog1 said:

What's the difference? Isn't it the same thing at first? Letting thoughts arise and waving at them as they pass?

Astus wrote:

If you take the position of watching your thoughts, that is still grasping at a mental state, a thought. So even if the instruction is to watch the thoughts, it means not grasping any of them, not forcing anything, not elaborating. If you try to be the watcher, that is a contrived and tiring practice. And it is also a mistake to believe that there is somebody looking at thoughts.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 23rd, 2012 at 7:54 PM

Title: Re: Europe near the end?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Europe near the end? Sounds like some bad newspaper headline. Does people have any idea of what Europe actually is outside this continent? Belarus, Macedonia, Norway, Moldavia, Albania, etc. are all in Europe but they are not members of the EU, and not all EU members use the Euro (17 of 27 member states use it). Also, a financial crisis, even if it goes to the worst possible level, would not mean the end of Europe. Many empires, kingdoms and nations have emerged and disappeared already, but the people are still here.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 24th, 2012 at 3:50 AM

Title: Re: Being in the Present

Content:

Konchog1 said:
I still don't quite get it, but thanks.

Astus wrote:
Which part do you find incomprehensible, or unacceptable?

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, May 24th, 2012 at 3:53 PM
Title: Re: Being in the Present
Content:

Astus wrote:
We like to think we are the one watching the thoughts. But that is based on the assumption that otherwise we would miss them. Also, it is the idea that is the problem, the reification of the mind. Just relaxing, resting in the nature of the mind means no objectification of any subject. That's why there is first the insight meditation and the analysis of the mind, to establish clearly it's ungraspable and luminous nature.

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, May 24th, 2012 at 11:55 PM
Title: Re: the true nature of siddhis
Content:

Astus wrote:
And since these siddhis are all very personal, just like miracles in any other religion, it is not verifiable by any scientific test, or shown to a general public, like on TV or in a theatre. Thus it is not possible to be used to convert people.

Author: Astus
Date: Friday, May 25th, 2012 at 6:23 AM
Title: Re: the true nature of siddhis
Content:

Astus wrote:
Well, in fact there is a way to convert people with miracles. Certain types of Christians actually do that and they have large groups of followers. Korea is an example for a country with strong Buddhist connections where today there are probably more who believe in Jesus than Buddha, partially because of the miracle makers.

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Astus
Date: Friday, May 25th, 2012 at 7:15 AM

Title: Re: the true nature of siddhis

Content:

kirtu said:

Praetyakabuddhas are supposed to perform miracles to help and convert people during the times between Dharma dispensations. In some stories masters and saints do the same.

Astus wrote:

There are stories, yes. But as the original question says, where are the living miracle makers in Buddhism, if siddhis exist like magic in Harry Potter's world? And miracles are very much present in Buddhism, starting with the life of Shakyamuni in the earliest texts (see: The Concept of the Buddha by Guang Xing). How should they be understood? I believe there are several factors present, like that people experience miraculous things around teachers today as well, even though it may not necessarily be the teacher's intention, therefore such events seem more like the signs of deep faith. From a subjective perspective, possessing siddhis could be about one's mind reaching new levels of consciousness. It seems quite natural that with meditation they actually appear.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 25th, 2012 at 4:47 PM

Title: Re: are the jhanas taught in zen/chan?

Content:

Astus wrote:

We don't even need to go to Dogen. The very idea of a Chan school is based on direct insight into the nature of mind. The early teachers, those from the East Mountain (Daoxin, Hongren) and what was later called as the Northern School (Shenxiu and heirs) still used some forms of specific meditation techniques, but after Heze Shenhui and the schools of Baotang, Niutou and especially Hongzhou the Chan school was defined as the direct path that does not require gradual stages like in other Mahayana schools.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, May 25th, 2012 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: are the jhanas taught in zen/chan?

Content:

bulhaeng said:

Of course in the countries where mahayana assumed a more syncretic form like China and Korea it is not easy to distinguish which practice is zen, which is not zen. Some will agree that chan is only sitting, or only sitting with a huatou, or only silent illumination. But then again, a teacher who is nominally chan/seon could teach whatever - chanting, bowing, different kinds of meditation, mantra, sutra studying - if it makes it a chan/zen practice remains for me an open question. But considering that all off today's zen schools have their root in the idea of "seeing nature", teaching gradual meditation stages seems an acquired addition.

Astus wrote:
Syncretism

I wouldn't say there was a point when in China/Korea/Vietnam they begun syncretising schools. First of all, there were never really separate schools, so it's not possible to mix them up. The exception is actually Japan where they separated Buddhism to different institutions. What happened is that Chan - actually, the idea of dharma-transmission and lineages - spread far and wide in the Song dynasty and again in the Ming dynasty in China and created a seeming unity among monastic leaders. But Chan as a school, a path, a practice was not taken up and preserved with the same enthusiasm or exclusivism.

Chan practice

There is no Chan practice really. It's not about practising something specific. What can be called distinctly Chan method is the huatou technique, which was actually made up by Dahui. And that is why any Mahayana meditation can be embraced as Chan, or rather as a preliminary to Chan.

Chan teacher

If Chan teacher is anyone with a Chan lineage, the majority of Chinese, Vietnamese and Korean monks are Chan teachers. If it means those who specialise in teaching meditation, the leaders of the meditation hall in a monastery, then it can be any kind of meditation method. Only if Chan is defined by a specific doctrine and praxis, or a set of those, can we state that the teaching given is like what Chan meant for certain ancient teachers.

Additions

As said before, the common practices are not really additions to Chan, rather they have always lived together, as both the monastic and lay community possess several methods and traditions of those practices. Exclusive Chan practice is quite rare in fact.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 26th, 2012 at 3:31 AM

Title: Re: are the jhanas taught in zen/chan?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jnana,

True, neither Changlu nor Foxin makes their meditation different from dhyana, and that statement appears only in the revised version of Fukanzazengi and the Zazengi in the Shobogenzo. But long before them there were Shenhui's criticism of all sorts of gradualism and the Platform Sutra addressing this subject more than once.

"The deluded person is attached to the characteristics of dharmas and grasps onto the samādhi of the single practice, merely saying that he always sits without moving and without falsely activating the mind and that this is the samādhi of the single practice. To have an interpretation such as this is to be the same as an insentient object! This is rather to impede the causes and conditions of enlightenment!"

"When the mind does not reside in the dharmas, one's enlightenment flows freely. For the mind to reside in the dharmas is called 'fettering oneself.' If you say that always sitting without moving is it, then you're just like Śāriputra meditating in the forest, for which he was scolded by Vimalakīrti! Good friends, there are also those who teach meditation [in terms of] viewing the mind, contemplating tranquility, motionlessness, and nonactivation. You are supposed to make an effort on the basis of these. These deluded people do not understand, and in their grasping become mixed up like all of you here. You should understand that such superficial teachings are greatly mistaken!" (Platform Sutra, ch. 4)

"In this teaching of seated meditation, one fundamentally does not concentrate on mind, nor does one concentrate on purity, nor is it motionlessness."

"Good friends, what is seated meditation (zuochan)? In this teaching, there is no impediment and no hindrance. Externally, for the mind to refrain from activating thoughts with regard to all the good and bad realms is called 'seated' (zuo). Internally, to see the motionlessness of the self-nature is called 'meditation' (chan). Good friends, what is it that is called meditative concentration (chanding; samādhi)? Externally, to transcend characteristics is 'meditation' (chan). Internally, to be undisturbed is 'concentration' (ding)." (Platform Sutra, ch. 5)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 26th, 2012 at 6:19 PM

Title: Re: are the jhanas taught in zen/chan?

Content:

Jnana said:

There's little doubt that this sort of rhetoric was the more popular and therefore more successful meme, with the consequence that important authors such as Guifeng Zongmi and Yongming Yanshou were relegated to second class status.

Astus wrote:

Zongmi put the dhyanas into the path of humans and gods, the first "chan", while the sudden teaching is in the "fifth chan". As he says, "[One who] cultivates the four stages of meditative absorption and the eight attainments is born into [one of] the heavens of the realm of form or the realm of formlessness." (Peter N. Gregory: Inquiry into the Origin of Humanity, p. 49) So it is not even the "lesser vehicle" by his assessment.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, May 26th, 2012 at 6:54 PM

Title: Re: are the jhanas taught in zen/chan?

Content:

Huifeng said:

Hmmm, well, yes. But, just saying that dhyana will only get one to the human or deva realms is not the same as saying that it is not taught. For instance, the five precepts basically is standard for rebirth as a human, but that doesn't mean that chan / zen does not teach the five precepts. The basic "five vehicles" notion - which is related to the position above from Zongmi - almost always emphasizes that the higher stages rely on the lower ones, and the higher ones cannot be attained without the lower ones. I hope you can see the distinction here. (Not to mention that there is basically no Buddhist school that indicates that dhyana is ultimate...)

Astus wrote:

Yes, all is seen in a complete view, all teachings are included. But it points out very well that what is understood by Zongmi as the Chan of the Tathagata, what the Chan School is about, is a very "minimalist" path. His definition of the Chan path is no different from what was stated by the already mentioned meditation manuals of Changlu, Foxin and Dogen, and also matches the Platform Sutra's no-thought teaching.

"If a thought arises, be aware of it; once you are aware of it, it will disappear. The excellent gate of practice lies here alone. Therefore, even though you fully cultivate all the practices, just take no mindfulness as the axiom. If you just get the mind of no mindfulness, then love and hatred will spontaneously become pale and faint, compassion and wisdom [prajna] will spontaneously increase in brightness, sinful karma will spontaneously be eliminated, and you will spontaneously be zealous in meritorious practices. With respect to understanding, it is to see that all characteristics are non-characteristics. With respect to practice, it is called the practice of non-practice. When the depravities are exhausted, the rebirth process will cease; once arising and disappearing has extinguished, calmness and illumination will become manifest, and responsive functions will be without limit. It is called becoming a buddha." (Chan Letter in "Zongmi on Chan", p. 88)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 28th, 2012 at 6:17 AM

Title: Re: are the jhanas taught in zen/chan?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Suffice it to say that there are many approaches to meditation in Buddhadharma that are to be found under the headings of Ch'an and Ch'an Ting. Ch'an Ting alone is an umbrella name for many methods: the Four Dhyanas, the Four Infinities, the Four-Void Worldly Ch'an, the Nine Observations, the Samadhi of Nine Degrees (supramundane), the Ch'an of Self-Nature and the Ch'an Ting. These approaches can lead one to deep dhyana, where real wisdom is to be found; and with real wisdom, there can be self-enlightenment, enlightenment of others and the Ultimate Perfect Enlightenment." (The Fundamentals of Meditation Practice by Ting Chen, tr. Lok To, p. 71, http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/chanmed1.pdf)

In the above book Ting Chen (about whom I have no information) gives meditation guidance mostly according to Zhiyi's manual of Six Gates and in general the samatha-vipasyana method.

"The Sweet Dews of Chan" (http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/chandew.pdf) by Cheng Kuan, who is a 20th century Chinese monk, gives a rather traditional instruction that includes the dhyanas and even meditation on a corpse.

But, as I've mentioned before, it is not easy to pinpoint what Chan stands for. Since it can include any method, there are no restrictions. On the other hand, what is called the Chan School has always embraced the direct path.

Huangbo said,

"From now on whenever walking, standing, sitting or lying down, only practise no-mind. You wait for a long time to have true realisation, because you have little strength for sudden break through. So for three, five, or even ten years you wait to obtain entrance and naturally progress then on. Because you are not that sort of person, you have the need to practise meditation and practise the path. But what does that have to do with the Buddhadharma?" (T48n2012Ap0383c05-08, my translation)

Zongmi's "sudden enlightenment, gradual practice" approach is not really different. Zongmi says, "Therefore, from the first time one produces the thought [of awakening] up to and including becoming a buddha [it is] just calm, just Knowing, immutable and uninterrupted. It is just that according to the stage [of practice] the terminology differs somewhat." (Zongmi on Chan, p. 94)

What is that gradual practice then? Jinul says,

"From this passage we see that the "no-mind which conforms with the path" of the patriarchs' school is not bound by samadhi and prajna. And why is this? The training in samadhi accords with the noumenon and absorbs all scatteredness; hence it involves the power which can forget conditioning [by lessening the entrancement with sense-objects]. The training in prajna investigates dharmas and contemplates their voidness; hence it involves the effort of effacement [by clearing away the deluded process of thought]. In the direct cognition of no-mind which frees your path of obstructions, the unhindered wisdom of liberation manifests before you and not even one sense-object or thought can enter from outside. They are nothing special; why waste your effort on them?"

(Collected Works of Chinul, p. 286-287)

Zongmi, also quoted by Jinul, explains here the meaning of gradual cultivation within Chan, as different from common gradual techniques. This matches the idea of continuing the original practice of no-thought, what in Dogen's case is called shikantaza.

"If one's practice is based on having all-at-once awakened to the realization that one's own mind is from the outset pure, that the depravities have never existed, that the nature of the wisdom without outflows is from the outset complete, that this mind is buddha, that they are ultimately without difference, then it is dhyana of the highest vehicle. This type is also known by such names as tathagata-purity dhyana, the one-practice concentration, and the thusness concentration. It is the basis of all concentrations. If one can practice it from moment to moment, one will naturally and gradually attain the myriad concentrations. This is precisely the dhyana that has been transmitted down from Bodhidharma. Before Bodhidharma arrived, all of the scholars from early times had understood only the four dhyanas [of the realm of form] and the eight concentrations [that is, those four plus the four formless concentrations of the formless realm]. Various illustrious monks had effectively practiced them, and they had all obtained results. Nanyue [Huisi] and Tiantai [Zhiyi] relied upon the principle of the three truths to practice the three tranquilizations and three viewings. Although the principles of their teachings are most perfect, their entrance gate is step-by-step. It also involves the type of dhyana mentioned above. It is only in the transmission from Bodhidharma that the practitioner all-at-once identifies with buddha substance. This is like no other gate."

(Zongmi on Chan, p. 103-104)

Hanshan Deqing advises the same,

"So called sudden enlightenment and gradual practice refers to one who has experienced a thorough enlightenment but, still has remnant habit tendencies that are not instantaneously purified. For these people, they must, implement the principles from their enlightenment that they have realized to face all circumstances of life and, bring forth the strength from their contemplation and illumination to experience their minds in difficult situations. When one portion of their experience in such situations accords[with the enlightened way], they will have actualized one portion of the Dharmakaya. When they dissolve away one portion of their deluded thinking, that is the degree to which their fundamental wisdom manifests. What is critical is seamless continuity in the practice. [For these people,] it is much more effective when they practice in different real life situations."

(<http://chancenter.org/cmc/2011/10/13/essentials-of-practice-and-enlightenment-for-beginners/>)

But there is another point that should be considered, whether one faces stronger or weaker defilements. In this case application of general methods is recommended.

"Question: Having awakened to the true mind of the third teaching, how does one practice it? Does one employ the cross-legged Chan sitting of the first teaching?

Answer: The person who is prone to turbulent, uncontrollable emotions does make use of the teaching devices of the first teaching, but the person of weak depravities and strong intellect relies on the one-practice concentration (samadhi) of Southern Chan and the third teaching. The one-practice concentration is movement and is carried out in the midst of all activities."

(Zongmi on Chan, p. 139)

Finally, Zongmi actually gives an explanation for the case when teachers have to use first the gradual methods to bring students to sudden enlightenment. And this is where the use of dhyanas fits very well.

"In a master-student transmission, [the master] must know the medicine [for each and every] disease. This means that all instructional teaching devices inherited from the past first show the original nature and then require reliance on this nature to practice dhyana. In most cases, when the nature is not easily awakened to, it is due to the grasping of characteristics. Thus, if [a master] wants to reveal this nature, he must first eradicate grasping [on the part of the student]. In [the master's] teaching devices for eradicating this grasping, he must [employ a type of rhetoric in which] common person and noble one are both cut off, merits and faults are both gotten rid of, in the precepts there is neither violation nor observance, in dhyana there is neither concentration nor distraction, the thirty-two marks are all like flowers in the sky, and the thirtyseven parts of the path⁵⁸ are all a dream or illusion. The idea is that, if [the master] enables [the student] to have a mind free of attachment, then [the student] can practice dhyana." (Zongmi on Chan, p. 119)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 28th, 2012 at 5:48 PM

Title: Re: the virtue of non-attachment in Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

It's a good beginning. Then stop being attached to non-attachment. And finally, don't create a concept of not being attached to non-attachment. So says Baizhang.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 28th, 2012 at 5:51 PM

Title: Re: pure land practices?

Content:

Nighthawk said:

I follow Honen's interpretation mostly.

Chinese Pure Land practice seems very intense.

Astus wrote:

Jodo Shu also has nenbutsu retreats.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 28th, 2012 at 9:56 PM

Title: Re: the virtue of non-attachment in Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Being patient is good. Waiting for enlightenment is delusion and incorrect practice. The patience to practise in Zen is, however, the patience of non-production of phenomena (anutpattika-dharma-ksanti). That is seeing emptiness without fear, letting go without worry.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, May 28th, 2012 at 10:46 PM

Title: Re: Daehaeng Kun Sunim

Content:

Astus wrote:

Oh, my number one living Chan master. Sad news indeed.

On the funeral:

<http://wakeupandlaugh.wordpress.com/2012/05/27/daehaeng-sunims-funeral-the-last-day/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, May 29th, 2012 at 4:33 PM

Title: Re: pure land practices?

Content:

Nighthawk said:

Honen never said it was a requirement.

Astus wrote:

There are no requirements in Buddhism. People do whatever they think is best for them, and accordingly they will get the results. You don't have to go to retreats in order to attain birth. But it is good if you have the willing and ability to separate a longer time for buddha-remembrance.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 30th, 2012 at 2:34 AM

Title: Re: Being in the Present

Content:

nirmal said:

Once the mind is concentrated, purified, bright, rid of defilement and steady, should we not direct it to investigate?

Astus wrote:

The steps of shamatha and vipashyana are like that, and they are meant to establish one in Mahamudra, what is described above in the quotes. Or, if you can, start right there.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, May 30th, 2012 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Anders

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 31st, 2012 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: Religion versus spirituality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Religion puts the emphasis on tradition, rules, structure, external authority. Spirituality puts the emphasis on individuality, modernity, personal freedom. What they hide with these terms is the opposite side. Religion exists as long as there are people who find their spirituality in it. Spirituality exists because there are other people telling what that means. We usually don't invent our own beliefs, only pick and choose from what we learn about. And we don't believe everything we are told, but only those that feel true to us. Religion gives the illusion of an ultimate truth above us. Spirituality gives the illusion of our freedom from being influenced by others.

Those who prefer religion have the idea of "spiritual people" that they are lost, they are selfish, they are heretics. Those who prefer spirituality think that religion is superficial, militaristic, old fashioned. In the end, both are simple terms for simple thinkers, who find some comfort in identifying with some general idea.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 31st, 2012 at 5:02 PM

Title: Re: Religion versus spirituality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jeeprs,

What you say, that organised religion is against any mystical experience, that sounds like the propaganda of "spiritual people". Both Eastern and Western Catholic Churches have many recognised mystic saints, and it's a living tradition, especially among Christian monastics. But preconceptions about "religion" naturally make one ignorant of all of these, because one would not even think to look for it there.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 31st, 2012 at 6:29 PM

Title: Re: Religion versus spirituality.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Let's look at this in our Buddhism. Those who think of it as their religion try to follow whatever they perceive as the true teachings (this may or may not fit others' interpretation). And those who think about themselves as spiritual people only want to use whatever they find acceptable in Buddhism but disregard the rest without much worry about it.

Thus, when it comes to debates, the religious Buddhist will probably hold fast to his view of the teachings, while the spiritual user of Buddhism won't really care but see that the religious is dogmatic. On the other hand, the religious Buddhist will see that the spiritual guy has no respect for the teachings and accepts doctrines that are not Buddhist, therefore the spiritual person is not a Buddhist but an outsider, a Dharma-lite consumer.

In fact, the religious Buddhist fails to see that s/he selects whatever school/lineage/interpretation is acceptable to him/her, and even in her/his studies and practices s/he's selective. And the spiritual fellow fails to see how s/he incorporates traditional ideas from Buddhism and other thoughts, while at the same time accepting unquestionably the attitude of individualism.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 31st, 2012 at 7:28 PM

Title: Re: Religion versus spirituality.

Content:

jeeprs said:

That assumes, however, that to be spiritual is to be someone who only wants to use whatever they find acceptable. It might not mean that at all, however. I recall the last words of the Buddha as saying 'be a light unto yourselves'. This doesn't mean 'pleasing yourself' but 'finding your own way'. In any case, this 'light' is what I regard as 'spirit', which can be distinguished from rules, methods and external forms.

Astus wrote:

That is a modern interpretation of those words, typical of an individualist view. What the Buddha says is internalising, realising the teaching.

"Therefore, Ananda, be islands unto yourselves, refuges unto yourselves, seeking no external refuge; with the Dhamma as your island, the Dhamma as your refuge, seeking no other refuge." (DN 16)

"For that which I have proclaimed and made known as the Dhamma and the Discipline, that shall be your Master when I am gone." (DN 16)

This is living a spiritual life within a religion (set of doctrines and practices). The extremes of "religion" and "spirituality" are gasping either the external structure, or relying only on personal interpretation. But the word (external) and the meaning (internal) should go together.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 31st, 2012 at 8:07 PM

Title: Re: Right Effort - How Is It Understood in Zen?

Content:

Astus wrote:

First of all, in Mahayana the eightfold path is generally forgotten, and usually reduced to the threefold training of morality, meditation and wisdom. In stead, there are the six paramitas, what has the virya paramita (paramita of vigour/effort/diligence). And then if we go to Chan, such gradual and detailed practices are mostly left behind and focus is on realising the buddha-mind, and that is mostly equivalent to prajna paramita. So we arrive to Dogen - who is, however, not the only source of Soto Zen - who transforms Zen into shikantaza, just sitting, and in that the primary thing is non-thinking (hishiryo). When there is non-thinking, it is pointless to talk about effort or no effort. What we may interpret, if we really want to, as right effort, is keeping non-thinking.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, May 31st, 2012 at 8:08 PM

Title: Re: name change

Content:

Astus wrote:

Contact an admin.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 1st, 2012 at 6:27 AM

Title: Re: Right Effort - How Is It Understood in Zen?

Content:

Astus wrote:

In "Sanjuushichihon bodai bunpou" (Thirty-seven Elements of Bodhi) Dogen does give some explanation for right effort. Here it is quoted from the Nishijima translation.

SBGZ 60 [SZTP] /70 [Shasta] /73 [Nishijima] said:

The Four Kinds of Right Restraint (Also called the four kinds of right exertion)

The first is to prevent bad that has not yet occurred.

The second is to cause to be extinguished bad that has already occurred.

The third is to cause to occur good that has not yet occurred.

The fourth is to promote the good that has already occurred.

“To prevent bad that has not yet occurred”: What is called bad does not always have established forms and grades; the term has been established land by land and sphere by sphere. Nevertheless, prevention of that which has not yet occurred is called the Buddha-Dharma, and we have received its authentic transmission. They say that in the understanding of non-Buddhists the prime val self is seen as fundamental, but in the Buddha-Dharma we should not be like that. Now, let us inquire, at the time when “bad has not yet occurred,” where is it? To say that it will exist in the future is to be forever a non-Buddhist of nihilism. To say that the future becomes the present is not an insistence of the Buddha-Dharma: the three times would have to be confused. If the three times were confused, all dharmas would be confused. If all dharmas were confused, real form would be confused. If real form were confused, buddhas alone, together with buddhas, would be confused. For this reason, we do not say that the future will, in future, become the present. Let us inquire further: what thing does “bad that has not yet occurred” describe? Who has known it or seen it? For it to be known and seen, there must be a time of its nonoccurrence and a time of something other than its nonoccurrence. In that case, it could not be called something that had not yet occurred. It would have to be called something that has already vanished. Without studying under non-Buddhists or śrāvakas and others of the Small Vehicle, we should learn in practice “the prevention of bad that has not yet occurred.” All the bad in the universe is called “bad that has not yet occurred,” and it is bad that does not appear. Nonappearance means “yesterday preaching an established rule, today preaching an exception to the rule.”

“To cause to be extinguished bad that has already occurred”: “Already occurring” means totally happening. Totally happening means half-happening. Half-happening means what is happening here and now. What is happening here and now is obstructed by happening itself; it has sprung free from the brains of happening. Causing this [bad] to be extinguished describes Devadatta’s living body entering hell, and Devadatta’s living body attaining affirmation; it describes a living body entering a donkey’s womb, and a living body becoming buddha.³¹ Grasping this principle, we should learn in practice what “causing extinction” means. Extinction means springing free from extinction and getting clear of it.

“To cause to occur good that has not yet occurred” is satisfaction with the features we had before our parents were born, is clarification prior to the sprouting of creation, and is understanding preceding Majestic Sound.

“To promote the good that has already occurred”: Remember, this does not speak of causing to occur the good that has already occurred; it is about promoting [good]. It is [the Buddha], having seen for himself the bright star, going on to make others see the bright star; it is eyes becoming the bright star; it is “confusion being followed by thirty years of not lacking for salt and vinegar.” For example: because we are promoting [good], [good] is already happening, and so “the ravine being deep, the dipper’s handle is long,” and “only because we had it did he come.”

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 1st, 2012 at 11:46 PM

Title: Re: Right Effort - How Is It Understood in Zen?

Content:

greentreeee said:

hi,

i'm just curious as to the origination of the eightfold path. ie; textual references etc.

Astus wrote:

Not specifically a Zen related question, but here it is, the very first teaching of the Buddha in the early scriptures (Zen follows the East Asian view that the first teaching of the Buddha was the Avatamsaka Sutra):

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn56/sn56.011.than.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 2nd, 2012 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: Buddha on Romantic Relationships - Personal Empirical Observ

Content:

Astus wrote:

This is in the "Personal experience" section because the initial question is about one's personal experience regarding relationship and Buddhism. Impersonal theories can go to other threads. Thank you.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 3rd, 2012 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: 84,000 illnesses of the mind

Content:

Astus wrote:

The number "84,000" is only a figure of speech in Buddhism and it simply means many. As for the "illnesses of the mind" you can find the different abhidharma works that list the unwholesome dharmas, and another popular source in East Asian Buddhism is the Surangama Sutra's fifty skandha demons.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 4th, 2012 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: Do Theravadins have anything similar to Dzogchen?

Content:

Astus wrote:

From a practical point of view, insight into impermanence, the rise and fall of phenomena, is the same as self-liberation. Realising that the nature of mind is empty matches the insight into selflessness.

But, in theory, Dzogchen is very far from Theravada.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 5th, 2012 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: Do Theravadins have anything similar to Dzogchen?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Anders and Jnana,

How does that question relate to Dzogchen where the three bodies are immediately perfect in the nature of mind, and buddhahood is attained without effort? Not much discussion of any arduous bodhisattva path where everything is already perfect.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 5th, 2012 at 12:26 AM

Title: Re: Do Theravadins have anything similar to Dzogchen?

Content:
Astus wrote:
Anders,

I just meant that the presence of the bodhisattva path is not really relevant in this case in my opinion.

Here's one from Ajahn Sumedho,

"That's when you hear the sound of silence, because your mind is just in that state of attention; in pure awareness there's no self, it's like this. Then to learn to relax into that, to trust it, but not to try and hold onto it. We can't even grasp the idea of that — "I've got to get the sound of silence and I've got to relax into it". This is the dodgy part of any kind of technique or instruction, because it is easy to grasp the idea. Bhàvanà (meditation or cultivation) isn't grasping ideas or coming from any position, but in this pañipadà, this practice, it's recognising and realising through awakened awareness, through a direct knowing."

(Intuitive Awareness, p. 104 - http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/intuitive-awareness.pdf)

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, June 5th, 2012 at 2:25 AM
Title: Re: Do Theravadins have anything similar to Dzogchen?
Content:

Astus wrote:
What I talk about is the practical side of both Theravada and Dzogchen (or any other vehicle for that matter). There are lot of theories about stages of progress, small and big future goals, and so on. However, when it comes down to the essential wisdom to be realised and practised, it's the same all over. This is prajnaparamita, to use a common Mahayana expression. The mind people have works in the same way, either there is attachment or there isn't, either it is the conditioned or the unconditioned. There is a large variety in conditioned phenomena, but the unconditioned is equal everywhere and for everyone. Theravada, Mahayana and Vajrayana all aim for realising the unconditioned and functioning from the unconditioned.

In terms of meditation, this is seeing that thoughts come and go. When grasped, thoughts proliferate. When left alone, they are unhindered. In this there is no difference whether it's Theravada, Mahayana or Vajrayana. It is just how mind works.

And as an extra, here's a nice teaching from Manjusri,

The Elder Subhuti asked Manjusri, "Do you not explain the Dharma of the Sravaka-vehicle to the Sravakas?"

"I follow the Dharmas of all the vehicles."

Subhuti asked, "Are you a Sravaka, a Pratyekabuddha, or a Worthy One, a Supremely Enlightened One?"

"I am a Sravaka, but my understanding does not come through the speech of others. I am a Pratyekabuddha, but I do not abandon great compassion or fear anything. I am a Worthy One, a Supremely Enlightened ONE, but I still do not give up my original vows."

Subhuti asked, "Why are you a Sravaka?"

"Because I cause sentient beings to hear the Dharma they have not heard."

"Why are you a Pratyekabuddha?"

"Because I thoroughly comprehend the dependent origination of all dharmas."

"Why are you a Worthy One, a Supremely Enlightened One?"

"Because I realize that all things are equal in the dharmadhatu."

Subhuti asked, "Manjusri, in what stage do you really abide?"

"I abide in every stage."

Subhuti asked, "Could it be that you also abide in the stage of ordinary people?"

Manjusri said, "I definitely abide in the stage of ordinary people."

Subhuti asked, "With what esoteric implication do you say so?"

"I say so because all dharmas are equal by nature."

Subhuti asked, "If all dharmas are equal, where are such dharmas as the stages of Sravakas, Pratyekabuddhas, Bodhisattvas, and Buddhas established?"

Manjusri answered, "As an illustration, consider the empty space in the ten directions. People speak of the eastern space, the southern space, the western space, the northern space, the four intermediate spaces, the space above, the space below, and so forth. Such distinctions are spoken of, although the empty space itself is devoid of distinctions. In like manner, virtuous one, the various stages are established in the ultimate emptiness of all things, although the emptiness itself is devoid of distinctions." (The Inconceivable State of Buddhahood in "A Treasury of Mahayana Sutras", p. 30-31)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 5th, 2012 at 2:32 AM

Title: Re: The Mahaparinirvana Sutra

Content:

Spirituality said:

That was way more than necessary, but clear, at least in this translation. You're right: in this translation this sutra does teach Buddha is eternal and is, as such, hard to reconcile with traditional Buddhism.

I'd love to hear what someone with access to the original language who knows something of the Buddhist history of ideas has to say about this text.

Astus wrote:

Reconcile with which traditional Buddhism? Do you mean Theravada? Just because Mahayana seemingly has many teachings not in accord with Theravada. Otherwise, however, the Nirvana Sutra is a basis of traditional Buddhism, at least in East Asia. The Buddha is eternal. But this eternity is the unborn nature of all, it is the dharmadhatu. In other words, emptiness.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 5th, 2012 at 2:35 AM

Title: Re: Do Theravadins have anything similar to Dzogchen?

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Does anyone know which Sutra I'm referring to here?

Astus wrote:

Perhaps these suttas:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an01/an01.049.than.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 5th, 2012 at 6:30 PM

Title: Re: Do Theravadins have anything similar to Dzogchen?

Content:

Jnana said:

I think it's prudent to acknowledge specifics. With the Theravāda & Sarvāstivāda śrāvakamārga, experience is reducible to momentary minds, mental factors, and forms, all of which are to be recognized as impermanent, unsatisfactory, and selfless. The purpose of these recognitions is to sequentially terminate the ten fetters and attain liberation.

With the dzogchen rang grol lam, experience is reducible to rigpa and the display of rigpa, which is to be recognized as alpha pure and spontaneously perfect. Thus whatever arises is naturally liberated without being established or recognized as "this" or "that" phenomenon, and there's nothing whatsoever to accept or reject.

Astus wrote:

What you describe is difference in theory, in explanation of what goes on. Insight into the three attributes is non-conceptual even in Theravada, and that is when they are the three doors of liberation. That's why I see little difference in practice.

From Mahasi Sayadaw's (quoting from him since he relies more on classical works than Ajahn Mun's lineage) "Fundamentals of Vipassana Meditation"

(http://www.mahasi.org.mm/e_pdf/E09pdf.PDF):

"But the present phenomenon is what comes up at the six doors right now. It has not yet been defiled. It is like an unsoiled piece of cloth or paper. If you are quick enough to meditate on it just as it comes up, it will not be defiled. You fail to note it and it get defiled. Once defiled, it cannot be undefiled. If you fail to note the mind-and matter as it rises, grasping intervenes."

"If you meditate, you find that what you see passes away, what you hear passes away. They pass away in no time at all. Once you see them as they really are, there is nothing to love, nothing to hate, nothing to cling to. If there is nothing to cling to, there can be no clinging or grasping."

"When one is well-practised in insight meditation, after the arising of life-continuum following the seeing process, insight consciousness that reviews "seeing" takes place. You must try to be able to thus meditate immediately. If you are able to do so, it appears in your intellect as though you were meditating on things as they are seen, as they just arise. This kind of meditation is termed in the Suttas as "meditation on the present.""

"If you fail to meditate even at the apprehending, you get to form process and name process. Then graspings come in. If you meditate after the emergence of grasping, they will not disappear. That is why we instruct you to meditate immediately, before the concepts arise."

"You note it the moment it arises. You note it and it ends right there. Sometimes as wandering of the mind is about to arise. You note it and it quiets down."

"So, if you note the moment you see, hear, touch, or perceive, no subsequent consciousness will arise to bring about graspings.

" you will simply have the sight of the things seen, the sound of the things heard, the sense of the things sensed, and the idea of the thing cognized."

As this extract from Mælukyaputta Sutta shows, the mere sight, the mere sound, the mere sense, the mere idea is there. Recall them and only the real nature you have understood will appear. No graspings. The meditator who meditates on what ever arises as it arises sees how everything arises and passes away, and it becomes clear to him how everything is impermanent, suffering, not self. He knows this for himself- not because a teacher has explained it to him. This only is the real knowledge."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 5th, 2012 at 9:11 PM

Title: Re: Do Theravadins have anything similar to Dzogchen?

Content:

Astus wrote:

OK, I can be wrong about Mahasi Sayadaw's vipassana, although it seems to me that since he talks about immediately noting whatever arises, it's not the same kind of mental noting as when one actually says the word in one's head. IIRC, in another book he explained that such pronounced noting is eventually dropped, which makes sense to me. If needed, I can try to find that work, but can't remember the title now. He follows the description of the Visuddhimagga about the steps of vipassana, so I assume he is a proper representative of traditional Theravada.

Jnana said:

What the classical theras consider to be non-conceptual is still considered conceptual for mādhyamikas, and hence, for dzogchen as well.

Astus wrote:

Do you say that because they use the term dhammas appearing and disappearing?

"As this extract from Mælukyaputta Sutta shows, the mere sight, the mere sound, the mere sense, the mere idea is there. Recall them and only the real nature you have understood will appear. No graspings. The meditator who meditates on what ever arises as it arises sees how everything arises and passes away, and it becomes clear to him how everything is impermanent, suffering, not self."

How is this different from the simple coming and going of phenomena as given in Madhyamaka, Chan or Vajrayana?

Anders said:

There is nothing to note there nor anything to meditate upon.

Astus wrote:

What is it then here where there is just being aware of experience immediately?

Anders said:

And 'theory' does impact method. to a certain extent. Mahasi Sadyaw works within a framework of freeing oneself from affliction. In the aforementioned ones, there is nothing to attain and Klesha and Bodhi are considered nondual. These kind of assumptions (or lack of same) embedded into the method ('theory') are quite relevant in terms of contrivance and effort. This is how sudden Chan distinguishes itself from gradual practise and how Dzogchen and Mahamudra distinguishes itself from the lower vehicles.

Astus wrote:

Oh, I don't mean to say that they are totally the same. Obviously they are not. However, my point is that, like in this case Mahasi's method, while goes through several steps, which makes it a gradual instruction, the most advanced method in it matches Chan and Dzogchen. This is similar to the relationship between Tiantai and Chan, or Madhyamaka and Mahamudra.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 5th, 2012 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Do Theravadins have anything similar to Dzogchen?

Content:

Jnana said:

A Theravāda yogi observes the rise and fall of mind and matter. Through this observation s/he recognizes the universal characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa) of impermanence, etc., which are common to all conditioned phenomena.

A Madhyamaka yogi removes the vikalpas of "mind" and "matter" and observes unestablished suchness. Here, all phenomena are unestablished (sarvadharmāpratiṣṭhāna), and there are no "things" to observe, neither the unique particulars (svalakṣaṇa) of objects nor the universals such as impermanence, etc.

This latter Madhyamaka insight is axiomatic for chan, chagchen, and dzogchen.

Astus wrote:

Do you mean that in case of Theravada concepts remain, and the yogi identifies those concepts as the ultimate reality? Don't they realise suchness?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 5th, 2012 at 10:15 PM

Title: Re: Do Theravadins have anything similar to Dzogchen?

Content:

Jnana said:

Right, what the classical Theravāda & Sarvāstivāda consider to be ultimates (mind, mental factors, and matter) are not considered ultimates from a Madhyamaka perspective. They are merely conceptually designated and the basis of these designations are mere appearances.

Astus wrote:

I know they have a different view of paramattha dhamma, and so there is difference. Although I find that since mind, mental factors and matter are conditioned even in Theravada, it agrees somewhat with Madhyamaka. But OK, if it goes down to practice in the way you just pointed out that one has to create these cognitions about the specific dhamma and their impermanence, etc., it does not match Dzogchen, and I have misinterpreted what Mahasi says.

What is left then is the lineage of Ajahn Mun where they don't apply abhidhamma but a different way. What do you say of that?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 5th, 2012 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: Do Theravadins have anything similar to Dzogchen?

Content:

Jnana said:

Well, the Thai forest lineage is a bit more diverse and idiosyncratic with regard to view. But the purpose of insight meditation here too (for a yogi following the śrāvaka path of liberation) is to recognize impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and selflessness, and thereby induce dispassion and the cessation of the fetters.

Astus wrote:

Well, OK then. Classic Theravada is unlike Dzogchen. Thanks for the correction.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 5th, 2012 at 11:55 PM

Title: Re: The Mahaparinirvana Sutra

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

emptiness isnt considered dharmadhatu in tathagatagarbha,(the nirvana sutra/Lotus sutra) states it was teachings to help one end tainted individual self(false self) not the actual goal.

Astus wrote:

Consider these passages from the Nirvana Sutra. Page number is according to the common PDF edition.

"The Truth is the Tathagata. The Tathagata is the True; the True is the Void; the Void is the True; the True is the Buddha-Nature; the Buddha-Nature is the True."

(p. 159)

"O good man! All that is made is not eternal. The Void is not anything made. So, it is eternal. The Buddha-Nature is not what is made. So, it is eternal. "The Void is the Buddha-Nature; the Buddha-Nature is the Tathagata; the Tathagata is not what has been made. What has not been made is Eternal."

(p. 162)

"How does the Bodhisattva meditate on the Void of nature ["prakrti-shunyata" - Emptiness of primordial matter]? This Bodhisattva-mahasattva sees that the original nature of all elements is all void. These are the five skandhas, the 18 realms, the 12 spheres, the Eternal, the non-Eternal, suffering, Bliss, the Pure, the impure, Self, and non-Self. In all such things, he sees no nature of their own. This is how the Bodhisattva-mahasattva meditates on the Void of nature."

(p. 194)

"When the Bodhisattva-mahasattva practises Great Nirvana, he knows and sees the universe and he realises that the real state is all-void and that there is nothing that one possesses, and that there is nothing that has any mode of harmonisation or perception. And what he gains is such a phase [state of realisation] as the unbreakable [i.e. undefiled], non-doing, the phantomic, the burning flame of the hot season, and the all-empty phase of a gandharvan castle."

(p. 257)

"He practises "Paramartha-satya" [Ultimate Reality] and the Ultimate Void. Why? Because all Bodhisattvas always thoroughly practise the natures and characteristics of the Void. By practising the Void, he can now know what he did not know in the past. What does he know? He knows that there is no self and what one possesses. All beings have the Buddha-Nature. He knows that by reason of the Buddha-Nature, even the icchantika, when he abandons the mind that he possesses, can indeed attain unsurpassed Enlightenment. Such is not what sravakas and pratyekabuddhas can know."

(p. 282)

"Now, hearing Dharma relates to the 11 shunyatās. Due to these voids, we see no form in anything. Now, hearing Dharma begins with the first aspiration and proceeds up to the ultimate unsurpassed Bodhi Mind. By gaining the first aspiration, one gains Great Nirvana. Through hearing, one does not gain Great Nirvana; by practising, one attains Great Nirvana."

(p. 293)

"What is the True? One knows well the phases of Nirvana, the Buddha-Nature, the Tathagata, Dharma, the priest, the Real State, and the Void. This is what is True."

(p. 296)

"The Buddha-Nature is none other than the All-Void of "Paramartha-satya" [Ultimate Truth]. The All-Void of "Paramartha-satya" is Wisdom. We say "All-Void".

(p. 318)

"The Middle Path is the Buddha-Nature. For this reason, the Buddha-Nature is Eternal and there is no change. As ignorance overspreads [them], all beings are unable to see. The sravaka and pratyekabuddha see the All-Void of all things. But they do not see the non-Void. Or they see the non-Self of all things, but they do not see the Self. Because of this, they are unable to gain the All-Void of "Paramartha-satya". Since they fail to gain the All-Void of "Paramartha-satya", they fail to enact the Middle Path. Since there is no Middle Path, there is no seeing of the Buddha- Nature."

(p. 319)

"The samadhi resultant from right thinking is right meditation. One abiding in right meditation sees all things as Void. This is right Wisdom. One perfect in right Wisdom segregates his self from all the bonds of defilement. This is Emancipation. "The person who has gained Emancipation praises it to all beings and says that this Emancipation is Eternal and Unchanging. This is the correct praising of Emancipation. This is unsurpassed Mahaparinirvana."

(p. 327)

"The Buddha-Nature of beings is not-one and not-two. The equality spoken of regarding all Buddhas is like the Void. All beings possess it. Anybody who indeed practises the Noble Eightfold Path gains - one should know - a bright view."

(p. 352)

"The Eternal of the Tathagata is the Self. The Dharmakaya "[Dharma-Body]" of the Tathagata is unboundedness, unobstructedness, birthlessness, undyingness, and the eight unmolestednesses. This is the Self. The beings, truth to tell, do not have such a Self and what the Self possesses. Only because of the fact that a person absolutely attains the absolute Void of "Paramartha-satya" do we say the Buddha-Nature."

(p. 389)

"The Buddha-Nature of the being is like the Void. The Void is not past, not future, and not present. it is not in, nor out; it is not within the boundaries of colour, sound, taste, and touch. It is the same with the Buddha-Nature."

(p. 414)

"If there is nothing, this is the Void. The same is the case with the Buddha-Nature, too. O good man! As the Void is empty, it does not fall into the category of the Three Times. As the Buddha-Nature is Eternal, it is not within the category of the Three Times."

(p. 440)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 6th, 2012 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: The Mahaparinirvana Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Malcolm,

I'm not doubting Hodge's expertise at all. However, the quotes I collected are from different parts of the sutra. In fact, at the final part it has explanations on the differentiation between what is void and what is non-void. Also, the Nirvana Sutra played an important role in Tiantai and to some extent in Chan. Neither of them had problem matching it with the teachings of Prajnaparamita and Mind Only. As for those who specialised in the Nirvana Sutra before Tiantai, I don't know about them.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 6th, 2012 at 3:35 AM

Title: Re: The Mahaparinirvana Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Malcolm,

I find that last section part quite in line with the eternalist idea, even if it is something added later. I don't see that in East Asia they had a problem with this. In fact, although this did not really exist in India, the whole East Asian branch - or rather as it evolved - can be called tathagatagarbha-vada. They had no Hindus around to debate on the atman-anatman issue, so names like the True Self is still alive, and the four attributes of buddha-nature as stated in the Nirvana Sutra is taught.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 6th, 2012 at 4:57 AM

Title: Re: The Great Cloud Mountain Temple Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Your consciousness presents Awareness to Itself energetically as sensory reality."

Is there consciousness and Awareness? What is presenting energetically?

"Is there a reason for this happening? No, there is no "reason.""

Do you mean that things just appear without cause?

"How could things exist without concepts such as time and space, self and other..."

Are you proposing that there is an order of concepts from fundamental to advanced?

"Because there are illusory things there seems to be Karma"

So first there are illusory things, then there is karma? Are they separate, or hierarchical?
What about karma causing illusory things?

"By regaining original mind in a flash"

How exactly? And why does it dissolve things and karma?

"all things appear as no-things"

What is the difference?

"To live more or less constantly in this Non Abiding No-State (Mu Ju Shin) is the goal of Zen."

More or less constantly? Either it is constant or not. Why more or less?

"The direct way to Great Enlightenment is via letting go of names and forms for intense, sometimes rapturous but always inexplicable physical sensations."

What does this enlighten one about? Getting intense and rapturous sensations without any sense, sounds more like some drug induced state. And if all is Awareness, why is the emphasis on physical?

"Do some Zen!"

What is doing Zen?

"Great Enlightenment cannot be experienced -- it is the direct way of experiencing."

Aren't all experiences direct? If it is not immediate, it is not an experience, is it?

"This headless Zen way is purely physical (mystical)"

Do you mean that out of the six sensory faculties one is lost?

"Doing Zen makes talk and writing seem crazy and superfluous."

Then it is stupid Zen. Nobody should do such a thing.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 6th, 2012 at 2:58 PM

Title: Re: Do Theravadins have anything similar to Dzogchen?

Content:

Anders said:

An open-minded Theravadin studying descriptions of trekcho would probably equate it with the opening of the Dhamma Eye experienced by stream-entrants. At least those whose depictions of Nirvana are similar such as much of the thai forest tradition and such.

Astus wrote:

That's what I was talking about when connecting self-liberation with the rise and fall of dhamma. I guess I did it poorly.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 6th, 2012 at 3:49 PM

Title: Re: The Mahaparinirvana Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

As I see it, the Nirvana Sutra uses the word "Void" in different contexts with different meanings. Just as you said, there is a list for 11 kinds, but there can be more depending on context. But let's take a different turn on this. Can you give a definition of buddha-nature? In everyday terms possibly. Then we can match it with whatever meaning of emptiness, or we can't.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 6th, 2012 at 6:20 PM

Title: Re: Wish List - Real Dharma Free for All

Content:

Astus wrote:

Great ideas, although little to do with this forum. You should perhaps find someone with the necessary programming skills to create the structure, then upload and maintain all the data.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 7th, 2012 at 2:50 AM

Title: Re: Baloney! and Jundo Cohen

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't see anything strange about this. He is in agreement with the classic Zen style of iconoclasm, of internalisation and pointing to the mind as the only real buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 7th, 2012 at 3:18 AM

Title: Re: Baloney! and Jundo Cohen

Content:

shel said:

No one said it was strange. In fact I've suggested that it's common.

Astus wrote:

So, what I said that it is in agreement with a style. If by common you mean that there are Zen teachers who talk ill of the Mahayana sutras, that is not a usual practice at all, and never was. It's equivalent of slandering the Dharma. The result of this is that his followers will not study the teachings and so fail to understand it. The idea that "Buddha was only human" - what is called "secular Buddhism" - is failing to understand the complexity and the meaning of Mahayana teachings about buddhahood. But, considering the audience, this sentiment is what they probably like to hear from their teacher. Also, the whole Dogen Sangha seems to be like this.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 7th, 2012 at 3:39 PM

Title: Re: The Mahaparinirvana Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

So, let's look at that definition then, if you say it covers all there is to cover.

Unknown said:

"O good man! The Buddha-Nature is none other than the All-Void of "Paramartha-satya" [Ultimate Truth]. The All-Void of "Paramartha-satya" is Wisdom. We say "All-Void". This does not refer to no Void [any Voidness], nor non-Void. Knowledge ["jnana"] sees the Void and the non-Void, the Eternal and the non-Eternal, Suffering and Bliss, the Self and the non-Self. The Void refers to all births and deaths. The Non-Void refers to Great Nirvana. And the non-Self is nothing but birth and death. The Self refers to Great Nirvana. "If one sees the All-Void, but does not see the non-Void, we do not speak of this as the Middle Path. Or if one sees the non-Self of all things, but does not see the Self, we do not call this the Middle Path.

"The Middle Path is the Buddha-Nature. For this reason, the Buddha-Nature is Eternal and there is no change. As ignorance overspreads [them], all beings are unable to see. The sravaka and pratyekabuddha see the All-Void of all things. But they do not see the non-Void. Or they see the non-Self of all things, but they do not see the Self. Because of this, they are unable to gain the All-Void of "Paramartha-satya". Since they fail to gain the All-Void of "Paramartha-satya", they fail to enact the Middle Path. Since there is no Middle Path, there is no seeing of the Buddha-Nature."

"O good man! There are three seeings of the Middle Path [i.e. constituting the Middle Path]. The one is the definitely blissful action; the second is the definitely sorrowful action; the third is the sorrow-bliss action.

Astus wrote:

Summing it up:

All-Void is the Void of all things, the non-Self of all things AND the non-Void of Buddha-Nature, the Self of Buddha-Nature.

So, there are all things, the five aggregates and the six faculties, and they are selfless, empty. And there is buddha-nature which is Self, non-Void. But, if we look at ourselves, our present experience, what else is there beyond the five aggregates and six faculties? And I mean right now. Can you point at it?

My take on this is that since there can't be anything else besides all things (five aggregates, six faculties), buddha-nature is actually the non-attachment to things, just as in Yogacara's three nature teaching. And that non-attachment is the basic nature, the eternal self, which is equivalent to emptiness. But, if you say this is not so, please explain what then is buddha-nature outside of all things.

The <http://www.fodian.net/world/1666.htm> says,

1. Truly Empty

Suchness is empty because from the beginning it has never been related to any defiled states of existence, it is free from all marks of individual distinction of things, and it has nothing to do with thoughts conceived by a deluded mind. It should be understood that the essential nature of Suchness is neither with marks nor without marks; neither not with marks nor not without marks; nor is it both with and without marks simultaneously; it is neither with a single mark nor with different marks; neither not with a single mark nor not with different marks; nor is it both with a single and with different marks simultaneously. In short, since all unenlightened men discriminate with their deluded minds from moment to moment, they are alienated from Suchness; hence, the definition "empty"; but once they are free from their deluded minds, they will find that there is nothing to be negated.

2. Truly Nonempty

Since it has been made clear that the essence of all things is empty, i.e., devoid of illusions, the true Mind is eternal, permanent, immutable, pure, and self-sufficient; therefore, it is called "nonempty." And also there is no trace of particular marks to be noted in it, as it is the sphere that transcends thoughts and is in harmony with enlightenment alone.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 8th, 2012 at 7:16 AM

Title: Re: The Mahaparinirvana Sutra

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

yea the jivitaka principle itself(spelled that wrong I think simple meaning is life force) you dont need the 5 aggregates or 6 tainted faculties to exist.I wouldnt say it is BEYOND those things but their is life in the formless realms which doesn't contain, sight, smell, touch, hearing, the only thing present is awareness of existence (like being in darkness) to me it's a scary place to exist in.

This shows that you don't need the 5 aggregates to exist. Next what is beyond it is the rupa/dharmakaya of the Buddha chapter 5 on the Adamantine Body this is what is BEYOND our 5 aggregate.

Astus wrote:

Identifying buddha-nature with the life force (jīvitendriya or simply jīva) is a strange idea, since believing that the life force is the self is among the four mistaken identifications as you can read in the Diamond Sutra (jīvagrāha) and others. It is still part of samsara, and a common mistaken view of Hindus (<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Jiva>).

As for the formless realms, four of the five aggregates are only mental, and they are present there. What in chapter five the Buddha says regarding the aggregates and faculties is, "He is no skandha, sphere or realm, and yet he is the skandha, sphere, and realm." What can we make of this?

Nagarjuna says (Mūlamadhyamakakārikā, tr. from "Ocean of Reasoning"):

"If the aggregates were the self,
It would have to arise and cease.
If it were different from the aggregates,
It would not have the characteristics of the aggregates."
(18.1)

So, if the self is same as the aggregates, that means the self is impermanent. How could then it be truly a self? But, if it is different from the aggregates, such a self would have no ability to sense, perceive, comprehend or experience anything at all. Certainly such a self would be useless and meaningless. So in the same chapter we also find this:

"The Buddhas have designated a self;
And have taught that there is no self;
And also have taught that
There is neither self nor selflessness."

So, as we know from the Nirvana Sutra too, there is the self-view of ordinary people, the teaching of selflessness of the śrāvakas, and the teaching of true self of the buddha-nature. And that true self is neither the self of ordinary people nor the selflessness of śrāvakas. What is the true self then? Nagarjuna also says there:

"Through the elimination of karma and affliction there is nirvana.
Karma and affliction come from conceptual thought.
These come from mental fabrication.
Fabrication ceases through emptiness."

The chapter on the Adamantine Body sums up succinctly, saying: "We cannot express."

and also "It is the All-Wonderful, the one Eternal, and the one not presumable." This one the Samdhinirmocana Sutra (ch. 2, tr. Keenan) explains clearly:

"Good son, the term 'conditioned' is a provisional word invented by the First Teacher. Now, if it is a provisional word invented by the First Teacher, then it is a verbal expression apprehended by imagination. And if it is a verbal expression apprehended by imagination, then, in the final analysis, such an imagined description does not validate a real thing. Therefore, the conditioned does not exist. Good son, the term 'unconditioned' is also invented from language [and it also validates nothing real].
"Furthermore, besides the conditioned and the unconditioned, any other expression that exists in language is the same. But, it might be objected, is it not true that there are no expressions without some [corresponding] reality? What, then, is the reality here? I would reply that it is that reality apart from language and realized in the perfect awakening of the saints through their holy wisdom and insight apart from all names and words. It is because they desire to lead others to realize perfect awakening that they provisionally establish [such expressions] as 'the conditioned' as verbal descriptions.
"Good son, the term 'unconditioned' is also a word provisionally invented by the First Teacher. Now, if the First Teacher provisionally invented this word, then it is a verbal expression apprehended by imagination. And, if it is a verbal expression apprehended by imagination, then, in the final analysis, such an imagined description does not validate a real thing. Therefore, the unconditioned does not exist. Good son, the term 'conditioned' is also invented from language [and it validates nothing real].
"Besides 'the unconditioned' and 'the conditioned,' any other expression that exists in language is the same. But [some may object], is it not true that there are no expressions without some [corresponding] reality? What then is that reality here? I would reply that it is that reality apart from language and realized in the perfect awakening of the saints through their wisdom and insight apart from all names and words. It is because they desire to lead others to realize perfect awakening that they establish [such expressions] as 'the unconditioned' as verbal descriptions."

Thus both self and selflessness are verbal fabrications, nothing more. True Self is beyond language constructs, it is the very understanding that everything there is is simply conceptual imagination.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 8th, 2012 at 5:59 PM

Title: Re: Kensho and Satori

Content:

Matylda said:

Yes it is amazing if we can take a perspective since we are not used to it in daily events, but that has nothing to do with satori...

Astus wrote:

Let's say that it's a start, to see that like and dislike are created by the mind. Identifying a neutral, non-interested state as satori is limited, sure. What the nature of mind is does not depend on different states of mind and it is present regardless of them. Whether something looks beautiful, ugly or uninteresting, these are just emotional states. Awareness itself is found in each of them, but it's not the same as any of them. Not abiding, not grasping, not identifying with any of them is being free. Clinging to neutrality therefore is mistaken.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 8th, 2012 at 7:10 PM

Title: Re: Kensho and Satori

Content:

Matylda said:

Self understanding is pretty misleading in zen, specially when it comes to satori or kensho.

Astus wrote:

Just a small note: any kind of understanding is misleading. If it's my view, or another's view, they are still a view. The correct view therefore is no view. How to be free from views? Discipline, study, practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 8th, 2012 at 7:18 PM

Title: Re: Anyone else bored to tears with this Dzogchen forum lately?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think that as long as it is taboo to talk about Dzogchen itself, all there is to talk about is X related to (whatever meaning you attribute to) Dzogchen.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 8th, 2012 at 7:43 PM

Title: Re: Kensho and Satori

Content:

Matylda said:

wow, still no view is a view. if no view is considered one has to know also no-discipline, no-study, and no-practice. There is nothing wrong with dsp, as far as they help. Look at the famous verses in Tangyo, when the 6th patriarch Daikan Eno wrote in response to the head monk verse. Anyway Yuimakyo, or Vimalakirti nirdesha sutra is good source to have some idea about it. To point unconditioned and support it by conditioned is sort of illogical. But the final point is beyond all of these. Master Torei's teaching in his Discourse on the Inexhaustible Lamp is also helpful.

Astus wrote:

No view is a view if one fails to understand no view and makes it a view. Reification of emptiness is simply a wrong view.

That's what discipline, study and practice is for, to help. It is not illogical at all to follow "conditioned" methods (in fact, there are no other methods) in order to assist in reaching the unconditioned. Even when it is reduced to the simplest mindfulness practice, it is still a technique, just like Huineng's no-thought is a method.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 8th, 2012 at 7:52 PM

Title: Re: Anyone else bored to tears with this Dzogchen forum lately?

Content:

Simon E. said:

I dont think "taboo" is quite right Astus. It is simply not possible to do more than talk AROUND Dzogchen.

Astus wrote:

When you say "around Dzogchen", you must already have an idea what Dzogchen is. If you have no idea, then there is nothing to talk around either.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 8th, 2012 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Kensho and Satori

Content:

Matylda said:

If we talk about general mahayana that can be true. What about zen? "Method" in Daikan's teaching is basically what could be easily misunderstood. He pointed it over and over again. Look again at his verse. It clears away all misconceptions.

Astus wrote:

I assume you mean this poem,

"Bodhi is fundamentally without any tree;
The bright mirror is also not a stand.
Fundamentally there is not a single thing—
Where could any dust be attracted?"

Now, here there is no method described, it is simply a statement that the nature is originally pure, therefore it doesn't have to be purified. That means the simplest method there is is to realise the nature of mind. The way to do that is what Huineng calls no-thought (Platform Sutra, ch. 4), that is, "to be without thought while in the midst of thought" and "the non-defilement of the mind in all states". And this is what I mentioned before.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 8th, 2012 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: Anyone else bored to tears with this Dzogchen forum lately?

Content:

Simon E. said:

No...I am not just being contrary. Ideas about Dzogchen do not help at all...
All we can do is to point to our experiences. And risk being misunderstood.
Which means in my case my input into the forum will be self limited. You can only describe your own experiences so many times before they induce even in yourself a state of ennui.

Astus wrote:

Ideas about Dzogchen can't help? They are all the words ever uttered and written down.
How could they be useless?

As for the risk of being misunderstood, everyone takes that risk all the time, whether here on the forum or in other communication forms. But, unlike in case of a video or book, people here can ask back.

It's not only your experience you can describe. There are teachings one has heard and studied but not yet mastered oneself. They can still be told to others, either by quote or link.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 9th, 2012 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: Anyone else bored to tears with this Dzogchen forum lately?

Content:

Simon E. said:

Actually many of them cant Astus. Not without breaking samaya.

Astus wrote:

And so we get to my first post here, that it is taboo.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 9th, 2012 at 4:22 AM

Title: Re: How can Buddhists be so sure of themselves?

Content:

Anders said:

Then over time you begin to confirm the truths of all this through your own practise. This is the only proof Buddhism offers - finding out for yourself. If that's not working for you, Buddhism is probably not for you.

gregkavarnos said:

You mean I can't just pay somebody to practice for me and bring me the fruits of the practice? Damn!

Astus wrote:

Actually, you can. It's called merit transference. Oh, and the payment for it is called donation.

As for the original question - although this has already been said - Buddhism is not about proving this or that, it is about relieving suffering. Taking and especially upholding the precepts is the first big step on the path to complete liberation from pain, sorrow and discontentment.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 9th, 2012 at 4:46 AM

Title: Re: Is 'Wholesome Conduct' in Sex a good Karma?

Content:

Huifeng said:

Though others would argue that sex itself involves some degree of craving for sensory experience, either a defiled or at least not a wholesome mental state.

Astus wrote:

Just to add a little more to this. Why people have sex? There can be a few reasons, sure, but the most common cause is the desire for sensual pleasure. Desire for sensual pleasure (kāmatṛṣṇā) is the very cause of birth in this realm of sensuality (kāmaloka) where we are now. This is true in all vehicles of Buddhism, just as dependent origination is true. Also, why people like to think that sex is not a hindrance to enlightenment? Because they are very much attached to it. Rhetoric excuses make no difference.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 9th, 2012 at 5:45 AM

Title: Re: How can Buddhists be so sure of themselves?

Content:

Ikkyu said:

Again, this whole "merit" business seems dubious at best. How does one "transfer" something immaterial that is probably non-existent -- and more likely a philosophical abstraction -- to someone else? How does this make sense in the context of reality, which Buddha-dharma claims to be so well acquainted with?

Rebirth is another thing that is paradoxical to the enth degree. If consciousness is destroyed upon the moment of death, as we know it is, how do some "aggregates" recreate it from non-existence? If there is no self that is reborn, then where does the consciousness/awareness come from? The concept of skandhas such as "mental formation" and "consciousness" being everlasting, transferable principles seems silly. We know why consciousness exists: it's called brain function. When the brain and the network of neurons in it die so does consciousness.

Astus wrote:

Merit transference sounds mystical, but really it isn't. It means that one recognises another's act and agrees with it, thus generating identical mental factors as if he had done it.

As for rebirth, the paradox you state is for this view that everything ends at the time of death. This extreme view in Buddhism is called annihilationism. As you also mentioned, there is no eternal self in the Buddha's teaching, and that is the other extreme view of eternalism. But Buddhism is not the same as materialism, it does not say that the mind is just some specific biological functions of the body. In fact, the existence of mind does not depend on the body. Thoughts are what generate further thoughts. We see, hear, smell, taste and feel based on the body's faculties, but what we see is identified by thoughts, and once one knows what one sees one has further thoughts about it based on that concept. You don't need any special education to understand this, just see it for yourself in your own experience. And since what at death stops functioning is only the body, the mind does not end with it. That's how there is rebirth eventually.

You see, if you want Buddhism to conform to the education you have received previously, you will struggle a lot with it, and either succeed in understanding the teaching of the Buddha or believe that it is nonsense and thus fail. Put aside your current opinions and look at Buddhism with fresh eyes and open mind. It is like learning a new language. If you start learning Japanese, but you want it to have the same grammatical structure as English, you will inevitably fail to comprehend the way the Japanese language works. So, as long as you want Buddhism to conform to your existing concepts, you are unable to actually see it for what it is.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 9th, 2012 at 5:47 AM

Title: Re: How can Buddhists be so sure of themselves?

Content:

Ikkyu said:

You make a good point. But in this case, is it OK for me to take precepts and tread the Buddhist path even if I have some serious doubts about it?

Astus wrote:

Absolutely. Doubts about the teachings remain until one has truly experienced the depths of the Dharma. It is a gradual process. One step at a time is perfectly enough. Just keep walking.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 9th, 2012 at 5:09 PM

Title: Re: Is 'Wholesome Conduct' in Sex a good Karma?

Content:

Dechen Norbu said:

But if you feel desire, this is a form of attachment, Vajrayana or not.

Lucjan said:

Desire is not really a form of attachment, even though the former commonly results in the latter. Desire is our playing field, the actual cause of our human dimension. Attachment is our ignorant reaction to desire. It is possible, and liberating, to experience desire devoid of attachment.

Astus wrote:

This is a nice argument actually, that there can be desire without attachment. What is desire without attachment? It means that desire appears, but one does not grasp it, so desire goes away. If there is no attachment to desire, there is no action that emerges from it, and that way the chain of the origination of suffering is cut. However, in order to have sex, one necessarily holds on to the desire and believes that it will result in happiness and satisfaction. It is a great example of distorted view and not applying the four noble truths.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 9th, 2012 at 6:39 PM

Title: Re: Definition of Mahamudra according to CNR

Content:

Astus wrote:

Is this some fixed set of instructions? Even in the book Crystal Cave they follow each other.

I find that this short poem of the 16th Karmapa rhymes well with http://www.kagyu-asia.com/l_mila_t_illuminating_wisdom.html: http://www.kagyu-asia.com/t_heart_mahamudra.html

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 9th, 2012 at 7:56 PM

Title: Re: The Mahaparinirvana Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here I show how in the Lotus Sutra it is the realisation of emptiness, prajnaparamita, that is the true teaching of the Buddha and the path for the bodhisattvas, the single vehicle. I also show the difference between the attached view of emptiness of the sravakas and the complete view of the bodhisattvas. The difference lies in bodhicitta, the will to buddhahood to liberate all beings.

In chapter 2 of the Lotus Sutra those five thousand monks left because of their arrogance. In the next chapter Shariputra says,

"Formerly, I was attached to false views
And was a teacher of brahmans.
The Bhagavat, knowing my mind,
Removed the false views and taught nirvana.
I got rid of false views completely
And attained the teaching of emptiness.
At that time I considered myself
To have attained nirvana.

But now I have become aware
That this was not the real nirvana.
When I become a buddha
I shall be endowed with the thirty-two marks,
And be honored by devas, humans, yakṣas, and nāgas.
Only then can it be said that I have Permanently attained nirvana without residue."

The first wrong view he had was the teaching of Hindus, the teaching of eternal self. That was removed by the teaching of emptiness of self. But attachment to emptiness is still wrong, and so he finally realised that the path of the bodhisattva is the one that leads to perfect enlightenment.

In chapter four we hear a similar statement from the elder disciples of the Buddha,

"Now we sit with weary bodies and only contemplate emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness. Neither the bodhisattva teaching, nor the carefree sporting with transcendent powers, nor the pure buddha worlds, nor helping sentient beings attain enlightenment produced any eager desire in us."

What they did not have was bodhicitta. So, the essential difference between a śrāvaka and a bodhisattva is bodhicitta. And what is the difference in their paths? In chapter one the Lotus Sutra says,

"To those seeking for the śrāvaka vehicle he taught the Dharma with respect to the Four Noble Truths, causing them to overcome birth, old age, illness, and death and to attain nirvana. He taught the Dharma with respect to dependent origination to the pratyekabuddhas; and to the bodhisattvas he taught the Dharma with respect to the six perfections (pāramitās), causing them to attain highest, complete enlightenment and perfect all-knowledge (sarva jñātā)."

It is the four noble truths, dependent origination and the six paramitas that are the paths of the three vehicles. And the meaning of the one vehicle is made clear in the second chapter,

"Even though the buddhas of the future
Will teach hundreds of thousands of koṭis
Of innumerable paths to the Dharma,
Their teachings will actually be
For the sake of the single vehicle.
All the buddhas, the Best of Humans,
Know that all dharmas are ever without substance
And that the buddha-seeds germinate
Through dependent origination.
That is why they will teach the single vehicle.
Having realized on the terrace of enlightenment
That the state of the Dharma

Is permanent and unchangeable in this world,
The Leaders will teach with skillful means."

The dharmas are without substance, without essence, and the buddhas teach many methods (the three vehicles) to help beings realise this. That there is a difference between the limited view of emptiness of the sravakas and the complete view of Mahayana is shown in the twelfth chapter,

"Those who were originally śrāvakas explained the śrāvaka practices in the air; and now they all practice to understand the meaning of emptiness of the Mahayana."

This emptiness of the Mahayana is the single vehicle itself, stated in the same chapter,

"You have expounded the essential character of dharmas
And revealed the teaching of the single vehicle."

And that is what bodhisattvas practice, as said in the first chapter,

"There are also bodhisattvas
Who are teaching innumerable sentient beings
The Dharma of tranquility
In various ways.
Furthermore, I see bodhisattvas
Who have perceived the essential character
Of all dharmas (phenomena) to be without duality,
Just like empty space.
I also see heirs of the buddhas
Who are seeking the highest path
Through this subtle wisdom,
Their minds free of attachment."

And the instruction on this practice with clarification is given in the fourteenth chapter,

"Furthermore, the bodhisattva mahāsattvas perceive the emptiness of all dharmas in their true aspect. All things are unerring, unmoving, nonreturning, irreversible, and like empty space which lacks substance. They are beyond all language. They are not produced, nor do they emerge, nor do they arise. They do not have any name or mark, and in reality they have no substance. They are immeasurable, limitless, without obstacles or obstructions. They exist only through dependent origination, arising through error. That is why I teach the permanent joy of perceiving the aspects of all existent things in this way. This is what is known as the second sphere of relationships of a bodhisattva mahāsattva."

And again, to show that this realisation of emptiness is equal to the omniscience of the buddhas, chapter five shows how it is also the single vehicle,

"Just like the great cloud that rains upon all the grasses, trees, shrubs, and herbs, whose seeds are watered and which grow according to their capacities, the Tathāgata teaches the Dharma of one aspect and character; that is to say, the character of liberation, dispassion, and cessation which ultimately leads to omniscience.

...

It is just like the grasses, trees, shrubs, and herbs that do not know their own natures, whether they are superior, mediocre, or inferior. Yet the Tathāgata knows the teachings of one aspect and character, the character of liberation, dispassion, cessation, complete nirvana, and eternal tranquility which ultimately leads to emptiness."

With this understanding should the Lotus Sutra itself be taught, as the tenth chapter instructs,

"The Tathāgata's chamber is nothing but the great compassion toward all sentient beings. The Tathāgata's garments are the thoughts of gentleness and perseverance, and the Tathāgata's seat is the very emptiness of all existing things."

This is a combination of compassion and emptiness, which is the true realisation of a bodhisattva and the buddhas. It is compassion itself that gives the primary difference between the sravakas and bodhisattvas. It is bodhicitta. So it is said by the Buddha in chapter fourteen,

"He should not acquire, comprehend,
Or perceive any phenomenon.
This is what is known
As the sphere of the
Bodhisattva practice.
All dharmas are empty and without substance,
Impermanent, without origination or cessation.
This is known as the sphere
Of the relationships of the wise.
Through the error of discrimination
One sees all existent things
As existing or nonexisting,
Real or unreal,
Produced or unproduced.
Being in a quiet place, the bodhisattva
Carries out practices to control his mind
And remains as firm and unmoved
As Mount Sumeru.
He should regard all dharmas
As being without substance,
Like empty space
Which has no firmness.
All dharmas are neither produced
Nor do they emerge;
They are immovable, nonreturning,
And always remain in their single character."

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 10th, 2012 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: Baloney! and Jundo Cohen

Content:

Astus wrote:

Hi Jundo,

You teach as you please of course, and you are not alone in that kind of symbolic interpretation of the teachings. And not alone I mean among the contemporary teachers who grew up within a materialist culture. Naturally, that kind of teaching appeals to a certain audience. And as long as it brings people the decrease of unwholesome states and the increase of the wholesome ones, it is wonderful. What lies beyond that, the ending of afflictions and the awakening of bodhicitta, is another matter. What are your goals in teaching? Zen is said to be the sudden path to buddhahood. Is that what you teach?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 11th, 2012 at 3:16 AM

Title: Re: Defintion of Mahamudra according to CNR

Content:

Astus wrote:

The 3rd Karmapa was a master not only of Mahamudra but also Dzogchen and Kalachakra. Still, he says in the Single Word of Heart advice, "I swear there is not a more profound and ultimate instruction from all the holy and realized masters of the enlightened lineage that is more profound and more vital than this single word of my heart-advice."

Adeu Rinpoche (in Quintessential Dzogchen, p. 213) also finds correlation between the four yogas and the four visions as the gradual stages of training in the natural state of mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 11th, 2012 at 3:48 AM

Title: Re: Some Notes on Mahamudra

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thanks for your notes. It's the first time I hear about Lama Phurbu Tashi but he is already sympathetic. I hope there will be more transcripts on their homepage in the future.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 11th, 2012 at 6:16 AM

Title: Re: Master Seung Sahn's Enlightenment & Poem

Content:

Astus wrote:

Enlightenment by sound, a common Zen theme. But, the Shurangama Sutra's teaching on Avalokitesvara's method is not exactly the same. As for the Zen part, enlightenment by a sudden noise or other experience, it means the cutting of conceptual thinking while at the same time being aware. This is called enlightenment, an initial experience to allow oneself to do actual practice. Why is it then that while everyone has been startled now and then by a sound or other impressions, few has become enlightened? That's because they didn't know what to see. Now, you are trying to get a sense of some Zen story, but this is again just conceptual manipulation. If you want to conduct a proper analysis, you have to first study the teachings. And by teachings I don't mean Zen stories and lectures, but sutras, treatises, commentaries, and teachings about them. All Zen teachers were educated in Buddhist doctrines, as it is an essential part of the monastic training. Look at this from the Record of Linji (tr. Sasaki),

"Followers of the Way, he who is a renouncer of home must needs study the Way. Take me, for example—I started out devoting myself to the vinaya and also delved into the sutras and śāstras. Later, when I realized that they were only remedies to help the world and displays of opinion, I threw them all away, and, searching for the Way, I practiced meditation. Still later I met a great teacher. Then, indeed, my dharma-eye became clear and for the first time I was able to understand all the old teachers of the world and to tell the true from the false. It is not that I understood from the moment I was born of my mother, but that, after exhaustive investigation and grinding practice, in one instant I knew for myself."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 11th, 2012 at 6:47 AM

Title: Re: Master Seung Sahn's Enlightenment & Poem

Content:

mujushinkyo said:

I understand what you're saying, but it's not completely so. Layman Pang, for example, didn't take ordination or study Buddhist doctrines. I have studied sutras, treatises, commentaries and teachings, yet there is still the basic question : What is this?

Astus wrote:

Layman Pang was a literati, a very well educated person, just as less famous lay Zen followers in later times. As for the basic question, Seung Sahn's reply was always, "only don't know".

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 11th, 2012 at 5:46 PM

Title: Re: The Mahaparinirvana Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Lotus Sutra (妙法蓮華經, Kumarajiva translation) does not contain words like buddha-nature (佛性), or tathagatagarbha (如来藏), or self-nature (自性), or true suchness (真如). While the actual words "not void" (不空) does appear in chapter 25, it simply means "not in vain" and not the technical term non-empty.

The Prajnaparamita sutras describe the bodhisattva path and they were generally not accepted by sravakas. So what makes you think that they have anything to do with it?

In China it was Zhiyi of Tiantai who elevated the Lotus Sutra as the final teaching and added the Nirvana Sutra to that. However, he also heavily relied on the Mahaprajnaparamitaupadesha, a major work by Nagarjuna. And if you check his Threefold Truth (三諦), the central doctrine of Tiantai, it says that the Middle Way is "Phenomena are both empty of existence and exist provisionally at once", which agrees perfectly with what I have already said.

As for your emphasis on that the buddha-nature is not empty but everything else is empty, what does that mean? It means that it is not empty of the buddha qualities (powers, marks, wisdoms, etc.). In this then there is no difficulty, since the teaching of the three buddha bodies also cover this, but it's still not in disagreement with the other teachings. That's how the dharmakaya is empty and the rupakaya manifests everywhere. In prajnaparamita terms, if a bodhisattva masters one paramita, he has mastered them all. If one realises emptiness completely, the buddha qualities appear naturally. Neither the Lotus Sutra nor the Nirvana Sutra has any other path for bodhisattvas than the six paramitas, just as in the prajnaparamita sutras. So how could there be a disagreement?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 11th, 2012 at 5:57 PM

Title: Re: Becoming a Monk

Content:

tracefleeman said:

I don't have any money :/

Astus wrote:

Travelling requires money, so if you don't have a monastery that accepts you for a few weeks, you should consider other options. For instance, doing a home retreat following a proper daily schedule. The book <http://www.ymba.org/monkey/monkeyfrm.htm> has advices on retreats, but you can find other sources too, like the Perfect Enlightenment Sutra, or perhaps ask assistance from a monk/teacher through e-mail or phone.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 11th, 2012 at 6:20 PM

Title: Re: Is 'Wholesome Conduct' in Sex a good Karma?

Content:

Simon E. said:

You accurately sum up the Buddhist view. However this is not the View in Dzogchen.

Astus wrote:

AFAIK, neither dependent origination nor karma is missing from Dzogchen, just as Dzogchen ngondro (Longchen Nyingtig, Dudjom Tersar) contains the four thoughts.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 11th, 2012 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

Matylda said:

SHIKAN TAZA 只管打坐

只 - SHI - only; free

管 - KAN - pipe; tube; wind instrument; drunken talk; control; jurisdiction

打 - TA - strike; hit; knock; pound;

坐 - ZA - sit

Astus wrote:

If you don't mind, it's made of two words only, and the reading exists both in Japanese and Chinese.

只管 -

Chinese: zhǐguǎn : solely engrossed in one thing / just (one thing, no need to worry about the rest) / simply / by all means / please feel free / do not hesitate (to ask for sth)

Japanese: hitasura / shikan : nothing but; earnest; intent; determined; set on (something)

打坐 -

Chinese: dǎzuò : sit in meditation / to meditate

Japanese: taza : to sit for meditation

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 11th, 2012 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

Astus wrote:

Matylda,

I don't know that much about kanjis to be able to comprehend it fully when the character is broken down to elements, but I have seen that kind of explanation, although not yet for shikantaza itself. As for the "taza", yes, it was a Buddhist dictionary that came up with a meaning on its own, but in Chinese they still have it within everyday language, if a non-specialised dictionary is any indication.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 11th, 2012 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jundo,

So much complication about sitting. Everybody in an office sits about 8 hours a day or more. That's why personally this idea that sitting has to be done in a ritual way, including a special posture, is not appealing as the central meaning of Zen. Sure, sitting in the right way has its benefits, that's why they use it everywhere in Buddhism and outside of it. For some reason Dogen's way of presenting simple sitting meditation is similar to Shinran's manipulation with the nenbutsu that is basically just reciting the name.

Daehaeng Sunim's approach is a lot more sensible to me:

"When some people first hear about letting go, it seems too ambiguous or difficult. They feel uncertain about what to do when they hear about letting go, because no method or detailed instruction is given. You may feel that you have to use sitting meditation in order to practice. However, your mind doesn't sit just because your body does. Meditation is done through mind, not through the body. You have to begin by taking care of problems through mind. You're doing things backward if you're trying to use your body to grasp your mind."

(No River to Cross, p. 54)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 12th, 2012 at 3:13 AM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jundo,

I follow you. But you're right, Dogen's style of teaching did not touch me. Keizan is closer to me, although I have read only one work from him. Beyond that, I think only Anzan Hoshin's way of instructing I like of those few I know from Japanese Soto Zen. Chinese Caodong is a different matter. But this is really a matter of style.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 12th, 2012 at 3:34 AM

Title: Re: Signs of progress

Content:

Astus wrote:

In Mahamudra you find the four yogas and each yoga's three levels. They describe the gradual path. You can find an extended explanation on it in Tashi Namgyal's "Mahamudra: the Moonlight".

Some online sources:

<http://luminousemptiness.blogspot.hu/2008/07/song-of-distinguishing-four-yogas.html> by Milarepa

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=100&t=4999> by Venerable Khenpo Tsultrim Gyamtso Rinpoche

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=S_5TvB4lXfw - a video lecture by the Venerable Khenpo Rinpoches

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 12th, 2012 at 5:26 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan, Pali and Chinese canons: differences?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are several editions of the East Asian Tripitaka. The commonly used Taisho Tripitaka was assembled in the 20th century and it has 100 volumes. Here is the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Taish%C5%8D_Shinsh%C5%AB_Daiz%C5%8Dky%C5%8D. Additionally there is the Zokuzokyo canon that has 88 volumes and contains texts not found in the Taisho Canon. Additionally to that there is the Jiaxing Canon that contains further texts from the Ming and Qing dynasty not contained in the other two, and is somewhat larger than the Taisho Canon. These are all modern collections.

There are also older editions, like the <https://zh.wikipedia.org/wiki/%E4%B9%BE%E9%9A%86%E8%97%8F> (1733), the <http://baike.baidu.com/view/111081.htm> (1372), and others before them. The oldest complete collection that still exists in woodblocks is the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tripit%E1%B9%ADaka_Koreana (1251).

As for which one is the biggest canon, that requires a definition of canon. If canonical works are strictly of Indian origin, then it might be the Tibetan because of the tantras - although the Chinese also have a large collection of them - as Jnana said. If a canon is not restricted to Indian origin - since it is common in East Asian canons to have all sorts of commonly accepted works being included - it is the Chinese (by which I mean a language, not a nation).

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 12th, 2012 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: Shikantaza

Content:

Astus wrote:

By Chinese Caodong I meant the Song dynasty tradition. Ven. Shengyan reintroduced somewhat the practice of silent illumination in Taiwan, but it's modern as you said. Regarding practice with koans, just as you said, it was part of Japanese Soto too. As for distinguishing Linji and Caodong, it makes practically no difference in China, just as you can't make a difference between one monk and another by the practices they do. It seems to me that while sitting meditation is a common practice, reducing the whole teachings to that is quite another matter. It's like what Honen did with reducing everything to buddha-remembrance, something that never really happened anywhere else. It would appear that this kind of emphasis on a single method in Japan is a unique historical phenomenon, especially as they could survive to this day.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 13th, 2012 at 4:49 PM

Title: Re: Master Seung Sahn's Enlightenment & Poem

Content:

mujushinkyo said:

Of course. "Don't-know." I don't-know every day. I'm educated, but it doesn't matter. I don't believe studying sutras leads anywhere. At least not for me. What about for you?

Astus wrote:

For me, sutras are the primary authority within Buddhism, all teachings are derived from them. The words of Shakyamuni are the Dharma, all the other works are only commentaries. Therefore, the guidance for the path is found in the sutras first. That's why they are important to me. To give a Zen example, Bodhidharma handed the Lankavatara Sutra to Huike to give an authentic basis for what he taught.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 13th, 2012 at 6:41 PM

Title: Re: The Mahaparinirvana Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

"the Prajnaparamita sutras do describe the Bodhisattva path, BUT the Lotus makes it clear the 6 paramitas are not the law, and the emptiness that was taught before the Lotus sutra was not emancipation."

What you say is based on the idea that there is a hierarchy among sutras, and your hierarchy is based on the Tiantai interpretation that the Lotus and Nirvana sutras are the highest, or on some Tibetan idea that the tathagatagarbha is the highest teaching. As for the first one of the Tiantai idea of the five periods, schools outside of Tiantai don't necessarily accept it. And the idea of the third turning of the wheel, that is not accepted by all schools either, nor is it interpreted in the same way in each school that accepts it. Beyond the ideas and interpretations of specific schools, the categorisation of sutras is arbitrary and not based on the texts themselves. Why? Because almost every sutra claims superiority above all other teachings, and neither the Lotus nor the Nirvana sutra is special in that. As the Diamond Sutra (ch. 8, tr. C. Muller) says, "all of the buddhas and all of their teachings of peerless perfect enlightenment spring forth from this sūtra." So, where does the Lotus Sutra say explicitly that the six paramitas are superseded by a different path?

"I would need more detail or explanation for this quote, are you saying it is empty of tainted defilements and samsara existence? I would agree? I also wouldn't say it exists provisionally at once, the Nirvana sutra speaks of that which is empty of false self and tainted ego defilements, then states the Tathagatagarbha isn't empty of itself and is permanent, so it wouldn't exist "provisionally" it would exist as the reality of all phenomena."

It means that things exist provisionally (conventional truth) but does not exist ultimately as self-existent things (ultimate truth). This is the middle way, the non-dual view. This is the correct understanding of emptiness in the Prajnaparamita sutras, Madhyamaka and Yogacara.

When you say that the buddha-nature is not empty of itself, what is itself?

"which would mean empty of everything even itself, which means everything including the Buddha is subject to dependant origination"

That's absurd. The point of being enlightened is that one becomes free of karma, free of rebirth, free of dependent origination. It is exactly because there is no self that there is freedom. If there was a self, it would be either deluded or enlightened, making any path of liberation impossible or unnecessary.

"the Best view I have come across that describes the Emptiness that is empty of all defilements but is not empty of its ultimate reality would be the view of shentong,"

Emptiness is not a thing, it means that appearances are without an independent self-nature, thus they are dependently originated.

As for Shentong, Taranatha says (in "Essence of Zhentong" http://www.jonangfoundation.org/files/jf_snying%20po_final.pdf),

"Naturally radiant self-cognizant pristine awareness that is not divided from the expanse is known as ultimate reality, the unconditional actuality of phenomena."

"Because of this, the essence of the tathāgatas and the nondual pristine awareness that pervades the nature of phenomena are equally adorned with all of the ultimate enlightened qualities of buddhahood. Just this great and invariable perfected nature is endowed with every aspect of pristine awareness while remaining free from all fabrications. This is the only unmistakable abiding reality. Because it is established as real, it is the object of experience for the undistorted pristine awareness of the exalted ones. Because it is invariable, it is constant, stable, and everlasting."

"To relinquish your subtle fixations on the discursive thinking of the relative, meditatively subsume yourself non-conceptually within the expanse. Through this process, you will then gradually come to encounter the non-conceptual enlightened essence directly." As was discussed already, the realisation of emptiness is non-conceptuality, and it is exactly the way to realise buddha-nature. That's why Taranatha says, "So, those who assert rangtong unerringly, and those who definitively assert that there is no essence are both proponents of zhentong." This awareness is prajnaparamita, that's why it's also called the mother of buddhas.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 14th, 2012 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: restricted texts question

Content:

Astus wrote:

I've just found this one, another translation of the 9th Karmapa's instructions by a disciple of Gendun Rinpoche:

Henrik Havlat: Mahamudra - The Ocean of True Meaning
(also available in German)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 14th, 2012 at 4:51 PM

Title: Re: Baloney! and Jundo Cohen

Content:

shel said:

Why Jundo's personal crusade against the Buddhist doctrine that he cannot believe? Perhaps I'm afraid he will turn away people interested in Buddhism. Is that a good enough reason?

Astus wrote:

Jundo's crusade against the Buddhist doctrine? Where? He actively teaches Zen, he even has a unique form of online training that in my opinion is magnificent to have. He even gives ordination so others can start/lead communities in a more official-looking way.

True, has has a not so traditional view of the sutras. But there's nothing strange or new about that. Just look at Brad Warner and compare the two styles of teaching. Or there is Sanbo Kyodan, the largest lineage in the West, that even has Catholic priests as Zen teachers. I'm not defending Jundo's interpretation of the sutras, but calling it a crusade against Buddhism? That's hardly the case.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 14th, 2012 at 7:59 PM

Title: Re: Master Seung Sahn's Enlightenment & Poem

Content:

seeker242 said:

Does he still study the scriptures after he has entered the "exhaustive investigation and grinding practice" stage? Or does he actually throw them away?

Astus wrote:

Consider these stories.

Once, when Daopi was reading a sutra he saw a monk coming for instruction. Daopi lifted his arm and covered his head with his sleeve. The monk came up to him and affected a sympathetic demeanor.

Daopi pulled his sleeve from his head, picked up the sutra, and said, "Do you understand?"

The monk then covered his own head with his sleeve.

Daopi said, "Blue heavens! Blue heavens!"

Once while the master [Zhaozhou] was reading the Vajracchedika Sutra a monk asked, "All the Buddhas and the Perfect Wisdom of all the Buddhas can all be attained from this sutra.' What is this sutra?"

The master said, "'Diamond Prajna-paramita Sutra. Thus I have heard. Once the Buddha was in Sravasti..."

The monk said, "That's not right."

The master said, "I can't amend the scriptures on my own."

When the Master (Mu-chou) was reading the sutras, the Minister Chen Tsao asked him, "Master, what sutra are you reading?" The Master said, "The Diamond sutra!" The Minister said, "The Diamond sutra was translated in the Sixth Dynasty; which edition are you using?" The Master lifted up the book and said, "All things produced by causation are simply an illusive dream and the shadow of a bubble."

When the Master (Mu-chou) was reading the Nirvana sutra, a monk asked him what sutra he was reading. The Master picked up the book and said, "This is the last one for cremation."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 14th, 2012 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: The Mahaparinirvana Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

What I'm missing from your response is the quote showing what other path the Lotus Sutra gives that is different what we find in other sutras. Also, the Lotus Sutra doesn't mention any sutra by title that would be inferior to it, it only talks about the inferiority of sravakas, but not bodhisattvas.

In the first chapter of the Lotus Sutra:

"At that time the Bhagavat was respectfully surrounded by the fourfold assembly (i.e., monks, nuns, laymen, laywomen), paid homage, honored, and praised. He then taught the bodhisattvas the Mahayana sutra called Immeasurable Meanings (Mahānirdeśa), the instruction for the bodhisattvas and the treasured lore of the buddhas."

From the <http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra20.html>:

“World-Honored One, what is this Dharma Door called? What is its meaning? How should Bodhisattvas train themselves?”

The Buddha replied, “Good men, this one Dharma Door is called Immeasurable Meaning. Bodhisattvas who wish to study and learn the immeasurable meaning should observe that dharmas have always been empty in nature and in appearance. With neither birth nor death, dharmas are neither large nor small, neither moving nor standing still, neither advancing nor retreating. Like space, they are non-dual.”

“The immeasurable meanings are born from one dharma. This one dharma is no appearance, which is not apart from appearance. The truth that appearance and no appearance are not apart from each other is called true reality. As Bodhisattva-Mahāsattvas abide in this true reality, the lovingkindness and compassion they exude are genuine, not false. They can truly end sentient beings’ suffering. Having rescued them from suffering, Bodhisattvas pronounce the Dharma to them, enabling them to experience happiness.

“Good men, if Bodhisattvas can train in this one Dharma Door of Immeasurable Meaning, they will quickly attain anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi. Good men, this profound, unexcelled Mahāyāna Sūtra of Immeasurable Meaning is true in its principle and supreme in its dignity. It is protected by all Buddhas of the past, present, and future. No māras or non-Buddhists can enter it, nor can it be corrupted by the wrong views that perpetuate birth and death. Therefore, good men, Bodhisattva-Mahāsattvas who wish to attain the unsurpassed bodhi should study and learn this profound, unexcelled Mahāyāna Sūtra of Immeasurable Meaning.”

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 16th, 2012 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: Sutra of the secret Essential Method of Dhyana

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here is the Chinese on CBETA: <http://www.cbeta.org/result/T15/T15n0613.htm>

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 16th, 2012 at 6:10 PM

Title: Re: The Mahaparinirvana Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

The other two nirvanas the Lotus Sutra talks about is the nirvana of sravakas and pratyekabuddhas, and the only true liberation is buddhahood that the bodhisattvas attain. That is what the one vehicle means, that both sravakas and pratyekabuddhas will become bodhisattvas and attain buddhahood. The idea that the Lotus Sutra points to the Nirvana Sutra is not mentioned in the sutra itself, and the connection between them is not established in any of them. What the Lotus Sutra calls the previous sutras are the teachings taught to the sravakas, since they say that they have not heard about it before, but not the teachings of Mahayana. Also, the connection you make between the Lotus and the Nirvana Sutra are your interpretation and not stated in them. Explaining one with the other is possible, but not necessary at all. The Lankavatara Sutra is a teaching that actually talks about the buddha-nature, and it also says that (XXVIII): "the reason why the Tathagatas who are Arhats and Fully-Enlightened Ones, teach the doctrine pointing to the Tathagata-garbha is to make the ignorant cast aside their fear when they listen to the teaching of egolessness and to have them realise the state of non-discrimination and imagelessness." As Ven. Yinshun, a modern master, sums it up (The Way to Buddhahood, §182, p. 315), "Some may think that the law of arising and extinction/Cannot be the foundation of being bound and being liberated/Because they are afraid of the phrase "the nonexistence of the self."/Therefore, the Buddha again embraced them with skillful means." This way the Nirvana Sutra can be rendered into another of the skilful teachings of the Buddha. And that's what the Lotus Sutra actually says, that all and every teaching of the Buddha is a means to liberation. The teaching is not the liberation itself but only something that points to it. Whether one can be helped by this or that method is not important as long as it works. And that is what ultimately makes Buddhism a single vehicle.

So, the question then is, what actual method is taught in the Nirvana Sutra? With what can one attain liberation according to the Nirvana Sutra? Simply the statement that there is a buddha-nature is not a path, not a technique, but a concept. How can we work with that idea? What brings us to liberation in that?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 16th, 2012 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: Copyrighted Dharma books

Content:

Astus wrote:

You can teach a group of people from any book you like, and spread the understanding you gained from books. But, you are not allowed to sell the books under your name for instance.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 17th, 2012 at 1:48 AM

Title: Re: Copyrighted Dharma books

Content:

LastLegend said:

But what is wrong with letting people copying the work? Are they not generating merits for writers, compilers, editors, etc by spreading the understanding or teaching? Strictly speaking of Dharma books.

Astus wrote:

There are always costs involved in any kind of work. For religious books you pay in donation to the church, for writers, editors, publishers, retail shops and government/state services you pay for the book. There are free editions online of course, but even then somebody has to pay for the servers and donate work for editing and programming. For example, there are many sutras available online for free, and the different Buddhist canons are also published. If you speak Chinese for example, you have access to a huge number of Buddhist works and teachings for free and you can copy them as you like.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 17th, 2012 at 4:25 AM

Title: Re: The Tao of Zen?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here's Chengguan's (4th patriarch of the Huayan school) view on the influence of Taoism on Buddhism.

豈言象之能至。故云迴出。又借斯亡絕以遣言思。(T36n1736, p2 b19)

Words may resemble very much. But the cause (behind it) is very different. We borrow the words but not accept their meaning.

言有濫同釋教者。皆是佛法之餘。(T35n1735, p521 b15-16)

Those who go too far and equate [false teachings] with Buddhism are all outside of the Buddhadharma.

無得求一時之小名。渾三教之一致。習邪見之毒種。為地獄之深因。開無明之源流。遏種智之玄路。誠之誠之。(T36n1736, p107 a11-13)

Do not seek after the trivial reputation of a single age and confuse the three teachings as one. Studying the poisonous seeds of false views is a deep cause for being born in hell, opens up the wellspring of ignorance, and blocks of the road to omniscience. Take heed! Take heed!

And his disciple, Zongmi says regarding Confucianism and Taoism, that is, the outer teachings:

由於時命；故死後卻歸天地，復其虛無。然外教宗旨，但在乎依身立行，不在究竟身之元由。所說萬物不論象外，雖指大道為本，而不備明順逆起滅染淨因緣，故習者不知是權，執之為了。(T45n1886, p708 a27-b4)

the essential meaning of the outer teachings merely lies in establishing [virtuous] conduct based on this bodily existence and does not lie in thoroughly investigating the ultimate source of this bodily existence. The myriad things that they talk about do not have to do with that which is beyond tangible form. Even though they point to the great Way as the origin, they still do not fully illuminate the pure and impure causes and conditions of conforming to and going against [the flow] of origination and extinction. Thus, those who study [the outer teachings] do not realize that they are provisional and cling to them as ultimate.

(Translations from Peter N. Gregory's "Inquiry into the Origin of Humanity")

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 17th, 2012 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: The Tao of Zen?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I recommend you first read this:

http://www.daoistcenter.org/Daoism_Misconceptions.pdf (PDF) by Louis Komjathy, Ph.D. It gives a nice list of incorrect ideas. The <http://www.daoistcenter.org/homepage.html> is also a valuable source of information.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 17th, 2012 at 7:52 AM

Title: Re: Sutra of the secret Essential Method of Dhyana

Content:

Matticus said:

Wow, this is fantastic, thanks again you guys. I don't understand a word of it, but the first leg of the journey is complete! Time to start bothering people I know that can read Chinese..... Or learn it myself??!! DUN DUN DUN

Astus wrote:

Just make sure that those people can read classic Chinese with Buddhist terminology.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, June 17th, 2012 at 3:37 PM

Title: Re: The Tao of Zen?

Content:

Ikkyu said:

I read your .pdf, and I personally found it lacking. While this individual asserts that there is no such things as Philosophical Taoism (Daojia), this is of course not true. It follows logic that between the periods in which the Tao Te Ching and Zhuangzi were written in the 4th century BCE and Religious Taoism came about in the 2nd century CE that there had to be some philosophical following of Taoism outside of ancestor and Heaven worship and the veneration of the Immortals or Shens.

See <http://www.reformtaoism.org/>.

Astus wrote:

Ancestor worship, rituals, magic, etc. are older than any writing, they are universal in almost every human culture. Organised Taoism, a Taoist self-awareness appeared after Buddhism reached and spread in China. There were philosophers, of course, just as there are New Age thinkers today without making it a single philosophy with fixed axioms.

You can of course interpret Laozi and Zhuangzi in a way that harmonises with Buddhism. Many did so before in East Asia. You can even find Buddhist commentaries. But then, it is not the same what those who are considered Taoists believe. It is also possible to read the Bible or the Bhagavad Gita, or practically any kind of book, with a Buddhist eye. Still, just because one likes to believe that Krsna was a bodhisattva, it won't make him a Hindu. In the same way, Buddhist teachings can be interpreted in a non-Buddhist way. What all this boils down to is a philosophical and theological debate on orthodoxy.

By the way, there is no such thing as philosophical Buddhism either.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 18th, 2012 at 5:35 AM

Title: Dzogchen Resources

Content:

Astus wrote:

Teachers and Communities

<http://www.dzogchen.it/> of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche

<http://www.rigpa.org/> of Sogyal Rinpoche

<http://www.dzogchen.org/> of Lama Surya Das

<https://www.ligmincha.org/> of Geshe Tenzin Wangyal Rinpoche

<http://www.vajranatha.com/> of John Myrdhin Reynolds

<http://www.nalandabodhi.org/> of Dzogchen Ponlop Rinpoche

http://www.simplybeing.co.uk/simply/Simply_Being_Dzogchen.html of James Low

Teachings

http://www.berzinarchives.com/web/x/nav/n.html_1870389411.html

<http://www.keithdowman.net/dzogchen/>

<http://www.zangthal.co.uk/files.html>

<http://www.nitartha.org/home.html>

Local Topics of Interest

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=48&t=8880>

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=48&t=8239>

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=48&t=4052>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 18th, 2012 at 5:35 AM

Title: Dzogchen Resources

Content:

Astus wrote:

Teachers and Communities

<http://www.dzogchen.it/> of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche
<http://www.rigpa.org/> of Sogyal Rinpoche
<http://www.dzogchen.org/> of Lama Surya Das
<https://www.ligmincha.org/> of Geshe Tenzin Wangyal Rinpoche
<http://www.vajranatha.com/> of John Myrdhin Reynolds
<http://www.nalandabodhi.org/> of Dzogchen Ponlop Rinpoche
http://www.simplybeing.co.uk/simply/Simply_Being_Dzogchen.html of James Low

Teachings

http://www.berzinarchives.com/web/x/nav/n.html_1870389411.html
<http://www.keithdowman.net/dzogchen/>
<http://www.zangthal.co.uk/files.html>
<http://www.nitartha.org/home.html>

Local Topics of Interest

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=48&t=8880>
<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=48&t=8239>
<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=48&t=4052>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 18th, 2012 at 4:24 PM

Title: Re: Karma in Yogacara

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thanks for the post. It was a good teaching, and good to see Dan Lusthaus.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, June 18th, 2012 at 9:01 PM

Title: Re: Taoism in general, specifically it's connections with Ch'an

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

seems VERY Daoist. It seems too fluid to be purely Confucian.

... I was more throwing it out there as an example of the cross-fertilisation between indigenous Chinese culture and (Indian) Buddhism.

Astus wrote:

That's the point, it is just Chinese, old Chinese. A tarot deck is not Kabbalistic, Thelemic or Christian just because it shows some connection to each of them.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 19th, 2012 at 3:01 PM

Title: Re: The Mahaparinirvana Sutra

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

MY REPLY:the answer is chapter 19 to chapter 46 from pg 134 to 477,the first 18 chapters are concept the rest are practice.read this then look for commentary on the empty of taint and not empty of itself emptiness and this will help.

Astus wrote:

Could you sum up the practical points?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 19th, 2012 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: The Healthy State of Buddhism, In Japan and Elsewhere

Content:

Astus wrote:

I don't know much about the current state of Japanese Buddhism, but it seems to me that just as in other areas of life, it is not simply black or white. I remember from the "Marathon Monks" film that they mention that those Tendai monks eat strictly vegetarian food. And in the Myoshinji line of Rinzai Zen the actual masters (from the rank "shike" 師家 and above) have to live in celibacy (Jørn Borup: Japanese Rinzai Zen Buddhism, p. 60). So there are those who live according to the old ideals of a home-leaver.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, June 19th, 2012 at 10:41 PM

Title: Single Self-Sufficient Path

Content:

Astus wrote:

In the Jewel Ornament of Liberation (chapter on prajnaparamita, p. 251-255) Gampopa writes,

If the meaning of emptiness does not dwell within the mind, we cannot attain liberation by means of the other virtues.

When one is endowed with the meaning of emptiness, there is not a single thing which is not included in this path.

Cultivation of bodhicitta is also included. Visualization of the deity and the recitation of mantras are also said to be complete when this [the realization of emptiness] exists. Performing fire-offering rituals is also included in this. Even the path—the six perfections—is complete in this. Doing prostrations is also included in this. It is also offering if one has this. Again, if one is endowed with this, it is also the very purification of evil deeds. The guarding of moral ethics and samaya is also included in this meaning. Listening, reflecting, and meditating are also encompassed in this meaning. Torma cakes and daily Dharma rituals are also included in this meaning.

In that case, if all these are included in meditating on only the essence or the mind-as-such, why do there appear teachings on so many graduated methods? It is for the purpose of leading all those sentient beings of little fortune, who are ignorant in the ultimate nature.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 20th, 2012 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: Vegetarianism in Zen, Chan, etc.

Content:

Astus wrote:

[quote="Matylda" What matters after all for me is the quality of teaching, quality of experience and realization. If it does not work then nothing really works. Regardless of celibacy, non-celibacy etc..[/quote]

Sherlock said:

what is more important is the state of Buddhadharma in Japan currently and its prospects for long-term survival.

Astus wrote:

And I can only agree with both of you. Many great masters in Japan taught lay people with the intention to enlighten them to the Dharma and liberate them all. Since I'm sure that people benefited greatly from Buddhism regardless of their ordination and social status, what we should be concerned about is our own wisdom and the happiness of everyone. It is easy to find bad things anywhere in the world, including monasteries. But if our mind is occupied by only this negative attitude it's hard to see the goodness and beauty. And even if we encounter something awful, the best thing to do is to understand it and learn how to avoid it.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 20th, 2012 at 1:44 AM

Title: Re: 'Rarity' of Vajrayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

I find it the same kind of motivational teaching as saying that human birth is rare, meeting the Dharma is rare, etc. The point is to go study and practise, otherwise you're just wasting your time.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 20th, 2012 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: are the jhanas taught in zen/chan?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jinul teaches both many methods and one method. Buswell writes in the introduction (Collected Works, p. 62)

"As his biographer, Kim Kun-su, first noted, Chinul tailored three main styles of Son practice which show the direct influences of his three enlightenment experiences: the balanced cultivation of samadhi and prajna, deriving from the Platform Sutra; faith and understanding according to the complete and sudden teachings of the Hwaom school, from Li T'ung-hsuan's Exposition of the Avatamsaka Sutra; and, finally, the shortcut approach of hwadu investigation, from the Records of Ta-hui. These styles were intended to instruct people of inferior, average, and superior spiritual capacities respectively. To supplement these three basic methods, Chinul taught two additional techniques for people of highest and lowest capacity: the approach of no-mind (thoughtlessness) and the recollection of the Buddha's name.²³⁰ He explained that each method could be followed exclusively or a progression from the simpler techniques to the more difficult could be cultivated."

As for the essential path, Jinul writes (Collected Works, p. 266),

"Consequently, even though we cultivate the manifold supplementary practices, they all have thoughtlessness as their core," If we can only maintain thoughtlessness, liking and disliking will naturally fade away, and compassion and wisdom will naturally grow in brightness; wrong actions will naturally be halted, and meritorious deeds will naturally be augmented. As far as our understanding is concerned, we will perceive that all signs are signless; as far as practice is concerned, it will be called the cultivation whereby nothing is cultivated. When the defilements are finally extirpated, birth and death will be cut off, As arising and ceasing have ended, a calm radiance will manifest and our responsiveness will be unlimited." This is called Buddhahood."

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, June 20th, 2012 at 11:21 PM

Title: Re: 'Rarity' of Vajrayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sherlock,

Shakyamuni in the early texts taught people to attain arhatship, not buddhahood. In fact, I have not heard or met any early scripture where Gautama advised people to become buddhas. On the other hand, he did say that there isn't much difference between an arhat and a buddha. Now, that's for "Theravada".

In Mahayana there is sudden enlightenment, even buddhahood in this life. For instance, it is a basic point of Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 21st, 2012 at 5:34 AM

Title: Re: are the jhanas taught in zen/chan?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Yes, many different practices. From yeombul to hwadu they could all be named Zen methods. If compared to what we find in other schools, then only hwadu remains as a Zen style practice, and the others are what practically everyone has. However, hwadu was the invention of Dahui, so we can't really say that it is a technique that Bodhidharma brought to China. What is it that remains? No-thought, or in Budwell's translation, thoughtlessness.

As for the dhyanas, I think in Jinul's system it'd fit in all right to the samadhi practice of the gradual path. And that's what it is of course.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 28th, 2012 at 5:36 PM

Title: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

Astus wrote:

Alayavijnana is used to explain how karma is carried on from moment to moment, life to life, and also it is a basis for the continuation of a being. Here are some problems I have:

If alayavijnana is a part/mode of consciousness, why are we not aware of it?

If we can't be aware of it, what makes it part of the consciousness? / If there can be a part of consciousness one is not aware of, what makes it consciousness?

If only buddhas are aware of it, since they have it already purified, even they can't see the defiled seeds, and so it's only an assumption.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 28th, 2012 at 6:44 PM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

Astus wrote:

Greg,

Do you have any reference for that? I mean, I haven't yet read anywhere that when abiding in the nature of mind, you see all the seeds that are present in the alayavijnana.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 28th, 2012 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

Huifeng said:

In particular, the ramifications and indeed requirements once alaya is established as a vijnana, as opposed to the collection of bijas.

Astus wrote:

As a background info, I've been reading the Cheng Weishi Lun when these questions came up.

Even if we talk about seeds only, they are mental phenomena, and the questions remain. How can a mental phenomenon exist without the mind being conscious of it?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 28th, 2012 at 8:53 PM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Aaaahhh... here is a reference for you: Dispelling misconceptions about the True Nature, Lesson 62 from Mahamudra - The Ocean of True Meaning

Astus wrote:

That part talks only about how the buddha-mind is full of good qualities. Doesn't even mention karmic seeds or alayavijnana. Are you sure that's your reference?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 28th, 2012 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

Astus wrote:

Greg, yes, that's it. Where does it say that with realising Mahamudra you can observe karmic seeds?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 28th, 2012 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

deepbluehum said:

What you are dealing with here is the problem of avidya. How can anger arise without your being conscious of it? Once it's full blown, you are conscious of it. But it comes on to you unawares. As soon as the circumstances align, it jumps out. This is the meaning of seed. Eye organ contacts object, pleasant or painful, generates eye-consciousness, aroused by memory and then anger can arise. This is the seed. In a sense Alaya-vijnana is memory stored deep in the "unconscious."

So the "seeds" are dependent originations. Buddhas don't see them because of that. So turning your attention to the process, seeing nothing, they disappear, slowly never to reappear. That's how it goes.

Astus wrote:

You just say that there is alayavijnana, but you don't answer how can there be mental phenomena without being aware of them. It is a problem because if there is no need of consciousness for a mental phenomena, then there are thoughts without being thought, and even a stone could have mental phenomena.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, June 28th, 2012 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

Astus wrote:

Greg,

I can turn it into a quite simple problem:

If we are not aware of seeds, how can they be mental phenomena? If we are aware of seeds, how could they be latent?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 29th, 2012 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

Astus wrote:

Anjali,

We suppose an unconscious mind, but since we are never aware of it, it is only a supposition, an explanation without experiential basis. We could as well think that latencies abide on the other side of the universe, or whatever we like. And I'm not bringing in any Madhyamaka arguments, like from the Madhyamakavatara.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 29th, 2012 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

What is the source of the aggregates, the elements and the sense factors of beings?

You are missing the forest for the trees my dear Astus. Looking to find specific words instead of seeing the meaning.

Astus wrote:

OK. It says, "The aggregates, the elements and the sense factors of beings have all from the beginning the true nature of awakened male and female buddhas and deities."

That's almost like saying that the aggregates, etc. are selfless, empty. It confirms the original purity of all phenomena. And so I ask how that relates to karmic seeds.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 29th, 2012 at 3:17 AM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

There are numerous mental phenomena occurring that I am not aware of. Take anger for example. You can be angry and so caught up in the feeling that you not aware of your anger. I can be aware of my capacity for anger yet not be currently expressing or feeling anger.

Astus wrote:

Does one feel angry when one is angry? Of course. Without feeling anger one can't be angry. The feeling itself is the consciousness in this case. What you say by not recognising on another level that one is angry, not identifying in a verbal-conceptual way with the idea of anger, is another thing.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 29th, 2012 at 4:37 AM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Yes, but at the same time "The aggregates, the elements and the sense factors of beings..." are the products of karma. Realising ones true nature allows one to see ones karmic seeds since they are the source of the aggregates, the elements and the sense factors of beings and at the same time the aggregates, the elements and the sense factors of beings are part of ones Buddha Nature.

Astus wrote:

Anyone who followed the pointing out instructions of Mahamudra has seen the nature of mind. But who has seen thousands of seeds? Also, there is another problem with this. They are called seeds because of their latency.

Vasubandhu writes, "What is consciousness? It is awareness of an object. ... Primarily, thought is the storehouse consciousness, because that is where the seeds of all the formations are collected." (Pancaskandhaprakarana in "The Inner Science of Buddhist Practice", p. 239)

So, even if there is talk about gross and subtle consciousness, all the seeds present in a single moment should be observable.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 29th, 2012 at 4:38 AM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

You keep changing the goal posts. A minute ago you were talking about awareness and now you are talking about feeling. So what are we talking about? Awareness or feeling?

One can be angry and not be aware that they are angry. It happens all the time.

Astus wrote:

Because feeling is a form of awareness I don't see any change of topic here. Seeing something and hearing something both have awareness. If I'm not aware of seeing or hearing something, then I don't see or hear it. Same with feeling.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 29th, 2012 at 6:56 AM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

deepbluehum said:

How come emotion can arise even if one doesn't want it to? There is clearly some process going on that one is not aware of and it is happening in your conscious mind. You are ignoring it. What you are ignoring is the alaya-vijnana. This is the meaning of avidya. Once you become aware of the alaya, these habits cannot arise.

Astus wrote:

How do you define ignorance in this case? Being ignorant of what? The alayavijnana itself? And how do you become aware of it? Or rather the ignorance in this case should be not realising that all is consciousness. But I'd still like to find a reference from actually being aware of seeds in a treatise.

Another problem is that the seeds are meant to be latent, they are defined as such. And when one is enlightened, the seeds are gone.

"The support is then converted. When that support is entirely converted, then the container consciousness with all its seeds is entirely eliminated together with all those seeds." (Asanga: Summary of the Great Vehicle, 1.48)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 29th, 2012 at 4:28 PM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

Huifeng said:

anusaya

Astus wrote:

How does that make the issue simpler? Latent defilements or seeds are both supposed to be mental phenomena that we are unaware of, and by definition they are meant to be latent. Which is OK, but then why are they mental? Or should we say that consciousness is not the essence of mind?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 29th, 2012 at 4:37 PM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

deepbluehum said:

You become aware of it by practicing the 5 paths. You probably want to see Maitreya's treatises.

Astus wrote:

Can you give some closer reference, like which treatise, which chapter, where it talks about becoming aware of alayavijnana and the seeds?

deepbluehum said:

They can only function so long as the alaya-vijnana has not been perceived. Once it is perceived, they cease to function.

Astus wrote:

In that case, there are no seeds left to become aware of. And this is what I mentioned as the problem, that in the end nobody ever sees any seed.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 29th, 2012 at 9:22 PM

Title: Re: Sudden Enlightenment?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sudden enlightenment is directly seeing the nature of mind. That can result in permanent liberation in rare cases, but most of the times it is insight into truth, but then one has to keep working with that to stabilise the realisation.

BTW, Huineng's true enlightenment occurred when he had a secret meeting with Hongren.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 29th, 2012 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

deepbluehum said:

There's no problem. You are toiling with the idea of a dependently originated object. The seed is a contingent remainder of the three prior consciousnesses working together. It can only operate so long as you are caught unawares. As soon as you see this operation, it stops.

Astus wrote:

And my issue is with the seed as mental phenomenon. Here it makes no difference that it is a contingent remainder or whatever else. The question is regarding it's nature of existence. For instance, you say, "It can only operate so long as you are caught unawares", but how can a consciousness operate without being conscious?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 29th, 2012 at 11:15 PM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

Astus wrote:

Greg,

By awareness I did not mean any particular function, but simply consciousness. Or I can also say that except for rupaskandha all the others belong to nama; also, they are within the sixth ayatana, where the dharmas are the objects of manas. And from the Vijnaptimatra view, whatever experience there is, it is a mental phenomenon anyway.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, June 29th, 2012 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

LastLegend said:

Memories for example only come when there is a trigger be an event or a thought.

I don't really see what you are getting at here. I rather you outright state what your beliefs than beating around the bush.

Astus wrote:

There is no belief in the back. But we can apply the question to memory too. If memories are in the mind, and mind is being conscious, why aren't we conscious of our memories?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 30th, 2012 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

LastLegend said:

Well can we be conscious of everything at the same time? The mind can only focus on one object at the time.

Astus wrote:

Seeds exist only momentarily, so there are thousands of them in the mind at the same time. How can it manage that then?

LastLegend said:

It is not there when there is no trigger or association, it arises when there is. So is it there?

Astus wrote:

Alayavijnana is supposed to store everything, including memories.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 30th, 2012 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

LastLegend said:

P.S. Alaya is not physical so does it have a limited storage capacity?

Astus wrote:

It doesn't. Since it is not physical, it does not occupy any space.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 30th, 2012 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Now you shifted the posts again, you went from awareness to feeling to consciousness. I cannot play the game if you keep changing the rules.

Yes, well... but even nama is broken up into citta, vijnana, mano vijnana, manas and alaya vijnana, so... Again, you need to define your question more accurately: You can't get an answer if you don't know the question. This was Ven. Huifeng's point right from page 1. And from the Vijnaptimatra view, whatever experience there is, it is a mental phenomenon anyway.

Again, yes, well, I mean, really, what exactly does this have to do with anything? Know what I mean?

Anyway, within the confines of Abhidhamma I think I have answered your original question, so if you have a new question, otherwise... Arivederci from me!

Astus wrote:

I have not changed the subject for even a tiny bit. Consciousness, awareness, etc. they all mean the fact of experiencing something. And when I say experience it is something that appears in a consciousness, and one is conscious, i.e. aware of something. This was the very definition of consciousness I have quoted from Vasubandhu in the previous page, "What is consciousness? It is awareness of an object." It is simply the dharmadhatu-manodhatu-manovijnana in the 18 dhatus system, it is the sixth sensory faculty, that includes all possible mental functions in the Abhidharma system, that is defined by being aware of an object. Putting it in the Yogacara context, the basic consciousness, alayavijnana, is also defined by awareness. That's why I said that since the very essence of consciousness in general - no matter which of the 6/8 consciousness one talks about - is the fact of awareness of something. And that's what the question comes from, that if consciousness - including alayavijnana - is necessarily being conscious of something, how is it that one is not, and actually cannot be, conscious of the seeds.

And so the Mahayanasamgraha (1.26) puts a difference between the alayavijnana and the other seven,

"The other consciousnesses are different from the container consciousness. They are the active consciousnesses that are present in all births and destinies. Know that they are also called the experiential consciousnesses, as taught in a verse from the Analysis of the Middle and the Extremes:

The first is termed causal consciousness
And the second experiential consciousness
Wherein the mental states of sense experience,
Discrimination of names, and activity take place."

This could very well be interpreted as that although it is called container consciousness, it is not conscious at all. Then why called consciousness?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 30th, 2012 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

deepbluehum said:

BTW, seed is just a metaphor. There's no actual seed. It is the operation of three faculties of the mind carrying on habitual actions.

Astus wrote:

I don't think it is important whether you call it habit, defilement, imprint, seed, etc. In all cases what is meant is latent mental phenomenon not experienced in the present, it is a so called potential. And so my question, why is it a mental phenomenon when there is no awareness of it?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, June 30th, 2012 at 3:34 AM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

deepbluehum said:

Are you aware of all your memories this moment? Normally we don't pay any attention to how we operate so we respond to phenomena conditioned by our memories. When we practice the path, we become aware that a given situation always generates a certain feeling, then we come to recognize the feeling has no real nature, that no feeler can be found, etc., and the conditioned response is subverted. Yet, the remaining awareness that is beyond subject and object is present, and that is the alaya-vijnana.

Astus wrote:

Of course I am not aware of all my memories, and even if I wanted I could not recall everything. Still, it is said that the alayavijnana retains all the imprints not just from this life but all the previous ones, and that's how a karmic effect can occur kalpas later. My question, however, is not about how it happens in our lives, but how can those be reserved moment to moment in the consciousness while one is not conscious of them. Because if it is indeed in the consciousness, and consciousness means being conscious of something, there should be consciousness of all the imprints. So either it is not in the consciousness, or consciousness doesn't mean being conscious of something. What is the third option?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 2nd, 2012 at 4:39 AM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm not sure which one is the case, but it seems the question is either said incorrectly by me, or I don't see the answers' relevance to it, or its meaning has eluded those who have kindly replied. So now I try from a slightly different perspective.

Let's say that the alayavijnana is simply a theoretical supposition, a convenient explanation about how memory, mind and karma works. The seeds are simply our unquestioned views we follow all the time. Once seen through, it's all gone. Unfortunately, this makes the whole argument for alayavijnana quite weak.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 2nd, 2012 at 3:35 PM

Title: Re: The Mahaparinirvana Sutra

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are a couple of Mahayana traditions where they take the Nirvana Sutra as an important scripture, like in Tiantai and Chan. However, if you say they have no meditation like the one you say exists in the sutra itself, it is either that there has never been such a meditation, or there was but disappeared, or the meditation exists in the traditions but not the way you understand the sutra.

For instance, Hongren's (5th patriarch of Chan) Treatise on the Supreme Vehicle (quotes from T. Cleary: Minding Mind) refers to the Nirvana Sutra three times (quite a lot in a small work) says simply,

"If you can just keep the mind still so that errant thought does not arise, the reality of nirvana will naturally appear. This is how we know the inherent mind is originally pure."

And also,

"When errant imagining ceases, you are accurately aware. By virtue of accurate awareness, dispassionately perceptive knowledge arises. By dispassionately perceptive knowledge, one finds out the nature of reality. By finding out the nature of reality, one attains nirvana. This is how we know that preserving the fundamental true mind is the basis of nirvana."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 2nd, 2012 at 6:11 PM

Title: Re: Ask a Transgender Buddhist

Content:

Astus wrote:

How do you balance the teaching on identification causing suffering and the gender identity that seems a core value for you?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 3rd, 2012 at 7:32 PM

Title: Re: Is Shikantaza.....

Content:

Astus wrote:

Vipassana is indeed a Pali word, and just as any Theravada teaching, it has little relevance to Japanese Zen. The vipasyana (kan) practice of the Tendai school has some relevance, but not direct relationship. Shikantaza is not a path, not a method to apply, but just (shikan) sitting (taza).

BTW, the practice of vipassana is not specifically related to the Thai forest tradition. In fact, the modern vipassana groups (bearing this name) are from Burma.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 3rd, 2012 at 7:39 PM

Title: Re: Karma in Yogacara

Content:

Astus wrote:

Hm. I never actually watched the video here but went to Youtube. So what I've seen was already linked, the 40 mins film.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 5th, 2012 at 3:57 AM

Title: Re: Questions regardin God and Nirvana

Content:

Astus wrote:

Nirvana means extinction. It is the extinction of the cause of suffering, it is the end of attachment. As an example, A is in love with B, then eventually A becomes bored with B, then A feels that B is getting rather annoying, and finally A happily leaves B. Simple story. When A finally gives up on B, that is the nirvana, the total extinction of A's infatuation with B. All beings are very much attached to the sensual impressions, their emotions and their ideas. But when one learns that it is this grasping of phenomena that is causing all the trouble, one gradually becomes disinterested in them, and turns away from them. And that is nirvana, when one has left behind all attachment for good. The bonfire of passion is now a pile of cold ash. The love story is over. Does this sound like a mystical experience? Or a divine presence?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 5th, 2012 at 3:58 PM

Title: Re: Questions regardin God and Nirvana

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

Nirvana does sever the allure of attachment, and true nirvana surely is the end of attachment, but the cause of suffering isn't necessarily attachment itself. The cause, is the erroneous notion that there was ever an A to be attached to B in the first place. So perhaps we're saying the same thing and I'm misreading what you wrote, but for me nirvana is a bit more than merely turning away, or leaving behind attachment, it's true extinction and total exhaustion of that which attachment is predicated on.

Astus wrote:

I merely talked about the third noble truth, the ending of suffering, which is nirvana. Of course, adding to that the whole 12 links of dependent origination, and its reverse (see: <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.023.than.html> is absolutely fine. The final steps are:

concentration -> knowledge & vision of things as they actually are -> disenchantment -> dispassion -> release -> knowledge of ending

Now there is another thing regarding views and ignorance, that are called the four perversions/inverted views

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an04/an04.049.than.html>). It is seeing what is impermanent as permanent, suffering as pleasure, not-self as self, impure as pure. This shows simply how confused we are and what kind of confusion is to be removed. Attachment is ultimately based on ignorance, and ignorance is not realising the four noble truths, how suffering dependently arises and disappears.

I emphasise this very basic explanation of nirvana in order to avoid difficult terminology like ending all views, insight into non-arising, realising all appearances as consciousness, etc. Isn't it clear just to say that as long as there is attachment to impermanent things one necessarily experiences the different forms of suffering? Of course, once one actually sees that things are impermanent, there is the way to be free from them. Again, I don't see it as anything mystical, but quite sensible.

Author: Astus
Date: Thursday, July 5th, 2012 at 4:01 PM
Title: Re: Questions regardin God and Nirvana
Content:
jeeprs said:
No. It sounds like nihilism.

Astus wrote:
It is the end of suffering, not the end of everything.

Author: Astus
Date: Monday, July 9th, 2012 at 4:16 PM
Title: Re: The Tao of Zen?
Content:
Ikkyu said:
I would say you are mistaken. A number of books have been published over the years such as "Buddhism Without Beliefs"... taking the ritualistic and religious element out of Buddhism in order to convey it purely as a philosophy.

Astus wrote:
Those are philosophising about Buddhism, just as anyone can use bits and pieces from the Buddha's teachings. Taoist and Neo-Confucian works also contain elements from Buddhist teachings, and it doesn't make them Buddhists either.

Author: Astus
Date: Tuesday, July 10th, 2012 at 5:16 PM
Title: Re: The Tao of Zen?
Content:
Ikkyu said:
The Tao has no character or components. It cannot be named or described. It is changeless, formless, outside of ordinary existence and yet intimately connected with all. Similarly, Nibbana has no characteristics. If it did it would be subject to no-self and thus be suffering, which it is not. It exists beyond duality, just as the Tao is beyond duality. They are both beyond being and non-being. The purpose of Taoism is to be one with -- essentially to attain -- Tao... to be one with existence and understand things as they are (c.f. dharmata/thathata). The purpose of Buddhism is to attain Nibbana, quite similar.

Astus wrote:
Such a description of nirvana makes it a metaphysical, abstract thing. That way people can match it with any such similar notion of God/Truth/Heaven/Soul/etc. as they like. First of all, nirvana is not a thing, a state, or a realm, but the final end of the causes of suffering. Like, if you quit smoking, being a non-smoker is not some special realisation, it is simply that you don't want any more tobacco. And not wanting more is just the lack of desire, not aversion or anything else. Nirvana is the lack of identifying with the five aggregates, no more "I, me, mine". Or, using emptiness, it is the lack of grasping at views, not reifying things any more. But neither emptiness, nor selflessness are new states or things. That's why it is also called seeing things as they really are (yathā-bhūta-jñāna-darśana), or simply suchness (tathatā). It is also seeing dependent origination, as dependent origination is emptiness itself, they are not separate. That's how on a single blade of grass there are infinite buddhas.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 10th, 2012 at 9:45 PM

Title: Re: Four Dharmas of Longchenpa

Content:

Astus wrote:

How about this one?

http://www.berzinarchives.com/web/en/archives/advanced/dzogchen/basic_points/four_themed_precious_garland.html

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 12th, 2012 at 4:49 PM

Title: Re: Soto-zen, Dogen and reincarnation

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think it is a good indicator of understanding whether a teacher accepts rebirth or not. It's because one needs to comprehend dependent origination, the way the aggregates function, and avoid the extreme views of permanence and annihilation. That is also why "correct view" is first of all defined as accepting the work of karma and rebirth.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 12th, 2012 at 10:17 PM

Title: Re: Soto-zen, Dogen and reincarnation

Content:

Astus wrote:

As for Soto Zen, here's the Dedication of Merit verse from the daily practice booklet (<http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/practice/sutra/pdf/Scriptures.pdf>):

"With the good karma gathered in this practice, we repay the virtuous toils of our fathers and mothers, that the living may be blessed with joy and long life without distress, and the deceased freed from suffering and born in the pure land. May the four benefactors, sentient beings in the three classes of existence, and those born in the three evil destinies and eight difficulties all be able to repent their transgressions, purify their defects, entirely escape the round of rebirth, and be born in the pure land."

And there are quite a few other rituals and ceremonies (like funerals) present in Soto Zen that would have no meaning at all without rebirth.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 13th, 2012 at 5:19 AM

Title: Re: Soto-zen, Dogen and reincarnation

Content:

tomamundsen said:

Brad just blogged about this topic again yesterday -

<http://suicidegirlsblog.com/blog/brad-warners-hardcore-zen-what-happens-after-you-die/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Astus wrote:

Using the teaching of no-self to deny rebirth? That is not understanding the relationship between dependent origination and emptiness, thus falling into the nihilist interpretation. Not to mention that in Mahayana rebirth could not be any more obvious as the bodhisattva path itself goes through immeasurable number of lives.

Using the SotoZen-Net's glossary (underlines added),

<http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/glossary/individual.html?key=bodhisattva>
S. bodhisattva, literally "awakening" (bodhi) "being" (sattva). 1. An epithet for the Buddha Shakamuni in his former lives, before becoming a buddha. 2. Any sentient being on the path to buddhahood, which is described in Mahayana sutras as beginning with a vow to attain awakening for the sake of all living beings and not to pass into nirvana while any beings remain suffering in the round of birth and death. 3. Exalted beings who have advanced so far on the path to awakening as to be virtually equal to buddhas in their wisdom, compassion, and ability to help ordinary beings. High level bodhisattvas such as Kannon, Fugen, Miroku, and Jizō are worshipped and prayed to as savior deities.

http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/library/glossary/individual.html?key=birth_and_death
S. sasāra. 1. The round (rinne 輪廻) of repeated deaths and births in different modes of sentient existence, conditioned by karma (actions and their results). 2. A continuous process of change taking place every instant, that is, "momentary birth and death" (setsuna shōji 刹那生死), conditioned by karma. 3. The entire life-span of a sentient being, from birth until death (ichigo shōji 一期生死).

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 13th, 2012 at 5:26 AM

Title: Re: Shin and "Bhakti Devotion"?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is no point in worshipping Amita Buddha. True faith means believing completely in the primal vow, that our birth in the Pure Land is guaranteed. And the reason of achieving birth there is to swiftly attain enlightenment and liberate all beings. One is thankful for Amita Buddha's great compassion, just as we feel gratitude toward someone who gave us something of immense worth.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 13th, 2012 at 4:38 PM

Title: Re: Soto-zen, Dogen and reincarnation

Content:

Astus wrote:

Saying that what the Buddha and Dogen taught are not what they believed and realised is saying that they were speaking lies.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 13th, 2012 at 6:25 PM

Title: Re: Soto-zen, Dogen and reincarnation

Content:

dharmagoat said:

Just to be clear, I am challenging the claim that we can know what the Buddha and Dogen believed based on what they taught.

The Buddha taught different things to different people depending on their needs and understanding. Sometimes his teachings were contradictory. Was he lying to some and not to others, or was he exercising skillful means in each case?

Astus wrote:

Skillful means doesn't mean it is not true, but that it is not the final teaching. The path is a gradual one, so one should not stop on level one. And just because there are further levels, the higher ones don't invalidate the lowers, but rather give them context and further meaning. Also, if the Buddha spoke anything that was not true, he failed to uphold the basic precepts, and that is impossible.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 13th, 2012 at 6:38 PM

Title: Re: Soto-zen, Dogen and reincarnation

Content:

Simon E. said:

There is also the point that although we know what Dogen taught the Interpretation of that teaching has been a matter of debate and division ever since, and that continues.

...

And some of them representing large numbers of adherents deny that Dogen taught literal post mortem Rebirth AT ALL.. Me, I have no idea who is right.

In the case of the Buddha I remain completely unconvinced that we have any idea at all what he taught.

Astus wrote:

What debate and division do you mean? Sotoshu is actually quite unified.

What large number of adherents? Do you mean in the West or in Japan? Just because Western Zen followers is still a minority anyway.

As for not being sure about the Buddha's teaching, that is something you have to sort out for yourself. Faith is something that comes with learning and experience.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 14th, 2012 at 6:37 PM

Title: Re: Soto-zen, Dogen and reincarnation

Content:

dharmagoat said:

So the original question remains. Can we know what the Buddha believed based on what he taught?

If all teachings but the final teaching lack context and are limited in meaning, can they be used to gauge what the Buddha actually believed?

What is the final teaching, and does anyone fully understand it?

Astus wrote:

The teaching is confirmed by proper reasoning and personal insight, the tradition of that is preserved by the community of the noble beings, the third jewel of Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 14th, 2012 at 8:23 PM

Title: Re: Soto-zen, Dogen and reincarnation

Content:

dharmagoat said:

The community of noble beings preserve the understanding of the final teaching of the Buddha, and are therefore the ones that know what the Buddha actually believed?

Astus wrote:

The buddha-nature, the eye of awakening, is present in all, but only those who have actually opened it realise the way things truly are. And that is the correct faith of a buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 16th, 2012 at 4:56 PM

Title: Re: I have a good karma question, please answer.

Content:

Astus wrote:

An action has internal and external results. The internal result becomes the basis of karma, the moral causality that is carried on within the mind stream. The external result is not a moral matter, as it is not personal, therefore not karma. That way the karma of giving is completed once the money is handed over in this case.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 16th, 2012 at 5:20 PM

Title: Re: Using buddhism to sell stuff

Content:

Astus wrote:

<http://vajrasecrets.com/books/english-books/gurus-for-hire-enlightenment-for-sale.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 16th, 2012 at 5:44 PM

Title: Zen has No Morals

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Accusations, slander, attributions of guilt, alleged misconduct, even threats and persecution will not disturb [the Zen Master] in his practice. Defending himself would mean participating again in a dualistic game that he has moved beyond."

- Dr. Klaus Zernickow

"It is unfair to conclude that my silence implies that I must be what the letters say I am. Indeed, in Japan, to protest too much against an accusation is considered a sign of guilt."

- Eido T. Shimano

Short description of the paper and link to the paper itself at the bottom:

<http://www.buddhistchannel.tv/index.php?id=70,10983,0,0,1,0>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 16th, 2012 at 11:09 PM

Title: Re: Zen has No Morals

Content:

Astus wrote:

However, when you are the enlightened Zen master, even your blinking is a Dharma teaching, not to mention alcoholism, abusing students and using all the money for your comfort.

From the paper: "In conclusion, I therefore concur with the aforementioned critics that the structure and teachings of Zen Buddhism itself lie at the root of the problem, and that the many cases of sexual or other teacher misconduct are merely symptoms thereof."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 17th, 2012 at 4:02 PM

Title: Re: Zen has No Morals

Content:

Sara H said:

It means that people are human, and that people who are practicing Zen are human and make mistakes. It doesn't mean that they are immoral. Making a mistake and being immoral are vastly different things.

Astus wrote:

The point of the paper is that Zen teachers are not seen as simply humans, but as enlightened super-beings. Also that's the reason they could keep their teacher position after decades of "mistakes". And that's why it is some fundamental (Western) ideas about Zen that is one source of the problem, namely the myth of Dharma transmission and the position it gives one.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 18th, 2012 at 1:17 AM

Title: Re: Soto-zen, Dogen and reincarnation

Content:

Samsaric_Spiral said:

I am a Soto Zen practitioner, and I believe this stuff is not important to the practice. Rather, living in the moment and dropping the subject/object dichotomy in all activities takes priority. Whether rebirth is true or not has little to no impact on my life at the moment; if it were either true or false, a practitioner would still go about his daily tasks without intent, goal, or an "I"-barrier. Soto Zen is more concerned with daily living, hence why it is a great school for non-monastic people. I believe in almost all Zen schools, all ideology is treated as non-absolute and provisional, so attaching oneself to ideology could serve as a barrier to sustaining Beginner's Mind/Mindfulness.

Astus wrote:

I agree, if one is interested only in sustaining a selfless awareness, no issues of past and future are relevant, not even the present. But then, why is selfless awareness important? Why sustain a beginner's mind? Sports, dating, computer games, etc. are all fun, aren't they? Doing daily tasks without intent sounds interesting. But what are those daily tasks? A butcher's daily tasks are Zen practice if done with mindfulness? Stealing the tax payer's money is just fine if done as a beginner? How about cheating on one's spouse or beating the kids? And these are just simple ethical issues that one can actually face. If Soto Zen is concerned about daily living, how is it addressed with the single idea of acting without a goal? And if one has truly no purpose in life, why get out of bed at all? These are real questions of daily life, where causes and conditions matter. Actions have consequences, and behind all action there is intention. Which intention is right, which is wrong? And so we arrive at the teaching of karma and dependent origination, and from that to rebirth, the matter of life and death.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 18th, 2012 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: Soto-zen, Dogen and reincarnation

Content:

ghost01 said:

Questions like these don't have any real answer, and really only cause suffering by contemplating them.. so the purpose of acting without a goal may be to escape a pointless and mindless circle of thinking that only harms you.

Astus wrote:

Thinking is tiring, so better stop it? Consider Dogen's works for a little here then. He produced a few manuals for sitting meditation, yes. He also gave hundreds of teachings on a large variety of Buddhist doctrines in the Shobogenzo, the Shobogenzo Zuimonki and the Eihei Koroku. He established rules for the entire management of monastic life in the Eihei Shingi from cooking to administrative tasks. And there are some other works, like the Mana Shobogenzo, his collection of 300 koans. So if we look at Dogen as the exemplary Soto Zen practitioner, there is a lot more than just sitting with a beginner's mind. Dogen was familiar with the important Buddhist teachings and so could rely on a tradition that was more than 1500 years old by then with a great number of texts from India, Central Asia, China, Korea and Japan that he had access to. Again, the Soto Zen school in Japan is about 800 years old, a living tradition with a massive textual corpus of its own. True, for lay people, this is all not important. They can feel content with sitting a little in silence. However, that also means one is not ready to transform one's entire life and continue the bodhisattva's work in every aspect of daily living. That's what being a lay person actually means.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 18th, 2012 at 3:34 AM

Title: Re: The allure of Zen...

Content:

Astus wrote:

First important thing to understand about Zen is that there are Zen stories and there is actual life. Stories are fiction, they are there to entertain and to educate. Life, well, that's a lot more complex thing.

In the book "Zen Wisdom" <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sheng-yen> is asked, "How does an ordinary practitioner recognize a false master?" To what he answers,

"The most important thing in recognizing masters is to be able to judge whether they have a correct view of Buddhadharma. If their views of the Dharma are correct, then even if their behavior reveals some weaknesses, they should not be considered false masters. On the other hand, if teachers do not have a correct view of the Dharma, they cannot be considered authentic or virtuous masters.

Of course, this presupposes that the person making the judgment has some understanding of correct Dharma. Without an understanding of the Dharma, there is no way a practitioner can tell if a teacher is genuine or false.

Beyond this, there are some basic criteria that can be used in assessing masters. First, consider their causes and conditions. In other words, their actions should be based on a foundation of emptiness; there should be no attachment in what they do. Second, consider their causes and consequences, or karma. The sense of emptiness that guides the actions of virtuous masters (causes and conditions) should accord with their karma (causes and consequences). That is to say, their actions need to be guided by a sense of responsibility. They should, at all times, be clearly aware of the consequences of their actions. Thus, there is an intimate relationship between responsibility and non-attachment.

These, then, are the marks of virtuous masters: they have a correct view of the Dharma, their actions reveal no attachment and they have a clear sense of responsibility."

So, the first thing you should do, is to study Mahayana. You should be clear about the basics, like bodhicitta, the six paramitas, compassion, dependent origination and emptiness. Although it is not used in East Asia, Shantideva's Bodhicaryavatara (The Way of the Bodhisattva) is an inspiring introduction to the fundamental teachings. Also, as an introduction to Zen, you should study the so called Platform Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 18th, 2012 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: Soto-zen, Dogen and reincarnation

Content:

ghost01 said:

So not being content sitting in silence makes you a Bodhisattva?

Astus wrote:

What I'm saying is not reducing everything to a single idea. As for bodhisattvas, they use infinite skilful means in order to remove suffering from the whole world.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 18th, 2012 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: Soto-zen, Dogen and reincarnation

Content:

Samsaric_Spiral said:

There are still precepts that one must practice with, like a raft, but eventually they become second-nature and the raft may be put behind.

Soto Zen also acknowledges actions have consequences. The accumulation and effects of these are what's referred to Karma in Zen.

Astus wrote:

There are precepts and there is karma, just like in any other Buddhist tradition. How come that rebirth is not understood to be a basic idea?

Samsaric_Spiral said:

Siddhartha's Cūḷa-māluṅkya Sutra alludes to how we will never have an absolute answer to whether the Tathagata exists after death. What's important aren't the intellectual answers to such questions, but how we live our lives right now.

Astus wrote:

The existence of a buddha after death is quite a different issue than the existence of ordinary beings after death, about whom we find lot of teachings regarding the different places of birth and consequences of actions.

Life is not lived "right now". Moving, action requires all three times. And just as this day is the result of all the previous days and the cause of all the following days, this life is the result of previous lives and the cause of future lives. Not a difficult concept at all. And why is it important? Because life is short and people die every day. We can die at any moment. How will we reach buddhahood and liberate all beings then?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 18th, 2012 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: Soto-zen, Dogen and reincarnation

Content:

Samsaric_Spiral said:

I understand what you're getting at now. In Soto Zen tradition rebirth is understood to occur moment-by-moment. To use an example, 10 years ago 'I' was essentially a different being; even the molecular components that make me up now have changed. Since in emptiness there is no defining quality that can be used to rigidly define another, there is only constant change. Rebirth is essentially occurring right now, like beads attached to a string. In acknowledging constant change and no fixed beingness, the rigid distinction between living and death can vanish, for death and birth are happening moment-by-moment.

Astus wrote:

Momentariness (a very old Buddhist idea) is one important thing. Rebirth is another important teaching. One is continuous change on the micro level, the other on the macro level. They complement each other perfectly. The body changes on the cellular level rapidly, but we can still grow old. The mind changes every moment, but the continuity is not interrupted even by death.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 18th, 2012 at 3:44 PM

Title: Re: Soto-zen, Dogen and reincarnation

Content:

Samsaric_Spiral said:

I don't think we're in disagreement then. Just Soto Zen Buddhists don't really discuss what happens after death, even though it is generally agreed the idea of a pure vacuum is nonsensical. It's not like "we" fall into a nothingness, but rather the "we" is already empty of self-existence and there is nothing but constant change (i.e., lack of fixed beingness).

Also, I will get off-topic a bit by mentioning something that's related my friend recently brought: there was a German philosopher Bahnsen who's views on death sort of agree with both Theravada notion of reincarnation and Mahayana emptiness. It also acknowledges constant change.

Astus wrote:

The difference between Theravada and Mahayana in interpreting rebirth is that Theravada Abhidhamma does not accept the intermediate state (bardo) between births while all Mahayana school does. There is no real self in any Buddhist system, and all teach karmic causality, dependent origination and even momentariness. Also, since Mahayana is the path of the bodhisattva, it is impossible not to have rebirth, without which the bodhisattva path itself couldn't exist. Another few specialties of Mahayana is the immanence of bodhisattvas and buddhas, and the accessibility of buddha-lands. Soto Zen temples include altars for worship, shrines for ancestors, bodhisattvas and buddhas, and other practices of worship.

The point is, seeing the unity of emptiness and dependent origination, the oneness of essence and function, is the middle way in view, meditation and conduct. And just as on an everyday level - although it's all momentary and insubstantial - we go here and there, live like people with lifespan, on a larger scale beings die again and again, worlds collapse and reappear, etc. There is not a "fixed being", but we can tell without thinking whose toe was stepped on.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 18th, 2012 at 6:03 PM

Title: Re: Tibet : Monks below 18 forced to disrobe

Content:

Astus wrote:

OK, so those kids who were sent to monasteries are now sent back to home. Then they need approval from a government office to become monastics. The first one looks like protecting children - like, if somebody in a Western country forced their children into a Christian monastery, it would not be outrageous at all if the government sent them back home or to some child care home. As for the need of official permission to become a monastic, it's been like that in China for very long now (I mean, hundreds of years).

News of arrest of monks who have written against the government, what is strange about this? It is still a dictatorship, there is no free speech. The monks could have been well aware of the consequences.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 18th, 2012 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: Zen has No Morals

Content:

seeker242 said:

I have never heard of ANY zen tradition teaching that zen masters are enlightened super beings. So why do some people view them as super beings when it's not an actual zen teaching? What is the source of that belief? It seems to me that the source is not any zen teaching but rather the ignorant mind of practitioners. So the ignorant mind of practitioners is really the problem.

Astus wrote:

What is the definition of dharma-transmission? "acknowledgement of awakening itself [which] remained separate from monastic leadership"

(https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dharma_transmission#Contemporary_use_in_the_Zen-traditions)

And that's what the legend tells us. Buddha approved Kasyapa, Kasyapa approved Ananda, etc. And all the students wait for the approval of their teacher that they actually got it right. That is the power of the teacher, that is spiritual authority. And just like any power, it can and it will be abused. Add to this the idea that people can learn Zen ONLY from teachers within a lineage. This is again enforcing the position of Zen teachers.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 18th, 2012 at 11:00 PM

Title: Re: Soto-zen, Dogen and reincarnation

Content:

Simon E. said:

I have never heard anyone reply that way . And I have heard the question put to many lamas including the Dalai Lama. They include... Situ Rinpoche, Thrangu Rinpoche, Chime Rinpoche, Ato Rinpoche, Sogyal Rinpoche and my first teacher Trungpa Rinpoche. All of them (and it is a question lamas get asked a lot) said they had no memory of previous lives.

I have also heard the same question put to Ajahn Chah and Ajahn Sumedho...who just wouldn't go there.

So we have a remarkable situation where advanced meditators have no memory of past lives...but random children apparently do...

Astus wrote:

That is indeed an interesting point. Do you have their testimonies that they have no memories at all?

BTW, a couple of people I know say they have memories of past lives, including my mother.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 19th, 2012 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: Zen has No Morals

Content:

kirtu said:

There is an issue with Dharma transmission definitely. But there is also an issue with Zen awakening and enlightenment. I have said before that people who perpetrate this behavior have either no or very shallow awakening.

Astus wrote:

Problem is, while in Japan in Sotoshu and Rinzaishu receiving Dharma-transmission does not allow people in and of itself to train monks, or necessarily mean that the person is enlightened. In the West, however, this was all messed up. So we see the results.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 19th, 2012 at 4:41 PM

Title: Re: The goal/stages/results of Zen meditation?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are stages described from early on. Things about Zen are confusing because it is not a unified method and teachers say so many different things, and so on and on.

It is wonderful you got to a very calm state. That is samatha as you know. Unfortunately, even samatha requires awareness. That you fall asleep, it's normal. However, to look for proper instructions in Zen books about this is a lost cause, you won't really find it. Why? Because Zen comes later, it deals with high class vipasyana. So, your choice of switching to Theravada was appropriate, if you managed to get the right training. If you want to use what the Zen trainees used, you should study the meditation manuals of Zhiyi. You can find great translations of two important works of him on <http://kalavinka.org/> and you can also order them as books.

Other sources you can use besides Theravada ones that you are probably already familiar with (e.g. Ajahn Brahm's books), you can use Tibetan manuals that are mainly based on Indian works, like Gen Lamrimpa: Calming the Mind, Lati Rinpoche: Meditative States in Tibetan Buddhism and Khenchen Thrangu: The Practice of Tranquility and Insight.

If you are looking for Zen's stages of realisations, there are some, but it's nothing unified. So, like there are three steps described by Baizhang Huaihai (alleged teacher of Linji Yixuan) as (1) don't grasp appearances, (2) don't attach to not grasping, (3) don't make a concept of not attaching. And there are others like this. However, these are not really meditation stages but wisdom. It is the realisation of the middle way, the unity of samadhi and prajna, emptiness and dependent origination, essence and function, etc. Since the nature of mind is already empty and aware, there is nothing to develop or attain, only to realise this fact for yourself. That's how Zen has no real stages. But, it is still possible to devise some levels, like using the 10 bodhisattva stages, or the whole 52 stages system, or as Ven. Shengyan summarised it as (1) calm mind, (2) unified mind, (3) and no mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 19th, 2012 at 5:46 PM

Title: Re: Zen has No Morals

Content:

Astus wrote:

Sara H,

Unlike a PhD, that requires a whole institution with a faculty to earn it and has clear rules about the expectations, Dharma-transmission is given on a personal basis based on a single individual's assessment. So they are not very similar.

Insight into the nature of mind has been interpreted as different levels of realisations by different teachers. For Mazu Daoyi, it is buddhahood right there. For Jinul it is the first stage of faith. And there are others in between, like 1st bhumi bodhisattva, or 8th bhumi bodhisattva. Nevertheless, it is meant to be the correct and direct realisation of things as they are, of suchness, emptiness, dependent origination, buddha-nature.

If it is without clear consequences even to such basic things as ethical conduct, that attainment is meaningless. One of the definition of a sravaka stream-entrant is that it keeps the five precepts. While bodhisattva morals are little different, the awakening of bodhicitta includes unbound compassion towards all beings. Such compassion means that one has no intention to harm any being but to help them become free from all suffering. If you read the paper this topic has started with, you can see that such level of power abuse is far from compassionate conduct.

And as for what interpretation we are talking about regarding Dharma-transmission, it is the general one among Zen followers who believe that Zen teachers are enlightened - just as you say too, that they have kensho - and therefore they are the living source of the Dharma and the judge of the student's realisation. That you don't connect this to ethical behaviour is another thing, since ethics come before meditation and wisdom.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 19th, 2012 at 6:53 PM

Title: Re: Zen has No Morals

Content:

dharmagoat said:

Does the idea that a lineage master is necessarily a "super being" come from the Tibetan tradition?

Astus wrote:

Zen precedes the arrival of Buddhism to Tibet.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 19th, 2012 at 6:53 PM

Title: Re: Zen has No Morals

Content:

Astus wrote:

seeker242,

I understand that, but even that transmission does not make that person a "super being". Where does the idea of "super being" come from, just from dharma transmission? Don't you know all the stories of transmission, that the Buddha gave the True Dharma Eye to Kashyapa? Aren't you familiar with Zen stories of enlightened masters that are then used in meditation? One who receives transmission is counted as an heir to the Buddha and all the great patriarchs. And they emphasises this too, by for instance showing the whole lineage, talking about the importance of lineage, praising their own master and their master's master.

Unknown said:

The answer is simple really, because the students were not being intelligent or reasonable, to begin with. A reasonable and intelligent student would have left those teachers behind in a heartbeat, without even thinking twice about it.

Astus wrote:

Not exactly. People who go to study under a teacher do that exactly because they don't know themselves what to do and expect the teacher to tell them. This is also pushed by the idea that you need a teacher and that you should obey your master. Being a student then is a little like being a child, where it doesn't really matter if you are intelligent or not. In fact, in Zen they like to say that one should put aside all cleverness, that Zen itself is beyond one's understanding.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 19th, 2012 at 6:58 PM

Title: Re: The Tao of Zen?

Content:

Ikkyu said:

If a very important Zen abbot is saying that Taoism has had this much influence, isn't there at least a little room to suggest this may be in some sense true?

Astus wrote:

If said Zen abbot were also a scholar in the relevant field then yes. Otherwise, it has no relevance that he was a famous Zen teacher.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 19th, 2012 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: Zen has No Morals

Content:

seeker242 said:

Which zen scriptures say a student is required to have blind faith in a teacher and do whatever they say? Even if what they say and do is completely contrary to the precepts? That doesn't exist! You put aside cleverness, but you don't put aside reasonableness. For example, if a teacher shows up drunk to give a dharma talk, it's not "cleverness" to say "Hmm, there is something wrong with this guy." It's just being reasonable.

Astus wrote:

Maezumi Roshi, who is not discussed in the original paper, was an alcoholic, just to give you an example. At the same time, we have <http://www.kwanumzen.org/1976/100-crazy/> as the "drunken master", or the entire life story of Ikkyu.

It is not the point that scriptures don't say this, because people don't even read the sutras. The picture you have as your avatar is an example of the idea that in Zen the scriptures are not important, therefore the only form of authority that remains is the teacher. And that leaves the position of master in the special position of spiritual judge and even king over unenlightened students. Since Zen is not something unenlightened people can understand, whatever happens is beyond mortal comprehension.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 20th, 2012 at 6:03 PM

Title: Re: Accumulating Merit by Khenpo Tsultrim Gyatso Rinpoche.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Interesting thing, this recitation-meditation.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 21st, 2012 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: The Tao of Zen?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Ikkyu,

Seung Sahn was a religious authority within his own school and made a significant impact in the Western Buddhist community. That doesn't make him a historian or a scholar of East Asian studies. Just because someone is a bishop of a diocese it doesn't mean he is necessarily proficient in the historic development of Christianity, or a general of military history, or a surgeon of medical history. In fact, because they all have their own specific understanding there is a good chance their interpretation will be biased and not based on verifiable research.

And that is an important point here, research. To say that Zen was influenced by Taoism, it is the very first task to define what constitutes Zen and what Taoism, and then show how the influenced has happened and in what area. Zen defines itself as a Buddhist school, uses Buddhist sources and claims Indian Buddhist origins. Whatever teachings are there in Zen, they can be traced back to Buddhist sutras and treatises. So, what is Taoist in it?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 24th, 2012 at 11:37 PM

Title: Re: The Buddhism trend in decline.

Content:

Astus wrote:

I doubt Google trends is representative of real life situation.

Just look at the word "mahamudra": <https://www.google.com/trends/?q=mahamudra> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

It is up and down.

Perhaps checking existing community centres, monasteries, publications would be a better indication.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 25th, 2012 at 12:50 AM

Title: Re: The Buddhism trend in decline.

Content:

conebeckham said:

I'd venture a guess that the vast majority of lay Buddhists don't google anything.

Astus wrote:

That sounds very true.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 25th, 2012 at 5:38 PM

Title: Re: Peixiu pronunciation

Content:

Astus wrote:

http://talkbank.org/pinyin/Trad_chart_IPA.php: p^hei-ɕjou

Further info here:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Pinyin#Rules_given_in_terms_of_English_pronunciation

Note, however, that this is modern Mandarin. Pronunciation changed a lot and there are several dialects in China. Using Japanese (Hai-kyuu) or Korean (Pay-hyu) can be actually closer to the original.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, July 25th, 2012 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: What actually makes someone a Buddhist?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Buddhist is someone who believes that ultimate liberation is taught by the Buddha as his Dharma and upheld by the Sangha. This is actually taking refuge in the three jewels. As for how deeply one understands the middle way, how well that person can practise ethical discipline and meditation, these are secondary matters, that can qualify a Buddhist.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, July 26th, 2012 at 4:45 PM

Title: Re: Zen masters from Shaolin?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Xueting Fuyu (1203-1275) established in Shaolin both its martial side and the Caodong lineage, and even today in China the Caodong lineage comes through him.

Zhanran Yuancheng (1561-1626), revived the Caodong lineage in the Ming dynasty, and his master, Cizhou Fangnian (?-1594), was from Shaolin.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 27th, 2012 at 5:10 AM

Title: Re: Practicing martial arts?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is a thread on <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=66&t=3945> you may visit.

From the <http://www.ymba.org/bns/bnsframe.htm>, the moral code of bodhisattvas in East Asian Buddhism, the 10th minor precept says,

10. On Storing Deadly Weapons

A disciple of the Buddha should not store weapons such as knives, clubs, bows, arrows, spears, axes or any other weapons, nor may he keep nets, traps or any such devices used in destroying life. (53)

As a disciple of the Buddha, he must not even avenge the death of his parents -- let alone kill sentient beings! (54) He should not store any weapons or devices that can be used to kill sentient beings. If he deliberately does so, he commits a secondary offense.

Regarding committing aggressive acts, see the 1st and 9th major precept.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 27th, 2012 at 5:18 AM

Title: Re: Sex and the Lama

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is not against law or lay precept to have sex with a student. Lying about the nature of the relationship, however, is deceitful and harmful. If the woman was not cheated by tales of spiritual benefits or promise of love, then there is simply the case of either casual sex or an emotionally balanced relationship.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 27th, 2012 at 4:58 PM

Title: Re: Practicing martial arts?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The one I quoted is a minor precept and it is about storing weapons, it is not about their use, but the fact that one possesses such tools. That makes it clear how even the potential of aggression should be removed. Regarding the acts of any form of aggression, it is covered by the major precepts. The acts of anger by the ninth, acts of harming and killing by the very first.

If one wants to do training for fitness, there are many forms of sports. It is true that what matters is intention, so theoretically practising martial arts is no problem. Problem is, however, that as we easily identify with our body and acts have deep impact on our mentality, martial training generates a martial attitude. By learning defensive techniques you also learn to expect attack, you learn feeling insecure and afraid. Of course, if you can put that all down and maintain a peaceful and compassionate mind, there can be no problem. But then, why practice self defence?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 27th, 2012 at 5:14 PM

Title: Re: How can Zen be considered it's own thing...

Content:

Astus wrote:

Why do you need a teacher? Because people are lazy and careless, they don't make the effort to fully comprehend the teachings and be able to apply it in their practice and then their life. Having a teacher is similar to calling the plumber to fix the toilet. You could fix it yourself, if you cared to learn how. Or, an even closer example is learning a language or profession. Anyone can learn a foreign language simply from books and podcasts, but without regular classes people tend to postpone learning and eventually give up. Also, just as a Zen teacher, the language teacher can point out your mistakes immediately, while to do it yourself you have to do tests and such.

Can one learn Zen without a teacher? Of course you can. Can you learn from books? Sure. Are you up to the task of actually doing it?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, July 27th, 2012 at 9:12 PM

Title: Re: How can Zen be considered it's own thing...

Content:

Astus wrote:

Huineng gives the answers in the Platform Sutra,

Need of teacher,

"If you are one who enlightens himself, you need not seek a teacher outside. If you insist that it is necessary to seek a Good Knowing Advisor in the hope of obtaining liberation, you are mistaken. Why? Within your own mind there is self-enlightenment which is a Knowing Advisor. But if you give rise to deviant confusion, false thoughts, and perversions, although a Good Knowing Advisor external to you instructs you, he cannot save you."

(ch. 2)

Learning from books,

"Those who grasp at emptiness slander the Sutras by maintaining that written words have no use. Since they maintain they have no need of written words, they should not speak either, because written words are merely the marks of spoken language. They also maintain that the direct way cannot be established by written words, and yet these two words, 'not established' are themselves written."

(ch. 10)

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 28th, 2012 at 7:32 AM

Title: Re: How can Zen be considered it's own thing...

Content:

Astus wrote:

Let's look at it from another perspective. What is it one should learn in Zen? Saying that it's a "thing" or "art" is not a definition. What is Zen about? It is about seeing the nature of mind. What is the nature of mind? It is non-abiding awareness. How do you experience it? You don't attach to ideas and emotions. How can you not attach to them? You see them for what they are, impermanent mental phenomena. And it can go on with an extensive description of the many teachings of Mahayana. A teacher can help you clarify all the teachings in a way that can make sense to you. You may also find a book by a teacher that answers whatever question you have at that time. The Buddhist canon and auxiliary works contain thousands of years of experience. A living teacher has a few decades of experience. However, unlike books, a teacher can know you and speak in a way that matches your way of understanding. Of course, if you can find the right teacher.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, July 28th, 2012 at 6:59 PM

Title: Re: How can Zen be considered it's own thing...

Content:

Astus wrote:

[quote="/johnny\""]can you explain progression in meditation specifically?[/quote]

It depends on the person who practises. The general stages are explained in several texts, covering the levels of calming and insight. The Zen part is at the final stages of insight with the realisation of the middle way, the unity of emptiness and dependent origination. The point where one sees not just that all phenomena are mind but also that the mind is unreal as well. But you already <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=69&t=9351> on that.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 30th, 2012 at 4:04 AM

Title: Re: How can Zen be considered it's own thing...

Content:

Matt J said:

How did you come to the conclusion that Zen teaches that the mind is non-abiding awareness?

Astus wrote:

"What is nonthought? If in seeing all the dharmas, the mind is not defiled or attached, this is nonthought. [The mind's] functioning pervades all locations, yet it is not attached to all the locations."

(Platform Sutra, ch. 2)

"Within continuing moments of thought one should not think of the previous [mental] realm. If one thinks of the previous thought, the present thought, and the later thought, one's thoughts will be continuous without cease. This is called 'fettered.' If one's thoughts do not abide in the dharmas, this is to be 'unfettered.' Thus it is that nonabiding is taken as the fundamental."

(Platform Sutra, ch. 4)

"Q: Where does the mind dwell in its real abode?

A: Dwelling nowhere is its real abode.

Q: What is dwelling nowhere?

A: It is the mind not dwelling anywhere or on anything.

Q: What does "not dwelling anywhere or on anything" mean?

A: Not to dwell anywhere or on anything means not to dwell on good or evil, existence or non-existence, within or without or on the middle, nor on concentration nor dispersion, and neither to dwell on the void nor on the non-void. This is the meaning of "not dwelling anywhere or on anything". Just this alone is real abiding. This stage of achievement is also the non-abiding Mind, and the non-abiding Mind is the Buddha Mind.

Q: What is the non-abiding Mind like?

A: The non-abiding Mind is not green, yellow, red or white. It is not long or short, nor does it come or go. It is not pure or impure, nor does it have birth or death. It is only deep and permanent stillness. This is the non-abiding Mind, which is also called the Original Body. The Original Body is the Buddha's Body, which is also called the Dharmakaya."

(Ta-Chu Hui-Hai: <http://www.ymba.org/TaChu/tachu2.htm>)

"Now we are getting towards the end of the third period of five hundred years since the time of the Buddha, and most students of zen cling to all sorts of sounds and forms. Why do they not copy me by letting each thought gas as though it were nothing, or as though it were a piece of rotten wood, a stone, or the cold ashes of a dead fire? Or else, by just making whatever slight response is suited to each occasion? If you do not act thus, when you reach the end of your days here, you will be tortured by Yama. You must get away from the doctrines of existence and non-existence, for Mind is like the sun, forever in the void, shining spontaneously, shining without intending to shine. This is not something which you can accomplish without effort, but when you reach the point of clinging to nothing whatever, you will be acting as the Buddhas act. This will indeed be acting in accordance with the saying: 'Develop a mind which rests on no thing whatever.' For this is your pure Dharmakaya, which is called supreme perfect Enlightenment. If you cannot understand this, though you gain profound knowledge from your studies, though you make the most painful efforts and practise the most stringent austerities, you will still fail to know your own mind. All your effort will have been misdirected and you will certainly join the family of Mara. What advantage can you gain from this sort of practice?"

(The Chün Chou Record in "The Zen Teachings of Huang Po", p. 61-62)

"Therefore, being with no place to dwell is the way of all Buddha activity. The Mind that does not abide anywhere is the Perfect Awakening, without understanding the Unconditioned Truth, even with much learning and diligent practice, one still does not recognize one's own Mind."

(The Chung-Ling Record in " <http://www.ymba.org/transmission/content.html> ")

"The mind of voidness and calm is a spiritual Knowing that never darkens. This calm Knowing of voidness and calm is precisely the mind of voidness and calm that Bodhidharma formerly transmitted. ... Knowing is no mindfulness and no form. Who is characterized as self, and who is characterized as other? When you are aware that all characteristics are void, it is true mind, no mindfulness. If a thought arises, be aware of it; once you are aware of it, it will disappear. The excellent gate of practice lies here alone. Therefore, even though you fully cultivate all the practices, just take no mindfulness as the axiom. If you just get the mind of no mindfulness, then love and hatred will spontaneously become pale and faint, compassion and wisdom [prajna] will spontaneously increase in brightness, sinful karma will spontaneously be eliminated, and you will spontaneously be zealous in meritorious practices."

(Chan Letter in "Zongmi on Chan", p. 89)

"This awareness is true awareness, the same as empty tranquil awareness. It is also called "awareness of no-thought." If one has thought and awareness, one is in the state of common people; if one has no-thought and non-knowing, one is in the state of the two vehicles; if one has no-thought, but with awareness, one is in the state of the Buddhas.

No-thought is empty and tranquil [awareness], and is also called "non-abiding awareness." Because if one abides in something, it is comparable to a person entering into a dark room and not being to see anything. But, if one does not abide in anything, it is like sunlight and moonlight illuminating and making visible all varieties of things." (Yongming Yanshou: Profound Pivot of the Contemplation of Mind in "Integrating Chinese Buddhism", p. 177)

"People who cultivate nowadays belong to the Buddha's spiritual family. They rely upon the direct approach of the sudden school and, having developed firm faith, they straightaway understand that their own minds are perpetually calm and ever alert. Since they rely on this realization when they begin cultivation, even though they cultivate the manifold supplementary practices, they only regard thoughtlessness as their core and nonactivity as their foundation. Due to this thoughtlessness and nonaction, their practice is independent of sequence in either time or space and free of any element of discrimination between the absolute dharma and its phenomenal aspects [that is, immanent suchness]. Since their cultivation is complete, approaches to dharma as numerous as dust motes and the meritorious qualities developed on all the bhavis are also complete in the essence of their sublime mind, which is, accordingly, like the wish-fulfilling gem." (Encouragement to Practice in "Collected Works of Chinul", p. 109)

"Think of not thinking. Not thinking-what kind of thinking is that? Nonthinking. This is the essential art of zazen." (Dogen: http://www.stanford.edu/group/scbs/sztp3/translations/gongyo_seiten/translations/part_3/fukan_zazengi.html)

"Right at this moment, this single thought is itself unborn! Everything that manifests before you now are illusory and insubstantial - all of which are reflections projected from the true mind. Work in such a manner to crush away [all your deluded thoughts]. You should fixate [your mind] to observe where the thoughts arise from and where they cease. If you practice like this, no matter what kinds of deluded thoughts arise, one smash and they will all be crushed to pieces. All will dissolve and vanish away. You should never follow or perpetuate deluded thoughts. Master Yongjia has admonished, "One must sever the mind [that desires] continuation." This is because the illusory mind of delusion is originally rootless. You should never take a deluded thought as real and try to hold on to it in your heart. As soon as it arises notice it right away. Once you notice it, it will vanish. Never try to suppress thoughts but allow thoughts to be as you watch a gourd floating on water." (Hanshan Deqing: <http://chancenter.org/cmc/2011/10/13/essentials-of-practice-and-enlightenment-for-beginners/>)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, July 30th, 2012 at 3:13 PM

Title: Re: Non-Abiding Awareness

Content:

Astus wrote:

Matt,

Identifying "present awareness" as the final meaning, as the true self is still grasping, abiding and the view of self. As Wuzhu of the Baotang school often said, "At the time of true no-thought, no-thought itself is not." Also, clinging to a pure consciousness as reality creates the duality of pure and non-pure, thought and no thought. Non-abiding is not abiding in some blank mind but not grasping appearances. That's what emptiness means, and that's why emptiness and dependent origination are not different. Referring to the Heart Sutra, the problem is not that there are aggregates, but identifying with any of them as real is the delusion creating suffering.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 31st, 2012 at 4:41 PM

Title: Re: Zen schools that involve qigong?

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think you can find quite easily a Chinese monk who also knows qigong. But that doesn't mean Buddhism or specifically Zen/Chan is connected to it in doctrine or praxis. You can find Western Zen teachers who are also psychotherapists or engineers, but neither of those professions are Buddhist methods.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, July 31st, 2012 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: Ask a Transgender Buddhist

Content:

Sara H said:

Are you talking about Anatta or the concept of no "sepperate-self".
Or the second Noble Truth being that clinging/craving/insisting/the "I must have" being the cause of suffering. ? Or something else?

Astus wrote:

Yes, I am referring to selflessness and the second noble truth, as they are related very closely. Identifying with something is grasping a self, and that causes suffering. More to the point of gender, here is what Soma bhikkhuni said in reply to Mara,

"What difference does being a woman make when the mind's well-centered, when knowledge is progressing, seeing clearly, rightly, into the Dhamma. Anyone who thinks 'I'm a woman' or 'a man' or 'Am I anything at all?' — that's who Mara's fit to address."
(<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn05/sn05.002.than.html>

There is also a longer sutta on the subject:

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/an/an07/an07.048.than.html>. Furthermore, in chapter seven of the Vimalakirti Sutra (tr. Charles Luk) it is said,

"all women are the same and though they appear in female form, they are fundamentally not women. Hence the Buddha said: 'All things are neither male nor female'. ... The form of a woman neither exists nor is non-existent."

So, it is a part of Buddhism that one should remove identification with one's gender, as part of getting rid of sensual desire.

Sara H said:

I view it as an "aspect" of me, in the same way that my hair color or eye color is.

Astus wrote:

Since you identified yourself in this thread as a transgender Buddhist, my question occurred because it seems to me that being a transgender is a very important thing for you. Or, if you don't mind me saying, being a woman is important for you.

Therefore I ask how you manage these two views to be helpful for you in your life.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 1st, 2012 at 3:33 AM

Title: Re: Zen schools that involve qigong?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The majority of Zen teachings is written in Chinese language. Does that mean Zen involves Chinese? No, Zen is not connected to the language that is used as its medium, and the language itself does not become Zen just because it is used to convey Zen teachings.

As for the concept of "Zen school", it is not an easy one to define. Traditionally speaking, there are only two schools of Zen since the Song dynasty, and that is the Linji and the Caodong. However, they exist in theory only.

So, if we changed the question, asking if there are Buddhist monastic/lay communities in East Asia where they practise qigong/gongfu/etc., the answer can be easily yes. And regarding their specific views on Buddhist doctrine and praxis one can find a large variety, while at the same time they all do qigong or other forms of body training. In fact, we can just say that there are often some form of body training involved, since even in qigong there are different styles.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 1st, 2012 at 3:35 PM

Title: Re: Zen schools that involve qigong?

Content:

Astus wrote:

johnny,

All I'm talking about here is the relationship between Chinese forms of body training and Zen Buddhism. I define Zen as a set of doctrines and methods. Taoism and history, I've said nothing about those. Now, when comparing or matching Zen with something else, what I consider are the doctrines and methods taught within the Zen canon. As you have found nothing related to qigong in it, so I say the same that they are not related. We can also consider that actually there are people who practise both Zen and qigong. There is no contradiction.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 1st, 2012 at 5:44 PM

Title: Re: Ask a Transgender Buddhist

Content:

Astus wrote:

I see your point. My question is not relevant then.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 1st, 2012 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: Non-Abiding Awareness

Content:

Astus wrote:

Baizhang's three gates are fine indeed. What difference do you find between those who talk of awareness and the Buddhist teachers you mentioned?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 2nd, 2012 at 5:47 AM

Title: Re: Non-Abiding Awareness

Content:

Astus wrote:

Andrew,

What else is there to realise besides emptiness? That is the quintessence of wisdom.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 3rd, 2012 at 3:50 PM

Title: Re: Soto is the same as Caodong?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The only difference in practical terms between Caodong and Linji in China was the brief period when Dahui came up with the huatou practice and it was in the process of spreading. But in a short time everyone embraced it. Dogen was in China when kanhua practice was still relatively new. So what he brought back to Japan was mainly general Song dynasty Buddhism where Chan philosophy was prevalent.

A couple of factors should be noted. First, individual monasteries were independent and it was up to the abbot and the elder monks what kind of teachings were available and practised in the daily routine. Being a Caodong monastery meant that the abbot associated himself with that lineage, but the teachings provided in the entire monastery was not defined by that. As a modern example, both Fo Guang Shan and Chung Tai Shan are Linji lineage, just as Kwan Um Zen and Hanmaum Seon are Linji, but the only group among them that shows some "Zen style" is really the Kwan Um Zen that was influenced by Japanese Buddhism and established in the West. My point is, these "schools" are just names that tell little about what actually goes on.

The Japanese Soto school went through many changes until it reached its current centralised form. Comparing Soto with Caodong raises the problems of identifying what these names stand for. Steven Heine has a study about Dogen's sources and life that might give you the answers you are after: "Did Dōgen Go to China? - What He Wrote and When He Wrote It". For Caodong in China, the only study I know of is Morten Schlütter's "How Zen Became Zen".

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 3rd, 2012 at 8:05 PM

Title: Re: Soto is the same as Caodong?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Matylda,

Can you specify where and what difference your friend experienced regarding koans?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 6th, 2012 at 5:17 PM

Title: Re: Whats the difference

Content:

Astus wrote:

Can you describe in brief what you understand as "mindfulness of mind" in vipassana?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 6th, 2012 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: The board and its direction (if any)

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm not really sure what evil and New Age invasion this is about. If I look around in the Buddhist forums, I don't see it happening. Am I missing something? Sure, I don't read everything, not even the half of it, but checking recent topics, titles here and there, it seems all according to the dedicated Buddhist section. There are some strange ones in Dharma Free for All and the Lounge, but that's what they are for anyway. Everyone has the great opportunity to discuss the wonderful Mahayana teachings in its myriad aspects. So, it's better to ask yourself what were the last three topics you posted in and those that you started. Were they about the Buddhadharma? Were they a reflection of bodhicitta?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 7th, 2012 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: Analysis of 'presence'

Content:

Astus wrote:

Is this 'presence' vegetarian or omnivore? Does this 'presence' sleep at night? Is it heterosexual, homosexual, bisexual, transsexual, or asexual? And if these are irrelevant questions, what is 'presence' good for?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 8th, 2012 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: Issues with going on retreat.

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Pure Land is precisely the sublime method enabling the practitioner to turn his back on worldly dusts to merge with Enlightenment and return to the source (the Mind). Laymen bound up in mundane affairs cannot easily find the time to attend retreats, practice meditation and recite the sutras. This method is, therefore, very suitable for persons such as yourself. Each one can pay respect to the Buddhas and recite sutras or Buddha Amitabha's name according to individual circumstances and capacities, dedicating the merits thus accrued to rebirth in the Pure Land."

(Yin Kuang: Pure-Land Zen, Zen Pure-Land, p. 24)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 8th, 2012 at 2:29 AM

Title: Re: Analysis of 'presence'

Content:

Astus wrote:

So, how can one perceive personally this 'presence'?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 8th, 2012 at 6:33 AM

Title: Re: Analysis of 'presence'

Content:

Andrew108 said:

It's more like the fact of perception rather than an object of perception. It's not an object to be perceived.

Astus wrote:

How come then that someone called 'teacher' can point it out for another?

Would you say that it's the presence of perception? The fact of being conscious? It is basic to all living beings. If there is nothing to be perceived about it, what do you call an analysis here?

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 8th, 2012 at 4:48 PM

Title: Re: Analysis of 'presence'

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Conventionally it seems that there is a teacher but really there is just the natural state and that's what we are exposed to.

Astus wrote:

Exposed to how? How do you make the shift from non-presence to presence?

Andrew108 said:

So....no words I'm afraid can get to it. Also whilst we experience everything with our body and mind both of these are not separate from 'presence' whilst at the same time 'presence' is not caused by body and mind. When we look at karmic experiences in this way then they are always super fresh and in actuality 'unborn' in that they are not separate from 'presence'.

Astus wrote:

Body and mind are not separate from presence, but presence is not cause by either body nor mind. So, are body and mind same as or different from presence? Or both? Perhaps neither? Do you see that any if these will result in contradiction, just as in Nagarjuna's analysis of the relationship between the aggregates and the self?

And no words can get to it. What do you mean words can't get to it? There is no way to give instructions on presence, or how to attain presence? Then all those teachings are really a waste of paper and bytes.

Andrew108 said:

Right. It's not an object or even something to be reified like a type of emptiness. It's just what it is. There isn't really any analysis that needs to be done. The natural state brings with it all the knowledge we need. Actually right now we have all the knowledge we need.

Astus wrote:

It is not an object of perception, OK. Is it the subject then? If neither subject nor object, what else is there? And how can anyone ever know about it? If there is no analysis, what is the source of knowledge? If it is some special instruction, see my questions above.

Just to be clear, the reason I'm asking these questions is simply to get your perspective on what you happened to start a discussion on.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 8th, 2012 at 6:00 PM

Title: Re: Analysis of 'presence'

Content:

Andrew108 said:

If we want to think about this in a more down to earth way then it's like knowing or seeing what anger is as an actuality. So we can have two ways to know anger. We can know it dualistically as something unpleasant and threatening to us (intellectually by looking with effort) or we can understand it from it's own side as being a display without basis (seeing without effort). This knowing so-called 'anger' from it's own side is similar to talking about knowing 'presence'. Recognizing 'presence' is also effortless seeing that knows itself.

Astus wrote:

So if we view anger just as an emotion without pushing it away, just being present with it, then it is the presence? And we can do the same with any other emotion or thought, right? That is, just being present with it without adding or taking away anything, without reacting to its presence. Isn't that just passivity?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 9th, 2012 at 6:08 AM

Title: Re: Does Zen/Chan Offer an Opinion Regarding Shentong/Rangtong?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Zen is not about philosophical opinions but going beyond ideas and concepts. Whether one emphasises buddha-mind or emptiness, they are just expedient means. And there are examples for both cases.

This story sums it up nicely:

A monk asked, "Master, Why do you say that Mind is Buddha?"

Mazu said, "To stop babies from crying."

The monk said, "What do you say when they stop crying?"

Mazu said, "Neither Mind, nor Buddha."

The monk asked, "Without using either of these statements, how would you instruct someone?"

Mazu said, "I would say to him that it's not a thing."

The monk asked, "If suddenly you met someone who was in the midst of it, then what?"

Mazu said, "I would teach them to realize the great Way."

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 9th, 2012 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: Does Zen/Chan Offer an Opinion Regarding Shentong/Rangtong?

Content:

My Socks Smell said:

I was not aware that Japanese Zen contains a strong element of Yogachara idealism. That worries me. Therefore, may I ask you (or anyone who would care to answer), could you give a brief analysis of exactly what differentiates Yogachara idealism found in Zen from the concept of the "One Without A Second" found in Advaita Vedanta? Thanks.

Astus wrote:

Yogachara is not Advaita, never was. Look into the works of Asanga and Vasubandhu, or some basic summary of Yogachara, like this one:

<http://www.acmuller.net/yogacara/articles/intro-uni.htm>. However, Zen is not Yogachara, and in East Asia it is a secondary teaching behind those of Tientai/Tendai and Huayan/Kegon. But again, Zen is neither of them.

As for East Asian Yogachara - if you're interested - see this nice intro by Tagawa Shun'ei: Living Yogacara: An Introduction to Consciousness-Only Buddhism

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 10th, 2012 at 4:27 PM

Title: Re: Hsuan Hua on Homosexuality

Content:

Astus wrote:

As far as I know, Ven. Hsuan Hua did not speak English and his primary audience was ethnic Chinese people. Since Buddhism in Asian countries is as conservative and traditional as Christianity in Western cultures, these views are not that strange then. Of course, this is not an excuse, but simply a possible explanation.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 10th, 2012 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: Hsuan Hua on Homosexuality

Content:

Astus wrote:

Interpretations of marriage, sexual life and many other social customs are not relevant to the path of liberation. They are just ideas of a culture in an era.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 11th, 2012 at 3:11 AM

Title: Re: Realized teachers - their mundane errors and misconducts

Content:

Astus wrote:

Regarding bodhisattvas, on the 2nd bhumi they attain purity in the ten virtuous conducts.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 12th, 2012 at 8:38 PM

Title: Re: Hsuan Hua on Homosexuality

Content:

Astus wrote:

If we look at the question from a scriptural point of view, there is no statement regarding homosexual acts as acceptable within the third precept. On the other hand, there are quite a few works on the contrary. As a sexual misconduct then, it can lead to lower birth.

Now, this doesn't mean that such a view is definitive. But some may believe so. Just because they think so, it doesn't mean they are against the Buddhist teachings.

Let me give another example of Hsuan Hua's interpretation of precepts,

"People who smoke will fall into the hell of Flames after they die. The hell of Flames is especially prepared for smokers. Whoever likes to smoke has the chance to go down there." (http://www.gbm-online.com/online/dharma/5_precepts3.html)

In his view, smoking is covered under the fifth precept against intoxicants. Can we find statements against smoking tobacco? No, as tobacco did not exist in Asia. So what is his interpretation based on?

Regarding homosexuality he refers to Chinese philosophical interpretations, like the yin-yang system. That is not Buddhist. He talks about the end of humanity, which is an argument commonly used against celibacy and not homosexuality.

What can be learnt from all this is not that Hsuan Hua was a false teacher and such, but the old teaching about not relying on the person but on the Dharma.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 12th, 2012 at 9:15 PM

Title: Re: Hsuan Hua on Homosexuality

Content:

Astus wrote:

Abhidharma and commentaries are in the Buddhist canon. However, Hsuan Hua does not quote them. It seems he just presents his interpretations as orthodox, and people accept it because he said so.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 20th, 2012 at 4:21 PM

Title: Re: How can Zen be considered it's own thing...

Content:

Astus wrote:

Matylda,

How can you tell if somebody is enlightened? Because if that is the primary criterion of a teacher, a student should be able to tell that a person is awakened or not. If the student is unable to tell, how to choose? Lineage is said to be a proof, but even in Dogen's time he met teachers of different lineages but could not follow them and rejected them as fakes. So lineage is no proof.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, August 20th, 2012 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: How can Zen be considered it's own thing...

Content:

Astus wrote:

Matylda,

You gave a list about the qualities of a good student and that such a student should serve the teacher and behave well. But, as for deciding who is an enlightened teacher you did not give any observable characteristics.

How about Dogen's critique of Dahui - the greatest reformer of Chan in Song China - in Jisho Zanmai? From the Shasta Abbey translation, "Even though 'Meditation Master' Sōkō did the training for a rather long time, he did not succeed in getting hold of his Master's Skin and Flesh, Bones and Marrow, much less did he even know that there is an Eye amidst the dust motes of defiling passions."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 21st, 2012 at 5:34 AM

Title: Re: How can Zen be considered it's own thing...

Content:

Astus wrote:

So regarding teachers the only important thing is that they are enlightened but nobody can actually tell if someone is enlightened or not. That makes it a matter of pure luck/coincidence/karma to find the right Zen teacher. On this basis it can be questioned whether any historical teacher was enlightened. And such a view doesn't sound good to me. On the other hand, in the nikayas one finds clear guidance on investigating (AN 4.192) and identifying (MN 95) the proper teacher. In Mahayana sutras one also finds guidance on this matter (e.g. Complete Enlightenment Sutra, ch. 10). There are also shastras giving lists of qualities a teacher should possess (e.g. Ratnagotravibhaga 93.3-9 (T1611, 844b 6-12) and Mahayanasutralamkara 17.10). How come that Zen is so lost in this matter that is said to be so important for it?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 21st, 2012 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: Why follow one tradition of Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

If you look into what are called traditions you find that they are combinations and systematisations of other traditions of teachings and practices. And within a single tradition there are smaller and greater differences among individual teachers. So, if we go on with our analysis of the concept of tradition, we find that it is indeed not a single thing but a manifold, constructed and dependently arisen phenomenon. Practitioners have always tried to benefit from whatever they had at hand and as teachers they transmitted those that were the most helpful on their path. It is only natural that since in English we have teachings from several sources we make use of them.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 21st, 2012 at 4:14 PM

Title: Re: How can Zen be considered it's own thing...

Content:

Astus wrote:

And what is the point? You say that it only matters if a teacher "realises it". But the fact of realisation can't be discerned by others, and not even the object of realisation is defined. So it is like not saying anything. You claim that neither ethics nor wisdom matters in a teacher. This way there is no meaning of the title "Zen teacher". Considering this non-defined concept, anyone could just be called Zen teacher and there would be no way to debate its validity.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 22nd, 2012 at 5:09 AM

Title: Re: Why follow one tradition of Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is new not because of the availability of information - in fact, the majority of Buddhist canonical and extra-canonical works are still untranslated - but because of this idea of "tradition". To give an example, in Chan they talk about lineage, and Chan teachers are thought of in terms of being members of this or that lineage. So we can say that there are different traditions. What people forget here is that the whole lineage issue exists only for abbots. All the other monks and the laity are simply Buddhists who study and practise various things. This reductionist view that if somebody prefers Chan (note, even Chan can mean many different things) then studying Yogacara and visualising Avalokitesvara are excluded is simply mistaken.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 22nd, 2012 at 7:00 AM

Title: Re: Power of Vows of Buddha Amitabha?

Content:

Astus wrote:

First, buddhas throughout the ten directions are real beings. Zen followers also pray to buddhas, bodhisattvas, Dharma protectors and even to local deities at some places. Saying that buddhas and all appearances are mind doesn't mean you just imagine yourself a big house and you then live in a big house. Where you live right now is a mental phenomenon simply because it is your experience. Contemplating on this is the path of wisdom. The path of Pure Land - if we use such a distinction - is focusing on attaining birth in the Land of Peace and Bliss. Within this you may also find different approaches and methods, you can choose whichever you like. The vows of Amita Buddha define his specialities as a buddha. The power of the vows means that those who have faith in them and rely on them are assisted by Amita Buddha. This is not a matter of imagination. Although people can imagine a dragon, but nobody is afraid of them because dragons are not real. However, if you think about the dangers of crossing a street, you don't think it's all just a fantasy. This is quite an important difference.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 22nd, 2012 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Affliction is Bodhi?

Content:

Astus wrote:

All thoughts and emotions, whether positive, negative or neutral, are empty. Seeing that they are unborn, empty, etc. is bodhi. Thus afflictions are not different from bodhi, bodhi is not found anywhere else. Bodhi is not the elimination of all thoughts and emotions but the realisation of their emptiness, i.e. not grasping them, not identifying with them.

This is not specifically a Chan teaching but common Mahayana actually. So you can even read about it in the sutras. What makes it Chan is the view that people can simply realise this without special preparatory training. That's because the mind is originally pure and it needs no development. Just realise that the mind is so and that is all.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, August 22nd, 2012 at 10:32 PM

Title: Re: Vows in Theravada, Mahayana, and Vajrayana

Content:

Astus wrote:

I'm no monk, but actually anyone can check on the numbers, and those who have some interest in these matters, know them.

So, Theravada Patimokkha contains 227 rules for bhikkhus (and 311 for bhikkhunis). Dharmaguptaka Pratimoksha (China, Korea, Vietnam) has 250 rules for bhikshus and 348 for bhikshunis. Mulasarvastivadin Pratimoksha (Tibet, Bhutan, Mongolia) has 253 rules for bhikshus (and 346 for bhikshunis).

Beyond those above in East Asia there are the bodhisattva vows of the Brahma Net Sutra (10+48 precepts), and Vajrayana followers in Tibet, etc., take a different set of bodhisattva precepts (18+46) and there are further Tantric commitments (usually 14 common root vows and further more depending on one's practice).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 23rd, 2012 at 3:57 PM

Title: Re: Power of Vows of Buddha Amitabha?

Content:

Astus wrote:

If Amita Buddha were only a symbol then aspiration to be born in the Pure Land is meaningless and useless. It is also questioning the whole bodhisattva path. The result is then a simple calming practice of reciting the name that can bring some inner peace while one focuses on recitation, but nothing more. It is certainly not a path to liberation in a Buddhist sense.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 23rd, 2012 at 7:12 PM

Title: Re: Why follow one tradition of Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

The goal is to be free from suffering. The means to that is realising emptiness. Whether you get to realisation by vipassana, koan or deity meditation, how could it matter? It's just personal preferences, karma.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 24th, 2012 at 9:58 PM

Title: Re: How do mind-streams interact?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is the teaching of three natures (trisvabhava) in Yogacara that you should consider here. On the imaginary level it is just like for everyone else. On the dependent level all is interrelated, phenomena are dependent on perception. Being dependent on perception doesn't mean that nothing exists beyond that, it just means that mind defines and interprets what one perceives. And on the ultimate level ideas of perception and perceiver are understood to be interpretations and ideas only. In the end, there is not even a mind one can conceive.

The problem raised, the interaction of mind-streams, is based on the assumption that there are physically-spatially distinct minds. But minds are not bound by space or time, they are immaterial. Another problem here is the idea that Yogacara - or Buddhism generally - should give a comprehensive philosophy. But it doesn't have anything like that. It is the path of liberation, all teachings are meant to assist in getting rid of grasping at thoughts and emotions.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 24th, 2012 at 11:23 PM

Title: Re: How do mind-streams interact?

Content:

mirage said:

Not spatially - just separate. Our minds are clearly separate in some way, otherwise our experience would be the same.

Astus wrote:

What separates them? If you mean that they are not the same experiences, yes, that is true. But how is that a problem?

mirage said:

That would be a bit disappointing.

Astus wrote:

Explanations have limited value. Explanations of the world are only as good as their efficacy in creating peace and wisdom. Buddhist teachings are not meant to be used as philosophical statements or scientific observations. They are practical guidelines. They are like recipes - they tell you what and how to cook, you can't eat the paper. On the other hand, the understanding that all views are conventional, relative and mind made, is quite a coherent teaching.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 25th, 2012 at 12:09 AM

Title: Re: How do mind-streams interact?

Content:

mirage said:

Well, the question is the same: if both of us see an apple, that means I have experience of apple, and you have a (different) experience of apple. Then I eat the apple, and your experience of it changes (disappears). What made your experience change?

Astus wrote:

When we talk about me, you and apple, that is the imagined reality. There is no understanding of consciousness-only here. If it is understood in terms of consciousness-only, the ideas of an external apple and you, and an internal me, they are all just ideas and not distinct entities. So, if you don't mix up these two, there is no problem at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, August 25th, 2012 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: How do mind-streams interact?

Content:

mirage said:

I feel like I almost understand you here, but in fact I probably do not. Do you mean that there is a deeper "level" beneath eight individual consciousnesses, on which mind-streams cease to be distinct?

Astus wrote:

No, there's no hidden consciousness. What I'm saying is that consciousness-only does not mean that there are only floating minds in this world without a physical realms, that's a different view, not a Buddhist one. Consciousness-only means that there is neither object nor subject.

Vasubandhu says at the end of the Trimsika (tr. KOCHUMUTTOM):

"One does not abide in the realization
Of mere representations of consciousness
Just on account of the [theoretical] perception
That all this is mere representation of consciousness,
If one places [= sees] something before oneself.
One does abide in the realization
Of mere [representation of] consciousness
When one does not perceive also a supporting consciousness,
For, the graspable objects being absent,
There cannot either be the grasping of that,
[Namely, the grasping of the supporting consciousness].
That indeed is the supramundane knowledge
When one has no mind that knows,
And no object for its support;"

And in the Lankavatara Sutra (tr. Suzuki):

"The personal soul, continuity, the Skandhas, causation, atoms, the supreme spirit, the ruler, the creator, —[they are] discriminations in the Mind-only."
(XXIX)

"clinging to the memory (vasana) of erroneous speculations and doctrines since beginningless time, they hold fast to ideas such as oneness and otherness, being and non-being, and their thoughts are not at all clear about what is seen of Mind-only."
(XXXV)

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, August 26th, 2012 at 5:34 AM

Title: Re: How can Zen be considered it's own thing...

Content:

Astus wrote:

Zen sickness refers to false understandings, attachments to wrong views and meditation experiences. It is not some common disease, insanity, obsession, or any of the kind that ordinary people suffer from. In fact, those who cling to some view regarding their realisation usually feel that it is the correct attainment. This can be remedied by a clear eyed teacher, or sufficient study and practice, or both at the same time.

"In my school, there are only two kinds of sickness. One is to go looking for a donkey riding on the donkey. The other is to be unwilling to dismount once having mounted the donkey."

(Foyan in Instant Zen, p. 4)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, August 28th, 2012 at 6:42 PM

Title: Re: Odd Sensation

Content:

Astus wrote:

By breathless you mean you feel choking or that you don't recognise the breath? If it's the second one, no problem, just leave it as it is, it is a sign of calmness. If the first one, observe what changes, what makes you feel in need of air, try to breathe through the mouth.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 30th, 2012 at 3:19 AM

Title: Re: Doing zazen but drawn to Pure Land,

Content:

Astus wrote:

Pure Land and Chan are simply two styles of practice. They are not incompatible at all, as one can see in China, Korea and Vietnam. In Tiantai teachings one can find both forms. The only point where they seem to be separate is when people think of them as exclusive methods. The first person in Buddhism who came up with the very idea of an exclusive practice was Honen. But even in his view exclusivity didn't mean invalidating or rejecting other methods, it was about focusing initially on the single practice of reciting the name and that in itself was sufficient to attain birth in Honen's view.

Doing zazen only can be a path to the Pure Land as long as you dedicate all the merits gained to attaining birth there. Adding to it the nenbutsu is also fine. Also, you can simply do the nenbutsu and it can be both a Zen practice and a way to the Pure Land. As far as the Pure Land path is concerned, what matters is your faith and dedication to it. As for Zen practice, what matters is the living wisdom. Since both are methods on the bodhisattva path with the aim of complete enlightenment, there is no contradiction.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 30th, 2012 at 3:30 AM

Title: Re: Odd Sensation

Content:

Astus wrote:

Then no need to worry about it or think too much of it. Of course, you may also make this situation a subject of your meditation, and look at it whether there is really a difference between breath and no breath.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 30th, 2012 at 5:35 AM

Title: Re: Doing zazen but drawn to Pure Land,

Content:

Astus wrote:

The book <http://www.ymba.org/monkey/monkeyfrm.htm> is very brief and gives a good list of buddha remembrance practices. It shows how all the different methods can be found in a single practice. It says, "In alert, focused Buddha recitation there is samatha, vipassana, samadhi, wisdom - each recitation is perfect. Where else can Zen be found if not here?" This refers to the same practice that is mentioned in Buddhism of Wisdom and Faith under Real Mark Buddha Recitation (5.29.1).

Another work related to both Zen and Pure Land practice is "Doubts and Questions about Pure Land Practice" that you find in http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/pureland.pdf.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, August 30th, 2012 at 3:13 PM

Title: Re: Will Buddhism become redundant?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Science deals with understanding and manipulating matter. Buddhism is about becoming free from suffering. Science can help in alleviating physical problems and even some mental disorders. Buddhism touches upon the subject of matter in refuting materialism/physicalism and in pointing to its basic qualities as impermanent, suffering, selfless and emptiness. Beyond those, natural science and Buddhism are separate fields of knowledge and practice.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 31st, 2012 at 3:28 PM

Title: Re: Panendharmism, anyone ?

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is sad to see that people who fail to study Buddhist sutras and shastras start coming up with strange ideas to fill in the gap in their understanding. Naturally, where they end up is confusion.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, August 31st, 2012 at 10:40 PM

Title: Unorthodox Ideas

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here are some twisted concepts I'd like to discuss.

1. Prajnaparamita, Madhyamaka and Mahamudra

As Karl Brunnhölzl explains (Straight from the Heart, p. 132f; and The Center of the Sunlit Sky, p. 52f) the meaning of the prajnaparamita teachings, of madhyamaka and what was later known as sutra mahamudra is identical in realisation. Same can be seen from Gampopa (Jewel Ornament of Liberation, p. 247f) equating them.

2. Inferential and Direct Method

Thrangu Rinpoche says (e.g. Pointing Out the Dharmakaya, p. 56; Essentials of Mahamudra, p. 46) that the sutra path takes long time because it applies inferential methods to realise emptiness while mahamudra is direct. However, a conceptual understanding of emptiness has never been accepted by the prajnaparamita sutras or madhyamika teachers as the true wisdom, that is also clear from point 1. Even in terms of method, as we can see in Kamalashila's meditation instruction (Stages of Meditation, p. 130-133), the analysis of mind itself is part of sutra vipashyana just as resting in suchness. To this we can also add that Chan is a direct method too that is in harmony with prajnaparamita sutras.

3. Emptiness of One is Emptiness of All

Tashi Namgyal states and backs it up with quotes (Mahamudra: The Moonlight, p. 199-200) that realising the emptiness of mind is realising the emptiness of all things. Since true realisation is not a conceptual idea of the emptiness of this and that, but awareness without abiding on any referential point, differentiations of emptiness from two to twenty are only for the sake of explanation. Therefore, whether one sees the emptiness of self or any phenomenon, the result is the same wisdom.

4. Unity of Emptiness and Compassion

In truth, emptiness and compassion cannot be separated from each other (e.g. King of Samadhi, p. 91; and Mahamudra and Related Instructions, p. 269f), therefore with the realisation of one both are attained. From this comes that with attainment of insight into the emptiness of self unbound compassion is also achieved.

5. Arhat, Buddha, Bodhisattva

Adding all the above up, it turns out that with the single realisation of emptiness of self there is all that can be realised and attained. Then the differentiations between paths and results are rendered provisional.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 1st, 2012 at 1:47 AM

Title: Re: Unorthodox Ideas

Content:

Astus wrote:

Such a distinction between the emptiness of self and phenomena is everywhere, and used as an explanation about the elimination of emotional and cognitive hindrances. And that's why I quoted the view of seeing one is seeing all.

Regarding the special qualities of buddhas, as you can see in both Chan and Vajrayana, and in the doctrine of buddha-nature, all of them have been internalised as qualities of the mind one can discover with realising the nature of mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 2nd, 2012 at 6:22 PM

Title: Re: Unorthodox Ideas

Content:

Astus wrote:

Comments regarding well known ideas how arhats are inferior to bodhisattvas, bodhisattvas to buddhas, sutrayana to vajrayana, well, those are just repetitions but not arguments. They are statements that you don't agree with the conclusion, which is fine, but it fails to consider all the points that led to the conclusion. Therefore, it does not address the issue raised.

Those who raised issues about different realisations, please consider points 1 and 3 in the OP first. To put it briefly, there is only one suchness to be realised and there can't be more than that. Not grasping a single view can't be diversified into different forms of non-attachment. At the same time, if there is any clinging, there is still suffering and no liberation of any kind.

There is the difference made between emptiness of person and emptiness of phenomena. This is then related to removing emotional and cognitive obscurations. The first means seeing that there is no self but only the five aggregates, the second is that the five aggregates are also without identity. This, however, is a methodical difference only. Why? Not grasping a self means not being attached to any of the aggregates. Not clinging to aggregates is their emptiness realised. Regarding this see Mulamadhyamakakarika, chapter 18, and the Khandhavagga (SN 22; or just suttas 1, 47, 95 in that section).

DarwidHalim said:

If we see the understanding of emptiness, there are 2 things:

1. Understanding the nature as what it is.
2. Understanding how the nature can appear as such.

Astus wrote:

This is separating emptiness and appearances, impermanence and dependent origination, essence and function. Such a separation is valid for gradual intellectual understanding and faults of grasping emptiness as a thing and falling into carelessness. Not valid for genuine insight that is referred to here.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 2nd, 2012 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Unorthodox Ideas

Content:

Astus wrote:

DarwidHalim,

All three doors of liberation are known to arhats, and that includes signlessness (SN 40.9). As a sutta (AN 6.13) says, "Don't misrepresent the Blessed One, for it's not right to misrepresent the Blessed One, and the Blessed One wouldn't say that. It's impossible, there is no way that — when the signless has been developed, pursued, handed the reins and taken as a basis, given a grounding, steadied, consolidated, and well-undertaken as an awareness-release — consciousness would follow the drift of signs. That possibility doesn't exist, for this is the escape from all signs: the signless as an awareness-release."

I agree that Mahayana scriptures and treatises say that sravakas realise only the emptiness of self. The definition I have referred to already, so I'm not debating it at all. What I say is that this is only a methodical difference, because the early texts, especially abhidharma works, teach insight meditation primarily by analysing seemingly simple phenomena into parts to highlight their constructed nature. Like for your example of flower, it is not really a flower but only form elements. And then phenomenal emptiness means that even form elements are constructed, they are unreal, only nominal. This is, however, is confirmed in the early works by agreeing that the form elements are constructed, and that they cease in nirvana. Otherwise we would have to say that an arhat, instead of thinking that the body is the self, thinks that the elements are the self, which is nonsense. More on the point that arhats realise the selflessness of phenomena see Wangchuk Dorje's reasonings and quotations in his commentary on the Madhyamakavatara, chapter on the first bhumi (The Karmapa's Middle Way, p. 107-112).

Clinging to any of the four extreme views means having a wrong view and being bound to samsara. If arhats were attached to the view of non-existence, they would be annihilationists, which excludes even ordinary men from correct understanding, not to mention noble ones.

As for the rejection of Mahayana sutras, it is a questionable statement. First of all, in the agamas and nikayas there is no mention of Mahayana works, so rejection of them is not possible. Beyond that, how many arhats do you know who refuted Mahayana sutras? As for doctrinal debates, you have plenty of them within Mahayana itself.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 2nd, 2012 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: Unorthodox Ideas

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jnana,

So did Yinshun emphasise the early Mahayana view of a long path and criticised all the later ideas of instant methods. If I take this a little further - while I'm not very familiar with Yinshun's teachings - it is as he quotes Taixu in Human Centered Buddhism (p. 48) that "Chinese Buddhism has been speaking the Mahayana doctrines and yet practicing the Hinayana way.", this applies to all who say there is liberation close at hand. In fact, if we can say that many Mahayana ideas were already present in mainstream schools like the Dharmaguptaka, Mahasanghika, etc., then it is the sravakayana everywhere in shiny buddha robes. But this is just a side note here. Unlike Yinshun, I prefer the idea of a single vehicle, where the paths are not separate or hierarchical, but provisional in form and one in nature.

DarwidHalim,

Dzongsar Jamyang Khyentse Rinpoche's book is wonderful. And if you think about sravakas in such texts not as some followers of this or that school, but as clearly wrong interpretations of people, it turns out that such criticisms have meaning and they are meant for the present audience.

Do you mean that an arhat sees that ultimately flowers are empty, it's just that he still thinks there is a real relative flower? If so, that's a faulty interpretation of emptiness, or rather a linguistic sophistry. You know the Zen story of Shakyamuni raising the flower and not saying anything. Did he or did he not grasp the flower? If he grasped it, do you think it was because of seeing characters? If he did not grasp it, how was it possible for him to raise the flower? To hold on to the idea that every experience are just illusion, that is indeed wrong. But if arhats are attached to such a concept, it means their failure to see the emptiness of concepts, and that means attachment to mental aggregates. Thus liberation is not possible for them.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 2nd, 2012 at 11:15 PM

Title: Re: Unorthodox Ideas

Content:

Astus wrote:

DarwidHalim,

In brief, it goes like this. The nikayas describe that both arhat and buddha attain the same liberation, but there are differences between arhats in terms of other abilities and the buddha is perfect in all the different abilities. Then, as understood by the early schools and early Mahayana, the special qualities of a buddha are developed on the aeons of practising the paramitas as a bodhisattva, but that attainment in terms of liberation are still the same. Then in later Mahayana with the idea of a single vehicle they created a hierarchy of liberations, at which point arhats eventually become bodhisattvas. With further development of buddha-nature concept occurred the option of a short cut path to buddhahood, thus appeared Chan and later Vajrayana. With this we come to a full circle in that the desired attainment is available in a single lifetime but now with all the special abilities.

It is on the basis of the buddha-nature teaching that it becomes possible to say that with becoming free from attachment simply by realising the nature of mind all the buddha qualities are present. This is the fundamental idea of all sudden teachings that are believed to be the ultimate and supreme methods by the majority of Mahayana followers. From this it is just one more step to say that since an arhat is free from attachment there is complete enlightenment. And this is what I did here. With this one can argue saying that arhats are not free from all attachments, practically making arhats not free from samsara but stuck in the illusion of liberation; or say that tathagatagarbha teachings are only provisional, turning sudden paths into illusory baits.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 3rd, 2012 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: Unorthodox Ideas

Content:

Malcolm said:

All we are left with is empty appearances: they are not real because no existence, etc., can be ascertained regarding them; they are not unreal since they appear. All we can say about them is that they arise in dependence.

Astus wrote:

The very same idea is in the early texts, where the below section is followed by the teaching of dependent arising.

"By & large, Kaccayana, this world is supported by (takes as its object) a polarity, that of existence & non-existence. But when one sees the origination of the world as it actually is with right discernment, 'non-existence' with reference to the world does not occur to one. When one sees the cessation of the world as it actually is with right discernment, 'existence' with reference to the world does not occur to one" (SN 12.15)

Same thing in the <http://www.buddhanet-de.net/ancient-buddhist-texts/English-Texts/Short-Pieces-in-Sanskrit/Fourth-Discourse.htm>,

"The processes arise and the processes cease, they arise with causes and conditions, and they cease with causes and conditions. There is the view about causes, and the view about continuity in existence, 'with causes processes arise', monks, seeing this with right wisdom as it really is there will be no existence-view or eternity-view; 'with causes processes cease', monks, seeing this with right wisdom as it really is there will be no extinction view, or annihilation view. So not having approached either of these two extremes, monks, the Realised One teaches the Dhamma which is a middle practice"

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 3rd, 2012 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: Unorthodox Ideas

Content:

SSJ3Gogeta said:

Um, I accept Allan Wallace is a great practitioner. But like Malcolm pointed out, he is wrong on some stuff.

Astus wrote:

"However defined, the essence of enlightenment corresponds to what in tantra is called "actuality" or the "causal continuum" (rgyu'i rgyud, hetu tantra), the original ground of being to be recognized as enlightenment itself. Thus, when we consider the above three aspects of tantra, it becomes apparent that tantra is based primarily on the theory of the essence of enlightenment or tath·gatagarbha. Although ancient practices of pre Buddhist origin were absorbed into the Buddhist tantric systems, it is this theory of Buddhist origin—the essence of enlightenment—that may be said to be the fundamental basis, or core teaching, from which tantra developed."

(Jamgön Kongtrul: Systems of Buddhist Tantra, p. 18)

"The most essential point in the Vajrayana is the buddha nature, and all Vajrayana practices are based on understanding this."

(Ringu Tulku: Confusion Arises As Wisdom, p. 97)

"The sole subject of the Vajrayana teachings is to show us how to awaken and realize this buddha-nature. There is nothing more than that."

(Ringu Tulku: Daring Steps, p. 21)

"Directly realising mind's nature and removing the afflictions generated in mind is the Vajrayana approach."

(Kalu Rinpoche: Luminous Mind, p. 174)

"Among the vehicles taught by the Buddha, both the mahayana and vajrayana lead to enlightenment; the main difference is that the mahayana is a more gradual path, whereas the vajrayana directly reveals the nature of mind."

(Khenchen Sherab: The Buddhist Path, p. 79)

"The view that buddha nature is the essential nature of each and every being is common to the Mahayana as the sutras, or Paramitayana, and to the Vajrayana, or Tantrayana. The Vajrayana goes into detail about what this means. Vajrayana explains that buddha nature is the innate presence of the source of all the realms and bodies of all buddhas and that these are innate within us. It talks about the presence of this as dakas and dakinis and so on. The Vajrayana explanation is essentially saying the same thing as the sutras. It is just saying it in a little bit more detail."

(Khenpo Karthar Rinpoche: Karma Chakme's Mountain Dharma, vol 1, p. 65)

"In essence, the secret-mantra vajrayana can be understood in terms of ground, path, and fruition. Regarding the ground, the minds of all sentient beings are pervaded by the tathagatagarbha."

(Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche: Pure Appearance, p. 1)

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 3rd, 2012 at 1:20 AM

Title: Re: Unorthodox Ideas

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

FOr example, you can say that you don't have any attachment to a piece of paper. But, you always see this white stuff as paper. WHen you see that white stuff, immediately the idea of paper appear in you, and you again think yes this is paper, so it against imprint in you. There is no attachment there. But, there is something like assertion.

They are indeed this word of "With this one can argue saying that arhats are not free from all attachments, practically making arhats not free from samsara but stuck in the illusion of liberation; or say that tathagatagarbha teachings are only provisional, turning sudden paths into illusory baits."

But if you see the teaching like Nagarjuna, Chandrakirti, they don't say something like that. Those sentences are more to personal view.

Astus wrote:

You say that there is attachment to the concept of paper. Again, that is attachment to the mental aggregates, since the concept and even the visual impression occurs within the aggregates. But such attachment is not possible, or it is not liberation. Assertion, as they say in madhyamaka, is the extreme of existence, and negation is the extreme of non-existence. These are the basics of mistaken views, and views exist in the aggregates.

Nagarjuna is early mahayana, and Chandrakirti did not follow the tathagatagarbha teachings either.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 3rd, 2012 at 1:39 AM

Title: Re: Unorthodox Ideas

Content:

Jnana said:

A pragmatic approach is, well, practical.... But it seems that a bodhisattva is still required to develop a number of capabilities that aren't necessary for an arhat liberated through discernment. For example, the first five of the six higher knowledges and samyaksambodhi. These differences are also accepted by Theravāda, Sarvāstivāda, etc.

Astus wrote:

There are differences explained in all traditions all right. However, in order to be inclusive, looking at the existing and the disappeared traditions, what actual practices are prescribed and followed don't show different ways. One important idea, however, is an exception. And that is post-enlightenment practices. For an arhat, that's the end of the story, and there are no further instructions. For a bodhisattva, it is the beginning of accumulating infinite merits. So what mahayana adds is a programme for enlightened ones. Or, it is not a prescription but a description. That is, those who have attained liberation are still active as we can see both from old texts and among today's teachers. A third option is that the bodhisattva teaching is a cure for those who failed to apply the teachings to social life. Fourth option is that it's a later technique to bring more people to the Dharma. All of these and more can be said and put together - i.e. all can be true at the same time - as a natural development of Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 3rd, 2012 at 1:44 AM

Title: Re: Unorthodox Ideas

Content:

viniketa said:

but the hierarchical rankings come primarily from commentarial literature, do they not?

There is probably something I am missing, here...

Astus wrote:

The Lotus Sutra is the number one source of the hierarchical structure of liberation, where sravakas attain only a fake nirvana before they turn to the bodhisattva path.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 3rd, 2012 at 2:31 AM

Title: Re: Unorthodox Ideas

Content:

SSJ3Gogeta said:

This is probably the stupidest thing I ever read on this forum.

You should read "Center of the Sunlit Sky" by Karl B.

Madhyamaka is the foundation of Vajrayana and Mahamudra.

Astus wrote:

Karl Brunnhölzl presents the Kagyü interpretation of madhyamaka, where there is also an "emptiness endowed with the supreme of all aspects." (p. 115f). Also, regarding Mahamudra, "Gampopa, Pamo Truba (1110–1170), Jigden Sumgön (1143–1217), and many others have said that "the treatise of our Mahamudra is this Treatise of the Sublime Continuum of the Great Vehicle composed by the Blessed One Maitreya."" (p. 57), which is also called Ratnagotravibhaga, the classical shastra on tathagatagarbha doctrine. Gampopa starts his Jewel Ornament of Liberation with stating the existence of buddha-nature. Brunnhölzl's teacher, Khenpo Tsultrim Gyamtso Rinpoche is famous for his teaching of Zhentong, that is again takes buddha-nature as a fundamental doctrine, and he confirms it as the basis of Vajrayana in his commentary on the Uttarat Tantra Shastra (Buddha Nature, p. 305-306).

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 3rd, 2012 at 3:43 AM

Title: Re: Chinese language and Buddhism

Content:

mutsuk said:

The point is that the chinese language lacks subtleties for carrying the teachings.

Astus wrote:

I don't really see how that can happen. I mean, on one hand, languages are different and there's nothing new about that. There are things impossible to translate because of such differences, but explanation is still possible. On the other, languages work perfectly well for all human cultures to express whatever is experienced, felt, thought. I haven't yet heard that translating from Sanskrit, Tibetan, Chinese, Mongolian, or any other language to English is not possible to be done accurately, despite the huge differences. So what makes Chinese language itself inferior? What subtlety exists in Sanskrit and English that is missing from Chinese?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 3rd, 2012 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: Unorthodox Ideas

Content:

SSJ3Gogeta said:

How is this the Ratnagotravibhaga? I'm reading the footnote 191. I don't get it.

Astus wrote:

Check the Bibliography on page 835.

"The Sublime Continuum. (Ratnagotravibhagamahayanottaratanttrasastra. Theg pa chen po'i rgyud bla ma) Sanskrit edition by Edward H. Johnston. Patna, India: The Bihar Research Society, 1950 (includes the Ratnagotravibhagavyakhya). P5525. ACIP TD4024."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 3rd, 2012 at 5:11 PM

Title: Re: Unorthodox Ideas

Content:

Astus wrote:

DarwidHalim,

The usual metaphors for what you're saying is the sun at dawn and the sun at noon, the view from the bottom of a well and the whole view of the sky, the light of firefly and the light of the sun, the space in a mustard seed and the space of the whole sky.

What is the problem with that? You can't quantify ultimate reality. How can the simile still work? If it is not understood as insight into the nature of things but as gradual removal of hindrances, the way the ten fetters are used to differentiate between sravaka aryas. However, in this case the argument is the one on the gradual path, making sudden techniques (primarily Chan and Tantra) skilful baits at best, fake at worst. And I'm not saying this is good or bad, it just makes later developments based on tathagatagarbha doctrine superficial.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 3rd, 2012 at 8:39 PM

Title: Re: Unorthodox Ideas

Content:

Astus wrote:

DarwidHalim,

Let me then clarify what sudden path is as I see it. The first thing is to realise the nature of mind. The mind is buddha, there is no further thing to develop or remove, it's originally pure. Therefore, the path is to keep the buddha-mind. No practices, no techniques. And the attainment is the very same buddha-mind, nothing more or less. Even in Jinul's teachings, where seeing nature is only the 1st stage of 52 stages, the only thing to do is to maintain the clear view. No further practices. Why? Because the initial realisation is already complete. If one had to apply methods then it would not be any different from the common gradual teachings.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 3rd, 2012 at 11:37 PM

Title: Re: Unorthodox Ideas

Content:

Astus wrote:

DarwidHalim,

Practice is based on theory. Now, as you say, people can and do misunderstand the teachings. That doesn't make the teachings any different. Some realise it easily, others slowly. It makes no difference in that everybody has to go through the no gate. It is about this that Huangbo says (Chung-Ling Record, tr. Lok To):

"Some students attain the state of liberated Mind quickly, some slowly. After listening to a Dharma talk, some reach "no mind" directly. In contrast, some must first pass gradually through the ten grades of Bodhisattva faith, the Dasabhumi of Bodhisattva development, and the ten stages before attaining the Perfectly Awakened Mind. Whether one takes a long or a short time, however, once attained, "no mind" can never be lost."

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 4th, 2012 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: Unorthodox Ideas

Content:

Astus wrote:

DarwidHalim,

Entering The Tao of Sudden Enlightenment by Huihai (tr. Lok To) explains the meaning,

"No thought means no mind grasping anything whatsoever. It is being without any view whatever, not even the thought of seeking something or not seeking anything. Having no thought means that in the face of any object or form, not even a single thought arises. This being-without-thought is called Real Mind. However, if one grasps the thought that this being-without-thought is the Real Mind, then it is not right thought but merely the wrong view."

This is perfectly in agreement with Nagarjuna's explanation of emptiness as being free of views. How do you make differences here? Is there a higher and lower freedom from views, higher and lower non-attachment?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 4th, 2012 at 2:59 AM

Title: Re: Panendharmism, anyone ?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Let's put into simpler terms. Amita Buddha is available to everyone because any human is capable of faith. He is also available in meditation, as it is described in the Visualisation Sutra. In fact, the very name in recitation is the presence of Amita Buddha, as that is what appears in one's perception. The fact that the Buddha's light reaches everywhere means that all are embraced and there is no hindrance formed by any karma. It doesn't mean that Amita Buddha is present everywhere, since he is in the Pure Land.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 4th, 2012 at 5:40 PM

Title: Re: Unorthodox Ideas

Content:

Astus wrote:

DarwidHalim,

The quote from the Tao of Sudden Enlightenment is a text written by Dazhu Huihai who was a disciple of Mazu and so a contemporary of Baizhang, master of Huangbo, in the same Hongzhou school. It's nothing to do with Taoism. That's why I've chosen that as a good source of explaining the teaching of no mind.

As for your explanation with statue, you successfully made up several levels of reification. Fortunately, madhyamaka uses only two truths, even if Jizang (Chinese reformer of madhyamaka) created a 4×2 truths system. One is stuck in ignorance as long as there is grasping a concept. Without abiding in any idea, there is freedom. Even if you create a hundred levels of larger and smaller areas of conceptual attachment, it's still mental proliferation. Without proliferation there is nirvana (MMK 18.5), it is the buddha (MMK 22.15). The ending of objectification, proliferation is within the scope of arhats too (DN 21, MN 18, SN 22.53).

By the way. prasanga is just a method, and those who apply that to teach people are the prasangika. Other forms of teaching, like mind only and even abhidharma, are used to bring people to liberation, freedom from attachment to ideas, and not just an idea of liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 4th, 2012 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Unorthodox Ideas

Content:

Astus wrote:

DarwidHalim,

Theravada recognises the difference between a buddha and an arhat, in terms of certain qualities and abilities, but not in liberation. The reason of their difference, just as in early Mahayana, is that a bodhisattva accumulates immeasurable merits through aeons of practice. Sudden teachings say that there is no need for such a long process, that they have a superior teaching, therefore buddhahood is accessible (in this life, in the intermediate state, or the next life) because of the inherent buddha-nature.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 6th, 2012 at 4:35 PM

Title: Re: Is Eido Tai Shimano's lineage legitimate?

Content:

Astus wrote:

In that area I'd rather recommend the <http://mro.org/> of the late Daido roshi. There is also the <http://www.dharmadrumretreat.org/> you could consider. They are both established communities with strong monastic lines.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 7th, 2012 at 3:23 AM

Title: Re: Buddha nature misunderstood as atman.

Content:

Astus wrote:

First, buddha-nature is meant to be misunderstood as a real permanent self. Why else would it be appealing to those who have not yet taken refuge in the Three Jewels? Second, buddha-nature is a convenient explanation of the unborn nature of the qualities of a buddha. Third, buddha-nature points to the fact that the path is about removing the obscurations and not about generating some imagined enlightenment. Fourth, buddha-nature requires neither purification nor realisation, therefore resting the mind without contriving anything is all that is needed.

"[And finally] by two reasons the Supreme Eternity is to be known: 1) Because he does not fall into the Nihilistic Extremity through his not diminishing, neglecting the non-eternal Phenomenal Life; 2) nor does he fall into the Eternalistic Extremity through his not intensifying the eternal Nirvāṇa.

It is said as follows: "If someone would perceive that all the Phenomenal Worlds are non-eternal, O Lord, this view would be a Nihilistic Perception. It would never be the true perception at all. If someone would perceive that the Nirvāṇa is eternal, O Lord, this view would be an Eternalistic Perception. And it would never be the True Perception at all."

(Ratnagotravibhaga, v. 38, tr. Jikido Takasaki)

"Thinking that permanent and blissful nirvana is transformed into the characteristics of suffering, they rush seeking after it all the time. Taking pity on such [people], the Buddha indicated the true blissfulness of nirvana: if [even] for an instant there is no characteristic of generation and if [even] for an instant there is no characteristic of extinction, then there will be no generation and extinction that can be extinguished. This is to have quiescence right there. But if when it is right there, one does not have the thought of it being right there, this is called permanent and blissful. This bliss is not experienced and it is not not experienced. How can there be the categories of one essence and five functions? And how could one possibly speak of nirvana contravening the myriad dharmas and rendering them permanently ungenerated? This is to revile the Buddha and destroy the Dharma."

(Platform Sutra, ch. 7, tr. John R. McRae)

"I expound the dharma of mind-ground, which enters the secular and the sacred, the pure and the defiled, the real and the temporal. But your 'real and temporal,' your 'secular and sacred,' cannot attach labels to all that is real and temporal, secular and sacred. The real and the temporal, the secular and the sacred, cannot attach a name to this person. Followers of the Way, grasp and use, but never name this is called the 'mysterious principle'."

(Record of Linji, ch. 11, tr. Ruth Fuller Sasaki)

"Therefore, that the grasses, trees, thickets and groves are impermanent is the buddha nature; that humans and things, body and mind are impermanent — this is because they are the buddha nature. That the lands, mountains, and rivers are impermanent — this is the buddha nature. Annuttara-samyak-sambodhi, because it is the buddha nature, is impermanent; the great parinirvāṇa, because it is impermanent, is the buddha nature."

(Shobogenzo, Buddha Nature, tr. Carl Bielefeldt)

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 7th, 2012 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: Learning to recite the nenbutsu

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thank you for sharing. Any more?

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 7th, 2012 at 4:10 PM

Title: Re: Political angle to the Chan Vs Dzogchen debate

Content:

Astus wrote:

Good question. However, it's good to remember that the times when Chan was popular on a larger level - i.e. outside of monasteries - was primarily because of connections to the secular elite. Rituals and ceremonies are abundant in Chinese Buddhism, and Chinese culture, even without any Vajrayana ideology, so it doesn't sound the right argument here for the reasons of Tantric teachings not being popular.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 7th, 2012 at 4:44 PM

Title: Re: Can someone definitively explain to me the differences...?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Samatha - meditation with the aim to calm the mind, usually by focusing on a single object

Vipassana - meditation with the aim to gain wisdom, usually by different methods of analysis of different subjects

Zazen - it means sitting meditation, doesn't qualify anything beyond that in and of itself

Anapanasati - it means awareness of breathing in and out, there are different forms of this practice in both Theravada and Mahayana

Shikantaza - a practice specific to Soto Zen where there is no object maintained nor analysis performed

Samadhi - it basically means the state of concentrated mind, can also mean a specific attainment within meditation depending on context

There are some glossaries you can use to look up basic words, like this one:

<http://www.sinc.sunysb.edu/Clubs/buddhism/glossary.html>, and on Wikipedia that has links to further articles: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Glossary_of_Buddhism

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 7th, 2012 at 4:55 PM

Title: Re: Political angle to the Chan Vs Dzogchen debate

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are many esoteric texts translated to Chinese, including late tantras like Hevajra and Cakrasamvara. As Tiger mentioned, the imperial court had connection with Tibetan teachers from the 13th century on.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 7th, 2012 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: Can someone definitively explain to me the differences...?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Anapanasati is a Pali word, and as such, it has its own complete practice in Theravada that covers both samatha and vipassana. In East Asia mindfulness of breath is mostly used only for samatha practice, and as such, it is only for calming the mind.

Zazen means sitting meditation, literally (za - sit; zen - meditate). Meditating in the sitting position can mean any kind of mental training. You can count your breath, just watch it, or be mindful of your body, your thoughts, visualise a buddha, etc.

What people do within the Japanese Rinzai school depends on the lineage and the teacher's instructions. Breath practice is common, sure. It's a kind of preliminary to koan practice. But shikantaza is a different approach, and it's not the same as just objectless meditation. Of course, we can say that ultimately koan practice leads to shikantaza. Or we can also say that shikantaza is mistaken and koan practice is correct. It depends on who you ask.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 11th, 2012 at 8:10 PM

Title: Re: Pointing Out / Systematic Instruction

Content:

Astus wrote:

As you can find in Mahamudra handbooks, regular checks by a teacher is how the effectiveness of instructions are assured. So, if you have a teacher who you can attend for a longer period, like within a retreat environment, make use of it. Otherwise, study the teachings, not only in Mahamudra manuals, but also works on madhyamaka, sutras, etc. When understanding, realisation and conduct matches what is taught, you see for yourself that the words of the Buddha and the masters are true.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 11th, 2012 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: Is Eido Tai Shimano's lineage legitimate?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Matylda,

I think the key difference in interpretation is that you say "If I follow the master I follow his teaching.", while many follow not the teachings but rather the teacher. This is of course failing the instruction of the http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Four_reliances. And when they follow the person, his acts become great concern. It also opens the door to all sorts of abuses of power.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 12th, 2012 at 2:24 AM

Title: Re: Dalai Lama on Science

Content:

Astus wrote:

There's been a nice little post on James Ford's blog yesterday:

<http://www.patheos.com/blogs/monkeymind/2012/09/science-buddhism.html>

Also, science is all right with Buddhism as long as it is not equated with materialism. Lokayatikas have been refuted already.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 12th, 2012 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: Is Eido Tai Shimano's lineage legitimate?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Matylda,

Abuse of social status (i.e. power) is not a matter of being a Buddhist, Hindu, political or any other group. Within a personality cult one individual gains immense influence on others' lives, and such a person then uses his position to his personal advantage while at the same time harming others. And the harm done is not necessarily against the law, but mental and emotional scars can take even longer to heal than physical ones. It is like being cheated by one's friend or spouse. In fact, comparing such a teacher to a bad parent seems quite appropriate. The difference here is that adult men reduce themselves to ignorant children and raise the teacher to the status of a heavenly father.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 12th, 2012 at 4:58 PM

Title: Re: Is there a difference between Shin and pure land buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Jodo Shinshu is an offshoot of Honen's teachings, and instead of emphasising the practice of nenbutsu it points to faith, shinjin, as the essential requirement of birth in the Pure Land. I don't see that there is a big difference otherwise. As for other practices, they are not important at all, although not forbidden either as long as they strengthen one's faith.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 12th, 2012 at 5:25 PM

Title: Re: Pointing Out / Systematic Instruction

Content:

Astus wrote:

In the end it is always you who decide what to do. So, you better clarify your motivation when you decide on this or that teaching and practice. Is it because it sounds good, or it fits your previous ideas, or the lama says so, or it works, etc.?

The important thing in calming meditation is to be calm and aware. What tool you use for that is secondary. If you feel it is all contrived, that's fine. Then just let it go. But the more subtle the object the easier it is to lose mindfulness of it and slip into daydreaming. This is something you have to clarify for yourself. Big words and ideas or of little help.

If you are wondering about the things to be discovered in insight meditation, you should rely on the instructions first and then on actual experience. Instructions are your guide but not the experience. Ideas about the instructions are easily misleading. See for yourself, drop the explanations and just look. And if you have doubts, bring them to your teacher. Not to argue about theories, but only to help you find the present truth. You may also just recognise that doubts and the rest are all based on ideas, ideas on thoughts, thoughts just come and go without any problem.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 16th, 2012 at 6:12 PM

Title: Re: Pointing Out / Systematic Instruction

Content:

Astus wrote:

In calming meditation you have to avoid disturbances, you have to concentrate not to be disturbed. If merged with vipashyana, resting without abiding on anything, there is no effort made not to be disturbed, because all is seen without being hung up on them. Example: normally one is disgusted by a pile of fresh dung, with concentration one blocks either the object or the feeling, with insight one does not reify the object nor identifies with the feeling and so there is self-liberation.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 17th, 2012 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: Dharma and Magic: is the latter necessary?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Some thoughts I've gathered on the subject while I was unable to access the site:
<https://eubuddhist.blogspot.com/2012/09/buddhist-magic.html>

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 17th, 2012 at 11:26 PM

Title: Re: Dharma and Magic: is the latter necessary?

Content:

Astus wrote:

From Ven. Sheng-yen (in " <http://chancenter.org/cmc/publications/free-literature/> "):
"Practicing Chan depending solely on one's own efforts without believing in the power of the Buddhas, bodhisattvas, and Dharma-protecting deities cannot be considered practicing Buddhism at all."

Issue raised previously here: <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=69&t=3435>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 18th, 2012 at 2:50 AM

Title: Re: Pointing Out / Systematic Instruction

Content:

Astus wrote:

The division to subject-object comes in when there is the thought/feeling that something is out there and I'm in here. But that thought/feeling (mental content, dharma) is an added quality to simple presence. Even if you recognise that there is this idea of duality, don't worry about it, it is just there. The important point is not to grasp phenomena, not to believe them, not to rely on them (which is not the same as rejecting them, or maintaining a thought of disbelief).

The meaning of the mind being empty is just that there is nothing to rely on, that there is no ultimate nature of mind/self. Doubt appears because there is the idea that one should find some optimal point to hold on to. But as you know, there is nothing to find as the real thing, as the true attainment. Not attaining anything is the real attainment. When the seeking stops it is found, because it is the seeking itself that contains the error. So they say: rest.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 18th, 2012 at 5:19 PM

Title: Re: Pointing Out / Systematic Instruction

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think the important point about this kind of non-meditation is to not slip into not meditating at all. To remedy that, Gampopa's "thoughts are the dharmakaya" idea is a useful one, that is, in face of everyday events and mental appearances we can work with wisdom and compassion. To manage, we need mindfulness of what goes on. Gradually it becomes effortless and expands to every moment - this is the subject of the four yogas. Pointing out, investigation, study - this is all needed first in order to be clear about what the practice is. But then, once you got it, the only thing left is using it.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 18th, 2012 at 5:38 PM

Title: Re: Dharma and Magic: is the latter necessary?

Content:

catmoon said:

The reason for the demise of magick was a fiendish invention called the controlled experiment. For some reason people decided that to be considered real, a phenomenon should be observable, reproducible, behave consistently and be quantitatively predictable. This style of thinking is responsible for our technological world, where we are surrounded by devices that would have been deemed impossible just a couple of centuries ago. In the same centuries, the competing style of thinking has advanced not one inch. The casters-out of demons of today are indistinguishable from those of centuries gone by, or of millenia gone by, and are no better at their craft or any wiser today than they were before. And one really should ask why.

Astus wrote:

There is another modern idea here to answer why. The idea of progress, of evolving. Does the Dharma require progress, to be better than it was before? No. Neither does magic. In fact, it is generally believed that the ancients knew better. The older the more authentic it is. And this is also reflected in cosmology very well. In science the universe evolved from simple to very complex. In Buddhism, there is just the rebirth of the whole world again and again.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, September 19th, 2012 at 6:14 PM

Title: Re: Exploring Tibetan Buddhism through a foreign language?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Russian seems like a good choice to have access to materials less known among Western scholars. On the other hand, the traditionally Buddhist people in the Russian Federation speak different languages, although they also know Russian. But if your goal is to have access to a large amount of Buddhist academic works, Chinese or Japanese sounds like a better choice, but perhaps less exotic in the area of Buddhist studies.

Check out this Russian language Buddhist forum:

<http://dharma.org.ru/board/index.php> (you can even find Buddhist books in Russian there).

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 20th, 2012 at 4:47 PM

Title: Re: Is Eido Tai Shimano's lineage legitimate?

Content:

Matylda said:

One has to see for oneself. In zen.

Astus wrote:

Indeed. Same thing the Buddha said.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 21st, 2012 at 5:42 AM

Title: Re: Is Eido Tai Shimano's lineage legitimate?

Content:

floating_abu said:

Sorry, Astus, the Buddha was talking about the Dharma teachings -- not places of sexual abuse, manipulation and financial irresponsibility.

Astus wrote:

My agreement was with the point of personal investigation. And I referred to this teaching: <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/an/an04/an04.192.than.html>.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, September 22nd, 2012 at 6:07 PM

Title: Re: Pointing Out / Systematic Instruction

Content:

monktastic said:

My hang-up before (e.g., in my last few posts) was: why do the Mahamudra masters insist you recognize mind as empty cognizance before attempting to undistractedly nonmeditate? The answer, I suppose, is that it removes two particularly troublesome graspings (that there is something to find and/or something to do). But as long as I understand that all hang-ups are to be released, I don't need to tie myself up in knots worrying about each individual instruction.

Astus wrote:

Kamalashila's (3rd Bhavanakrama, tr. Martin T. Adam) brief explanation of the reason for the necessity of proper discernment in insight meditation:

"Therefore, that which is described in the highest teachings as nonmindfulness and nonattention is to be seen as preceded by the discernment of reality. On account of which, nonmindfulness and nonattention are to be undertaken by way of the discernment of reality, not otherwise. Which is to say that when a yogin observing with perfect wisdom does not see even a single dharma in the three times as ultimately originated, then how in that context could he be mindful and pay attention? For how could that which is ultimately not experienced in the three times he noticed or attended to? Thus this one would have entered into the nonconceptual knowledge in which all conceptual proliferation has been calmed. And on the basis of that entrance one penetrates emptiness. And on the basis of that penetration there is the abandonment of the net of all false views. And one who is possessed of method, on the basis of adhering to wisdom, is perfectly skilled in conventional and ultimate reality.

Thus it is on the basis of obtaining unobscured knowledge that one understands every single teaching of the Buddha. Hence without the discernment of reality there is no arising of perfect knowledge, nor also the abandonment of the afflictive obscurations."

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, September 23rd, 2012 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: Is Eido Tai Shimano's lineage legitimate?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Since the discussion is beyond the original topic, it is now closed.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 24th, 2012 at 1:57 AM

Title: Re: jhana vs silent illumination or other zen methods

Content:

Astus wrote:

Shikantaza is not something you maintain, rather it is not maintaining our delusions. Just sitting is a way to express the basic Zen method of no-thought (in the following translations of Dogen's works put as "before thinking"). As you can see yourself, Dogen explicitly denied that shikantaza is some sort of absorption or gradual technique. That way he subscribed to pure sudden enlightenment teaching, as it is the hallmark of Zen.

Dogen says (Zazengi, all translations from <http://www.wwzc.org/book/translations-anzan-hoshin-roshi-and-others>),

"Having aligned body and mind, exhale deeply. Sitting in balance and stillness like a mountain, think of "not-thinking." How? Be "Before Thinking."

This is the essence of zazen. Zazen is not meditation. It is the Dharma Gate of great ease and joy. It is stainless realized-practice."

Saying the same with more words (Fukanzazengi),

"Once you have found your posture, breathe in and out deeply, sway left and right and then settle firmly and steadily. Think of not-thinking. How do you think of not-thinking? Be Before Thinking. These are the basics of zazen.

What I call zazen is not developing concentration by stages and so on. It is simply the Awakened One's own easy and joyful practice, it is realized-practice within already manifest enlightenment. It is the display of complete reality. Traps and cages spring open. Grasping the heart of this, you are the dragon who has reached his waters, the tiger resting in her mountains. Understand that right here is the display of Vast Reality and then dullness and mental wandering have no place to arise."

He also said (Zanmai-O-Zanmai),

"Sit in the full lotus posture with the body. Sit in the full lotus posture with the mind.

Free of "body" and "mind", sit in the full lotus posture.

My late Master, the Old Buddha, said, "Practising Zen is dropping through the bodymind. Just sitting is primordial realization. Offering incense and worshipping the images of the Awakened Ones, chanting the names of the Awakened Ones, repentance, reciting the Discourses and other religious rituals are not necessary."

At another place (Sankon Zazen Setsu),

"No practice whatsoever can be measured against zazen. ... In perfect ease go, stay, sit and lie down. Seeing, hearing, understanding and knowing are all the natural display of the Actual Nature."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, September 24th, 2012 at 5:27 PM

Title: Re: Neurological science and buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

I've never seen any Buddhist teaching that agrees with materialism/physicalism, and those few teachers who do appeared only recently. It's little to do with magical abilities, however.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, September 25th, 2012 at 6:24 PM

Title: Re: Neurological science and buddhism

Content:

steveb1 said:

I suppose the central question to Buddhism and other non-materialist systems is: "If consciousness does not arise from neural processes, then what exactly is the role of such processes, what is the role of the brain?" Is there anything in Buddhism that addresses the obviously profound connection between mental phenomena and neural events ... ?

Astus wrote:

The debate exists if the problem is the classical issue of mind and body. Buddhism does not have such a duality. On one hand, it is one of the unanswered questions. On the other, they are not answered because they have incorrect presuppositions of existence and non-existence. The Buddha taught the five aggregates as the middle view. In modern terms, it is a phenomenological approach.

Aemilius said:

The teaching that I quoted is given by Nagarjuna in Mula-madhyamaka-karika and by Vasubandhu in his shorter works. Nagarjuna in many ways denies the apriori existence of matter. Matter has no independent existence in madhyamaka buddhism, it certainly isn't a cause for mind and mental states. Their point is that neither has mind an independent existence.

Astus wrote:

Nagarjuna invalidates the independent existence of all phenomena, it does not prove any non-material existence of mind. Vasubandhu teaches mind-only, but since it's very much philosophical, his proof is relevant only for Buddhists. For instance, Vasubandhu uses magic as an argument at one point. It's hardly persuasive today.

The problem with supernatural abilities generally, is that even in Buddhism they are not sufficiently explained, but simply taken for granted. There is no reasoning how one person could read another's mind, or hear distant events, or fly in the sky. To explain it, that would need getting into the laws of physics, a topic that Buddhism does not really involve itself. And even on the level of Abhidharma, no detailed mechanism for superpowers either.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, September 27th, 2012 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: Sūtra, Tantra, & Essence Mahāmudrā

Content:

Astus wrote:

gnas lugs (place + method) = way of abiding -> natural state

gnas lugs kyi phyag rgya chen po = Mahamudra of the natural state http://www.nitartha.org/dictionary_search04.html doesn't mention any Sanskrit equivalent.

(I don't know Tibetan, just looked it up)

Equating alayavijnana with tathagatagarbha is another matter.

<http://www.rinpoche.com/teachings/buddhanature.htm>,

"Again, first there is the ground of ignorance and from that there is the subtle movement arising from conceptualisations, which in turn gives rise to the movements that stimulate the mind. When a practitioner realizes the ground, then there is the wisdom, the power, and the great compassion of a Buddha. As long as somebody does not recognize the ground, there is delusion and all that follows. The ground of both delusion and liberation is called alaya, the Sanskrit term for "universal ground." The Tibetan translation for alaya is kun-gzhi, "basis of all."

You can find a lot more in "A Direct Path to the Buddha Within" on the subject.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, September 28th, 2012 at 2:30 AM

Title: Re: How do gay Buddhists explain this one?

Content:

Astus wrote:

It's unlikely to be meant for monks, since the very first precept of the pratimoksha already covers all kinds of genital-orifice contact (including even animals), and genital-manual contact is also covered in another rule.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 1st, 2012 at 12:44 AM

Title: Re: BBC Radio Programme on Osel Hita Torres

Content:

Astus wrote:

Non-UK members can listen as well.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 1st, 2012 at 3:32 AM

Title: Re: Akshobhya and Amitabha

Content:

Astus wrote:

Buddha-lands are different depending on the individual vows of the buddha who resides there. And just because it is a buddha-land - i.e. has a resident buddha - it doesn't mean it is necessarily out of samsara. When Shakyamuni was in this world it didn't mean that there were no hells or any evil things.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 2nd, 2012 at 3:45 AM

Title: Re: Why is Tibetan Buddhism more popular?

Content:

Astus wrote:

What originally made Zen famous in the West was its anti-intellectualism, anti-structuralism, iconoclasm, minimalism, etc. That is, the way DT Suzuki painted it. There was also a fascination with Japanese culture. But it seems that while that idea of Zen is still alive and well, it leaves too much out. That means that people are mostly free to fill out the huge gaps with their own ideas - thus the many Zen of this and Zen of that - but that results in Zen being little more than a catchword. It takes enormous dedication/fanaticism to stick with a formless and aimless seated meditation as the centre of one's faith. Generally it just turns into some relax time. My hope is that Korean Buddhism can establish itself in the West as a comprehensive practice and doctrine, since there are apparent intentions to do so by the Jogye Order (largest Buddhist organisation in Korea).

I can second Dzoki in that in Central Europe it is Tibetan Buddhism that rules the land, Diamond Way being the number one by miles. In Hungary's case there are a couple of historical reasons too, for instance https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/S%C3%A1ndor_K%C5%91r%C3%B6si_Csoma. Another example, the last time the Dalai Lama was in Budapest (2010) he had an audience of more than 10,000 people (that is 0.1% of the entire population of the country) in a stadium. Of course that doesn't mean all were Buddhists.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 2nd, 2012 at 4:47 AM

Title: Re: Why is Tibetan Buddhism more popular?

Content:

Astus wrote:

While I can only agree regarding publications with JKhedrup, there is another thing I'd like to add here. And that is the difference in the source material itself. Most of the texts translated from Chinese are either Chan works or sutras. Both are difficult to understand for any beginner, or even not so beginner readers. Without a firm knowledge of essential Mahayana doctrines it is only natural that there will be serious misunderstandings. But to get the knowledge of basic Mahayana one has to start reading either academic translations from Sanskrit or works from the Tibetan tradition. And here I'm talking about classical works, not introductory books.

Here is an example of a classical Chinese Buddhist text that was later often referred to in Chan,

"In entering there is transcendence and in emerging there is subtlety. The entering of wisdom is transcendent, [since] the outer defilements have no support. The emergence of wisdom is subtle, [since] the inner mind is devoid of activity. When inwardly the mind is free of intentional activity, one is no longer moved by various views. When outer defilements have no support, one is no longer bound by manifold existence. Free from the bonds of manifold existence, discursive thought no longer charges about. Unmoved by various views, there is inconceivable quiescence and cessation. This can be called originally pure and intrinsic transcendence and subtlety."

(Treasure Store Treatise, ch. 2, in "Coming to Terms with Chinese Buddhism", p. 204)

It is not a matter of bad translation but mainly a foreign terminology. And Dogen - whose works are almost completely translated to English - is a whole different level.

Longchenpa's Precious Treasury series are like children's books compared to that in terms of language.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 2nd, 2012 at 6:49 AM

Title: Re: Thamal gyi shepa vs. baby rigpa vs. rigpa (etc.)

Content:

Astus wrote:

"in what way does an experience of "baby rigpa" differ from a "complete" recognition of rigpa?"

The difference is made in order to show that there is a difference between a practitioner and a non-practitioner (i.e. a buddha). The practice is abiding in the natural state, and the natural state is the result, so this way the result is the path. But we can translate it to make it clearer: it is about practising with the correct view in order to attain complete realisation. The correct view conceptually is emptiness, experientially it is not grasping anything as real. It is practice because one works with habitual tendencies that are gradually removed.

"Much of my time is spent in what I could call "thought-free wakefulness," or what feels like a self-aware presence. There is no sense of some concrete thing doing the watching, but there continues to be a sense that objects are being watched."

As Nagarjuna and many other masters have pointed out, there is no ultimate truth beyond conditioned reality. The term "ordinary mind" is usually explained as being ordinary in the sense of simple, uncomplicated, not proliferating views. There is another sense I like to add, and that is the expression's literal sense, our everyday mind that thinks, feels, remembers, wants, hurts, etc. If there is the idea that the true nature of mind is without all the usual content, that is a reification of an abstract self, it is an imagined nothingness, it is annihilationism. Whatever appears in the mind is just natural. Thoughts, etc. come and go. If you fuss about it, there is a problem. Whether you want to grasp or reject, pull or push, there is trouble. If you don't mess around, all is perfect as it is.

Milarepa taught,

"If you are happy practicing with mind,
Thoughts are the mind's magical creations.
Be mind itself."

Read the full poem: <http://www.unfetteredmind.org/milarepas-song-to-lady-paldarboom>

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 2nd, 2012 at 7:48 AM

Title: Re: Thamal gyi shepa vs. baby rigpa vs. rigpa (etc.)

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are two defining characteristics: awareness, no characteristics. Well, it's actually one signless awareness. Attaching to any specific feeling, form, thought, impression, vision, etc., is identifying with something, taking an impermanent appearance as eternal. Why is it said to be difficult? Because it is our very basic habit to cling to thoughts and other things. Therefore one fails to differentiate between the content of the mind and mind itself. And when there is differentiation, the mistake happens again by thinking of "mind itself" as a thing, as a state.

Ajahn Sumedho taught a very easy method to see the gap between thoughts. First create a clear and strong thought, for instance saying in your mind "Om mani padme hung". Note how you start to say it in your mind, how you are saying it, and how it goes away. Then a break. A gap. Then you say it again in your mind.

The correct understanding of emptiness is a practice itself. Just consider the fact that karma ultimately comes from thoughts. If you change your thought-patterns you change your karma. Emptiness teaches oneself that there is nothing really to attach to, nothing to identify with, nothing to rely on. So when there is nothing real found, nothing concrete attained, one can let go of it. Without clearly seeing that appearances are empty of self, one may enforce on oneself some calm and peace, but then after meditation everything starts again as before. So understanding helps to let go. When all is let go of, there are no reference points, it is just non-conceptual awareness, it is resting meditation.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 2nd, 2012 at 5:25 PM

Title: Re: Thamal gyi shepa vs. baby rigpa vs. rigpa (etc.)

Content:

Astus wrote:

"I don't experience appearances as themselves being awareness"

If I think about this sentence literally, even imagining it feels absurd. Awareness is being conscious of something. If that thing is the consciousness that is aware of it, the whole thing collapses. I mean, logically. So that's not what is meant. The other end, that awareness and objects are separate is also ruled out, otherwise they had no connection to each other. In terms of practice, it is to be determined by looking for the gap or border between object and subject in the sensory fields. Of course there is no such thing. Another method is to search for the mind and the object if it's inside, outside or in between. Teachings on this are found in Wangchuk Dorje's Ocean of Definitive Meaning and commentaries. What it comes down to is that there is just the flow of experience, as in the examples of the mirror and the lake. Because everything is an experience, everything is mind. And since all experience are ungraspable and inconceivable, they are empty. When you relax and let sights, sounds, etc. appear and disappear as they are without fixating on any of them, you just open yourself completely, the idea of any viewer and viewed, hearer and heard becomes meaningless. Try to meditate on a single sensory gate, first perhaps using a fixed visual object. Then investigate what you experience.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 2nd, 2012 at 5:46 PM

Title: Re: Why is Tibetan Buddhism more popular?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Another thing is that here if you mention Buddhism, people think it exists in India - Buddha was Indian, right? - and then the Dalai Lama and Tibet. That Buddhism is a major religion in China, that's not common knowledge at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 2nd, 2012 at 8:03 PM

Title: Re: YinYana Creed - based on Nicene Creed

Content:

Astus wrote:

Nice work.

Look at these titles:

<http://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/btg/index.htm> (1894)

<http://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/tbc/index.htm> (1908)

<http://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/pos/index.htm> (1909)

<http://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/busc/index.htm> (1913)

<http://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/cob/index.htm> (1919)

<http://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/bups/index.htm> (1921)

<http://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/bb/index.htm> (1932)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 3rd, 2012 at 3:13 AM

Title: Re: Ven Master Dr Heng Sure on Pure Land

Content:

Astus wrote:

Unless the mentioned economic collapse happens a hundred years later, by which time Buddhism could have spread widely enough among Westerners, there is little chance for Ven. Heng Sure's prediction about turning to faith in Amita Buddha can happen. Christianity is still strong in the US. and it has deep enough roots in Europe to regain its followers. Rather it seems to me that those who have already tried some sort of more popular form of Buddhism can turn to the Pure Land, because in their belief in the Dharma is already there.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 3rd, 2012 at 5:26 PM

Title: Re: Being in the Present

Content:

Astus wrote:

That is how samatha relates to vipasyana. In samatha the mind settles on an object (including itself), and in vipasyana one investigates the object the mind is settled on and the mind itself.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 3rd, 2012 at 5:33 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land and Bodhisattvas

Content:

Astus wrote:

Kaji,

A time when there were no buddha-lands is not really possible. There is no beginning of life in Buddhism, there is no beginning of buddhas either. But being born in a buddha-land as a part of one's progress on the bodhisattva path is not a requirement, although since bodhisattvas start their career under a buddha and are guided by buddhas, buddha-lands and bodhisattvas go together quite well.

The Tusita is a heaven in the realm of desire, not a buddha-land/pure land (the words are synonyms generally).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 3rd, 2012 at 7:52 PM

Title: Re: Isn't it a Buddhist belief that there exist so called Demons

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are demon-like beings in Buddhism. Mostly they are in the realm of hungry spirits and the lower heavens. These are for example the naga (aquatic serpent demons), yaksha (nature spirits), rakshasa (man-eating demons), pishacha (flesh-eating demons), kimnara (centaurs), asura (warrior gods), mahoraga (subterranean serpent demons).

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 3rd, 2012 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Why is Tibetan Buddhism more popular?

Content:

Astus wrote:

" here we are in 2012 and in Soto Zen, 22% of the respondents to a recent survey of dharma successors were over 70 years old. Almost 50% were between 60-69. Only 7% were in their 40s.

Now I like old people as much as the next person. I'll be one soon myself. So I'm not hating old people here, just saying that when you've got 70% of your denomination's priests over 60 years old (aka, Boomers and beyond), then you might have a problem."

Read the full article: <http://sweepingzen.com/zen-is-going-to-hell-and-its-the-boomers-fault>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 3rd, 2012 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: What's the meaning of Zen Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

You should read some history and other basic things about Zen. See <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Zen>.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 4th, 2012 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: Whats the meaning of Zen Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

If you want an even shorter introduction to Zen, but still something conceptual, here is this four line poem attributed to Bodhidharma that is usually used as a definition of Zen.

教外別傳

不立文字

直指人心

見性成佛

Outside doctrines a separate transmission

Doesn't rely on letters and words,

Directly points to human mind

To see nature and become buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 4th, 2012 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: Being in the Present

Content:

Astus wrote:

As you quoted text says, in a deeper sense. A calm mind and an insightful mind unites in the final practice. Strictly speaking, samatha is just calming the mind, which in Mahamudra results in simply resting it in its natural state. Vipasyana is insight into the mind itself, seeing the mind that rests, seeing its nature. Vipasyana in its analytical form is looking here and there, checking and probing, asking questions and following steps of enquiry. Vipasyana in its resting form means that the investigation has finished, nothing conceivable has been found, there is awareness and emptiness without the minutest distinction. This whole process is actually also found in Kamalasila's manuals, so it's neither secret nor very specific to Mahamudra.

Another difference that can be said between samatha and vipasyana is that while in samatha you gradually move inside and you reach a stable mental state which you leave when you finish meditation, in vipasyana you open your awareness to everything that occurs and realise that the nature of mind is always unaffected by appearances, that phenomena are already empty as they are, and there is not a single state of mind you need to revert to in order to be free from suffering.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 4th, 2012 at 1:13 AM

Title: Re: Pure Land and Bodhisattvas

Content:

Astus wrote:

Does that sutra state anywhere specifically that it's a pure land or buddha land?

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 4th, 2012 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Japanese Buddhist Traditions 'reality show'

Content:

Astus wrote:

It looks more like a song contest to me. The order in the video actually is:

- 10: Rinzai, singing: Hakuin's Song of Zazen
- 9: Soto, singing: Great Compassion Dharani
- 8: Tendai/Nichiren (in Tendai temple), singing: 14th chapter of Lotus Sutra
- 7: Shingon, singing: Rishu-kyo (Adhyardhaśatikā Prajñāpāramitā Sutra)
- 6: Nichiren/Soto/Tendai (in Nichiren temple), singing: 16th chapter of Lotus Sutra
- 5: together singing the Heart Sutra
- 4: Shin, singing: Shoshin Nenbutsu Ge (Hymn of the Nembutsu and True Faith)
- 3: Soto Zen: Kannon-gyo (section of Lotus Sutra, ch. 25)
- 2: Jodo/Shin, singing: Infinite Life Sutra (Larger Amitabha Sutra)
- 1: Jodo/Shin/Tendai, singing: Amida-kyo (Shorter Amitabha Sutra)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 4th, 2012 at 7:19 PM

Title: Re: Maitreya's Pure Land?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are some points regarding aspiration to be born in the Tusita to meet Maitreya. In Zhiyi's Ten Doubts about the Pure Land it says that there are two main differences. First is that only by upholding the ten virtues and other practices can one attain birth there, and even then there is no guarantee one will succeed, while birth in Amita's land is easily accessible simply by reciting his name. The second point is that the Tusita is still in the realm of desire, there are many distractions from the path and retrogression is still possible, unlike in the Western Land of Peace and Bliss where perfect liberation is guaranteed. The text goes on with further problems, like that just meeting Maitreya in itself does not make sure one actually achieves enlightenment. It also mentions that besides Asanga and Vasubandhu there was also Simhabhadra who aspired to be born in Maitreya's court but he was eventually stuck in the outer section in Tusita and got entangled by the five desires.

Of course, the above is from the perspective of those who propagate birth in Amita's land. But based on the quote from Ven. Yinshun it seems to me that the requirements of birth are more difficult for Maitreya than Amita Buddha, although this again may depend on whom you ask.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 4th, 2012 at 7:22 PM

Title: Re: Akshobhya and Amitabha

Content:

Astus wrote:

Nothing has intrinsic reality in Mahayana. But everything exists dependently. So, the hells are as real as anything else.

Jan Nattier in her "The Indian Roots of Pure Land Buddhism" explains that initially Akshobhya's land was popular, but as it reflected an older version of the concept of the bodhisattva path, Amita's land gradually took over in popularity because of its accessibility and guaranteed liberation for ordinary people.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 4th, 2012 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: Maitreya's Pure Land?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Could you then also participate in the assembly at his ascension to buddhahood?"

On one hand, the point of all the teachings there are is to guide people onto the path. If somebody likes Maitreya then go for that. If it's Amitabha, Vairocana, Avalokita, etc., then choose that. In this sense all these teachings are equal in their function. On the other hand, if we want to choose based on doctrinal and practical details instead of emotional preference, the Pure Land teaching of Amita Buddha is the best. And then it doesn't matter if you can be there at Maitreya's descent, since you find yourself in the company of many bodhisattvas and buddhas, and you too are about to reach buddhahood.

Talking about Maitreya, Vimalakirti had a great conversation with him. Just look at how this layman starts his conversation with the next buddha:

"Maitreya, the World-honored One has bestowed on your noble person the prediction that you will achieve anuttarā samyak sambodhi in a single lifetime. What lifetime will you use to experience this prediction, past, future, or present? If a past life, then the past life is already extinguished. If a future life, then the future life has not arrived. If the present life, then the present life is nonabiding. It is as the Buddha has explained, "O bhikṣus, you are in this immediate present born, aged, and extinguished.""

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, October 6th, 2012 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Can I only use a Zen Buddha/Bodhisattva statue?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Zen as a school within Mahayana is not bound to any particular buddha. So, there is no such thing as a "Zen buddha".

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 8th, 2012 at 7:16 PM

Title: Re: Akshobhya and Amitabha

Content:

Astus wrote:

"What does actually change the the vasanas? How does the hell cease to manifest?
How does the human world cease to manifest?"

Ingrained habits are changed by new habits or the Buddhist path. As for the cessation of the different realms, do you mean liberation from such births or in a cosmological sense? In the first case, it is by realisation on the path. In the second one, it is a matter of cyclical contraction and expansion of the realms.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 8th, 2012 at 9:26 PM

Title: Re: Zen has No Morals

Content:

Astus wrote:

Oushi,

If you say that moral conduct, goodness, is inherent in humans, that contradicts the fact of unethical behaviour and evil deeds. If you say that from the buddha-nature comes buddha acts, that is not argued, but then it requires first attaining enlightenment. To reach such a realisation there is a path, and the first part of that path is ethical discipline. Without teaching that very first step the further levels are not available.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 8th, 2012 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: Zen has No Morals

Content:

Astus wrote:

Oushi,

Direct realisation of buddha mind is fine. In theory. In real life hardly anyone teaches it (I've heard of only one teacher like that in this century: Daehaeng Sunim, although there might be others). Therefore there is a need for a gradual path, as it has been devised by the Buddha. It is also true that a bodhisattva on the second bhumi perfects ethical discipline, but that is already a high level compared to all the other 41 levels on the path before that. And if we consider Jinul's teaching, sudden enlightenment is just level 1 of 52. When the precepts are not taught by a teacher but instead the teacher himself is raised beyond all moral concerns, we can see the results as in the original essay posted at the beginning of this thread.

There isn't much on ethics in the Record of Linji. You should look at Baizhang's Regulations as a prime example of added ethical discipline in the Zen tradition besides the Vinaya and bodhisattva precepts.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 8th, 2012 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: Who is your favorite Buddha/Bodhisattva?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Seevoice" is the best.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 8th, 2012 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: Zen has No Morals

Content:

Astus wrote:

Oushi,

If teachers don't usually instruct in the direct way, the reason is either that they don't think people will understand it or they don't know it. In either case it shows that the direct method is for those who are already well prepared.

Rinzai Zen (Japanese) has a clear systematic training programme that actually culminates in the contemplation of the bodhisattva precepts.

Baizhang was Linji's teacher, Chinese. The regulations were written in China, not Japan.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 9th, 2012 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: Zen has No Morals

Content:

oushi said:

we should talk about how things are.

Astus wrote:

And that's why ethics are important to be mentioned, because without it Zen sounds like some abstract idea of a detached mind where there is no cause and effect. From that comes all the actual cases already mentioned.

oushi said:

And how different it is from the founders (Linji) approach...

Astus wrote:

The Linji school was founded hundreds of years after Yixuan himself and his Record was rewritten repeatedly. If you want a glimpse of something closer to Linji it is the teachings of the Hongzhou school. There is also an interesting work about his Yulu:
<https://books.google.com/books?id=JkGTSWEUCeUC&printsec=frontcover#v=onepage&q&f=false>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 9th, 2012 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: Zen has No Morals

Content:

oushi said:

What is morality, how is it developed, why people defend it so furiously?

Astus wrote:

Morality in Buddhism is defined by the correct behaviour in body and speech. What correct behaviour consists of is given in the ten virtuous deeds and others. It is part of both the noble eightfold path and the six paramitas, therefore they lead to both temporary and ultimate liberation from suffering. This answers your three questions.

oushi said:

It is conditioned and relative. You won't find two people sharing the same moral conduct.

Astus wrote:

It is exactly because of being conditioned that it has effect. If by relative you mean that people have different ideas of what is good and bad, you are right. However, Buddhism is not based on the opinion of ordinary people and has a set of moral principles. Also, karma is infallible regardless of what someone believes about right and wrong. The difference between a layman, a novice, a monk and a bodhisattva primarily depends on their respective precepts, the precepts are what give the fundamental cohesion and structure of the community. It is not a question of individual opinions, even when in the daily application of precepts there is some relative freedom.

oushi said:

Buddhism is not about fitting into a model, it's about ending craving. It does not matter what is the object of desire, it still will create suffering.

Astus wrote:

How do you end craving? With the practice of morality, meditation and wisdom. Desire is indeed the cause of suffering. The desire to be free from desire, however, is the cause of liberation. That's how there is also a path and not just a goal.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 9th, 2012 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: Who is your favorite Buddha/Bodhisattva?

Content:

Red Faced Buddha said:

Never heard of her. My favorite is probably Manjushri, next to Amitabha Buddha and Avalokiteśvara.

Astus wrote:

Guanyin (observe+sound) = Avalokitesvara

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 9th, 2012 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: Zen has No Morals

Content:

oushi said:

Karma is not a magical force behind the scenes. You won't accumulate bad karma from actions that you see as right.

Astus wrote:

Karma is not magical, only natural. There are situations where people say it is all right to kill, steal, cheat, etc., and one can actually be in situations when it feels acceptable to kill, steal, cheat, and so on. Does that make it ethical? In fact, people necessarily choose what they think is the best choice. And yes, there can be conflict between what they believe is morally right and what is right at the moment. But if such a relativist attitude were true, then only those could experience any negative karma who have an internal moral conflict. That is, not many people. And that makes the whole teaching of karma useless. It's rather the opposite in Buddhism. Karma is a teaching about how the mind functions, how different attitudes and actions create imprints in the mind, and then how those imprints change one's experience. The twelve links of dependent origination is an easy example for this. It is not some made up religious phantasm to scare little children but something that is based on meditative observation of the mind. On the night of his enlightenment Siddhartha saw first his previous lives and then saw how beings are reborn according to their actions, and then realised the ending of all defilements. This is understanding the second noble truth, the origin of suffering, and the realisation of the third truth, the end of suffering. Not understanding the cause of the problem can only result in being unable to solve it. That's why the four noble truths are the core teachings of the Buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 9th, 2012 at 3:26 PM

Title: Re: Whats the difference

Content:

Astus wrote:

There can be other interpretations, but the different levels of absorption (dhyana) simply describe a more and more calm mind. For instance, on the first level we still have thoughts and pondering about things. The fourth level is what a stable, calm, pristine, limpid mind is without thoughts or feelings of elation.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 9th, 2012 at 3:48 PM

Title: Re: Zen has No Morals

Content:

Astus wrote:

Oushi,

"Far better it is to have nothing further to seek, to be simple and plain."

That's good, no disagreement with that. Question really is, if it were so simple and easy, how on earth could supposedly enlightened Zen teachers commit such misconducts?

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 9th, 2012 at 5:23 PM

Title: Re: Zen has No Morals

Content:

oushi said:

How do you measure enlightenment? You used "supposedly" because you don't know. You think I will? Buddha is not found in appearances. If you believe in morality as a measure of enlightenment, you will be driven by assumptions.

Astus wrote:

If buddha-nature contains perfect morality, by enlightenment it should naturally manifest in all one's actions as buddha activity.

oushi said:

Go for direct meaning, don't waste your time for local gossips. Only because people are looking for the Buddha outside, they fall prey to charlatans.

Astus wrote:

Was it your idea to choose direct over gradual? Was it you who invented what direct is? If no, then you have already relied on others.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 9th, 2012 at 5:59 PM

Title: Re: Whats the difference

Content:

Astus wrote:

As mentioned before by puer aeternus, samadhi originally meant meditation and usually of the samatha type, mostly synonymous with dhyana. The meaning of samadhi was gradually changed in Mahayana to encompass different sorts of realisations, like in the Samadhiraja Sutra which is relevant in Mahamudra. At the same time, the meaning of dhyana was also gradually modified into different sorts of deep absorptions to the level that it was taught to be avoided in Mahayana. As with many terms in Buddhism, they eventually become the victims of over-conceptualisation.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 9th, 2012 at 6:35 PM

Title: Re: Zen has No Morals

Content:

oushi said:

What is perfect morality? Can you describe it?

Astus wrote:

Mentioned before, the 10 virtuous acts and others describe it fine. In brief, it is harmlessness and compassion.

oushi said:

1. Gradual, from definition, is an approach of those that don't know.
2. My direct approach came from inquiry. Scriptures came later. It is great fun to read them. Before that, you need to see, that is why I ask questions. There is no point of just repeating after masters.
3. All relies on the teacher.

Astus wrote:

1. Those who already know need no instructions.
2. Inquiry is needed when one is without knowledge, and by inquiring one goes through a gradual investigation.
3. In that case, it is not based on one's own buddha-mind.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 9th, 2012 at 7:23 PM

Title: Re: Zen has No Morals

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Bodhidharma quote was about false visions of buddhas, not ethical conduct.

Ideas of self and owner are rejected and refuted by all Buddhist schools under the teaching of selflessness. How is that subject relevant here? Or, as Wumen asks, "Why should you ask whether you recognize him or not?"

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 9th, 2012 at 7:59 PM

Title: Re: Zen has No Morals

Content:

oushi said:

And what is the true Buddha?

Astus wrote:
Lu Sheng-yen?

Author: Astus
Date: Wednesday, October 10th, 2012 at 1:32 AM
Title: Re: Whats the difference
Content:
viniketa said:

This does seem to be the case. Not sure how or why dhyana got "demoted", as the distinctions between levels was pretty close to the "eight consciousnesses". Hum, maybe I just answered my own question...

Astus wrote:
I think the reason is that the dhyanas were first elevated to a very high position and accordingly their definitions changed. Even today there are a variety of teachers with different views regarding what the dhyanas actually stand for (especially among Theravada masters). Since it became so removed from actual practice, it was for the better that later teachers simply dismissed them as unnecessary or even misguided.

Author: Astus
Date: Wednesday, October 10th, 2012 at 4:31 AM
Title: Re: Whats the difference
Content:
Astus wrote:

Here is a summary from Tsele Natsok's Heart Lamp (p. 31-33) on the nine dhyanas. Interestingly, it is not under the section discussing shamatha but the chapter about "Faults and Qualities", sub-chapter "Clearing Away Specific Errors and Mistakes". The reason given is the fault of attaching to bliss, clarity and nonthought. What he originally defines as the proper practice of shamatha in Mahamudra is resting naturally without fixating on thoughts or appearances. So, his description of the dhyanas:
When resting evenly in shamatha, then, to be free from gross thoughts of perceiver and perceived, but still to be fettered by the concept of meditator and meditation object is called the "samadhi of the First Dhyana." Why is that? Because this is what is being meditated upon in all the abodes of the gods of the First Dhyana. Meditating in this way creates the cause for being reborn there as a god at the level of the First Dhyana.
Likewise, the second dhyana is to be free from the state of mind of concept and discernment, but still to experience the taste of the samadhi of joy and bliss.
The third dhyana is to be free from mental movement, but supported merely by the inhalation and exhalation of breath.
The fourth dhyana is to be free from all kinds of thoughts, a state of samadhi which is unobstructed clarity, like space.
Supreme among all the mundane samadhis, these are the foundation for vipashyana. If meditated upon with attachment, however, they become a deviation from Mahamudra causing rebirth as gods in the abodes of those dhyanas.

Furthermore, thinking "All phenomena are infinite like space!" or "This consciousness, free from partiality and nonexistent, is infinite!" or "Perception, being neither existent nor nonexistent, is not an action of mind!" or "This mind is voidness, which is nothing whatsoever!" Dwelling in the states of these four levels has the defect of straying into the four formless spheres of finality; called the Infinite Space, Infinite Consciousness, Neither Presence nor Absence, and Nothing Whatsoever.

The shravaka's samadhi of peace is the state of mind that has abandoned these four thoughts in which involvement in objects has been blocked, and in which you abide having interrupted the movements of the wind-mind. Although such a state is taught to be the ultimate shamatha, in this context it is not a faultless meditation unless embraced by vipashyana.

Each of these nine dhyanas of absorption has some temporary qualities, such as accomplishment of superknowledges and miraculous powers. Here, however, you should attain the ultimate result of complete enlightenment and not merely relative or superficial qualities. Thus, if these are accomplished naturally and you then cling to them or feel arrogant, know that to be a direct obstacle for enlightenment.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 10th, 2012 at 5:57 AM

Title: Re: Whats the difference

Content:

Astus wrote:

Regarding not fully focusing on the object:

"The importance of not focusing on the meditative object too intently should be emphasized here. You need to restrain your mind from wandering away from the meditation object, but you should also maintain a sense of relaxation. ... The function of the meditative object is to enhance your concentration. Simply be aware of the object, rather than grasping onto it or trying to focus on it too intently. An element of relaxation is extremely important here. You should not mistake the object of meditation for the function of meditation. The function of meditation is not to concentrate on a piece of wood or any other object."

(Traleg Kyabgon: Ocean of Certainty, p. 80)

"What is very important, the masters always advise, is not to fixate while practising the concentration of calm abiding. That's why they recommend you place only twenty five percent of the attention on mindfulness of the breath. But then, as you may have noticed, mindfulness alone is not enough. While you are supposed to be watching the breath, after a few minutes you may find yourself playing in a football match or starring in your own film. So another twenty five percent should be devoted to a continuous and watchful awareness, one that oversees and checks whether you are being mindful of the breath. The remaining fifty percent of your attention is left abiding, spaciously. Of course the exact percentages are not as important as the fact that all three of these elements-mindfulness, awareness and spaciousness are present."

(Sögyal Rinpoche: Natural Great Peace, p. 7)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 10th, 2012 at 3:01 PM

Title: Re: Whats the difference

Content:

Astus wrote:

I've seen that order before, can't remember where. But it is somewhat logical.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 11th, 2012 at 4:41 PM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

Astus wrote:

Matt,

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=114310#p114310> was my final conclusion on the matter.

viniketa,

The alayavijnana is unconscious because we are not conscious of it. Seeds are latent tendencies, and there are myriads of them.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 11th, 2012 at 7:42 PM

Title: Re: The possibility of subforums for Rinzai and Soto Zen.

Content:

Astus wrote:

Tibetan Buddhism has its subforums, just as East Asian Buddhism. Based on the number of topics in the Zen subforum it does not seem necessary to further divide it. Plus, such a distinction exists only in Japanese Zen, and in the West, because of the majority Sanbo Kyodan groups, they are not really separate. Nevertheless, if you feel the need for a special section for a specific tradition for some reasons it can be arranged without problem.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 11th, 2012 at 9:22 PM

Title: Re: Change Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

Originally it was Vajrayana forum, but it was changed because on one hand Tibetan Buddhism includes its own Mahayana interpretations. On the other hand, Shingon is different in many aspects from Tibetan Vajrayana (for instance it's heavily influenced by Huayan teachings). Also, Vajrayana in Bhutan and Mongolia are derivatives of Tibetan traditions and they still have close connections.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 11th, 2012 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

Astus wrote:

Regarding the hidden nature of the alayavijnana, my point was that as we are not aware of it right now, we are not conscious of it at this moment, then based on what reason can it be called a consciousness? What you don't think of is not your thought, and if you don't know you think of something it is not thought of at all. Same with a feeling that you don't feel, or a sight that you don't see. This is the same problem I have raised <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=113784#p113784>, and some added explanation <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=113830#p113830> and even more <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=113967#p113967> if it's not yet clear.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 12th, 2012 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

One way to think about it: Is your anger at x always manifest or does it just manifest on certain occasions? What happens to your anger at x when it is not manifest.

Astus wrote:

This is practically saying that anger has an permanent nature and a physical existence that has to be kept hidden until it occurs again.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 12th, 2012 at 1:33 AM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

Astus wrote:

Anjali,

The problem making alayavijnana something other than consciousness clearly violates the core idea of Vijnaptimatra, that is, that all phenomena are mental phenomena.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 12th, 2012 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: What is the difference between an Arhat and Bodhisattva?

Content:

Astus wrote:

First of all, there is a variety of interpretations about how arhats differ from bodhisattvas. Generally we can say that arhats are permanently free from samsara, while bodhisattvas have chosen to remain within samsara in order to help beings and accumulate merit to become buddhas. Because bodhisattvas eventually can become buddhas, it is said that because of their wish to become buddhas, they are superior to arhats in the sense that they have greater aspiration based on greater compassion, and that compassion and aspiration is what bodhicitta is.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 12th, 2012 at 3:30 PM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

Astus wrote:

I think that if the whole alayavijnana idea is based only on logic it remains a convenient explanation of karma on a superficial level, but it falls apart quite fast under analysis.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 12th, 2012 at 3:40 PM

Title: Re: What is the difference between an Arhat and Bodhisattva?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Just to add to this plethora of interpretations and ideas, in East Asian Buddhism - based primarily on the Lotus Sutra - arhats attain only a seeming nirvana and once they're awoken from it by the buddhas they continue their path to liberation as high level (8th bhumi) bodhisattvas. So, according to this view, there is only one kind of nirvana, that of the buddha.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 12th, 2012 at 6:03 PM

Title: Re: The possibility of subforums for Rinzai and Soto Zen.

Content:

Astus wrote:

As a trial subforums have been created under Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 12th, 2012 at 7:33 PM

Title: Re: Akshobhya and Amitabha

Content:

Astus wrote:

If you are in the realm of humans your mind is human. It may have strong tendencies for another realm but it changes to that only at becoming (bhava). Disappearing from a realm is called death.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 14th, 2012 at 7:39 PM

Title: Re: Ch'an groups in the West.

Content:

Astus wrote:

In the UK (and affiliated centres in other European countries) there is the <http://www.westernchanfellowship.org/>, it is within the Dharma Drum lineage but a separate organisation.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 14th, 2012 at 7:57 PM

Title: Re: Question about Korean Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

As mentioned, Korean Zen is diverse. There is the Jogye Order, the largest Buddhist organisation, but there are also other ones, like the Taego Order or the Kwan Um Zen School that are not part of Jogye. Within the Jogye Order there are different vocations monastics can take (meditation, scripture, ritual) as their primary field of study before full ordination. That means that while Zen may seem the main form of Buddhist tradition, in fact all monastics are required to be proficient to some extent in the essential Mahayana doctrines as it is defined in Korea based on outstanding teachers like Wonhyo, Uisang and Jinul. And when we look into a narrower subject like the hwadu practice, different teachers instruct it in their own unique ways, if they use hwadu at all (mostly the Hanmaum School to which Chonggo sunim belongs where they don't use hwadu meditation).

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 14th, 2012 at 9:56 PM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

Astus wrote:

"After 8 pages on this topic do you believe anyone directly addressed the issues of your original post?"

Except for these last posts after my summary of the problem, no.

"It's object and form are undeterminate [aparacchinna]. Why? Because..."

I think it just explains that the alayavijnana is not bound to any specific form of perception, therefore everything can be within it.

Now I address your kind responses using Xuanzang's Cheng weishi lun (all quotes from "Three Texts on Consciousness Only"). He writes,

"THAT WHICH IT GRASPS is twofold: the seeds and the body provided with organs. "Seeds" refer to images, names [or words], and the perfuming of imagination. "Body provided with organs" refers to physical organs and the support of the organs. These two are what is grasped by consciousness" (p. 60)

"The term PERCEPTION means that the eighth consciousness as retribution has the function of perceiving its objects. The function of perceiving is the seeing part of this consciousness." (p. 61)

""Seeds" refers to all the impure seeds held by the consciousness that is retribution. They are included in the nature of this consciousness and are therefore its object of perception. Although pure seeds are connected with this consciousness, they are not included in its nature, and therefore they are not its perceptual object." (p. 65)

"The term IMPERCEPTIBLE [in Vasubandhu's verses] means that the mode of activity of this consciousness is extremely subtle and fine and therefore difficult to know thoroughly. Or, we may say that it is hard to know because the internal objects that it grasps and holds are extremely subtle, while the extent of the external world is hard to fathom. Why are the objects it grasps and the mode of activity of this consciousness difficult to know, [and how do we therefore know that it even exists!? Like consciousness that does not depart the body during the samadhi of cessation [of perception], it must be trusted to exist. You must admit that during this samádhi there is a consciousness, because the meditator is still classified as a sentient being, just as when the mind is functioning in a normal way. It is the same even at the final stages of the cessation of thought [in samádhi]. (p. 67-68)

So, in effect what Xuanzang says is that while the alayavijnana necessarily works as a consciousness with subject and object, it is actually imperceptible. The reason the alayavijnana is posited is simply to explain states where the normal six consciousnesses cease. This is also the same reason the bhavanga-sota/citta is put in to abhidhamma works and most likely copied from Yogacara.

"How do we know that apart from visual consciousness, etc., the eighth consciousness has a separate, independent substance? Through holy teaching and proper reasoning." (p. 83)

There is no experience of the alayavijnana, no pointing to the seeds, simply texts and arguments. While in his explanation Xuanzang repeatedly says that the alayavijnana is the true object of belief in self - i.e. there should be something any ordinary people experience about it to mistake it for a self - his reason for its existence is mostly a tautology: it must exist "because without this consciousness there is no mind to hold the seeds." (p. 90) Also,

"It must be granted that there is a real mind as retribution that repays projected karma, that is found in the three realms, is not interrupted, that changes into the body and world receptacle, and acts as a support for sentient beings. I We argue this I because (1) apart from mind, body and world receptacle are in fact nonexistent; (2) dharmas not associated with mind have no real substance; and (3) the evolving consciousnesses, etc., do not always exist. Without this consciousness, what changes into a body and world receptacle? Based on what dharmas can sentience be always established [in samadhi, etc.]" (p. 94-95)

That is, there must be a continuous eighth consciousness otherwise we have no explanation of the continuity of mind/being. What shows well how the alayavijnana is an unconscious consciousness is that Xuanzang brings up nirodhasamapatti, cessation samadhi, where there is no conscious activity as an argument for alayavijnana.

"Apart from this [eighth] consciousness, no consciousness that does not leave the body would exist in someone in this samādhi. ... If you do not admit the existence of a consciousness that is subtle, homogeneous, constant, and omnipresent and sustains life, [heat,] etc., how can [the scripture] speak of a consciousness that does not desert the body?" (p. 104)

And that's why I say that the alayavijnana is nothing more than a provisional explanation of the working of karma, because in the Yogacara's own system it is admitted that it is a consciousness without anyone being aware of the functions it performs. And an unconscious consciousness is a contradiction in my view.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 15th, 2012 at 2:29 AM

Title: Re: Hindu defense against Buddhism

Content:

Astus wrote:

To add one more thing besides the position of Buddha in the Hindu pantheon, Advaita Vedanta is believed to be the highest philosophy only by those who follow that specific school. There are other forms of Vedanta philosophies, and beyond that there are also other Hindu teachings. Hinduism is truly just a blanket term that covers lot of contradictory interpretations and even more religious practices. Just compare a vegetarian Vaishnava group like the ISKCON with a Shaivite movement like the aghoris where they eat human flesh.

As for the Hindu defence against Buddhism, the most famous apologist I am aware of is Adi Shankara. But I suppose there were others too who could be reviewed here. So, who has the knowledge to bring them here?

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 15th, 2012 at 5:45 AM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

Astus wrote:

Yes, there was this point about the nature of mind or ground-mind I have not replied to.

While theoretically we can say that alayavijnana is the same as tathagatagarbha, but as we can see in the descriptions, they don't actually match. One reason is that, just as Daniel Brown says, it is realising the dharmakaya, it is enlightenment, and not the experience of the storehouse-consciousness but in fact becoming free from karma. Another reason can be that not all Yogacara traditions teach universal buddha-nature, it is not essential to the Yogacara teaching, although it is true that in many cases there is a fusion of these two ideas, like in Mahamudra.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 22nd, 2012 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: Essential Chan Buddhism: Heart of Chan - NYC Nov 7th, 2012

Content:

Astus wrote:

I wonder what kind of transmission is there in Huayan and Faxiang...

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 22nd, 2012 at 3:15 PM

Title: Re: Essential Chan Buddhism: Heart of Chan - NYC Nov 7th, 2012

Content:

Astus wrote:

I doubt that there is any lineage from the Tang dynasty or from as late as the Qing. Even in Chan they had to reinvent the lineage several times and fill in the gaps of missing generations.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 22nd, 2012 at 3:31 PM

Title: Re: Bankei's "method" of abiding in the unborn

Content:

Astus wrote:

As said before, the first and most important thing is to recognise the unborn. What is the unborn mind? Using Bankei's explanation, it is this mind that while you are reading hears the background noises, sees things around the monitor, feels the chair, and all of that happens without intentionally trying to perceive them. It is the awareness without fixing on a single object of attention, the naturally present knowing that does not require grasping anything in order to be aware and be able to interact. Once this is clear just keep it. Nothing else needs to be done. This is genuine and direct Zen, not <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=69&t=5105>.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 22nd, 2012 at 4:04 PM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

anjali said:

I believe Xuanzang's analysis of the alaya-vijnana is faulty. The alaya-vijnana is non-dual--subject/object duality haven't popped up yet. That comes at the next level. There is no perceiver and perception of separate objects. There is no grasper-grasping. Let me offer up a quote from Gampopa. I was reading from Gampopa Teaches Essence Mahamudra by Tony Duff a couple of days ago, and came across something that confirmed a suspicion I had.

Astus wrote:

Xuanzang teaches Yogacara and he gives a detailed analysis of the alayavijnana. Gampopa teaches Mahamudra and how the alayavijnana as a general teaching fits into it without giving the step by step details of it. The way the two present and interpret is different in that for Xuanzang the alayavijnana is basically ignorant, while for Gampopa it is just the obscured version of buddha-mind. Nevertheless, the problem of latent, unseen, unconscious mental phenomena still stands. Also, when there are many seeds we can't call it non-dual which would exclude both one and many.

anjali said:

At the level of alaya-vijnana both consciousness and karma are in a non-active state. They are both latent.

Astus wrote:

As you said, "an unconscious consciousness is a contradiction."

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 22nd, 2012 at 5:44 PM

Title: Re: Esoteric practices in Hwa Yen

Content:

Astus wrote:

The first classic on Huayan is Dushun's meditation manual. Nothing esoteric in that, although it contains a Huayan-styled meditation. Chengguan studied first under a Chan teacher, while Zongmi, the so called fifth patriarch, was explicitly a Chan advocate.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 22nd, 2012 at 8:40 PM

Title: Re: Bankei's "method" of abiding in the unborn

Content:

Astus wrote:

Another thing about Bankei is that he taught openly to everyone. No special requirements, no secret techniques. The teaching of the buddha-mind includes everyone because all beings have the unborn without exception.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 22nd, 2012 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land location

Content:

Astus wrote:

Your questions are perfectly valid, no need to worry about that. The first problem is that Buddhism hasn't had the modern cosmology with what people understand the universe today. It is said that Sukhavati is 10,000 buddha-lands away to the West. It basically means: far away. One buddha-land covers a great trichiliocosm (https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Buddhist_cosmology#Sahasra_cosmology), which is based on the single unit of a world system with mount Meru, the continents and the six realms. This does not convert to planets, solar systems or even galaxies. But if you want to, you may think that it's 10,000 galaxies away. Or you can also say that it's a separate dimension. And while we cannot reach another buddha-land by any known vehicle, in meditation it is possible.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 22nd, 2012 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land location

Content:

Nighthawk said:

What's your opinion about it? Do you see it as 10,000 galaxies away or as something in a separate dimension?

Astus wrote:

If I want to use today's cosmology I say it's galaxies. Another dimension is also fine, although then the meaning of distance and direction is lost. However, direction on galactic level is also problematic. And that's why classic Buddhist cosmology doesn't translate well to modern terms.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 23rd, 2012 at 5:49 AM

Title: Re: Bankei's "method" of abiding in the unborn

Content:

Astus wrote:

There are many lost and revived teachings in Buddhism. Since how and when teachings survive or are reborn is a complex religious and social matter, I don't consider it as an accurate measurement of the quality of any doctrine. The variety of teachings is also not a problem nor an issue of superiority, just as the Buddha gave many methods in order to lead everyone to liberation so are there many ways one can choose from freely even today.

As for instructions of abiding in the unborn, it can be put into modern everyday terms to make it clear to anyone. Abiding in the unborn means not giving birth to fixed ideas about whatever we experience. It is called unborn because it is without any concrete view, concept or feeling. Once a label that we believe to be real is attached to something there will be emotions and from emotions deeds, habits and new births. But if we understand that only the unborn is our true nature and not any thing that the mind gives birth to, there is no reason from then on to identify with passing experiences. Of course, the teachings of emptiness and selflessness are the same as this, there is nothing new invented, only the format changes.

In Bankei's words:

"That you do see and hear and smell in this way without giving rise to the thought that you will is the proof that this in-herent Buddha-mind is unborn and possessed of a wonderful illuminative wisdom. The Unborn manifests itself in the thought "I want to see" or "I want to hear" not being born. When a dog howls, even if ten million people said in chorus that it was the sound of a crow cawing, I doubt if you'd be convinced. It's highly unlikely there would be any way they could delude you into believing what they said. That's owing to the marvelous awareness and unbornness of your Buddha-mind. The reason I say it's in the "Unborn" that you see and hear in this way is because the mind doesn't give "birth" to any thought or inclination to see or hear. Therefore it is unborn. Being unborn, it's also undying: It's not possible for what is not born to perish. This is the sense in which I say that all people have an unborn Buddha-mind."
(Waddell: The Unborn, p. 88)

Regarding Bankei's arduous practice, he explains:

"You can gather from what I've told you that my practice lasted many long years and that I came to realize my Buddha-mind only after great hardship. But you can grasp your Buddha-minds very easily, right where you sit, without that long, punishing practice. That shows the relation that links you to Buddhahood is stronger than mine was. You're all very fortunate indeed."
(p. 90)

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 23rd, 2012 at 3:19 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land location

Content:

Astus wrote:

If there is analysis to be applied to the Pure Land teaching, it has to follow the teachings of the Buddha to make sense. First of all, whatever realm is experienced by a sentient being is because of its karma, its mental habits. It is not that there is some independent external world that people just fall in or go to. The external is a result and reflection of internal factors. Buddha-lands are the results of each buddha's merit accumulated and vows made through their bodhisattva path over many kalpas. Being born in a land where there is a living buddha is also a matter of karma for beings, that is, their mental status. Different lands have their own conditions for beings to get there, and that's how going to the Western Land of Amita Buddha is relatively easy compared to many other buddha-lands.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 23rd, 2012 at 3:56 PM

Title: Re: Bankei's "method" of abiding in the unborn

Content:

Astus wrote:

Matt,

Bankei has the answer for those questions. In short, the buddha-mind is without delusions, once found and one abides by it there is no hindrance or obstacle. If there is still identification with habits it is not the unborn.

Haskel: Bankei Zen, p. 82-84 said:

A monk who had come from Sendai in Oshu said: "Somewhere I seem to recall there being the expression, The mind enslaved to physical form.' I'm anxious to accord with original mind at all times, but how should I practice in order to do this? Please instruct me."

The Master replied: "In my school, there's no special form of instruction; and as for religious practice, there's no particular way for doing that either. People fail to realize that right within themselves they're fully endowed with the Buddha Mind they have from their parents innately, so they lose their freedom and talk about wanting to 'accord with original mind.' When you've realized that the Buddha Mind you have from your parents is unborn and marvelously illuminating, your hands and feet will function freely, and that's the working of the marvelously illuminating Buddha Mind which is unborn.

"As proof that your Buddha Mind is unborn and freely functioning: When you came from Sendai having heard about Bankei, you traveled a long way; but as you stopped for the night here and there along the road, you weren't thinking continuously about me. In the daytime, you looked around at all the sights, and if you had traveling companions, you talked to them. But even though you didn't walk along thinking about our meeting and deliberately keeping it in mind at every step of the way, in the end you arrived here at my place. This is what's meant by the Buddha Mind being unborn and perfectly managing things.

"Now, the herons you see in Sendai are white, without having to be dyed that way; and the crows, without being dyed, are black. And right here too, even though when you see them you're not deliberately trying to distinguish between the two, as soon as they appear before you, you know the white one's a heron and the black one's a crow.

Without rousing a single thought, it's all smoothly managed, isn't it?"

Then, the monk asked: "I find it impossible to control all my passions and delusions. What should I do? It's simply proved too much for me, and I wish to receive your instruction."

The Master replied: "Your idea of wanting to control your passions and delusions is itself delusion, changing the Buddha Mind for delusion! Delusions don't have any actual substance when they arise. In fact, they're nothing but shadow figures, things you've seen and heard that pop up sporadically in response to circumstances."

Again, the monk questioned the Master: "What is enlightenment?"

The Master replied: "There's no such thing as enlightenment. It's a completely extraneous pursuit. To realize conclusively that the Buddha Mind you have from your parents innately is unborn and marvelously illuminating— that's enlightenment. Not realizing this makes you deluded. Since the Original Buddha Mind is unborn, it functions without thoughts of delusion or thoughts of wanting to be enlightened. As soon as you think of wanting to be enlightened, you leave the place of the Unborn and go counter to it. Because the Buddha Mind is unborn, it has no thoughts at all. Thoughts are the source of delusion. When thoughts are gone, delusion vanishes too. And once you've stopped being deluded, talking about wanting to attain 'enlightenment' certainly is useless, don't you agree?"

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 23rd, 2012 at 4:20 PM

Title: Re: Essential Chan Buddhism: Heart of Chan - NYC Nov 7th, 2012

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here are some studies on Chan lineage history:

* highly recommended

*John R. McRae: Seeing through Zen: Encounter, Transformation, and Genealogy in Chinese Chan Buddhism

Albert Welter: Monks, Rulers, and Literati: The Political Ascendancy of Chan Buddhism

John R. McRae: The Northern School and the formation of early Ch'an Buddhism

Wendi Leigh Adamek: The Mystique of Transmission: On an Early Chan History and Its Contexts

*Morten Schlütter: How Zen Became Zen: The Dispute Over Enlightenment and the Formation of Chan Buddhism in Song-Dynasty China

Elizabeth A. Morrison: The Power of Patriarchs: Qisong and Lineage in Chinese Buddhism

*Jiang Wu: Enlightenment in Dispute: The Reinvention of Chan Buddhism in Seventeenth-Century China

And two extras not strictly on lineage:

Robert H. Sharf: Coming to Terms With Chinese Buddhism: A Reading of the Treasure Store Treatise

Albert Welter: The Linji Lu and the Creation of Chan Orthodoxy: The Development of Chan's Records of Sayings Literature

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 23rd, 2012 at 7:23 PM

Title: Re: Bankei's "method" of abiding in the unborn

Content:

Astus wrote:

A <http://www.dharmanet.org/Bankei.htm>.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 23rd, 2012 at 8:00 PM

Title: Re: Akshobhya and Amitabha

Content:

Astus wrote:

One can follow the idea of different gotras, sure. I personally believe in the universal potentiality of complete liberation, aka tathagatagarbha.

Author: Astus

Date: Tuesday, October 23rd, 2012 at 8:04 PM

Title: Re: Time and re-incarnation

Content:

Astus wrote:

Since causes are followed by consequences, this is quite linear and makes it impossible to return to a previous state that was the cause of the present state, since the previous causes are already gone.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 24th, 2012 at 3:20 PM

Title: Re: Bankei's "method" of abiding in the unborn

Content:

Astus wrote:

Bankei gives a very simple method, the Unborn. The buddha-mind is the object of meditation, the basis, the method and the goal of the meditation. That's why clarifying first on the level of experience what the buddha-mind is is the most important thing in Zen.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 24th, 2012 at 3:46 PM

Title: Re: Questioning Alayavijnana

Content:

Astus wrote:

anjali,

The idea that there is no subject-object in the alayavijnana is problematic already. The very definition of consciousness is that there is a subject consciousness being conscious of a mental object. If there were a stand alone, independent consciousness it would make it a substance, an eternal thing, an atman. Also, if the basis were pure there is no reason for impurity to arise. Pure mixing with impure to make a single consciousness is another problem, because it lacks the explanation for the connection between the two. By the way, in your quote it just gives an example but not an explanation of latent seeds, failing to address the problem of unconscious mental factors. Also, the seeds are not one but many mental factors, each with its own causal continuum of momentary existence and disappearance.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 24th, 2012 at 4:15 PM

Title: Re: Time to reform Buddhism entirely.

Content:

Astus wrote:

The only reform Buddhism always needs is more realised beings and less traditionalism-ritualism. But it is happening anyway.

"You are all already perfect buddhas."

"I'm not."

"OK, you're not."

(á la Life of Brian)

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 24th, 2012 at 6:45 PM

Title: Re: All Buddhists Are Atheists

Content:

Astus wrote:

Western Buddhists can be theists, atheists and anything else they want, because they generally lack both a traditional and an educated view of Buddhism. This is just individualism in use. And that's how people can't clearly define what Buddhism is or how it relates to other concepts. On the other hand, it is a great event to see the process of changing Buddhism to fit a new culture.

This is also an opportunity to reflect on our own ingrained assumptions and expectations, habitual views that we want things to match. Some prefer colourful gods and buddhas, some want scientific materialism. In my understanding the path to liberation is about recognising and overcoming such attachments. But Buddhism has many facets and gives something to people with all kinds of motivation to satisfy their grasping mind while at the same time teaching something good. That's why belief in God, gods or no god is generally not a problem. Even historically the Buddha left the laity to their own local faiths.

This is a fine article regarding the concept of God in Buddhism:

<http://ccbs.ntu.edu.tw/FULLTEXT/JR-PHIL/jackson.htm>

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 24th, 2012 at 8:49 PM

Title: Re: All Buddhists Are Atheists

Content:

Astus wrote:

Interesting. She said God, but didn't mean God. She said Eternal, but didn't mean Eternal. Zen is very confusing. Nevertheless, it is now at least clear that there is neither God nor Eternal in Buddhism according to Rev. Jiyu.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 24th, 2012 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: All Buddhists Are Atheists

Content:

oushi said:

The problem of God lies not in religions, but in narrow minded people who, trying to grasp the teachings, objectified God.

I don't believe that there is anyone here (or even out there) that can refute Sasaki Roshi.

Astus wrote:

What male and female gods? And why even mention any god if it can't be even thought of? Also, Sasaki Roshi is neither the Buddha nor a sutra.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 24th, 2012 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: All Buddhists Are Atheists

Content:

oushi said:

Male and female gods are two fundamental functions of the mind. Male god makes objects out of female god, like you are doing it here. If you think you can find an object that is God, you will fail, also from the Christian point of view. God is the union of those two. There is a perfect reason why mention about this union. When you talk about the Buddha, you are talking about the same. Why do you talk about Buddha, when you are not talking about a historical person? Sasaki Roshi is neither the Buddha nor a sutra I asked you before, "what is Buddha?", and you didn't seem to know. Sasaki is not a Buddha, and nothing but the Buddha.

Astus wrote:

Gods and mental functions generally define quite different things. This is again a confusion of terminology. Not to mention the use of male and female for non-biological non-beings is also problematic. If I talk about "the Buddha" I mean Siddhartha Gautama. If I say "a buddha" it is any being who achieved perfect enlightenment. I don't consider Sasaki roshi any of the two.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 24th, 2012 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: Why not Theravada

Content:

Astus wrote:

Theravada is a lot smaller in terms of variety of teachings and texts. Mahayana includes everything there is in Buddhism.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 25th, 2012 at 3:27 AM

Title: Re: All Buddhists Are Atheists

Content:

Jnana said:

Well, right view is important. Without it non-conceptual jñāna doesn't occur. And without non-conceptual jñāna liberation can't be realized.

Astus wrote:

But very few Buddhists care about liberation, or believe that it is possible in this life for them. And even when some say it is important for them they lack the motivation to relinquish their own views. That's how stream entry and the first bhumi became traditionally high level goals when they were meant to be the entrance originally. Those who believe that buddhahood is just a single realisation away (sudden paths) tend to use it as an excuse for disparaging every other teaching while they themselves wait for some sort of miraculous enlightenment without knowing the path leading to it. Therefore accumulating merit and developing familiarity with the Dharma has to be regarded as an auspicious sign that the person will eventually conform with the teaching sometime in the future.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 25th, 2012 at 5:16 AM

Title: Re: Bankei's "method" of abiding in the unborn

Content:

Astus wrote:

Bankei teaches what has always been the main doctrine of Zen. It is the reverse of saying that one should see how things are empty, instead he points to this mind that thinks and feels as originally perfect. That is, it's not about letting go our attachments but realising that the mind is already without attachments. Because of that there is no development or gradual training involved here. The only source of problem, as he says, is exchanging the buddha-mind to all sorts of ideas and emotions. Why do we do that? Because we don't know yet that this mind is already unborn and functions perfectly. Seeing that it functions just fine means that we don't need to struggle, we don't need to come up with different solutions to our situation where we become motivated by craving and anger. We give birth to many attachments because we don't trust in the buddha-mind, we want to handle everything ourselves. That's why Bankei teaches about the unborn by showing how the mind recognises the sounds of dogs and birds, how the mind manages to direct our steps without effort or trouble. Those are immediate proofs of the buddha-mind's natural functions that we all know about already. This is not complicated at all.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 25th, 2012 at 3:17 PM

Title: Re: Bankei's "method" of abiding in the unborn

Content:

Alex123 said:

Thank you for your reply. The point of difficulty is what to do, or how to stop states such as anger, anxiety, fear, lust, etc from arising at the future date? I understand that they occur spontaneously " on their own " and without having to make up conscious decision for such a state to arise.

Astus wrote:

Anger, anxiety, fear, lust, etc. don't arise spontaneously, we give rise to them by first identifying with our thoughts and making judgements about things being attractive, repulsive or uninteresting, then again holding the emotion generated by our thoughts thus eventually giving rise to action. When it seems that emotions or actions appear by themselves it is the case that we don't recognise our thought processes, which is ignorance, unawareness. That's why abiding in the unborn means that no ideas and impulses take over the control.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 25th, 2012 at 8:22 PM

Title: Re: Bankei's "method" of abiding in the unborn

Content:

Astus wrote:

Matt,

Whatever appears, see that it is something born, not your real nature, and let it return to the unborn, let it dissolve on its own. You have to maintain grasping at an emotion or thought to make it stay, and grasping happens because you regard it as your real nature.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 25th, 2012 at 9:11 PM

Title: Re: All Buddhists Are Atheists

Content:

Astus wrote:

Oushi,

Materialism - believing that everything is ultimately matter - is not a Buddhist view. In Buddhism the mind is not material.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, October 25th, 2012 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism without a teacher

Content:

Astus wrote:

No need to worry about having or not having a teacher. You can learn the Dharma from the right books (there are many wrong books too) and online from the right sources (and not bad sources). How to tell the difference between right and wrong? Through studying and understanding the sutras and shastras. You can also ask many questions on this forum. There are teachers you can send e-mail to, if you you want. Even without personally meeting anyone the information you can get is enormous. And if you reach a point where you find that you could really use someone experienced to talk to you will be able to find the ways to travel.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 26th, 2012 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: Do you think Non-Buddhist can become enlightened?

Content:

Astus wrote:

There is even a special term for those who are enlightened without following the teaching of a buddha and without starting a new era of teachings: pratyekabuddha.

Also, the Buddha only said that enlightenment requires following the noble eightfold path. He didn't say that people should follow him personally.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, October 26th, 2012 at 10:35 PM

Title: Re: What takes rebirth: body or mind?

Content:

Astus wrote:

It is said: "The samsaric body circles."

The actual nature of mind is free of elaborations,

This sounds like separating buddha-mind from deluded mind, a simple dualism. But it's nothing to do with materialism, as he says that it relies on the samsarik material and mental body. As for his reference to prana, I leave that to those who believe in Tantra.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, October 28th, 2012 at 6:52 AM

Title: Re: Sri Simha in Zen/Chan lineage

Content:

Astus wrote:

The Indian lineage of Chan is taken from non-Chan sources and have nothing to do with Chan beyond the lineage concept that was created to legitimise Chinese teachers. I don't know who and when made up the Dzogchen lineage of the early teachers, but even the legends of the two Simhas don't match. Besides this accidental choice of name I see no connection here.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 29th, 2012 at 5:07 PM

Title: Re: Sri Simha in Zen/Chan lineage

Content:

Yudron said:

I don't think the received history of the early Dzogchen lineage is "made up." It is incomplete, however... and quite possibly was reconstructed based on oral history after the fact.

Astus wrote:

In any case, the two Simhas show know connection.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, October 29th, 2012 at 6:27 PM

Title: Re: All Buddhists Are Atheists

Content:

Astus wrote:

To me it seems that in Buddhism the common Indian deities/gods were gradually changed to bodhisattvas and buddhas in Mahayana, and naturally practices related to them developed from simple considering the buddha's and gods' good qualities into visualisations, prayers and rituals. If we drop the intellectual-philosophical explanation about the difference between buddhas and gods, and how everything is mind made and empty, on the everyday practical level in religious practice whether one prays to Tara, Guanyin or Virgin Mary for a son it makes no difference. Why is it not important if the being one prays to is a god or a buddha? Because the beings are easily exchangeable without affecting the content and the nature of the prayer and the ritual. Buddhism could incorporate Indian deities into its pantheon even as buddhas, like Tara, or in Japan they could reinterpret Shinto gods as bodhisattvas and buddhas. The latest example is Jesus as a bodhisattva.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, October 31st, 2012 at 5:57 PM

Title: Re: what's the fundamental difference?

Content:

Astus wrote:

First it should be clarified what they are that you want to see the difference between. Theravada is a specific school that is based on Pali language canonical and extra-canonical works with several regional varieties in South Asia. Mahayana and Vajrayana are not schools, they don't have their own organisation or any fixed canon, they are rather types of teachings and practices. However, what people usually mean by Mahayana is every other existing Buddhist schools besides Theravada, and by Vajrayana it is usually Tibetan Buddhism. Therefore, for practical and historical reasons, Buddhism is divided to regional areas, that is: South (mainly Sri Lanka, Cambodia, Myanmar, Laos, Thailand; source is Sri Lanka), East (mainly China, Korea, Vietnam, Japan; source is China), North (mainly Tibet, Bhutan, Mongolia; source is Tibet). These three regions first of all use different canonical languages, developed on their own mostly without connection to the other two, and also represent distinct cultural areas. One more important thing is that they use slightly different monastic regulations, and since Buddhism's primary upholders are the monastics, the lineages are first of all defined by ordination type.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 1st, 2012 at 7:45 AM

Title: Re: Can a Buddha intervene with our karma?

Content:

Astus wrote:

If buddhas could change the karma of beings, then it follows that all beings would be enlightened, and there would be no need for personal effort of any kind, since the buddhas want to save everyone. However, when there is a teaching that says that some buddha or bodhisattva purifies one's karma, it is because one's own connection to the buddha that is generated through a specific practice. In the Lotus Sutra it is taught that Avalokitesvara can save one from practically anything starting with mundane troubles up to the root afflictions of the mind, but only if one correctly keeps in mind the bodhisattva. In the sutras about Amitabha buddha we learn that birth in his Land of Bliss is easily attainable even for one who committed the gravest crimes, if one remembers Amitabha with faith. In order to be purified by Vajrasattva there is a quite elaborate practice that includes visualisation, recitation and repentance. So it is not that buddhas just intervene in any being's karma. It is exactly because doing the proper practices (i.e. generating karma) that one can negate other karmic effects.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 1st, 2012 at 8:20 AM

Title: Re: Sri Simha in Zen/Chan lineage

Content:

Astus wrote:

Transmission in Zen is not really a historical matter. It is mind to mind, not hand to hand. If we focus on historical facts and religious legends the true intention is already lost.

"According to tradition, Master Chih died in the year 514, while Bodhidharma came to Liang in 520; since there is a seven year discrepancy, why is it said that the two met? This must be a mistake in the tradition. As to what is recorded in tradition, I will not discuss this matter now. All that's important is to understand the gist of the matter." (Yuanwu's commentary on the case of Bodhidharma meeting the emperor, in The Blue Cliff Record, tr. T. Cleary, p. 5)

"We learn that Shakyamuni Buddha inherited the Dharma from Kashō Buddha, and we learn that Kashō Buddha inherited the Dharma from Shakyamuni Buddha. When we learn the matter in this way, it will be the true succession of Buddha after Buddha and Ancestor after Ancestor."

(Dogen: Shisho in Shobogenzo, tr. H. Nearman, p. 171)

"Hōen of Tōzan said, "Even Shakyā and Maitreya are servants of another. I want to ask you, who is he?"

(Gateless Gate, case 45, tr. K. Sekida)

"all of the buddhas and all of their teachings of peerless perfect enlightenment spring forth from this sūtra."

(Diamond Sutra, ch. 8, tr. C. Muller)

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 1st, 2012 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: Can a Buddha intervene with our karma?

Content:

Astus wrote:

lucidaromulus,

In chapter 25 of the Lotus Sutra it is told how Guanyin helps anyone who thinks of her. But as I said before, there is the condition of remembrance, actually making it a form of practice. However, if Guanyin were able to help people of her own free will nobody would have any trouble in life.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 2nd, 2012 at 9:12 PM

Title: Hsiu-hsiu-an Discourse on Sitting Meditation

Content:

Astus wrote:

This is said to be a 14th century Chan text that is used in Won Buddhism. Ryuei's blog has some commentary on it.

Translation by <http://fraughtwithperil.com/ryuei/2011/09/13/hsiu-hsiu-an-discourse-on-sitting-meditation/>:

Hsiu-hsiu-an Discourse on Sitting Meditation

Generally, to practice sitting meditation one must reach the highest excellence and ought to be naturally alert.

Cutting off thinking and yet not falling into dullness is called "sitting." Remaining without passion in a passionate situation and without defilement when dwelling amidst defilement is called "meditation."

Allowing nothing external to enter and nothing internal to leave is called "sitting." Having no abode and depending on nothing while constantly lighting the way before one is called "meditation."

Remaining unmoved when the outside world is moving and staying quiet and free from agitation in the middle of it all is called “sitting.” Turning the light back within to illuminate and discern the root source of all phenomena is called “meditation.”

Refraining from acting on the favorable and unfavorable circumstances one is faced with and likewise not being turned aside by the distractions of forms and sounds is called “sitting.” Illuminating the darkness so that the brightness exceeds that of the sun and moon and transforming matters so that virtue overcomes heaven and earth is called “meditation.”

Entering the samadhi free of distinctions when surrounded by distinctions is called “sitting.” Displaying the wisdom which discerns distinctions even when there are no distinctions is called “meditation.”

In summary, the blazing work of the function in accord with the correct substance of the absolute is called “sitting”; while attaining the sublime throughout one’s length and breadth and thereby finding no obstructions when dealing with any matter is called “meditation.” These words are just a summary because no amount of paper or ink can thoroughly exhaust [the real meaning of sitting meditation].

The Naga’s great samadhi is neither quiet nor moved. It is the true thusness of the wondrous substance, which has no appearance and no disappearance. It cannot be seen when looked upon nor heard when listened to. It is empty yet not empty; being yet not being. It is vast enough to encompass what has no boundaries yet so minute that it can enter what has no inside. It is the universal spirit of knowledge and wisdom, radiant light, longevity, the great moving power, the great function, unexcelled and inexhaustible.

Someone with an aspiration [to be enlightened] should examine this fully in order to act in accord with the great enlightenment. After the single voiced roar [of awakening] the multitudes of subtle powers will all be complete in oneself. How can this be compared with the powers of darkness outside the Way transmitted by those claiming to be teachers who take what they have gained to be the final goal?

Translation from

<http://www.wonbuddhism.org/doc/4.buddhist.sutra%28english%29/8.Hsiu.Hsiu.Am.Di%20course.on.Meditation.pdf>:

Hsiu-Hsiu Am Discourse on Za-Zen

Generally, to practice Za(sitting)-Zen(meditation) is to reach the mental state of highest excellence and to be in the state of complete alertness.

When the mind is devoid of any thought and yet no drowsiness takes place, it is called Za; if there is no passion in a condition which fans it and if one transcends defilements in which one is, it is called zen.

When neither external sense-object enters the mind, nor the mind goes out towards external things, it is called Za. If the mind is neither attached to anything nor depends on anything so that the constant light illuminates, it is called Zen.

If the mind is not moved when the external conditions shake it and if the mind is quiet and free from agitation, it is called Zen. If the light going out is turned inward so that the source of the self-nature is reflected, it is called Zen.

If the mind is not agitated either by favorable or adverse conditions, nor is it rolled over by color or sound, it is called Za; if the light surpasses the sun and the moon when it illuminates the dark area, and if virtue surpasses heaven and earth when transforming things, it is called Zen.

To enter the state of samadhi in a condition of discrimination is called Za; to have the discerning Prajna in the condition of no discrimination is called Zen.

In conclusion: to keep the true nature of samadhi serene while the mind works like a blazing fire is called Za; to attain boundless wisdom and thereby to do things without any obstruction is called Zen.

Za-zen can be summarized briefly as this. However no amount of ink and paper would be sufficient for a detailed illustration.

The great Samdahi of Naga is neither quiet nor moved; the wondrous nature of True Thusness is neither born nor annihilated. Neither can it be seen when looked at, nor can it be heard when listened to. It is empty and yet it is not; it exists and yet it does not. It is as vast as to envelop what has no boundary and it is as minute as to enter what has no inside. The magic power, light, longevity, great moving power and the application of the one who is enlightened to it are inexhaustible and limitless.

If one with an aspiration to be enlightened practices Za-Zen in a proper way until one attains the great enlightenment, one will be filled with various powers of wondrous spirit at the roar of awakening. How could this be compared with the wicked heretics who, with their instructions, claim to be teachers, and who take what they gain to be the final goal?

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 3rd, 2012 at 12:40 AM

Title: The Source of What: Who Transmits What?

Content:

Astus wrote:

"Without fully and finally letting go one's self-with-form, there can be no transmission — even if one has received innumerable transmission certificates from various lineages. The basis and source of transmission in Zen is the awakening to one's selfless self. And this emerges precisely from the dropping away of self, once and for all. Remember the character I wrote on the board? That's it. No one transmits anything to anyone; in other words, shin or kokoro transmits kokoro to kokoro by way of kokoro. That's all."

<http://beingwithoutself.files.wordpress.com/2011/07/sourceofzenwhotransmitswhat.pdf> by Jeff Shore is a wonderful summary of the issue that combines both the Zen and the scholarly view.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 4th, 2012 at 2:32 AM

Title: Re: Why academics value Buddhism?

Content:

Astus wrote:

Talking about monasticism and academics, for instance Robert E. Buswell is both a scholar and ex-monk. He also wrote a book "The Zen Monastic Experience: Buddhist Practice in Contemporary Korea". Even today, the general system in Korea is that monks and nuns stay in a monastery for 2×3 months and then wander for 2×3 months.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 4th, 2012 at 6:46 PM

Title: Re: Zen has No Morals

Content:

Astus wrote:

Here is something interesting from the wonderful Bankei,

Bankei Zen, tr. P. Haskel, p. 7 said:

A certain master of the Precepts School asked: "Doesn't your Reverence observe the precepts?"

The Master said: "Originally, what people call the precepts were all for wicked monks who broke the rules; for the man who abides in the Unborn Buddha Mind, there's no need for precepts. The precepts were taught to help sentient beings—they weren't taught to help buddhas! What everyone has from his parents innately is the Unborn Buddha Mind alone, so abide in the Unborn Buddha Mind. When you abide in the Unborn Buddha Mind, you're a living buddha here today, and that living buddha certainly isn't going to concoct anything like taking the precepts, so there aren't any precepts for him to take. To concoct anything like taking the precepts is not what's meant by the Unborn Buddha Mind. When you abide in the Unborn Buddha Mind, there's no way you can violate the precepts. From the standpoint of the Unborn, the precepts too are secondary, peripheral concerns; in the place of the Unborn, there's really no such thing as precepts. . . ."

Astus wrote:

So, there is no need for the precepts, because they don't violate it anyway.

Author: Astus

Date: Thursday, November 8th, 2012 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: Why isn't Tendai popular in the West?

Content:

Astus wrote:

What I'm missing from Tendai are translations. Zen has most of the major sutras and masters translated to English, and there are many studies on the history and teachings. As for Tendai, there's not much one can study.

Author: Astus

Date: Friday, November 9th, 2012 at 8:59 PM

Title: Re: Mondo Zen, Integral Zen (tm)

Content:

Astus wrote:

It seems that the founders and members found Zen presented in America lacking in certain aspects, thus created this newer format. I consider it a natural evolution of modern (non-Buddhist) Zen.

Look at this bibliography: http://www.mondozen.org/resource_library/reading_list.htm "onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 10th, 2012 at 8:36 AM

Title: Re: Mondo Zen, Integral Zen (tm)

Content:

Astus wrote:

What I'm really missing is the description of the actual methods and teachings. There are all these praises about the teacher and the method, but no real information.

However, by a simple search I've found their http://www.mondozen.org/_literature_104890/Mondo_Zen_Training_Manual_April_2012 that describes the whole process. It seems to me like a very interesting application of Rinzai Zen koan process transformed into a modern training. So, before any further critiques, I recommend everyone to read it.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 10th, 2012 at 8:09 PM

Title: Re: Mondo Zen, Integral Zen (tm)

Content:

Thus-gone said:

I'm sure it's helpful on a psychological level, and may even trigger some kind of opening experience, but I see no place for the deepening and integration of awakening that is the very essence of the Zen school.

Astus wrote:

What makes you say so? In their koan training they seem to really work on making people realise the essentials of Zen, and after that they also have a 60-day follow up programme to deepen the realisation. And depending on personal choice one could still continue practising with or without a group.

Author: Astus

Date: Saturday, November 10th, 2012 at 11:56 PM

Title: Re: Mondo Zen, Integral Zen (tm)

Content:

Astus wrote:

I've read the manual and besides its language and using some psychological terms and ideas it is within the limits of a Zen Buddhist training. In fact, to me it looks very good as a modern application of classical techniques. It is to the point, step by step and helpful.

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, November 11th, 2012 at 8:07 AM
Title: Re: Mondo Zen, Integral Zen (tm)
Content:
Astus wrote:
BuddhaSoup,

Yes, I've recognised that too. However, it might as well be viewed as a working technique. It doesn't determine anything about the cost of training and the way it is run. Instead of jumping to conclusions the facts should be checked first.

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, November 11th, 2012 at 8:35 PM
Title: Re: Mondo Zen, Integral Zen (tm)
Content:
Astus wrote:
Jinzang,

People who are not already in Buddhism must have a reason to engage in Zen or any other form of Buddhist practice. It is not by accident that the Dalai Lama propagates the scientific research on meditation, it actually validates Buddhism and makes it more appealing to people than just a strange eastern religion. Self-help (pseudo-)psychology is a common entry point to the Dharma.

Why is it wrong? What is confirmed is how the practice should be done. Especially at the beginning it is important to have a clear understanding of what the method is about and to develop faith and aspiration. Otherwise, if people are left in the darkness and just told to sit silently it will hardly bring any good result. In the case of Zen in order to do it correctly one must first become experientially established in buddha-mind, or it is not Zen.

Author: Astus
Date: Sunday, November 11th, 2012 at 9:58 PM
Title: Re: Mondo Zen, Integral Zen (tm)
Content:
Astus wrote:

How they manage their organisation is a different area than their doctrinal and practical teachings. If a commercial model works better than the one based on donations I don't see it as an error. Profit oriented spiritual enterprises are a problem when the money is not used for the welfare of the people but turned into the private wealth of the owners of the organisation. In fact, the Buddhist form of community is that there are no owners or leaders but only members. In practice, however, throughout the history of Buddhism the system produced strong managers and head teachers who had overwhelming influence over spiritual and financial matters. Is Mondo Zen about benefiting only those few at the top or is it about bringing the Dharma to more and more people?

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 11th, 2012 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: Question about Korean Zen

Content:

Astus wrote:

As I've said here before, Korean Zen should not be reduced to a single entity. It shows a great diversity in terms of how Zen and Buddhism in general is approached and taught. Within the Jogye Order there are different groups with their own ideas and methods. Hwadu practice is the prevalent technique, but there are teachers who instead of that emphasise yeombul (buddha-remembrance), kongan or something else. The ganhwa method itself can be used in different ways. It shouldn't be forgot that calling it "Korean" Buddhism defines only its geographical and cultural situation, not its content.

Author: Astus

Date: Sunday, November 11th, 2012 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: Recommended reading on Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Astus wrote:

As for East Asian Buddhism, the Kuroda Institute has two series:

<http://uhpress.wordpress.com/books-in-series/kuroda-institute/>, they contain many good works. Orthodox Chinese Buddhism by Ven. Shengyan is a good introduction to general Chinese Buddhism. Specifically about Zen, Steven Heine and Dale S. Wright edited a series published by Oxford University Press. Works by John R. McRae, Jan Nattier, Robert H. Sharp, Bernard Faure, Albert Welter, Robert E. Buswell Jr., Charles A. Muller, Taigen Dan Leighton and others are also recommended.

For the Abhidharmakosa, this is a useful blog: <http://abhidharmakosa.wordpress.com/>.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 12th, 2012 at 2:23 AM

Title: Re: Mondo Zen, Integral Zen (tm)

Content:

Astus wrote:

The question is whether there is an option to just participate in whatever programme for free. Usually in any European country people can go in to a Christian church and just listen to the priest or minister. There are temples that are open for the public all day and they don't ask for anything. However, the major Christian organisations receive state support in many countries. That means that the buildings and the priests are paid indirectly by everyone. Buddhist organisations have that only in Asia. However, regardless if it's Christian or Buddhist, if there is a special programme, like a retreat, people are asked to pay. The system of donation works only when there are enough people willing to pay for those who can't pay, or rather when the people supported receive sufficient funds to run the organisation. Ultimately it is up to the people who pay, not those who ask for the money. So if the question is what we can do as individuals, it is choosing an organisation that we are happy to support regularly.

Author: Astus

Date: Monday, November 12th, 2012 at 7:19 PM

Title: Re: Mondo Zen, Integral Zen (tm)

Content:

Astus wrote:

Thanks Lance for sharing your experience.

Author: Astus

Date: Wednesday, November 14th, 2012 at 5:51 PM

Title: Re: Where is Mount Sumeru?

Content:

Astus wrote:

